It is not surprising that for Cyprian paenitentia and satisfactio[84] are termini technici, while a corresponding notion for 'sorrow' in the modern sense of a mere change of 'attitude' is unknown to him. The only sorrow which he knows is the one which is just as clearly and really effective as was the sin in question. Thus he prescribes a longa et plena paenitentia. This theory of sin and the forgiveness of sins is so consonant with his thinking that the bases of a more nuanced view which we discussed above do not show themselves effectively. A further development which would not depart from the basic living principle is possible only if it goes beyond even the generally accepted theory in contemporary theology; and this is a task which one can hardly set for the Bishop of Carthage.

This view is not only an interpretation and a construction which exceeds what is empirically tangible in Cyprian himself. He provides many sufficient indications of the fact that for him genuine sorrow must be just as real an act as the sin which is being expiated, and that [183] assurance of its genuineness and its success before God is given to the extent that it really is an act. One has only to consider the general line of argument followed by Cyprian in De lapsis or in the corresponding letters to realize that for him the refusal to take on a paenitentia with a long-lasting satisfactio is, in itself, tantamount to a lack of 'sorrow', so the question does not arise at all why one cannot be satisfied with the sorrow of the lapsi. A pax without previous doing of penance is only a useless appearance (De lapsis 15-16). Not surprisingly (cf. Epist. 55,18), despite the real difficulties involved in a speedy reconciliation, Cyprian knows only the distinction between a paenitentia plena et iusta and the paenitentiae simulatio.

Once one presupposes that in Cyprian sorrow and doing penance are completely identical, then the postponement of sorrow until the point of death becomes understandable. If there is no paenitentiam agere present, the true dolor delictorum is also lacking (Epist. 55,23). This notion that 'sorrow', to be really effective, must be realized in the doing of penance is well expressed in Epist. 31,6 by the apparently nonsensical formulation (paenitentia . . . paenitentiam probat). Here we read: sed pudor, sed modestia, sed paenitentia,[85] sed disciplina, sed humilitas atque subiectio . . . hoc est quod paenitentiam probat. Penance as an act is the real proof of penance as an attitude even for the person who is doing this penance himself. There are many other indications which could be adduced in support of this view. Although the psychology which it implies, even when it is applied to a complicated individual case, may appear to be somewhat crude, nevertheless its importance and its practicality immediately become apparent once one asks how genuine 'sorrow' is to be established both by the Church and by the sinner himself. His desire to be at peace with the Church, his regret of having been in a situation in which he 'had' to deny, his fear of God's [84] In his view the remission of sin is attached absolutely to the remission of the punishment due to sin, which is quite different from our modern view.

[85] The variant patientia of the Codex Baluzianus and several older editions before Hartel must, in view of the witness of the other codices, be considered an error.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

judgement and his subsequent repudiation of his fall (secundum quid) are all possible without excluding the fall itself and, therefore, do not necessarily amount to and express true 'sorrow'. As long as the existential situation, brought about' by sin, lasts, how can a person really be sorry for this sin other than by behaving in a contrary manner? If this is a valid argument, then a person can be 'sorry' for a denial of faith only by a renewed confession (Epist. 55,4; 19,2). If a person is not able to produce such a sorrow, he can rectify his unjust act only by an act of penance which shows that the position and attitude which led to his [184] sin have been radically altered for the good. This is because Cyprian is convinced that such sin usually springs from guilty attitudes which are already previously present and come to light in the sin (De lapsis 21/22; Epist. 65,3). Such attitudes are not eradicated by a mere 'regret' of the act alone. If, for instance, the love of material possessions leads to a fall from faith, then one cannot normally be existentially and convincingly sorry for this fault without giving up the corresponding material advantage (cf. De lapsis 35). Behind the 'still imperfect' theory of the remission of sins, which does not distinguish between the punishment due to sin and the guilt of sin, the Bishop of Carthage holds, therefore, an insight which is obscured by the too self-evident distinction between the incurring of guilt and the incurring of punishment, an insight into an existentially realistic psychology of true sorrow and, therefore, of the true nature of guilt itself.

The background of Cyprian's penitential teaching becomes even clearer when it is asked: how does he know that sins committed after baptism have to be remitted in a way different from those committed before baptism? The 'argument from Scripture', according to which good works remit sins (cf. Sir 3:30; Tob 4:10, Luke 11:40), without relating to the baptismal remission in Christ's blood so that there remains only one other object of this remission, namely, sins committed after baptism, is too artificial and complicated to have been the real basis of this teaching. Indeed it is a proof (De op. et eleem. 2; Epist. 55,22) which already presupposes its conclusion.

A reason for Cyprian's view could also be the semel of baptism which he mentions in this context. Since, according to tradition (Eph. 4:5; cf. Heb. 6:4),[86] there is only 'one' baptism, and this expression, right from the beginning, means not only the specific unity of every valid baptism but also the fact that it is possible only once for every individual,[87] Cyprian and his predecessors who, as he, taught the difference between the remission of sins before and after baptism, could have concluded that here there was not only an external, ritual difference but a profound, real one. A mere ritual difference would involve that there was simply one pardon of sins.

In connection with the idea of the unrepeatable possibility of 'baptism for the pardon of sins', and based upon it, the teaching of the intrinsic difference of the post-baptismal forgiveness of sins was always a more or less explicit part of the apostolic tradition. Nevertheless, [185] everything is not clear on this point. Like Tertullian, Cyprian also does not make any distinction either between guilt and punishment or between their remission. If in baptism guilt is forgiven and washed away, it must follow necessarily that in baptism the punishment is waived. Moreover, this waiving of the punishment is only another expression for the pardon of guilt, and not something additional to the teaching of the forgiveness of [86] Cf. Melito, Fragm. 12 (Otto IX 418); Hermas, Mand. IV 3,1; Tertullian, De bapt. 15; De paen. 7,10; De pud. 18,15; Clemens Alex., Paedag. I 6,29,5-30,1; Hippolyt, Philosoph. VI 41,2 f.; Origen, Exhort. ad mart. 30; Didasc. Apost. VI,12,2. As is generally known, the ε3ν βα&πτισμα ει0φ α!φεσιν τω~ν α(μαρτιω~ν is explicitly confessed later in the Eastern symbols (cf. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole, pp. 130, 134, 135, 137, 138, 146, 153, 165, 166). For Cyprian, cf. Epist. 63,8: baptisma . . . semel . . . sumitur nec rursus iteratur.

[87] In Tertullian, De bapt. 15 both of these aspects of the one baptism are mentioned together, to enable him to deduce from this unity both the fact that heretics are unable to baptize and the fact that baptism itself cannot be repeated.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

guilt, as it is so considered by us today, and which, therefore, requires its own proof and a special declaration. This is the meaning of the following statement of Tertullian: exempto scilicet reatu eximitur et poena (De bapt. 5). It is precisely the possibility of concluding to the pardon of the poena from the remission of the reatus that shows that both are here the same and, therefore, arc remitted at the same time and together. Clement of Alexandria holds the same view (Paed. I 6,26,2). The verbal difference between α(μαρτι/α and ε0πιτιμι/α does not indicate that he is aware of different possibilities for the remission of guilt and punishment, but rather the contrary, since it is presupposed as self-evident that in baptism the ε0πιτιμι/α is forgiven along with guilt.

The ancient teaching, already traditional before Cyprian, on the complete remission of guilt in the one baptism does not explain how a possible remission of sins after baptism comes about otherwise than in baptism itself. On the contrary, this possibility itself is difficult to account for logically. Nevertheless since it was a firm datum of tradition and, at the same time, baptism was unrepeatable, it was necessary and natural to look in another direction for such a unified remission of guilt and punishment in the case of sins committed after baptism. For this purpose all that could be considered was a paenitentia plena which takes away the reatus culpae and the reatus poenae simultaneously.[88] If this conclusion were the only actual theological reason for the existence of the post-baptismal penitential practice and for the difference between it and the forgiveness of sins in baptism, then it is difficult to see how a pelagian interpretation can be precluded from the assertion that the person who sins after baptism can and must obliterate his faults through his own works without the grace of 'Christ's blood'.[89] In any case, it would seem to make the well-attested intervention on the Church's part unnecessary. The accusation of pelagianism cannot be avoided by maintaining that the works of penance themselves remit 'only' the punishment [186] due to sins, since according to Cyprian it is certainly sin itself that is remitted through the works of penance. It is also of little use, in this regard, to hold that these works of penance are only at all effective by the power of Christ's redeeming grace.[90] Although this point is undoubtedly valid, it actually serves to highlight the opposition between the remission of sins in baptism and in post-baptismal penance. It might be thought, therefore, that it is only in baptism that sins and punishments were forgiven together gratuitously, whereas in penance only the guilt but not the punishment was forgiven in this way. But this would be a distinction alien to Cyprian, and it would not explain how and from what source he knows about these two kinds of forgiveness. If he knew about it from an explicit theoretical tradition, then it is no longer possible to say why Cyprian did not consider the distinction between guilt and punishment more explicitly. Indeed it is only the fact that he did not so consider this question that makes the acceptance of such a tradition thinkable.

We are left, therefore, with the following dilemma: either the explicit tradition mentioned above had the dogmatic meaning that the post-baptismal remission of sins occurs by one's own efforts without the grace of Christ's blood, in which case this theory can simply maintain an opposition between baptism and penance and disregard the distinction between guilt and punishment, or this tradition is simply a matter of a practice in the Church, according to

[88] J. Grotz appears to be simply unaware of this explanation. Cf. S. Hübner, p. 74.
[89] Obviously Cyprian does make statements about the necessity of grace for all good actions. Dei est, inquam, Dei omne quod possumus (Ad Donat. 4). Nemo suis viribus fortis est (De dom.om.14). Tantum nos posse, quantum credimus (Test. III, 42). These statements, however, are not applied to the theology of satisfactio.
[90] Obviously both the OT and the NT say that good works remit sins. But this evidence, which Bossuet already used in Cyprian's defence, is not relevant. For in the Bible these statements are not used to establish the contrast between the two different methods of remission which Cyprian has in mind. In other words, in the Bible it remains debatable whether or not good works remit sins precisely because and in so far as they are an appropriation and effect of Christ's grace, that is, of redemption which is granted gratuitously.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which penance has to be done for sins committed after baptism. The explanation of this practice on the part of Cyprian and those who followed him would then be simply a theologumenon having no dogmatic significance. The first possibility is totally unacceptable for dogmatic reasons and is also historically at least unlikely. According to the second possibility, Cyprian is interpreting a tradition which has already been handed on to him. For its part, this tradition does not appear to have arisen from previous thinking. Nevertheless, the last point must be proven. As far as its theoretical presuppositions are concerned, it must also have been semi-pelagian. But this cannot apply to Cyprian. Moreover, if it is understood in the strict sense of the term, it applies even less to the time before Cyprian. Now if the practice did not emanate from such a theory, then the question remains, where could the difference of treatment of catechumens and those who have sinned after baptism have come from, since every practice has a theoretical background? The reason must have been [187] that a greater doubt is objectively justifiable with regard to the sincerity of a new change of attitude after baptism than with regard to the metanoia in baptism. This doubt is shared by both the penitent himself and the Church.

Thus in Cyprian's teaching the question of the distinction between the remission of sins in and after baptism brings out the same insight which had already been in evidence in his way of considering the nature of sin and the remission of sins. Despite a certain obscurity, the specific origin of Cyprian's teaching about the paenitentia iusta is his living awareness that only the act of penance is proper sorrow, giving the assurance of the genuine 'attitude' to which God grants his forgiveness. From this it follows almost self-evidently that something different and 'more' is demanded from a sinner who is baptized than from the catechumen. At his conversion to Christianity the latter breaks both from his whole past and from the surrounding pagan world. In the 'baptismal vows' of the abrenuntiatio he expresses in the most real and vital way possible an attitude which leaves absolutely nothing to be desired. He 'experiences' his new birth to the divine life in baptism at a depth and an intensity which leaves him in no doubt about the complete forgiveness of his guilt.[91]

The person who sins after baptism, however, has lost all this and has shown by his action that the radical Christian attitude and condition is not alive in him (any more). Thus the mere fact of being a Christian was not an existential proof of a true Christian attitude. He could consider this 'Christian' life, along with its wishes and sentiments, only with a more bitter scepticism. In view of this shattering experience, the question must have arisen concerning what would reassure both himself and the church community that he would struggle to recover that attitude which would make him worthy of the Spirit of God and of peace with God. Not 'sorrow' in feeling and words but only hard action could restore to a worthy man faith in his attitude. This experience, therefore, must have been the simple but continually effective starting-point from which the early Church prescribed, regulated and supervised personal penance, while the tangible forms and obligations of penance (prayer, fasting, penitential garb, etc.) merely continued the penitential practice of the synagogue.[92] For the [91] For this experience of regeneration, cf. Cyprian's composition Ad Donat. 3-4. It is a question of the experience which the regenerated man has of the power given by God. He overcomes immediately the old, radical addiction to sin which seemed to him previously to be invincible. Because of the experience of this heavenly, God-given vitality he knows already that one day he will stand justified before God. But what is the effect of a further sin after such an experience? This question spotlights what paenitentia is in its living source: it is the attempt of a man striving relentlessly for his salvation to restore himself slowly to that original state.

[92] Cf. J. Schümmer, Die altchristliche Fastenpraxis (Münster 1933), pp. 184-7. It is worth noting that already in the synagogue good works were demanded of a person who had been banned. Thus this is to be understood as a self-evident and traditional practice and not as something which was newly developed from a theory of penitential practice for those who were excluded from the Church. The subsequent theory explains the practice correctly and it turns out, in agreement with the whole of Christian teaching, to be logically and genuinely Christian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

latter there was no need of a special discovery. They needed only to be filled with new spirit and life and to be energetically prescribed.

[188] Cyprian's theory about this institution, which was already traditional for a long time before him, combines elements which are correct with those which are only provisional and indeed questionable. It is still possible to discern its Sitz im Leben. Thus the bishop of Carthage orders the confessors to observe actum et opera et merita of the individual penitents in order to discover quorum paenitentiam satisfactioni proximam conspicitis (Epist. 15,4). In this way the confessors were able to ascertain not the 'absolution' of guilt before God but only the genuineness of the penitents' sorrow, proven by their deed. But Cyprian is still not satisfied with this. His practice demands less than his teaching, but it still demands a great deal. It is in fact inspired by another conviction than that which he develops in his theory, namely that God forgives the person who is truly sorry and that this sorrow expresses itself in, and is proven by, paenitentia: paenitentia . . . paenitentiam probat. In this practice, which is simpler and also clearer than the theory, the paenitentia is for Cyprian what makes a sinner into a reformatum et depositis prioris vitae delictis ad sobrios et bonos mores et ad innocentiae disciplinam poenitentiae dolore correctum (Epist. 55,23). God is able to forgive the guilt of such a person by his grace. Cyprian also considers those worthy to receive the peace of the Church who, after their fall, have made a new confession, without suffering death for it (Epist. 25). He thinks that such a deed is a clear indication that one commissi vere et firmiter paenitet et fidei calor praevalet (Epist. 55,4). Moreover, attention has already been drawn above to the notion of satisfactio as an interior healing of the sinner. This need not be understood only as an 'image' of the strictly juridical notion of satisfactio. The 'payment of guilts' could just as well be seen as an image drawn from the juridical sphere to describe a paenitentia which in deed and truly heals the sinner from the interior consequences of sin in the very depths of his person, including his body. Only after this process is man free from all the 'punishments' of sin. Indeed in the early Church the principal 'works' of penance that were fasting and prayer[93] were frequently and insistently characterized as exorcism. It is the deed and not only the mere 'attitude' that transforms man and expels the 'forces of darkness'. Finally, Greek theology too, beginning with Clement of Alexandria, in its theory conceives the works of penance very clearly as an inner healing of man. Could it not be that this conception has just as much right to our attention as a correct and original [189] explanation of the penitential prescriptions practised in the early Church?

Despite this explanation of the real basis of penitential practice in the early Church, it is still possible to derive from it the teaching which has in fact long since been taken from it, namely, that in the sacrament of penance all the 'punishments' of sin are not necessarily and always forgiven. This constitutes a difference between baptism and penance which naturally can and must be shown in greater detail. Just the experience of an existentially limited intensity of conversion, due to the after-effect of previous guilt, includes, on its own, the persistence of a punishment of sin. Nevertheless, 'punishment' here is not to be understood as only imposed from outside, without an intrinsic relationship to man's moral situation and as a mere extrinsic reality. On this supposition, the real theological problem consists not in the question of why the punishments due to sin[94] can persist, despite sorrow, but rather in the question of why they arc totally waived in baptism. This question, however, only presented itself at the periphery of consciousness in the early Church. This is easily explained by the [93] Cf. Matt. 17:21; Mark 9:29; Tertullian, De ieiunio 8; Excerpta ex Theodoto 83.84; more in J. Schümmem, Die altchristliche Fastenpraxis (Münster 1933), pp. 175 f., 215 f.; F. J. Dolgem, Der Exorzismus im altchristlichen Taufritual (Paderborn 1909), pp. 80-6; J. Behm, νη=στιφ etc. in: ThW IV (Stuttgart 1942), pp. 925-35 (esp. 927,930: der apotropäische Charakter des Fastens im im Heidentum und Judentum).

[94] The punishments due to sin are understood here as the interior consequences of the punishment which are not necessarily taken away eo ipso by a change of attitude which is sufficient for salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

enthusiastic experience of the new birth in baptism on the part of the whole man. In any case, an objective answer to this question can be expected only from a systematic treatment of the subject.

5. The Effect of Reconciliation by the Church

A) THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THE CHURCH'S ACT IN PENANCE (APART FROM IN THE ACTUAL RECONCILIATION)

The Church's activity in penance is not confined to the re-bestowal of church fellowship – as we would say today, the 'absolution'. The whole Church with the bishop and the people and, especially, the confessors lend the penitent their support primarily in so far as they share in penance through prayer and the eucharistic offering. Thus the bishop prays daily for the penitents with tears asking for the plenissima pax (Epist. 43,6; De lapsis 32) and offers sacrifice for those who have fallen (De lapsis 16).[95] The confessors pray in a similar vein (De lapsis 36). As in Tertullian so also for Cyprian an intercession by the whole church community at the time of the liturgical exhomologesis would have been self-evident; it also gives its consent to the reconciliation [190] (Epist. 64,1). The Bishop of Carthage obviously visualizes all this as a support of the penitent's own satisfactio. He even recognizes a per episcopos et sacerdotes Domini Domino satisfacere (Epist. 43,3).[96] Since in Cyprian satisfactio is clearly distinguished from reconciliation itself, as its necessary prerequisite, it can be achieved only by such a support given to the penitent by intercession, but in no way exclusively per sacerdotes. The effect of this intervention, being a wish for divine pardon, is viewed just as eschatologically as the penitent's personal satisfactio. It, too, is effective at the judgement (De lapsis 17,36). In so far as the impositions of hands (?) at the exhomologesis are considered an exorcism, they too, by their scope and effect, are a similar support of the sinner's personal satisfaction through penance on the Church's part. This is the best way of understanding two otherwise quite unconnected elements which Cyprian brings together:[97] purgare conscientiam[98] sacrjficio et manu sacerdotis (De lapsis 16). The Bishop of Carthage

[95] An offerre pro illis, that is, the lapsi who are not yet actually reconciled, an offerre nomine eorum is indeed just as unlawful as the granting of the Eucharist (Epist. 15,1; 16,2; 17,22; 34,1). But what is meant there is obviously an offering of the Eucharist for the lapsi who, because of the provision of their gifts for the offering (cf. Epist. 34,1; 65,3), claim this as their right as full Christians, or their own celebration of 'private masses' for themselves in small circles (cf. Epist. 63,16; 57,3; 5,2). Cf. J. A. Jungmann, Missarum Sollemnia I (Vienna, 1952), pp. 274, 280. This does not mean, therefore, that the bishop cannot offer the sacrifice for the conversion of sinners as a help to their satisfactio, as purgare conscientiam sacrificio . . . sacerdotis (De lapsis 16). J. Grotz, p. 82, simply identifies offerre with purgare, whereas purgare is the precondition of offerre. On this cf. S. Hübner, p. 66.

[96] Accordingly, in the phrase of De lapsis 29: satisfactio et remissio facta per sacerdotes, the per sacerdotes can refer perfectly well to the satisfactio. Thus it becomes clearer how Cyprian envisages the remissio as being brought about per sacerdotes without his having to deviate from his usual strict notion of remissio, If, in his view, remissio means the complete remission of sin, including the punishment which this involves, and if, after baptism, this is attainable only by a plena satisfactio, then it is only really possible in so far as the priests contribute their support to the satisfactio. It is impossible to derive from De lapsis 29 the notion of a remissio through the absolution of the priest as distinct from the satisfactio.

[97] The sacrifice and the imposition of hands occurred at the same time and the same place, in so far as the imposition of hands was probably performed during the celebration of the Eucharist. But Cyprian does not intimate at which precise stage of the liturgy it occurs. The order (sacrificio – manus) suggests an imposition of hands towards the end of the mass, as was later the case in Augustine and the Gallican liturgy. Cf. J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten (Innsbruck 1932), pp. 167,300 ff.

[98] The purgare does not have only a juridical sense, as Capelle, in RthAM 7 (1935), p. 230 f., remarks appositely. Nevertheless, it is impossible to prove that Cyprian regarded the purification of the conscience as a consequence of the imposition of hands precisely in so far as the latter is the act of reconciliation. It is more

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

does not say explicitly how far he considers this aspect of church penance to be necessary for salvation. Nevertheless it is for him an actual part of the one essential church penance, without which there is no reconciliation with God. The ecclesial aspect, therefore, shares in this necessity.[99] But this does not necessarily mean that sacrifice and the prayer of the Church have to be explicitly connected with the individual performance of penance. If this connection does not exist today, this is, therefore, no proof that such an intercession on the Church's part is unnecessary.

Thus this aspect of the penitential process in the early Church, should not be neglected as if it were irrelevant for the sacrament, even if it is generally overlooked in modern dogmatic treatises. This aspect implies an awareness of the manner in which the satisfactio of the sinner effects grace, an awareness which appears only too briefly in Cyprian's explicit theory. In other words, this aspect supposes a living consciousness of the union between all the members of the Church. Where the Church's intercession is conceived in this way as being more or less necessary, it is completely impossible to experience satisfactio as an autonomous extinction of 'guilts' before God by one's own efforts. For Tertullian the intercession of Christ present in the Church, being assured of a hearing, was one of the notions by which he grasped the Church's decisive act in the paenitentia secunda. This can no longer be said of Cyprian, since he [191] considered the granting of the pax and the communicatio alone as the decisive act of the Church. But this does not necessarily mean that the importance which he accords to the Church's intercession is any the less. The Church is an organism which communicates grace. Spiritu eius (Ecclesiae) animamur (De cath. eccl. un. 5) . . . haec nos Deo servat (ibid., 6). This organism does not communicate grace as a static reality, however, but continually applies to its members grace and Spirit-dispensing influence through sacrifice and prayer which can never fail it. Sacrifice and prayer belong inalienably to the very nature of the Church. It is for this reason that it is the mother of life who dispenses and grants the Spirit. The bestowal of the Spirit incorporates people into this Church which offers sacrifice, prays and, in so doing, again bestows the Spirit. This intercession precedes the reincorporation into the Church; it refers the sinner to God[100] and as co-operation with the sinner's own penance is indispensable for the success of this penance.

B) THE EFFECT OF THE RECONCILIATION BY THE CHURCH

The decisive act of the Church with regard to the sinner who has separated himself from the Church and thereby lost his right of access to the Eucharist is the readmission.

This reconciliation takes place through (or on the occasion of) the imposition of hands and has an immediately tangible effect in the sphere of the Church. Cyprian speaks of an in Ecclesiam suscipi (recipi) (Epist. 55,29; 4,4), ad Ecclesiam redire (Epist. 4,4; 19,2), of the ius communicationis (communicationem) accipere (Epist. 16,2; 19,2), ad communicationem venire (admitti) (Epist. 17,2), of the pax (Epist. 18,1; 19,2; 20,3; 55,29; 57,1.4), of the Ecclesiae reconciliari (Sent. episc. 8,22), of a pax data et communicatio concessa (Epist. 66,5). The actual communicatio is evident above all in the active participation in the sacrifice and in the legitimate reception of the Eucharist (Epist. 15,1; 16,2.3). The granting of the pax is the exclusive prerogative of the bishop[101] (Epist. 15,2; 16,1.3; 17,2; 19,1; 64,1). Only in a prudent and more correct to ascribe this effect to the imposition of hands and the sacrifice only in so far as they are the support of the penitent's own satisfactio.

---

[99] On the necessity of the unanimous prayer of the whole Church for the forgiveness of guilt, cf. also De dom. or. 8.

[100] Every spiritualis oratio presupposes the Spirit which Christ sends. De dom. or. I.

[101] This is already evident from the fact that normally the imposition of hands by the bishop is required. Cf. the details in the first part of this essay.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

case of necessity can the peace of the Church be granted by a simple priest or even by a deacon (Epist. 16,1; 17,2; 18,1; 19,2). The action of the bishop is described as a 'judgement'. He is iudex ad tempus a Deo datus (Epist. 66,3), ad tempus iudex vice Christi (Epist. 59,5) and in virtue of this office in the Church he Judges individual cases even in the case of sinners (Epist. 57,5; 66,5) [192] and passes a sententia (Epist. 55,18). It is obvious that, as far as its reference to salvation is concerned, this judgement does not prejudice in any way Christ's last judgement[102] (De lapsis 17; Epist. 55,18.20.29; 58,3), but this does not mean that for Cyprian it is not a true judicial sentence.[103] Thus he has no need to fear any difficulty arising from an opposition between the bishop's judgement and that of Christ, because they do not refer immediately to the same object. The judgement reserved to Christ alone concerns directly the remission of guilt by a plena satisfactio. The declaration of the bishop, however, is the new recognition of full church fellowship. Generally the bishop should pronounce this judgement only when he has reason to believe that the satisfactio plena has been reached. Nevertheless, Cyprian knows cases where such a judgement on the bishop's part is I valid and is to be upheld although full satisfaction has not yet been made (Epist. 64,1; 55,13). A pax which is granted after too short a penance or on the sick-bed is recognized as valid, although Cyprian is conscious that under the force of circumstances, even where the official requirements of penance are concerned, he is falling short of the ideal (Epist. 59,16; 55,7). Nevertheless, he does know cases in which the granting of the pax is simply void. A pax without any penance[104] at all is an inrita et falsa pax . . . et nihil accipientibus profutura (De lapsis 15). The same applies where the will is lacking to renounce a sinful decision (Epist. 57,3). [105] Also the pax granted by a bishop who does not hold his power legitimately (Epist. 66,5)[106] is invalid, as it is when it is bestowed by non communicantibus (Epist. 59,13). A more precise and basic consideration of when a reconciliation is valid[107] is still wanting. The bishop's judicial power which he exercises in the new recognition of full church fellowship is based primarily, apart from a general appeal to the evangelii vigor and the Domini ac Dei lex (De lapsis 15), on Matthew 16 and 18,[108] that is, on the power of binding and loosing there [102] We will return to this point later.

[103] Thus the observation of Capelle, in RThAM 7 (1935), p. 225, goes too far: Cyprien répudie donc clairement l'idée que la réconciliation puisse se faire par un jugement de l'Eglise. Once it is granted that for Cyprian reconciliation occurs in the first place with the Church, then it can be said that it is based on a sententia, a statutum (Epist. 55,18) or an examinatio (Epist. 66,5). How could the ius communicationis (Epist. 16,2) be granted otherwise?

[104] In view of what has been said earlier, it is obvious that Cyprian makes no distinction here between 'contrition' and the works of penance. The absence of the works of penance is, at least according to De lapsis, evidence of the lack of contrition, since the intention to have sin remitted (our 'contrition') is for Cyprian the intention to settle the debitum, that is, to do penance.

[105] This is how this passage should be interpreted theologically. A non proeliaturus lapsus is one who has not the slightest intention of avoiding to deny his faith on every occasion in the future. Nevertheless, this does not mean that the proeliaturus is only the person who in fact confesses his faith in the blood of martyrdom. There is 'no evidence that Cyprian had this idea. If a non proeliaturus gains the pax on false pretences, se ipsum fallit et decipit. Thus Cyprian must have considered such a pax objectively invalid. In fact this must also have been the case (Epist. 55,18) when a sinner paenitentiae simulatione deluserit the bishop.

[106] For Cyprian this is the immediate consequence of the bishop's sinfulness. Both baptism and penance are invalid (Epist. 66,5), if a person 'has ceased to be a bishop' (Epist. 66,4) because of acts which are dubbed incesta, impia, nefanda (Epist. 66,7). Cyprian's 'donatist' presuppositions are clearly in evidence here. But this notion also shows how necessary the pax must be for salvation and how it communicates the Spirit if it can be granted only by a person who himself possesses the Spirit.

[107] Cyprian considers the inrita pax of De lapsis 15 to be such for several reasons which vary considerably: the absence of the performance of penance, the irregular granting of reconciliation by the bishop, the omission of the exhomologesis (Epist. 15 etc.). What is the most decisive element is not considered. Cyprian stresses most the absence of the performance of penance, and in De lapsis exclusively so.

[108] It is not a question of a verbatim quotation. Thus it is not clear whether the bishops, with their paraphrase

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

promised by the Lord (Epist. 57,1). The context in which Cyprian uses this passage shows clearly that he understands the ligare in terris as an Ecclesiam cludere and the sovere illic as a granting of the communicatio et pax. The more immediate object of the power of binding and loosing is, therefore, the relationship of men to the Church,[109] but only in so far as the positive relationship is subsidium and pignus of eternal salvation. That which is bound if this positive relationship is lacking is, as Cyprian makes clear from his free quotation of the Matthew passage, also already eo [193] ipso bound in heaven; there is no further possibility of salvation. Nevertheless the person who possesses this pignus really receives the possibility of withstanding the future judgement (solvi possent).[110]

Apart from his application of the heavenly loosening to the last judgement, Cyprian's interpretation of Matthew 16 and 18 corresponds exactly to the immediate meaning of the biblical words themselves. The direct application of the binding and loosening on earth to the relationship of man to the Church is thoroughly justified.[111] In the letter of the forty-two African bishops to Pope Cornelius the biblical foundation of the institution of penance in the early Church is again in evidence, as it is already in the polemic against the Montanists and indeed with the main emphasis on the ecclesial interpretation.[112] Indeed without this emphasis the concrete form assumed by the celebration of penance, that is, as an exclusion from and readmission into the Church as a fellowship of grace, remains finally unintelligible. In view of the appeal to Matthew it is, at first sight, surprising that Cyprian never has recourse to John 20. He quotes John 20:21 f. only with regard to the general authority of the apostles and bishops and especially with regard to the power to baptize (cf. De cath. eccl. un. 4; Epist. 69,11; 73,7; 75,16). Nevertheless this fact is not particularly significant. For one thing, Matthew 16 is also cited in the same context (De cath. eccl. un. 4; Epist. 75,16), and in Cyprian's view this passage can certainly refer to the bishop's power in penance. Moreover it is easy to understand why the Bishop of Carthage refrains automatically from adducing John 20 in favour of the power of penance. The remittere peccata mentioned here is taken by him quite spontaneously and self-evidently as the remissa peccatorum in the strict sense. Thus this text is excluded as far as penance is concerned. Applied to penance it would have suggested that the bishops have the same power to forgive post-baptismal sins which Cyprian attributes to them only in baptism. Thus Cyprian confines his use of the text to baptism. His preference for Matthew 16 is probably best explained by the fact that this text brings out more clearly the unity of the episcopate with the one Peter (cf. De cath. eccl. un. 4) than Matthew 18 or John 20. Cyprian considered that this aspect was particularly important, even in the question of penance, when faced with the laxists among his clergy who attempted to reconcile sinners off their own bat and to emancipate [194] themselves from the bishop. It may even be possible to deduce from De cath. eccl. un. 4 that these laxists in the Carthage

(. . . legem dederit ut ligata in terris et in caelis ligata essent, solvi autem possent illic quae prius in Ecclesia solverentur [Epist. 57,1]), are thinking of either Matt. 16 or Matt. 18. Cyprian never quotes Matt. 18 elsewhere (cf. D. J. Chapman, in RBén. 27 [1910], p. 449). Thus the reference to Matt. 16 is the more probable here.

[109] The spei salutaris subsidium which is mentioned only in this context is again membership of the Church, in so far as this has a salvific significance. Pignus vitae in data pace percipiant (Epist. 55,13). The possession of the pax is the pignus vitae, the spei salutaris subsidium. It is worth noting that the letter, deviating from Matt., modifies the loosing with the phrase in Ecclesia in the place of in terris. In the case of the binding, however, it preserves the in terris. Thus the loosing has a special connection with the Church. Certainly in Epist. 73,9 (cf. also Sent.episc. 48) there is the unique mention of a peccata solvere which occurs in baptism. Here, therefore, the immediate object of the solvere is the guilt as such. But this is mentioned only once here in connection with baptism and it cannot be applied to penance. For the solvere must be understood of a remissa which, according to Cyprian, does not exist in penance. On the other hand, the solvere in Epist. 57,1 should be explained in the light of its own context. And this requires an ecclesial interpretation.

[110] Cf. the relevant details given above.

[111] This could be demonstrated by a more precise exegesis of the Matthean texts.

[112] Cf. 'Tertullian's Theology of Penance' in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

clergy themselves appealed to John 20, because the quamvis . . . seems to suppose a contrary opinion. This must have made use of John 20:21 f.[113] What is more, it is a fact that the schismatics attacked in this writing rebelled against Cyprian because of the question of penance.

This second reason for Cyprian's reserve with regard to John 20 does not contradict the one already mentioned. In fact the laxists had simply readmitted sinners without reference to the bishop or the unity of the bishops in council. This is what Cyprian would call the straightforward remissa peccatorum. It is not unlikely that they appealed to John 20 in this sense and that, precisely for this reason, Cyprian did not enlist the aid of this text for his own notion in the question of penance.[114]

The power of binding and loosing promised in Matthew 16 and 18 finds its immediate application in the exclusion of a sinner from the Church and his readmission into it. Moreover, Cyprian considers that this power is exercised not merely 'on the occasion of', that is, 'also' along with the forgiveness of sins. Rather, he sees it, along with the Church's support of the sinner's own satisfactio, as the Church's own and direct act in the whole penitential process. There is never any question of another act on the Church's part.[115] The bishop's authoritative act is always the granting of the pax and the communicatio. All the other effects appear always as essentially and intrinsically connected consequences of the restoration of peace with the Church. Moreover, Cyprian interprets Matthew 16, in so far as this passage mentions an act of the Church, quite naturally in terms of exclusion from and readmission into the Church. Any exposition of Cyprian's view of the salvific effect of the Church's penitential process must, therefore, give explicit attention to this middle role played by the Church. If, and in so far as, he considers the act of the Church to have sacramental effects, that is, to cause grace, these effects flow from the act whereby the sinner is reconciled with the Church.

Now reconciliation with the Church has real effects with regard to grace in the next life. Negatively speaking, the blessing of belonging to the Church, which the unreconciled sinner lacks, is so indispensable for his salvation that without it he is lost. The perdere pacem is a perdere salutem (Epist. 36, 2). Even a martyr who is extra Ecclesiam [195] constitutus and thus ab unitate atque a caritate divisus cannot receive the crown through his death (Epist. 55,17). Men who, by following schismatic priests, have fallen away from the Church and died in this situation extra Ecclesiam sine communicatione et pace perierunt (Epist. 72,2). Thus full church membership is an absolutely indispensable precondition for a real possibility of salvation. To reject it means a spei salutis subsidium denegare (Epist. 57,1), whereas the reconciliation is a pignus vitae percipere (Epist. 55,13). Thus the former represents a binding realized also in heaven, while the latter opens up the possibility of a loosening at the last judgement (Epist. 57,1). If a person, through the granting of an invalid peace with the Church, prevents anyone from seeking a valid peace with the Church legitimately, he hinders the communicatio ad salutem (De lapsis 16). The person who is not in the Church is already a semetipso damnatus, so that there is no longer any need for an actual judgement passed by the Lord (De un. 17). On the other hand, the person who is again readmitted to the Church is [113] This would obviously presuppose that this biblical passage already figured in the recension B of De unitate (enumeration according to Battifol) in A.D. 251 and that it was not introduced by Cyprian only in A.D. 255-6 after the subsidence of the polemic against the laxists. D. van den Eynde believes the latter to be the case, because the biblical quotations added to recension B are not to be found previously in Cyprian. Cf. D. van den Eynde, 'La double édition du "De unitate" de S. Cyprien' in: RHE 29 (1933), pp. 5-24.

[114] On this, cf. H. Bruders, Matt. 16:19; 18:18 and John 20:22,23 in 'Frühchristlicher Auslegung: Afrika bis 251' in: ZKTh 35 (1911), pp. 79-111.

[115] If theme is a mention of a venia which is granted immediately by the Church (Epist. 31,6; 72,2; cf. De lapsis 135), this can be understood perfectly well of the peace with the Church, since it is precisely the latter which is demanded vehemently by the lapsi as their right (De lapsis 35).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

enabled with this peace to pass over to the Lord (Epist. 18,1; 20.3). There he comes into judgement and must 'stand in wait for forgiveness' (ad veniam stare) (Epist. 55,20). It is an advantage that the Lord is coming to his Church and that he will judge (only) those quos in ea (Ecclesia) intus invenerit (Epist. 55,29). Certainly a deprecari in die illo is still necessary, but only the person who is in the Church (Epist. 65,5) is capable of it. As opposed to the martyrs who enter 'immediately' into glory he must still pendere in die iudicii ad sententiam Domini (Epist. 55,20), but in the Church he has the firm assurance that when the Lord comes in judgement acknowledging a paenitentia plena et iusta he will also ratify as valid the granting of church fellowship (Epist. 55,18). This applies particularly with regard to the completion of the penitent's own penance through the intercession of the Church in its martyrs and priests (De lapsis 36).

The renewal of church fellowship by the bishops is, therefore, of salvific importance for the penitent at least in so far as it provides the indispensable precondition for salvation at the judgement. Since the satisfactio is definitively effective only at the judgement, the renewal of church fellowship is just as necessary for salvation as satisfactio.[116] This is not only the theology of a bishop but a practical conviction which dictates the behaviour of Christians. If peace with the Church did not have in itself any meaning for salvation, then Christians would [196] hardly have been so bothered about it on the death-bed, when indeed the earthly tangible consequences,[117] such as access to the liturgy, must have been meaningless. But this is not all. The legitimately communicated peace with the Church conveys the possibility of receiving the sacrament of the Lord's body (Epist. 15,1; 16,2; 17,2). Granted the necessity for salvation which Cyprian ascribes to the reception of the Eucharist,[118] the possibility of a non-sacrilegious participation in this sacrament is very important. The unworthiness to receive this sacrament resides primarily in the sin and not only in the excommunication. Nevertheless it is the imposition of hands in penance and not the mere satisfactio which belongs to the prerequisites for worthiness to receive the Eucharist, which means that through satisfactio and the imposition of hands an interior change is accomplished in the sinner which makes him worthy to receive the Lord's body again. Cyprian does not devote any special considerations to the precise nature of this change in this context. He knows, however, that Spiritum Sanctum consecutis ad bibendum calicem Domini pervenitur (Epist. 63,8).[119] Thus his eucharistic thought seems to suggest that the reason for the renewed worthiness to receive [116] At this point of our analysis of Cyprian's teaching on penance we are in a position to make yet another distinction: at the judgement satisfactio is the cause of the venia, but fellowship with the Church is its indispensable prerequisite. Nevertheless, this would be too neat and too clear a formula which does less than justice to Cyprian's idea. If it is true that satisfactio, especially in De lapsis, appears as a moral cause of the venia, it is still too hasty to conclude that the pax could count only as a precondition for the venia.

[117] The mere naming of a cleric as the executor of a will had the effect of excluding the dying person from sacrifice and prayer for the peace of his soul (Epist. 1,2). This was doubtless the case with an unreconciled sinner, who was known as such. In this case (differently from that in which it is a question of a person who was recognized as a frater) the punishment is due to the fact that a sinner is no longer a member of the Church in the full sense and, therefore, being dead, has even less of a right to communicatio with the Church's saving benefits than he had during his lifetime (Epist. 15,1; 16,2; 17,2).

[118] Cf., for example, Test. III 25 (John 6:53) and 26: a person must be baptizatus if he is to attain the Kingdom of God. In view of the quotation of John 6:35 baptism here includes implicitly communion which was granted for the first time at initiation (Epist. 63,8). Good works had still to be added to baptism and the Eucharist. What is more, Cyprian testifies to the practice of giving communion to infants (De lapsis 25). He could not be surprised, therefore, by any objection against the idea of the necessity of the Eucharist for salvation which might arise from another practice. The Eucharist affords salvation to the person who receives it worthily (De lapsis 26), and it is indispensable for the successful endurance of martyrdom (Epsit. 58,1.9; 57,2.4).

[119] Cyprian is here thinking primarily of baptism, although he does recognize that sin which renders a person unworthy of the Eucharist also deprives him of the Spirit. Thus it cannot be far from his mind that the reason for a renewed worthiness after a sin must be a repossession of the Spirit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Eucharist consists in the possession of the Spirit which is communicated by the imposition of hands.[120]

In fact for Cyprian the passage between a manus imposito ad accipiendum Spiritum Sanctum and a mantis impositio in paenitentiam is so fluid that he is able to explain the imposition of hands in penance defended by Stephen quite simply as a communication of the Spirit. If these two impositions of hands had been completely distinct for the bishop of Carthage, this misunderstanding would be hardly thinkable. Even independently of our present question the imposition of hands of reconciliation is understood either simply as a gesture of the communication of the Spirit, on at least it stands very close to it conceptually. Finally, the peace with the Church is also considered explicitly as the reason for the new reception of the Spirit: quomodo potest ad confessionem paratus aut idoneus inveniri, qui non prius pace accepta receperit Spiritum Patris (Epist. 57,4). Cyprian says this to justify a premature reconciliation in face of the threat of a new persecution. The Spirit is accordingly necessary to undergo martyrdom. It can only be present for a person who has sinned previously, however, if he has received it again pace accepta. Thus in this case even a premature communication of the pax is [197] justified. Already the knowledge of the connection between pax and possession of the Spirit leads to practical consequences, even if this is naturally not their only reason. This knowledge can hardly have originated out of the top of his head. Moreover, this is not the only passage in Cyprian's work where he links explicitly the usual reconciliation of a sinner with the bestowal of the Spirit.[121]

What was concluded for the connection between pax and possession of the Spirit in Cyprian, both from the fact that a sinner is again made worthy to receive the Eucharist and from the rite used to effect reconciliation, shows that this connection is not an idea derived from Cyprian by argumentation and by using Epist. 57 as a proof text. Despite the fact that it is rarely attested, it must have been a commonplace for him, as well as not being entirely unknown to the tradition of his day (Hermas, Tertullian, Didascalia). The same idea appears even more clearly in Cyprian's general theology of the Church. What is more striking, however, is the fact that the rebestowal of the Spirit is never placed by Cyprian in relation to satisfactio. Given the importance which he ascribes to the latter for the forgiveness of sins, this may be surprising at first sight. This applies particularly where the remission of sins is considered as the bestowal of grace. Nevertheless, upon closer consideration, this observation is seen to be self-evident. This is because for Cyprian the satisfactio is the long-lasting payment of the 'guilts' of sin which receives its definitive answer from God's side only with the last judgement. It is not possible to connect any bestowal of the Spirit, considered as an actual and present event, with such a notion as this, as long as it is not broadened on modified. This is also why in Cyprian the communication of the Spirit was too closely linked with an external, temporally fixed ritual (baptism-confirmation).

In our opinion, this observation and its explanation justify us in understanding the statement of Epist. 57,4 clearly in the sense that Cyprian, in speaking of the reception of the Spirit through the pax accepta, is really thinking only of the pax itself and in no way of the satisfactio as the cause of the communication of the Spirit. This maintains, despite his demand for at least a sufficient satisfactio, as a precondition of the pax. It is not the satisfactio which bestows the Spirit[122] but the pax. Thus the relationship existing between [120] This possession of the Spirit is nowhere placed in an immediate causal relationship with satisfactio as such.

[121] The teaching of Pope Stephen may also be relevant here. He understands the imposition of hands for heretics as an imposition of hands of penance, and still states explicitly that it communicates the Spirit. But Stephen is very obscure on this matter. Cyprian does not acknowledge this imposition of hands for heretics and, moreover, he interprets it as Confirmation.
[122] How little Cyprian considers linking the reacquisition of the Spirit with satisfactio as such is clear from Epist. 25: even after they have been purified from their crime and their fault by means of their confession, the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

satisfactio and pax, as it was explained above, is in fact now reversed. Whereas previously the pax was the precondition (pignus) for the [198] effectiveness of the satisfactio as the cause of the forgiveness of sins at the judgement, now a certain[123] satisfactio is required so that the pax may effectively bring about the communication of the Spirit. This will have to be borne in mind when we come to discuss the relationship between personal penance and church reconciliation with regard to the unity of their effects.

But perhaps it could still be asked here whether Cyprian saw the communication of the Spirit in the granting of the pax, that is, the actual ritual, or in the renewed church membership, considered in its duration, allowed by the bishop's act. The way in which this discussion of the problem appears in Augustine[124] shows that this question should not be peremptorily rejected as too subtle for a Father of the Church. At the same time, no clear answer to it is found in Cyprian. On the one hand, he considers the bishop's possession of the Spirit the indispensable prerequisite for the effectiveness of his administration of baptism and his granting of the pax (Epist. 66,5). Thus one could ascribe the principal cause of the communication of the Spirit to the episcopal act of reconciliation as such. On the other hand, it is not completely clear that the penitential imposition of hands, on its own, is anything more than a gesture which supports the sinner's own exhomologesis. This exhomologesis, however, is a part and an indication of his satisfactio which is followed less 'formally' by the pax. Thus it is not to be simply excluded that it was the full church membership (in facto esse) which was considered the actual and immediate principle communicating the Spirit.[125] The restoration of church fellowship through the bishop's authoritative verdict as such, therefore, has an essential salvific importance and brings about effects concerning grace and the communication of the Spirit.

In order to appreciate the precise reason why according to Cyprian the renewed recognition of full church membership has this salvific meaning and is a cause of grace it is necessary to refer to his theology of the Church. Salus extra Ecclesiam non est (Epist. 73,21). Christianus non est, qui in Christi Ecclesia non est (Epist. 55,24). Habere non potest Deum patrem, qui Ecclesiam non habet matrem (De cath. eccl. un. 6). Ut habere quis possit Deum patrem, habeat ante Ecclesiam matrem (Epist. 74,7). Quomodo potest esse eum Christo, qui cum sponsa Christi atque in eius Ecclesia non est? (Epist. 52,1). Haec nos Deo servat (De cath. eccl. un. 6). These statements about [199] the necessity of the Church for salvation cannot be understood merely in terms of an external precondition which simply precedes the actual event by which man is saved. The Church is here seen rather as itself bringing about salvation, and this Church is the actual, historical, tangible Church. Even if we leave Cyprian's theology of baptism out of consideration, this is evident from his view of penance. This view demands the actual granting of peace with the Church, realized through the imposition of hands by the bishop alone, which entails legal and empirically verifiable consequences. This peace with the Church[126] communicates the Holy Spirit to the man to lapsi are still sub diabolo quasi prostrati until they have been granted the pax, even though they have a right to this pax. Cyprian could not have said this if he knew that they were already in possession of the Spirit through satisfactio alone; in his view Spirit and the grace of baptism, on the one hand, and the exclusion of the devil from within man, on the other, coincide exactly (Epist. 69,15-16).

---

[123] Cyprian knows of an effective pax even in those cases where the satisfactio is not yet recognized as plena.

[124] Cf. B. Poschmann, 'Die kirchliche Vermittlung der Sündenvergebung nach Augustinus' in: ZKTh 45 (1921), pp. 208-28, 405-32, 497-526 (esp. 413 ff.). In the case of Augustine this way of posing the question obviously arises from the anti-Donatistic situation: where does the Spirit come from if, in this perspective, the bishop cannot bestow it because although he dispenses the sacraments validly he does so without possessing the Spirit himself?

[125] Cf. the details in n. 69.

[126] The sacramental ('instrumental') causality of reconciliation becomes much clearer in the case of the effect of baptism which is brought about by the water sanctified through the priest's word (Sent. episc. 18). It is effective

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whom it is announced. In the context of the question of penance it is not explained why this is so. The fact of such an efficacy of the peace with the Church with regard to grace follows self-evidently from the view which he holds of the necessity of the Church for salvation. It is for him a self-evident theological axiom which is not disputed even by his adversaries in the controversy over the baptism of heretics. In any case, it follows from Cyprian's theology of the Church[127] that only the Church of the bishops who derive from Peter and are united under him is the 'Church'. As visibly, legally constituted it is the Church of Christ which he 'has prepared through his own blood' (Epist. 72,2). It is his body (Epist. 63,13) and, therefore, bound to him alone and united with him (Epist. 74,6). As this visible Church of Christ, it alone possesses the Spirit[128] and transmits it to the members who belong to it legitimately by baptism. Spiritu eius animamur (De cath. eccl. un. 5). This life-giving influence is exercised in the Church, however, not only in the once-and-for-all act of baptism but also through the continuing possession of life by its members who, therefore, must remain always united with it. Quidquid a matrice discesserit seorsum vivere et spirare non poterit, substantiam salutis amittit (De. cath. eccl. un. 23). Thus Cyprian's ecclesiology would be violated by the view which sees in church membership a mere juridical precondition that man can withstand God's judgement in the question of his salvation – which salvation, however, he has to achieve by his own efforts. It is only in the Church that man enters into life-giving contact with the Spirit of Christ which, emanating from the Church, continually inspires man. And it is for this reason that the pax with the Church is the means by which the Spirit is communicated.

[200]

6. The Unity of Satisfactio and Pax in Their Remitting of Sins

Does Cyprian's theology shift from the idea of satisfactio as man's act which remits sins to that of reconciliation as the act of the Church which conveys the Spirit? Does this mean that there are contradictions or, at least, important inconsistencies in the penitential theology of this Father of the Church? It is certainly difficult to understand logically that satisfactio as the

---

in the case of infants (Epist. 64,5). Neque enim Spiritus sine aqua separatim operari potest neque aqua sine Spiritu (Sent. episc. 5). Cyprian's whole teaching of the remissa peccatorum without personal satisfactio in baptism points in the same direction; similarly the fact that he does not recognize a 'Baptism of desire', since in his view the baptism of blood is not to be interpreted as baptism of desire. If, therefore, Cyprian is familiar with the idea of a sacrament as opus operatum, then the notion that the pax causes the possession of the Spirit cannot be discounted as being alien to him.

[127] Cf., for example, C. A. Kneller, 'Sacramentum unitatis (Zu Cyprians Schrift an Donatus)' in: ZKTh 40 (1916), pp. 676-703; A. d'Alès, La théologie de S.Cyprien (Paris 1922); H. Koch, Cathedra Petri: neue Untersuchungen über die Anfänge der Primatslehre (Giessen 1930); B. Poschmann, Ecclesia principalis. Ein kritischer Beitrag zur Frage des Primats dei Cyprian (Breslau 1933); E. Mersch, Le corps mystique du Christ II (Paris 1936), pp. 15-34; E. Altendorf, Einheit und Heiligkeit der Kirche: Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung der altchristlichen Kirchenbegriffe im Abendland von Tentullian bis zu den antidonatistischen Schriften Augustins, Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte 20 (Berlin 1932), pp. 44-116, cf. RHE 29 (1933), p. 1049; J. Zeiller, 'La conception de l'Eglise aux quatre premiers siècles' in: RHE 29 (1933), pp. 571-85, 827-48; M. Bévenot, 'Episcopat et Primat chez Cyprien' in: EThL 42 (1966), pp. 176-95; C. B. Daly, Absolution and Satisfaction in St. Cyprian's Theology of Penance, Studia Patr. II. TU 64 (Berlin 1957); M. Jourgon, Cyprien de Carthage (Paris 1957); G. Klein, 'Die hermeneutische Struktur des Kirchengedankens bei Cyprian' in: ZKG 68 (1957), pp. 48-68; R. Hardowirgono, 'S. Cypriaan: Het Heil in de Kerk' in: Bijdragen 19 (1958), pp. 1-21,137-61; J. Colson, L'evêque, lien d'unité et de charité chez Saint Cyprien de Carthage (Paris 1961); K. Delahaye, Ecclesia Mater chez les Péres des trois premiers siècles (Paris 1964); A. Demoustier, 'L'ontologie de l'Eglise selon Cyprien' in: RSR 52 (1964), pp. 554-8; W. Simonis, Ecclesia visibilis et invisibilis (Frankfurt 1970); U. Wickert, Sacramentum Unitatis (Berlin/New York 1971).

[128] The whole of Cyprian's argument in the question of the baptism of heretics flows from this axiom. Cf., for example, Sent. episc. 34: solo possideat gratiam Christi et veritatem.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

remission of sins achieved by the penitent himself is a presupposition of reconciliation,[129] while this reconciliation appears at the same time as a presupposition of the forgiveness of sins by God. Nevertheless this difficulty need not have existed for Cyprian.

Cyprian does not demand a plena satisfactio as a prerequisite for reconciliation in every case. At least in those cases where it is not required one and the same satisfactio cannot be the presupposition for church reconciliation and for the full forgiveness of guilt at the judgement. Thus the satisfactio can only be the condition for the reconciliation which then, in its turn, is required so that full satisfactio made on earth or in the next life achieves forgiveness by God. Nevertheless, apart from these cases, even when Cyprian normally demands a plena satisfactio as a condition for the pax of the Church, he does not actually prescribe the forgiveness of guilt by God as a condition for church reconciliation. If this were the case reconciliation would always arrive too late to have any effect on the forgiveness of guilt. Rather he expects a satisfactio which offers the prospect that later at the judgement God will forgive the guilt. For such a future forgiveness the peace with the Church can still have an important meaning. This solution of the difficulty corresponds totally to Cyprian's view, according to which God will answer the satisfactio with venia definitively only in the future at the judgement. He considers the peace with the Church explicitly as an indispensable pre-requisite for this venia. For all this, however, the real difficulties in Cyprian's two-sided theology of penance are not yet eliminated. If church reconciliation alone is the cause of the renewed reception of the Spirit, then thereby the remission of sins is achieved, and indeed here and now. But then what is the position of satisfactio which will not have this effect until the judgement?

It is fairly easy to answer this particular difficulty in Cyprian's [201] theology of penance in the light of today's common theological distinction between the liability for guilt and the liability for punishment. The forgiveness of guilt itself occurs on the supposition of a certain satisfactio ('sorrow') by means of the communication of the Spirit in church reconciliation. This 'forgiveness' is required so that full satisfactio (which, according to Cyprian, will be achieved at the last judgement) can usher in the total remission of the punishments due to sin (that is, quite simply the venia according to Cyprian). Thus both church reconciliation and personal satisfactio count as causes of forgiveness without being relegated to a mere 'precondition' for the remission of sins. Certainly, to regard satisfactio as mere 'sorrow' would not correspond to Cyprian's view. On the other hand, to consider the pax only a precondition would jeopardize the 'sacrament' as opus operatum and would not adequately represent the view of the Bishop of Carthage. But is this suggested solution of the difficulty in this theology of penance one which Cyprian himself could have envisaged?

The distinction between guilt and punishment, remission of guilt and remission of punishment is not so common and familiar for Cyprian, even if it is not totally foreign to him, that one can take it for granted that for him there could arise no serious tension between the remission of sins through satisfactio and the remission of sins through reconciliation. What is more, in view of Cyprian's basic tendency, such a solution undermines considerably the importance of the satisfactio plena. This satisfactio plena, in his view, is in some way decisive for salvation, and there subsists an uncertainty about this salvation so long as there is no assurance that the satisfactio has been carried out to a sufficient degree. On the other hand, in this 'solution' salvation is already fundamentally assured through the possession of the Spirit, and in comparison with this the remission of guilt remains a secondary matter. It could also be observed that even in our modern way of thinking the certainty of possession of the Spirit because of reconciliation, granted the subjective and necessarily presupposed disposition of the penitent, always remains questionable and thus allows for that radical [129] The pax is fructus paenitentiae (Epist. 55,17,29).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

uncertainty about salvation which Cyprian stresses. Against this last point, however, it should be remarked that Cyprian, far from emitting any uncertainty about the possession of the Spirit, regards this as a characteristic of the [202] situation in which the sinner finds himself after baptism. In the solution offered, however, this uncertainty would apply just as much to the newly baptized.

We must, therefore, be content with the observation that, as yet, a perfect accord between the different assertions in Cyprian's theology of penance has not been found. It is worth noting, in this regard, that the Bishop of Carthage, despite these tensions in his theory, did not succumb to the temptation simply to sacrifice one of the two aspects. The original, essential importance of reconciliation for the reception of the Spirit and the remission of sins (at least in fact) is underlined just as much as the causal importance of personal activity for the remission of sins and thus, at least in fact, for the reception of the Spirit. Perhaps, on the whole, this theology of penance is even better than the penitential teaching common today. The latter, as opposed to Thomas Aquinas, considers it possible to safeguard the causality of the Church or sacramental activity with regard to the communication of grace and the remission of sins only by relegating the satisfactio, considered as 'sorrow', to the mere precondition for the grace of the sacrament of penance. A truly thomistic theology of penance would vindicate Cyprian on this point and show that the full importance of the sacrament as opus operatum can be safeguarded without such a depreciation of the satisfactio.

Let us then leave Cyprian's theology of penance simply in its own historical position, without trying to force his statements into a synthesis which he himself does not provide. Nevertheless, it is possible to pose a further question: how could Cyprian stop short here psychologically without experiencing the need for a more precise synthesis and without the temptation to sacrifice one of his two basic principles in the theology of penance for the sake of the other? The answer to this question is of some historical importance, since it can show that it is completely unjustifiable to hold an interpretation of Cyprian in which one or other of these basic statements is depreciated. This is precisely what has happened with Galtier on the one hand and H. Koch on the other,[130] as if it were psychologically totally impossible that both statements, being the starting-points contrary interpretations, could not have originated in Cyprian's mind. Moreover, the answer to our question is relatively simple: possession of the Spirit and freedom from guilt are not so closely [203] connected for Cyprian that every time communication of the Spirit is mentioned he had to think eo ipso clearly of the remission of guilt, and vice versa. We do this today quite automatically. And indeed Cyprian also recognizes that the Holy Spirit leaves a man on account of serious sin, that is, that sin is a loss of grace.[131] Nevertheless, in his explanation of the remission of sins as such he never exploits explicitly and immediately the notion of the rebestowal of the Holy Spirit. He uses this notion to describe the effect of the pax but never directly the nature of the remission of sins. This is less surprising than it may appear today. In the Bible the consequences of sin are considered exclusively from a moral and eschatological viewpoint.[132] The description of the consequences of sin from the point of view of the theology of grace is totally lacking here. Thus in the Bible there can be no explanation of the renewed remission of sins in terms of a rebestowal of grace and of the Spirit. In the second century polemic against the amoral, gnostic notion of grace, the loss of grace through sin had to be stressed. Thus developed the [130] Koch maintains that according to Cyprian the remission of sins (implicitly = the acquisition of grace) is the work of the satisfactio. Thus penance cannot be a sacrament, since then the sacramental sign would communicate grace. According to Galtier (De paenitentia, n. 150) it is reconciliation which communicates the Spirit (implicitly = the remission of sins). Thus satisfactio for the guilt, leaving aside the question of the mere 'punishments' of sins, can be only a precondition; and thus penance involves a real sacrament.

[131] Cf. the previous considerations on 'the nature of serious sin'.
[132] For the different approaches possible, cf. 'Sin as Loss of Grace in Early Church Literature' in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explicit notion of sin as a loss of grace. But naturally this development was not so rapid that this viewpoint predominated immediately over the moral and eschatological approaches. It took even longer for the post-baptismal remission of sins considered as the regaining of grace, under the influence of the idea just mentioned, to become the dominant viewpoint.

It is therefore not surprising if, with regard to the remission of sins, the moral and eschatological viewpoints predominated much longer. Certainly Cyprian, following Tertullian, knew the notion, of the mortale crimen (De bono pat. 14) as sin which brings about the death of grace. Nevertheless such offences are much less clearly differentiated from other sins by means of the treatment from the viewpoint of grace in Cyprian than they are in Tertullian.[133] The more ancient approach to sin is still prevalent. It is therefore hardly surprising that the consideration of the nature of sin from the viewpoint of grace is not exploited by Cyprian in the theology of the remission of sins. Presumably a consideration of the forgiveness of sins from the point of view of a theology of grace did not emanate exclusively from such a view of sin itself, but developed rather from an ecclesiological reflection: the person who sins separates himself from the Church. This is an idea which was understandable even [204] without a clear consideration of sin from the viewpoint of the theology of grace. The person who returns to the Church receives the Holy Spirit through it as the mediator of grace.

Despite a determination of the nature of sin from the viewpoint of grace in certain cases, at that time the idea was completely unthinkable that the Holy Spirit and the guilt of sin could coexist simultaneously in a man. We could perhaps visualize such a possibility, since for us the possession of the Spirit is justifiably compatible with a venial fault. At that time, however, the clear knowledge of the essential difference between a serious and a venial sin was only beginning to show itself. It would take much longer before it became clearly and commonly accepted. Can we say, therefore, that at that time the possession of the Spirit and the remission of certain sins which were only vaguely distinguished from other 'venial' sins must have been quite self-evidently identical? In fact all that Tertullian, for example, can say when faced with a casually-minded and unrepentant catechumen is that, even if, against all expectation, he receives baptism, he will lose the Spirit again soon afterwards. He does not dare, therefore, to state categorically that unrepentance and possession of the Spirit are always and everywhere incompatible. We have already referred to similar points of obscurity in Pope Stephen. On the other hand, at that time it was perfectly possible to envisage a purification from sin which was followed only later by a communication of the Spirit. This is directly observable in Tertullian. But it is essentially no different in Cyprian. Certainly in his view possession of the Spirit is necessary in order to be able to dispense the pardon of sins in baptism (Epist. 69,10 f.). Nevertheless, for him the purification and sanctification of baptism which forgives sins, on the one hand, and the imposition of hands which communicates the Spirit, on the other, are two 'sacraments' (Epist. 72,1; 73,9.21; 74,5.7; 75,8.l8).[134]

Thus the idea of a purification from sins, in so far as it is effective already here on earth, by means of satisfactio, allowing for the new communication of the Holy Spirit in reconciliation

[133] Thus it is mentioned in De op. et eleem. 2 that we can be post gratiam baptismi sordidati, and yet denuo purified by the iugis operatio which, as opposed to baptism, bestows God's forgiveness rursus. This thought continues without any interruption in the third chapter and becomes an exhortation for us to heal our sins in this way, since no one is without sin.

[134] Cyprian never ascribes a communication of the Spirit to baptism, as distinct from the imposition of hands after baptism. If, for example in Epist. 74,4.5, he stresses the cooperation of the Spirit in baptism itself, it is obvious that, unless he is contradicting himself, he is referring only to the active co-operation of the Spirit on the side both of the person who is administering the baptism and of the water (cf. Epist. 75,9; Sent.episc. 5). In any event this cannot mean a communication of the Spirit to the neophyte. How far it is possible for us to deduce logically such a communication of the Spirit at baptism from the effects which Cyprian ascribes to baptism is quite a different question.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

through the imposition of hands, is not totally out of the question for Cyprian. According to his way of thinking, however, there could be no question that the bestowal of the Spirit would be brought about by penance considered more on less as man's own effort.[135] If, according [205] to the ideas of that time, this activity can purify from sin, then this is only in so far as the purification itself is considered from a moral viewpoint. It cannot communicate the Spirit of God which, according to Cyprian, is given by God through the sacraments of initiation. Given the state of theological reflection at that time, therefore, it is not at all surprising that in Cyprian the theology of the remission of sins and that of the communication of the Spirit went their separate ways. The importance of all this for us is that we are not justified, for the sake of pure logic, in depreciating either Cyprian's theology of satisfactio as a cause of the remission of sin and the remission of guilt on his theology of pax as the Church's act communicating the Spirit. Cyprian rightly insisted on both aspects, and, differently from us, he still experienced no problem in holding both of the assertions. In so far as this theology, being a reflection of the teaching of the Church at that time, has a claim to lasting relevance, we have the task of grasping the subjective act of man and the act of the Church in their unity in such a way that one causality can be predicated of both acts with regard to the one effect which is both the reception of the Spirit and the remission of sins together. Once this unity of satisfactio and the act of the Church has been grasped, and the penitent's role within this unity is seen as being caused by grace, then the semi-pelagian tone of Cyprian's teaching on satisfaction is eliminated.

7. The Sacramental Nature of Church Penance

We can resume what has been said above by broaching the question: does Cyprian in his theology of penance bear witness to the existence of a sacrament of penance? That church penance is not called a sacramentum,[136] as are baptism, confirmation and Eucharist, is irrelevant, because even these sacraments are not so called for the reason which today justifies this designation. In any event, how important the bishop's power in the granting of reconciliation was for the Bishop of Carthage is evident, for example, from Epist. 66,5. He points to the consequences of Puppian's challenge of his episcopal power with reference to the fact that very many Christians Would die sine spe salutis et pacis. He explains this fact more precisely [206] by saying that some would not be validly baptized and, therefore, would not receive the Spirit, while others would not be validly reconciled with the community of the Church[137] Thus baptism and the granting of reconciliation are both fundamental acts on the [135] When Tertullian in his Montanist period wishes to praise fasting, he says on one occasion (De ieiunio 8) that through fasting the Holy Spirit inducitur, just as the wicked spirit is expelled. Nevertheless, according to De bapt. 6.8; De paen. 6,17, in comparison with 2,6, for Tertullian too personal penance and purification from sins arc only a preparation and a prerequisite for the communication of the Spirit in the sacrament. In other words, they are not the immediate cause of the communication of the Spirit itself.

[136] Cf. J. de Ghellinck, Pour I'histoire du mot 'Sacramentum' I (Louvain/Paris 1924) (J. B. Poukens, pp. 153-220). Poukens (p. 215 f.) considers that it is not certain in which of the many senses sacramentum is intended when Cyprian uses this term to designate baptism. confirmation and the Eucharist. Thus it is clear how unimportant this designation is for reconciliation. In Epist. 74,4, for instance, Cyprian accuses Pope Stephen of deriving the disciplina ad celebranda sacramenta from the heretics, since these sacramenta, according to Stephen's own testimony, were celebrated at II the reception of 'heretics' only by an imposition of hands. According to Cyprian this meant that the behaviour of Christians was being dictated by anti-Christians. In view of all this, it is not totally unlikely that Cyprian gave the name of sacrament to the imposition of hands at baptism.

[137] In my opinion (as opposed to B. Xiberta, Clavis Ecclesiae [Rome 1922], p. 41) Cyprian does not make an essential distinction here between baptism and the reconciliation of penance. He describes both by stressing their immediate effects (Spiritus Sancti gratia–communicatio). It is obvious, however, that in the disputed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishop's part which are decisive for salvation.

The ability to perform these acts rests, according to Cyprian, on an authorization by Christ. It is a matter of an authoritative, indeed judicial, activity of the bishop which is performed by means of a visible sign, that is, by the imposition of hands and prayer. This act is decisive for salvation and thus the sinner is strictly obliged to submit himself to it. It is the cause of effects which concern grace. In today's terminology we would call such an act a sacrament Although the comprehensive description of reconciliation which we have given still lacks elements which in today's notion of sacrament clearly distinguish the sacrament itself from signs which are associated with it, such as sacramentals, etc., these elements were no more consciously emphasized in the early Church with regard to the other sacraments, for example, in baptism as opposed to the accompanying 'ceremonies', than here in the case of the reconciliation of penance. Cyprian attributes the strictly eschatologically effective removal of sins, as he understands it, to satisfactio as its cause. This does not deprive the church reconciliation of its sacramental character since, on the one hand, for Cyprian the effect of this reconciliation as far as grace is concerned does not coincide simply with the remission of sins and, on the other hand, he understands the whole of penance as a unity[138] consisting of satisfactio and reconciliation, which parts should never be separated or thought of as being effective separately. The difference between this sacrament and baptism has already been sufficiently emphasized above. In penance there is not a simple remissa peccatorum because the reconciliation presupposes a plena satisfactio and because the complete sacrament includes this satisfactio as an essential clement. To this extent, it can be styled, even in Cyprian's sense, as a sacrament of the remission of sins committed after baptism, even if the reconciliation and the pax, together with the bestowal of the Spirit which they entail, are not directed towards the immediate and full remission of sin. The sacramental character of this remission is also implicit in the fact that satisfactio itself includes a co-operation on the Church's part.

[207]

8. Lasting Consequences after Complete Reconciliation?

In the later history of the Patristic development of penance the penitent still has to observe, even after his reconciliation, prescriptions and obligations which imprint the mark of penance profoundly on his subsequent life. Now did such obligations, which in time made the whole of the ancient penitential practice impracticable, exist already in the third century? In general this question has to be answered in the negative. A probable indication to this effect is the fact that at this time penance itself, at least in principle, lasted a very long time and, even more than later, was determined by the judgement of the individual bishop. The bishop could make it last until he saw that the plena satisfactio was reached. Later, however, there were fixed points for reconciliation, which meant that there was a general reconciliation for all those who had done penance up to a particular point of time. It was this state of affairs, rather than that existing at Cyprian' s time, which prompted the suggestion that further penitential passage the second and third ne-clauses (CSL 3:p. 730 nos. 16 and 17) provide a more precise justification for the first ne-clause (no. 13). What this says is why many would die without hope of salvation, if Cyprian were not a legitimate bishop. That is why Cyprian links baptism with reconciliation in respect of their importance for salvation. This does not detract from the stress on the difference between baptism and satisfactio which is found in other passages, since satisfactio means something different from pax et communicatio. The latter can easily be seen as a parallel to baptism. Nevertheless, the 'parallelism' between baptism and penance (De op. et eleem. 2; Epist. 55,22), which in fact underline the difference between the two, should not be made into an argument for the sacramental nature of penance.

---

[138] Cyprian does not consider in any detail either how this unity is to be envisaged more precisely or how it comes about.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

obligations might be necessary even after the reconciliation. Nevertheless already in Cyprian's time there are indications of the lasting consequences of a church penance or, better, of the fault which led up to this penance. Thus the priest Trofinus, being converted from schism, is received again in Rome only as a layman (ut laicus communicet) (Epist. 55,11). The same principle applies to bishops, priests and deacons who have apostasized or become schismatics and wish to do penance. Pope Cornelius, with the agreement of the bishops, already lays down the general principle that penitents, even if they have fallen into sin as lay people, should not be allowed access to the ordinatio cleri atque sacerdotalis honor (Epist. 67,6; 72,2). Pope Stephen and other bishops, however, appear to have been somewhat more lenient in their judgement in certain circumstances in the case of bishops who have fallen (cf. Epist. 67,5.9).

As a further 'lasting consequence' it might be mentioned that a person who has once received church reconciliation is not able to do so a second time. Nevertheless this principle is not stated explicitly in Cyprian. It is already present in the Pastor Hermae, however, and is explicitly mentioned by Tertullian as a principle for the African Church. And this is still the case later, for example in Augustine. [208] Thus it is without a doubt current in the middle of the third century. The fact that Cyprian himself does not mention this principle explicitly allows us to conclude that in everyday practice it did not apply to many cases which demanded his attention.[139] Indeed this principle helps us to understand why Cyprian could make the granting or the refusal of church reconciliation appear more like a disciplinary than a dogmatic question (Epist. 55,21). All the Churches refused reconciliation in this particular case. The Bishop of Carthage could believe, therefore, that a person who refused reconciliation in other cases did not necessarily have to hold a different dogmatic view on the right, authority and obligation of the Church with regard to sinners. In the struggle against Novatianism, however, he recognized that a kind of rigoristic penitential practice could exist which was to be rejected radically for dogmatic reasons. This is because the person who explains the refusal of reconciliation as the refusal of a necessary pignus vitae, and at the same time is convinced that the Church could grant this pignus vitae, implicitly teaches that the Church is obliged to give this guarantee of' salvation, at least in normal cases. Cyprian did not consider how this principle could be reconciled with a refusal, albeit exceptional, of reconciliation to a repentant sinner. This refusal was linked necessarily with the once-and-for-all character of the granting of penance. The notion of a 'substitute' for a sacrament through the votum sacramenti was completely unknown to Cyprian. It is only with Augustine that both theoretically and explicitly a possibility of salvation is opened to a sinner who is excluded from a second church reconciliation. This is all the more noteworthy in that Augustine, throughout his whole life, could not bring himself to a clear idea on the possibility of a 'baptism of desire'.

9. A 'Private' Sacramental Penance in Cyprian?

A) THE QUESTION AND ITS TREATMENT

It is already difficult to pose precisely the terms of the problem with which we are now concerned at the end of this exposition of Cyprian's theology of penance. In fact, since this question arises again especially in the high Patristic age, a more precise determination of the status quaestionis is called for than the situation of Cyprian himself [209] would seem to require. In general the question may be formulated as follows: in the third century is there, [139] Cf. S. Hübner, p. 50, n.8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

beside the 'public', another 'private' but sacramental[140] penance by which the Church forgives sins? This question is not as clear as it may appear at first sight, since, it may be asked, when is a sacramental penance public and when is it private? Thus in order to pose our question more precisely we need to clarify the difference between these two notions. Now this is a difficult task from both the 'liturgical' and the 'historical' viewpoints.

In earlier periods of the study of the early Church's penitential discipline from the point of view of the history of dogma 'excommunication' was regarded as something added to penance itself in the sense of a modern punishment by the Church (cf. on this point J. Grotz). At least in so far as the sinner was also reconciled with the Church, excommunication occurred in many or even in all incidents of the penitential-process in the early Church. Nevertheless, according to this approach it always occurred as only accidental to the actual sacramental event. The theory has even been propounded that the sacramental 'absolution' from sin occurred at the beginning of the penitential process so that at the end of it only the excommunication, considered a mere punishment of the Church, was lifted in foro externo.[141] On this basis it was easy to establish the difference between public and private penance. A public penance is one which occurs between the introduction and the absolution of an excommunication, this last being considered a punishment of the Church and, therefore, concerned with the forum externum. In all other cases penance is 'private'.

This view of the situation is, however, certainly false. In the early Church every serious sin was considered the deprivation of full peace with the Church.[142] Reconciliation restores this peace with the Church, but it was also considered as entailing the effects of grace in the next life, the rebestowal of the Holy Spirit and, in this sense, the removal of guilt. This viewpoint of the early Church makes it impossible, therefore, to distinguish a 'public' church penance from a supposedly sacramental 'private' one by claiming that the one presupposes and revokes an 'excommunication', while the other does not.

In fact even from a modern dogmatic viewpoint it is not possible to establish the distinction in this way. For a very long time there has [210] been an excommunicatio latae and one that is ferendae sententiae which is not connected with every sin and which does not follow necessarily from it but is appended as a subsequent punishment by the Church for certain sins, in addition to the consequences which sin naturally entails. But this practice does not supersede the view of the early Church. Even modern theology recognizes the fact of the removal of full church fellowship, the deprivation of the unrestricted participation in the visible and invisible blessings of the Church. This deprivation is entailed always and necessarily by serious sin itself and is made good only by sacramental absolution. What we [140] On the supposition, that is, that private penance can be shown to be sacramental. Every one agrees that there was a private penance in the Church Fathers in the sense that the sinner remitted his own light sins through his own penitential efforts or at least without an actual intervention of the Church which acted as a sacrament.

[141] The following specialists in the history of penance defend this theory: F. Frank, Die Bussdisziplin der Kirche (Mainz 1867), p. 811 ff.; F. Probst, Sakramente und Sakramentalien in den drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1872), p. 368 f.; H. J. Schmitz, Die Bussbücher und die Bussdisziplin der Kirche I (Mainz 1883), p. 28 f.; II (Düsseldorf 1898), p. 75 f.; J. Stufler, 'Die Sündenvergebung bei Origenes' in: ZKTh 31 (1907), pp. 193-228 (cf. 207); id., 'Einige Bemerkungen zur Busslehre Cyprians' in: ZKTh 33 (1909), pp. 232-47 (cf. 245). The dogmatic theologians followed this theory almost unanimously for a long time. Cf., for example, D. Palmieri, De paenitentia (Prati 1896), p. 508 ff.; H. Hurter, Compendium theol.dogm. III (Innsbruck 1903), p. 498 (n.501) nota; Ch. Pesch, Praelect. dogm. VII (Freiburg/Br. 1920), p. 138 ff. (n.263 ff.). In this context we should also mention J. Grotz. He posits the existence of a purely canonical stage of penance, in the form of an exclusion and a readmission, before the actual sacramental church penance. But he, too, separates the two very carefully. For the discussion of this view, cf. the essay 'The Penitential Teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas' in this volume.

[142] The only difficulty against this view for the period which we are considering comes from Tertullian. We will consider it below.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

are talking about is the exclusion from the Eucharist.[143] In the penitential practice of the early Church, therefore, excommunication and its removal by the granting of the pax is seen in its actual theological essence and precisely not as pertaining to canon law (iure ecclesiastico). Moreover, this point is not overlooked in today's practice of 'private' sacramental penance on the occasion of every sacramental absolution of serious sin. Thus the 'excommunication' so understood dogmatically is of no use in establishing the distinction between 'public' and 'private' sacramental penance, as if one could then use this notion historically.

In the third century 'excommunication' always (or almost always) had the effects which followed automatically from serious sin, that is, exclusion from the Eucharist. By his serious sin the sinner placed himself in the 'position of 'being a penitent' because at that time everyone communicated and placed the highest value on the exercise of this right. Thus the penance in the early Church which is called public by everyone should in fact be styled 'private' in the sense that it does not involve the lifting of an additional, specifically imposed punishment by the Church, that is, the liberation from an 'excommunication' in today's canonical sense. In those days it was more a question of the abolition of the connatural, albeit ecclesial too, effect of sin itself. If, therefore, this idea of excommunication is to serve as any basis at all for the distinction between the two notions under discussion, this can be only with regard to greater or lesser explicitness or solemnity of the excommunication. But how is this to be done?

For 'liturgical' reasons such a distinction is not easy simply by looking at the actual celebration of penance. The penitential practice of the early Church, which is usually called 'public', is in fact public in very many different degrees. At the same time, even today's form [211] of administering this sacrament, which is dubbed 'private', is not entirely devoid of all public aspects. In the 'public' penitential institution of the early Church there may have been occasionally a public individual confession of the sins themselves. But it is false to maintain that such a confession, as distinct from the performance of penance itself, was necessarily or even usually public. Thus the public character of the confession cannot be legitimately considered as a criterion for distinguishing between public and private penance; it is just not always verified in those cases where everyone would speak about 'public' penance. The public character of the performance of penance, however, was so varied and subject to so many different, fluid and vague nuances that such a penance could lack practically all public character, just as today's private penance does. On the other hand, it frequently appeared no different to the consciousness of that time from the normal 'public' penance. If, for example, in Cyprian a sick person was reconciled because of the letter of a martyr, then he received the peace of the Church through the imposition of hands and he kept it when he recovered his health. Thus he appeared practically never publicly in the 'class of penitents', so that on the one hand his penance was very 'private', while on the other hand it was still nothing other than 'public', although adapted to concrete circumstances. Doubtless Cyprian was not aware that he was here granting a special sacramental penance which differed in any way from the normal church penance. If one wishes to call this instance of what is generally called 'public' church penance 'private', this is merely a question of arbitrary terminology.

Nevertheless this way of approaching our question leads easily to the impression that the Fathers of the Church themselves subscribed to two independent forms of church penance. For this reason it is better to avoid such terminology. There arc enough examples from the fourth century and afterwards to show that for practical reasons the normal basic model of 'public' penance is taken so much for granted in certain cases that there is no longer even a mention of the word 'public'. And even here it is only a question of practical variations of this normal form of penance which is usually called 'public'. Even today's 'private' penance, [143] This applies at least where this exclusion is considered as iuris divini.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

however, has a certain public character. A sacrament, considered as a visible rite, is always by this very fact in a certain sense 'public'.

The fact that a person is making a confession and receiving absolution is even today not the object of the secret of confession and can, [212] therefore, be easily known. The external form, such as the times of confession, the confessional in the church, etc. entails this public, knowledge, at least as far as the intention to receive the sacrament of penance is concerned. It is perfectly possible to envisage a situation in which at some time and for some reason it was known that venial sins were not to be confessed. In this situation a confession in today's style (without anything otherwise being changed) would make its 'public character' real even with regard to serious sins. In general the penance of the early Church is called public when the penitent was placed in the class of penitents. Similarly there would be a private sacramental penance wherever this enlisting did not take place, irrespective of how this 'private' forgiveness of sins actually occurred. The completion of this penance itself could obviously vary a great deal. Now there certainly were classes of penitents in the early Church. Later Augustine[144] calls them the proprie paenitentes who have to submit themselves to the paeniientia major et insignior,[145] the paeniteniia qualis agitur in Ecclesia.[146] The consequences of belonging to the class of penitents are even fairly easy to describe: exclusion from the Eucharist, obligation to do certain works of penance even publicly, a special place at the celebration of the liturgy and even partial exclusion from it, submission to determined church penitential rituals, for example, impositions of hands, public reconciliation as well as tangible lasting consequences after reconciliation. Without a doubt this paenitentia, because of these consequences manifestly public in the Church, was also called publica.[147]

But which elements, constituting the public character of this penance, are essential to it and which, in certain circumstances, can be wanting without its ceasing to be 'public'?[148] If explicit excommunication and its abolition do not belong to these essential characteristics, since by these alone a sinner does not necessarily have to appear in the class of penitents (cf. Epist. 4,4), then what is in fact the most important element is excluded. Excommunication and its abolition constitute the most basic organizational principle of 'public' penance in the early Church. Moreover, their absence from the explicit ritual is one of the most conspicuous characteristics of to-day's private penance. Thus such an exclusion is not logically possible. If, however, the actual entry of the sinner into the class of penitents by his public performance of penance is stressed as being essential to the penitential state in the strict sense, then it is possible [213] to prove the existence of a 'private penance' in the early Church (the reconciliation of heretics, the penance of the sick, the penance of clerics). In this case, this penitential process 'of the early Church becomes a specific form of penance clearly distinct from public penance. In the mind of the early Church itself, however, it represented only the practical applications of public penance to concrete cases and circumstances. This is clear from certain indications, such as lasting consequences of penance, the unrepeatable character of penance of the sick, etc. Thus the one notion of private penance would embrace

---

[144] Epist. 265,7; Sermo 352,3,8; De fide et oper. 26,48.
[145] Augustine, Epist. 151,9.
[146] Augustine, Sermo 392,3.
[147] Thus in Ambrose, De paenit. II 10: paenitentia quae publice agitur; De obitu Theod. 34; Council of Toledo (A.D. 400) can.2 (Mansi III 999); Paulinus, Vita S. Ambmosii n.24; Augustine, Sermo 392,3; Rufinus, Hist, eccl. 2 (II), 18; Leo the Great, Epist. 167. Penance was called publica both because of its notoreity and also by contrast with the private performance of penance for daily sins, but not as opposed to a private sacramental penance. Augustine's corripere in secreto (Sermo 82,8,11) does not alter this picture. See the evidence for this in Poschmann.
[148] If in a community today all the participants were obliged to communicate, then the person who is excluded from the Eucharist by serious sin would in fact become a 'public' sinner. But this reception of the sacrament of penance would still remain private.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

different, otherwise unassociated elements which individually suit public penance, such as the ancient, unrepeatable penance of the sick with its lasting consequences and the (supposed) sacramental correptio in Augustine or even in our modern private penance.

But for penance to become public must the sinner belong to the class of penitents only de iure on also de facto? If we consider those cases in which a sinner in fact did not appear as a penitent, as in the reconciliation of a person who is dying, and in which the Fathers of the Church were conscious of conferring the usual penance,[149] it is very difficult, from both the dogmatic and the historical viewpoints, to prove the existence of a specifically private penance. This usual penance was generally 'public' and was deprived of its (greater) public character in the cases mentioned only by force of circumstances. Nevertheless, such a penance which is public juridically can in fact not be public. Moreover, it would be at least very difficult to prove that our modern 'private' penance is not 'public' in this juridical sense. This would be so, even if this notion required certain elements of even a practically public nature which no longer exist in today's penance. In our view it is even more difficult, indeed it is impossible, to prove the existence of such a private penance alongside this public penance, as we understand it, in the early Church. At that time, whenever there is evidence of a sacramental penance there is also the awareness, indeed also the explicit expression, of a reconciliation with the Church. In other words, there is the conviction that the penitent belongs de iure to the class of penitents and must be transferred from it into the status of a complete Christian. All this means not that the notion of a 'private' penance becomes theoretically impossible[150] but that it is not met in fact in the early Church. A very clear indication of this, at least as far as the early [214] Latin Church is concerned, is the awareness that reconciliation is always a reconciliation with the Church. It could be asked, however, what it is that makes a penitent in fact a member of the class of, penitents, although it is difficult to find an answer to this question if one refuses to draw arbitrary distinctions which obscure rather than clarify the issue.

Against all these somewhat circumstantial considerations, it may be objected that historically there is no doubt that, at least from the seventh century onwards, when a private penance clearly distinguished from 'public' penance was indisputably accepted, these two notions were clearly distinguished from each other. This distinction between these two notions is, therefore, a historical fact and needs no further verification. It is an undisputable fact. The paenitentia publica and the reconciliatio publice statuta is clearly mentioned for the first time, in opposition to sacramental private penance, in Theodore's penitential book.[151] From this time onwards, the term publica is certainly no longer merely a more precise description of the one penance but a differentia specifica distinguishing it from another form of the umbrella notion of church-sacramental penance. On the basis of this clear historical starting-point, it should be easy to maintain convincingly the distinction between these two notions. However, in reality these historical notions are far from clear and definite. On the contrary, they contain confusedly very heterogeneous elements have undergone considerable changes even since the seventh century. In the paenitentiale Theodori, for example, the notion of public penance includes explicitly the fixed day of reconciliation (coena Domini), the reconciliation intra aspidem, and indeed (normally) by the bishop, the public performance of penance,[152] together with the unrepeatable character of penance and its lasting [149] Cyprian makes this clear by the way he formulates the nature of such a reconciliation of the sick. It has precisely the same form as the usual reconciliation. Moreover, later, when the sinner had recovered his health, he had the same obligations as after a normal 'public' penance.

[150] At least this is not the case if the rite of reconciliation in public penance requires an explicit mention of reconciliation with the Church.
[151] Cf. Paenitentiale Theodori 112; Wasserschleben, p. 197.
[152] This is the meaning of the statement: reconciliatio ideo in hac provincia publice statuta non est, quia et

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consequences. On the other hand, it is difficult to say what Theodore understands by penance which is not public. He does not use the term 'private'.[153] And it is obviously not possible to exclude from this notion all the characteristics of his public penance. His practice of private penance clearly places no value on the secret performance of the duties of penance and it involves a long-lasting exclusion from the Eucharist. Moreover, here also reconciliation is granted only after the performance of penance. In the ninth century even for what was explicitly called 'private' penance reconciliation was normally required on Maundy Thursday;[154] thus even this element could not have belonged specifically to the essence of public penance. In other words, [215] it is clear that the ritual of private penance during the first centuries of its proven existence was normally still very complicated.[155] It involved a fairly large amount of public knowledge. Thus, from the historical point of view, the only characteristic of this new Anglo-Saxon 'private penance', distinguishing it from the ancient 'public' penance, is its lack of the unrepeatable character and the lasting consequences which were present in the ancient penance. But if one wishes to make such a difference the decisive distinguishing mark, is this sufficiently well expressed by the two notions 'public' and 'private'? 'Repeatable' and 'unrepeatable' penance would seem to be sufficient and indeed clearer notions. In any event, it may be asked whether the early Western Church provided a reasonable context in which a clear, concrete case for the notion of 'private' penance could be found. It is difficult to discover the normal practice of such a form of sacramental penance in the early Church. Certainly there is no question of two different forms of penance – the one private, the other public – between which one could make a free choice. It must be said, however, that the uncritical use of these two notions tends to lead almost inevitably to such a view. At least it suggests the idea that in the early Church there was a sacramental private penance which was generally available if and when a once-and-for-all, unrepeatable, 'public' penance was no longer possible. Such an idea, flowing from certain dogmatic assumptions,[156] is really based on the previous desire to prove the existence of private penance in the early Church. If, however, it is readily admitted that such a 'private' penance does not in fact alleviate substantially the dogmatic problem posed by the unrepeatable public penance, then the real use of this vague distinction for the early history of penance becomes very meagre indeed.[157] This applies even if, presupposing the corresponding development of the notion, it is possible to prove the existence of this distinction in the early Church, since the practice of denying a second sacramental penance still subsists, at least in many cases, and even in Augustine, despite his correptio secreta. Thus it needs to be asked why some have recourse to these notions as a support for their own theses and are not content to expound them as notions of that time, in their original meaning, and to say what people of that time understood publica paenitentia non est. Since the paenitentia is distinguished from the reconciliatio, it must refer to the performance of penance.

---

[153] As a fixed term, privata paenitentia appears, for example, besides publica paenitentia in the ordo paenitentiae Praemonere debet of the Fulda manuscript (Fulda II) from the tenth century (cf. Schmitz II 57; Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten [Innsbruck 1932], p. 176 ff.), while in the earlier manuscripts of this instruction (Fulda I: cf. Jungmann, p. 178; the Pontifical of Poitiers: cf. Morinus App. 55; Ps.-Alcuin, De div.off. 13) the difference is not so pronounced. The term is also missing in the inscription of the penitential ordines of the ninth century from Fulda (cf. B. Opfermann, 'Zwei unveröffentlichte Fuldaer Bussordines des 9.Jh' in: ThGl 36 [1944], pp. 47-51).

[154] Cf. J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten (Innsbruck 1932), p. 270 f.

[155] Confession and absolution were separated; the absolution was granted only after the completion of the penitential duties; finally reconciliation was performed by the bishop; the penitential rites were very complicated, including long and numerous prayers, kneeling before the altar, certain bodily postures, etc.

[156] The view that the Church could not deny reconciliation to a repentant sinner, even in particular cases, and that, therefore, there must have been a 'private' reconciliation if the public one could not take place is such an assumption.

[157] P. Galtier recognizes this, De paenitentia (Paris 1931) th. XVII, n.307-11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

by them.

To take our modern 'private penance' as the historical starting-point is to incur similar difficulties. This approach involves taking our modern penitential practice as the classical normal case of 'private [216] penance' and, on this basis, attempting to determine precisely what is private and what is public penance. The 'private' character of our modern penance is made up of many different elements. The Church's act in this penance represents an ideal case of the mere forum internum. There is no explicit, tangible imposition and lifting of an excommunication which is expressed in the rite. The penitential duty which is imposed remains secret and its execution is not done openly. It is generally minimal and is decided by the confessor on the spot. Normally the penitent receives absolution immediately. It remains secret whether a serious sin is involved or not. There are no after-effects of this penance. There is no difference between the treatment of clerics and that of the laity. The sacramental rite is reduced to an absolute minimum. Moreover, this penance is able to be repeated. These are all the elements which make today's form of penance, as opposed to that of the early Church, appear 'private'.

But what, among all these elements, is really essential for a private penance? In fact even today there still exists the exclusion from the Eucharist, that is, excommunication in the sense of the early Church. Whether or not this is expressed in the rite of penance itself makes no difference to the fact. Even in the early Church, given certain circumstances, the public character of the performance could be very little in evidence. Even then reconciliation could be granted immediately. This was done with the awareness that it was only the adaptation of the one usual public penance to special circumstances, which shows that even this form was modelled on the penance of excommunication. In Cyprian the normal public penance has no lasting consequences. A penance could exist in merely desisting from the fault in question, that is, it was possibly minimal and insignificant, and even then reconciliation was considered as the lifting of excommunication, that is, as a shortened public penance. The fact that, in today's confessional practice, a serious fault remains a secret is due purely to the external circumstance that confessions of devotion are common, even though they are not obligatory. But this practice is irrelevant to the nature of penance and its correct celebration. Indeed the same circumstance is perfectly compatible with a public penance. When, towards the end of the early period of the Church's history, it became common for everyone to undertake penance on his death-bed, this penance lost its public defamatory character, even though this penance at the point of death [217] was thoroughly public, as its ritual and its lasting consequences in the event of a subsequent recovery show. Thus a circumstance which is purely external and accidental to both forms of penance can make 'private' penance public, for example, if confessions of devotion were no longer practised. Similarly, a public penance can become private if it is freely undertaken by everyone. In other words, there is only one element in our actual modern private penance which clearly distinguishes it from the penance of the early Church, and which has nothing at all to do with either its 'public character' on its 'private character', and that is the fact that it is repeatable. And this element is best left with its proper name. Thus even on the basis of today's form of 'private penance', it is not possible to arrive at a useful notion of a specifically private penance.

All these considerations lead to the conclusion that, although church penance remains exactly the same in its essence, with regard to the degrees in which it is expressed publicly it is susceptible of an extraordinary number of variations. This variety of degrees and levels in the public character of penance is such that it would be purely arbitrary to dub certain forms of it 'public' and others which evince hardly any differences making them at all or only occasionally less public, on the contrary, 'private'. The Fathers of the Church were well

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justified, therefore, in calling the whole of church penance simply 'public'.[158] This does not mean that they simply overlooked the practical and perhaps considerable differences in the public character of this penance. If one wishes to describe, in this regard, today's penance in relation to the form of the early Church, one ought to say objectively and cleanly: through a whole variety of means and for different reasons the public character of today's penitential process has become considerably restricted. This is better than saying that today public penance has been superseded by private penance. The real difference between the penance of the early Church and that of today, a difference which ought to be called by its proper name, lies in the unrepeatable character of penance in the early Church, as opposed to the repeatable character of today's penance since the early Middle Ages. This is a clear difference, intelligible both conceptually and juridically.

In today's penitential rite the change in relationship between man and the Church is no longer formally expressed and is, for the most part, no longer clearly recognized, even if, in fact, it is undoubtedly [218] objectively present. It is unfortunate and only leads to misunderstandings when the historian of dogma today simply wishes to present the different forms of penance in the early Church as 'public' or 'private'. It would be more correct to describe the many, and not only the two, different forms in which the one penance appears, according to what they have in common and their peculiarities, and thus to determine the precise degree of their public character. This would naturally also involve discussing whether penitential practices with a very limited public character (correptio secreta, monastic penance, etc.) could be counted as sacramental-church penance.

If, however, an answer is sought to the badly posed question of whether the Church before the seventh century knew a sacramental 'private' penance besides the 'public' penance, then it must be in the negative. In the West at least, the only penance which was sacramental was the one unrepeatable penance which also reconciled men explicitly with the Church and which, despite the considerably different degrees in its public character in its individual instances, was always experienced as one and the same penance. Talk about a private penance, however, is apt to obscure this basic insight, even if, by drawing attention to certain notions, what it conveys is not necessarily false.

B) A LOOK BACK AT TERTULLIAN

Galtier is of the opinion that in Tentullian[159] there are several 'species' of penance which are essentially different from each other. The one is defended by the Catholics for capital sins but rejected by Tertullian in so far as it concludes with reconciliation. The other concerns the delicia leviora. The latter is related to the former as a castigatio to damnatio. It is a forgiveness by a bishop for a sin which, although serious, is relatively less so than the capital sins. Thus it must be a church-sacramental penance but it cannot count as a public penance, since the castigatio was distinguished from the damnatio of public penance and does not include an excommunication.[160]

It is a fact that Tertullian speaks about two species of paenitentia (De pud. 2; 3; 4; 18). And [158] This penance is called 'public' only by contrast with the purely subjective, independent performance of penance for daily sins, without a sacramental mediation of the Church, but not as opposed to another kind of sacramental remission of sins by the Church. This point needs to be repeatedly stressed.

[159] P. Galtier, L'église et la rémission des péchés (Paris 1932), pp. 273-82, and id. 'A propos de la pénitence primitive: Méthodes et conclusions' in: RHE 30 (1934), pp. 517-57, 797-846 (esp. 809-12), connects Tertullian with Cyprian in the question of private penance. In Tertullian we meet for the first time 'une rémission du péché distincte de celle qui s'obtient pan la voie de la pénitence publique' (p. 809).

[160] Nevertheless, P. Galtier (RHE 30), p. 811, concedes: il peut même lui (au coupable) arriver d'être mis pour un temps a l'écart du tropeau. But how does this measure differ from an excommunication?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Catholics did have a paenitentia for the delicta leviora. But the two species are only introduced by Tertullian by his differentiation of penance according to its effect (discriminatur conditio paenitentiae; De pud. 2), that is, in so far as the one penance [219] ends with the venia of church reconciliation, while the other can never reach this pardon.

But what Galtier has not proven is that the Catholics made an essential distinction between the penance for capital sins and that for the leviora peccata. The impression that the penance for leviora delicta does not begin with an 'excommunication' (De pud. 7) comes only from the fact that Tertullian in his new theory of sin, with which he attempts to underpin his rigorism, can no longer recognize the leviora delicta as serious sins. Thus he accommodates his interpretation of the parables of the lost drachma and the lost sheep to this view by explaining 'that the sinners whom they intimate are still 'alive', just as the lost sheep and the lost drachma were still in the house, which stands for the Church. This was just his way of providing the theological basis for his opinion that those guilty of capital sins, because they have lost the grace of baptism which was granted only once, cannot be received back into the Church, whereas those sinners with leviora delicta are still alive, that is, they have not lost the grace of baptism and, therefore, can be reconciled with the Church.[161]

The castigatio is here (De pud. 2) certainly opposed to the damnatio. But since, in this passage, the damnatio clearly signifies the eternal exclusion from the Church because of a delictum irremissible, the castigatio cannot mean a species of penance alongside another paenitentia among the Catholics which is called damnatio and alone entails an actual poena. The distinction between castigatio and damnatio is introduced in the passage by Tertullian only to facilitate the distinction between remissibilia and irremissibilia. Thus in this context castigatio must have the general meaning of 'correction', which is also able to be a characteristic of the public penitential process, at least in Tertullian (De paen. 11,6).[162]

Thus is not to deny that, even among the Catholics, sins were treated differently according to their gravity, in so fan as the duration of the penance was concerned. But it is by no means evident that the leviora delicta, which they considered as serious sins entailing the loss of grace, were treated differently from capital sins. This explicit difference between sins was also introduced only by Tertullian, but, nevertheless, he also recognizes even for the leviora delicta an extra gregem dari (De pud. 7). Thus it seems more than unthinkable that such an excommunicatio would be imposed only as the beginning of a penance for the leviora delicia, whereas it would not be demanded in [220] other cases, so that penance would at one time be 'public' and at another 'private'.

C)VARIATIONS OF THE PENITENTIAL PROCESS IN CYPRIAN

It is certain that penance in Cyprian has a great variety, as far as its duration and its public

[161] On this point, cf. 'Sin as Loss of Grace in Early Church Literature' in this volume.

[162] To claim that the list in Apol. 39, exhortationes, castigationes et censura divina, represents only clearly distinct termini technici is to force the meaning of the text. Cf. P. Galtier, loc. cit. (RHE 30), p. 812. If this were the case, castigatio, as opposed to censura divina, could never mean in Tertullian the excommunication which he mentions, by way of conclusion, in similar contexts. From De pud., however, it is clear that, in a possible new terminology, damnatio = excommunication without the prospect of a reconciliation. Accordingly, castigatio could here mean every punishment by the Church which does not preclude this prospect. But Galtier has not proven that in De pud., granted Tertullian's Montanistic presuppositions, the castigatio cannot refer to an excommunication which is removable and that the leviora delicta were punished without such an excommunication. This excommunication would always be a mild castigatio by comparison with the definitive exclusion (= damnatio). At the same time, in itself castigatio (castigare) can also mean a hard punishment (cf. Thesaurus linguae latinae III, p. 530 ff.). Cf. also B. Poschmann, in: ThRv 32 (1933), pp. 257-72 (cf. 264); id., Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 309, 306 ff.; C. M. Chartier, 'La discipline pénitentielle d'après les écrits de saint Cyprien' in: Antonianum 14 (1939), pp. 17-42 (cf. 20 n.1).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

character are concerned. Thus, for example, an immediate restitution of church fellowship is envisaged for a deacon and a virgin who have lived together but without having had sexual relationship. If the case is more serious than this, however, both partners must perform a paenitentia plena (Epist. 4,4). There was a considerable difference between the treatment of the libellatici and that of the sacrificati. In danger of death even the sacrificati receive reconciliation immediately, even if their time of penance has not yet ended. Heretics, too, are reconciled immediately in certain cases (Epist. 55,11; 59,16).

But does this possibility of different forms of penance justify us in speaking about the existence of a private penance alongside public penance? Certainly Cyprian does not distinguish between these two forms verbatim, even if he may have recognized their existence. Moreover, both 'species' of the penitential process have this in common that they both include the granting of the communicatio, an admitti ad Ecclesiam (Epist. 4,4). This applies even to the milder,' process. Thus even this process is conceived as being accompanied by a kind of excommunication, even if this is not visibly and tangibly expressed in terms of the obligation to a long penance and a public exhomologesis.

In Epist. 16,2 and 17,2 in fact penance for the minora delicta (peccata) described in the form of a 'public' penance. Obviously these minora delicta can only have been presented as light by comparison with actual complete apostasy. Nevertheless these minora delicta which are subject to public penance are still described as non in Deum commissa (Epist. 17,2). On the other hand, sins in Deum included obviously not only apostasy but also, for example, adultery and fraud (Epist. 55,27), and this certainly not in any vague sense.[163] Rather, it applies to them in the technical sense of Epist. 17,2 since, by the use of this expression, Cyprian shows that, as far as their forgivable character is concerned, apostasy and adultery ought not to be distinguished. If, however, even the lesser sins like adultery and fraud were submitted to 'public' penance[164] it is highly unlikely [221] that there would have existed, besides this form of penance, one which was still essentially different from it. If this were the case, it would be difficult to visualize which sins it would cover.

Obviously the iustum tempus for the penance (Epist. 17,2) for certain minora delicta could be reduced to the period of time between the sin itself and confession, followed immediately by absolution (Epist. 4,4). Since already the sin alone and not only the official declaration brings about the excommunicatio as the separation from the Church, the body of Christ, this period of time can be counted as the duration of the excommunication. This means that those guilty of such sins do not in fact appear among the penitents. Now, as important as this difference may seem to us, from the point of view of the practice of the early Church it was obviously a question only of a differentiation within the one penitential system. And this differentiation has its, basis solely in the differing seriousness of the sins subjected to penance; Even in these cases the sinner was considered as having been at first separated from the Church. The prerequisites and the guarantees of his genuine repentance, which were demanded of him before he could be readmitted to the Church, depended upon the seriousness of the sins in question. Thus the penance prescribed must have been very varied in practice. Nevertheless the procedure always followed the same schema, that is, exclusion followed by reconciliation with the Church. There is no indication here that this difference was either conceived or considered as one between a 'public' and a 'private' penance. It is merely a question of variations of the one form of penance. It is, however, correct to say that these differences were very much in evidence in everyday practice.

Finally, it may be asked-which 'kind of penance' is involved in De lapsis 28. It is here recounted that zealous Christians make an exomologesis conscientiae to God's priests in

[163] As is the opinion of P. Galtier, L 'Eglise et la rémission des péchés (Paris 1932), p. 288.
[164] This means a penance of excommunication.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

seeking a remedy for their small wounds. Without having actually fallen, they have nevertheless played with this idea (quoniam de hoc vel cogitaverunt). The unusual phrase exomologesis conscientiae makes it quite clear that here it is only a question of a private confession before the sacerdotes Dei. The meaning of this confession is the unburdening[165] of the anxious conscience (animi sui pondus exponere) and the prayer to the priests for a salutaris medella (medellam exquirere). Nothing more is said in this passage.[166] It is not possible to say, therefore, what the sallutaris medella comprises. Obviously it was not clear even to the [222] people who were asking exactly how the small guilt was to be healed. Were they, therefore, to learn from the priests precisely what they had to do themselves? The medellam exquirere (= inquire about) need not mean more than this. Or should the priests actually give the remedy to them? But, in this case, what did this remedy consist of? One could think of a brief penance of excommunication (cf. Epist. 4,4) or of the offering of the sacrifice for this small guilt. Even the real lapsi do not appear to have rejected this (Epist. 15,1; 16,2). Or was it a question of a prayer for the sinner? It is not possible to answer this question. In any case it is not possible to prove, from this text, the existence of a sacramental 'private penance'.[167] Not every priestly intercession is necessarily an actual sacrament. Even today we have a votive mass pro remissione peccatorum.

[165] As deponere, exponere also in Cyprian means 'to liberate oneself from something' (cf. the passages: CSL 3,3:425). Since, however, the medella for guilt as such must be sought and applied, this expression can mean only the psychological unburdening of the conscience through the confession of secret guilt, and not convey the idea of the remission of objective guilt. Contrary to P. Galtier, L'Eglise et la rémission des péchés (Paris 1932), p. 295.
[166] The following sentences (cf. CSL 3,1: 258,2) resume the general exhortation addressed to actual libellatici, begun in cap.27.
[167] Cf. S. Hübner, p. 183 ff., esp. 185.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[223]

PART FOUR

The Tradition of the East

[225]

7

PENITENTIAL TEACHING AND PRACTICE ACCORDING TO THE DIDASCALIA APOSTOLORUM[1]

For a surprisingly long time the penitential teaching and practice of the Didascalia Apostolorum[2] received scant attention as far as the history of the sacrament of penance was concerned. It was occasionally cited in works on this subject. But, apart from E. Schwartz[3] and H. Achelis/J. Fleming,[4] who dedicate two brief pages to the penitential teaching of the Didascalia, it is really only B. Poschmann[5] who has attempted a more detailed treatment of this topic. As the studies of P. Galtier, J. Grotz and H. von Campenhausen[6] show, this has meant that the topic is once more the focal point of studies in the history of dogma. Thus it is obvious that the history of penance can in no way omit the witness of the Didascalia Apostolorum.

This 'Teaching of the Apostles' is a relatively early source for the history of penance and therefore provides valuable information, from the canonical, liturgical and dogmatic points of view, on the teaching and practice of penance in the early Church. It may even transpire that this text is, to a certain extent, unique, when compared with the other witnesses of the first

---

[1] The first version of this revised essay appeared in ZKTh 72 (1950). pp. 257-81. The edn of the Didascalia generally quoted in this essay is that of F. X. Funk (cf. n.2).

[2] For the literature on penitential teaching in the Didascalia Apostolorum, cf. E. Schwartz, Bussstufen und Katechumenatsklassen (Strassburg 1911), pp. 16-20; H. Achelis/J. Flemming, Die Syrische Didaskalia (TU 25,2: Leipzig 1904), pp. 298-307; R. H. Connolly, Didascalia Apostolorum (Oxford 1929), pp. liv-lvi; P. Galtier, L'église et la rémission des péchés aux premiers siècles (Paris 1932), pp. 191 f., 353 f., id., Aux origines du sacrement de la pénitence (Rome 1951), pp. 157-221; E. Amann, 'Pénitence', in: DThC XII/I (Paris 1933), p. 790; B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 476-8; J. Janini Cuesta, 'La penitencia medicinal desde la Didascalia Apostolorum a S. Gregorio de Nisa' in: RET 7 (1947), pp. 337-62; J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg 1955), pp. 371-91; H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1963); K.. Baus, Von den Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Grosskirche (HdKG I) (Freiburg 1962), pp. 384-6. Edns of the text: F. X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum I (Paderborn 1905). E. Tidner was responsible for a new edn of the traditional Latin version of the Didascalia, which comprises a little more than a third of the whole work: Didascaliae apostolorum, Canonum ecclesiastricorum, Traditionis apostolicae versiones latinae (TU 75: Berlin 1963).

[3] E. Schwartz, Bussstufen und Katechumenatsklassen (Strassburg 1911).

[4] H. Achelis/J. Flemming, Die Syrische Didaskalia (Die ältesten Quellen des orientalischen Kirchenrechts II) (TU 25,2: Leipzig 1904).

[5] B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda: Die kirchliche Busse im ältesten Christentum bis Cyprian und Origenes (Bonn 1940).

[6] P. Galtier, L'église et la remission des péchés aux premiers siècles (Paris 1932), and Aux origines da sacrement de la pénitence (Rome 1951); J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg 1955); H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1963).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

half of the third century. This is because it does not recognize the sole opportunity for the performance of church penance which for many centuries was of profound significance for the history of penance in the whole of the West. These introductory remarks on the history of penance in general should serve to justify a more detailed examination of the teaching [226] and practice of penance according to the Didascalia Apostolorum.

I. THE QUESTION OF PENANCE

According to the latest research the Didascalia Apostolorum[7] was composed in northern Syria certainly in the first half of the third century and possibly even in the first decades of that century. The penitential teaching of this writing is perfectly at home in the setting of the other views on church penance which are known to us from the third century. It is possible, as A. von Harnack and E. Schwartz believe, that, in its present form, it contains statements which are directed against the Novatians. These would naturally have to be considered additions, if the original work is taken to be prior to the Novatian controversy.[8] Nevertheless, this by no means proves that the supposed original work was in any way rigoristic. It is possible to construct an original work of this tendency for the Didascalia Apostolorum only on the false supposition of a radical rigorism which excludes those guilty of mortal sin definitively from the Church and which is in evidence wherever there is a mention of excommunication (when the contrary is not expressly stated). Consequently, every time a condemnation is pronounced as a result of sin, both conversion and the removal of this condemnation must be considered impossible.[9]

It is perfectly possible that even an early edition of the Didascalia underwent anti-Novatianist modifications.[10] These would then have been merely the expression of, and stress on, a point of view which was already present in the original writing. But it is impossible to prove the contrary. On the one hand, the teaching about the practice of excommunication in its many forms is so current throughout the whole of the Didascalia that it is impossible to

[7] Cf. J. Quasten, Patrology II (Utrecht/Antwerp 1953), pp. 147-52; A. Stuiber, Patrologie (Freiburg/Br. 1966), p. 84 f.

[8] Recent research inclines to the view that the supposed anti-Novatianist elements are not absolutely demonstrable for the work itself. In every instance they could be explained as later additions. Cf. P. Galtier, p. 189 ff.; H. von Campenhausen, p. 269.

[9] These are the only reasons which E. Schwartz and R. H. Connolly (who finally remains undecided) adduce. This way of stressing the bishop's power of binding by omitting all explicit mention of his power of loosing is clearly evidenced in Origen at about the same time. Cf. the relevant study of Origen's teaching on penance in this volume. Even when the power of loosing is mentioned, it is not intended simply as the counterpart to the binding, since it can be exercised without a binding (although this is obviously not permissible in the case of mortal sins). Thus it is not surprising that only the power of binding is mentioned (II 11,2) if the intention is to impress upon the bishop his obligation with regard to those guilty of mortal sins. As is the case with Origen in De oratione 28, the primary aim is to emphasize both the need for excommunication and the bishop's duty not simply to leave such a sinner in the Church (II 9/10).

[10] This is not absolutely certain. In fact the actual opponents of the lenient treatment of sinners (II 14,3.10.12; 15,1; 18.6) seem to be rather zealous, strict and somewhat misanthropic lay people in the communities of the bishops addressed. Even without supposing a theoretical Novatianism, it is possible to understand such 'zealous Christians' who were pressing for discipline and order in the community and thus wished to alienate once and for all those persons who were responsible for scandals. So long as the institution of penance for the forgiveness of sins was identified materially with a disciplinary procedure within a small community, such difficulties and demands were bound to arise from everyday practice. In that situation there were always people who refused to associate either in the liturgy or in civil life (which were very closely related, in any case) with men of questionable life-style. To that extent, the danger of Novatianism was already present, even without (theoretical) Novatianism. Achelis/Flemming (p. 302 n. 1) dispute that the opponents of the Didascalia where penance is concerned are Novatians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

assume or explain the whole teaching on the questions concerning penance as a later addition – as if originally in every single passage there were only a mention of excommunication with no consideration of the question of what was to happen to repentant excommunicates. On the other hand, there is, in fact, not the slightest trace of an early rigorism in the original writing. Thus it is scarcely possible to detect and to separate the anti-Novatian additions which are eventually present, [227] in order to be in a position to consider the penitential teaching of the supposed original writing purely on its own. The teaching of the Didascalia is, therefore, to be considered as a whole and is to be assessed as a witness for the teaching on penance in Syria about the middle of the third century. It remains legitimate, however, to accept this witness as a whole even for the first half of the third century.

II. THE THEOLOGY OF SIN

The theology of sin in the Didascalia Apostolorum is not very precise. There are naturally different degrees of guilt, all of which do not entail eternal punishment (I 3,3-5). At the same time, sin committed after baptism which deserves the punishment of hell is usually designated simply as sin (e.g., I 3,3; II 7). Only once is there a mention of 'sin unto death' (V 9,5).[11] But this does not include every fault, since everybody sins (II 18,4.6) and is, nevertheless, able to be without 'sins' (in the sense of mortal sins) (II 18,1; II 13,1.3). Mortal sin does not only entail the punishment of hell. It is also the loss of life (I 3,11; 8,18), in so far as it expels the Holy Spirit which was received at baptism (VI 21,1.2.3.4.5.6). A person guilty of such a sin is 'mortally injured' and has an 'incurable' wound (II 63,5; VI l4,10).[12] This (mortal) sin has an ecclesial aspect: on the one hand, through his act the sinner separates himself from the Church (II 4,3; 43,2.3; 56,2),[13] indeed he is no longer a Christian (II 8,3), while, on the other hand, the Church is marred by the sin of such a 'Christian' (II 10,1; VI 14,10).[14]

III. EXCOMMUNICATION

Those guilty of mortal sin must be excommunicated (VI 14,10). Precisely who is affected here is ascertainable more by practical directives than by theoretical explanations. Obviously heretics are included in this group of sinners (VI 14,1). Nevertheless, it is generally stated that the person who has done something 'evil' (iniquum; mala opera) (II 8,3.4; II 9,1; 39,5) should be excommunicated. Such bad behaviour includes quarrelsome and slanderous [11] The adversus Deum peccare in II 56,2 is to be understood in the fullest sense, as 'sin against God' was understood elsewhere at this time. Cf. II 31,3: delinquere in Deum omnipotentem.

[12] The Didascalia clearly states that, provided there is sorrow, all sins can be forgiven. Thus the incurable mortal sin mentioned here is to be understood as it is in Origen: a sin which has induced the death of grace and has thus showed itself to be previously incurable, that is, it cannot be prevented from causing the death of the soul. Cf. on this point the essay on 'The Penitential Teaching of Origen' in this volume. Cf. also J. Grotz, pp. 378-81.

[13] This applies to everyone who disturbs the peace of the Church.

[14] In II 14,3.9.13 the point is made in polemic against rigorism in penance that the sinner does not defile the Church. This could refer to the repentant, converted sinner who has returned to the fellowship of the Church. However, it is then stated that not even Judas could harm the Church, were he to take part in its worship. Such inconsistencies arise in the heat of polemic. The fact remains that the Church has to remove such sinners if it is to stay undefiled (VI 14,10). Only when it is physically or morally impossible to apply this principle, when a man is unable to discern clearly the ultimate dispositions of another and where it is a question of a repentant sinner, is it correct to say that, according to the view of the Didascalia, the Church is like Noah's ark (II 14,9) and that, in the Church, the sin of the one member does not harm another (II 14,10.13).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

behaviour (II 46,4), [228] the disregarding of the excommunication of another person (III 8,5), false accusation concerning a fault deserving excommunication (II 42,5; 43,1), lying (II 39,5.6), schismatic tendencies (VI 3; 4,3-4), 'confusion, quarrels, calumnies, murmurrings, bickerings, insults, accusations, reproaches and vexations'[15] (II 43,3; cf. 43,2; 32,3).[16]

As is obvious, the circle of sins which call for the penance of excommunication is very wide. There is no mention of a narrowly defined category, along the lines of the 'triad of sins'.[17] If excommunication is simply the most effective pedagogical means which the bishop has, but one which must be applied judiciously and only after the less drastic means of correction has failed (II 41,3-9), then it must be appropriate for all sins which are in any way serious but which do not belong to the 'small imperfections' of the just (II 18,5). Also those people are to be 'avoided' who have become guilty of offenses which occasion conflict with the civil penal law (V 2,1-2). Thus they are also excommunicated officially by the Church.

Not to appear at the celebration of the liturgy was tantamount to the destruction of the 'body of Christ' (II 59,1); thus it could be concluded that those people who habitually absented themselves from the liturgy were officially excluded from the 'body of Christ'. Similarly, the condemnatio by the whole community which the person who curses his fellow-Christians incurs (II 32,3) ought also to be considered an excommunication.

In the passage IV 5-8 there is a fairly long consideration of the question of the person from whom the bishop ought not to accept alms. The section ends with the conclusion that nothing ought to be accepted from those who are excommunicated until they once more become full members of the Church (IV 8,3; cf. also 6,9). Thus the sinners who are here rejected as givers of alms must refer not merely to pagans but also to Christians who, through the sins mentioned, have incurred excommunication.

The description of the sins liable for excommunication is, therefore, very vivid: to imprison a person unjustly, to abuse slaves and the poor, sexual offences, misuse of authority on the part of civil, rulers, the fabrication of idols, the procuration of false testimony before the court by lawyers and witnesses, fraud in working with precious metal, the falsification of weights and measures, the diluting of wine, predicting the future through dreams, murder, participation in capital punishment, unlawful soldiery, usury, idolatry, theft, etc. This list evinces great similarities with the catalogue of professions [229] and occupations which, according to Hippolytus, exclude a man from the catechumenate.[18] It is, therefore, only logical that such sins should be liable to excommunication. In fact it seems that elsewhere there was less willingness to extend this list than there was in the Didascalia, especially where, as in the West, the possibility of only one penance was the clear norm. According to II 38, it may be assumed that excommunication was generally applied wherever the gradually intensified exhortation of the bishop, according to Matthew 18:15-17, remained ineffective, and that it was basically appropriate (when there was no sign of improvement) wherever the bishop could meaningfully intervene with either exhortation or reprimand.[19] Origen's problem, namely, that even in the absence of improvement one could not excommunicate in all the cases where the evangelical procedure of reprimand was necessary, is not yet found in the Didascalia. It is much quicker in its use of excommunication, and is able to be so because – as we shall see later – it knew nothing of a unique opportunity for reconciliation.

There are various reasons for excommunication: allowing the person guilty of mortal sin to [15] This tr. is taken from H. Achelis/J. Flemming, p. 58, 6-8.

[16] Cf. J. Grotz, pp. 375-78.
[17] These are generally understood to be apostasy, fornication and murder. On this point, cf. J. Grotz, pp. 347, 356-64.
[18] Cf. Hippolytus (Dix, pp. 24-8). Didascalia II 39,5-6 shows that the author was aware of the parallel between the treatment of catechumens and that of sinners.
[19] Cf. J. Grotz, p. 383 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

remain in the Church taints it (II 10,1) and constitutes a danger for the morale of Christians (II 10,1.2; 17,4; 43,5); the exclusion, on the other hand, effects a salutary fear in the other Christians (II 17,5; 49,4; 50,4).

The actual carrying out of the exclusion is fairly complicated. It would appear that, in fact, a distinction has to be made between two events which here may be called the real and the liturgical excommunication.[20] The justification for this distinction will appear in the following exposition which attempts to situate the unconnected individual data of the Didascalia in their proper place. This reconstruction is itself justified in so far as it affords an understanding of the individual data and avoids the many superficial repetitions which a continuous reading would inevitably entail. But this procedure is justified above all by the way it inserts the penitential teaching of the Didascalia, especially with regard to its strictness, in the context of the other data known to us from this time.

1. The Real Excommunication

The real 'excommunication' has its first step – and this would also have been its original form – in the voluntary withdrawal of the sinner [230] from the liturgical and social life of the community; he does this either because in his new religious and moral situation he no longer places any value on such a participation or because he is aware of the interior and exterior contradiction in his relationship to the Church and therefore avoids the liturgy (II 10,3). All this implies a long self-exclusion from the Church.

It can also happen that, in the case of a less 'tactful' person (inerubidus: II 10,4) who, despite his fault, remains undisturbed in the Church, the initiative has to come from the community. After all, the bishop exercises a certain supervision over the behaviour of the Christians entrusted to him (II 6,4; 5,2; 18,7; 20,2-5; 21,2; 37,1-3, etc.). He is supported in this task by the deacons (II 17,2; 28,6; 44,3 f.; 57,6; 58,1), while the co-operation of the laity in this regard (through advice, accusation, etc.), although it was obviously customary, was rather underplayed because in practice it inevitably led to strife and unrest in the community (II 37,2-3; 42,1-6; 47,3). Thus a bishop could exclude a Christian sinner motu proprio if he had not separated himself from the church community of his own accord (II 10,4, etc.). Such an exclusion obviously had to have a public character. To begin with, it would often be preceded by an accusation on the part of other members of the community which would demand an impartial, careful and lenient verdict, in order to avoid an unjust excommunication. This care was also required in order that unjust accusations which derived only from personal animosity could be energetically counteracted, even eventually with the excommunication of the accuser (II 42; 43,1; 49,3-4; 48,1-3; 56,2). If in this process it is established that there is an objective reason for an expulsion, then the bishop has to effect the real excommunication: he reprimands the sinner in the assembly of the community and expels him from it (II 10,4-5). This judicial sentence (II 11,2; 6,11) of an unerring bishop (II 6,4) could be accepted by the person who is expelled repentantly and sorrowfully (II 10,5) or even obstinately.[21] Since in the individual case it is in no way established whether and when [20] J. Grotz's arguments in favour of two radically distinct institutions of penance appear to be inconclusive. Cf. our discussion of his basic ideas in our essay 'The Penitential Teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas' in this volume.

[21] The deacon posted at the church entrance (II 57,6) also had to ward off obstinate excommunicates who believed that they were excluded unjustly. There were also people who were not excommunicated because the bishop, on account of his own life-style, could not confront them with the necessary authority, or who had acquired the bishop's indulgence by presents and alms (II 9; IV 8,3). In other words, people were not always prepared to undergo an excommunication willingly and repentantly.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the sinner would be able to be readmitted into the community of the Church, at this moment a later reconciliation would still be unsure. This is because it is not at all clear either that the excommunication to be imposed would be accepted repentantly by the sinner or that he would in fact reform himself. All that is certain is the general principle that a possibility for reconciliation must be offered to repentant sinners.[22]

[231] It is also obvious that this excommunication was, first and foremost, a matter of church discipline. Indeed, it must have frequently happened that such a real excommunication took place in the sinner's absence, simply because the latter did not appear. The reason for the sinner's voluntary absence, however, need not be his religious indifference. It could very well be the Christian's sorrow and real penitence (II 10,3), making him decide to announce himself in the Church again only when he has actually reformed himself and therefore has eradicated the original cause for the excommunication. Nevertheless, even in such a case as this, for perfectly comprehensible theological[23] and pastoral[24] reasons, the repentant sinner is not simply 'forgiven' his excommunication. This doubtless explains why the real excommunication which was practically nonexistent was compensated liturgically and an attempt was made to prelude the already possible reconciliation with at least a short, more ceremonial period of penance, so that excommunication and reconciliation did not coincide.

It even appears that there is in the Didascalia already that stage in the development of the penitential process[25] at which even the person who had previously been really formally excommunicated was submitted to the subsequent liturgical excommunication just mentioned. But this development will come as no surprise to anyone conversant with the laws of liturgical progress. In any case it is the best explanation of the two to seven weeks of the period of penance mentioned in II 16,2: what is meant there is not the actual time of penance and conversion[26] but a more liturgical-ceremonial interval between the liturgical

---

[22] The passage II 10,4-5, as opposed to II 16,1-2, refers to this meal, official and publicly valid excommunication. This distinction between the real and the liturgical excommunication becomes clear in II 43,1, where a false accuser is excluded from the Church. After some time he is summoned again and has to promise – obviously in the way described in II 16,1-2 – that he will do penance during the period which is then imposed upon him (II 16,2). He is admonished (II 16,2; 43,1), and thus begins his period of penance in the strict liturgical sense. When these weeks are up (II 16,2; 43,1) he receives reconciliation by the imposition of hands. The same structure of the penitential process is found in II 50,4: first the sinner is judged and excluded; he has to do penance, that is, he must really be converted. Then he comes to the bishop and prays for readmission, while confessing his guilt and promising to do further penance, that is, the still outstanding liturgical penance which begins with the liturgical exclusion (II 16,2) and which already determines when the readmission will take place. The same procedure is found in II 13,4; iudica eum (the sinner) primum severe (the real excommunication) et deinde (that is, after the real penance) suscipe eum cum benignitate et misericordia (at the liturgical excommunication at which it is already decided in practice that the future reconciliation will take place after a couple of weeks), si promiserit se paenitentiam acturum esse (a promise which he must have already made previously in order to be admitted to the present rite and which the penitent is only too pleased to repeat at this stage) et increpa eum, ange eum (the official reprimand and exhortation of the liturgical excommunication), persuade ei ac succurre ei (the bishop's co-operation in the sinner's penance during the coming liturgical period).

[23] At least previously, the sinner was out of right relationship with the Church. This situation must be expressed visibly, since there can hardly be an actual sacramentally visible 'loosing' if there has not been previously a corresponding 'binding'.

[24] This could have appeared as preferential treatment to those who had, as it were, been surprised by a spontaneous excommunication on the bishop's part.

[25] Cf. II 43,1; 50,4.

[26] We have no more precise information about this particular period. Apparently at this time there were no fixed penitential duties in the circle of the Didascalia. In II 43,1 there is mention only of aliquod tempus. II 50,4 demands that such a period should last until the sinner has done penance, that is, until (II 16,2) it is possible to establish by examination that he deserves to be readmitted. In these circumstances the length of the penitential period must have varied considerably. Given the general leniency found in the Didascalia and the reasonable demands which the bishop made in determining the period of penance to suit each individual case, this period

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excommunication and reconciliation which was naturally characterized by prayer, fasting and solitude (II 16,2). Thus this time limit does not prove an exception to the general penitential practice of that century and one must discount Connolly's argument, according to which the Didascalia shows signs of a twofold penitential practice.[27] At the same time, this interpretation of the brief time limit of II 16,2 confirms the existence of two distinct kinds of excommunication in the Didascalia.[28]

2. The Liturgical Excommunication

The precise procedure for the liturgical excommunication is laid down in II 16,1-2.[29] According to this passage, the bishop summons [232] the repentant sinner first of all into the church assembly; at this point the sinner himself is actually outside the Church, even though he is already repentant, that is, he has already done penance and is still doing it. Thus he is able to be called in and examined concerning his worthiness for readmission to the Church (II 16,2). Now this makes sense only if he has not just fallen into the sin for which he has been expelled from the Church's fellowship. Next the penitent confesses his guilt within the community (II 50,4), begs forgiveness and promises that he will mend his ways (II 16,4). Then he is examined as to whether he has really already done penance (II 50,4a) and is still doing it and therefore whether he basically deserves reconciliation. The bishop admonishes and exhorts the penitent and gives him instructions about the following short penitential period of a few weeks, during which the penitent has to pray, fast and be alone. At the same time the bishop determines the precise length of this penitential period (two to seven weeks), could not have been generally more than a couple of years, at the most.

---

[27] Cf. R. H. Connolly, pp. lv-lvi.

[28] It is not surprising that the real excommunication could fall into disuse sooner than the liturgical excommunication. The latter was, for theological reasons, in a certain sense necessary for the introduction of the reconciliation process. The real excommunication could hardly serve this purpose, since it did not, as such, establish that the reconciliation had in fact already begun. Thus the real excommunication could fall into disuse wherever, on the one hand, its real significance as an actual exclusion from the community was diminished by the fact that the sinner willingly avoided the community and undertook his own conversion, and, on the other hand, the theological-sacramental emphasis (which had originally been placed on it) shifted more and more to a liturgical-ceremonial rite of excommunication. Thus it is possible to see here clearly for the first time that a separation is gradually taking place between excommunication considered as a measure of church discipline and as a punishment, on the one hand, and excommunication considered as an introduction to a sacramental process of reconciliation, on the other. The ultimate practical reason for such a separation, which is given already by Tertullian, Cyprian and others, is that not every necessary excommunication can reckon on the repentance of those concerned. Where this is not the case, then it necessarily deteriorates into a mere church punishment. On the distinction between the two penitential periods and the establishment of the length of the liturgical period of penance, cf. also J. Schümmer, Die altchristliche Fastenpraxis mit besonderer Berücksichgung der Schriften Tertullians (Münster 1933), pp. 195-9.

[29] This means that II 16,1 is considered as a summary of what is repeated somewhat clumsily (from the literary viewpoint) in II 16,2, that is, after the author has interrupted himself with his theological consideration of why we should pray for sinners in the community (cf. F. X. Funk, p. 60,14-16). This is certainly the simplest way of understanding these two verses. Nevertheless, it is not totally excluded that 16,1 refers to the real excommunication, while 16,2 refers to the liturgical excommunication. This interpretation would make no substantial difference to our view. J. Grotz (p. 388 f.) naturally explains the period of liturgical excommunication, according to his basic thesis, as a church penance which is imposed after the lifting of excommunication or even without a previous excommunication. Nevertheless, it must be granted even with regard to this full church penance (in Grotz's terminology), that the penitents, although no longer eiecti, are still segregati, that is, they do not yet stand again in communio in the strict sense (J. Grotz, p. 389 f.) and therefore cannot take part in the actual liturgy. These penitents arc, therefore, 'excluded' or excommunicated, unless excommunication is taken in the purely arbitrary sense of a situation in which the person excommunicated has absolutely no relationship with the Church and can take no part whatsoever in the liturgy (of the Word).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

according to the seriousness of the penitent's guilt. After this the sinner is dismissed and is to be considered by every one as an outsider.[30] It would appear that this dismissal is itself expressed by the penitent's being led ceremonially out of the church (by the bishop, deacons or laity?), since there is a mention of a subsequent return into the church. After the penitent had been thus ostracized, the whole community would (sometimes) have ratified the bishop's sentence.[31] Finally, a general prayer was said for the penitent. With this the act of liturgical excommunication comes to an end. From now on the sinner is 'bound' not only by his own sinful condition (II 21,1; VI 19,3) but also body and soul through the visible act of the official Church, exercising its heavenly power (II 34,4; cf. also II 11,2 with 1110,4-5; 21,1).

The separation of the penitent from the Church during the penitential period just mentioned[32] is, however, only a relative one. If the bishop did not bother about the penitent during these weeks, it is obvious that the salvation of the latter's soul would be seriously jeopardized (II 21,3). Since the bishop is called to bear the burden of other people's sins (II 25,7-9. 12), as a mediator between God and men (II 25,7; 26,4; 35,3), so he must look after the penitent and help him in his penance (II 21,2; 40,2): he must visit him, talk to him, trust him and lead him to complete conversion. At the same time the penitent must also take part in the liturgy, even if, like the catechumens, he remains excluded from the celebration of the Eucharist (II 39,6; 40,1; VI 14,1).[33]

[233]

3. The Effects of Excommunication

The juridical excommunication, expressed by the bishop, is not a mere measure of the Church's temporal discipline. By this excommunication the sinner is excluded from the Church. But this Church is God's vineyard (I praef.), the living and life-giving mother of the faithful (II 61,4), the bearer of the Holy Spirit (VI 14,7), the body of Christ (II 59,1), outside of which there is no salvation (II 20,5; 21,7.8; 47,3). This means that the person who is legitimately excommunicated is bound body and soul by a heavenly and divine authority (II 34,4), he has lost life and eternal glory and is shameful in men's eyes and guilty before God (II 47,3).

With regard to the effect of an excommunication which was either inflicted or upheld illegitimately, the Didascalia appears to be hesitant in its view. In one passage it stresses that such a measure has no validity before God (II 48,2-3) and works only to the detriment of the [30] This means that subsequently the excommunicated person should be avoided, which was not possible in the previous period of real excommunication in some circumstances, for example, when the penitent withdrew himself discretely from the community. Even alms for the support of the poor were not accepted from him (IV 8,3); since the care of the poor was essentially the duty of the bishop and of the Church, such an attitude is understandable. Otherwise, almsgiving is generally treated as a means of penance (III 8,3). The penitent would give alms in order to be assumed of the prayers of others in respect of his own sins (IV 7,1-3; 8,1-2).

[31] This need not be meaningless and superfluous, since, after the penitent's expulsion everything depended on his being avoided in practice by the members of the community. The penitent has 'to remain humbly on his own' and so publicly confess his guilt. But this also demands a corresponding behaviour on the part of the rest of the faithful. Such a general agreement with the bishop's excommunication appears to be intended also in II 32,3.

[32] This obviously applies also, in certain circumstances, to the period of real excommunication; especially since the following statements cannot be applied with certainty to penance either before or after the liturgical excommunication.

[33] The permitti in Ecclesia, as it applies to repentant heretics, refers to the liturgy of the Word, whereas obstinate heretics are excluded from both the liturgy of the Word and the liturgy of prayer (neque per verbum neque per orationem communicare). The repentant sinner was allowed access to the liturgy of the Word before the actual liturgical excommunication. This is evident both from the reason given for this access and from the fact that the relevant passages in the Didascalia do not apply absolutely only to the period of liturgical penance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

salvation of the person who excommunicates illegitimately (II 48,5). On the other hand, it is also stated that an illegitimate excommunication (or the refusal of reconciliation) involves more harm for the person who is excommunicated than is caused by the murder of a just man, since such an excommunication thrusts the person who is expelled from the Church into hell (II 21,7 f.; 56,2). What this second statement certainly shows is how profoundly convinced the author of the Didascalia was of the other-worldly effect which is, in principle, connected with an excommunication.

IV. RECONCILIATION

Provided that they are repentant, all those who have been excommunicated can be reconciled with the Church again, since God forgives all repentant sinners (II 12,1-3; 13,4; 14,1-3; 14,11; 15; 16; 18,1-3.7; 20,2-11; 21; 23; 24, etc.). Even idolatry, murder, adultery and heresy find το&ποφ μετανοι/αφ (II 23,1; 24,3; VI 14,1).[34] The idea that God and the Church could treat the repentant sinner differently, that is, that God could grant forgiveness while the Church still had to refuse reconciliation, is totally unknown to the Didascalia. The one forgiveness necessarily calls for the other. The only unforgivable sin is the obstinate rebellion against God (α(μαρτα&νειν ε0κ παρατα&χεωφ) (II 23,2), as well as the obdurate perseverance in heresy or unbelief [234] (VI 14,2-7), interpreted as a sin against the Holy Spirit – in other words, actual unrepentance.

1. The Rite

As we have already seen, the rite of reconciliation takes place several weeks after the liturgical excommunication. It consists of a reception of the penitent by the bishop before the assembled community (recipe eum), the episcopal imposition of hands[35] accompanied by the prayer of the whole community (tota Ecclesia pro eo orante ei manus impone), and the reinstatement of the penitent in his previous place in the Church (ac deinde permitte ut in Ecclesia sit) (II 18,7),[36] where he is able once more to take part in the celebration of the Eucharist with the community and the bishop.[37]

By analogy with the procedure for baptism, we need to distinguish the actual place of reconciliation from that of the celebration of the liturgy. Otherwise it is not possible to understand the introducere (II 41,2) which follows the imposition of hands.

2. The Meaning of the Rite

[34] Cf. K. Baus, p. 384.
[35] Presumably this was also accompanied by a prayer on the bishop's part.
[36] These instructions are not to be understood abstractly and juridically. The individual aspects follow each other in temporal and succession and are, therefore, rules for the liturgical ceremony. The clearly distinguished classes of Christians had their fixed places in the Church. The deacons had to ensure that these places were respected and, occasionally, to show visiting strangers to their proper places (II 57,2-58,6). Since this was also the duty of the deacons on other occasions (II 57,7.9; 58,5), it is easy to imagine that after the imposition of hands and at the bishop's command the deacon leads the penitent to his previous place in the community which he has rot been able to occupy during his period of penance because of his exclusion from the liturgy. II 41,2 also contains the real distinction between the manum imponere pro eo precantibus and the deinde introducere et participem facere ecclesiae. In the corresponding place of the Constitutiones Apostolorum (II 41,2; F. X. Funk, p. 131,8) the introducere is explicitly interpreted as a 'leading back to his previous place (νομη/)'.
[37] The latter is obviously intended, once the communicare is distinguished from the recipere (II 38,4).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now how is this external service of church reconciliation[38] to be understood? The Didascalia is clearly aware of the parallel of this rite with the form of initiation (II 41,2). A part of this parallel is perfectly comprehensible and presents no difficulty at all: after baptism and after the penitential imposition of hands, both of which occur outside the actual precincts of the church (however one may visualize this location at the time of the Didascalia), the newly baptized person or the reconciled penitent is introduced into the actual place where the liturgy is celebrated so that he can take part in the subsequent celebration of the Eucharist.[39]

In both cases it is a question of the same event having its basis in the fact that the preceding rite has made the person a fully legitimate participant in the worship of God. This does mean, however, that, in the case of baptism, the whole of the rite of initiation, as it was required at this time for access to the celebration of the Eucharist (that is, including today's Confirmation[40]), must have preceded this [235] introduction. Thus, following the parallel just mentioned, the imposition of hands of reconciliation in penance corresponds to baptism and Confirmation. 'Baptism' here means the whole of the rite of sacramental initiation.

But what is the precise import of the parallel in this respect? To begin with, the text states only that the penitent receives the imposition of hands at the place of baptism.[41] Accordingly, the comparison lies in the effect (the communication of the Spirit) despite the difference of the rite itself. In other words, it is important to notice that, according to the precise wording of the expression, the Holy Spirit is not bestowed in the penitential imposition of hands in the same way as in baptism.[42] Rather, at the place of the baptismal rite an imposition of hands is administered which has the same effect, namely, the bestowal of the Spirit. This is the only way to understand the sentence: aut per manus impositionem aut per baptismum accipiunt participationem Spiritus Sancti. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that in the Didascalia the once-and-for-all possibility of baptism[43] is a self-evident principle (VI 12,2). Thus the penitential imposition of hands is not envisaged here as the formal repetition of the rite of initiation or of one of its parts. The parallel – in so far as it is apparent – consists only in an identity of the effect of baptism and the penitential imposition of hands. The Didascalia, as opposed to the Constitutiones Apostolorum,[44] does not stress that baptism also involves an [38] On the imposition of hands, cf. also II 43,1. It is obvious that the bishop took this opportunity to express his joy over this event in an address: gratanter autem paenitentes suscipite gratulantes (II 15,3).

[39] Cf. II 41,2: Quemadmodum gentilem baptizas ac postea recipis, ita et huic manum impones ac deinde introduces et participem facies ecclesiae. Cf. also II 41,1: ad orationem eum (the penitent who is reconciled) admitte sicut gentilem (after baptism).

[40] Thus it is here simply presupposed that 'Confirmation', according to the Didascalia too, is a part of the rite of initiation.

[41] The Constitutiones Apostolorum have preserved this sentence verbatim: και∴ ε1σται αυ0τω~| α)ντι∴ του= λου/σματοφ η9 ξειροθεσι/α (II 41,2; F. X. Funk, p. 131,8 f.). This needs to be underlined here, since the following sentence no longer agrees textually with the Didascalia but stresses that in baptism also the Spirit is bestowed by the imposition of hands. In the Didascalia, however, the text continues: 'Since the Holy Spirit is received either through baptism or through the imposition of hands'. Even granted that 'baptism' here includes an imposition of hands, the difference between the two events is clear both in form and in content.

[42] This can be deduced from the text of the Constitutiones Apostolorum mentioned in the previous note; and perhaps this idea is even intended there. If this were the case, however, it would entail a contradiction to the first sentence (και∴ ε1σται . . .) which the author himself does not appear to have noticed.

[43] Thus the imposition of hands of Confirmation is still an inseparable aspect of the single rite of initiation that is 'baptism'. In II 32,3 it is the ξειροθεσι∴α of the bishop which communicates the Spirit 'in baptism'. In VI 21,1 it is simply stated that we receive the Holy Spirit 'through baptism'. 'Baptism' here, therefore, is a comprehensive notion which embraces the imposition of hands of Confirmation.

[44] The re-wording of the text of the Didascalia in the Constitutiones Apostolorum is an indication that in the Eastern Church the process had already begun which leads to an increasingly stronger identification of the reconciliation of heretics (penitents) with Confirmation. In fact it may be asked whether, in both cases, it is not a question of the same imposition of hands (considered either materially or formally), so that the imposition of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

imposition of hands by which the Spirit is communicated. It does not give the slightest hint that the penitential imposition of hands could be a repetition of the imposition of hands in confirmation, considered either materially or formally. Indeed, such a repetition of the imposition of hands in confirmation is rather excluded both by the once-and-for-all possibility of baptism and by the opposition which the Didascalia emphasizes between the two rites. The passage in II 41,2, Quemadmodum igitur gentilem baptizas ac postea recipis, ita et huic manum impones . . . ac deinde eum introduces . . ., does not contradict the opposition just mentioned. The et here does not stress that the hand is imposed as in baptism. It merely underlines the general parallel between the two rites (baptism and penance) with regard both to a man's access to the liturgy (cf. II 41,1) and to the communication of the Spirit. The et requires no other explanation than this parallel (cf. Connolly 104,21).

Obviously there is also an imposition of hands in baptism; but it is [236] incorrect to hold that it is precisely on this point that the Didascalia sees the parallel in question. Otherwise, it would be completely impossible to understand why the baptismal imposition of hands is never mentioned, whereas baptism is mentioned three times. Now if the author of the Didascalia already considered the imposition of hands after baptism as an independent part which, as such, does not belong essentially and necessarily to initiation (either because the actual bestowal of the Spirit took place through an anointing as at confirmation or because the imposition of hands had already become to be considered as totally independent from the actual baptism), then he would naturally have been 'free' to adduce this rite as formally identical (as a repetition of 'confirmation') or at least as materially so (as applicable to another purpose) in another place – in the present instance, therefore, with regard to reconciliation. But these assumptions are not verified in the case of the Didascalia, since otherwise it could not be said that baptism communicates the Holy Spirit or that it is communicated in baptism by the imposition of hands. If, therefore, the imposition of hands after baptism still belongs essentially to the one initiation and is thereby unrepeatable, then the Didascalia could not consider the penitential imposition of hands as a repetition of this post-baptismal imposition of hands.

Nevertheless, the question of the meaning of the penitential imposition of hands is not yet actually answered. If reconciliation was conceived as a parallel to baptism (if only in the sense explained above), then it is possible that the imposition of hands of confirmation after baptism served as a model for a similar rite in reconciliation, simply because in both cases it was a matter of expressing the communication of the Spirit. But is the imposition of hands of confirmation after baptism the only possible model which could have served in the production of the penitential imposition of hands? In fact there is in the Didascalia yet another imposition of hands, associated with an anointing of the head by the bishop (III 12,2-3),[45] an ungere in manus impositione, and one which occurs before baptism. In accordance with the other data of the history of the liturgy, this anointing must be seen as an exorcism.[46] hands at penance would be the repetition of the imposition of hands at Confirmation. A further witness to the same development at the same time (the end of the fourth century) is the inauthentic can. 7 of the Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381). According to this, it appears that the validly baptized heretic is reconciled by Confirmation (the sealing with myron accompanied by the Eastern formula of Confirmation); cf. C. J. Hefele, Conciliengeschichte II (Freiburg 1875), pp. 26-8; H. Elfers, Die Kirchenordnung Hippolyts von Rom (Paderborn 1938), p. 132 f.

---

[45] For the explanation of this difficult text, cf. H. Elfers, p. 143 f.

[46] Nevertheless, this rite is placed on the same level as the anointing of the king and the priest in the Old Testament. But this is probably only to explain that, in the case of women, the bishop could be satisfied with an anointing of the head. For parallels to this anointing-imposition of hands as an exorcism in preparation for the act of baptism proper, cf. in Clemens of Alex., Excerpta ex Theodoto 83-4 (GCS 17:132, 15-23) [should number 20 here not read as ε0πθε/σειφ ξ., instead of the conjecture ε0πα&ρσειφ ξειρω~ν?]; The Acts of Thomas 157 (Hennecke, Neutest. Apokryphen 287; Lipsius/Bonnet II 2,266 f.); Hippolytus, Paradosis (Dix, pp. 30-2);

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The connection of anointing and imposition of hands in this instance does not necessarily exclude the possibility of a parallel with the penitential imposition of hands. In fact in Origen also the rite of reconciliation appears to have been connected with an anointing. In any case, later in the East such [237] a connection was common. It is difficult to prove, despite the silence of the text on this point, that this connection could not have been the real background for the teaching of the Didascalia.[47] Nevertheless, it is not possible to prove this assumption positively. In the Didascalia it is the anointing that is clearly emphasized in this exorcism before baptism. Thus it is rather unlikely that an eventual imposition of hands employed in connection with the exorcism before baptism could have been singled out as the model for the penitential imposition of hands.

We are left, therefore, with the imposition of hands after baptism, to which the Didascalia ascribes the communication of the Holy Spirit (II 32,3; 33,1; 33,2; VI 7,2).[48] Here there is no mention of an anointing.[49] Now the penitential imposition of hands is also considered as a communication of the Holy Spirit – and indeed without mention of an anointing. It follows that, in all probability, the Didascalia intends the penitential imposition of hands to be understood as an imitation (not as a formal repetition!) of the imposition of hands of confirmation. In other words: according to the Didascalia, the rite of reconciliation is an imposition of hands because, and in so far as, this is a gesture which bestows the Spirit, and not because it has a healing character (i.e., is an exorcism). Obviously this does not mean that it is only the imposition of hands in confirmation, considered as a rite conferring the Spirit, that was the unique model for the creation of the rite of reconciliation. The mere fact that the imposition of hands as a gesture of the communication of the Spirit is not the prerogative of Cyprian, Sent. episc. 1; 8; 37 (CSL 3,1: 436; 441; 450); Cyprian, Epist. 69,15. These parallel passages from the same period attest clearly the exorcism character of the anointing-imposition of hands or the simple imposition of hands before baptism and thus show how the imposition of hands in the Didascalia is to be understood. Nevertheless, it should not be overlooked that this anointing before baptism is not followed by any further anointing. This point has been demonstrated by R. H. Connolly, Didascalia Apostolorum (Oxford 1929), p. xlix f. n.8 with reference to 'The Liturgical Homilies of Narsai' (Cambridge, 'Texts and Studies' VIII/I, 1909), p. xlvii ff. and on the Syr. tr. in general xlii-xlix. In the Syrian Church a (first) communication of the Holy Spirit was already attributed to this anointing, as Connolly illustrates with a whole succession of Syriac texts. Subsequently in the consciousness of that time the anointing as an exorcism and as a rite of the Communication of the Spirit were more or less fused together. Cf. also the texts of J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains et les rites connexes (Wetteren 1925), p. 281 n.6. Moreover, the Didascalia also knows of an imposition of hands with prayer as an exorcism which, with the permission of the bishop or the deacon, may be performed even by widows (III 8,1-3). This practice is known at the same time also by Ps.-Clement (De virginitate I 12 [F. X. Funk, Patres Apost. II^2, p. 11]) and even previously by Tertullian (De praescript. haeret. 41).

---

[47] In penance the bishop is considered a 'physician' who has to heal the wounds of sin (II 20,10-11; 41,3-9). The notion of a healing anointing which acts as an exorcism cannot be far removed from this idea. Nevertheless, Origen's witness reflects a usage in the circle of the Alexandrian Church, making a conclusion for the Didascalia difficult. Moreover, the rite of reconciliation, differing according to different regions, must have corresponded to the development of the rite of initiation. In fact the anointing of Confirmation acquired precedence over the imposition of hands of Confirmation in the Alexandrian Church well before this happened in the Syrian Church. Thus the anointing at reconciliation also must have gained acceptance later in Syria than it did in the Alexandrian area.

[48] In the chronological list of II 33,2 the expression Spiritu Sancto replere follows the expression per aquam regenerane. This indicates that the communication of the Spirit by an imposition of hands (II 32,3) cannot occur through that imposition of hands (III 12,2-3) which takes place before baptism. Rather a second imposition of hands is to be assumed after the baptism of water, even though nothing is mentioned about this in III 12,2-3. In fact what is the role of the deaconesses in the rite of initiation? They complete the anointing of the head before baptism with an anointing of the whole body, but they have nothing more to do with imposition of hands after baptism. This would explain why, in this context, the first imposition of hands is mentioned but not the second.

[49] As generally in the Syrian Church, as opposed to the Alexandrian Church, the anointing at Confirmation was lacking for a long time. Cf. H. Elfers, pp. 141-7; J. Coppens, p. 330 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

confirmation[50] makes this impossible. Moreover, this symbol is so old and self-evident and appropriate that it imposes itself wherever it is a question of the bestowal of the Spirit. Nevertheless, after all that has been said above, it is obvious that a parallel was perceived between the imposition of hands of confirmation and the penitential imposition of hands, in so far as both communicate the Holy Spirit. This is not only a simple fact which is stated explicitly in II 41,2. The expression, per impositionem manus . . . accipiunt (in penance) participationem Spiritus Sancti could always be understood by synecdoche; that is, the imposition of hands is, in itself, a prayer of the bishop which helps the penitent to purify himself from his sins and is, therefore, merely a penitential rite at the conclusion of the penitential process which itself ends with the renewed possession of the Spirit. If, however, our explanation is the [238] correct one, then the imposition of hands is intended precisely as the communication of the Spirit and expresses the fact that this possession of the Spirit is not only the immanent effect of the sinner's own penance but is granted to him by the Church along the lines of initiation.

3. The Theological Meaning of Reconciliation

We must now turn to the theological meaning of reconciliation and its rite. The bishop represents almighty God and, according to Matthew 18:18, has the power to forgive sins (II 18,2). The 'loosing' by virtue of this scriptural text occurs in the remission of sins (solve per remissionem: II 18,2). This heavenly and divine authority frees not only the body – as the power of kings would do – but also souls (II 34,4). It is worth noting that in the Didascalia the notions of binding and loosing clearly have the double meaning which they have in the New Testament in Matthew. Thus binding and loosing are to be understood both as the imposition and relaxation of a generally obligatory norm and as the imputation and lifting of an individual state of guilt.[51] The bishop undertakes the lifting of personal guilt 'in God's place' (II 18,2). It is through the bishop that the Redeemer says to the sinner: Your sins are forgiven you (II 20,9), and the bishop grants the α!φεσιφ from sins (II 18,1.2.7). Thus this authority of loosing – in so far as there is a question of explicitly stressed moments – is understood as 'binding in heaven', that is, as a direct if, naturally, representative remission of guilt before God, not however as a 'loosing' as the bond of guilt imposed by the Church 'on [50] The bishop was also consecrated by the imposition of hands; cf. II 2,3.

[51] For the first notion, cf. I 6,7-9; II 5,4; VI 16,6; 17,6 (binding as the imposition of a law); I 6,10; II 34,7; 35,1; VI 16,1; 12,11; 17,1 (loosing as the abrogation of a law); II 21,1; VI 19,3 (binding as a self-induced state of guilt); II 11,2; 34,4 (imposition and lifting of exclusion from the Church having a heavenly effect); II 18,2-3; 20,10; 33,2 (loosing as the forgiveness of guilt in baptism or penance). On this, cf. V. Brandner, '"Binden und Lösen" in der altsyrischen Kirche' in: Katholik 95, 1 (1916), pp. 220-32, 287-304 (for the Didascalia 225-7, 287-9). This ε0χουσι/α του= λυ/ειν (Const.Apost. II 18,3 [F. X. Funk, p. 65,26] corresponding to Didascalia II 18,3) is now in the Didascalia simply a solvere per remissionem as God's representative (II 18,2; Connolly, p. 55,6 f.: loose by forgiveness). The loosing of the guilt here implicitly dispenses with the intermediary of reconciliation with the Church; (at least as far as the explicit meaning of the text is concerned) it means directly forgiving guilt in God's name. Through the bishop the redeemer says to sinners: your sins are forgiven (II 20,9). Thus reception into the Church appears rather as a consequence of the redeeming forgiveness of sins than as its cause. This is also clear from the unhesitating use of the notion of α!φεσιφ for the forgiveness of sins after baptism by the bishop without any inkling of the narrower and stricter use which it normally has with regard to baptism alone, in the Pastor of Hermas, in African theology from Tertullian to Cyprian, in Clement of Alexandria, in Origen and in Firmilian. Cf. II 18,1-2; 18,7; 20,9, as well as II 13,1; 16,2.3; 18,5; 23,2; 26,2. The most that can be said is that in V 9,1-6 something of the earlier use of this notion in the sense of a completely gratuitous forgiveness of guilt is discernible. But here also it is stated that in martyrdom sins are 'covered' – which is elsewhere an effect of the old α!φεσιφ in baptism. For Origen, however, 'to cover' was rather a notion which expressed an opposition to the α!φεσιφ of baptism and martyrdom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

earth' which has a subsequent heavenly effect. The same conclusion follows from the teaching that the bishop bestows the Spirit in the same way through his imposition of hands in reconciliation as he does in baptism (II 41,2).[52] Here baptism and penance are paralleled not only in their effect (in such a view the sinner's personal penance could still be seen as the decisive moment), but also the bishop's imposition of hands (therefore the act of the Church) is paralleled with baptism, with the result that the urgently demanded penance of the sinner himself appears more like a precondition[53] for the bishop's announcement that the penitent's sins are remitted. This is an anticipation of part of the Scotist theory of penance.[54]

[239] Naturally this does not mean that the ecclesial aspect of penance is simply lacking. Grave guilt entails radically and necessarily the separation from the Church. And the exercise of the power to forgive sins as God's representative is always seen as an act in which the penitent is again reconciled with the Church (II 18,7; 20,4.10-11; 24,2; 33,3; 43,1; IV 8,3; VI 14,1). Nevertheless, this readmission into the Church is seen more as the consequence of the remission of sins and healing through the bishop than as the means of the remission of sins and the communication of the Spirit: sanans suscipe: II 42,2.[55] In any case in the Didascalia the authoritative forgiveness of sins is independent of incorporation into the Church as a means of salvation. Thus its sacramental character is more clearly attested here than elsewhere: the parallel with baptism, the teaching on the bishop's representative power to forgive sins in God's name and the idea of the communication of the Spirit as an initiation express with all the clarity desirable not only the sacramental nature of penance as a whole but also that of the bishop's part in the penitential process.

At the same time, there is nothing to indicate that the correction and exhortation of a sinner by the bishop which is private or carried out before two witnesses but which does not include an excommunication has a sacramental character and, therefore, represents a 'private' sacramental penance (II 37,1-3; 38,1-3). In this case it is a question of those doctrinal and educative measures which the bishop as doctor and educator of the faithful ought not to withhold from the sinner even in the penance of excommunication, without, however, in any particular case having a sacramental character in themselves. They are obligations which pertain to the bishop's simple pastoral charge (cf., e.g., II 5,2.3; 20,2; 41,3-8, etc.). The [52] Obviously before this, even in Cyprian, reconciliation and the communication of the Spirit were related causally. Nevertheless, this view was then more clearly counterbalanced by the teaching that the forgiveness was not simply as in baptism but the mere effect of the hard μετα&νοια on the part of the penitent himself.

[53] Penance is only the cause and the proof of the fact that the penitent is 'worthy' to receive the α!φεσιφ: II 16,2 (cf. II 16,3). Elsewhere, too, subjective penance appears repeatedly as a condition of forgiveness and readmission to the Church; cf., for example, II 18,7; 13,4; 24,2; 38,4; 39,6; 41,1; 43,1; 50,4. In itself this is not surprising, since penance is always and everywhere a condition of reconciliation with God and the Church. But in the Didascalia subjective penance as a cause of the remission of sins is emphasized less than elsewhere in the third century. Even the sanare, vivificare and sublevare happens through the bishop and the α!φεσιφ conferred by him (II 18,7; 24,2; 33,3).

[54] On this, cf.: N. Krautwig, Die Grundlagen der Busslehre des J. Duns Scotus (Freiburg 1938); W. Dettloff, Die Lehre von der acceptatio divina des Johannes Duns Scotus mit besonderer Berucksichtigung der Rechtfertigungslehre (Werle 1954), pp. 203-31.

[55] This interior sequence of aspects is clearly reflected in the course of the penitential liturgy: the imposition of hands which communicates the Spirit precedes the introducere et participem facere Ecclesiae (II 41,2). Thus whereas in Cyprian (Epist. 57,4) the person who receives the Spirit of the Father is the one who has been granted peace with the Church (cf. 'The Penitential Teaching of Cyprian of Carthage' in this volume), here the reverse is the case: it is the person who has received the Spirit who re-enters the participatio Ecclesiae. Obviously it should not be overlooked that the Church is aware of being susceptorium Sancti Spiritus (VI 14,7), which comes near to saying that it is precisely the incorporation into this Church that grants a shame in its Spirit. The faithful live in the living and life-giving mother (II 61,4). In II 33,3 the 'readmission' is placed before the 'coming alive'. Nevertheless, this could mean, as in II 13,5, admission to the official liturgical penance occurring in the liturgical excommunication, which precedes the restoration to life through reconciliation and the actual incorporation into the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishop even shares this pedagogical and intercessory activity with the laity, as, for example, widows, who fast together with the penitents (III 8,1-3).

4. The Repeatable Character of Reconciliation

Now is this forgiveness of sins by the imposition of hands explained by the Didascalia as a possibility which is presented once and for all or not? It is never clearly stated that it is possible only once. Nevertheless, this alone is not sufficient proof that the author of this work [240] is unaware of such a once-and-for-all possibility. One has only to remember that in Origen's numerous and detailed views on penance it is only once mentioned that this penance is possible only once to realize that the silence of any text on this question can hardly be construed as an adequate argument that this principle was not held in the circle represented by the text in question. Certainly a declaration on this subject should be expected in a book which considers thematically questions of church discipline, especially here, since the detailed considerations of the Didascalia offer sufficient opportunity to discuss such a principle. There is frequent stress on the fact that sins can be forgiven before God and also before the Church, and those who contest such a church reconciliation as impossible are often taken to task. Thus it would have been appropriate at least once to refer to the fact that church reconciliation is possible only once, in order to convince the sinner that he should not count on the Church's unlimited leniency and to demonstrate to the rigorist that his strictness is understood. For these reasons the silence of the Didascalia is surprising, to say the least.

In one passage, however, there is a positive hint of the possibility of a repeated reconciliation. In II 43 there is mention of the treatment of a troublemaker in the community who, by his false accusations against a fellow-Christian before the bishop, causes strife in the community and who even, through his unjust incriminations, causes the bishop to excommunicate the person who is wrongly accused (II 42). Now, for his part, the bishop must react against this miscreant with excommunication (II 43,1). If he subsequently mends his ways and does penance for a certain time (aliquod tempus), then he should be readmitted into the Church (II 43,1). If, afterwards, he shows, however, that he is continuing his bad behaviour, then he must be excluded from the church again (II 43,2). This measure is justified on a broad basis and in detail: this sinner brings only harm and shame to the Church as long as he lives in the fellowship of the Church. In reality he is not a member of the Church, even though he appears to belong to it. Just as a doctor amputates superfluous fingers and excises cancer without depriving the body of anything but only effecting its own perfection, so also the bishop must confidently exclude the troublemaker a second time since the Church can only thereby benefit (II 43,2-4). That he cannot be readmitted again after this second excommunication is not explicitly stated, but it is intended. [241][56] Otherwise, the long justification of the renewed exclusion would not make sense; since it is more than obvious that the repetition of a fault which is the reason for a just excommunication, in view of an explicit promise of reform (II 43,1), is a still more serious reason for an exclusion. The expression, Cum enim bis ex Ecclesia egressus fuerit, recte abscissas est (II 43,4), is therefore to be understood in the sense of a permanent exclusion. This does not constitute a contradiction to the penitential principle of the Didascalia, since in this case the sinner is obviously unrepentant and obstinate; that is, the conditions which are always necessary for reconciliation appear to be permanently lacking. Now if this permanent exclusion is specifically justified, and this at considerable length and in detail for this particular case, then the author of the Didascalia cannot be aware of a principle which self-evidently, generally [56] As F. X. Funk, I 134 (n. on II 43,2-4), also stresses. Similarly H. Achelis/J. Flemming, p. 302.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and without exception would preclude the readmission of a person who has been excommunicated a second time. Otherwise, he would only have to recall this principle of the μι/α μετα&νοια, and the permanent exclusion envisaged here would have a far better justification as an individual example than the one which it has in fact. Thus it must be concluded that the Didascalia does not appear to know the principle of the one metanoia.[57]

This observation is by no means as unlikely as it may appear at first sight. Wherever we meet the contrary principle in the second and third centuries it is clearly derived from the Pastor Hermae: in Africa with Tertullian or in the area of Alexandria with Clement and Origen, who both cite Hermas explicitly and even treat him as canonical scripture. The Syrian author of the Didascalia, however, certainly knew nothing of the Latin literature. According to Connolly,[58] neither has he undergone the literary influence of Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Moreover, this applies to a greater extent to all questions of church discipline which are less easily changed than ideas. Although the author of the Didascalia may indeed have known Hermas (according to Connolly),[59] the allusions to him in this writing are, nevertheless, fairly slight.[60] But a knowledge of Hermas still does not mean an acceptance of his penitential principle. If one does not start out from the false supposition that Hermas himself represents an unheard-of innovation from strictness towards leniency, so that the once-and-for-all penance after baptism was already to be considered a concession,[61] then there is no longer any argument to [242] the effect that a greater leniency than that found in Hermas is unlikely as long as it is not demonstrated by the strictest proofs which remove all doubt. The difference between the Didascalia and the Alexandrian tradition from the point of view of the liturgy of penance has already been noted. Thus it is not at all unlikely that this difference applies also to penitential discipline, that is, that the once-and-for-all possibility of penance after baptism is unknown to the Didascalia. Further observations confirm this impression that in fact the Didascalia does not know the one metanoia.

Achelis/Flemming (p. 306 f.) remark that there is no trace of the triad of unforgivable sins[62] in Syria according to the Didascalia and the Constitutiones Apostolorum. Although this is correct, this observation must be seen in its proper perspective. The striking point about this fact is not that in the Didascalia there are no unforgiveable sins but that the group of sins which are subject to excommunication is hardly limited in any way and, above all, is less determined than elsewhere. Where, however, the principle of the unrepeatable character of church forgiveness is in force the group of sins which are subject to excommunication must, in practice, be defined as narrowly as possible, if one wishes to avoid falling into insoluble difficulties in all too many cases where the penitential discipline is concerned. In fact it is remarkable that wherever the principle of the once-and-for-all penance is in force there is in practice the tendency to submit to excommunication more or less only the triad of sins and similar offences also punishable by civil law, although in theory there is the awareness that the circle of mortal sins is somewhat wider. All these problems do not burden the Didascalia.

---

[57] J. Grotz, arguing from the case of the false accuser, makes the generalization that reconciliation after an excommunication was possible only once: 'it was not repeatable' (p. 385). But in a note (p. 385 n.9) he states: 'Obviously this does not justify us in believing that it is non-repeatable as a matter of rigid principle.' Since no further justification is offered, it is reasonable to hold that – outside the sphere of influence of the Alexandrian Church – a once-and-for-all penance did not exist in the East. This affords the simplest explanation of why in the East there was nowhere a controversy over the abolition of such a principle: it simply had never existed.

[58] Cf. R. H. Connolly, Didascalia Apostolorum (Oxford 1929), p. lxxxiii.

[59] Cf. R. H. Connolly, p. lxxix.

[60] F. X. Funk, p. 220, notes with a question mark IV 3,2 as a reference to Hermas, Mand. II 5. This also appears to Connolly to be the best evidence, as he stresses in his index (p. 278).

[61] A concession which could only have been introduced on the authority of Hermas and, therefore, only through the recognition of the notion of the once-and-for-all character of penance.

[62] On this, cf. n.l7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is much freer with excommunication, treating the three capital sins no differently from the essentially lighter offences and, vice versa, punishing the latter as capital sins, that is, with excommunication. Given this wide possibility of excommunication, it is difficult to conceive that a relapse after an already completed penance did not occur more frequently than where in practice only the most serious offences were punished with a very lengthy penance of excommunication. In view of the great emphasis on the possibility of forgiveness for repented guilt in the Didascalia, a person who has relapsed with regard to a slight fault can hardly be refused a new reconciliation in principle,[63] provided he has subsequently submitted himself to excommunication.

[243]

5. Parallels to the Ban Practice of the Synagogue

The whole of the practice of excommunication in the Didascalia, down to the slightest details and more clearly than elsewhere, has the characteristics of the ban practice of the synagogue, although both the theological background and the purpose of the two institutions remain quite different. Given the spiritual and geographical proximity of the Didascalia to Judaism and its community life[64] (despite its controversy with Judaism) this affinity is not surprising. The parallels[65] between the penitential practice of the Church, as this is presented in the Didascalia, and the synagogal practice of the ban are clear: a consequence of the nezipha (reprimand) and the nidduy (simple ban) was that the person so punished had to 'withdraw to his own house and in this way manifest his sorrow for what he has done'.[66] Similarly, the bishop prescribes for one who is excommunicated: ut humiliter secum maneat et oret rogetque in diebus ieiunii. It is striking that here the co-operation of the community in the penance is not confined, as it is elsewhere, to prayer for the sinner and assent to the reconciliation by the bishop, but is also expressed 'liturgically' in the excommunication itself by a general ceremony of indignation and condemnation on the part of the whole community: Irascantur ei et iudicium de eo faciant (II 16,1; similarly II 32,3). This also has an even more impressive parallel in the synagogal ban.[67] The reasons for the exclusion, from the very nature of the case, obviously often vary between the two communities, but even here there are remarkable parallels. For instance, a person who describes his fellow man as 'slave' may [63] This does not exclude that reconciliation would be refused in those cases where it was believed that the sinner was incorrigible.

[64] The anonymous author of the Didascalia displays a detailed knowledge of Jewish teaching and practices. He calls the Jews explicitly 'brothers' (V 14,23). On this, cf. L. Goppelt, Christentum und Judentum im ersten und zweiten Jahhundert (Gütersloh 1954), p. 205 ff.; W. Bauer, Rechtglaübigkeit und Ketzerei in ältesten Christentum (Beiträge zur histor. Theologie 10) (Tübingen 1964), pp. 253 f., 256-60. Kirche and Synagogue: Handbuch zur Geschichte von Christen und Juden, vol. i, ed. K. H. Rengstorf and S. von Kortzfleisch (Stuttgart 1968), p. 69 ff.

[65] 'Parallel' does not mean an immediate dependence of the practice in the Didascalia upon the custom of the ban in the synagogue. Prescinding from the general oriental background, this phenomenon can be explained as the preservation in a conservative setting of a practice received originally from early Christianity. It is merely one more instance of the relationship which is known to have existed between the synagogue and the Christian Church, especially in the field of the liturgy. Cf., for example, A. Baumstark, Vom geschichtlichen Werden der Liturgie (Freiburg 1923), pp. 13-21; id., Liturgie comparée (Chevetogne o..J. [1940]) pp. 11, 87 f., 114 f., 137, 175; M. Simon, Verus Israel: Etudes sur les relations entre chrétiens et juifs dans l'Empire romain (Paris 1942).

[66] Cf. Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, pp. 293, 304. Since (ibid.) a funeral rite was prescribed for the person who was banned, he would surely have to fast during the time of his withdrawal. This does not mean, however, that he was excluded from visiting the temple, any more than the excommunicates were refused participation in the liturgy of the Word.

[67] Cf. Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, pp. 302, 327: 'In the act of banning the banned person should be cursed, castigated, struck, have his hair torn out, be entreated, bound, tied and even forced into a narrowly confined area' (p. 302). 'Both the simple ban and the solemn ban were expressed with curses' (p. 327).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be banned.[68] The Christian community 'judges' solemnly the person who insults his brother by calling him 'fool' and raca (II 32,3). The verdict of the synagogue in a contention between two Jews which is itself a civil matter may be imposed by the ban.[69] In the Didascalia, too, an actual civil contest between two Christians, in which the bishop is the arbiter, can end with the excommunication of one of the parties.[70] To the principle that the person who bans unjustly himself incurs the ban[71] there corresponds in the Christian context the instruction that anyone who allows another person to be excommunicated because of false accusations before the bishop must be excommunicated (II 42,5; 43,l).[72] It is also noticeable that both in Judaism and in the Didascalia the incidence of exclusions from the community is very great.[73]

[244] These examples, which could be multiplied,[74] are explicable, in part, by the very nature of the matters which they involve, and do not suppose even a mediate dependence on the one side or the other. There are some aspects, however, which are explicable only on the assumption that the practice of the synagogal ban has been applied in its external form to church excommunication, as this is represented in the Didascalia, without many elaborations, since the time of the early Church. Now the ban of the synagogue, either in its simple form (nidduy, shamta) or in its acute form (cherem), is not possible only once. Even less is it insoluble.[75] Indeed, from the very nature of the case, it could hardly be otherwise. Every ban is able to be dissolved, therefore. In view of the affinity of the Didascalia's excommunication practice with these Jewish practices, it is difficult to believe that excommunication could be lifted only once, especially since this excommunication is applied frequently and lightly and leniency is preached with regard to sinners.

What is more, the Constitutiones Apostolorum do not appear to recognize a once-and-for-all granting of reconciliation. In Const. II 40,1 the 'second stumble', which is treated exactly as the first, can not really mean a second stumble before the first undertaking of penance.[76]

---

[68] Cf. Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, p. 310.

[69] Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, pp. 298, 310.

[70] II 47, 1-2 is to be construed in the following way: on the Monday the bishop should try to make a decision in a lawsuit between two Christians in such a way that neither party opposes the bishop's verdict but that both guard the peace with one another. Otherwise (which appears to be the logical corollary), it can inevitably happen that 'the sentence of condemnation of the earthly tribunal' must be passed by the bishop on one 'who is nevertheless a brother'. This sentence is passed only if one of the parties opposes the bishop's verdict and does not comply with it during the course of the week. Thus what is meant can only be excommunication and not a verdict in civil law. For the notion of the 'earthly tribunal' cf., for example, Strack/Billerbeck, I, p. 742, the rabbinical distinction between a 'lower' and an 'upper tribunal'. The latter confirms the ban of the latter 'on earth'.

[71] Cf. Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, p. 313.

[72] For understandable reasons, the Didascalia seems to evade the question of what ought to happen to a bishop who excommunicates unjustly. Here he is threatened only with the consequences of his behaviour in the next life (II 43,5 etc.).

[73] Cf. above under 3: Excommunication. Apart from the 24 reasons officially recognized in about the middle of the third century, Strack/Billerbeck, IV I, pp. 309-13, lists eight others (cf. ibid., pp. 313-18).

[74] Cf. the obligation of others to avoid a person who has been banned: Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, pp. 304, 328; Didascalia III 8,5; the ban because of the profanation of a feast day: Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, p. 311; Didascalia II 59,1; the question of whether the gifts of a person who has been banned should be accepted: Strack/Billerbeck, IV 1, p. 305; Didascalia, IV 5,1-8,3; III 8,3.

[75] Strack/Billerbeck, IV I, p. 320: 'Every simple ban can be loosed. Although this principle is nowhere explicitly stated, it is self-evidently implied in all the prescriptions concerning the lifting of the ban.' P. 328: 'The assumption, which is still held by Schurer, that the cherem was not able to be dissolved . . . is to be totally rejected. The Shulchan Arukh takes completely for granted that the cherem can be dissolved.'

[76] F. X. Funk, I, p. 128 n. 1, also emphasizes this, even though he wishes to exclude a repeated granting of penance for capital sins. But the assumption that there is such an essential distinction within the penance of excommunication is a purely arbitrary one. Wherever a second reconciliation was refused, this refusal must have affected all those who simply had to undertake a penance of excommunication.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now if the Constitutiones Apostolorum do not know of one metanoia, then it is also unlikely that the Didascalia was aware of it.

An argumentum e silentio always presents difficulties. Where, however, a practice is not known it cannot be expected that its absence should be explicitly noted. At the same time, it may be expected that in a work of church order or church law such an important principle should be mentioned if m fact it were m force On the supposition that the principle of the once-and-for-all possibility of church penance was never generally in force in the East, it is possible to explain much more easily why the passage from public church penance to sacramental private penance was able to be achieved in a less striking and a less reflexive way than in the West.

The Didascalia gives us, therefore, an excellent picture of the nature of penance in the Eastern Church in the first half of the third century. There is an elaborate penitential liturgy, a clear consciousness of the sacramental character of public church penance, as well as an application of this penance to practically all the kinds of sin which we today would call 'serious' (at least if we prescind from [245] mere sins of thought). There is no mention of a sacramental private penance without excommunication existing alongside the public church penance of excommunication. In this respect the Didascalia still belongs completely to the earliest period of the history of penance. At the same time, it does not recognize the once-and-for-all character of this church penance of excommunication. It provides, therefore, testimony to the effect that the Western practice, emanating from Hermas, of granting penance only once cannot simply and without proof be presented as the 'more ancient' practice. The parallels with the synagogal practice of the ban also support this. It follows from this, as indeed a close examination of Hermas would also show, that the unrepeatable possibility of penance after baptism in the Western Church represents a canonical measure which was undertaken for pastoral reasons, and that it does not derive from a dogmatic principle. The Didascalia also shows very clearly that the assumption of a linear 'evolutionary' principle for the history of penance, according to which the development proceeds inevitably from a definite strictness towards an ever-increasing leniency, with progressive concessions made to sin, is not justified on historical grounds.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[246]

8

THE PENITENTIAL TEACHING OF ORIGEN

With Origen the history of penance enters the realm of theology in the proper sense of this term. He is the first theologian of the Church in the strict sense, that is, one who attempts to organize the data of the transmitted revelation into a powerful 'system'. This necessary and, in the final analysis, inevitable enterprise is undertaken with the explicit intention of making more comprehensible the Word which has been revealed and is transmitted within the Church. Nevertheless, this approach incurs the risk that the structure of the system, together with the basic notions which are used as explanations, may dominate and violate the transmitted doctrine to be believed. A correct appreciation of Origen's teaching on penance presupposes an acquaintance with some of his own fundamental methodological preconceptions. It is for this reason that we begin this study with a brief consideration of his theology as a whole.[1]

I. TEACHING ON PENANCE, THEOLOGY AND THE CHURCH

Origen does not wish to be anything other than a man of the Church. Consequently, what is prescribed by the gospel and taught by the Church are, for him, the inviolable and self-evident norm of the whole of his thinking.[2] Although he offers a more profound explanation and understanding (gnosis) of the transmitted teaching of the [247] faith and of the Scriptures which must remain inaccessible to the majority of ordinary Christians, he does not do so by appealing to a secret tradition, after the manner of the Gnostics. Rather, it is here a matter either of a theologico-speculative interpretation of this doctrine to be believed, which doctrine still remains an obligatory norm for this explanation, or of a consideration of questions which were previously open. It can, nevertheless, also be a question of the gradual, ever-ascending search for that inaccessible 'truth' which lies behind, as in its 'parable', the immediate meaning and expression of the doctrine and practice of the faith. This 'truth' does not, however, simply render redundant this more immediate level of truth and reality. On the contrary, it confirms its validity. What is meant, therefore, is an investigation which is possible and permissible for a man only to the extent that he continually purifies himself and approaches the higher reality in love.[3] Naturally, this theology has not always been fortunate

[1] The present, thoroughly revised study appeared in its original form in a French tr., under the title 'La doctrine d'Origène sur la Pénitence' in: RSR 37 (1950), pp. 47-97, 252-86, 422-56. In 1964 it appeared unchanged in Italian in the vol.: K. Rahner, La penitenza della Chiesa (Rome), pp. 707-876. It appears in German here for the first time. For the abundant literature on Origen's teaching on penance, cf. the general bibliography in the present vol. and H. Crouzel, Bibliographie critique d'Origène (Instrumenta Patristica VIII) (The Hague 1971).

[2] De princ. I praef. 2 (GCS 22: 8,18-20.25-8); Matt XII 6 (GCS 40) 77, 26-29; Matt XII 13 (GCS 40) 94,26-32; Lc 16 (GCS 35) 109, 15-20; Jos 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,11-15; Num 9,1 (GCS 30) 54,20-25; Lev 7,4 (GCS 29) 383,7-9. Cf. G. Bardy, 'La règle de foi d'Origène' in: RSR 9 (1919), pp. 162-96; D. van den Eynde, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles (Gembloux/Paris 1933), pp. 227-34; G. Bardy, La théologie de l'Eglise de S. Irénée au concile de Nicée (Paris 1947), pp. 128-65; R. Cadiou, La jeunesse d'Origène (Paris 1935), pp. 164-7, 267 ff., 383, et passim; H. Crouzel, Origène et la 'connaissance mystique' (Brussel/Paris 1961).

[3] This question cannot be considered in detail here; but cf. J. Lebreton, 'Le désaccord de la foi populaire et de la théologie savante dans l'Eglise chrétienne de III[e] siècle' in: RHE 19 (1923), pp. 481-506; ibid., 20 (1924), pp. 5-37; J. Lebreton, 'Les degrés de la connaissance relgieuse d'après Origène' in: RSR 12 (1922), pp. 265-96; D. van den Eynde, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

enough to maintain, in fact, its connection with its own basis. Nevertheless, its proper fundamental orientation is unmistakeably clear. It is, therefore, usually quite easy to distinguish in this theology the testimony of the tradition of the faith in teaching and practice, on the one hand, from the theologico-systematic explanation of this tradition by Origen, on the other, provided one begins with the basic philosophical and theological notions. According to these principles of Origen, we even can and must rank his testimony of the Church's teaching, in its 'common' formulation for the 'masses', not as of an inferior value but precisely as the continuing norm of his actual theological endeavour. Wherever, therefore, in a particular case Origen's theological explanation does not conform to this norm, as he himself represents it, then one ought to disagree with him in his own name. Moreover, it would be false to recognize in the Church's consciousness of the faith attested by him only that which survives his incidental theological interpretation.

For a correct appreciation of Origen's theological ideas it is vital to bear in mind the specific manifold character which, in his own view, belongs to the general object of theology. Concern about any particular intended realities must consider the μυστη/ριον,[4] which according to a fundamental Platonic notion, in general, and to the idea that the whole of reality is in a condition of becoming, for Origen in particular, is the principal object of theology. The becoming [248] in question consists of a unique movement of spirits from God and back to him which has many different stages. Thus, according to Origen, the universe of angels, demons, men, matter and spirit is not merely a collection of disparate things held together by the transcendent creator, but an interiorly interrelated and hierarchically structured reality. Everything – nature and history – is included in this reality and organized by the one Logos which is both the image of the one God and the revelation of the unity to which the world is destined. Every level and degree of reality is, therefore, a shadow, a resemblance and an image of the eventual highest level. Each level refers inevitably to this last where the 'truth' finally lies. This truth is the meaning which is finally intended by all the other levels, their fulfilment, even their 'suppression' in the terminology of Hegel. Naturally the lower level is not, as such, destroyed or radically denied and threatened in this way. On the contrary, it is only by its corresponding higher reality that it is seen in its true light.[5] Thus everything, when seen in its proper order, is the image and likeness of the one Logos. This applies just as much to earthly, external history as it does to the 'phenomenal' character of the interior history of spirits in their free relationship with God. The body acts as the image of the fallen and redeemable soul; the Old Testament is the typos of the New, and this, in its turn, is the image of the eternal Kingdom in which God will be all in all.[6] Likewise, the Church acquires a sacramental structure in all its aspects: in the preaching of Christ and about Christ, as the Church itself, in the Scriptures, the hierarchy, the liturgy and the actual sacraments.[7] In each case there is an external level, for instance, Jesus' body, the words of the Scriptures, the external institution of a hierarchy, the visible offering, the elements of the (Gembloux/Paris 1933), pp. 152-6, 230-3; H. U. von Balthasar, 'Le Mystérion d'Origène' in: RSR 26 (1936), pp. 513-62 and 27 (1937), pp.38-64.

[4] Cf. on this H. U. von Balthasar, 'Le Mysterion . . .', and H. Crouzel, 'Origène' ,pp. 25-209. This structure represents both the object of theology and the mode of knowledge which is most appropriate to this object. However, Origen does not expound it in terms of abstract principles. He generally assumes it when considering particular questions and applies it unconsciously. In what follows no attempt is made to demonstrate this structure. The general reference to the conclusions of von Balthasar and Crouzel seems to be sufficient for our present purposes. Cf. also J. Daniélou, Origène (Paris 1948), as well as Origenes, Gesit und Feuer – Ein Aufbau aus seinen Schriften by H. U. von Balthasar (Salzburg 1951), pp. 11-43 (Introduction).

[5] This is evident from Origen's teaching on the transformation of the body, as distinct from its destruction.

[6] Cf. 1 Cor. 15:28.

[7] On this, cf. the author's systematic considerations under the title 'Was ist ein Sakrament?' in: Schriften zur Theologie X (Einsiedeln-Zurich-Cologne 1972), pp. 377-91.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Eucharist, baptism in water, etc. All this is the sign, the body, the visible aspect of the corresponding hidden spiritual reality which is present within these things and active through them. The inner truth thus both hides itself and reveals itself at the same time. It is in this way that are revealed the interior union of all men with the Logos, the spiritual meaning of the Scriptures, the interior hierarchy of the Church according to how near men are to God's Logos, the interior sacrifice of Christ himself and of Christians, union with the Logos in the eucharistic meal and the interior purification by baptism in the Spirit.

These two 'levels' of the Church are neither opposed to each other [249] nor are they merely juxtaposed. The external level is the 'bodily' aspect of the interior level, which latter expresses itself and is effective in the former.[8] Corresponding to this external level in the Church is the external hierarchy of bishops, priests and deacons, which Origen recognizes unhesitatingly as a divine institution, so that, in his view, a Church without them would be unthinkable.[9] This hierarchy cannot, therefore, be something which is merely exterior, like the reflection of merit or fault in a pre-corporeal existence.[10] With its inalienable duties, it is the revelation of the truth contained typologically in the historical levitical priesthood. According to Origen, it is, on the one hand, indeed only the reflection of the eternal hierarchy, itself still considered to be in some way 'external', in which Christ himself will be the 'true' bishop in the definitive Kingdom of God. On the other hand, it is the expression of the 'true' interior hierarchy of the faithful.[11] The latter is of particular importance for our present purpose. The grades of this interior hierarchy are measured by the corresponding participation in Christ's offering and in the union with the Logos in obedience towards the Father. The activity of the external officials is valid and legitimate. Origen underlines this explicitly with regard to the offering of sacrifice,[12] along with the authority to teach.[13] Moreover, in any one individual case the interior and the external hierarchy ought to coincide. Thus priests and bishops should enter the rank in the interior hierarchy which corresponds to their external dignity.[14] For his part, Origen knows very well that, in his day,

[8] On this, cf. Origen's teaching on baptism according to H. U. von Balthasar, 'Le Mystérion . . . ', pp. 54-8.
[9] In Ezech. hom. 8,1 (GCS 33) 402, 5-8. Cf. A. von Harnack, Der kirchengeschichtliche Ertrag der exegetischen Arbeiten des Origenes I (TU 42,3) (Leipzig 1918), p. 129 f. It is obvious that Origen considers the bishop's teaching office more important than his other duties (cf. Cant. III [GCS] 189, 6-11). He sees the priest and the bishop as didaskalos, and he himself had to be ordained priest in order to be able to teach legitimately. This emphasis which stresses the teaching office before the other duties of the hierarchy does not, however, change in any way its usual structure, as Origen also recognizes. Cf. D. van den Eynde, p. 233 f.; J. Daniélou, p. 57 f.
[10] Cf. Ad Rom. IX, 2 (PG 14) 1213.
[11] In Matt. X 15 (GCS 40) 18,24-19,3; ibid., XIV, 22 (GCS 40,2) 336,20-337,7: the exterior hierarchy, divided into three levels, is συ/μβολον of the realities mentioned after it; In Luc. hom. 13 (GCS 35) 91,22-5: every Church has a visible bishop, who is νοντο&φ. On this, cf. H. U. von Balthasar, p. 45 ff.
[12] In Lev. hom. 6,6 (GCS 29) 367,25-368,7; H. U. von Balthasar, p. 49 f. The section Ad Rom. IX,42 (PG 14) concerns not the Eucharist but the blessings for ordinary meals and the sanctification which they afford if they arc made in the right spirit (as opposed to G. Bardy, p. 141). The 'exception' to this principle will be considered below in detail in connection with the power to forgive sins.
[13] This is not to dispute the fact that Origen, as distinct from Tertullian, for example, did not elaborate very clear criteria for deciding between what was important and unimportant in church teaching and, consequently, in the obligations which emanate from this teaching. Cf. D. van den Eynde, p. 230. Since, however, even the Scriptures had to be interpreted according to the tradition of the Church and the role of judging the heretics falls to the bishops (cf. Origen, In Num.hom. 9,1 [GCS 33] 54, 20-9), there can be no doubt that Origen recognized a fundamental teaching authority (at least a negative one). This is connected with the office, but not with the bishop's personal holiness. Nevertheless, this does not mean that in certain aspects of positive teaching personal holiness was not considered a necessary prerequisite. This was all the more important in that, according to Origen, even an unjust decision on the Church's part is to be borne humbly and patiently (Cf. In Ezech. hom. 10,1 [GCS 33] 417, 15-17). In his view, theme is no earthly court of appeal against the Church.
[14] In Lev. hom. 6,3 (GCS 29) 362,23-363,15; ibid., 6,6 (cf. n.13).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this is not very often the case[15] and he frequently laments the fact. At the same time, he recognizes that there are many Christians in the interior hierarchy who are far worthier of a place in the external hierarchy than many actual priests and bishops.[16]

The event of salvation within this Church, as it is accomplished, for instance, in the forgiveness of sins, must therefore be connected necessarily with all these 'levels' of the mysterion of the Church.

But did Origen himself see within his own system these relationships to the different levels of reality of the Church, and say as much, at least with regard to the role of the forgiveness of sins committed after baptism? Did he apply these connections and relationships, as they, in his view, existed in general and principally between the external and interior Church, also to the forgiveness of sins? These questions themselves indicate that in this study particular [250] care will be taken to refer the individual assertions of Origen on the forgiveness of sins to the correct level of the reality of the Church and to assess precisely their theological import. These preliminary remarks dictate sufficiently the structure of this explanation of Origen's teaching on penance. Nevertheless, before the objective, church aspect of the forgiveness of sins, we will describe firstly the 'subjective' aspect: the penance of the sinner himself, in so far as he does it under the influence of grace.

II. THE PERSONAL PENANCE OF THE SINNER

1. Sin Committed after Baptism

The Church has never claimed to be an actual sinless community of saints. The letters of Paul make it abundantly clear that a Christian was capable of sinning after baptism and that this frequently happened. The images of the dead branch on the tree of the Church, of the mixture of wheat and chaff on the threshing-floor of the Church, of Noah's ark with its clean and unclean animals-all these are quite frequently applied to the community of the Church in the second and at the beginning of the third century. Nevertheless, it may still be said that it is only with Origen that 'the early Christian dream of God's sinless bride . . . came to an end'.[17] For it is only with him that the harsh reality of everyday Christian life is confronted theologically and reflectively with the knowledge of a holy Church without wrinkle and stain.[18] This point will be considered in greater detail below. In any case the progress in the Church's self-awareness with Origen is evidenced by the fact that the enthusiasm for baptism, even in comparison with Cyprian of Carthage, is remarkably less intense. Without any doubt, Origen fully appreciates the power, the efficacy and the fundamental importance of baptism as the basis of the whole of the spiritual life. And he certainly has not overlooked the once-and-for-all, immediately effective meaning of baptism,[19] which is the foundation of all further progress, in favour of a merely interior, slow and gradual moral-mystical ascent of man towards God. But he knows much more clearly than any of the theologians [251] before him that, more often than not,[20] when baptism is mentioned in the sense just outlined, it is a matter

[15] Cf. A. von Harnack, p. 129 ff.; J. Daniélou, p. 56 f.
[16] In Num. hom. 2,1 (GCS 30) 9,22-7.
[17] Cf. Origen, Geist und Feuer, p. 28 (introduction by H. U. von Balthasar).
[18] Cf. In Jos. hom. 21,1 (GCS 30) 428-429,14; In Jem. hom. 15,3 (GCS 6)127, 25-7; In Num. hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68-71; In Gen. hom. 2,3 (GCS 29) 31,10-14.
[19] Cf. H. Rahner, 'Taufe and geistliches Leben bei Origenes' in: ZAM 7 (1932), pp. 205-322 (against the one-sidedness of Völker); J. Daniélou, pp. 65-74; H. U. von Balthasar, pp. 548.
[20] Origen never thought of a renewal or a repetition of baptism. He made the distinction between baptism secundum typum Ecclesiae traditum (Ad Rom. V,8 [PG 14] 1038-40) and the interior dying with Christ by the reception of the Spirit without thereby considering the baptism in water a mere meaningless formality. This

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of what it should be, rather than of what it in fact is. In his view, the newly baptized often receive 'today' only the typus tantummodo mysteriorum without virtus eorum ac ratio.[21] If a person perseveres in sin he does not receive the α!φεσιφ α(μαρτιω~ν[22] in baptism, and Origen knows that this is only too often the case [23] Even if baptism is not actually received unworthily, according to Origen it is still only a beginning, albeit a fundamental and indispensable one.[24] Even Cyprian still considered that baptism was the sudden and complete change of the whole man, which communicated the Spirit in its fullness and which then only had to be preserved. Origen no longer shares this view.[25] It is by effort and exertion that a baptized person, who was previously ensnared by vices, is able to free himself slowly from his previous habits.[26] Thus man is always a sinner.[27] Compared with the definitive, eschatological purification of the rebirth in Spirit and fire, the purification of baptism is only a 'prelude', 'in a mirror and likeness'.[28] A relapse after baptism is, therefore, only to be expected, without, however, man's being totally deprived of God's mercy.[29] Origen views the sins of the baptized clearly and dispassionately. These sins are numerous and found in Christians of all conditions and classes, beginning with the bishops.[30] What is more, he tries to make sense of this fact and its precise theological nature. We will consider later more closely the change of the relationship of the baptized to the Church which is caused by sin. For the moment we must look at the other aspects of the nature of sin, that is, the sin of baptized Christians. What Origen has in mind are the actual sins of real men with all the degrees of guilt which these sins have within the developed psychological situation of an individual Christian. It is not surprising, therefore, if the obscurity and the complexity of this concrete situation prevents Origen's theology of sin[31] from being expressed in well-known and neat categories. Thus the formae et modi et numeri peccatorum[32] are more fluid in his thinking than they are in today's moral theology. His 'distinctions' are frequently more like descriptions and often have no clear theological basis at all.[33] Nevertheless, it is obvious that would be a contradiction of his basic notion of the relationship between τυ&ποφ and the interior reality (cf. H. U. von Balthasar, p. 56). Thus his notion corresponds to today's distinction between a 'fruitful' and a (merely) 'valid' baptism. The fact that he makes this distinction so clearly – Tertullian, for instance, still did not have the courage to do so – shows how the situation has changed.

---

[21] Ad Rom. V, 8 (PG 14) 1040.

[22] In Luc. hom. 21 (GCS 35) 140,1-7; In Num. hom. 3,1 (GCS 30) 14,1-6.

[23] In Luc. hom. 22 (GCS 35) 145,25-30; cf. J. Daniélou, p. 67 f.

[24] Cf. H. Rahner, p. 214 ff.

[25] The transformation does not take place ad subitum: Ad Rom. VI, 10 (PG 14) 1092; In Cant. II (GCS 33) 171,13-17.

[26] Contra Celsum III, 65 (GCS 2) 259,2-7 [SC 136,150,18 ff.]; cf. In Jos. hom. 6,1 (GCS 30) 321,21-322,6; In Lev. hom. 8,7 (GCS 29) 405,11-14.

[27] Ad Rom. II, 14 (PG 14) 918; In Num. hom. 10,1 (GCS 30)68-71; In Jos. hom. 21,2 (GCS 30) 431,11-14; Contra Celsum III 69 (GCS 2) 262,13-15 [SC 136, 158, 35-40]; In Joan. XX 26/27 (GCS 10) 362,20-2; 363, 30-4. On the question whether the 'perfect' can reach impeccability, cf. the dissertation of P. D. Huet (1630-1721) (PG 17) 955 ff. Cf. also: W. Völker, Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Orgenes (Tübingen 1931), pp. 162-8 (with further references to the previous literature); A. Lieske, Die Theologie der Logosmystik bei Origenes (Münster 1938), p. 90 ff.

[28] In Matt. tom. XX 23 (GCS 40) 416,32-417,5.

[29] In Ezech. hom. 6,7 (GCS 33) 385, 13-19.

[30] Cf. the material in A. von Harnack, I 65ff.; II 114ff., 129 ff.

[31] On the whole question, cf. the thorough study of G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes (Regensburg 1958), which we will have occasion to refer to again.

[32] In Ezech. hom. 5,1 (GCS 33) 372,21.

[33] Thus, for example, sin as θα&νατοφ–α)σθε/νεια–ζημι/α: In Joan. XIX 13-14 (GCS 10) 312,22-313,15; the distinction between α(μαρτι/α–ρ(υ/μοφ which, in the case of ρ(υ/μοφ can range from a morally light blemish to a pollution of the whole body: In Luc. hom. 14 (GCS 35) 96,20-98,10; In Jer. hom. 2,2 (GCS 6) 18,26-19,8; he also asks himself whether sins which, in themselves, are not 'mortal' but which, because there is no repentance, lead to a justifiable ban on the Church's part (therefore become mortal sins): In Matt. tom. XIII 30

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Origen maintains the distinction which is fundamental for the theology of penance, namely, that between those sins which cause the loss of grace and those which do not have this effect.

A) THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SINS

Origen considers, in the first place, that the different seriousness of individual sins[34] is a teaching attested by the Scriptures. This difference, however, is not one merely of degree. This is because many sins destroy the grace of baptism, while others do not have this effect. Thus Origen generally distinguishes, in his terminology, between mortal sins and non-mortal sins: mortale peccatum,[35] peccatum ad mortem,[36] α(μα&ρτημα (α(μαρτι/α) προ_φ θα&νατον,[37] and, on the other hand, α(μα&ρτημα μη∴ θανατη/φοπον (non ad mortem),[38] levis culpa,[39] peccatum leve,[40] minus peccatum[41] and parvum peccatum.[42] This opposition is also found figuratively in the distinction between illness and death, expressed by the notions of vulnus facile and insanabilis plaga,[43] that is, of sin which does harm and that which destroys.[44] On the basis of these notions alone, it is still not clear whether the distinction involved corresponds to today's realities of mortal sin and venial sin. All the same, as we shall see, it is basically a question of the same distinction.

B) LIGHT SINS

Origen frequently considers the levis culpa of the α(μαρτη/ματα μη∴ θανατη/φοπα as not destructive of grace. The person who has only the ρ(υ/μοφ of sin which does not lead to (GCS 40) 264,6-25; 266,7-21; 268,12-25; the only criterion which he recognizes for an essential distinction between sins is simply whether the sinner is ready to do penance or not: In Num. hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68-71; the three-fold distinction between sins (according to 1 Cor. 3:12) which, according to their gravity, are like wood, grass or straw: In Lev. hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 482, 10-19 and passim. Weakness, illness, somnolence: In Matt. tom. X 24 (GCS 33,19-30; the five-fold relationship to mortal sin: In Matt. tom. XII 35 (GCS 40) 149,18-33; impius, infirmus, peccator: Ad Rom. IV 11 (PG 14) 999; peccata pingua–tenuia–subtilia: In Luc. hom. 35 (GCS 35) 214,22-215,4. In addition there is the division into sins of deed, word and thought: In Cant. IV (GCS 33) 239,3l-240,1; In Ex. hom. 6,3 (GCS 29) 194, 18 f.; ibid., 3,3 (GCS 29) 166,15 f.; In Lev. hom. 9,7 (GCS 29) 430,2-10; In Is. hom. 4,3 (GCS 33) 261,14 f. (This division is taken from Philo.) On the divisions of sins, cf. further in G. Techtweier, ch. 5; 'Die Arten der Sünde, pp. 210-81, and W. Capitaine, De Ethica Origenis (Münster 1898), p. 163 ff.

---

[34] In Ezech. hom. 9,2 (GCS 33) 408, 16-24. It is interesting that Origen refuses to accept the idea that sexual faults are the most serious sins.

[35] In Lev. hom. 12,3 (GCS 29) 460,1.

[36] In Lev. hom. 11,2 (GCS 29) 452,7; In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262.14 f.; In Ex. hom. 10,3 (GCS 29) 249, 20; In Lev. hom. 4,5 (GCS 29) 322,11 f.; Fragm. ad libr. X Strom. (PG II) 103; In Lev. hom. 8,7 (GCS 29) 405,15 f.; ibid., 5,4 (GCS 29) 341,17.

[37] De or. 28,10 (GCS 3) 381,16 f.; In Joan. XXVIII 6 (GCS 10) 396,33; ibid., XIX 23 (GCS 10) 325,11; In Jer. hom. 2,2 (GCS 6) 19,2.

[38] In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 264,14-16; In Ex. hom. 10,3 (GCS 29) 249,22 f.

[39] In Jos. hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,3; In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 264, 26. It is obvious that here levis culpa is meant as the opposite of mortal sin.

[40] In Lev. hom. 15,2 f. (GCS 29) 481,13; 482,14.

[41] In Jer. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 296,3; ψιλο_ν α(μα&ρτημα: Fragm. on 1 Cor. 3:14 (PG 17) 40.

[42] In Jer. hom. 2,12 (GCS 33) 302, 15-18. It is debatable, however, whether this distinction is entirely exclusive. Certainly any proof which pretends to demonstrate a further differentiation within mortal sin itself is subject to serious doubts, especially if the text In Lev. hom. 15,2 is taken as the only decisive indication of this assumption. Here, as we will reiterate below when we consider this text more closely, it is advisable to exercise a certain amount of reserve from the viewpoint of literary criticism. Cf. n.106.

[43] In Jem. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,24.29.

[44] In Ex. hom. 10,3 (GCS 29) 249,17-19. In the three-fold distinction: θα&νατοφ–α)σθε/νεια–ζημι/α of In Joan. XIX 13-14 (GCS 10) 312,22-313,4 the two last members correspond to the damnum of In Ex. hom. 10,3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

death is a τηρη/σαφ το_ Βα&πτισμα του= α(γι/ου πνευ/ματοφ;[45] he counts as one who is burdened by α(μαρτη/ματα μη∴ θανατη/φοπα, and as long as he does not prove himself to be unrepentant he remains a brother in the fullest sense of this term and must not be excluded from the Church.[46] It is even quite clear from In Num. hom. 10,1[47] that Origen holds that a certain coexistence of (light) sin and holiness is possible. In this passage he explains at considerable length how one can be a 'saint' (radically and initially) and still at the same time and inevitably a sinner. This 'holiness' consists precisely in the continual ever-renewed striving to purify oneself increasingly from sins. The only person who is not holy is the one who does not make this effort.[48] Now if there are in this sense sancti iidemque peccatores (GCS 30: p. 70,16), then there must be sins which do not simply drive the Holy Spirit out of man. Mortal sins are not compatible with the indwelling of God and Christ in a man. This simul iustus et peccator, therefore, can refer only to those sins which Origen considers non ad mortem, as culpa levis. In In Luc. hom. 2 (GCS 35)[49] he suggests that in fact it is perfectly possible [253] for a person who has once been justified not to sin any more. Unless, therefore, one wishes to make Origen crudely contradict himself (cf. In Num. hom. 10,1), then this possibility of not committing further sins must be understood of the avoidance of mortal sins. On the other hand, the inevitable sins (In Num. hom. 10,1) must be construed as α(μαρτη/ματα μη∴ θανατη/φοπα. Indeed the distinction as a whole is meaningful and understandable only if light sins can be compatible with the preserved baptismal grace. But this means that they must be venial sins in today's sense. Origen here talks about damages

[45] In Jer. hom. 2,3 (GCS 6) 19,22. The expression evokes the terminology of Hermas (Sim. VIII 6,3) (GCS 48: p. 71,18-21). Cf. also 2 Clement 6,9; 7,6; 8,5. For the notion of keeping with regard to baptism in Origen, cf. In Luc. hom. 24 (GCS 35) 158,23-6: habere priorum (as opposed to the eschatological baptism in fire) baptismatum (in water and the Spirit); aquae et Spiritas lavacra servare.

[46] In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262 ff.: only the person who commits the grandia (263,14), that is, mortal sins, is an α)δελφο_φ ο)νομαζο&μενοφ (263,14), so that even in the case of a person who perseveres obstinately in a non-mortal sin, it has to be left to God to decide whether he still belongs truly to the Church (268,20-5). The levis culpa does not deserve the Church's ban: In Jos. hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,2-5 (at least if there is present a firm purpose of amendment). Origen could not have said this if he were thinking of a guilt which was only relatively light but which still destroys the grace of baptism. For, in his view, such an act in itself separates a person objectively from the Church. A person guilty of a sin of impurity (in Origen's view a peccatam mortale: cf. In Matt. Tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262,13-26) is already, by that very fact, separated from the Church and, consequently, should also be officially excommunicated, in so far as this is possible: Fragm. in Jer. 48 (GCS 6) 222,10-14. Similarly In Lev. hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,22-6, where peccatum means a mortal sin. As we have shown, not every sin separates a person from the Church, but in this instance Origen is thinking of those sins mentioned in 1 Cor. 6:9 f. (GCS 29) 481,5-10; In Jud. hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 478,22-479,10, where likewise the simple peccatum is to be understood of mortal sin, because it is described as an abandonment on God's part, ibid. (GCS 30) 479,18-23. As we have already seen, Origen does not consider that this happens in the case of every sin. It is, however, a part of his description of mortal sins as opposed to other faults; we will return to this point later. In Jem. hom. 15,5 (GCS 6)127,26 (when we fall we are only still νομιζο&μενοι ει}ναι α)πο_ τη=φ ε0κκλησι/αφ).

[47] Cf. (GCS 30) 68-71. For a similar emphasis on sinfulness in general even in the case of the saints, cf. In Is. hom. 3,2 (GCS 33) 255,12-14; In Num. hom. 6,3 (GCS 30) 32-5.

[48] Obviously Origen is not thinking here of mortal sins. Since he does not recognize the person guilty of a mortal sin as being any longer a brother, he could hardly count him as a 'saint'. The many examples adduced from Paul (cf. ibid. 69,14-18 and 70,6-16), which are elsewhere counted by Origen, without any doubt, as mortal sins, obviously only serve to show that the Christian ought not to consider himself automatically immune from sin. They do not imply that the Christian, in spite of these sins, can still be a saint at the same time. This is all the more true in that Origen always sees in mortal sin that lack of a genuine purpose of amendment which is incompatible with holiness. What is more, Origen considers that, in the case of mortal sins, exhortation to amendment within the Church without excommunication is futile:
In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 263,4-12.

[49] Cf. ibid. (GCS 35) 13,5-20,4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

but not about destruction, about injuries but not about mortal wounds.[50]

This agreement between Origen and today's theology on the question of this basic distinction can be brought out even more clearly by another consideration. If these notions are not in fact identical, then Origen could make the difference between mortal and non-mortal sin, between sin which causes damage and sins which kills, intelligible only with regard to its eschatological effects. In this case, mortal sin, as opposed to a non-mortal sin, would be conceivable only as a fault which in fact causes eschatological death and leads to definitive destruction. In other words, it is not possible to find another meaning for the distinction in question in terms of the present state of grace than that of today's theology. Now, even apart from the fact that an exclusively eschatological understanding of this question does not fit into Origen's system – involving, as it does, the definitive salvation of all men – such a conception is already precluded because, in his view, even mortal sins can be remitted in this life.[51] Thus the θα&νατοφ which these sins entail can refer only and immediately to the present life of grace, while non-mortal sins precisely do not have this effect.

Indeed the condition in which the sinner guilty of such a culpa levis remains corresponds to his preservation of baptismal grace. He still lives within the area of the Church's grace. He is still truly a brother.[52] Immediately, and without the need for this connection to be renewed, he is still under the helpful and salvific influence of the Church's fellowship. His brothers, the officials in the Church and in the heavenly groups of angels – which also belong to the interior reality of the Church[53] – can still intercede for and help him. In so far as the [50] Although according to In Is. hom. 3,2 (GCS 33) 255,12 and In Num. hom. 6,3 (GCS 30) 32-5 every sin (peccat enim omnis homo: ibid. [GCS 30] 255,12) appears to exclude the continuing presence of the Spirit, this ought to be understood, in the context, as referring to the full presence of the Spirit, with all his gifts as well as his actual influence on man's questionable acts. Origen even excludes such a presence in respect of the conjugal act which he, nevertheless, in the same context explains as being free from sin (ibid. [GCS 30] 35,16). All this indicates that Origen has a more actualistic notion of the indwelling of the Spirit than either we are accustomed to or, indeed, he himself presupposes when he speaks about the preservation of baptism, etc. Nevertheless this actualistic view ought not to blur the essential distinction which Origen consistently draws between mortal and non-mortal sins. At the same time, this particular view of the relationship between the Spirit and man should be kept in mind in the prudent interpretation of In Lev. hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 487-9. If it is there stated that with every actual sin (communia, quae frequenter incurrimus: ibid. [GCS 30] 489,20 f.) a person 'sells' his or her 'heavenly house', then, once the exegetical basis for these ideas is taken into consideration, nothing more is being said here than in the texts mentioned above. The passage of In Lev. hom. will be considered more closely below.

[51] In Lev. hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 489,19-22; In Joan. XXVII 6 (GCS 10) 396,32-6; Fragm. ad libr. X Strom. (PG II) 103; In Ezech. hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 357,32-358,1; In Jer. hom. 20,9 (GCS 6) 191 f. Cf. below for a more precise consideration.

[52] Cf. n.48 above.

[53] Corresponding to Origen's view of the intrinsic unity of punishment and means of salvation, this activity, too, is to be understood as simultaneously both a punishment and a means of salvation. In contrast to the reaction to a plaga insanabilis, however, it does not come immediately from God himself. The vulnera facilia of the minora peccata are punished and healed by God's 'servants': In Jer. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,17-20; In Ex. hom. 4,8 (GCS 29)181,26-182,5 contains a similar idea. We are unable to pursue further this profound idea: in the case of venial sins, where man remains connected with the totality of all the means of grace, or is still open to it, this totality still works salvifically in all its dimensions and dynamism for the perfection of man's life of grace: the angels: In Jer. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,15-18; instruction and correction by the brethren (especially the τε/λειοι); In Lev. hom. 3,2 (GCS 29) 302,2-6; In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 268,15-21; ibid., XII 11 (GCS 40) 86,24-31; De or. 14,6 (GCS 3) 333,11-16; In Num. hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68,4, etc.; the intercession of the blessed martyrs and saints: In Num. hom. 10,2 (GCS 30) 71,25-72,2; De or. 11,2 (GCS 3) 322,14-18; the activity of the priests of the Church, by which they correct, participate in penance and offer sacrifice: In Matt. tom. XVI 8 (GCS 40) 496,21-8; In Jos. hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 332,22-333,5; In Lev. hom. 5,3 (GCS 29) 339,11-17; ibid.,5,4 (GCS 29) 342,9-15; ibid., 13,3 (GCS 29) 471,25-7; etc.; the punishing effects of guilt in the world through suffering, illness, etc.: In Joan. VI 58 (GCS 10) 166,23-167,5; In Num. hom. 8,1 (GCS 30) 51,10-24; In Ps. 37,5 (PG 12) 1385, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian, after committing venial sins, still lives within the fellowship of grace that is the Church and only in it and by the grace [254] of the Church, which is constantly made actual in its life and activity, he can achieve the forgiveness of his sins. This is what Origen means when he speaks quite generally of the Christian's being able to have his peccatum remitted only by the help of priests and the meliores.[54]

C) MORTAL SINS

Now what about mortal sins, those faults which incur death? According to Origen, 'death' is the most common characteristic of sin. It is appropriate, therefore, that our reflection should begin with this notion. We have already seen that by death Origen means the nature or the necessary consequence of the sins in question, that is, a present and not an immediately eschatological reality. Sin causes death at the very moment when it is committed. Now what does such a death through sin mean for Origen? After such a fault the Christian is dead because Jesus, who is life itself, no longer lives in him. Or, expressed against the background of a more actual notion of grace: Jesus 'no longer enters' into the anima defuncta.[55] This is because in this soul is preserved neither the Spirit of baptism nor its gifts as these are described in Hebrews 6:4.[56] This man has lost the Holy Spirit, the 'robe', the 'ring' (cf. Luke 15:22) and his sonship[57] and has, as it were, returned to Satan by a miscarriage of the child of the Logos.[58] He is expelled from God's Kingdom,[59] is dead among the dead 'outside'[60] and belongs to the devil.[61] In a certain sense he no longer exists as far as God is concerned.[62] This is what Origen means when he uses the notion of 'dead'.

This spiritual death is often the result of a longer or shorter process leading up to it or of an illness which is considered a mortal wound. Sin is 'incurable', that is, its development cannot be influenced favourably, death cannot be halted.[63] Thus the expressions 'incurable' and [54] In Num. hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68,4-13. This passage evinces the two-fold level of the Church's mediation in the healing of sins: through meliores and sacerdotes.

---

[55] In Lev. hom. 12,3 (GCS 29) 459,20-460,7.
[56] In Luc. hom. 24 (GCS 35) 158,23 ff.; In Joan. XXVIII 7 (GCS 10) 397,29-34.
[57] In Lev. hom. 8,11 (GCS 29) 417,12-18; In Joan. XXVIII 15 (GCS 10) 408,11-16; In Lcv. hom. 4,3 (GCS 29) 318,18-23.
[58] In Ex. hom. 10,4 (GCS 29) 250,20-6.
[59] In Lcv. hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 481,3-11. It is worth noting that the sin mentioned here as 'against God' is, according to In Lev. hom. 4,5 (GCS 29) 322,8-11, identical with the peccatum ad mortem.
[60] In Joan. XXVIII 7 (GCS 10) 397,29-34; 398,3-5.
[61] In Ex. hom. 6,9 (GCS 29) 200,15-20; In Ezech. hom. 12,3 (GCS 33) 435,23-436,2.
[62] In Jer. fragm. 71 (GCS 6) 232,26 f.; In Joan. XXVIII 6 (GCS 10) 396, 28: νεκρο_φ τω θεοω~|.
[63] Cf. In Joan. XIX 13 (GCS 10) 312,22-313,16, where it is clear that mortal sin is considered 'incurable' because and in so far as the 'illness' cannot be treated by the physician (Christ and his assistants) in such a way as to prevent death. At the same time theme are diseases and weaknesses which are certainly 'curable' and thus do not entail death. Contrary to Poschmann, p. 473 f., the notion of mortal sin is not used here in the sense of 'sin' which, because of definitive voluntary unrepentance, leads in fact to eternal death. Even according to Poschmann (op. cit. p. 435 f.) this would not correspond to Origen's use of the term elsewhere. It fits neither the context here nor the application of the notion in his commentary on John XXVIII 6 (GCS 10) 396, 33 f. The allusion to the night into which the soul enters (cf. Luc. 12,20; In Joan. XIX 12 [GCS 10] 312,20) is no proof of Poschmann's interpretation. It is not clear from Origen's allegory that by this night he means physical death which sin makes definitive. The prognosis on the part of the physician Christ that the illness will end in death refers to the fact that the illness of the 'Jews' will end in death. This illness was already at a critical stage, although it had not yet led to actual death of the soul. But this will occur because the Jews did not wish to be healed (In Joan. XIX 11 [GCS 10] 311,13-14; In Jer. hom. 2,12 [GCS 33] 302,2: irremediabilis nolentisque curari). The expression α(μαρτι/α α)νι/ατοφ is found already in Hermas, Mand V 2,4 (GCS 48:31,4); likewise also: Didascalia apost. VI 14,10; cf. Const. Apost. II, 37,2; 41,7; VI, 18,10; Ps.-Cypr., De sing. cler. 6 (CSL 3,3; 179,18); Ps.-Cypr., De aleatoribus 5 (CSL 3,3: 97,18); Cyprian, epist. 30,7 (of Novatian); Cyprian, De lapsis 15 (letalis plaga); the synodal documents of the council of Antioch of AD. 269 (sec in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. VII

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mortal sin are almost identical for Origen. Sin is 'incurable', however, because it leads to death, but not because the person guilty of mortal sin cannot be raised again to a new life.[64] Such an idea is to be excluded from any consideration of 'incurable' sin according to Origen.

Mortal sin is not only a loss of grace in the sense of a relegation through a 'relapse into pagan behaviour'[65] to the state prior to baptism. It is a specific loss of grace which is clearly distinct from the pre-baptismal state. The sins of Christians, whom God has loved, [255] are worse than those of pagans and heretics;[66] there are sins against the Holy Spirit which can be committed only by those who possess this Spirit. This presupposes the presence of the Holy Spirit which is communicated to the believer through Christ's death in baptism.[67] Thus, in Origen's view, 'sin against the Holy Spirit' (Matt. 12:31 f.) does not suppose a special obstinacy but is present wherever a Christian o(kai.\ paro&ntoj au0tou= (sc. to_ paro_n pneu=ma a#gion): GCS 10: p. 408, 24) e0n th|= yuxh= a(marta&nwn.[68] This corresponds to the situation of Hebrews 6:4 ff. The sin against the Holy Spirit is unforgivable, since it is committed in clear opposition to the sumbouli/a and su/mpnoia of the e0nu/parxon pneu=ma.[69] It is even its complete 'reversal' since in to_ th=j yi9oqesi/aj pneu=ma with every good deed one is continually reborn from God in the Spirit as a son of God with Jesus Christ.[70] The sin against the Holy Spirit cancels this new participation in the life of the Trinity and, therefore, spells death. The person who is guilty of such a sin opposes himself immediately to God, who is present within him, and this in direct contradiction to the inner dynamism of his own state of grace. Thus he stands before the wrath of God and not only in contradiction to his world: non per ministros retribuet Babyloni Deus, sed ipse retribuet, quod meretur.[71] Afflicted with the plaga insanabilis of mortal sin, man is no longer open to the salvific influence of created reality, the 'servant of God'.[72] Thus he falls

---

30,12 [GCS 9,2: 710,25]). In all these texts there is nowhere a mention of the fact that a person who has 'died' of an 'incurable' sin cannot be revived. The contrary is either presupposed or expressed (cf. H. Koch, Cyprianische Untensuchungen [Bonn 1926], p. 441 f.; P. Galtier, L'Eglise et la rémission des péchés aux premiers siècles [Paris 1932], p. 191 ff.). For the identification of the a(marti/a pro&j qana&ton with the a)ni/ata tw~n a(marthma&twn and ei0j ku/rion in Origen, cf. De or. 28,8-10 (GCS 3) 380,12; 381,10 f. and 15 f. For the idea that a terminal illness cannot be halted by angels, etc., cf. In Jer. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,24-296,2; ibid., 2,12 (GCS 33) 300-2; In Lev. hom. 8,5 (GCS 209) 402, 15-18; In Jos. hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,2-7; In Ps. 37,1 (PG 12) 1372.

[64] In Joan. XX VIII 6 (GCS 10) 396,32-4.

[65] In Joan. XXVIII 7 (GCS 10) 397,34.

[66] In Ezech. hom. 10,2 (GCS 33) 419,1-7. Cf. Ad Rom. IV 12 (PG 14) 1002; In Ezech. hom. 5,3 (GCS 33) 374,1-26.

[67] Cf. the long researches in In Joan. XXVIII 15-20 (GCS 10) 408-15; esp. 15 (ibid., 408,4-409,3). On the basis of these ideas Origen is easily able, for instance, to forgive Peter's denial; the sin of a Christian is greater and more serious because he has already received the spiritus gratiae (Heb. 10:29: In Matt. ser. 114 (GCS 40) 236,29-239,32.

[68] In Joan. XXVIII 15 (GCS 10) 408,25.

[69] In Joan. II 11 (GCS 10) 66,10-17.

[70] In Jer. hom. 9,4 (GCS 6) 70,12-27. On this cf. A. Lieske, p. 157. On the whole section of reflections on sin, cf. also G. Teichtweier, who nevertheless recognizes only the presence of the legal-ethical viewpoint. He thus opposes a consideration of the consequences of sin from the viewpoint of grace, and this by appealing to the lack of an adequate distinction between nature and grace (loc. cit. p. 134). In general and as a matter of principle, the first point which must be made in this regard is that from the very nature of the case there is already an inner connection between the individual consequences of sins, making the isolation of any one approach inappropriate. Teichtweier, following his own presuppositions, understands 'death' as the consequence of sin uniquely as the expression of the intensity of the lapse into sin; that is, in this case the sinner stands in an irreducible opposition to God, the source of life (p. 141 f.). This means, however, that both the Church as a community of grace and consequently the theological significance of reconciliation are overlooked.

[71] In Jer. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,10 f. Cf. In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1372: there are sins which can no longer be punished by the law, the bishop or the angel of penance but only by God himself.

[72] In Jem. hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,20-2; In Lev. hom. 4,4 (GCS 29) 319,23-320,7; In Jer. hom. 13,1 (GCS 6)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

completely under the influence of the sinful forces in the world. To a certain extent he has become the property of the devil[73] and stands in a kind of spiritual-personal relationship to him;[74] he is 'consecrated'[75] to him, begotten by him[76] and a member of the corpus peccati, whose head is the devil himself.[77]

For such a sin against the Holy Spirit there is no aphesis:[78] ου0 γι/νεται α!φεσιφ τω~| ει0φ αυ0το_ (το_ πνευ=μα) η9μαρτηκο&τι. The person who offends in this way is a α)συ/γγνωστοφ.[79] Nevertheless, it is not easy to say precisely what is meant here by the aphesis which is no longer possible after mortal sin. It is obvious that on this point Origen is dependent on a traditional teaching which he has received from Hermas through Clement of Alexandria. For his part, he does not appear to sense any need to explain this notion more clearly. He certainly does not mean that mortal sins against the Holy Spirit simply cannot be remitted.[80] This point will be demonstrated later in greater detail. Thus the aphesis is not 102,28-103,3.

---

[73] Cf. n.61 above.

[74] In Matt. tom. XII 4 (GCS 40) 75,3-5; ibid. XI 6 (GCS 40) 44,8-10; In Jer. hom. 9,4 (GCS 6) 70,3-11.

[75] In Num. hom. 20,3 (GCS 30) 193,9-29.

[76] In dependence upon John 8:44 and 1 John 3:8: In Joan. XX 10 (GCS 10) 339,26-30; ibid., XX 13 (GCS 10) 343,19-23; 344,10-14. The fact of being engendered by the devil appears here to be more the presupposition of, and reason for, the (new) sin than its consequence.

[77] Ad Rom. V 9 (PG 14) 1046.

[78] In Joan. II 11 (GCS 10) 66,11; ibid., XXVIII 15 (GCS 10) 408,18-21; Exhort. ad mart. 30 (GCS 2) 26,20-4; In Matt. series 114 (GCS 40) 239,5-20; In Jer. hom. 16,5 (GCS 6) 137,21-3; In Lev. hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 295,18-20.

[79] In Matt. ser. 114 (GCS 40) 238,8. In Joan. II 11 (GCS 10) 66,13 συγγνω&μη is synonymous with α!φεσιφ; cf. ibid. (GCS 10) 66,6.9.11.

[80] That such sins can in fact be remitted is abundantly obvious from the texts just mentioned and from their context. In Exhort, ad mart. 30 Origen mentions simply without any qualification α(μαρτη/ματα which can be granted an α!φεσιφ through baptism and martyrdom. In the abstract – and this may indeed be the case elsewhere – it is conceivable that α(μαρτη/ματα designates only mortal sins; cf. n. 33 above. In the present context, however, this is unlikely. For if this were the case, would Origen take it so easily for granted that the friends – Ambrose and Protoctetus – whom he is exhorting, together with their companions who are threatened, do in fact need to remit mortal sins? If, however, α(μαρτη/ματα here refers to all sins, including those which are not mortal, then α!φεσιφ cannot mean the remission of sins at all. For no one disputes that according to Origen at least non-mortal sins can be remitted apart from baptism and martyrdom. Moreover, this does not necessarily mean an α!φεσιφ, although it could do if α!φεσιφ were to have this comprehensive meaning. Just before the passage In Joan. XXVIII 15 there is ibid., XXVIII 7 (GCS 10) 397,15-19, that is, the text which contains the resurrection of Lazarus. This resurrection provides a symbol of the restoration to life of the person who is guilty of mortal sin, that is, who has sinned in the sense of Heb. 6:4 f. and has reverted to a pagan way of life. In Matt. ser. 114 it is stated that sinners who behave according to Heb. 10:29 no longer have hope of a remissio either in this world or the next. But Origen adds immediately that such a sinner ought not to say: peccata nostra in nobis sunt et quomodo vivemus. For God says: vivo, quoniarn nolo mortem peccatoris sicut paenitentiam (Ezek. 33,10 f.), and he knows which penalties he inflicts super denegantes et paenitentes, as opposed to the denegantes et non paenitentes (cf. In Matt. ser. 114 239,23-8). It is, therefore, clearly presupposed that penance is always effective, even though remissio is no longer possible. In In Lev. hom. 2,4 he has his audience saying: apud nos una tantummodo est venia peccatorum, quae per lavacri gratiam in initiis datar; nulla post haec peccanti misericordia nec venia ulla conceditar. This is merely the principle which had been in force since Hermas. It refers to mortal sins, since it is these, above all, that arc remitted in baptism. But it never occurred to any one to deny that a forgiveness for non-mortal sins was possible. It is obvious that Origen, in his answer, does not intend to dispute this ancient principle – once it has been correctly understood – especially since he himself enunciates it just as unhesitatingly elsewhere. Now if, in order to prove that, despite this principle, Christians are not worse off than Jews, he enumerates seven remissiones, then it follows that at least one of these must refer to mortal sins. Otherwise he would only have evaded the objection. Thus the septima remissio of public penance is placed at the end of the list as the climax and decisive argument (cf. In Lev. hom. 2,4 [GCS 29] 296,17-22). Likewise, the remissio of In Lev. hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 488,23 f., according to the context (cf. ibid., 489,19 f.), also includes the remission of mortal sins by means of the once-and-for-all public penance. As could be shown from the actual context, this remissio in Lev. hom. 2,4 refers to mortal sins not only de facto but also absolutely de iure. It is a remissio peccatorum. The single venia – whether in the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simply identifiable with every remission of guilt. But this is only a negative definition of this notion. [256] What does it mean positively? The answer to this question requires, in its turn, a more precise definition of the specific character of the post-baptismal remission of sins and is, therefore, important for us at this point. Nevertheless, the answer is to be given here only in so far as it does not presuppose the whole teaching of the nature of the remission of sins committed after baptism – a point which will be considered later. Rather, it will be derived provisionally from those texts which themselves speak explicitly and immediately of aphesis. In the narrow, technical sense in these texts aphesis appears first in connection with baptism, where it is in a special sense unique to Christian initiation. The only conceivable application of this sense to mortal sins committed after baptism would be by way of a possible baptism in blood in martyrdom.[81] But the unique possibility could explain the nature of aphesis only if there were no longer any possibility of the forgiveness of later sins after baptism. In this case the aphesis would simply mean the once-and-for-all forgiveness of sins which was only possible in baptism. But this hypothesis is not verified. Thus the connection of baptism which is possible only once with the aphesis allows only one conclusion, which is that the latter is a special forgiveness of sins – indeed possible only in baptism. If, however, this special

---

Greek it is α!φεσιφ, συννω&μη or another word that is behind it is irrelevant, since these expressions can have the same meaning; elsewhere Origen conveys its sense with α!φεσιφ – does not exclude a remissio in a wider sense. According to In Lev. hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 296,17, it is dura et laboriosa. Thus in this passage α!φεσιφ is not used in the strict sense of a simple remission of sins. The only text which does not admit of a clear interpretation on this question in function of its context is In Joan. II 11. Nevertheless, in this work the fact that mortal sin against the Spirit is able to be overcome is so clearly expressed that it would be absurd to interpret this passage differently from the other texts or – as, for instance, G. Rauschen, Eucharistie und Busssakrament (Freiburg 1908), p. 179, does – to assume that Origen changes his opinion in the same work. Moreover, if In Joan. II was composed substantially earlier (after A.D. 220) than, for example, In Joan. XXVIII 15 (after AD. 233), then both texts say the same thing. For just before In Joan. XX VIII 15 occurs the section In Joan. XX VIII 7: the teaching on the restoration to life of the person guilty of mortal sin. Thus there is no reason why In Joan. can and must be interpreted differently from the other texts. That the contrary of α!φεσιφ is not unforgiveness but another kind of remission of sins is obvious from Selecta in Ps. 31,1 (PG 12) 1301: α)φι/ενται με.ν αι(α)νομι/αι δια& του= α(γι/ου Βαπτι/σματοφ, καλυ/πτονται δε. αι9 α(μαρτι/αι δια_ τη=φ τικρα~φ α(μαρτι/αφ μετανοι/αφ. Even though the formulation of this sentence may derive more from Evagrius than immediately from Origen (cf. H. U. von Balthasar, 'Die Hiera des Evagrius' in: ZKTh 63, [1939] pp. 86-106), it nevertheless resumes faithfully Origen's idea of the difference between α!φεσιφ and the notion which is actually opposed to it. It is also possible to think that the sentence is a summary from Didymus, Expos. in Ps. 31,3 (PG 39) 1320. But even in this case, we have an idea which is peculiar to Origen: on the one hand, α!φεσιφ, συγγνω&μη in baptism for sins committed before the law; on the other hand, no α!φεσιφ but an ε0πικα&λυψιφ of sins, in virtue of μετα&νοια for offences committed after baptism. For the origin of this formula in Origen, cf. Ad Rom. II 11 (PG 14) 872: quorum remissae sunt iniquitates per baptismi gratiam vel quorum tecta sunt per paenitentiam peccata. We will have to consider the text In Jer. hom. 16,5 more closely later. It is evident, therefore, that α!φεσιφ and every kind of remission of sins are not absolutely identical. Certainly α!φεσιφ can have a narrow technical sense, and does so necessarily in several passages. Nevertheless, this obviously does not mean that in other passages it cannot have a wider non-technical sense and then means, quite simply, any kind of 'forgiveness of sins'. This is the case in De or. 28,5 (GCS 3) 378,5 f.; ibid., 31,3 (GCS 3) 396,23; ibid., 33,1 (GCS3) 401,21; In Is.hom. 6,2 (GCS 33) 270,29; 271,5; In Lev.hom. 5,3 (GCS 29) 339,13 f. compared with 340,1 f.; Exhort.ad mart. 30 (GCS 2) 27,5; In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 99,5; In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68,9.11; in Lev.hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 295,26-296,22. In the last passage the contrast between the technical and the more general use of the notion is very clear: una tantummodo venia peccatorum (ibid., 295,18) – many remissiones (ibid., 295,26). It is also clear, therefore, that the technical usage is traditional: Origen makes his audience raise the lament over the una venia peccatorum as a self-evident axiom.

[81] Cf., for example, Exhort.ad mart. 30 (GCS 2)26,20-4. Very often baptism and the remission of sins are simply mentioned together without it being at all evident from the texts that the remission in question is an effect which is proper to baptism. Thus, for example, in Cant. III (GCS 33) 226,16 f.; In Lev.hom. 8,3 (GCS 29) 398,11 f.; ibid., 8,7 (GCS 29) 405,11 f.; In Jos.hom. 15,7 (GCS 30) 393,11 f.; In Luc.hom. 14 (GCS 35) 98,13; ibid., 21 (GCS 35) 139,1-3.18 f.; 140,3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

forgiveness differed from other possibilities of forgiveness after baptism only by virtue of the sacramental and unique rite, then a stress on the once-and-for-all character of the baptismal aphesis would be superfluous. A mere warning not to forfeit the grace of such a once-and-for-all forgiveness in baptism would be meaningless. Thus the difference between the aphesis in baptism and that after baptism cannot refer only to the rite of the sacrament of initiation.

On this question In Joan. II 11 provides further help. Since sin committed after baptism is more serious than the faults committed before baptism it does not receive the same forgiveness as the latter. It is a sin against the Holy Spirit, and only if it were lighter than this would a remission by a συγγνω&μη be considered.[82] Even if baptism could be repeated it still does not appear, therefore, to be able to remit sins committed after baptism. The aphesis can only apply to sins which are not committed as a conscious contradiction against the dynamism of the Holy Spirit which is given to man in baptism. Thus the impossibility of a renewed aphesis does not depend upon the unrepeatable character of sacramental baptism (and the forgiveness [257] which it involves). Neither does it depend, however, on the fact that God does not wish to grant a further aphesis. The only criterion here is the intrinsic nature of the guilt to be remitted. The nature of a further possible means for the forgiveness of sin must, therefore, obviously correspond to the intrinsic nature of the sin to be remitted. This is not the case, however, of baptism and the aphesis which is granted with it, in regard to the sins committed after baptism. We have already described in some detail the nature of mortal sin committed after baptism. It follows from what we have said that the remission which this sin calls for cannot come about by way of a direct and immediate effect of the Church's usual and normal activity, that is, for Origen the activity of priests, the faithful and angels. This activity of the Church naturally includes sacrifice, prayer, instruction and correction, all of which are effective only in those cases where the sinner has not, through 'death', fallen out of the fellowship of grace itself. In the latter case he must be given up as 'incurable', which means that he can no longer be preserved from death, even by 'God's servants'. At the same time, this idea also implies that aphesis for sins which do not incur death is, according to De or. 28,9 f., obviously possible by means of prayer and sacrifice.[83] With regard to sins committed after baptism, therefore, aphesis would mean that forgiveness of sins which is brought about by the συνεργει=ν [84] of the Church for one of its living members who is still united with it. But it is precisely no longer possible if this living relationship has been disrupted through the death of sin.

This view fits well into Origen's theology of serious and light sins. Nevertheless, it has the disadvantage of dissociating the aphesis of baptism from that for sins committed after baptism, despite the similarity of the two ideas. Before baptism the candidate is not yet a member of the Church and, therefore, he is not yet in a position where the 'sin-remitting' activity of the Church can affect him. The most that can be said is that a non-baptized person does not block himself off directly and explicitly from this influence of the Church, as does the person who commits serious sin after baptism.

This discrepancy does not, however, detract from the approach to a solution which we have suggested. The genuine meaning of the formula of once-and-for-all aphesis in baptism does not have to coincide completely and in all respects with the notion of aphesis which is derivable from Origen' s theory of sin committed by a baptized [258] person. In order to do full justice to the technical notion of aphesis in Origen's work it is, in any event, necessary to make a further observation. This is that for Origen α!φεσιφ is the opposite of κο&λασιφ.[85]

[82] Cf. In Joan. II 11 (GCS 10) 66,13-15.
[83] Cf. De or. 28,9 f. (GCS 3) 380,25; 381.5.10.15.
[84] Cf. ibid., 381,8.
[85] In Joan. fragm. 12 (GCS 10) 494,10: it is through the α!φεσιφ, which here obviously refers to baptism, that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

By this he means a remission of sins without the suffering of the consequences of sin. The place where this notion appears most clearly is In Jer. hom. 16,5-7.[86] The person who has received the α!φεσιφ α(μαρτημα&των in the bath of regeneration and subsequently, despite the light of faith which he has received (ε0ν γνω&σει: GCS 6: p. 137,30), backslides into sins must, as opposed to the α!φεσιφ of baptism, α)πολαμβα&νειν τα_φ α(μαρτι/αφ (GCS 6: p. 137,18-27). Obviously what are meant here are sins which are not only 'hay' and 'straw' but 'wood' (cf. 1 Cor. 3:11 f.) (138,8 ff., 15ff.; 138,23 f.) and which bring about the condition envisaged in Hebrews 10:26 f.,[87] in other words, faults which are without any doubt mortal sins. In this passage the α)πολαμβα&νειν τα_φ α(μαρτι/αφ stands in opposition to the α!φεσιφ achieved in suffering the punitive fire of God in the next life, a fire which destroys sins and so eradicates the evil in man. It frees from guilt (α)φανισμο_φ τω~ν κακω~ν: 139,3) and thus prepares the purified but not to be 'burned' 'image and likeness' (138,22) of God in man for the reception of salvation and the rewarding even of those good works done in life. From this text it is clear, therefore, that κο&λασιφ (139,3), as opposed to α!φεσιφ, is to be understood as a 'medicinal'[88] punishment for the remission of sins. The aphesis in baptism is, accordingly, a forgiveness without the need to suffer the consequences of sins. It is irrelevant that the text here presents the remission by 'punishment' as taking place in the next life. For it will be pointed out later that the contrite penitent is able, already in this life through his penance, to anticipate the purificatory baptism of fire[89] in the next life, through which sins committed after the baptism in water and the Spirit are remitted. That these ideas are based on the esoteric notion of the apocatastasis[90] and that there is no distinction made between those who are repentant and those who leave this life in their obstinacy does not affect in any way the fundamental idea of a pure aphesis as opposed to a salutary suffering of punishment. Nevertheless this idea is not to be seen as opposed to the refusal of every forgiveness.[91] By way of conclusion it may be stated that, the punishment imposed for sin according to the law is lifted. Origen's notion of κο&λασιφ must be completely disassociated from any idea of a purely vindictive punishment, such as would contribute nothing to the actual remission of guilt. Such a notion does not exist in Origen's thinking. In his view punishment is always destructive of guilt (at least in so far as it is considered in itself). Thus where α!φεσιφ occurs, as opposed to κο&λασιφ, it is a question of a remission of guilt which is not brought about by the expiatory suffering of the punishments due to sin. α!φεσιφ is, therefore, the remission of sin without punishment which, nevertheless, obviously allows of a forgiveness precisely through the suffering of such punishment.

---

[86] Cf. In Jer.hom. 16,5-7 (GCS 6)137-9.

[87] This passage states explicitly that sins such as those mentioned in Heb. 10:26 f. can be remitted through undergoing punishment. This also clarifies how In Jem. hom. 13,2 (GCS 6)103,15-104,18 should be understood. This text is repeatedly adduced as a proof that, according to Origen, mortal sins are unforgivable. It is here stated, with regard to the sins of Heb. 10:29 and 6:4 ff., that the sinful Jerusalem, that is, the soul which, after baptism, has relapsed into sin and become unbelieving, cannot count on forbearance, pity and prayer for reconciliation, not even that of Jesus himself. However, this need not mean any more than what is said of the same sins in In Jem. hom. 16,55 ff., namely that such sins can be remitted only by undertaking the punishment which is appropriate to them.

[88] Cf., for example, παιδευ/ων πο&νοφ: In Jer.hom. 12,3 (GCS 6) 91,5.

[89] The same idea of a purifying and not merely vindictive baptism of fire for sins committed after baptism figures in: In Jer. hom. 2,2 f. (GCS 6) 17-20. (It is said explicitly, cf. ibid., 19,3; 18,28 f.: with regard to mortal sins, as opposed to ρ(υ/μοφ sins, that the sins which are remitted in the fire of judgement are mortal sins.) In Luc.hom. 24 (GCS 35) 158; In Is.hom. 4,5-6 (GCS 33) 262; In Lev.hom. 9,8 (GCS 29) 432,17-27; In Ex. hom. 13,4 (GCS 29) 275,18-23; In Ezech.hom. 1,3 (GCS 33) 324,7-27; Ennarr. in Job 20,25 (PG 17) 76.

[90] Cf., for example, Comm. in Gen. tom. III 7 (PG 12) 68; in Matt. tom. XV 11 (GCS 40) 379,20-380,6; Contra Celsum VI 26 (GCS 3) 96,11-17.

[91] It is entirely another question whether this forgiveness of guilt in baptism is entirely compatible with Origen's notion of the salvific meaning of suffering, which latter both emanates from guilt and finally destroys it (thus not to be punished signifies God's most intense anger: In Jer.hom. 2,5 [GCS 33] 294,21-5; In Ex.hom. 8,5 [GCS 29] 230,8-13, etc.) or with the teaching that bad habits, etc. (which are also in Origen's view the punishments

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because of their special gravity, there is no longer any aphesis for mortal sins committed after baptism. This is because, on the one hand, the rite of baptism can no longer be considered appropriate [259] for their forgiveness, and, on the other hand, they cannot be remitted by the immediate operation of the Church's prayer and sacrifice. Rather, they must be expiated through the undergoing of the punishment which they have deserved. From the very nature of the case, it is obvious that the last aspect is a corollary of the ineffectiveness of the Church's prayer and sacrifice in such cases. This ineffectiveness rests, however, on the nature of mortal sin which excludes from the Church's inner fellowship of grace and causes the spiritual death of the sinner, precisely because man has opposed himself to the Holy Spirit.

D) CONCRETE MORTAL SINS ACCORDING TO ORIGEN

Which sin, according to Origen's view, leads to death and which does not? Origen obviously considers sin not so much in its objectivity as in the way that it occurs in the actual life of the individual with all its unforeseeable circumstances. Thus he states with regard to the question just posed:[92] Quae autem sunt species peccatorum ad mortem, quae vero non ad mortem, sed ad damnum, non puto facile a quoquam homine posse discerni. Scriptum namque est: delicta quis intelligit? It is later added that it is possible, nevertheless, to have some idea of these ex parte aliqua from the Scriptures (in evangelio per parabolas). In fact Origen renounces all attempts to establish any theoretical objective norms for such sins.[93] He simply stands by the statements of the Scriptures and the actual practice of the Church as it occurred in the exercise of the Church's penitential discipline at that time, and thus used a purely human criterion to distinguish between mortal sins which were subject to the penance of the Church and other faults. Thus for him the following are those guilty of mortal sins: masculorum concubitor, adulter, homicida, mollis, fornicarius, avarus, idolorum cultor,[94] the person who commits a blasphemia,[95] the maledicus in Deum and in proximum and the other sinners whom Paul names in 1 Corinthians 6:9 f. and excludes from the Kingdom of God.[96] In De or. 28,10 the following are spelt out ει0δωλολατρει/α, μοιξει/α, πορνει/α, ε0κου/σιοφ φο&νοφ.[97] In Joan. 28,7 the expression of reversion to the ε0θνικο_φ Βι/οφ means a mortal sin[98] which concerns not only falling away from the faith but lapsing into every 'pagan' vice.[99] Thus it is stated that through murder, adultery, theft, perjury, violence, etc., a person becomes the property of the devil,[100] with the obvious implication that these are mortal sins.

---

for previous sins) are not yet remitted by baptism. What is clear is that Origen feels himself bound by the Church's teaching of a single α!φεσιφ in baptism, and when he considers or evaluates it he understands it in the traditional way of a forgiveness which abrogates punishment.

[92] In Ex.hom. 10,3 (GCS 29) 249,21-3.

[93] He is obviously clearly aware of the different degrees of subjective imputability which sin can involve. Cf., for example, In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 482,28-483,1: sins non ex corde, non voto et animo iniquo; Ad Rom. V 11 (PG 14) 999; ibid., II l (PG 14) 871 f.; In Num.hom. 28,2 (GCS 30) 282,26-283,9. Cf. E. R. Redepenning, Origenes. Eine Darstellung seines Lebens und seiner Lehre (Bonn 1841-6; rep. Aalen 1966) II, p. 424.

[94] In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262,15-20; 263,17-26 (with reference to 1 Cor. 5:11); 264,3-5 are also listed: φο&νοφ, φαρμακι/α, παιδοφθεορι/α η1 τι τω~ν τηλικου/των.

[95] In Lev.hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 489,14. Cf. Fragm. 48 in Jem. (GCS 6) 222,13.

[96] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 481,5-14. It is here a question of the deliberate and habitual tendency to blaspheme.

[97] Cf. De or. 28 (GCS 3) 381,14; 380,23. Origen does not have in mind here a fixed group of three, since he adds: η3 τινοφ α!λλου ξαλεπωτε/ρου πται/σματοφ (ibid., 380,28-318,1).

[98] Cf. In Joan. XXVIII 7 (GCS 10) 397,34.

[99] Cf. In Joan. XXVIII 6 (GCS 10) 396,33 f.

[100] In Ex.hom. 6,9 (GCS 29) 200,16-201,5. For adultery as a mortal sin, cf.: Fragm. ad lib. X Strom. (PG 11) 103; for fornication: Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247,23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The [260] cursing of one's parents also seems to be reckoned with these faults.[101] The state of the conscience of the Christian people on this question at that time is particularly well expressed in a passage of In Jer. hom. 20:[102] 'And every one of us [Origen is speaking reproachfully] who has not practised idolatry, who has not committed an act of impurity (would that we were indeed clean in this respect at least!) believes that, on leaving this life, he will be saved.'

On the other hand, according to Origen, the following, by way of example, are not mortal sins: λοιδορι/α, φυσι/ωσιφ, πολυποσι/α, λο&γοφ ψευδη∴φ και/ α0ργο&φ aut talis aliqua culpa levis, quae etiam in illis, qui videntur proficere in ecclesia, frequenter inveniuntur.[103] Otherwise, not a great deal is said about individual venial sins which may be explicitly distinguished from mortal sins.[104]

There is, however, a further question to be considered. Did Origen maintain only the double distinction of sins into mortal sins and non-mortal sins, or did he also make a further essential distinction within the category of mortal sins? By this is not meant a distinction in the vague sense that even the individual mortal sins can differ considerably from each other pro qualitate vel quantitate. This is a point which Origen also stresses.[105] It is more a question here of two radically different classes of mortal sins. In general it appears that such an idea is not demonstrably present in Origen.[106] Indeed, in view of his reserve with regard to the [101] In Lev.hom. 11,3 (GCS 29) 452,28-453,3. In general those offences which, in the Old Testament, were punished by death Origen considers, according to the New Testament, to be mortal sins which are subject to church penance in interitum carnis; cf. In Lev.hom. 11,2 (GCS 29) 451,1-13. It is obvious that Origen still recognizes here the traditional distinction between peccatum in Deum and non in Deum (in hominem). De or. 28,9 (GCS 3) 381,9-11; 28,3 (GCS 3) 376,25-7; In Lev.hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 408,5; ibid., 4,5 (GCS 29) 322,9-11; In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68,10-12; In Ezech.hom. 5,4 (GCS 33) 375,25-8; Exhort.ad mart. 17 (GCS 2) 16,19-23. But the content of the notion is just as vague as it is elsewhere. In In Lev.hom. 4,5 'sin against God' is identified with 'mortal sin'. For this reason alone, therefore, 'sin against God' does not mean simply sin against faith. In In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 481 it is stressed that both the maledicus in proximum and the maledicus in Deum are excluded from the kingdom of God.

[102] Cf. In Jer.hom. 20 (GCS 6) 181,13-19.

[103] In Matt.tom. XIII (GCS 40) 264,21-9.

[104] It is not clear, for example, whether or not Origen (In Lev.hom. 9,9 [GCS 29] 437,29-438,3) regards as mortal sins the frequenting of the circus, the races and the gladiatorial games, which were considered sins in themselves.

[105] In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 482,19 f., etc.

[106] G. Teichtweier maintains that theme is a further subdivision of mortal sin. To do so he proceeds from the different terminology which Origen uses to designate sins. According to this, he holds, more than a mere two-fold distinction is required. Teichtweier sees a confirmation of this assumption in the parallel with the Montanist Tertullian's teaching on sin which implies a three-fold distinction. Cf. op. cit., pp. 237-9. The distinction between mortal sins and non-mortal sins is obviously upheld throughout Origen, as Teichtweier also observes, op. cit., p. 237. But then, in order to justify the further sub-distinction of mortal sins, Teichtweier appeals to what is, for him, the indispensable evidence of the text In Lcv.hom. He does so, however, without discussing the literary-critical problem which this passage presents. This is all the more surprising in that in an earlier work, Das Sein des Menschen: Ein Beitrag zur Anthropologie des Origenes (Diss.Tübingen 1951), p. 28, he voiced deep doubts about Rufinus' translation. A. von Harnack, Der kirchengeschichtliche Ertrag der exegetischen Arbeiten des Origenes I (TU 42,3) (Leipzig 1918), pp. 78-87, and II (TU 42,4) (Leipzig 1919), pp. 126-9, had already expressed certain reservations about the tradition represented by Rufinus. J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg 1955), p. 176, agrees with this, without, however, applying these doubts to the text In Lev.hom. 15,2. With regard to this text in particular, Teichtweier comes to the conclusion that, in all probability, it transmits faithfully Origen's basic teaching (cf. Das Sein des Menschen, p. 22). Nevertheless, the disputable nature of the text must be kept in mind. J. Grotz interprets the alleged distinction between culpa mortalis and crimen mortale in such a way that by the culpae mortales he understands mortal sins which are not subject to the punishment of excommunication. This provides him with his proof for the difference which he holds between a repeatable penance without excommunication and a non-repeatable penance with excommunication (cf. p. 289). We have paid particular attention to Grotz's basic thesis in the essay on the penitential theology of the Shepherd of Hermas.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simple distinction between mortal and non-mortal sins, it is hardly to be expected. Nevertheless, one text, namely In Levit. hom. 15,2, does seem to express this idea. The text in question[107] makes the distinction between culpa mortalis and crimen mortale. At the same time, the culpa mortalis is compared with the sermonis vel morum vitium, with the communia quae frequenter incurrimus.[108] The crimen mortale, on the other hand, is put on the same level as the blasphemia fidei.[109] interpretation arises from the way in which the text is actually formulated. Most specialists in the history of penance, therefore, have taken the text in this sense, exactly as it is presented.[110] However, in its present formulation this text does arouse serious doubts. It is indeed stated that through the culpa mortalis one sells one's house to the devil,[111] even though on each occasion and even if this should happen repeatedly, a redemption always remains possible. Now, as we have already seen,[112] this idea is not necessarily connected with Origen's idea of mortal sin. Moreover, 'house' here seems to be meant in such a sense that it can be applied to every individual virtue.[113] Thus one [261] could possess many 'houses', and, given Origen's essential gradation of beatitude,[114] it would be perfectly conceivable to sell one 'house' without totally losing beatitude. This applies even apart from the notion of the apocatastasis. Thus the general meaning of the text does not indicate that here it is a question of culpa mortalis distinct from a crimen mortale. On the contrary, it gives rise to serious doubts about the actual existence of such a distinction in the original Greek text which is lost. As we have seen, this distinction is not found anywhere else in Origen. The sermonis vitium, which in our text would count as a culpa mortalis, is not considered elsewhere as a mortal sin.[115] And is it likely that Origen would in fact compare a culpa mortalis with the communia quae frequenter incurrimus, when frequenter inveniuntur is elsewhere precisely a characteristic of the culpa levis?[116] In any case, the sharp distinction between blasphemia fidei[117] and another culpa mortalis is not made elsewhere, with regard to church penance, either by Origen or by other authors. Once it is considered that according to Origen's theology every mortal sin (therefore even a culpa mortalis) in itself separates the [107] Cf. In Lev.hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 489,13-15.

[108] Ibid., 489,15.20-2.
[109] Ibid., 489,13-15.
[110] Cf.. for example, P. Galtier, L'église et la rémission, p. 268 ff. He prefers to make this culpa mortalis the object of the sacramental absolution without excommunication. Cf. B. Poschrnann, p. 346, who accepts the text as it stands, without, however, accepting Galtier's conclusions. For further details about the interpretation of this text, cf. E. T. Latko, Origen's Concept of Penance (Quebec 1949), p. 115 f. Cf. also J. Grotz, p. 248 f., and G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre, p. 258.
[111] Origen interprets typologically the prescriptions of the old law (Lev. 25:29ff.) concerning the possibility of buying back a house which has been sold, according as it is in urbibus muratis or in vico or is a domus levitae vel sacerdotis.
[112] Cf. esp. nn. 50, 63 and 80 above.
[113] Cf. In Lev.hom. 15 (GCS 29) 488,11 (simplicitas is the house of Jacob; timor Dei that of the obstetrices).
[114] Cf., for example, In Jos.hom. 10,1-3 (GCS 30) 357-61; In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 481,22-484,7; In Luc.hom. 17 (GCS 35) 121. Cf. L. Atzberger, Geschichte der christlichen Eschatologie innerhalb der vornicänischen Zeit (Freiburg 1896), pp. 395-8; C. Bigg, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria (Oxford 1913), p 279 f.
[115] Cf. esp. nn.33 and 48 above.
[116] Certainly Origen is not worried about describing the sinful state of the community in dismal terms, so long as he is speaking in general and simply about sins. But when it is a question of mortal sins in the strict sense, then he becomes much more circumspect and no longer takes it simply for granted that practically all his hearers are sinners in this sense. For then he states: vereor, ne etiam aliquos de his, qui in ecclesia sunt, aliquos de adstantibus, dum nescimus . . : In Ex.hom. 6,9 (GCS 29) 204,5-7. Does this notion fit in with the idea that communia quae frequenter (we all !) incurrimus could be mortal sins? Cf. similarly in Ps. 36 hom. 1,5 (PG 12) 1328: si quis vestrum, licet non optem esse in loco conventu talem aliquem (a fornicator) . . .
[117] According to the context (the house in the town which can be bought back only once = fides quae muro ecclesiastici et apostolici dogmatis cincta est) only the blasphemia fidei is considered a crimen mortale, although there are also culpae mortales present.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sinner from the fellowship of the Church, and that the penance of excommunication, which in fact is granted only once, is the appropriate expression of this separation, then it would appear that a remission for an actual culpa mortalis without church penance and excommunication semper . . . et sine intermissione is excluded. For these and other[118] reasons we consider that the term mortalis as the description of the culpa in this text should be omitted. It is probably a question of an early dittography, arising from the expression crimen mortale in the Greek text or even in Rufinus' Latin translation.[119] Its omission makes the text more intelligible.[120] In any case, this distinction between culpa mortalis and crimen mortale here is so unique and doubtful that it would hardly be methodologically justifiable to derive from it consequences for Origen' s theology of penance which do not fit into the view which he expresses elsewhere.

2. The Forgivable Character of Sin

It is not here a question of the possibility which the Church has of forgiving mortal sins. Through his own fault alone the sinner has in fact incurred 'excommunication' and normally he is also explicitly charged with a declaration of excommunication on the Church's [262] part. Whether the Church is able to receive him back into its full fellowship after the remission of his sins or how it participates in this supposed remission does not interest us here. Rather it is a question of whether a person guilty of mortal sins can remit his sin before God and indeed in this life. According to Origen's eschatology there is no definitive and eternal rejection for a sinner who dies unrepentant. Through the purifying fire of the future age, even in his case, God's love will so conquer the wickedness of created freedom that, in the final analysis, the whole of created freedom will be saved for ever.[121] Thus in this [118] For instance, are crimen and culpa in fact such clearly distinct notions for Origen and his translators that this distinction remains even after the addition of the mortale/-lis? In Num.hom. 1,1 (GCS 30) 69,18 there is a mention of the crimen infiationis, which is, however, only a venial sin. In Lev.hom. 5,4 (GCS 29) 341,6-9 Origen stresses that the Bible generally does not distinguish between peccatum and delictum. If ever a distinction is made, then delictum means the lighter sin.

[119] According to an oral remark, B. Kotting (Münster) also holds the mortalis here as not corresponding to Origen's way of thinking, and he recommends that it should be omitted. In his view, it is Rufinus who has introduced the notion of a culpa mortalis, which should not be considered as a mortal sin.

[120] The text becomes more comprehensible and clearer, because between culpa and crimen there is obviously an opposition intended. On the one hand, however, this is hardly expressed in the mere notions of culpa and crimen, while, on the other hand, it is completely cancelled out if both of these notions are qualified by the same adjective, mortalis. It is possible that Rufinus himself had a hand in this deterioration of the text, since, on his own testimony, he translated the homilies on Leviticus very freely (cf. Rufinus, Peroratio in explanat.Origenis super Epist.Pauli ad Romanos [PG 14] 1293). Already E. R. Redepenning, II 51 f. n.5 omitted the mortalis after culpa and, in so doing, referred both to A. Anrauld and C. de la Rue (cf. [PG 12] 559 n.26). Arnauld's idea, De frequenti communione liber (Lovanii 1674), pp. 198-200, that culpa moralis should be read in the place of culpa mortalis, is supported by In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 70,6 f., where a distinction is drawn between delicta moralia and fidel crimen. Arnauld's conjecture is, therefore, not arbitrary, as D. Petau, De poenitentia publica et praeparatione ad communionem lib. VI cap. 9 (Paris 1867), pp. 360-2, maintains. Moreover, Petau's arguments against Arnauld on this matter are too a priori. O. D. Watkins, A History of Penance I (London 1920), p. 138, is likewise of the opinion that the original text has been altered by the translation. W. A. Baehrens, the editor of GCS 29; 30; 33, does not record in the apparatus of his edition the four MSS. in which C. de la Rue claims to have observed the absence of the mortalis after culpa (cf. [PG 12] 559 n.26). Neither does he mention this absence in several manuscripts in his Überlieferung und Textgeschichte der lateinisch enhaltenen Origeneshomilien zum Alten Testament (TU 42,1) (Leipzig 1916). If, however, the observation of C. dela Rue was correct, then it must have been a question of later MSS. – de la Rue himself refers to this fact – which were not considered for Bahrens' text. Nevertheless, it is still possible to recognize in this omission a critical correction of the text on the part of later copyists.

[121] Cf. E. R. Redepenning, II, pp. 444-51; L. Atzberger, pp. 387-418; J. Daniélou, pp. 271-83. We believe that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

definitive perspective there is no problem whatsoever of the forgiveness of mortal sins for Origen. Everyone is agreed on this point. Origen also tries to withdraw this teaching from the existential reach of the man who is not yet purified, for whom it is obviously a temptation. For this eschatology he appeals to God's essential goodness and establishes his thesis with the application of metaphysical principles. In this way, however, he enters into contradiction with the teaching of the Church, and the question of whether he recognizes the fundamental possibility of the forgiveness of mortal sins in this life becomes even more poignant. If this were the case, then this forgiveness would be limited only by man himself and his refusal, which would be the free rejection of God's offer of forgiveness. To pose the question in this way is not in itself to contradict the teaching of the Church. And it is only this question which is relevant to the history of the controversies about penance and to the Church's theology of penance of that time and today.

Now Origen does not defend any kind of rigorism according to which a divine forgiveness for mortal sins in this life would be impossible or even only doubtful. His theology of the freedom of the spiritual creature, of the love of God and of the saving significance of all punishment is already so weighted against a negative answer in this question that it would be astounding if, despite all this, he still came to another conclusion. This conclusion, in fact, flows from his basic metaphysical principles upon which his world-view and his theology are built. Nevertheless, it also has very concrete consequences for the everyday life of the Christian and for the practice of the Church. Even in these views Origen still wishes to be a man of the Church, and thus it is unthinkable that he would have formulated them in opposition to the Church's teaching or that he would not have noticed the contradiction. Thus his answer to our question, [263] despite the fact that some of its presuppositions do not agree with the teaching of the Church, can certainly be regarded as a witness of the tradition of the Church. What is more, he felt that in propagating his view he was doing nothing more or less than defending the tradition of the Church against a heretical Gnostic fatalism which, he was convinced, regarded man's ethical stance as the necessary consequence of his particular φυ/σιφ.[122]

Neither the notion of an 'incurable' sin nor the denial of the possibility of an aphesis for mortal sins committed after baptism has anything whatsoever to do with the challenging of the fact that such sins are forgivable. This means that already the principal arguments for the view that Origen is a witness for an 'early Christian' rigorism are obviated. Rather, he teaches positively the possibility of forgiveness for mortal sins. But it still remains to adduce several indications which stress that in the statements concerned it really is a question of a possibility of forgiveness in this life. Since it is obvious that Origen's teaching on penance has not undergone a theological development, a precise chronological ordering and treatment of the relevant witnesses either here or in what follows would contribute nothing. It can, therefore, be omitted.[123]

In In Exod. hom. 6,9 Origen explains that through murder, adultery, perjury, robbery and violence, which he means to be considered as the price paid by the devil, a person becomes

---

H. U. von Balthasar is right when he says (Origenes, Geist und Feuer, loc. cit., Introduction, pp. 33 and 544) that it is contrary to Origen's view that the world's process recommences, once, after several aeons, it is completed and God has become all in all, since this teaching, according to Origen, figured among those which were philosophically debatable (this is how Contra Celsum VIII 72 [(GCS 3)] 289,9 f. is to be explained) and not among those which are to be held. Cf. Ad Rom. V 10 (PG 14) 1052 f.; ibid., VII 12 (PG 14) 1134; Fragm. of the commentary on Romans in J. A. Cramer, Catenae Graecorum Patrum in Novum Testamentum, 8 vols. (Oxford 1838-44), vol. iv, pp. 155-7. See further literature on this question in W. Volker, p. 29 n.2.

[122] Cf., for example, In Jer. hom. 2,12 (GCS 33) 300,15-19.

[123] We will consider later the only objection which may be levelled against this view and which is derived from De or. 28. This is because it concerns rather the power of the Church. It has already been shown above that the notion of 'incurable' sin which also occurs here does not, in itself, mean that the sin in question is unforgivable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the property of Satan, just as he becomes the property of Christ through Christ's blood. He was himself afraid that even some qui in ecclesia sunt might in this way have again become the possession of the devil in secret, since he is intent on sowing his weed among the wheat. Et tamen, si quis forte huismodi pecuniam a diabolo deceptus accepit, non usquequaque desperet: misericors enim est et miserator Dominus et creaturae suae non vult mortem sed ut convertatur et vivat. Poenitendo, flendo, satisfaciendo deleat, quod admissum est. Dicit enim propheta quia, cum conversus ingemueris, salvus eris.[124] Thus, in Origen's view, actual mortal sins can be remitted through penance and not only by means of the purifying fire in the next life. The 'earth' as it were 'swallows up' by the mors admissi sceleris the person guilty of impurity. Nec tamen penitus desperandum est. Possible namque est ut, si forte resipiscat, qui devoratus est, rursum possit evomi, sicut Jonas. And since this event is distinguished from the liberation of sinners from the underworld by Jesus Christ, this [264] return and its saving effects must concern something which happens in this life.[125] In In Ps. 36 hom. 1,5[126] the Christian who commits impurity is told: per exhomologesim . . . revela ea (the guilt) Domino et spera in eum, et ipse faciet . . . spera in eum, quod possis ab eo veniam promereri, et ipse faciet. Quid faciet? Sine dubio sanum te faciet. At the same time, the preacher of this homily expresses the hope that none of his hearers has become guilty of fornicatio. Thus Origen seems here to be thinking of a mortal sin. Moreover, there is no indication that the restored health in question is promised only for the next life.

In In Ps. 36 hom. 4,2[127] this instruction is given to a sinner whose fault has separated him from the Church (quomodo ad Ecclesiam redire?) and who has forfeited his salvation (quomodo possum ego salvus fieri . . . iam nulla spes est): non iaceat post casum, ne prosternatur, sed exsurgat et emendet culpam, expurget paenitentiae suae satisfactione commissum. What Origen clearly has in mind here[128] is fornicatio, impudicitia and those cases which correspond in some way to Peter's denial or the sin of David with Uriah's wife.[129] The sinner must begin his reform immediately and thus the exhortation is intended as a message of confidence to the simple Christian who knows nothing about the theory of the final salvation of all things. This is abundantly clear from the question quoted above. This exhortation, therefore, must concern an effect which takes place in this life; indeed it concludes with a redire ad Ecclesiam. In In Levit. hom. 14,4[130] it is explained why a less [124] Cf. In Ex.hom. 6,9 (GCS 29) 200 f. The passage quoted is found ibid., 201,13-16. I consider it excessive to wish to derive from this text a clearly defined 'juridical notion of sin and its expiation' (cf. Poschmann, p. 432). The notion of selling is dictated by the scriptural passage. The image of 'payment' is not applied to penance itself. Satisfacere for sins occurs here, but also elsewhere in Latin translations (In Num.hom. 9,3 [GCS 30] 57,28: satisfacere pro delictis; In Num.hom. 9,8 [GCS 30] 66,16: paenitentiae tempus et satisfactionis locus; In Ps. 36 hom. 4,2 [PG l2] 1353: safisfacere Domino; poenitentiae satisfactio); it is difficult to say, however, which Greek word originally corresponded to this Latin term, since it is not clear either that it was always the same Greek notion or that Rufinus, in transmitting such a term, was not paraphrasing. In the translation of Gregory of Nazianzus' Oratio apologetica, Rufinus, the translator of Origen's Homilies, translates the notions υ(περαπολογει∴σθαι, α)πολογι/α, πρεσβει/α with satisfacere, satisfactio (cf. A. Deneffe, 'Das Wort satisfactio' in: ZKTh 43 (1919), pp. 158-75; for Rufinus see p. 162). Nor is it important what Rufinus himself understood by the notion of satisfacere. It need not have expressed anything more than 'to ask', 'to request', etc. In any case, for Origen satisfactio is in fact punishment which is voluntarily undertaken. This punishment, however, in Origen's view flows connaturally from sin as its intrinsic consequence and has, as its essential function, the interior healing of sin. In a certain sense it overcomes sin and eliminates it. Thus it is obvious that Origen does not have a juridical notion of the relationship between guilt and punishment (penance), although he may use juridical metaphors to clarify this relationship.

[125] In Ex.hom. 6,6 (GCS 29) 197,11-198,5. The quotation is found ibid., 197,28 f.

[126] In Ps. 36 hom. 1,5 (PG 12) 1328.

[127] Ibid., 4,2 (PG 12) 1351-4.

[128] Ibid., (PG 12) 1353 C.

[129] Ibid., (PG 12) 1351 D.

[130] In Lev.hom. 14,4 (GCS 29) 484-87.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grievous sin like taking God's name in vain is treated more seriously in the Old Testament than a greater offence like blasphemy: the punishment of death for the less grievous was, at the same time, its remission, so that this did not require further punishment in the next world.[131] The serious sin, on the other hand, was not expiated by a punishment in this life and manet illis aeternis ignibus extinguendum (485,9). According to Origen, Paul was cognisant of this (486,20). And thus the apostle punishes the sinner guilty of impurity in 1 Corinthians 5 'with death', that is, he hands him over to Satan in interitum carnis in this life so that his spirit will then be saved in the next world. This spiritual death consists in the afflictio corporis, quae solet a poenitentibus expendi (486,26 f.). This leads to the following consequence: Unde et si nunc quis forte nostrum recordatur in semetipso alicuius peccati conscientiam, se qui se obnoxium novit esse delicto, confugiat ad [265] paenitentiam et spontaneum suscipiat carnis interitum ut expurgatus in praesenti vita spiritus noster mundus et purus pergat ad Christum Dominum nostrum (486,28-487,3). Thus, according to Origen, the sin of the incestuous person at Corinth can be fully remitted in this life by the interitus carnis. Moreover, this sinner is for Origen the biblical type par excellence of the one who is subject to church penance. The interitus carnis is the paenitentia, which consists of the afflictio carnis quae solet[132] a penitentibus expendi. A similar train of thought is found in detail in In Levit. hom. 11,2.[133] There it is expressly a question of those sins which correspond to Hebrews 10:28 f.,[134] therefore, of peccata ad mortem. In the new covenant the punishment for such sins is no longer bodily death, since the bishop ought not to impose such a punishment.[135] Rather, what is now appropriate for the remission of sin is paenitentia[136] in so far as this is freely undertaken.[137] If this is not the case, nobis ultio reponitur in futurum.[138]

In In Jer. hom. 20,9[139] there appear two sinners who have become guilty of the same offence of impurity. One of these, however, is unrepentant, while the other is conscience-struck and does hard penance, not only for a few days but for a long period of time. Thus in his heart is already burning the purifying fire of judgement. Indeed the more intense this is, the greater must be his trust in God and the more rapidly will he find mercy. Penance in this life is sufficient 'period of punishment' for him, if it lasts as long as in the case of the incestuous person in Corinth. When Paul saw that this person had undergone sufficient affliction he ordered that love should be allowed to take over so that the penitent should not be destroyed by affliction. Origen concludes from this:

---

[131] Origen applies this principle to Ananias and Saphira: In Matt. tom. XV 15 (GCS 40) 393. Even here (393,5-8) there is a mention of the α)πολαμβα&νειν το_ η9μαρτημε/νον which represents the opposite of α!φεσιφ. Because the avaricious couple were in fact believers, they were judged 'to conceive sin' ε0νθαυ=τα, that is, in this life and thus to be purified through bodily death.

[132] Origen clearly has in mind here quite definite traditional penitential practices, namely the obligations of actual church penance.

[133] In Lev.hom. 11,2 (GCS 29) 449-52.

[134] Ibid., 450,20-6.

[135] Ibid., 451,4-7.

[136] Ibid., 452,1.25 f.

[137] Ibid., 452,1-4.

[138] Ibid., 452,20 f. At the end it is said of such a person guilty of mortal sin: Quod et si aliquis est qui forte praeventus est in huiuscemodi peccatis, . . . ad auxilium confugiat paenitentiae, ut si semel admisit, secundo non faciat, aut, si et secundo iam aut etiam tertio praeventus est, ultra non addat. This refers to a repeated lapse before the first (and unique) church penance, without any mention at all of whether this penance itself is possible more than once. It is certain that the logic of Origen's thought demands that a sinner who had relapsed even after the once-and-for-all church penance (In Lev.hom. 15,2 [GCS 29] 489,19 f.) is still able to be saved before God. Nevertheless, Origen does not mention such a case explicitly. In any event, it is obvious that, for the reasons given earlier, even in his circles, such a case must not have occurred very often.

[139] In Jer.hom. 20,9 (GCS 6) 191,16-192,15.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

> Every one of us examines his own conscience and sees wherein he has sinned; for he must be punished for his sins. He asks God that the fire which was in Jeremiah and then on Simon and Cleophas[140] should also come on him so that he will not be destined for the fire of the next world. For the person who does not undergo fire here, but remorselessly sins again, will be set aside for that fire.

Thus the interior fire of penance remits sin, and indeed even mortal sin, here on earth, exactly as the fire of judgement in the next world.

[266] What Origen says on one occasion, therefore, applies also to mortal sins:

> . . . Qui audiunt, sciant scriptum esse quia cum conversus ingemueris, tunc salvus eris et scies ubi fueris. Et si dixeris tu peccata tua prior, ego exaudiam te tamquam populum sanctum. Audisti quomodo, etiam si peccator fuisti, tantum si conversus es et desisti a peccato, iam sanctus appellaris? Nihil ergo desperandum est his, qui compunguntur, et convertuntur ad Dominum: non enim superat bonitatem Dei malitia delictorum.[141]

Mortal sins are remissible in this life, even if after baptism this requires no longer the aphesis but the interior fire of penance.[142]

3. Penance

A) THE FIRE OF PENANCE

In the following section we will consider more closely the subjective penance of the person guilty of mortal sin. Penance is first and foremost a grace. Now it is obviously impossible to give here even the briefest sketch of the whole of Origen's teaching on grace.[143] Nevertheless, we must have some information about this teaching, even though we shall confine ourselves essentially to those questions which are connected immediately with the teaching on penance. Origen has often been accused of holding a semipelagian, purely external 'synergism' between grace and human freedom. Nevertheless such a description appears too superficial and schematic to be able really to do justice to Origen's basic ideas. In any event, for Origen 'grace' is not merely a divine help given to man to enable him to lead a human, moral life. Man is called to a real participation in the life of the Logos by possessing the Holy Spirit and moving towards the Father. The 'supernatural' character of this possession of the Spirit by which man as an inalienable reflection of the Logos is enabled to share really, ontologically in the life of the Logos by faith, gnosis and love is not developed explicitly. Nevertheless, this does not mean in any way a denial of this supernatural or purely gratuitous character of the divinization of the created spirit. It is only the result of the way [140] Origen is thinking of Luke 24:32. The 'was not our heart burning' is also adduced in a similar context. Cf. In Ex.hom. 4,8 (GCS 29) 180,23: ignis paenitentiae is this burning of Luke 24:32; In Exh.hom. 7,8 (GCS 29) 216,23-9; In Ex.hom. 13,4 (GCS 29) 275,16-23.

---

[141] In Lev.hom. 9,8 (GCS 29) 435,5-l1.

[142] Further evidence to this effect will be offered in the following context.

[143] Cf. Fr. Wörter, Die christliche Lehre über das Verhältnis von Gnade und Freiheit von den apostolischen Zeiten bis auf Augustinus (Freiburg 1856), pp. 201-81; G. Capitaine, De Origenis ethica (Münster 1898); p. 104 ff.; C. Bigg, p. 245; W. Völker, p. 38 ff.; H. Rahner, pp. 205-23; H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 42 n.9; H. Rondet, Gratia Christi: Essai d'histoire du dogme et de théologie dogmatique (Paris 1948), pp. 84-6; A. Lieske, passim. Völker contains references to earlier literature on the question. Other works which might be usefully consulted: K. H. Schelkle, 'Erwählung und Freiheit in Römerbrief nach der Auslegung der Väter' in: ThQ 131 (1951), pp. 17-31, 189-207; and E. Maurial, Origenis de libertate arbitrii doctrina (Montpellier 1856). In the following considerations we shall use the material from Origen's work which has been made available through these studies.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Origen considers the created spirit as it actually is. Accordingly, he has no occasion to distinguish this situation [267] explicitly as 'supernatural' from another merely 'purely natural' one. He also takes it for granted that we do not have this life 'from ourselves'. The ability to be modelled on the Logos is increased by the activity of the Holy Spirit and this strengthens the reciprocal activity between human freedom and the divine help. Now if this co-operation is seen, in itself, 'synergetically' and if it is asked which factor of this co-operation has the initiative, then it must not be forgotten that Origen, in face of the gnostic naturalism of his time, had every reason to stress human freedom. It was obviously of prime importance that the inalienable image and existence of the Logos within man's η9γεμονικο&ν, being the starting-point for every possibility of salvation and for man's inheritance of salvation, is not to be understood in the sense of mere 'nature'. Today also theology must recognize within man, as he actually is, an aspect of his existence which, on the one hand, is supernatural but, on the other, is an indispensable, real, ontological characteristic of his true nature.[144] It is certain that Origen does not stress very explicitly that the actual decision in favour of the good, as the exercise of free choice with regard to good and evil, is itself still a special grace. But could he see this clearly if, on the one hand, he propounded a radical eschatological optimism, according to which – as he certainly intended it to be understood – all men would be saved and, on the other, he attacked gnosticism, for which freedom is not an inalienable reality in man?

In any case, according to Origen a person guilty of mortal sin has lost the Spirit of grace and is really dead. His rebirth to life is, therefore, above all a work of God himself. This is true, even if Origen in his preaching repeatedly exhorts man as he actually is to penance and conversion, that is, to an activity which he himself must freely undertake and see through. Despite all this, the new beginning of life is always the work of God. Mortal sin, as opposed to that fault which does not incur death, is no longer able to be healed by created power alone.[145] In the case of a plaga insanabilis, therefore, the magnus medicus himself must intervene;[146] sacrificia sacerdotum and the obsecrationes pontificum are, in this case, unable to effect a cure, and an improvement through the scientia divinae legis is impossible. Thus we read of these sins: ipsius Domini agere virtutem.[147] Nevertheless, the Lord has arranged that others should have a special responsibility for loosing the bond of death incurred by the person who commits such a sin against the Holy Spirit. This applies [268] above all to the angels. They play an important role in the very first stirrings of the new beginning of the [144] How otherwise could the loss of the visio beatifica be experienced existentially as a loss? In the case of Origen, it should also be considered that, at least in one perspective – that of the two-tiered Platonism of a natural, physical and human world, on the one hand, and of the spiritual, divine world on the other – he can and must recognize the natural virtues of 'pagans' (cf. H. U. von Balthasar, p. 42 n.9; G. Capitaine, p. 106 n. 1). Nevertheless, he must not, thereby, dispute the absolute necessity and importance for salvation of the virtues given spiritually by God. This implies the distinction between the natural and the supernatural orders (cf. also G. Capitaine, p. 49), while at the same time precluding absolutely a crude synergismus between God and man on the same level.

[145] This obviously does not exclude that, in the overall process of the healing of the person guilty of mortal sin, these powers are again effective, once the new creative impulse from the side of God/Christ has occurred. Thus the texts which stress the batter point represent only an apparent contradiction of this basic principle.

[146] In Jem.hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,24-296,9. The fact that here the activity of the great Physician himself, as opposed to that of his ministri, is seen principally as a punitive retribution does not dissolve Origen's viewpoint of the material identity of vindictive and medicinal punishment, from which he considers the matter here. Even in the case of retributio it is a question of an activity of the Physician.

[147] Cf. in Ex.hom. 4,8 (GCS 29) 181,26-182,5. Cf. also In Ex.hom. 4,3 (GCS 29) 173,30-174,1. It is not absolutely certain from the text alone that Origen is here thinking clearly about the mortal sins of a baptized Christian or of his interior impenitence. But even this text is clear in the bight of De or. 28. For there, too, it is a question of explaining that the healing of mortal sins is impossible for a baptized person only by the prayer and sacrifice of priests.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spiritual life. For surely, it is first and foremost always Christ's prayer and command that call the dead from the grave of sin.[148] Nevertheless, as far as the idea of the remission of mortal sin is concerned, there is no further explanation[149] of how the living command, reserved to Christ alone, actually operates in raising men from the death of sin and precisely how it is distinguished from the activity of the other forces, that is, of angels and of the Church, which certainly co-operate in this remission. It is, however, possible to derive a clearer idea of the nature of this divine initiative from Origen's more general views. The most important of these, for our present purpose, is doubtless the assumption that conversion requires a divine impulse, but could subsequently be understood as an act of human freedom. This would correspond to our modern notion of gratia efficax, and undoubtedly it ought to be thought of in this way. For if a sinner is to be summoned from the grave by a divine command this is a matter of God's action with regard to a person who is repentant, but not with regard to one who is obdurate. Nevertheless, the effect of this divine action cannot be identified with gratia efficax in the sense of modern theology. For Origen does not seem to have conceived the actual doing of good, once the free choice between good and evil has been made, as grace. In his view God gives the possibility to do either, and then all the rest is left to the decision of man himself.[150] If, however, this motion on the part of God and Jesus Christ is understood exclusively in the sense of a prevenient grace which makes conversion possible, then this idea, as far as its positive content is concerned, would be perfectly appropriate,[151] even though it would remain fairly formal and undetermined. For we would then immediately have to ask what it is precisely that constitutes this impulse of grace for Origen. The specific character of this revivifying motion on God's part must, therefore, be looked for elsewhere.

According to Origen, the grace which makes conversion possible must reside in the experience of divine judgement on sin. If angels and men desire to preserve the sinner from mortal sin, that is, if they wish to heal him but, nevertheless, have to face the fact that their effort is futile, then there is nothing else that they can do. As opposed to a parvum peccatum, which does not entail a judgement which reaches up to heaven, the crimen of mortal sin calls for the [269] judgement of God himself, a judgement which corresponds to the seriousness of the fault committed.[152] This judgement consists in a rejection of the sinner on God's part and it can occur in two quite different ways. Either the sinner does not notice it at all, and this is the most dreadful form of God's anger with regard to man,[153] or else the Logos, which is

[148] In Joan. XXVIII 7 f. (GCS 10) 397-9.
[149] Actual penance by means of the sin-remitting suffering of the punishments due to sin, which is Origen's more precise theme, already does not strictly belong any more to the activity which is reserved exclusively to God.
[150] De princip. III 1,20 (GCS 22) 234,5-235,8. Origen does not appear to have relinquished this position essentially, although he also stresses that a help of grace on God's part is necessary for salvation. Without it man is unable to do anything good, and thus true salvation absolutely needs this help. It is not stated explicitly that the actual acceptance of the possibility offered by God is itself a grace. Even In Matt. tom. X 19 (GCS 40) 25,11-26,28 and In Lev.hom. 16,7 (GCS 29) 505 seem to say nothing on this point (contrary to H. U. von Balthasar, p. 42 n.9). Here, too, there is only a mention of the necessary help of grace which obviously achieves its effect. This grace could be construed as prevenient, but even then, according to Origen, it is explicitly no more than the grace which facilitates conversion, as, for example, in De princip. III 2,4 (GCS 22) 251,12-19. In any event, it is a question of the granting of ι9κανο&τηφ; cf. In Joan. VI 36 (GCS 10) 145,1-12.
[151] Cf. the texts quoted in n. l50.
[152] In Jer.hom. 2,12 (GCS 33) 302.
[153] Cf., for example, In Jer.hom. 2,5 (GCS 33) 294,23: magna ira est a Deo tormenta non perpeti; In Luc.hom. 10 (GCS 35) 73,3-7: we are 'anaesthetized' against the domination of the spiritual enemies; In Jer.hom. 6,2 (GCS 6) 48-50: a long consideration of the two kinds of sinners; there are those who die so quickly that they no longer feel their inner condition and punishment, and theme are those who still feel these things; In Ex.hom. 8,5 (GCS 29) 230,8: hoc est terribile, hoc est extrernum, cum iam non corripimur pro peccatis; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,3 (PG 12) 1376.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

united with his soul and accuses him, gives him a 'synesthesis' of his faults and their punishment. But the latter is already the beginning of blessedness, the first sign that the soul is alive again. On the other hand, to experience no pain at all[154] is the most terrifying experience of all. The person who does not come to judgement has simply lost his salvation. Thus no one should wish to flee from God's 'judgement', even if he had the possibility of doing so.[155] The sinner should even pray for the inner fire of judgement, so that he may become worthy to receive it in his heart.[156] For this fire is, in the final analysis, nothing other than the Logos of the Lord itself.[157]

In order to appreciate this idea properly, it is necessary to bear in mind Origen' s teaching on the inalienable existence of the Logos in created spirits.[158] The person who, in this regard, approaches judgement or, more precisely, is already near it, is the one who allows the fire which is within him to achieve its full effect as judgement on his sins.[159] The intrinsic contradiction between the Logos existing radically within the soul and mortal sin is not always experienced. But when this does happen, then the 'burning fire' of God's Logos becomes the fire of judgement in the depths of man's being. It purifies the soul and punishes invisibly and spiritually. But it also illumines and is simultaneously a grace which has been requested and a judgement quite different from the fire which is prepared for the devil.[160] By committing an 'incurable' sin a man has, as it were, done all that he is capable of. And God has allowed him to go into this extreme situation where he is placed in utter darkness and thus in this gloom experiences the meaningless of sin,[161] since the Logos rooted within the soul cannot be completely eradicated by sin. Thus man vegetates in his state of interior confusion which flows from sin, and the experience of this is the effect of God's fire within man.[162] And the sinner's desperate attempt to persevere in his fault is weakened by its α))λογι/α.[163]

This notion of Origen's of an impulse to conversion has its weak points. Certainly he recognizes that this fire of the interior Logos can [270] even temporarily harden a man pro ipsis motuum morum qualitatibus[164] and that God can impose a greater punishment. For a man does not necessarily have to experience the burning and radical opposition of his sin to the permanent presence of the Logos. Moreover, there is always the danger that sin may appear as a necessary phase, as it were, in the process of man's development, provoking, in its turn, dialectically the very judgement which sooner or later effects the cure.[165] It is only when the existence of the Logos within man is considered as purely gratuitous that the judging and healing experience of the radical opposition of sin to it can itself be understood [154] In Jer.hom. 6,2 (GCS 6) 48,26-32; 49,15-22. Insensitivity is a kind of demonic possession and madness: In Num.hom. 8 (GCS 30) 52,13-16.

[155] Ad Rom. II 2 (PG 14) 874.
[156] In Jer.hom. 20,9 (GCS 6) 191,16; 192,11-15.
[157] Ibid., 190,14; In Ex.hom. 7,6 (GCS 29) 213,14-16; In Ps. 37 hom, 1,1 (PG 12) 1372 C/D.
[158] Cf. the texts in A. Lieske, pp. 109-14.
[159] In Jos.hom. 4,3 (GCS 30) 311,18-22. It is here that the famous agraphon is quoted: qui approximant mihi, approximant igni. The same quotation is found also in In Jer.hom. 3,3 (GCS 33) 312; 25 f. in this form: qui iuxta me est, iuxta ignem est; likewise Didymus, In Ps. 88,8 (PG 39) 1488.
[160] Cf. also In Is.hom. 4,5 f. (GCS 33) 262; in Job 20,25 (PG 17) 76; In Ezech. hom.1,3 (GCS 33) 324,7-13; In Lev.hom. 9,8 (GCS 29) 432,17-27; In Ex.hom. 13,4 (GCS 29) 275,18-23.
[161] Cf. In Matt.tom. XVII 24 (GCS 40) 651; De or. 29,13 (GCS 3) 388,6-12.
[162] In Ezech.hom. 8,4 (GCS 33) 422,5 f.: sin – nervos animae succidit; In Ezech.hom. 5,1 (GCS 33) 371,18-372,5: the fiery sword of the interior judgement, which itself cuts in two; Fragm. In Osee (PG 13) 828 C: the interior disintegration of the sinner who falls out of unity.
[163] In Luc.hom. 17 (GCS 35) 115,2-5 [Greek fragment]
[164] In Cant.hom. II (GCS 33) 128,10-14.
[165] Cf., for example, De princip. III 1,7-15 (GCS 22) 204-23; In Num.hom. 14,2 (GCS 30) 121-5; In Matt.tom. XIII 23 (GCS 40) 242,18-243,13; De or. 6,5 (GCS 3) 315: Paul; J. Daniélou, p. 277 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as a grace. But Origen himself is not clear about this gratuitous character.[166] What is more, the actual experience of the interior fire, as opposed to the insensibility on the part of a person who is obstinate, must be considered as a special grace. This is something more than is possible merely by reason of the indwelling of the Logos. Only on these conditions would the specifically gratuitous character of the impulse to conversion be fully safeguarded. The notion of just such an impulse is widely accepted today and, from what we have said, gains in both importance and clarity through Origen's thought. This grace is not merely a question of an extrinsic psychological stimulus to a change of attitude, a stimulus which would be connected with its very formal supernatural (ontological) elevation of this act. Rather, the impulse is determined concretely by the actual situation in which the sinner finds himself. This impulse is the awakening experience within the human being of the burning contradiction which created freedom cannot exclude from its nature, the contradiction between one's personal decision and the inalienable, real, ontological, supernatural orientation towards God which is an indelible mark of human existence. It is at this point, at the very ground of being, that God's fire burns, that God's voice continually calls the sinner from the grave of his sin.

In this view of Origen we meet for the first time a major theology of attritio. However, it is not considered here, as it is from Augustine down to the present day, principally as an imperfect act of conversion from sin by reason of its imperfect motive. Rather, Origen considers first and foremost the experience and the recognition of the radical opposition to God on the part of the sinner himself. The conversion from sin follows not only because of the punishment, which is a misfortune for men, but because of the judging holiness of [271] God, who is a consuming fire. Origen knows very well that, in the final analysis, it is only love that can move created freedom with a definitively free 'necessity'.[167] Nevertheless, quite rightly, he does not see conversion from sin primarily as a free movement of love which, with a freedom of indifference, turns itself towards God. Rather, he considers this movement as a consequence of the experience of God who burns like a fire within man and who, as such, is the first thing to make man aware that he is destitute by virtue of his sin. The first grace of a sinner is not that which represents his highest and final activity, namely love, but the experience and the acceptance of what he actually is: man within whom God's judgement is already burning.

B) THE PENANCE OF THE SINNER

The experience of the fire of judgement at the ground of being does not, however, represent the whole of penance. This fire would only consume sin. According to Origen's thought, however, corporeity as such is already a manifestation of original sin and the means of overcoming it.[168] Thus that which occurs at the very core of a spiritual creature must also be expressed externally and bodily, as reflecting and adumbrating the 'true' realities. But this means that God himself (or the Logos), considered as the real physician who heals mortal sins, is obliged to intervene with burning and cutting in a way which begins in the sinner's heart but extends to include his whole reality. Man must not only bear all this passively, but even do it actively by his penance which, in its turn, is influenced and helped by the whole of [166] Obviously this indwelling of the Logos is that of the personal logos of God, that is, of Christ the Logos (cf. A. Lieske, p. 110 ff.). As such a personal relationship, it is perfectly able to be considered from the viewpoint of grace. Origen also often stresses that the actual function of the hegemonikon in directing man towards the divine requires the help of God's grace. Cf. A. Lieske, pp. 107-109. Moreover, it ought not to be overlooked that the inalienable character of the indwelling of the Logos is not an argument against its purely gratuitous character.

[167] Ad Rom. V 10 (PG 14) 1052 f.
[168] Cf., for example, De princip. I 8,1 (GCS 22) 94-7, etc.; J. Danièlou, pp. 207-17; H. U. von Balthasar, pp. 535-8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

created reality. The purpose is the spontaneus interitus carnis, the destructive overthrow of man's sinful reality as a being of flesh, and this as a free act of his own penance. This is what we must now consider in more detail.[169]

God has many different ways of forgiving sins.[170] The fire burning in man's heart spreads over the whole man.[171] It begins as a punishment of the conscience and a torment of the heart[172] and burns more fiercely than an external fire which torments martyrs.[173] It consists in disgust over the sin which has been committed.[174] Man is completely paralysed by the terror of the interior judgement, he no longer wishes to eat and drink,[175] he weeps with groans coming from his heart.[176] Then this penance becomes active, a spontaneus carnis interitus;[177] man himself chooses the afflictio corporis, quae solet a [272] paenitentibus expendi, and thus brings about himself the interitus carnis which consists in the afflictio.[178] To this belong the abstinentia cotidiana,[179] the severitatis austeritas,[180] in other words, the external works of penance, as they were customary in the dura et laboriosa paenitentia,[181] the τικρα_ α(μαρτι/αφ μετα&νοια.[182] Because the interitus carnis also consists in spontaneity above all, a man can be exhorted to undertake it actively. Spontaneum suscipiat carnis interitum.[183] Through this free undertaking the terror caused by God's judgement can really take effect and the sensus carnalis or, as it is also called, the cupiditas carnalis,[184] can die out. This is the death which, as opposed to the death of sin, is caused by God himself. It is the laudabilis carnis interitus, the mors laudabilis, qua peccato quis moritur, in which also the flesh dies to sin and vices.[185] Viewed from the purely temporal angle, this 'death and becoming' can occur very quickly,[186] although, in comparison with the brief moment of sin, this process can last a very long time.[187] Nevertheless, this whole active penance on the sinner's part is only the willing acceptance and performance of that penance which is imposed upon him by God and by the fact that he is a sinful man. It includes the readiness to suffer purifying afflictions which are laid down by God sickness of the body, loss of earthly possessions, death of relatives and all those external sufferings which are attributable to God's providence.[188] In addition to all this, it is still necessary to undergo the obligatory correptiones of the church community with patience.[189] The supraterrestrial created spirits, too, take part in this varied [169] For the moment, we are not considering the church aspect of this penance.

[170] In Joan. VI 58 (GCS 10) 167,2-5; In Ezech. hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 356,20-9.
[171] In Jer.hom. 20,8 (GCS 6) 190, 33-191,3.
[172] Ibid., 20.9 (GCS 6) 191,19.
[173] Ibid., 20,8 (GCS 6) 190,29-32; In Joan. XIII 23 (GCS 10) 247,1-6.
[174] De or. 29,13 (GCS 3) 388,9. This κορεσθη=ναι is the counterpart of the κο&ροφ τη=φ θει/αφ α(γυ/πηφ, which is the essence of original sin; cf. De princip. II 8 (GCS 22) 159,7.
[175] In Jer.hom. 20,9 (GCS 6)191,25.
[176] In Ex.hom. 6,9 (GCS 29) 201,15; In Jer.hom. 20,9 (GCS 6) 191,28. With teams also: Selecta in Ps. 115 (PG 12) 1577 D; In Lev. hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 296,18 f.; ibid., 15,2 (GCS 29) 488,26.
[177] In Lev. hom. 14,4 (GCS 29) 487,1.
[178] Ibid., (GCS 29) 486,26 f.
[179] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,2 (PG 12) 1376.
[180] Ad Rom. VI 6 (PG 14) 1069.
[181] In Lev. hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 296,17.
[182] Selecta in Ps. 13,1 (PG 12) 1301.
[183] In Lev. hom. 14,4 (GCS 29) 487,1.
[184] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,2 (PG 12) 1375.
[185] Ad Rom. praef. (PG 14) 834; ibid., VI 6 (PG 14) 1068.
[186] Ibid., praef. (PG 14) 834. Origen himself remarks that this interitus carnis of the incestuous person in Corinth occurs in the brief period of time between the two letters to the Corinthians.
[187] In Ezech.hom. 10,3 (GCS 33) 421,13-19; In Num.hom. 8,1 (GCS 30) 51,15-24.
[188] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,5 (PG 12) 1385 (one of the most moving penitential prayers of the early Church); In Lev. hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 486,1-8.
[189] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1370 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penitential suffering in order to change man by his salutary death. The interitus carnis of a person guilty of mortal sin is achieved by a 'handing over to Satan', an event which is reflected externally in excommunication by the Church In any case the devil takes the place which God has relinquished in the Christian who has committed mortal sin.[190] The devil, however, is not only man's enemy but also ε0κδικητη/φ, and this means God's punishing agent.[191] Thus it is better to experience his 'curse' rather than a 'blessing' in miseriae et supplicia and to bear these with patience.[192] This applies even to the inner 'state of confusion' (σπαρα&σσεσθαι) caused by these 'Babylonians'.[193]

According to Origen, even the consequences of sin caused by demons have a salvific meaning. Thus he does not distinguish these from the punishments of sin which have been prescribed for man's salvation by the good angels.[194] This may be due to the fact that in [273] his view all angels, albeit in differing degrees, are fallen.[195] In any case, the good angels also have a role to play in the punishments which are administered to sinners in penance.[196]

Up until now we have considered only the objective penance of the sinner, that is, apart from its ecclesial aspect. In this way we have tried to determine the actual content of the α)πολαμβα&νειν τα_φ α(μαρτι/αφ which, as an alternative to a simple aphesis, remits sins after baptism. A proper understanding of Origen's view, however, requires further clarifications.

It is obvious that, according to Origen's way of thinking, punishment has an essentially medicinal character.[197] An exclusively vindictive punishment, which would be merely the expression of the objective value of the moral law, is totally alien to him. He considers the punishment of sin, first and foremost, as the intrinsic and connatural consequence of sin, flowing from the very nature of the offence.[198] Such an idea of the punishment of sin does not necessarily imply that this latter must come to an end. Nevertheless these two ideas are linked together by Origen. In fact it would be conceivable that an intrinsic consequence of sin, which should actually facilitate and encourage conversion, in the event does not achieve this aim. It is, after all, possible that a man remains definitively unrepentant for other reasons. Thus this notion of the punishment of sin as an essentially medicinal consequence of sin can hardly be rejected on the supposition that it makes the general idea of the apocatastasis inevitable. Obviously in the present instance it is a question of punishment only because and in so far as this is a consequence of sin, and not vice versa. Moreover, it cannot be said that such a notion necessarily includes the denial of an external punishment of sin, a position

[190] In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 478,21-3; 479,11-18.
[191] In Jer. hom. 19,14 (GCS 6) 71,4; Contra Celsum VIII 33 (GCS 3) 249,1-4; In Num.hom. 13,7 (GCS 30) (117; cf. J. Daniélou, p. 239.
[192] In Ezech. hom. 12,3 (GCS 33) 436,23-5; 437,7-13. On the question of the demons as the causes of plagues on Earth, see E. R. Redepenning, II, p. 355.
[193] In Jer. hom. 1,4 (GCS 6) 3,18.
[194] Cf. in Jer.hom. 2,6 (GCS 33) 295,17-20; Origen believes that non-mortal sins can be healed by the punishment on the part of either good or bad angels.
[195] Cf., for example, De princip. I 7,4 f. (GCS 22) 89-94; ibid., I 8,1 (GCS 22) 94-8; E. R. Redepenning, II, pp. 112ff., 348 ff.
[196] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1372, with reference to the Shepherd of Hermas.
[197] In Jem.hom. 20,1 (GCS 6) 176,15-177,9; In Ezech.hom. 1,2 (GCS 33) 321,10-12: si non esset utile conversioni peccantium adhibere tormenta peccantibus, nunquam, misericors et benignus Deus poenis sclera puniret. This idea is found already in Plutarch. Cf. J. Daniélou, p. 98 f., who on this point sees a particularly clear influence of 'middle Platonism' on Origen.
[198] Cf. Ad Rom. II 6 (PG 14) 883; De princip. II 10,4-8 (GCS 22) 177-183. Inhere explaining the punishments in the next life as the effect of sin, Origen remains consistent, since a punishment which derived only from God's anger and was in no way (also) an effect of sin could only make the illness worse and would not be medicinal. It follows from this, therefore, that the punishment ceases automatically once the interior conversion has been completed: cf. Ad Rom. II 1 (PG 14) 873.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which Jerome actually accused Origen of holding.[199]

In other words, it is perfectly possible to understand a punishment of sin as a consequence which flows necessarily from the nature of sin itself. This would be the clash between the sinner's guilty act and condition – which could even be definitive – and the objectively imposed structure and order of his true reality. In this sense it could be described as an 'external' punishment. Origen is perfectly able to grant this[200] without relinquishing his basic speculative principle that in the religious sphere there are no punishments which could be considered vindictive. The latter would be punishments which are not the intrinsic consequence of guilt and which are imposed by an [274] external cause only as a vindictive reaction to sin. 'Punishment' arises as the consequence of sin from the clash between guilt and the objective ordering of reality which exists for itself and not primarily in view of the punishment of the sinner. Thus this reality also reveals the transcendence of the moral order. In this sense one could also speak of a 'vindictive' aspect, of δι/κη α#μα και∴ ι0ατρει/α.[201]

This notion of the medicinal nature of the punishment of sin obviously raises several questions which are not answered explicitly by Origen. How, for instance, could such punishments really overcome sin? They can certainly not be understood as the execution of a purely juridical sentence. We will go into this question in more detail below. At the same time, there can be no question here of what one may call an automatically effective self-destruction of evil.[202]

Such a notion would be gnostic and would be in direct contradiction to the concept of freedom which Origen directs against Gnosticism. If, in his view, guilt springs essentially from freedom, it follows that it can be taken away only by freedom. It may appear from many passages in his work that moral evil is taken away simply by the fact that, being suffered by God's longanimity, it leads finally ad absurdum or, as non-existent darkness, it is dissolved necessarily by God's light.[203] Thus it would seem that, in the final analysis, in the light of the general teaching of the restoration of all things, the distinction between a punitive consequence of sin which is accepted freely and one which is suffered merely passively is only secondary and provisional. Nevertheless, for Origen man's freedom is an original datum, and thus in his view punishment can have a salvific meaning only if it is undertaken willingly. If, therefore, God's punishment is to have a meaning for man's salvation, it must be able to persuade man to undertake this punishment freely.[204] Even on this supposition, however, it is still not possible to avoid the question of how punishment, considered as the consequence and manifestation of guilt in the flesh, can, by being freely accepted, be so changed as to become a cure for the guilt. In other words, how is it that guilt, which becomes punishment and enters into the instrument of the flesh, is able to be so ambivalent that it can also become the manifestation of, and even an impulsion towards, the free return of the spirit towards God which removes guilt? To answer this question from Origen's thought would presuppose at least a precise treatment of his metaphysics and theology of σα&ρχ. For the 'flesh' means two things: the manifestation of guilt and the means of taking it away. [275]

---

[199] Comm. in Ep. ad Eph. III 5 (PL 26) 522: nec extrinsecus adhibenda tormenta; Apol. adv. Rufinum II 7 (PL 23) 429; Ep. ad Avitum (PL 22) 1065.

[200] Illnesses, temptations of the devil, the πυ=ρ καθα&ρσιον of the end of the world (cf., on this point, L. Atzberger, p. 407), etc.

[201] Thus Contra Celsum V 15 (GCS 3) 16,7 f. with regard to the πυ=ρ καθα&ρσιον of the end of the world.

[202] K. Rahner, 'Gnosis' in: LThK 4 (1960), pp. 1019-21; H. Rahner, 'Gnostizismus, christlicher' in: LThK 4 (1960), pp. 1028-30.

[203] Cf., for example, In Joan. II 27 (GCS 10) 84,20-6; In Joan. fragm. 3 (GCS 10) 386, 29-387,19; De princip. III 4,3 (GCS 22) 267,28-268,15; In Joan. fragm. 41 (GCS 10) 516; De princip. III 1,12.13.17 (GCS 22) 214-18; 225 ff.; J. Daniélou, p. 277 ff.

[204] Cf.In Jer.hom. 20,2 (GCS 6) 178,20-5; De princip. I 2,10 (GCS 22) 44,1-1l.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Such an undertaking, however, in the context of this study would lead us too far astray.

It follows from Origen's view of the nature of punishment that there can be no question of a juridical notion of penance. This penance can be nothing other than the voluntary undertaking of the punishments of sin. Its purpose is man's inner restoration to health, and it ends as soon as this end is reached. In such a way of thinking it is impossible to have the idea of a juridical relationship of guilt between the sinner and God, a state which would be independent of man's moral condition and so would require a punishment which, even after man's complete conversion, would still be in order. If occasionally it does appear that Origen does entertain such an idea,[205] this is only a question of images and comparisons with human relationships which ought not to be exaggerated. This observation is confirmed by another consideration. According to Origen, actions and even sins 'form' men. They do not simply fade into the past in such a way that they can, nevertheless, still be reckoned juridically. Rather, they leave in man a τυ/ποφ which remains imprinted on his heart,[206] secundum sui qualitatem agentis mentem imaginantur et formant.[207] Notae quaedam et signacula relinquantur in the depth of the heart.[208] The object of reforming penance is the real, ontological condition of man.[209] Such an idea of the meaning of penance implies that this could not be thought of as the execution of a purely juridical sentence. While in Cyprian 'healing' was used essentially as an image for the endurance of a punishment, in Origen it is precisely the contrary.

With reference to what we have already seen, the observation which we have just made clarifies two points. First, according to Origen, despite his theological reflection on the question, the difference between sins, that is, between mortal sins and non-mortal sins, cannot be as clear-cut as it is for us today. Every sin leaves behind its τυ/ποφ, which has to be remitted by penance, if not always by official church penance. This means that the difference between serious and light sins is also made somewhat unimportant, especially since the remission of the τυ/ποφ of a mortal sin is always in fact possible, at the very latest by means of the fire of judgement in the next life. This may be a reason why in the early period there are only a few witnesses for mortal sin as a loss of grace[210] or, indeed, for non-mortal sins as not radically destroying the grace of baptism.

Second, it is impossible to observe in Origen a clear differentiation [276] between 'guilt' and 'punishment'. For instance, punishment is corporeity, man's inner confusion and division, his contradiction of God, of the inner fire and, especially, of the structure of his given reality. All this, however, is so essentially a consequence of guilt that, according to Origen, the latter is only actually finally remitted when it is destroyed by penance or the fire of the next life. In other words, when the reality through which guilty freedom has operated and expressed itself is transformed by the interitus carnis. Thus it is possible to understand why Origen appears to know no other moment for the remission of guilt than the completion of penance itself. Leaving aside the baptismal aphesis, the remission of guilt is seen as an event and a process, not as the infusion of grace at a particular moment. Although mortal sin is also considered as a loss of baptismal grace and although certain consequences are derived from this for the prescribed penance, no further account is taken of the specific nature of

[205] Cf., for example, In Luc.hom. 35 (GCS 35) 212-15.
[206] In Jer.hom. 16,10 (GCS 6) 142,5-9.
[207] Ad Rom. III (PG 14) 873.
[208] Ad Rom. II 10 (PG 14) 894; De princip. II 10,4 (GCS 22) 178,5 f.
[209] Ad Rom. II 1 (PG 14) 873. The fact that these τυ/ποι reappear at the judgement as enduring realities need not be seen as a contradiction: the whole of man's spiritual past can, on the one hand, be really, ontologically and physically 'resumed' in his present, while on the other hand being essentially marked by later decisions (for example, to do penance). Thus penance 'marks' the past rather than 'extinguishes' it.
[210] On this point, cf. 'Sin as Loss of Grace in Early Church Literature' in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mortal sin in the question of the nature of forgiveness. As in the case of all other sins, it is here a question of overcoming the moral condition which man has acquired through mortal sin. Origen is less explicit about the direct regaining of baptismal grace. Certainly he knows clearly that the Holy Spirit is bestowed in baptism in a way which would not be possible through a mere moral transformation of man's conscience.[211] Nevertheless, he hardly looks at penance from this point of view. Penance achieves forgiveness by man's moral reformation. Obviously the idea of a reacquisition of grace by penance is not radically excluded, for Origen also knows that the Holy Spirit is the cause of men's sanctification.[212] He does not, however, look at penance explicitly[213] from this point of view, even though it is obviously implied in his notion of mortal sin. This is clear from the opposition which he establishes between baptism in the Spirit and baptism by fire,[214] the latter including penance in this life.[215] This penance is seen by Origen more in its opposition to baptism in water and the Spirit than as a new reception of the Spirit. Both baptisms are similar, however, in that they remit sin.[216] In the case of baptism proper this applies de iure, at least, if not in fact. But this [211] In In Lev.hom. 6,2 (GCS 29) 361,7-11 the moral conversion through personal effort as a condition of effective penance is clearly distinguished from the reception of the gratia Sancti Spiritus through baptism. The same distinction between μετανοει=ν and α!φεσιφ α(μαρτιω~ν is found in In Luc.hom. 21 (GCS 35) 139,1-5; 140,1-4. G. Teichtweier, p. 290, also rightly places a great deal of weight on the distinction between α!φεσιφ and μετα&νοια. He says: 'Αφεσιφ and μετα&νοια or ε0χομολο&γησιφ are, therefore, different ways of forgiving sins.' This is contrary to J. Grotz, pp. 257-60, where this distinction is explicitly rejected, since even forgiveness of sins by the Church consists exclusively of α!φεσιφ, that is, of the forgiveness by the prayer of the priest, independently of the sinner's personal act of penance. Accordingly, only in serious cases is this 'actual penance' preceded by an excommunication (p. 260; cf. on this point ibid., p. 259: 'The remissio means precisely remission without any personal activity'). For the specific effect of baptism, cf. In Joan. VI 33 (GCS 10) 142,23-143,1. For the interpretation of this text, cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 55 f. Although the centurion Cornelius received the Spirit even before his baptism (In Num.hom. 3,1 [GCS 30] 14,6-11; ibid., 11,3 [GCS 30] 81,13), nevertheless, as a matter of principle, the penance and the conversion of the catechumen is a mere precondition for the reception of the Spirit which is bestowed in baptism. Thus, although the virtuous life of pagans deserves a reward by God in the next world, only a baptized person can enter into the actual kingdom of God: Ad Rom. 117 (PG 14) 888. Before baptism, a person can already believe in Christ and invoke him, but it is only in baptism that he receives the Spirit and becomes a living member of the Church: Ad. Rom. VIII 5 (PG 14) 1166 f. For the reception of the Spirit in baptism, cf. also: In Ezech.hom. 6,5 (GCS 33) 383,15 f.; In Luc.hom. 26 (GCS 35) 165,8-16; De princip. II 10,7 (GCS 22) 181,5-9.

[212] Cf. A. Lieske, pp. 141-46.

[213] The following passages, however, could be invoked: In Num.hom. 6,3 (GCS 30) 32,22 ff.: requiescit enim Spiritus sanctus . . . in his, qui purificant animas suas a peccato; In Jos.hom. 3,2 (GCS 30) 303,17-23: the aim of all paenitentia et conversio is sancti Spiritus gratia, which is not said only with regard to baptismal conversion; In Lev. hom. 8,11 (GCS 29) 417,12-18: non solum purgationem consequi possit is, qui convertitur a peccato, sed et Spiritu sancto repleri, quo et recipere priorem stolam et anulum possit et per omnia reconciliatus Patri in locum Filii reparari. Nevertheless, it is important to note that in these texts the purification from sins and the reception of the Spirit are not necessarily envisaged simply as two aspects of one and the same event. These texts arc perfectly comprehensible if the purification from sins is seen as the necessary precondition for the reception of the Spirit, which itself can depend upon causes other than the penitent's mere moral striving after his own purification.

[214] In Jer.hom. 2,3 (GCS 6) 19,9-15; In Luc.hom. 24 (GCS 35) 158. Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 56 ff.; C. M. Edsman, Le baptême de feu (Uppsala 1940), pp. 1-15 (Edsman makes too much of a differentiation within a notion which, in Origen's view, is ultimately unified.)

[215] In Jer.hom. 20,8 f. (GCS 6) 190-2.

[216] A basis for the notion that penance = a new reception of the Spirit is provided by the teaching that, according to Paul, the interitus carnis occurs for the recovery of the πνευ=μα. Since, however, this recovered πνευ=μα is the personal spirit of the sinner himself (cf., for example, In Lev.hom. 14,4 [GCS 29] 487,2: spiritus noster mundus et purus; In Ezech.hom. 12,3 (GCS 33) 437,4 f.: spiritus traditi; ibid., 437,16: spiritus eius), and yet for Origen the ψυξη/, and the νου=φ are man's πνευ=μα, in so far as man's spiritual principle possesses the πνευ=μα of God, included implicitly in the recovery of the πνευ=μα by the interitus carnis is its interior restoration to grace. On the notion of πνευ=μα, cf. Ad Rom. II 10 (PG 14) 893; In Joan. XXXII 18 (GCS 10) 455, 17-22; De princip. II 8,2-3 (GCS 22) 154,18-15,12; E. R. Redepenning, II, p. 369 f.; G. Bardy in: DThC XI

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

observation also has a positive aspect, along the lines of Cyprian's theology: once the bestowal of grace is not tied clearly and explicitly to subjective penance it becomes possible to see the bestowal of the Spirit as the effect of the Church's action in the remission of sins. In the case of penance this does not appear to be [277] so. It still remains to be considered, however, whether and how Origen himself thinks along these lines.

All that has just been said raises once more the question of the relationship of personal penance to grace. Here is one way of answering this question: 'He [Christ] brings forgiveness of sins, we receive it in baptism . . . but this forgiveness is confined to those sins which were committed before baptism. The sins which we commit later . . . must be expiated by ourselves'.[217] 'The baptized person must obtain for himself the forgiveness of sins committed after baptism'.[218] Such a view is surely correct. If the remission of post-baptismal sins, as opposed to the aphesis at initiation consists in the fact that one 'takes it upon oneself' (α)πολαμβα&νειν τα_φ α(μαρτι/αφ) and pursues it and its bitter consequences to the end, then this remission appears not to demand directly the redeeming grace of Christ but to be performed by man 'himself'. We have already seen that it is at least possible to conceive, even in Origen's system, the beginning of conversion and the experience of the interior fire of judgement as grace. Already the mere fact of this experience means that God has desisted from his great anger, which would otherwise make the sinner insensitive to the fire. The very presence of the fire is itself a grace, since the contradiction implied in sin would not exist at all if God did not preserve the supernatural existence of the Logos within man. It is in this way that he prevents man from remaining imprisoned in his complacent carnal existence as a being of this transitory world.

However, all this does not answer the question posed above. For the actual penance which is required for the interitus carnis goes beyond the interior fire of judgement. Now the question is: should this additional element be considered as itself a grace or as the work of man alone? Can such a penance be a grace Christi and, in particular, be related with his actual work of redemption on the cross? Indeed, even the interior fire of judgement could be an 'ideal' grace of the Logos, having no connection whatsoever with the salvation which God's incarnate Son obtained on the cross. What makes this difficulty even more acute is the fact that the interitus carnis which remits sin is, in fact, to be undertaken for mortal sins outside the community of the Church, so that thereby the sinner may become worthy to share once again in the Church's fellowship of grace.[219] This fact could indicate that penance is to be understood as man's [278] own work. Against such a view, however, it must be stressed that, according to Origen, the misericors et miserator Dominus has provided the possibility of a penance for sins committed after baptism, precisely because he did not wish the sinner to die.[220] But does this necessarily mean that the remission of sins through personal penance, 1534 f.; A. Lieske, p. 143 n.56.

---

[217] E. R. Redepenning, II, p. 25. As a proof for this opinion he refers to Ad Rom. III 8 f. (PG 14), although here it is a matter of the redemption through Christ in general. Cf. Contra Celsum III 62 (GCS 2) 256: here also it is a question only of the need which all men have of salvation; In Lev.hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 295,18-296,22 (the passage which we have already considered on the once-and-for-all remissio in baptism and the six other possibilities for the remission of sins); Ad Rom. II l (PG 14) 872: the difference between the remissio in baptism and the tegere peccata through paenitentia. The strength of the proof, therefore, consists only in the difference between baptismal α!φεσιφ and personal penance which remits sin. The question remains, therefore, whether or not this penance can still be grace.

[218] E. R. Redepenning, II, p. 424, with a reference to p.25. Poschmann also appears to be of essentially the same opinion; cf. his study, p. 432: 'Thus, in its effect, penance appears as a counterpart to Christ's blood: while the latter redeems us from the Devil – in baptism – through penance it is the sinner himself who must provide his own ransom.'

[219] We will discuss this point in more detail below.

[220] Thus also B. Poschmann, p. 432. In Ex.hom. 6,9 (GCS 29) 201,18 f. Certainly no more on the subject of God's mercy can be derived from this passage. Thus Poschmann's view appears to be exaggerated: 'Certainly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which is doubtless necessary, is itself a grace? Certainly Origen recognizes that there are graces which are effective even before actual membership of the Church.[221] Thus penance outside the Church with a view to regaining membership with it need not necessarily be a work devoid of grace which a man has undertaken on his own initiative. If this were the case, then he would only have finished with sin in so far as he has expiated it completely on his own.

Penance, however, in so far as it is interitus carnis, is in fact precisely a participation in the death Christi;[222] the renunciation of sins, in so far as it is a conversion, is a crucifixion with the Lord.[223] It is Christ himself who is poor and weak in those who are spiritually weak and poor; with them he suffers in the prison of the world,[224] while the sinner hangs invisibly with him on the cross.[225] The Lamb of God continues to take away the sins of every individual until sin has been totally eliminated from the entire world.[226] If, in reality, the mystery of the incarnation and of the death of the Logos consists in the fact that the dominion of the devil and the sinful flesh is overthrown,[227] then penance is a participation in Christ's own destiny. For, in the final analysis, it is his coming in the flesh and especially his death which make possible the experience of the opposition between flesh and spirit[228] and elevate the order of the flesh to that of heaven.[229] Thus the interitus carnis, far from being the conquest of sin by man himself, is a part of Christ's continuing destiny in this world. Indeed, it is, in a certain sense, the most important part of this destiny, since it is more essential for him to triumph in us than for himself alone.[230] But this means that penance is a grace. Moreover, it should now appear to the impartial observer that the teaching of the aphesis in baptism is even more problematical than the victory over sin by post-baptismal penance. For if every sin leaves its τυ/ποφ in man, if especially the whole of man's fleshly existence is an expression of the creature's sinfulness, and if Origen explicitly recognizes that baptism represents not the end he (the sinner) would not be capable of doing this (providing the ransom) on his own; he has only the misericors et misserator Dominus to thank if his penance has that result' (p. 432). If it were a grace to undertake the penance imposed, then without a doubt the remission obtained through it would also be a grace. But such a juridical conclusion has no place in Origen's view of penance (being an inner healing by the destruction of sin). But is every possibility to do penance itself already grace? The same applies to In Lev.hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 488,23, where it is a question of the pietas et clementia legislatoris which allows us to redeem the house of heaven which has been sold to the Devil.

---

[221] Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 42 ff. The principal passages quoted are Selecta in Ps. 47,9 (PG 12) 1440 in connection with In Joan. XX 20 (GCS 10) 351,33-352,35 and In Cant. III (GCS 33) 215 f.; Ad Rom. V 8 (PG 14) 1166; In Matt. ser. 63 f. (GCS 38) 145,10-151,18.

[222] Ad Rom. V 7 (PG 14) 1335 ff.: si ergo commonitus quis morte Christi, qui pro impiis mortuus est, poeniteat in his omnibus et velut pessimum regem regnantem in sua carne depellat alienumque se ab eius desideriis faciat ac praeceptis, iste vere per mortem Christi peccato mortuus esse dicitur. There is no reason for wishing to understand this only of baptismal penance. Cf. Fragm. in I Ep. ad Thess. (PG 14) 1300: in Christo autem mortui, qui plena ad Deum mente conversi sunt; In Num. hom. 12,3 (GCS 30) 102,23-103,9.

[223] In Matt.tom. XII 24 (GCS 40) 122-5. Such expressions in Origen are to be understood very realistically. Christ is and suffers in the members of the Church as the soul in the body. Cf. also In Matt. ser. 73 (GCS 38) 172,18-174,23.

[224] In Matt. ser. 72 (GCS 38) 168-70. Granted the fact that in Origen's system of thought there is finally no separation between the Church and the world (cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, pp. 42-5), there need be no contradiction in the fact that the penitent guilty of mortal sin, on the one hand, is still outside the Church while, on the other hand, in his situation and in his act of penance he is united with Christ.

[225] In Jos.hom. 8,3 (GCS 30) 338,5-339,3: the well-known passage of the 'double cross', on which hang both Christ and the devil, but also man himself as both holy and sinner.

[226] In Joan. I 32 (GCS 10) 42,3-7.

[227] Cf. J. Daniélou, p. 264 ff.

[228] In Jer.hom. 11,1 (GCS 6) 79,20-80,5.

[229] In Lev.hom. 1,4 (GCS 29) 286,20-287,3.

[230] In Num.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 48,6-12.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

but only the beginning of the complete destruction of sin in the flesh,[231] then his notion [279] of the aphesis in baptism appears to fit less comfortably into his system of Christian redemption than his teaching on penance. In other words, the mere remission of the 'punishment' due to sin must inevitably appear as a retention of the medicine which heals, since punishment and the means of healing are materially identical, and thus the healing is not yet complete through baptism alone. It follows that Origen must have accepted the aphesis teaching as part of traditional teaching and handed it on without having integrated this idea into his system and experience.[232]

In view of all this, it would be erroneous to wish to explain Origen' s notion of metanoia solely on the basis of the aphesis. It would also be misleading, on the same basis, to understand metanoia as an expiation of sin, without grace, by man's autonomous moral effort. Rather, it is a matter of a specifically Christian event, in so far as it is a participation in Christ's redeeming death. This is, however, an event which is possible not only at its onset but also in its final execution only 'in Christ' and, in this sense, must be a grace. Baptism in water and baptism in fire are sacramenta in the Lord's hand.[233] Omnis purificatio peccatorum, etiam haec, quae (as opposed to baptism, the grace of which is granted only once) per paenitentiam quaeritur, illius ope indiget, de cuius latere aqua processit et sanguis.[234]

III. CHURCH PENANCE

1. The Ecclesial Meaning of Penance

So far we have been concerned with the personal penance of the sinner himself. Now we must consider this penance further; that is, in so far as it occurs within the Church and is accompanied and met by the activity of the church community. First of all, however, we must consider an aspect of sin itself which, although we have not previously given it much attention, is very important in the present context. This is the fact that sin itself has an ecclesial aspect. According to Origen, the sinner 'dies' through his mortal sin, in so far as he becomes impervious to the healing influence of the Church which is able to preserve him from death. If, later, we are going to [280] understand Origen's view on the nature of excommunication, we must at this point stress that he considers every sin an immediate contradiction of the Church, in so far as this latter is a holy community and the body of Christ himself. In this church community the illness of sin is by no means the private affair of the individual affected. No one in the Church is able to say: quid hoc ad me spectat, si alius male agit? For it is a matter of: polluitur enim ex uno peccatore . . . plebs universa. To tolerate sin would be a universae ecclesiae, moliri interitum, since then God's anger is directed to the whole people.[235] Also just a little leaven corrupts totam unitatis conspersionem et consensus in the Church.[236] The person who is guilty of a sin of impurity, for example, offends not only his own body as the temple of God but also the body of the Church. In omnem ecclesiam videtur delinquere, qui corpus suum maculaverit, quia per unum membrum macula in omne

[231] Cf. above under nn. 80 and 91.
[232] In this context it is worth noting that Origen ascribes to Martyrdom a greater purifying role than to baptism In Jud. hom. 7,2 (GCS 30) 507,16-508,18. In his view martyrdom is both baptism and the highest form of penance in one.
[233] In Ezech.hom. 5,1 (GCS 33) 372,7-12.
[234] In Lev.hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 411,7-9.
[235] In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 332,21-334,20.
[236] In Matt.ser. 89 (GCS 38) 205,1 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

corpus diffunditur.[237] Because of this effect' which the sin of every baptized person has on the church community Origen is fully aware that the Church is a Church of sinners. This is true not only in the sense that sinful humanity, like the prostitute Rahab or the sinful woman in the gospel, is accepted by Christ and saved from sin,[238] but also in the sense that in this world sinfulness is a permanent mark of the Church itself. The Lord weeps over the Church as he wept over Jerusalem,[239] and in this world it can never be totally cleansed from sin.[240] At the same time Origen still considers the Church to be holy. This means that there is a kind of dialectic at work in the relationship of the sinner to the Church. On the one hand, the sinner still belongs to the Church, since before excommunication he is still one of its members, at least externally, and is a νομιζο&μενοφ ει]ναι α)πο_ τη=φ ε0κκλησι/αφ.[241] And this 'reckoned as belonging to the Church' cannot be a mere illusion for the man who, in his earthly experience, is unable to separate the cockle from the wheat, the vessels of mercy from those of anger, the good fish from the bad. The fact is that both are found together in the one Church at this time.[242] If this were not so, the Lord would not be able to weep over her.[243]

On the other hand, the sinner stands in permanent opposition to the holy Church. Thus, even without being excommunicated, he is, because of his sin, already in fact 'outside'.[244] This is why Origen is able occasionally to count as belonging to the Church only the saints and to exclude from its fellowship those who πιστευ/ειν νομιζο&μενοι [281] ε0κκλησιαστικοι//.[245] It is not possible to resolve this dialectical relationship of the sinner to the Church in Origen's thought[246] simply on the assumption that the sinner is allowed membership of the visibly hierarchical Church but not to the 'spiritual' fellowship of the Church. In any case, it is easy to show[247] that for Origen these two realities are not independent of each other. This point is particularly clear in the question which we are now discussing. It is precisely the connection and the relationship between these two sides of the one Church that explain why the loss of grace through a mortal sin constitutes a contradiction not only against the spiritual interior fellowship of Christians who are with and in the Lord but also against the visible Church. It is for this reason that a person guilty of such a sin should, in principle, always be excommunicated, unless this is practically impossible. Mere leniency, however, could not prevent it.[248] Origen could certainly subscribe to the idea that

---

[237] In Jos.hom. 5,6 (GCS 30) 320,8-13.
[238] Cf., for example, In Matt.tom. XII 4 (GCS 40) 75,7-15; In Jos.hom. 3,4 f. (GCS 30) 304-7.
[239] Fragm. in I Cor. (J. A. Cramer, Catenae Graecorum Patrum, V 11); In Jos.hom. 21,1 (GCS 30) 427,12-429,14; Selecta in Ps. 73,3 (PG 12) 1529 C/D; In Jer.hom. 15,3 (GCS 6) 127,25-30; In Luc. hom. 38 (GCS 35) 223,5-9; 224,11; In Matt.tom. XVI 21 (GCS 40) 546,7-549,21; In Luc.hom. 2 (GCS 35) 14: the sin of the ε0κκλησιαστικο&φ which stains the Church obviously occurs in the Church and is not envisaged as existing prior to baptism. It is considered as being repeatedly remitted; In Jer.fragm. 31 (GCS 6) 215,1-17; In Matt.ser. 35 (GCS 38) 68,4-9.
[240] In Jos.hom. 21,1 (GCS 30) 428,15-18.
[241] In Jer.hom. 15,3 (GCS 6) 127,26.
[242] In Jer. fragm. 31 (GCS 6) 215,7-11; In Ezech.hom. 1,11 (GCS 33) 334,30-335,23; In Gen.hom. 2,3 (GCS 29) 30,17-31,12.
[243] Cf. above under n.239.
[244] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,22-4; In Jer. fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,16 f.; cf. also In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 479,6-10; In Lev.hom. 12,6 (GCS 29) 465,1-4.
[245] In Matt.tom. XII 11 f. (GCS 40) 88 ff. Cf. also In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 263,13: α)δελφο_φ ο)νομαζο&μενοφ, who in reality is not a brother.
[246] Origen clearly experienced this dialectic. In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,27-480,2 he says: Qui . . . inter nos est et peccat, ex una quidem parte, qua Deo credit (at least through his external membership) Israeliticae videtur originis; ex ea parte, qua peccat, de Aegyptio genus ducit.
[247] Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mysterion, p. 40 ff.; A. Lieske, p. 84 ff.
[248] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,18-26 these three 'separations' are clearly distinguishable: separation from the spiritual aspect of the Church: exire a via iustitiae . . . a lege Dei; contradiction to the visible fellowship of the Church, even before the official church excommunication: per ipsum peccatum . . . quamvis intret (peccator)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the sinner still remains a member of the visible Church. However, the more this truth was understood undialectically, in the sense that the Christian's relationship to the Church had in no way changed by his sin, the more, insignificant excommunication appeared as a measure which was appropriate to every mortal sin. It was felt less and less that membership of the church community was the prerogative of the saint and that, for the sinner, it was a contradiction of his interior condition. Thus exclusion from the fellowship of the Church was considered less and less as an essential part of the penitential process, even though it is still present today in the exclusion from the Eucharist. Because of the way in which excommunication was understood and practised it was inevitable that it should come to be regarded as an additional means of punishment for specific mortal sins. This development originated only with Augustine's polemic against the Donatists and did not begin with Origen. It is necessary to understand this if we are to appreciate properly Origen's insistence on a 'binding', that is, excommunication for mortal sins.

2. The Church's Saving Action with Regard to the Sinner

Mortal sin, of its very nature, demands a clarification and an explanation of the relationship in which the sinner stands to the Church. His membership has, in fact, become ambiguous, and thus it is necessary [282] to make it clear that he no longer belongs to the Church 'in truth'. The sinner must, therefore, be excommunicated. Since, however, according to Origen, every consequence and punishment of sin must, in the final analysis, be salvific, even this death must issue in a new life of the spirit.[249] Excommunication is, therefore, the Church's first saving act with regard to the sinner.[250] Nevertheless, Origen does not appear to recognize a precise technical term for this excommunication.[251] Tradere in interitum carnis includes excommunication, since it concerns the actual paenitentes. Nevertheless, this is a general ecclesiam, eiectum esse et segregatum a consortio et unanimitate fidelium; separation by excommunication: abici per episcopi sententiam.

---

[249] In Lev.hom. 144 (GCS 29) 486,23-8; In Num.hom. 19,3 (GCS 30) 183,2-4.

[250] It is necessary to say a word here about J. Grotz's fundamentally different understanding of excommunication; cf. also the thorough discussion of his view in the essay contained in this volume: 'The Penitential Teaching of the Shepherd of Hermas'. According to Grotz, excommunication is first and foremost a disciplinary measure of the Church with regard to specific offences. To this extent, therefore, excommunication is purely and simply an accidental element of the Church's penitential procedure, which is effective within the communio (cf. pp. 280, 292). As a consequence of historical development, it became taken for granted that sacramental church penance, that is, the paenitentia secunda, in the case of mortal sin in the strict sense (which Grotz distinguishes from mortal sins in the wide sense by means of a juridical criterion) can be supplemented by the disciplinary element of excommunication (pp. 299-307). All this, however, amounts to an unjustifiable introduction of today's canonical understanding of excommunication into the penitential theology of the early Church. Above all, the assumption that the communio continues while exclusion from the Eucharist is imposed is incompatible with the ecclesiology of the Church Fathers. At the same time, Grotz grants that communio in the full sense contains the right to the Eucharist (p. 264) and that exclusion from the Eucharist is included in excommunication (p. 263).

This fundamental position gives rise to a separation between communio and pax cum Ecclesia. The ecclesiological aspect of reconciliation with the Church becomes a disciplinary action which is effective only in certain cases, while the supernatural effect of the forgiveness of sins is ascribed only to reconciliation with God. According to this view, the readmission into the Church, in so far as it is a purely canonical event, has no sacramental effect whatsoever. This assumption, however, is in open contradiction to the theology of the early Church which teaches the saving significance both of the church community and of membership of it. Cf. on this point S. Hübner, 'Kirchenbusse und Exkommunikation bei Cyprian' in: ZKTh 84 (1962), pp. 49-84, 171-215.

[251] In one passage the Latin tr. has: propter peccata . . . excommunicare; cf. In Matt. ser. 14 (GCS 38) 27,32.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concept, since it also includes the afflictio corporis.[252] Although κο&λασιφ and correptio are expressed. most poignantly in excommunication, they still signify any correction of a sinner, even when he is not excluded from the Church on account of a mortal sin.[253] Apart from the question of terminology, the fact of excommunication is expressed quite simply as an expulsion from the Church, and this in both the active and the passive sense. The result in either case is that the sinner is 'outside'.[254] The notion of ligare (δε/ειν) seems to be used by Origen almost in the technical sense as an expression for the excommunication of a sinner. The bishop's power of binding is exercised precisely in the act of excommunication and even in those cases where the exclusion can, in principle, be lifted and is intended for only a certain time. Thus binding and loosing are not, at least conceptually, contradictory or mutually exclusive notions but, even supposing the intention to bind really, two successive phases of one dynamic event.[255]

Excommunication is imposed by the bishop. The exclusion from the community is [252] Cf. Ad Rom.pracf. (PG 14)834. In our view, however, it is particularly important that the tradere in interitum carnis (in manus Zabuli, etc.), at least when this action does not take place only before God in secret, includes an a corpore Christi separari, a pelli de ecclesia by the priests: cf. In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 478,18-479,10; In Ezech.hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 357,30-2.

[253] Cf. In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 261-8; In Lev. hom. 3,2 (GCS 29) 302; In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 333,24-334,5; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1370 ff.

[254] For example, α)πελαυ/νειν του κοινου=: Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247,18; ε0κβα&λλειν: In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,16; In Jer. hom. 12,5 (GCS 6) 92,17; Ibid., 14,14 (GCS 6) 120,12 f.; ibid., 7,3 (GCS 6) 54,2; expellere de ecclesia: In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262, 20-6; In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 333,6; ibid., 21,1 (GCS 30) 429,1; abscindere a conventu ecclesiae: In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371; In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,4; de ecclesia pellere: In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 479,3 f.; foras mittere: In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 483,12; eicere, proicere: Ad Rom.praef. (PG 14) 834; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371 A; In Ezech.hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 357,30; a corpore Christi separare: In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 478,27; πο&ρρω ει]ναι τη=φ ε0κκλησι/αφ: In Joan. XXVIII 4 (GCS 10) 393,27; foris esse et segregatus a conventa fidelium: In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,25 f. abici a conventu bonorum et segregari a coetu castrisque sanctorum: In Lev.hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 408,18 f.

[255] Cf., for example, In Matt. tom. XIII 31 (GCS 40) 269,3-5; In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 478,23-479,1. Here we are not considering De or. In the passages mentioned, however, it is obvious that ligare is identical with excommunication. We have already shown that the interitus carnis included in excommunication is, at least in principle, not thought of as a permanent condition, but actually effects the forgiveness of sins. It can, in principle, end with readmission into the Church, as is explicitly stated: Ad Rom.praef. (PG 14) 834: the interitus carnis achieves for the incestuous person in Corinth a Ecclesiae membris associare, even though he was eiectus; Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 248,2-5: those who have been ejected are again allowed access to the Church; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371: Paulus eiectum reconiungit ecclesiae; In Ezech. hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 357,32-358,1; et in praesenti quidem potest quis egrediens de populo Dei rursum per paenitentiam reverti. It is clear from this general principle that the case of the incestuous person in Corinth is seen by Origen not as a single case of exclusively apostolic authority but as a typical example of general church practice. Thus the notion of binding does not exclude a subsequent reconciliation with the Church. On the other hand, the notion of 'loosing' does not, in itself, necessarily imply a previous 'binding' on the Church's part (excommunication). For Origen gives us to understand that, at least occasionally, even in the case of mortal sins which have been brought to the bishops' attention, the attempt was made ad gratiam iudicare, without excommunication, therefore, obviously not merely to tolerate the sin (according to Origen's own witness, this often happened: In Jos.hom. 7,6 [GCS 30] 332,22-6), but also to forgive it (In Lev.hom. 12,6 [GCS 29] 465,1-5). The same conclusion is apparent from In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262,10-263,12, where Origen discusses (if only to reject) the opinion of others that it is necessary for a person guilty of mortal sin only expelli de ecclesia if after his deed and despite exhortation he refuses to mend his ways; otherwise it is possible statim eum dicere lucrifactum (ibid. [GCS 40] 262,20 f.). At least the attempt, therefore, to 'loosen' was actually made, even if it is held by Origen to be ineffective in the case of mortal sins. Moreover, it is clear from In Matt.tom. XIII 31 (GCS 40) 269,11-18 that Origen himself recognizes the notion of a λυ/ειν of sin (by exhortation, correction, etc.) without its being preceded by an excommunication, although also only in the case of non-mortal sins. It remains clear, therefore, that 'binding' on the Church's part means excommunication, but not a definitive excommunication, at least not necessarily. 'Loosing' is a liberation from sin, but one which does not necessarily have to be preceded by an explicit binding on the Church's part.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

expressed per episcopi vocem,[256] per episcopi sententiam,[257] ab episcopo,[258] per sacerdotes,[259] per eos qui ecclesiae praesident et potestatem habent non solum solvendi sed et ligandi,[260] with reference to an apostolica auctoritas[261] of the episcopus arguens.[262] All these expressions reflect the actual practice in Origen's day. There is no doubt that the bishops at that time claimed this power for themselves not only in practice but also as their theoretically justified right. Origen himself explicitly attests this fact.[263] Indeed, given the actual position of the bishop in the Church at that time,[264] it is unthinkable that anyone else other than he could have exercised such a right of excluding people from the Church. Nevertheless, it is possible that Origen recognized, at least theoretically, in others than the bishops a power of binding and a right to excommunicate. [283] In any event, it is no argument against the bishops' exclusive right to 'bind' that good Christians 'avoid' those people who, through their influence, could corrupt them but who for some reason or other either cannot be excommunicated or have not in fact been excommunicated.[265] In behaving so, these Christians are merely following the exhortation of 2 Thessalonians 3:6. In any case, it is a private practice of individual Christians which does not alter the official position of a sinner with regard to the Church. It was obviously not at all infrequent that Christians did not want to have anything to do with others whom they considered, rightly or even wrongly, to be a 'scandal' for the Church and for the liturgical assembly in particular.[266] Origen approved of this behaviour of privately avoiding sinners. He held the view that where it was a question of lighter sins for which no actual excommunication was imposed but which were not renounced one could regard those Christians who committed such sins according to Matthew 18 privately as 'pagans and public sinners'.[267] This 'binding'[268] is obviously an expression of

[256] In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 483,8.
[257] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,23. The exclusion is a iudicium eorum qui praesunt ecclesiae: In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 483,9 f.
[258] In Lev.hom. 12,6 (GCS 29) 465,2.
[259] In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 479,3.
[260] Ibid., (GCS 30) 478,25.
[261] Ibid., (GCS 30) 478,21.
[262] In Ps. 37,1 (PG 12) 1371 B.
[263] Cf. In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 98,28-99,13: the bishops claim the power of binding and loosing by appealing to Matt. 16. Origen recognizes this claim (cf. ibid. [GCS 40] 99,7), even if only on certain conditions, to which we will return. De or. 28,8-10: the τινεφ (cf. [GCS 3] 381,12), whom Origen here reproaches for exceeding their powers, are described as successors of the apostles (ibid. [GCS 3] 381,l), who have received their Spirit (ibid. [GCS 3] 380,8), who lay claim to a ι9ερατικη∴ α)χι/α (ibid. [GCS 3] 381,12 f.). Since Origen also recognizes a certain kind of power of binding and loosing in other depositories of the Spirit, his polemic here against exceeding this power can, in reality, only apply to the bishops. In no way could it apply, in this context, to all Christians merely because they belong externally to the Church. The bishops' claim is attested in the present text. Moreover, in other places too, Origen, while recognizing the bishops' fundamental power, inveighs against its practical use; cf. A. von Harnack (TU 42,3), pp. 69 ff., 73 ff., (TU 42,4) 129 ff. Apart from the bishops, it is just possible to think of the confessors, as they appear in Tertullian and Cyprian with their claims. There is, however, no trace elsewhere in Origen of such claims on the part of the confessores. It is possible to conclude from In Ezech.hom. 4,8 (GCS 33) 368,31-369,3 that occasionally even Origen placed too much trust in the intercession of martyrs. This, however, has nothing to do with the claims of the martyrs themselves. With regard to the efficacy of the death of martyrs for the forgiveness of sins, cf. also: In Num.hom. 10,2 (GCS 30) 71,25-72,16. Accordingly, De or. must also concern bishops. This also implies that, for the justification of their power with regard to penance, they appealed not only to Matt. 16 but also to John 20. Cf. De or. 28 (GCS 3) 380,5-15.
[264] Cf. Harnack's detailed considerations in the passages mentioned in n.263.
[265] In In Jos.hom. 21,2 (GCS 30) 430,17-20 this state of affairs is clearly discernible.
[266] Cf. In Ezcch.hom. 1,11 (GCS 33) 335,15-18; In Ps. 37 hom. 2,4 (PG 12) l384 C; ibid., 2,1 (PG 12) 138l B. This practice on the part of 'good' Christians could also be an obstacle for those who wished to undertake public penance, since such a penitent would then be 'cut off'.
[267] This is certainly the meaning of In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 264,6-268,25. The emphasis is on the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the sinner's moral situation before God and in no way affects the bishop's exclusive right to bind in the strict sense. The meaning here is quite different from the official exclusion from the Church.

It does seem, however, that according to Origen all the τε/λειοι also have, along with Peter, the keys of the Kingdom of heaven, just as they all also have the power mentioned in John 20:22.[269] Thus omnis fidelis, who is Peter by virtue of his heavenly profession of faith and a way of life which corresponds to it, has the keys of the Kingdom of heaven not only in so far as he enters into the Kingdom of heaven through the door of his own virtues,[270] but also to the extent that his sentence of binding and loosing with regard to others is the judgement of God 'invested' in him. Obviously this applies only when such a sentence emanates from one who is truly a Peter, a τε/λειοφ.[271] But precisely how are these views of Origen to be understood? Later we will consider more closely his idea of the 'binding' on the part of a perfect spiritual person; this need not concern us at the moment. Where it is a question of a 'binding', it would appear that Origen is not thinking only of the hierarchy. We will examine the actual reason for this later when we consider the question of the 'loosing'. What needs to be said here, however, is that basically, according to Origen's fundamental conception, every external [284] hierarchy, together with its activity, must have corresponding to it necessarily an internal hierarchy within the Church, together with its activity. Nevertheless, Origen is unable to describe this 'binding' concretely. His view on this point remains abstract, unclear and general. If ever he wishes to provide a concrete content for, or a meaningful example of, this idea of the possibility of 'binding' on the part of an authentic Peter or, vice versa, the impossibility to do this on the part of those who are not Peter, then he refers to the episcopal power of binding.[272] This shows that in fact in the Church of Origen's day there was no other 'binding' than that which was performed by the bishop. And this is why he could not evoke a concrete example of another kind. But the question needs to be asked: what is the nature of a binding on the part of a spiritual person who is not a bishop? Certainly, within a community led by bishops, there can be no question of a recognized and official excommunication existing alongside that of the bishop, let alone contrary to his will.[273] At the same time, a purely internal binding would be meaningless, since Origen himself never tires of stressing that the sinner is bound before God merely by his deed.[274] It would be possible, however, for exhortation: you – if not the official Church – can treat the sinner as a pagan and public sinner (ibid. [GCS 40] 268,15); thus the nos (ibid. (GCS 40) 260,20) refers not to the official Church but to those who have in fact exhorted the sinner in vain. Poschmann (p. 443) misunderstands the meaning when he sees even in this case an official excommunication about which there is only a doubt whether it is also valid in God's eyes. This practice of private avoidance seems to be recommended also in the Epistola Clementis ad Jacobum n.18 (PG 2) 53 B, when a bishop is unable, for whatever reasons, to perform an excommunication officially, even though he would clearly wish to do so.

---

[268] This is what In Matt.tom. XIII 31 (GCS 40) 269,3-270,6 calls the attitude of individual Christians towards an unrepentant fellow-Christian who is not excommunicated.

[269] In Matt.tom. XII 10 f. (GCS 40) 84-8. The quotation from John 20 figures ibid. (GCS 40) 87,16-22.

[270] In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 96,5-97,9.

[271] In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 98,5-100,26.

[272] In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 98,28-100,26.

[273] This was already excluded by the clearly episcopal structure of the Church at that time. Moreover, Origen himself complains that there are people in the Church who ought to be excommunicated and in whose regard the bishops are neglecting their duty (In Jos.hom. 7,6 [GCS 30] 332,21-333,3). This reproach makes sense, however, only if the bishops are in fact the only persons who have the power to excommunicate. Origen also says explicitly that episcopi, presbyteri and diaconi are those qui iudicant eos, qui intus sunt, and that the judgement of souls has been entrusted to the Ecclesiarum iudicibas: Ad Rom. II 2 (PG 14) 873; In Jud.hom. 3,3 (GCS 30) 484,2-4.

[274] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,22-6; In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,16 f.; In Lev.hom. 12,6 (GCS 29) 465,1-4; ibid., 14,3 (GCS 29) 483,6-8; In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 479,6-10.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a spiritual and charismatic person to 'bind' meaningfully in the sense that, either privately or publicly, he exhorts, warns and rebukes sinners and thus makes them aware of their unconfessed sinful condition. This role of the spiritual person in the Church, which could be even more effective when related to the avoidance of sinners on the part of strict Christians which we have already seen, is perfectly feasible. It would have been very important and, in fact, would have been no different from that played by all the great 'preachers of penance' throughout the history of the Church. It is indeed a role which is indispensable to the constant need of spiritual renewal within the Church, which must always begin with the acknowledgement that it is 'bound' by sin. From the dogmatic point of view such a role is thoroughly compatible with the bishop's exclusive right to the official 'binding'. Thus it can be styled a 'binding' only by analogy.

But all this does not answer fully the questions concerning the authority which is at the origin of excommunication. Does Origen demand as part of the episcopal authority which imposes an excommunication that the bishop himself be a spiritual person? In other words: if a bishop were a sinner would he so lose his power that his [285] excommunication would be invalid? Is Origen in this sense to be understood as a forerunner of Donatism?

In the general introduction to this study the point has already been made that Origen's general orientation in ecclesiology is not Donatist.[275] But is this still the case with regard to this particular question? What we are doing here is to confine the question of the requirements for the validity of the penitential measures taken by a bishop to the validity of 'binding'. For its part, the 'loosing' of sin and of the sinner is not only the counterpart to 'binding' but includes more than the mere lifting of excommunication. Thus in the case of loosing the situation and the circumstances can be quite different from those in the case of the binding. In the first place, we need to note that Origen recognizes an excommunication which he holds as invalid and illegitimate.[276] We must, however, look more closely at what he means by this. For Origen an excommunication is above all 'invalid' when it does not express clearly and effectively the actual exclusion from the Church which has occurred through sin. But this does not mean that it is not present visibly within the Church, at least as a fact, albeit juridically invalid. Nor does it mean that it should be considered non-existent. This is why, in the case of an unjust excommunication or, for example, deposition from the clerical state, Origen's advice is very simple: bear it patiently.[277] Even when a bishop acts unjustly his external authority is not to be ignored. Even in the case of an invalid sentence, this authority must be respected with patience. In this respect, therefore, according to Origen the bishop's authority with regard to excommunication is not dependent upon the moral rectitude of his behaviour and judgement. It follows that it depends even less upon his personal holiness. Nevertheless, an unjust excommunication can do no harm to the person excommunicated in

[275] Cf. the details above in the introduction to part III: 'Church Penance'.

[276] In Lev.hom. 14,3 (GCS 29) 483,8-14: if the bishop's iudicium is not rectum, because there is no mortal sin, then theme arises a situation which is not distinctly and clearly specified by Origen: the person judged is in some way draussen (depellitur et foras mittitur). This is, however, only 'appearance' (videtur expulsus), and he is in fact still inside the Church (intus est). These two simultaneous statements can be justified only by saying that the actual exclusion from the community (the liturgy, the Eucharist), which, given the circumstances at that time, could not in practice be lifted from the person judged unjustly (except in the case of schism, etc.), since it was simply the material effect of excommunication, is only an appearance, in so far as this fact is not really the expression of the man's inner separation from the Church's community of grace. Obviously the texts of Origen do not allow us to answer the question whether this is a matter merely of a simple fact or of a fact juridically valid in fono externo.

[277] In Ezech.hom. 10,1 (GCS 33) 417,12-418,10. It is worth noting the sive digne, sive indigne (ibid. [GCS 33] 417,21) as well as the boni (ibid. [GCS 33] 418,3). If the details concentrate more on the deposition of the cleric than on the excommunication, the latter is always included, since it is explicitly mentioned at the beginning of the passage (a populo Dei separari: ibid.[GCS 33] 417,13 f.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the internal sphere of grace and salvation. But this is self-evident.

What we have just seen, however, seems to be contradicted by Origen's teaching that only the holy are able to 'bind', and this only with a just judgement.[278] In order to resolve the apparent conflict between this view and the previous result of our study we need to examine the Sitz im Leben of Origen and his theology. It is obvious that the view which smacks of Donatism has a double origin in his theology. First, Origen wishes to preclude the view that unjust excommunications have a salvific value in God's eyes. His own bitter [286] personal experience is in evidence here. Thus the fact that the bishop must be a τε/λειοφ can be understood as a defence against an unjust excommunication. For it is obvious that Origen did not wish to hold that practically all excommunications, even those of people who were really sinners, were null before God simply because the bishops concerned were not τε/λειοι.[279] Indeed, the picture which Origen paints of the moral condition of the episcopate of his day hardly gives the impression that he considered the majority of bishops at that time to be perfect spiritual people or even good Christians. Thus the conditions which he lays down for a valid excommunication sound more Donatist than they were intended; they are in fact directed against the religious significance of unjust excommunications.

Second, Origen considers the conditions for binding always in connection with the conditions for 'loosing' and the remission of sin. Given his comprehensive notion of 'loosing', he was able to lay down such conditions without their having to be understood in a Donatist sense. The rigorous application of the same conditions to the binding, however, would lead to false conclusions. In fact Origen was much more concerned with the question of correct loosing than with that of binding.[280] If he strays from the text which he wishes to interpret he considers binding and loosing somewhat unguardedly, carelessly and imprecisely in the same category. It is only if this phenomenon is forced that Origen is made to contradict what we have seen to be his notion of unjust excommunication, as well as to maintain a false opposition to the anti-Donatism which he otherwise holds. When it is seen in its true light, therefore, Origen's view of excommunication is that it is declared by the bishop in so far as he is an official and not because he is a spiritual person.

3. Excommunication

A) THE OBJECT OF EXCOMMUNICATION

All mortal sins, whether they are publicly known or secret, are subject to excommunication. This basic principle is of the greatest importance for a correct understanding of the institution of penance in Origen. That is why we must consider it in more detail at this point. In the first place, it is obvious that without any doubt the (three) [287] capital sins considered 'irremediably' to lead to death have to be bound. For these even the attempt at a remission through 'prayer' without binding is forbidden and ineffective.[281] Apart from these, 'mortal [278] In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 98,5-100,26; cf. De or. 28,8 (GCS 3) 380,7-15.

[279] He also stresses that the holy Christian must be subject to, and obey, the less holy bishop, just as Jesus behaved towards his step-father Joseph: In Luc. hom. 20 (GCS 35) 133,17-134,6. It is clear here that, according to Origen, the inner hierarchy of the Church, based on holiness, does not have to be transferred purely and simply also into the Church's external hierarchy.

[280] Cf., on this point, De or. 28 (GCS 3) 375-81.

[281] De or. 28,10 (GCS 3) 381,12-16: here the following are explicitly named as mortal sins which have to be bound and retained: ει0δωλολατρει/α, μοιξει/α, ποινει/α. Cf. De or. 28,9 (GCS 3) 380,28 which names ε9κου/σιοφ φο&νοφ as belonging to the same group. This is not a question of a narrow triad of such sins, since with murder and adultery is also compared α!λλο ξαλεπω&τερον (ibid., 380 f.). Adultery and fornication arc, of their very nature, not always 'public' and remain mostly unknown. Thus these three capital sins should not simply be identified with public sins.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sins' are mentioned as the obligatory object of excommunication. This applies – although with some reservation – even before the sinner, after repeated exhortation, has shown that he is clearly unrepentant.[282] Beyond what we have already seen Origen provides only a little information about the individual sins which are submitted to excommunication. Explicitly named in connection with excommunication are α)σε/λγεια,[283] incesti scelus,[284] impurity and blasphemy,[285] but also heresy and offences against the disciplina ecclesiastica and the Evangelii regula.[286] Otherwise, sins deserving excommunication are hinted at only very vaguely.[287] In general all mortal sins have to be bound, while the mortal sins in question are to be understood in the sense which we have already outlined. What is important, however, is the special stress which Origen puts on the fact that even secret sins have, in principle, to be submitted to excommunication, although it is also obvious to him that many of these sins escape episcopal excommunication since they are not self-evident. The 'sin against God' after baptism (in fide) must not, however, be kept secret but is to be made known to 'all' in order that it may be remitted by the interventus and the correptio of all.[288] If a person should 'remember' later that he has burdened himself with serious guilt, then he must 'of his own accord' undertake the interitus carnis (spontaneum carnis interitum suscipiat).[289] If public penance is described as an occasion when the sinner non erubescit sacerdoti Domini indicare peccatum,[290] this presupposes that, on other occasions, the priest has no knowledge of the [282] In Matt. tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262,10-263,6. He presents as examples of those guilty of mortal sin: masculorum concubitor (certainly usually secret), adulter, homicida, mollis. The reservation (cum qui taliter sentit, non arbitror ad utilitatem communem ista sentire) concerns the negative reply to the question whether a person should be 'ejected' only after repeated warning. At the same time, if it is said in this context that excommunication ought not to be actually imposed for light sins, such as often occur even among good Christians (ibid., 264,20-9), even after a warning and a relapse (ibid., 265,4-10; 266,14-21; 268,13-25), this concerns sins which are clearly light ones. In Origen's view, this does obviously not exclude the possibility of sins which are serious both subjectively and objectively precisely because the sinner has not repented after repeated warning and so must be excommunicated. In his opinion, there can also be sins which demand excommunication only after a private and public warning: In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,3-7. The text In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,20-2: postmodum cum confutatus fuerit pro peccato, exit etiam de coetu et congregatione sanctorum, on the other hand, obviously concerns the case where a secret sin, or at least one which was at first unknown to the bishop, was committed, but which has already caused an interior separation from the Church (cf. ibid., 479,19 f.), so that the exclusion on the part of the Church has to take place as soon as the fact is known by the bishop – be this by the confession of the sinner himself or in any other way. For this case, cf. also In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 479,2-6.

[283] Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247,23.

[284] Ad Rom.praef. (PG 14) 834.

[285] In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,10. 14.

[286] In Jos.hom. 7,6 f. (GCS 30) 334,13 f.; 335,9-13; In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 480,8-11.

[287] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1370: gravissime delinquere; In Ezech. hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 357,31: digna abiectione, etc.

[288] In Lev.hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 408,3-8. The omnibus publicentur need not, in itself, mean any more than the fact that the penitent is undertaking public penance by which he becomes known as having committed a mortal sin. It does not say that he makes a detailed confession of the way in which he has precisely become guilty.

[289] In Lev.hom. 14,4 (GCS 29) 486,28-492,3. It is really a question of public penance: quae solet a poenitentibus expendi (ibid., 486,27) with reference to the person guilty of incest in Corinth (ibid., 486,20-3). On the other hand, it is not certain that In Lev.hom. 3,4 (GCS 29) 308 concerns anything more than the confession of sins before God, by which the devil's role as accuser at the judgement is anticipated. Similarly, this is all that is involved in In Ps. 36 hom. 1,5 (PG 12) 1328. Although the tradere carnem in interitum (In Lev.hom. 3,4 [GCS 29] 308,15) is mentioned, it is difficult to think that Origen would consider sins in sermone solo vel etiam intra cogitationem secreta as the object of public penance. Cf., for example, in Lev.hom. 12,6 (GCS 29) 465,7-9, where sins of thought are distinguished as a 'blemish' from sins of deed which make a man exteriorly or interiorly an abiectus. It ought not to be overlooked that the interitus carnis also includes works of penance. Thus it can mean only these, even if they are not done precisely within the official, public penance of the Church.

[290] In Lev.hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 296,19-21.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

guilt in question. Thus public penance did not exist merely for generally known scandals but also for secret sins. In any case, the exhortation to seek the advice of an experienced doctor of souls in order to discern whether a secret sin is a languor, qui in conventu totius ecclesiae exponi debeat et curari shows that secret sins were not as a matter of course and without consideration exempt from obligatory public penance. It was a question of deciding in each individual case whether the guilt was so great that a public penance was absolutely necessary, that is, whether it really was a mortal sin.[291] Origen expresses the same exhortation to confess secret sins publicly, despite the fear of humiliation and being despised by others, in another passage of the [288] same homily.[292] Origen's basic ideas also lead to the same conclusion. For if, on the one hand, even secret sin separates a man interiorly from the Church[293] and if, on the other hand, it is only the practical impossibility that hinders the community of the Church from imposing of its own accord, as in the case of peccata manifesta, excommunication,[294] then this view presupposes that an interior 'excommunication' which exists in God's eyes should be expressed in exclusion from the Church. Whenever a sinner earnestly wishes to expiate his own fault this excommunication which he introduces, himself and which is, in this sense, the sponataneus interitus carnis, must be his first step towards penance.

In the case of the levis culpa, however, there is no question of an excommunication.[295] And in those cases where it is not a matter of the spontaneous confession of serious guilt but of an intervention on the Church's part against sins, allowance is made for moderation and leniency [291] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6 (PG 12) 1386. This interpretation of the passage appears to me to be the only one possible. Cf., on this point, B. Poschmann, p. 449 ff. The question to be decided by the physician of souls is whether the sin has to be expiated publicly. This text does not say that the all-important and decisive viewpoint for making this decision is the eventual edification of the community. In fact A. Vanbeck, 'La pénitence dans Origène' in: RHLR, NF 3 (1912), pp. 544-57; 4 (1913), pp. 115-29; ibid., p. 557, would like to derive from this text the idea that only offences causing scandal require a public penance. On this point it must be said, however, that it is here precisely a question of secret offences which, as such, cannot give rise to scandal. Nevertheless, it is perfectly possible that they must be subjected to public penance. Also, it seems to me that nothing more is demanded of public confession than that which is inevitably involved in public penance. Given the small number of sins which were subject to public penance and which was even smaller in practice than in Origen's theory, penance also required a relatively precise public confession, even if an individual confession was not made before all the faithful. Obviously this may have happened sometimes out of penitential fervour. On the other hand, the previous confession before the physician of souls had necessarily to be detailed, because it had to be decided whether there was present an actual mortal sin to be submitted to public penance. Apart from this decision, however, the examination of conscience, which Origen recommends in any case in the same context, requires a more precise expression. To conclude to the necessity of a detailed confession of sins before the community either by the sinner himself or by the bishop in the process of correcting the sinner, by reason of the difference between the expressions languorem exponere (= before the community) and causam languoris exponere (= before the physician of souls) appears to force the words unduly. And would the confession of secret sins be as 'edifying' as it is supposed to be? A detailed correptio in the case of a public scandal can have such an effect along with reconciliation. It is very doubtful, however, whether it would have this effect in the case of a painful revelation of secret sins.

[292] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,1 (PG 12) 1380 f. The text makes sense only on the supposition that without such a confession the sin cannot be healed. For, if this were not the case, why should the sinner take upon himself the social disgrace, described in such vivid colours, in order to undertake the exhomologesis (the word occurs here twice) for his secret sins (crimina nullo . . . arguente)?

[293] Cf. above under n.244.

[294] In Jos.hom. 21,1 (GCS 30) 428,15-429,14. It is always supposed that the Church must always be actually free from sinful 'Jebusites' and that everything must be done at least to come near to this state: eos saltem eiciamus, quos possumus. Origen could not speak in this way if it were accepted as a matter of principle that secret mortal sins are in no way considered the object of excommunication. The same supposition lies behind In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 256,17-29. If it is explained that even the secret sinner is actually separated from the Church, and at the same time it is said that the person cast out of 'Jerusalem' is able to return there only if he does penance outside for a considerable period of time, then this obviously applies to secret sins as well.

[295] In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,4 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the sentence passed. In these cases excommunication should be applied sparsam.[296]

B) EXCOMMUNICATION IN PRACTICE

The bishops exercise a kind of supervision over the Christian life of their communities. They are strictly obliged to ensure, without any respect for persons, that the ecclesiastica disciplina et Evangelii regula are correctly observed. They are the guardians of the community, who must follow the example of the Lord and, as the 'eye' of Christ's body, are responsible for the whole Church.[297] This supervision enables the bishop to know the religious and the moral life of every Christian in the community, although he is undoubtedly supported in this matter by the other members of the community.[298] They not only have to admonish the sinner privately but they are also obliged to report him to the Church if he is not showing any sign of improvement. For the same reason they ought not to refuse to appear before the bishop as trustworthy witnesses against a person who is accused of a fault.[299] It is obvious that such a supervision of the way of life of every individual Christian was a difficult task for all those concerned: the bishop, the clergy and the faithful. Thus the clergy were not infrequently afraid of being slandered by the accused. This applied even to bishops, few of whom were saints. The temptation was to appear not strict but lenient. Thus there was [289] a continual risk of turning a blind eye even to offences which were clearly subject to excommunication.[300] Indeed, some sins were explicitly declared to be curable without excommunication,[301] if it were anticipated that there would be a violent opposition from those concerned, who were unwilling either to be corrected or to be deprived of their rights as members of the Church. Given the defamatory nature of excommunication, all this is understandable.[302] If, however, a bishop is conscientious he must take the necessary measures, once it becomes known that a member of his community is guilty of a serious fault. He may become aware of this fault by his own observation, by information from a third party[303] or even by the spontaneous confession of the sinner himself.[304] In these circumstances, the following should happen, at least according to Origen's theory: if it is a question of definite and indisputable mortal sins, such as unnatural impurity, adultery and murder, the sentence of excommunication should be declared clearly and decisively.[305] If the [296] In Matt.tom. XVI 8 (GCS 40) 496,21-9.

[297] In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 332,21-334,20.
[298] In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 333,12 f. The 'morals police' which had to supervise the catechumens (cf. Contra Celsum III 51 [GCS 2] 247, 13 f.) remain effective in some form or other even after the catechumenate (cf. ibid., 247,15-16).
[299] In Lev hom. 3,2 (GCS 29) 302,15-30; In Jos.hom. 21,1 (GCS 30) 429,6-8.
[300] In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 332,22-333,7.
[301] De or. 28,10 (GCS 3) 381,12-18; In Lev.hom. 12,6 (GCS 29) 465,3: ad gratiam iudicare.
[302] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1370 f.; In Ezech.hom. 10,1 (GCS 33) 417,13-20; In Jer.hom. 14,1 (GCS 6) 120.
[303] In this case the correctness of this information must be established by a regular procedure. Ad Rom. II 10 (PG 14) 894A.
[304] Cf., on this point, the considerations in n.291.
[305] In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 263,4. Given the reserve with which Origen presents this principle in theory, it is questionable whether this always happened in practice, especially in the case of adultery, which the bishop could know about only by the sinner's personal confession. Because it was practically impossible to apply the theory, it became customary in this case ad gratiam iudicare. This also provided the justification for that practice which, because it was applied too widely and was perhaps even based on a false premiss, is attacked by Origen in De or. 28. In In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 332,21-334,20 also it seems to be supposed that the fornicans too (ibid., 333,11) in certain circumstances is excommunicated only if he persists after having been warned and reprimanded (ibid., 333,3-7). It should not be forgotten that to determine precisely what is serious sin both objectively and subjectively was, and is, not an easy business. Given the severity of the penitential procedure at that time, the church authorities were forced unwillingly in practice to impose excommunication only where it was also the thorough conviction of the community which participated in this procedure that it was clearly a position is not so clear, as is often the case with a spontaneous confession to a doctor of souls, then the director of conscience has to decide whether a penance of excommunication is required.[306] If the sin was made known to the church authorities in any other way, then the sinner should be corrected by the bishop privately, with the possible cooperation of witnesses, or even publicly before the whole community. This official and possibly even public correction could take place quite independently of an excommunication. In fact it (correptio, confutatio) occurred more often than excommunication.[307]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If this correction is ineffective and if the sinner perseveres in his fault which is certainly not a levis culpa, then he must be excommunicated.[308] Obviously the excommunication was performed before the whole community with a certain official and liturgical solemnity.[309] Thus its defamatory character was obvious.[310] Of its very nature this ceremony would include a repeated correptio and if, at this moment, the sinner were repentant he would confess his guilt.[311] At least as far as previously secret sins are concerned, it is very possible that this public confession was not very detailed.[312] The admission that one was guilty of mortal sin was already in itself a publicare delictum which was defamatory. Moreover, in fact and in practice there was very little difference between an actual individual [290] public confession of sins and excommunication in the presence[313] of the penitent, who accepted this exclusion from the community. Certainly people were not reflectively aware of this difference, as theoretically important as it may appear to us today. When the guilt was already known publicly before the sinner's confession, the bishop had no need to exercise any reserve in his correptio. Origen suggests that such a public confession often found an echo of deep pharisaism in the community of 'good Christians'.[314]

The whole event took place with the active participation of the bishop, who used his question of mortal sins. This is possibly what gave rise to the consuetudo in this question that, in practice, only those were excommunicated qui manifesti sunt in magnis delictis (cf. in Matt.ser. 89 [GCS 38] 204,31), qui manifeste et evidenter criminosi sunt (cf. In Jos.hom. 21,1 [GCS 30] 428,21-429,1). In making this assessment of the practice, we should not overlook the fact that there was also at that time the clear theoretical awareness that there could also be secret sins which kill the sinner and render him excommunicated in God's eyes, and that he had to undertake penance of excommunication of his own initiative.

---

[306] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6 (PG 12) 1386.

[307] In Matt.tom. XVI 8 (GCS 40) 496,13-17.22 ff.; In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334;3-5; In Lev.hom. 3,2 (GCS 29) 302,18-25; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371 f. In this passage priests and deacons are explicitly presented along with the bishops as 'those who correct'.

[308] In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,2-7.

[309] Cf. In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,14 f.: in uno consensu ecclesia universa conspirans; interventus et correptio omnium (In Lev. hom. 8,10 [GCS 29] 408,7) doubtless refers to the same activity, since interventus et correptio are thought of as following the public confession of guilt.

[310] In Ezech.hom. 10,1 (GCS 33) 417,13 f.

[311] In Lev.hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 408,6 f.: 'sins against God' omnibus publicentur; In Ps. 37 hom. 2,1 (PG 12) 1381 f.: procedat in medium et ipse sui accusator existat . . . ego ipse mei accusator efficior . . . ipse me arguo, ipse me confuto (says the sinner); ibid., 2,6 (PG 12) 1386: languorem in conventu totius ecclesiae exponere. Cf. also Selecta in Ps. 56,10 (PG 12) 1472; in Jer. hom. 20,8 (GCS 6) 189,19-23. These instructions should be understood as realistically as possible. The confession really takes place before the assembled community: coram hominibus and with the iracundia episcopi arguentis In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371.

[312] Ad Rom. VI 9 (PG 14) 1090 refers to Daniel's exhomologesis in ieiuniis et cilicio et cinere and thus to his general confession of sins (Dan. 9:5 f.). It is explicitly noted, however, that in the Bible no sins are ascribed to Daniel, because he is a saint, differently from the case of David. Origen is able, therefore, to envisage a penitential exhomologesis which does not involve a precise, detailed confession. Besides the exhomologesis before God or men (cf. In Ps. 36 hom. 1,5 [PG 12] l328B; In Ps. 37 hom. 2,1 [PG 12] l38lC) Origen seems to know of a still broader notion of exhomologesis: cf. Selecta in Ps. 135,2 (PG 12) 1653-6.

[313] Unrepentant sinners, who had become known as such through those who supervised the morals of the community, were indeed excommunicated, even though they had totally withdrawn themselves from the public act of excommunication and the life of the Church.

[314] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,1 (PG 12) 1381: exprobrant . . . confitentem et notant vel irrident.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

discretion to impose the excommunication whenever it appeared to him to be appropriate. From the very nature of the case it is obvious that, at least where it was a question of previously secret sins, this act on the bishop's part had to be preceded by a private avowal and confession by the sinner before the bishop. This provided him with the reason for his decision and its execution. We need not concern ourselves here with the question of whether the doctor of souls who, in the case of secret sins, was to be consulted, had always to be, in Origen's theory, a bishop or a priest. In any case, what is confided to him in private confession has also to be brought before the bishop in the form of a personal avowal, at least in the sense that, where a public penance is necessary, it is essential that confession is also made to the bishop.[315]

There are only a few obscure indications in Origen concerning the excommunicated penitent's external condition. As far as those who are truly repentant are concerned, the exclusion would be lifted after some time and the intervening period represented a kind of second catechumenate.[316] Since it had to be a period of hard personal penance,[317] the connection of the penitent with the bishop during it could not be severed entirely. Obviously the penitents had to provide proof of their conversion.[318] At the same time, it does appear that they were excluded from the liturgy itself and not only from the Eucharist. For expressions such as exire de coetu et congregatione Ecclesiae,[319] a conventu Ecclesiae abscindi,[320] which make a distinction between the Church itself and the meetings of the Church, should be understood as literally as possible. Thus those who are excommunicated are not only juridically ostracized from the fellowship of the Church and from the Eucharist but they are also forbidden to take part in any way in the liturgy of the community. Ciciuntur ab oratione communi.[321] Nothing more is said, however, about how [291] the penitents were supervised or how the exclusion from the liturgy was carried out in practice. Nor is it said that this [315] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6 (PG 12) 1386. Similarly In Luc.hom. 17 (GCS 35) 119,1-8. That the physician of souls to be asked first is always the bishop seems to be excluded by the fact that, if this were the case, then the choice recommended by Origen would be impossible. If, however, the non-episcopal (priestly or non-priestly) physician of souls were to decide that the penance of excommunication was necessary, then this would have to be made in dependence upon the bishop. This would make a private confession before the bishop inevitable. This is what is meant by the statement: non erubescit sacerdoti Domini indicare peccatum (In Lev.hom. 2,4 [GCS 29] 296,20). This is a necessary part of public penance. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that non-priestly, experienced physicians of souls were just as rare in those days as they are nowadays. Thus in the vast majority of cases the confession of sins which Origen recommends to be made before fellow-Christians qui possunt mederi vulneribus nostris atque peccatis (In Luc.hom. 17 (GCS) 119,3-5) was made before priests, even though in theory it could be made before others, provided it was not a matter of the immediate undertaking of the penance of excommunication. B. Poschmann, p. 449 n.3, is correct when he sees in the private consultation of the bishop with a view to making this confession a reason why Origen considers this practice to be the fulfilment of Jas. 5:14.

[316] Cf. Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247,1-248,5.

[317] Cf. the texts referred to above in nn.170-96.

[318] Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247,1-248,5.

[319] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,20-2.

[320] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371.

[321] In Matt.ser. 89 (GCS 38) 204,31 f. This happens propter honorem orationis (ibid., 205,8 f.). This exclusion obviously does not necessarily mean that penitents should not attend the liturgy at all. Cf. Origen's remark in In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371. It can quite simply mean that the penitents were present in a special place outside the rest of the assembled community. At this time there were already churches built according to such rules; cf. In Jos.hom. 2,1 (GCS 30) 296,20. This custom would, therefore, correspond to the later προ&σκλαυσιφ, as it is discernible, for instance, in Gregory the Wonderworker. In the texts quoted, however, the emphasis could lie simply on the oratio, so that all that is being said is that the penitent ought to take part in the service of reading and the preaching of God's word but not in the service of prayer. This distinction is found later in the Eastern penitential practice. Origen also certainly is acquainted with this order of the liturgy: cf. Fragm. In 1 Cor. (J. A. Cramer, Catenae Graecorum Patrum, V, p. 69).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exclusion was really complete.[322]

C) THE THEOLOGICAL MEANING OF EXCOMMUNICATION

According to Origen the separation of a sinner from the Church is not an additional church punishment which the bishop imposes arbitrarily in the case of serious public scandals. Rather, he holds that it flows always and necessarily from the very nature of mortal sin itself. It expresses what mortal sin always brings about and what has already happened in God's eyes: the inner separation from the fellowship of the Church. This means that external participation in the life of the Church has become hypocrisy and must be purified.[323] A Church which did not do this would be corrupt and would itself incur hell together with the sinful and dead member.[324]

We must look more closely, however, at the meaning of this separation from the Church. It is only in this way that we will be able to grasp clearly the salvific meaning of the official lifting of excommunication which we will examine later. Thus the topic which we are now considering has a special importance. By excommunication the sinner is cut off from the community of believers,[325] separated from the body of Christ,[326] alienated from his homeland, that is, the Church,[327] and from the people of God,[328] his city which is built of living stones.[329] This separation from church fellowship means, in particular, exclusion from the Eucharist.[330] This gives rise to the situation which we have already described. The sinner finds himself under the dominating power of the devil[331] and is at the same time subject to God's anger[332] which is no longer mediated by created punitive powers, such as the Church, angels or the law. A close examination of this separation which occurs in excommunication shows clearly that the Church is not seen here merely as an external organization but as a fellowship which is necessary for salvation. Obviously excommunication is an external act of the hierarchical Church, having all the evident consequences of exclusion from the liturgy. Nevertheless, the more important effect of this exclusion from the fellowship which is a source of grace is the loss, at least temporary, of salvation. For the separation from the homeland, from the body of Christ, from the heavenly Jerusalem and, quite simply, from the community means being handed over to darkness and the [292] divine anger. 'How can I achieve complete happiness . . . how can I return to the Church?'[333] Both of these questions have the same meaning for the excommunicated penitent. If Origen stresses the necessity of the Church for salvation, and indeed precisely in the context of the exclusion from it of the one who previously [322] To have a clearer idea of the supervision of the morals of the community, it would be useful to consult the Didascalia Apostolorum – a work which is close both in time and in place of origin to Origen. On its penitential teaching, cf. the essay 'Penitential Teaching and Practice According to the Didascalia Apostolorum' in this volume.

---

[323] For further details, cf. above n.248.
[324] Cf. In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS) 334,16-18: . . . quam mecum ire in gehennam. If exclusion from the Eucharist is considered to be iuris divini, then even for today's dogmatic theology every mortal sin still involves an inner separation from the fellowship of the Church's grace, which manifests itself in the sacramental-visible dimension (and is, therefore, a kind of excommunicatio latae sententiae).
[325] In Lev.hom. 14,2 (GCS 29) 479,20-2.
[326] In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 475,25.
[327] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,6 (PG 12) 1380.
[328] In Ezech.hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 365,30; ibid., 10,1 (GCS 33) 417,13.
[329] In Jer.fmagm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,8 f.
[330] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6 (PG 12) l386D-1387; In Joan. XXVIII 4 (GCS 10) 393,25-30.
[331] In Jud.hom. 2,5 (GCS 30) 479,2; In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,9-14.
[332] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1372.
[333] In Ps. 36 hom. 4,2 (PG 12) 1353.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

belonged to it,[334] then the Church which he has in mind is the actual Church which, in his view, is always, at one and the same time, an inner fellowship of grace and an externally, hierarchically organized Church.[335] The internal detrimental effect which excommunication has on salvation, that is, on the relationship between man and God, is in no way diminished by the fact that Origen ascribes this effect already to mortal sin itself, even when there is no official church excommunication present.[336] Both views are correct and the one ought not to be disputed in favour of the other. Origen does not attempt to explain how they are to be reconciled logically. The question is: if a man is already, by reason of his sin, 'outside', that is, outside the inner fellowship of grace, what interior effect in God's eyes can the explicit excommunication still have upon him? But this is to pose, with regard to the particular case of excommunication, the central question of sacramental theology. How can a sacrament have the same effect which is also achieved by the personal act of man himself? In Origen's sacramental theology, and indeed still later in the Church, this question was not experienced as a dilemma[337] which was to be resolved one-sidedly, either in favour of the sacramental sign or in favour of the personal action. However, this does not give us the right simply to evade the question, even with regard to excommunication. Excommunication is 'only' the expression for man's act and, as the τυ/ποφ of this act, it brings about what the sinner has done. He has fallen away officially from God's grace, and this is expressed by excommunication. A closer consideration of Origen's teaching of the Church as the community which opposes sin at all its levels,[338] and of the Eucharist which establishes a living contact with the flesh of the Logos and in which God and man are united,[339] would show even more clearly the significance of excommunication as the separation from this community and from the body of Christ.

The further questions concerning excommunication, such as the lifting of it, its consequences, etc., will be answered in what follows, when we consider the further action of the Church which is aimed at the remission of sin.

[293]

4. Reconciliation by the Whole Church

A) THE DIFFERENT FUNCTIONS WITHIN THE CHURCH COMMUNITY

Scholars are still divided in their interpretation of the texts in Origen's work which are concerned with the question of the positive role of the Church in the remission of mortal sins committed after baptism. At first sight it appears that Origen teaches that the Church has a role in the remission of sins which is the prerogative of the holy bishop in so far as he is spiritual, or even of the lay person, provided that he, too, is spiritual, that is, 'perfect'. It [334] In Jos. hom. 3,5 (GCS 30) 307,8-10: nemo ergo sibi persuadeat, nemo semetipsum decipiat: extra hanc domum, id est extra ecclesiam nemo salvatur; si quis foras exierit, mortis suae ipse fit reus. Cf. In Jer.hom. 5,16 (GCS 6) 45,30-46,2.

[335] Cf., for example, the ideas mentioned above in nn.l16 and 248.

[336] Cf. above under nn. 248 and 250.

[337] Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, pp. 552 n.l; 49-51; 53-62. The 'exception' which is here made with respect to penance in Origen's general sacramental teaching does not exist in reality. For further details, cf. below.

[338] Cf., for example, In Ezech.hom. 9,1 (GCS 33) 405,13-406,9; In I Reg.hom. 1,4 (GCS 33) 5-7; Frag. 1 Cor. (J. A. Cramer, Catenae Graecorum Patrum, V, p.182).

[339] In Lev.hom. 4,8 (GCS 29) 327,3-27; In Joan. VI 33 (GCS 10) 142; on this point, cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, pp. 39 f., 55 f.; Contra Celsum III 28 (GCS 2) 226,6-18. Moreover, on his eucharistic teaching, see C. Bigg, pp. 264-7, E. R. Redepenning, II, p. 438 ff.; G. Bardy in: DTh XI, 2c 1558 ff.; J. F. De Groot, Conspectus historiae dogmatum (2 vols., Rome 1931), vol. i, p. 200 ff.; H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, pp. 548-53, 59 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

would seem, therefore, that on this point Origen' s teaching on penance contradicts his overall and basic anti-Donatist position which recognizes an objective validity and efficacy of the hierarchy and of the sacraments. In order to clarify this important question it is not sufficient merely to consider in general Origen' s view of plurality and diversity within the Church. We must also try to see how this aspect of the Church both appears and is effective particularly in the Church's reconciling activity. On this point at least Origen himself is clear in principle. Now once this point is established, it becomes methodologically essential, when confronted with the individual statements of Origen on the Church's reconciling activity and their presuppositions, always to ask which level of the Church they refer to. If account is not taken of the precise function within the Church to which these statements refer, then it is hardly possible to avoid serious misunderstandings concerning Origen's teaching on penance. Moreover, at the outset of all our considerations it is vital to observe that Origen does recognize a sacrament of penance. This does not mean, however, that this sacrament should be considered in isolation, as it usually is today. To consider it in this way would hardly be helpful. It would in fact be submitting it to the disadvantage of modern sacramental theology which considers the sacraments individually. If it were viewed in this way it would be an event separated from the general life of the Church, which must be a continually reconciling and sanctifying fellowship. It would subsist only by reason of an 'institution' by Jesus Christ and, quite apart from baptism, would be the only expression of the Church's reconciling activity, while in all other cases where sins are forgiven it is man himself who 'alone' brings about the remission of his sins by sorrow and penance. If we today reflect on this commonly accepted understanding of the sacrament of penance, we can see immediately how unsatisfactory it is. The Church [294] offers the sacrifice of the altar for the forgiveness of sins. It prays and does penance. Every conversion of a sinner is in fact supported by the intercession and the expiation of the whole Church, long before the actual 'confession'. The example of the holy members of, this community also has a role to play, as well as the call to penance announced by the preachers of the gospel of justice and grace, which the Holy Spirit is constantly giving as a grace to the Church. Every profound metanoia of an individual is part of the living experience of the Church. It originates in the Church and, in its turn, affects the Church. For this Church throughout its history is on a continual journey from Adam to Christ. Thus the experience of sin, consisting in its awful sense of loss and separation from God, is a grace for the Church, although this is possible only in Christ, himself deserted by God on the cross, who in this sense too is head of his Church. The remission of sin is complete only when the 'punishments of sin' have been fully changed and destroyed in us.[340] All this is soon clear upon reflection. And yet none of it is found in previous treatises on penance, although that is where it all ought to be. In general the work of Origen, or of a Church Father, is approached with only those questions about the sacrament of penance which relate to penance as it is currently known to us. It is hardly surprising, therefore, if [340] The Church's reconciling activity, which we are discussing in this section, need not necessarily always take place temporally between the excommunication and its lifting. This obviously cannot be the case, since this activity is certainly effective even where there is no question of penance of excommunication. We will return to the question of the relationship between this activity of the Church and the lifting of excommunication when we come to the detailed discussion of the latter. It is far too peremptory to consider those 'punishments' which remain after the remission of 'guilt' simply as a 'sentence of punishment' consisting only in God's 'decree'. The picture changes, however, once we ask what it is in objective, existential reality on our part that corresponds to this decree of God: guilt and punishment move closer together. Our 'fleshly condition', the Godless aspect of our un-enlightened being, with all its consequences, is the remaining expression of our guilt and its punishment, even after forgiveness. In the final analysis, therefore, punishment is really reducible to guilt and is its expression. As such, it is something which ought not to be. The remission of the punishments due to sin, therefore, is a theme not only of the teaching on indulgences but must be included in the considerations on penance as a genuine part of the teaching on the forgiveness of sins.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

these works are found to contain a detailed treatment of those points which, while being acknowledged as 'also' important, do not come within the ambit of our rather arbitrarily defined dogmatic treatises. Similarly, points which we would consider important are often treated only peripherally and indistinctly by the Church Fathers, while the main point of their discussion is often found elsewhere than where we would expect it to be. If, therefore, any effort is made to integrate the insights of the witnesses of the early Church into the artificial setting of the contents of modern treatises of penance, it is difficult to avoid misunderstandings. Moreover, if these insights are not viewed in a wider context, then the picture of, say, Origen's teaching on penance does not only become incomplete and distorted but it also loses those characteristics which could be so important for developing the teaching on the sacrament of penance today.

At least in his teaching on penance Origen was very much aware of both the Church's manifold nature and its activity in the remission of sins. Something has already been said on this topic.[341] If Christ is both priest and sacrifice in the forgiveness of sins, then for Origen it [295] follows necessarily that the ministri et sacerdotes ecclesiae secundum imaginem eius, qui sacerdotium ecclesiae dedit participate in the remission of sins.[342] For the present we need not consider precisely how this co-operation takes place or which of its aspects is emphasized in this passage. What is more important is the fact that Origen appears to take it as self-evident that there is a correspondence between the head of the Church and its members in the remission of sins. Thus it is that bishops correspond to angels, because the one Church has two levels – duplex ecclesia una hominum, altera angelorum. The correspondence also applies obviously to the various duties.[343] Origen also takes this correspondence for granted in his notion of penance in which both angels and bishops have their part to play.[344] There is not only a correspondence between the exterior and interior hierarchy, in such a sense that the external function does not eliminate or supply for the interior function, or in any way coincide with it. But even within the level of the external hierarchy the lower members are dependent on the higher in the remission of sin. Even in the dimension of this visible unity the lower member needs the co-operation of the higher in the forgiveness of every sin.[345]

---

[341] Cf. above the texts and details in connection with nn. 270-4.

[342] In Lev.hom. 5,3 (GCS 29) 338,10-13; 339,11-14.

[343] Cf., for example, In Luc.hom. 12 (GCS 35) 84-7; ibid., 13 (GCS 35) 91,20-5; ibid., 23 (GCS 35) 156,25 f.; ibid., 35 (GCS 35) 208,19-22. It is immaterial whether all the speculations on angels are correct (an individual guardian angel for each community; angels which do not exercise their 'episcopal office' properly, etc.). All that matters is that, according to Origen, in the one Church angel and bishop are 'bishop' in their own way. They do not compete with one another.

[344] Cf. In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371 f. All that we need to observe here is the natural way in which Origen transfers the idea of the correptio by bishops (priests and deacons) to a corresponding correptio by angels. In view of his general notion that there is only a relative difference between angels and spiritual persons, the angels, in the exercise of their role, have essentially the same status in the Church as perfect spiritual persons. This implies that the respective moles of the bishop and the spiritual person are no more mutually exclusive than those of the 'visible bishop' and the invisible angel-bishop. Indeed Origen's system as a whole would suggest that the contrary is the case.

[345] In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68,4-12:

> qui meliores sunt, inferiorum semper culpas et peccata suscipiunt . . . Israelita si peccet, id est laicus, ipse suum non potest auferre peccatum, sed requirit levitam, indiget sacerdote, immo . . . pontifice opus est, ut peccatorum remissionem possit accipere. Sacerdos autem, si delinquat aut pontifex, ipse suum potest purgare peccatum, si tamen non peccet in Deum; de huiusmodi enim peccatis non facile remissionem aliquam videmus in legis litteris designari.

Despite the Old Testament terminology, all this refers to the men and the hierarchy of the New Covenant(cf. In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 [PG 12] 1372). Since there is also a mention of the sins of bishops and priests, it must be a question of offences committed after baptism, although not only of mortal sins. The special difficulty which the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

These examples illustrate Origen's basic conviction that the various aspects of the Church which are neither reducible to each other nor mutually exclusive are at work in its activity of reconciliation. But this obviously does not mean that the distinction and demarcation of all the functions of the individual 'levels' of the Church are always clearly made. Rather it is a question of the same activity ascribed both to the external official and to the interior 'perfect'. Thus there is no explicit and clear emphasis on the idea that the official hierarchy possesses a special duty, that is, of officially lifting official excommunication, besides that which it has in common with the 'perfect'. The fact that in this case it would appear that, contrary to the general principle, the duties of the individual groups do not only correspond to each other without competing with each other but even partially overlap and replace each other is due, in the first place, to the very nature of the general principle and, in the second place, to the nature of the sin which has to be remitted. From the point of view of our method, this observation provides an indication of the perspective in which we should treat Origen's teaching in what follows. In other words, should we consider the power of spiritual lay people to lift official excommunication apart [296] from official reconciliation as an exception or even as a usurpation of' the prerogative of the official hierarchy, or indeed vice versa. It is, therefore, necessary to examine a little more closely this apparent exception to Origen's general basic ecclesiological thought.

In the first place, the overlapping mentioned above is a corollary of the very basic principle which we have explained. In fact, according to Origen the interior and the exterior hierarchy are not to be distinguished in such a way that they simply lie side by side or the one beneath the other without being related. Despite the fact that its own specific acts are fundamentally valid, the exterior hierarchy must be the expression and manifestation of the Church's interior hierarchy. Thus it ought to correspond to the latter in such a way that the leaders of the one hierarchy are in fact always the leaders of the other. Ideally, therefore, the one responsible for the duties and functions in the interior hierarchy, that is, the spiritual person, is the depositary of the powers of the exterior hierarchy, and vice versa. This ideal agreement, however, is not always realized. Nevertheless, its absence does not deprive the exterior hierarchy as such of its proper character. It is an ideal which should be the object of continual striving.[346] In this regard, it is worth recalling what has been said earlier about the perspective in which Origen regarded the nature of sin. If, in his view, there is not and in fact cannot be a clear distinction remission of the mortal sins of bishops presents to Origen resides in the fact that, in their case, the penance of excommunication meant the permanent exclusion from office (Contra Celsurn III 51 [GCS 2] 247,1-248,5) or that, at that time, a cleric was simply not allowed access to public penance. From the context and considering In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1372, where the three groups of the hierarchy (deacons, priests, bishops) co-operate in the reconciliation of men, we can see that, in this passage too, it is these three groups of officials, and not three grades of holiness, that are meant. Consequently here (at least principally) meliores is not to be understood as the counterpart of inferiores in the sense of moral qualities or spiritual prerogatives. It is a question of grades of offices, from the laity to the bishop. Their reconciling activity must be sought, therefore, on this level of hierarchically ordered and visible sacramentality. In practice, this may be defined as supervision and official reprimand, including the penance of excommunication (In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1, etc.), the offering of sacrifice and the administration of the Eucharist (Contra Celsum VIII 33 [GCS 3] 249,5: the Eucharist as 'healing'; in Num.hom. 16,9 [GCS 30] 152,4-5: we drink sacramentorum rita the blood of him who was wounded for our sins; In Ex.hom. 4,8 [GCS 29] 182,1; De or. 28,9 [GCS 3] 381,4-6). For further details, cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion: the Eucharist as the manifestation of Christ's eternal reconciling sacrifice. In every case, therefore, the right of the different officials in the Church is recognized. The lay person, regardless of whether he is spiritual (or whether other lay persons supporting him arc also such) cannot dispense with the higher grades of the hierarchy, while these, on their respective levels, have no need of those who are under them, since they, for instance, offer sacrifice. For further examples, cf. below: the martyrs and their death, the saints in this world, etc.

---

[346] Cf., on this point, H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 49 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between guilt itself and the punishment due to sin,[347] then it follows that, according to him, the remission of sin must necessarily include the overcoming of the whole of man's carnal character. But this does not come about merely through the sacrament of penance as such. Not only could Origen assume this as part of tradition and teach it himself,[348] but it is also evidenced by man's immediate, experience of his moral life. Given this concept of sin, it follows that any inquiry about an ecclesial means of reconciliation must be directed towards that activity of the Church by which the carnal side of a humanity bound together within the Church is purified and transformed. This activity is nothing other than the redemptive penance undertaken by the saints with and under the direction of Christ their head. This entails, however, that the Church as a whole and in all its dimensions must be opposed to sin as the indispensable instrument of salvation. Thus its interior hierarchy, that is, the ever increasing holiness of its spiritual members, must exercise a reconciling function Moreover in the ideal situation – which really ought [297] to be the 'normal' one – the officials of the exterior hierarchy should play a part in this activity of the interior hierarchy. In other words, they exercise their office properly only when they also reconcile as spiritual persons. In any event, the bishop, the priest and the deacon are συ/μβολον α)ληθινω~ν κατα_ ο)νο&ματα ταυ=τα πραγμα&των in the full sense only in so far as they realize in 'truth' what they represent symbolically in the sacramental sign. This ideal performance of the duty of the interior hierarchy on the part of the bearers of official hierarchical power is a participation in the function which is originally the prerogative of the interior hierarchy. It is only good method, therefore, to take the latter as the starting-point. Thus Origen's recognition of a reconciling function exercised by spiritual persons is not to be considered as an unjustified extension of the episcopal official power to the laity. Quite the contrary. The bishop, in so far as he is himself a spiritual person – which is what he ought to be – participates in a function which belongs originally and inalienably to the saints, each according to his place, within the body of Christ. Nevertheless, in so far as he exercises a specific visible function, the bishop has to have a role in the whole process of reconciliation which is reserved to him and which he does not share with the spiritual person. These requirements are implicit in Origen's notion of the fundamental relationship between 'groups' within the Church. But they must be confirmed by reference to the texts themselves. This applies particularly to the idea that a specifically reconciling function within the Church has its starting-point with the spiritual persons and then becomes the right of the bishops, even if this method does not account for the full episcopal power in the forgiveness of sins. In other words, our methodological principle is to be pursued without prejudice to the specific power which is reserved exclusively to the official church.[349]

B) RECONCILIATION ACHIEVED BY THE CHURCH OF THE SAINTS

The previous considerations have led to the expectation that Origen recognizes a sin-remitting activity on the part of the 'interior' hierarchy, that is, of the Church of the saints. Such an activity, therefore, is exercised not only by the exterior officials of the Church, even though these latter may have a part to play in it. The question which now remains to be asked is whether in Origen's view the 'saints' in fact contribute to the remission of sins and whether the bishops also [298] do this as 'saints'. Thus we must try to see the precise nature of this activity and what it presupposes in those who exercise it.

---

[347] Cf. above under n.340.

[348] Both aspects are in fact implicit in his teaching on the difference between the baptismal α!φεσιφ and the poenitentia dura et laboriosa.

[349] Cf., on this point, H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (Tübingen l963), pp. 262-91; also G. Teichtweier, pp. 339-40; J. Grotz, pp. 206-229.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is not only Peter and the other apostles who are the rock on which Christ has built his Church, but πα~φ ο(ξριστου= μιμητη/φ, all 'perfect believers' (τε/λειοι) have the keys of heaven, that is, the power to bind and to loose. Everyone who has the ε1ργον of Peter, that is, not only the traditional faith in Christ but also that which is inspired from above, together with freedom from sin through the virtues which open the individual heavens, is able to loose and forgive in such a way that his activity takes effect also in heaven.[350] The holier a person is, therefore, the greater is his power of loosing.[351] As is obvious from the text taken as a whole – the 'saints' observe the command of fraternal correction laid down in Matthew 18 – it is a question of the 'saints' here on earth and of their activity. Certainly it would be a misunderstanding of Origen to see in these 'saints' a narrow and sharply defined caste which is clearly distinguishable from 'ordinary' Christians. Every Christian, to the extent of his inspired faith and his particular freedom from sin, must belong to them.[352] The only ones who are excluded are those who are bound by their own sins.[353] In the final analysis, all Christians must convert their brothers and heal their sins.[354] In other words, sins have to be remitted interventu et correptione omnium.[355] In fact the circle of the Church's reconciling α#γιοι must be drawn even wider, since both martyrs and angels also belong to the circle of powers which, as the 'interior Church', contribute to the remission of sins.[356] Indeed, although their activity in this regard is naturally, at least partially, different from that of the other saints,[357] they can nevertheless be included with the saints because their activity has its basis in their personal activity and holiness; they are also members of the Church of the saints.

Now this power of the 'saints' includes a whole lot of activities which the 'saints' are able to do. Thus the spiritual person is simply appointed by God himself, as was Jesus the friend [350] Cf. In Matt. tom. XII 10-14 (GCS 84-100; esp. Ibid., 84,24-86,5; 88,6-13; 96,6-15; 98,6-28). The question of the power of binding, which is here being considered somewhat vaguely together with the question of the power of loosing, has already been discussed in some detail above. In the present passage the power of loosing is described as ε0χουσι/α (ibid., 98,6). The Christians who possess it are called, in addition to Petrus, τε/λειοι (ibid., 86,7 f.24), α#γιοι (ibid., 88,31), homines spirituales (ibid., 88,20), fideles (ibid., 96,7), imitators of Christ (ibid., 86,1 f.; 88,16) and stabiles in fide (ibid., 85,20). The content of their power is described only very vaguely: binding and loosing (passim), to open heaven in such a way that the one loosed is free (ibid., 98,22-4), to obtain α!φεσιφ in heaven (ibid., 87,16-22; 99,5). In fact all that is said is that the saints have the effective power of reconciliation. How and by what means this power is exercised is not specified. It would be methodologically false to press the images (that of judging, etc.) which are contained in the text which is itself to be interpreted. We must look for an answer to this question elsewhere in Origen. It would be purely arbitrary to attempt to explain this power of reconciliation simply by the notion which we today recognize as the official priestly power of the sacrament of penance for the forgiveness of sins. The same ε0χουσι/α as in Matt. tom. XII is also ascribed to the α#γιοι in De or. 14,6 (GCS 3) 333,12. 14-16.

[351] In addition to the text already cited (esp. ibid., 96,15-97,27: every individual virtue is its own door to heaven and its own heaven; all together constitute the whole kingdom of heaven), cf. In Matt. tom. XIII 31 (GCS 40) 269,28-271,9.

[352] This follows from the principle already mentioned concerning a power of reconciliation increasing with the degree of virtues.

[353] In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 99,12-22 (Latin text).

[354] In Luc.hom. 34 (GCS 35) 205,7- 14.

[355] In Lev. hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 408,7. Although this refers specifically only to sins subject to public penance, it still applies analogously to all sins.

[356] We have already mentioned several times angels and their activity in the forgiveness of sins. Cf. under n.344. In fact after his own resurrection the person guilty of mortal sin is delivered by God and Christ to the angels of his respective Church (In Luc.hom. 34 [GCS 35] 204,24). They then have to 'loosen' the remaining fetters of his sins (In Joan. XX VIII 8 399,21-4). For the case of martyrs, cf. Exhort. ad mart. 30 (GCS 2) 26,28-27,5; In Num.hom. 10,2 (GCS 30) 71,18-72,27.

[357] As will be shown below, the reconciling activity of the saints occurs on two levels: first, through their interior proximity to God by prayer, sorrow, suffering, struggling with the demons, etc., second – although still by reason of their personal holiness and precisely not strictly as officials – in the visible Church through exhortation, teaching, etc., including the visible sacrifice of the altar, in the case of priests.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of sinners, to live among sinners in order to work for their conversion.[358] Just as Jesus himself, despite his α)πα&θεια, suffered the condition of the poor and the sick,[359] so also the perfect persons weep with those who weep and especially grieve over those who do not wish to do any penance.[360] As compassionate doctors of souls they have the gift of mourning and suffering with sinners, the disciplina condolendi et compatiendi.[361] By prayer, fasting and the exercise of virtues they [299] also fight for the rest of the people and for those who are weaker than themselves.[362] They strive for the weak and for sinners against the demonic powers.[363] Their most sublime deed with regard to the reconciliation of their brothers in the Church is the shedding of their blood in martyrdom, in imitation of Christ's sacrificial death: in this way they effectively destroy the power of the demons, they drive away sins and thus redeem at least some.[364] Through their intercessions the spiritual persons intervene for sinners so that they may obtain forgiveness. They may even be asked spontaneously for this intercession.[365] Obviously they will observe above all the gospel precept concerning fraternal correction which is incumbent on all Christians.[366] Since, however, the 'saints' are like Peter and Paul,[367] there applies to them that which is said of Paul, namely, that they, inseparable from the love of Jesus, 'by sacrificing, not by transgressing', wish themselves to be anathema in the place of others in order to gain salvation for their brothers.[368] This assumere peccatorem et monendo, hortando, docendo, instruendo adducere eum ad poenitentiam, ab errore corrigere, a vitiis emendare et efficere talem, ut ei converso propitius fiat Deus is explicitly described as a delicta repropitiare.[369] The hostiam iugulare verbo Dei et doctrinae sanae victimas offerre is called purgare a peccatis conscientias auditorum, indeed even remissionem peccatorum tribuere.[370] Thus it must be that these means for the forgiveness of sins are in fact tantamount to the power of 'loosing' which in Origen's view is the prerogative of the τε/λειοι. There is nothing in Origen's work which warrants another explanation. In other words, he holds that the 'loosing' of sins is an essentially wider and more comprehensive notion than the official lifting of an excommunication imposed by the

[358] Selecta in Ps. 27,3 (PG 12) 1285-8.
[359] In Matt.tom. X 23 (GCS 40) 33,3 f. Cf. W. Völker, p. 171.
[360] Selecta in Ps. 60,3 (PG 12) 1480 f.; Selecta in Threnos I (PG 13) 608C; 629C.
[361] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6 (PG 12) 1386; Ad Rom. IX 15 (PG 14) 1221 f.
[362] In Num.hom. 25,4 (GCS 30) 238,4-14.
[363] Cf. the texts in W. Völker, p. 175 f.
[364] Cf. the references in W.Völker, p. 176 f. According to Origen there is also a martyrdom of every day: In Ps. 118,157; cf. in J. B. Pitra, Analecta sacra Spicilegio Solesmensi parata, 8 vols. (Paris 1876-83), vol. iii, p. 307 f.
[365] De or. 14,6 (GCS 3)333,11-16. After all that has been said previously on the subject of the 'saints', there should be no doubt that here they do not only forgive any guilt incurred against themselves, but 'make us worthy (passively) to participate in the power which has been given to them to forgive guilt (in God's eyes)'. This applies despite De or. 28,8 (GCS 3) 380,5, where there is mention of an ε0χουσι/α to forgive precisely guilt incurred against the person who is forgiving.
[366] Cf. above under n.299.
[367] De or. 14,6 (GCS 3) 333,14 f. See further texts placing them in parallel with the apostles in W. Völker, p. 186.
[368] Ad Rom. VII (PG 14) 1139 A/B.
[369] In Lev.hom. 5,4 (GCS 29) 342,11-15.
[370] In Lev.hom. 5,3 (GCS 29) 339,11-14; 340.1 f. Both of these passages in fact refer to the bishop. The fact, however, that the tribuere remissionem peccatorum and the purgane conscientias are explained in such a way that they can refer also to spiritual persons and only express what Origen certainly ascribes also to spiritual persons shows, on the other hand, that it is precisely this influence, by means of exhortation, pleading, prayer, etc. that we must bear in mind when we consider the power to forgive sins which is ascribed to them. Whether the bishops' power to forgive sins is totally identified with this spiritual activity of the saints (which Origen obviously asks also of bishops), or whether they have a still wider function to play in this question, which is their sole prerogative, is a point which remains to be considered.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church.[371] Thus he does not ascribe to the saints any more than that which is recognized even by contemporary church teaching. What this binding power necessarily presupposes, then as today, is holiness and the living, grace-giving union with the holy Church, the body of Christ.[372] Even today any well-balanced teaching on the Church's activity in the remission of sins must take account of this role played by the 'saints' and not concentrate solely on the sacramental powers exercised in the two sacraments which remit sins in the strictest sense. It is obvious that throughout all this consideration of the act of reconciliation Origen has in mind not only mortal sins, at least not primarily, but all sins in general.

Now, since according to this way of thinking even the members of [300] the official hierarchy must be spiritual people, it follows that they possess this power only if and in so far as they are spiritual. Although it is undeniable that Origen recognizes a binding and loosing which is reserved exclusively to the bishop, he still holds that he has a power to remit sins which is his in so far as he is a spiritual person and not because he is a bishop.[373] This is because the bishop, as such, must also be 'holy'. We have already considered the nature of the bishop's activity in this regard.[374] Now if, on the one hand, the 'saints' effect the forgiveness of sins by their intercession and, on the other hand, the forgiveness of sins is attributable to the bishops who also exercise this role through their 'prayer',[375] then there is surely no reason for the assumption that the episcopal 'prayer' for the remission of sins must be of a radically different kind from that of the other saints. Nevertheless, even prescinding from the fact that the bishops enjoy the power to impose and lift excommunication and thus of binding and loosing, this does not mean that the bishops' power to remit sins has to be identical in all respects with that of the other spiritual people. Already in the case of the correptio it is necessary to distinguish between one which is private and one which is official.

---

[371] It could still be said, however, that if the 'binding' does indeed include the lifting of excommunication (and, in view of In Matt.tom. XII 10-14 and tom. XIII 30, there can be no doubt that it does), then spiritual persons must also possess even this power to reincorporate penitents into the Church through the loosing of excommunication, since they can certainly 'loose'. Nevertheless, this would be a form of argumentation which rests upon Origen's obscure terminology and certainly is not in line with his true thinking. We have already shown that it cannot be seriously doubted that, in Origen's view, real excommunication is the prerogative of the bishops. If this is the case, then it follows that only they can really loose it.

[372] Cf. In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 98,28-99,22 etc.

[373] In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 99,11-22. According to the whole section, this precise power of loosing belongs also to the spiritual person who is not a member of the official hierarchy. The bishop's holiness, therefore, is presented not only as, the mere condition of the effectiveness of his official power but as itself the real cause of and reason for the effectiveness of this loosing.

[374] Cf. in Lev.hom. 5,3-4, loc. cit.

[375] Cf. in Ex.hom. 4,8 (GCS 29) 182,1 f.: we are purified from sins (other than mortal sins) per obsecrationes pontificum. This purification is placed on the same level as the purification per scientiam divinae legis and is distinguished from the liberation from mortal sins which requires the immediate intervention of God. It from this that the purifying prayer of priests is not to be thought of as sacramental in the strict sense, since Origen holds that the scientia legis is certainly an apanage of spiritual persons who do not hold an office (cf. W. Völker, p. 169 ff.). He does, however, recognize in principle a prayer which remits sins. Accordingly, the remission of sins by the bishops through mere 'prayer' is to be understood as that which Origen admits in De or. 28,10 for sins, with the exception of mortal sins. Certainly the bishops lay claim to this prayer clearly in virtue of their ι9ερατικη∴ α)χι/α (cf. [GCS 3] 382,12f.). They attribute to their 'prayer' for sins a special efficacy deriving from their episcopal status and which is not given to others. This may refer especially to liturgical prayer. Nevertheless, this is still no argument in favour of a meal, essential difference (both objectively and according to Origen's view). Objectively this 'priestly' prayer could still be understood as 'sacramental' in the modern sense. It need not be taken as the formula of an actual sacrament. As far as Origen himself is concerned, he does not look for the explanation of the effectiveness of this prayer in the priestly status. All that he is concerned to do is to dispute the effectiveness of prayer alone for mortal sins in particular. Since he seems in this passage to concede such a power of prayer for the forgiveness of sins only to spiritual bishops (cf. ibid., 380,8-15; 381,4), it would seem all the more appropriate to understand this power in such a way that, along the lines of In Matt.tom. XII 14, it belongs to the bishop because he is spiritual.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The latter is without any doubt the prerogative of the clergy.[376]

Origen also recognizes sacrifice as a means of reconciling the sinner. Certainly by 'sacrifice' for sin he often means the interior sacrifice of the contrite heart and the corrective and converting word of God pronounced by the priest.[377] Nevertheless, since he also talks about the sacrificia sacerdotum, as distinct from the obsecrationes and the scientia divinae legis, and since he explicitly ascribes to these a sin-remitting efficacy,[378] there can be no doubt that for Origen the actual liturgical sacrifice of the Eucharist belongs to the spiritual bishops' reconciling activity.[379] Thus there are two points at which the bishop's spiritual power to remit sins is expressed in an exterior official act of the Church. In other passages it is not at all clear what Origen has in mind when he ascribes a reconciling activity to bishops and priests.[380] It could refer to a wide variety of activities: the simple charismatic role, in the strictest sense, played by a spiritual person, the official correptio just mentioned, the offering of sacrifice and, finally, that act which we will later have to describe as specifically sacramental, that is, the authoritative loosing from the actual excommunication from the Church imposed by the bishop.

[301] If we wish to describe the whole of the reconciling activity of the Church of the saints theologically we could say: the Church of the saints, being affected by the sin of one of its members, guards its solidarity with this sinful member. It is, therefore, obliged to do what the sinner himself has to do for the remission of his sins. Only he, however, has to actually α)πολαμβα&νειν τα_φ α(μαρτι/αφ. He has to face up to the reality of his sinful condition, which is itself the most severe guilt and punishment. At the same time, he must renounce all his apathy with regard to his own condition and allow the immanent fire of judgement to destroy his sin completely in both his interior and his exterior being. But likewise the Church 'takes' this guilt 'on itself'.[381] Having itself become sinful by the sin of its member, it expiates the sin together with the sinner.[382] Everything that the Church does in its saints is only this process of taking sin upon itself in all the various forms which correspond to its manifold nature.

---

[376] In Matt.tom. XIII 30 (GCS 40) 262,16-26; 264,9-12; In Lev.hom. 3,2 (GCS 29) 302; In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 333,3-7. In the last passage it is also clear that the bishops themselves could, in the first instance, undertake a quite private correptio of the sinner (obviously in the appropriate cases), before they proceed to an official correptio. In the first instance they behave precisely as any spiritual person and every good Christian who likewise has a responsibility secrete convenire (ibid., 333,4) as a physician.

[377] In Lev.hom. 5,3 f. (GCS 29) 337,28: contribulati spiritus hostia; ibid., 340,1: hostia verbi Dei et doctrinae sanae victima; ibid., 342,22 f.: offerre pro peccatis, id est a via peccati convertere peccatores.

[378] In Ex.hom. 4,8 (GCS 29) 182,1. Here, likewise, it is not a question of sacrificia sacerdotum for mortal sins.

[379] Theme is no reason why the sacrifices offered for specific groups of sins in De or. 28,9 (GCS 3) 381,4-6 cannot refer to the actual liturgical sacrifice, with the same proviso as was made with regard to the text mentioned in the previous note. We might even, with A. von Harnack (TU 42,3) 79, read In Lev.hom. 3,6 (GCS 29) 310,19-21.26-30 as showing that at that time already the question had arisen of how a poor person without money could come to such a sacrifice.

[380] Thus, for example, In Num. hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 71,7-9: qui sancti sunt, pro peccatis poenitudinem gerunt, vulnera sua sentiunt, intelligunt lapsus, requirunt sacerdotem, sanitatem deposcunt, purificationem per pontificem quaerunt. Or In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1369: omnes, qui post Apostolos in Ecclesia positit sunt, quibusque curandorum vulnerum disciplina commissa est, quos voluit Deus in Ecclesia sua esse medicos animarum. Such formulations are obviously very general and comprehensive and it would be unjustifiable to think that they refer only to the bishop's strict sacramental activity.

[381] In Lev.hom. 5,3 (GCS 29) 339,12 f. The peccata occipere in imitation of Jesus is said here of the sacerdotes Ecclesiae. In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 68,4: meliores . . . inferiorum semper culpas et peccata suscipiunt.

[382] Cf. also Selecta in Ps. 29,3 (PG 12) 1292D. 1293A; the Church, which feels itself in solidarity with sinners; In Num.hom. 10,2 (GCS 30) 71,15: Christ with the apostles and martyrs sumit peccata sanctorum; In Lev.hom. 7,1 f. (GCS 29) 373-80: the solidarity of the whole Church with Christ in heaven and on earth in the reconciliation of all men.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. The Official Power of the Church

A) THE LIFTING OF EXCOMMUNICATION: THE FACT AND THE TERMINOLOGY

According to Origen mortal sins are subject radically and necessarily to church excommunication which is imposed by the bishop. By this excommunication a sinner is handed over to Satan in order to have his sin remitted. Excommunication is essentially able to be lifted and, after suitable penance, it can be reversed in such a way that the sinner is once more reconciled with the Church as a real member. We need not consider for the moment whether such a reconciliation is feasible in all concrete cases. What is certain is the fact: there is a reconciliation in the sense just described. Even after an official proici there is for the egrediens de populo Dei a rursum per poenitentiaam reverti,[383] a προι/εσθαι of those who have been excluded to the κοινο&ν of the Church,[384] an ad Ecclesiam redire.[385] Granted that there has been sufficient penance outside the Church, there is a ε0πανιε/ναι and κοινωνει=ν τη=| ε0κκλνησι/α|,[386] a revocare and Ecclesiae membris associare,[387] as happened in the case of the incestuous person in Corinth, a reconiungere eiectum Ecclesiae.[388] Now although the lifting of excommunication and the reincorporation of the excommunicated within the visible community of the Church is of a different nature than the reconciling activity of the Church by the saints as [302] described above, and although with the term 'loosing' often, if not mostly, he means precisely this latter activity, he still appears also to designate the lifting of excommunication as solvere. Certainly 'binding' means first and foremost excommunication. It would be astounding, therefore, if 'loosing' did not also mean the exact opposite. Thus if, in one and the same context, Origen speaks of the bishops' potestas solvendi et ligandi and if he understands by potestas ligandi the power of excluding people from the Church,[389] then one ought to interpret the potestas solvendi as the power of reconciling the penitent with the Church. After all we have seen, there is no need to prove that it is the bishop who performs the reconciliation. Nevertheless, this point is not stressed as explicitly as might be expected. But he is certainly the one who imposes the excommunication. Origen maintains that the bishops base their claim to the power of binding and loosing on Scripture. Moreover, the bishop has a very prominent role to play elsewhere, for instance, in supervising morals, in hearing the confession, in administering the correptio, and he appears – at least in practice – as the most important person in all the other reconciling activity of the Church. Thus there can be no doubt that he is the one who executes the reconciliation of the penitent with the Church. Given the strictly monarchical-episcopal structure of the individual Churches at that time, as is evident also in Origen, and the fact that

[383] In Ezech.hom. 3,8 (GCS 33) 357,30-358,1.
[384] Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 248,3.
[385] In Ps. 36 hom. 4,2 (PG 12) 1353. Origen's stress on both the possibility and the effectiveness of penance in this passage shows that the question raised by the doubting sinner: Quomodo ad Ecclesiam redire must be answered basically in the affirmative.
[386] In Jer.frag. 48 (GCS 6) 222,16,21.
[387] Ad Rom.praef. (PG 14) 834.
[388] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1371. This is also said of the incestuous person in Corinth, the type of a repentant sinner.
[389] In Jud.hom, 2,5 (GCS 30) 478,23-479,1. It would, however, be false to understand the 'loosing' in such cases exclusively of the lifting of excommunication. According to Origen, 'loosing' in the case of bishops who are really what they ought to be is a wider notion. In In Matt.tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) also this notion retains its indeterminate character, which obviously does not exclude the lifting of excommunication but also includes much more than the bishop has as a spiritual person. In Matt.hom. XIII 31 (GCS 40) 269,11-18, for example, shows that, in Origen's view, there is a 'loosing' by means of a simple once-and-for-all νουθεσι/α, therefore without excommunication.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only the bishop is able to impose an actual excommunication and that on this point there is not the slightest trace in Origen of 'competition' on the part of, say, the confessors or any others, it is obvious that for him it was only the bishop who, both in practice and in theory, has the right to perform such an official reconciliation.

There is one allusion to a rite of reconciliation, if we accept that Origen sees in public penance the fulfilment of the instruction laid down in the letter of James 5:14 f.[390] Since in this text there is a mention of an imposition of hands accompanied by prayer, and since both in the West in Cyprian and in the East[391] this is also attested at this time, there can be little doubt that Origen also at least thought of it. For him, therefore, reconciliation takes place by imposition of hands accompanied by prayer. The whole community would be present and praying, thus providing a suitable parallel to the act of excommunication. The fact that the Didascalia Apostolorum attests such a co-operation on the part of the whole community at the reconciliation [303] of penitents[392] would confirm this reconstruction. It remains to be asked, therefore, whether, according to James 5:14 f., Origen and his contemporaries envisaged an anointing which accompanied the imposition of hands. Later in the East it is clear that in some places reconciliation includes an anointing. Leaving aside Origen himself, the first traces of this practice are discernible in Syria about A.D. 300.[393] Thus it is highly likely that Origen also knew of this practice and considered it the 'carrying out' of the passage in James with regard to the reconciliation of penance.[394] The conclusive text from In Lev. hom. 2,4, according to which the reconciling imposition of hands was already in Origen's view accompanied by an anointing, receives a further confirmation from In Lev. hom. 8,11.[395] There is here mention of a olei imago in the sense that the penitent, having been purified of his sins, again receives a share in the graces given by the Holy Spirit. Since the reference here is not to the newly baptized but to the man who is to be justified again, because he has fallen into sin after his baptism,[396] the real anointing in question must be the reconciliation of [390] In Lev.hom. 2,4 (GCS 29) 296,17-297,3. Both in quo et impletur illud, quod Jacobus Apostolus dicit (ibid., 296, 22 f.) and the fact that this forgiveness of sins according to James is not counted as a new (eighth) possibility makes it clear that Origen wishes to relate this text to the seventh possibility of forgiveness in his list, that is, to dura et laboriosa per poenitentiam remissio peccatorum (ibid., 296,17 f.) and not to the sacrament of the anointing of the sick. This explains why Origen transforms the words 'they should pray over him', in the text of James, into 'they must impose hands upon him', thus clearly modelling the text on the liturgy of reconciliation. The only question that can be asked is whether, in Origen's circle, all the elements listed in Jas. 5:14 f. (imposition of hands by the presbyteri Ecclesiae, anointing, 'prayer of faith') occurred as aspects of the forgiveness of sins or whether Origen regarded the text as sufficiently 'fulfilled', even if, for example, at that time an anointing was not yet customary. Cf. J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains (Wetteren/Paris 1925), pp. 41 f., 374 ff.

---

[391] Cf. Didascalia Apost. II 18,7 (F. X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum I [Paderborn 1905], p. 66); ibid., II 41,2 (F. X. Funk, p. 130): ibid., II 43,1 (F. X. Funk, p. 134).

[392] Cf. the texts mentioned in the previous note.

[393] Thus, for example, in Aphraates, Demostr. XXIII 3 (Patr. Syr. Pars I vol. ii [Paris 1907] 10). For further witnesses, cf. F. Dölger, Den Exorzismus im altchristlichen Taufritual (Paderborn 1909), pp. 148-51; J. Coppens, pp. 377-9.

[394] Origen also seems to know of a post-baptismal anointing; baptism occurs, that is, in aquis istis visibilibus et in chrismate visibili: Ad Rom. V 8 (PG 14) 1058. Cf. also In Lev. hom. 6,5 (GCS 29) 367,11: unctio chrismatis. The parallel with baptism, which is already a characteristic of the penitential process, is further confirmed by a parallel anointing.

[395] Cf. ibid. (GCS 29) 417,12-18.

[396] H. Elfers, Die Kirchenordnung Hippolyts von Rom (Paderborn 1938), p. 137, appears to understand the text as referring to confirmation. Nevertheless, the sinner, with whose progressive and gradual purification the whole homily of n.5 is concerned, is obviously already a Christian and no longer a catechumen. In the whole section, beginning from n.5, it is always a question of the contrast between the sanctus (iustus, mundus) and the peccator (ibid. [GCS 29] 393,22; 408,18 f.; 413,3; 412,21). It is never there a question of the contrast between pagan (catechumen) and Christian. The six kinds of leprosy-sins which are considered are all applied to sin which was committed after baptism (ibid. [GCS 29] 404,1-5; 405,11-17; 406,5-11; 407,12-21; 408,6) and which is to be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penance.

What is the precise meaning of these ceremonies according to Origen? If we are to answer this question we must first of all recognize that Origen views the period of penance as parallel to the period of the catechumenate, as a kind of intense catechumenate.[397] Thus we can assume that the liturgical forms of the catechumenate and of its conclusion were transferred to the corresponding phases of the period of penance. It is certain that Origen knows of an imposition of hands which has the character of an exorcism.[398] In view of the evidence provided by the church order of Hippolytus and the practice attested in Cyprian, it is probable that such impositions of hands occurred also in the circles known to Origen during the period of the catechumenate and in the immediate preparation for baptism. The most obvious meaning of these impositions is as exorcisms or gestures of prayer, since they were formally distinguished from the authoritative granting of new access to church fellowship. In fact they form part of that intercessory reconciling activity which we have already described as the duty of bishops. Such an imposition of hands would be preceded by others during the period of penance and would only attract special attention if in fact it coincided with the end of this period and with reconciliation. At the same time, Origen also recognizes the imposition of hands as a rite for the bestowal of the [304] Spirit after baptism.[399] Similarly in the Didascalia Apostolorum[400] and in Firmilian of Caesarea, Origen's pupil,[401] the imposition of hands is a gesture for the bestowal of the Spirit. Likewise in In Lev. hom. 8,11[402] the reconciliation, submitted to public penance, because it is 'against God' (ibid. [GCS 29] 408,5) and 'mortal' (Ibid. [GCS 29] 405,16; 408,6-8). In the description of the purification of such a sinner (ibid. [GCS 29]) the misunderstanding that it is a question of a new baptism, because there is a mention of 'living water' (Ibid. [GCS 29] 411,6-9), is explicitly rejected. In contrast to baptism, it is more a question of a purificatio peccatorum . . . quae per poenitentiam quaeritur (ibid. [GCS 29] 411,7 f.; cf. also 414,5). Then in n. 11 of the homily the gradation of this purification is considered (ibid. EGCS 29] 411,16-417). The expression 'to wash', found in the biblical text cited, recurs frequently, but it is never applied to baptism (ibid. [GCS 29] 413,15-18). The readmission into the castra (ibid. [GCS 29] 413,19; 414,16; 416,9) is intended as the counterpart to the exclusion from the camp, that is, the excommunication of the Christian sinner (ibid. [GCS 29] 408,17-20). It is then stated of these gradually purified sinners:

---

> sic ergo conversis a peccato purificatio per illa omnia datur, quae superius diximus (that is, this gradual purification), donum autem gratiae spiritus per olei imaginem designatur, ut non solum purgationem consequi possit is, qui convertitur a peccato, sed et Spiritu sancto repleri, quo et recipere priorem stolam et anulum posit et per omnia reconciliatus Patri in locum Filii reparari.

It is thus clearly a question of the penance of a Christian after baptism. Certainly the term 'oil' also occurs in the biblical text being interpreted. It is perfectly possible that the communication of the Spirit is 'signified' by the 'oil' as a simple metaphor and not through a real anointing. Thus G. Teichtweier has rejected the assumption of a real anointing on the grounds that all that can be discerned in the overall context is an allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament purification ceremonies. According to the text Selecta in Ez. XVI (PG 13) 812, Teichtweier understands 'oil' exclusively as a symbol which signifies the communication of the Spirit (cf. G. Teichtweier, p. 326). An anointing at reconciliation is, however, attested for the East at this time, and In Lev.hom. 2,4 suggests that Origen is familiar with it. Thus it is justifiable to think here of a real liturgical anointing with oil, through which the gift of God's grace is meaningfully signified. In Origen imago does not necessarily mean 'metaphor', figurative speech. It can quite simply mean a real symbolic event: τυ/ποφ. Thus no objection against our interpretation can be derived from the use of this term.

[397] Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247 f.

[398] In Jos.hom. 24,1 (GCS 30) 448 f.

[399] Cf. De princip. I 3,7 (GCS 22) 58,20 f. Cf., on this point, J. Coppens, p. 289.

[400] Didascalia Apostolorum VI 7,2 (F. X. Funk, p. 316); II 41,2 (ibid., p. 130). In these texts it is precisely a question of the imposition of hands at the reconciliation of penance. Cf. Ibid., II 33,1 f. (ibid., pp. 114-16): the 'hand' of the bishop is precisely that which fills the faithful with the Holy Spirit.

[401] Cyprian ep. 75,7 f.18 (CSL 3,2:815.822). On the dependence of Firmilian on Origen: Eusebius, Hist.eccl. VI,27 (GCS 9,2) 580, 16-21.

[402] Cf. above under n. 396.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

more precisely, the rite of reconciliation, because it includes an anointing, ought to be seen as a communication of the Spirit. Thus it is more likely that the imposition of hands with an anointing is not intended – at least, not primarily – as an exorcism but as a sign of the bestowal of the Spirit. This means that in a certain sense the rite of reconciliation should be considered a liturgical parallel to the rite of confirmation, on which it appears to be modelled. This does not entail, however, that Origen must have considered this rite a formal repetition of confirmation. Such a view is precluded by the fact that, on the one hand, confirmation is still too much bound up with initiation while, on the other hand, the once-and-for-all character of this initiation in baptism is explicitly stressed.

B) THE EXTENT OF THE CHURCH'S POWER OF RECONCILIATION

The question which we must now ask is: can the bishop receive back into church fellowship all sinners who are genuinely repentant and after a sufficient period of penance? Or are certain sins eo ipso excluded from such a gracious act? As we have already seen, Origen does not know any mortal sins which cannot be forgiven by God himself. Thus in this life, and quite independently of the theory of the apocatastasis, all faults can be forgiven by God by means of penance. This means that Origen would hardly be likely to restrict the Church's power of reconciliation. In his view the relationship of man to God ought to be reflected in man's relationship to the Church of God. The person who is separated from God has not only fallen foul of the Church interiorly and invisibly but must also be visibly separated from the Church per sententiam episcopi. If, therefore, all sins are able to be forgiven in God's eyes, then it would be a crass contradiction in Origen's thinking if he did not allow all those sinners who are reconciled with God the possibility of also being reconciled again with the Church by the word of the bishop. Such a contradiction is tenable only on the basis of firm proof from the texts of Origen himself. Now such proof is not forthcoming. The only text which could support it with any degree of probability is De or. 28. We will consider this text presently. All the other texts which are adduced on [305] this question concern not the forgiveness of sins by the Church but God's forgiveness, and these have already been considered. Moreover, Origen has no reason to introduce a further essential distinction into his notion of mortal sin. And it is only such a distinction which could make it possible to treat a particular class of mortal sins, as for example the three 'capital sins', in a different way from that provided for the other mortal sins. Thus if Origen submits mortal sins to church penance without making such a differentiation, and if this penance ends in a reconciliation with the Church, then he must have all mortal sins in mind, that is, every person guilty of mortal sin who is repentant is able to return to the Church. And this is in fact the case. According to Contra Celsum III 51,[403] a late work, the Church excludes sinners who have committed fornication or some other α!τοπον, from its fellowship and allows them back only after a long period of penance. With this observation Origen is attempting to counter Celsus' accusation and to stress how strict Christian morality really is. Given this perspective, he would surely have stressed the fact if there had been any sins which totally and radically were excluded from such a reinstatement. But he does not know of any such sins. A similar universal and unrestrictive expression about the reconciliation of those guilty of mortal sins with the Church is found in In Ezech. hom. 3,8:[404] iuste autem proicitur, qui digna facit abiectione, ut auferatur a populo Dei et eradicetur ab eo et tradatur Satanae. Et in praesenti quidem potest quis egrediens de populo Dei rursum paenitentiam reverti. Since this particular

[403] Cf. Ibid. (GCS 2) 247-8.
[404] Ibid. (GCS 33) 357,30-358,1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possibility of a return is opposed to a return in the next life,[405] there can hardly be any sins in praesenti which exclude people from the Church totally and permanently. If there were, then the view expressed in this passage would be groundless. Further, such expressions about the possibility of those guilty of mortal sins being reconciled without any restrictive conditions are found frequently elsewhere in Origen.[406] Thus in practice he declares explicitly that the Church is able to forgive almost all those sins which, because of their seriousness, would seem to warrant a definitive exclusion: impurity to the extent of incest,[407] blasphemy[408] and sins against faith.[409]

There remains, however, the view expressed in De or. 28. Does this agree with Origen's overall teaching on the Church's ability to forgive all mortal sins? As far as our present purpose is concerned, this text simply says the following: bishops should not presume to [306] forgive on their own, through their own sacrifice and prayer, 'against the Lord', idolatry, prostitution, adultery, voluntary homicide and other serious sins which are 'incurable mortal sins'. Rather such sins ought to be 'retained', since the bishop should 'remit' (α)φιε/ναι) only what God also forgives. This is all that this frequently-quoted text actually provides on our subject. From it we may take two main points: if it implies that every church forgiveness is excluded for the sins in question, then, all other things being equal, a divine forgiveness is also excluded, since the latter is the condition of the former.[410] In this case, Origen would be denying the ability not only of the Church but also of God to forgive all mortal sins.[411] We have already seen, however, that such a horrifying rigorism is totally alien to Origen's writings. Moreover, since this text does not exclude every kind of divine forgiveness[412] for all mortal sins, it follows that it is not possible to contest every form of church reconciliation in these cases.

In the second place, the interpretation of this text just outlined would completely deprive the Church's institution of penance, ending as it does with reconciliation, of this object and indeed would render it redundant. For the text withdraws every 'serious' case, every mortal sin from such a power of prayer enjoyed by priests. Thus if this power is identical with that

[405] Ibid. (GCS 33) 358,1-7.

[406] Cf. In Lev.hom. 8,10 (GCS 29) 408,3-8: the sin 'against God' obtains venia by means of interventas omnium, provided it is publicly 'confessed' and subjected to church penance. Origen could not speak in this vein if this venia did not also include that of the Church. In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,7-223,6 simply mentions the sinner who, after doing penance for a sufficient period of time, is again received into the fellowship of the Church. The allusion to 1 Cor. 5:5 and 1 Tim. 1:20 shows that these sinners also include those guilty of incest and blasphemy. In Lev. hom. 14,4 (GCS 29) 486,20-487,3 says, in the context of and with regard to public church penance, that through it our spirit is purified in praesenti vita. Now to claim that public penance is the cause of an effect obtainable in this life would not make sense unless it were possible for this process to come to an end, that is, without the reconciliation of the sinner with the Church.

[407] Ad Rom.praef. (PG 14) 834; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1370 f.: the incestuous person in Corinth is here presented as the typical case of both exclusion from the Church and penance.

[408] In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,12-22, in so far as the case of βλασφημει=ν in 1 Tim. 1:20 is considered susceptible of church reconciliation.

[409] In Lev.hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 489,19 f.: the gravioro crimina also include the biasphemio fidei, quae muro ecclesiastici et apostolici dogmatis cincta est (ibid., 489,14 f.). The locus poenitentiae is granted to these offences, even if only once. The stress on this once-and-for-all character of penance makes sense only if the possibility of penance was really offered: a penance, however, which does not terminate in this life cannot be granted once and refused a second time.

[410] The successor of the apostles, being a spiritual person, α)σιη/σιν α# ε9αν α)φη= ο(θεο&φ De or. 28,8 (GCS 3) 380,12.

[411] The following sins are beyond the reach of the spiritual bishops' power of prayer: τα_ α)νι/ατα (De or, 28,8 [GCS 3] 380,12); μοιξι/α ε9ξου/σιοφ φο&νοφ α!λλο καλεπω&τερον πται=σμα (ibid., 380,28 f.); ει0δωλολατρει/α, μοιξι/α, πορωει/α (ibid., 381,14); α(μαρτι/α προ&φ θα&νατον (ibid., 381,17).

[412] It should be remembered that in Origen α)φιε/ναι, α!φεσιφ does not necessarily mean every kind of forgiveness of sin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

power which is the basis of the official penance of church excommunication and reconciliation, then it must be asked whether such an institution would still have any object at all. In this case, Origen would be denying the very justification of such an institution, whereas in fact it is obvious that in this text he is only concerned about the misuse which 'some' are making of it.[413] In view of the fact that Origen is a man of the Church, he can hardly be credited with the rejection of such a longstanding institution of the Church. For all his radicalism, not even Tertullian dared to do that. Perhaps, then, Origen assigned only light and daily sins to the penance of excommunication. This idea is in direct contradiction to his own statements.[414] Moreover, it would again lead to consequences which are impossible in practice. How, for example, can all sins which are not 'serious' be made the necessary object of a penance of excommunication, in the expectation that such a rule will be taken seriously in practice? These considerations alone lead to the conclusion that in this text the power to forgive sins by means of prayer and sacrifice, which Origen is here restricting, [307] can hardly be the power of church penance of excommunication and the power to forgive sins which is exercised within it. In the light of all that we have said earlier, it is not difficult to see what is meant positively by this power to forgive sins by means of prayer and sacrifice. It is the sin-remitting activity of the Church of the saints, undertaken principally but by no means exclusively by the bishops as spiritual persons and even outside any process of excommunication. It is the Church's support of the penitent by prayer, sacrifice, exhortation, correction, penitential practices, etc., even by sharing in the burden of sin. It is an activity which has always been practised and must continue to be in the community of the saints. In other words, this is what Origen is saying here: mortal sins cannot be remitted solely by this reconciling activity. Rather they must be 'retained', that is, subjected to excommunication. In this case, the bishop should not simply ad gratiam iudicare,[415] that is, bypass excommunication and attempt to apply to incurable sins that medicine which is effective only for sins which have not caused spiritual death, namely, prayer and sacrifice alone. In this passage Origen does not say explicitly that the prescribed penance of excommunication will end with a reconciliation, provided that the sinner is repentant. But this is self-evident for him and indeed precisely in respect of the sins referred to in De or. 28. If he were not to take this obvious principle for granted even in this passage, then he would be contesting the fact that any penance of excommunication, imposed for any mortal sin whatsoever, could end with a church reconciliation. De or., therefore, denies the possibility of a remission of mortal sins by 'prayer' alone, but not the possibility of pardon by means of the 'death' of the penance of [413] De or. 28,10 (GCS 3) 381,12. This fact also shows that it is not essential in the discussion of our question to arrange the writings of Origen chronologically. If he recognizes the institution of penance as a whole, as it must already have existed with a church reconciliation at least several decades before Contra Celsum III 51, then he must know of a church reconciliation after the penance of excommunication already when he is composing the De oratione. He does not challenge this institution, even though he repudiates the abuse which 'some' make of it. If, however, in De or. he had contested the Church's ability to forgive any sins at all, then he would have opposed this institution. G. Teichtweier, p. 290, holds a similar view. J. Grotz, p. 260, however, considers this passage, where Origen is concerned with the abuse of the α!φεσιφ for serious sins, precisely as a confirmation of a power of absolution which can precede an excommunication and be completely separated from it. It is only in this priestly absolution that 'the real sacramental penance' is performed, and this as a kind of opus operatum without the sinner's co-operation by penance; cf. p. 255.

[414] It is impossible to be excommunicated for a levis calpa: In Jos.hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 334,2 f; however, a levis culpa is only that which remains after the ambit of that which is here outside the bishops' power of prayer alone is considered. In fact the latter is exactly identical with what was earlier established as the object of excommunication, that is, as serious sin. The same conclusion follows from In Lev.hom. 15.2 (GCS 29) 489,20 f.: the communia quae frequenter incurrimus do not belong to the object of the penance which is granted once and for all.

[415] In Lev.hom. 12,6 (GCS 29) 265,3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excommunication.[416]

What it is contesting is reconciliation by 'sacrifice' alone, but not reconciliation through μετα&νοια τελει/α.[417] Even when, according to 1 Corinthians 2:25 and 1 John 5:16,[418] both 'sacrifice' and 'prayer' are useless, the anima contribulata and the spiritus humilitatis are still effective.[419] Indeed the very reasoning of De or. includes the idea that the 'servant' alone cannot heal a mortal sin. This requires the intervention of God, which itself must be expressed by the sinner being excluded from the Church and surrendered to Satan for the destruction of his flesh.[420] This interitus carnis brings about the man's salvation and he is subsequently reconciled with the Church. As opposed to this 'taking of sin upon oneself' by the penance of excommunication, [308] any attempt to remit mortal sins by prayer and sacrifice alone would be to presume that an aphesis by God and the Church (in the technical sense of this term in Origen)[421] were possible for these sins. But such an aphesis for these sins does not exist in God's eyes. Thus the Church should not have the presumption to wish to grant it. In other words, in no way does De or. 28 exclude a power of reconciliation in respect of those who have been excommunicated. What is disputed here is the possibility of remitting serious sins solely through the bishop's prayer. Moreover, this prayer is not the prayer which is operative in the reconciliation of excommunicates. Origen is not saying anything different, therefore, from what he maintains elsewhere when he contests the possibility that incurable sins can be remitted by the prayer of the bishop alone. The person guilty of mortal sin must be excommunicated. His sin must be 'retained'. The text does not say that after sufficient penance he ought not to be 'loosened', but it does exclude this both logically and in fact. Otherwise there would be no penance of excommunication ending in reconciliation for mortal sins. And this would stand in contradiction to the whole of Origen's teaching on penance. For he recognizes for every person guilty of mortal sin both forgiveness before God and reincorporation into the Church. Thus De or. 28 is perfectly comprehensible within the general framework of Origen's teaching on penance, without giving rise to any kind of rigorism. Even in this passage the possibility of reconciliation for those who are excommunicated is not restricted. What is restricted, however, is the range of the charismatic remission of sins, and this in favour of, the penance of excommunication.

All this leads to yet another conclusion which, although it does not belong strictly to the

---

[416] In Lev.hom. 11,2 (GCS 29) 452 f.; ibid., 14,4 (GCS 29) 484-7.

[417] Fragm.in 1 Reg. 3,14 (PG 17): only 'simple' sins of 'ignorance' can be forgiven by 'sacrifice', the rest only διə ε1ργων και∴ μετανοι∴ας τελει/αφ. It is a question of the story of Heli which in De or. 28,9 is also one of the biblical examples used to illustrate the principles developed here. The ε0ν α)γνοι/α και∴ ψιλα_ πλημμελη/ματα of 17,40, which can be remitted by sacrifice, correspond well to the α)κου/σια μλημμελη/ματα of De or. (cf. ibid. [GCS 3] 380,27), which can be expiated by 'sacrifice' alone. To the sins by which 'God himself is affronted' correspond in De or. the 'sins against the Lord' (cf. ibid. [GCS 3] 381,10 f.). These parallels show that the fragment is in the spirit of Origen. Thus it is a commentary on De or. the rejection of prayer and sacrifice is not a denial of the efficacy of the τελει/α μετα&νοια. Prayer and sacrifice alone can, therefore, be ineffective, and the sin can still be forgiven. G. Teichtweier, p. 292, lays particular emphasis on the need for the sinner's personal performance of penance, in the sense of a μετα&νοια. In his view, 'the decisive factor in a post-baptismal remission of serious offences is precisely the sinner's personal performance of penance and not the priest's prayer of forgiveness.' Cf. also ibid., p. 308 ff., and esp. p. 319, where the official absolution by the organs of the Church does not play too preponderant a role.

[418] This text is adduced in De or. 28,9 as a proof the principle being defended.

[419] In Lev.hom. 4,5 (GCS 29) 322 f.

[420] Cf. above under the nn. 61, 73, 324 and 331, together with the relevant details.

[421] That Origen knew of this traditional α!φεσιφ-notion at the time of De or. is evident from the contemporary work Exhort. ad mart. 30 (GCS 2) 26,20 ff. Although he disputes that the α!φεσιφ is possible outside baptism and martyrdom, he still assumes that sins can be forgiven, in so far as martyrs, through their vocation, mediate to others (ibid. [GCS 2] 27,5) an α!φεσιφ in the wider sense (as θεραπει/α: ibid. [GCS 2] 26,29). Obviously this happens under the usual conditions which are precisely underlined in De or.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

present context, may be considered briefly. The, bishop's priestly prayer for the forgiveness of sins which is effective outside the penance of excommunication, that is, not with regard to mortal sins, should be understood in today's sense as the sacramental absolution from venial sins outside public penance. Indeed it is 'only' the prayer of the saints for sinners, which the bishop has to offer primarily as a spiritual person, but which is not his official prerogative. It is rather an ε0χουσι/α which he shares basically with every saint who is filled with the Spirit. This is because the whole Church of the saints can and must συνεργει=ν[422] along with the sinner who is doing penance.

[309]

C) THE CONCLUSION OF RECONCILIATION

We now need to raise the question of the duration of the penance of excommunication. From what we have already seen, it is to be expected that the duration of the period of penance varied in length according to the different cases. The criterion for measuring the length of the period of penance was not only the objective and subjective seriousness of a sin as such but also the extent to which this period provided evidence to the leaders of the community and to the community at large of the sinner's sincere, serious and effective intention to mend his ways.[423]

Thus the length of the period of penance necessarily differed from case to case. The excommunication could even be imposed by the bishop himself acting against the will of the member of the community in question. The situation could arise, therefore, in which such a sinner obstinately, and despite the excommunication, was unwilling to eliminate the cause which occasioned it. He consequently remained banned by the Church until he later changed his attitude and the excommunication itself, after being a predominantly disciplinary measure, became an actual part of the institution of penance. With this came the prospect of a proximate lifting of the excommunication.[424] This could also account for the varied duration of excommunication. We cannot tell how long the period of penance lasted in the majority of cases. What is clear is that penance lasted longer than the catechumenate. This point is stressed explicitly.[425] Such a comparison is meaningful, however, only if the two periods

[422] Cf. further details above under nn. 350 and 351, together with the relevant text.

[423] Cf. Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 248,1-3: the conversion must be made clearly visible, that is, the penitent should be readmitted only when he has proven that he has mended his ways by a visible way of life. This obviously required a longer or shorter period of time, according to the particular case.

[424] This could also be at least part of the Sitz im Leben of the later clear distinction between two stages of penance (cf. Didascalia Apost. II 16,1.2; Dionysius, fragm. ep. ad Canonem [see J. B. Pitra, Iuris ecclesiastici Graecorum historia et monumenta (Rome 1864-8) I 545]; Gregorius Thaumat., Ep. can. [J. .B. Pitra, 1562 ff.]). In the first instance, the sinner is either moved by his own guilty conscience or forced by the bishop's ban (cf. Didascalia Apost. II 10,3-5; 16,1) to keep away for a fairly long time from the life of the community, that is, at least from the actual liturgy, until he has re-established his moral relationships and until he can be sure that the dust has settled over the scandal which he has caused. Only then will he have truly sought reconciliation. Before he receives it, however, a further short period of penance in the strict sense is required (Didascalia Apost. II 16,2). A further period is inevitably needed for the verification of the penitent's conversion, the questioning of witnesses on the subject, etc. The other part of this Sitz im Leben must obviously have been a similarly graduated time of preparation in the catechumenate. This 'gradation' is what J. Grotz means by 'stages of penance'. According to him, we must make both in Origen and in all his predecessors in the theology of penance a distinction between excommunication as a stage prior to actual church penance and the much more frequently applied 'real' sacramental church penance without excommunication. 'Excommunication' is imposed only in quite serious cases, where the sinner is obstinate, and in itself has 'nothing to do' with church penance and the forgiveness of sins (J. Grotz, p. 281 f.). In his view, real penance is that which 'has essentially the same characteristics as Cyprian's exhomologesis' (ibid., p. 307). The difference between the two stages is that the unrepeatable excommunication is imposed only in particularly serious cases, whereas the repeatable church penance without excommunication is often performed alone (ibid., p. 248,2 f.).

[425] Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 248,2 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

belong, more or less, to the same 'order of importance'. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that Origen, as Hippolytus,[426] envisages a catechumenate lasting several years. This means that the penance of excommunication could easily last several years, so that a penance of more than three years would not have been considered abnormal. Nevertheless, the possibility of a substantial reduction of the amount of penance required would not have been discounted,[427] if there were evidence of particular zeal and real conversion. Without feeling himself to be out of step with the penitential practice of his day, Origen is able to make capital out of the fact that, in the brief time-lapse between the two letters to the Corinthians, the incestuous person was both excommunicated and reconciled again with the Church.[428] Nevertheless, it would appear that Origen detects a special zeal for penance operating in this case; thus it would be wrong to conclude [310] that in the circles known to him the penance of excommunication usually lasted only a few weeks. This would contradict his own testimony to the effect that the period of penance must be longer than the period of the catechumenate.[429] At the same time, he stresses that the period of penance should be measured with moderation and that, in the determination of its duration, the case of the incestuous person in Corinth is typical.[430] In any event Origen does not evince any notion of a life-long penance.

6. The Meaning of Excommunication

A) THE LASTING CONSEQUENCES OF EXCOMMUNICATION

Reconciliation does not mark the end of all the consequences of excommunication. What we have seen in Cyprian is also found in Origen. Above all, the reconciled person remains a Christian of diminished rights, since he is permanently excluded from holding ecclesiastical office.[431] Naturally this would concern, in the first place, those penitents who were simple Christians when they had, fallen into sin and had done penance. Subsequently they were barred from ecclesiastical offices. Nevertheless, at the same time both in the East and in the West those sinners who, previously, had held ecclesiastical office were treated in the same way.[432] The question which can be asked, however, is whether every kind of [426] Traditio Apostolica 17,1 (G. Dix, The Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of St Hippolytus of Rome [London 1937], p. 28). Although here a catechumenate of three years is required, the author adds immediately that if the catechumen is very zealous he can be received more quickly, since it is not time but behaviour that counts.

[427] Especially since it was obviously necessary to overcome strong resistance against public penance on the part of Christians and in general there was a tendency to be too lenient rather than too strict. Moreover, the question always had to be decided whether in fact a public church penance had to be imposed or not: De or. 28,10 (GCS 3) 381, 12-22; In Jos. hom. 7,6 (GCS 30) 332-4; In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 137 ff.; In Ezech.hom. 10,1 (GCS 33) 416-18; In Jer.hom. 14,14 (GCS 6) 120,4-14. Cf. on this point Jerome's translation (PG 13) 422. In Jer.hom. 12,5 (GCS 6) 92,10 ff.

[428] Ad Rom.praef. (PG 14) 834.

[429] The fact that in the Didascalia Apost. II 16,2 (F. X. Funk, p. 60) theme is a question of a period of penance lasting only a few weeks can hardly be used as an objection against this point. For it must be assumed, following E. Schawamtz, Bussstufen and Katechumenatsklassen, (Strassburg 1911), p. 19ff., and B. Poschmann, p. 477, that this length of time refers only to penance in the strict sense of the word, by which the penitent is tested after his prayer to be reconciled with the Church to see whether he is really converted. Naturally this conversion must already have taken place previously. At the beginning of this second stage, the penitent is examined to see 'whether he is worthy to be received into the Church'. The proof of this worthiness must, therefore, already be present and is not merely to be produced in the next few weeks of meal penance. Cf. also In Jem. hom. 12,5 (GCS 6) 92,12 f., where it is emphasized that reconciliation ought not to take place too quickly lest the whole Church suffer harm.

[430] In Jer.hom. 20,9 (GCS 6) 192,3-10; In Joan. XXVIII 4 (GCS 10) 393,7-14.

[431] Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 248,3-5.

[432] In fact the principle applied was that the higher a person's rank in the Church is, the harder he is to be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excommunication imposed on a bishop or a priest was in fact experienced and considered as an excommunication of penitents and, accordingly, entailed this lasting consequence even after it was lifted.

Yet another consequence which remained permanently after reconciliation was the impossibility of a second church penance: in gravioribus enim criminibus semel tantum poenitentiae conceditur locus.[433] The principle of the unrepeatable character of church penance of excommunication was clearly received from Hermas and Clemens and was practised in Origen's day. It is presented as being self-evident and not needing further justification. Moreover, Origen does not appear to have seen any problem in reconciling this principle of church discipline with his theological principle that God always accepts genuine penance. It may be that cases of this kind did not occur frequently enough to necessitate theological reflection. Or perhaps the principle was quietly and discretely simply not applied [311] in all its rigour to such cases. Nevertheless, given the salvific importance attributed to the Church in the theology of that time, it is doubtful whether any would then have ventured the theory which is found later in Augustine,[434] namely, that a Christian who has fallen back into sin again could receive salvation even without church reconciliation, provided that he did penance.

B) THE THEOLOGICAL MEANING OF OFFICIAL CHURCH RECONCILIATION

We have now reached the decisive point in our discussion of Origen's teaching on penance. For all that the remission of sin, even quite independently of excommunication and its being lifted, was not only a matter of what happened within the private individual but was also achieved by the co-operation of the Church of the saints, it remains a fact that this involvement of the whole body in the guilt of one of its members should not be styled 'sacramental' in today's sense of this term.[435] Apart from the case of the reconciliation of a person who is excommunicated, the texts of Origen provide evidence only for an ecclesial but not for an ecclesial-sacramental remission of sins. Can, therefore, the official reconciliation of an excommunicate be considered as a sacramental act? It has already been sufficiently proven that this act was performed by the hierarchical Church with the awareness that it has been empowered to do so by Christ. But this does not entitle us to call it sacramental. Our question can be answered only when a further question is settled: does Origen ascribe to this act a meaning which goes beyond that of a purely church disciplinary measure? This obviously also implies the question of how such an assumed transcendent meaning of the act of reconciliation fits into the whole celebration of penance and how it is related to the reconciling activity within this celebration of both the sinner himself and the Church of the saints. It is only by keeping these questions in mind that we will avoid the danger of ascribing to reconciliation a meaning which it does not have in Origen's view. He provides very little information either explicitly or thematically on this problem. Thus we will find an answer to our question partly by paying careful attention to significant motifs and indications in other areas of his teaching.

In considering the theological significance of excommunication, we have made it punished: In Ezech.hom. 5,4 (GCS 33) 375,2-9. Although this refers in the first place to the punishments of the next life, it also applied within the Church itself – at least in theory. On this point, cf. G. May, 'Bemerkungen zu der Frage dem Diffamation und der Irregularität der öffentlichen Büsser' in: MThZ 12 (1961), pp. 252-68.

---

[433] In Lev.hom. 15,2 (GCS 29) 489,19 f. This does not concern the possibility to repeat penance; cf. In Lev.hom. 11,2 (GCS 29) 452,21-5. It is here a question of penance after a repeated sin, which ought not to be a reason for finally abandoning penance.

[434] Augustine, Ep. 153,7 (PL33) 655 f.

[435] This is also the view of G. Teichtweier, p. 325.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sufficiently clear that reconciliation with the Church [312] is not purely a matter of discipline. If the Church is the necessary means of grace and salvation, and this precisely in so far as it is a visible community of salvation, then it follows that reconciliation, considered as a readmission, must have a decisive meaning for salvation.[436] If the excommunicated person, by virtue of his legitimate exclusion, is 'handed over to Satan' and thus stands outside the possibility of salvation – even if, in Origen's view, this 'being outside' still has a mysterious salvific meaning – then everything depends on the return to the homeland and to the people of God, and on the reincorporation into the unity of Christ's body. How can man be saved? How can he return to the Church? For Origen these questions are two sides of the same coin.[437] Here we have a parallel to what we have already seen with regard to excommunication: the saving significance of official reconciliation as readmission into the fellowship of the Church which is necessary for salvation is not undermined by the fact that this official act only achieves officially what must have already taken place 'interiorly' somehow by the conversion of the sinner himself. This corresponds to the fact that the sinner is already 'outside' the fellowship of grace before he is exteriorly and officially excommunicated. In fact in the present instance the position is even clearer. If, according to Origen, the person guilty of mortal sin, who is already 'outside' in God's eyes, must also be unconditionally and necessarily excommunicated, and if it would be presumption on the part of those in authority and even worse presumption on the part of the sinner himself to attempt to bypass this phase by relying on the interior reconciliatory power of the Church (its prayer), then it follows that a person guilty of mortal sin cannot be genuinely repentant if he does not have recourse to the penance of excommunication. He cannot return to the church interiorly, therefore, without being prepared to submit himself to exterior excommunication. But if this is necessary, then the same applies to its official lifting by the Church, that is, to the reconciliation by the bishop.

This is also what happens at baptism. Origen makes it abundantly clear that before baptism a person must dissociate himself interiorly from sin. In so doing, however, it is far from Origen's mind to cast doubt on the necessity, the efficacy and the saving significance of [436] J. Grotz, pp. 304-6, sees in In Joan. XXVIII 7 (GCS 10) 397 f. a proof for his own view that the granting of the communio and sacramental reconciliation are not one and the same thing. In fact he understands readmission into the fellowship of the Church as an exclusively canonical measure. In view of Grotz's interpretation of the allegory of Lazarus, it must be asked how a granting of the communia can be understood if there is still exclusion from the Eucharist. Grotz must grant that such a granting of communio does not mean full integration into the community of the Church. At the same time, the text suggests the continuation of an excommunication, in so far as the description of the Christian summoned out of the grave is not compatible with one who shares in the fellowship of the Church. This is evident from the following: '. . . he is still wearing the bonds of death of his earlier sins and a band round his eyes, and he does not see, nor can he go anywhere or do anything because of the bonds of death, until Jesus orders those who can untie him to let him go' (ibid. [GCS 10] 397). 'There the person who follows Jesus can see how such a person does indeed come out because of Jesus' call but is still bound with the cords of his sin and tied by them; because of his sorrow and his listening to Jesus' voice he does indeed live, but he is still hound hands and feet with the bonds of the grave, the shackles of death, because he is not yet delivered from the chains of sin nor free to do anything properly' (ibid. [GCS 10] 397-8). 'And because death still dwells in him, he is not only bound hands and feet but also blindfolded' (ibid. [GCS 10] 397-8). For the tr. of the texts, cf. also H. Karpp, Die Busse: Quellen zur Entstehung des altkirchlichen Busswesens (Zürich 1969), pp. 235-9. According to this text, therefore, by Jesus' call the sinner becomes aware of the helplessness of his separation from the community of the Church's grace and reveals his readiness to return. Even after his summons from the grave the sinner is still bound and does not yet enjoy the freedom to realize his return on his part. Grotz, however, considers that at this point the communio is already given, although he does so in function of an external, juridical notion of the Church which does not consider its interior effect on grace. This, however, contradicts Origen's ecclesiology. He calls the immediate effect of the 'loosing' man's freedom which allows him to attain fellowship with Christ. This is realized in the participation in the Eucharist.

[437] In Ps.hom. 2,4 (PG 12) 1353.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

visible sacramental baptism.[438] Both the interior and the exterior act have the same aim, but we shall have to consider more closely, with [313] the help of Origen himself, precisely how they are interrelated. The point which needs to be made for the moment is that Origen considers reconciliation an indispensable, visible reincorporation into the interior fellowship of grace which is necessary for salvation. This obviously means that, in his view, it already has a transcendent effect and should in this sense be described as 'sacramental'. In later terminology it would represent at least 'the necessary condition', without which any further activity on the part of the penitent or of the Church would be useless, since the penitent would remain outside the community which was necessary for salvation. Thus according to the Scholastic theory reconciliation would have at least a causalitas dispositiva. The dispositio exigens formam which was acquired by it was not an ornatus animae, as it was called up until Thomas Aquinas' commentary on the Sentences, but the frilly effective membership of the body of Christ who communicates his Spirit and his salvation to all his fully legitimate members. Nevertheless, this distinction need not prevent us from seeing a genuine sacramental causality in this way of conceiving the effect of reconciliation. The fully legitimate membership of the Church of grace would be the res et sacramentum of complete salvation and, as such, the immediate effect of the official church reconciliation.

But does this translation of Origen's teaching into more recent categories not betray his original thinking? Does it not ascribe to reconciliation an effect which, according to Origen, is really the result of the sinner's personal penance, albeit supported by the cooperation of the Church of the saints? This objection raises the question of the relationship between reconciliation and the other reconciling activities. It is obvious that Origen himself did not experience any more difficulty on this point than he did with regard to the relationship between the personal purification from sin as a preparation for baptism and the forgiveness of sins through the sacramental act of baptism. Today we do not find it very easy to envisage a purification from sin which is not purely and simply identical with the communication of the Holy Spirit. But Origen did not experience this difficulty. Thus he was able to ascribe that purification from sins to the personal preparation for baptism[439] and to consider the communication of the Holy Spirit as an effect of the sacrament.[440] We can, therefore, say that according to Origen, despite all the penance performed during the time of the catechumenate and the purification [314] from sins which is gained thereby, it is only the incorporation into the Church by baptism that communicates the Holy Spirit. The principle, si desit eis gratia Spiritus, nec membra esse Christi corporis possunt,[441] can therefore be reversed: it is only by being a member of Christ's body in the full sense that a person can also posses the Holy Spirit. In view of the fact that Origen conceives the period of penance of excommunicates as

[438] Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, pp. 54-6.
[439] Cf., for example, In Luc.hom. 21 (GCS 35) 139 f.: it could here be a question simply of giving up sin, without any reference to an actual purification from previous sins. Nevertheless, the thinking seems to be moving in that direction. In Luc. hom. 22 (GCS 35) 145 f.: here the idea is somewhat clearer; the catechumens must no longer be a generotio viperarum. when they come to baptism. Ad Rom. V 8 (PG 14) 1037-41. Here the idea is clear: the catechumen must be already dead to sin, the old man must be already dead and must discard all impurity, if he wishes to be buried with Christ in the new grave of baptism and receive the Spirit. Cf. also Contra Celsum III 59 f. (GCS 2) 254 f. This conception must have presented few difficulties for Origen, since he unconsciously recognized that even the unbaptized were capable of supernatural virtues. Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 42 ff.
[440] Cf. Ad Rom.; this teaching receives its clearest expression in the fragment of Origen which Athanasius has transmitted to us; cf. Ep. IV ad Serapionem n. 10 (PG 26) 649-52: the Son is already at work in the catechumens, but the Holy Spirit only in those who have received him through the gift of baptism. This notion lies at the basis of the idea that only the baptized can commit sins against the Holy Spirit. Cf. above nn.65-71 and the corresponding text. Accordingly, John's baptism is already 'purifying' but does not fill converts with the Holy Spirit, as does Jesus' baptism; cf. In Joan. VI 32 (GCS 10) 141,22-7. Cf. H. Rahner, pp. 208- 14.
[441] Ad Rom. IX 2 (PG 14) 1215.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a kind of second catechumenate and reconciliation as a reconiungere membris Ecclesiae, there is no reason why this idea should not be applied to penance. It is by reconciliation that the purified penitent is reincorporated into the fellowship of the Church and so recovers the Holy Spirit which he had lost. We have already seen[442] that Origen considers personal penance less as an acquisition of the Holy Spirit than as a moral purging of the interior state of sin, in other words, as a destruction of the 'flesh'. This fits into what we have just said.

Moreover, the interitus carnis, Origen's comprehensive key expression for the personal penance of the excommunicate, also corresponds very precisely to the 'death' which according to In Rom. V, 8 the catechumens have to undergo before receiving the Spirit in baptism. In this connection, it should not be forgotten either that the imposition of hands in reconciliation appears to be considered as a gesture for the communication of the Spirit. Origen obviously gives great prominence to personal penance, and this interpretation of its relationship to reconciliation does not diminish its importance. For, according to Origen, reconciliation always presupposes excommunication. It is this excommunication that occasions that which is most fundamental: conversion. The sinner is shaken out of the insensitivity of his sinfulness by grace and experiences the interior fire of judgement which burns for his salvation. This fire is the Logos itself. It is in this way that sin reaches its furthest limit and so actually becomes a means of redemption. The actual reversal in man's development is, therefore, the work of God alone and occurs before the intervention of the Church with its reconciliation.[443]

The conclusion which we have just reached somewhat indirectly is confirmed by the text In Lev.hom. 8,11.[444] It has already been shown that this text concerns penance for sins committed after baptism.[445] Here there is a clear distinction made within penance between a purgatio (purificatio) from sins, on the one hand, and a receiving of the donum gratiae, a replenishment by the Holy Spirit, a reacquisition [315] of the 'robe' and the 'ring', that is, sonship, on the other hand. The purification is achieved by conversion from sin, by a gradual process, through which the sinner by his own effort, but also supported by the priest, abolishes sin and continually eradicates the consequences of sin. In other words, it occurs by 'subjective penance'.[446] The communication of the Spirit, however, per olei imaginem designatur. Even if it is considered uncertain that Origen knew of a liturgical anointing which was associated with the well-attested imposition of hands, the clear distinction between purification from sins and reception of the Spirit must imply a distinction also in the causes of these two events – just as there is in baptism and the preparation for it. Once this is granted, then the only possible cause of the reception of the Spirit is the rite of reconciliation. If the text is allowed its most obvious meaning,[447] that is, if the olei imago is taken in the [442] Cf. above under nn. 89, 198, 211, 213 and 316, together with the corresponding considerations.

[443] This is obviously the case in today's theology too. It is necessary for God to have touched man's heart with his grace before he can produce the 'sorrow' which is essential for the sacrament and its effect. This is self-evident. Nevertheless, our treatises on the sacrament of penance sometimes give the impression not so much of denying this truth as of forgetting it. They take it so much for granted that they usually give a very scant theological reflection on this purely divine beginning of man's conversion.
[444] Cf. ibid. (GCS 29) 417,12-18.
[445] This still applies, even if the real liturgical anointing with oil at reconciliation is not accepted as proven.
[446] The profectus quidam purgationum (In Lev.hom. 8 [GCS 29] 412,4) bring it about that gradually the person arrives ad summam puritatis (ibid., 412,6). These purifications consist, for instance, in the renunciation of all sins and all their harmful consequences, in thoughts, words and deeds (Ibid., 412,18-413,2; 41,16), in the renunciation of arrogantia (ibid., 414,12), in the positive conversion to God through virtue (ibid., 415,6 ff.), in the production of new virtues (ibid., 415,11 ff.). After these purifications (cf. the three-fold post: ibid., 417,4.) the Spirit is communicated.
[447] It should not be overlooked that Origen applies the text Jas. 5:14 f. to penance and, in so doing, introduces into it an imposition of hands. This is understandable only if a real imposition of hands did occur in penance. Thus, it is also unlikely that the anointing with oil which is likewise mentioned in Jas. 5 did not figure in the rite

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sense of a real anointing which accompanies the imposition of hands, then it expresses immediately what is meant: the purification from sins datur per illa omnia quae superius diximus (that is, through the progressive destruction of sin by means of the poenitudinem gerere (415,6), the deponere peccata (414,10), etc. But the communication of the Spirit occurs in the act of reconciliation by the olei imago.[448]

The only objection that could be levelled against this view is that it follows the lines of current modern sacramental theology in ascribing one effect to man's personal act and the other to the sacramental act of the Church. In other words, it overlooks the fact that, in Origen's view, the visible act of the Church, in so far as it is effective, is the typus ecclesiis traditus,[449] that is, the manifestation of that which is accomplished in the depths of man's being as an encounter between God and man. Accordingly, for this objection there would be no act of the Church having an effect which 'otherwise' would not happen and which occurs after that which man has done previously with God's grace alone.

Against this it must be stressed that for Origen excommunication and reconciliation are two phases of one simple event. They both have the same aim. Excommunication is not merely a vindictive punishment which is to be lifted as quickly as possible, even in view of penance. It is rather a τυ/ποφ of the fact that the person guilty of mortal sin is now in the situation of grace in which alone he can be cured, that is, in the immediate grace of God's own judgement. After [316] the failure of the Church's created saving powers the sin is pronounced 'incurable' and, by excommunication, the sinner is handed over to the judgement of God who is his physician. Thus excommunication and reconciliation together 'cover' visibly in the Church as a τυ/ποφ the one event which happens in fact. The sinner who recognizes the 'truth' of his sin, that is, his 'being outside', is redeemed. But it is precisely because this 'outside' is itself also included in the grace of Christ in virtue of his death that the sinner returns as he does, sharing in that death by his own interitus carnis.

It is only within the one event, which, as a whole, has an ecclesial and an interior aspect and occurs with these two aspects interacting inseparably that the relationship which we have stressed between an individual moment of the ecclesial dimension and an individual moment of the interior dimension is understood and justified.[450]

To complete our view on this question we need to make two further points. The sinner's personal interior penance and even the reconciling activity of the Church of the saints are both visible within the Church, even though they are carried out as an event of the 'interior' Church in virtue of the Spirit of its holiness. Thus even the sinner's personal penance occurs publicly in the Church, since it is an exhomologesis which is under church supervision and, in certain circumstances, may even be enforced officially. The reconciling activity of the Church of the saints is visible in the exhortation of fellow Christians and of the bishop as well of reconciliation. If this were not the case, there would be no reason why Origen thought of referring this text to reconciliation at all. After all, he is the one who introduces the imposition of hands into the text. Thus he must have discovered another indication in the text which suggested to him that here James was thinking of a remission of sins apart from that granted during a meal illness. Now such an indication could only be the anointing with oil, since this was also used in the reconciliation of penitents. That Origen in Lev.hom. 8,11 (GCS 29) 416,1-417,1 understands the application of the oil 'mystically' is not an argument against the actual use of real oil in reconciliation, but means only the quest for the higher 'truth' contained in the real symbols of the liturgy.

---

[448] G. Teichtweier, p. 326, rejects this decisively, since 'according to the whole context of this passage . . . it is all only an allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament purification ceremonies'. The passages which he adduces, however, esp. Selecta in Ez. XVI (PG 13) 812, do not contradict the observations made above.

[449] Cf. Ad Rom. V 8 (PG 14) 1038.

[450] This general theological observation alone renders questionable the dividing of the event of penance into a purely canonical excommunication, on the one hand, and a sacramental, 'real' penance, on the other (cf. J. Grotz).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as in the offering of sacrifice by priests.

C) A SYSTEMATIC SURVEY

Moreover, although the beginning of penance, consisting of the immediate, divinely inspired awareness of the interior fire of judgement, and its end, consisting of the direct reception of the Holy Spirit, are both essential for the person guilty of mortal sin and his penance, this does not mean that a mediation of created sanctifying powers, acting in all their human and ecclesial dimensions, is in any way excluded. In fact God's immediate act of conversion leads man back into this reality of the created sanctifying powers and subjects him to their influence Christ honours the angel of the Church', who has to lead the sinner to full health and who, therefore, like the good Samaritan, brings the sinner back into the inn of the Church.[451] God hands the sinner over to the 'angel of penance'.[452] We have already [317] seen that even the devil, to whom the person guilty of mortal sin is 'handed over', has, in Origen's system, a positive role in penance which he carries out unwillingly as God's agent. Thus the process of penance as a whole is visible as a reality of the Church in all its phases. It takes place in all the dimensions of created reality in the ambit of the visible, hierarchical Church, just as it does in the Church considered as an interior community of grace and in the depths of man's personal freedom, that is, at the point where man is in direct contact with God. The process comprises three phases which do not necessarily succeed each other chronologically. It begins with insensitivity and the immediacy of God which is experienced within it as a radical judgement; it passes into and through the medium of the created punitive and, thereby, healing reality of the Church and of man's flesh; it ends with the immediate awareness of God, this, time experienced as radical love in the reception of the Holy Spirit. If we distinguish in this way the dimensions and the development of the penitential process and represent it schematically we obtain a record of all its aspects in the schema produced on page 318 which is designed to illustrate both the complexity and the unity of Origen's view of the penance of Christians.

This schema ought to be fully comprehensible, for the most part,[453] in the light of what we have already seen. This applies even to most of the connections between the individual elements of the penitential process. The following considerations are intended to facilitate a further understanding, particularly concerning the sacramental nature and efficacy of the process.

The first striking aspect of this schema is that the three dimensions of the penitential process which it distinguishes obviously evince a relationship with what later theology will call sacramentum – res et sacramentum – res sacramenti. This relationship becomes clear immediately res et sacramentum is understood in its most meaningful and objective sense and not as a formal, abstract, juridical or ontological concept. This notion really means an

[451] In Luc.hom. 34 (GCS 35) 204,14-26.
[452] In Ps. 37 hom. 1,1 (PG 12) 1372. It should not be forgotten that this activity of the created heavenly powers is also the 'truth' of the τυ/ποφ which happens in the Church, where the bishop, the angel's earthly counterpart, has an analogous role in the education of penitents.
[453] For the sake of the clarity and simplicity of the schema, we have attempted to express here Origen's notion that the whole penitential event is also an 'image' of the eschatological purification of man, who must endure the future fire of judgement. This 'prospective' tendency of every sacramental event towards an eschatological truth should not be overlooked. Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 56 ff. What is here said concerning baptism also applies to penance: ego puto quad et post resurrectionem ex mortuis indigeamas sacramento eluente nos atque purgante: In Luc.hom. 14 (GCS 35) 99,8-12; cf. In Matt.tom. XV 23 (GCS 40) 416-18. In fact, according to In Jer.hom. 20,8-9 (GCS 6) 190-2, the penitential fire of this life is an anticipation of the eschatological fire which will purify man definitively.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation inner relationship of the recipient of the sacrament to the Church.[454] It is brought about by the sacramental sign. It is specific to each individual sacrament, and through it a special grace is communicated. On this view the sacramentum is the visible event in the dimension of the official Church (of the potestas ordinis), the res et sacramentum is the relationship of man to the Church as the means of grace, signified and

[318]

		Direction of the Progress of the Penitential Process
		God alone in grace as judgment ▶	the created powers as the grace of reconciliation ▶	◀ (again) God alone in grace as salvation
The Dimensions of the Penitential Process	The exterior Official Church	official church excommunication as the image of the expulsion into the 'outside' that is God's judgment ▼	public penance and official correptio, sacrifice of the Church, 'prayer' ▶ ▼	◀ official reconciliation (reverti ad Ecclesiam) ▼
	The Interior Church of the Saints	▲ the interior separation from the Church as a means of grace ▼	the interior reconciling activity of the Church of the saints by means of the co-redemptive 'assumption' of the sinner's guilt ▼	full participation in the Church as the means of grace (reconiungi corpori Christi et membris Ecclesiae) ▼
	Man as Spirit and Flesh	the experience of God as the interior fire of judgement ▶	interius carnis ut spiritus salvus fiat ▶	reception of the Holy Spirit effected by the sacramentum, and finally the res sacramenti is the grace of the Church which accrues to man as a result of this relationship and which effects his whole activity and being. The relationship between the three notions of later theology and the three dimensions of the penitential process which are discernible in Origen should now be quite clear. The events or effects which we have just outlined in fact are each produced by one of the three dimensions.

[454] Cf., for example, M. de la Taille, Mystenium fidei 3 (Paris 1931), p. 581, where this relationship of res et sacramentum to the Church, especially in penance, is already fairly clear. It is certainly evident in Augustine's teaching on the Eucharist: the Eucharist is also essentially sacramentum communionis ad Ecclesiam, and it is perfectly comprehensible to present this most profound unity with Christ's mystical body as the res et sacramentum of the Eucharist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The peculiarity [319] of Origen's view consists solely in the fact that the sacramental event (sacramentum) and its immediate (res et sacramentum) and mediated (res sacramenti) effect itself have three stages in each of these dimensions. They are to be considered, therefore, as a dynamic process and not merely as static entities. It is only when each dimension is seen in relation to the others that its full significance can be assessed precisely.

The three stages which are discernible in the schema with regard to the direction and the succession of the development in the penitential process could obviously be put in a different order. Origen's thought would probably not be violated if the second and third stages were transposed. For the handing over of the penitent to the saving powers of the interior Church can also be understood as the consequence (as well as the presupposition) of a change of an intimate awareness of God as anger and judgement to an awareness of him as love. In this sense God would deliver to the Church the person who is already saved. The awareness of his judgement is already a grace for him, so that the first and the third stages of the schema are practically only two aspects of one and the same act by which God transforms man. Such a transposition is not made unfeasible by the fact that in the dimension of the visible and official Church public penance and the official correptio obviously and clearly take place before church reconciliation. For it should not be forgotten that the reconciling activity of the Church, both as official and as holy, like the interior work of penance, the interitus carnis, which ends only with actual death, continues beyond reconciliation, even if somewhat less explicitly than previously. The Church's teaching about penance, the sacrifice on its altars, its prayer, the interior expiation of the saints, the offering of the martyrs and the death of the elderly – all these are permanent features of the Church which exercise a saving influence on the sinner. Thus reconciliation, in so far as it is a readmission to the Church, may very easily be considered as an incorporation into this Spirit-permeated, reconciling and active medium of grace that is the Church. The Church bestows the Spirit on the new and the renewed member not only through its being but also through its permanent life.

This clarifies a point which previously was probably left vague and, when expressed, did not appear to correspond very well to Origen's own thinking. Reconciliation bestows the Spirit. Provided that this [320] is correctly understood, it is what Origen means. In this view reconciliation confers the Spirit in so far as it means the incorporation into the static and active medium of grace that is the inner Church of the saints. In other words, this middle term in Origen's system must not be overlooked. Origen is so insistent that the personal possession of the Spirit is an indispensable condition in everyone who, by prayer, exhortation, etc., contributes to the reconciliation of others, that it is unthinkable that he should renounce this principle completely where it is a question of the bestowal of the Spirit by official reconciliation. It can certainly be applied here without the implication of Donatism. We have already established that Origen does not lean in this direction in the case of the other sacraments, and this would also contradict his view on the teaching of penance. The person who is reconciling does not transmit his Spirit of grace but reincorporates the penitent legitimately into the visible Church. But, in so doing, he places the penitent within that medium of grace which as a whole possesses this Spirit perpetually and inalienably and, therefore, communicates it to all those who legitimately belong to it. Thus the Church achieves in them that victory of the Spirit over the mortal flesh which is the condition for the personal possession of the gift of the Holy Spirit. There is every indication, therefore, that Origen's view of the effects of church reconciliation is already similar to that which will be held later by Augustine.[455] Accordingly, reconciliation does not simply transmit the Spirit from the person who is reconciling, as the Donatists would have it, or even from God to the [455] Cf., for example, B. Poschmann, 'Die kirchliche Vermittlung der Sündenvergebung nach Augustin' in: ZKTh 45 (1921), pp. 208-28; 405-32; 497-526.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penitent through the instrumentality of the person reconciling, after the fashion of the usual way of explaining sacramental causality. Rather it communicates the Spirit in so far as it incorporates the penitent into the community which already possesses this Spirit, namely, the Church. And this happens irrespective of whether the person reconciling possesses this Spirit personally or not. Nevertheless, the person who claims the right to take part in the Church's reconciling activity must also possess this Spirit himself. The person who is not holy, therefore, communicates the Spirit only when and in so far as he incorporates the penitent into the permanently holy body of Christ. If this body were ever to be deprived of the Spirit – which of course is absolutely impossible – then the sacrament would be ineffective. The fact that the interior personal state of the individual dispensing the sacrament is irrelevant to the effect of the sacrament [321] should not lead to the conclusion that the possession of the Spirit by the Church of the saints is also irrelevant to the power of its sacraments. The reconciling activity of the Church of the saints is only the necessary expression of its holy reality. Thus this activity is the indispensable condition of the effective communication of the Spirit by official reconciliation. Consequently, the individual phases which are discernible in the process of penance suppose each other and are interdependent to such an extent that, in the final analysis, one of them cannot be isolated from the others and stand in relation to them completely and independently as an efficient cause to its external effect. The individual phases are supported by the whole and it is only within this whole that it is possible to ascribe to one phase a 'causal' relationship with regard to another. Obviously all this throws some light on Origen's notion of the causality of the sacramental sign.

The schema also illustrates the fact that, according to Origen, what happens visibly in the sphere of the official Church is not only the tangible embodiment of the Church's activity, having an effect in the depth of man's soul, but also the expression of man's interior journey of conversion. This man meets God in his fire of judgement burning immediately within him. He is, therefore, 'outside' the Church and begins again to allow himself to be influenced by the saving grace of Christ's body. It is for this reason that he does penance publicly and then receives the Holy Spirit by dying in penance. He is then once more in the fellowship of the Church. For Origen the sacramental sign is the embodiment of the act of God and the act of man as they occur within the Church. Later Thomas Aquinas will say that the 'acts of the penitent' are the interior constitutive elements (materia) of the sacramental event. We have something similar in Origen, although without the notion of hylomorphism. Moreover, the sacramental sign is so organically articulated in the penitential institution of the early Church that everything is clearly at the same time the expression of the act of God and the act of man. This made it impossible for Origen to ascribe a part of the visible sacramental event exclusively to man's interior act and another part exclusively to God's act.

All these considerations justify us in treating the whole external event of penance, from excommunication up to reconciliation, as the expression of that which is happening in the interior reality of the [322] Church and within the personal depths of the man who is converting himself. Considered as the unity of the visible activity of the hierarchical Church and of the public activity and suffering of the penitent within the Church, this event is what Origen calls συ/μβολον,[456] in the case of baptism. This applies to what happens interiorly

[456] Cf., for example, In Joan. VI 33 (GCS 10) 142,28; Contra Celsum III 51 (GCS 2) 247,10; In Jer.hom. 19,13 (GCS 6) 169,22 f.; Ad Rom. V 8 (PG 14) 1038; συ/μβολον, πυ/ποφ are here distinguished from the καθα&ρσιον ψυξη=φ, the δυ/ναμιφ of the event or – as we can also say with Origen – from the α)ληθινα_ κατα_ τα_ ο)νο&ματα ταυ=τα (which designate the symbol) πρα&γματα. In Matt.tom. XVI 22 (GCS 40) 338,10-13: it is here said of what is the interior 'truth', the signified reality of the officials of the hierarchy. Obviously this does not mean that τυ/ποφ and συ/μβολον (which are also often used elsewhere as synonyms by Origen) only or even principally have this meaning of sacramental sign and image (which is fulfilled by the reality signified). Mostly these words have the meaning which today's theological terminology still knows by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and we have here perhaps some more light thrown on the way in which Origen envisages the efficacy of the sacrament. It is no longer a question here of showing that with regard to the sacramental event in general or to penance in particular this event is the effective sign of the interior event of grace. This has also been already treated elsewhere.[457] What we wish to consider at the moment is how to define more precisely the way in which the visible event is effective. Now, according to Origen, all the phases of the penitential process in its different dimensions are so interdependent that the interior and exterior aspects should be considered to be related to each other reciprocally as cause and effect. This is the only way of doing justice to Origen's own testimony. It is possible that the notion of τυ/ποφ (συ/μβολον) will help us to answer the question of how such a relationship of reciprocal dependence of the individual phases in the one process can be conceived. However, this relationship should not be depreciated by making the συ/μβολον a mere subsequent and, ultimately, unimportant reflection of an event which exists independently in itself. At the same time, it ought not to be exaggerated in the sense that it can no longer be considered the expression and consequence, that is, the 'manifestation' of the interior aspect. On one occasion Origen[458] calls the bodily gesture of prayer συ/μβολον and ει0κω&ν of the free interior attitude of prayer[459] which is visible in the body and so impresses on it an 'image' of the ι0διω&ματα of the soul. Indeed, in general for Origen what is perceived by the senses is essentially only a sign and an image of what is true and real.[460] But the relationship between the body and the soul is the most simple and the most intelligible case illustrating what A. von Harnack says on the subject of the 'symbol' of the ancients:

> We today understand by symbol a thing which is not what it signifies; at that time symbol was understood as a thing which in some way was what it signified; at the same time, according to that previous way of thinking, the true heavenly reality always lay in or behind the manifestation, without coinciding with it completely on earth.[461]

[323] The scholastic theory of the relationship between the soul and the body still provides us today with perhaps the best access for our thinking habits to an understanding of the ancient notion of συ/μβολον. Origen himself justifies such an approach, since he holds that the corporeal is a συ/μβολον of the psychic. Now if the corporeal is understood not merely as the juxtaposed expression of a spiritual reality which is itself independent of this expression, but rather as a manifestation in which the spiritual, even though it is distinct from the manifestation, must be expressed in order to be itself, then it is possible to understand how the interior and the exterior aspects are related to each other in the symbol of the sacrament. The symbol is the expression of grace in the mystery, in the sense that this grace is expressed only there and depends upon it, in the same way that the symbol depends upon the grace. The 'incarnation' is the way in which the grace becomes present. By being given a body it is given existence. According to Origen the sacrament-image is not, as in modern sacramental the word 'type'.

---

[457] Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 55.

[458] The drawing of this parallel (the body as συ/μβολον of the soul) seems justified, because Origen himself in his teaching on the sacraments speaks about an 'embodiment' of the power of grace: In Joan. VI 33 (GCS 10) 142,26: σωματικω~φ γι/νεσθαι.

[459] De or. 31,2 f (GCS 3) 396,12 f.; 396,23 f. On this parallel between the spiritual and bodily expression (signum): In Num. hom. 2,2 (GCS 30) 10-12.

[460] Cf. H. U. von Balthasar, Le Mystérion, p. 517 f.

[461] A. von Harnack, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte I (Tübingen 1931), p. 476. On this Platonic-early Christian notion of image, cf. A. Lieske, p. 212 ff., and the literature which he cites; G. Söhngen, Symbol und Wirklicheit im Kultmysterium (Bonn 1940), p. 55 ff., points out that such a notion could also find an application in today's theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theology, 'image' because it is effective, or even 'image and effective', but it is precisely 'effective as image' or 'effective, because it is image'. Grace is produced and is present because and in so far as it is embodied within its symbol, just as there are spiritual attitudes which are only present if they are realized by the bodily gesture which they themselves produce. Thus the συ/μβολον of the sacrament is a cause by being the image of that which is caused.[462] This is not the place to give a more precise definition and explanation of this συ/μβολον which is simultaneously cause and effect of the reality signified. We believe, however, that with it we have reached to some extent Origen's notion of συ/μβολον in relation to the sacramental event, and that we may apply it to the process of penance. If we wish to understand Origen's view of the way that the visible aspect of this process is effective, then we must accept that this whole process is a unity of the act of God and the act of man within the Church. By his penance man exposes himself to God's judgement which is grace and manifests this visibly in the Church. This act is only effective in so far as it is simultaneously a consequence and a cause, that is, an image which renders the reality present in expressing it. But similarly God also reveals the saving act of his judgement within the Church. This is evident in the word of binding and loosing expressed by the Church. It is in this way, and only in this way, that God's grace is really present. The Church's word of judgement and of pardon is, therefore, also simultaneously the consequence [324] and the cause of the same creative word of God which is here and now expressed in the depths of the sinner who is to receive grace.[463]

7.Penance as a Sacrament

A) CHURCH PENANCE AS A SACRAMENT

We are now in a position to raise the question of the sacramentality of church penance, even though we have previously already used the terms 'sacrament' and 'sacramental' unhesitatingly to describe what we have found in Origen's work. In fact all has already been said on this subject. According to Origen penance leads to an interior pardon for man by the reception of the Holy Spirit. This process is also visible in the dimension of the official-hierarchical Church. This visible aspect is, on the one hand, necessary, since Origen clearly sees the need for the penance of excommunication in the case of mortal sins, and, on the [462] In Scholastic terminology, we must say: the sacramental sign should not be considered as the efficient cause of something which is completely different from itself, but belongs to that category of causality which is difficult to define, lying, as it does, between efficient and formal-material causality. Accordingly, the sign is itself only in so far as (exactly like a forma) it is at work in its formandum and formatum. Thus, on the one hand, the actus of this formatio is different from the sign, and, on the other hand, the sign would not be itself if it did not establish this actus.

[463] Although both grace and judgement should be manifested exteriorly in order to exist, Origen knows that they can also exist without having their normal manifestation always and in every case. According to Origen, it is possible for a person to be 'outside' in God's eyes, while still appearing to be in the Church. With regard to the grace of baptism (therefore giving a positive case), he stresses that, in certain circumstances, it is able to exist without the sacrament, that is, without its exterior manifestation: In Num. hom. 3,1 (GCS 30) 14,1-17. Nevertheless, this does not alter the principle that, according to Origen, 'in this lower, visible world, to which we now belong, every interior reality must be manifested exteriorly' (E. R. Redepenning, II, p. 421 f.). How the 'exception' is reconcilable with this principle presents a problem even for theology today, when, on the one hand, it maintains the necessitas medii of the sacrament, while, on the other hand, it grants that it is possible to be justified by the mere votum sacramenti. Simply because Origen recognizes that in certain circumstances the reality can exist without its full manifestation does not mean that he considers the συ/μβολον in the sacramental event to be only a subsequent sign having no importance for the reality signified, any more than the teaching that purely 'interior' faith and love effects justification allows us to accuse modern theology of denying the necessity of the sacramental sign.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other hand, it is prescribed by the hierarchical Church in virtue of an explicit authorization by Jesus Christ with reference to John 20 and Matthew 16.[464] Now where the visible aspect of a grace-giving process is so necessary that this process cannot exist without it – and it is only in this way that it can be thought of meaningfully as necessary – and where the power to establish this visible aspect is given by Christ himself, there we have, in today's terminology, a sacrament. The question of precisely how the causal relationship between the sacramental sign and the grace signified by it is to be considered in no way alters the fact that there is a sacrament. Even if this further question, when viewed in the light of a later and possibly theologically necessary solution, was not answered very exactly by a previous theologian, this does not justify the conclusion that this theologian either denied or overlooked the existence of the sacrament.[465] Origen knew of a sacrament of penance.

At the same time, this sacramental process is still firmly embedded in the general reconciling activity of the Church. Origen does not only recognize alongside the penance of excommunication other forms of the Church's reconciling activity which, incidentally, he overlooks less willingly than generally happens today. He also implicates the reconciling activity of the Church of saints within the sacramental [325] process itself. According to the most probable interpretation of his views, the repentant sinner is reincorporated into the mystical body by reconciliation in such a way that he thereby receives the Holy Spirit. In view of these considerations, it can hardly be reckoned a deficiency if sacramental church penance rather than being totally isolated remains organically connected with the whole life of the Church which is constantly renewing its holiness by penance.

B) 'PRIVATE' SACRAMENTAL PENANCE IN ORIGEN?

Is there, according to Origen, in addition to the penance of excommunication, yet another remission of sins which would be sacramental in the modern sense, that is, a 'private', 'secret' absolution from sins by the priests? Since we have already answered this question in essence, all that is required here is a summary. There is no evidence of a real sacramental 'private penance' in Origen.[466] Certainly, even in his view, the Church, in the person of its official representatives, supports the effort of the sinner, even when it is a matter of the remission of sins which are not subject to the penance of excommunication as mortal sins. Thus he refers to private exhortations, corrections, intercessory prayers, sacrifices, pastoral counselling, etc., on the part of priests. It could even be said that Origen considers such a support to be necessary and, therefore, as obligatory for the laity.[467] Nevertheless, this is not [464] Cf. De or. 28,9.10 (GCS 3) 380,16-19; 381,12 f.; In Matt. tom. XII 14 (GCS 40) 98,28-99,9. It should be noted that Origen explicitly attests that the episcopate make its appeal for this power to these texts. Thus this power refers explicitly to the penance of excommunication. It is, therefore, immaterial that Origen himself under-stands the binding and loosing also, although not exclusively, in a sense which refers to the reconciling activity carried out by others than the official hierarchical Church.

[465] We have already seen that in those places where Origen's view of the causality of the sacrament is obscure, there are also difficulties which even modern theology has to discuss.

[466] The idea of a sacramental 'private penance' in Origen is also rejected by G. Teichtweier, p. 322, as well as by B. Altaner/A. Stuiber, Patrologie (Freiburg 1966), p.207. Even J. Grotz, p. 299, would wish to avoid the misunderstanding which might arise as a consequence of his interpretation of Origen's theology of penance, namely the assumption of a private penance. Thus he stresses that excommunication and penance without excommunication are not two completely independent kinds of penance-which would allow the conclusion that sacramental penance without excommunication is a kind of private penance-but that excommunication is 'only a preliminary stage for real church penance'.

[467] On the reasonable assumption that In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 30) 48,4-9 really is concerned also with non-mortal sins. Only subsequently, in the question of how the priest, as opposed to the lay person, remits his sins is the distinction drawn between ordinary sins and mortal sins (ibid., 68,10-12). Nevertheless, upon closer analysis, this text shows how Origen thinks of the reconciliation of the lay person by the priest in the case of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sufficient proof that this obligatory measure taken by the official Church was a sacrament in the strict sense, that is, as distinct from liturgical prayer, from the Church's supervision of morals and from the eucharistic sacrifice in general. It has already been shown that De or. 28 contains nothing more than this.[468]

In Lev. hom. 15,2[469] presents no more of an argument in favour of a sacramental private penance. Obviously Origen also recognizes the existence of mortal sins which in fact do not entail excommunication. This does not, however, warrant the conclusion that these sins ought not to be remitted by a public church penance. But even if it were accepted that this false conclusion[470] were in fact correct, it would still have to be demonstrated that such sins could be remitted not only with the help of the Church but by a specifically sacramental means, that is, private penance, which is distinct from the other aids which the Church offers for reconciliation. The private confession [326] before the physician of souls,[471] who does not consider that a public penance is necessary, does not in itself represent a private performance of penance. For, even supposing that this doctor of souls was normally a priest, it should not be forgotten that according to Origen, at least in theory, every spiritual person possesses the power to loosen, in the sense which we explained earlier. Thus it is hardly possible to decide in the cases in question whether Origen is thinking of priests as such or of a spiritual person, who is in fact either a priest or a lay person.

Moreover, no further precision is given on the role of the physician of souls in the case of non-mortal sins. It needs to be proven specifically that this role is other than the Church's usual reconciling role, which we have seen to exist alongside the penance of excommunication and which is not sacramental in today's sense. This cannot be presupposed. It is methodologically false to understand the remission of sins by the Church in any form as a 'private' sacramental absolution provided it is done by 'the Church and does not involve a lifting of excommunication. This is because, according to Origen, a third possibility is conceivable. This is not to be considered sacramental, however, since it is open to every non-mortal sins: it is done through the same priestly functions by which the priest ipse suum potest purgare peccatum (ibid., 68,10). It is a question, therefore, of functions by which the priest can reconcile himself, but which are refused to the lay person because he cannot exercise these functions. If it were here a question of sacramental absolution, then both priest and lay person would be in the same position, since no priest can absolve himself any more than a lay person. It must, therefore, be a question of functions which the priest as such can exercise in general – and in his own favour. These are easy to name: the knowledge of truth, in which the official διδα&σκαλοφ is not dependent upon others as the lay person is, the official liturgical prayer of the Church for reconciliation, in which the priest is able to include himself and the liturgical sacrifice. Thus it is obvious why Origen disputes the possibility of a reconciliation of oneself only in the case of mortal sins (ibid., 68,10-12). In this case, according to Origen's system, the priest, too, is the mere object of the Church's hierarchical activity. This assumes, however, that there is not a sacramental absolution outside the penance for mortal sins. The same applies to texts like In Num.hom. 10,1 (GCS 10) 71,3-12. The requirere sacerdotem, the peccatum suum per pontificem curare certainly includes here the remission of mortal sin, for otherwise the result would be an in peccatis suis mori (ibid., 71,7). In the case of other sins this need mean nothing more than the disciplinary, admonitory and liturgical support of the penitent by the Church, without this support being an actual sacrament.

---

[468] Cf. above under n.421, together with the relevant text.

[469] Cf. ibid. (GCS 29) 489,11-22 and above under nn.107-11, together with the relevant text. Even apart from the question of whether here culpa mortalis is really to be read as opposed to crimen mortale, it is not in any case mentioned at all that the communia, quae frequenter incurrimus and sine intermissione redimuntur are remitted by means of a specifically sacramental act of the Church. Otherwise it would have to be assumed that at that time confession occurred extraordinarily frequently (sine intermissione, for example, the sermonis vitia [ibid., 489,15], etc.). This, however, is a very unlikely notion.

[470] We have already seen that, according to Origen, even secret mortal sins are, as a matter of principle, subject to public church penance. Such a sinner must likewise 'do outside the Church, for a sufficient period of time, what he has to do': In Jer.fragm. 48 (GCS 6) 222,14-16.

[471] In Ps. 37 hom. 2,6 (PG 12) 1386.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spiritual person. And even if it were reserved to the priest, it could only represent those powers which cannot be identified with the actual power to perform the sacrament of penance.

The only possible inkling of a private sacramental penance in Origen is found in De or. 28, which presupposes that the priest is able to remit at least certain sins without excommunication by his 'prayer', and in so doing he acts in the awareness of the power mentioned in John 20. In this case there is an objective sacrament, irrespective of whether the priest is explicitly aware or not of the sacramental character of his action, say, in parallel to baptism or to the reconciliation of an excommunicate. In fact he intends to exercise the sacramental power conferred in John 20 and thus his 'prayer' for forgiveness is more than a mere prayer of intercession. This theological deduction, however, comes up against a whole series of difficulties.

Does the appeal to John 20, when the sins for which the power of remission is being sought are not mortal sins, represent a special biblical basis? Is the binding and loosing in this text, when applied to such 'light' sins, to be understood any differently from what lies within the capability of a spiritual lay person? Is it to be supposed [327] that, when and wherever such a 'prayer' occurs, the other preconditions, especially confession, necessary for the dispensing of a sacrament, are fulfilled? If this 'prayer' is construed as sacramental, it must be admitted at the same time that Origen in the same text and elsewhere allows it efficacy only if the priest is a spiritual person. There is a hint of Donatism here which tends to speak against the sacramental view of this 'prayer' and suggests that it is the intercession of a friend of God, for whom it is decisive that, as an intecessor, he is an ε0μπνευσθει/φ, who is 'known by his fruits'.[472] Origen does not display any Donatist tendencies elsewhere in his sacramental teaching or in his teaching on penance. It is, therefore, methodologically correct not to assume such tendencies in this passage, so long as the 'prayer' of the priests in De or. 28 can be interpreted as other than sacramental. This is obviously possible and is not excluded by the appeal to John 20:23. If this passage really does refer to a specific act of the Church, other than the accompaniment of the personal penance of every Christian, then one could expect that this would also be mentioned in In Lev. Hom. 2,4.[473] where Origen takes the opportunity to enumerate as comprehensively as possible the many different ways in which sins may be remitted. In this passage, apart from baptism, martyrdom and public church penance, there is mention only of the subjective performance of penance. Finally, it is difficult to see for which category of sins such a private sacramental penance would be appropriate. The attempt to prove in Origen a third group of serious sins between mortal sins which are subject to public church penance and venial sins must be considered futile. Even secret mortal sins are subject to public church penance. Today, our own practical daily experience, contrary to theory and liturgical ceremony, knows of only a sacramental intervention of the Church for the remission of sins. This is why we tend to think that every form of the remission of sins which is clearly attested in Origen is to be interpreted as sacramental. But there is no real basis for this interpretation. In any case, Origen considers 'prayer' for the forgiveness of sins to be so much a part of the priest's other activity for the remission of sins (monendo, docendo, instruendo[474] – per sacrificia sacerdotum et obsecrationes pontficum . . . per scientiam divinae legis)[475] that he hardly appears to be aware of a special power which is not already [472] Cf. De or. 28,8 (GCS 3) 380,8 f.

[473] Cf. ibid. (GCS 29) 295, 26-297,3.
[474] Cf. In Lev.hom. 5,4 (GCS 29) 342,12 f.
[475] Cf. In Ex.hom. 4,8 (OCS 29) 182,1-5. The fact that the obsecrationes of the bishops are listed here under other means for the remission of sins of a more therapeutic kind and that all together are opposed to the remission of mortal sins (difficiliora, which require God's own intervention: ibid., 182,4 f.) shows that Origen himself sees in these obsecrationes a contrast with church penance. He hardly means, therefore, that the mere

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

implied in the rest of the priest's activity. He considers, rather, that these other priestly functions (moral correction, [328] prayer, sacrifice, teaching), with their corresponding power, are also able to remit sins.

In the reconciliation after an excommunication we have a function which is clearly reserved exclusively to the bishop, even though in its effect it is related with the activity which the whole Church exercises in the remission of sins. The only proper sacrament discernible in Origen is the penance of excommunication. Apart from this, there are indeed acts of the hierarchical Church which are directed towards the forgiveness of sins, but these cannot be called sacramental in today's sense.

'prayer' of the priest for the remission of sins is a special sacramental event.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

BIBLIOGRAPHY

LIST OF EDITIONS OF TEXTS

1. The Apostolic Fathers

Bihlmeyer	Bihlmeyer, K., Die Apostolischen Väter, vol. I. Tübingen 1924; 2nd edn 1956. Based on: Funk, F. X., Patres Apotolici 1-2. Tübingen 1901.
Fischer	Fischer, J. A., Die Apostolischen Väter. Munich 1956.
SC 167	Jaubert, A., Clément de Rome. Epître aux Corinthiens. Paris 1971.
GCS 48	Whittaker, M., Die Apostolischen Väter, vol. I: Der Hirt des Hermas. Berlin 1956.
SC 53 bis	Joly, R., Hermas. Le Pasteur. Paris 1968.

2. Irenaeus of Lyon

Harvey	Harvey, W. Wigan, Sancti Irenaei episcopi Lugdunensis libros quinque adversus hareses (Adv. haer.), 2 vols. Cambridge 1857.
PG 7	Migne, J.-P., Patrolgia Graeca, vol. VII: Sancti Irenaei, ed. D. R. Massuet. Paris 1857.
TU 31,1	Ter-Mekerttschian, K., and Ter-Minassiantz, E., Des heiligen Irenäus Schrift zum Erweise der Apostolischen Verkündigung. Leipzig 1907.

3. Tertullian

CSL 20	Reifferscheid, A., and Wissowa, G., eds., Qu. S.F. Tertulliani Opera I (De spectaculis; De idololatria; Ad nationes; De testimonio animae; Scorpiace; De oratione; De baptismo; De pudicitia; De ieiunio adversus psychicos; De anima). Vienna 1890.
CSL 69	Hoppe, H., ed., Qu. S.F. Tertulliani Opera II/1 (Apologeticum). Vienna 1939.
CSL 70	Kroymann, A., ed., Qu. S.F. Tertulliani Opera II/2 (De praescriptione haereticorum; De cultu feminarum; Ad uxorem; De exhortatione castitatis; De corona; De carne Christi; Adversus Judaeos). Vienna 1942.
CSL 47	Kroymann, A., ed., Qu. S.F. Tertulliani Opera III (De patientia; De carnis resurrectione; Adversus Hermogenem; Adversus Valentinianos; Adversus omnes haereses; Adversus Praxean; Adversus Marcionem). Vienna 1906.
CSL 76	Bulhart, V., and Borleffs, P., eds., Qu. S.F. Tertulliani Opera IV (Ad martyras; Ad Scapulam; De fuga; De monogamia; De virginiabus velandis; De pallio; [Borleffs =] De paenitentia). Vienna 1957.

4. Cyprian of Carthage

CSL 3,1	Hartel, G., ed., S. Th. C. Cypriani Opera omnia (Ad Donatum; Quod idola Dii non sint; Ad Quirinum [Testimoniorum libri tres]; De habitu virginum; De catholicae ecclesiae unitate; De lapsis; De dominica oratione; De mortalitate; Ad Fortunatum [De exhortatione martyrii]; Ad Demetrianum; De opere et eleemosynis; De bono patientiae; De zelo et livore; Sententiae episcoporum numero LXXXVII). Vienna 1868.
CSL 3,2	Hartel, G., ed., S. Th. C. Cypriani Opera omnia (Epistulae). Vienna 1871.
CSL 3,3	Hartel, G., ed., S. Th. C. Cypriani Opera omnia (Appendix scriptorum quae C. Cypriani nomen ferunt: De spectaculis; De bono pudicitiae; De laude martyrii; Ad Novatianum; De rebaptismate; De aleatoribus; De montibus Sina et Sion; Ad Vigilium episcopum de Judaica incredulitate; Adversus Judaeos; Orationes; De duodecim abusivis saeculi; De singularitate clericorum; De duplici martyrio; De pascha computus; Epistulae; Carmina).

5. Didascalia Apostolorum

TU 25,2	Achelis, H., and Flemming, J., eds., Die Syrische Didaskalia, Leipzig 1904.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Funk, F. X.	Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolicorum, vol. I. Paderborn 1905.
Connolly, R. H.	Didascalia Apostolorum. The Syriac Version Translated and Accompanied by the Verona Latin Fragments. Oxford 1929.
TU 75	Tidner, E., ed., Didascaliae apostolorum, Canonum ecclesiasticorum, Traditionis apostolicae versiones latinae. Berlin 1963.

6. Origen

GCS 2	Koetschau, P., ed., Origenes I (Die Schrift vom Martyrium; Buch I-IV gegen Celsus). Leipzig 1899 (new edn in preparation).
GCS 3	Koetschau, P., ed., Origenes II (Buch V-VIII gegen Celsus; Die Schrift vom Gebet). Leipzig 1899 (new edn in preparation).
GCS 6	Klostermann, E., ed., Origenes III (Jeremiahomilien; Klageliederkommentar; Erklärung der Samuel- und Königsbücher). Leipzig 1901.
GCS 10	Preuschen, E., ed., Origenes IV (Der Johanneskommentar). Leipzig 1903 (new edn in preparation).
GCS 22	Koetschau, P., ed., Origenes V (De principiis). Leipzig 1913.
GCS 29	Baehrens, W. A., ed., Origenes VI (Homilien zum Hexateuch in Rufins Ubersetzung I: Die Homilien zu Genesis, Exodus und Leviticus). Leipzig 1920 (new edn in preparation).
GCS 30	Baehrens, W. A., ed., Origenes VII (Homilien zum Hexateuch in Rufins Ubersetzung II: Die Homilien zu Numeri, Josua und Judices). Leipzig 1921 (new cdn in preparation).
GCS 33	Baehrens, W. A., ed., Origenes VIII (Homilien zu Samuel I, zum Hohenlied und zu den Propheten, Kommentar zum Hohenlied in Rufins und Hieronymus' Ubersetzung). Leipzig 1925 (new edn in preparation).
GCS 35	Rauer, M., ed., Origenes IX (Homilien zu Lukas in der Ubersetzung des Hieronumus und der griechischen Reste der Homilien und des Lukas-Kommentars). Leipzig 1930 (2nd edn Berlin, as GCS 49).
GCS 40	Klostermann, E., and Benz, E., eds., Origenes X (Matthäuserklärung I: Die griechisch erhaltenen Tomoi). Leipzig 1935.
GCS 38	Klostermann, E., and Benz, E., eds., Origenes XI (Matthäuserklärung II: Die lateinische Ubersetzung der Commentariorum series). Leipzig 1933.
GCS 41/1	Klostermann, E., and Benz, E., eds., Origenes XII/l (Matthäuserklärung: Fragmente und Indices). Leipzig 1941.
GCS 41/2	Klostermann, E., and Früchtel, L., eds., Origenes XII/2 (Matthäuserklärung: Fragmente und Indices). Berlin 1955.

7. Other Texts Used (apart from PG and PL)

GCS 12	Stählin, O., ed., Clemens Alexandrinus I (Protrepticus und Paedagogus). Leipzig 1909; 3rd edn Berlin 1972.
GCS 17	Stählin, O., ed., Clemens Alexandrinus III (Stromata VII-VIII; Excerpta ex Theodoto; Eclogae propheticae; Quis dives salvetur; Fragmente). Leipzig 1909.
CSL 73	Faller, O., ed., S. Ambrosii Opera VII (Expl. symboli; De sacramentis; De mysteriis; De paenitentia; De excessu fratris; De obitu Valentiniani; De obitu Theodosii). Vienna 1955.

LIST OF LITERATURE CITED AND OF FURTHER LITERATURE

Achelis, H., and Flemming, J., Die Syrische Didaskalia (TU 25,2). Leipzig 1904.

Adam, K., Der Kirchenbegriff Tertullians. Paderborn 1907. Das sogenannte Bußedikt des Papstes Kallistus. Munich 1917. Die kirchliche Sündenvergebung nach dem hl Augustin. Paderborn 1917. 'Die geheime Kirchenbuße im Ausgang des christlichen Altertums. Kritische Bemerkungen zu Poschmanns Untersuchung' (ThQ 110, 1929).

Akinian, P. N., 'Cyprianus: Buße (armenisch)' (Handes Amsorya, Monatsschrift für armenische Philologie, Vienna 1961). Not consulted.

Alès, A. d', La théologie de Tertullien. Paris 1905. 'La discipline pénitentielle au II^{e} siècle en dehors d'Hermas' (RSR 2, 1911). 'La discipline pénitentielle au II^{e} siècle en dehors d'Hermas' (RSR 4, 1913). L'édit de

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Calliste. Paris 1914. La théologie de S. Cyprien. Paris 1922.
Altaner, B., and Stuiber, A., Patrologie. Freiburg/Br. 1966.
Altendorf, E., Einheit und Heiligkeit der Kirche. Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung der altchristlichen Kirchenbegriffe im Abendland von Tertullian bis zu den antidonatistischen Schriften Augustins, Berlin 1932.
Althaus, P., Der Brief an die Römer (NTD 6). Göttingen 1958.
Amann, E., 'La pénitence primitive' (DThC XII/1, Paris 1933).
Anciaux, P., 'Histoire de la discipline pénitentielle' in Problèmes du Confesseur, Paris 1963; reprinted from Pénitence et Pénitences, Brügge 1953. Das Sakrament der Buße. Geschichte, Wesen und Form der kirchlichen Buße. Mainz 1961. (Original title: Het Sacrament der Boetvaardigheid.)
(Anonymus), 'Die Lehre des Origenes über die Buße' (Katholik 45/I, 1865).
Atzberger, L., Geschichte der christlichen Eschatologie innerhalb der vornicänischen Zeit. Freiburg/Br. 1896.
Aubin, P., Le problème de la 'conversion'. Paris 1963.
Baehrens, W. A., Überlieferung und Textgeschichte der lateinisch erhaltenen Origeneshomilien zum Alten Testament (TU 42,1). Leipzig 1916.
Balthasar, H. U. von, 'Le Mystérion d'Origène' (RSR 26, 1936; 27, 1937). 'Die Hiera des Evagrius' (ZKTh 63, 1939). Origenes. Geist und Feuer–Ejn Aufbau aus semen Schriften. Salzburg 1951.
Bardenhewer, O., Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, 4 vols. Freiburg/Br. 1913-24.
Bardy, O., 'La règle de foi d'Origène' (RSR 9, 1919). Origène (Les Moralistes chrétiens). Paris 1931. 'Origène' (DThC XI12, Paris 1932). La théologie de l'Eglise de saint Clément a saint Irénée. Paris 1945. La théologie de l'Eglise de saint Irénée au concile de Nicée. Pans 1947. 'Les idées morales d'Origène' (MSR 13, 1956).
Bareille, G., 'Confirmation d'après les Pères grecs et latins' (DThC III, Paris 1908).
Batiffol, P., Etudes d'histoire et de théologie positive. Paris 1926.
Bauer, W., Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des NT and der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur. Berlin 1958. Rechtgläubigkeit and Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum. Tübingen 1964.
Baumeister, A., Die Ethik des Pastor Hermae. Freiburg/Br. 1912.
Baumstark, A., Vom geschichtlichen Werden derLiturgie. Freiburg/Br. 1923. Liturgie comparée. Chevetogne o.J. 1940.
Baus, K., Von der Urgemeinde zur frühchristlichen Großkirche (HdKG1), Freiburg/Br. 1962.
Beaucamp, P., 'Un évêquc du Ille siècle aux prises avec les pécheurs: son activité apostolique' (BLE 69, 1949).
Behm, J., 'κυρο&ω etc.' (ThW III, Stuttgart 1938). 'νη~στιφ etc.' (ThW IV, Stuttgart 1942).
Belser, J. E., Die Epjstel des hl..Jakobus, Freiburg/Br. 1909.
Bertram, G., 'υ3βριφ' (ThW VIII, Stuttgart 1969). 'φρη=ν' (ThW IX, Stuttgart 1970).
Bettencourt, S., Doctrina ascetica Origenis. Rome 1945.
Bettenson, H., The Early Christian Fathers (Texts). London/New York 1956.
Bévenot, M., 'The Sacrament of Penance and St. Cyprian's De Lapsis' (ThSt 16, 1955). 'Episcopat et Primat chez Cyprien' (EThL 42, 1966).
Bigg, C., The Christian Platonists of Alexandria. Oxford 1913.
Billerbeck, P., see Strack, H. L.
Billicsich, F., Das Problem des Übels in der Philosophie des Abendlandes. Vienna 1952.
Blötzer, J., 'Die geheime Sünde in der altchristlichen Bußdisziplin' (ZKTh 11, 1887).
Bohm, J., Die Handauflegung im Urchristentum. Leipzig 1911.
Bonwetsch, G. N., Die Theologie des Irenäus. Gutersloh 1925.
Boudinhon, M., 'La missa poenitentium dans l'ancienne discipline d'Occident' (RHLR 7, 1902).
Brandner, V., ' "Binden und Lösen" in der altsyrischen Kirche' (Katholik 95/I, 1916).
Brewer, H., 'Die kirchliche Privatbuße im christlichcn Altertum' (ZKTh 45, 1921).
Brinktrine, J., Die Lehre von der Gnade. Paderborn 1957.
Bruders, H., 'Mt 16,19; 18,18 und Jo 20,22.23 in frühchristlichcr Auslegung. Afrika bis 251' (ZKTh 35, 1911).
Bultmann, R., 'θα&νατοφ' (ThW III, Stuttgart 1938). Das Evangelium des Johannes (Meyers Kom. 2). Göttingcn 1952.
Cadiou, R., La jeunesse d'Origène. Paris 1935.
Campenhausen, H. von, kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten. Tübingen 1963.
Capelle, B., 'L'absolution sacerdotale chez S. Cyprien' (RThAM 7, 1935).
Capitaine, O., De ethica Origenis. Münster 1898.
Carra de Vaux Saint-Cyr, M.-B., 'Le Sacrement de Penitence' (LV 13, 1964).
Cavallera, F., 'La doctrine de la pénitence au III^{e} siècle' (BLE 30, 1929; 31, 1930). 'A propos de l'histoire du sacrement de penitence' (BLE 24, 1923).
Chartier, C. M., 'L'excommunication ecclésiastique d'après les écrits de Tertullien' (Antonianum 10, 1935). 'La discipline pénitentielle d'après les écrits de saint Cyprien' (Antonianum 14, 1939).
Clark, K. W., 'The Sins of Hermas' in Early Christian Origins. Studies in Honour of H. R. Willoughby.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Chicago, 1961.
Clerc, J. Le, Parrhasiana, ou Pensées diverses sur des matières de critique d'histoire, de morale ou de politique. Amsterdam 1699, 1701.
Colson, J., L'évêque, lien d'unité et de charité chez saint Cyprien de Carthage. Paris 1961.
Conzelmann, H., 'ξα&ριφ' (ThW IX, Stuttgart 1971).
Coppens, J., L'imposition des mains. Wetterers/Paris 1925.
Comely, R., Commentarius in epistolam ad Romanos. Paris 1896.
Coruzel, H., Théologie de l'Image de Dieu chez Origéne. Paris 1956. 'Notes critiques sum Origène' (BLE, 59, 1958). Origène et la 'connaissance mystique'. Brussels/Paris 1961. Virginité et Mariage selon Origène. Bruges/Paris 1963. Bibliographie critique d'Origène (Instrumenta Patristica VIII). The Hague 1971.
Cuesta Gonzales, F. de La, 'La pénitencia en "El Pastor" de Hermas' (Studium legionense 4, Leon 1963).
Daillé, J. (Dallaeus, J.), De sacramentali sive auriculari Latinorum confessione disputatio. Ghent 1661.
Daly, C. B., 'The Sacrament of Penance in Tertullian' (IER 69, 1947; 70, 1948), Absolution and Satisfaction in St. Cyprian 's Theology of Penance (TU 64; Studia Patristica II). Berlin 1957.
Daniélou, J., Origène. Paris 1948. Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme. Tournai 1958.
Deemter, R. van, Der Hirt des Hermas – Apokalypse oder Allegoire? Delft 1929.
Dekkers, E., Tertullianus en de geschiedenis der liturgie. Brussels/Amsterdam 1947.
Delahaye, K., Ecclesia mater chez les Pères des trois premiers siècles. Paris 1964.
Delling, G., 'α)ρξη/' (ThW I, Stuttgart 1933).
Demoustier, A., 'L'ontologie de l'Eglise selon Cyprien' (RSR 52, 1964).
Deneffe, A., 'Das Wort satisfactio' (ZKTh 43, 1919).
Dettloff, W., Die Lehre von der acceptatio divina des Johannes Duns Scotus mit besonderer Beriicksichtigung der Rechtfertigungslehre. Werl 1954.
Dibelius, M., Der Hirt des Hernias (Hdb NT, Erg. Bd.). Tübingen 1925.
Dick, E., 'Das Pateninstitut im altchristlichen Katechumenat' (ZKTh 63, 1939).
Diekamp, F., and Jüssen, K., Katholische Dogmatik. Münster 1959.
Dölger, F. J., Der Exorzismus im altchristlichen Taufritual. Paderborn 1909.
Döllinger, J.I., Hippolytus und Kallistus, oder die römische Kirche in der ersten Hälfte des dritten Jahrhunderts. Regensburg 1853.
Doskocil, W., Der Bann in der Urkirche (NTSt, Kan.Abt.11). Munich 1958.
D'Ercole, G., Penitenza canonico-sacramentale dalle origini alla pace constantiniana (Communio 4). Rome 1963.
Edsman, C. M., Le baptême de feu. Uppsala 1940.
Elert, W., Der christliche Glaube. Berlin 1940.
Elfers, H., Die Kirchenordnung Hippolyts von Rom. Paderborn 1938. 'Gehört die Salbung mit Chrisma im ältesten abendlandischen Initiationsritus zu Taufe oder zur Firmung?' (ThG1 34, 1942).
Esser, G., Die Bußschriften Tertullians De paenitentia und De pudicitia und das Indulgenzedikt des Papstes Kallistus. Bonner Universitätsprogramm 1905. 'Nochmals das Indulgenzedikt des Papstes Kallistus und die Bußschriften Tertullians' (Katholik 87, 1907; 88, 1908).
Estius, W., Commentarii in omnes Divi Pauli epistolas. Douai 1614-16; finally Paris 1892.
Evans, R. F., One and Holy. The Church in Latin Patristic Thought. London 1972.
Eynde, D. van den, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles. Paris 1933. 'La double édition du "De unitate" De S. Cyprien' (RHE 29, 1933). 'Notes sum les rites postbaptismaux dans les églises d'occidcnt' (Antonianum 1, 1939).
Fechtrup, B., 'Über die Grundsätze, welche die Kirche in den ersten Jahrhunderten bei Zulassung zur Buße für die schweren Sünden und bei Erteilung der Lossprechung von denselben befolgte' (ThQ 54, 1872).
Fermaud, U., Exposition critique des opinions d'Origène. Strasbourg 1859.
Fischer, J. A., Rezension zu St. Giet (ThRv 61, 1965).
Flemming, J., see Achelis, H.
Foerstem, W., 'δαι/μων' (ThW II, Stuttgart 1935).
Fonck, L., Die Parabeln des Herrn. Innsbruck 1909.
Frank, F., Die Bußdisziplin der Kirche. Mainz 1867.
Freppel, C. E., Origène, 2 vols. Paris 1868.
Fmicdnch, G., sec Kittel, G.
Funk, F. X., 'Das Indulgenzedikt des Papstes Kallistus' (ThQ 88, 1906). Zur altchristlichen Bußdisziplin (Kirchengeschichtl. Abhandl. und Unters. 1). Paderborn 1897.
Galtier, P., 'La consignation à Carthage et à Rome' (RSR 2, 1911). 'La consignation dans les églises d'occident' (RHE 13, 1912). 'Onction et confirmation' (RHE 13, 1912). 'Absolution ou Confirmation? La reconciliation des hérétiques' (RSR 5, 1914). 'Imposition des mains' (DThC VII, Paris 1923). 'La rémission des péchés moindres dans l'Eglise du troisième au cinquième siècle' (RSR 13, 1923; cf. L'église et la rémission [1932],

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pp. 264-72). "Les péchés "incurables" d'Origène' (Gr 10, 1929; cf. L'église et la remission [1932], pp. 184-213). L'église et la rémission des péchés aux premiers siècles. Paris 1932. 'A propos de la penitence primitive. Méthodes et conclusions' (RHE 30, 1934). 'Comment on ecarte la penitence privée' (Gr 22, 1940). De paenitentia. Rome 1950. Aux origines du sacrament de la penitence. Rome 1951.

Garcia, Z., 'El perdon de los pecados en la primitiva Iglesia: La doctrina de Origenes' (RF 26, 1910).

Gaudemet, J., 'Note sum les formes anciennes de l'excommunication' (RevSR 23, 1949). 440

Ghellinck, J. de, Pour l'histoire du mot 'Sacramentum' I (Spicileg. sacr. Lovan. 3). Louvain/Paris 1924.

Giet, S., L'Apocalypse d'Hermas et la penitence (TU 78; Studia Patristica III). Berlin 1961. Hermas et les Pasteurs. Les trois auteurs du Pasteur d'Hermas. Paris 1963.

Goetz, C., Die Bußlehre Cyprians. Konigsberg 1895.

Gommenginger, A., 'Bedeutet die Exkommunikation Verlust dem Kirchengliedschaft?' (ZKTh 73, 1951).

Goppelt, L., Christentum und Judentum im ersten und zweiten Jahrhundert. Güttersloh 1954.

Green, W. M., 'Initium omnis peccati superbia: Augustine on Pride as the First Sin' (U. Calif. Class. 13, 1949).

Groot, J. F. De, Conspectus historiae dogmatum, 2 vols. Rome 1931.

Grotz, 3., Die Entwicklung des Bußstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche. Freiburg/Br. 1955.

Gummersbach, J., see Pohle, J.

Hagemann, H., Die römische Kirche und ihr Einfluß auf Disciplin und Dogma in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten. Freiburg/Br. 1864.

Hahn, A., Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln der Alten Kirche. Breslau 1897.

Hall, S. G., Repentance in 1 Clément (TU 93; Studia Patristica VIII). Berlin 1966.

Hamel, A., Kirche bei Hippolyt von Rom. Gütersloh 1951.

Hardowirgono, R., 'S. Cypriaan: Het Heil in de Kerk' (Bijdragen 19, 1958).

Harnack, A. von, Der kirchengeschichtliche Ertrag der exegetischen Arbeiten des Origenes I (TU 42,3). Leipzig 1918. Der kirchengeschichtliche Ertrag der exegetischen Arbeiten des Origenes II (TU 42,4). Leipzig 1919. Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, 3 vols. Tübingen 1931.

Haslehurst, R. S. T., Some Account of the Penitential Discipline of the Early Church in the First Four Centuries. London 1921.

Hausherr, I., De doctrina spirituali christianorum orientalium quaestiones et scripta. Rome 1933.

Hefele, C. 3., Conciliengeschichte II. Freiburg/Br. 1875.

Heilmann, A., and Kraft, H., Texte der Kirchenväter, 4 vols. Munich 1963-4.

Henrion, M. R. A., and Verwort, A., Histoire Ecclésiastique depuis la creation jusqu'au pontjflcat de Pie IX. Paris 1857.

Hervé, J. M., Manuale theologiae dogmaticae. Paris 1925.

Hochban, J. I., 'St. Irenaeus on the Atonement' (ThSt 7, 1946).

Hoh, J., Die kirchliche Buße im zweiten Jahrhundert. Breslau 1932.

Holl, K., Enthusiasmus undBußgewalt beim griechischen Mönchtum. Leipzig 1898.

Holstein, H., 'L'Exhomologèse dans l'Adversus haereses" de Saint Irénée' (RSR 35, 1948).

Holtzmann, O., Das Neue Testament II. Gießen 1926.

Huby, J., and Lyonnet, S., Saint Paul (VS 10), Paris 1957.

Hübner, S., 'Kirchenbuße und Exkommunikation bei Cyprian' (ZKTh 84, 1962).

Huet, P. D., Origeniana (ed. Delarue IV). Paris 1759.

Huhn, J., Ursprung und Wesen des Bösen und der Sünde nach der Lehre des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius. Paderborn 1933.

Hurter, H., Compendium theologiae dogmaticae III. Innsbruck 1903.

Janini Cuesta, J., 'La penitencia medicinal desde la Didascalia Apostolorum a S. Gregorio de Nisa' (RET 7, 1947).

Jeremias, J., Die Gleichnisse Jesu. Göttingen 1956.

Joly, R., 'La doctrine pénitentielle du Pasteur d'Hermas' (RHR 147, 1955). Hermas le Pasteur (SC 53b; introduction). Paris 1968.

Jourgon, M., Cyprien de Carthage. Paris 1957.

Joyce, G. H., 'Private Penance in the Early Church' (JThS 42, 1941).

Jüssen, K., Die dogmatischen Anschauungen des Hesychius von Jerusalem. Münster 1934. see Diekamp, F.

Jugie, J. B., Theologia dogmatica christianorum orientalium III. Paris 1930.

Jungmann, J. A., Die lateinischen Bußriten. Innsbruck 1932. Missarum Sollemnia I. Vienna 1952.

Karpp, H., Die Buße. Quellen zur Entstehung des alt kirchlichen Bußwesens (Traditio christiana 1). Zurich 1969.

Kirk, K. E., The Vision of God. London 1932.

Kirsch, P. A., Zur Geschichte der katholischen Beichte. Wurzburg 1902. 'Die Behandlung der crimina capitalia in der morgenländischcn Kirche im Unterschied zur abendländischcn' (AkathKR 84, 1904).

Kittel, G., and Friedrich, G., Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (ThW). Stuttgart 1933 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Kittcl, G., 'α!γγελοφ' (ThW I, Stuttgart 1933). 'δο&χα' (ThW II, Stuttgart 1935).
Klee, H., Die Beichte, eine historisch-kritische Untersuchung. Frankfurt/M. 1828.
Klein, G., 'Die hermeneutische Struktur des Kirchengedankens bei Cyprian' (ZKG 68, 1957).
Knabenbauer, J., Commentarium in Evangelium secundum Joannem. Paris 1906.
Kneller, C. A., 'Sacramentum unitatis (Zu Cyprians Schrift an Donatus)' (ZKTh 40, 1916).
Koch, Hal, Pronoia und Paideusis. Studien über Origenes and sein Verhältnis zum Platonismus. Berlin/Leipzig 1932.
Koch, Hugo. 'Die Sündenvergebung bei Irenäus' (ZNW 9, 1908). Die Bußfrist des Pastor Hermä (Festgabe A. von Harnack). Tübingen 1921. Cyprianische Untersuchungen. Bonn 1926. Cathedra Petri. Neue Untersuchungen über die Anfange der Primatslehre. Gießen 1930.
Köhne, J., 'Die Bußdauer auf Grund der Briefe Cyprians' (ThGl 29, 1937). 'Zur Frage der Buße im christlichen Altertum' (ThGl 35, 1943).
Kogler, L., Bußsakrament und Ablaß. Linz 1931.
Kortzfleisch, S. von, see Rengstorf, K. H.
Kraft, H., see Heilmann, A.
Krautwig, N., Die Grundlagen der Bußlehre des J. Duns Scotus. Freiburg/Br. 1938.
Kurtscheid, B., Das Beichtsiegel. Freiburg/Br. 1912.
KuB, O. ,Die Briefe an die Römer, Korint her and Galater (RNT 6). Regensburg 1940. Der Römerbrief II. Regensburg 1959.
Lagrange, M. J., Saint Paul Epître aux Romains. Paris 1922.
Lahousse, G., De gratia divina. Bruges 1902.
Lais, H., Dogmatik I. Kevelaer 1965.
Lange, H., De gratia. Freiburg/Br. 1929.
Langstadt, E., Tertullian's Doctrine of Sin and the Power of Absolution in "de pudicitia" (TU 64; Studia Patristica II). Berlin 1957.
la Taille, M. de, Mysterium fidei 3. Paris 1931.
Latko, E., Origen's Concept of Penance. Quebec 1949.
Lebreton, J., 'Les degrés de la connaissance religieuse d'après Origène' (RSR 12, 1922). 'Le désaccord de la foi populaire et de la théologie savante dans I'Eglise chrétienne du IIIe siècle' (RHE 19, 1923; 20, 1924). 'Le développement des institutions ecclésiastiques a la fin du lI^e^ siècle et au debut du III^e^ siècle' (RSR 24, 1934).
Leenhardt, F. J., L'Epître de saint Paul aux Romains. Neuchâtel/Paris 1957.
Lennerz, H., De gratia redemptoris. Rome 1934.
Lercher, L., Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae III. Innsbruck 1951.
Lieske, A., Die Theologie der Logosmystik bei Origenes. Münster 1938.
Ludwig, A., 'Die Bußstationen in der abendländischcn Kirche' (AkathKR 83, 1903).
Lumper, G., Historia theologico-critica de vita, scriptis atque doctrima sanctorum Patrum, 13 vols. Augustae Vindelicorum 1783-99.
Lyonnet, S., see Huby, J.
Maréchal, B., Concordance des saints Pères de l'Eglise, 2 vols. Paris 1739.
Massuet, R., Sancti Irenaei episcopi Lugdunensis et martyris detection is et eversionis falso cognominatae agnitionis, seu contra haereses libri quinque. Paris 1710.
Maurial, E., Origenis de libertate arbitrii doctrina. Montpellier 1856.
May, G., 'Bemerkungen zu der Frage der Diffamation und dem Irregularitat der öffentlichen Büßer' (MThZ 12, 1961).
Mazzella, C., De gratia Christi. Rome 1905.
Meinertz, M., and Vrede, W., Die katholischen Briefe. Bonn 1932.
Mersch, E., Le corps mystique du Christ II. Paris 1936.
Michaelis, W., 'παραπι/πτω' (ThW VI, Stuttgart 1959).
Michel, O., 'να&οφ' (ThW IV, Stuttgart 1942). Der Brief an die Römer (Meyers Kom. 4). Göttingen 1957.
Mitzka, F., 'Gnostizismus und Gnadenlehre' (ZKTh 51, 1927).
Möhler, J. A., Patrologie oder christliche Geschichte. Regensburg 1840.
Mörsdorf, K., 'Exkommunikation' (HThG I, München 1962).
Morinus, 3., Commentarius historicus de disciplina in administratione sacramenti Paenitentiae. Antwerpiae 1682.
Mortimer, R. C., The Origins of Private Penance in the Western Church. Oxford 1939.
Müller, K., 'Bußinstitutionen in Karthago unter Cyprian' (ZKG 16, 1896).
Münscher, W., Handbuch der christlichen Dogmengeschichte. Cassel 1832.
Navickas, J. C., The Doctrine of St. Cyprian on the Sacraments. Würzburg 1924.
Nygren, A., Der Römerbrief. Göttingen 1954.
O'Donnell, M. J., Penance in the Early Church. Dublin 1908.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

O'Hagan, A. P. The Great Tribulation to Come in the Pastor of Hermas (TU 79; Studia Patristica IV). Berlin 1961.
Opfermann, B., 'Zwei unveröffentlichte Fuldaer Bußordines des 9. Jahrhunderts' (ThGl 36, 1944).
Ott, L., Grundriß der katholischen Dogmatik. Freiburg/Br. 1957.
Palmieri, D., De paenitentia. Prati 1896.
Permanedem, Fm M.,Bibiiotheca Patristica, 3 vols. Landshut 1841-2.
Pesch, C., Praelectiones dogmaticae V. Freiburg/Br. 1916. Compendium theoiogiae dogmaticae III. Freiburg/Br. 1941-2.
Petavius, D., Dogmata theologica, 6 vols. Venice 1745 ff. (8 vols. Paris 1865-7). De poenitentia publica et praeparatione ad communionem, lib. IV. Paris 1867 (De la penitence publique, Paris 1644).
Peterson, E., Frühkirche, Judentum and Gnosis. Freiburg/Br. 1959.
Pitra, J. B., Juris ecclesiastici Graecorum historia et monumenta. Rome 1864-8. Analecta sacra Spicilegio Solesmensi parata, 8 vols. Paris 1876-83.
Plumpe, J. C., Mater Ecciesia. An Inquiry into the Concept of the Church as a Mother in Early Christianity. Washington 1943.
Pohle, J., and Gummersbach, J., Lehrbuch der Dogmatik II. Paderbomn 1956.
Poschmann, B., Die Sichtbarkeit der Kirche nach der Lehre des hl. Cyprian. Paderborn 1908. Die Sündenvergebung bei Origenes. Braunsberg 1912 (reproduced in Paenitentia secunda, 1940). 'Die kirchliche Vermittlung dem Sündenvergebung nach Augustinus' (ZKTh 45, 1921). Die abendländische Kirchenbuße im Ausgang des christlichen Altertums. Munich 1928. Ecclesia principalis. Ein kritischer Beitrag zur Frage des Primats bei Cyprian. Breslau 1933. Review of (Theophaneia–Beitr. z. Religions- u. Kirchengeschichte des Altertums, ed. F. J. Dölger and T. Klauser, vol. I). Galtier, P., L'église et la rémission des péchés (ThRv 32, 1933). Paenitentia secunda. Die kirchliche Buße im ältesten Christentum bis Cyprian and Origenes (Theophaneia – Beitr. z. Religious- u. Kirchengeschichte des Altertums, see F. J. Dölger and T. Klauser, vol. i). Bonn 1940. 'Die innere Struktur des Bußsakraments' (MThZ 1, 1950). Buße and Letzte Ölung (HDG IV, 3). Freiburg/Br. 1951.
Poukens, J. B., Saint Cyprien et ses contemporains, see Ghellinck, J. de.
Pressensé, E., Histoire des trois premiers siècles de l'Eglise ancienne. Paris 1869.
Prete, S., 'Cristianesimo antico e riforma ortodossa. Nete intorno al Pastore di Erma (II. Sec.)' (Convivium, 1950).
Probst, F., Sakramente und Sakramentalien in den drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten. Tübingen 1872.
Puniet, P. de, 'La liturgie baptismale en Gaule avant Charlemagne' (RQH 28, 1902). 'Onction et confirmation' (RHE 13, 1912). 'Confirmation' (DACL III, Paris 1914).
Quasten, J., Patrology, 3 vols. Utrecht 1950-60.
Rager, J., Die Lehre von der Sündenvergebung bei Origenes: Eine dogmengeschichtliche Untersuchung. Diss. Freiburg/Br. 1917.
Rahner, H., 'Taufe und geistliches Leben bei Origenes' (ZAM 7, 1932). 'Gnostizismus, christlicher' (LThK 4, 1960).
Rahner, K., 'Gnosis' (LThK 4, 1960).
Rauschen, G., Eucharistie und Bußsakrament in den ersten sechs Jahrhunderten der Kirche. Frciburg/Br. 1908.
Redepenning, E. B., Origenes. Eine Darstellung seines Lebens and seiner Lehre. Bonn, 1841-6 (Reprint Aalen 1966).
Rengstorf, K. H., and Kortzfleisch, S. von, Kirche und Synagoge. Handbuch zur Geschichte von Christen und Juden I. Stuttgart 1968.
Roetzem, W., Des heiligen Augustinus Schriften als liturgiegeschichtliche Quelle. Munich 1930.
Rolffs, E., Urkunden aus dem antimontanistischen Kampfe des Abendlandes (TU 12,4). Leipzig 1895.
Rondet, H., Gratia Christi, Paris 1948. 'Aux origines de la théologie du péché' (NRTh 79, 1957).
Ruch, C., 'Confirmation dans la sainte Ecriture' (DThC III, Paris 1908).
Rüthy, A. E., 'Zur neutestamentlichen Begründung des Bußsakramentes' (IKZ 44, 1954).
Saint-Palais d'Aussac, F. de, La réconciliation des hérétiques dans l'Eglise latine. Paris 1943.
Schafer, K. T. 'Antidotum' (RAC I, Stuttgart 1950).
Schanz, P., 'Die Absolutionsgewalt in der alten Kirche' (ThQ 79, 1897).
Schelkie, K. H., 'Erwählung und Freiheit im Römerbrief nach der Auslegung der Väter' (ThQ 131, 1951).
Schiffini, S., Tractatus de gratia divina. Freiburg/Br. 1901.
Schlatter, A., Der Evangelist Johannes. Stuttgart 1948.
Schmaus, M., Katholische Dogmatik III/2. Munich 1951.
Schmitz, H. J., Die Bußbücher und die Bußdisziplin der Kirche I. Mainz 1883. II, Düsseldorf 1898.
Schümmer, J., Die altchristliche Fast en praxis mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Schrjften Tertullians. Münster 1933.
Schwane, J., Dogmengeschichte der vornizänischen Zeit. Münster 1862.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Schwartz, E., Bußstufen und Katechumenatsklassen. Straßburg 1911.
Seeberg, R., Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Leipzig 1895.
Sickenberger, I. ‚Die beiden Briefe des heiligen Paulus an die Korinther und sein Brief an die Römer. Bonn 1921.
Simon, M., Verus Israel. Etudes sur les relations entre chrétiens et juifs dans l'Empire romain. Paris 1942.
Simonis, W., Ecclesia visibilis et invisibilis. Frankfurt/M. 1970.
Söhngen, G., Symbol und Wirklichkeit im Kultmysterium. Bonn 1940.
Spanneut, M., Tertullien et les premiers moralistes africains. Gembloux/Paris 1969.
Steitz, G. E., 'Die Bußdisciplin der morgenländischen Kirche in den ersten Jahrhunderten' (Jahrbuch f. dt. Theologie (Gotha) 8 1863).
Strack, H. L., and Billerbeck, P., Kommentar zum NT aus Talmud und Midrasch. Munich 1922-56.
Strom, A. V., Der Hirt des Hermas. Allegorie oder Wirklichkeit. Leipzig/Uppsala 1936.
Stufler, J., 'Die S:undenvergebung bei Origenes' (ZKTh 31, 1907). 'Die verschiedenen Wirkungen der Taufe und Buße bei Tertullian' (ZKTh 31, 1907). 'Die Bußdisziplin der abendländischen Kirche bis Kallistus' (ZKTh 31, 1907). 'Die S:undenvergebung bei Irenänus' (ZKTh 32, 1908). 'Einige Bemerkungen zur Bußlehre Cyprians' (ZKTh 33, 1909). 'Offentliche und geheime Buße bei Origenes' (ZKTh 37, 1913).
Stuiber, A., see Altaner, B.
Tanghe, D. A., 'L'Eucharistie pour la rémission des péchés' (Irénikon 34, 1961).
Tanquerey, A. A., Synopsis theologiae dogmaticae II. Paris/Rome 1959.
Taylor, J. H. 'St. Cyprian and the Reconciliation of Apostates' (ThSt 3, 1942).
Teichtweier, G., Das Sein des Menschen. Ein Beitrag zur Anthropologie des Origenes. Diss. Tübingen 1951. Die Sündenlehre des Origenes. Regensburg 1958.
Telfer,.W. The Forgiveness of Sins. London 1959; Philadelphia 1960.
Thyen, H., Studien zur Siindenvergebung im Neuen Testament und Semen alttestamentlichen und jüdischen Voraussetzungen (Forschungen zur Religion u. Literatur des Alten u. Neuen Testaments H. 96). Göttingen 1970.
Tillmann, F., Das Johannesevangelium. Bonn 1931.
Tricalet, P. J., Bibliothèque portative des Pères de l'Eglise, 9 vols. Paris 1758-63.
Trillhaas, W., Dogmatik. Berlin 1962.
Umberg, J. B., Die Schriftlehre vom Sakrament der Firmung. Freiburg/Br. 1920.
Vacandard, E., La pénitence publique dans l'Eglise primitive. Paris 1903.
Valton, E., 'Excommunication' (DThC V/2, Paris 1912).
Vanbeck, A. (pseudonym for J. Tunnel), 'La Pénitence dans le Pasteur d'Hermas' (RHLR, m.s. 2, 1911). 'La pénitence dans Origène' (RHLR, m.s. 3, 1912; 4, 1913).
Verde, F. M., 'II problema del male da Plutarco a S. Agostino' (Sapienza 11, 1958).
Verwort, A., see Henrion, M. R. A.
Vincenzi, L., In S. Gregorii Nysseni et Origenis scripta et doctrinam . . . Rome 1864.
Vögtle, A., Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament. Münster 1936.
Völker, W., Das Volkommenheitsideal des Origenes. Tübingen 1931.
Vogel, C., Le pécheur et la penitence dans l'Eglise ancienne (texts). Paris 1966.
Volz, P., Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter. Tübingen 1934.
Vorgrimler, H., 'Matthieu 16, 18s et le sacrement de pénitence' in L'Homme devant Dieu (Mélanges offerts au Père Henri de Lubac) I, Paris 1963.
Vrede, W., see Meinertz, M.
Watkins, O. D., A History of Penance I, London 1920.
Welte, B., Die postbaptismale Salbung. Freiburg/Br. 1939.
Wendland, H. D., Der Brief an die Römer (NTD 3). Göttingen 1958.
Wickert, U., Sacramentum Unitatis. Berlin/New York 1971.
Wikenhauser, A., Das Evangelium nach Johannes (RNT 4). Regensburg 1957.
Wilckens, U., 'υ#στερoφ' (ThW VIII, Stuttgart 1969).
Windisch, H., Taufe und Sünde im ältesten Christentum bis auf Origenes. Tübingen 1908.
Wipping, S., Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im NT (ZNW, BH 25). Berlin 1959.
Wörter, F. ‚Die christliche Lehre über das Verhältnis von Gnade und Freiheit von den apostolischen Zeiten bis auf Augustinus. Freiburg/Br. 1856.
Xiberta, B., Clavis Ecclesiae. Rome 1922. 'La Doctrina de Origenes (sobre el Sacramento de la Penitencia)' (Reseña Eclesiastica 18, 1926).
Young, F. W., The Shepherd of Hermas. A Study of his Concept of Repentance. Diss. Duke University 1946. (Not consulted.)
Zezschwitz, C. A. G., 'Die Privatbeichte in der morgenländischen Kirche' (Zeitschrift f. Protestantismus und Kirche (Erlangen, m.s. 43, 1862).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Zorell, F., Lexicon Graecum Novi Testamenti. Paris 1931.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[vii]

FOREWORD

This new volume of the Theological Investigations brings the series up to sixteen volumes (12 in the German) Once again this collection consists of a wide variety of essays, talks and writings, which the author was asked to produce on different occasions. From this one would expect a miscellaneous and random result, but in fact even a first, swift glance at the writings which originated in this way over the last few years and which seemed appropriate for such a collection reveals the quite clear emergence of a particular topic, namely the question of the Holy Spirit and his activity in the Church and in theology.

This is hardly surprising, since the charismatic movements in North America and in Europe have aroused interest in the gifts of the Spirit, in charisms and the guidance of the Spirit, and interest which came overnight to occupy the centre of the public, religious stage. It is indeed obvious that this type of experience of the Spirit raises a question which theology cannot and may not evade. For in the first place it seems as though a long forgotten Christian theme has once again taken on new life. But this brings with it the charge against theology that it has not been concerned with this important aspect of the life of faith. Today it is precisely non-theologians, the ordinary faithful, who must remind those 'responsible for Christian belief', i.e. theologians, of their neglect and forgetfulness, through the living proof of spiritual power. Furthermore the concrete expressions of this activity of the Spirit, such as speaking in tongues or healing, to mention only the most well known, seem to call in question the traditional theological enterprise, the whole way in which theologians think and reason. Effective Christianity would then detach itself from the realm of theology and find once more its original place in the charismatic faith of Christians.

[viii] Without being able to investigate more closely the rights and wrongs of these charges, which, though mostly unspoken, are commonly felt, we may at this point simply note that they recall one of our earliest theological enquiries, from which an unbroken thread may be traced throughout our theological work. These enquiries have not been prominent for a long while in the German speaking world and have not, in consequence, received much attention. If they are now taken up in this volume, the purpose is to present the above mentioned theme in a somewhat clearer light, for it is from this concern that our writings over the last few years on the subject of the activity of the Holy Spirit have originated. In this way the collection presented here has acquired its unified theme and focus, which is expressed in the subtitle: 'Experience of the Spirit: source of Theology'. A few short remarks may at least indicate the exact meaning to be attached to this phrase.

As in earlier volumes of my Theological Investigations, the point of stress summarised in the subtitle should not be taken to suggest a systematic treatment of the topic. It may be said only to expose the underlying shape which is shared to a greater or lesser extent by the individual essays. If in the present volume that consists in the experience of the Spirit, then at least a theme is formulated, or rather a basic stance indicated, which extends beyond the particular texts which have been brought together here and is of crucial importance for the whole theological activity of the author. This implies not only the general truth that genuine Christian theology can only speak through the Holy Spirit and in that measure already presumes and includes the experience of his power. Rather it should point to that quite specific experience to which St Ignatius Loyola wished to guide and direct spiritual practice through his Exercises. This experience is characterised by discernment of spirits, by the process of choice, by the practical search for the will of God, to mention only a few aspects. Proper to such experience is the basic tendency, strengthened and stimulated by meditation on the life of Jesus which shapes and surrounds it, to seek for the appropriate theological expression by which the immediate experience may achieve greater depth and clarity. From spiritual decisions, which are essential for the life of faith, whether of the individual or of the Church, there follows an inevitable exchange between experience and reflection. This in turn permits the ecclesial and theological activity and structures to possess the necessary flexibility and reference to particular situations in the [ix] transmission of truth. This may be clarified more concretely if one recalls the author's earlier works, for instance the Quaestiones Disputatae, 'The Dynamic Element in the Church' or 'Visions and Prophecies', or the various utterances on freedom and on public opinion in the Church, on the task of the layman and his relation to the hierarchy. The attempts to find a solution to these and similar questions all involved the serious application of the same basic concept of the working of the Holy Spirit. This theme appears also in a more spontaneous and perhaps livelier form in the author's published papers on the subject of spiritual practice; one may mention here 'Spiritual Exercises' (1965) and 'Meditations on Priestly Life' (1970). In such practices the Christian attempts to lay himself open directly to the instinctual faith of the Church, to ratify and make his own those insights of faith which the Church has achieved over the centuries through the guidance of the Spirit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this context awareness of the Spirit is in no way restricted to the intense emotional experience of the individual; it is alive also in the broad stream of the Church's awareness of the Spirit. But this does not mean that on the basis of a sober, rational theology and psychology such intense experiences should without more ado be rejected or treated with sceptical doubt in every case. It is rather that men, who are still on pilgrimage through time and history, should never imagine that they have received an absolutely certain and final assurance of the Spirit. What better way, indeed, is there of maintaining a lively awareness of this state than to insert one's own experience into the activity of the Spirit in the broad mass of the Church?

One can see from these few remarks that on the one hand the reality of the Spirit in Christian faith confronts theological reflection with limit questions, with problems which Christianity is forced to face in order to come to terms with itself, its past, its present tasks and its power to fashion the future: namely, the foundation of faith, the experience of grace, living from faith, etc. The present era is not the first to raise questions like these, but perhaps the answers which belong to the Church's history of spirituality have in the meantime been partly buried and forgotten. But we can even today grasp with relative ease the theological statements on the topic. Naturally theology has always attempted in various ways to formulate its answers by listening to Scripture and this point of departure is one to which contemporary theology also remains bound.

On the other hand reflection on spiritual experience impels [x] Christian faith into the heart of the mystery from which arises the question of God and of Jesus Christ in his unity and difference with regard to the Father. And, since the Christian has to understand himself both in relation to Jesus Christ and at the same time in contrast to him, the question can at this point no longer be suppressed, the question, that is, which man is to himself. The ecclesial community should help to answer this existential question, for its claim and its ministry remain, as does man himself, under the influence not only of the purely divine activity of the Spirit but also of the operations of the world, if indeed this conceptual antithesis is here allowable. But the effects of the world are not at all so unambiguous, or so easily evaluated, for the contemporary Christian as appears to have been the case in the past. For in these effects, too, the Spirit can be at work; it can present signs of the times to the Church. Thus the scope of spiritual discernment is broadened almost beyond measure. There is today a widespread feeling of oppression, fear and insecurity, a sense of being lost. The countless Variety of opposing questions and problems threatens to cripple the Christian. For however joyful and good the strict application of spiritual judgement may be in helping to solve this or that particular problem, it inevitably sharpens the perception of the relentlessly mounting number of similar questions. These the individual is no longer in a position even to survey by himself, still less to hope that he can make a substantial contribution to their solution.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In this sense what has been said so far, and indeed the whole collection of writings presented here, may leave the reader very dissatisfied. For the texts assembled here mostly deal with very specific problems, to which moreover the author has already addressed himself on various earlier occasions. So the volume may not appear to promise very much in detail, nor a great deal that is new. However the matter may be seen in quite a different light when the overall viewpoint, 'Experience of the Spirit: source of Theology', is allowed to coordinate and unify the contents and to offer a fresh perspective. This will bring to light connections and relations which scarcely come into view when the particular essays are read on their own. In wishing the reader to tackle this volume of the Theological Investigations in this way, the author is not so much concerned with the historical fact mentioned above that his own theological thinking sprang from the practice of the Ignatian Exercises and so in fact was fashioned in the light of reflection on the effective operation of the [xi] Spirit. Rather he is moved by a consideration which is grounded in the very substance of theology. In every case theology must be built out of a living experience of faith which is given, in the author's opinion, when hope transcends particular expectations and is enveloped by a promise deeper than words, when responsibility is freely accepted and borne, even without the explicit ratification of utility or success, when freedom is lived and death is grasped as the entry into the unimaginable assurance of salvation. Everyone must dig out his own experiences of this sort from the rubble of his daily activity. In all these moments, so we affirm, God, and his liberating grace, is present and in them we experience what Christians call the Holy Spirit. And this awareness remains alive even at times of inevitable oppression. It is offered to us for our free acceptance, if we do not wish to barricade ourselves against it in a hell of freedom.

This experience comes to every man, albeit in an endless variety of forms according to the personal and historical situation of the individual. But the Christian knows that the Spirit of God, which is offered to him for salvation or judgement with continual urgency, has been guaranteed to man as finally victorious in the crucified and risen Jesus and has entered into a permanent and irrevocable covenant with the history of mankind. Thus the Christian is assured that this Spirit, which has been poured out on all flesh and is at work over the whole earth, is no longer to be driven from the world by the despairing rejection of the individual; it is indeed the Spirit of the Father of Jesus, the Spirit of Jesus himself. We trust in his effectiveness and in his victory, if we cast our gaze on Jesus and his victory in death and no longer do we overlook the government of the Spirit at work even in our own lives.

At this deeper and more fundamental level, we find that the particular questions and problems, which threatened to fragment, once more come together. Here Christians and theologians can discover the courage and the joy which they need in order to carry on. On this level, too, the intense charismatic experiences are to be grounded, so that they may transmit the power of Spirit intended by Christianity. If this collection should contribute to this progress, if it can in the best sense have theological repercussions in the world of spiritual experience and awareness of faith, if it can promote consciousness and awareness of a spiritual kind, and if finally it should encourage concentration on the pressing demands of particular problems, without thereby breaking the connection with the [xii] underlying framework, then these essays may continue the work which was intended as the purpose of the earlier volumes.

For the publication of this volume the author has once again relied on the assistance of Fr Karl H. Neufeld S.J., D. Phil. Because of many obstacles and numerous obligations, the author has scarcely had the chance to deal personally with the final draft and arrangement of this volume, in so far as the proposed texts required attention at various points, so as to avoid

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

repetitions, remove superfluous material and add valuable notes. For this labour the author has his assistant to thank.

In conclusion I would once more express my joy in being able to dedicate this volume of Theological Investigations, even if rather belatedly, to my mother on the completion of the hundredth year of her life.

Munich, June 1975

Karl Rahner

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Faith and Spirit

[3]

1

THE FOUNDATION OF BELIEF TODAY

The foundation of belief today is a large and difficult question and from the start one should expect only a few fragmentary remarks in the way of an answer.[1] Necessarily we cannot avoid being selective in our considerations and this may lead to some vital points receiving insufficient attention. In modern society, however, we become aware of various needs, requirements and desires which are relevant to the underpinning of Christian belief. This enterprise indeed always contains a risk and we need therefore to be convinced that it is necessary today to seek to establish some grounds for Christian belief.[2]

As long as Catholic theology exists – indeed we may assert from the very beginning of Christianity – apologetic has been undertaken and fundamental theology taught, even if in a variety of ways, with changing methods, points of departure and perspectives. But the conviction has always remained that Christianity, its faith and its theology must be missionary. Therefore appeal must be made to the unbeliever, the doubter and those on the way to faith. Catholic theology has never maintained the view that faith was a sort of leap in the dark into a world to which there was no other access except through the totally irrational decision to believe. The Catholic mind always included respect for human intelligence, for reflection and for [4] intellectual reasoning and argument. Naturally such reasoning may proceed in a variety of ways depending on the exact topic under discussion and today, for example, it is rightly emphasised that Christianity has to find not only a 'rational' but also a 'narrative' or 'historical' foundation.[3] The Christian message that salvation is accessible in history cannot be expressed in terms of metaphysical reasoning alone, but must also be 'narrated' as the history of salvation. But even such 'narrative' theology is in fact rational, a point that the explanatory statements 'God became flesh', 'Jesus died on the cross', 'Jesus rose from the dead' themselves make plain. This in turn, of course, makes possible theoretical reasoning and metaphysical reflection in theology.

A first deduction follows from these preliminary remarks: whoever is to reach belief has the right to demand that the preachers of the Gospel 'give an account of our hope'[4], as we already find it expressed the New Testament. Such a grounding of faith has an external and an internal aspect; it is at the same time rational and spiritual. Certainly since the 19th century

---

[1] On the question of the foundation of faith, cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Contemporary Intellectual Formation of Future Priests', Theological Investigations VI (London & Baltimore, 1969) pp. 113-138.
[2] The following reflections were written for a lecture given to preachers and catechists at the IVth Theological Conference at the Bildungshaus Stift, Zwetll in December, 1973. They have been revised and expanded for publication here.
[3] Cf. J. B. Metz, 'Erlösung und Emanzipation' in Erlösung und Emanzipation, Quaestiones Disputatae 61, L. Scheffczyk ed. (Freiburg i.Br., 1973), pp. 120-140, esp. 137-140; also J. B. Metz, 'A Small Apology for Narrative', Concilium 5/9 (May 1973), pp. 84-89 and H. Weinrich, 'Narrative Theology,' ibid., pp. 48-56.
[4] 1 P 3: 15.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic theology has not paid sufficient attention to the interior foundation of faith. Current apologetic and fundamental theology has been carried out in too rationalistic a manner. This point must be granted without further dispute.

It was said that, since revelation is evidently guaranteed by miracles, it follows that in the Old Testament, in Jesus Christ and in the Church derived from him, a historical revelation has been given. This fact was, as it were, proved as a whole and the intention was to extract specific truths of faith from divine revelation, demonstrated by such formal reasoning, and present them to the individual with the rider: this is revealed truth; you must believe it; it does not matter whether you understand it or not, or whether you find any interior, personal access to it. Even today it must be admitted that Church authorities still behave in a manner which appeals too exclusively to the formal authority of the Church and the magisterium. On the basis of this authority alone the individual is required to accept specific articles of faith without any effort being made to render such truths credible [5] from within their own horizon of meaning.[5] What exactly is meant, however, by the 'internal' and 'external' aspects of the grounding of faith, or by its 'rational' and 'spiritual' side, must be more clearly indicated in the course of the following reflections.

THE SITUATION OF BELIEF TODAY

The external situation of Christian belief, of the possibility and duty of faith, is characterised by the crucial fact that Christianity and the Church are, in the expression of Peter Berger, a cognitive minority.[6]

What was the situation like in the past? For at least 1500 years the Church, and its theology and apologetic, existed in a historical and intellectual world formed by a more or less homogeneous Christian society. Faith constituted public opinion: it was accepted and taken for granted as self-evident. God's existence, for example, was regarded by St Thomas Aquinas as an assumption requiring no discussion for the ordinary mortal, for belief in God was an assumed fact in society to which everybody referred without question and with perfect right. Today the situation is quite different. Christianity and the Church are no longer publicly supported without question by society, or at least such backing is rapidly crumbling away. Thus Christian faith today is ever more plainly in a state of 'gnoseological' or 'mental concupiscence.'[7] This expression may seem to some an awkward, modish or odd description. Perhaps it should be briefly explained.

The fact of concupiscence, of that excessive desire which is a consequence of original sin, is already attested in ch.7 of the Epistle to the Romans as well as in the dogma of the Church and the teaching of the Council of Trent.[8] According to the Tridentine text, the state of concupiscence cannot be completely overcome, so that even the justified Christian must struggle 'ad agonem' with it in his Christian life. Until now it has only been considered and discussed with reference to the [6] ethical (or unethical) impulses in man. Man always feels

[5] On the problem of Extrinsecism' cf. A. Lang and H. de Lavalette, LThK III, 1321-1323; also cf. K. Rahner, 'Remarks on the Importance of the History of Jesus for Catholic Dogmatics,' Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975) pp. 201-212, esp. 203 sq.
[6] Cf. P. Berger, Rumour of Angels (London, 1971) pp. 12 sqq.
[7] For this expression, cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Relationship between Theology and the Contemporary Sciences,' Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 94-102; also in this volume, 'Faith between Rationality and Emotion'.
[8] Cf. the Decree of the Council of Trent on Original Sin, Denz. 1515.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself driven by various forces and desires.[9] These impulses are not integrated and harmonised; they war one against another. In this state a man must live out his life. Even when he wishes clearly and freely to choose God, he will be impelled by quite different forces, that is, by egoism, or, as one used to say, by 'the flesh'. A man is unable in some measure to reach real peace and genuine integrity in his moral behaviour or to achieve the complete ordering of his life. He is and remains, as it were, two people: when he makes a wholehearted, personal decision in one direction, he is acutely aware that he cannot entirely reconcile the 'other' active within him to this commitment by means of his own choice of direction. But concupiscence, in the Christian sense of the term, is more clearly evident today in the realm of human knowledge as well as in the moral domain. In the 16th or 17th century a theologian, or even an ordinary Christian, could organise his knowledge into a more or less well-structured system. His questions and problems were open to solution. Moreover it was known and recognised at that time that a unified, well-organised and comprehensible world picture could emerge in which everything found its proper place and nothing had to stand in opposition to anything else. Centuries earlier St Thomas Aquinas, in his Summa Theologiae, had already created such a system, in which the human knowledge of the day, the possible questions and answers, were all taken into account. The result of this unified synthesis was that each proposition was treated as an absolute and definite assertion. Either one accepted that God is a Trinity or one did not; tertium non datur. If one said no, then the denial possessed the same absolute and definite quality as the positive affirmation.

The present situation, however, is characterised by the above mentioned 'mental concupiscence'. Our minds are fed with disparate insights and pieces of information from a great range of sources of knowledge and these do not admit any longer of a positive and complete ordering into a coherent whole. When I began my theological studies forty years ago, I was far cleverer than I am today, if I take all the possible branches of knowledge and intellectual problems as my [7] criterion of measurement. For today there is such a vast number of questions and areas of knowledge of a historical, metaphysical, philosophical, linguistic, sociological and religious kind that in the face of this mass of theological material I feel much stupider than I did then. Christian Pesch,[10] whose manual of theology I followed, could still be firmly convinced that he had dealt with all the relevant theological material in his 9 volume 'Theologia Dogmatica'. He had in some measure worked out a positive, theological synthesis in the then prevailing intellectual climate. Such a thing is quite impossible today. One would have to have some knowledge of, say, Aramaic, modern linguistic philosophy and sociology. To this must be added a thousand other things, so that a mass of phenomena, of whose existence we at least have some inkling, confronts us as questions to be answered and tasks to be undertaken. This enormous range of knowledge and intellectual possibilities, a range which can no longer be adequately covered, brings plainly to the fore that human limitation which I have tried to describe with the phrase 'mental concupiscence'. In the past men have been conscious of limits in the moral sphere imposed by concupiscence and in a similar way today the problem is felt in the realm of knowledge.

In this situation the individual is no longer in a position adequately and positively to organise in his mind all the knowledge which is important for his picture of the world. We ought not to behave as though a synthesis of faith and contemporary knowledge were still a possibility for the individual. We may rightly believe, however, that Christianity contains the final truth and meaning for man and the world. We may also be granted the conviction that ideally an ultimate synthesis must in itself be possible and that no data of knowledge exist

[9] For this notion cf. Ignatius Loyola, Spiritual Exercises 'On the Discernment of Spirits' (313-336). The rules do not merely seek to create an awareness of the phenomenon; they also offer the individual practical help in dealing with it.
[10] Chr. Pesch, Praelectiones Dogmaticae, 9 Vols. (Freiburg i.Br. 1914-1925).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which are so mutually opposed that one set must be accepted as true and the other rejected as false. Of course this ideal can only be approached asymptotically: it always lies before us and will presumably move away to an ever increasing distance. Limitations of time, strength, intelligence and memory remain even for modern man, despite all the available means of assistance, while the material to be gathered into any synthesis, coming from every branch of modern knowledge and from the whole range of human experience in history and in society, is ever on the increase.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE MODERN SITUATION

If we now turn to the question of the foundation of faith, the state we have described above forces us to concentrate first of all on the basic essentials of Christian revelation. The Second Vatican Council was justified in speaking of a hierarchy of truths even though it did not specify exactly what the expression meant.[11] It is immediately obvious that the individual articles of faith may be related either more closely to, or more distantly from, the fundamental centre of Christian faith. In this sense the idea of an objective hierarchy of truths is straightforward enough. But clearly we must reflect more carefully upon the subjective hierarchy of truths.[12] In fact the two are so closely intertwined that they share a common dependence upon the original revelation. What else can a man do if he is in a state of 'mental concupiscence', faced by an incomprehensible mass of knowledge which can neither be digested nor fitted into a synthesis, except to return to the original, central revelation? There must be such a centre which I can make my basic support and from which I can calmly accept the totality of Christianity. This I can do without having first achieved the perfect, but unattainable, synthesis of all Christian truths, even those of secondary importance, with contemporary knowledge and the modern mind. In today's world even the theologian who has spent a lifetime of study in his field has the right to say that, not being an exegete, he cannot give an exact account of how Mt 16:18 can be positively reconciled with the papal office as it exists and is conceived in the Catholic Church today. For this, particular specialist knowledge is demanded which is scarcely to be found in mind of one person. The earlier assertions of fundamental theology on this point certainly do [9] not suffice as an objectively adequate answer to the question. They do no more than point in the direction in which an answer is to be found. But the Christian and the theologian must positively come to terms with truths of this sort, even if a direct synthesis of the kind outlined above is not obtained. So the only possible first step is for me to return once more in a conscious fashion to the innermost kernel of my faith.

In order to provide grounds for belief we can begin quite happily with man. There is no need to fear that this anthropological starting point necessarily leads to a subjective or reductionist version of Christian faith which is limited to one epoch. Certainly one thing is quite clear: the man who has no questions hears no answers, even though of course the question stays more plainly in a man's awareness if the answer is also heard, for question and [11] On the notion of the 'Hierarchy of Truths' cf. Cone. Vat. II Decree on Ecumenism, Art. 11, commentary by J. Feiner in, Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, II (London and New York, 1967), also K. Rahner, 'Theology and Anthropology,' Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 28-45; 'The New Image of the Church', Theological Investigations X (London, 1973), pp. 3-29; 'On the Theology of Ecumenical Discussion,' Theological Investigations XI (London, 1974), pp. 24-67; 'The Faith of the Christian and the Doctrine of the Church,' Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 24-46.

[12] The author has already discussed the problem of the subjective hierarchy of truths some years ago under the title 'Gestaltwandel der Haresie,' cf. Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln, 1954); cf. also K. Rahner, 'What is Heresy?' Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 468-512.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

answer hang closely together.

The more precise the question, the more care and attention will be paid to grasping the answer. Similarly the answer given in revelation clarifies the question a man asks. If one is aware from the start of the complementary relationship existing between the anthropological starting point and the theological answer, then one should not permit any further attack on the proposed point of departure. A man can say that he is only interested in answers for which he has a question; so God can only communicate with a person on a level which concerns that man's innermost core of existence. Why should this lead of necessity to an abridgement of Christian faith? Man is essentially a questioner; indeed he is an absolute question which does not stop at any given point. An objective curiosity is part of his nature, for a person is endowed, even before he begins to ask questions, with the grace of the Holy Spirit, which is rooted in the centre of his personal being. He is given the capacity to ask for infinity and to lay himself open to the infinity of God. If we do not hold back our questions, needs and desires from this natural right and this horizon of meaning, then we experience ourselves in the concrete situation of salvation as a question which can only find an answer in the self-communication of God in the Holy Spirit and in Christian revelation.

To the possible objection that I for my part have no interest in the trinitarian nature of God or that I cannot awaken any feeling for the Trinity in someone else who has questions of his own which I am trying to answer, then one may reply: examine the questioner more closely and at the same time reflect more deeply upon the meaning of the Trinity (original sin, purgatory, etc.). Bore down, as it were, into the depths of human existence and make a real effort to grasp the [10] meaning of the objective dogmas of the Church. Then it will become apparent how the human, existential question and the concrete answer of revelation come together and how the essential kernel and experience of revelation are brought to light. Out of this experience a valid hierarchy of truths of faith is established. Of course the official teaching of the Church exercises normative power in directing the process of grounding Christian faith, but today this must necessarily consist in personal initiation and in arousing an inner experience of faith.[13] This is even the case when someone asserts that he is unaware of any experience of faith and has no interest in such a phenomenon. In fact in his actual existence a man has a thousand experiences which he does not reflect upon, which he even represses or pushes to the edge of his consciousness and which he does not explicitly trouble himself over, and yet they are still there. If they are brought to life in the right way, they can illuminate the content of Christian faith, for a man is always summoned by divine grace, which lies ever before him and is continually operative in his life. Naturally one cannot avoid a certain rift, a certain tension between the doctrinal teaching, on the one hand, about God, man and salvation history, which comes from without, and the inner experience of faith, on the other, which is proper to each individual. One reason for this is the finite and subjective nature of human consciousness, which is far from possessing the inner strength and vitality to be capable from its own resources of developing the whole content of Christian faith. There is the additional factor that human subjectivity, raised up by grace, only achieves a sufficiently objective level when operating in the framework of the whole of human history and the total process of salvation and revelation. For this reason the individual is always obliged, and justified, in referring himself to this historical objectivity. The grace which is at work in man produces the complete fullness of the reality of revelation and faith. Therefore grace not only possesses an inner point of connection with human existence but also a seed in every man out of which the whole history of human salvation and revelation may grow, both in Christianity [13] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Die Notwendigkeit einer neuen Mystagogie', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie lI/I (Freiburg, 1966) pp. 269-271; also 'Die Rücksicht auf die verschiedenen Altersstufen in der immer erneuten Glaubensmystagogie', ibid., III pp. 529-535.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and in all the great religions. To proclaim Christian faith, one must always be seeking for new ways to awaken to life this interior disposition and capacity. Christianity cannot be put over as indoctrination in the way [11] school children are taught that Australia exists, that is, by being told: you yourselves have not yet been there but others have travelled there and geographers have proved its existence. So you must accept that there is such a country. If one wants to communicate Christian faith in this way from the outside by appealing to the formal authority of the Church or to some generally accepted social institution, then one would not be preaching the message of God in the manner demanded by the present age.

At this point a second consequence may be briefly mentioned. Christians must be constantly brought to realise that, even apart from faith or theology, it is quite natural for people today simply to endure the fact of mental concupiscence. How much there is in our world that can no longer be gathered together into a positive synthesis! We may consider merely the enormous variety of conditions under which men achieve salvation. How many never reach the full use of their intelligence and are, as it were, taken up into a blessed fulfilment free and gratis. Others, on the other hand, seem condemned by God to have to work out their salvation in fear and trembling, with possible failure as the end result. Why do we not belong to the number of those who, according to the usual teaching of the textbooks, gain beatitude without any free decision? What can a man say in reply to questions like these except: I do not know? Here neither airy hypotheses and theological speculation are of any assistance, nor the view that all past assertions on the topic are now nonsense. It seems to me that one simply has to accept that in the present situation there are many things presented by both experience and knowledge which cannot be arranged into a neat pattern. Despite Küng's investigation, for example, I am convinced of the truth of the dogma of the First Vatican Council about the teaching authority of the Pope and hope to remain of this mind until the day I die. But I am equally aware that this teaching raises a thousand question marks. But that does not force me to the assertion that the doctrine of the papacy proposed up to now is simply out of date.

If one asks the average Sunday churchgoer whether he is convinced that the Pope is infallible, then perhaps only a fraction would reply, yes. So we are faced with the fact that only a few Catholics out of all those baptised really possess the mind of faith which is presumed by the Church as a matter of course: I believe everything which the holy, Catholic Church presents for belief. Now are the others, the great remainder, not Catholics? Two reasons militate against such a deduction. [12] First a great proportion of these Christians base their lives on the essential substance of Christianity, even if perhaps they do not consciously reflect on it, and secondly they grasp, at least in some manner, the essential reality of faith. Now this appears decisive in the present case, for the outlook of mental concupiscence which is to be presumed today is not such that assertions which either really or apparently contradict the faith are held and proposed with absolute conviction. The religiously informed person does not in fact say: I am utterly and completely certain that the Pope is not infallible. If one interprets more carefully a statement which sounds like this, then it turns out to mean something like: I can't get a first grip on the assertion of papal infallibility; it does not seem to me at all probable; I am inclined to the opposite position, etc. If one tries to explain this outlook more clearly, one runs up against the pressure of mental concupiscence and its many-sided conditioning, which in practice excludes a positive and explicit commitment of faith to the statement of the First Vatican Council. In the present situation this ought not to be treated as a loss of faith. Whoever does see it in this way might be told: an absolute, all-embracing and final decision about the teaching authority of the papacy can be left aside. The difficulties and problems can be freely admitted but this too should not lead one to want to set up another absolute system. One should rather accept that it is in a certain sense impossible to acquire the requisite knowledge. Whoever agrees with this position can today in my opinion legitimately be and remain a Christian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

FROM THE EXPERIENCE OF FAITH TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF BELIEF

A man desires to be free, to possess hope and understanding, to grasp his own freedom in such a way that it comes to fulfilment in the course of his life and realises the potential that lies within him; he wants to be a man of fidelity, love and responsibility. In practice the process of genuine, free self-determination comes about in all the opaque details, the doubts and obscurities, the incongruous events and apparently purposeless beginnings which flood into our life. For a man's biography is directed in freedom to a point of absolute decision and in fact already contains such a decision within it, since it is life as a single whole for which one is answerable and this life does not simply gutter out in the darkness of particular events.

Philosophers and other theoretical thinkers can of course reflect [13] endlessly about concepts such as freedom, responsibility, love, altruism, etc. Indeed such notions are not clear and transparent to any of us. But they do nevertheless possess a meaning and give a direction to one's decisions in the thousand trivialities of daily life. The impression can force itself upon one that these words can all be explained away in psychoanalytic, biological or sociological terms, that they can be unmasked as the unavoidable superstructure of much more primitive realities which in fact constitute the real essence of human existence. But in all these endeavours one and the same subject is at work and is the responsible agent. Thus in the final analysis all these attempts to dissolve what is specifically human must be false. A man cannot and may not escape being a genuine subject and the freedom and responsibility this entails; I accept myself, I take myself on.

This self-affirmation is uttered without ultimate protest but still with full consciousness of the limitations and accidents of biological and historical existence, even if it is accompanied of course by the right and duty to alter and improve what is oppressive in these conditions. Nevertheless not all is open to such improvement; not everything which I must become is the result of my own decision alone. In the ultimate analysis I can either reject myself in radical protest or accept myself in the total and concrete reality of life, even though this remains opaque and oppressive and cannot be manipulated so that I have full and complete control over it. It remains full of pain and obscurity. However I can accept it in hope.[14] But the hope which embraces and sustains everything does not provide ultimate certainty that we possess it; rather it offers the promise that the incomprehensible element in all that is beautiful will in the end be made plain and that this meaning is final and blessed. That is my hope.

Can one be persuaded and convinced that such hope is a false and cowardly utopia and that to indulge in it is worse than letting oneself fall into a radical scepticism? But in fact this scepticism, however theoretically possible, cannot be sustained in the actual business of living, where I carry responsibility, where I love and am loved. An ultimate trust in the complete and all-embracing meaning of human existence is not simply a free floating ideology. It covers everything and is covered by everything which is encountered elsewhere in [14] human life.[15] It is the free and basic act of human existence which can only find halting expression in human words. It reaches out finally to what we call God. Certainly the word 'God' is obscure but what is meant by it comes out in a man's life, or at least can do so, even when the word itself is absent. Today what is meant by it cannot easily be expressed [14] Cf. K. Rahner, Meditations on Priestly Life (London, 1973); 'Self-realization and Taking up one's cross,' Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 242-259.

[15] On absolute trust cf. K. Rahner, 'I Believe in Jesus Christ,' Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 165-168; 'A Fragmentary Aspect of a Theological Evaluation of the Concept of the Future', ibid., pp. 235-241; 'On the Theology of Hope,' ibid., pp. 242-259.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

within the frame of reference of the 'world architect', as was possible in the period of the Enlightenment. Furthermore we are acutely aware that great crimes have been committed under the banner of the word 'God' and that monstrosities and stupidities have been justified by appeal to it.

And yet the ultimate ground of my hope in the act of unconditional acceptance of my existence, this I can reasonably call God. God is far from being thereby made the projection of my hope into the void. For the moment I think of him as a projection, he becomes meaningless and ineffective in my life. On the other hand I can no more give up the ground of my hope than I can surrender the hope itself. So God must be what is most real, what embraces and sustains everything, for only thus can he be both ground and goal of my hope as I conceive it in the act of trust by which I accept my own existence. This God is an unfathomable mystery, for the hope in which freedom and reason form an indivisible unity reaches out beyond all expectations. Hope cannot provide a goal of its own making, since every individual item in life's reckoning is provisional and determined and threatened by another. The final destination of our hope in an unlimited existence must therefore be sought elsewhere.

The act whereby personal existence is accepted in trust and hope is therefore, as long as it is not the victim of self-deception, a letting go of oneself into the incomprehensible mystery. Christianity is far from being a clarification of the world and existence; rather it contains the prohibition against treating any experience or insight, however illuminating it may be, as conclusive and intelligible in itself. Christians have less answers (at their disposal) than other mortals to hand out with a, 'now everything is clear'. A Christian cannot enter God as an obvious item in the balance sheet of his life; he can only accept him as an incomprehensible mystery in silence and adoration, as the beginning [15] and end of his hope and therefore as his unique, ultimate and all-embracing salvation.

From the innermost heart of his experience a Christian knows that he himself is sustained by this mystery in his trust and hope for the fulfilment of his being. So he calls this movement towards God at work within him, 'grace', 'the Holy Spirit', even if he does not necessarily have to reflect on it and may even repress it, although he cannot destroy it. The movement directed to the immediate presence of God he interprets as faith, hope and love. A Christian must grant every man who is faithful to his conscience this interior movement towards God, even when the other does not think of it in these terms and has not yet grasped its historical appearance in Jesus Christ in explicit Christian faith.[16]

A Christian is afraid that he is able to reject this inner movement of human existence in either open or hidden unbelief. But he is also hopeful, for himself and for others, that this movement will pass through every darkness and superficiality of life and reach its final and 'eternal' goal. Thus a man's existence remains in the last instance under the threat of his capacity freely to deny himself. This threat is continually overcome by the hope that the history of man's freedom, which is enveloped and determined by the freedom of the incomprehensible mystery, will, as a whole, achieve a blessed outcome through the power of God, even if no theoretical statement about the salvation of the individual person can be deduced from this hope.

JESUS CHRIST: THE SYNTHESIS

[16] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Observations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian" ', Theological Investigations XIV (London, 1976), pp. 280-294, where references to earlier publications and to the discussion of this concept are to be found.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All that has been said up to this point is brought together in a mysterious way for the Christian in the encounter with Jesus Christ. The basic human hope and the experience of Jesus sustain and justify each other in an ultimately indestructible bond, which may be grasped by a man of integrity and reasonable conscience, as long as he assumes a stance of what Christians call humility in the face of the incomprehensible mystery.

The encounter with Christ is mediated both through the Gospel of [16] Christianity and of the Church based on the message of Jesus and also through the ultimate hope in God's grace.

What does a Christian see in Jesus? The answer may originate from various elements of experience and so the following considerations cannot represent the only possible description of the encounter with Jesus or one which is universally binding. On the other hand, the experience itself, for all its different aspects does possess a unity. The history of Christianity, which has its own unique importance, envisages one man who loves and is faithful even unto death, whose whole human existence, embodied in word and action, lies open to the mystery which he himself calls, 'Father', and to which he surrenders himself in trust even when his world is shattered. The dark chasm of his life is for Jesus the sheltering hands of his Father. He stands fast in his love for men; he is sure in hope, even when everything seems to collapse in the destruction of death. He was convinced that in him and his message the kingdom of God was at hand, that is, that God in direct love and forgiveness victoriously pledges himself to man, transcending all the good and evil forces which influence human existence. For the person who listens to the message of Jesus a new and decisive opportunity for man has come about, which is never to be surpassed. This experience also means that we are faced by a man who, in his life and death, does not fail to match up to the demands which are involved in being human. Thus Christianity is convinced that, despite every reason for scepticism in our experience of man, we may with innocent trust and total abandon surrender ourselves to one man in absolute dependence. Jesus' followers shared the experience of Good Friday without any illusions. And yet they then became aware, as a gift from Jesus himself, that his life is not in ruins, that his death is in fact a victory and that he is the one totally and finally accepted by the mystery of God. In a word they experienced the fact that he is risen. Of course one should not conceive of this resurrection as a return to the limits of a life restricted by space and time and the facts of biology; one should rather think of it as the ultimate salvation of the one complete man, body and soul, in God.

The mystery is the 'incomprehensible God' and so the manner of this acceptance cannot be given imaginative form. But whenever the absolute hope of man and the experience of the life and death of Jesus meet, we can no longer reckon with the destruction of Jesus without thereby denying this absolute hope and allowing the self-abandonment of man, whether willingly or not, to emptiness and [17] futility. If on the contrary we search for the historical personality who permits us to trust that in him our hope is fulfilled, then we cannot find any other to name except the one presented by the witness of the apostles. The experience of Jesus gives us, in so far as we freely commit ourselves to our own hope, the strength and the heart to affirm from the centre of our own experience, and from the hope that lies within it, that he is risen. The basic human hope and the historical experience of Jesus are bound together for a Christian as a unity. Jesus of Nazareth is accepted by God and in Jesus God has answered the question which man constitutes in his unlimited, incomprehensible nature. Human existence is here finally and gloriously blessed and the sceptical human question, fashioned in guilt and futility, is transcended. The courage to hope is sealed. So Jesus is the ultimate answer which can never be surpassed, because every conceivable question is annihilated in death and he is the answer to the all-consuming question of human existence in that he is the risen one. As Word of God, he answers the question which we ourselves pose.

From this starting point there arise the statements about Jesus Christ contained in the traditional teaching and theology of Church, i.e. orthodox Christology. But the reverse is also

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

true: whoever accepts Jesus as the insurpassable Word of God, as the final seal of his own hope in history, is and remains a Christian, even if he cannot follow the traditional Christological formulations or finds great difficulty in doing so, because they come from a framework of meaning not easily intelligible today.

Cross and resurrection belong together in the authentic witness to Jesus and in genuine and responsible faith in him. The cross means the stark demand for a man to surrender himself unconditionally before the mystery of his being which he can never bring under his control, since he is finite and burdened with guilt. The resurrection means the unconditional hope that in this surrender the blessing, forgiveness and ultimate acceptance of man takes place through this mystery.[17] It also [18] implies that if a man abandons himself to this movement, no further destruction lies in store. Cross and resurrection clearly show how this self-abandonment is taken up by God in the fate of Jesus and how the possibility of self-surrender, the hardest task of our life, is irrevocably promised to us in Jesus Christ. For the Lord is an absolutely concrete fact. A man need only involve himself with this specific individual in unconditional love and he then possesses everything. Certainly one must die with him; no man escapes this fate. Why not, then, utter with him the words, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?'[18] or 'Into your hands I commend my spirit'?[19] In the destiny of Jesus every human philosophy receives for the first time a truly specific and concrete form. What exactly this philosophy looks like or should look like is not especially important. Once a man has reached Jesus, then it contains this simple message: just to be prepared to make the final act of hope and self-surrender to the incomprehensible mystery. Yet this covers everything because the fate of Jesus, a death which is life, has brought this philosophy into being, not of course in mere talk about death but in the actual experience and suffering of death.[20]

For us this moment still lies in the future. Our life is directed towards it without our knowing exactly when it will appear in our life. But only then has the essence of Christianity been grasped and conceived. A man can and should, however, prepare himself to be open to this event. The glory of our present existence is not thereby removed. Rather it gives everything its proper value and makes the burden light. Christianity is thus simplicity itself because it embraces the totality of human existence and leaves all the details to the free responsibility of man, without providing an exact recipe for them. At the same time it is the hardest thing of all, a grace offered to all which can and is received, even when unconditional hope has not yet discovered its seal in Jesus of Nazareth.

THE TASK OF THE CHURCH

Many people today seem to find Jesus more easily in anonymous hope without being able to call him by his historical name. But whoever has [19] a clear enough encounter with Jesus must also recognise him for who he is; otherwise he would be denying his own basic hope. The raising of Jesus from the dead cannot be the victorious pledge of the presence of the divine mystery which forms the fullness of our life, unless the eternal validity of Jesus's [17] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Frühe Bussgeschichte in Einzeluntersuchungen', Schriften zur Theologie XI (Zurich, 1973), where the author deals extensively with this aspect of the forgiving and saving will of God. This background should be taken into account if the reflections proposed here are to be properly understood. On the importance of the historical investigations into the sacrament of penance in the work of the author, cf. K.-H. Neufeld, 'Fortschritt durch Umkehr: Zu Karl Rahners bussgeschichtlichen Arbeiten', StdZ 192 (1974), pp. 274-281.

[18] Mk 15:34.
[19] Lk 23:46.
[20] Cf. K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death, Quaestiones Disputatae 2 (Freiburg and London, 1961), esp. III 'Death as a Dying with Christ', pp. 64-88.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

resurrection were not also the object of the faith of many. Thus there comes into being the community of those who believe in him as the one crucified and risen. Within this community they discover the answer to the problem of their own existence and learn to become aware of the mystery in which he is both near at hand and far away, if we place ourselves in its presence. This community is called the Church. Those who believe in Jesus cannot be individualistic in their religion, if only because of their common relationship to the Lord. Moreover faith in Jesus can only be awakened through active witness and therefore demands the social structure of a community of faith which is gathered around Jesus Christ. Furthermore Christianity is ecclesial because man has a social nature, which means that the history of his freedom is worked out in the context of the community. Finally it seems contradictory today, at a time when there is growing emphasis on the need for greater human solidarity and social involvement, for individuals and groups to imagine that Jesus must be reached apart from his Church. This outlook reveals an out of date individualism which, even from a purely secular and historical point of view, has nothing to offer for the future. Also the most convinced individualist in matters of faith depends upon the Church for Scripture, tradition and religious language, even if he wants to sever his connection with the Church. In general truth has something to do with an open and at the same time critical attitude towards society and institutions. Without such an outlook even so-called personal truth would lapse into arbitrary whim and lose its meaning even for the individual. The precise value of the Church is of course assessed very differently by the various Christian bodies but Christianity universally recognises institutions and affirms an ecclesial orientation which is vital for its existence. Baptism is acknowledged by practically all Christians as the rite of initiation into the Christian community and this implies the recognition of the Church as a concrete and historical institution in society.

Every genuine Christian will certainly suffer as a result of the actual social form of the Church in history. For the concrete embodiment of the Church never matches up to its true nature. It preaches a message which questions its own empirical structure. It is, namely, a Church of [20] sinners, whose members deny in actions what they affirm in words. The history of the Christian Church has plenty of horror and misery in it, and in the end there only remains the question: where else should we go if we leave the Church? Could we be more faithful to the liberating Spirit of Jesus if we, sinful egoists that we are, set ourselves up as the 'pure' at a distance from the poor, miserable Church? For our part the misery can only find a remedy through our sharing the burden of poverty for which each one of us himself bears the guilt. As a Christian in the Church a man carries the responsibility for changing it from within, for the Church always remains 'ecclesia semper reformanda', as the Second Vatican Council[21] emphasised. If we discover something genuinely Christian within us and really find out what it means, how can we then object to letting it benefit in a selfless way the community of sinners? By the power of Jesus Christ the Church will pass through its miserable history and come to the fulfilment which has been promised in the death and resurrection of the Lord.

Christians have had a basic awareness that the relation of hope and love to the incomprehensible mystery of their life which they call God can only be acknowledged, expressed and given credible form in an unconditional love of their neighbour, for this alone is capable of forcing open the hell of human self-centredness.[22] This love is not to be treated as something self-evident, otherwise it becomes corrupted into an expression of hidden egoism. As the liberating grace of God it stretches us continually beyond our capacity and is [21] Cf. Conc. Vat. II, Lum. Gen. Art. 8.

[22] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for this reason only really possible if a man, consciously or not, allows himself to surrender to the incomprehensible mystery. Then the Spirit of Jesus is at work, even if it is not explicitly acknowledged, as Mt 25 makes plain. Let us, therefore, hope that the grace of God performs this miracle in us too; everything depends on it.

At a time when there is of necessity a growth in human solidarity and social involvement, love of neighbour can only be authentic if it also takes a form which goes beyond the realm of private, individual relationships. Before all else love must today be expressed, though not exclusively, in Christian responsibility for the social sphere. The individual, groups and the Church as a whole has this task, each in its own [21] way. To fulfil it requires hope in eternal life, the stimulus of the Christian spirit in the Church and the Spirit of Jesus himself. By recalling his death and resurrection the Church acquires a critical distance from its present state which prevents it from making into an absolute either the existing shape of things or some plan for the immediate future. Were the Church to dissolve into a humanitarian enterprise, it would betray its proper function, for it has the duty of declaring to the world the ultimate seriousness and the incomprehensible value of love of neighbour. This is, however, only possible through witness to the unfathomable mystery which the Son of man, Jesus Christ, has entered in faith, hope and love. But even today there seems great danger of not taking love of neighbour seriously enough, especially the neighbour who is encountered in secular society. And yet only in this love can a Christian find God, to whom he desires to surrender himself totally with Jesus Christ, because he is the incomprehensible mystery which Jesus did not resolve but rather accepted in faith and hope.

Christianity and the Christian churches also obtain in this way a new and balanced relationship to the non-Christian world religions, which in the past lay outside the orbit of Christian culture. Now Christianity cannot let go of the claim both to have received the definitive and all-embracing word of grace in Jesus, crucified and risen, and still to preach this word today. But this is not to deny that the liberating Spirit of God is active in all finite human affairs, within every perplexity and error. The non-Christian world religions witness in their own fashion not only to human limitation but also to the Spirit of Jesus. Certainly many of their major experiences can provisionally be included in the comprehensive answer of Jesus, because the history of the Christian message is far from complete.

Atheism has become a world-wide phenomenon, which affects millions today. But here too it should not be assessed by Christianity simply as an absolute human denial which expresses only the refusal to surrender oneself to the unsearchable mystery of God. It is rather to be seen as a stage in the history of the experience of God which clearly renders God a mystery more radical than a mere object of petitionary prayer, a mystery which cannot be manipulated by men either conceptually or practically, or fitted into any human frame of reference, but is solely to be trusted in hope.

Thought and action often tend to lead to a kind of bewilderment which admits of no resolution. At first glance it seems as though one [22] had simply to carry on in the face of such perplexity, even without knowing where the path is leading. But the urgent question remains of what lies hidden beneath this silent, faithful and patient endurance. Here one runs up against the hope which human experience has formulated in two words: mystery and death.

Mystery means here that perplexity contains hope; death contains a veto against our masking or stifling this perplexity, or forcing it into a false optimism which is merely stupid and futile. If we gaze upon the crucified Jesus, we should realise that we are to be spared nothing. In hoping in his death, I dare also to hope that in a shared death lies the ascent to a blessed mystery. Despite every dark shadow such a hope permits life even now to emerge in its proper beauty and be filled with promise.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christianity offers a simple task, a burden both heavy and light, as the Gospel asserts.[23] If a man carries it, then it begins to carry him. The longer life lasts, the heavier and the lighter the burden becomes. Christianity calls for a whole-hearted and straightforward profession of hope, amidst all the mysterious twists and turns of our life, and assures us that in this mystery there lies what we call God, eternal life, ultimate value and the salvation of our being. The message is proclaimed: look at the crucified Jesus who achieved eternal fellowship with God and not merely the validity of an ideology, and follow at his side the way into the unfathomable mystery. In this lies the whole of Christianity. Within our world and in our own life a mass of queries and tasks remain, for which there are no simple recipes or programmed solutions. For they remain our tasks, for which we are responsible. Christianity is straightforward and credible. For who can seriously forbid a man from fixing his gaze of Jesus and, even after 1500 years, prevent him from recognising in him today the seal of his hope? Whoever takes this step and holds firm to it despite every darkness in his life, that man is a Christian. No one can assert with absolute certainty that he in fact does this, just as no one can say that the whole business of Christianity is the result of external indoctrination and social support and is a mere facade behind which so-called Christians and messengers of the Gospel conceal their ultimate hopelessness and despair. I hope in my hope and in Jesus who seals this hope, that is, I hope to be a Christian. Certainly this is not harder to carry than the burden of existence which is laid on every man and which no one can [23] shrug off Christianity is a total whole, and therefore at one and the same time simpler and more mysterious, harder and easier than anything else. In this sense we can all of us merely say: I hope to be a Christian.

[23] Cf. Mt 11:30; 1 Jn 5:3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[24]

2

EXPERIENCE OF THE SPIRIT AND EXISTENTIAL COMMITMENT

If we look closely at the topic of the experience of the Spirit and existential commitment, we find that the subject is in fact limitless[1], for even a first glance makes it clear that it is only a variation of the theme, 'Transcendence and History'. Although this fact is not yet taken as self-evident in the usual manuals of theology, it is nevertheless true that the gift of grace through the Spirit of God is in the first instance a genuine self-communication of God to the transcendent human self and not an internal or external categorial reality of human consciousness, material, as it were, for the free decisions of the human person. The topic of transcendence and history cannot receive complete clarification here; on the other hand we cannot simply presuppose it as a suitable theme for discussion. Only a few comments are possible at this point and these may only provide scant illumination, so that one must be content with their fragmentary character.

CHARACTERISTICS OF EXISTENTIAL COMMITMENT

The following comments, while especially important for subsequent reflections, should not give the impression that the essence of existential commitment is to be completely defined. Within Christian theology existential commitment signifies the free act of a human being in [25] which he has ultimate control over himself before God.[2] In the last analysis it is relatively unimportant whether in this decision the 'before God', i.e. the acceptance or rejection of God, is made explicit in words or not.[3] Since the exercise of freedom with respect to a purely categorial object and to a finite value, or one conceived as finite, is not possible without a prior, transcendent grasp of absolute being and absolute good – a thesis no Thomist would deny –, it therefore follows that every genuine, free decision must contain a reference to God on the part of the free subject. As stated above, the conscious analysis of this state of affairs is immaterial, because a man's behaviour with regard to the obvious and given categorial objects which always surround our historically conditioned use of freedom and through which that freedom is mediated, such behaviour can only be free if it occurs within the transcendent horizon of freedom, in the unlimited, prior grasp of absolute good, i.e. of God. In any case the basic tenet of Christian anthropology is to be formulated thus: a man's free behaviour is not limited to the categorial and finite object of his free choice or to a concept of God in his objective consciousness but extends to God himself. The transcendent nature of freedom not only enables us to make a categorial choice which has moral consequences, since it is assisted by various concepts bestowed by God as the guardian of that divine law of which we have an intellectual grasp; it is also its own object of freedom.

[1] This study originated in an essay written for the Festschrift for E. Schillebeeckx. Since this essay is closely related to other studies found in this volume and partly covered the same ground, the text was revised to avoid tedious repetition; cross-references were also added.
[2] This notion should not be understood in the sense of a hypothetical decision as L. Boros proposes in The Moment of Truth (London, 1965). The author has never supported this hypothesis and his conception is much broader. Nothing is stated here about the historical moment in which a man actually takes this decision.
[3] On this cf. the study, 'Anonymous and Explicit Faith', in this volume and the author's earlier publication on the topic of the 'Anonymous Christian' with the ensuing discussion; references are to be found in 'Observations Problem of the "Anonymous Christian" ', Theological Investigations XIV (London, 1976), pp. 280-294.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For activity subject to categorial limits not only takes place within a transcendent horizon which is open to the absolute, it also radically alters this horizon itself. This means that such activity must be described as a possible, freely constituted acceptance of the self-communication of God, and so of salvation, or of damnation if and when this self-communication permanently comes to nothing.

In all this we have of course been speaking of the transcendent nature of man which is raised up by grace and which, through grace, is [26] ordered to the direct presence of God himself. This is not to attack the legitimacy of a limit concept of 'pure nature', that is, the idea of a transcendence of knowledge and freedom which does not bestow any promise of, or claim on, direct union with the ultimate goal of man, a goal which can only be approached in an asymptotic fashion. But this is really a question of a limit concept which cannot be used any longer as the starting point for any anthropological deduction. Now, however much the explicit notion of human transcendence raised up by grace may stem from Christian revelation, nevertheless it cannot essentially, and not merely historically, be drawn from the language of Christian revelation. If an experience of the Spirit occurs and if this appears, from a Christian point of view, to lie outside the explicit, institutional bounds of Christianity and even outside the range of its language, and if it is a genuine case of a revelation event, then the concept of 'graced transcendence' may be applied in an anthropological investigation, and not merely subsequently through an appeal to positive theological data. This is true even though the notion receives its best and purest expression in explicit Christianity and acquires greater clarity from this source. Nor is the truth of the above assertion affected by the fact that the meaning of graced transcendence implies that revelation is a genuine reality.

Whenever a man speaks of unbounded transcendence and does not stifle his spirit in the face of it but rather surrenders himself without reserve to the absolute reality of his transcendent nature and has some experience of it, then he is raised by grace to communion with the direct reality of God. This is true whether he reflects upon it or not, whether indeed he is capable of pursuing such reflections or not. It is also the case even if no reference is made to that event which we Christians call the explicit history of revelation.

Man's free control of his own transcendent nature, raised up by grace, either in acceptance or rejection, comes about through an existential decision which always involves historically limited, categorial material. This is where freedom is expressed and mediates the subject to itself.

How is the freedom which involves the categorial object related to the freedom of the subject towards himself and God? The relationship is a very complex one, but we should start from the fact, which is not immediately obvious, that there exist decisions which are objectively wrong but which do not destroy a man's positive relationship to God, so-called 'objective' sins which carry no 'subjective' guilt. An absolutely [27] fixed relationship between the categorial content and the transcendental significance of a free decision cannot be given if by the 'content' of such a decision is meant the object of explicit, conscious awareness, i.e. all that can be put into words, empirically and historically comprehended and subsequently assessed. For this would be to ignore the transcendent element which is always involved in such an act and forms part of a man's awareness. With respect to this knowledge no discrepancy can exist between the evaluation of the act before God and by God and the act in itself. The alteration of the transcendental consciousness raised up by grace, mentioned above, is brought about by the categorial decision and does not, therefore, always correspond to the categorial content of the decision. Nor does it possess a univocal relationship to this content which can be determined by reflection. This is confirmed by the Catholic teaching that no one can form an absolutely sure judgement about himself and no one knows on the basis of reflection with certainty whether he is in a state of grace or not.[4]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One cannot deduce from the transcendent nature of man, raised up by grace, – in so far as it is open to explicit, thematic investigation – a determinate object of choice which is clearly differentiated from the goal of this transcendence. Conversely a particular, categorial object of choice, even if it is materially correct and conforms to the objective structure of man and the world, cannot guarantee for certain that its choice will bring about a positive relationship to human transcendence and its goal.[5]

SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCE

Before we begin a more detailed elaboration of our theme, something must be said about experience of the Spirit. Without offering further evidence here, we may propose the thesis as a basic assumption for our later exposition that the essential nature of genuine experience of the Spirit does not consist in particular objects of experience found in human awareness but occurs rather when a man experiences the radical re-ordering of his transcendent nature in knowledge and freedom [28] towards the immediate reality of God through God's self-communication in grace. In addressing ourselves to the question whether a man freely accepts this experience or rejects it, we must remember that experience of the Spirit is not constituted by a particular divine operation 'from without', working upon the human spirit conceived as an already finished entity. It comes about rather through God's self-communication to the human spirit ('uncreated grace')[6] by which God becomes a constitutive element of human transcendence.

Experience of the Spirit is, therefore, experience of the radical and permanent nature of human transcendence, which goes beyond itself towards God because it is constantly impelled by his self-communication. This innermost depth in man can be presented as 'nature' or in the form of free acceptance or the protest of rejection. Under 'nature' one should include everything which is presupposed for the existential self-determination of human freedom as the condition of its possibility. It is immaterial whether it is the simple, finite reality of creation or the unmerited gift bestowed upon this nature in its own proper way as the 'being' of man.

Like any other experience, the transcendent experience of the radical nature of the Spirit is mediated through categorial objects, for the finite, spiritual essence of man only comes to self-expression in relationship to what is other, and in the ultimate analysis this other must be personal. The above certainly applies to the normal case but does not touch the question whether a mystical experience may be imagined in this life in which the transcendent elevation of man by the grace of the Spirit is really grasped without the mediation of any categorial, a posteriori object coming from without.[7] In any case such a transcendent experience, in so far as it happens at all, can certainly be given objective form and, in this

---

[4] Denz. 1534; 1540-1541.

[5] One should at least take note at this point of the highly controversial issue, whether a specifically Christian morality exists with regard to its material content. It seems to us that the reflections proposed here could be used at a starting point for such a discussion.

[6] On the theme of grace cf. the article 'grace', Sacramentum Mundi II (London and New York, 1968), pp. 412-426. On the question of 'uncreated grace', cf. K. Rahner, 'Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 316-346; see also under the heading 'The Self-Communication of God', Sacr. Mun. III, pp. 114-118; ibid, IV, pp. 297-305; ibid. V, pp. 348-355.

[7] On the question of mysticism cf. the other studies in this volume which deal explicitly with the topic, especially 'Religious Enthusiasm and the Experience of the Spirit'; 'Modern Piety and the Experience of Retreats'; 'Faith between Rationality and Emotion'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

way, becomes a definite object of human awareness. Indeed transcendent experience as such is not the same as [29] the objective form in which it is conceived and the two should not be confused. Consequently it should not be tacitly assumed that the grace-filled experience of radical transcendence only occurs when an objective concept is also produced in the form of a categorial content of knowledge or when the experience is mediated to human consciousness through overtly 'religious' material.

Our thesis ultimately rests upon the view that every categorial object and the experience of it are finite and that no essential distinction can obtain between such objects, whatever may be the case in individual instances. To suppose the existence of such a distinction, by which a number of such objects appear as a result of a special, direct operation of God while the rest do not, is fundamentally to adopt a mythological understanding of the relationship of God to the world.

COMMITMENT AND THE SPIRIT

How are the experience of the Spirit and existential commitment related to each other? Existential commitment means in this context, for example, the choice of a particular career, a specific form of behaviour towards another person, the decision to marry, a particular religious act, etc. Of course such actions must bring into play a definite, positive relationship to the prior, transcendent nature, raised up by grace, and so to God in himself. But this raises the question how exactly the categorial object of an existential decision is connected to the basic significance of this decision, that is, the establishment of our actual transcendence in freedom, the acceptance or rejection of God, who communicates himself as the ultimate dynamic of our transcendent nature. Obviously this creates a difficult problem. A categorial object of choice can be in itself wrong and yet at the same time make possible the achievement of a positive relationship to God. On the other hand an object of choice which is right according to human criteria, in terms both of people and of things, and which lies within the objective norms laid down by God, such an object does not necessarily provide an absolute, unambiguous guarantee that by making such a choice a man really achieves a positive relationship to God, in which God communicates himself as God in grace. For one must not assume that psychological freedom of choice and its realisation with regard to a categorial object necessarily involves real, existential self- determination. Otherwise one could not make sense of 'venial' sin 'ex [30] imperfectione actus'[8] and correspondingly of an 'impaired act of freedom'.

Furthermore an object of choice which is correct by human standards cannot guarantee the clear fulfilment of the existential commitment, since the latter refers to the transcendent experience of the Spirit and to God, while in a concrete situation of free choice several categorial objects can be presented at the same time. These may in fact appear under certain conditions as more or less equally possible in themselves, but only one may seem to be willed by God as the necessary, concrete means which must be chosen here and now to achieve a positive attitude to the experience of the Spirit and of the existential relationship to God. It is not immediately self-evident in the case of a choice between several objects, in themselves legitimate and 'good', that it really matters, with respect to the relationship to God, which decision is taken. But we can take it for granted here that it does matter, since it is the view of those who possess genuine spiritual experience and knowledge that for something to be

[8] Cf. the classical textbooks of moral theology, e.g. D. M. Prümmer, Manuale Theologiae I (Freiburg i.Br. 1923) no. 370 (Thomist); J. Aertnys, Theologia Moralis I (Turin, 1928), no. 258 (following Alphonsus Liguori); H. Noldin, Summa Theologiae Moralis I, (Innsbruck, 1956), no. 300.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

willed by God it is a necessary, though not sufficient, condition that it should be objectively right, i.e. conform to the 'Laws of God', be humane and in accord with the mind of the Church. But this condition is not in itself sufficient to establish it as willed by God. This view is not incompatible with the hypothesis that in some cases the subject may be thrown back by God in his decision upon the ambivalence and openness which is intrinsic to human freedom with regard to objects of choice. It is not possible to appeal to other experience in the face of such a spiritual experience, for this may be explained as the hypothetical case mentioned above and offers no argument against the necessity imposed by God of deciding between objectively good alternatives.

THE PROBLEM OF CHOICE

How can a man come to an existential decision in the face of a number of worthwhile possibilities, if he is to proceed, not arbitrarily, but before God and in conformity with a choice willed by God? In daily life the ordinary man of piety usually experiences little difficulty and this simplicity should certainly not be disturbed. He has the personal [31] impression that God 'tells' him what choice he should make out of those open to him; God 'enlightens' and 'inspires' him so that he knows quite concretely what is the will of God in a particular instance.

Now theology does not allow the possibility of 'new revelations' even for the most important decisions in the life of the Church and this rules out any regular intervention of God to determine which object of choice is here and now the right one. One cannot escape this conclusion by pointing out that in this case it is 'merely' a matter of the private sphere of human life, for this is just as important as the 'public' life of the faith of the Church. Such intervention would form a 'private revelation'[9] and while this can of course happen, it cannot be the presupposition for all such decisions, and that is what is at issue here. How, therefore, can the actual choice be made in an existential decision between various possibilities which are of the same, or similar, worth according to objective moral norms, but only one of which is willed and commanded by God? Given the above assumptions, a specific choice is only possible, unless one is to appeal to a mythological explanation, if one allows a synthesis of the transcendent experience of the Spirit and the encounter with the categorial object of choice freely offered here and now.

This synthesis allows for the experience of one morally possible choice in preference to others as God's purpose for us. Now the transcendent experience of God's self-communication in grace is not directed to a thing, or to a merely necessary being, but to a personal reality in freedom, to whom a man surrenders himself when he freely responds with faith, hope and love to God, who is present to him in what is necessarily a transcendent experience. Whenever human freedom is realised, it is experienced, whether this is thought out or not, as the free gift of God and as the continuation of his creative act in the life of the creature, for the creature owes both its essential being to God and also its free development. From this point of view a synthesis of the transcendent and the categorial is certainly conceivable. The categorial which is freely willed can be experienced as the fixed purpose creatively determined by God's freedom.

A word should be added about the meaning of the synthesis of the transcendent and the categorial, by means of which a choice, given by God, can be put into effect among various possibilities. First of all this [32] synthesis is not to be ruled out where a categorial object of choice does not mask and disguise the transcendent experience but rather allows both the [9] Cf. K. Rahner, Visions and Prophecies, Quaestiones Disputatae 10 (London and Freiburg, 1963).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

experience itself and the reflection which tests it to occur unhindered. This is not immediately obvious because it is assumed that the categorial object of choice is morally good and at the same time cannot be chosen by man on his own. A person may have the experience of being unable in a free and uninhibited way to fit a particular object of choice, even one that is morally good, into the movement of knowledge and freedom which is involved in the transcendent experience of the Spirit. He may reflect upon general principles and norms and seek to assess a particular object by reference to them. In doing so he may not come up against any objection to the choice of a particular categorial object, and yet somehow he has not got it in him to make the choice and this constrains and obscures for him the free impetus of the transcendent spirit in quite a different fashion from other cases where this experience does not occur. Of course a number of objects could be included on an equal footing in such a synthesis without there being only one which masks the transcendent experience of the Spirit. In this case all the objects would be possible not only on the basis of their human and rational legitimacy but with respect to God as well. This free selection would in fact be divinely intended and God's will would not have foreseen only one particular object. Here it is not of any particular importance either before God, or for the experience of the Spirit, which is in fact chosen among the various possible options.

Finally the synthesis intended by God between a particular categorial object of choice and the transcendent experience of the Spirit can and should be experienced in a more positive way. For the freely accepted transcendent experience of the Spirit is only possible here and now through concentration upon one distinct object of choice among others. This means that this object does not in any way lessen or distort the experience of the Spirit but rather provides a concrete and practical means of expression for it. According to what was said earlier an object of choice which by human standards is not in itself right, i.e. not in conformity with the norms of the moral law, can in practice mediate the free acceptance of the transcendent experience of the Spirit. Of course if this objective moral contradiction were clearly perceived and affirmed, then there would be no place for the experience of the synthesis of transcendent, spiritual experience and a categorial object of choice. To suppose otherwise would be to imply [33] that the will of God, the creator, bore absolutely no relationship to the structure of the created world and was quite indifferent to it. In the last analysis, however, the will of God, together with his world, is precisely the object of transcendent experience. In a case where someone with full knowledge and consent willed what was objectively wrong by human, moral standards and wished in this way to attempt a synthesis of an essentially wrong object of choice and a freely accepted transcendent experience of the Spirit, his intention would remain unfulfilled and would not lead to spiritual experience. Such a synthesis simply cannot be achieved in this manner.

So far all that has been said about the connection and the complementary dependence of spiritual experience and existential decision has been on a very abstract and general plane. Certainly it could all be more clearly and precisely described, but the scope required by the topic has not allowed detailed consideration of the psychology of the transcendent experience of the Spirit in grace, of the logic of existential commitment or of the nature of freedom which cannot be neatly fitted into a logic proper to theoretical reason.[10] Nor can we deal with the various pieces of evidence offered by theological tradition which witness more or less clearly to the unity of the transcendent experience of the free spirit (of God and man) and existential commitment. In this connection, for instance, the Spiritual Exercises of St Ignatius could be adduced as evidence,[11] although this would require the treatment of texts whose [10] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Logic of Concrete Individual Knowledge in Ignatius Loyola', The Dynamic Element in the Church, Quaestiones Disputatae 12 (Freiburg and London, 1964), pp. 84-156.

[11] Cf. in the present volume the reflections contained in the essay entitled, 'Modern Piety and the Experience of Retreats'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exact meaning is still disputed today. My own view, however, is that they point to this unity of spiritual experience and existential decision.

This short study has contained not merely speculations and mental fantasies which have nothing to do with the concrete business of living. If this objection should be raised, the counter question must be put whether sufficient attention has been paid to the very real distinction between an unthought out transcendent experience which forms part of a specific object of consciousness, without itself being a categorial object, and the concept of such a transcendent experience which has been thought out, given objective form and expressed in words. If such a concept does not normally occur in daily life, this by [34] no means proves that the transcendent experience of the Spirit is also lacking.

Furthermore if someone were to maintain that he never experienced such a synthesis of transcendent experience of the Spirit and the objects of an existential decision, then again a counter question may be asked. Is it absolutely essential for the truth of the position outlined here that such a synthesis can frequently be experienced as a distinct, clear object of reflection? Or is not also conceivable that such basic options and commitments happen relatively infrequently and then directly determine the rest of a man’s life?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[35]

3

RELIGIOUS ENTHUSIASM AND THE EXPERIENCE OF GRACE

The comments of a dogmatic theologian upon enthusiasm in the Church cannot take into consideration either exegesis and biblical theology or the phenomenology and history of religion, or church history, in so far as these are relevant to the topic.[1] However there are certain phenomena which merit our attention: experiences of the Spirit, glossolalia (speaking in tongues), the experience of a radical transformation of the 'old man' into a new person brought about by the Spirit of God, a radical conversion, and similar events which occur today in the various charismatic movements in the churches and which offer a real and concrete expression of Christianity.

We cannot give an exact description of such phenomena here nor can we assert with certainty that the comments we wish to make from a dogmatic viewpoint really bear upon their concrete and specific characteristics. We intend here to do two things. First we must [36] delineate an area from the standpoint of traditional theology in which a phenomenon such as charismatic enthusiasm can be described and located in dogmatic theology. Secondly we must attempt to give some basic guidelines about the discernment of spirits. We must, that is, at least touch upon the question under what conditions a charismatic phenomenon can in any sense count as an experience of the Spirit, which, according to the dogma of the Church, is the grace-filled, divinising gift of God to justified mankind. In trying to provide at least the bare outlines of the 'locus theologicus', as it were, in which such enthusiasm can be rooted, we leave the question open whether the specific and concrete phenomena and experiences which are reported in the life of the Church today are in fact dealt with at all in our account. The question also remains open whether even the beginnings of an effective spiritual discernment can in fact be provided by such a dogmatic method or whether discernment of spirits,[2] if it is really to distinguish between the genuine and false elements in movements of religious enthusiasm, must supply much more specific criteria with greater human and psychological content than those offered from a purely dogmatic perspective.

We cannot simply proceed in our investigation from the definitive and infallible teaching of the official Church. In this area statements which are binding for a particular Christian denomination are not sufficient. Even if a complete theology of grace, whether Catholic or Protestant, were assumed, this would still be the case. If one restricts oneself to the Catholic theology of the Holy Spirit, the question still remains open according to the official teaching of the Church whether a direct experience of the Spirit can in fact occur in the sense determined by Catholic teaching on grace at the 6th session of the Council of Trent,[3] that is,

---

[1] The concept 'enthusiasm' requires some clarification. In the usual Catholic dictionaries, even in the 'Dictionnaire de Spiritualité' (Paris, 1932), it is not to be found. In Protestant circles it has been interpreted since Luther to mean emotional excess, cf. W. Trillhaas, RGG II (Tübingen, 3rd ed. 1958) and similarly Y. Congar, 'Enthousiastes', Catholicisme IV (Paris, 1956), pp. 262 sqq. From this background enthusiasm was seen above all in connection with prophetic proclamation, cf. Fr. Heiler, Erscheinungsformen und Wesen der Religion, (Stuttgart, 1961), pp. 274 sqq.; 281 sqq. In more recent times the positive aspects of religious enthusiasm have received more prominence, cf. W. J. Hollenweger, Enthusiastisches Christentum. Die Pfingstbewegung in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Wuppertal and Zurich, 1969). For the general concept cf. Brockhaus Enzykl V (1968) 562 and E. Fink, Vom Wesen des Enthusiasmus (Essen, 1948). Cf. also, R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm (Oxford, 1950).

[2] On 'Discernment of Spirits' see 'Discemement des esprits', asc. et. mysi III (Paris, 1957), 1222-1291 (J. Guillet, G. Bardy, Fr. Vandenbroucke, J. Pegon, H. Martin) and H. Wuif, LThK X (Freiburg, 1965), 533-535.

[3] Cf. Denz. 1525; 1529-1530; 1553-1554.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the experience of the Spirit which gives justification, of sanctifying grace, and of the infused virtues.

Naturally Catholic teaching contains the doctrine of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, the outpouring of the Spirit and its presence in men, justifying grace, the presence of the trinitarian God,[4] but unfortunately the question still remains unanswered in Catholic theology whether the Spirit enters the realm of human consciousness [37] as the Spirit or is only accepted as a present reality through the external indoctrination, as it were, of Scripture and the teaching of the Church, but which we know lies beyond our own spiritual experience. Here we can leave aside the question of the exact manner and means by which the Spirit can be given to us at all. The discovery and establishment of such a basic division within Catholic theology may seem surprising. For the traditional Catholic theology of grace must obviously be familiar with some sort of experience of the Spirit. Actual grace which is declared to be absolutely essential, in the face of Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism, for every saving action, is understood as an inner inspiration and illumination. Experiences of grace which help to overcome concupiscence are known as are ones in the sense of the 'Imitatio Christi'. Ignatius Loyola was familiar with such experience, a sense of consolation, and he regards it as beneficial for the whole of Christian spirituality.[5] But a closer investigation of post-Reformation theology, at least since the Baroque period, reveals quite clearly that for a major school of theology, in which the Jesuits are also represented, a real experience of the so-called supernatural grace of justification, either habitual or actual, simply does not enter the picture; for this school the proper reception of the justifying Spirit of God, even when such justification brings about subjective human acts, lies beyond conscious awareness and is a purely ontological reality.[6] Obviously, given such an assumption, the whole problem which engages us here does not arise at all. For on this reckoning any form of charismatic enthusiasm, although it is not denied as a purely empirical phenomenon by this school and may indeed be cultivated in its spirituality, is something which in the last resort must be judged according to natural, human and moral criteria alone. Of course there may be talk in some sense of the experience of grace in such a school, but strictly speaking its conclusion must be that such experiences are natural events of a psychological kind which must be empirically investigated from a variety of viewpoints by different methods and judged according to human criteria. In addition one may say that these experiences fulfil the human and religious conditions for being 'ontologically raised up' by the grace of God but that this elevation by [38] the Spirit is a reality whose occurrence transcends human consciousness. According to the pre-suppositions of this school of theology, religious enthusiasm may be regarded as a very important phenomenon, perhaps even as absolutely necessary and indispensable for justification, but nevertheless as a phenomenon which, in the language of such a school, belongs to the pre-conditions required for acts of salvation. To put the matter more concretely: a supernatural act of faith which confers salvation consists for this school in objects of consciousness which are mediated verbally and doctrinally by the teaching of the Church. These objects can basically be heard, received and known by a purely natural act and can be related to human freedom of a merely natural kind. The only qualification added by this school of theology is to the effect that, when such acts are freely undertaken as acts of faith, then they are in reality 'ontologically' elevated by the Holy Spirit into an event which takes place beyond consciousness. This act of faith, in so far as it has been ontologically transformed by grace, is the bearer of salvation, which it would not be were it a purely

[4] Cf. Denz. 3329-3331.
[5] Cf. Ignatius Loyola, Spiritual Exercises, nos. 6-10, 313-336.
[6] It is essential to see these remarks in the general context of the theology of grace; cf. the author's article in Sacramentum Mundi II (London and New York, 1968), pp. 412-426; also F. Stegmuller, 'Molina' and 'Molinismus', LThK VII (Freiburg, 1962), 526-530.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

natural occurrence. But from the point of view of human consciousness the credibility, meaningfulness and revealed character of the content of faith can be shown, according to this school of thought, without recourse to the supernatural assistance of the Holy Spirit which is necessary for salvation. Only in the moment when the act of faith becomes a saving act is it raised ontologically by grace beyond the scope of conscious awareness, so that in this sense it possesses an ontological character substantially different from that of a purely natural act.

All this, however, takes place outside the realm of consciousness. All the elements open to psychological comprehension which play a part in the occurrence of such an affirmation and decision of faith can indeed be spoken of as grace from the point of view of the actual providence of God, etc. But in the last resort this grace is essentially regarded as natural, medicinal grace which must be sharply distinguished from the properly pneumatic element, the purely ontological elevation of the psychological event which we call religious awareness, the experience of faith or the affirmation of faith.

If, then, we want to speak of Christian enthusiasm from the standpoint of dogmatic theology, we must from the start make a clear and definite break with this approach which has been traditional in the Jesuit school. We are convinced that both Scripture and a more representative and genuine theological tradition within the Catholic [39] Church point to a different understanding of grace. Grace, the Holy Spirit, the working of the Spirit of God in the proper sense of divinising grace which is radically new and really contains the Spirit of God, all this is something which in our view, to put the matter cautiously, operates within human consciousness. Pneuma means for us, in the strictly theological sense of grace which raises up and divinises supernaturally, a genuine self-communication of God in himself.[7]

Even if we set ourselves completely apart from the position mentioned above, which has an extensive following in Catholic theology, we must nevertheless clearly and realistically admit that at first glance the opinion of this school which we have rejected seems to have a great deal to recommend it. That is to say, if we consider the rather naive and self-conscious wave of pentecostal enthusiasm which has appeared on the contemporary scene and get to work on it with the tools of the psychology, history and phenomenology of religion, then we might well be tempted to say: all this enthusiasm which has come to the fore in modern Christianity is psychological, an expression of natural, human capacities which appear elsewhere in the history of religion taken as a whole. One could say that the phenomena of the gifts of the Spirit, of charismatic enthusiasm are basically universal religious events and are perhaps to be found in a more or less pure, confused or distorted form in every religion. One might feel that, since they are present everywhere, they do not imply any peculiarly Christian phenomenon. They occur under various guises in different religious sects, both inside and outside Christianity; they appear within various Christian denominations, cultural groups and social classes; they may be found in a variety of psychological or cultural types, but in essence they point to purely human capacities, which in the last analysis have nothing to do with Christianity as such. From this perspective one might attempt to defend the basic position of the Jesuit school of thought outlined above by suggesting that only such a stand can rescue the specific essence of Christianity from the onslaught of charismatic enthusiasm, which, on psychological, historical and phenomenological grounds, would reduce it to the level of other religions. Only in this way can we locate the specifically Christian element firmly in the supernatural elevation of man by the [40] Spirit which lies beyond the scope of human consciousness. This would provide a safe refuge from the psychological and phenomenological scepticism of today. One could treat the whole phenomenon of religious enthusiasm either positively or negatively, with benevolence or scepticism. One might in [7] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The self-communication of God', Sacr. Mun. III (London and New York, 1969), pp. 114-118; ibid. IV, pp. 297-305; ibid. V, pp. 348-355.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation certain circumstances regard such phenomena as very useful or as an inevitable concomitant of religion, but the exact elucidation of their origin would be a question in which dogmatic theology could happily declare itself to have no interest.

OUTLINE OF A CONTEMPORARY THEORY OF GRACE

First of all we must select and sketch out the theory of grace which we are to take as axiomatic, in so far as grace is regarded as the sanctifying and justifying self-communication of the Spirit of God himself. Obviously our remarks here can only take the form of a thesis proposed without further theological reasoning to support it. What justification there is for the thesis in this context consists in the usefulness which we hope it has for a theological interpretation of the phenomenon of religious enthusiasm, which is the concern of the present study.

I mean by the essence of grace the self-communication of God to the transcendent spirit of man. In virtue of this self-communication the transcendence of man is permanently and necessarily ordered to the direct presence of God, whether this be the object of conscious or thematic reflection or not. Furthermore God's self-communication is a dynamic force which transforms the inner, transcendent reference of the human spirit to God so that this transcendent, spiritual movement finds its fulfilment in the beatific vision, the direct knowledge of God face to face in love, in which God is possessed without the mediation of any created reality. Grace is thus understood as the radical transformation of human transcendence so that God is not merely the final goal of human striving which one may come nearer to but never reach. He is not only the ultimate objective which, asymptotically approached, opened up the whole spiritual movement and intellectual history of mankind and kept it in motion. Grace is also that which makes it possible for this movement to reach God in himself. Naturally, therefore, grace divinises man and bestows upon him a share in the holiness of God.[8] Such a preliminary understanding of grace in [41] relation to human transcendence makes it possible first of all to allow grace to operate in cases where apparently a directly Christian communication of justifying grace is not present, where the conscious interpretation of the elevation of human transcendence does not occur, or, if it does, is only expressed in a very obscure manner. The notion of the specific essence of grace outlined here does not in fact result in insoluble conflict with the problems and difficulties which the Jesuit interpretation of supernatural grace mentioned above sought to avoid. According to the latter view, grace is a divinisation of man which takes place ontologically beyond the realm of consciousness and which properly speaking, at least in normal cases, is present for the first time in human awareness only in the beatific vision. It takes as its starting point the problem that all other specific, categorial religious phenomena which can be described and empirically analysed are to found outside Christianity and beyond the bounds of any spirituality proper to the Church. Now on this view it seems very difficult, if not impossible, to explain their existence through the operation of what in all seriousness we can call the Holy Spirit, the self-communication of God. Such an interpretation is based on the conviction, expressed in scholastic terms, that this grace essentially and properly consists in the self-communication of God, i.e. in what scholastic theology calls uncreated grace, in contra-distinction to any habitual or actual grace, however sublime, which is created in us by God. Uncreated grace is thus God himself, the goal and ground of those acts which are related to God in himself. According to our thesis no particular, categorial object of consciousness is assigned to this grace, which is present rather in transcendent experience.

[8] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Grace' Sacr. Mun. II (London and New York, 1968), pp. 412-426.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This latter can, however, subsequently be the object of historical and categorial reflection and in fact must be reflected upon, since no transcendent experience is to be found without some complementary historical expression. This account of the matter avoids a conception of divine grace which would make of it a particular, inner-worldly phenomenon which comes from without (a conception to be rejected on theological as well as philosophical and historical grounds). For the peculiar type of divine causality of grace that this assumes seems to lack credibility in the face of secular arguments.

Finally we must make it even more plain that we did at the beginning that the competence of the dogmatic theologian does not extend to the question, however important, whether the various experiences and events which one is considering in speaking of religious [42] enthusiasm can be brought to some degree under a single, common heading. It is presupposed in the dogmatic reflections offered here that this is possible, at least in some measure, even at the cost of neglecting very great differences amongst the particular experiences of religious enthusiasm. If the term 'religious enthusiasm' does not contain any theological common denominator, then our reflections would have to be parcelled out, as it were, to cover the various, disparate experiences of religious enthusiasm. We proceed from the position, admittedly far from certain or free from problems, that in fact all these experiences do have something in common and that this consists in a transcendent experience which touches the centre of the religious subject and in which the subject has an experience of God. Of course the assertion of a common element in such charismatic phenomena is problematic in itself because it is questionable whether this radical, transcendent experience does occur in all such phenomena, even if they are judged to be genuine in themselves from a phenomenological point of view; one might feel on the contrary that some phenomena of this type may precisely inhibit or distort transcendent experience. It is furthermore obvious that to assert a common element is not to define the specific peculiarities and distinguishing characteristics of the various charismatic phenomena. Finally the proposal of a common factor in the different expressions of religious enthusiasm does not imply that a similar transcendent experience of God may not be present in religious phenomena which we would not normally call 'enthusiastic' or charismatic, phenomena such as intense meditation, contemplation, mysticism, as well as moral decisions which lay claim on human freedom in its most ultimate as well as its most superficial aspects. However the assertion of a common element does seem to us to make sense for various reasons. First it makes it possible for theology as such to have something to say about such phenomena; secondly if these phenomena do not possess some generic essence in common, they could be of no religious significance at all but would merely count as strange, psychic occurrences which might attract the interest of a para-psychologist or perhaps a psychiatrist. The obvious criticism might of course be made that if some common factor is attributed to these expressions of religious enthusiasm which covers them all without exception, then the specific character of these expressions is not in any way affected. So appeal to the common element does not enable one to say anything at all about religious enthusiasm as such. But in our view this criticism is in the last resort not valid, since all these [43] expressions of religious enthusiasm, if and when they are genuine (which is by no means always the case), bring more clearly to a person's consciousness the experience of transcendence, an experience which may of course be found elsewhere and in other ways; they make it easier for a person to objectify this experience and mediate it to human freedom in a more intense form than would mostly, though not always, be possible for the majority of mankind in the normal unfolding of the history of individual and collective piety, if this is seen as the history of grace-filled experience of transcendence. To put the matter in summary form: a clear dose, as it were, of grace-filled, transcendent experience is a rare and sporadic

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

occurrence; it is usually found, if at all, in homoeopathic states and in unreflective mysticism[9] (by mysticism is meant here a transcendent experience through grace which is not categorial). It follows that there is and must be transcendent experience in the form of religious enthusiasm. This is true even if the categorial element plays a much greater role in the objectification of the experience from the point of view of the subject than is the case in genuine mysticism. This means that there is much greater likelihood of distortion and corruption in the former than in the latter. Religious enthusiasm is, as it were, mysticism in ordinary dress. It may be noted here, in order to forestall possible objections, that mysticism can be interpreted as an entirely Christian phenomenon, as an expression of faith; properly understood it is the realisation, whether consciously grasped or not, of that 'kenosis' which took place in the death of Christ and was borne, accepted and answered by God through his own self-communication, in which alone ultimate freedom can be achieved. But with these remarks we find ourselves at the end of our preliminary reflections and already embarked upon the thesis which is to be proposed in this essay.

THE MEANING OF RELIGIOUS ENTHUSIASM

Our thesis concerning the theological interpretation of the phenomena of religious enthusiasm amounts to this: it may be admitted first of all that expressions of enthusiasm, in so far as they differ in their particular characteristics from other religious occurrences, are not of necessity specifically religious or experiences of grace. However, through [44] these phenomena a man comes face to face in a particular way with his own transcendence and through it with his freedom and so with his inner reference to God. This goes beyond his day-to-day experience of transcendence and makes him confront in a free and conscious manner the fact that his transcendence is raised up by grace and ordered to the direct and immediate presence of God, in so far as it is accepted with the free consent of faith. Thus in the totality of the phenomenon of religious enthusiasm there occurs an experience of grace. This thesis must be spelt out in greater detail but two basic reasons may be given to justify it. First it provides a meaningful framework in which to locate the theological data and enables one, at least in a general way, to interpret the experience of religious enthusiasm as a genuine experience of divine grace, a point already made clear in Scripture. Secondly it leaves one room to include all the psychological phenomena, all the oddities and problems of a religious kind which an honest observer can neither ignore nor interpret in their brute reality as manifestations of the divine Spirit, whose operation is essential for their occurrence.

What is the situation, then, of ordinary Christians in their daily piety? They have at their disposal a large store of religious concepts, propositions, motivations and patterns of behaviour which all perform an important function in guiding their daily life and action. But in their day-to-day affairs they do not encounter with any clarity either the heart of their own subjectivity or God himself in his true self-communication. They meet with the conceptual and verbal objectifications of these two principles, which form the poles of tension of Christian and religious life. Of course the genuine realities are 'intended' in the conceptual objectifications of consciousness if the daily piety is itself authentic, a fact which may normally be taken for granted. Moreover it can and should not be disputed that some experience of human transcendence and its radical re-ordering by grace to the direct presence of God is obtained through such everyday piety, even if it is not the object of conscious reflection. But the day-to-day awareness of the pious Christian rests on these conceptual and [9] To supplement these remarks cf. K. Rahner, 'Mystische Erfahrung und mystische Theologie', Schriften zur Theologie XII (Zurich, 1975), pp. 428-438.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

propositional expressions; it is dissolved and remains fixed in them; it confuses, in the words of Scripture, the letter with the spirit, the word about God with the Word of God and with God himself. It is a secondary matter here whether this resting in the expressions of religion happens quite naively and is not felt as the problem of God's distance but rather as consolation, joy, liberation, security and nearness, or whether the pious Christian suffers in his daily life from the [45] mediation of true religious reality through conceptual expressions and has the terrible sensation of remaining fixed in a purely human realm without any authentic experience of God himself at all.

How can this imprisonment in the objective and categorial reality of everyday existence, even religious, be broken? When can a man experience his own freedom for what it is in a clearer and more radical fashion and become aware of the ultimate and decisive self-determination of the one, total subject before God, and not merely be faced with this or that object of choice, over which he possesses some control according to certain objective moral norms? How, that is, will we come to a clear and inescapable experience of the real self-communication of God in which he is grasped as the goal of our transcendence and as the underlying ground of our very experience of God? For this is in fact what the Christian doctrine of grace asserts of every religious act, although, as we have pointed out earlier, it then consigns the experience of grace to an objective realm beyond conscious awareness. How will we transcend in our religious acts the endless conceptual objectifications of God which enable us only to relate to him and his word through their mediation, so that God himself remains a remote being, only accessible through conceptual, linguistic and cultic images? When will we grasp this teaching on grace not only in propositional formulae but also in clear and inescapable experience?

If, as I say, we abstract from the phenomenon of the radical 'emptying' characteristic of a mysticism of faith in which a person shares in the descent of Jesus into death, we can say: all expressions of religious enthusiasm, whenever they are to some degree genuine and in earnest, are spiritual events in which the grace filled transcendence of man comes plainly to the fore and in which the subject freely experiences God as both the ultimate goal of this transcendence and the very ground of the experience itself. We do not mean that these phenomena of religious enthusiasm consist only in such grace-filled experiences of transcendence and in nothing else besides. This is certainly not true of them as it might be asserted of genuine mysticism. For they possess categorial content of different kinds and are caused by a great variety of factors. But they also contain a genuine, grace-filled experience of transcendence which has an inescapable impact quite different from the grey mask of everyday normality usually superimposed on such experience: In them a man passes 'outside himself'. The true meaning of religion is hidden and made remote by the dominance of its traditional, [46] everyday expressions, even though their real function is to be a sign and pointer towards this meaning. Through religious enthusiasm the objectification of religion is dislodged from its system. The experience of being taken out of oneself makes what is normal and organised in the institutional Church seem provisional and questionable, incommensurate with the meaning it is supposed to signify. A man is thrown back upon his own subjectivity, which no longer appears manageable to him in terms of conceptual expressions and propositional criteria. He then has the courage to entrust himself to something within him which no longer has to be tested and sanctioned by categorial norms but is experienced, at least in a preliminary way, as not being subject to such control, as the realisation of freedom which occurs in the act of self-surrender to the sovereign mastery of God, a mastery which lies beyond our justification. All this at least enables a person to experience in a clear and inescapable manner his own transcendence and inner reference to God, itself sustained by God's self-communication. It is true that these charismatic experiences do not bring about such a grace-filled awareness of God's presence in entirely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pure and clear form, for they can distort the real experience of grace in a new way precisely because they break through the imprisoning objectivity of everyday religious awareness. But the experience of religious enthusiasm does make plain the provisional character of all that is, in the broadest sense, 'institutional', i.e. rational language, sacraments and law, and shows clearly that the whole institutional structure, although it can never disappear entirely in this life, is nevertheless in itself a sign which is destined to destroy itself and disappear at the appearance of God. To this extent these experiences render the immediate reality and given-ness of the grace-bearing experience of God more evident and inescapable than is normally the case in everyday, religious existence where the sign all too easily takes the place of the reality which it signifies.

To explain all this more clearly and to establish its truth more firmly, one would have to examine specific experiences of religious enthusiasm, for these vary enormously amongst themselves. Only then would one be in a position to show how each experience mediates in its own way a purer and more radical experience of grace than those which occur in everyday, religious practice, limited as it is to objective categories. But such an exposition is not possible here, if only because I do not regard myself as competent to describe particular expressions of religious enthusiasm from a psychological and phenomenological [47] point of view. One would have to indicate a category in which to locate religious phenomena, in such a way that on the one hand their human reality could be appreciated and, at the same time, critically examined, and on the other hand they could be judged, at least under certain conditions, to be in fact what they claim to be, that is the action of the Spirit of God.

CONSEQUENCES

If we understand mysticism in the sense indicated above, i.e. a radical experience of faith which destroys the conceptual and the categorial in so far as these claim to be ultimate realities, we may regard religious enthusiasm as a sort of mysticism of the masses. Now if this enthusiasm is an experience of the grace of faith, which expresses the grace-filled awareness of transcendence more clearly because the circumstances are psychologically and existentially out of the ordinary, it is evident first of all that, in so far as they are to be distinguished from the experience of grace itself, they are rightly subject to human, critical analysis; their origin and nature, their possible consequences and distortions are to be assessed by human, secular criteria. The one condition for this analysis is the conviction that genuine experiences of grace do exist and that they can in principle occur in experiences of religious enthusiasm, although they are not limited to them. Indeed under certain conditions they may be felt more clearly and with greater impact in these phenomena. A further assumption is that the rational version of man found in the western world, especially amongst intellectuals, is not necessarily the model and paradigm for the whole of humanity. What emerges as the essential character of religious enthusiasm may not in itself be the unsullied manifestation of the 'Holy Spirit', but may possess a particular analogical affinity to him, at least in certain important respects. But given these assumptions, the phenomenon of religious enthusiasm in itself can be assessed by psychology, depth psychology, para-psychology or whatever else, each in its own way, without this being an irreligious and profane attack upon such enthusiasm, an attack which is bound to misunderstand their specific character and importance. We are not faced with the alternatives of being forced either to recognise expressions of religious enthusiasm, at least when they are genuine, as the unadulterated operation of the Holy Spirit, or to discount them from the start, [48] even from the human point of view, as 'rubbish', the result of human religious impulses going off the rails.

It must be granted that with respect to their categorial content and conceptual framework,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

their particular imagery and distinct prophetic utterances, and the actual impulses which an individual, a community or a society experience in them, they are of human origin and cannot be interpreted simply as divine inspiration which would give their particular categorial content an unambiguous sanction and a heavenly guarantee.[10] But this precisely does not mean that a genuine, grace-filled experience of transcendence cannot be present in those feelings of enthusiasm whose categorial content arouses justified misgivings or even should be rejected altogether on a number of possible counts. Even prophets, for example, who were filled with the Spirit of God, have made mistakes, if one looks at the matter from a purely historical point of view. The language of the charismatically inspired can be psychologically conditioned either individually or socially, even when the experience is genuine, and can be extremely limited and primitive in character. A man who is deeply moved by religious feeling and bewails his sinfulness can be lamenting something which a psychologist of human development may explain as a harmless human weakness, and yet the man's contrition can be quite justified. Someone in a moment of religious enthusiasm may have a 'conversion experience' whose content later proves highly questionable and dated; nevertheless it may have been a genuine experience of conversion in the sense that through a very dubious categorial medium a person can achieve a radically free self-determination and an unconditional acceptance of the sovereignty of God.[11] Critical analysis of the categorial content of religious enthusiasm does not necessarily place in question the basic experience of grace and of the Spirit. Whether this is present, whether the subject has experienced his own freedom and in it grace, this question must be decided so far as possible by other criteria than that of the rightness or wrongness of the content of such experiences taken by itself alone. This is especially true in cases where the content of an experience may be quite acceptable and yet the experience itself hardly qualifies as a case of religious enthusiasm, since it is existentially far too shallow and superficial to count as a clear and radical experience of [49] the transcendent impact of transforming grace. In Catholic theology such criteria are mostly to be found in mystical theology, in ac much as this is not only concerned with the transcendent experience of grace in its intrinsic purity (such as in the exclusively mystical images, pictures, appearances, or terms of a John of the Cross)[12], but also takes into consideration mystical phenomena which possess categorial content and in addition treat such content seriously. This means that it is difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish them from those experiences which today would be put under the heading of religious enthusiasm, especially such things as prophecies, proclamations, missions, which may appear less within charismatic communities (because of the mechanics of communication), but which can be aimed at such communities as the audience addressed. But no more will be said here about such criteria. If the correctness of content cannot be made into a clear and decisive criterion for the presence or absence of a genuine religious experience of grace, it cannot function in this way either for the value for a community of such an experience of religious enthusiasm.

The above remarks should not be taken to imply that the categorial content of such experiences is simply irrelevant. Other things being equal, an experience of this type has more chance of being genuine, that is, of being a real transcendent experience of grace which touches the core of personal freedom, if the categorial content is objectively correct, i.e. if it is in some measure an appropriate objectification of the experience of grace. However it

[10] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Mystische Erfahrung und Mystische Theologie', Schriften zur Theologie XII (Zurich, 1975), pp. 428-438.
[11] On the theology of freedom the author has published a collection of his own writings, Grace in Freedom (London and Freiburg, 1969).
[12] On St. John of the Cross cf. I. Behn, Spanische Mystik (Dusseldorf, 1957), pp. 463-742; A. Winkelhofer, Die Gnadenlehre in der Mystik des hl. Johannes v. Kreuz (Freiburg i. Br. 1936); A. Brunner, Der Schritt über die Grenzen. Wesen mid Sinn der Mystik (Wurzburg, 1972).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

should not be overlooked in this case that the objective validity of the categorial content can create the danger of seeming to guarantee the intense and radical character of an experience of grace, simply because the categorial content gives no cause for objections. In order to test the authenticity of the categorial content of such an experience we should use all the normal rules which are valid for the assessment of theological statements and events in general: conformity to the message of the Gospel, to Scripture, to the faith and mind of the Church, etc. Here we will not go further into the matter, except to say that our case raises the question which applies to all Christian statements and theological texts but in a more acute form than elsewhere, the question, that is, of how the original experience of [50] grace which took place in the encounter with the historical Christ event is related to the explicit teaching of Christianity in Scripture and tradition. For the latter is after all nothing more than the historical interpretation which has proved valid and authentic for the community of the Church of the original process of the experience of grace mediated through Jesus. But even if this question becomes particularly urgent in the case of religious enthusiasm, nevertheless it is a problem which comes up in all theological discourse and does not require special treatment here.[13]

The dogmatic question should be raised at this point of how the relationship of religious enthusiasm to the Christian community, to the Church, can be assessed and tested. In contrast to the central core of mysticism the expressions of religious enthusiasm make themselves felt precisely within the Christian community as such. This applies both in cases when something like a prophetic message, etc. is directed to a community or to the Church and in cases when an intense experience of individual conversion occurs publicly in the community and seeks recognition through the community. But the relationship of religious enthusiasm to the community and the Church can be referred to that part of ecclesiology which deals with the charismatic element in the Church, with its validity and role vis-à-vis the institutional structure of the Church, and with the obvious tension between the charismatic and institutional elements.[14] One should also call attention to the teaching on 'discernment of spirits', a topic much neglected in contemporary theology, which should enable the authorities in the Church, and others as well, to distinguish between the authentic and the inauthentic expressions of religious enthusiasm. But nothing more will be added on this subject here.[15]

It may be noted that the question we have touched does in fact lie concealed within other departments of dogmatic theology, which cover the topic in an analogous way, although this fact is not immediately evident. At root, for instance, the same problem is involved [51] when one considers the question, acute in the 19th century and the first half of the 20th, of the relationship between traditional fundamental theology and the apologetic of immanence. The same issue is at stake when the function of the grace of faith is discussed as the reception of the message of the Gospel which comes from without; when the relation of the letter and the spirit in the text of Scripture is considered; when in sacramental theology the exact connection between 'sacrament' and the 'res' of the sacrament is examined; when the Church as the presence of the Spirit and the Church as institution is discussed in ecclesiology. In all these cases it is a question of the relation between two realities which should neither be identified nor completely separated. This relation reappears in phenomenon of religious enthusiasm in that, however spiritual the experience may seem at first, one must distinguish [13] On the mediating role of Jesus Christ, cf. the author's theological meditation, Ich glaube an Jesus Christus (Zurich, 1968).

[14] The author has dealt fully with this topic in the writings collected in The Dynamic Element in the Church, Quaestiones Disputatae 12 (London and Freiburg, 1964).
[15] For the discernment of spirits according to Ignatius Loyola, cf. in this volume, 'Modern Piety and the Experience of Retreats'; bibliog. references will be found there.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between the real, fundamental experience of grace in the transcendent being of man on the one hand and the categorial content on the other. For this content can both be the cause and medium of a clearer and existentially more radical interiorisation of the transcendent experience of grace and also be its complementary expression, which under certain circumstances may seem in retrospect highly dubious from a historical or individual point of view.

In conclusion we may note that elements are present in a theology of human freedom which involves the historical and corporeal nature of man, as well as in traditional moral theology and in mystical teaching, which could be used for a theological interpretation of an intense experience of conversion, of the reception of the Holy Spirit, and of baptism in the Spirit (leaving aside the question whether baptism admits of different levels) and other such phenomena. The distinction, for example, drawn in moral theology between an act which, though free, is relatively insignificant and one which is of decisive importance for life (a distinction which unfortunately is rarely applied in Catholic theology to any but sinful actions), and the teaching on being ‘confirmed in grace’ and on the possibility of interiorising this reality, which is found in mystical theology, both contain, despite the as yet unsolved problems they possess, many theological insights which could be of value for the assessment of religious enthusiasm.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[52]

4

ANONYMOUS AND EXPLICIT FAITH

The topic to be discussed here is the possibility of 'anonymous faith' and its relationship to 'explicit faith'. By anonymous faith is meant a faith which on the one hand is necessary and effective for salvation (under the general conditions which are required for justification and final salvation, i.e. hope and the love of God and neighbour) and on the other occurs without an explicit and conscious relationship (i.e. conceptual and verbal and thus objectively constituted) to the revelation of Jesus Christ contained in the Old and/or New Testament and without any explicit reference to God through an objective idea of God.

We combine in the concept of 'anonymous faith' a lack of an explicit relationship both to Christian revelation and to God, although it can of course happen that faith has a clear conceptual and verbal reference to God and only lacks an explicit relationship to Christian revelation. We are disregarding for a number of reasons the distinction much stressed elsewhere in contemporary theology between faith explicitly addressed to God but without express reference to Christian revelation in historical form and the 'faith of an atheist'. First the question of the salvation of those who feel obliged to affirm atheism is an urgent one. Secondly the Second Vatican Council takes account of such cases.[1] Thirdly the notion common in the past that a 'natural' revelation or even a private illumination could provide a relationship to God which is not a mere metaphysical affirmation of God's existence but involves a genuine faith in the self-revelation of God, this notion is no longer tenable because of the contemporary view of the length of human history and because atheism is a worldwide phenomenon.

[53] We are taking for granted here the theological doctrine that genuine faith is necessary for justification and salvation. This is the general teaching of theologians and was repeated by the Second Vatican Council. We are assuming as well that mere 'good will' based on a purely natural knowledge of God is by itself quite inadequate for salvation and justification, so that the view of Straub, for instance, cannot be sustained that in cases of necessity good will, founded on a formal readiness to believe, without actual faith, i.e. fides virtualis, is enough.[2]

We find ourselves, then, in the following theological situation: genuine faith in revelation is necessary for salvation. But it is not immediately plain what is exactly meant by 'faith universally necessary for salvation'. We are theologically justified in our definition of saving faith if we take into consideration that the teaching of the Church allows a man a chance of being saved, as long as he does not grievously offend his conscience by his actions, even if he does not come in the course of his life to an explicit acceptance of the Christian message in faith. But it must nevertheless be affirmed that a purely natural, metaphysical knowledge of God can never replace faith. On the other hand the Church today allows even for non-Christians and atheists who do not act against their conscience a real chance of supernatural salvation and the Second Vatican Council explicitly reckoned on such a possibility.

---

[1] Cf. Conc. Vat. II Lumen Gentium no. 18; Gaudium et Spes no. 22; Ad Gentes No. 7.

[2] Cf. the studies, some much older, collected in: A. Straub, De analysi fidei (Innsbruck, 1922), with the idea of a 'fides stricte dicta, sed virtualis'; cf. also K. Rahner, 'Membership of the Church according to the teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical "Mystici Corporis Christi"', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963) pp. 1-88.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

FAITH NECESSARY FOR SALVATION

The question, then, is: how is it conceivable that these men could possibly achieve the faith which is necessary for salvation? Earlier explanations offered to cover this eventuality simply do not merit serious consideration any longer, e.g. private illumination, possibly at the moment of death; natural revelation which is mediated to a man through tradition; the acceptance of the distant possibility of faith which never reaches a more practical, explicit level of belief because of the personal fault of the individual 'heathen'. These solutions no longer hold water because, since the Second Vatican Council, we must [54] also reckon with a genuine possibility of salvation, and therefore of faith, being available to those who, without personal guilt, believe quite consciously and explicitly that they are obliged to profess atheism. It is no use saying in this case that a conscious atheist cannot remain free of guilt for long, that either he must in a short time become a convert to explicit theism or his atheism becomes culpable.

We are offering here an optimistic answer with regard to the possibility of salvation. There can exist an 'anonymous faith' which carries with it an intrinsic dynamism and therefore an obligation to find full realisation in explicit faith, but which is nonetheless sufficient for salvation even if a man does not achieve this fulfilment during his lifetime, as long as he is not to blame for this. Naturally such a person would deny, both to himself in his conscious awareness and to others, that he has such anonymous faith and in consequence this doctrine is not directly available for apologetic use. But this does not prevent a Christian from holding that his non-Christian or atheist fellow human being may be an anonymous believer.

The question now follows: what is to be understood by 'anonymous faith', and how is it to be conceived as a real possibility on the basis of valid theological principles? (The question whether such a possibility of salvation, which is universally available and offered to every man, is in fact freely accepted and realised, this question will not be pursued here.) We start from the assumption that the attempt to find an answer is not forbidden by the declaration of the Second Vatican Council that in such cases faith occurs in ways known only to God.[3] For this remark should evidently be taken to mean no more than that the Council itself is neither able nor willing to use its binding authority to lay down anything more precise on the subject. But if the theologian does not venture on his own responsibility and at his own peril to search out these mysterious ways of God, he would be laying the Church's teaching open to the objection that it was simply self-contradictory in that it asserted both that salvation was possible for all men and that faith was necessary.

To answer our question we may proceed from two pieces of data drawn from Christian anthropology, understood in both a theological and a philosophical sense. First there is the doctrine of the unlimited, transcendent nature of the human spirit in knowledge and freedom and secondly there is the dogma of God's universally effective will [55] which offers to all men the possibility of reaching their 'supernatural destiny' in the direct possession of God. The heart of our thesis is that, because the universal and supernatural will of God is working for human salvation, the unlimited transcendence of man, itself directed of necessity towards God, is raised up consciously by grace, although possibly without explicit thematic reflection, in such a way that the possibility of faith in revelation is thereby made available. Thus one can speak of genuine faith on condition that a man freely accepts his own unlimited transcendence which is raised up by grace and directed to the immediate presence of God as its final goal. We will now try briefly to expound this thesis.[4]

---

[3] Cf. Conc. Vat. II Gaudium et Spes no. 22; Ad Gentes no. 3.

[4] The author has treated the themes briefly summarised here more fully elsewhere; on the 'transcendent nature of the human spirit' cf. the author's studies in the philosophy of religion; on the 'salvific will of God' cf. the article in LThK, V, 165-168; also Sacr. Mun. V (London and New York, 1970), pp. 405-409.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE TRANSCENDENT CHARACTER OF THE HUMAN SPIRIT

Man is the being who possesses unlimited transcendence of knowledge and freedom. The inner dynamism of his spirit is directed to absolute being, to absolute hope, to the absolute future, to good in itself, to what is unconditionally right, and thus to God (or whatever one calls the goal of human transcendence which goes beyond all that can be grasped in objective categories). The transcendent reference of man to God is mediated through categorial objects (at least in cases other than genuine mystical experiences). But this object does not necessarily have to be a religious concept. The transcendent reference to God can be found in the mediation of ordinary, secular material, as long as a man by means of this material freely comes to a position of complete responsibility and self-determination. There then exists a conscious reference to God which can be freely accepted, although this is not explicitly reflected upon or treated under the heading of 'God'.

Even if a man does not think of God as part of his conscious vocabulary or even feels that he has to reject such a concept as self-contradictory, he is nevertheless always and inevitably involved with God in his secular awareness. Without reflection he accepts God when he freely accepts himself in his own unlimited transcendence. He does this when he genuinely follows his conscience with free consent, because by such an action he affirms as well the condition of possibility [56] of such a radical option which is implicitly bound up with this decision, i.e. he affirms God. So an explicit atheist is always involved with God. He cannot avoid this reference to God since it stems from the necessity of transcendence. At the same time he can be an anonymous theist when he recognises in his positive moral decision the unconditional call of conscience, for which the ultimate condition of possibility is the reference to what we call God. Explicit atheism is either culpable or involves an implicitly affirmed theism. This is, however, the precondition for a faith which in a strict sense responds to God's self-revelation; it is the 'potentia obedientalis' for such faith.[5]

THE SAVING WILL OF GOD

The second piece of theological data which is relevant in this context is the universal and supernatural will of God acting for salvation. This is expressed concretely in the communication (at least as an offer) of supernatural grace, whose transforming power is the condition of possibility of genuine saving acts and therefore, most fundamentally, of the act of faith. Two aspects of this supernatural grace should be specially noted here. First the offer of such grace should not be thought of as an occasional event happening periodically in a man's life, at least so long as he is not justified. This grace can in fact exist in the form of a mere offer (as in the case of baptised children), but in the case of adults who have not yet achieved justification grace cannot merely be an intermittent offer. Without prejudice to its gratuitous character, it should be conceived as an abiding possibility of human freedom and can be expressed either in the form of an offer alone, or as an acceptance which brings justification, or as a direct and deliberate rejection.

The second point to be made about such grace is that it transforms human consciousness. Here we can appeal directly to Thomist teaching, according to which supernatural, elevating grace is not a purely ontological reality beyond the scope of consciousness; it also brings a new, a priori, formal object with it which lies beyond the reach of a natural act of the human [5] Cf. K. Rahner, Hearers of the Word (London and Sydney, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spirit. This formal object is not to be thought of as a new, distinct item of conscious awareness which is a direct object of reflection, still less as a particular concept or word. It is rather the radical nature of the unlimited transcendence of man itself which is consciously known, though not necessarily perceived as an object or fully thought out. This transcendence is ordered by the transforming power of grace to the direct presence of God as its final goal, so that God does not merely remain the distant end point to which human transcendence tends asymptotically through knowledge and freedom, but is constituted as its proper goal. Since God seen as end point of spiritual transcendence and God regarded as immediate possession both form the a priori nature of the human spirit and cannot be simply differentiated by pure reflection, the thesis of the a priori consciousness of grace does not mean that it must be possible to distinguish grace as such from the natural spiritual essence of man by means of reflection upon particular objects of consciousness. This is all the more true given that question whether a person has freely and concretely accepted this grace or not cannot be decisively settled by pure introspection.

The process by which human transcendence is given new depth and purpose and is ordered to the direct presence of God is universal in time and place, because God's saving will is universally operative, even if it cannot be distinguished or given conceptual shape by individual reflection. If God's self-communication is free and if it is consciously grasped by a person, even if this occurs without thematic reflection, then the two conditions for supernatural revelation are realised in the strict sense of the term. Traditional theology also recognises an intrinsically transcendent revelation, even if under another label, in its teaching that historical revelation can only be grasped and understood for what it is through the grace of faith, which is nothing else than the self-communication of God to the human spirit in the depths of its being. If one adds at this point the Thomist doctrine of the new, supernatural, formal object given by grace, then one has already found what we are describing here as transcendent revelation, or, perhaps more accurately, the transcendent factor in revelation.

'ANONYMOUS' FAITH[6]

If a person by a free act in which he accepts himself unconditionally in his radical reference to God raised up by grace, also accepts the basic [58] finality of this movement of his spirit, even if without reflection, then he is making a genuine act of faith, for this finality already means revelation. If this supernatural finality is freely accepted, without explicit reflection, then there exists what we term 'anonymous faith'. Such a transcendence, which is supernaturally raised up and implies revelation, is of course always mediated through some object and therefore is, in the widest sense, mediated historically. This mediating, categorial objectivity, in which a man becomes present to himself and to his own transcendence, does not have to be an explicitly religious act. It can be formed by a particular moral decision in which a man is responsible for himself and accepts (or rejects) himself. To this extent the acceptance of human transcendence in faith, which is supernaturally elevated and so reveals God, can be found in an atheist as well, given that he is absolutely obedient to the dictates of his conscience and so accepts himself and God, at least unreflectively, in so far as he actually realises his own transcendence.

At this point we must state more carefully what is the relationship between this transcendent revelation and the anonymous faith which it makes possible on the one hand, [6] The author has frequently considered the question of the 'anonymous Christian' in his writings, although in a slightly different perspective to the one adopted here. The above reflections are meant to supplement these other writings from another point of view.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the historical, Christian revelation on the other. It must also be shown why the transcendent revelation and the faith offered through it to human freedom does not make the historical, verbal revelation superfluous, but rather underlines and reinforces the latter's obligatory character.

If historical, Christian revelation is understood as the process, willed by God in his saving providence and demanded by human nature, by which the transcendent revelation becomes present to itself in history, then there exists no insuperable obstacle to the solution of the problem. Transcendent and historical revelation have a mutual reference: the former acquires historical form and shape in the latter, just as in other cases the transcendent being of man is mediated to itself through history. Historical revelation only realises its proper character through its transcendent counterpart, since it is only effective for salvation if through it the transcendent self-communication of God finds historical expression, the communication, that is, to which we give the name of the grace of faith and justification.

If during his life a person is offered, in a manner which is credible to him, the chance to give objective structure and shape to his being (and therefore an opportunity of supernatural elevation), and if he rejects this possibility, then he is deliberately denying his grace-filled transcendence as well. It is not possible to have 'anonymous faith' when its [59] thematic expression in the Christian belief in revelation is culpably rejected. But as long as a person is not guilty of this and at the same time accepts himself in a moral decision, he assumes at the same time his own radical transcendence, which is ordered to the direct presence of God, and so possesses anonymous faith. This remains true even if the acceptance happens without conscious reflection and the object which mediates this moral decision is not necessarily grasped in a religious or 'theist' manner.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[60]

5

FAITH BETWEEN RATIONALITY AND EMOTION

The above title, which concerns the relationship between faith, rationality and emotion,[1] forces us to feel our way slowly to what I believe to be the heart of the topic. It is perhaps wiser, therefore, not to state at the outset what exactly is meant to the crucial assertion in the following reflections. First of all a few preliminary remarks may be in order, so as to provide a broader survey of the question and thus open the way to the central theme.

THE APPROACH TO FAITH

Faith, rationality and emotion all appear in the title and are set in a certain relationship: it is suggested that faith lies somehow between emotion and rationality. No attempt is to be made here to articulate the notion of faith as it is found in the self-understanding of Christian faith and in Catholic theology. For the central question we are tackling implies that the other two concepts are to be used in order to reach a definition of the idea of Christian faith. Such an attempt to define the essence of Christian faith apparently from without may seem surprising, and indeed hopeless, if one accepts the account of faith normally given in Catholic theology. But the effort should still be made and indeed this is the task, as will gradually become evident, with which these reflections are concerned. Let us, furthermore, leave aside the question of the exact significance of the word 'between' in the title. [61] The term is not very clear because it can either be understood as the mere 'between' of a third object lying between two others on the same level, or it can be taken to mean an 'over', so that the middle term in fact contains within it the over-arching and essential principle of unity for the other two terms, between which it apparently stands. The words, rationality and emotion, are obscure as well: they do not have an unambiguous clarity which can easily be described, thus making it possible to get to grips with the topic.[2] This does not mean that the subject proposed for discussion is illegitimate. For there are of necessity cases, especially in anthropology, metaphysics and religion, in which it is not possible to proceed in a straight line, as it were, from clear fixed concepts and so reach a new concept, a fresh insight which leaves the starting point undisturbed. Every point of departure of one's limited reflection (and there is always something unavoidably arbitrary about what point one chooses) is to some extent redefined and altered by the feedback which the result of one's investigations produces. It is only at the end of the path that one finds out at exactly what point one stepped on the road.

At first glance rationality seems a perfectly straightforward term. Wherever rationality is present, language and conceptual operations are dominant with ever new conceptual distinctions, logic, discussion, argument and the critical analysis of propositions. Rationality

[1] The original text served as a basis for a lecture which was one of a series delivered to the Catholic Academy of Bavaria; cf. K. Rahner (ed), 1st. Gott noch gefragt? Zur Funktionslosigkeit des Gottesglaubens (Dusseldorf, 1973). The reflections presented here are the result of further revision; cross-references have been added to the author's other writings.

[2] For the basic concepts cf. philosophical lexicons, e.g. J. Hoffmeister, Wörterbuch der Philosophischen Begriffe (Leipzig, 1944), p. 236 (Emotion) and pp. 576-578 (ratio/rationalismus); M. L. Falorni, Enciclopedia filosofica I (Venice and Rome, 1957 ff), 1868-1871 (Emozione) and F. Borgato, ibid. III, 1884 (Razionalità). Usually, however, one is referred to 'Affekte', 'Gefühl', etc., as in LThK.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as such is not directed in the first instance to the particular content of a proposition; rather it is ordered, in a constantly new way, to the methods and validity of the connection of propositions to one another. It is aimed, therefore, at least approximately and within distinct areas of human consciousness, at the building of systems. It seeks as far as possible, by connecting the propositions in question in a way that is open to systematic control, to analyse their content in the framework of the formal, propositional structure, or at least to trace back in this manner the propositions whose content remains irreducible to as few axioms or basic assumptions as possible.

Rationality poses the question of verification, especially with regard to those propositions which cannot be proved through their clear, [62] formal relationship to each other and through appeal to the rules of valid, propositional logic. Rationality also makes a critical investigation of the pre-suppositions which, though external to the propositions in question, nevertheless have an effect upon them: ones concerning their setting, their place in history, their dependence and effect upon social conditions, their ideological use and abuse, their dependence upon a historically conditioned language, and their general horizon of understanding, both conscious and unconscious. It is also to be noted of course that these 'external' assumptions, which are open to critical and rational scrutiny, mutually condition one another. These characteristics of rationality should suffice for the moment. We will leave aside the question of what ultimate assumptions of transcendental necessity are laid down by rationality, even though this question alone makes clear the fundamental relation between faith and rationality. The position of Catholic theology on this point is that the relationship must be a positive one. For the notion of faith itself forbids one to regard it as an absolutely irrational phenomenon and to locate it altogether outside the sphere of reason. If the totality of such rational questioning is tentatively described as 'philosophy', then there is such a thing as philosophical faith, at least in the broad sense of the involvement of faith with rationality. Propositions of Christian belief cannot be contrary to reason without faith being obliged by its own principles to destroy itself.

Obviously much more could be said about this relationship, but for the following discussion an important, preliminary decision has been taken which will not receive any further justification at this point. At any rate faith and rationality have something to do with each other. Faith is a λογικη_ λατρεια&, a 'rationabile obsequium' (Rom 12:1), a reasonable act of worship, as the First Vatican Council explicitly emphasised .[3]

It is more difficult to define the word emotion, even in a provisional fashion. It could simply be asserted that emotion signifies everything in human consciousness, both individual and collective, which escapes the control, in practice even if not in principle, of rationality as we have defined it, in so far as rationality can be carried on in a finite, reasoned process of reflection and work through the contents of human consciousness. This of course only provides a negative [63] definition of emotion and one that is determined by rationality. This negative definition of the term assumes that to some extent emotion is amenable to rational reflection and that ideally emotion and rationality are to be brought into harmony, so that emotion, in so far as it is legitimate, appears reasonable and rationality is accepted as desirable by the emotions. This is true even if the ideal can only be approximately achieved and never totally realised. Our definition does not concern itself in a systematic way with emotions which are rationally determined and verified as legitimate. We are considering emotion in so far as it is not covered by reason. Thus it is crucial for our case that in fact such an element exists in emotion which is not rationally thought through and organised, which cannot be analysed adequately in any conceivable finite process and which is rationally

[3] Cf. specially Ch. 4, 'De fide et ratione' from the dogmatic constitution, 'Dei Filius' and the corresponding canons, Denz. 3009, 3016, 3017, 3033.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

recognised as such. Reason is, therefore, presented with a problem with which it must come to terms in advance of its natural striving to subject everything to rational analysis. On this definition, however, the emotional element includes feelings of the greatest variety and diversity.

If we leave aside those phenomena which lie outside the realm of clear awareness, we would still have to enumerate a great variety of things, both individual and collective: particular moods and individual dispositions, patterns of behaviour biologically determined and conditioned by historical development, impulses and repressions, aggression and fears, both individual and collective, unthought out ideals, opinions, realms of understanding which are biologically, racially or socially conditioned and have an effect prior to any rational justification or analysis. At this point there is no need to give a more detailed account of this emotional element, nor to try to fit it into a conceptual framework which provides clear means of discrimination. What is meant, however, should be relatively comprehensible.

A completely different category of emotion, however, must also be mentioned: the reality of freedom and its objective expressions in history. These phenomena come under the concept of emotion as we have defined it here for a number of reasons. First free decisions and objective expressions inevitably are based on something and a condition of their possibility lies in all the emotional states which we described above. If these are not subjected to sufficient rational analysis, then the free choices which flow from them are subject to the same limitation No motivation, however rational it may and should be, can be sufficiently thought through (in the sense defined earlier) and justified, so that all emotional factors are excluded. Any reflection [64] upon such motivation is always affected by particular forces which themselves cannot be adequately examined because this would lead to an endless process of reflection.

Another point is that freedom of its essence cannot be subjected to adequate rational investigation. For freedom as such, i.e. the choice amongst a number of possibilities, is independent of its biological, psychological, social, etc. presuppositions. It is creative, which means that it does not, in its own self-realisation, merely put into effect what is sanctioned by reason, but sets goals in a creative manner which cannot be justified by a purely functional rationality. The latter indeed can only present hypothetical models of behaviour of which not even a selection can be justified by reason which operates in terms of function and hypothesis. Rationality is primarily concerned with the effectiveness of means and not with the creative establishment of ends and their justification.

It is not possible here to develop a philosophy and theology of freedom[4] and thus to demonstrate the irreducible originality of freedom with respect to rationality. A mere mention must here suffice. But even if freedom does possess its own peculiar character, nevertheless it is a reality which, in its individuality, can be counted as belonging to the emotional element in man. If one were able to develop a theology and a philosophy of freedom, it would become clear that freedom constitutes the very essence of emotion in comparison with which all other emotional factors would appear derivative, being mere conditions of possibility, a sign of the finite and passive character of created freedom and in the end analysable in terms of freedom.

FAITH AND FREEDOM

From the position now reached we may express the topic, faith between rationality and emotion, more precisely in the form, faith between rationality and freedom. This more exact [4] The author's most important writings on the theology of freedom are to be found in 'Grace in Freedom' (London and Freiburg, 1969), esp. pp. 203-264.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formulation does not mean that the relation between faith and the emotions of the first type mentioned does not pose difficult questions in human life. Faith is indeed in part determined by such emotions and is continually placed in question by the rational process of critical analysis made of these emotions. This process faith must both permit and sustain. But it [65] must always be remembered with regard to faith that just because psychological, social and historical conditions cannot be sufficiently analysed, it does not mean that any possibility of an absolute commitment of faith is thereby destroyed, any more than is the case for other absolute decisions in human life. For these are not rendered impossible and illegitimate in being conditioned by emotions not open to adequate rational reflection. But here we would prefer to restrict our attention to the relationship between faith and the particular emotional factor which is caused human freedom and the decisions which result from it.

I would state as a thesis, without offering any further argument to support it, that the essential nature of freedom is not in itself a neutral possibility either to act or not to act with regard to this or that particular categorial object of choice experienced in an a posteriori manner. Although freedom is always mediated through a particular categorial act, it consists much more in the capacity of the spiritual subject to exercise definitive control over himself, even if this self-determination occurs in space and time, in the length and breadth of an individual's history and therefore cannot be tied down by personal reflection to a particular moment of a man's life. The subject and object of freedom is constituted by the whole man acting with ultimate decision. Freedom means the capacity to act once and for all for oneself without being a mere point of intersection of influences which come from without and lose themselves in the impersonal web of objective causes which we call the world.

If we take this concept of freedom for granted, then our thesis runs that according to Christian understanding the realisation of freedom is identical with faith. This means that faith is not a free activity of a distinct categorial kind which is concerned either with a particular object reaching us from without in an a posteriori experience or with a specific item of knowledge; it is the united and fundamental totality of freedom itself. Wherever freedom as decisive self-determination is positively realised and the object of freedom, namely the human person, is unconditionally accepted for what he is by the subject of freedom which is that very same person, wherever, that is, a person does not reject himself in a final denial, and does not utter an ultimate protest in total scepticism or despair, even though this acceptance is mediated and obscured by categorial objects of choice, then there is present what Christians call 'faith'. This is true even though this identity can be mediated in different ways and ideally should be mediated [66] through the explicitly affirmed content of Christian faith (as 'fides quae').

The thesis of the identity of freedom in its fundamental realisation and faith may sound surprising, and even scandalous, to the religious sensibilities of the average, practising Christian. But at root this position rests only upon assumptions which are indisputable in Christian theology. I will attempt to enumerate the most important of these in the belief that, if they are accepted, a little further reflection will certainly throw light upon the thesis we are proposing.

THE REFERENCE TO GOD

Faith is a free act. Even if this assertion, which is expressly stated in the First Vatican Council, is understood to mean merely a particular free action alongside which there exist acts of freedom involving other objects of choice, nevertheless one must ask how the fulfilment of this individual free act is related to that primordial freedom which is whole and undivided and enables a man to achieve ultimate self-determination.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One should add that a genuine and radical philosophy of freedom can and must demonstrate that the essential nature of freedom is only conceivable in and through the transcendent reference of the human spirit in knowledge and freedom to that being, or rather person, whom we call God. Thus the realisation of freedom understood in this fundamental sense inevitably implies the affirmation or denial of God, irrespective of whether the reference to God is the object of conscious verbal reflection or not.[5] Freedom is freedom for or against God; to become aware of this goal of freedom, whether reflectively or not, is to experience for the first time what is really meant by God and is to affirm or deny implicitly or explicitly his reality. To this insight it must be added that human transcendence, ordered to God in freedom and knowledge, is always and inescapably deepened, whether this is accepted or rejected, by what in Christian terms is called grace. In other words this transcendence is raised up by the self-communication of God and brought into direct contact with his presence in what we [67] call the vision and possession of God.[6] If a man freely accepts himself as he is, even with regard to his own inner being whose basic constitution he inevitably has not fully grasped, then it is God he is accepting. As long as it is a matter of the conscious, though unreflective, acceptance of God in his authentic self-communication, the acceptance is of the self-revelation of God and is therefore faith.

The justification for such an assertion lies ultimately in the teaching of the Second Vatican Council, that genuine faith, whose object is revelation and whose consequence is salvation, is possible for all men. It can be found in people who consciously believe they are and must be atheists, as long as they are completely obedient to the absolute demands of conscience, that is, to use our terminology, they accept themselves unconditionally, without self-rejection, fulfilling that primordial capacity of freedom which involves the subject as a whole.[7] If this teaching of the Second Vatican Council is accepted, one can in my opinion only answer the question of how, from a theological point of view, to justify a faith which is universally available and can be realised even by atheists, by accepting the position outlined here of a fundamental identity of faith, taken in a Christian sense, and freedom, of emotion as freedom.

We must return to the question of human rationality as this is currently understood, and, without undermining its value, try to deepen it with regard to its basic presuppositions, even if once again we cannot give detailed arguments to support our account. We may express our thesis thus: the ultimate condition of possibility of rationality is the transcendent reference of man to the unfathomable mystery we call God.

The objective, functional connection of particular phenomena established by empirical reason is grounded as a single whole in the dynamic structure of the human spirit. The reference of the latter transcends the mastery of particular items of information and their systematic arrangement into the totality of possible categories of knowledge and is focused upon the ultimate goal of the whole movement [68] of the human spirit, which we call absolute mystery[8] or God. This reference, which goes beyond all particular, intelligible

---

[5] The background of these ideas is to be found in the author's two older works: Spirit in the World, (London and Sydney, 1968) and Hearers of the Word (London and Sydney, 1969). The position outlined there should however be supplemented by the works listed in note 4 dealing with a theology of freedom.

[6] Cf. 'Self-communication of God', Sacr. Mun. III (London and New York, 1968) pp. 114-118; ibid. IV, pp. 297-305; ibid. V, pp. 348-355. This idea is central to the author's position as B. van der Heijden (Karl Rahner, Darstellung und Kritik seiner Grundpositionen) has correctly seen, although his broader interpretation does not always do justice to the author's views.

[7] Cf. Conc. Vat. II, Gaudiurn et Spes, Pt. I, ch. 7, Arts. 12, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21.

[8] On the concept 'Mystery' cf. esp. the author's article in Handbuch der Theologischer Grundbegriffe I (Munich, 1962), pp. 447-452 (bibliog). Since the notion is easily taken to mean the unknown or what is as yet unknown (i.e. a question), a thorough account of the exact sense in which the term is being used is reasonable and necessary. In the ultimate analysis a Christian can only accept the existence of genuine mystery, if it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

objects to the incomprehensible mystery, is not just an inescapable fact, an additional possibility set beside rationality; it is precisely the condition of its possibility. If this dynamic reference to the incomprehensible mystery is called 'irrational', in a sense not yet discussed in these reflections, then the inevitable conclusion follows that this irrationality permanently remains the innermost core and condition of possibility of all rationality. Because we possess a primordial reference to the incomprehensible mystery, therefore we are able to set ourselves at a critical distance from every individual object and item of knowledge; we can distinguish and arrange particular objects of experience; we are capable of recognizing each individual piece of knowledge as provisional, ideologically suspect or open to improvement.

RADICAL TRANSFORMATION THROUGH GRACE

The reference to the unfathomable mystery of God, which is above reason and yet belongs to the inner being of rationality, is radically transformed, at least in the form of a universally available offer, and directed to the immediate presence of God by what in Christian language is called grace. This radical process no longer leaves God at a distance, approached but never attained, the far off mover of the impulses of the human spirit acting through knowledge and freedom; it makes God in himself an attainable goal, though he still remains an abiding mystery, even in the beatific vision. Thus the process can and should be described as revelation because it touches on the gratuitous self-communication of God to the human spirit. But this is not a reference merely to a particular piece of the history of revelation and salvation through God's self-communication, but forms its essential heart. The whole of the history of revelation and salvation of mankind can and should be understood as the history in which the radical reference [69] of human rationality and freedom to the direct presence of God as abiding mystery comes to ever clearer expression under the guidance of God's saving providence.[9] The history of revelation is the history of human rationality, in as much as through the Holy Spirit, through God's self-communication in the Holy Spirit, rationality is laid open in its innermost being to the immediate reality of the incomprehensible mystery and comes to full self-realisation in and through history. The history of revelation is the history of rationality under the influence of grace in which reason grasps ever more plainly this mystery as its foundation and master and freely accepts it.

The history of revelation, then, fundamentally coincides with that of human rationality, understood in this radical sense. This intrinsically universal history of revelation becomes the revelation history contained in the Old and New Testaments to the extent that it is recognised as permanently made valid by Jesus Christ and not as corrupted by the free rejection of man. The revelation history which occurs in Jesus and is grasped by us in faith should not in the first instance be treated as a particular occurrence, however unique in character, within the totality of salvation history, but rather as that event in which the universal gift of God, bestowed upon the whole of mankind in the Holy Spirit and radically transforming human rationality, achieves clear and definitive historical expression in an irreversible, eschatological form. Christian faith is explicitly present whenever human rationality, transformed by grace and ordered to the direct reality of God, is freely accepted, given that in this acceptance it is understood and recognised that the self-gift of the absolute mystery finds embraces human rationality in its proper sense and does not endanger the real responsibility (freedom) which rationality brings.

---

[9] On the problem of salvation history cf. K. Rahner, 'History of the World and Salvation History', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 97-114; Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 99-101; more fully, A. Darlap, 'Fundamentale Theologie der Heilsgeschichte', MySal I, pp. 3-156.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

decisive, historical realisation in Jesus Christ and is definitively accepted through the death of the man Jesus on the part of mankind.

Christian faith is not, therefore, a particular event among others, which occurs in the, history of human rationality (history taken in a collective and individual sense), but is the primordial act of human rationality as such, which at the same time achieves through faith historical and eschatological self-realisation. The only assumption to be made is that rationality grasps its own disclosure and basis in the mystery, that it recognises its own liberation through God's grace and [70] its ordering to the immediate presence of this mystery, and accepts the historical mediation of Jesus for its own self-realisation. Christian faith always achieves its full development through the medium of history and ultimately through Jesus, in so far as he has freely accepted the unfathomable mystery in his death and is himself saved and accepted once and for all in what we term his resurrection. But the historicity of Christian faith is not of an arbitrary sort, but rather the one in which human rationality, set free in its very roots for the direct presence of God, is mediated to itself.[10]

Thus Christian faith is not some particular event which could be limited and located anywhere in the area of rationality and emotion, and which must struggle hard to find a place somewhere 'between' these two realities. It is rather the ultimate event of rationality and emotion as a single whole, given only that rationality is grasped as rooted in the mystery of God and emotion is seen as the freedom by which a person comes to definitive self-acceptance and in which rationality, rightly understood, first discovers its genuine fulfilment in the acceptance of the mystery. Since Christian faith forms the totality of rationality and emotion and binds them together, it cannot be determined by any other reality outside itself, or by the experience of such reality, as long as we grasp the basic meaning of faith. It is rather the self-realisation of rationality and emotion coming to free and eschatological fulfilment in history.

This totality, which cannot be determined from without, is at once the simplest thing and the hardest, and the same is true of Christian faith, which consists in the fulfilment of the single human whole. It is the simplest thing in the world, the acceptance, that is, of the unfathomable mystery bestowed upon us,[11] and of the experience of this merciful self-communication as it is victoriously and irrevocably established in human history by the faith and death of Jesus. Christian faith possesses, then, of its essence no particular categorial content which is exempt from the doubts and threats attached to such facts, nor is it immune to the process and experience of ideological criticism. [71] For the ungraspable mystery which, in the strictest sense of the term 'name', is nameless, is not a particular datum of fact. Jesus is only understood as the Christ, that is, as the definitive and victorious self-communication of mystery to the world, if his cross, his death, are accepted as the salvation and surrender of a man to this mystery, through which a human being transcends the complexity and the ambiguity of particular facts and experiences and enters the silent mystery of God.

All the remaining content of the Christian faith, and especially the social expression of this faith, namely the Church, does indeed consist in categorial data and particular formulations of these data, but it does not form an independent and additional element to this faith which can only be taught from without; it is rather deduced from the primordial fact of revelation and faith, which is the acceptance of the absolute mystery, first in Jesus and then derivatively in us. The inevitable, categorial expansion of this basic reality into many distinct propositions is [10] The thesis of a transcendental Christology is summarised in : K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie, systematisch und exegetisch, Quaestiones Disputatae 55 (Freiburg L. Br., 1972), pp. 15-78.

[11] It is essential for this encounter that the incomprehensible mystery is communicated to man as a force of forgiveness i.e. as demanding and effecting a conversion. Cf. K. H. Neufeld, ('Fortschritt durch Umkehr',) Std Z 192 (1974), pp. 274-281.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a matter of history; it is a process carried on by the collective bearer of the history of revelation through reflection upon it and comes after Jesus and stems from him. It is not primarily undertaken by the individual. But this does not alter the fact that the freely accepted experience of this simple and basic reality must take place in every individual; only then is it an experience of the grace of faith and therefore genuine Christian faith. This process is very different from the indoctrination of propositions which, supported by formal authority, are brought to a person from without and must be accepted as the doctrine of experts not open to verification.

A faith which operates from the most simple and basic datum has the simplicity of the whole but also presents great difficulties. For it must find the verbal expression necessary for its articulation in concepts and realities which are not external and prior to it but rather subsequent, specific and derivative. Faith cannot be defined as a point in a larger frame of reference of human rationality and freedom, but forms the free acceptance of this frame of reference itself, the internal harmony of subject with himself. This is the reason why it is so hard to formulate in human conceptual thought what Christian faith is.

In considering these difficulties one should never forget that the essence of faith as the free acceptance of the single totality of rationality and emotion is never simply identical with any completely successful formulation of it in terms of conceptual reflection. Faith itself does not stem originally from the verbal communication of conceptual [72] thought about it but occurs in a great variety of historical forms. These come about whenever a man accepts human existence composed of rationality and freedom in unconditional fidelity to his conscience. This means that the conceptual formulation of faith in the Christian message is in a sense secondary, although not superfluous, in comparison with the primary embodiment of faith.

The Christian message as it develops in revelation and faith may be secondary but this does not mean that the explicit, moral obligation of faith becomes unnecessary. For this message is the legitimate objective form of the primary reality which necessarily seeks historical expression and formulation. Furthermore to refuse to accept such an objective expression would be to deny the primary reality of faith and would therefore be unbelief in the most fundamental sense. Conversely a Christian can only be satisfied with his conformity to the articles of faith handed on to him through the teaching of the Church and often originating in an earlier historical period, when he has as intense an awareness as possible of the interior revelation which is given with the self-communication of God and is usually called grace. He must experience in every part of his life the inner direction of his being in knowledge and freedom to the unfathomable mystery of God. Spiritual instruction in this area, which embodies real vitality and energy, is rarely to be found in the Church today, so that it is hardly surprising if many people try to obtain the experience through mental techniques which either avoid the practices and scrutiny of the official Church or are found outside Christianity. In this respect the Church must have the courage to return afresh to its own experience of spirituality and mysticism which was much more alive in earlier times.[12]

TENSIONS

In proposing the fundamental thesis that at root faith, emotion and rationality form a unity, we should not overlook the tensions and opposition of a derivative but nevertheless essential kind that exist between them. A distinction has been drawn between the basic reality [73] of [12] The different essays in this volume of the Investigations are intended to show how religious experiences of a spiritual or mystical kind can overflow and be transposed into the idiom of theological reflection. In this way the rift, all too common even today, between lived piety and abstract theology may be bridged.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

revelation and faith as the fulfilment of rationality and freedom on the one hand, and the conceptual reflection and verbal formulation of this primary fact on the other. If one considers this verbal expression and the scientific and systematic reflection upon it which is known as theology, then problems naturally arise between faith understood in this sense and human rationality and emotion. On this topic a few comments should be made which touch on the contemporary understanding of these three realities. We are dealing here with the objectified content of faith existing in human consciousness, that is, 'fides quae' (faith as object); we are not speaking of the primary realisation of 'fides qua' (faith as personal act) with which we have been mainly occupied up to this point.[13]

First of all it must be freely and honestly recognised that for an educated person today the mass of knowledge arising from the discoveries of the modern sciences, with their attendant problems and diversity, is too great to be mastered by a single individual and therefore generally prevents a person achieving an adequate positive integration and synthesis of the content of his mental world and the formulations of faith. This inevitably creates a state of tension between faith and rationality. It is true that a synthesis between 'fides quae' and modern 'scientia quae' (the objective content of science), if such an expression may be allowed, remains a desirable ideal, a goal to be aimed at even if never attained both for the individual and for the ecclesial community of faith. But in earlier periods knowledge and thought were of comparatively small dimensions and at least an alleged synthesis between the object of belief and the objects of secular knowledge was attainable. What distinguishes us from the past is that today such a synthesis is empirically beyond our reach. This does not mean that a man can allow, with an easy descent into irrationality, assertions of faith and propositions of secular science to exist side by side in a state of evident contradiction. What is to be done in the individual consciousness when someone is totally convinced that he perceives such a contradiction is not under discussion here, since as a Christian a man can and should be assured that such an opposition cannot objectively exist.[14]

[74] This conclusion does not, however, settle the matter, for between straight contradiction of known propositions on the one hand and a positive synthesis of diverse items of knowledge drawn from various sources of experience and knowledge on the other, there lies a third possibility which is the fate of people today, believers included. This third state is one of plurality of propositions of faith and secular knowledge which an individual cannot work through or integrate into an adequate positive synthesis. This plurality is a burden for us and involves our emotions in the widest sense of the term in pain and suffering. We know too much today to be able as believers to integrate all our knowledge with our faith ('fides quae') and create out of them both a harmonious view of the world. We can, however, see from the theological point of view that this situation is not in fact to be wondered at. Christian theology has always recognised that a variety of good and evil impulses exist in man which can never be properly brought together in a person's fundamental stance vis-à-vis God, and has called this state concupiscence or inordinate desire. Today we have become more clearly aware than in earlier times that, in addition to the state of moral concupiscence, that is, plurality on the emotional level, there exists also a state of gnoseological or mental concupiscence, the plurality[15] of diverse secular and theological branches of knowledge.

---

[13] The author has said something about the distinction between 'fides qua' and 'fides quae' in his study, 'What is a Dogmatic Statement?' Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 42-66.

[14] On the subject of conscience, cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Encyclical 'Humanae vitae', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974) pp. 263-287; 'Heresies in the Church Today?', Theological Investigations XII (London, 1974), pp. 116-141; 'Perspectives for the Future of the Church', ibid., pp. 202-217; 'Kirche im Wandel', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Zurich, 1968), pp. 445-478.

[15] On the question of intellectual pluralism today and the 'mental concupiscence' of human knowledge, cf. K. Rahner, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church,' Theological Investigations XI

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

These all condition the human situation despite, and in virtue, of their mutual disparity and lack of harmony, and so maintain human consciousness in a state of basic inner conflict. But given that Christian faith has always taken cognisance of this, at least in the field of moral decisions, such mental concupiscence is hardly surprising. A man may freely take account of it and to be a Christian he does not need to behave as though this situation did not obtain. There are guidelines about how one can face the matter in patience and hope without [75] having to deny its existence or sweep it under the carpet. A man can be a Christian and deal honestly with the situation; he is not allowed to use his faith to deny it. Complete success in creating a world view which integrates faith and secular knowledge in a positive and harmonious synthesis is not an ideal which it is open to a Christian to believe attainable during his earthly life.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE RELATIONSHIP

There is a history involved in the relationship between rationality and the content of faith (‘fides quae’) in which we must live as believers. If one were to list the special characteristics which determine the relation between ‘fides quae’ and ‘scientia quae’ today, one might put it as follows.[16]

The relationship between Christian faith and the natural sciences was from the origin of these sciences very tense but has now become more harmonious and relaxed. For no proven discoveries of the natural sciences can be formulated against which Christian faith is obliged to protest. The results of biology, palaeontology, etc no longer meet with opposition from theology. Christian philosophy and theology can maintain an entirely positive stance towards a secret ideal of the natural sciences which foresees as a methodological and heuristic principle the development of as close a unity as possible of all known material phenomena. This ideal theology can applaud, provided only that the natural sciences do not go beyond their methodological assumptions and become blind to the internal structure of the one world which is essentially varied and diverse.

On the other hand the relationship between faith and science is not simply settled in this way. It is a matter much less of a minimal, negative reconciliation between particular theological and scientific statements than of the tension still existing today between a scientific and a religious or metaphysical mentality. Here we can merely observe that the enduring burden of this tension belongs to the mental plurality or concupiscence which we have already considered. The coexistence of both outlooks in the same mind is entirely possible if one looks at the evidence offered by the lives of scientists of the highest rank.

[76] With regard to the historical sciences, it is to be noted that here many particular problems have been resolved, in so far as theology has grasped the lesson that in the case of theological statements as well as others a more exact distinction can and must be drawn than before between the meaning of a theological statement and the propositional model and its horizon of understanding, which is conditioned by historical factors. It has been shown that the independence of past and present theological statements and their proper meaning can be maintained despite the fundamental and legitimate process of demythologisation occasioned by the distinction drawn above. Human history understood aright is open to God and contains

---

(London and New York, 1974), pp. 3-23; ‘The Future of Theology’, ibid., pp. 137-146; ‘The Current Relationship of Philosophy and Theology’, Theological Investigations XII (London, 1975), pp. 61-79; ‘The Faith of the Christian and the Doctrine of the Church’, Theological Investigations XIV (London, 1976), pp. 24-46.

[16] Cf. K. Rahner, ‘Theology as engaged in an Interdisciplinary Dialogue with the Sciences’, Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 80-93, esp. pp. 90-93.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in itself what must be called divine revelation, without thereby implying miraculous interventions in an otherwise secular world. Nevertheless there persists here too a state of concupiscence in the relationship between secular history with its limited methods and theology as the ultimate interpretation of history which goes beyond history to the mystery of God.

From modern psychology and especially from depth psychology theology has learnt more clearly concerning its own material that man is bodily and not just an abstract subject of spirit and transcendence, a fact which was always known in theology but never filled out with sufficient content. Man is thus a psychic being with an inner shape which can be exactly ascertained and exists prior to the free spiritual activity of the personal subject; he exhibits a structure and mechanisms which cannot be adequately controlled by the spiritual subject. Furthermore techniques exist for the individual and collective direction of the pre-personal psyche which cannot be displaced by a rational and moral appeal to a person as a free spiritual subject.[17] If for this reason theology has had to take a more modest stance concerning man and can no longer claim to the sole representative of anthropology, but is in a position of open dialogue with other sciences, that is all to the good and in fact corresponds to the basic meaning of faith and theology.

Over and above the earlier philosophy of law and the state, there are today a whole range of social sciences, whose existence and rationality faith and theology must be prepared to face. This is of the greatest importance for theology, even though these partners in dialogue did not exist in the past. Such an interchange gives rise to new and difficult [77] questions. One need only consider the philosophy and sociology of language to see its significance for the theology of the word; one might note also the critical analysis of ideology, the research into the secular and social pre-conditions of religion and its institutions, the whole question of the relationship between truth and institution, the critiques by sociology of the traditional ethical models and the traditional understanding of natural law. Of course the critical rationality of the social sciences raises a question mark for theology. But at the same time it must be said that these sciences do not succeed in reducing religion to a historically conditioned phenomenon which is now out of date, if only because of the particular starting point of their methods of analysis and the questionable nature of their philosophical roots.

We must now break off our reflections. In a situation of insuperable pluralism of knowledge and endeavour characteristic of the present age, faith will always be the object of dispute and opposition, and it cannot in practice reckon on being universally recognised.[18] But it is not the case today that the conceptual and verbal formulation of faith need be in deadly opposition to the rationality of modern science and the general intellectual climate. The presupposition for this hope, which must constantly be re-assessed, is twofold, first that these sciences no longer assert that from their particular categorial starting point everything legitimately falls within their province, and secondly that faith is not essentially understood as a limited body of propositions within the whole social, psychological and historical range of consciousness, but rather the realisation of the single totality of rationality and freedom. The single totality of the reality of man does not exist in a state of hostile competition with the partial dimensions and expressions of human existence, as long as we assume that a man has a task to perform which concerns him as a unified whole and that he has the capacity and duty to give objective expression to this whole, even though the form of expression is limited, [17] Cf. K. Rahner and A. Görres, 'Der Leib in der Heilsordnung', Schriften zur Theologie XII (Zurich 1975), pp. 407-427.

[18] These remarks should sound a note of necessary realism but should not be taken to imply resignation or defeatism. The author's views on responsible thought and action may be seen, for example, in Strukturwandel der Kirche als Aufgabe und Chance (Freiburg i. Br., 1972).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

historically conditioned and open to the absolute future of the divine mystery.[19]

[78] If the essential nature of faith is understood as the single totality of rationality and freedom, it does not follow that possible conflicts and tensions between the conceptual expressions of faith on the one hand by which faith comes to have a place, even if in a derivative sense, within the field of conceptual rationality and science, and categorial rationality of a secular kind on the other, that such tensions are ruled out from the start or are already positively resolved. But the believer need not see a fundamental and irreconcilable clash between the conceptual expressions of faith and secular rationality. He will accept the mental concupiscence of plurality in his mind with patience and tranquillity and try to master it as far as possible. And he will go forward in the hope of the promised reconciliation of this plurality which he will obtain on entering the eternal mystery, no longer looking forward to unity in diversity as a mere promise but being able to experience the diversity through the possession of the single mystery. Anselm of Canterbury once coined the phrase: 'irrationalia rationabiliter cogitare',[20] to think out the irrational in a rational manner. If one treats the term 'irrationalia' not in the sense of a primitive irrationality in the face of which basic rational efforts are abandoned as hopeless from the start, but rather as implying the unfathomable mystery which is experienced at the root of our rationality and freedom, then the phrase says exactly what is meant here. Faith is not of its nature something which has to struggle laboriously for a place between rationality and emotion; it is rather the single fundamental whole composed of rationality and freedom. It is, therefore, possible to reflect further on this in a rational way ('rationabiliter cogitare'), to meditate upon faith and its objective expression in freedom and tranquillity, because this meditation itself belongs to faith.

[19] The author's studies on the 'Theology of the Future', taken from Theological Investigations Vols. IV, V, VI, VIII, IX, have been collected in the Wissenschaftlichen Reihe des Deutschen Taschenbuch Verlags (dtv 4076; Munich, 1971).

[20] This term is meant to cover the famous principle of Anselm, 'Fides quaerens intellectum'. The actual word, however, has not been found as yet in Anselm's writing.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[79]

PART TWO

Spiritual Theology in Christian Tradition

[81]

6

THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES' ACCORDING TO ORIGEN

If religious, and especially mystical, experience seeks to express the inexpressible despite all the obstacles that lie in the way, then inevitably it must go back to images which come from the realm of sense knowledge.[1] Mystics are happy, therefore, to speak of sight, hearing and taste of a spiritual kind in order to describe their experience of the realities of which they were conscious. Modern mystical theology retains this imaginative language and tries to interpret it.[2] It would seem, therefore, a worthwhile undertaking to sketch the history of the idea of the spiritual senses. One might discover that perhaps not every epoch or school compares mystical experience with the working of the same sense faculty and that their analogies are borrowed primarily from one or other sense perception. This diversity of modes of expression might then be traced back either to a variety of mystical experiences or to the human way of understanding in which the mystical experience was interpreted in different schools and historical periods.[3]

[82]

THE POINTS OF DEPARTURE IN ORIGEN

We have a modest goal in view here. Our concern is to investigate more closely the points of departure in Origen of the concept of spiritual senses and their influence on the later spiritual literature which arose from them. This essay is thus limited in two ways: first, only a short period is being considered and secondly, numerous religious texts will remain unexamined in which only a single faculty is employed for the metaphorical portrayal of spiritual experience.[4] For one can only speak properly of an idea or doctrine of spiritual faculties when these partly imaginative, partly literal expressions such as to touch God, to open the eyes of the heart, etc. are found in a complete system in which five instruments are involved in the [1] This text, published for the first time in German, goes back to the first major theological study written by the author, which appeared in French in RAM 13 (1932), pp.113-145. Here it has been simplified and abridged, and is included because the theme it deals with is closely connected to the other writings which form this collection. It is also of decisive importance for the author's ideas, and points to a line of thought which remained operative, albeit in a concealed way, in his later work.

[2] Cf. A. Poulain Celsum, The Graces of Interior Prayer (London, 1950), pp. 88 sq. In the first decades of this century this book played a considerable role in Europe in the discussion of the spiritual senses.

[3] P. Bainvel, editor of the 10th edition of Poulain's work, says in the introduction, p. 19: 'On the lower levels mystics refer particularly to the touch, taste, feel or breath of God which are present in them. Understanding and especially sight are only spoken of the higher levels.' Bonaventure, on the contrary, places 'touch' on a higher level than 'sight' in mystical experience. These variations of expressions contain more than a terminological difference; rather they clearly point to a basic divergence of speculative understanding of mystical experience.

[4] Cf. e.g. PS 33:9; 8:9; Ac 17:27; 2 Cor 2:18; Eph 1:18.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spiritual perception of immaterial realities.[5] If an author then clearly speaks of five spiritual faculties, we are justified in taking into account texts which only refer to a single faculty.[6]

Origen seems to be the first to have formulated such a doctrine of five spiritual senses[7] and he frequently comes back to this topic. We have to wait until St Bonaventure in the Middle Ages to find similarly extensive treatment of this notion.[8] We see the teaching of Origen continued in the literature of the Greek world, and this later stimulated speculation among the Scholastics, but the theme very obviously is the result of tradition and loses its vitality. We may obtain a first impression of Origen's idea from the following piece of his writing:

[83] 'After thorough investigation one can say that there exists, according to the word of Scripture, a general sense or faculty for the divine. Only the blessed know how to find it, as we read in the Wisdom of Solomon, "You discover the divine faculty of perception." (Prov. 2:5). This sense, however, unfolds in various individual faculties: sight for the contemplation of immaterial forms, as is evidently granted to the Cherubim and Seraphim, hearing for the discrimination of voices, which do not echo in the empty air, taste in order to savour the living bread which came down from heaven to bring life to the world (John 6:33), and even a sense of smell, with which Paul perceived those realities which caused him to describe himself as a sweet odour of Christ (2 Cor. 2:15), and finally touch, which possessed John when he states that he has touched with his own hands the Word of life. (1 John 1:1). This sense for the divine was discovered by the prophets . . . '[9] 'Solomon already realised that there are two modes of sense perception, one mortal, transient and human, and the other immortal, spiritual and divine.'[10]

How did Origen arrive at this doctrine? As far as can be discovered, he must have drawn it from no other source than Scripture.[11] Those passages in particular come into question in which religious understanding is expressed in terms which manifest the operations of sense powers.[12] Nothing need be said here about the exegesis of these passages, which in fact simply contain well chosen metaphors and do not involve any doctrine of five spiritual sense faculties.

As mentioned above, Origen bases his conceptions upon the text of Prov 2:5, but he also refers to Heb 5:14. He reads the Old Testament text after his own fashion and does not follow the Septuagint and other translations in interpreting the passage to mean the knowledge [84] of God as the fruit and reward for labours endured; rather he extracts and emphasises the sense character of the knowledge, from which he deduces that man possesses, over and above his bodily faculties, 'a sense for the divine, which is completely different from the senses as normally described' or simply 'divine faculties of sense'.

---

[5] This definition is not meant to prejudge the question of the form which the doctrine takes in the individual writers.

[6] The goal of A. Poulain is different from ours, and so he appeals to different texts.

[7] The most important texts in Origen are: De principiis 1. Ic. 1 n. 7. 9. 11; 1. II c n. 3; c. 9 n. 4. Contra Celsum 1. I n. 48; 1. VII n. 34. In Levit hom. 31 n. 7. In Ezech. hom. 11 n. In Cant. Cant. 1. I and 1. II. In Matth. comm. ser. n. 63-64. In Luc. fragm. 53 and 57. In Joan. t. X n. 40; t. XIII n. 24.

[8] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Doctrine of the "Spiritual Senses" in the Middle Ages: the contribution of St. Bonaventure', in this volume.

[9] Contra Celsum 1. I n. 48 (GCS 2) 98,9 sqq.

[10] De Principiis 1. I c. 1 n. 9 (GCS 22) 27,8 sqq.

[11] Philo is not familiar with this doctrine as it is found in Origen. Yet many of his expressions point to it in a preliminary way. References are to be found in the French edition of this study. Clement of Alexandria uses the two scriptural references (Prov 2:5 and Heb 5:4) which served as a starting point for Origen. Apart from 'bodily senses', Tertullian is familiar with 'intellectual senses', whose object is the 'immaterial powers' of the soul (such as good, evil, etc.); he also speaks of the eyes and ears of the inner man, with which Paul saw and heard the Lord.

[12] The scriptural passages used by Origen are: Eyes: Ps 18:9; Eph 1:18. Ears: Mt 13:9; 2 Cor 12:2 sq. Taste: Ps 33:9; Jn 6:32 sq. Smell: 2 Cor 12:15. Touch: l Jn 1:1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the New Testament passage the early Christians are blamed for not digesting the solid nourishment of the higher knowledge proper for adults and for still needing the milk of the basic elements of Christian teaching. Here it is added that this 'solid food' is the nourishment of 'the perfect', whose faculties are trained to distinguish between good and evil. The commentators interpret this to mean the capacity for moral discrimination[13] but Origen understands the passage in the same way as the Old Testament quotation from Proverbs. The New Testament statement fits even better into his system in that only the perfect (the exact significance of the term requires closer examination) are endowed with these spiritual faculties, which they have brought to a higher level of operation through constant practice.

Origen appeals also to Jer 4:19.[14] His allegorical and systematic method of exegesis tends naturally to read into these texts a theory of five spiritual senses.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE IDEA

In his polemic against Celsus, Origen took his teaching a stage further. Celsus had concluded from the Christian dogma of the resurrection from the dead that Christians believed in a material, sense knowledge of God.[15] This notion Origen rejects. When Scripture speaks of eyes, ears, etc., with which God is perceived, then what is clearly meant are eyes, ears and hands which only have the name in common with the bodily organs. And Scripture also refers, which is more remarkable, to a sense faculty for the divine which is radically different from everything which men call sense faculties at all.

At this point the personal tendency of Origen to interpret all genuine religious experience in psychological terms come into play; he [85] does this even in the case of mystical experience. It is no accident that the most beautiful and searching exposition of this teaching is to be found in the commentary of the Song of Songs, which since Origen is the book for mystics and in which, in his own words, 'Solomon uses the image of bride and bridegroom to awaken in the soul love of heaven and longing for divine blessings and instructs the soul how to climb the path of love of neighbour right up to union with God.[16]

Looked at more closely this view means that beside our five bodily senses we possess five more, the sense faculty of the soul,[17] the divine faculties,[18] the faculties of the interior man,[19] the faculties of the heart,[20] spiritual senses,[21] a 'kind of sense faculty which is immortal, spiritual and divine',[22] 'a sensuality that has nothing sensual in it',[23] 'a higher sense faculty which is not bodily'[24] or 'a divine sensuality, completely different from this reality as normally defined by men'.[25] Frequently he simply speaks of five senses.[26]

Origen derives the existence of these faculties from the scriptural references already quoted

---

[13] It is interesting to note that the exegetes saw in this expression from the Letter to the Hebrews a correspondence with the language of Philo which must have been known to the Alexandrian Origen.
[14] In Matth. comm. ser. 66 (GCS 38).
[15] Contra Celsum I VII n.33 (GCS 3)183, 24. Origen rejects this conclusion, cf. ibid. 1 VII n. 34.
[16] In Cant. prol. (GCS 33) 76,14 sqq.
[17] Ibid. (GCS 33) 105, 31 and 167,25 sqq.
[18] In Luc. fragm. 57 (GCS 35) 260 sq.
[19] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 105, 5:16; In Lev. hom. 3 n. 7 (GCS 29) 312, 15 sqq.
[20] De Principiis 1 II c. 4 n. 3 (GCS 22) 131,5.
[21] Cf. De Or. 13,4 (GCS 3) 329,14.
[22] De Principiis 1 I c. 1 n. 9 (GCS 22) 27,8 sqq.
[23] Contra Celsum 1. I n. 48 (GCS 2) 98,22.
[24] Ibid. I VII n.34 (GCS 3) 185,13 sq.
[25] Ibid. I VII n.34 (GCS 3) 184,26.
[26] Ibid. 1 I. n. 48 (GCS 2) and I. VII n.34 (GCS 3).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and other passages, where seeing, hearing God, etc. is mentioned and where it cannot be a question of the bodily senses. Celsus already knew of the 'eyes of the soul', of which he had heard from the Greeks.[27] But this notion was common among Christians even earlier.[28] The 'animal man' and the unbeliever make a great joke of this doctrine and from their point of view this is hardly surprising, but the believer must allow himself to be instructed by the word of God.[29] Unbelief is shown precisely in the lack of the spiritual senses in certain people, who are then naturally incapable of perceiving spiritual realities.[30]

[86] The character of the spiritual senses becomes clearer if one investigates more closely what sort of men possess them, what reality they grasp and how they operate and develop. There are people, as we have seen, whose spiritual sense of sight is blind, of hearing dumb, of smell dull. Origen says explicitly that not every man possesses these spiritual faculties.[31] Thus, for example, the eyes of Adam were closed after his sin.[32] Certain people may develop a particular sense but never come to the full use of all five. So the 'virgins' in the Song of Songs only possessed the sense of smell from following the bride,[33] because they had not yet reached the 'summa perfectionis'.[34] Only the 'perfect', the 'blessed' and the 'just'[35] have control over the use of all the faculties, and here these terms must be given their full breadth of meaning proper to Origen. Such figures as, for instance, Isaac, Moses, the prophets, John and Paul belong to the number of the perfect, as well as the blessed in heaven.[36]

To the possession of the spiritual faculties is allied the knowledge of the 'intellectualia',[37] the 'blessings from above and those which are beyond man',[38] 'of the spiritual',[39] and 'of that which is better than the body'.[40] In basing himself upon Scripture, Origen is able to define the object of each particular sense, as in the following text:

'Christ is grasped by every faculty of the soul. He is characterised as the true light which illuminates the eyes of the soul. He calls himself the word so as to be heard, the bread of life to be tasted. He is called the oil of anointing and nard, so that the soul rejoices in the sweet aroma of the Logos. He became the Word made flesh which can be expressed and comprehended, so that the inner man may lay hold of [87] the Word of life. This same Word of God is all this (Light, Word, etc); it comes to be through the fire of intense prayer and leaves none of the spiritual faculties empty of grace.'[41]

Origen expressly states that only a single reality can affect two faculties simultaneously and each sense grasps the reality in a different manner according to its own specific perfection.[42]

---

[27] Ibid. 1. VII n. 39 (GCS 3) 189,22.
[28] Ibid.
[29] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 106 sq. and In Luc. fragm. 57 (GCS 35) 260 sq.
[30] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 107, 7 sqq.
[31] In Luc. fragm. 53 (GCS 35) 259,47. Contra Celsum 1. II n. 72 (GCS 2) 194,18; ibid. 1. VIII n. 19 (GCS 3) 236,30.
[32] Contra Celsum I. VII n. 39 (GCS 3) 190,2 sqq.
[33] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 103,19.27.
[34] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 110,32.
[35] In Joan. t. XIII n.24 (GCS 10) 248,25 sqq. In Luc. frgm. 53 (GCS 35) 258,9 sqq. In Cant. I (GCS 33) 105, 1 sqq. De Principiis 1. I. C. 1 n. 9 (GCS 22) 27,8 sq. In Luc. fragm. 57 (GCS 35) 260,3.
[36] Contra Celsum 1.I n. 48 (GCS 2)98. De Principiis 1.II c. 4 n.3 (GCS 131), 4 sqq. In Cant. I (GCS 33) 104,17 sqq.
[37] De Principiis 1. IV c. 4 n. 10 (GCS 22) 364, 10.
[38] In Luc. fragm. 57 (GCS 35) 261,4.
[39] In Joan. t. x n.40 (GCS 10) 218,8; ibid. t.XIII n.24 (GCS 10) 248,6.
[40] Contra Celsum 1. I n.48 (GCS 2) 98,13. In Luc. hom 3 (GCS 35) 20,18: 'superna et divina'.
[41] In Cant. II (GCS 33) 167,25 sqq.
[42] Ibid. III (GCS 33) 180,25 sqq.; ibid. II (GCS 33) l72,8 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE EXERCISE OF THE FIVE SENSES

How are the spiritual faculties to be developed? A person does not possess them in the measure which enables him really to grasp 'superna et divina'. The ear may be spiritually deaf.[43] The cause of such insensitivity is to be sought in sin. So Origen alludes to 'contentio' and 'iactantia'.[44] The sinful obstacles he calls 'ignorantia et imperitia' as well as 'malitia' in his system of asceticism.[45]

In order to vitalise the spiritual faculties, both grace and practice are indispensable. For their correct use the Logos itself is the foundation, who bestows light to the eyes of the soul and grace to the spiritual senses, in that through grace he makes room for himself in our faculties.[46] The angels can also influence them and in any event the reality must permit itself to be grasped by the faculties,[47] without the human agent being able thereby to abandon his efforts.

The physical faculties are strengthened by constant practice; it is just the same with the spiritual senses.[48] The efforts of the bodily senses must be followed by the mastery of spiritual faculties,[49] where indeed a great deal of training is required.[50]

[88] The first and most important condition for this is faith. In addition Origen speaks of 'eruditio' and 'industria' as well as attentiveness to the mystical sense of Scripture.[51] At the same time a man must free himself from domination by the physical faculties, so that the eye of the soul has clarity of vision to the extent to which we close the eye of the body.[52] Above all it is prayer which exercises the spiritual faculties.[53] Everyone who trains himself in this way becomes one of the 'perfect'. No one who has really grasped Christ with his senses can be turned aside by anything else. Christ is everything for him; what he sought he has found in Christ. The divine senses first achieve total fulfilment at the moment when we enter into direct communion with Christ. Then we are finally set over great things having been faithful in small things.[54]

To connect this notion to the rest of Origen's psychological ideas, one should first of all point to the well known distinction between soul and spirit. The exact relationship between the two in his mind is not easy to work out, but the basic idea is that the spirit becomes soul as it voluntarily sets itself apart from God and the soul is transformed into spirit by being cleansed in the material world, its place of purification, and by return to God.[55] But the terminology of Origen is not entirely clear. Often spirit and soul mean the same thing,[56] so

---

[43] Contra Celsum. 1. II n. 72 (GCS 2)194,18.
[44] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 107,10 sq.
[45] Ibid. 1 (GCS 33) 105,22 sqq.
[46] Contra Celsum 1. VI n. 151 (GCS 3) 202, 17; ibid. 1. VII n.39 (GCS 3) 190,2 sqq. In Matth. comm. ser. n. 63 (GCS 38); In Matth. t. XVI n. 11 (GCS 40). In Cant. III (GCS 33) 203,28: 'sensibus mihi animae videtur lumen praebere'; ibid. II (GCS 33) 168,4 sq. De Principiis I. II c. 9 n.4 (GCS 22) 167 sq.
[47] In Matth. comm. ser. n.64 (GCS 38); according to the general principle that angels can cause contemplation. cf. De Principiis 1. III c. 2n. 4 (GCS 22) 250,20 sqq. In Luc. hom. 3 (GCS 35) 20-23: this idea runs through the whole homily. Contra Celsum 1. II. n. 72 (GCS 2) 194,11 sqq.
[48] In Ezech. hom II n. 1 (GCS 33) 423 sq. In Cant. I (GCS 33) 105,14 sqq.
[49] In Levit. hom 3 n. 7 (GCS 29) 312,15 sqq.
[50] In Luc. fragm. 53 (GCS 35) 258,10 sq.
[51] In Cant. II (GCS 33) 166,19 sqq. In Matth. comm. ser. n.63 (GCS 38). In Cant. I (GCS 33) 105,23.
[52] Contra Celsum 1. VII n.39 (GCS 3) 190,6 sqq. In Joan. t. x n.40 (GCS 10) 218,4 sqq.
[53] In Cant. II (GCS 33) 168,3-5. Contra Celsum. 1. VII n.44 (GCS 3)195 sq. De orat. 9,2 (GCS 3) 318,26 sqq.
[54] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 103,27 sqq. and 104,17 sq.
[55] In Principiis 1. II c. 8 n.3 and ibid. 1. Ic. 8 n.4 (GCS 22); cf. DThC X1/2 (Paris 1931) 1532-1534 (G. Bardy).
[56] Cf. De Orat. 27,2 (GCS 3) 364,23 sqq., where several ideas are used in the same sentence with the same meaning. Similarly Contra Celsum l. VII n.4 (GCS 3), 156,4 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that they appear, especially in his ascetical writings, to be two aspects of man set over against each other.[57] This obscure mode of expression explains why Origen often speaks of the 'faculties of the soul', although knowledge of the divine is restricted according to his teaching to the 'spirit'.[58] But [89] the expression 'faculties of the spirit' is also to be found.[59] This implies that the spiritual faculties should be treated as organs of the spirit directed to the understanding of spiritual realities. Their specific functions are attributed by Origen to the 'spirit', which recognises the 'incorporea' and 'intellectualia' and discovers the divine sense, while the intellect only reaches a certain higher level of insight.[60] The 'spirit' alone grasps invisible and spiritual blessings.

When reference is made to the five spiritual faculties as organs of the 'spirit' by which spiritual realities are perceived, one must not overlook the analogy which rests behind the employment of the names of bodily organs for the capacities of the spirit. These concepts are to a greater or lesser extent to be taken in an imaginative sense.[61]

Did Origen really conceive of five distinct organs operating in religious knowledge? Or were spiritual sight, hearing, etc. not rather for him different imaginative expressions for the 'spirit', the real organ of perception? The first alternative seems the more probable, since Origen can also characterise the spiritual senses as powers of the soul,[62] which are, as it were, different species of the general divine sense, as appears in the works of Solomon.[63] In his view the power of the soul is to be distinguished in the spiritual faculties from the power of taste[64] in the same way as the bodily senses differ among themselves. According to Origen not every man possesses all the spiritual senses, but often only one or other of them. When he stresses the imaginative significance of these expressions, he means to point out that these scriptural terms are to be understood in an imaginative sense in that they can be ascribed to spiritual sense faculties and not to physical ones.[65]

[90]

THE PLACE OF SPIRITUAL FACULTIES WITHIN THE SYSTEM

How does this doctrine fit into Origen's thinking as a whole? Two basic principles of his spiritual system must first be outlined, although we do not of course have the scope here for a

---

[57] Cf. De orat. 24,2 (GCS 3) 353,24 sq. In Joan fragm. 3 (GCS 10), 486,32 sq. Contra Celsum 1. VIII n.52 (GCS 3) 267,24. cf. also DThC t1/2 (Paris, 1931) 1534.

[58] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 105,31; ibid. II (GCS 33) 167,25 sq. In Ezech. hom. II. n. I (GCS 33) 424, 1 etc. It also comes before the 'taste of the soul', the 'smell of the soul', etc.

[59] De Principiis 1. Ic. 1 n.7 (GCS 22) 24,8.9

[60] De Principiis I. lIc. 8 n.2 (GCS 22) 154,27 sqq. and ibid. 1. IV c. 4 n. 10 (GCS 22) 364. The close relation between the 'spirit' and the sense of the divine is particularly evident here.

[61] Contra Celsum 1. VII n.34 (GCS 3) 185,11 and ibid. n. 38 (GCS 3) 188,21 and ibid. I. VI n.61 (GCS 3) 132, 3. In Luc. fragm 53 (GCS 35) 259,30. De Principiis 1. IC 1 n. 9 (GCS 22) 26,15 sqq. In Exod hom 10 n.3 (GCS 29) 247,22. In Cant. prol (GCS 33) 65,15 sqq.; 66,4 sqq.

[62] De Principiis 1. I c. I n. 9: Powers of the soul; cf. In Luc. fragm 53.

[63] Contra Celsum 1. I n.48 (GCS 2) 98,12.

[64] In Joan. t. xx n.43 (GCS 10) 386,23 sq.

[65] What is said about the relationship of the 'spirit' to the spiritual senses, applies also to the relation of the 'principale cordis' (according to the translation of Jerome and Rufinus) to these senses, so that the two are synonymous. Jerome also uses the term 'mens', i.e. precisely in the sense of 'spirit'. This is the favourite usage of Origen for the principle of religious knowledge; cf. In Jer. hom. 5 n. 9 (GCS 33) 39, 7-8.11; In Num. hom. 10 n.3 (GCS 29) 63,19: 'principale . . . quod solum recipere potest mysteria veritatis et capax esse arcanorurn Dei', also In Cant. II (GCS 33) 170,14 sqq. The perceptions of the spiritual senses can also be explained by their effects upon the 'principale'; cf. Contra Celsum I. I n.48 (GCS 2) 97,32 sqq. Thus Origen can see perfection in the possession of the spiritual senses and can call it either 'the kingdom of God' or 'the blessed state of the spirit'; cf. De orat 25 (GCS 3) 359,9 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

detailed exposition of his ascetical and mystical teaching.

Normally a division within the spiritual life between an active and a contemplative side is deduced from the distinction between 'soul' and 'spirit', a contrast, that is, between 'praxis' and 'theory',[66] between 'men of action' and 'men of theory'.[67] It is easy to see the relation of these two aspects of Way of the Lord[68] in Origen's psychological doctrine. According to him the 'soul', in contrast to the 'spirit', possesses two sides, aggression and desire, as he repeatedly remarks.[69] The moral danger for the soul ultimately lies in the passions and errors to which it is prone. So the task of the spiritual life is to combat these passions and errors in order to purify and sanctify the soul. This is the role played by the active, practical life. In Origen's language the obstacle to be tackled is called 'bad' or 'evil', and the goal to be striven for virtue, proper behaviour, righteousness or the observance of the laws of God.[70] At the highest point of the 'active life' a man arrives at [91] 'indifference' or 'apathy'[71] and close to this point, or at least on the same level, there appear love and purity.[72] Such an active life necessarily precedes the contemplative, for, as we saw, purity is the precondition for knowledge of God, which forms the heart of the contemplative life. Only knowledge of God removes the labour of the active life.[73] In this sense praxis comes before theory;[74] practical men have their place in the forecourts of house of the Lord, while men of theory dwell in the house itself.[75] This ordering of the stages of the spiritual life is not reversible.[76]

The realm of the 'spirit' is 'theory'[77] and the essence of the contemplative life is precisely 'spiritual knowledge',[78] a bread, in Origen's words, 'which contains what is hidden and makes clear faith in God and knowledge of the things of God',[79] and stands therefore in direct

---

[66] In Luc. fragm. 13 (GCS 35) 283,8; ibid. hom. I (GCS 35) 9,26-10,1, etc.
[67] Select. in Psalm. (PG 12, 1652 C; 1249 D; 1581 D); cf. In Joan fragm. 36 (GCS 10) 512,23.
[68] In Joan. t.VI n. 19 (GCS 10) 127,29 sq.
[69] In Luc. fragm. 54 (GCS 35) 260,10 sq. In Ezech. hom. 1 n. 16 (GCS 33) 340,3 sq. 20 sq. In Gen. hom. 1 n. 17 (GCS 29) 20,23 sq.; ibid. hom. 2 n. 6 (GCS 29) 38,16 sq. etc.
[70] Cf. Select in Psalm. (PG12, 1304 B; 1552 D; 1684 D). Surprisingly enough the clearest formulations of Origen's spiritual teaching are to be found in the Selct. in Psalm. However, it is not certain that the whole work is authentically that of Origen and should only be used therefore with reservation. But the undoubtedly genuine writings of Origen provide enough evidence of his spiritual teaching to guarantee the accuracy of our account. On the Select in Psalm cf. E. de Faye, Origène (Paris 1923), t.I. pp. 210-213.
[71] Select. in Psalm. (PG 12, 1085 B; 1672 C). Apart from the Select in Psalm, the expression 'apathy' is rarely found in Origen.
[72] If the whole meaning of the active life consists in meditation, then the significance of love and purity rests on their close connection to theory. Only the pure man is capable of it. cf. Contra Celsum 1.III n.60 (GCS 2) 255,7; ibid. I IV n. 96 (GCS 2); also ibid. I VI n.69; 1 VII n.33 and 45 (GCS 3) 196,17 sq. etc. It is characteristic of love that the fall of the spirits is presented as the separation from love and contemplation; love is above all the other virtues and above every form of knowledge. Despite this, the intellectual aspect of perfection is over-emphasised.
[73] Select in Psalm. (PG 12, 1644 b).
[74] Ibid. (PG 12, 1173 B).
[75] Ibid. (PG.12, 1652 C).
[76] Ibid. (PG 12, 1641 D-1644 A). Knowledge of God and not innocence makes man blessed. (cf. PG 12, 1588 C).
[77] In Ezech. hom. I n.16 (GCS 33) 340,21.
[78] Cf. footnotes 66 and 67.
[79] In Levit. hom. 13 n. 3 (GCS 30) 472,4 sq. Here and at similar places we touch on a problem that can only he mentioned in passing. What connection is there between Origen's spiritual doctrine of the distinction between the active and the contemplative life and his idea, suspect to many, of two classes of Christian? The one class is content with faith, observance of the commandments and the foolishness of the cross, while the other achieves perfection, and Possesses divine wisdom through a deeper revelation of the word of God and a secret tradition. The doctrine of the two classes of Christian could paradoxically either be expressed in the two levels of the spiritual life or be an erroneous opinion of gnostic origin, as J. Lebreton believes; cf. RSR 12 (1931) pp. 165-196: 'Die Stufen der religiosen Erkenntnis nach Origenes'; G. Bardy, DThC X1/2 (Paris, 1931), 1514-1516; E. de Faye, Origène, t.I-III (Paris, 1923).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

contrast to the normal bread of the observance of divine commands. The obstacle to be overcome here is the 'spirit's' absence of knowledge.[80] [92] Without hesitation Origen stresses the priority of contemplative over the active life[81] and values the latter merely as a preparation for the former. However in his view one cannot exist without the other.[82] Thus even the ordinary Christian has some understanding of the Trinity, which is precisely the summit of the contemplative life.[83]

'Theory' affects the active life to the extent to which it is set apart from what is of the physical senses. Origen is even able to point out the dangers of higher knowledge.[84] But what does this 'theory' exactly consist in? This will become clearer if we take a closer look at the three stages of the spiritual life, which Origen recognises in addition to the distinction between the two aspects of the soul alluded to above.[85] For he often distinguishes 'praxis', 'physical theory' and 'theology'.[86] A similar triple division is evident in the distinction between 'mystical', 'physical', and 'ethical' dogmas.[87] Numerous examples of this could be adduced.[88]

In any event, according to this triple division, the knowledge of the Trinity, that is 'theology', appears as the 'perfectio scientiae'.[89] More detailed exposition of these three levels is to be found, using other terms, in Origen's commentary on the Song of Songs, where he distinguishes between the 'ethica', the 'physica' and the 'enoptica'.[90] [93] Rufinus calls these 'moralis', 'naturalis' and 'inspectiva' in his translation.[91]

The 'moralis' corresponds to 'praxis', although it signifies a science rather than a rule.[92] Because of his obedience and observance of the commandments Abraham is the model for this type of knowledge,[93] for whoever has reached this level corrects his behaviour and observes the commandments.[94]

The 'physica' is called 'natural where one refers to the nature of the whole of reality, so that nothing happens in life contrary to nature and everything serves the purpose for which it was brought into being by the creator.'[95] Whoever understands this recognises 'by distinguishing between the cause and the nature of things that he must overcome the vanity of vanities and strive for what is eternal and permanent'.[96] So the 'physica' is 'knowledge and discernment of transient beings'.[97] Its goal is the insight that 'all that is visible is corruptible

---

[80] In Joan. fragm. 3 (GCS 10) 486,32. In Luc. fragm. 54 (GCS 35) 260,8. Select, in Psalm. (PG 12, 1429 A; 1545 B; 1549 C).
[81] Select in Psalm. (PG 12, 1581 D; 1652 C). Martha is regarded as less perfect than Mary: In Luc. fragm. 39 (GCS 35) 252,5 sq. 21 sq.
[82] In Luc. fragm 39 (GCS 35) 252,4. A life of virtue flows from constant prayer; cf. De orat. 12,2 (GCS 3) 324,25 sq. Select in Psalm. (PG 12, 1088 AB).
[83] In Levit. hom. 5 n. 3 (GCS 29) 340, 17 sq. Select, in Ezech. 6 (PG 13, 785 BC).
[84] Select in Psalm. (PG 12, 1644 A). In Ezech. hom 9 n. 5 (GCS 33) 414, 27 sq.
[85] This division is found in many passages of Origen which are not mentioned here; thus a distinction is drawn for example between 'agnitio (ratio) fidei (intuitus et inspectio contemplationis)' and 'perfectio operum'; cf. In Cant. III (GCS 33) 216,3 sqq.
[86] Select in Psalm. (PG 12, 1641 D).
[87] In Jer. fragm. 14 (GCS 33) 241,3 sqq. Origen adds a 'perhaps' and indicates a certain hesitation; cf. In Cant. prol. (GCS 33) 75,9 sq., where he still keeps this triple division.
[88] In Con. hom. 14n.3(GCS29) 123,25 sq; 124,l7 sq.; hom 6 n. 2; ibid. 67,28 sq.; 68,19 sq.
[89] In Num. hom. 10 n.3 (GCS 29) 74,6 sq.
[90] In Cant. prol. (GCS 33) 75,8 sq.
[91] Ibid.
[92] Ibid. (GCS 33) 75,17 sq. Also: 'vitae instituta componens'; ibid. 76,8 sq. and ibid. 77,29 and ibid. 78,15 sq.
[93] Ibid. 78,23.
[94] Ibid. 79,13.
[95] Ibid. 75,19 sq. and 76,10 sq.
[96] Ibid. 78,2 sq. and 79, 14 sq.
[97] Ibid. 78,16 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and fragile, so that anyone striving for wisdom grasps it in this way; he disdains it without hesitation and esteems it lightly, renouncing all that is earthly and stretching out for the invisible and eternal'.[98] The model for this is Isaac, 'who dug wells and discovered the depths of reality'.[99] Obviously the 'physica', therefore, presents a religious outlook on the world and has a moral rather than a scientific purpose. But does the 'theory of the immaterial' belong still to the 'physica' or to the 'inspectiva'? The answer is not entirely clear[100] but the matter is of no great importance.

'Inspectiva' means the sort of knowledge 'in which we go beyond what is visible and grasp something of the divine and heavenly reality, perceiving through this faculty alone that the latter things surpass bodily appearance'.[101] The object in this case is the same as in the Song [94] of Songs: 'the love of the perfect soul for the word of God',[102] which leads to 'the contemplation of the godhead'.[103] The soul strives for the invisible and the eternal; the model for this is Jacob, 'because of the contemplation of divine things' [104]

Each of these stages corresponds to one of the books of Solomon: the book of Proverbs belongs to the 'ethica'; Ecclesiastes corresponds to the 'physica', and the Song of Songs to the 'enoptica'.[105] The Song of Songs stands in the final place because only someone with the 'ethica' and the 'physica' already behind him can understand it.[106]

We are now in a position to fit Origen's idea of the five spiritual senses into his overall system of thought. As already stated, only the perfect are in possession of all five spiritual faculties. In consequence only they can make use of the five senses since they have gone through the active life and reached a state of 'apathy', of freedom from the passions; they have arrived at perfect purity and love through observance of the commandments. They are persuaded of the vanity and transitoriness of the visible world and thus the way lies open for them to the kingdom of God, to insight and 'theory'.[107] Therefore the 'pure spirit'[108] can ascend to the contemplation of divinity itself, the Trinity and the divine Word. All five spiritual senses come into operation, each one being touched by the grace of the Word.

These conclusions are not mere deductions since Origen himself relates the activity of the spiritual senses to the ascent of the soul to the 'enoptica'. In this sense he explains the passage in the Song of Songs, 'the aroma of your ointments surpasses all other fragrance' (1:3), to mean the state in which the soul has mastered for itself all learning, [95] whether this is 'ethica' or 'physica'.[109] All this knowledge was aroma for the soul, yet, as he continues, at the moment when the soul comes to awareness of the divine mysteries and truths and is permitted to cross over the threshold and arrive at wisdom itself, which comes neither from

---

[98] Ibid. 78,5 sq.
[99] Ibid. 78,29 sq.
[100] According o Origen the 'scientia incorruptibilium' belongs to the naturalis', while knowledge of all immaterial realities is proper to the 'inspective', [101] In Cant. (GCS 33) 75,21 sq.
[102] Ibid. 78,14 sq.
[103] Ibid. 78,17 sq.
[104] Ibid. 78,30 sq.
[105] Ibid. 77,30 sq.
[106] Ibid. 78, 10 sq. The same triple division is found in other passages, e.g. De Principiis 1. III n.3 (GCS 22) 259,18 sq. . . . 'sanctae et immaculatae animae cum se ommi affectu omnique puritate voverint Deo et alienas se ab omni daemonum contagione servaverint et per multam abstinentiam purificaverint se et pus ac regliosis imbutae fuerint disciplinis participium per hoc divinitatis assumunt, et prophetiae ac ceterorum divinorum donorum gratiam promerentur'. The division of 'theory' or rather the triple division of the spiritual life is found also in: In Joan. t. 1 n. 28 (GCS 10) 36,14 sq. Contra Celsum 1. VII n. 46 (GCS 3) 198,13 sq. In Joan. t. XX n. 34 (GCS 10) 371 sq.
[107] Select, in Psalm. (PG 12, 1581 D).
[108] Ibid. (PG 12, 1304 C and 1424 C).
[109] In Cant. I (GCS 33) 100,12 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the world nor from its masters but is God's own wisdom accessible only to the perfect, at this moment it has reached the stage where it may grasp the unutterable mysteries and can properly say, 'odor unguentorum'. This spiritual and mystical knowledge surpasses all the aromas of moral and natural philosophy.[110] The soul, guided by Christ, follows his scent like 'the soul which is practised in the moral and then also in the natural sphere'.[111] 'And this only happens in so far as his aroma (that of Christ) is taken in. What do they (that is, the companions of the bride in the Song of Songs) do when their hearing and sight, feeling and taste are filled with the Word of God and each is endowed with its proper virtue corresponding to its nature and capacity?'[112] 'And so those who have reached the highest degree of perfection and blessedness rejoice with all their senses in the Word of God.'[113] This agrees exactly with Origen's conception of the 'perfect', when he explains the Word of God and God himself as the object of the spiritual faculties.[114]

THE USE OF THE SPIRITUAL SENSES

One requires a special grace from God in order to be able to make use of the spiritual faculties. This is true both for 'theology' and for 'enoptica'. 'For with this (sc. grace) a man comes to the contemplation of, and longing for, unseen and eternal blessings. But in order to obtain them properly we have need of mercy. The only condition for this is that after realising the beauty of the divine Word, we can allow ourselves to be set on fire with saving love, so that the Word itself deigns to love the soul in which it has encountered longing for it.'[115]

'It is possible for us with the grace of God to recognise the truth but [96] it does not rest with us whether we are counted worthy of spiritual knowledge.'[116] Thus the spiritual senses can grasp nothing if God does not bestow his merciful grace upon a man. Origen's doctrine of the five spiritual senses consists in his psychological notion of 'theology', which he treats as the highest degree of the spiritual life.

Did Origen intend to use his doctrine to give a clearer account to the psychology of mystical experience in the proper sense of the term?[117] This point is not easy to settle and a sure answer would require a special investigation. For Origen does not appear to separate clearly popular knowledge of God from mystical experience. All knowledge of God according to his account is more or less mystical, without it being absolutely necessary for someone to have genuine mystical understanding.[118] So one should not immediately try to

---

[110] Ibid. 100,21 sq.
[111] Ibid. 102,28 sq.
[112] Ibid. 103,27 sq.
[113] Ibid. 105, I sq.
[114] Contra Celsum. I. VII n.34 (GCS 3) 184,14 sq.; ibid. n.39 (GCS 3)190,3 sq. De Principiis I. I c I n.9 (GCS 22) 26,15 sq.
[115] In Cant. prol. (GCS 33) 79,17 sq.
[116] Select in Psalm. (PG 12,1424 B).
[117] Cf. the controversy about the mysticism of Origen, which has remained inconclusive: C. A. Kneller, 'Mystisches bei Origenes', St. M-L (1904), pp. 238-240 and H. Koch, 'Kennt Origenes Gebetsstufen?', ThQ 87 (1905), pp. 592-596.
[118] For Origen, God belongs to every form of knowledge; cf. Select, in Psalm. (PG 12, 1164 B); however he allows a natural knowledge of God as well which arises from creation, e.g. In Rom. 2, 13 (PG14,892 B); De Principiis 1. I c. 1 n. 7 (GCS 22) 24,19 sq.; Contra Celsum 1 VIII n.37 (GCS 3)188,2 sq. Externally it seems heavily influenced by mysticism, although it should not be regarded as genuine mystical experience (Plato's influence). Origen writes: 'We make it clear that man is by nature quite incapable of feeling God and of finding him in a pure form, unless the one sought comes to his aid', Contra Celsum 1. VII n.42 (GCS 3) 193, 16 sq. Cf. A. Miura-Stange, Celsus und Origenes (Giessen 1926) pp. 64 sq. To this notion corresponds the strong

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

find a description of mystical experience in such language of Platonic enthusiasm. Also the way in which ecstasy is definitely excluded makes it doubtful whether Origen had really experienced mystical states.[119] He speaks rather of the difficulty of finding charisms.[120] This prevents us, however, [97] from seeing a psychology of mystical experience in his doctrine of the five spiritual senses. Nevertheless it must be granted that Origen applies this notion to a type of knowledge which is of a mystical character, although he sets it clearly apart from general religious understanding. The spiritual senses remain active in his view in eternal bliss. They comprehend the angels, the Cherubim, and even God, though it is assumed that these latter allow themselves to be so perceived; otherwise every effort of the spiritual eye would be fruitless.[121] Furthermore Origen uses his teaching of the spiritual senses to explain prophetic inspiration.[122] He proposes a 'deep' interpretation of the story of Isaias and Ezechiel.[123] He mentions, too, in connection with the doctrine of the spiritual senses the two events which counted in tradition as the high points of biblical mysticism, the vision of God by Moses and the rapture of Paul into the third heaven.[124] It is evident, then, in Origen that the spiritual senses can be the organs of mystical knowledge.

THE LATER INFLUENCE OF THE DOCTRINE

A few remarks may be added here to show the later influence of Origen's teaching, although no comprehensive survey will be attempted.

Evagrius of Pontus is a disciple of Origen in this matter as in his whole spiritual teaching.[125] Thus we read: 'The "spirit" possesses five spiritual senses which are its means of perception and with which it fulfils the purpose of creation. Sight reveals to it the essence of things; hearing allows it to grasp their foundations; with the sense of smell and pure and holy aroma is sensed which is pleasing to it and its house; through touch genuine trust develops'. Elsewhere he writes: 'Just as every art demands a living faculty which is suitable for it, so the [98] "spirit" as well needs a spiritual sense for the discernment of spiritual things'.[126]

Evagrius' manner of expression is more accurate than that of his master; the 'spirit' possesses five spiritual faculties corresponding to its nature. He speaks of the spiritual eye, of the eye of the soul or of spiritual sight, etc.[127] The fact that they are organs of the 'spirit' clearly proves that their operation relates to the 'theoretical' dimension. The 'praxis' and its emphasis laid on the moral dispositions which are required for knowledge of God, e.g. purity. It seems difficult to find in Origen 'the outline of a theory of mystical knowledge', (cf. G. Bardy, DThC X1/2 (Paris, 1931) 1536).

---

[119] Cf. De Principiis 1.111 C. 3 n.4 (GCS 22) 260,27 sq. In Ezech. hom. 6 n. I (GCS 33) 378,6 sq. Contra Celsum I. VIII n.3 and 4 (GCS 3) 154 sqq. Cf. A. Zöllig, Die Inspirationslehre des Origenes (Freiburg i.Br. 1903), pp. 69-70. Evidently Origen attracts a 'manic ecstasy'; whoever is filled with the Spirit must be completely free without ecstasy and can reject the inspiration of the Spirit. This does not fit genuine divine ecstasy, which Origen did not consider at all. Similarly with regard to mysticism of a Montanist type; cf. Fr. Leitner, Die prophetische Inspiration, (Freiburg i.Br., 1896), pp. 119 sq.

[120] Fragm in Prov. (PG 13,25 A).

[121] In Luc. hom. 3 (GCS 35) 20 sqq.

[122] On this inspiration, cf. Fr. Leitner op. cit. pp. 142 sq. and A. Zöllig, op. cit. pp. 58 sq.

[123] Contra Celsum 1. I n.48 (GCS 2) 98,9 sq.

[124] De Principiis 1 II c.r n.3 (GCS 22) 131,3 sq. Similarly In Joan t. XXXII n.27 (GCS 10) 472,31 sq. Contra Celsum I. IV n.96 (GCS 2) 369, 14 sq., and 1. I n.48 (GCS 2) 99,15 sq. Cf. also, In Cant. I (GCS 33) 109,11 sq. In Jesu Nave hom,23 n.r (GCS 33) 446,25 sq.

[125] On this dependence cf. W. Bousset, Apophthegmata, (Tübingen, 1923) and M. Viller, 'Aux Sources de la Spiritualité de saint Maxime', RAM 11 (1930) 11 (1930) pp. 156-184; 239-268.

[126] W. Frankenberg, Evagrius Ponticus (GAb, NF XXII/2) Berlin, 1912) Syriac with Greek translation; cr. ibid. pp. 155 and 79, and also W. Bousset, op. cit. p.318.

[127] Cent. II, 80; VII, 44; II, 28; VII, 27; II, 62 (Frankenberg, 183; 461; 147; 451; 175).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

goal, namely 'apathy' or freedom from passion[128] are pre-supposed here. His use of terminology seems to create a problem for knowledge of the Trinity which he sometimes distinguishes emphatically from any other type of knowledge.[129] But even in this case it is a matter of 'sight' and a 'way of seeing' and a 'perceiving'.[130] Given these expressions, Evagrius must regard even knowledge of the Trinity as dependent on the spiritual senses. Their operations, however, are envisaged in the following manner: the bodily senses perceive sensual things;[131] in comparison with the spiritual organs of perception, they grasp only a part and not the whole of the perceived object.[132] This is surpassed by the 'perception of the spiritual organs', which penetrate more deeply the reality already grasped by the bodily senses and discover much more about it than do the latter.[133] The spiritual faculties, in fact, either comprehend nothing or the whole reality, whose deepest meaning they communicate.[134] [99] They have, therefore, a more difficult role. For here 'theory' should become evident,[135] in which the individual senses are apportioned, each in a different way. The eye perceives the existence of these immaterial beings, spiritual hearing grasps their inner meaning, the sense of touch lends certainty to these perceptions and finally smell and taste comprehend them in a more affective manner.[136] It is from this point that the human gaze ascends to the light of the Trinity.

Although one of the faculties, the eye, is apparently the organ of 'theology', as has already been pointed out, its operation is quite different here than in 'physical knowledge'. At this level the perception of the spiritual senses is closely linked to the activity of the bodily faculties, so that each is brought into operation by the other.[137] This entirely material point of departure disappears on the higher level. In this 'state beyond the forms', in pure prayer, the spiritual eye perceives more as the light of the Trinity, the light without images.[138] This light is ultimately the highest that exists and yet remains at the same time 'eternal unknowing'.[139] In order to reach this point an ever increasing purity is needed, which can be achieved with angelic assistance.[140] Indirectly Evagrius implies that not everyone possesses all the spiritual senses and may here and there only have control of one or another of them. Many men can in [128] Cf. M. Viller, op. cit. p. 168; this seems also to be the meaning of Cent 1,37 (Frankenberg, 81).

[129] Cf. Cent II, 16; III, 41; V, 63 and epist. 58 (Frankenberg, 141; 217; 347; 607). Cf. M. Viller, op. cit. pp. 244, 246 and 164; Cent. II 47; VII 19 and epist. 29 (Frankenberg 161; 429; 587).
[130] Cent. V.51.52.57.63; Gnost. 151; Antirr. (Frankenberg, 339; 341; 343; 347; 553; 547).
[131] Cent. V.57 sq., ibid. I.34; II,80 (Frankenberg, 343; 79; 80). All these expressions carry the same meaning and describe bodily sense perception.
[132] Cent. II, 28 and 80 (Frankenberg, 147 and 183).
[133] Cent. II, 80; V,58 (Frankenberg, 183; 343).
[134] Cent. II, 28 and 35. (Frankenberg, 147 and 155). What is said here only refers to the perception of immaterial realities, i.e. spiritual phenomena in the strict sense. One does not rightly grasp now the physical sight of bodily realities differs from spiritual perception, unless spiritual perception consists in the knowledge of the foundation of things.
[135] Cent. V.34 (Frankenberg, 341) has the same meaning: the deepest sense of physical realities from a religious and moral viewpoint. Babai interprets it in this way in his commentary on Cent. V,54 and 58 (Frankenberg, 343 and 345). Origen explained the 'physica' in the same way; Cent. 1,33; 11,80; V,57 (Frankenberg, 79; 183; 343).
[136] Cent. II 35-36; II 27'and V.54 (Frankenberg, 155, 147, 341).
[137] This is certainly the meaning of Cent. 11,80. (Frankenberg, 183). Cf. Cent. II 80; V,57. 60. 61. (Frankenberg, 183; 343; 345). Cent. V,6I must accordingly be interpreted as follows: physical perception arouses the awareness of the deepest spiritual meaning which can be drawn from these sense realities (Cent. 11,80, 35 sq.) Conversely this awareness awakes the memory of the physical perception of these objects. The relation between physical perception and 'theory' in the 'physica' assumes that 'theory' is dependent on physical perception. On this point Cent. IV, 85 (Frankenberg, 315) and V,56 (Frankenberg, 343) agree, as do other passages in Evagrius, cf. M. Viller, op. cit. pp. 248-256.
[138] Cent. II, 29; IV, 87; V,51 and 61; VI, 26; VII,4 and 30 (Frankenberg, 149; 315; 339; 345; 415; 427; 455).
[139] Cent. III,88 (Frankenberg, 257).
[140] Cent. V.52; 57; VI,35 (Frankenberg, 341; 343; 383).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

his opinion perceive the smell of demons.[141] [100] This, then, forms the main outline of Evagrius' teaching. The many passages which are parallel to Origen's own writing do not require separate mention here.

It is evident, however, that Evagrius does make additions to the theory of mystical experience. This development would become clearer if one were to pursue his spiritual teaching in detail, an investigation which exceeds the scope of this essay.[142] The view of Bousset seems to us mistaken when he says about Evagrius's conception of the five spiritual senses: 'His spirituality is taken to extremes and takes on a new physical and sensual force.'[143] However it is true that the following passage from the 'Mirror of the Nuns' does seem to provide a certain justification for this opinion: 'The eyes of the virgins see the Lord, the ears of the virgins hear his words, the mouth of virgins kisses the bridegroom, their sense of smell is attracted by the aroma of his perfumes, and their hands touch the Lord.'[144]

As is well known Diadocus Photicus is heavily influenced by Evagrius.[145] But he is not familiar with any doctrine of five spiritual faculties, but only of 'one spiritual sense', 'a sense of the spirit', etc. On this topic P. Horn has made a closer investigation.[146] The differences between the two views are easily understood. Diadocus is more or less familiar with an experience of knowledge coming from the indwelling of God in the purified soul. The soul recognises its right relationship to God and experiences divine consolation, which gives a man total fulfilment. On this basis Diadocus can state that the purified person possesses a single perception in contrast to the five bodily senses.[147] [101] He has no difficulty in referring to the eyes of spirit, to the perception of the divine light and its illumination.[148] It is surprising to discover how often he uses the images of tasting and savouring to describe religious experience.[149] In one passage he even speaks of 'sniffing out the aroma of supernatural good deeds'.[150]

Pseudo-Macarius maintains more accurately than Diadocus the doctrine of the spiritual senses in his spiritual homilies. Bousset has rightly affirmed that he too lies under the influence of Evagrius and, at least indirectly, of Origen.[151] The question of the authorship and authenticity of these homilies does not concern us here; the solutions attempted by Stoffels, Stiglmayr, Marriott, Villecourt and Wilmarts are well known. [152]

In any event Pseudo-Macarius accepts that there are five spiritual senses of the soul which are sanctified by the grace of the Holy Spirit and are then truly 'wise virgins'.[153] This image makes on suspect a direct dependence upon Origen, who had already compared the five [141] Cent. V.78 and VII, 44 (Frankenberg, 353; 461).

---

[142] For this, parallels can be found in Origen, at least if one restricts one's attention to the actual content of the texts. However, a considerable difference exists between the writers. One finds a concern in Evagrius, but not in Origen, to detach mystical from ordinary knowledge and to highlight its peculiar characteristics.
[143] W. Bousset, op. cit. p. 318; cf. F. Cavallera, 'Bespr. zu Bousset', RAM 6 (1925) pp. 80-83.
[144] Cf. H. Gressmann (ed.) Mönchs-und Nonnenspiegel (Greek) (TU 39,46; Leipzig, 1913), p.151.
[145] Cf. R. Reitzenstein, Historia monachorum und Historia Lausiaca (Gottingen 1916), cap. V: 'Evagrius und Diadochus von Photike', pp. 124-142. Cf. M. Viller, op. cit. p. 263.
[146] 'Le sens de l'esprit d'après Diadoque de Photice', RAM 8 (1927) pp. 402-419.
[147] De perfectione spirituali, cap. 24; 25; 29; ed. Weis-Leibersdorf (Leipzig, 1912); new edition: E. de Places, Diadoque de Photice. Oevres spirituelles (SC 56; Paris, 1955), pp. 84-163.
[148] Cf. J.E. Weis-Liebersdorf, Vorwort 5,2; cap. 9 (10,25); cap. 14(16,17); cap. 40(46,5); cap. 71(88,11); cap. 85(116,17).
[149] Cf. ibid.
[150] Cf. ibid.
[151] W. Bousset, op. cit. p. 319; J. Stiglmayr, 'Makarius der Grosse im Lichte der kirchlichen Tradition', ThG1 3 (1911), pp. 274-88. The author refers directly to Origen (ibid. p. 280).
[152] Cf. O. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altkirchlichcn Literatur III, (Freiburg i. Br., 1912), pp. 87-93; also J. Stiglmayr, Pseudo-Makarius und die Aftermystik der Messalianer', ZkTh 49 (1925) pp. 244-260.
[153] Hom. 4 n. 7 (PG 34, 477).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spiritual faculties to the wise virgins in the Gospel. These powers are brought into operation by the temptations of evil forces as well as by the graces of the Holy Spirit.[154] Pseudo-Macarius regards these five spiritual senses as natural faculties, since, according to him, their operations can remain on a purely natural plane, i.e. without grace.[155] In prayer God can enter the soul through all the senses[156] and Christ, who sanctifies a man and fill him with his own divine spirit, bestows new eyes, new ears and a new language upon him.[157] Through sin the eyes of the heart are so blinded that they no longer see the glory of God, which Adam could see before the Fall. Satan has darkened the [102] eyes of the inner man and made his ears deaf. But Christ gives back health to the inner man. A divine light illumines the spiritual eyes, which were previously darkened by sin.[158]

A section from the 4th Homily, relevant to our topic, is found in Simeon Logothetes (Metaphrastes) in the second half of the 10th century;[159] he quotes the text practically verbatim, but adds an explanation which completely alters the meaning.[160] Apparently the Greeks of the period had already entirely forgotten the earlier teaching of the five spiritual senses.[161]

Finally we should note traces of Origen's doctrine to be found here and there outside spiritual writings. Basil the Great, for instance, is clearly referring to Origen in the way he tries to prove the doctrine of the five spiritual senses from scriptural passages. He uses the names of the bodily senses for the powers of the soul.[162] Still more obvious is the influence of Origen upon Gregory of Nyssa. In his exposition of the Song of Songs the theory of the five spiritual faculties is explicitly presented as a teaching of the 'philosophy' of the Song of Songs. Further evidence is here unnecessary.[163]

Traces are also to be found of a doctrine of five spiritual senses in the Latin patristic literature, although it would be hard to prove the influence of Origen in this case. But in this connection mention should at least be made of Augustine and Gregory the Great.[164]

[103] The influence of Origen's ideas clearly makes itself evident in the speculations of the Scholastics. Numerous texts prove the point beyond doubt. A passage from the 3rd homily on Leviticus serves as one of the important patristic sources and is continually quoted in support

---

[154] Hom. 50 n.4 (PG 34, 829 A).
[155] Hom. 4 n. 7 (PG 34, 477).
[156] Hom. 33 n. 1 (PG 34, 741 B).
[157] Hom. 44 n. I (PG 34, 780 A).
[158] Hom. 45 n. 1 (PG 34, 785 D). Hom. 33 n. 4; Hom. 28 n. 4 sq., Hom. 25 n. 10; Hom. 14 n. I and 6 (PG 34, 744C; 712 sq; 673CD; 569 D; 573 C). Cf. W.. Bousset, op. cit. p. 319.
[159] Cf. 0. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur IV (Freiburg i. Br. 1924), p. 89.
[160] De elevatione mentis n. 4 (PG 34,893A).
[161] In the 7th Century Maximus the Confessor matched the five spiritual senses with the powers of the soul which were familiar from other sources; cf. Ambig. liber (PG 91,1248A).
[162] In princ. prov. hom. 12 n. 14 (PG 31, 413-416).
[163] Gregory himself refers to Origen's commentary on the Song of Songs, In Cant. prooem. (PG44, 764AB). In addition there are numerous points of contact between the two commentaries; cf. In Cant. hom. 1(PG44,780CD) Gregory interprets Prov 2:5 in the same way as Origen.
[164] Origen naturally has a certain influence upon Latin thinking through the translations of Jerome and Rufinus. For Augustine, cf. Serm. 159 C. 3 sq. (PL 38,869); the proof of the 'sensus interiores' recalls the use of Scripture in Origen. Cf. also Tract in Joan. 18 c. 5 n. 10(PL 35, 1542); De civ. Dei XI c. 27 n. 2 (PL41,341), Soul. 1 c. 6 n. 12 sq. (PL 32,875 sq.); Conf. X c. 6 and 27 (PL 32,782 sq., 795). Augustine was familiar with De Principiis by Origen (cf. De. Civ. Dei XI c. 23- PL 41,336). The idea of the spiritual senses may come from this source. The comparison of the senses with the five prudent virgins is also common in Augustine. Epist. 187 c. 13 n. 4d (PL 33, 847) is important for scholastic speculation about the five spiritual senses. For Gregory cf. Moral. VI c.33 (PG 75,973 sq.) among other references, where the 'sensus mentis, sensus animi, sensus interni' are discussed. There is also frequent mention of the 'occuli cordis', e.g. Hom. in Ezech. II hom. 1 n. 18 (PL 76,948B).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of the theory of spiritual senses.[165] But the ideas of the Scholastics themselves on the spiritual senses are not here our topic of discussion. The purpose of this investigation was to provide a historical study of Origen's doctrine of the five spiritual senses, without intending to add a great deal about their value and importance.

[165] Cf. In Levit. hom. 3 (GCS 29) 31Z. This text was better known that the rest, since it was to be found in the usual glossary (Lev 7:5). It was used by e.g. Alexander of Hales, Summ. Theol. II inq. IV tract. I sect. II qu. 3 tit. 1 memb. 3c 1 (Quaracchi, 1928, n. 381 sq.), also by Albert the Great, In III sent. dist. 13 A art. 4 (ed. Borgnet t. 28,239); by Bonaventure, In III Sent. dist. 13 dub. c litt. magistri (Quaracchi t. III, 291); by Thomas Aquinas, In III Sent dist. 13, exp. textus (Parma t. VII, 145 sq.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[104]

7

THE DOCTRINE OF THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES' IN THE MIDDLE AGES

THE CONTRIBUTION OF ST BONAVENTURE

We have already investigated the origins of the doctrine of the five spiritual senses.[1] In this essay the historical development of this notion will be pursued further. The fullest account is to be found in the mystical theology of St Bonaventure, so that it is obviously advisable to deal primarily with the work of this doctor of the Church. Earlier and later testimony can and should only be introduced to give the main outline of the history of the idea of the five senses without any attempt being made to treat the matter fully.

In the case of Bonaventure also only those texts will be considered which deal explicitly with the five faculties. Wherever only one or other spiritual sense is mentioned, or there is a purely metaphorical reference to religious experience, the testimony is too uncertain to be relevant for our concern.[2]

We have already drawn attention in a summary way to traces of this doctrine in the works of the Latin fathers, especially in those of Augustine.[3] Despite the brief and general character of these texts, they [105] are important for their influence and confirmation of later scholastic speculation on the matter. For after Origen Augustine was the real master for medieval theology on the subject of the five spiritual faculties. Certainly one has to move to the classic scholastic writers before one comes across any original conception of the spiritual senses after the patristic period. All that was achieved in the time between Origen and Bonaventure was to prevent the doctrine from passing into complete oblivion. Among the 12th century mystical writers one finds only three who mention the teaching, Bernard of Clairvaux, his friend and biographer William of St Thierry and his disciple Alcher of Clairvaux. But even Bernard's remarks do not go beyond the division, allegories and parallels,[4] which remained common in the Middle Ages. He remarks in a sermon: 'Just as the soul bestows sense powers to the body, so the soul of our soul, that is, God himself, furnishes our soul in his own way with five senses. They are nothing else than the various possibilities of loving each corresponding reality: sight is the love of God.' According to this, Bernard basically recognised only a single spiritual sense, which is fundamentally directed to religious phenomena. William of St Thierry is completely dependent upon Bernard and repeats in his work 'De natura et dignitate amoris'[5] the latter's ideas. In his writing only sight has a religious character, even if he does say: 'Through the five spiritual senses the soul is bound to God with the help of love'. At another point in the same work he relates each spiritual sense to a particular period of the history of salvation.[6] This recalls similar notions in Origen.[7] But

[1] Cf. in this volume: 'The spiritual senses according to Origen' and also the fuller French version of the text in RAM 13 (1932), pp. 113-145. The present essay also appeared first in RAM 14 (1933), pp. 263-299 in French. A section was published in German in ZAM 9 (1934), pp. 1-19. The text has been abridged and slightly revised for publication here.
[2] This means that certain passages are excluded which are quoted by other authors in their treatment of the 'spiritual senses'.
[3] On Augustine cf. the essay referred to in footnote 1. Strangely enough Sermo 159, 3-4 (PL 38, 869) was never used in later periods, although it is a clearer proof of Augustine's knowledge of the doctrine of the true spiritual senses (even if not in a mystical sense) than Confess. X 6,27.
[4] Sermo 10 de diversis 2-4 (PL 183, 567-569).
[5] Cf. ibid. cap. 6 n. 15 (PL 184, 390-391); cap. 7 n. 16-20 (PL 184,391-394).
[6] Cf. ibid. cap. 10 n. 26 sqq. (PL 184, 397-399).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

on the whole the statements of Bernard and William are too general in character to admit of a definite conclusion whether the sense intended here is really meant. But they should not be ignored since in the high Middle Ages they frequently serve as authoritative testimony on the question of the spiritual senses.

The contribution of Alcher of Clairvaux on this topic is of greater importance. In his small treatise De spiritu et anima,[8] which in subsequent centuries was generally ascribed to Augustine, he presents [106] a good summary of the earlier psychological tradition.[9] He speaks of the spiritual faculties in two places: 'the senses of the outer man, it must be stressed, are to be found in a similar fashion in the inner man, for spiritual realities are accessible, not to the bodily, but to the spiritual senses'. In the same way as Origen and Augustine before him he attempts to find scriptural proof for the existence of these spiritual faculties.[10]

Other writings influenced the speculation of the classic scholastic authors on the subject of the five spiritual senses in addition to the testimony of the 12th century Latin mystical thought. Mention should be made of the Glossa ordinaria and the quote from Origen it contains through which, in addition to the work of Augustine, an idea originating in Greek mystical writing penetrated the Middle Ages. There was also another basis for the new development of the doctrine which played a part at the time. Peter Lombard stated in one passage[11] in his Sentences that in Christ the head of the mystical body, all the senses are to be found, while the saints only possess the sense of touch. This remark in the manual apparently contradicted the assertion of Origen, which was well known from the Glossa ordinaria. The solution to the problems this caused gave the commentators on the Sentences the chance to discuss the spiritual faculties.

Finally reference should be made to the indisputable influence exercised by the meaning of the word 'sensus' in classical Latin and at later periods. Apart from sense knowledge the word also signified the highest spiritual principles and their operation. In the religious terminology of the 12th century we find a 'sensus spiritualis'[12] in contrast to the 'sensus carnalis', and similarly a 'sensus cordis', a 'sensus animae' and a 'sensus intellectualis'. It was not long before the parallel of 'sensus carnalis' and 'sensus spiritualis' influenced the discussion of the five spiritual senses.

Building upon these elements the medieval scholastics developed the notion of the spiritual senses, showing the greatest respect here, as [107] in other questions, to the tradition of all the ancient concepts, distinctions, etc. But logical thought had already evolved too far for it to be possible to regard everything as acceptable simply on grounds of antiquity. On the other hand such material could not be used without distinctions being drawn. So many ancient notions, which writers did not want just to abandon, came to convey a meaning which could be retained in the period when in themselves they were forgotten; for they no longer expressed something which could not be stated more simply without their use.

The process was similar in the case of the spiritual senses. They were commonly explained in a manner which set their content firmly within the framework of more reliable ideas and rendered them in fact superfluous. Only when direct mystical experience and lively interest in

---

[7] Comm. in Matth. t. XV n. 33 (GCS 40). The same idea also appears later in Gerson.
[8] This work is only attributed to Alcher; the text is in PL 40, 779-832.
[9] Cf. Ueberweg-Geyer, Die patristische und scholastische Philosophie (Graz, 1951), p. 260.
[10] Cf. De spiritu et anima cap. 9 and 49 (PL 40, 785 and 815); Dt 32:39; Ps 33:9; Lk 8:46; 2 Cor 2:15; Rev 2:29.
[11] Cf. the work referred to in footnote 1; III Sent. dist. 13 with reference to Augustine's epist. 187 to Dardanus cap. 13 n. 40 (PL 38, 847).
[12] A few examples: Hugh of St. Victor, Miscellanea 1. I tit. 24; tit. 162 (PL 187, 490 and 559); Richard of St. Victor, Beniamin minor cap. 5 (PL 196, 5), etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

its significance occurred, was any attempt made to find a genuinely meaningful interpretation of mystical theory. This is, however, exactly the case with St Bonaventure.

THE IDEA OF THE HIGH MIDDLE AGES

The doctrine of the five spiritual senses is to be found for the first time in the classical scholastic period in the Summa aurea, the commentary on the Sentences by William of Auxerre.[13] The question is treated in the section dealing with heavenly beatitude. Essentially, however, he is familiar only with one spiritual sense, the intellect, which reaches perfection through faith. But we are entitled even here to speak of five spiritual senses in as much as the intellect can have various acts which are distinguished 'in their working and their enjoyment' although not at all in their essential principle of operation. Evidently the question, known from other sources, of the relation of spiritual senses and powers is summarily resolved in the sense that every other power apart from the intellect and will is denied. But in this way the spiritual senses are still merely different modes of activity of the intellect, which completely envelops God.

The direction in which future speculation about the spiritual senses was to develop remained true to this assumption. William of Auvergne maintains this position.[14] Yet he does not speak directly of [108] these five senses but combines them in a group, 'gustus spiritualis, visus spiritualis, olfactus spiritualis, odoratus spiritualis'. Surprisingly he connects 'gustus spiritualis' with the 'donum sapientiae', and apportions the different senses partly to the intellect and partly to the will:[15] sight and hearing belong to the intellect, while taste and smell are identified with the 'virtutes motivae'.

A little later than these two writers, Alexander of Hales also deals with the five spiritual senses in his Summa. What is novel in his treatment is that he clearly inserts the idea into his whole system of psychology. Having discussed the intellectual powers of the soul, he turns to the act of the power of insight.[16] He states that insight is also called the spiritual sense. There is no doubt here that the spiritual sense is understood as an act and not a power. By analogy to the bodily senses, the intellect (sensus spiritualis) is described as the spiritual sense. However there are five spiritual senses, not because so many different powers exist, but because the intellect can grasp the same object in various ways.[17] At any rate it is clear that such a conception fits a disembodied soul or an angel, which are directed to 'intelligibilia', and would only be hindered by the activity of bodily powers.[18] Evidently it is a question for Alexander of Hales of the idea of the five spiritual senses, but his interpretation is so oversimplified that the notion is in fact superfluous.

A more important contribution to the problem is provided by Albert the Great, for he connects the five spiritual senses with mystical knowledge. This idea does not figure in [13] Summa aurea 1. IV (Paris, 1500) fol. 300-301. William died in 1231 or 1237, cf. LThK X (1965), 1128-1129.

[14] De virtut cap. 11 (Orleans, 1664; reprinted, Frankfurt, 1963), 145-147; De Universo II pars 2 cap. 13, ibid. 856.
[15] De Virtut. op. cit. 146.
[16] Summa pars II q. 69 (Venice, 1675), 115-118; Quaracchi, 1928, t. II inq. IV. tract. 1 s. 2 q. 3 tit. 1, membr. 1-2 n. 368 sqq, pp. 446 sqq. Ibid. q. 70, Quaracchi 1928, m. 3 n. 381 sqq, pp. 459 sqq.
[17] Ibid. pars II q. 70 m. 1 p.118-119 and Quaracchi 1928, m. 3 c. 1 n .381, pp. 459-460; also m. 2 p. 119 and Quaracchi cap. 2 n. 382, 461.
[18] Ibid. m. 3-6, p. 119-120 and Quaracchi 1928, c. 3-6. n. 383-386, S.462- 464; cf. J. A. Endres, 'Die Seelenlehre des Alexander von Hales,' PhJ 1 (1888) pp. 24-55; 203-225; 257-296 (esp. 283-284).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Alexander's thinking at all. In Albert we have to some extent all five spiritual senses,[19] and he also describes them as acts ordered to the intellect and will. Spiritual taste and feeling are expressions of the will, which experiences the blessings [109] of God. To the objection that a spiritual sense is a form of knowledge and therefore must be related to the intellect, Albert gives the perceptive reply that, in addition to the knowledge received from without, there is also knowledge coming from the experience which enables a man to perceive divine reality. For according to a phrase of Pseudo-Denis, a man suffers the divine reality and experiences this in spiritual taste and feeling.[20] The other senses belong to the perception of the truth, i.e. to the intellect.[21] By analogy to the bodily senses the spiritual senses belong metaphorically to the intellect which knows God. The angels also possess them. As far as we can tell, Albert is noteworthy for his view that feeling and taste are of lesser importance than the other senses. This is also the form in which the doctrine appears in the works of Anthony of Padua and Thomas Aquinas.[22]

ST BONAVENTURE

There is a notable literature written on Bonaventure's doctrine of the five spiritual senses.[23] Before embarking on a closer analysis of his [110] ideas, a problem raised by P. Bonnefoy must be resolved. In his view Bonaventure does not always mean the same thing when he speaks of the spiritual senses in different parts of his writings. On the contrary, the same words express different realities which are quite disparate: spiritual perceptions, the principle behind such perceptions, gifts of grace in the order of knowledge and the affections, habits of knowledge, and natural powers. In treating the investigations of other scholars he merely remarks: 'The basic error of these attempts to bring together the various statements on the subject lies in the view that all the passages in which Bonaventure speaks of "sensus

[19] We leave aside here Albert's problem of the extent to which Christ, as head of the mystical body, possesses these senses. i.e. graces, which do not pass to the members of the body. In III Sent. dist. 13 art. 4 (edit. Borgnet) t. 28, p. 240.
[20] Cf. De caelest. hier. cap. 15 S 5 (edit. Borgnet) t. 14, p. 414; all the spiritual senses seem to be described as acts of the intellect, but even here the object of taste and touch is the good.
[21] In III Sent. loc. cit.
[22] De caelest. hier. cap. 15 S 5; cf. edit. of Borgnet, p. 417; it is not easy to see how this fits with the identification of 'cognitio experimentalis' and the senses of touch and taste, for Albert regards the sense of smell as the highest and thus explicitly disregards the order of value among the physical senses. The remarks about angelic faculties are not taken into account here, op. cit. S 5-6 (p. 415-422). Cf. J. Heerinckx, 'Les sources de la théologie mystique de S. Antoine de Padoue', RAM 13 (1932), p. 239 and idem, 'S. Antonius Pataviensis auctor mysticus,' Antonianum 7 (1932), p. 69 sqq. On Thomas Aquinas, in III Sent dist. 13 expos. (ed. Parma) t. VII p. 145-146; In Philipp. cap. 21. 2 ibid. p. 513; In Psalm. 33 n. 9 ibid. t. XIV p. 266.
[23] Cf. E. Longpré, 'la théologie mystique de S. Bonaventure', AFrH 14 (1921) esp. 51-53; idem, 'Bonaventure', DSAM I, 1768-1843; Fr. Andres, Die Stufen der Contemplatio in Bonaventure Itinerarium (Munster 1921); R. Carton, L'expérience mystique de l'illumination interieure chez Roger Bacon (Paris, 1924), esp. pp. 242-245; B. Rosenmoeller, Religiöse Erkenntnis nach Bonaventura (Munster, 1925), passim; D. Dobbins, Franciscan Mysticism (New York, 1926), esp. pp. 51 sq; J. M. Bissen, Les degrés de la contemplation (Paris, 1928/30); J. Bonnefoy, Le Saint-Esprit et ses dons selon S. Bonaventure (Paris, 1929); Et. Gilson, The Philosophy of St. Bonaventure (London, 1938): St. Grünewald, Franziskanische Mystik (Munich, 1932); J. Bonnefoy, Une somme bonaventurienne de théologie mystique (Paris, 1934); H. Koenig, De inhabitatione Spiritus Sancti (Mundelein 1934); St. Grünewald, 'Zur Mystik des hl. Bonaventura', ZAM 9 (1934), 124-142; 219-232 (a discussion of our study); F. Beauchemin, Le savoir au service de l'amour. (Paris, 1935); F. Imle, Das geistliche Leben nach der Lehre des hl. Bonaventura (Werl, 1939); J. Friederichs, Die Theologie als spekulative und praktische Wissenschaft nach Bonaventura und Thomas von Aquin (Bonn 1940); R. Guardini, Systembildende Elemente in der Theologie Bonaventuras (Leiden, 1964); A. Elsässer, Christus der Lehrer des Sittlichen (Munich, 1968). The works of Bonaventure are quoted from the 10 volume critical edition of Quaracchi (1882-1902).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spiritualis" deal with one and the same phenomenon'.[24] The search for 'a synthesis' is for him anachronistic. But in our opinion P. Bonnefoy is wrong. One must start with the clear statements of Bonaventure that the spiritual senses are acts and not new powers.[25] Here he is saying nothing new and is not contradicting, pace Bonnefoy, any earlier mystical tradition.[26] These acts touch on the intellect and will, which are perfected by three operations: by means of the virtues, the gifts of grace and the blessings of beatitude. If one sticks to this line of thought, which presents no internal contradiction, then there is no reason to interpret the different texts on the spiritual senses as though they referred to quite disparate phenomena.[27] Otherwise one must allow with P. [111] Bonnefoy that in a single text the same word can be used with completely different meanings, with the result that no coherent thought can be obtained from it.[28]

What is the nature of Bonaventure's doctrine? Surprisingly he does not include it in his treatment of psychology but refers to in connection with grace. This already clarifies to some extent the mystical character of the spiritual senses.

For Bonaventure the soul in a state of grace has three modes of operation: through the virtues, the gifts of the Holy Spirit and the blessings of beatitude.[29] By these means the powers of the soul are corrected (habitus virtutum, potentiae rectificantur); their activity is made easier, they develop and become stronger (habitus donorum, potentiae expediuntur); finally they are brought to the perfection which a man can achieve on earth (habitus beatitudinum, potentiae perficiuntur). Although these three modes of operation are already present in the soul in a state of grace, they do not have their full effect at the same moment;[30] rather each of them corresponds to one of the three stages of the spiritual life: beginning (purification), development (enlightenment) and perfection.[31] The perfect man enjoys the sevenfold gifts of the blessings of beatitude and reaches the state of profound peace. But through the gift of wisdom love is also made easier, which is a preparation for the blessings of peace and finds its fulfilment in it.[32] When the soul has acquired such peace, then it experiences of necessity spiritual joy, the fruits of the Holy Spirit. At this point a man is on the threshold of contemplation, which is exercised precisely in the acts of the spiritual senses. Consequently it is a question here not of new modifications or powers but rather of acts, that is, applications of [112] the modifications which already have names to describe them in contemplation.[33]

---

[24] J. Bonnefoy, Le Saint-Esprit et ses dons Selon S. Bonaventure (Paris, 1929), p. 214.
[25] Ibid. p. 212. Cf. In III Sent dist. 34 pars 1 art. 1 (T. III 7376).
[26] Ibid. p. 214. The long prevalent error that Poulain regards the spiritual senses as new powers of the soul seems ineradicable, although he himself expressly affirms the opposite; cf. Katholik 92 (1912), p. 291.
[27] Here it is a question purely of 'sensus stricte acceptus' (III Sent dist. 13 dub. T. III 291 b). In this sense the spiritual sense in Bonaventure is one-sided. The word 'sensus' can in itself mean a new power, so that the expressions of Bonaventure in the context of the 'sensus spiritualis' can often suggest the idea of a power. But these ideas lose nothing of their force if one sees in them the perception of the sense rather than the sense itself; the corresponding statements are quite intelligible if they are given this meaning. The acts can have their principle either in the intellect or in the will. The soul in possession of the three theological virtues regains the acts of experiential perception, since it has gained the theological virtues which form the principle of their operation. Bonaventure treats the senses as perceptions and so as acts. In summary we maintain that a 'comprehensive viewpoint' can be found in the texts of Bonaventure, in the sense that he is always dealing with acts of the soul which is perfected by the threefold modification of the virtues. This remains valid even in cases when the actual form of words points rather to powers.
[28] J. Bonnefoy, Le Saint-Esprit et ses dons . . . (Paris, 1929) pp. 210 and 212.
[29] Cf. Breviloquium V 6 and III Sent dist. 34 art. 1 q. 1 (edit. Quaracchi t. V 285 sq. and III 735 sq.)
[30] III Sent dist. 34 art. 1 q. 2 (III 739 sq.)
[31] Ibid. 1. 3 (III 7426); Brevil. V 6 (V 256 ab).
[32] Brevil. V 5-6 (V 2576-2596).
[33] Brevil. V 6 (259-260) and III Sent dist. 34 art. 1 q. 1 (III 7376); Rosenmoeller does not bring out clearly the act quality of the senses in Bonaventure. It was Bonaventure, and not post-Tridentine Scholasticism, who was

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A closer examination of the principles of these acts, that is, of the spiritual senses, leads to the same conclusion as that drawn by P. Bonnefoy, namely that the operation of the highest principles, the blessings of beatitude, is involved.[34] But the result for contemplation is that, for Bonaventure in contrast to modern mystical theology, the gifts of the Holy Spirit are of secondary importance. This is clearly stated in Bonaventure and in the Breviloquium comes first in the arrangement of the contents. But Bonaventure's doctrine of the blessings of beatitude is too little known to allow one to gain from it a deeper understanding of his thinking on all the spiritual senses.[35]

The two other modifications of the soul, the virtues and the gifts of grace, are so closely connected to contemplation that they also provide a real deepening of the spiritual senses. One should take note of the operation of the blessings of beatitude in the case of some of the senses, and so be able to work out what is the specific character of the sense in question. The two ultimate principles in the treatment of these senses are intellect and will; given Bonaventure's view of the relationship of these two powers of the soul,[36] it is hardly surprising that he can refer the same operation to two faculties. It is natural for him to regard the five spiritual senses as acts both of the intellect and of the will.[37] But just as the various operations relate in a different way to the intellect and the will according to their own particular character, so do the spiritual senses.

Spiritual sight and hearing are closely associated to the intellect; [113] taste, smell and touch relate rather to the will. This also determines the way they are connected to the theological virtues. Thus faith is first of all rooted in the intellect; from faith proceed spiritual sight and hearing[38] as soon as the corresponding operation of gifts and blessings have their effect. Hope, and especially love, are rooted in the will, from which the spiritual sense of smell and the higher senses, the taste and touch of love, proceed.[39] It is to be remarked at this point that the gift of understanding and the blessing of purity of heart correspond to the virtue of faith, while the gift of wisdom and the blessing of peace[40] are ordered to the virtue of love. As acts, the spiritual senses arise from three determinations of the soul; spiritual sight from faith, the gift of understanding and the blessing of purity of heart; taste and touch from the virtue of love, the gift of wisdom and the blessing of peace. Thus the principles of the spiritual acts of contemplation, i.e. the spiritual senses, are worked out as far as possible.

THE OBJECT OF KNOWLEDGE OF THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES'

---

the first to overcome the oversimplified schema of Aristotle, here intelligence, there will, in the case of the spiritual senses.

[34] J. Bonnefoy, op. cit. pp. 97-98. The exact nature of the contemplation whose acts are constituted by the spiritual senses requires further study.

[35] It is well known that in Bonaventure the theological virtue of hope is connected with the gift of counsel, as it is in another aspect with strength and fear. In addition, hope has to do with the spiritual sense of smell.

[36] Cf. I Sent. dist. 3 pars 2 art. 1 q. 2 (I 84-87); II Sent dist. 24 pars 1 art. 2 q. 1(II 560); III Sent dist. 27 art. 1 q. 1 (III 591), where Rosenmoeller speaks of a 'mutua circumincessio' of the powers of the soul; cf. Rosenmoeller, op. cit. (bibl.)

[37] III Sent dist. 13 dub. 1 (III 292a).

[38] Cf. III Sent dist. 23 and 27 (III 475 sq. and III 604b); also Itin. cap. 4 n. 3 (V 306b). The presence and effectiveness of the other two series of operations are implicitly assumed here. The spiritual senses are not identical here with the 'habitus', as Bonnefoy, op. cit. p. 313, believes. The account in the Itinerarium corresponds closely to that of the Breviloquium where these senses are explicitly described as acts (V 258b).

[39] III Sent dist. 26 art. 2 q. 5 (III 579 sq.) and Itin. cap. 4 n. 3 (V 3066).

[40] III Sent dist. 34 pars 1 art. 2 q. 1 (III 744b); Brevil. V 5 (V 257b); ibid. V 6 (V 259b); de Donis Sp. S. coll. 2 n. 3 (V 463a).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In a general way Bonaventure describes the object of the spiritual senses when he speaks of the 'perceptiones mentales circa veritatem contemplandam' or the 'usus gratiae interior respectu ipsius Dei', or even of the 'usus spiritualium speculationum'.[41] But to avoid misinterpreting Bonaventure's view point, we must be careful about these descriptions for two reasons. First it cannot be deduced from these accounts that the 'contemplatio' and 'speculatio' which are proper to a man on his long journey from sense perception to ecstasy are realised by the spiritual senses, or, in other words, that these acts are simply spiritual senses in Bonaventure's use of the term.[42] Such a conclusion [114] runs counter to the fact that the doctor of the Church regards the spiritual senses as acts which are concerned with the stages of perfection and with the acquisition of the highest 'habitus' of the blessings of beatitude.[43] Secondly one should not assume from this description that these gifts possess a definite intellectual stamp, for some of them belong primarily to the realm of the affections. In summary we may say that the account describes the general manner of their operation rather than a series of exact distinctions. It implies that as acts of contemplation the spiritual senses simply have God as their primary object grasped as a present reality, without providing a more precise analysis.[44]

Some of the texts in Bonaventure give a clearer picture of the object of the spiritual senses, particularly when the perception of a particular phenomenon is attributed to a given sense.[45] These passages will be referred to frequently in what follows. A comparison between the two main passages from the Breviloquium and Itinerarium points to Christ as the reality grasped by the spiritual senses, the 'verbum increatum, inspiratum, incarnatum'.[46] Spiritual hearing grasps the 'verbum increatum', so that the soul hears its voice and highest harmony. Spiritual sight perceives the Word, because the soul is dazzled by its light and brilliant beauty. The spiritual sense of smell perceives the 'verbum inspiratum' when the soul experiences the lofty aroma of the Word. Spiritual taste savours the 'verbum increatum' when it enjoys [115] the sublime delight of its sweetness. The spiritual sense of touch grasps the 'verbum incarnatum' and its powerful grace.[47] This description of the object of the spiritual senses undeniably possesses both depth and beauty, but it must also be admitted that the attempt to discover a special object for every sense, a 'ratio' through which it perceives the Word, is rather forced. Even though Bonaventure's dialectical skill and his ingenuity in drawing distinctions can cope with this difficulty, the impression remains that, despite the parallels with the physical senses and their object (splendor, harmonia, fragrantia, dulcedo, suavitas), a genuinely

[41] Brevil. V 6 (V 260d); III Sent dist. 13 dub. 1 (III 291b); Brevil. V 6 (V 258b).
[42] This is the view of R. Carton, op. cit. pp. 245-246; 249-250. In Brevil. V 6 (V 260a) the sentence 'quae quidem contemplation . . . Sed consummatur in gloria sempiterna' must be understood as an additional comment to the foregoing 'circa veritatem contemplandam'. But this does not allow one to say that the spiritual senses can be referred as intellectual acts of perception to every possible object of the 'speculation' which is then described.
[43] Brevil. V 6 (V 258b). Here contemplation must be taken in the strict sense. That this operation signifies the highest level of perfection is clear from II Sent dist. 34 pars 1 art. 1 q. 1 (III 737a); ibid. dist. 36 q. 2 (III 795b); IV Sent dist. 1 pars 1 q. 6 (IV 28b); Brevit. V 4 (V 256a-b). Of course, the senses can be perfect in different ways and so correspondingly can the acts of contemplation.
[44] Cf. R. Carton, op. cit. p. 246; the assertion that God is the principal object of the senses must be brought into harmony with another idea of the senses whereby they are the perception of 'spiritualis refectio', i.e. of created grace. Cf. III Sent (III 738a).
[45] Brevil. V 6 (V 259b); Itin. cap. 4 n. 3 (V 306b); cf. Coll. in Hexaem. III n. 22 (V 347a); Sermo 9 in Epiphan. (IX 166b-167a). These texts were used by the Centiloquium, Hugh of Strasburg, Rudolf of Biberach, Peter of Ailly, Nadal, Polanco; vide infra.
[46] In Bonaventure e.g. Coll. in Hexaem. IX n. 1-4 (V 372-373).
[47] For the order of the senses we follow the Itinerarium which assesses them according to the principles from which they originate (will higher than intellect); cf. III Sent dist. 13 dub. 1 (III 292 a). In the Brevil the sense of taste includes 'sapientia . . . comprehendens . . . verbum et splendorem.'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

penetrating analysis of the specific character of the spiritual gifts as acts of contemplation has not been achieved. From another point of view, however, one can go further, but only for sight, touch and spiritual taste.[48]

Putting the various texts together one can see that spiritual sight is indebted to the act of faith, the gift of understanding and the blessing of purity of heart, in so far as we can refer to a spiritual sight which belongs in a general way to the five senses, although this only applies when the highest mode of operation, purity of heart, is at work. To these three modes of operation there correspond according to Bonaventure three stages of the supernatural knowledge of God[49] and he connects them explicitly with the acts of these three modes of operation. Thus it follows that the act of the third and highest stage of divine knowledge is nothing other than the spiritual sense of sight, the act of purity of heart.[50] The three stages are characterised as follows: the first consists in the simple acceptance of revealed truth in virtue of faith and understanding, in the measure that such truth allows itself to be discovered in the 'traces' of the mysterious divine life found in material things. The second stage bestows a deeper understanding of these mysteries according to their internal principles, in as much as they can be reached by the gift of understanding through consideration of the 'likenesses' and 'images' of God existing in spiritual creation.[51] But it is the third stage which alone is of particular interest [116] here; this consists in the simple vision (simplex contuitus) which is reserved to purity of heart, which 'alone is permitted to gaze upon God'.[52] For an account of the 'simplex contuitus' we need only follow P. Bonnefoy.[53] It involves a vision of the first truth which is immutable, and of its eternal ideas which form the ultimate principles of all creation. This 'contuitus' finds its internal unity in our becoming aware of the direct operation of eternal truth upon our own spirit. Of course this simple vision of God is not a direct perception of the divine essence free of any intermediary. Such a thing would be an impossible occurrence in the mystical realm in this life, if one leaves aside the extraordinarily rare case of 'raptus'. 'Non videtur in sua essentia sed in aliquo effectu interiori cognoscitur.'[54] Thus the 'contuitus simplex' is 'an infallible fore-knowledge of the eternal foundations which comes through particular images bestowed upon our spirit.'[55]

With regard to the highest act of the will, the sense of taste corresponds to that of sight. Although it is far from easy to determine exactly where Bonaventure locates spiritual taste in the overall framework of his mystical theology, one can obtain a perfectly correct idea of its character by saying that it is an appreciation by the affections of the influence of created divine grace with regard to the direct experience of God. Taste is for the will what sight is for the understanding. Spiritual taste consists in 'suscipere ab ipso (Deo) delectationes'.[56] Certainly Bonaventure states quite categorically that taste is less perfect than feeling or touch which, as will be shown shortly, signify the direct union of love with God through ecstasy. Consequently taste can only be the direct, affective experience of created salvation, a created 'dulcedo', which allows God to be grasped as the principle of this 'dulcedo'. Bonaventure explains this experience as the essence of taste,[57] yet it also seems to be the stage of mystical [48] Cf. De reduct. artium ad Theol. n. 10 (V 322b); another division in, Sermo 14 in Epiphan. (IX 168b-169a).

[49] For the following, Cf. J. Bonnefoy, op. cit. pp. 180 sq.
[50] Ibid. p. 191.
[51] III Sent dist. 34 and 35 (III 737a and 778f); Brevil. V 4 (V 256b).
[52] III Sent dist. 35 q. 3 (III 778a).
[53] Cf. J. Bonnefoy, op. cit. pp. 182-183.
[54] II Sent. dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (II 544).
[55] J. Bonnefoy, op. cit. p. 183; For the philosophical angle, cf. B. A. Luyckx, Die Erkenntnislehre Bonaventuras (Munster, 1923) pp. 205 sq.
[56] Itin. cap. 4 n. 3 (V 306b).
[57] Brevil. V 6 (V 259b).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

development which proceeds the ecstatic union of love.[58] In summary we may conclude from all these remarks that spiritual taste appears to [117] be the act of the will which can be directly felt with complete fulfilment.[59]

The 'simplex contuitus', vision, is the final goal of human understanding on earth, and yet it is not the last step of mystical progress or the highest form of contemplation in this world. For 'contuitus' only offers, according to Bonaventure, a 'contemplatio mediocris' in contrast to 'contemplatio perfecta', the 'excessus ecstatici'.[60] The most fundamental reason for this distinction is that spiritual sight, the act of the blessing of purity of heart, is not direct union with God but rather knowledge 'in interiori effectu'. The 'excessus ecstaticus' is, by contrast, the experience of the will, the union with God of a more direct love. Its act is 'spiritual touch', the highest spiritual sense. Ecstasy and spiritual touch are one and the same.

ECSTASY[61]

How is the nature of ecstasy to be understood in contrast to mystical knowledge 'in effectu interiori', and how is the relationship of spiritual touch to ecstasy to be interpreted?

In the first place ecstasy is to be distinguished from 'raptus',[62] which is an extraordinary occurrence. The latter is a direct, clear vision of God through the intellect, and is a foretaste of the beatific vision as an 'actus gloriae'.[63] This is a privileged and exceptional state which Bonaventure thinks, for instance, St Paul enjoyed, but not Moses.[64] Thus 'raptus' and ecstasy should be clearly distinguished, as in fact Bonaventure explicitly does. For him ecstasy is not extraordinary and he attributes qualities to it which 'raptus' cannot possess.[65]

[118] As was indicated above, ecstasy is set apart not only from 'raptus' but also from a knowledge of God which is mediated by the created effects of grace. In this regard we are essentially at variance with the interpretation of Longprés and Grünewald[66] and in basic agreement with Gilson and Rosenmoeller.[67] It is, however, impossible here to investigate more closely the essence of 'cognoscere Deum in effectu interiori', since this would demand clarification of the question whether this stage of knowledge of God in Bonaventure is a mystical phenomenon as this is currently understood.[68] Here it is sufficient to stand by the assertion; 'Non videtur (Deus) in sua essentia sed in aliquo effectu interiori cognoscitur'.[69] Ecstasy, on the contrary, is to be sharply distinguished from intellectual experience of the

---

[58] Serm 1 in Sab. sancto n. 3 (IX 269a). Ecstasy proper here corresponds to 'amplexus'.
[59] Cf. III Sent. dist. 34 pars 1 art. 1 q. 1 (III 738a).
[60] Coll. 20 in Hexaem. n. 9 and 10 (V 427a); cf. .J. Bonnefoy, op. cit. p. l95.
[61] The basis of what follows is to be found in the section of this study already published in an expanded form under the title, 'Der Begriff der ecstasis bei Bonaventura' in ZAM 9 (1934), pp. 1-19. Since the original version was too long, it has been shortened for publication here.
[62] In addition to the concept 'ecstasy', the expressions 'excessus mentalis', 'amplexus', 'excessus anogogici', 'amor ecstaticus' and 'anagogica unitio' are also used in Bonaventure to refer to mystical experience.
[63] Cf. Coll. 3 in Hexaem. n. 30 (V 347b-348a) and II Sent. dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (II 544b).
[64] II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (II 544b); III Sent dist. 35 q. 1 (III 774b).
[65] For Bonaventure ecstasy is 'docta ignorantia', 'caligo', 'ignote ascendere', etc. This does not correspond to 'raptus', which is 'actus gloriae'; cf. II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (II 546a).
[66] Cf. E. Longpré, La théologie mystique de S. Bonaventure (Florence, 1921) and St. Grünewald, Franziskanische Mystik (Munich, 1932).
[67] Et. Gilson, The Philosophy of St. Bonaventure (London, 1938) and B. Rosenmoeller, Religiöse Erkenntnis nach Bonaventura (Munster, 1925).
[68] Grünewald assumes a mystical quality for 'cognoscere in effectu gratiae'; i.e. ecstasy is 'cognoscere in effectu gratiae' and yet mystical. He makes use of the texts accordingly.
[69] II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (III 544b). This text is rightly quoted to exclude a direct intellectual vision of God. But this does not necessarily mean the exclusion of all direct union of love with God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

created effects of grace, even of a mystical kind, since it is the direct experience of God, direct in the proper ontological sense, and not only in the sense that the experience of the created effects of grace (which are, therefore, recognised) allows a practically direct knowledge of God as their underlying cause (in the form of a 'medium in quo'). Bonaventure makes the distinction quite clear: 'Cognitio viae[70] multos habet gradus; cognoscitur enim Deus in vestigio, cognoscitur in imagine, cognoscitur et in effectu gratiae, cognoscitur etiam per intimam unionem iuxta quod dicit Apostolus: Qui adhaeret Deo unus spiritus est. Et haec cognitio est excellentissima, quam docet Dionysius quae est in ecstatico amore et elevat supra cognitionem fidei secundum statum communem.'[71] Here a clear separation is made between 'cognoscere in effectu gratiae' and 'cognitio per intimam unionem', which represent different degrees of knowledge of God. The higher of the two, which is not achieved through the medium of the operations of grace, is described as a knowledge through 'intima unio', which consists [119] in ecstatic love and is the one taught by Denis. It is not hard from this text to understand the connection between knowledge of God, 'unio' and ecstatic love: ecstatic love (an act of the will) effects union with God, which permits an experience of God that surpasses any in which God is perceived in the created operations of grace. The experience of God contained in 'intima unio' is not 'raptus'.[72] For the latter is, according to Bonaventure, not a 'cognitio viae'. Furthermore it would be hard to understand why 'raptus' should be characterised as ecstatic love, whereas in other places ecstasy is described as 'amor ecstaticus' and as 'intima unio'.[73] Moreover the background reference to the teaching of Denis is elsewhere not given for 'raptus' but for 'ecstasis', and in exactly those passages where the latter is plainly distinguished from 'raptus'.[74] In consequence it is ecstasy which in III Sent. dist. 24 dub. IV is clearly distinguished from 'cognoscere in effectu gratiae' as the higher stage.[75]

Another text makes it clear that, far from treating ecstasy as a form of knowledge of God which is mediated by the created operation of grace, we should rather regard it as the direct experience of God in the proper sense of the term, that is, without any intermediate perception: 'Est cognoscere Deum in se et in suo effectu. Est cognoscere Deum in effectu, hoc est videre per speculum et hoc dupliciter: aut per speculum lucidum et oculum et sic videbat primus homo ante lapsum; aut per speculum obscuratum et sic videmus nos modo . . . Alio modo cognoscitur Deus in se; et hoc dupliciter: aut clare et hic modo a solo Filio et a beatis; alio modo in caligine, sicut Beatus Dionysius de Mystica theologia. Et sic vidit Moyses et sublimiter contemplantes, in quorum aspectu nulla figitur imago creaturae. Et tunc revera magis sentiunt quam cognoscant.'[76]

According to Bonaventure, therefore, we should assume a 'cognoscere' or better a 'sentire' of God which is a direct process ('in se') without any intermediary means of perception (not 'in effectu'). This [120] experience is to be distinguished both from the knowledge of Adam[77] in paradise and from the 'visio beatifica'. It is naturally true that this 'sentire Deum in Se' is contrasted with 'cognoscere in effectu', and appears beside 'visio' as a direct experience of [70] 'Viae' is stressed in contrast to 'patriae' according to the context. 'Raptus' cannot be meant here.

[71] III Sent dist. 24 (III 531b).
[72] According to Bonaventure 'raptus' is not a 'cognitio viae'. Consequently, he does not need to mention it in this list.
[73] Coll. 2 in Hexaem. n. 29 (V 341a).
[74] II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (II 544b).
[75] Longpré wrongly appeals to this passage to prove that even ecstasy is a 'cognoscere in effectu gratiae'. But all that is stated is that ecstasy is not 'conspicere Deum in claritate suae essentiae'.
[76] Coll. in Jona. I n. 43 (IV 255b-256a).
[77] The knowledge of Adam in the garden of Eden is for Bonaventure the standard of mystical experience, in so far as it is an intellectual experience of God. Thus, II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 speaks without distinction of Adam's knowledge and of the mystical knowledge of the intellect.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God. It is not a matter of a psychological impression of something which in fact is a mediated knowledge of God. Rather we are dealing here with a directness which is also characteristic of the beatific vision. And yet in Bonaventure's view there must also be an essential (that is, qualitative and not merely quantitative) difference between ecstasy and the beatific vision. This is the reason why he speaks of 'sentire' rather than 'cognoscere', that is, of experience rather than knowledge. This remark of Bonaventure should make us wary of putting too much weight on expressions such as 'knowledge', etc. used in his account of 'ecstasy'. It is a question of a mysterious experience, not of intellectual knowledge.[78]

This 'feeling God himself' is not 'raptus' but ecstasy, that is, the highest (normal) mystical experience, which Bonaventure describes in II Sent. dist. 23 a.2 q.3. The text runs as follows: 'Concedo tamen nihilominus quod oculi aspectus in Deum figi potest ita quod ad nihil aliud adspiciat, attamen non perspiciet vel videbit ipsius lucis claritatem, immo potius elevabitur in caliginem, et ad hanc cognitionem elevabitur per omnium ablactionem, sicut dicit Dionysius in libro de Mystica theologia, et vocat istam cognitionem doctam ignorantiam. Haec est, in qua mirabiliter inflammatur affectio, sicut eis patet qui aliquoties consueverunt ad anagogicos elevari excessus.' It is generally agreed that this description refers to ecstasy and this is clear from the account itself. For 'raptus' is plainly distinguished from this mystical experience by the following phrase: 'Quod si Deus aliquid ultra faciet, hoc privilegium est speciale, non legis communis'. 'In caligine sentire Deum in se' is identical with ecstasy, as we can see from a comparison with In Joan. I n.43:

[121]

II Sent.	In Joan. I n.43
a) oculi adspectus in Deum figi potest ita quod ad nihil aliud adspiciat	a) in quorum adspectu nulla figitur imago creaturae
b) in caliginem	b) in caligine
c) sicut Dionysius dicit in libro de Mystica theologia	c) sicut Dionysius dicit de Mystica theologia
d) mirabiliter inflammatur affectio	d) magis sentiunt quam cognoscant

If one recalls that in II Sent. ecstasy 'in caliginem' is to be distinguished from 'raptus' and from 'visio', and that it also appears in In Joan. I n.43 where 'in quorum adspectu nulla figitur imago creaturae' is only a variant upon 'sentire Deum in Se', then there can be no doubt of the identity of the experience described in these two passages. Similarly it is clear that this experience is different both from 'raptus' and from the mediated knowledge of God. Consequently the reference must be here to ecstasy, regarded as an ontologically direct experience of God.

The attempt has been made to explain the crucial text from In Joan. I n.43 by means of 'raptus'[79] but this attempt cannot be regarded as successful. For if one wanted to reconcile 'raptus' at this point with the remark in John's Gospel (1:18) that no man has seen God, it would not be necessary falsely to assert that 'raptus' was 'in caligine' (how is that possible, since it is 'actus gloriae'?) Instead one would merely have had to repeat that 'raptus' is an experience of those who enjoy what is a special privilege for 'men on the way', to whom the assertion of John 1:18 applies. For these and other reasons the text must be dealing with ecstasy, an immediate experience of God.

[78] This distinction between 'sentire' and 'cognoscere' shows where the solution to the problem lies of how there can be a direct experience of God which is not the 'visio beatifica'. On this level of knowledge in the broadest sense, Bonaventure characterises the experience of ecstasy as 'sentire'. In consequence, he ascribes it to the 'affectus' alone. At the same time, he distinguishes it from 'videre', the term he uses to describe 'visio' and 'raptus' (II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3).

[79] Cf. St. Grünewald, op. cit. p. 88, note 199; also p. 43, note 57.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is not contradicted by the text from the commentary on the Sentences, although this passage is normally regarded as the classic proof for the view that even in ecstasy God is only grasped by means of the recognition of the created operations of grace. To interpret this text correctly, one need only hold that Bonaventure wished to exclude direct, intellectual[80] vision of God on this earth, for such vision would, at most, be quantitatively different from the beatific vision. If one is looking for a direct or indirect understanding of God, then there is no need to speak of ecstasy, since it is not relevant to the question of what [122] kind of intellectual vision of God was possessed by Adam. A more precise understanding of ecstasy reveals a qualitative difference from the beatific vision, since it consists essentially and exclusively in an experience of God in the 'apex affectus'.[81] Ecstasy does not figure in the question posed in this text, and is only mentioned by Bonaventure in a couple of asides.

Bonaventure shows why even a weaker form of the beatific vision is not to be attributed to Adam: the highest level of normal perception on earth is 'ignote ascendere' according to Dens. Vision itself, even of a weaker type, would be something more perfect in comparison with this. Therefore Adam's intellectual knowledge of God can only be a 'cognoscere in effectu interiori', which is definitely to be distinguished from 'ignote ascendere'.[82] Bonaventure summarises his point of view by saying that it is only glory, 'in qua non solum aspeceret divinum effectum, sed etiam ipsum vultum desideratum . . . Concedo tamen nihilominus quod oculi adspectus in Deum figi potest ita quod ad nihil aliud adspiciat, attamen . . .'.[83] The qualification makes the contrast mentioned above unmistakably clear: Bonaventure evidently presumes that 'docta ignorantia' is a direct experience of God, while denying that it is a 'vision of the brightness of the light itself'. On the other hand, this knowledge is not mediated by the created effects of grace; that is to say, ecstasy has a quite specific quality. This is confirmed with still greater clarity by a more precise investigation of the nature of ecstasy. One merely has to show that ecstasy is an act of the 'apex affectus', while 'visio' is primarily an act of the intellect. Thus Bonaventure does not fall back into the previously rejected notion that only a quantitative difference of clarity obtains between earthly mysticism and the vision of the blessed.[84] Attempts to weaken the directness of the ecstatic experience of God as taught by Bonaventure would only involve one in contradictions.[85] Ecstasy, however, also forms a contrast to the knowledge of God bestowed by the operations of grace.[86]

[123] How can this direct experience of God be made comprehensible? As we said above, ecstasy is the direct union of the soul with God, and this contact is realised essentially and exclusively in the 'apex affectus', that is, in an affectivity which is higher and more interior than the intellect.[87] In the experience of the direct spiritual union with God in the highest point of the soul every activity of the intellect as such is excluded. The reason for this is that the innermost part of man lies beyond the intellect.[88] Here God dwells exclusively, which [80] A 'visio intellectualis' (II 546a), in which God is directly 'intellectui praesens', means a more or less clear vision of God.

[81] As 'sentire Deum in se', Bonaventure can set it together with the 'visio beatifica' over against 'cognoscere in effectu' (cf. Coll. in Jona. I n. 43).
[82] II Sent dist. 23 art. 2 q. 3 (II 544b and 546a).
[83] Ibid.
[84] Ibid. (II 544a).
[85] Cf. St. Grünewald, op. cit. pp. 87-110.
[86] Our interpretation agrees with that of Gilson; similarly Rosenmoeller, op. cit. pp. 185 sqq. 'Unmittelbarkeit der Gotteserfassung der Ekstase.'
[87] Itin. cap. 7 n. 4 (V 3126); Coll. 2 in Hexaem. n. 30 (V 341b); Serm. 4 in Epiph. (IX 162b); cf. also Brevil. V 6 (V 260a); III Sent dist. 24 dub IV (III 531b).
[88] Cf. Coll. 2 in Hexaem. n. 29-31 (V 341 a/b).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

means that no one else can touch this highest point of the spirit,[89] the innermost depths of a man. A man may, however, enter the innermost part of his spirit through ecstatic union and here he reaches the highest point of his soul. The whole mystical enterprise up to this point was nothing other than the gradual return of a man to the interior domain, as ascent to the highest point of the soul. Because this can only be reached in 'affectivity', a man must leave behind him all intellectual activity at a certain point on his mystical path on this earth.[90] This assertion should not be qualified in the sense that what is proposed is in fact an imperfect act of knowledge, such as is always required by a finite intellect in relation to the infinite. The truth is rather that ecstasy does not involve the intellect at all. This explains why mystical union is an entry into darkness, into a divine obscurity. This 'night' and the exclusion of the intellect are essential to ecstasy, since it is not a weaker form of direct intellectual vision of God, for this only realises its fulfilment (excessus), that is direct contact with the essence of God,[91] in the beatific vision (and in 'raptus'). Ecstasy, by contrast, is the obscure experience of the direct union of love with God. Thus the difference from 'visio' is qualitative and not merely quantitative.

How are we to conceive the direct experience of a union of love? The principle that nothing can be willed which is not first known raises a notable difficulty here. According to Bonaventure this union [124] can and must be experienced in some real way. Admittedly it is of a peculiar kind[92] compared with other forms of knowledge, but what is particularly obscure is how to interpret it except as intellectual knowledge. This is precisely what Bonaventure seeks to do. He did not explicitly address himself to this problem, but he could have offered the following reflections which would fit in with his basic line of argument. In every act of will and of love the object is not already grasped by the will in virtue of its intentional presence to the intellect; rather it must enter the will on its own account.[93] The direct ecstatic union of love is realised without the assistance of the intellect; therefore the reality of God's own essence must be the 'informing object' of the will (more precisely of the 'affections') in its innermost being. For in ecstasy the 'apex affectus' is 'transformed'[94] completely into God. In Bonaventure's view an object can under certain conditions be perceived without the creation of a rational representation to make perception possible, because the object is itself present as a principle of perception. Thus in our case it happens that the 'apex affectus', in which God is present, is not merely a capacity of the same order as the intellect. As the highest and most interior element in the soul it belongs to a deeper level of reality than the intellect and all that is related to it in the same order of being and can be characterised as will or normal 'affection'. Now this highest point of the soul (according to the genuine Franciscan model) bears a closer resemblance to the will than to the intellect.[95]

---

[89] De myst. Trinit. q. 1 art. 1 fund. 10 (V 46a); II sent dist. 8 pars 2 q. 2 (II 226/7); I sent dist. 1 art. 3 q. 2 (I 41a), and de scientia Christi q. 4 fund. 31 (V 20b).

[90] III Sent dist. 35 1. 3 (III 779b); cf. ibid. dist. 31 art. 1 q. 1(III 689a); coll. 2 in Hexaem n. 32 (V 342a); ibid. 20 in Hexaem n. 11 (V 427a).

[91] Itin. cap. 7 n.4 (V 312b); coll. 2 in Hexaem n. 30 (V 341b); de scientia Christi q.7 (V 40 sqq.)

[92] Bonaventure says 'sentire' and not 'cognoscere' in order to describe the experience before 'theory' which he then develops from this experience.

[93] One should note the scholastic doctrine of 'pondus amoris' which was coming to play a role in speculation on the Trinity. It does not seem to be found in Bonaventure, but he does explicitly affirm an 'information' of the 'apex affectus' by God in 'ecstasy'.

[94] Itin. cap. 7 n. 4 (V 312b); cf. also ibid. n. 3 and 6. Because every other created 'information' of the apex of the soul is excluded (and on the other hand this 'information' by God far surpasses the creative power of the apex), Bonaventure also calls ecstasy 'sapientia nulliformis'. Cf. Coll. 2 in Hexaem n. 8 (V 337b) and ibid. n. 28 (V 340b).

[95] Bonaventure states this principle in respect of the intellect. Cf. B. A. Luyckx, Die Erkenntnis Bonaventuras (Munster, 1923), pp. 175 sqq; 182-183. It is then extended to the experience of God by the 'apex affectus'. The

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Nevertheless this 'apex' lies deeper than the will and is the ground of the soul which supports the capacities of both understanding and will. If, according to a general scholastic notion of [125] the metaphysic of the soul, the capacities of intellect and will spring somehow from the deepest and innermost ground of the soul, then the soul must possess these capacities as a unity in the depths of its being, capacities which develop 'outwards' into two separate faculties. Now if God touches this deepest point from within, giving form to it, as it were, then the 'apex affectus' will become conscious of this direct union of love without the intellect taking any active part.[96] Naturally the soul experiences God directly in the ground of its being only as the motive power of ecstatic love which leaves all knowledge behind it, and in consequence the experience remains obscure until the intellect as well is flooded, without being blinded, by the dazzling brilliance of God in the beatific vision. But at any rate God is here the dark fire of love.[97]

After this description of the main outline of Bonaventure's theory of ecstasy, a number of questions remain open which cannot be pursued in detail here. In summary we might say that in itself the account given by Bonaventure should be regarded as a remarkable attempt to resolve the problem of reconciling the specific character of the mystical life of grace, which cannot be reduced to the experiences of the normal life of grace, with the fact that direct vision of God face to face is the reward of heaven and not the lot of pilgrims. It is not the only conceivable solution to this problem but it is the one which falls least into the error of reducing the specific character and the sublime heights of mystical experience. It is also significant how strongly in this theory the darkness, the 'night character' of the highest mystical experience is stressed. Certainly the influence of the Areopagite makes itself felt at this point. But the way this idea is taken up, and the way the darkness of mystical experience is clarified by means of a metaphysical system quite foreign to Denis shows that the theme of the night in the mysticism of Bonaventure is not just a piece of tradition. In his theory the darkness, the night (if we may use the terminology of John of the Cross) is not so much a preparatory state of testing [126] prior to the highest mystical experience, but the experience itself. Recent investigations into the mysticism of John of the Cross[98] show that in this point also Bonaventure anticipated the deepest ideas of the mystical doctor of the Church.

ECSTASY AND SPIRITUAL TOUCH

In brief one may say that spiritual touch is nothing else than the act by which the soul grasps the substance of God in ecstasy. Thus the examination of the nature of ecstasy was in no way a diversion from the main topic; it was rather an attempt to determine more precisely what Bonaventure understood by spiritual touch. Ecstasy and spiritual touch belong together and this identification can be shown in a number of ways. First of all it is noteworthy that, when Bonaventure treats of the spiritual senses in a general way, ecstasy is mentioned.[99] Further in his view feeling and touch form the highest and most spiritual sense since it unites a person

---

'virtutes interiores' are 'quasi circulus intra circulum' according to Bonaventure; cf. Serm. 4 in Epiph. (IX 162b). Cf. also St. Grünewald, op. cit p. 83, note 182d.

[96] In ecstasy the powers of the soul flow back in some measure into the ground of the soul and remain suspended in the higher state (Serm. 4 in Epiph.). If this is the explanation of how the 'apex affectus' can really experience the union of love without the aid of the intellect, then Bonaventure is not a forerunner of the mystical theory (e.g. of Vincent of Aggsbach) that the mystical union of love occurs without any knowledge; for in Bonaventure the apex experiences it in ecstasy. Cf. E. Vansteenberghe, Autour de la docte Ignorance (Munster, 1915).

[97] Itin. cap. 7. n. 6 (V 313b) and Coll. 20 in Hexaem n. 11 (V 427a).

[98] Cf. J. Baruzi, Saint Jean de la croix et le problème de l'expérience mystique (Paris, 1931).

[99] Brevil. V. 6 (V 259b-260a); Itin. cap. 4 n. 3 (V 306b).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

most fully with God, the highest spirit, and signifies the experience of union with God.[100] The highest blessing, that of peace, is to be found in spiritual touch. Ecstasy, however, arises from peace and this is expressly referred to spiritual touch: 'ut transiens in illud (Verbum) per ecstaticum amorem recuperate . . . tactum'.[101] In the Breviloquium he writes about spiritual touch: 'Adstringitur summa suavitas sub ratione Verbi incarnati inter nos habitantis corporaliter et reddentis se nobis palpabile, osculabile, amplexabile per ardentissimam caritatem quae mentem nostram per ecstasim et raptum transire facit ex hoc mundo ad Patrem.'[102] Here it is made quite clear that touch is the act of love in ecstasy. When we review the character of ecstasy in Bonaventure's account, it strikes us at once that this experience is best rendered by the term 'contact'. The [127] mystic experiences of the direct presence of God in 'a totally obscure encounter', as Meister Eckhart expresses it.[103] The two characteristics of directness and darkness in the experience of God are best expressed by the word 'contact'. Bonaventure offers the term in the spirit of his philosophy and theology and discovers the principle of this 'night' in the essentially affective nature of the direct grasp of God.[104]

The speculative power and the mystical depths are indeed remarkable which Bonaventure has applied to the traditional teaching of the five spiritual senses in order to clarify the nature of mystical experience. Bonaventure has also managed to integrate the traditional material into his own system of mystical theology.[105] The number five remains perhaps a trifle arbitrary and as a result Bonaventure was not entirely successful in assigning to each sense distinct mystical experience as the specific object of perception. Thus the sense of smell and hearing remain more or less superfluous for the account of spiritual contemplation and its various levels. In this there lies a certain weakness in the rigid doctrine of the five spiritual senses. However this proves how successful were Bonaventure's efforts to give content to the rather a priori and schematic teaching and bring it a little closer to reality. His partial success makes one able to assert that the doctrine of the five spiritual senses is not merely a period piece, a speculative a priori game which has no contact with the real world. If his success was not complete, the fault lies not in Bonaventure but in an inescapable flaw inherent in the doctrine of the spiritual senses. Within the scope of this essay it is not possible to make a critical assessment of the content of Bonaventure's teaching and come to a conclusion about the extent to which his views on contemplation and ecstasy correspond to reality. Rosenmoeller has raised a question about the sources of Bonaventure's teaching of the spiritual senses.[106] We are conscious [128] that in this study we have drawn attention only to a few of Bonaventure's predecessors; however the few examples we noted indicate that Bonaventure added nothing new to the substance or the many particular details of this teaching. At any rate even the discovery of new sources could not rob him of the achievement

[100] III Sent dist. 28 art. 2 q. 1 (III 604b); cf. ibid. dist. 13 (III 292a).
[101] Itin. cap. 4 n. 3 (V 306b). On the spiritual senses, cf. also the fact that not all acts of a lower sort are here like those of cap. 7. It is already a question of the soul which 'purificatur, illuminatur et perficitur' through the three theological virtues. That is, the soul is 'perfect', and so these acts should not be regarded merely as preparation for mystical experience (cf. E. Longpré).
[102] Brevil V 6 (V 259b). Gilson and Rosenmoeller both believe that the spiritual senses play an active part in ecstasy. But they do not connect ecstasy so closely to touch as we do.
[103] Cf. Traktat 11 (Ausg. Fr. Pfeiffer, Deutsche Mystiker des 14 Jahrhunderts II, Stuttgart 1857/Reprint 1924, 507, 29). This edition is poor, but a more recent one is not available.
[104] Understandably, this ecstatic union is linked to the experience of the highest beatitude (at least in general terms). Bonaventure uses images and expressions of the sense of taste to describe it. However, subjective feeling should not be regarded as the mark of ecstasy. Taste is less perfect than touch in Bonaventure. Yet it can occur in ecstasy since it is rooted in the 'affectus' and is not affected by the exclusion of the intellect.
[105] Cf. De plant. parad. n. 16 (V 579a); Soliloq. cap. 1 n. 44 (VIII 43); Serm. 2 in dom 12 post Pent. (IX 401b-402a); De S. Agnete serm. 2 (IX 510b).
[106] Op. cit. p. 201

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of being the first of the Scholastics to have given to this doctrine real content which expresses the direct experience of mysticism.

Finally we must complete this account of the spiritual senses by adding a few remarks about the later development of the doctrine. In the same century as Bonaventure mention should be made of Roger Bacon.[107] Although his brief comments do not suffice to show whether he was directly dependent on Bonaventure, nevertheless the fact that he allotted the spiritual senses to the fifth stage of the 'scientia interior' between the blessings and the fruits, indicates at least kinship, if not dependence, with the teaching of Bonaventure. To the 13th century there also belongs the Compendium theologicae veritatis of Hugh Ripelin of Strasbourg. In the section on the spiritual senses he takes over, with no great understanding, the exposition found in the Breviloquium of Bonaventure.[108] Here there is also a connection in his teaching between the blessings and the fruits; the fact that this is found in the 'most well known and complete manual of the Middle Ages'[109] provides clear evidence for the spread of the doctrine in this period. The Centiloquium also takes over the ideas of Bonaventure with almost as close a verbal similarity; it is the work of an unknown 14th century writer. If one remembers the extraordinary dissemination of these two manuals, then an echo of the teaching is almost certainly to be expected in the German mystics. Meister Eckhart offers eloquent witness of this.[110] Precisely because he lacks any clear theoretical doctrine, his expressions provide a notable example of the use of the idea of the five spiritual senses for the description of higher mysticism. A clear witness of the growing influence of Bonaventure is found in the middle of the 14th century in another German, Rudolf of Biberach. In his On the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit[111] he scarcely makes any use of [129] Bonaventure's ideas, but in his On the seven ways of eternity[112] greater originality is evident. Here the operation of the five senses is a sign of the influence of love in the life of the soul. However in their activity they meet with the corruption of our nature and with their own omissions. Only the grace of Christ and concentration on the interior life can overcome these obstacles. In particular Jesus offers in the eucharist the nourishment necessary to enable the soul not to lose these faculties. The bread 'strengthens all the interior senses; it arouses them so that each can lay hold of its proper object. All the senses recognise God made man, who is hidden in the sacrament.' This reference to the eucharist is the most original element of Rudolf's teaching on the spiritual senses.

In the 15th century five authors deserve mention, Bernadine of Siena, Peter of Ailly, his disciple Gerson, Denis the Carthusian and Harphius. Bernadine describes how in heaven the souls savour their bliss with every spiritual sense and how these senses are tortured in the sufferings of hell.[113] The Compendium Contemplationis of Peter of Ailly devotes the whole third tractate of 13 short chapters to the spiritual senses.[114] They are different from the bodily senses but their nature is hard to determine. He holds to the view of a 'quidam' which is the same as that of Bonaventure. The senses communicate to us a 'experimentalis notitia' of spiritual realities. In the fourth chapter these senses are divided according to three faculties:

---

[107] Opus maius II, edit. S Jebb (Venice, 1750), p. 338. On Bacon's doctrine of the five spiritual senses, see R. Carton, op. cit. pp. 242 sqq.
[108] Cf. Comp. theologicae veritatis V cap. 56 (Edit. Borgnet XXXIV 191 Alberts d. Grossen). He forgets sight and says 'sub ratione splendoris audit.'
[109] Cf. DThC VI 902.
[110] Cf. footnote 103.
[111] Pars 1 cap. 3 (edit. Vives VII 590) and pars 2 sect. 7 cap. 2 (ibid 637).
[112] Dist. 4 art. 2 (edit. Vives VIII 443 and 464-472). This forms the fullest medieval account of the spiritual senses.
[113] Op. omn. (edit. de la Haye; Venice 1745) I 301B serm. 57 de gloria corporum beatorum art. 2 cap. 2; II 72A, serm. 11 de indicio generali art. 3 cap. 3.
[114] Cf. Tractatus et sermones compilati . . . Petro de Ailliaco (Argentinae, 1490) fol. 23-25.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'memoria, potentia intellectiva, potentia affectiva seu volitiva'. The subsequent chapters describe the nature of the act of the senses and its object. Finally individual senses are considered, the obstacles to them and, in conclusion, the means of salvation. Gerson is also familiar with this teaching but does not add anything new.[115] Denis the Carthusian writes in his commentary on the Heavenly hierarchy of Denis the Areopagite as follows: 'Denique hi quoque quinque sensus interiores in nostris sunt animabus'.[116] In fact they refer here only to intellectual joy which is [130] treated in its various forms. Finally Harphius gives a complete account of the spiritual senses[117] without going further than Bonaventure. Because of the success of his Theologia mystica it is not without importance that in this area he transmits the tradition of Bonaventure.

In the 16th century Blosius witnesses to this teaching.[118] Like Peter of Ailly he relates the senses to the three powers of the soul: memory, intellect and will. At this period what is particularly interesting is the attempt to connect the doctrine of the five spiritual senses with the 'Use of the Senses' in the Spiritual Exercises of St Ignatius Loyola. Various outlines and preparatory drafts from this period, which appeared before the official 'Directory' of 1599, make use of Bonaventure's teaching or that of Rudolf of Biberach in order to clarify the 'Use of the Senses'. Thus Polanco and a 'Directorium Granatense' wish to leave the possibility open of employing Bonaventure's doctrine for the explanation of the 'Use of the Senses'.[119] Gilles Gonzales, however, declares himself against this method.[120] In the official Directorium the 20th chapter entirely omits any reference to this teaching.[121] This is not the place to treat the question of the correct interpretation of the Ignatian use of the senses. The connection between it and the ancient doctrine of the five spiritual faculties is only one of the many indications which favour such an interpretation of the use of the senses. The latter was very widespread before the official Directory and it was not seen as an easy exercise, nor was meditation regarded as 'more intellectual' and 'generally higher' in comparison. On the contrary the use of the senses was regarded as 'more intellectual' and as 'a certain participation in vision', as a 'higher form … more difficult' than meditation.[122] In this view the use of [131] the senses was placed next to the prayer of the heart and of simplicity. Taken as an allusion to Bonaventure this is less remarkable and unreasonable than may at first sight appear. The justification of seeing a relationship between Bonaventure and Ignatius will not be discussed here. It should merely be stated that the idea of the five spiritual senses was well known to the Jesuits of the first generation; Nadal and Peter Faber provide evidence of this.[123]

The two great classical figures of Spanish mysticism, Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross, are not familiar with the doctrine in the form which has been investigated here. In their

---

[115] Gerson, Op. omn. serm. 2 de omnibus sanctis (Antwerp, 1706), III 1523 sq.
[116] Cf. Art. 77, op. omn. (Tournai, 1902), XV 254; Enarrat. in Boetii de cons. philos. II prosa 1 art. 1 (Tournai 1906), XXVI 159; cf. cap. 15 3 (PG 3) 332 A-B, where the bodily senses are used in an allegorical way for the intellectual powers of angels.
[117] Theologia mystica 1 cap. 15; cap. 38; II pars 5 cap. 35 (edit. Rome 1587), 153; 221 sq; 833.
[118] Institutio spiritualis, praef. (Opera, Antwerp, 1632), 297.
[119] Monum.. hist. SJ, Monum. Ignat. ser II, 812-813 (Polanco) and 961 (Granatense).
[120] Ibid. 901; 918-919; 1047-1048.
[121] Ibid. 1150-1151.
[122] For this interpretation of the senses cf. Monum. hist. SJ, Monum. Ignat. ser II 1096-1097 n. 15; A. Gagliardi, Commentarii seu Explanationes in Exercitia spiritualia S.P. Ignatii de Loyola (Bruge, 1862) 22-24; L. Palmensis, Via Spiritualis V. 1 1. 3 cap. 7 (edit. Nonell; Barcelona, 1897), 397-400. Here we are not dealing with those who later held this view, since we merely wish to explain how it was that before the appearance of the Directorium in 1599, Bonaventure's doctrine was connected with the use of the senses. The writers quoted above all received their spiritual formation before 1599.
[123] Monum. hist. SJ, Monum. Nadal IV 677 sq; cf. K. Rahner, 'Über die Gnade des Gebetes in der Gesellschaft Jesu', Mitteil. aus d. deutschen Provinzen SJ 13 (1935) 399-411 (Transl. of the relevant text); Monum. hist. SJ, Monum. Fabri Memoriale n. 69, 527; n. 343, 656; n. 345, 657 and n. 436, 693.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

main writings which expound the psychology of mysticism, only the empirical foundations of the doctrine are present; the direct character of mystical experience can more easily be expressed through images taken from immediate sense perception and the peculiarities of a particular mystical experience have their analogue in the expression of one or other of these senses. Thus Teresa writes: 'The first stage of supernatural prayer, as I have experienced it, is an interior concentration which is felt by the soul. It seems to possess new senses in itself which roughly correspond to the external senses.'[124] John of the Cross speaks of the feeling of the soul, of spiritual hearing and spiritual eyes, of the 'sense of soul', 'spiritual sense', 'rational and higher sense' and of 'spiritual taste'.[125] He also compares the four ways of pure spiritual perception (vision, revelation, hearing, spiritual sensations) with the different sense perceptions.[126] It can be presumed that he has in mind a similar division to that of Bonaventure when he distinguishes between 'knowing him (God) through his effects and works' and the essential communication of his divinity; the latter is characterised as 'the touch of naked substances, the knowledge of the soul and divinity'.[127] Evidently John of the Cross is inevitably as Bonaventure drawn to 'touch and feel' when [132] it is a question of portraying the highest mystical experiences. Naturally he employs images derived from all the physical senses in order to describe mystical states.[128]

Is the absence of a specific doctrine of the five senses in classical modern mysticism a real reason for the disappearance of this notion, which previously received such emphasis and importance? In fact E. Lamballe was even capable at the beginning of this century of imagining that the whole idea originated from A. Poulain. Or have perhaps the flaws inherent in the doctrine itself been the cause of its demise? In any event it plays scarcely any part in the exposition of mystical occurrences, even in cases when it receives mention. It suffices to refer to Luis of Granada, du Pont, Sandaeus, Surin, Nouet, Angelus Silesius, Honoré de Sainte-Marie or Scaramelli to illustrate this point.[129]

In the more modern period the doctrine of the five spiritual senses attracted fresh attention. This is due to the influence of A. Poulain, who gave greater importance to it than is usually the case in the definition of mystical prayer. Among the other writings which deserve specific mention is an article in Katholik, as well as the work of Saudreau, Lamballe, Tanquerey, Grabmann, Richstaetter, Maumigny, Hamon, Juan de Guernica, Arintero, Seisdedos, Bainvel and Dorsch. In addition reference should be made to works on the Exercises of Ignatius published by Sinthern, Maumigny, Maréchal and Brou, as well as the studies of Bonaventure's teaching mentioned above.[130] A [133] direct mystical experience which makes

---

[124] Letter to Rodrigo Alvarez, cf. Bouix, Lettres, t. 1 (Paris 1861), 379 = Letter 78.
[125] Cf. the references in J. Baruzi, Saint Jean de la croix et le problème de l'expérience mystique (Paris, 1931) p. 361.
[126] Subida II 21 (E.C. I 223).
[127] Cantico str. XXXII V. 2 (E.C. II 589). Similar expressions are often found in John of the Cross.
[128] Cf. J. Baruzi, op. cit. 362 and 719, where mention is made of M. Carré-Chataignier, Essai sur les images dans l'oeuvre de Saint Jean de la Croix.
[129] Guia de los pecadores I 1. 1 cap. 5, 1; Meditationes t. I, Praef. 11; Clavis pro theol. mystica (Cologne, 1610); on this cf. Katholik 92 (1912), p. 107; Traité de l'amour de Dieu 1. 3 cap. 6 (Paris, 1879), pp. 142-143; Conduite de l'homme d'oraison dans les voies de Dieu 1.6 entret. 14 (Paris, 1856), t. II pp. 269 sqq; Cherub. Wandersmann V, 351 (Munich, 1924) p. 351 (Silesius is dependent upon Sandaeus); Tradition des Pères et des auteurs ecclesiastiques sur la contemplation t. I pars 2 dist. 10; on this cf. Katholik op. cit., Dirett. mist. III cap. 5 and 13.
[130] Cf. Katholik 92 (1912), pp. 97-112, 171-182: 'Zur Theorie von den fünf geistlichen Sinnen'; cf. ibid. pp. 291-298, 372-375 and 446-447. Saudreau often mentions the spiritual senses in his discussions with A. Poulain; cf. Les degrés de la vie spirituelle II (Paris, 1912), p. 69; L'état mystique (Angers, 1921), pp. 310 sq., 320 sq., 341; La contemplation, principes de théologie mystique (Paris, 1913), p. 28; Precis de théologie ascétique et mystique (Paris, 1924), p. 848; Wesen und Grundlagen der Kath. Mystik (Munich, 1923), pp. 50-51; Mystische Gebetsgnaden und ignatianische mystik (Innsbruck, 1924), pp. 208 sq.; K. Richstaetter, P. Maumigny,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

use of the 'spiritual senses' is to be found in the accounts of an Ursuline nun, Mother Salesia Schulten.[131]

This brings us to the end of our outline of the history of the doctrine of the five spiritual senses. B. Rosenmoeller has expressed the hope that a history of this idea could provide solid information about the psychological and epistemological foundations of modern mysticism. We fear, however, that it has not been possible in this first attempt to realise this hope. The direct character of mystical experience is always described in images which are derived from the world of sense perception. Even the finest shade of difference between various mystical experiences can best be clarified for the layman with the assistance of comparisons which stem from the realm of physical sensations; of course this also touches on the limits of analogy. If one assumes five different faculties which correspond analogically to the bodily powers of sensation, then one is going quite a long way beyond the empirical data. If one wants to avoid this difficulty – and attempts to do so have nearly always been made – and one describes the senses as acts of intellect and will, then it is no longer obvious why there should be exactly five types of such intellectual activity. This move in fact undermines the raison d'être of the whole notion, for it does not provide any fresh knowledge and says nothing more than could be said without it. This remains true even if in the meanwhile well-chosen metaphors are selected from the realm of sense perception. If one tries, like Bonaventure, to fill out the a priori vacuum with empirical content, then one reaches the conclusion that analogies drawn from direct sense experience are indeed necessary and valuable but that a doctrine of five spiritual senses, taken as exactly parallel to physical [134] senses, is superfluous.[132] Only the conservatism of the medieval mode of thinking provides a reason for the long continuance of the teaching, which had become unnecessary in its ancient form. Furthermore its interpretation as exemplified by Bonaventure's exposition shows that it is not without significance whether the metaphors used to portray mystical experience are derived from the sense of touch or sight. For a difference of metaphor can clarify a difference of mystical experience. The problem we were considering was a limited one; the only conclusion it leaves us is that progress in this question demands an examination of the common linguistic usage of mysticism prior to an idea of five senses, i.e. an investigation of the whole use of the images which come from sense experience.[133] In this broader context some of the partial results of this study could acquire greater significance. Research into the language of mystics and their use of metaphors and images could then perhaps open up the area in which the mystic depicts his experience in the most original fashion, and where, consciously or unconsciously, he is least influenced in his expression by the categories of his

---

Katholische Mystik (Freiburg, 1928), pp. 171-176; Pratique de l'oraison mentale II (Paris, 1909), pp. 29-38, 338-339; DThC V (1891); Introducción a la Mística Franciscana (Buenos Aires, 1925); on this, RAM 8 (1927), p. 421; Evolución mística III (Salamanca, 1930), pp. 575-581; Cuestiones místicas (Salamanca, 1927), pp. 70 sq., Principios fundamentales de la Mística III (Madrid, 1914), p. 355; A. Poulain, The Graces of Interior Prayer (London, 1950); Präsideskorrespondenz 20 (1926), p. 96; G. Harrasser, Studien zu den Exerzitien des hl. Ignatius I (Innsbruck, 1925), pp. 78-70; Saint Ignace, maître d'oraison, (Paris, 1925), pp. 181 sq.

[131] Cf. K. Richstaetter, Mater Salesia Schulten und ihre Psychologie der Mystik (Freiburg i. Br. 1932), pp. 105, 160-163, 166-167, 169, 173, 175, 177, 179 sq., 190, 200, 203, 211.

[132] One would be tempted to register an objection based on this assertion. If the medievals merely saw metaphorical expressions of the mystical acts of intellect and will in the doctrine of the five senses, then the doctrine should not be treated by itself without something being said about the use of these metaphors. But such a study would require a series of preliminary enquiries which far exceed the limits of a single essay. Moreover, the history of the five spiritual senses does form a clearly defined chapter in the history of metaphors which are drawn from the realm of sense perception and used to portray mystical realities.

[133] Of course special attention should be paid to the accounts of mystics who have had genuine mystical experience and have an original, personal style of describing it. One should exclude everything which is not based on experience or stems second hand from mystical accounts for which images, concepts, etc., are followed without discrimination.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

philosophy. This might lead to a more independent presentation of secondary, reflective descriptions of mysticism. These secondary accounts always mirror the outlook existing outside the world of mysticism. The partial answer contained in this study leads, therefore, to a more important problem which cannot be discussed here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[135]

8

MODERN PIETY AND THE EXPERIENCE OF RETREATS

The topic proposed here doubtless opens up a number of perspectives and this unavoidable range of options could easily lead to disappointed expectations. It should, therefore, be clearly stated at the outset that here the subject to be discussed is the place occupied today in the history of spirituality by the Ignatian Exercises. The exact meaning of this provisional description of our topic will become plainer in the course of the following reflections, but the stress lies as much on the term, 'history of spirituality' as on the word 'today'.[1]

Our task is to bring together the historical and spiritual background of the Exercises and the contemporary situation of today and tomorrow, a situation whose main characteristics are likely to increase in intensity. Put somewhat differently, it is a question of seeing how the Exercises are affected when they are taken from the world in which they originated at the beginning of the so-called modern period, which both gave them their characteristic stamp and which in turn they decisively marked, both in religious and secular terms. For today they must enter a new historical and spiritual context at the 'end of the modern period',[2] one in which they are not so naturally at home. These thoughts may seem at first glance abstract, laboured and far-fetched to those who are looking for modern retreat models or [136] want to test their practical effectiveness in the modern world. And yet such reflections may contribute to a clearer understanding of all the doubts and questions which surround the modern retreat. What in fact is going on when one tries to give a retreat today without simply slipping unthinkingly into the old formulae? What should a retreat look like which fits into our spiritual and historical landscape? The presuppositions and character of these questions involve much that is uncertain and hypothetical; they also perhaps neglect a great deal and do not permit a comprehensive survey or an obvious arrangement of the material. Still the search must be pursued in good heart.

PRESUPPOSITIONS

In order to locate the problem of retreats today, we should at least remind ourselves briefly what is the context of our search, namely that the Church possesses a genuine history in which its reality can develop. This means that the Church remains itself in all its aspects and yet at the same time lives a true and authentic history, which does not merely involve external accidents, clearly recognised as such, but implies an actual historicity of its substance, dogma, worship, the composition of 'iuris divini' (and not only 'iuris humani'), spiritual life and the relation to the world. Of course the dialectic thus proposed of the enduring and essential identity of the Church and its authentic historicity raises a host of difficult problems, particularly because permanence cannot be regarded as a static characteristic nor historicity as a set of changing externals separate from the substance of the Church. The one cannot be so clearly divided off from the other. Without being able here to go into the matter more closely, we may assume here that the relation of change and identity in the Church cannot simply be expressed in terms of the model of substance and accidents (dogma – theology,

[1] This essay is based on a talk addressed to retreat givers in Vienna in the autumn of 1974. The text has been considerably revised and a shorter version was published in Gul 47 (1974), pp. 430-449.
[2] This expression goes back to the title of a well-known work of Guardini, The End of the Modern World (London, 1957), which appeared in Basle 1950, and later in Wurzburg (1959).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

divine law – human law, etc.). This would lead at best either to a purely verbal harmony or to a trivialising of the Church's historicity. The causes of change need not occupy us here, how far that is, the control of the Spirit as the innermost realisation of the Church is to be grasped as something over and above the secular influences which are unquestionably at work. In any event we can be sure that the Church of Jesus Christ does experience something genuinely 'new' in its life, which is neither 'the way things have always been' nor something reduceable to superficial triviality. Historically new phenomena can occur in the Church even if they cannot be [137] completely grasped as such by the historical subject. This is particularly true when what is new first appears and forms the immediate destiny of the subject who reflects upon it for whom the new future emerges slowly amidst doubt and pain. Traditional Church history tends to remain too tied to directly comprehensible facts and to be unclear in its reflection and designation of the newness of an epoch. It often characterises periods of history as divisions which are defined in relation to world history external to the Church and to its influence upon the history of Christianity. However the newness of an epoch is always prepared for in advance in the abiding essence of the Church and thus it can be interpreted in retrospect, when its true character becomes clearly apparent, as what in fact has always been there; it can be discovered as a lived, conscious reality which was already present in an earlier form. Yet at the same time the novelty of an epoch is genuinely something fresh. This is shown by the fact that it only emerges for what it is against the opposition of those who, being of a conservative caste of mind, act in defence of the permanent substance of the Church and only discover new elements to be what has always been known and lived when the novelty has proved itself and is already taken for granted by a later generation.

Newness as a mark of a whole period of Church history does not of course simply dissolve and disappear because of later developments, even if it is also true that in a subsequent era it does not retain the same form it once possessed as the characteristic stamp of a particular period of history. Once new, it underlies the changes of later history and remains embedded in subsequent phenomena. In this it no longer plays the part of simple novelty but retains an irrepressible vitality and a future effectiveness. This is in fact already given in the reality of history if it is to remain faithful to itself.

In detail it is hard to determine in the face of the continual ebb and flow of history what is transitory in a new development and what is permanent, when the form of novelty, though not the actual content, is overtaken by a later period. This truth applies even to the reality and knowledge which the Church has grasped in a historical process of development as dogma which is permanently valid even in future ages. Even in this case the distinction between abiding essence and specific form cannot be made without ambiguity and possible mis-understanding. Even a new dogmatic expression comes to light and finds clear definition under transitory historical and social conditions.

These remarks should make it plain that, although something new [138] which has appeared at a particular period can be permanently maintained, we do not regard Church history simply as a process of evolution which always produces higher levels of perfection. This is true even if we leave aside the fact that human history, in contrast to non-human evolution, always involves freedom and this applies also to the Church, so that there is a history of refusal, guilt and infidelity to what perhaps should be maintained. The point of mentioning these presuppositions of change and continuity was to render the following observations more intelligible.

THE SPIRITUAL EXERCISES AS A CHARACTERISTIC DOCUMENT OF THE MODERN PERIOD

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The first thesis may be formulated as follows: the Exercises of St Ignatius[3] are a fundamental document of the post-Reformation Church, which had a decisive influence upon its history; the Church of this period corresponded to the general western culture of the modern era, even if it also possessed its own specific character; the Exercises brought something genuinely new into the Church which in the present situation of 'the end of the modern period' is both passing away and being maintained in a remarkable fashion. It is worth illustrating and verifying this thesis and spelling out the consequences for the Exercises.

A) THE MODERN FOUNDATION

However bold the venture may seem, we must first take a look at the modern period in the secular meaning of the term. The question here is not when exactly it began, whether as early as St Thomas Aquinas and the anthropocentric shift[4] embodied in his thinking or with the rise of Nominalism in the late Middle Ages, with its attack on universals in favour of the individual being, or with Luther's Reformation, [139] or Descartes's philosophy of the transcendental subject, or with the rise of modern science with its exact method of quantification, whose start is itself hard to date.[5] Naturally it cannot be denied that in many ways the modern period was shaped in advance by the history of Greek and western culture and that the spirit and history of Christianity were of essential and irreplaceable importance for the formation and the background of the modern period.

Medieval man thought and lived on God and the world, on universals and order formulated in appropriate norms. His personal reflection upon himself, his spirit and his freedom was conducted, if it occurred at all, in relation to these objective realities in which he knew from the start he was included as a part in the whole. Naturally the groundwork existed for a philosophy and theology of the free personal subject; indeed this was inevitable given the background of the Christian doctrine of grace, redemption, predestination and individual salvation history. However they formed only a partial beginning and did not provide a point of departure and a foundation for the trust and commitment to the objective reality of God, the world, nature and order.

The modern period radically altered this picture. In this context it is not of great significance that the modern period of the individual subject finds self-expression in an enormous variety of ways, which are often self-contradictory. The central fact is that of the individual subject itself, which applies even when the person freely and deliberately accepts and appropriates the traditional realities of a 'philosophiae perennis' and of Christian faith, i.e. when the subject belongs to the Church and maintains this connection, regarding himself not merely as a member of a profane world but as a person directed to God. In the transcendent, a priori structure of his being the crucial starting point is this initial subjectivity, which is revealed as the primary certainty. The state of creative freedom can no longer be understood as an instance and application of a general norm. It is set over against the surrounding world and is no longer experienced as part of an already given order of reality.

---

[3] Ignatius Loyola, Spiritual Exercises (London, 1963, trans. by Thomas Corbishley S. J); cf. J. Leclercq, A. Rayez, P. Debongnie, Ch. Schmerber, 'Exercises spirituels', DDSp. IV (Paris, 1961), 1902-1949; also I. lparraguirre, G. Dumeige, G. Cusson, 'Ignace de Loyola', DDSp VII (Paris, 1971), 1226- 1318; for the background cf. H. Rahner, Ignatius von Loyola und das geschichtliche Werden seiner Frömmigkeit (Graz and Salzburg, 1949).

[4] This is the thesis proposed by J. B. Metz, Christliche Anthropozentrik Munich, 1962).

[5] Cf. on this question from the point of view of the natural sciences, P. E. Hodgson, 'Zweifel und Gewissheit in den Naturwissenschaften', StdZ 193 (1975), pp. 187-198.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The other characteristics of the modern period need not be discussed here. It will be enough to recall the type of rationality by means of which the world is not only confronted and reflected upon, but which also seeks to control the [140] world as the object of creative and free planning, and thereby shapes it as a living environment. Modern man uses his technical intelligence to transform the natural world and create society and is thus driven to question inherited tradition. He seeks to unite different areas which have been separated by a historical no-man's land into a single world civilisation. He possesses the basic tendency towards critical analysis, excluding nothing a priori from the range of his enquiry.

B) SELF-DISCOVERY BEFORE GOD

The Ignatian Exercises were both an influential factor and a significant document of the modern age, or so our thesis ran. This claim must be studied more closely. It cannot of course be disputed that Ignatius and his work are, and will always be, bound up in many ways with earlier epochs of the Christian faith and the Christian Church, precisely because of the enduring effects of the modern era. But it is not surprising that Ignatius, both at the beginning and later, was suspected of being an 'Alumbrado'.[6] We cannot dismiss it as a matter of course, nor regard it as a biographical triviality, that the religious path of Ignatius starts with a subjective experience of consolation and desolation[7] which cannot properly be the object of 'objective' control. If we take the words in his autobiographical account seriously and do not treat them as a pious exaggeration, thus rendering them ineffective, then we cannot but be aroused and deeply disturbed when we read, for instance, that mystical experiences provide the whole content of faith, the totality of our understanding of God and the world, even supposing the Scriptures were to be lost.[8]

Let us turn at once to the basic conception of the Exercises. Through their use the creator and creature should be placed in solitary contact with each other. In this situation the retreat master can quite happily be regarded as the Church's representative, but in Ignatius's view the less he enters the solitude of creature and creator the better.[9] [141] Now this principle is far from being obvious or customary; on the contrary as an explicit principle it is radically modern.[10] In the Exercises a fundamental and free decision of life-long importance should take place. Such a choice essentially comes to be made according to Ignatius not simply by applying general human, Christian and ecclesiastical norms to a specific case, which is merely a concrete instance however complex of a universal principle, but rather by deciding

---

[6] On this concept cf. the corresponding article by J. Vincke, LThk 1(1957), 407; also H. Rahner, Ignatius the Theologian (London, 1968).

[7] Autobiography of St. Ignatius Loyola (New York, 1974); cf. the interpretation of L. Bakker, Freiheit und Erfahrung. Redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen über die Unterscheidung der Geister bei Ignatius von Loyola (Wurzburg, 1970), pp. 69-147.

[8] Cf. Autobiography of St. Ignatius, nos. 29 and 30.

[9] Cf. Ignatius Loyola, Spiritual Exercises, no. 15.

[10] It is of course, possible to interpret this statement of Ignatius in a trivial sense by saying that the direct presence of God is given in the context of the Church and world which is experienced as a prior, valid reality. In practice, this is usually the case in ordinary piety. This priority must be formally considered and recognised by the individual free subject as something which is permanent, and cannot be eliminated or properly thought through. But the subject must (as a solitary individual) experience the rest of the world and the Church as threatened and placed in question by the immediate advent of God and the sovereignty of his will. In this light, the actual world and Church cannot be taken for granted any longer as functionally representative. If subsequently they regain their natural validity, then this is only because they have been confirmed in this role by the immediate proximity of God. It remains true, therefore, that the first sentences of the Spiritual Exercises assume the uniqueness and historical originality of the individual subject in the sense current in the modern period.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

upon the unique, individual destiny willed by God which transcends all general norms.[11] The will of God is not, therefore, simply and entirely transmitted through the objective structures of the world and the Church. The subject goes beyond what is universally valid and seeks through his choice his own unique truth, setting himself at a distance (termed 'indifference') from every particular existing object. This can only be chosen in a free decision as what is here and now important and subjectively accepted by a person, if his subjectivity is set free. By God is meant the guarantee that such absolute [142] freedom is available to every individual and that it can and should be offered and required of a person.

Naturally in addition to the phenomenon of fundamental choice Ignatius was also familiar with the apparently more rational process of reflection, i.e. with the act of choice as the point of intersection of general human, Christian and ecclesiastical norms. But he regards this as a secondary and derivative version, which applies if and when the fundamental choice is either impossible or unsuccessful.[12] All this highlights the free subjectivity of a person in which the individual himself is directly confronted by the ground and guarantee of his radical freedom, i.e. by God.

The Exercises are an influential factor and an important testament of the modern era, even if they do not at all reject the past heritage of the Christian Church but rather seek to preserve it. But this is done from the typically modern starting point of a transcendent subjectivity radically transformed, we must add, and raised up by grace. Grace should here be understood as the direct presence of God to the unique subject, not as a general principle. In the context of Christianity and the Church the Exercises mean that this subject appears as something genuinely new and is a formative influence in the modern era of the Church. This is not contradicted by the fact that the customary practice of piety usually trivialised this crucial event of the modern era and still continues to do so. Even the Jesuit theology of the high Baroque period only partially and hesitantly studied and developed this modern Ignatian starting point.[13] The battle to preserve what was ancient and permanent in Christian tradition made theology in many ways incapable of using the new point of departure to lay hold of the lasting element in tradition.

C) THE INDIVIDUAL AND THE CHURCH IN THE EXERCISES

The radical point of departure of the modern period allows one to understand why the Church does not figure as the active subject in the Exercises. This fact should nevertheless be a cause of deep interest to the thoughtful reader. 'As active subject' is the operative phrase; what is intended here is often treated as a matter of course or accepted without question, and is thus frequently overlooked.

[143] Naturally the Church is found in the Exercises as something to which the individual is related as object. Ignatius reflects upon the history of salvation and therefore upon the heart of the Church. He aims at a completely personal relationship between the retreatant and Jesus

[11] Ignatius developed a logic of existential decision by means of his rules of choice, which had not existed in this form before, despite the traditional doctrine of the discernment of spirits. Since then, there has never been sufficient theological study of the real meaning and presuppositions of this Ignatian innovation. Its importance remains valid today, but it must be removed from the context of the choice of a vocation in the Church and clearly expressed in terms of its general significance for human existence. Hesitation and opposition in the mind of the Church against the spirit of the modern period prevented the real understanding and the proper expansion of this logic of existential and practical reason, which cannot be given an adequate theoretical basis. Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Logic of Concrete Individual Knowledge in Ignatius Loyola', The Dynamic Element in the Church, Quaestiones Disputatae 12 (Freiburg and London, 1964), pp. 84-156.
[12] Spiritual Exercises, nos. 177, 179-188.
[13] Cf. in this volume, 'Reflections on a New Task for Fundamental Theology'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christ, the Lord of the Church. In this way he brings him to an experience of his calling by Christ to serve the kingdom of God and the Church. According to Ignatius the individual perseveres in his choice which has been made directly before God and his will in the context of hierarchical Church, the holy Mother, the bride of Christ.[14] But this perseverance arises also from the free decision of the retreat-ant, who in virtue of the direct presence to the subject of God acknowledges these limits.[15] In this sense he accepts the commandments of the Church, papal norms, Church fasts, etc. In Paris Ignatius expressly added to the Exercises as originally conceived at Manresa the rules for thinking according to the mind of the Church.[16] In passing he mentions the retreatant's attendance at Mass and Vespers and the Divine Office. One can see, as did Ignatius, a function of the Church being exercised by the retreat master; there are directions for general confession and confessors aimed to relate the retreatant to the Church. Our Lady and the saints are to pray for the retreatant. But despite all these references and many others the Church is merely a reality to which the individual is related before God. Here the question cannot be discussed how and why the reference to the history of salvation, the life of Jesus and the Church as normative can follow from the modern starting point found in the Exercises, and how much reflection Ignatius gave to the connection between the subject and the Church, a connection which the subjectivity of the modern age made far from obvious. No injustice would be done to Ignatius, living as he did at the break between the Middle Ages and the modern period, if one did not expect too much reflection on his part on this point, even if one must admit [144] that the well known problems he had with the Church's Inquisition made him sensitive to such questions.

However human subjectivity and the role of the Church are related to each other, the fact remains that the Exercises are a solitary event proper to the individual person and that in this process the Church does not figure as the controlling agent. It is no argument against this claim to say that in the Exercises the sacrament of penance, confessor, Mass and even the Divine Office in choir have a place. As long as one does not read into these practices modern attitudes and interpretations which were certainly foreign to Ignatius, then they do not involve anything more than aids offered by the Church to the individual which operate from without. Retreatant and Church remain different subjects of action, in so far as the latter is active at all. Even external common prayer is at the most an active realisation of the Church addressed to God, which remains external to the real heart of the Spiritual Exercises, i.e. the existential choice and the achievement of absolute freedom before God (termed indifference), and the experience of the radical immediacy of God in the comfort of the 'first' and the 'second time of choice'.[17]

So the Church does not emerge as the active subject in the Exercises, or more precisely in the decisive central part of the Exercises. This may perhaps provide some answer to the bemused inquiry how it could work any other way. Can the Church play any other part in the decisive process of the Exercises, i.e. in the act of choice, than the one it actually has, that is to be the context and point of reference for the solitary decision of the individual subject who makes his decision before God himself who alone offers it to him? This is not an obvious query and cannot easily be given a simple negative answer, even if the real problematic can only be clearly seen today. For we are in a position today to ask whether the Church in the [14] Spiritual Exercises, no. 170.

[15] Anyone familiar with the 19th century teaching of the Church on the justification and necessity of a 'rational' fundamental theology, which formally, even if not temporarily and psychologically, precedes the assent of faith of the believer and so his membership of the Church, will not be surprised at this assertion. Church membership is not the primary datum of religious existence. This leaves it open how far Ignatius considered this question, but in this context the ultimate independence from Scripture mentioned above must give food for thought.
[16] Cf. L. Bakker, op. cit. (footnote 7), pp. 55-58.
[17] Spiritual Exercises, nos. 175 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

form of a small specific community cannot itself be the subject of a religious and existential act of choice, of the discernment of spirits and of the experience of consolation in the sense intended by Ignatius. This line of thought of course would not merely include the official Universal Church and its doctrinal decisions in so far as they affect the life of the individual believer in relation to the world, in the Church's sacramental worship and in the formulation of law; it would also include the Church as subject of a specifically religious decision, of which the individual acknowledges [145] his membership and in which he finds personal self-expression.

Before pursuing this line of argument and trying to come to some tentative conclusion, two further considerations should be mentioned. One involves a closer examination of Ignatius himself and the other is expressly concerned with the end of the modern era and its effect on the secular world and the Church.

IGNATIUS AND THE 'END OF THE MODERN ERA'

The following assertion is unusual and appears to contradict the traditional interpretation of Ignatius of Loyola and his work and yet it may at least be proposed today as a suggestion: Ignatius in founding his order and in his later life is not only the man of the Exercises in the sense of a solitary spiritual process in which the subject is directly confronted by God and involved in a personal existential decision as it appears in the Exercises. How far he himself was conscious of the additional factor in his life and work whereby he points beyond the modern era of the Church which he helped to found, need not detail us here. But we may note in passing that Ignatius did not regard himself as the single founder of his order,[18] but rather saw the group of his first companions, united by the spirit of the Exercises, as the real founders of the order. We are not, I think, justified in dismissing this notion simply as the expression of saintly humility. For he knew and practised the 'deliberatio communitaria' with his companions (deliberation not only in the group but of the group),[19] where the logic of existential choice was to apply and operate for the group as a whole. In the same way he treated the static general norms and constitutions of an order not simply as a fixed structure existing prior to behaviour, but rather as something which can and should become valid and effective through a dialectical process of shared testing and decision making [146] which was to take place dynamically in such a group.[20] These facts reveal a tendency in Ignatius which cannot merely be traced back to the text of the Exercises as this now stands; rather they foreshadow a period of time which only now appears to be dawning at the end of the modern age.

What is meant by the end of the modern age, by the new epoch which is gradually but plainly emerging, in which the specific characteristics of the Exercises as they are explicitly contained in the text will embody something of lasting value but will no longer bear the stamp of their age in the same way as before? This is the difficult question which we must now tackle with whatever success, if we wish to discover the proper place of the Exercises in [18] Cf. P. Dudon, Saint Ignace de Loyola (Paris, 1934), pp. 622-625; A. Ravier, Ignace de Loyola fonde la Compagnie de Jesus (Paris, 1973), pp. 96 sqq., 121.

[19] Cf. Dudon, op. cit. pp. 335 sqq., 354 sqq.; Ravier, op. cit. pp 82 sqq., 230 sqq; D. Bertrand, Un corps pour l'Esprit (Paris, 1974). Cf. the following studies from Studies in the Spirituality of Jesuits: J. C. Futrell, 'Ignatian Discernment' (April, 1970); J. J. Toner, 'A Method for Communal Discernment of God's Will' (September, 1971); J. C. Futrell, 'Communal Discernment: Reflections on Experience' (November, 1972); L. Orsy, 'Toward a Theological Evaluation of Communal Discernment' (October, 1973). Also, J. G. Gerhartz, 'Vom "Geist der Ursprungs" der Gesellschaft Jesu', Gul 41(1968), pp. 245-265.
[20] Cf. A. Ravier, 'Hat die Gesellschaft Jesu das Recht, ihre Konstitutionen zu ändern?', Gul 47 (1974), pp. 422-430.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the contemporary Church from a spiritual and practical point of view. In this we cannot rely upon a description of the present epoch which appears to be dissolving the modern period, in so far as this epoch is a general historical and secular phenomenon characteristic of the whole of humanity. Men are searching today for higher forms of social structure, given that western civilisation with its rational and technical methods is becoming dominant all over the world. These social structures seek to reconcile the dignity and value of the individual with the social character of man and also face the social and material demands which are necessary for survival both now and in the future. It should at least be clear by now that these higher social formations are something new, even if their form remains the object of strife between the existing systems of society found in east and west, north and south, in developed and developing nations. Nor is their novelty eliminated by the variety of historical and social conditions under which this struggle is being conducted. This new phenomenon will stamp the emerging historical epoch, however obscure this process may appear now and however much it is interpreted within the framework of understanding proper to the age that is now passing away, i.e. the modern era.

THE CHURCH AFTER THE END OF THE MODERN ERA

There is no doubt that the Church must also enter the new age and its higher forms of socialisation. It may quite correctly appear that the Church of the Second Vatican Council is only now for the first time [147] catching up with the backlog of demands raised by the modern period in the various areas of its life (doctrine, liturgy, law, etc.), so that it may come to terms with the spirit of this age while maintaining a critical distance from it. However it is also, we may hope, noticeable that tentative efforts are being made amidst the present changes in the Church to discover new forms of social structure which correspond in the realm of the Church to the characteristics of the era now emerging. There are various signs of this new search which deserve mention. The new discovery at the Second Vatican Council that the Church is not just the hierarchy but is the pilgrim people of God in which each has an active part and a specific task; the search for ‘democratic structures’ in the life of the Church which are not mere appendages to the democracy of the modern period but embody higher forms of socialisation in the ecclesial community; the call for vital basic communities which build up the Church from below and are not individualistic groups founded on mutual sympathy, but are genuine communities in society based on shared faith in the Gospel and the power of the liberating spirit of Jesus; the liturgy as the real expression of a community’s life and not merely an officially conducted ritual which the individual pious Christian attends, a change which the reform of liturgy may have brought about in principle but which is far from being completely carried through. This list could be extended further if one reflects that new structures of law will be developed in the Church in which the freedom of the individual may be safeguarded without destroying the Church as a body, but rather revealing its unity and its spiritual power to integrate the individual in a new and clearer way. One might also take into consideration that the contemporary Church has the chance to develop within itself models of new social structures for which secular society is also seeking, with the result that the Church would not be forced to follow belatedly the social forms developed by secular society. In all these activities the Church is also seeking higher forms of human socialisation, even if as yet there is perhaps little conscious reflection upon this process.

To grasp this point in a creative and imaginative way, one should concentrate more on local communities and less on the universal Church. One should consider living basic communities, for these are not mere refuges for individual Christians who feel put off by the official institutional system of the Church and suffer from a sense of loneliness and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

abandonment in their experience of life. Rather they represent new types of genuine community life which correspond to [148] the new groupings in society for which mankind is searching today. These inadequate and vague comments about the new situation emerging in the Church may of course be trivialised by an appeal to prior tendencies supposedly existing in the permanent structure of the Church, which would render the new state of affairs merely a superficial modification of what has always been the case in the life of the Church.

NEW QUESTIONS – NEW PRAXIS

These last remarks cannot receive further elaboration and proof here, but the perspective they have opened up allows us to take a new look at the Exercises of Ignatius. As we have already pointed out, the 'whole' Ignatius is not to be found in the explicit text of his Spiritual Exercises; rather we can discover in him anticipatory signs of community understanding and expression which are important for the notion of the Church and its life which is being developed today. From this the question arises: are we to expect today and in the future the appearance of new forms of the Exercises arising from the cultural and ecclesial demands of the new epoch, in which the Church can act in a previously unknown way? This would imply that the Church would not merely be an objective reality with which the retreatant has to reckon but rather an active subject finding expression in a specific community of believers; it would not consist just of the sum of participants in the retreat, but would be an independent subject to which the individual feels bound in his personal religious existence. This model goes beyond what has been the centuries old practice in common retreats, because in the latter case the retreat master for practical reasons would address many individuals at the same time, without their forming a united group or Church. If one gives an affirmative answer to the question whether such a new form of retreat should exist, despite the formal and vague description of the model, then two other problems immediately become pressing.

How are we to conceive in practical terms of a retreat as the active self-expression of the Church, as an ecclesial event and as something genuinely different from individual retreats happening at the same time? Secondly can and should, in addition to this new form, the type of retreat continue which follows the text of the Ignatian Exercises and corresponds to its original conception? In contrast to these questions it is immaterial whether, if one says yes to the first, one applies the term [149] 'retreat' to this new form of ecclesial expression in which the Church acts as subject. If this form of active community self-expression clearly exists as a living reality, then its title depends upon the history of its development. The fact that nothing can be said on this point at the moment is of no particular importance.

The first question should, I believe, receive an affirmative answer. To grasp this it is important, indeed vital, to take note of what was said earlier about the tendency existing in the Church towards new and higher forms of socialisation. But this is not in itself sufficient. For it is not yet clear whether and why these social formations in the Church and its life should have anything to do with retreats, and whether something which might possibly be called a retreat could be an event in which the Church achieves active self-expression. The first question might be answered from various points of view depending on whether one approaches the matter from an empirical stand-point or from a more fundamental theological angle. Here we will use both methods because this seems unavoidable in the area under discussion.

From an empirical point of view there are today new group activities which are beginning to have an effect on the arrangement of retreats: one thinks in this context of sensitivity training, group dynamics and similar practices, irrespective of whether the word 'retreat' is given to the application of these techniques or other names are preferred, such as days of rest

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or days of recollection etc. These arrangements make use of discussion or similar types of group dynamic organisation; we will not discuss this question in detail here.

For our task of more fundamental analysis the question is crucial whether such changes and, additions which are made to enrich retreats merely involve the use of modern psychological techniques to help achieve the retreat's proper goal which was also the aim of earlier individual retreats, or whether by contrast it is entirely a matter of offering useful psychological and perhaps religious assistance to an individual or a group in solving pressing problems of life. In this latter case the processes of group dynamics, etc. should not be termed a 'retreat', because despite their utility they have little or nothing to do with the nature and goal of the classical retreat. A third conceivable possibility would be that at least in specific cases and under particular conditions they could be in a theological sense what we have called the new self-expression of the Church in a given small community. Here the necessary conditions for 'community' in this sense would not necessarily imply a stable institutional group in the form of a parish or [150] a religious community. One's answer here need not be an exclusive choice of one of the three possibilities as the only one that is feasible and legitimate. The first two can contain continual extensions to the third possibility. Our question is centred upon this third option: does there exist something like the self-expression of a community in the discernment of spirits and the act of choice? Does this self-expression apply to the community (Church) as such? Before giving an affirmative reply the question must first be answered whether there can be Ignatian Exercises which would embody, in addition to the permanent traditional model, a new form of spiritual activity to correspond to the specific character of the new epoch which appears to be bringing the modern period to an end?

THE EXERCISES: A POSSIBLE SELF-EXPRESSION OF THE CHURCH

First of all it must be noted that the Church can achieve self-expression over and above the acts of the official institutional Church in doctrinal teaching and legal norms, and this occurs in the life of the ecclesial community. It is immaterial here what sort of concrete structure such a community should have to ensure the claim that its modes of expression are properly acts of the Church as such. A eucharistic celebration in which all members of the community present actively participated is certainly a case of genuine ecclesial self-realisation in a concrete community. No theologian would assert that such eucharistic worship is merely the sum of the actions of the celebrant and the faithful present, regarded as individual worshippers. Rather the Church comes into being in the Mass, although the theologian and the social anthropologist may find it hard to make clear how the community proper, that is the Church, is to be distinguished from the sum of its members in such a shared communal activity. I would hold also that the Church is realised as Church in the choir office of a religious community and that it is not on psychological grounds alone that many individuals come together in common prayer. One common result of discussion of the nature of the Church's liturgy is to raise the question of when to characterise common prayer and celebration as liturgy in the strict sense, i.e. when it should count as the self-expression of the Church as such and is therefore genuinely liturgical. In summary, however, we may say that the Church can certainly achieve self-realisation in the local community.

The further question to be asked is whether a particular community can under certain conditions and in specific situations undertake, in a clearly comprehensible manner, a decision making process, a discernment of spirits in which the community as such reaches a decision and makes the Church a reality in a sense at least analogically related to that occurring in the celebration of the Eucharist and common prayer. I myself would answer affirmatively. As far as I am aware the question has never previously arisen, and indeed could never before have even been posed, since such decisions affecting the life of the whole community have up to now either been taken only on secular matters or have occurred within the framework of a paternalist structure in which one individual decides for the group and not the group itself. The problem can be clearly formulated today and reflects a contemporary awareness and a modern demand that decisions affecting a group should be made by the group itself. In this way they possess greater objectivity and clarity, quite apart from the human and formal structure of the group and whether each member of the group is assigned in a formal democratic manner the same role in the decision making process. Certainly one cannot derive from the nature of the Church the conclusion that a group decision is less 'ecclesial', i.e. less the self-expression of the Church, than when the decision is made for the group by an individual (Pope, bishop, etc.) in a monarchical fashion. After all the college of bishops is, with the Pope, a collective entity which is entrusted with the highest authority in its decisions; the Pope is selected by a college in an act of choice which is of fundamental ecclesial significance. Collective acts of decision made by an ecclesial group, a community, can therefore be ecclesial and be, in the strictest sense, self-expressions of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If these communal acts of decision occur in the religious context of discernment of spirits and involve the Ignatian rules of choice, as they are proposed in the Exercises for the individual's decision, then we would have a form of spiritual exercises proper to the era following the modern period. We cannot find this in Ignatius himself by following the literal text of the Exercises, since there the Church does not appear as active subject. But why today should not communal decisions in this sense be taken in 'spiritual exercises' or retreats. The formation of such a community, which must be an ecclesial body if it is a question of the self-expression of the Church in the discernment of spirits, must obviously involve more than retreats, for otherwise the participants would not come to a common decision but would at most offer mutual assistance in reaching a decision in accord with the [152] method of group dynamics, and this would still leave us on the individual plane. But there are specifically ecclesial communities, involved in the Exercises, which have to make important decisions and could do so in the manner prescribed in the Exercises. Religious orders, secular institutes, etc. would certainly belong to this number.[21]

The question arises whether one could conceive in addition to these ecclesial communities of other groups which might be ready to reach decisions in the way proposed in the Spiritual Exercises, groups such as the presbyterium of a diocese, a Chapter, a parish council, or a group which is gathered together for a religious purpose and wishes to remain together. But this question does not require further investigation here. What is of interest to us is to ask whether the act of decision which can under certain conditions be made collectively could be undertaken in the manner envisaged in the Exercises. One's first impulse is simply to say: why not?! Obviously many changes would have to be made to create a form of Ignatian Exercises which was genuinely collective and much would be done differently from what is prescribed by Ignatius in his handbook. Methods for a practical process of communal decision making would have to be developed in order to preserve the essential character of the Ignatian choice. Only then could one speak of a genuinely religious decision in the sense intended in the Exercises. Any process of group dynamics should therefore be tested to see whether and in what way it can be used as a technical psychological aid to assist communication and thus collective decision making in such Exercises. Given the specific [21] On attempts to form small spiritual groups, regarded as Churches, both within existing ecclesial communities (religious orders, etc.) and outside them (groups of laity and religions, married and unmarried), cf. R. Soullard, 'The Future of Religious Life', Conc. 10/7 (1974), pp. 84-92; also M. Delespesse, 'Neue Gemeinschaften und Ordensleben', Conc. 10 (1974). In these studies the difficulties are apparent which face religious orders in particular.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation character of a particular group and keeping in mind the goals and subject matter of the decision in question, continual transitions may easily occur between common retreats of a number of individuals or group discussion upon a particular problem requiring resolution conducted with a more secular type of group dynamics on the one hand, and the type of Spiritual Exercises we are speaking of on the other, which involves a process of existential commitment as envisaged by St Ignatius, i.e. the decision of an ecclesial group. The logic of such a decision is specifically Christian and religious in that it is basically 'mystical' and [153] leads therefore to the self-realisation of a Christian community and thus to the self-realisation of the Church. We would hold that an entirely new form of ecclesial self-realisation is here being proposed, but that despite its novelty it is just as legitimate as the self-realisation of the Church in the activities of the hierarchy or in the liturgical community. It could indeed be one of the characteristic marks of the Church of the post-modern period, because, as we have noted above, up till now ecclesial groups have either passively accepted decisions affecting them being made by one individual or, in the case of collective resolutions, have used methods common in the secular world.

PRACTICAL CONSEQUENCES

In the Exercises the Church as such can be the active subject of decisions in communities and groups using the method of Ignatian choice; it can therefore achieve self-realisation as the Church. In the actual text of the Exercises this is not the case, but it could occur, as we have shown, in modern Spiritual Exercises. As the Spiritual Exercises in their traditional form, in which the solitary subject faced God and his sovereign will, bore the stamp of the Church of the modern period and deeply influenced its development, so today the Exercises in the form described here could bring about the self-realisation of the Church by preserving what was once new, and so become a characteristic sign and an influential element in the Church of the post-modern era. In this form they would not merely be an arbitrary variant of the earlier Exercises, built up with the help of group dynamics and minor concessions to collective psychological needs; they would rather represent something specifically new. This new element was indeed already foreshadowed by Ignatius himself but it does presuppose the higher degree of socialisation proper to the post-modern age. It also carried this socialisation beyond the purely secular versions and achieves it within the Christian framework. If one takes seriously the process of a genuinely collective discernment of spirits, which takes place in an ecclesial group and is regarded as of crucial existential and religious importance for the members of the group, then one must concede that here there is something which is both new and specifically ecclesial.

Modern movements in the Pentecostal movement often appeal, even within the Catholic Church, to experience of the Spirit, by which is meant an experience which cannot be objectified or controlled. But [154] what is entirely lacking here is the Ignatian logic of existential decision which, while not seeking to displace direct experience of the Spirit, teaches the retreatant to distinguish it clearly from other experiences and thus enables it to operate effectively as the foundation and criterion of a particular decision. An essentially new type of Exercises, which can be envisaged and tried for the first time in the post-modern era, is not meant to exclude the classical format of 'common' retreats which have their own value. Furthermore the new kind of retreat understood as the self-expression of the Church can only be outlined in rather abstract and formal terms; more is impossible at the moment. But whoever has to conduct retreats today may, either because of trends he has experienced and which may seem to him suspiciously fashionable or because of experiments in new collective types of retreat, come to a better understanding through these reflections of what is actually

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

his own real concern, although he has not been fully aware of it until now. He should be encouraged to try to work out with suitable groups a new model in which the Church can achieve new practical forms of self-expression today.

Individual retreats in the original sense also retain their importance, and should be practised and developed in the future. But they are no longer the characteristic mark of the present era of the Church's history, even if they do and must remain the new element of the Church's modern period. But now their novelty has been overtaken by the post-modern state of the Church. The special quality of the Ignatian Exercises can be expressed in the new form of a collective retreat as the self-expression of the Church, without the traditional type of Exercises losing its worth. For individual and social elements remain transcendent human characteristics which are related to each other, although each has its own irreplaceable mode of realisation. Even if the individual person possesses no private existential world which lacks social reference and significance, nevertheless he does have his personal, autonomous life which can find its legitimate place and its proper fulfilment in individual retreats.

In addition modern experience shows that even higher forms of socialisation lead to an increase of individual loneliness which is to be accepted and cannot fundamentally be removed. The acceptance and the existential and religious interpretation of loneliness in the face of the mystery we call God, whose very silence is a mode of speech, form an essential part of individual retreats and can only be properly dealt with in this context and not in group retreats. The life and death of the [155] individual always remain unique events, even if these should be brought into the higher forms of the religious community life and into their self-expression through the new type of retreat, and should be accepted in the group as an element of its own life. There are, then, crucial decisions of an existential and religious kind which must inevitably be borne by the individual on his own. Who, for instance, can decide except the individual person about whether to belong to a particular ecclesial group with its own characteristics which are specific to it and not universally binding? Even given higher forms of socialisation in society and Church, the personal choice of profession, the organisation of one's life style, etc. are matters that fall within the scope of individual freedom. The 'upper room' of the Gospel to which the believer retires in order to speak with God will remain necessary in the future. For men without the courage to pray privately could scarcely be members and representatives of a society containing higher forms of socialisation as these are being sought today. Such people, on the contrary, could only establish mediocre communities in which the individual would not be consciously alert to the radical subjectivity of the modern period, which must also be preserved in the post-modern age and included as part of the groups existing in it. Individual retreats in their classical form do not, therefore, lose their importance and urgency in the new situation.

After what has been said, it should now be plain that the classical type of individual retreat on the one hand, and the group retreat on the other, by which is meant a self-realisation of the Church, mark the two extreme points of what may be termed Ignatian. Between these two points many variations are conceivable which veer in a greater or lesser degree towards one or other extreme. In this basic framework the numerous retreat models proposed today may be more clearly located from the point of view of the history of spirituality and piety. But the primary purpose of these reflections is to encourage both individual retreats and the attempt to work out the new form of retreat outlined here, a form which could bring the Church to self-expression. It is this we are looking for, whether consciously or not.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[156]

9

REFLECTIONS ON A NEW TASK FOR FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY

The following pages, written in honour of J. Salaverri the renowned fundamental theologian, contain no more than a brief and provisional outline of a line of thought which is meant to indicate a new but important task for fundamental theology today.[1] Throughout this essay the provisional character of the present sketch and the rough indications of the direction of thought should be kept in mind. Naturally the existing tasks and methods of fundamental theology are not being questioned nor is any doubt being raised about their importance. This too should not be forgotten. Our concern is rather to point out a new task for fundamental theology which can no longer be overlooked today, and to bring it more clearly than before to the attention of theologians. It follows from the nature of the material that this also indicates a goal for the so-called 'analysis fidei', for this is implied by the close connection between fundamental theology and dogmatic theology caused by the nature of faith and by their mutual interaction.

THE STATE OF FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY TODAY

We are assuming here as a definition of fundamental theology that it involves scientific and systematic reflection upon the grounds of credibility of Christian revelation and the obligation of faith. It is not our concern here to examine precisely how this task of fundamental theology is interpreted in particular theological schools and in relation to [157] the various theories of the 'analysis fidei'. We do not intend to enquire either whether fundamental theology should lay claim to other problems and topics. We are primarily interested here in the cultural and human situation which faces traditional fundamental theology today, if on the one hand it tries to be scientific, and on the other hand seeks to make contact with men today whose faith it is supposed to serve.

The history of fundamental theology since the Enlightenment shows that its practitioners have always worked upon the material and the problems which were found in the particular period in question and have used the methods available at the time. At least ideally fundamental theology extended its awareness of the problem as far as, but of course no further than, the general cultural problematic demanded and made possible. Thus it was engaged in the questions of the time and made use of the scientific methods, so far as these were available, embodied in philosophy, history and the social sciences. In the face of these sciences and the results and problems they raised, it sought to justify the credibility and the credentials of faith by using the methods customary in such sciences. This attempt had quite legitimately an apologetic thrust in order to make real contact with men of the times, at least those of the educated classes.

The intellectual world today, which is a conditioning factor of fundamental theology, is such that one must really speak of a qualitative change in the situation facing fundamental theology. The mass of philosophical problems, the range of methods, the variety of starting points and goals, the ever-increasing wealth in the humane sciences are all factors of significance for fundamental theology. In addition, there are the difficulties encountered in [1] For a good general survey of the situation and prospects of fundamental theology today, see H. Bouillard, 'La táche actuelle de la théologie fondamentale', Le Point Theologique 2 (Paris, 1972), pp. 7-49.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the application of methods of analysis, the increasing influence of religious studies, for example the psychology, sociology and history of religion. All this means not merely a quantitative but rather a qualitative change in the situation facing the fundamental theologian.[2]

Today, therefore, the sort of fundamental theology in the form of a handbook does not exist any more, one, that is, which has really covered the intellectual scene and has confronted directly and adequately the problems it raises. The lack of comprehensive expositions of fundamental theology bears eloquent testimony to this observation. [158] There are no fundamental theologians, and cannot be any longer, who could bring together in their own person and in their own head the necessary knowledge, questions and methods required for a modern fundamental theology in the full sense of the term, without failing to do justice to the pluralism of the contemporary situation.

In order to come to terms with the apparently hopeless state of affairs in which fundamental theology finds itself, one may appeal to the possibility of team work. But however necessary such combined efforts may be, they simply do not occur, and in the end it appears an impossibility that they should exist. For in contrast to the natural sciences, the questions and discoveries of one person in philosophy and history cannot be simply taken over by another, if a decision of faith is at stake or the construction with others of a coherent and unified fundamental theology. To take over the results of another assumes that one has oneself worked through the problems under review and come to the same conclusions. We do not mean by this that teamwork has no value or that fundamental theology conducted with the earlier direct methods has become impossible as a science, at least as an ideal to be aimed at. But the present situation is basically new. The goal of creating a comprehensive and well-grounded system of fundamental theology through direct work is no longer feasible. In earlier periods people studying in this area were always conscious of the fact that the work was always open to improvement and clarification, and that in the course of time new questions would constantly arise which would then require new answers. But one could quite justifiably be convinced that one had given satisfactory, positive answers in one's own fundamental theology to the questions raised by the intellectual needs of the day. Even today one can yield to the temptation of wishing to continue in the old style. But this means confining oneself to a philosophical and historical frame of reference which is no longer relevant to the present age. This need not imply that all one's statements and ideas are simply false, but it does mean that one does not make contact with the assumptions and outlook of others. If this were not the case, there could scarcely be so many atheists and other non-Christians alive today.

What fundamental theologian could seriously imagine that he has a comprehensive grasp of existentialism, linguistic philosophy, Anglo-Saxon positivism and structuralism? In this area who could suppose he has such a precise knowledge of Jewish theology at the time of Christ that he can provide an exact scientific exegesis of Mt 16 which is [159] correct from the point of view of fundamental theology, unless of course he specialises in this one narrow field, thereby losing his grasp of the thousand other problems facing fundamental theology? Who can claim as a fundamental theologian, as exegete or as historian of the early Church to be able to give a detailed and accurate account of the history of the Church's early development? In such an account the fundamental theologian must provide the necessary results in this area without giving up the attempt to be an expert in the numerous other fields of fundamental theology which are just as important. One could extend this list of questions indefinitely.

---

[2] Cf. on the question of pluralism in theology: K. Rahner, 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), pp. 3-23; 'Possible Courses for the Theology of the Future', Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 32-60.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We do not wish to question the value of the labours of earlier fundamental theologians who have tried to gain direct mastery of the problems they have encountered, but nevertheless a sober assessment forces one to conclude that this science with its established methods has ceased to be a practical possibility and has become a limit case, a remote ideal which may be aimed at but can never be fully realised. This situation naturally demands more detailed analysis from the angle of scientific theory but the above description may suffice for our purposes.

INDIRECT METHOD IN FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY?

What then is to be done if the fundamental theology is no longer available to modern man in the present situation, a science, that is, able to provide answers to the unavoidable problems of pluralism which the individual is no longer capable of mastering adequately in a positive and direct way? A method must be found to enable fundamental theology to study this situation in an indirect manner. Initially this leaves the question of what in fact is meant by 'indirectly' entirely open.

People are often faced by situations in which an absolute commitment is possible and necessary without their being able in advance rationally to reflect upon all the presuppositions and reasons which are involved in the decision. Thus the description of fundamental theology as it affects those who use it to help them reach decisions of faith is not an isolated or unique case. Rather it is obvious and commonplace that a person is often unable to subject the assumptions, reasons and motives of a free decision to sufficient rational reflection and objective analysis. This applies above all in cases when the decision is absolute and irrevocable. This fact does not require extensive explanation here. [160] Its basic cause is that all reflection which seeks to offer grounds for a decision is conducted within a given horizon of understanding and is affected by particular lines of interest. This does not mean that reflection should not be attempted at all or that it cannot at least be partially successful, but it does imply that it is influenced by psychological, cultural and social conditions which themselves cannot be the object of adequate study without engaging upon an infinite regress. Of course it is often the case that such conditions entirely escape attention and in fact such awareness is not an absolute requirement. But the man who makes a decision is then under the impression that he is aware of the conditions, reasons and motives for his decision, even if this turns out in fact to be an illusion. In other cases a person may be explicitly conscious of the inadequacy of his reflections. In this situation the problem arises for him of how he can legitimately reach a considered and carefully prepared decision, when his process of reflection is incomplete. The decision is more absolute than the reflection, for the latter is inevitably conditioned and provisional.

The fact that decisions are of this sort is confirmed by the theological observation that, according to the teaching of the Council of Trent,[3] no one has absolute conscious certainty about his state of grace, and therefore about the quality of his commitment to a relationship of faith, hope and love to God. There is a disparity in this case between rational reflection prior to a decision on the one hand, and the absolute quality of the decision itself on the other. This disparity is also noted in the 'analysis fidei' when one considers the relationship between the relative human certainty of the arguments provided by fundamental theology for the existence of a divine revelation and the absolute commitment of faith. The same problem is evidently involved here, whatever solutions are offered by the various theories of the 'analysis fidei'. At this point we cannot enter into further discussion of these solutions, nor is there any need

[3] Denz. 1540, 1565 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to do so.

In any event the various theories are scarcely satisfactory. Either they do not pay sufficient attention to the radical difference between the grounds of faith provided by fundamental theology and faith itself, or they simply appeal to the decision of 'the will'. But today it is precisely the former difference which is most strikingly evident. As regards the latter solution, the will is supposed to overcome the disparity mentioned above but it is never made clear what justifies a man in [161] making the absolute assent of faith. Recourse is made in this connection to illumination of grace through the Holy Spirit, to the grace of faith; now obviously this is a reality, but one must give some clearer indication what exactly it is, how it works and how it can overcome the disparity.

The question then remains: is there any theological theory to explain how the inadequacy and limitations of one's awareness of reasons and motives for an absolute decision can be overcome in a justifiable and at least 'manageable' way, when it comes to making such a total commitment?

METHODS OF 'CHOICE'

The elements at least of such a theological and spiritual theory seem to me to be present in Christian tradition, although it has not been properly considered in the 'analysis fidei' and in fundamental theology in general, nor fully worked out from a theological point of view. The clearest introduction to it is to be found, albeit more in the form of technical spiritual instructions than of a fully developed theological exposition, in the rules of choice contained in the Spiritual Exercises of St Ignatius.[4] This applies especially to the instructions which are called the first and second time of choice.[5] Naturally we cannot here undertake a detailed exegesis or a theological exposition of the teaching of Ignatius about choice. In fact this teaching has recently been subjected to extensive and penetrating analysis and considerable differences of theological opinion exist among scholars.[6] For our brief sketch it is [162] enough to say that the doctrine of Ignatius in its general outline can and should be used to resolve the contemporary problem of fundamental theology which concerns us here, assuming that the doctrine receives a clearer theological interpretation. For this purpose it is not necessary to go into the differences of theological interpretation given to the ideas of

---

[4] Ignatius Loyola, Spiritual Exercises (London, 1963) nos. 169-489.

[5] Ibid. nos. 175, 176.

[6] A bibliographical survey of the more recent studies is given by D. Gil, La consolacion sin causa precedente (Montevideo, 1971), pp. 121-128. In this work the author tries to provide an overall survey by means of a historical investigation of the relevant texts and commentaries. Recent investigations can be attached to the publication of the 'Monumenta Ignatiana'. In general, three important groups of interpretation evolve from this starting point: a Spanish, a French and a German. While the Spanish interpretations seem to concentrate on the exact analysis of the texts themselves, the French and German studies try to confront the contemporary situation. In the French context the Dictionnaive de Spiritualité (Paris, 1937 sqq.), initiated by M. Viller, became an important source and point of reference (8 vols. so far). In addition the influence of G. Fessard, La dialectique des 'Exercices Spirituels' de Saint Ignace de Loyola (Paris, 1956; new ed. 1966, two vols.), has become steadily stronger. For the present topic, see especially Vol. 1, 'Passage de l'avant a l'après', pp. 68-103. Cf. also the investigations in the periodical Christus (since 1954). In the German field of studies, see especially E. Przywara, Dens semper maior. Theologie der Exerzitien, 3 vols. (Freiburg i. Br., 1938-40). Of this work, H. Rahner said (ZkTh 64, 1940; p.171) that it 'leads theologically into the heart of the infinity of God, whence alone everything becomes clear'. H. Rahner should also be mentioned: most of his works on the subject are collected in Ignatius the Theologian (London, 1968). In this context, the author's study should be noted, since the basic ideas considered there are applied here to fundamental theology: 'The Logic of Concrete Individual Knowledge in Ignatius Loyola', The Dynamic Element in the Church, Quaestiones Disputatae 12 (Freiburg and London, 1964), pp. 84-156.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Ignatius; we need only state that this teaching belongs to the study of fundamental theology and the 'analysis fidei', quite irrespective of how particular theologians interpret it in detail.

The above claim requires fuller justification. What does Ignatius intend with his rules of the first and second time of choice? The content of choice which interests him (e.g. a religious vocation) is of course rather different from our concern. But this does not alter the fact that in contrast to the third time of choice, Ignatius's goal is total commitment to the will of God recognised as such, without this knowledge being solely derived from rational reflection upon the legitimacy and necessity of the object of choice itself. An absolute decision to embrace the will of God founded upon rational consideration of the object is left by Ignatius to the third time of choice, but in his view this takes second place to the two others since it applies to cases where no decision has been possible at the first and second time of choice. Thus he assumes that reflection on the object does not provide a clear indication that it is the absolute and unambiguous will of God. In this he is considering a decision situation which corresponds exactly to the one we are discussing. Through rational reflection upon an object the person who has to make a decision considers the object in itself and asks whether it is right for him. The result is a relative certainty of a greater or lesser degree about the will of God. The conviction that it is in fact God's will and demands an absolute commitment arises only from the experience of grace. This [163] implies a lived synthesis of the categorial object of choice and the absolute freedom of the spirit directed to the immediate reality of God. God is present in this experience 'without intermediary' and is not displaced by the object of choice.[7]

It is evident that we have here a spiritual guide and at least the elements of a theological theory which can and should be transferred to the 'analysis fidei', and to fundamental theology in general.[8] For the categorial content of faith and its rational foundations which are proposed in fundamental theology certainly form an object of choice of the requisite kind. It can be grasped as the 'will of God', as genuinely willed by God and 'revealed', just in the manner which Ignatius described in the first and second time of choice.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE 'CHOICE' FOR FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY

We need not discuss further here the difficult problems involved in the precise theological meaning of the rules of choice. The cultural and historical background and the general conclusions arising from this teaching which are relevant to a theological and philosophical

---

[7] Cf. G. Dumeige, 'Ignace de Loyola II. Experience et doctrine spirituelles', DD Sp 7, 1277-1306. Apart from the works already mentioned the following should also be noted: J. H. T. Van den Berg, De onderscheiding dergeesten in de correspondentie van S. Ignatius (Diss. Maastricht, 1958); H. Hagemann, 'Ignatian Discretion', Woodstock Letters 88 (1959), pp. 131-138; L. M. Estibalez, Discernimiento de espiritus (Bilbao, 1960); L.B. Bakker, Die Lehre der Ignatius von Loyola von der Discretio spirituum (Diss. Rome, 1963); F. Marxer, Die inneren geistlichen Sinne (Freiburg i. Br, 1963); M. A. Fiorito, 'Apuntes para una teologia del discernimiento de espiritus', Ciencia e fe 19 (1963), pp. 401-417 and 20 (1964), pp. 93-123; J. Ayestaran, La experiencia de la divina consolacion (Diss. Rome, 1964); P. Sbandi, Eine Untersuchung zur zweiten Wahlzeit in den geistlichen Ubungen (Diss. Innsbruck, 1966); E. Hernandez Gordils, Que su santisima voluntad sintamos y aquella enteramente la cumplamos (Diss. Rome, 1966); L. Marchand El Espiritu Santo en los Ejercicios espirituales (Diss. Rome, 1967); C. Lofy, The Action of the Holy Spirit in the Autobiography of St. Ignatius (Diss. Pierre, South Dakota, U.S.A., 1967); G. Bottereau, 'La Confirmation divine d'après le journal spirituel de S. Ignace', RAM 43 (1967), pp. 35-51.

[8] It seems that this was, almost unconsciously, investigated by P. Rousselot, Les yeux de la foi. The articles appeared in 1910 in Les Recherches de Science Religieuse, pp. 241-259 and 444-475. The fact that he did not make this dependence clear is overlooked even in recent studies: cf. E. Kunz, Glaube-Gnade-Geschichte. Die Glaubenstheologie des Pierre Rousselot S.J. (Frankfurt, 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

anthropology cannot be dealt with in detail here. The significance of these rules of choice for our problem also depends on the detailed theological [164] interpretation given to the ideas of Ignatius. However the spiritual writers are not themselves agreed today precisely on this point. Nevertheless the truth remains that a theory dealing with a categorial object of choice which is regarded as embodying absolute divine obligation cannot but be of importance for fundamental theology, if it is seriously and realistically to get to grips with the contemporary situation. This applies exactly to the understanding of the object, rational yet incomplete, which in the last analysis is ascribed to God and to the experience of his grace-filled and direct presence.

A task for any genuine fundamental theology is to develop a theology of the Ignatian choice as a precondition of the availability of an absolute decision of faith. Such an openness must at least theoretically contain the process of reflection proper to fundamental theology, a process which never reaches a definitive conclusion. It is not a question of the 'technical' assistance of a 'man of God', if one may put the matter thus. In the Exercises this is the case since the purpose is to bring the individual person to a concrete decision in faith in his own particular situation. Certainly there will always be this task for 'mystagogues' or masters of the spiritual life, and for preachers of the Gospel. But there is also the theoretical demand for fundamental theology to try to bridge the gap mentioned above between the grounds of credibility of Christian revelation and the actual decision to believe. This has always been a topic discussed in fundamental theology but the question was never satisfactorily worked out. Today it seems an impossible task given the methods used up to now. The logical structure of the practical reason operating in matters of faith and the grammar of existential commitment[9] must be subjects for fundamental theology to discuss, but these are materially identical with the rules of choice proposed by Ignatius Loyola. At any rate it is beyond doubt that he tackled the heart of the problem in his Exercises.

Modern theology seeks some connecting link in its treatment of the 'analysis fidei' between the relative certainty of the insights of fundamental theology and the absolute character of the assent of faith by appealing to the illuminating power of the grace of faith,[10] and this certainly provides the elements of a satisfactory solution, but the grace [165] of faith must not appear as a theological postulate, a 'deus ex machina' which lies quite beyond verification, and this demands that some indication is given about what exactly the grace of faith is like. It must be made clear how it is to be grasped as the radical reference of the transcendence of man to the immediate reality of God, and therefore as a fundamental element present in human consciousness, i.e. a 'supernatural' formal object. Finally it has to be explained how this grace-filled reference to the immediate presence of God forms a synthesis, in a manner which is basically open to verification, with the categorial object of revelation, so that revelation acquires credibility and thus enables a man, albeit with total freedom, to give the absolute assent of faith.

J. H. Newman attempted to bridge the same gap with his theory of the 'illative sense' which created a unified credibility out of converging but disparate items of knowledge.[11] The positive elements in this doctrine certainly remain of permanent value but the question is still left open of what exactly this spiritual power of synthesis signifies, if it is not taken merely as a capacity proper to practical reason which seeks to retain its independence in every area of life in the face of the logical processes of theoretical reason. Clearly a decision of the practical reason is involved, and one which is directed to God himself and his free presence

[9] Cf. K. Rahner, op. cit. (footnote 6).
[10] Cf. in addition to P. Rousselot (footnote 8), H. Urs von Balthasar, Love Alone: the Way of Revelation (London, 1968). Balthasar regards the interpretation of the Exercises given by G. Fessard as 'very dangerous', and himself agrees with E. Przywara.
[11] Cf. J. H. Newman, An Essay in Aid of a Granunar of Assent ch. 9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the contingencies of history which evade a totally rational analysis. The decision has a quality of uniqueness which cannot be covered by the general structure of the illative sense proper to practical reason. If one seeks to discover the specific character of this sense from a theological point of view, one may be led quite reasonably to consider the theology of the choice of an object in history. This object is recognised as the 'will of God', although the one making the choice is unable to reduce the divine volition entirely to the objective legitimacy of the object chosen. Again we return to the postulate of a theology of decision of a kind at least intimated by Ignatius of Loyola.

Perhaps the somewhat depressing assertion would not be out of place that Jesuit theology has not always and in every respect brought the heritage of Ignatian spirituality into effective use in the course of history. One could point to many lines of thought found in this spirituality whose unique qualities have not been translated into theological reflection or accorded the weight which their intrinsic importance merits. One has the impression that Jesuits have regarded [166] Ignatius as a pious and holy man whose achievements earned him an important place in the history of the Church. But he has scarcely been treated in his own right as one of the central figures in the development of spirituality at the beginning of the modern period. Thus Jesuits have a duty towards the founder of the order which has not yet been fulfilled in their theological work.[12] To the retort that Ignatius was no theologian, one should point out that he was more, not less, than a theologian, and that in consequence he can set tasks even for tomorrow's theology. One of these tasks we may have indicated in the brief compass of this essay.

[12] This statement is made without regard to the works mentioned in the above footnotes because these works have had practically no effect in the realm of theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[167]

PART THREE

Listening to Scripture

[169]

10

THE ACCEPTANCE IN FAITH OF THE TRUTH OF GOD

In every period of history the experience of human need and guilt arouses the expectation among men of an answer from God which would bestow forgiveness and salvation upon man, both individually and in his existence in society and history. This gives depth and clarity to what one can say about the mutual dependence of faith and knowledge.[1] These ideas should now be brought into critical contact with a contemporary situation which may seem to make man deaf to the call of faith, but could perhaps bring him to a more acute sensitivity in a new way.

THE PRESENT SITUATION: A GOD-LESS WORLD.

Until the beginning of the modern period the human picture of the world was so modest and transparent that nearly everywhere the limit was soon reached; its spatial and temporal dimensions were so constructed in human thought that God was for actual experience practically a piece of the world, who dwelt perhaps in heaven but in a sort of heaven which was a continuation, in the same mode, of the spatio-temporal world. Today the picture of the world has been transformed and deepened to an extraordinary degree and the whole situation has altered. The world has become a self-contained whole which is not [170] open to God at particular points and does not flow into the divine sphere; it does not experience the impact of divine causality at specific individual points which are open to human observation (prescinding for the moment from the supernatural history of salvation). It is only as a whole, and therefore in a less demonstrable manner, that it points to God as its precondition. This easily leads to the conclusion that God cannot be found anywhere, for everywhere it is the world that one meets.

Towards the end of the 18th century and during the 19th there existed a theoretical and practical atheism which was so criminally naive and culpably superficial that it asserted God's non-existence with complete certainty. It produced no men of genius and now it belongs basically to the past, although it is still today a mass psychosis and the dogma of a militant world view. The case is rather different with the 'atheism of anxiety', if the phenomenon we have in mind may be so described. The horror at God's absence in the world, the dismay at his silence, at his self-imprisonment in his own remoteness, at the meaningless secularisation of the world's laws, where this involves man and not nature, this

[1] This essay was originally published as thesis XVIII in the collection, 'Warum Glauben?' Begründung und Verteidigung des Glaubens in einundvierzig Thesen, eds. W. Kern and G. Stachel (Wurzburg, 1967) pp. 169-176. There the author referred to what was said by the other writers, since it was necessary to bring out the transition from the first part of the work, 'Man and God', to the second part, 'Jesus Christ and his Church'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whole experience leads a man to suppose that he must profess theoretical atheism; it is in fact a genuine intuition of the depths of existence with which for long the customary thinking and speech of Christianity has not come to terms. At root it is the experience that God does not belong inside one's picture of the world, that he is really God and not some demiurge or the main spring of the universal clock, and that for every normal event a cause exists which is not God himself.

This experience is falsely interpreted if one supposes that only this-worldly, a-theistic experience is granted to man. The point is to show how man always transcends this experience and that the experience of the 'atheism of anxiety' basically indicates the growth of God in the spirit of man.

PRIOR CONDITIONS

A man never fashions his picture of the world with complete originality or freedom from prior assumptions. He always starts with an inherited world view. We begin with a 'given' world, not only a world of objects but also a mental world. This mental world, behind which we cannot entirely penetrate, has a double face, one metaphysical and one historical. The metaphysical assumptions consist of a series [171] of propositions which are continually being partially 'verified' by experience but can never be actually proved, propositions of the kind that 'worldliness' is a universal phenomenon which always and everywhere conforms to the law of non-contradiction, that everything has a sufficient reason. Such preliminary, a priori structures of thought and being only reveal their legitimacy to those who freely entrust themselves to them; there is no point of reference outside them from which they can be justified.

We do not inherit merely a set of metaphysical principles; we also receive an already formed world picture which has been moulded by tradition. Even if we regard it with the greatest mistrust, engage in revolutionary protest against it, we are nevertheless not free of it; we are still involved with this world view and not with another. Even in the natural sciences we only discover what can be found in the direction in which investigation has been conducted. The discovery can never disclose what was overlooked or missed, or prove that the missing element would not have been of greater importance than the one found. Neither an individual nor a historical period can break out in every direction simultaneously and make a total discovery of everything; every conquest is also a renunciation. The only question is, how to make the sort of renunciation in one's conquests which does not involve a fatal loss.[2]

THE BASIC FIRST PRINCIPLE

If the scientific picture of the world is so conditioned, then it cannot claim to be the primary and most fundamental element of human existence. The truth of religion, the knowledge of God and faith in his historical revelation comes before it. We must always hold fast to the conviction that there are not two truths, which contradict each other and are mutually exclusive. In fact in cases of apparent conflict both sides must engage in honest self-criticism and try to discover the cause of the seeming contradiction. But religion is not simply to be

[2] Only in this sense may the shortened form of the doctrines of faith be used, a 'dangerous' expression in theological discussion. In any event a lively awareness is required which basically admits that every gain is bought at the price of a loss and that, in consequence, the vital preservation of the Christian message in a living form is only to be expected from the community of believers as a whole.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

handed over to science and its world picture. Religion is a higher reality since [172] it arises from a prior and more fundamental level of existence. Every process of constructing and imagining a world, every attempt to order and comprehend the multiplicity of things occurs within the prior horizon of understanding, is directed to the incomprehensible, the unimaginable reality we call God. This reality is not a part of the world or of a picture of the world; it is an incomprehensible infinity[3] lying behind the world's multiplicity. In so far as it is the transcendent source and goal of knowledge and cannot be conceived in objective categories, it must be thought of as a personal spirit,[4] since it is also the foundation of all personal beings existing in the world.

The transcendence of God has been an explicit and permanent theme of Christian metaphysics. It has been realised that God does not belong to the world picture as the ultimate hypothesis, but rather forms the precondition of the world and knowledge of the world, in such a way that direct human perception of God is impossible and only indirect knowledge lies open to man. He is grasped as the unconditioned, to which the experience of multiplicity and its limits points without consigning its inner reality to human comprehension. Nevertheless it is only in the contemporary situation that this knowledge is explicitly entering the realm of lived emotion and the real heart of human existence.

CHRISTIANITY AND RELIGIONS

Set in the general context of religion and the encounter with God, Christianity does not stand as a rival to the scientific picture of the world which so deeply marks our contemporary thinking. But Christian faith does not merely consist of the silent worship of the nameless God; it is also the word of God addressed to man in human language which must name in a range of particular conceptual propositions the reality of God which lies beyond names. This faith consists, therefore, of history, institution, authority, commandment.

[173] In this more concrete sense competition is more evident between Christianity and a world picture, and this seems to produce antinomies and conflict. The revelation of God is expressed in human words and concepts which are in part conditioned by pictures of the world. We do not need at this point to discuss the well known tensions which over the past centuries have burdened the relationship between the Catholic doctrines of faith and modern science, the question, for instance, of the post-Copernican system, the age of the world, the theory of evolution as applied to the physical nature of man, and similar topics. Over the years the apparent contradictions between the two sides which these questions contain have been overcome, and the topics themselves are today only of methodological interest in that they constitute a warning to each side against the transgression of proper limits.

More fundamentally we can say that we are more sensitive than earlier and less complex generations to analogical terms applied to God, his truth and his saving acts. Expressions such as 'Jahweh roars', 'it grieves God', which appear quite naturally in the Old Testament, are not so easily employed today. Whether this is altogether an advantage is a matter we can leave open at the moment. To lessen the imaginative clarity of an expression represents a more serious danger than is often supposed. But in general the constricting sense of the inexact and pictorial character of talk about God, even if it appears in revelation, is simply an

[3] Cf. W. Kern: Human knowledge always goes beyond itself to the infinite mystery of God, which only God himself can reveal to us. Thus, knowledge and faith are dependent upon each other. Warum Glauben? (Wurzburg, 1967), pp. 151-159.

[4] Cf. J. de Vries: The intentional ordering of life proves the existence of a spirit which transcends the world; also O. Muck: Human knowledge and will, which naturally strive for infinite being and value, are only possible if God is the goal of this striving. Both in: Warum Glauben? (Wurzburg, 1967), pp. 100-109 and 118-127.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unavoidable fact of our times, and one which may in some ways be a blessing. For to grasp that God is an incomprehensible and inexpressible being who transcends all our propositions is a blessing, and means a growth in the knowledge of God. This knowledge is bought at the cost of the sadness of wandering in shadows and images, in the words Cardinal Newman had written on his tomb. But this is no justification for doubting the truth and importance of the meaning intended by these inadequate propositions. The knowledge they contain is more valuable than all worldly knowing. To be able to stammer about God is in the end more important than to speak precisely about the world. Theology knows well enough that stammering is all it can do. The difficulty attributed to theology by men today is seldom as novel as they imagine since they are unaware of the centuries of labour and effort which has been expended in the attempt to expound and interpret the revealed word of God.

But however untiring the efforts to provide clarity and meaning, theologians also realise that fundamentally they are reduced to stammering [174] when it comes to speaking of God. All possible explanation leaves the mystery of God intact. Theology is not the unmasking of the mysterious in the self-evident but rather a gaze into the bright darkness of divine mysteries. Total clarity would be a sure sign that the spurious self-evidence of human rationalism had been mistaken for the truth of God.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE BIBLE

There are other ideas arising from the inadequacy of all human concepts in speaking of God which have a closer connection to the scientific picture of the world of an earlier age. When we say, God is in heaven, the Son of God came down to earth, descended into hell, etc., then a world picture is evidently assumed which is no longer ours, although it retained its validity in theology until the 18th century. The collapse of this picture of the world seems to demand a ‘demythologisation’ of the biblical message. This question takes us into the territory of exegesis but one basic observation is in order as a preparatory move to make one more sensitive to the word embodied in historical revelation. Considered from a more fundamental standpoint, demythologisation is not required for two reasons: first ‘mythological’ statements retain their meaning even after the disappearance of the world picture in which they originated.[5] Secondly this meaning is the same as that originally intended. It can be shown that even at the time the intended content of the statements were not basically identified with the material provided by the current world view. It is true that in past ages there was little conscious reflection on the distinction between the form and content of propositions. But it was realised, even if on the edge of consciousness as it were, that such a distinction was both possible and necessary. In the case of eschatological statements, for instance, which presuppose the ancient cosmology, such freedom and so little consistency is employed that even at the time it was clearly recognised that not everything could be taken with absolute literalness. Today indeed, the intended meaning can be given a more valid sense, which is independent of the shift of world view. Just as the ancients evidently realised that ‘sitting on the right hand of God’ is an [175] imaginative construction, and yet still expresses genuine meaning, so we can recognise today that the ascension into heaven does not mean a change of location in our physical space, and yet has a valid significance.

Plainly, then, these statements have not become poorer in content for us, and yet the awareness of faith today does share the increasing opacity common to the general scientific [5] On the exegetical validity of a limited demythologisation, cf. A. Vögtle: not every form of a ‘demythologisation’ of the New Testament is false to Scripture; in, Warum Glauhen? (Wurzburg, 1967), pp. 209-220.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

level of consciousness (the developments of modern physics would be a case in point). But the fact of diminishing transparency does not need in the long run to lessen the vital impact of statements of faith. But, as was suggested earlier, greater opacity betokens a gain as well as a loss. It lessens the danger of the naive reduction of religious realities; the inexpressible greatness of God and of human existence before God become clearer. Certainly modern man must first settle down to this new situation and such a process of change demands time.

LISTENING TO THE WORD OF GOD

The change we have described does not mean the escape from the limits of history into a non-historical mastery of the message of revelation; rather it points in a new way to the necessity for man of grasping the word of God in so far as it bestows meaning from within his given situation. He cannot embrace this situation totally in advance by reflection. The reverse is in fact true: revelation first answers the question for him which is signified by his actual situation. The specific historical and metaphysical existence of man cannot be constructed by scientific reflection even on the intellectual level. Religion, seen as the knowledge of God and reception of his revealed word, is prior to the reflective, scientific picture of the world. The 19th century belief that science by itself could provide a basic structure for human existence which was free from any prior assumptions expresses an outlook which, historically speaking, is now dying. That in fact the enterprise could not succeed is not of any particular importance. It has become plain that to expect science to serve as a ‘creed’ for the foundation of human existence is to overburden its capacities.[6] A scientific picture of the world cannot manufacture a picture of man. The reverse is in fact true: prior to and behind science there lie metaphysics and faith, higher [176] and more comprehensive forces which with all the knowledge belonging to them are essentially ordered to freedom and commitment.

A serious attempt to come to terms with this insight necessarily yields a directive of crucial importance: to prevent reflective science becoming a poisonous and random curiosity and a relativistic capacity of instant creation, the roots of the unreflective understanding and harmony of being must not be cut off; rather they must penetrate at least as deeply into the subsoil of existence as the objectifying reflections of science which range ever further in the world of secular experience in all its extent and variety.

The remarkable thing about the present situation is that science itself is coming to this realisation and does not have to be forced to accept it from outside. In the same way philosophy is aware of its limits, without the constant reminder of an opposing religious faith being necessary. By referring to history and tradition in this way man learns to listen to the word of God which is the object of his hope, the saving answer given by the living God in human history which offers meaning to man. It is spoken in the shadows and parables of human language, for how else could it be understood? But it contains the promise of absolute truth which justifies and makes possible all the creative thought and action of man.

[6] Cf. K. Rahner, ‘Science as a “Confession”?’ Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 385-400.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[177]

11

THE OLD TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN DOGMATIC THEOLOGY

The title of this essay might arouse expectation for an exegetical study.[1] The following reflections, however, are concerned with the question of how a dogmatic theologian can deal with the books of the Old Testament, given that he maintains the dogmatic principles of inspiration and inerrancy in the Old Testament and has an impartial attitude to the results of modern exegesis.

It is not an easy matter to bridge the gap between dogmatic theology and exegesis in the case of the New Testament, and so it is hardly surprising that the same task is still more difficult in the case of the Old. The question is one of course which has occupied the attention of Christian theology at every period. From the very beginning the Church claimed the Old Testament to be its own holy book and proclaimed its God, i.e. the father of Jesus Christ, to be the author of the history and book of the Old Testament.[2] In this connection rules of hermeneutics necessary for the understanding of [178] the Law and the Prophets, as the New Testament described the Old,[3] had to be thought out; various suggestions were put forward to solve the problem. In the same way the biblical encyclicals of the last hundred years from Leo XIII to Pius XII were intended to facilitate the understanding of the Old Testament by emphasising the basic criteria of interpretation, so that modern exegesis of the Old Testament and dogmatic teaching about the bible should be in harmony. It should not be doubted or disputed that these pronouncements of the Church's magisterium and the theological opinions they support were quite justified and still retain their value. The basic idea that none of the very diverse literary genres present in the Old Testament is necessarily an obstacle to its being the inspired word of God naturally retains its significance, and its application resolves a whole series of questions are connected to the problem mentioned above. The same applies to the important notion that the meaning these literary genres express is in harmony with the inspiration and inerrancy of the bible, given an unbiased, precise and correct understanding of the genre in question.

THE RANGE OF THE TOPIC

Does this idea really solve all the relevant questions? Or must the answers gained by its use be considered within a larger and more comprehensive framework, without diminishing their importance in the slightest, in order to find a really satisfactory solution. From this point of view it must be verified whether the usual appeal to the various literary genres in the case of problems raised by the Old Testament can give adequate and convincing weight to the

[1] On the problem of the relation of exegesis and dogma, cf. K. Rahner, 'Exegesis and Dogmatic Theology', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 67-93; on the importance of the Old Testament, 'Old Testament Theology', Sacramentum Mundi IV (London and New York, 1969), pp. 286-290 (bibliog.). 'Theos in the New Testament', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 79-148; 'Christianity and the Non-Christian Religions', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966); 'The Secret of Life', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 141-152.
[2] This was especially important against Marcion; cf. H. Rahner, 'Markion', LThK VII (Freiburg, 1962), 92 sq.; J. Quasten, Patrology I (Utrecht and Brussels, 1950), pp. 268-272; B. Altaner, Patrology (Freiburg and London, 1960), pp. 143-144.
[3] For this expression, cf. Mt. 5:17; 7:12; 22:40; Lk 16:16; 24:44; Jn 1:45; Rev 24:14; 28:23; Rom 3:21.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

inspiration and inerrancy of these books. If not, then it would be necessary to propose explicitly another principle in addition to the literary genres. This principle is often overlooked, although its application can alone make the idea of biblical inerrancy, as this is traditionally deduced from inspiration, clear and intelligible. Of course such efforts would be superfluous from the start, were we to adopt the position taken by many Catholic theologians today, which is opposed to the pronouncement of the magisterium, or at least to its manner of formulation, and which allows for the occurrence of error even in the inspired text. The distinction used to be made between propositions of a historical and scientific kind and those of a properly religious type, and the [179] possibility of error was allowed in the former case but not in the latter. Today, however, this distinction is frequently not drawn. If it is allowed or asserted that erroneous propositions can and do occur in the bible, then this usually includes statements of any kind, and it is only the substance of Scripture as a whole which is regarded as free from error.

This tempting possibility of resolving the problem in one swift blow will not be pursued here since we share the traditional view that in the Old Testament, at least statements of moral and religious import do not contain error. Of course this means excluding errors only on condition that the properly intended meaning embodied in the literary genre under consideration is correctly understood. With this proviso genuine errors which concern religious truths of the Old Testament cannot be admitted. The question, however, remains open whether in fact the solution proposed here is net in harmony with the true intentions of those who support the possibility of scriptural error. It would then simply be a matter of a difference of terminology and of the binding force, if any, of the official terminology of the Church upon a theologian.

SPECIFIC DIFFICULTIES IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

The solution we propose has grown out of consideration of specific difficulties which arise for the dogmatic theologian today in dealing with the Old Testament. Our first task is to point these out in order to make the ensuing line of thought intelligible. The difficulties we mention can be overcome by means of the solution which should be added to the traditional theory, or, to put the matter slightly differently, should be worked out on the basis of the latter theory. This does not mean that the theologian wishes to offer the exegete new material. Rather he is simply presenting the problems in a straightforward manner without providing the complete body of exegetical proof. Certainly the theologian will put in some reflections of his own here and there in course of his exposition, in order to clarify the difficulties as he perceives them on the basis of his theological convictions. The modern exegete may of course take a different view, since he has been accustomed to leave the task to the theologian of showing how the Old Testament text can be reconciled with the dogmatic principle of scriptural inerrancy. Here we are not claiming to enumerate all the problems or to arrange them in an enlightening systematic structure.

[180] A first well known problem for the theologian is the heno-theism[4] contained in the older parts of the Old Testament which stands in a certain opposition to the monotheism proper of the Jewish religion. For these early texts provide evidence that Yahweh was the only God to be worshipped by the people of his covenant, but that this position did not exclude the existence of other gods belonging to other nations. It is true that many Old

[4] Cf. W. Holsten, RGG III (Tübingen, 1959), 225; J. Haekel, LThK V (Freiburg, 1960), 233. For the Old Testament question, both general and particular, see Fr. Heiler, Erscheinungsformen und Wesen der Religion (Stuttgart, 1961), pp. 323, 460.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Testament passages merely bear witness to the historical fact of henotheism and in this sense are true; one cannot derive from these statements any conclusion about the objective validity of henotheism, since it is here a matter of historical narrative and not of theological truths. This explanation may apply in a number of instances, especially in cases where elements from an earlier understanding of the world and from a more primitive language were used as poetic texts at a later period. But all this does not rule out the view that there are henotheistic assertions in the Old Testament which, at least at an early stage, were meant in a theological sense. To point out in answer to this that such texts would have received a new meaning when included in the broader framework of God's inspired word seen as a whole is merely, in my view, to push the problem one stage further back. For if such statements are transposed into a new context which relativises and transforms them, if, that is, an appeal is made to the 'analogia fidei',[5] then it would still be necessary to work out their meaning more clearly and explain how the text in question was in origin essentially open to such new interpretation and suited for it. But this already leads us to the theory which we wish to offer as a solution.

A second question affecting the inerrancy of the Old Testament arises from the fact that the more ancient layers of these books know nothing of individual survival after death regarded as a positive phenomenon. In this case, too, the lack of knowledge does not necessarily imply that the unknown state of affairs is denied. Further it could be shown that pessimistic assertions about death and sheol do not refer to the condition of the dead after death, but rather to the experience of death itself. Or we might say that such statements may [181] be regarded as entirely correct in that they express a permanently valid and tenable notion of the 'limbus patrum'[6] in the history of salvation. But even so explanations of this kind do not offer an entirely convincing answer to the problem. For the pious Jew in the Old Testament experienced death as his exclusion from the saving history of God and his people, and so from the saving power of God himself. He gave religious expression to this feeling and drew moral and religious conclusions from it. So his ignorance of existence after death and its positive worth passed over to a direct denial of such an existence. This on the face of it appears a case of basic error.

A third problem centres quite understandably on the egoistic nationalism which is given religious expression in the Old Testament and for which theological justification is sought. Leaving aside the later prophets, we see Yahweh taking so primitive and exclusive a stance in favour of the people of his covenant that political and military victories are quite naturally treated as acts of Yahweh, and the ensuing death and destruction of other nations accepted without question as the simple consequence of his partisan support for Israel. Even the cruelties of the contemporary war ethic are quite logically traced back to the positive will of God, who desires the extermination of his enemies and watches over obedience to this commandment with threats of punishment. Earlier attempts have been made to answer these questions by saying that God is the sovereign Lord of the life of all men, and therefore can champion the cause of one nation in order to forward his providential designs for salvation; thus he is able not merely to allow the extermination of enemies but even to command it.[7] In this connection there can be no doubt of the moral quality of this seemingly egoistic nationalism: the people of the covenant were positively allowed to act in a way which was held to be immoral for other nations. On this ground we are justified in regarding this as nationalism. The conception of the covenant was not that of an ideology which merely sought

[5] Cf. L. Scheffczyk, 'Analogy of Faith', Sacramentum Mundi I (London and New York, 1968), pp. 25-27. More fully, E. Mechels, Analogie bei Erich Przywara und Karl Barth (Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1974).
[6] Cf. P. Gumpel, LTHK VI (Freiburg, 1961), 1057-1059.
[7] Examples of this line of argument are to be found in moral theology text books; cf. also, N. Peters, 'Die spezielle Sittenlehre', in G. Esser andJ. Maus bach, Religion – Christentum – Kirche II (Kempten, 1923), pp. 83-96.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to give positive value to a normal antagonism between nations.

Finally there are the well known difficulties arising from the prophecies and the historical and theological interpretations made by prophets living at the time of the fall of the kingdom and after. The [182] future they proclaim contains contradictions which cannot be simply resolved by an appeal to the element of freedom constituted by faith or apostasy which would determine the actual shape of these future events. In conclusion we should mention the problem which stems from the acceptance of religious and theological conceptions found in the world surrounding the Old Testament, for these have an influence upon the theological statements contained in the Old Testament and lead to results which cannot easily be given internal consistency. This brings us to the question whether such assertions and laws can really claim to be divine revelation.

All these difficulties have only been briefly noted here but they can scarcely be resolved by means of literary genres alone without doing violence to the facts, even though the latter principle does in general offer a solution to numerous problems.

THE HIGHER UNITY OF THEOLOGICAL TRUTHS

Where can we discover the appropriate principle and context by which to understand and explain the difficulties we mentioned, in such a way that error is not included? The answer presupposes that the theological character of the statement in question is taken into careful consideration. For only as theological assertions can they claim to express divine revelation in the proper sense of the term. It is only, too, from this perspective that the meaning of inerrancy and error can be accurately defined with reference to these statements. Of course they can be declared true or erroneous in so far as they correctly describe the object to which they correspond. But it remains to be shown nevertheless that the intended object in theology is God and nothing else. All that is other than God can in principle only constitute the material content of a statement of revelation and therefore possess a corresponding inerrancy if and when this content is related to God. Taken in isolation by itself it cannot be the object of revelation since, as an inner worldly state of affairs, it is in principle open to secular human understanding and is thus not the right sort of object to be revealed in a personal, divine self-disclosure.

For this reason perception of an inner-worldly reality can only be an instance of revelation if, and in so far as, the object itself and knowledge of it are set within the spiritual movement by which a man accepts in faith the personal self-communication of God through grace and the Spirit which constitutes the primary event of revelation. In [183] this way he can appropriate the inner-worldly reality, since in it the relationship to the self-revelation of God unfolds.[8] The description of such an inner-worldly state of affairs would not in this case be erroneous, in the sense of a revealed truth, to the degree to which the statement and its content did not displace the openness of the spiritual movement to the direct reality of God. With regard to revelation inerrancy of this sort does not demand essentially and in every instance that such a proposition, considered by itself apart from its place within this spiritual movement, i.e. according to purely secular standards and criteria, should correspond to the facts and in this sense be free from error.

The positive inclusion of such a statement and its content within the primary revelation, i.e. the movement of the spirit caused by God's self-revelation and directed to the immediate divine presence, can occur in a provisional way if the statement is experienced and accepted, [8] Cf. K. Rahner, Hearers of the Word (London and Sydney, 1969); 'Theology and Anthropology', Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 28-45.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

without reflective awareness of its goal, as an ongoing process open to an unplanned future. In addition, however, the absolute goal of this movement, i.e. the immediate divine reality, can be explicitly and consciously recognised as the fundamental horizon of understanding and of interpretation of all inner-worldly propositions. Furthermore it is possible that the successful attainment by this spiritual movement of the direct presence of God may be affirmed and experienced as a reality and not merely as a possibility. In the first case where the ultimate horizon of understanding, which constitutes revelation and inerrancy, is grasped and made actual in particular objects of knowledge, we find the manner of revelation proper to the Old Testament. If one goes beyond this to the direct presence of God, then we encounter the mode of revelation proper to the New Testament.

THE OPENNESS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

To gain a better understanding of what has been said, we should note that only Christianity possesses, or rather establishes, a single binding canon of Old Testament books.[9] The extent and the binding theological character of the books collected in the Old Testament can only be [184] defined for us, and indeed in itself, by reference to the New Testament, even if this collection of books existed before Jesus Christ and was respected as sacred scripture in pre-Christian Judaism. However the canonicity which may be attached to them cannot for Christians pass over, independently of Jesus Christ, to the sacred writings of other religions despite the recognition that these books are in some measure special.

We must also reflect that the individual books of the Old Testament, and still more particular statements within them, can only be interpreted as possessing theological significance in so far as they are read and understood within the framework of the whole of the Old Testament. The inclusion of a particular writing in the corpus of the Old Testament can be recognised as valid for us by reference to Christ, in that this corpus forms a written expression and description of the history of salvation, which, though pre-Christian, leads directly to Christ and possesses normative value for a Christian. In this process of inclusion the actual event of inspiration is to be located; only within the totality of the Old Testament can the particular statements of particular books be correctly interpreted and understood as being free from error.

Thirdly we should remember that the Old Testament collection is a record of the history of God and his people and thus expresses a spiritual movement which is open to the uncontrollable activity of the God of history. Theoretical assertions should not be separated from this record, if they are to be correctly understood and are true. Of course the absolute goal of this open-ended movement is not consciously grasped on this level, as it is later in the New Testament when the goal is achieved in Jesus Christ. If the openness of the history, contained in the covenant and promise and governed by the sovereign and unpredictable freedom of God, is recognised as the basic principle of understanding proper to the Old Testament,[10] a principle which is explicitly expressed and widely assumed, then there is available a hermeneutical principle by which to understand the particular statements of the Old Testament and to make intelligible the real inerrancy of these truths. This inerrancy is to be found in the fact that the particular phenomena and the statements referring to them are always open to the spiritual movement of history ordered to the sovereign mastery of God. This openness is permanently present and is accepted in faith. [185] The spiritual movement

[9] On the canon of scripture, cf. K. Rahner, LThK V (Freiburg, 1960), 1283 sq.; on the Old Testament, P. Katz, 'The Old Testament Canon in Palestine and Alexandria', ZNW 46 (1956), pp. 191-217.
[10] This concept is intended to cover both pre-Christian Jewish history and the book which witnesses to it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is of course brought about by the self-communication of God in grace.

What has been proposed so far may seem more or less self-evident. The position, however, we have adopted becomes more critical when it is assumed that there can be statements about inner-worldly phenomena in this positive revelation which can be 'true', although considered in themselves outside this ultimate horizon of understanding they do not correspond to the intended inner-worldly reality, and on this level are false. In other words inner-worldly states of affairs which in themselves are not grasped correctly and 'false' interpretations of them can nevertheless positively assist the absolute movement towards God. In so far as they achieve this, they can and should be rightly described as true in the sense of truth which consists in the open-ended movement to God arising from God's own self-communication and the grace and revelation it contains. Thus, to put the matter briefly, inner-worldly error can lead to absolute truth. This error must then be itself 'true' because it is taken up into the movement directed to the absolute divine reality.

This possibility seems to me to be the critical point of the theory put forward here. And yet nothing new is being proposed except the application of a well known and accepted principle to our basic problem. It cannot seriously be denied that an inner-worldly confusion and the error attached to it can be the medium of saving action, through which faith, hope, and the love of God come to fulfilment. In consequence it can and should be called true in cases where it is properly established that it is positively integrated in the spiritual movement directed to God himself. Of course in most instances in real life we cannot have certain knowledge of this. We can only, therefore, measure the inner-worldly misinterpretations according to inner-worldly criteria, understand them in a secular horizon of meaning and ultimately treat such confusions and our comprehension of them as cases of error.

But if it is established in a particular case that something which is mistaken and incorrect from an inner-worldly standpoint positively assists the absolute movement towards God, then we are justified in declaring such an interpretation to be true, as long as we do not intend to use the analogy of 'simul justus et peccator'[11] and prefer to call these propositions simultaneously 'true and false'. The latter option appears [186] untenable both because it creates a scarcely intelligible paradox and because the linguistic usage of the Church stands against it.

Since the history of the Old Testament from Abraham on is the direct pre-history of Jesus Christ, it is positively directed as a whole to the immediate presence of God. In so far as particular events and propositions are recognised as legitimate parts of this history, the propositions must be treated as true; their legitimacy means here that the historical movement can only find practical realisation through particular phenomena and their interpretation.

THE APPLICATION OF THE SOLUTION

The solution we have reached to the interpretation of particular Old Testament statements which can be considered true, despite all the difficulties attached to them, should now be applied to the line of thought to which the fact of their truth gives rise. Thus it should be made clearer how the assertions in question can be made intelligible and shown to be true. Here we can only offer a few brief and simple comments on the practical application of this theory. For example, is a man who regards himself only as a henotheist not nearer to the God of salvation history, and therefore closer to the truth, if a state of polytheism exists around him which he cannot personally remove, than a person who attempts in this situation the [11] Cf. K. Rahner, 'What is a Dogmatic Statement?', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 42-66.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

impossible task of being a monotheist? Under these conditions the latter could perhaps mean no more than the abandonment of the God of a specific history of salvation, the God, that is, of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in favour of the shadowy figure of the God of the philosophers. If, on the other hand, he declares his exclusive loyalty in a henotheistic sense to the God of the covenant, then by maintaining the contrast between theoretical henotheism and exclusive allegiance to Yahweh he achieves the clearest recognition of the living God open to him. In this situation henotheism is the goad of absolute acknowledgement of Yahweh and as such possesses greater truth than the abstract form of monotheism.

The history of truth is one which cannot satisfactorily be organised by means of our system of logic. If we are placed because of this history in an existential situation in which we are explicitly summoned by the hope of eternal life, whether we wish it or not, then there is no way back for us to the condition in which the people of the Old Testament found themselves and which prevented them from looking beyond their collective and inner-worldly concept of salvation history. [187] If we did do so, we would be denying our ultimate destiny in the direct experience of God. By contrast, in the context of the Old Testament, this state of affairs possessed a positive function in the history of salvation, for it was the means of achieving a relationship of total surrender to the sovereignty of God's freedom. At that period it could be an expression of the truth since it was the only real way available of treating life with absolute seriousness.

The egoistic nationalism of Old Testament Judaism was certainly not revealed as such and was only willed by God in the sense in which the whole history of the world is willed; here, however, we cannot without ambiguity apply the distinction between 'willed' and 'permitted' to specific historical periods. But in a particular historical period exclusive, egoistic nationalism could, at least partially and over a long stretch of time, be one practical way in which a man could put himself totally at the disposal of God as Lord of this history. Thus statements about such a form of nationalism could be true. The war ethic, with all its cruelties, was perhaps the only means, given the circumstances of ancient Israel, of enabling Israel to assert its identity as the people of the covenant, so that the war ethic could be perceived at that time as the will and revelation of God. In that period it could be the only possible, and therefore the true, medium of obedience to the God of history. The predictions of particular prophets made as a result of the national catastrophe in Israel may be contradictory taken in detail. However in the circumstances of the time the individual prophet could only perhaps give expression to his hope in the saving Lord of history and the absolute future through these particular prophecies. Despite their internal contradiction they could, then, be counted as true in a deeper and more comprehensive sense, just as if the material content of their predictions were in simple harmony with each other.

The truths brought into the Old Testament from alien religions and cultures over a long historical period cannot easily be reconciled either with each other or with the basic assertions of belief in Yahweh. In addition the difficult problem can arise, for instance in the case of belief in angels or the devil, that conceptions originating outside the Old Testament could either be asserted absolutely or only within the hypothesis, which was in the end left undecided, that they were valid in themselves. The questions we have mentioned demand further investigation. However, whether the material content, which came from a variety of sources, is correct in itself or only assumed as a hypothesis, the statements under discussion did express the religious [188] truth of radical openness to the sovereign freedom of the grace of God.

THE CONCEPT OF TRUTH

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The interpretation of religious truth we have briefly sketched assumes a certain concept of truth which, though not opposed to the formal notion of truth in the usual sense, has nevertheless a specific character in the realm of religious truth. The conformity of a proposition to the reality it signifies, i.e. the general nature of propositional truth, refers in our case to the conformity of reality and proposition (with respect to the concrete, free self-surrender of man in faith) to the direct self-communication of God. The material and categorial content of the corresponding proposition cannot always be reconciled, either for the individual or for the human community, with the innermost personal act of commitment to God's self-communication. To this extent, therefore, propositions, even taken in a religious sense, can be false with respect to their material content and should in consequence be rejected. But on the other hand not all material content which is incorrect both in itself and with reference to the reality it signifies need be irreconcilable with a successful and authentic commitment of faith to God. This is certainly true, for example, in the case of practical judgements which lead to an action which is subjectively right but whose categorial content is objectively wrong.[12]

To show that the use of traditional terminology without such a conception of truth cannot solve the problem we are considering, we need only mention the 'expectation' of Jesus. Jesus may, though the issue is not important, have rejected the demand to give the exact time of the coming of the kingdom of God, but he did presumably operate on the assumption in his preaching that the kingdom would come soon. We can then ask whether taken as it stands this assumption was true or false. If one considers the 'soon' in isolation and does not integrate it into a higher unity with the unknown character of the day [189] of Yahweh – a synthesis for which scarcely any evidence can be discovered in the consciousness of Jesus – then one can speak of an 'error' in the expectation of Jesus. In this 'error' he would then have merely shared our human lot, for to err is better for historical man, and therefore for Jesus, than always to know everything. But if one assumes the concept of truth we have outlined here and maintains it consistently out of respect for the terminology of the magisterium, then there is no reason to speak of an error in Jesus' expectation. A genuine human consciousness must have an unknown future before it; the expectation of Jesus was the right way for him in his situation of realising an absolute commitment to the call of God's proximity. Only if human propositions are located in a static realm with no regard for history, on the assumption that human commitment for or against God can take place beyond time and history, only then can Jesus' objectification of the decision of salvation cause surprise or be regarded as erroneous.[13]

THE SOLUTION AND THE NEW TESTAMENT

Finally we must add a cautionary word against wishing to apply the theory we have used to explain Old Testament statements to the theological truths of the New Testament in too naïve and hasty a manner. This does not mean that the theory has no significance at all for New Testament writings, though we cannot develop this point more fully here. But in the ultimate analysis Christianity appeals to the fundamental assertion that Jesus has surrendered himself [12] Cf. on 'situation ethics', K. Rahner, 'On the Question of a Formal Existential Ethics', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 217-220; 'Zur "Situationsethik" aus ökumenischer Sicht', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Zurich, 1968), pp. 537-544. For the idea of 'mental concupiscence', cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Relationship between Theology and the Contemporary Sciences', Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 94-102.

[13] On the notion of truth, cf. K. Rahner, Zum Problem Unfehlbarkeit. Antworten auf die Anfrage von Hans Küng, Quaestiones Disputatae 54 (Freiburg i. Br., 1971), pp. 9-70.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to the incomprehensible reality of God in his death, i.e. in the destruction of the categorial, and has been accepted by God in this radical self-surrender. This statement contains a categorial, and therefore falsifiable, content if it is taken by itself, but its content is guaranteed in a radical and a priori manner from factual falsification in that it explicitly enables the categorial content, both in its appropriation (faith) and in its objective referent (fides quae: the victorious death of Jesus) to be handed over to the incomprehensible being of God. There is a basic difference between the statements of the New and Old Testaments, and so the specific concept of truth proper to the New Testament must be treated on its own. We must assert that the hermeneutic of the Old [190] and of the New Testament, in a theological and not a philological sense, must be distinguished, even though God is the author of both Testaments.[14] The propositions of the Old Testament are true on condition, and for the reason, that they signify the realisation of a commitment to the God of an unknown and open-ended promise; the propositions of the New Testament are true in that they proclaim the death and resurrection of Jesus, in which the absolute future has already arrived and is no longer a mere possibility presented to the freedom of man.

[14] Cf. the confrontation with Marcion, summarised in the works referred to in footnote 2; more recently, B. Aland, 'Marcion, Versuch einer neuen Interpretation', ZThK 70 (1973), pp. 420-447.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[191]

12

ON THE 'HISTORY OF REVELATION' ACCORDING TO THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

The relationship between exegesis and dogmatic theology[1] labours under considerable difficulties. Scholars on both sides seem to grow further apart rather than come closer together. What can a dogmatic theologian say to an exegete in these circumstances?[2]

An important area of common effort could be the dogmatic constitution of the last Council which more than any other is relevant to exegesis: the dogmatic constitution on Revelation, Dei Verbum.[3] In this study only the short section 3 from the 1st Chapter of this conciliar text will be considered and a few critical remarks formulated to serve as a stimulus offered by a dogmatic theologian for an encounter between the two disciplines.

We do not intend here to dispute or doubt the central statement of this short passage; the purpose or our critical comments is rather to [192] make plain the degree to which such a conciliar text leaves open questions which demand an answer, if the concept of the history of revelation, which is of fundamental importance for the exegesis of scripture as written revelation, is to be clarified, so that it can in some measure be integrated into the contemporary horizon of human understanding. These remarks may serve to pinpoint the relevant questions without attempting to offer a solution.

THE TEXT AND ITS PRESUPPOSITIONS

For the sake of convenience the section in question will be given in the official translation, although when compared with the original Latin text it is not entirely satisfactory.

'3. God, who creates and maintains all things through the Word (cf. Jn 1:3), offers men of every age evidence of himself in created things (cf. Rm 1:19-20). Because he willed to open the way of supernatural salvation, he made himself known, in addition, to our first parents from the beginning. After their fall he restored them to hope for salvation by promising the redemption (cf. Gn 3:15). Without intermission he concerned himself for mankind in order to give eternal life to every man who seeks salvation by persistence in good works (cf. Rm 2:6-7). Later he called Abraham in order to make him into a great people (cf. Gn 12:2-3). After the patriarchs he brought this people through Moses and the prophets to recognise him as the only living and true God, as a loving father and a just judge, and to look forward to the promised saviour. So through the ages he prepared the way of the Gospel'.[4]

In the context of the 1st chapter, the place of this section is easily intelligible. There the

[1] This essay was originally written for the Festschrift for R. Schnackenburg, Neues Testament und Kirche (Freiburg i. Br., 1974). It has been revised for publication here, but the original occasion of its composition influenced the choice of topic and the formulation of the question.

[2] On the topic of exegesis and dogmatic theology, cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology in the New Testament', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 23-41; 'Exegesis and Dogmatic Theology', ibid. pp. 67-93; 'Scripture and Theology', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 89-97; 'Scripture and Tradition', ibid. pp. 98-112.

[3] A scholarly commentary is given in: Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II III (London and New York, 1968), pp. 155-272. Introduction and Commentary by J. Ratzinger, A. Grillmeier, B. Rigaux. Cf. also the highly readable commentary on the introduction and ch. 1 by H. de Lubac, Dieu se dit dans l'histoire – La Révélatjon divine, Foi vivante 159 (Paris, 1974).

[4] Cf. og. lit., III pp. 172-175.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

topic discussed is revelation and its acceptance in faith, to which the teaching of the transmission of revelation can then be attached. This in turn introduces the main theme of the Constitution, i.e. Scripture. The earlier sections of the 1st chapter offer a brief formal account of the nature of revelation; the section following then speaks of the climax of revelation in Jesus Christ. The text quoted above describing the history of divine revelation from the beginning right up to the climax in Jesus Christ discussed in the next section is quite understandably placed between the two. If one ignores the fact that the schema has an 'objectivist' structure, i.e. it deals with revelation [193] in itself without then or previously answering the question of how a man can expect or recognise in the realm of his own existence something like a divine revelation at all, then the external sequence of the topics considered in this chapter seems quite reasonable. If one then turns to the text itself, one is struck by the way in which the very first clause speaks of what is usually regarded as the 'natural revelation' of God in his creation.[5] This implies that the text confirms the view, not explicitly but as an unspoken assumption, that the natural revelation of God is an obvious and universal phenomenon. This phenomenon provides a man with the best starting point from which to gain an understanding of divine revelation in the strict sense. Behind this line of thought there lies a mental model of the relationship of nature and grace, i.e. of the natural knowledge of God and the self-disclosure of God in revelation proper, a model which has remained constant in the development of theology since the Enlightenment. While recognising a legitimate distinction between nature and grace, one can no longer assert that this model is self-evident in modern theology or indeed wholly valid. For beyond space and time there exists a saving will of God which is universally effective and which directs man everywhere to his 'supernatural goal', i.e. the direct possession of God. This relationship to God is given a radical orientation by divine grace to God's self-communication and self-revelation, at least as an offer presented to man's free decision. This fact highlights the essential unity, ordained by God, of the relationship to God in spirit and in grace, which man experiences. In the factual order the so-called natural knowledge of God and the self-revelation of God in the strict sense are inter-related. For these reasons the divine revelation proper should not be assumed a priori to be a phenomenon located in a particular space and time. On the basis of this assumption the section we are considering can too easily take natural knowledge of God as a self-evident starting point.

STAGES IN THE HISTORY OF REVELATION

The account of the history of revelation (presupposing here the general character of revelation given in section 2) divides this history up to the climax in Jesus Christ clearly into three stages: the original revelation of God to the first parents; the period between them and the Old [194] Testament history of revelation starting from Abraham and Moses; the Old Testament history of revelation itself up to Jesus Christ. Let us take a brief look at each of these three very different sections of the history of revelation before Jesus Christ.

First of all the primal revelation:[6] we may pass over here the break which in the text is built into the original revelation as a historical event, namely the fall of the original parents. This event separates the revelation of the 'way of supernatural salvation' and the revelation of hope and promise of redemption. Even if we abstract from this point, the text raises a number

[5] On the idea of 'natural revelation', cf. H. Fries, 'Die Offenbarung', MySal I (Zurich, 1965), 159-238, esp. 163-165.
[6] On the 'original revelation', cf. J. Heislbetz, 'Urofferibarung', LThK X (Freiburg, 1965), 565-567 (bibliog.); also K. Rahrier and J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition, Quaestiones Disputatae 17 (Freiburg and London, 1965), pp. 9-25.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of questions for contemporary man which remain unanswered, although a genuine understanding of this passage can scarcely dispense with either the questions or the answers. To register a critical note is not, to make the point clear from the start, to demand that a conciliar text of this type should itself offer answers to such questions, in so far as the answer is still an object of controversy amongst theologians, or for a variety of reasons is not fit material for an official statement of the magisterium. The purpose of the critique is merely to point out that the text might have been formulated in such a way that it would have been clearer to the modern reader that at least these problems were recognised and taken into account, and that a traditional formula had not Simply been chosen, a formula which taken literally may seem somewhat naive and far removed from a contemporary horizon of understanding. How is one to conceive of this revelation to the 'first parents', when they lived perhaps two million years ago, originated from the animal world by evolution and so must be imagined as 'primitive' beings? And yet they are supposed to recognise the path of 'supernatural salvation'. Furthermore what is one to make of this account if, with some justification, one assumes a state of polygenism with regard to the origins of mankind?[7] Why should not the whole story be an incredible myth? Has our knowledge of this original revelation been transmitted from the revelation itself by an unbroken tradition right from the beginning, or is the description [195] of it an inference projected back to the origins, an aetiology[8] (either mythological or empirically justified, or a mixture of the two)? Such an aetiology might come from a later experience of salvation and revelation and contain the insight that, because of the unity of human history and universal salvific will of God, the basic structures of human history must have been present right from the start. As an extrapolation with a universalist thrust of the Israelite experience of salvation and revelation in relation to the God of its later history, the subsequent aetiology could also have influenced the account of paradise and the fall of the first parents given in Genesis and so make intelligible the development of this account and the precise limits of its meaning. But can one put this original revelation, which is an inferred postulate projected into the past, on the same plane as the later, historical and articulate revelation in the way evidently proposed in the text here? A further query is whether one can blithely assume that this revelation explicitly referred to 'supernatural salvation' in the modern sense of the term. The same questions could of course also be asked with regard to the fall of the first parents. In summary the portrayal of the original revelation is located in a traditional framework of meaning and ignores too many questions to allow a contemporary reader to make sense of it.

The second stage of the history of revelation which is described in our text is the period of time between the first parents and Abraham and Moses. The first thing that strikes us about this account of an enormous stretch of time, which makes the period from Abraham until today seem a brief moment by comparison, is that there is no mention of revelation taking place in this period, but only of a history of the saving providence of God, which is not necessarily the same thing at all. Did a genuine history of revelation take place in this time? How is it to be conceived? Can one operate here with once feasible notions derived from a time when the history of mankind was understood to have lasted a mere few thousand years, and imagine that revelation during this vast stretch of years consisted in the transmission of the original revelation? If not, then did some new history of revelation occur in the course of this enormous period of time? Or was there at this stage a history of supernatural salvation

[7] On 'Polygenism', cf. K. Rahner, 'Theological Reflections on Monogenism', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 229-296 (bibliog); also HThTL 5, Herderbücherei 455 (Freiburg i. Br., 1973), pp. 100-104.

[8] On 'aetiology', cf. K. Rahner, 'The Sin of Adam', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York, 1974), p. 247-262. Also, LThK I (Freiburg, 1957), 101 1-1012; HThTL 1, Herderbücherei 451 (Freiburg i. Br., 1972), pp. 148-150.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

without revelation? [196] But then how could faith in a strict theological sense conceivably have happened in this period? At this point the dogmatic constitution is not as advanced in its theology as other conciliar decrees, in that it treats the question of faith and revelation in this period, understood as the conditions for salvation operative even at that time, with much greater caution and timidity. In the decree on the missions it is regarded as self-evident that faith leading to salvation (and therefore revelation which is its precondition) is both possible and necessary,[9] even though the decree declines to explain more clearly this possibility of faith. In the dogmatic constitution on the Church and on the pastoral constitution, saving faith is assumed and stated to be a possibility for every man who follows the demands of his conscience.[10] It would thus have created no problems to affirm the existence of revelation in the true sense in the period stretching from the beginning up to the Old Testament patriarchs, and so to assert the possibility of genuine faith in revelation. But in fact this is not to be found. Why? The need to treat salvation and revelation history of this period very briefly hardly explains by itself the restriction to the mere saving providence of God in a passage which really required mention of the history of revelation. It does seem as if the issue was passed over too lightly and questions left aside to which the modern reader requires at the least the first elements of an answer, or at the minimum the explicit statement that no answer was possible. To fail to do so is to frustrate a legitimate interest in the unity of man and his history. What is more important, the present account makes the history of revelation following this period seem a quite new and unexpected age with no connection with the whole history of mankind. To the modern man such an age appears then as a sheer miracle, even if he is basically ready to grant the occurrence of new and unexpected events in history.

We have now come to the third phase, which is presented in our text as the history of revelation up to Jesus Christ. We may leave aside here the fact that the history of Old Testament from the time of Abraham seems to have been regarded perhaps in a rather too optimistic light, and conceived practically as the uniform and unbroken preparation of the chosen people for Jesus Christ. We can also overlook [197] the total lack of reference to the dualism of law and Gospel (promise) which is characteristic of the Old Testament period. What does, however, demand our attention is the fact that revelation to Abraham and the prophets occurs in a manner quite unrelated to the universal history of salvation and revelation which has certainly taken place. Now a person schooled in the history of Old Testament scholarship will ask whether it is possible to attribute so easily to an 'Abraham' the historical role which is given him here following the fashion of an age which was quite unaware of modern critical study of the Old Testament. In our text the intention is to portray genuine history in the modern sense. Can Abraham simply be made the father of the nation which is the bearer of the history of revelation available to us in the writings of the Old Testament? Can one adopt the style of e.g. Gen 12:2-3 and merely repeat formulae, if one wishes to explain the reality, origins and significance of the Old Testament history of revelation to Christians today, who can approach the Old Testament in faith only on the basis of Jesus Christ? Even if one does not just speak of an Abraham saga and is prepared to grant a genuine historical core to the figure described in the Old Testament, even so the failure to take into account the enormous temporal gap between Abraham and Moses and the consequent silence on the subject remains somewhat surprising. One could make the same comments about Moses: he is fitted rather too smoothly in our view into a continuous list with the prophets of a far later period, who can be grasped even by us today as historical figures, each with a particular individual stamp. Is not Moses also conceived in a rather naive

[9] Cf. Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, no. 3. cf. Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II IV pp. 87 sqq.; cf. in same decree nos. 8,9,14, 15, 17.
[10] Cf. Dogmatic Constitution in the Church, no. 16 and 17. cf. Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II 1, pp. 182-185. Also, Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, nos. 22, 26, 38, 41, 57.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and unsophisticated manner, following the style of Old Testament presentation and without regard to the results of contemporary study of the history of the Near East and modern exegesis? And is not the whole history of Old Testament revelation presented without any connection with the rest of the history of religion, which can readily be understood as a single history of revelation, even if corrupted by sin and error? For without in any way wishing to dispute the dignity and value of the Old Testament, we may say that in this general history the revelation of the Old Testament is clear and verifiable in so far as it forms the immediate (regarded, that is, from the point of view of the history of man and salvation) and quite short preparation and context for the Christ event. It is this latter event which provides the only guarantee of the continuing validity and normative status of the Old Testament for us even today.

In conclusion we want to repeat that this critique of the text contained [198] in Section 3 does not demand that all the questions raised by this passage should be answered. The point of these critical remarks was to show that, if the authors of the text had clearly perceived and reckoned with these questions as ones which are urgent and necessary today, then they would have composed the text differently. In all probability they might have altered the entire conception of the pre-Christian history of revelation and not presented it, as they have, in the framework of a simple time series, a model which is not intelligible to us. Instead they might have treated it retrospectively, taking as their starting point Jesus Christ,[11] who alone makes the event of revelation intelligible to us. From this view point they could have looked backwards and offered a survey of the whole of human history as the history of salvation and revelation, providing a careful outline of the particular history of salvation which we call the history of the Old Testament. This section, quite small in spatio-temporal terms, of the universal history of revelation still affects us in that it forms the immediate and proximate history of the Christ event. It would then perhaps also have been feasible to have developed the theme of section 3 on the assumption that the saving will of God is both supernatural and universal. On this basis the necessary and universal character of revelation in every age (despite our inability to say exactly how this occurs) could have been presented as a theological deduction and not as a piece of historical description. The exegesis of the New and Old Testament did not play the part it should have done in the Council. In general an honest effort was made to give expression to traditional theology and to strengthen these statements with traditional proof texts. Of this our text is a good example.

[11] Cf. also the speculative methods mentioned below. The author has tried to combine both methods in: K. Rahner and W. Thusing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch, Quaestiones Disputatae 55 (Freiburg i. Br., 1972), 'Grundlinien einer systematischen Christologie', pp. 15-78. This also provides a practical example of collaboration between exegesis and dogmatic theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[199]

13

THE ONE CHRIST AND THE UNIVERSALITY OF SALVATION

The purpose of this enquiry is to throw some light on the question of the one Christ and the universality of salvation as a theme of systematic theology.[1] The precise meaning of this topic may become clearer in the course of these reflections.

Our method here will be to use both the binding statements of the Church's magisterium and broader theological opinion to underpin the ideas presented. For it is in fact impossible to formulate a systematic account of the teaching of the Church, in a form that can be personally appropriated in a contemporary setting, without free theological opinion playing a role whose limits can often not easily be separated from dogma proper. Christian faith at any particular historical period needs theological opinion in order to be given appropriate expression; no theology can be made up of the defined propositions of the Church's magisterium alone, for theology must be explained and explanation necessarily requires the use of concepts, assumptions and contexts of meaning which are subject to chance. At any rate theological opinion does enter in either explicitly or in a disguised form; the boundary between it and the binding dogmatic truths may be clearly marked or ill-defined and the theological weight of this opinion may be of various types. But such opinion is always present, even for instance in the 'Credo of the people of God' of Paul VI.[2] Here, however, we can dispense with explicit definition of the [200] various theological 'notes', in as much as the topic under discussion directly embodies only one statement of a dogmatically binding sort and even this has perhaps not been explicitly defined as such. I refer to the truth that the achievement by any man of his proper and definitive salvation is dependent upon Jesus Christ. How that is to be conceived is the subject of this enquiry.

Naturally other propositions possessing either dogmatic force or a high theological 'note' will be employed in the course of this investigation. But to clarify the truth of the universal significance of Jesus for the salvation of every man, any meaningful and reasonable proposition can rightly be used which is appropriate for the explanation of this dogma.

THE THEOLOGICAL MEANING OF THE QUESTION

We are speaking in the first place of the basic possibility of the salvation of all men and not of the extent to which, according to Christian understanding, salvation will in fact be achieved, i.e. whether the 'apocatastasis' of all men is a legitimate hope or not.[3] Here the question is the possibility of salvation, not its actual realisation. Contrary to the view of St Augustine, this possibility is a real one in a fallen world: no man is excluded from salvation simply because of so-called original sin; a man can only lose the possibility of salvation through serious personal sin of his own. Salvation here is to be understood as the strictly supernatural and direct presence of God in himself afforded by grace. This, of course,

[1] A student of the author has investigated the question of the universality of redemption from a historical perspective in a dissertation: A. Bsteh, Zur Frage nach der Universalität der Erlösung. Unter besonderer Berücksichtigung ihres Verständnisses bei den Vätern des zweiten Jahrhunderts; Wiener Beitrage zur Theologie XIV (Vienna, 1966).
[2] Published in AAS 60 (1968), 436-445.
[3] Cf. J. Loosen, LThK 1(1957), 709-712.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excludes, despite the statement of Pius V1[4] on the subject of limbo, a purely natural state of blessedness. The direct 'vision' of God is the only salvation for all men. How the many stages of this long journey to the final union with God are to be conceived is not a matter of concern here. Indeed in certain cases the journey may not even be terminated by death. The traditional teaching about a 'place of purification' embraces a multitude of assumptions and modes of interpretation whose possibilities have by no means been exhausted and which can substantially alter the common popular notion of purgatory.

The fundamental proposition which is the proper subject of theological investigation refers therefore to the universal possibility of supernatural salvation for all men after original sin. This possibility [201] must really be given to all. By this is meant all those throughout human history who have come to a free realisation of their existence. The question is here excluded of the salvation of those who are clearly human beings but who have probably never achieved the full exercise of their freedom. Theological reflection upon the universal possibility of salvation involves, then, all those who have reached complete self-determination as free persons and have thus explicitly or implicitly taken a free decision for or against God. Whether this definition implies a real restriction of universality or not is a matter about which we have no certain knowledge. In any event it means all men who have existed from the beginning of human history proper, even if this beginning can scarcely be defined with any theological precision. To this group all men of course belong who have never had direct tangible contact with the Gospel and its preaching. In this context the question raised by Billot[5] is of fundamental importance, whether, that is, every man who did not die as a child and could lead a more or less normal life, given the changing cultural circumstances, was capable of reaching the realisation of freedom necessary for the achievement of supernatural fulfilment. In the light of the actual historical and cultural conditions of life experienced by many individuals and groups, one may doubt whether many so-called adults do in fact reach a level of freedom which is effective for salvation. There is no simple means of resolving this question. Either one can appeal to the fact that subjective freedom in certain circumstances can be achieved despite lack of thematic reflection and scanty material, which means that the number of adults 'under age' with respect to their salvation is of no importance. Or one asserts that many so-called adults do exist who, with regard to their salvation, never go beyond the stage of unbaptised children who die young. We know as little about the fate of such men as about the destiny of those who die as embryos or infants.

Without proper evidence one can only say about such men that we are entirely ignorant of their fate. If one were to claim knowledge, one would merely be projecting theological data, in itself correct enough, into the absolute future in a one-sided and inadmissible manner, and the outcome of such a procedure is questionable. The significance of this is to indicate the limits of any theological proposition about the universal possibility of salvation.

[202]

GOD'S SALVIFIC WILL IN THE CONTEMPORARY UNDERSTANDING OF FAITH

Given these assumptions the theological truth of the universal possibility of salvation may be taken without reserve to possess binding dogmatic force. It may be that it has not been defined but there is no doubt that it belongs to the contemporary understanding of faith and may be considered as the explicit and official teaching of the Church. As such it is to be regarded as absolutely binding. The truth in this matter was not always seen with such clarity

[4] Denz. 2626.
[5] L. Billot S.J. (1846-1931), Professor at the Gregorianium, Rome and important speculative theologian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to be part of the faith of the Church as it is today, despite the numerous scriptural passages[6] which are used today by theological textbooks to prove the universal salvific will of God. For even if the notion that God's salvific will is limited to the predestined is rejected as heretical[7] and even if God's salvific will is taken to apply to non-believers and St Augustine's particularism about salvation is considered a restriction which is now overcome, nevertheless the truth that God wills the salvation of all men can be so loaded with 'ifs' and 'buts'[8] that it can hardly be characterised as a formal dogma in the sense intended here.

Now, however, the Second Vatican Council has recognised the possibility that even non-Christians, polytheists and atheists can live in a subjective state of freedom from serious sin. At the same time the Council reckons with the possibility of supernatural salvation in such cases. Thus it is an evident part of the contemporary understanding of faith that there is no human state which allows one to draw definite conclusions about the personal sinfulness of a man and thus deny him the possibility of salvation. This is the meaning of the proposition that all men have the possibility of being saved, as this proposition is understood today. This implies that there is no human situation which can be empirically verified and conclusively established, that certainly rules out salvation from the start. At the same time salvation is only achieved in fact when a man acquires faith, hope and love, and so overcomes the contrary tendencies in him. The Second Vatican Council, in contrast to the previous tradition of the schools, reckons with the possibility of the saving activities of faith, hope and love being found even in the case of atheists who remain attached to their belief. So the possibility cannot be denied to any other group of men, whatever their externally verifiable attitudes and beliefs. A man may be [203] disposed in whatever way he will as far as empirical criteria are concerned, but the direct possibility of salvation cannot thereby be denied to him. Only if we grant this, can we take seriously the biblical injunction that we can judge no man.[9] How the real and direct possibility of salvation can co-exist with a human situation which objectively ought not to be[10] is a matter to be considered later.

The Second Vatican Council offered no definition of the truth of the universal salvific will of God, but this truth has never before in history been so clearly a part of the understanding of faith as it is today. One can, therefore, either offer the sort of theological description we have provided above or define the proposition as 'sentientia fidei proxima',[11] with L. Ott for example. The topic of our deliberations is not the proposition in itself but rather its Christological reference; thus the above remarks may be considered sufficient explanation of its theological significance, its limits and its theological 'note'. Further proof of its validity and a more detailed treatment of its history are not in any event necessary here.

THE DIRECT AND SAVING PRESENCE OF GOD

In every conceivable historical and social situation of life a man can have direct saving access to God without necessarily being required to leave his objective situation 'de necessitate medii absoluta', in order to be able to discover the direct reality of God somewhere else. Naturally the actual discovery of this immediate presence demands 'metanoia', faith, hope and love, but the universal possibility of salvation, as it is understood here, means precisely that the necessary turning to God can be achieved, either reflectively or unreflectively, from [6] Cf. 1 Tim 2:4.

[7] Cf. Denz. 623 sq., 1567, 2005, 2304 sq.
[8] This must apply at least until the Second Vatican Council.
[9] Mt 7:1; Lk 6:37.
[10] E.g. an objective sin, a theoretical or practical atheism.
[11] Cf. L. Ott, Grundriss der Katholischen Dogmatik (Freiburg i. Br. 1959), pp. 288 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

any conceivable existential standpoint, in so far as it is the given historical, cultural or religious situation which is in question. This possibility is a categorial one and belongs to the basic structure of human freedom and human self-realisation. It may often occur in the case of a particular human life that the refusal freely to alter his own existential situation means a denial of God and the destruction of the chance of salvation. But this assumes that the prior historical situation of a man is directly open to the saving presence of God, in so far as it is not [204] formed or maintained by the personal sin of the individual. In purely human terms we can never assert with total certainty of any situation that its existence is only possible because of the personal guilt of the individual living in it, and that it is therefore a sign of the loss of God's direct saving presence.

In an ultimate sense God is equally near everywhere. The narrow gap can everywhere be bridged through faith, hope and love with the help of whatever aid the particular historical circumstances provide. Conversely the faith which is effective for salvation never enters so clearly into any situation that its presence or absence enables one to make a certain judgement that the situation is open or closed to salvation. In saying this I do not at all mean to question the importance or the objective value of a moral act, the validity of the confession of faith, or of actual membership of the Church, or to relativise these values with regard to the subjective salvation any man. However a more thorough treatment of these questions would divert us from the topic under discussion.

The world is drawn to its spiritual fulfilment by the Spirit of God, who directs the whole history of the world in all its length and breadth towards its proper goal. This means that every man, whatever his situation, can be saved. The Christ event, however, seems at first glance to be the effect and not the cause of the dynamic of divine spiritual communication to the world. How can one claim, then, that salvation comes entirely from Jesus Christ? This question forms the focal point of our reflections, given the necessary clarifications we have provided.

THE PROBLEMATIC

We live in a world in which each and everything is inter-dependent, in which every event is in some way important for every other, at least if it comes later in time, a world in which Sirius wobbles in its course when a child throws a doll out of its cradle, to quote the telling remark of one modern physicist. But this physical unity of space and time does not offer a suitable basis for the solution of our question. For we are not dealing with a framework or a unity in which every element is significant for every other, but rather with a single, specific, historical event which is supposedly important even for the periods of history before it. This event, taking place within history, is meant to be absolutely fundamental for every other event occurring at any time [205] from the beginning to the end of that same history. And yet this must be understood as a history of freedom operating at every particular moment, i.e. events continually occurring which cannot be dependent for their very essence, the decision for or against God, on other events, however much these latter may form the conditions and context for the exercise of freedom. In the realisation of salvation the freedom of the individual is irreplaceable.

One could offer the answer that freedom must be exercised under prior conditions and circumstances which are independent of it, since human freedom is finite. One might add that the 'objective redemption' through Jesus Christ forms part of the condition of freedom as far as salvation or damnation are concerned. But this raises at least the question of how redemption understood in this way can apply to those who lived before Christ. Furthermore how can this situation be of relevance for the free action of those who, though living after the time of Christ, have either no knowledge of him at all or knowledge of a kind which does not impel their freedom to an ultimate decision? Finally in what way is the objective redemption to be analysed as constitutive of human freedom and its exercise?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The 'objective redemption through Christ' can be a specific and characteristic element in the basic structure of human freedom, which includes numerous other elements as well. It would then possess a unique place among these elements, which is higher than all others, since it forms part of the predestination of freedom ordained by God. This predestination is assumed in all schools of Catholic theology, whatever their exact interpretation, to be something which can be reconciled with human freedom. But this is merely a statement of the real problem. Whether we should speak of a general (or particular) predestination of human freedom to salvation or simply of the saving will of God does not make any difference to our investigation. Our enquiry concurs the how of the connection of such a saving will, or divine predestination, with the Christ event.

A quick and easy answer to our question which consists in an appeal to the 'cosmic Christ' should be avoided. Of course the pre-existing Logos of God can be conceived without difficulty as a creative, sanctifying, reconciling and divinising force operating in the world and in history. Human salvation depends on the Logos and all salvation is related to it. The eternal Logos of God gives himself to the central core of human freedom as the condition of possibility of a supernatural response to the self-communication of God. He thus constitutes the [206] redemption or the redemption event. On the basis of the 'communicatio idiomatum' one can say of Jesus that he is the salvation of the world, just as he can say he is creator of the world.

But all this does not provide a satisfactory answer to our question, for the self-communication of the divine Logos to the world is conceived not as a single event within history but as the ultimate dynamic orientation which operates universally and is the ground of the whole of history. One may leave aside here the further problem of how the function of the Logos in its work of salvation and its guidance of the world is related to the activity of the Holy Spirit, and how, or rather with what justification, the disciples of Jesus moved from the experience of him as the one crucified and risen (cf. the letter to the Colossians, the writings of John and the letter to the Hebrews) to the pre-existent, creative and saving Logos embodied in Jesus. But that still leaves the question unanswered how the particular historical event of the death and resurrection of Jesus, which happened at a particular time and place, can be of fundamental importance for the salvation of all men, It may be that the question cannot be answered without reference to the pre-existent Logos in Jesus, but this appeal by itself does not provide the solution we are looking for.

SELF-REDEMPTION AND REDEMPTION BY ANOTHER

In Christian apologetics a distinction is usually drawn between self- redemption and redemption by another. We mention this point in order to avoid the danger of making greater demands than are theologically necessary upon the redemption of all men in Christ and upon his death and resurrection. Otherwise people today are forced into a situation of meaningless confusion from which they cannot escape. The Christian doctrine of faith, hope and love, of the union in grace with God and of the free reception of God's self-communication can well be understood in the sense of a true self-redemption. The person who redeems himself in freedom, i.e. places God in the centre of his own free existence, is a creature who is constituted by the creative freedom of God and is therefore given the capacity to accept God's self-communication. God, however, shares himself with man both through uncreated grace which forms his very being and through the supernatural capacity which arises from

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grace and belongs to man in his freedom. God is himself the condition of possibility of human salvation from which man freely realises his salvation. Naturally it is [207] taken for granted in Christian theology, in contrast to any form of Pelagianism, that the free acceptance of salvation is also a gift of God's grace and thus forms the very core of the human person and of human freedom.[12]

If, however, self-redemption means that a man can achieve his fulfilment without God, then any form of self-redemption is foreign to Christian teaching. Christian salvation can only be understood as self-redemption in the sense that a man does not merely receive his salvation in a passive manner but rather realises it with total, and not just partial, freedom. The very possibility of freedom, however, is established by God through nature and grace. To gain a proper idea of this grace one should not conceive of the grace in which a man achieves salvation as an external means but rather as the innermost core of human freedom which is freely constituted by God.

If self-redemption is presented in Christian faith in the above sense, and if the cross of Christ (rooted in the incarnation of the Logos and reaching fulfilment in the resurrection) is made the cause of our salvation as the 'redemptio objectiva', then the causality of the cross must be understood in relation to the general and the individual conditions of possibility of self-redemption. But how this is to be conceived still remains unclear.

CROSS: CONSEQUENCE OR CAUSE?

It follows from what we have said that the event of the crucifixion, taken as 'redemptio objectiva', cannot be the cause of the uncaused salvific will of God, at least not in the usual sense of the term. For according to common understanding, cause means a physical or moral operation which brings something about. By contrast we must say: because God wills salvation, therefore Jesus died and rose again, and not: because the crucifixion occurred, therefore God wills our salvation. God is not transformed from a God of anger and justice into a God of mercy and love by the cross; rather God brings the event of the cross to pass since he is possessed from the beginning of gratuitous mercy and, despite the world's sin, shares himself with the world, so overcoming its sin.

[208] What mode of 'causality' is to be attributed to the cross for the salvation of all men, is precisely the question which is at stake here. This is also a version of the real difficulty of the so-called Anselmian theory of satisfaction,[13] which in a crude or a more subtle form has determined the doctrine of the redemption in western Christianity, at least where the crucifixion has not been denied any form of causality and the cross and resurrection treated only as ground for our faith and our trust in God. The satisfaction theory requires a series of tortuous distinctions in order to make plain that the one making satisfaction and the one accepting it are in our case one and the same. This seems to make the theory untenable as a model for the understanding of the causality of the redemption. We can see from the history of preaching and theology how this theory consistently obscured the simple fact that the event of the cross did not originate in an angry God who demanded reparation, but from a God of gratuitous and merciful love. This is not to deny that God's holiness and justice are evident on the cross or to dispute the value for religious teaching of certain elements of the satisfaction theory, which are entirely to be approved. But the theory, almost of necessity, introduces the metaphysically impossible idea of a transformation of God and obscures the [12] Cf. A. Hamman, LThK VIII (1963), 246-249. Also the more recent study of the position of Pelagius by G. Greshake, Gnade als konkrete Freiheit. Eine Untersuchung zur Gnadenlehre des Pelagius (Mainz, 1972).

[13] Cf. W. Kasper, Jesus the Christ (London, 1976), pp. 219-221.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

origin and cause of the crucifixion which is the mercy and love of God. This love can only include sin in the world because, as God's yes to man, this love was meant to prove itself Victorious over man's no to God.

The satisfaction theory requires the ultimately inconceivable notion that Jesus is man's representative and is opposed to the correct understanding of self-redemption outlined above. In addition the Pauline formula 'υ(πε_ρ η(μω~ν' is interpreted in an unconvincing manner which forces the sense of Paul's words.[14] But how could the apostle of the gentiles know and speak of this 'υ(πε&ρ' in the light of the experience of the death and resurrection of Jesus of the first disciples?

THE MERIT OF CHRIST

Official doctrinal pronouncements of the Church as well as traditional theological opinion both refer to the fact, e.g. in connection with the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of Mary,[15] that grace and salvation were guaranteed man 'intuitu meritorum Christi'. Yet this [209] comment, while perfectly correct in itself, expresses no more than the truth from which these reflections originated and which requires further elucidation. This line of thought connects human salvation with the cross of Christ, without explaining how the connection is to be conceived. At least it makes it easier to understand how pre-Christian mankind and men living outside Christianity could be dependent for their salvation upon the cross of Christ, in that the idea of God's eternal fore-knowledge of this event in time is brought into play. This makes intelligible a possible effect of Christ's cross operating before the time when he himself became a historical event.

There is here the problem that the elements of the history of salvation, which should be inter-connected to form a single salvation history, are in this account bound together by forces operating outside history, that is, by the eternal fore-knowledge of God. This fore-knowledge does not belong to salvation history as such, since all historical and temporal moments are equally and eternally present to it. But even if we leave this difficulty aside, the fact remains that the proposed 'intuitus meritorum Christi' does not explain the real meaning of the statement that God wills human salvation 'because of' the cross of Christ.

In the light of what we have said the cross of Christ cannot be the cause of human salvation in the sense that it brought about the will to save in God which otherwise would not have existed, or that it bestowed upon men a type of salvation which takes no heed of human freedom. Despite all these objections does a connection exist between the cross of the Lord and the salvation of all men, a connection which is more than an appeal to the moral impact which the death and resurrection of Christ has on us? Any attempt to discover such a connection should not ignore the fact that all men are involved. Let us start our investigation with Jesus himself and then turn to ourselves; the double perspective will open up questions which otherwise might have been overlooked.

JESUS AND ALL MEN

The relationship of Jesus to all men raises a series of questions relevant to exegesis and fundamental theology which cannot be systematically investigated here. Only one will be mentioned: how did the pre-Easter Jesus conceive of his death? Did he approach it with full [14] Cf. 2 Cor 5:21; Gal 1:4; 3:13; 1 Cor 1:13; 11:24.

[15] Cf. Denz. 2803.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

knowledge and consent and accept it in ultimate unconditional faith and trust? Did [210] he realise the soteriological significance of his death? Under what assumptions and in what framework of meaning can Jesus' knowledge of the soteriological importance of his death be conceived? What is the minimum required by dogma and fundamental theology to enable us to attribute to the pre-Easter Jesus a soteriological value for his death in a historically tangible form?

Without being able here to go further into these and similar questions, we will simply assume that the death and resurrection of Jesus, taken together, do possess soteriological significance. We take this to be the teaching of Scripture and the Church, and there is sufficient evidence to connect its content with the reality of the pre-Easter Jesus. Here the only question to be asked is how the connection between the death of Jesus and the salvation of all men can be imagined without our getting enmeshed in the conceptual tangle we mentioned earlier.

Of course we should remember first, that Jesus possesses that relationship to every man which connects all men together in the many dimensions of life within the framework of a single humanity and history. The existential, ontological, historical, philosophical and theological grounds for this assertion cannot be listed or developed here, except to say that humanity and history form a genuine unity and do not merely consist in a sum of individual human beings and isolated biographies put together by our thought processes. This unity affects not only the common physical and biological basis of man and his world, but also the human reality of man and his freedom and history, which cannot easily be explained. It is obvious that such a specifically human unity, and not one with merely material and biological foundations, is important for the soteriological connection between Jesus and the whole of humanity and should not be obscured or undervalued. It plays a role in the doctrine of redemption found among the Greek fathers, in that in their view humanity has a form of existence which enables the eternal Logos to enter into communion with the single race of mankind. But even the western theory of satisfaction presupposes a unity among men to which Jesus belongs as well, irrespective of whether this unity, in which Jesus in his representative function can act for all, is thought of as the result of divine -decree rather than as a natural unity of mankind to which the incarnate
Logos of God also belongs. Yet however necessary it is to reflect upon the unity of man and his history, nevertheless it is not sufficient by itself to make what is meant here intelligible.

If one wanted to say that the redemption was achieved through the [211] incarnation alone, then the universal significance of the Christ event could be explained on the basis of the unity of mankind alone. Humanity is one and is saved as a single whole through the incarnation of the eternal Logos in this unity. He must share the ultimate salvation with man which necessarily belongs to him as the Logos of God; otherwise the unity of human history would be destroyed, if the necessary salvation of one of its members were irrelevant to the destiny and possibility of salvation of the whole of mankind. Certainly these considerations have positive meaning and validity and they should therefore be included in a theology of the cross and its significance for salvation. But if the cross of Christ, his death and resurrection, are regarded as a saving event affecting all men, then even the notion of a universal communion of race and history shared by the Logos is not sufficient by itself. The death and resurrection of Jesus must possess universal importance in themselves for salvation and cannot merely be regarded as isolated events, of no significance in themselves, in a life which only has universal relevance for salvation in being the life of the eternal Logos. It is this Logos which entered the unity of mankind and took on a human nature, thus taking on and saving the whole of humanity.

As we have seen earlier, the 'causality' of the saving death of Jesus for the salvation of all men must be the consequence and not the cause of the self-giving of God to the world in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grace. It does not mean a transformation in God, for God brings the crucifixion to pass out of grace not out of anger, although the meaning of the cross does not consist alone in its power to convince us of the love and forgiveness of God. If the causality of the cross with regard to salvation were exclusively interpreted in this way, then any universality would be out of the question, since the majority of mankind have no explicit knowledge of the cross and since, according to Paul's notion of the saving effect of the cross, the death of Jesus is set within the category of sacrifice. However we may here with caution assert that the Pauline ideas of 'sacrifice', 'ransom', 'reconciliation through blood' do not reflect the original understanding of the saving significance of the Cross of Jesus for all men; they are legitimate ideas but they are secondary notions which must be explained in the light of the primary and original data and are aimed to bring home the significance of Christ's death for our salvation. In other cultures and historical periods such ideas do not so easily achieve this goal, even if we do not mean to imply by this that, for us today for example, these models of thought should be entirely rejected.

[212] The question, therefore, of the mode of causality remains open. One is tempted to demand from the start the abandonment of the idea of 'causality' altogether. But the fact remains that it is part of the Christian confession of faith that the death of Jesus means something for the salvation of all men, that it was for us that he died. Such formulations express the same content as the 'causality' of the death of Jesus with regard to the salvation of all men. The problem remains the same whether one speaks of 'causality', 'meaning' or 'for us'. In any event all forms of causality of a physical or moral type fail, so that a causality of the death of Jesus is suggested which is precisely one that should not come into question.

To resolve this dilemma one may pursue a number of paths. Here we will choose one which discloses the causality of Jesus' death we are seeking with a concept which is familiar in a different theological context and has been extensively investigated.

We may assert the following: the cross (together with the resurrection of Jesus) has a primary sacramental causality for the salvation of all men, in so far as it mediates salvation to man by means of salvific grace which is universally operative in the world. It is the sign of this grace and of its victorious and irreversible activity in the world. The effectiveness of the cross is based on the fact that it is the primary sacramental sign of grace.

SACRAMENTAL SIGN AND GRACE

The salvific causality of the cross should not be subsumed under the sign causality of grace which is characteristic and familiar from sacramental teaching, or rather from one possible and legitimate version of that teaching. The specific character of the effect of the cross must be obtained from theological investigation of the cross itself. Of course this can lead to a notion of causality which evidently agrees with the sign causality of the sacraments. Such a conception can then easily be adopted, although the proposed causality is not to be found elsewhere and is not to be subsumed under the other familiar notions of causality. Sufficient proof of this is provided by the fact that the new concept in sacramental theology is recognised as sign causality, a type of causality, therefore, which is proper to the sign as such and is not some- thing added to the sign. In sacramental theology it is not that the qualities sign and causality are attributed to the sacramental processes [213] with regard to grace and then other categories of instrumental causality of a physical or moral type are applied to cover this sign causality and interpret it. It is rather the case that the sign is the cause. 'Sacramenta causant gratiam, quia et prout significant gratiam'. We are not of course assuming here that every sign of a thing can also be treated as its cause. But in so far as a sacrament can and should be conceived of as a 'real symbol', as a historical and social

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation embodiment of grace, where grace achieves its own fullness of being and forms an irreversible gift (opus operatum), to this extent the sign is a cause of grace, although the sign is caused by this grace.

The mutual inter-dependence prevents one regarding grace and the sign of grace as two quite separate realities set over against each other as cause and effect. We should rather speak of two moments in a process of historical and ontological fulfilment, even if the conditions of each are different. In this sense the sacramental sign is a cause of grace. The sign belongs to the essential actualisation of this grace which thereby finds irreversible historical expression. The sign is in fact brought forth by grace as its 'real symbol', so that grace itself achieves fulfilment. The ontological and pneumatological implications of sign causality and its connection with the bodiliness and the historicity of man require fuller clarification but these remarks about the notion of sign causality must suffice. Its legitimacy in any event is independent of the following reflections and thus can serve as theological evidence in their favour.

What is to be said in our case? God's saving will embraces everything and so permits even the sin of the world. His self-communication which consists in an offer made to human freedom touches the innermost nature and goal of man and therefore of salvation history. In this process each thing is important with and for every other, since every individual in this single salvation history is willed by God's saving purpose as an element within it. The solidarity of man in salvation history is not of the same character for every individual as this history unfolds in time, nor does it consist merely in a temporal succession of individual histories of salvation. It tends towards a goal and a fulfilment of the whole of salvation history, in which the being of God as self-giving love and the freedom of God find an irreducible and historically tangible expression. Under these conditions it is at least conceivable that the ambivalence of human and divine freedom which is a primary feature of this history will be resolved by a free and historical act before the universal culmination of the total historical [214] process. The outcome would then be fixed and irreversible from within history.

The logical possibility is assured if the irreversible outcome, appearing within history, of the historical process of human and divine freedom is positive, i.e. signifies the salvation of the world which could not then be totally lost. This would be possible if God were to communicate himself to a man in such a unique manner that this man would become the definitive and irreversible self-gift of God to the world. He would also freely accept the divine self-gift in such a manner that this too would be irreversible, i.e. through his death as the definitive culmination of his free actions in history. If salvation history is irreversibly directed in this sense to salvation, and not to damnation, through a concrete event, then this historically tangible occurrence must be a sign of the salvation of the whole world in the sense of a 'real symbol', and so possesses a type of causality where salvation is concerned. To this we wish to apply a well known theological concept and call it 'sacramental'.

Christian faith sees in Jesus, his cross and resurrection just such an event. Given the unity and solidarity of mankind, we have here before us the sign of an irreversible positive outcome of the one historical process. Before this event took place the positive ending of salvation history was not assured with tangible historical certainty, but was obscured by the ambiguity of human and divine freedom. Thus we may predicate of this sign of the salvation of the whole world the type of sacramental causality which was mentioned earlier. Because Jesus died and rose again, therefore salvation is offered and given to the whole of mankind; taken together cross and resurrection are the 'cause' of the salvation of all men. To avoid the problems alluded to above, this 'causality' must be thought of in terms of 'sacramental sign causality', which is brought about by the prior divine will to save mankind and is not itself the cause of this divine will. If the Second Vatican Council emphasises that the Church is the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sacrament of the world's salvation[16] and explains this statement by describing the Church as the basic sacrament of salvation,[17] then Jesus Christ may be [215] called the primary sacrament ('Ursakrament'), which is the original 'sign and instrument of the innermost union with God and of the unity of the whole of mankind'.[18] In this way the Constitution on the Church speaks of the Church, deriving its description from the nature of Christ.

The quotation refers to 'sign and instrument', which can be easily interpreted according to a particular sacramental theology as, 'instrument because sign'. The objection may be raised that a sign, which can only be directed and addressed to men, may possibly be a significant cause of their awareness but cannot be the cause of the reality signified, i.e. the salvation of men. In reply to this it should be pointed out that a notion of 'sign' is here being assumed which is quite inappropriate for a sacramental sign. Certainly this form of explanation does not do full justice to the causality of Jesus and cross where salvation is concerned, or entirely explain the dogma of the redemption through the cross. But in a sacramental sign the saving will of God and grace find historical expression. Sign and signified are essentially one, in contrast to the above assumption, so that the reality signified comes to be in and through the sign, and the sign therefore, in this specific and limited sense, causes the reality signified.

This applies in a fundamental way to the relationship between the saving will of God and grace which is the innermost purpose of the whole history of the world, on the one hand, and the cross of Jesus on the other. In consequence the cross can and should be understood in this sense as the cause of the salvation signified and not merely regarded as the cause of our awareness of salvation in faith. Of course the cross possesses this latter function for us and our faith as well, but the cross of Jesus as the universal primary sacrament of the salvation of the whole world expresses more than this, and indeed says everything, always assuming that 'sacrament' is correctly interpreted and is seen to possess the specific type of causality which is proper to the cross as the instrument of salvation for all men.

The explanation we have offered does not of course exhaust the subject matter. Much has been left without proper proof or development, e.g. the solidarity of all men and the history of individual freedom within the totality of human history, the connection between God's self-communication in grace and the death of Jesus, the theology of death, the unity of the death and resurrection of Jesus, etc. On [216] many of these topics we have spoken elsewhere; others are deliberately left open here. For the thesis we have proposed is not meant to include at any price under the notion of the primary sacramental causality of signs all that objectively belongs to the salvation brought about by Jesus and the universal significance of his cross and resurrection. Our theory does not in the least exclude other factors which have not been mentioned here and which could not be included under this concept, as long as the thesis is not itself placed in doubt by such alternative possibilities. Our purpose here is to show, by moving from Jesus to humanity as a whole, how a single historical event may be seen to possess universal meaning. This meaning is unique and does not arise simply from the importance which any particular occurrence in history possesses for the totality of human history.

MAN AND THE CROSS OF CHRIST

[16] Cf. Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (LG), nos. 1, 8, 48, 59; Decree on Ecumenism (UR), no. 2; Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church (AG), no. 1; Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (GS) no. 45.
[17] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Kleine Vorüberlegung über die Sakramente im allgemeinen', Die siebenfaltige Gabe. Über die Sakramente der Kirche (Munich, 1974), pp. 7-18.
[18] LG, no. 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It was stated at the start of this enquiry that the universal significance of the cross of Jesus for human salvation must be seen from the point of view of the whole of humanity. It is plain that this significance is only present and intelligible if the relationship is mutual, if, that is, not only is Jesus related to mankind but also mankind is related to him. In part this is presupposed, in part proposed as a thesis. But this poses new problems which acquire proper focus and depth if we leave on one side those with faith who believe explicitly in Jesus and redemption on the basis of the Christian Gospel and concentrate on those who, for no fault of their own, have never really been touched by the explicit message of Christianity. To this number belong the whole of mankind living before Christ as well as non-Christians since the time of Christ and all those who consciously and explicitly believe that they are required by their conscience to refuse the Gospel of Christ as this is presented to them. In this last case it is not a question of sin offering a threat to salvation. All these groups ultimately belong to a single category, since for a variety of reasons they have not been reached by the Gospel of Jesus and yet their rejection of the Christian message does not mean an existentially serious sin. Seen from this point of view, therefore, such people form a single group as far as our topic is concerned despite all the differences amongst them, for their problem is a common one.

To answer this question two assumptions must be made: first, that all men only achieve salvation through Christ. This is not self-evident [217] and is sometimes not given sufficient consideration in contemporary theory when the question of non-Christian religions and the universality of salvation is being discussed. Further treatment of this point is not needed here, however, since we have already shown how the universality of salvation may be conceived in relationship to Jesus.

The second assumption is still less obvious and both as fact and possibility requires clearer proof. It states that all men who reach salvation must have a relationship to Jesus Christ in their saving faith and that the fact that Jesus is the universal cause of salvation implies that all men are related to Jesus by means of the faith that is necessary for salvation.

The fact and possibility of this raise two different questions of which the ‘how’ question will receive most of our attention. On the fact itself a few prior comments will be made so that its possibility can be intelligibly discussed. As a result of the Second Vatican Council it must be accepted that salvation is open to any adult human being on the basis of a strictly supernatural faith in revelation brought about by grace. This is true of all men, even for ‘heathens’, and this means that in no case can faith in any way be replaced by anything else, as could be proposed at the beginning of this century by Straub,[19] for example. All such suggestions contradict the teaching of the magisterium. The theological difficulties this raises are made plain by the repeated assertions of the Council that God alone knows how such a faith is in fact possible in certain circumstances and under certain conditions. Specifically this applied to pagans and those living before Christ who were untouched by the Old Testament. But despite this evident embarrassment the Council held fast to the conviction that supernatural faith in revelation in the proper sense of this term was necessary for all men and rejected the view that in place of faith a purely metaphysical knowledge of God, freely accepted, would suffice. A free self-revelation of God is thus demanded, which is to be accepted by man. Without going any further into this problem, the possibility and intelligibility of a supernatural faith in revelation for all men must simply be presupposed. Otherwise we would have to discuss the possibility of salvation and faith for atheists and the question of anonymous theism, as was done at the Council.

Let us suppose, then, that a faith which is directed to the self- revelation of God is possible even when a person has not been in [218] contact with the explicit revelation contained in the [19] Cf. A. Straub, De analysi fidei (lnnsbruck, 1922).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Old and New Testaments. We may note in passing that this does not mean accepting the theory of an 'original revelation in the Garden of Eden' in the usual sense, or supposing that this primitive revelation was transmitted through several million years of human history. The only matter to be discussed is whether the faith, whose possibility we are assuming, may conceivably contain, in a manner analogous to the implicit and unthematic presence of God, an implicit but still genuine presence of Jesus Christ, especially in the case of so-called atheists. Only under this condition would such people not only be drawn into the redeeming action of Jesus, but would also possess a relationship to this act of salvation through their faith, thus creating a two way connection.

This brings us to the often discussed question of 'anonymous Christians',[20] a topic which in the space available here can only be briefly touched on. Recently the phrase has occasioned massive objections, which sometimes contain considerable misunderstandings. It is absurd and ridiculous, for instance, to assert that supporters of this notion merely want to use it to console Church members for the diminishing number, both in relative and absolute terms, of those confessing explicit Christian faith. It was never just a matter of a 'tranquilliser' to counter the disappearance of Christian belief. In fact the theory arose from two facts: first, the possibility of supernatural salvation and of a corresponding faith which must be granted to non-Christians, even if they never become Christian; and secondly, that salvation cannot be gained without reference to God and Christ, since it must in its origin, history and fulfilment be a theistic and Christian salvation.

One can only escape this conclusion if one adopts the pessimistic outlook common in the past and disputes the possibility of supernatural salvation for such people, thereby consigning them to hell or limbo, or if one grants salvation merely on the basis of human respectability without reference to God and Christ, or if, finally, one refuses to think about the Christian character of salvation in these cases, thus endangering the universality of Christ's redeeming action, which should on the contrary be firmly maintained.

As we said years ago, it is not a question of the name, 'anonymous Christian' or 'anonymous Christianity'.[21] The issue clearly arises from [219] the teaching of the Second Vatican Council. In addition we should have learnt enough from psychology, depth psychology and a genuine metaphysical understanding of human knowledge and freedom to realise that a man does not know and deliberately put into practice only those things which he can state in words as objects of his conscious awareness or can freely affirm. It is obvious that a contradiction can exist between the way a person takes free possession of himself in an unthematic and unreflective manner and the way he interprets himself as an object in words and concepts, and this contradiction does not have to be noticed by the person concerned, who may indeed expressly deny it. Is it surprising that in certain circumstances the real situation and the basic self-understanding of a person may be grasped more clearly by someone else than by the person himself, who may in fact strongly resist the other's interpretation? This fact must be accepted; it cannot be avoided or explained away, since it frequently happens that one man interprets another differently from the latter's own reading of himself.

I must assert as a Christian and a metaphysician who holds that the spiritual element in man cannot be reduced to matter that even a materialist philosopher does those free, spiritual activities which I objectify in a philosophy of spirit, even if the empiricist affirms that such activities do not in fact exist. A Marxist philosopher of history certainly interprets my role as a priest differently from the way I do. From a formal point of view, then, there is no problem

[20] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Observations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian" ', Theological Investigations XIV (London, 1976), pp. 280-294. Bibliog. and references given there.
[21] Cf. the introduction to the article referred to in footnote 19, op. cit., pp. 531 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in my treating someone as an anonymous Christian, even if he energetically denies my interpretation and rejects it as false or incoherent; Nishitani the well known Japanese philosopher, the head of the Kyoto school, who is familiar with the notion of the anonymous Christian, once asked me: What would you say to my treating you as an anonymous Zen Buddhist? I replied: certainly you may and should do so from your point of view; I feel myself honoured by such an interpretation, even if I am obliged to regard you as being in error or if I assume that, correctly understood, to be a genuine Zen Buddhist is identical with being a genuine Christian, in the sense directly and properly intended by such statements. Of course in terms of objective social awareness it is indeed clear that the Buddhist is not a Christian and the Christian is not a Buddhist. Nishitani replied: Then on this point we are entirely at one.

Of course an anonymous Christian is different from an explicit Christian. Otherwise he would be an explicit Christian and not an [220] anonymous one. He lacks nearly all or most of those characteristics which on the level of objective understanding and social life go into making a Christian. The idea of the anonymous Christian does not mean that the realities which the anonymous Christian lacks, such as the explicit profession of Christian faith or baptism, are unimportant for salvation and for being a Christian, even if it is not possible here to explain more clearly their significance for salvation.[22] It is more important that the heathen in his polytheism, the atheist in good faith, the theist outside the revelation of the Old and New Testaments, all possess not only a relationship of faith to God's self-revelation, but also a genuine relationship to Jesus Christ and his saving action. It is in fact not easy in the case of the relationship to God to solve the question why such men do not merely have an unthematic, transcendent relationship to the God of philosophers but also possess a relationship to the God who communicates himself to man in grace and bestows a supernatural self-revelation on man.

A CHRISTOLOGY OF QUEST

The actual history of Jesus Christ, the particularity of his cross in space and time, makes the relationship to him difficult, more difficult at any rate than the transcendent relation of man to God. In contrast to the possibilities open to believers, Jesus cannot be meant to be an explicit theme in the cases we are considering, nor be presented as a concrete historical point of reference which would make possible an encounter with his unique spatio-temporal location. Otherwise the reference to Jesus embodied in faith of this type would not differ from that possessed by an explicit Christian. One way out of the cul-de-sac created by the demand for a relationship to Jesus for which a concrete historical possibility cannot seemingly be discovered, may be offered by the suggestion that such a relationship can actually be established by a person's alignment, correct in terms of faith, to realities which are objectively and historically connected to Jesus and his history. This would mean that a man would be related to Jesus without this involving any subjective implications. This notion need not be false, but it leaves the proposed relationship so 'thin' that it does not suffice by itself. For the relationship would have, in part at least, a purely objective [221] character and would not enter at all into the existential realm of the life of faith, or at least not in an intelligible fashion. The objective part of the relationship remains so general and abstract that it provides less explanation than is here required. Finally the whole theory is based on the single truth that, given the unity of history, each part is connected to the whole.

[22] The importance for salvation of the realities which constitute explicit Christianity may be explained as the response to a command or as a necessary means of salvation or in a variety of other ways.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We can only find a real way out of this difficulty if in such cases we attribute a 'Christology of quest' to all men of good will and regard it as sufficient to answer our question. A person who is searching for something which is specific and yet unknown has a genuine existential connection, as one alert and on the watch, with whatever he is seeking, even if he has not yet found it, and so cannot develop the relation to the object of his quest to its full extent. The reality of the relationship to this object and its inner connection to the goal becomes clear, since the relation to the goal is always characterised by a new and more radical search. If this were not true we could not speak of the growth of faith and the quest of hope in the case of the justified. If searching belongs to the essence of the pilgrim state of having found what is being sought, then the real connection of the search to its object cannot be denied, even if the object of the quest has not yet been found. At this point it will be clear that the search is brought about by grace, which has found its historically tangible expression and its irreversible force in Jesus. This means that if the search is caused by this grace, a person engaged on such a quest is directed in some measure to this goal. We are assuming here that such a Christology of quest involves hope and expectation of an Advent kind and that a person who is caught up in the actual process of history demands some factual guarantee of the successful fulfilment of his eschatological hope. Its realisation means the end of his history, the fulfilment of his own transcendent nature which consists in the reference to God and his own self-realisation in freedom. This realisation, however, does not occur in an isolated transcendence apart from history, but takes place in the specific and common history of all men.

For further clarification of the relationship of eschatological hope to Christ, as it is found in the actual fulfilment of human existence transformed by divine grace, three different claims upon human existence should be distinguished. Human existence is always directed to the freedom of man. In accepting freedom a man gives assent in his quest to the absolute source of salvation which is tangible in history, although these three claims do not in themselves exhaust the basic [222] structure of human existence.[23] They are united by the fact that a man who approaches them without reserve is always engaged upon a 'Christology of quest' in his human existence. The difference between such a person and an explicit Christian is that in the Christology of quest a man does not know that it is in Jesus of Nazareth that what he is seeking is to be found. Because a man engaged upon the Christological quest is prepared without conditions or qualifications to accept the goal wherever and however it can be found, this Christological search is in fact directed to Jesus, for it is Jesus who in reality is its proper goal. This means that the Christological quest possesses a relationship to Jesus, even if a man does not know how to call him by his proper name. This relationship plainly differs from that of a professing Christian to his Lord.

THE CLAIMS UPON HUMAN EXISTENCE

First of all there is the demand for an absolute love of neighbour, in the form presented in Mt 25. This must be taken with radical seriousness and approached, as it were, from 'below', from the love of the particular neighbour. If one adds an 'as if' to the statement of Christ that he himself is genuinely loved in a neighbour, or if one adopts a theology of purely legal attribution, then one distorts the sense of Jesus' words which is taken from the real experience of love. The true meaning is that through radical and unconditional love of [23] Similar ideas, though from another point of view, form the basis of the author's study, 'Das konkrete Verhältnis zu Jesus', Ich glaube an Jesus Christus (Zurich, 1968), pp. 49-65. They have also been used for various proposals for a short formulation of faith; cf. R. Bleistein, Kurzformel des Glauhens II (Wurzburg, 1971), pp. 86-94.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

another, a man makes an implicit act of faith and love in Christ. This is indeed true, for any man, being both finite and unreliable, cannot rationally justify from his own resources the offer of absolute love in which a person dares to commit himself without reserve or qualification to another. In himself he could only be the object of a limited love, a love in which the lover either holds himself back or ventures into a realm which may be without meaning. If this dilemma could be overcome purely by an appeal to God as the guarantee and limit of the absolute character of love, then this might be feasible in an abstract and speculative sense with reference to the general concept of absolute love. But if a man experiences the absolute quality of love, it is plain that love demands [223] more than the permanent and transcendent guarantee of God. Love does not find its full realisation out of its own resources but from the radical unity it has with the love of God in Jesus Christ. It implies a unity of the love of God and the love of neighbour, in which the love of neighbour is the love of God and so has an absolute quality, even if this lacks thematic expression. Love searches for the God-man, i.e. for the one who can and may be loved as man with absolute commitment proper to the love of God, not as an idea but as a concrete reality. Ideas cannot be loved: it is the reality which is desired, whether this be already present or lies in the future. This notion depends of course upon the assumption that men form a single totality and that genuine love is not an isolated, individualistic affair. It always tends rather to embrace all men with all the practical implications demanded by love, and conversely it must find concrete expression in the love of the particular individual. Furthermore we are saying that the existence of the God-man within the single totality of mankind makes possible absolute love of another person.

Secondly there is the demand to be prepared for death. Normal preaching tends to concentrate in the case of the death of Jesus, despite its crucial significance for salvation, too much upon the particular, categorial event which takes place alongside many others on the world stage and has its own specific character. But the particular character of this death does not make plain much of the innermost being of the world and of human existence, or bring it to fulfilment. One moves too quickly to a consideration of the external causes and the violent nature of this death and treats it in the context of a theory of satisfaction as the purely external and meritorious cause of the redemption. But in a theology of death the event of Jesus's death can be more closely related to the basic structure of human existence. Death is the one act governing the whole of life in which a man as a free being has total self-determination. This means, or should mean, the acceptance of absolute control in the radical powerlessness which is acutely experienced in death. If a man, whose freedom signifies being responsible for his own destiny and the desire to control it, freely and willingly accepts this radical powerlessness, and if this is not an acceptance of the absurd which could be rejected with justifiable protest, then in this acceptance a man is looking forward to death as reconciliation with expectant hope, or giving assent to it in these terms. For a man does not give assent in the ultimate analysis to abstract norms and concepts but rather to that present or future reality found in his own [224] history as the basis of his existence, in which the enduring dialectic between action and powerless suffering is finally reconciled in death. But this is only possible if the dialectic at the root of human existence is resolved through being attributed to the one who is himself the ultimate ground of this duality.

Finally we should mention the demand for hope in the future. A man has hopes and plans and at the same time projects himself into the unforeseeable which lies ahead. In so doing he moves towards his own future. In this process he is continually striving to overcome the inner and outer self-alienation and to lessen the gap between what he is and what he wishes and ought to become. Does this absolute reconciliation, both individual and collective, remain a distant goal, ever approached but never reached, or can it be achieved as the absolute future, without its achievement destroying the finite and being swallowed up in the absolute being of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God? If the absolute future of God is really our own future, does the reconciliation still lie ahead of us as a final goal, or does it already belong- to history, so that history even now embodies the definitive pledge of the goal and, though still incomplete, is moving within its final purpose? The man with authentic hope must hope that the reality of history gives an affirmative answer to the second alternative in each question. This hope offers a Christian an insight into that which faith in the incarnation and resurrection of Jesus, understood as the definitive beginning of the coming of God, professes to be the absolute future of the world and of history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[225]

PART FOUR

Questions About God

[227]

14

THE HIDDENNESS OF GOD

'God is dead' is a modern slogan which is now beginning to ebb and fade away. 'How should we speak about God?' is a question raised by not a few theologians in the attempt to come to grips with the actual realities of understanding, thought and intelligible language on this subject. 'God is hidden', 'He is a mystery, indeed he is the absolute mystery'. So speaks a long theological tradition, and it is on this tradition that a dogmatic theologian would like to offer a few reflections here.[1] The paucity of the data, familiar to every school of theology,[2] allows no more than an abstract treatment [228] of the subject. All the striking and concrete information drawn from biblical and historical theology must here be omitted. Still this investigation will be undertaken in the hope of presenting a somewhat more radical analysis of the problem which lies behind the phrase, 'the hiddenness of God'.

First of all we should review the traditional data found in manuals of theology on the topic. By the theology of the manuals is meant Catholic theological endeavour in so far as this has influenced contemporary textbooks without achieving any very penetrating investigation into the richer and more colourful history of this theological proposition about God.[3] If such a phenomenon should also be found in the realm of Protestant theology, then this must be left aside since the author is not competent to deal with it.

The second stage will be to consider the problematic, raised by the propositions found in

---

[1] For the relevant statements of the Church's magisterium, cf. Denz. 294, 501, 525, 800, 804, 3001.

[2] See the remarks which are usually made in the chapter on the possibility of knowledge of God. These ideas are normally proposed for the knowledge of God after death only as an appendix. M. Premm, Katholische Glaubenskunde I (Vienna, 1951), pp. 86-88; J. Pohle and J. Gummersbach, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik I (Paderborn, 1952), pp. 151-155; 174-176; Joh. Brinktrine, Die Lehre von Gott, I (Paderborn, 1953), pp. 39-42; Fr. Diekamp and Kl. Jüssen, Katholische Dogmatik I (Munster, 1958), pp. 129-131; Die Katholische Glaubenswelt I (Freiburg i. Br., 1959), pp. 396 sq.; H. Lais, Dogmatik I (Kevelaer, 1965), pp. 43-45. The topic is easier to grasp and is approached by different authors in Mysterium Salutis II 'Die Heilsgeschichte vor Christus,' (Zurich, 1967), pp. 35, note 7; 289 sq., 300, 345, 349.

Our reservations in embarking upon the Protestant treatment of the question are based on the great diversity among different writers which seems to have existed in discussions of the 'hiddenness of God'. Even a cursory glance at the following accounts by dogmatic theologians gives evidence of this: W. Elert, Der christliche Glaube (Berlin, 1940), pp. 176-184 (Gotteserkenntnis); P. Althaus, Grundriss der Dogmatik (Gütersloh, 1959), pp. 31-33 (Der verborgene Gott); W. Trillhaas, Dogmatik (Berlin, 1962), pp. 97-119 (Gottes Verborgenheit und Gottes Erkenntnis) above all the extensive treatment by Karl Barth is to be noted Church Doqmatics II Pt 1 (Edinburgh 1957) pp. 179-204 (The Hiddenness of God).

[3] Cf. the references given in footnote 2. In general one may say that on the Catholic side there is a tendency to treat the question in a narrow and restricted way. At any rate there is little attempt to go beyond the statements of the magisterium. On the Protestant side, however, a whole range of topics are touched on under this heading, so that the meaning is hard to grasp clearly. The treatment is normally extensive and almost indeterminable. Here only the textbooks in German are considered, but they scarcely differ from works in other languages, at least on the Catholic side. Mysterium Salutis is also available in other languages.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this theological school, which has not itself received sufficient attention within the school. Finally some attempt will be made to bring together the contributions of a systematic theologian into a positive synthesis.

'THE HIDDENNESS OF GOD' ACCORDING TO CLASSICAL THEOLOGY

If I am not mistaken, the concept 'hiddenness' is less frequently used in Catholic theology than that of 'incomprehensibility'. This fact is of some significance. Does it mean that a metaphysical treatment of the question is preferred to an investigation from the perspective of the history of salvation and revelation? Of course the theologian knows from revelation that vital knowledge of God is given to man through the revealed word, knowledge of which he would otherwise be quite ignorant despite its crucial importance for salvation. God emerges, as it were, from his hiddenness in revelation and makes himself known to man as the author of salvation.[4] And yet the revealed word of God [229] is seen from the point of view of the 'incomprehensibility of God' as something which is hidden and can only be illuminated through the word of revelation, in so far as this is intrinsically possible. Here the metaphysical or essential aspect is dominant. The basic assertion of classical theology refers to the incomprehensibility, the 'incomprehensibilitas' of God. This incomprehensibility follows from the essential infinity of God which makes it impossible for a finite created intellect to exhaust the possibilities of knowledge and truth contained in this absolute fullness of being.

This does not mean, however, that in God some things are known (at least in the final vision of heaven), while others simply remain unknown. Rather one and the same God is known and is at the same time fundamentally incomprehensible, even if the investigation of the question is not normally taken any further, i.e. how one can speak in the same breath of the 'knowability' and the 'unknowability' of one and the same 'object'.

The incomprehensibility of God is then defined more precisely by the observation that the being of God and the mystery of the Trinity are not 'transparent' to man. This applies at least in the case of the possibilities of knowledge open to man during his life of pilgrimage when his natural intellectual capacities do not permit him to obtain a speculative and philosophical grasp of the Trinity. He can only know of the Trinity through the word of revelation which man does not naturally merit and which in this sense is supernatural. Even then, after revelation, the Trinity escapes conceptual mastery and remains a mystery.[5]

In addition the attempt is made to ground the necessity of revelation in the fact that God is free with regard to the world, and that even through the act of creation God has not experienced any restriction of his freedom. Thus the possible realm of free divine decisions is not completely exhausted by creation and its structures. God can behave as a free agent towards the world once it is a given reality. Such free decisions could on this account only be known by man through revelation. In so far as a sort of hiddenness is attached to these free 'decrees' precisely because of their origin in freedom and as long as they are not [230] objectified, God remains in this free relationship to the world the one who is hidden. Why and how far the free decisions of God retain their hidden and incomprehensible character after revelation are questions which scarcely receive any detailed analysis. Wherever such a free self-disclosure of God reveals something which is and remains a mystery in virtue of God's own inner nature, a quality of mystery is evidently attached to these decisions because [4] Cf. Vatican II, Dei Verbum nos. 2 and 3, where however our question is not explicitly mentioned.

[5] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73; The Trinity (London, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of their content. Essential incomprehensibility and the necessity of historical revelation are closely connected in such a viewpoint.

The reference to the free decrees of God in relation to a world which is already created make it possible to pursue the theme of salvation history in the question of the hiddenness of God, for God freely emerges from his hiddenness into history. But the doctrine of God's free decisions with respect to the world is not very clearly related to the fact of God's ontological incomprehensibility. In consequence the theme of God's hiddenness in relation to salvation history, though briefly touched on, remains secondary to the main idea of his essential incomprehensibility.

Classical theology adds a second crucial assertion: God remains incomprehensible even in the beatific vision. One might remark that this notion is already covered by the way in which God's incomprehensibility is grounded in relation to the human mind. For this line of reasoning rests less upon the special features of human existence in its earthly form than upon the incommensurability of the finite capacity of knowledge proper to man with the infinite nature of God. In other words the argument is conceived in terms of metaphysics and not of salvation history. But the fact that classical theology holds firm to God's incomprehensibility even in the beatific vision must nevertheless be underlined. For scholastic teaching differs from Scripture in that the state of human salvation, of ultimate blessedness, is more radically centred upon the beatific vision. This is conceived as the fulfilment of man's theoretical intellect. In this perspective the absolute and direct contact between the human intellect and the being of God is stressed and this contact is no longer mediated by any finite reality. This the difference must be brought out and emphasised between the pilgrim state on the one hand, in which knowledge of God remains obscure and is mediated through the created world and finite language in riddles and images, and the radical and direct self-disclosure by God in the beatific vision on the other hand. If the incomprehensibility of God is still affirmed despite the emphasis laid [231] upon his self-revelation in the beatific vision, then this is a striking assertion of God's mystery which is far from self-evident. Of course it poses the question how God can still be incomprehensible if he is directly perceived and if, at least in this state, man is said to be 'capax infiniti'. The problem, then, is how such a vision can exist and what it is supposed to entail, if God still remains incomprehensible.

THE PROBLEM OF GOD'S INCOMPREHENSIBILITY

These propositions of classical theology are not free of problems. In this theological endeavour one is struck by the predominant desire for theoretical understanding. From the start the incomprehensibility of God is so firmly based upon a certain conception of knowledge and of truth obtained by such knowledge that God's incomprehensibility merely forms the presupposition for a negative assertion of the finite nature of man. Man can never entirely or exhaustively grasp God. One might almost add, unfortunately! The horizon of understanding which is assumed here, the criterion by which human knowledge is measured so that God remains incomprehensible, represents a conception based on a model of knowledge in which an object is penetrated and mastered. In comparison with this paradigm of knowledge, human perception of God on earth and even in the state of final fulfilment remains deficient. God is, unfortunately, always incomprehensible, however much a man may know of him and however directly he may perceive him in heavenly beatitude.

In such an ideal of knowledge the Greek desire of absolute gnosis and the modern understanding of knowledge as a process which leads to the mastery of an object come together, whether the mastery in question is conceived in terms of German idealism or of the natural sciences. In this context the incomprehensibility of God is the ground for the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

permanent finitude of the creature negatively conceived, even though it must be granted that the assertion of such finitude gives God the glory which, in an absolute sense, is proper to him alone. This must be stated in the face of any temptation to make human subjectivity the event of absolute consciousness or to suppress the pain of being finite in any other way. It only remains to ask whether with the predominance of the desire for theoretical understanding the radical recognition of God's utter incomprehensibility does not naturally lead to an indifference on man's part towards something which he cannot understand, that is, to a kind of practical atheism. And how can the [232] state of human beatitude be conceived if man is thrown headlong into direct contact with God's incomprehensibility which is utterly beyond his powers, and if his capacity for knowledge is not meant to be directed to the experience of incomprehensibility[6] but rather to comprehensive mastery? This means that he must be resigned to being trapped within his finite capacity of knowledge in the face of the incomprehensible God.

This theology raises a second problem about God's incomprehensibility. It is quite understandable that the free decisions of God with regard to the world must remain hidden as long as they are not communicated through specific verbal revelation. But it seems that the hidden character of God's personal freedom in relation to the world is not so easily intelligible as classical theology apparently imagines. One need only recollect that the free decisions of God towards his world must, it seems, be given objective expression in terms of worldly realities in a manner similar to the divine purpose in the creation of the world. But then the free decisions of God seem to possess no special hidden quality beyond that belonging to any free personal decision before it is made known through a freely created objective form. As long as the free decrees of God are not related to his intrinsic reality of incomprehensible glory, then they are necessarily linked to those realities which he freely creates (e.g. the salvation of men). Such realities belong to the finite realm and cannot be more incomprehensible to a man with a finite capacity for knowledge than other realities in the world. Being finite they are intrinsically commensurable to a finite intellect of a fundamentally unlimited, transcendent kind. If one wanted to understand the incomprehensibility of God from the point of view of the freedom of his decisions and the necessity of revelation it implies, then the 'deus absconditus' must come out of his hiddenness in order to become 'deus revelatus' in such a way that his whole revelation would be comprehensible. It would then be a matter of indifference to us what he might perhaps keep hidden, for the 'incomprehensible' element of the 'deus revelatus' would merely consist in the human fear that God could behave towards men differently from the way in which he in fact does behave. The God who treats sinners with mercy and grace could also be a God of pure anger and judgement, or, to put the matter in Catholic and scholastic terms, he could be a God who denies the chance of supernatural destiny. But this fear [233] must be removed by the experience that in reality God has freely acted as the God of forgiveness and absolute nearness. But this would be intelligible as a statement about us, even if it rests upon the freedom of God, and so cannot be any more incomprehensible than we are ourselves. At any rate this is how it seems until it becomes clear that the actual content of God's free decisions in relation to us consists precisely in the presence of his incomprehensibility. Only in this way can the doctrine of essential incomprehensibility and the idea of the divine hiddenness of salvation history be mutually related.[7] For this to occur it is not enough to say that through revelation God has freely determined to manifest those mysteries which lie hidden in him and which retain their mysterious quality. For the question still remains open, what is the exact relationship between the process of revelation and the content of revelation, between [6] In this experience the issue is the incomprehensibility itself and not what is grasped and known.

[7] This is not only possible, or merely provisional and only factually overcome.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'revelatio qua' and 'revelatio quae'.

In general it is not clear in classical theology that the problem arising from the direct vision of an incomprehensible God can only be solved in the context of love. It is not a matter here of the scholastic dispute, whether the essence of beatitude consists in the intellectual fulfilment as such, i.e. in the 'visio', or in the fulfilment of the will in love for which direct vision merely provides the precondition in the form of knowledge, or in both. The traditional diversity of opinion and the various scholastic theories are of no interest as long as one does not realise that knowledge of the incomprehensible God himself in direct vision can only cease to be the opposite of fulfilment, if knowledge itself achieves perfection by being 'raised up' into love. Otherwise knowledge, taken in the sense usual in western tradition, would itself founder on the alien and-inhospitable rock of God's incomprehensibility. If the fundamental character of knowledge is understood, not in the sense of 'seeing through' an object, but rather as a possible openness to the mystery itself, then the question becomes at once more straightforward. Knowledge in the traditional sense would then be regarded as a derivation of the basic meaning of knowledge. The mutual perichoresis of knowledge and freedom occurs naturally and settles the question of the primacy of knowledge or love by focusing upon a more fundamental and essential spiritual unity which finds expression in the duality of knowledge and love. In the traditional conception of the direct vision of God[8] no answer is usually given to [234] the question of why knowledge does not come to grief when faced with the vision of God's incomprehensibility, or of why it does not despair and give up when confronted with his enduring hiddenness. If it is assumed that knowledge means comprehensive mastery, then the object grasped in such knowledge, even when it reaches fulfilment, must be qualified with the negative predicate of incomprehensible. Vision in this account can only be a radical version of the insight that we never reach God.

Finally we should notice a further problem inherent in the classical doctrine of God's incomprehensibility. Whenever the necessity of a supernatural verbal revelation is grounded in the fact that God is hidden in himself from the human spirit, distinctions are made between various grades of 'mysteries'. We do not want to pursue this point further here, but it is clear that it is simply assumed even in the case of the highest level of the mysteries of faith and revelation that there are a specific number of such mysteries. It is asserted of 'mysteria stricte dicta' that they could only be made known through the revelation of God and even after this revelation they remain impenetrable to man. There is scarcely any attempt made to answer the question whether this impenetrability is maintained for each of the 'mysteria stricte dicta' in the direct vision of God. It is supposed rather that the number and type of mysteries communicated through divine revelation depends simply upon the free decision of God.

The concept of divine incomprehensibility, as this is grasped by the human mind, naturally implies that it can be spelt out in an indefinite number of mysteries, always assuming of course that such a 'multiplication' does not contradict the basic notion of incomprehensibility. This assumption, however, hardly receives any explicit consideration. Scholastic teaching takes it as a matter of course that 'mysteria stricte dicta' in the sense outlined above can refer not merely to the explicitation of the incomprehensibility of God, as for example, the mystery of the Trinity. They can also be present in realities which embody God's actions 'ad extra' such as transubstantiation. We have already said that such an assumption is far from obvious or illuminating. In any event it is evident that the doctrine of the multiplicity of 'mysteria stricte dicta' is not related in this account to the primary mystery of divine incomprehensibility. No answer is given to the question, and perhaps it is not even seen as a question, of how any finite reality, created by God [235] and distinct from him, can [8] Here one must overlook Bonaventure and a few other theologians who were aware of the value of the 'ecstatic' in the being of man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be a 'mysterium stricte dictum' for an intellect possessing unlimited transcendence. If the axiom is valid that being, intelligibility and knowledge increase and diminish in the same measure and are ultimately identical, as St Thomas took for granted and regarded as self-evident,[9] then a finite reality of this type cannot be fundamentally impenetrable. If one starts from the position that the quality of mystery in the sense of a 'mysterium stricte dictum' can only be predicated of God alone and of no other reality, then the question of the 'number of mysteries' is seen in a new light. If such a number exists, then it must in any case be related to the incomprehensibility of God himself.

OUTLINE OF A SYNTHESIS

We should now address ourselves to trying to give a positive answer to the problems we have found in classical Catholic theology with regard to the incomprehensibility, hiddenness and mystery of God.

In such an attempt to discover a positive synthesis we should not be worried about whether we are concerned with philosophy or theology. The following reflections may seem philosophical and speculative but in fact they proceed from a conviction of faith, that is, from a strictly theological proposition. This states that perfect beatitude granted to man by God consists in immediate access to God, i.e. God is himself the fulfilment of man. All communication in the created order, in so far as this can be conceived or is to be found in traditional theology (lumen gloriae), must be understood in relation to the direct access to God as communication with his immediate presence. It cannot be a question here in any sense of a created reality originating in God which merely represents God and only makes him indirectly present to man as the cause of the fulfilment which is properly ours. Of course this theological assertion can be taken as an interpretation of the experience of faith which can be directly grasped in Scripture. The proposition as defined by Benedict XII,[10] which counts as dogma for Catholic theology, cannot be anything else than the expression of a radical human hope in the Spirit of God, despite all the other possible formulations of this proposition. God himself in his own very being wills to be the beatitude of man. This fulfilment of the 'capax infiniti' [236] through the 'infinitum' may not be weakened by an appeal to other modes of communication which are of a more finite and intelligible nature. This 'metaphysic' need involve no more than the assertion that God himself and nothing else is our eternal life, however he may be understood by us here and now. This theological proposition forms the basis of all the reflections which are contained in this essay. However philosophical and speculative the line of thinking may appear, its only purpose is to make the primary theological statement intelligible and to prevent it being weakened or undervalued.

'The Truth' occurs in the basic experience of the mystery itself. Such knowledge is not in origin a defective mode of real knowledge, in the usual sense of the term. For such knowledge is directed to what can be comprehended and penetrated and only fails in this endeavour in a particular instance, without the object which is partially perceived becoming something totally unknown. What is called knowledge according to the common usage originating in the western tradition of philosophy, i.e. comprehension and mastery, consists in the ordering of data in a horizon of understanding and system of coordinates which is evident to us as the object which we possess identically with ourselves. But it is this which is a defective form of the true knowledge in which the mystery itself unfolds. If knowledge in the ordinary sense is regarded as a secondary and defective form of the real nature of knowledge,

[9] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Thomas Aquinas on Truth', Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 13-31.
[10] Cf. Denz. 1000-1001.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

then it is of no importance whether ordinary knowledge is understood in the sense of the creation of functional connections between the primary data of an original experience, or treated as the vision in which what is seen is comprehended. For the essence of knowledge lies in the mystery which is the object of primary experience and is alone self-evident. The unlimited and transcendent nature of man, the openness to the mystery itself which is given radical depth by grace, does not turn man into the event of the absolute spirit in the way envisaged by German idealism or similar philosophies; it directs him rather to the incomprehensible mystery, in relation to which the openness of transcendence is experienced. Man as transcendent subject is not the shepherd of being but the one protected by the mystery. In the primary realisation of his being (dasein) and in the philosophical reflection derived from it, man comes to be himself and here he does not experience himself as the dominant, absolute subject, but as the one whose being is bestowed upon him by the mystery. This is the reason why, in forming any concept, he understands himself as the one who reaches out beyond the conceptual into the nameless and the [237] incomprehensible. Transcendence grasped in its unlimited breadth is the a priori condition of objective and reflective knowledge and evaluation. It is the very condition of its possibility, even though it is ordered to the inexpressible. It is also the precondition for the freedom which is historically expressed and objectified. Thus the experience of the nameless mystery as both origin and goal is the a priori condition of all categorial knowledge and of all historical activity; it is not merely a marginal phenomenon at the end of the road. Otherwise it would merely be a matter of a journey into the bright light of categorial and ultimately scientific understanding, a journey on which a man grows weary in the pursuit of knowledge, leaves what is still unknown to itself and gives the name of mystery to this unmastered realm of the intelligible. In contrast knowledge in the primary sense is the presence of the mystery itself. It is being addressed by what no longer has a name, and it is relying on a reality which is not mastered but is itself the master. It is the speech of the being without a name, about which clear statements are impossible; it is the last moment before the dumbness which is needed if the silence is to be heard, and God is to be worshipped in love. If one insists that knowing in the basic sense consists in a piece of clear and ordinary understanding and in the science based upon it, then what we have said would have to be formulated in a different way. The manner of formulation is ultimately of no special consequence. The origin and goal of knowledge in the mystery is one of its constituent elements. In an unthematic way this is experienced in day-to-day knowledge and may be called ‘primary’ in the sense of the a priori condition of possibility of all knowing, even though it only becomes thematic in a secondary sense through subsequent reflection upon its own a priori presuppositions. There may be many truths. They can be clear and can guarantee control over reality. But they all stem from the unfolding of the mystery itself, from the one truth. This is not merely a later collection of truths but precedes them as the condition of their possibility. The presence of the one truth is of course unthematic, since it exists in the first instance as the condition of possibility of spatio–temporal and categorial–historical experience. It can therefore be overlooked and suppressed; its silent presence can be ignored in the face of immediate phenomena which in their variety and particularity can fill the space of life and consciousness. Where, too, this one truth is expressed in word in the ultimate courage of existence and, almost against its own nature, finds objective form, it can be confused with other objective [238] expressions and so lack truth and credibility. But this does not alter the fact that the one truth is the primary event of the spirit; it is the mystery which endures and unfolds and establishes the essential human capacity for truth.[11] In other words the ‘deus absconditus’ is the source of truth for [11] Cf. The author’s studies in the metaphysics of knowledge: Spirit in the World (London and Sydney, 1968); Hearers of the Word (London and Sydney, 1969); ‘Thomas Aquinas on Truth’, Theological Investigations XII

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

man, which is freely bestowed upon him and determines his identity. Man always stands before the 'deus absconditus', even when he tries to look away and refuses to accept the truth that clear knowledge of the reality of the world, which gives him mastery over the world, comes from this 'deus absconditus'. Knowledge is primarily the experience of the overwhelming mystery of this 'deus absconditus'.

Divine revelation is not the unveiling of something previously hidden, which through this illumination leads to an awareness similar to that found in ordinary knowledge of the world. Rather it means that the 'deus absconditus' becomes radically present as the abiding mystery. This mystery presents itself through revelation as the source of forgiveness, salvation and an eternal home. Revelation does not mean that the mystery is overcome by gnosis bestowed by God, even in the direct vision of God; on the contrary, it is the history of the deepening perception of God as the mystery. This continues in the direct presence of God afforded by what we call the beatific vision and can only be sustained in the loving surrender to the enduring mystery. It is the lost and not the blessed soul who perceives everything as infinite variety and so perceives nothing at all. The blessed abandons himself unconditionally to the direct self-communication of the mystery of the 'deus absconditus' from which come love and salvation. If the theoretical intellect is understood as the capacity for conceptual mastery and comprehension, then beatitude means that the theoretical intellect is set free to love the mystery, which lays total hold of us by its direct presence. The history of revelation, then, consists in the growing awareness that we are involved with the permanent mystery and that our involvement becomes ever more intense and exclusive. If revelation is seen in this perspective, there is certainly a great deal more to say about it than we usually find in discussions of revelation. But if the climax of revelation, the communication of the Spirit of God himself, takes place when a man loses everything in death except God, and in [239] this way achieves blessedness,[12] then the history of revelation can well be written in the manner proposed here. In any history nothing can ultimately be explained without reference to the ending. In our case the ending is the advent of God who is the enduring mystery and is accepted in love. In that history, therefore, the mystery is not removed by a slow process of attrition; rather all the provisional realities are dismantled which can lead to the belief that we can only achieve a relationship to God through what we believe we know about him. But such knowledge only offers figures and images, either good or bad, which represent and shape him to our needs. This process only lasts until we finally let go of everything in the assurance that God, the one who fundamentally cannot be shaped to our needs, becomes through his self-gift the being who alone is fitted to us. For through his own very being God has granted to us that the measure of our knowledge, desire and activity need not be ourselves but is the immeasurability of God himself. The fulfilment of the created order consists in the fact that God, who is our absolute future, is the incomprehensible mystery. This incomprehensibility is not to be taken as the limit of fulfilment but rather signifies its limitlessness which is loved and experienced as such. Of course this doctrine represents a danger for man. If he derives enjoyment from its theoretical and objective expression and turns it into a secret idol, then the highest fulfilment is distorted into a terrifying disorder. Only if the incomprehensible mystery is itself the object of love, if knowledge goes beyond the self and knowledge and love penetrate the mystery through such ecstasy, no longer returning to the self, only then is the final and greatest danger removed, the danger, that is, of turning the doctrine into a sublime gnosis in which once again a man replaces God with self. One cannot escape this danger by refusing really to accept that it is the will of God to be himself the absolute future of man and to be his proper fulfilment. He desires to be the (London, 1975), pp. 13-31. All these studies were written in the same period.

[12] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Ideas for a Theology of Death', Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975) pp. 169-186.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

beatitude of man in his incomprehensibility and not despite it, and this is the key to man's own self-understanding. The incomprehensibility of God as the blessed fulfilment of man, if one wished to develop the metaphysical line of thought any further, is the same reality as the incomprehensibility of God in his own being and in the free gift of the mystery to man in his individual concrete history. This is realised in the single 'free decree' of God, which is at root beyond understanding since once again it is identical with God [240] himself, who is the fulfilment of man and his reconciliation and forgiveness. This applies to the sinner as well as the justified, for the sinner is resolved in himself to reject God, because he wishes to escape from the incomprehensibility of God and seek refuge in the intelligibility of his own knowledge and action.

One further consideration must here be added, if we are to give a positive and systematic answer to the problems arising from the classical treatment of the hiddenness of God, and this concerns the manner in which an appreciation of God as the mystery which always lies beyond knowledge can be related to the understanding of other theological statements within a Christian dogmatic system, in order to give them new depth. Thus, for example, we must confront the doctrine of the Trinity with the notion of the hiddenness of God. It would then have to be shown that the 'Father' as the original source of both the processes within the godhead and of the creation of the world, means the being who transcends conceptual mastery and cannot be subordinated to any overarching system. He persists in this mode of being when he unfolds his identity through grace and vision in becoming totally present to man. 'Pater immensae majestatis'. The 'Spirit' would then signify the divine possibility of direct self-communication to man as mystery. The 'Son' means that God can give historical shape to this ultimate truth, which is himself, and bestow it upon humanity in a man who freely accepts his salvation in death and thus makes the divine self-gift of the mystery a definitive and credible reality. Because God himself and not some created representation of God is involved in the free self-gift of God as mystery, the three-fold form belongs directly to God in his relationship to man. Thus the economic Trinity of salvation is ipso facto the immanent Trinity.[13] What knowledge we possess from the history of revelation and faith about the threefold relationship of the single divine self-communication, which confronts us directly with the mystery itself, also applies to the immanent divine Trinity, whose 'mystery' is none other than the 'mysterium' which communicates itself to man and endures for eternity.

For a systematic Christology we should also reflect that Jesus stands as a human being in faith before the inexorable mystery which is an object of love precisely in its incomprehensibility. This makes it intelligible that his death is not just one of a series of events in his human [241] life but is the climax of his existence. For as long as a man accepts death unconditionally with faith and hope, he comes naked before the incomprehensibility of God, since all else has been destroyed. Classical Catholic theology, in dealing with the question of the knowledge and self-consciousness of Jesus as man, has a strange, if touching, tendency to ascribe as much positive and specific knowledge to the mind of Jesus as possible, while refusing to predicate divine omniscience of Jesus' human consciousness. In this theological account it would in fact be more important to stress the humanity of Jesus and emphasise that he surrendered himself unconditionally in his mind to the incomprehensibility of God and accepted with love, and without any attempt at repression, the ultimate 'beata ignorantia'.[14] Seen in this light the ignorance of Jesus, for which there is ample evidence in [13] Cf. K. Rahner, The Trinity (London, 1970); 'Remarks on the Dogmatic Treatise "De Trinitate" ', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 77-102.

[14] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Dogmatic Reflections on the Knowledge and Self-consciousness of Christ', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 193-215; 'The Two Basic Types of Christology', Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 213-223.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Scripture, does not point to a deficiency, but rather to a positive merit in his acceptance of this ignorance.

We have already alluded to the significance of the doctrine of God's incomprehensibility for an investigation of revelation and its history in theology. In the teaching on grace and justification, the fact and reason for God being in himself the justifying grace of man would be illuminated by treating the incomprehensibility of God as the positive goal and definitive fulfilment of man. It could then be shown that the doctrine of 'gratia increata', which is found in classical Catholic theology, is central to any radical treatment of grace and justification. Unfortunately the doctrine is usually presented as a mere effect of grace understood as a created characteristic of man. The Tridentine teaching of the infused 'habitus' of divine virtues in justification can and should be regarded as expressing the fact that the direct self-communication of God genuinely reaches man, without the 'infusi habitus' being a replacement or substitute for the self-communication of the mystery.[15] This might perhaps lead to a better understanding within classical Catholic theology of the forensic notion of justification found among the Reformers, always assuming that this [242] conception is itself not given a false mythological interpretation, but is taken rather to express the fact that man is justified by God if God himself acts directly towards man and makes him just through his own being.

The connection between the enduring incomprehensibility of God as the source of beatitude and eschatology has already been made clear in this essay. Only if eschatology points to God himself as the absolute future of man can it avoid being unmasked as a mythological (and therefore open to demythologisation) presentation of the tasks and goals which man should achieve through his own powers, albeit in an unending evolutionary process. The human future only becomes the true God in himself when man recognises it as always lying beyond his comprehension, or better, places his hope in it. Otherwise the future would merely be the object of human comprehension and control and so be immanent in the world. Alternatively it would be a cipher for the endless human progress into the future which can never be said to have reached its definitive goal.

These reflections should make it clear how vital the doctrine of the abiding incomprehensibility of God is for a theology of history,[16] not only of the individual but of humanity and society as a whole. The critique posed by Christians of the historically given state of any society comes from the power of hope in the absolute future[17] which one cannot dominate or plan. The absolute future is to be trusted and not treated as an enemy which one should reject or escape. Such a critical stance can be radical, patient and courageous; it implies neither a conservative glorification of the present situation, underpinned by ideology, nor a destructive impatience which seeks violent means to force a new world into existence by sacrificing the men of today.[18]

Finally the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of the absolute future of man, which is a promised gift, must be seen in connection with the meaning of the word 'God'. One might, for instance, enquire whether [243] the content of the scholastic idea of the infinite being of God, which could very easily be misunderstood as an inadmissible exaggeration of the [15] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 316-346; 'Gnade', LThK IV (Freiburg i. Br., 1960), 991-1000; 'Selbstmitteilung Gottes', LThK IX (Freiburg i. Br., 1964), 627.

[16] Cf. A. Darlap, 'Fundamentale Theologie der Heilsgeschichte', MySal I (Zurich, 1965), pp. 3-156; 'History and Historicity', Sacr. Mundi II (London and New York, 1969), pp. 31-39.
[17] Cf. the author's collected studies, Zur Theoloqie der Zukunft (Munich, 1971).
[18] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Function of the Church as a Critic of Society', Theological Investigations XII (London, 1974), pp. 229-249; 'The Church's Commission to bring Salvation and the Humanisation of the World', Theological Investigations XIV (London, 1976), pp. 295-313.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

experience of the finite, could not better and more clearly be explained with reference to the incomprehensibility of our divinely inspired hope in the absolute future.[19] If the classical Catholic theology of the incomprehensibility of God were seen in this radical perspective, it would also be plain that a genuine 'theologia gloriae', for which Catholicism is often criticised, is still, if rightly interpreted, a theology of 'deus absconditus'. The 'gloria' is nothing other than the loving surrender of man to the incomprehensibility of God which is now a directly present reality. This is not to deny that essential differences exist between the theology of the pilgrim condition and that of fulfilment in glory, and that theologians in this world still need to be warned that they must be conscious in their theology of their condition as pilgrims. But the accusation, usually levelled from both sides, of a presumptuous transgression of boundaries could be considerably blunted, if it was mutually conceded that any 'theologia gloriae' always concerned the glory of the incomprehensible God. In every theology there is always the danger of imagining that the 'lumen gloriae' clarifies everything and even illuminates the mystery of God in such a way that at least in this 'gloria' God becomes transparent to the human mind. Conversely, however, it is not true that the 'deus absconditus' is the sort of God who desires that we should not recognise him at all. He does not share one part of himself with us and conceal the other; rather he bestows his whole being upon us. In communicating himself as 'deus revelatus' he becomes radically open to man as the 'deus absconditus'. From this mystery man is no longer able to escape: he accepts God as he is, as the mystery of incomprehensibility who, once recognised, is the very truth of man and, once loved, is his blessed fulfilment.

[19] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Observations on the Doctrine of God in Catholic Dogmatics', Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 127-144; 'On the Theology of Hope', Theological Investigations X (London, 1973), pp. 242-259; 'Immanent and Transcendent Consummation of the World', ibid., pp. 273- 289. On the question of God, cf. K. Rahner, Gotteserfahrung heute (Munich, 1972), pp. 1-16.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[244]

15

AN INVESTIGATION OF THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD IN ST THOMAS AQUINAS

The purpose of the few brief remarks presented here is to supplement and develop various questions connected with St Thomas Aquinas's[1] doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God. We will, therefore, assume the basic substance of his teaching that God always lies beyond the understanding of any finite created mind, even that of angels and of men in a state of ultimate fulfilment, and of the created soul of the God-man. Thus the fact that the state of blessedness can vary with the individual beholder is made intelligible.[2]

[245] The reason for this incomprehensibility lies, according to Aquinas, in the disproportion, even in the case of the beatific vision, between the self-communication of the infinite God, the source and object of direct vision, on the one hand, and the finite character of the beholder on the other, who remains limited even when raised up by grace and the light of glory and given the capacity to have the beatific vision. It is this question which we would like to consider briefly from a hermeneutical point of view, without setting out the whole theory or assembling the numerous texts of Aquinas[3] on the incomprehensibility of God so as to form a single system. The object of these remarks is to caution against too simple and straightforward an interpretation of Aquinas's teaching on this point, for in fact his theory opens up all the heights and depths of Thomist theology and philosophy. In a sense the theory of the incomprehensibility of God is itself an incomprehensible doctrine; the mystery[4] which the doctrine concerns turns back, as it were, upon itself and transforms it into an inexpressible

---

[1] This essay, originally conceived as a lecture, appeared under the title, 'Über die Unbegreiflichkeit Gottes bei Thomas von Aquin', in the collection ed. by L. Oeing-Hanhoff, Thomas von Aquin 1274-1974 (Munich, 1974), pp. 33-45. It was further revised for publication here. The author owes a debt for the ideas it contains to the as yet unpublished dissertation of his student P. Siller, Die Incomprehensibilitas Dei bei Thomas von Aquin (Innsbruck, 1963). This topic has engaged the author's attention a great deal recently, for which further evidence is contained in the essay published in this volume, 'The Hiddenness of God', which tackles the question in a more general context.

[2] Cf. a number of studies on this question: R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Le sens du Mystère et le clair-obscur intellectuel: nature er surnaturel (Paris, 1934); A. M. Hoffmann, 'Mysterium bei Thomas', DTh 17 (1939), pp. 30-60; G. Marcel, The Mystery of Being (London, 1950-1); J. Pieper, The Silence of St. Thomas (London, 1957); V. Richter, 'Logik und Geheimnis', Gott in Welt I Rahner-Festschrift (Freiburg, 1964), 188-206; E. Schillebeeckx, 'The Non-Conceptual Intellectual Element in the Act of Faith', The Concept of Truth and Theological Renewal (London and Sydney, 1968), pp. 30-75. P. Siller, 'Unbegreiflichkeit', LThK X (Freiburg, 1965), 470-472 (bibliog.); A. Halder, Aufklärung und Geheimnis (Freiburg, 1967); G. Ebeling, 'Profanität und Geheimnis', 2THK 65 (1968), pp. 70-92; J. Splett, 'Hegel und das Geheimnis', Phil]B 76 (1968), pp. 317-331; P. Wess, Die Incomprehensibilitas Gottes und ihre Konsequenzen bei Thomas von Aquin und Karl Rahner (unpubl. diss. Innsbruck, 1969); P. Wess, Wie von Gotf sprechen? Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Karl Rahner. (Graz, 1970), pp. 91-109; K. Rahner, 'Geheimnis', LThK IV (Freiburg, 1960), 593-597. K.Rahner,'The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology' Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73.

[3] This is based on the following passages in Aquinas: Super ep. ad Eph. c.3 lect. 5; ibid. c. 5 lect. 3; In Evang. Joan. expos. c. 1 lect. 11; Super I ep. ad Tim. c. 6 lect. 2; In III sent dist. 14; In IV Sent. dist. 49 q. 2; De Verit. q. 2 a. 2 ad 5; ibid. ad 6; q.8 a.1 ad 5; a.2; a.4; q.20 a.4; a.6; S.c.g. III 51-56; S. th. 1 q.12 a.7; a.8; a.9; a.10; q. 56 a.1 ad 1; q.57 a.5 ad 2; q.62 a.9; q.107 a.3; I/Il q.93 a.2. It is unnecessary here to quote the commentaries, especially those on Pars I of the Summa.

[4] On the concept of 'mystery', cf. the author's works referred to in footnote 2; also more recently, 'Theology as engaged in an Interdisciplinary Dialogue with the Sciences', Theological Investigations XIII (London, 1975), pp. 80-93, esp. 87-89; 'On the Relationship between Theology and the Contemporary Sciences', ibid. pp. 94-102, esp. 96-100. Also, K. Fischer, Den Mensch als Geheimnis. Die Anthropologie Karl Rahners (Freiburg, 1947); the review article by K. H. Neufeld, Std2 192 (1974) pp. 429 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mystery, which is the ultimate mystery of man himself.

THE PROPOSITION OF FAITH

In any attempt to assess Thomist teaching on the incomprehensibility of God, it must be made quite clear from the start that for the master [246] of Scholasticism this incomprehensibility is a statement of faith which is to be found in the witness of Scripture[5] and tradition.[6]

For Thomas, therefore, the heart of the matter is not a philosophical doctrine which remains within the self-evident horizon of philosophical understanding, even though confirmed by revelation. For Thomas, and here we encounter at once the difficulty of this doctrine, the incomprehensibility of God must always be considered in relation to the possibility of the direct vision of God, which is only made known to us through revelation. The question of how precisely the nature and process of revelation should be conceived is not relevant here.[7] In this vision there is no longer a 'species' in the intellect of the creature which represents the object of the vision. The reality of God himself fulfils the function of a 'species', even though Thomas is firmly convinced that the self-communication of God which causes this vision can only find a human response if the intellect of man is adapted to it through the light and grace of glory, which raises the natural human capacity to a higher level. This statement of faith which affirms the possibility of a direct vision of God alone gives depth to the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God, as well as causing problems for this doctrine. The incomprehensibility of God should not then be regarded as a distant reality, for it increases rather than diminishes in the vision of God, in which alone it becomes an inescapable event. It does not describe the remnants of something which, sadly, remains unknown, but rather points to the immediate object of the experience of God in heaven, an object which is present in the mind overflowing with the fullness of God's self-communication. From the hermeneutical point of view we must read and interpret the Thomist doctrine of God's incomprehensibility by confronting it with his teaching on the direct vision of God, if its positive qualities and its limitations are to be correctly evaluated. The theory of the direct vision of God poses an incomprehensible mystery for us and conversely the reality (and thus the possibility) of the mystery of this vision in eternal life is experienced precisely in the direct encounter [247] with the incomprehensibility of God. But if this is so, then in the ultimate analysis the mystery of the direct vision of God does not cease to exist in heaven; rather the incomprehensibility is experienced as the reality which offers itself directly to human vision. For it is God in his simplicity as a whole who is perceived. His incomprehensibility cannot be understood as a 'part' of God which remains beyond the visual field. The assertion of the direct vision of God and assertion of his incomprehensibility are related for us here and now in a mysterious and paradoxical dialectic. They seem to destroy each other, for it cannot be the case here that God's incomprehensibility means that a particular part of the 'simple' God is clearly perceived, while another remains beyond sight. In its ultimate and most radical meaning the incomprehensibility of God is itself an internal factor in the awareness, through revelation, of the possibility of the direct vision of God. Only if this point is clearly understood, can one scale the heights which Thomas's doctrine possesses in its totality, even if not in every individual text on the topic.

---

[5] Cf. Phil 3:12; 1 Cor 9:24; Jer 32:18 sq.; Rom 11:33; Job 11:7.

[6] According to the commentaries of Aquinas on Eph 3; Jn 1; Rom 9; Eph 5; 1 Tim 6, Thomas finds evidence for this idea in tradition in Ambrose, John Chrysostom, Augustine, Denis the Areopagite and John Damascene.

[7] For the idea of 'revelation' in K. Rahner, cf. numerous studies elsewhere; a preliminary account is to be found in: Sacr. Mun., V (London and New York, 1970), pp. 343-355; also 'Offenbarung', Rahner-Register (Zurich, 1974), pp. 144 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE INTERPRETATION OF AQUINAS

In dealing with the question of God's incomprehensibility, Thomas makes repeated use of his 'metaphysic of light'. This has of course a long tradition before his time and has a quality of self-evidence for him which makes it readily available as a conceptual and verbal instrument. In the infinity of his unlimited and pure being, God has an absolute identity transcending the duality of subject and object. He is the being who is absolutely in and by himself; in this unity of reality and knowledge he is the pure light who both makes the object intelligible and luminous when finite knowledge exists, and renders the subject capable of grasping the object in his activity and bringing it to the level of his own activity, so that the subject is illuminated as well. The exact meaning of the metaphysic of light in Thomas, how it differs from the theory of illumination in Augustine, its Aristotelian twist and yet its fidelity to Augustine's basic intention,[8] these are all questions which [248] need not occupy us here. They can readily be left aside without damaging our understanding today of Thomas's doctrine of God's incomprehensibility, as long as one pays careful attention to its real meaning and the extent to which it can be understood even without reference to the concept of light.

To read Thomas properly, of course, one needs to know what is his central concern. Here however the metaphysics of light can be left to one side, since it is no longer helpful in the context of contemporary metaphysics, which inevitably comes into play in any interpretation of the medieval master. Furthermore the real meaning intended by Thomas can be expressed in terms of Thomist ontology which is immediately intelligible today and can be directly related to the modern question of being. If we exclude the metaphysic of light from our considerations and try to state the content of theory by means of Thomist ontology and ontological theology, then one immediately meets a double problem, at once philosophical and theological. The first concerns the relationship between divine being, in which pure existence forms the 'essence' of God, and finite being in which essence and existence are distinct and the essence forms and determines the manner and degree to which the being shares in the divine existence as a 'similitudo' of God. The second question refers to the relation between the self-communication of God afforded by grace and glory, without which the direct vision of God is impossible according to Thomas's metaphysics of knowledge, and the grace-filled, illuminating and elevating disposition, termed the light of glory, without which a direct perception of God is similarly inconceivable for Thomas. Both questions must be recognised and considered if one wants to understand Thomas's doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God. For the direct vision of God must be conceived in such a way in Thomas that the incomprehensibility of God, far from being removed, is in fact opened out to the one who sees God. Conversely the incomprehensibility of God must be thought of in such a manner that it does not contradict the directness of the vision of God. It is obvious that the problems raised by this question necessarily lead back to the larger issues mentioned above.

It is, then, not surprising that Thomas cannot bring fully into play the whole extent of his philosophical and theological anthropology concerning the basic relationship between God, who is pure existence, and a finite being and his knowledge in the realm of nature and grace, whenever he speaks in particular texts of the incomprehensibility of [249] God. Thomas, like any other thinker, cannot make the whole range and depth of his thought present in every sentence, although his very formal model of speech does allow him to maintain an openness

[8] On the question of the 'metaphysic of light', cf. G. Söhngen, 'Thomas von Aquin über Teilhabe durch Berührung', Die Einheit in den Theologie (Munich, 1952), pp. 107-139; J. Ratzinger, 'Licht und Erleuchtung–Erwägungen zur Stellung und Entwicklung des Themas in der abendlàndischen Geistesgeschichte', StudGen 13 (1960), pp. 368-378; L. Oeing-Hanhoff, 'Licht II. Philosophisch', LThK VI (Freiburg, 1961), 1023-1025.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to the totality of his theology and metaphysics in individual statements, despite the limitations of the horizon of understanding present in each case. We cannot and should not go more fully here into these two issues here, although they must always be kept in mind for hermeneutical purposes, if the texts of Thomas dealing with divine incomprehensibility as it is found in the direct vision of God are to be properly evaluated and their depth of expression and their difficulties plainly seen. A few remarks may clarify where a discussion of the problems frequently found in these texts may lead.

With regard to the first question: if the whole of Thomas's thought concerning the relationship between absolute being and finite existence is given, due weight, then insights into this relation clearly emerge which are of a more radical and discriminating kind than is often apparent both in the school of Thomism and in many texts of Aquinas himself.[9] The relationship between absolute 'esse' and the 'esse commune' of finite reality can be made intelligible in a somewhat over-simplified philosophy and theology, using the notion of creation which is itself modelled, albeit analogically, on the causality known to us in world. On the basis of the idea of creation an ontology of participation can then be built up. But usually the concept of creation is based in too primitive a fashion upon the idea of causality accessible to us in other ways. If one thinks of the idea of creation as a unique phenomenon, then one must ask what is the source of this idea, for it cannot occur subsequently to a genuine knowledge of God in his own existence. Furthermore the question arises about the relationship which must obtain between an agent and an effect when the separation between them is not the precondition of their relationship but is established originally by the agent and the difference is basically maintained by the agent itself. This makes the relation between absolute being and created reality very problematical and means that it cannot simply be inserted into a scheme of general causality. The transcendental uniqueness of the concept of creation and of the relationship between [250] absolute being and a finite reality must be brought to light or, to use an alternative formula, taken back into the darkness of its incomprehensibility. Only from this starting point can the ontological relation between the self-communication of God and intellect engaged in the direct vision of God be properly understood, and the incomprehensibility of God in the direct vision be conceived as the climax of that impenetrability which necessarily obtains for finite reality in its ontological relationship to pure being. If the relation of pure being to finite reality is not carelessly conceived on some general causal model, in which the difference between agent and effect already exists as the condition of possibility of the process of cause and effect and is not established by the agent itself, then the ontological intelligibility of a self-communication of the being of God to a created being no longer lies outside the scope of an ontology of the relation between God and creature, even if the mystery of the possibility of the vision of God offered in revelation is not thereby removed. For the absolute being of God freely establishes us for ourselves as beings distinct from God and maintains this distinction in himself because established by him alone. This means that for the absolute being of God the same distinction does not exist which he imposes upon us as our mode of existence. The vision of God is the radical form of the general ontological relationship between the being on the one hand whose self-communication establishes distinction (for us) and identity (for absolute being), and finite reality on the other hand. This vision involves an ontological self-communication of God[10] to the created intellect which is not the result of direct vision but its ontological condition, in the same way that the 'species', as the real actualisation of the intellect, is the [9] Cf. L. Dümpelmann, Kreation als ontisch-ontologisches Verhältnis. Zur Metaphysik der Schöpfungstheologie des Thomas von Aquin (Freiburg, 1969); J. Pieper, 'Kreatürlichkeit. Bemerkungen über die Elemente eines Grundbegriffes', Thomas von Aquin 1274/1974, ed. L. Oeing-Hanhoff (Munich, 1974), pp. 47-71.

[10] The author has constantly spoken of the 'self-communication of God'; for a brief summary, cf. Sacr. Mu,,. III, pp. 114-118; ibid. IV, pp. 297-305; ibid. V, pp. 348-355.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

condition of possibility of actual knowledge of an object. Thomas sometimes eases the difficulty of showing how a direct ontological self-communication of God to a created spirit is possible, without either making God finite (as the 'form' of the finite intellect) or dissolving the creature in its infinity, by drawing a distinction between the orientation of a creature to being and the orientation to knowledge (modus essendi-modus cogitandi). But this distinction, though quite valid in its intention, leaving as it does God incomprehensible and infinite and the intellect with vision finite and limited, does not really solve the problem, if the ontological nature of the [251] divine self-communication in the vision of God is taken seriously. Of course it is not necessary to 'solve' this problem since it is a part of the divine incomprehensibility which unfolds rather than diminishes in the vision of God. But clearly the general ontological relationship between pure being and finite reality must be thought of in a way that gives some genuine content to the ontological relationship between God and creature in its state of beatitude. Conversely one has only reached a sufficiently radical understanding of the general relationship if it bears the formal characteristic of rendering conceivable a relation between God and the creature which is found in the vision of God as the condition of its possibility. In all these respects hints and suggestions are to be discovered in Thomas in his comments on the incomprehensibility of God, which compel one to go back to the general ontology of the relationship between the pure being of God and finite reality, if one wishes to gain an authentic and creative interpretation of the text. It must be stressed that such a reference must give thematic expression at one and the same time to the conceivability (which does not mean the perspicuousness) of a direct vision of God and to the divine incomprehensibility. Only in this way can one prevent the doctrine of incomprehensibility from becoming an opaque, but sadly inevitable, element in God which remains unknown in the vision of God. At the same time it opens up the possibility of making divine incomprehensibility the positive content of the vision of God, since this vision is the supreme climax of the ontological relationship between God and the creature. This relationship signifies a positive finite state and not a block which fixes the creature in his finite condition in the face of infinity. For then the finite state would always be surpassed and made superfluous by the infinity of God and would in the end become unbearable.

On the second main issue we mentioned, the following observations may be permitted. In a reaction against Peter Lombard, who simply identified the grace of justification with the Holy Spirit, Thomas rightly emphasised that this grace essentially signified a created determination of the substance and capacity of the one justified, or at least necessarily implied it. In consequence Thomas correctly postulates a created 'lumen gloriae' which, being finite, makes the permanence of the divine incomprehensibility, even in glory, intelligible. But on closer inspection the relation between the created grace of justification and the 'indwelling' of God in the one justified is much more complex than appears at first glance. It is clear that for [252] Thomas,[11] as opposed to an over-simplified scholastic theology, 'uncreated grace' is not simply a consequence of finite, created, habitual grace. For, leaving aside all other considerations, this would be impossible for Thomas since the 'visio', the fulfilment of grace, is grounded in an ontological self-communication of the reality of God himself to the created spirit, and this cannot be derived from any created grace. It is no divergence from the Thomist theology of justification and glory to make use of insights hinted at by Thomas and to interpret created grace and created light of glory as a disposition which is formed by the self-communication of God in grace and glory as its effect and the condition of its possibility. As is quite common in Thomas, there is a mutual relationship between act and potency which is fully disposed for the act, so that each is the condition of the other. For Thomas, however, the incomprehensibility of God is not simply and entirely made plain, even in direct vision of [11] Cf. S. Dockx, Fils de Dieu par grace (Paris, 1928).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God, through the finite light of glory which he postulates. Rather it must be made clear why and how the self-communication of infinite being to the direct vision of a finite spirit does not merely permit the continued existence of divine incomprehensibility but rather demands it of its own essence and that of man. So, despite the doctrine of the created light of glory, which is quite correct in itself, we are still dealing here with the pure mystery of faith, incomprehensible in itself and experienced as such, the mystery namely, that the incomprehensibility of God can make itself directly present in an encounter with a created spirit, for whom there exists the experience of incomprehensibility which gives God his ultimate name.

THE FINITE NATURE OF MAN

Any interpretation of the Thomist doctrine of the incomprehensibility of God should not overlook the fact that this doctrine is primarily a statement about man, about his finite nature and its positive quality. Only in a highly derivative and tenuous sense should one regard divine incomprehensibility as an ‘attribute’ of God himself. If one starts by making divine incomprehensibility a (negative) attribute of God, then it would simply become one of a number of attributes which we predicate as ‘names’ of God, despite his simplicity and infinity. The doctrine of divine incomprehensibility could not then be given its proper weight or value for a theological and metaphysical anthropology. [253] The most radical and ultimate statement of this anthropology is that man is a being who is endowed through the free self-communication of God in grace with the infinite incomprehensibility and incomprehensible infinity of God, and so shares in his own being in divine incomprehensibility. A closer examination of Thomas’s doctrine clearly shows that God’s incomprehensibility is a theme of his anthropology. The doctrine presents itself most often in the context of the knowledge of angels, of man and of Jesus. The basic thrust of the Contra Gentiles makes it plain that here too the doctrine of incomprehensibility is fundamentally a topic of philosophical and theological anthropology, since it deals with the ‘finis’ of man, i.e. the God of men. It is true that in the Summa, in the first section of the Prima Pars, the doctrine of incomprehensibility is included as part of the treatment of the divine attributes, but here we should not forget that in qu.12, and especially art.7 of qu.12, qu.3-11 are repeated with an anthropological twist in which the divine attributes, having first been described with reference to God himself, are once more analysed to see how God ‘in himself’ is at the same time the God of men. If the crucial significance of the doctrine of incomprehensibility for a genuinely Christian anthropology is overlooked, then it is almost impossible to prevent divine incomprehensibility from appearing merely as an attribute of God, which man, as a result of a purely negative experience of finite limitation, can only accept of necessity with more or less resignation. This obscures the basic truth that divine incomprehensibility is of vital importance for human self-understanding: it affects all man’s knowing and does not only emerge when man is specifically concerned with God. If the affirmative synthesis in human thought always and inevitably refers to ‘what’ to a ‘something’ beyond it, while necessarily distinguishing the two, then ‘esse’ itself is affirmed as the point of reference of the predicative statement, as the reality which is not comprehended. Thus the controlling presence of divine incomprehensibility is also affirmed. All human knowing, despite the possible intelligibility of the ‘what’ which is predicated, is enfolded in an incomprehensibility which forms an image of the divine incomprehensibility where God reveals himself as the one without a name.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

‘EXCESS’ IN GOD

For Thomas the incomprehensibility of God is present in an ‘excessus’, in an ‘excedere’. This ‘excessus’ should not simply be identified [254] with the ‘via eminentiae’, even though it is the latter’s ultimate foundation. It is the primary movement of the spirit and of its activity (intellectus agens) directed to the unlimited being and incomprehensibility of God, which is the ground of all knowing. It is only if a man permits this ‘excess’ to operate in the free act of his existence and accepts it as the real kernel of his own self-realisation, that he recognises divine incomprehensibility as his own blessed fulfilment, It is not enough to treat this superabundance as a transcendent characteristic of the human intellect operating (even if unthematically) in every act of knowledge, a characteristic which determines the essential nature of the ‘intellectus agens’ as it shares in the light of God and itself gives illumination. It must be seen, too, as the free human act in which a man accepts his own being ordered in grace to the incomprehensibility of God, and surrenders himself unconditionally to this incomprehensibility as the true source of his own fulfilment, Only then do we find the reality we call faith, hope and love, assuming only that the ‘excessus’ is taken to be direct and immediate encounter with divine incomprehensibility brought about by God himself. The theological dispute among the Schoolmen about the real nature of eternal beatitude is familiar enough, as is the explicit teaching of Thomas on the question. But in my opinion we should take seriously Thomas’s doctrine of a perichoresis (if we may put it thus) of the transcendent determination of a being as distinct from its categorial determinations which are closely connected to one another, and introduce his notion of ‘excess’ at this point. If we then give full value to his assertion that particular capacities unfold in their multiplicity from the original unity of the essential substance, then the ancient controversy need not be settled by a cheap compromise (as perhaps in Suarez), but can really be transcended in an authentic and original way. Freedom and love can be seen as identical in origin with the intellect (given the ‘ordo’ between them), and the intellect only achieves its own fullness of being when in hope and love, in a freedom which properly belongs to it, it surrenders itself to incomprehensibility as its own beatitude.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[255]

16

THE MYSTERY OF THE TRINITY

Christian theology must always address itself to the Trinitarian confession of faith. In so far as such statements do not make up a coherent framework, they are open to systematic correlation, explanation and even criticism.[1] Thus a theologian who has developed and expounded these formulations in his theological reflections and wishes to state his opinion about these ideas is faced by considerable difficulties.

We will, however, leave this problem aside, simply because the topic of the Trinity is enormously important and involves a central question of Christian doctrine and preaching. No individual angle or particular theological investigation should occupy the limelight; the quicker individual contributions are absorbed into a general understanding of the mystery which has contemporary relevance and [256] pastoral vitality, the happier the theologian should be.[2] For the issue itself should not be forgotten in modern theology or in the contemporary awareness of faith in the Catholic Church, or relegated to a backwater. This is in fact in danger of happening today in one of two ways. Either the Trinity is taught in a way that merely conforms to received formulations and has no interest in, or connection with, the realities of Christian life and spirituality. Alternatively the doctrine of the Trinity is forgotten in an exclusive concentration upon a distorted political theology or a theology of liberation which is unable to see beyond itself, or in a Christology exclusively concerned with Jesus from below. All these attempts fail to do justice to the fullness of New Testament teaching. A few reflections are offered here though they do not provide a systematic or comprehensive treatment of the question.

As we have observed above, it is not a matter today merely of reproducing other people's formulations of the mystery. Any attempt today to present the Christian doctrine of the Trinity must involve a 'liberation' of the usual traditional propositions from their 'splendid isolation', in which they have been encapsulated in scholastic theology. We must try to make the doctrine of the Trinity fruitful for practical Christian living, given that the doctrine has a 'sitz im leben' and that the Trinity is of crucial importance for actual Christian life and spirituality. Furthermore the teaching cannot even have the right 'speculative' content and form, unless it meets these demands in Christian life.

For this purpose a collection and systematic arrangement of the author's theological statements and insights on the Trinity was necessary, since these are scattered in a variety of [1] This essay originally appeared in Brazil in Portuguese and formed an accompanying note to the study by M. de Franca Miranda on the self-communication of God in the trinitarian theology of K. Rahner. Here the personal reflections have been expanded and contents revised. The remarks contained here are an obvious addition to the author's trinitarian theology which is not spelt out here. A few references may help to orientate the reader: 'Remarks on the Dogmatic Treatise ''De Trinitate" ', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 77-102; 'Nature and Grace', ibid. pp. 165-188; 'The Theology of the Symbol', ibid. pp. 221-252; 'Theology and Anthropology', Theological Investigations IX (London, 1972), pp. 28-45; 'Observations on the Doctrine of God in Catholic Dogmatics', ibid. pp. 127- 144. The scriptural basis is to be found in: 'Theos in the New Testament', Theological Investigations I (London, and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 79-148. For a short summary, cf. 'Trinity' and 'Trinity in Theology', Sar. Mun. VI (London and New York, 1970), pp. 295-308. A more extensive treatment is available in: The Trinity, (London, 1970).

[2] This line of reasoning is to be understood in the light of the general theme of spiritual experience which forms the main topic of this volume. This experience, which most of the essays deal with, or presuppose, is certainly not only a private and personal event in the spiritual life of mystics, but is also a social phenomenon, which is clearly evident in the community insofar as the concrete demands of God's will are expressed in the actual faith of Christians, in and through which they find then real salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

writings and are not for the most part included in the author's more extended and systematic treatment of Trinity.[3] Because of his age, the author was unable to join together these 'membra disiecta' into a single whole and wishes to express his gratitude for the achievement of this task.

[257] Such a collection, however, does create a certain problem in that lines of thought and ideas appearing outside the context of the Trinity must be taken into account and these items, being isolated and incomplete, can scarcely be integrated with any clarity into a systematic presentation of the Trinity. This applies, for instance, if we recall the impression given by this systematic approach that Christological data have been neglected, while general anthropological factors have been given preference. But if it is a cause for criticism that insufficient attention is paid to the awareness of sonship in Jesus which is clearly to be found in Scripture, then it should be remembered that in traditional treatises on Christ and the Trinity this awareness of sonship is understood in direct relation to the 'immanent' sonship of the eternal Logos. Now the New Testament evidence suggests that the awareness of the sonship of the Lord is a far more complex and difficult matter than is suggested by this approach, even though it remains the permanent basis for knowledge of the 'immanent' Trinity. From an exegetical viewpoint Jesus' consciousness of divine sonship, whose unique character distinguishes it from that of the justified Christian, cannot simply be identified with the process by which the eternal Logos originates from the Father.

The task of exegesis and biblical theology this entails can scarcely be tackled successfully by one who is an amateur in New Testament exegesis. However he may be able to escape being too severely criticised for the lack of Christological material in the treatment of the Trinity if he explicitly recognises that his reflections could well be deepened and supplemented in this area.

A further objection concerns the excessively formal character of the thesis that the justified possess real relationships to the Trinitarian God and not merely those of appropriation.[4] It is to be welcomed that the thesis of the existence of such relationships is assumed and basically accepted, for even today it is not one that necessarily commands general recognition as part of the common deposit of Catholic theology.[5] Obviously one should have no hesitation in trying to fill out this assertion with more 'material' content and to explain it more clearly. Stress is in fact laid on the eternal significance of the humanity [258] of Christ as the mediation of the direct contact between God and those in a state of grace and even of final beatitude. This also is not to the same degree common in contemporary theology. Naturally it is important to bring out more fully and clearly the significance of this for a real understanding of the relationships of man to the Trinity and vice versa.

The objection, however, that no clear distinction is made between self-communication and the self-communication of God is hardly reasonable. If God is really God, i.e. absolute reality, with a personal spiritual nature, then self-communication must be the same as the self-communication of God. If God is Trinitarian and is really related to man and not merely by appropriation, then the communication of being and of self by God must also be Trinitarian. If in this self-communication he possesses as 'Father' a specific relationship to man, one can also speak quite naturally and without contradiction of the self-communication of the one God, as one can of the self-communication of the Father in his 'originality'.

The formula we proposed of 'distinct modes of subsistence' is of course no more than a formal abstraction which is of only limited use in making it easier to understand the religious life, and especially the prayer, of a Christian. The real content of the economy of salvation

[3] Cf. K. Rahner, The Trinity, (London, 1970).
[4] Cf. M. Schmaus, 'Appropriation', LThK I (Freiburg i. Br., 1957), 773-775.
[5] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Eternal Significance of the Humanity of Jesus for our Relationship with God', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 35-46.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and of the immanent Trinity must be seen in the 'distinct modes of existence', if they are to be of any 'spiritual' assistance. In the traditional teaching of the Church and in theology, reference is made to 'persons', which means that there is a real distinction from the 'numerically' single reality of the one God. This distinction is brought together in a 'general concept' (i.e. person) in a manner which is quite unique and original. If this occurs in the mode of speech authorised by tradition, the new concept of 'mode of subsistence' is also be justified. Of course all the reservations and qualifications apply to it which one may reasonably make in the case of the concept 'person'.

To conclude our reflections on the mystery of the Trinity as it is presented in the faith and theology of the Church, we may point out in general terms the direction in which a contemporary theology of the Trinity can and should be developed in the future. It is at any rate certain that the identity of the economic and immanent Trinity must be taken seriously. Even if we are resolutely concerned out of fidelity to tradition to guard the deposit of faith as is demanded by contemporary conditions, we must start out from the fact that an interpretation of faith is prevalent in which the economic and [259] immanent Trinity are not regarded as self-evidently identical. It is therefore easy to see why formulations are to be found today which do not appear to do justice to the basic thesis mentioned above, although this does not necessarily imply that the thesis itself has not been taken to heart.

It is not a question here of setting the immanent and economic Trinity in a narrower and clearer relationship, which nevertheless always assumes the prior existence of two separate realities. The goal of our efforts is rather to bring out a prior and original identity and unity of the two realities, in relation to which the immanent and economic Trinity offer developments, clarifications and aspects of this underlying unity. If this point is fully grasped, then it is no longer possible to assert that a 'speculative' doctrine of the immanent Trinity may (still) be possible but that it does not (any longer) arouse much interest. Such statements betray a basic misunderstanding, alluded to above, that a 'pure' dogma of the immanent Trinity can evolve which is totally different from the doctrine of the economic Trinity. In clarifying the one doctrine of the Trinity, as we have tried to do here and elsewhere, further advances can certainly be made in understanding the being of God in himself. In this endeavour it should not be taken as a foregone conclusion that the development of the doctrine of the immanent Trinity must be limited in its formulation of new insights to the concepts used by traditional scholastic theology. We may hope that any material could be pressed into service in the attempt to destroy once and for all the false conception that a 'speculative' doctrine of the immanent Trinity may perhaps be conceivable today, but that it is a completely idle and irrelevant undertaking, possessing neither spiritual nor religious interest to the modern Christian and theologian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[260-263]

VOLUME 16

LIST OF SOURCES

THE FOUNDATION OF BELIEF TODAY
A paper given to preachers and catechists in the Bildungshaus Stift, Zwettl in December, 1973. The hitherto unpublished text was revised and expanded for publication.

EXPERIENCE OF THE SPIRIT AND EXISTENTIAL COMMITMENT
Originally composed as a contribution to the Festschrift for E. Schillebeeckx on his 60th birthday (1974). The text was revised and cross-references added for publication here.

RELIGIOUS ENTHUSIASM AND THE EXPERIENCE OF GRACE
A paper given at the day conference of the Swiss Theological Society in Berne in November, 1973. It was first published under the title, 'Das enthusiastisch - charismatische Erlebnis in Konfrontation mit der gnadenhaften Transzendenzerfahrung' in: C. Heitmann and H. Mühlen (editors), Erfahrung und Theologie des Heiligen Geistes (Hamburg and Munich, 1974), pp. 64-80. The text was further revised and in part expanded for publication here.

ANONYMOUS AND EXPLICIT FAITH
Originally published in, StdZ 192 (1974), pp. 147-152. In this edition the footnotes were added in order to integrate the ideas into the author's complete works.

FAITH BETWEEN RATIONALITY AND EMOTION
Originally a paper given at the Catholic Academy of Bavaria. It was first published in: K. Rahner (ed), Ist Gott noch gefragt? (Dusseldorf, 1973), pp. 125-144. For this edition the text was further revised and expanded.

THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES' ACCORDING TO ORIGEN
This essay, published for the first time in German, was the author's first major theological work. It comes from the period of his theological training and yet in a remarkable way traces of later questions and of their possible solution can already be discerned in it. The original text was substantially shortened for this edition and the excessive number of footnotes considerably reduced, in order to fit the essay into this collection. For detailed references to the works of Origen one should consult the original French edition: 'Le début d'une doctrine des cinq sens spirituals chez Origène', RAM 13 (1932), pp. 113-145.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES' IN THE MIDDLE AGES: THE CONTRIBUTION OF BONAVENTURE
First published in French under the title, 'La doctrine des "sens spirituels" au Moyen-Age en particulier chez Saint Bonaventure', RAM 14 (1933), pp. 263-299; a larger, expanded section appeared in German under the title, 'Der Begriff der ecstasis bei Bonaventura', ZAM 9 (1934), pp. 1-19, and started a controversy with St. Grünewald, cf. ZAM 9 (1934), pp. 124-142 and 219-232. The essay has been included in this collection because of its fundamental importance for the author's later work in the philosophy of religion and because of the striking similarity of theme it bears to the questions which have principally occupied the author's attention over recent years (cf. the previous essays).

MODERN PIETY AND THE EXPERIENCE OF RETREATS

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A shortened version was published under the title, 'Über den geistes - geschichtlichen Ort der ignatianischen Exerzitien heute', GuL 47 (1974), pp. 430-449. The text is based on a paper given to retreatgivers in Vienna.

REFLECTIONS OF A NEW TASK FOR FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY
Published in Estudios Eclesiasticos 47 (1972), pp. 397-408 (Homenaje al P. Joaquin Salaverri S.J.).

THE ACCEPTANCE IN FAITH OF THE TRUTH OF GOD
First published as Thesis XVIII in: W. Kern and G. Stachel, (eds.) Warum Glauben? Begründung und Verteidigung des Glaubens in einundvierzig Thesen (Wurzburg, 1967), pp. 169-176, under the heading: 'Nicht das Weitbild der modernen Wissenschaft vermag dem Dasein letztlich Sinn zu geben, sondern erst die glaubende Annahme der geschichtlich uns zugesprochenen Wahrheit Gottes.' The text has been slightly revised for publication here.

THE OLD TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN DOGMATIC THEOLOGY
A paper given in Regensburg in 1972. It has been revised and expanded, and is published for the first time here.

ON THE 'HISTORY OF REVELATION' ACCORDING TO THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
Originally a contribution to the Festschrift for R. Schnackenburg, Neues Testament und Kirche (Freiburg i. Br., 1974), pp. 543-549. It was published originally under the title 'Kritische Anmerkungen zu Nr. 3 des dogmatischen Dekrets "Dei Verbum" des II Vaticanums'. The text was further revised and expanded for publication here.

THE ONE CHRIST AND THE UNIVERSALITY OF SALVATION
Previously unpublished.

THE HIDDENNESS OF GOD
A contribution to the Festschrift for Y. Congar, Le service théologique dans l'Eglise (Paris, 1974), pp. 249-268. Published for the first time in German.

AN INVESTIGATION OF THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD IN ST THOMAS AQUINAS
A slightly revised version of the essay in the collection, Thomas von Aquin 1294-1974 (Munich, 1974), pp. 33-45. It appeared there under the title, 'Über die Unbegreiflichkeit Gottes bei Thomas von Aquin'.

THE MYSTERY OF THE TRINITY
The text is based on an explanatory note by the author for the study written by M. de Franca Miranda, cf. p. 255 of this volume, footnote 1. For this edition the essay has been shortened and footnotes and cross-references added, in order to fit it into the complete works of the author.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

The Experience of Jesus

[3]

1

CHRISTMAS IN THE LIGHT OF THE IGNATIAN EXERCISES

It is easy to feel that to attempt to say anything to an audience trained in theology about the mystery of Christmas in our time – the real mystery of the holy night – is too difficult a task. This is especially true nowadays when the interpretation of the scriptural texts demands an exegetical knowledge and expertise to which only a few people can lay claim.[1]

Having hesitantly pointed to these difficulties, I should like here, as a dogmatic theologian, quite simply to make an attempt which may seem rather hazardous: I should like, in a few reflections, to try to show a connection between a basic approach characteristic of St Ignatius in the Exercises, and the mystery of Christmas. This connection may perhaps lead us into the Christmas mystery in a new way, making its Sitz im Leben – its situation in life – a little clearer. The attempt is a risky one, but I should like to make it all the same.

INDIFFERENCE

Jesuits will of course be convinced – and I hope they are right – that they know what indifference in the Ignatian sense means.[2] None the [4] less, it may be useful, at the beginning of these brief reflections, to make sure that we are aware of the precise meaning of this attitude, and to say quite clearly and definitely what this key notion of Ignatian piety means.

It is probably correct to say that indifference is the same as what Paul calls the freedom conferred by the Spirit of God himself – freedom with regard to all the individual powers and forces in our human existence, both in our inner life and in our external situation. Indifference, that is to say, sees things from the point of view of the person who arrives at his decisions in freedom; whereas biblical freedom as we find it in Paul views them from the aspect of God's liberating grace. Paul sees freedom in the light of God, who gives himself directly and without mediation, and radically transforms our transcendental nature, directing it towards himself. In this way he liberates us – both inwardly and outwardly – from every individual thing in our existence to which we should otherwise be subject or enslaved, either with or without guilt. Indifference and freedom, seen as one and the same thing, signify the infinite and open space in which God becomes the event we encounter in our existence – God

[1] The present text is based on a Christmas sermon preached to a Jesuit community in 1974. Apart from slight stylistic revisions, the original character has been preserved. A few notes have been added for the sake of the reader who is less familiar with Ignatian spirituality.

[2] Cf. Ignatius Loyola, Spiritual Exercises no. 23, (London 1963). See in general G. Bottereau and A. Rayez, 'Indifférence' in Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascetique et mystique (DSAM) VII (Paris 1971), pp. 1688-708; also K. Rahner, 'Ignatian Spirituality and Devotion to the Heart of Jesus' in Mission and Grace III (London 1966), pp. 176-210, esp. pp. 199-210, and Meditations on Priestly Life (London 1973), pp. 30-8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation himself, not God represented by anything finite. Of course, here this event still takes place in a kind of emptiness and darkness, in dumbness and mute adoration of the ineffable mystery which shelters us namelessly in its infinity, without offering us any one resting place from which we can survey the whole.

ASSIGNMENT TO ACTION

But what does this freedom and indifference mean, this deathly reaching-out into the darkness of God[3] beyond the circumference of our own existence which we can name and mould in freedom? We can never know with certainty, by means of our own reflection or our own judgement about ourselves, whether we ourselves have achieved this result, or whether it is really conferred on us. No, this encountered event can only be the continuing object of our own wavering hope. But in the search for this experience should we not have become the mystics of an expressionless spirituality, or Buddhists, for whom [5] the world and history have dissolved, together with individual action and responsibility? Should we not be something quite other than Christians and men who know themselves to be sent on a mission for which concrete action is ultimately decisive?

In the face of this question it is essential to appeal to another fact of Ignatian spirituality; because for Ignatius Loyola 'indifferent' freedom for the tremendous mystery of God does not mean, simply and exclusively, we have found a home where we can abide, so as never again to have to return to the here and now of our everyday earthly life. On the contrary, it is an encountering event which, without itself disappearing, sends us back from itself into the concrete reality of our life for particular decisions and actions. For Ignatius himself, the event is truly conferred (and not merely in mystical ideology) only when we also let ourselves be sent back like this again and again into earthly existence. That is why for Ignatius indifference and freedom come into being only when people, out of this infinite freedom which, when it is experienced, he calls 'consolation', arrive at choice; when against this background they freely allow themselves to be given the specific assignment that is sent to them out of the freedom of God. But what is sent must at the same time be penetrated and reclothed, without adulteration and division, by that absoluteness, that eternal divine validity and glory out of which it is sent to us.

In this way Ignatian choice is, in unadulterated and undivided unity, the place at which divine freedom, the consolation of indifference and our earthly decision in freedom for something specific are simultaneously consummated. In Ignatius himself the mystery of this unity in the existential logic of decision may remain largely unexplained and continue to be a nuzzling problem for theologians and philosophers.[4] But it seems to me all the same that in Ignatius Loyola we find that the experience of such unity is possible and is actually achieved. It lets us perceive how we can be, and must be, 'detachedly' lost in the incomprehensibility of God, in order in this very way to find the true reality of our unique existence in its own specific history. On the other hand, however, it also lets us discover how this world and the beyond, history and transcendence, can be bound into an [6] unadulterated and undivided unity, so that God is to be found in everything – or, better still: that he is to be found in the [3] On the question of the darkness of God, see 'The Hiddenness of God' and 'An Investigation of the Incomprehensibility of God in St Thomas Aquinas', both in Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979), pp. 227-43 and 244-59 respectively.

[4] Cf. K. Rahner, The Dynamic Element in the Church (London 1964), esp. 'The Logic of Concrete Individual Knowledge in Ignatius of Loyola', pp. 84-170; also 'Religious Enthusiasm and the Experience of Grace' and 'Modern Piety and the Experience of Retreats', both in Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979), pp. 35-51 and 135-55 respectively.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation particular concreteness and uniqueness which is demanded of individual freedom in any given case, without any loss of identity. But this confronting event of infinite freedom takes place at the very point when in freedom we seize the specific, particular thing assigned to us – what God has provided for us, as distinct from other possibilities, because the Absolute only unites itself with this but not with that non-absolute, giving it its own eternal validity. In Ignatius indifference and choice of the particular possess an ultimate unity in diversity; freedom becomes concrete and what is concrete becomes free.

CHRISTMAS?

What I have said can only point to something in stuttering terms, without any theological and philosophical precision. Consequently we must go on to ask: what has all this to do with the mystery of Christmas? The answer can be summed up as follows: Christmas is the supreme instance of this unity of transcendence and concrete freedom, though of course it is unique, unsurpassable and exemplary. This unity, according to Ignatius, opens up a way of approach for us in our own experience to an understanding of what, for Christian faith, has happened in the birth and life of Jesus of Nazareth, and in the death he achieved. In saying this we are certainly not drawing Jesus down to the level of our own existence; on the contrary, we are merely establishing that human existence, in its unity of transcendence and historicity, is the potentiality of what theology generally calls the hypostatic union of God and an undiminished and untruncated humanity. But if we let the potentiality for this hypostatic union (which is what being man means) interpret and fulfil itself in the experience of that mysterious unity of indifferent freedom and specific decision, then we come to understand what being man is; and I am sure we are not acting incorrectly.

What is certain, however, is that here we have a particular access to the mystery of Christmas in the light of Ignatius' spirituality. In confessing the incarnation of the eternal divine Logos in our flesh, we certainly talk in faith about the 'ontological', 'substantial' unity of the Word of God and the full humanity of Jesus in unity and difference. Here nothing must be denied or repressed. But this unity of God and man reaches its own goal and essential perfection only [7] when it is thought of in completion; when, that is to say, the divinely descending freedom of God (which wills each particular thing in its finitude) meets the freedom of man which it sustains; and when it frees this freedom for the absoluteness of God and for the obedient acceptance of that absoluteness – the absoluteness which therefore confers the freedom of God on the unique existence of the individual person.

If, now, this takes place in Jesus (as distinct from in us) to a comprehensive, exemplary and manifest degree, then this is itself an efficacious promise to us. For such unity also achieves fruition accordingly in the framework assigned to us as well – which is by no means a matter of course. And we experience what grace means as the act towards us of the divine freedom – an act on which we have no claim. In this way the correspondence and the difference between Jesus and ourselves is brought out so clearly that here we find a special starting point for an understanding of Christmas.

These suggestions remain highly theoretical and fragmentary, especially those of real christological significance. All the same, we may say that the practice of Ignatian indifference, as the freedom which loses itself willingly in the mysteriousness of God, and the finding a home in the specific existence uniquely given to every one of us, allows that unadulterated and undivided unity to grow in us. We then find God in that unity, even in the down-to-earth triviality of our everyday life; and we cease to be the slaves of that triviality. We cannot of course subjugate that unity to ourselves, but we can let it happen and lay hold of it, die and live. When that happens it is Christmas; Christ is born and the mystery of that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation birth lays hold of us as our own salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[8]

2

ON THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE EASTER FAITH

Properly speaking, every truth of Christian faith has a relation to the Christian's spirituality, i.e. to the conscious and (to some extent) methodical development of faith, hope and love. For everything has been revealed for our salvation, and so aims at man's perfection. This anthropological purpose of the whole of revelation (as God's act and word) does not involve any anthropocentric narrowing down of revelation. It does not mean that revelation is thought of according to the limitations of finite man.[1] For the man of revelation is precisely the man who, through God's self-communication – or through 'God in himself', or through God in his own glory – is to be pardoned and brought to perfection. Consequently the proposition that every tenet of faith can and must be questioned with regard to its anthropological significance is absolutely justified. And this means that every tenet of faith must also be questioned for its significance to the spirituality of the Christian.

What, then, does the Easter faith mean for the Christian's spirituality, if by the Easter faith we mean Christianity's acknowledgement that Jesus, the One who was crucified, lives, is risen, saved by the power of the living God?

When we put this question to earlier text-books of dogmatic theology, we generally receive a very meagre and existentially unsatisfying answer which more or less evades the question as it affects the [9] here and now. The statements about Jesus' resurrection in our text-books are generally made from the point of view of fundamental theology: the mission of Jesus, his teaching and the saving significance of his death are confirmed, sealed and made credible to us through the 'miracle' of Jesus' resurrection, seen in the light of fundamental theology and apologetics. The resurrection is the greatest of all miracles and can be effected directly by God alone.[2] But this establishes a merely indirect connection, at most, between Jesus' resurrection and our spirituality. In this view of the resurrection of Jesus, which belongs purely to fundamental theology, we do not perceive directly what this resurrection could have to do with the consummation of our own pardoned and deified existence. One might have the impression that, for our spiritual life as such, there would have been no real difference if the teaching of Jesus and the satisfaction for our sins made by Jesus on the cross had been authenticated for us by means of some corroboration other than the resurrection; or if the risen Christ had been snatched up into a dimension in which he had no relation to or meaning for us apart from the significance of his earthly life.

At all events, the meaning of Jesus' resurrection in terms of fundamental theology cannot offer any obvious spiritual relevance as long as the inner relationship between Jesus' death on the cross and his resurrection has not become clear as being the single event of our redemption. For if the resurrection really belongs to the redemption on the cross as an intrinsic aspect, not merely as an event that follows the cross in time and confirms it

[1] For another aspect of the subject cf. 'Dogmatic Questions on Easter', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 121-33. Recent theological discussion seems to impute 'an anthropocentric narrowing down of revelation' somewhat too carelessly and indiscriminately. It is not always really clear what this imputation actually means, or whether it can be justly and appropriately levelled against the statements of others.

[2] As an example of the way of looking at things I have described, cf. thesis 34 on the resurrection of Jesus by M. Nicolau in Sacrae Theologiae Summa I (BAC 61), 4th edn (Madrid 1958), pp. 375-96. From the exegetical side, however, valuable attempts at finding an answer to our question have been made; cf. H. Schürmann, Jesu ureigener Tod (Freiburg 1975), pp. 66-96 ('Das Weiterleben der Sache Jesus im nachösterlichen Herrenmahl').

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

outwardly, then it is part of the spiritual significance of the event of the cross for us. But we must go on to discuss this from another starting point.

Beyond this aspect of Jesus' resurrection for fundamental theology, former text-book dogmatic theology concerned itself more or less only with the substance of the doctrine of the resurrection, in so far as it touches on Jesus' individual destiny and its accomplishment. In short: the resurrection as an actual 'mystery of salvation' which is [10] related directly to our Christian existence is not stated very clearly.[3] If we look at the spiritual life of Christians themselves as we find it in traditional Catholic piety, then we can observe a curious phenomenon – or so it seems to me. If I try to make this clear here, I do not mean that in actual devotional life the relationship of the devout man or woman to Jesus Christ is found precisely and distinctly in the two forms that we are here distinguishing so sharply, so as to make them clear. But a difference of the kind I mean here does exist, and the unity of what is being divided forms precisely what we can call the spirituality of the Easter faith. For that reason it would seem justifiable to start with these contrasting models of the devout person's relationship to Jesus.

One kind of devotion to the person of Jesus is loving participation in the actual life of Jesus, in his earthly history, from the beginning of his life to his death and the crowning victory of that life in the resurrection. Even here, however, the resurrection is still seen as the final phase of this historical life, to which the believer turns in loving participation and personal involvement. This type of devotion can be found from the early Middle Ages onwards – especially since Bernard of Clairvaux – down to our own time. Of course the devout man or woman knows, in contemplating the life of Jesus as the norm of his or her own life, that this Jesus is the Son of God, the Word of the eternal Father, who appeared in history for our salvation. But their gaze still turns backwards into past history and is directly concerned with the historical details of Jesus' life. They undertake a pilgrimage back into history, so to speak, as one makes a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. The historical aspects of the life of Jesus have for this group of believers, as regards their immediate impression at least, a significance similar to other historical events which affect later people as a challenge or an example. This historical narrative may indeed differ from other historical material through its content, and thereby, of course, also through its existential meaning for us; but not through our mode of access to it.[4]

[11] At the centre of the other type of devotion to the person of Jesus stands the invocation of the transfigured Lord, prayer to Jesus in his own blessedness and glory. But in this direct, trusting, loving and adoring relationship to the transfigured Lord there is still (purely descriptively, not fundamentally) no clear distinction between the relationship of the devout person to the eternal God as such (whether, in this religious relationship, he is explicit as the one or as the triune God) and his relationship to Jesus as the God-man; although, because of the unmixed duality of natures in Jesus Christ, the relationship to Jesus as the transfigured man must not be fundamentally and simply merged in the relationship of the devout person to God. In this relationship to the transfigured Lord, the earthly history of Jesus hardly plays a role any more; the believer turns to the now-ruling Pantocrator, who in his power and glory reaches new decisions (the hearing of prayer, the granting of grace etc.); or he may perhaps appeal to 'the bridegroom of the soul', to the all-ruling Logos of the Father, who forms the innermost centre of a person's own existence. Whether Jesus mysticism, or Logos mysticism,

[3] On the idea of 'the mystery of salvation' or the mysteries of the life of Jesus, cf. K. Rahner, 'Mysterien des Lebens Jesu', LThK VII, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1962), pp. 721-2; 'Current Problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 1961), pp. 149-200.

[4] One of the most highly developed examples of this viewpoint is to be found in the considerations of the life of Jesus in Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises. But these are always linked with the other aspect which is brought out here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or the adoration of the heavenly Pantocrator is predominant in this second type of devotion is not here decisive. But there is, nevertheless, a danger that the history of Jesus may disappear from the field of vision of the person praying and meditating, as being 'something in the past'. Jesus' history may have been exemplary and of saving efficacy, but it is none the less a thing of the past, and has been replaced by God in himself and in his Spirit – the Spirit which has always sustained and ruled all history. Through this Spirit we have such direct access to God that in that access history is no longer to be found.

Even if we were to say (and of course we should, fundamentally speaking, be right) that these two types of Christian piety and religious relationship to Jesus are always present together in a living and unrestricted Catholic devotion, and in individual Christians, this would not really eliminate the difficulty which is meant and which we are discussing here. The gaze of the devout person would still have two different directions: backwards into a past which no longer exists 'now', and upwards into the eternity of God, which is ultimately outside history.

Of course the inward problem which is inherent in this double direction of vision in Christian devotion involves what is in fact the really basic problem of theology in general. We might characterise this basic problem briefly as being the question of the unity between transcendence [12] and history. How can history have significance for salvation and achieve eternal validity, when man in his transcendental nature, radically altered through grace, has direct access to the infinite God in himself? And when this God lives as the infinite and unchangeable One, beyond all history, and in his infinite fullness of being holds in advance and from eternity everything that happens in history, in finite being and in particular events? How can a history made up of finite events and beings have a meaning that is absolute and ultimate in kind before an infinite God? Why does not history pass away, as something provisional and without substance, for the spiritual subject who has been raised by grace, once that subject has acquired a direct relationship to the God who is above all history? Of course we cannot treat this fundamental problem in detail here. It is a basic problem of the Christian faith, and hence of Christian devotion as well. But I wanted to touch on it at this point in order to indicate, at least, the deeper background to the question of the spirituality of the Easter faith.[5]

For this Easter faith postulates an indissoluble unity between transcendence and history. It demands that the Christian's devotional life should vividly realise this unity in its undivided and unadulterated nature. It demands, that is to say, that devotion should let the God of infinite, eternal and unassailed fullness of life be in truth the God of a history of abiding validity; and, conversely, that devotion should lay hold on the God of history (who – at least seen in the light of the eternal Logos – actually carries on his own history in his world and does not merely passively sustain it, being himself beyond the world) as being the God of fullness of life and reality, already possessed from eternity to eternity. In this unity of transcendence and history, the two aspects certainly cannot coincide for us in lifeless identity; the Chalcedonian 'unmixed' character of Christology applies here, too. But the Easter faith enjoins us – and especially in the light of Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen One – not to overlook this 'undivided' unity of history and transcendence, above all in the completion of history. It insists that we do not simplify it through a mere parallelism of the two aspects, but that we understand that the consummated [13] encounter with God as he is in himself actually means encounter with the consummated history that is ours.

Seen in the light of the spiritual 'realisation' of the Easter faith, this means the following:

[5] On the problem of history and its significance for salvation, see among K. Rahner's more recent writings: 'Possible Courses for the Theology of the Future' and 'Experience of Self and Experience of God', Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975), pp. 32-60 and pp. 122-32 respectively; 'On the Concept of Infallibility in Catholic Theology' Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 66-85.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

when we turn to the exalted Lord in faith, in hope and in love, we find none other than the crucified Jesus, in whose death his whole earthly life is of course integrated. When we are told that that the crucified Jesus is to be found in the risen Christ, then this statement expresses considerably more than is clear from the duality of viewpoint on the part of the devout person which we mentioned earlier. The risen Christ is not merely the One who at some earlier time lived a human life, was crucified and died, but has now simply left all this behind him as the no-longer-existing past, and now leads a different, new life – a life which is linked with the earlier one only through the identity of the substantial bearer of both lives (or phases of life), beyond that claiming for itself only the moral qualities of that earlier life. No, the risen Lord is the One who was crucified. This 'is' does not merely indicate the identity of a substantial subject, who now sustains a different life from before. The 'is' states that this very earlier life itself is completed and has found eternal reality in and before God.

We must not trivialise the identity between the earthly Jesus and the exalted Lord – either through a mere recourse to the identity of the substantial subject, or through the notion that in the risen Christ the same 'character' is present as in the earthly Jesus. His eternal life is rather the ultimate form of his earthly life itself. What he leads in the 'Now' of eternity is not a new and different life (even though it exists in homogeneity with his earthly life). His life in eternity is the ultimate form of his history, so that when the devout person turns to the risen Christ, he finds the Jesus who was crucified, and vice versa. Of course much in the earthly life of Jesus is simply 'past and gone' and no longer exists. To deny that would simply be to assert that the history of Jesus is not completed. But for that reason this earthly life of Jesus is not after all simply past and gone: it is; it is completed and eternally valid; it has itself been accepted by God and acknowledged as real; from the human subjectivity of Jesus, it has been gathered out of the mere flux of earthly time into the Now of eternity, and taken into irrevocable possession.[6] [14] Our understanding of history's consummation remains inevitably dialectical, allowing history to be truly 'passing', while preserving it as ultimately abiding; and we cannot of course transfer this to a unity which is in itself directly accessible to us. We have to come to terms with this dialectic. It is the same for us as for Paul, when in chapter 15 of the First Epistle to the Corinthians he describes the resurrection body as being totally different from the earthly body, and yet holds that it is this very resurrection body which signifies the concrete character of our earthly history.

We ought really now to go on to show, by means of biblical theology, that in the New Testament the exalted Lord is essentially understood as being one with the crucified Jesus, and vice versa. The evidence for this cannot be given here.[7]

We could also go on to show that the piety documented in the tradition of theology and spiritual writings has always tended towards a unity of the two viewpoints which we have described above in deliberately exaggerated form. When the devout person turns in prayer to the exalted Lord, he sees, like Stephen, the Son of man standing at the right hand of God (Acts 7:56); and when in his meditations he follows the paths of the earthly Jesus, he knows that what he contemplates so lovingly is now eternal reality, which has found its ultimate form in the life of the eternal God. When Jesus' 'resurrection' is correctly understood, as faith really believes it to be, then it does not mean the living-on of an identical subject, whose life, having gone through a past phase, now has a new content; the resurrection means the ultimate, God-given form of the earthly life belonging to history. And this history has an

[6] On the whole subject, cf. K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), esp. 'Grundlinien einer systematischen Christologie', pp. 15-78.

[7] I should like to draw express attention to W. Thüsing's questions and comments in K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 123-233. I am indebted to him for a number of points.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ultimate meaning because in the incarnation and cross of the eternal Logos it is the history of God himself.[8]

Of course we ought also now to go on to show that in history itself something eternal is already taking place as an encountering event and is to some extent already open to experience; and that this eternal happening 'takes place' through freedom, but is through that very freedom established as something final and irrevocable, not as [15] something transient. So that eternity comes about in history and does not merely tack itself on behind history as something new and different. But here we can point only in the most cursory way to this more general problem of the relationship between freedom, time and eternity.

We have perhaps been talking about the spirituality of the Easter faith in very unspiritual terms, i.e. in merely abstract theological language. And even so, we have failed to mention many conclusions which might be drawn from the basic approach to an understanding of the risen Christ that we have indicated, and from the relationship of the devout person to this risen Christ. For example, we could go on to draw conclusions about the real nature of the heavenly intercession of the risen Christ with the Father; for this is not a new 'occupation' on the part of Jesus (sit venia verbo), provoked by us, but is identical with the validity of Jesus' earthly life and his cross, which he eternally possesses in knowledge and freedom. It is impossible to say any more here. My intention has been really only to encourage the devout man or woman to turn without reserve to the exalted Lord in prayer, because direct access to God also means direct access to the history which God has accepted as his own reality, finally confirming it as his own in the resurrection of Jesus.

[8] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Eternal Significance of the Humanity of Jesus for our Relationship with God', Theological Investigations Ill (London and Baltimore 1967), pp. 35-46.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[16]

3

JESUS' RESURRECTION

SOME OBSERVATIONS DRAWN FROM SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY

It is possible to enquire about Jesus' resurrection today (if we are to do justice to the facts and talk in a way that inspires confidence) only if we take into account the whole of what philosophy and theology have to say about man. Here we must start from the assumption that the hope that a person's history of freedom will be conclusive in nature (a hope which is given in the act of responsible freedom and which is transcendentally necessary) already includes what we mean by the hope of 'resurrection'. Whether this hope is accepted or rejected is initially unimportant in the context of a question of this kind. At all events this hope must include knowledge of what is really meant by resurrection.

It is only in the light of this starting point that a distinction which we can also observe in the history of revelation can be made comprehensible. I mean the distinction which exists between hope for the resurrection of 'the righteous', and the expectation that even the people who have finally, as part of their freedom, missed their calling will also 'be raised'.[1] The second 'resurrection', for the purpose of judgement, can be understood only as the presupposition and implication of hope for the resurrection of the morally perfect. It must consequently be essentially different in kind and can, so to speak, be only a borderline concept.

But hope for the conclusive nature of one's own history of freedom, because of its absolute responsibility, also includes the idea of 'the resurrection of the body', because the hoping person as such basically affirms his own unity and his own history in space and time; consequently [17] he is prevented from the outset from confining his hope merely to one part or excerpt of his reality. Of course such a hope can then always be differentiated, in the case of a particular individual; but it cannot be split up. That depends on the elements of his being and the particular interpretation which he gives to the quite natural differentiations of his single existence in its different aspects.

It is therefore quite possible (depending on the particular philosophical and anthropological interpretations of man's make-up we choose) to conceive of a considerable variation in the precise interpretation of what resurrection could mean for that particular aspect of man's being which we normally call his 'body'. Nor will this breadth of variation, philosophically speaking, be limited by the facts of the Christian revelation, as long as these facts themselves are carefully interpreted. Consequently, if we see the matter in the light of our own historical time, and judge it as belonging to the event of a person's being perfected in all the different elements of his being, we can leave the question open, theologically speaking, whether temporality is to be objectively included or not. In other words, it may remain an open question whether the perfecting of the individual person in his 'physical being' is an event which takes place 'later', as his personal perfecting, or whether it takes place when he dies; i.e. whether we have to expect the resurrection of the individual 'in the body' as part of a general resurrection of all men at the end of history, or whether it is 'co-existent' with historical time, which meanwhile continues to run its course.

At all events, we should be giving a temporal character to the perfection of man in a quite mythological way if we were perhaps to assume, with contemporary biblical scholars, that the

[1] Cf. 1 Cor. 15:12-58; John 5:29.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one resurrection of men and women takes place after a period of complete non-existence on the part of the dead. This would make it impossible to talk seriously at all any more about a true identity between the person who has died and the person who is raised. On the contrary, we must cling to the fact that 'the resurrection' in its theologically valid sense refers primarily to the acquiring of a final and ultimate form by the whole, individual person in his own history of freedom; it applies to his 'body' only in a secondary and derivative sense.[2] But it is just this [18] which also corresponds to the facts of the Christian history of revelation. A doctrine of the resurrection 'of the body' which neglected this or was not prepared to accept it as true would be subscribing to mythological notions.

On the basis of what we have said, we might now formulate the proposition that the knowledge of man's resurrection given with his transcendentally necessary hope is a statement of philosophical anthropology even before any real revelation in the Word. But we should have to counter this by saying that, at least initially, the elucidation of man's basic hope as being the hope of resurrection was in actual fact made historically through the revelation of the Old and New Testaments. It was there that man was taught to take his existence in space and time and in the body really seriously. So at least in actual fact and historically, this hope always remains theological.

Secondly, we should have to stress that – at least conceivably – the actual and absolute hope for the ultimate consummation of our own history of freedom – hope which is really lived as being actual and absolute, and which finds the courage to express itself clearly – is due, at least sensu positivo, to God's grace, which is always active in men and women. For it is this which first gives human nature a claim to finality of this kind; as 'pure nature' man simply could not have it at all. This aspect of hope cannot be eliminated 'experimentally', however. So the actual, specific hope of resurrection is founded on grace and therefore remains theological, even in the light of its own reality; although this is not a claim that it could be fundamentally objectified and identified simply on the basis of the positive evidence of Christian revelation (Scripture and tradition).

THE LORD'S RESURRECTION

We said at the beginning that belief in Jesus' resurrection is possible only within this transcendentally necessary hope of resurrection. This applies not only to the fact of Jesus' resurrection but also to its meaning – if by meaning we understand, as we must, both 'meaning in itself' and 'meaning for us'. This does not exclude – it expressly includes – the fact that because of the circle that links all transcendental and historical experience, the secure objectification of the transcendental hope of resurrection is brought about by the experience of Jesus' resurrection. We therefore can and must say: because Jesus is risen, I believe in and hope for my own resurrection.

[19] For that reason we are now bound to interpret Jesus' resurrection as the final and conclusive form of this person and his actual history before God and with him. The statement 'he lives in the glory of God'[3] is therefore more primal and basic than the individual accounts of the visions and 'appearances' of the risen Jesus – in fact, and not only according to the biblical tradition.

Thus the fundamental experience of being saved and the enduring finality and conclusiveness of Jesus and his history are not simply identical with whatever can be reported

[2] Cf. here 'Der Leib in der Heilsordnung' in K. Rahner and A. Görres, Der Leib und das Heil (Mainz 1967), pp. 29-44. The text is printed in the present volume, pp. 71-89.
[3] Cf. here Matt. 22:44ff (following Ps. 109:1); Rev. 2:25 (following Ps. 16:9-11); Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20; Col. 3:1; Heb. 10:12; 1 Pet. 3:22; etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

directly and 'tangibly' in the experience of 'the appearances', in concepts drawn from time and space. On the contrary, what is really at stake is an experience of faith in the Spirit – the experience that Jesus is alive. And this experience is fundamentally open to every Christian. He has only to accept believingly and trustingly his own transcendental hope of resurrection and, therefore, also be on the look out, implicitly or explicitly, for a specific event in his own history, on the basis of which his hope can be believed in, as something that has been realised in another person. He has certainly also to hope for others just as much as for himself. But in view of Jesus and his history it becomes possible to believe that this Jesus has undergone an event whose liberating power can have an effect on the believer. In spite of this, the Christian experience of Jesus' resurrection remains bound to the apostolic testimony, because without that testimony our own resurrection could no longer be mediated to ourselves through Jesus, as an actual named individual. The search for the actual event towards which our own resurrection hope is directed, as its historical verification and mediation, would run into the sand without the testimony of the apostles. At the same time, faith in this testimony is not just the same as mere belief in a witness because he is competent and credible; for example, when we are told about an event whose facts we can no longer verify for ourselves.[4]

The theological, and not merely the philosophical, justification for the close link between our own personal existential hope of resurrection and the evidential character of Jesus' resurrection is to be found in the fact that the Lord's resurrection can of course be believed in [20] only with the help of God's grace. This internal reasoning is admittedly really circular, as modern theology has understood ever since Rousselot's writings on the relationship between faith and credibility.[5] But this grace to believe must not be thought of as a purely neutral and colourless divine aid towards the act of faith; or as an essential 'supernatural elevation' of that act. It is in its very nature hope for our own 'resurrection' because it is God's eschatological communication of himself for our final salvation. It must therefore be attributed from within to the historical experience of a specific resurrection.

There is no doubt at all that the accounts of 'the empty tomb' belong to the oldest tradition in the New Testament. Yet we must not forget that this fact alone does not give us any real knowledge about Jesus' resurrection. The empty tomb ought rather to be judged as an expression of a conviction which had already spread for other reasons – the conviction that Jesus was alive. A secondary point is that we must also probably leave the question open of how the mention of the empty tomb is related to the accounts of the appearances, and what significance must be attributed to this report in view of the literary nature of the appearance narratives. This is simply a point to be mentioned here.

Finally, the 'facts' of Jesus' resurrection must simply be determined in the light of what we have to understand by our own 'resurrection'; and this must be decided first of all, quite apart from the significance for us of Jesus' resurrection in the context of salvation history. If we began by taking our bearings from the notion of the revival of a physical, material body, we should be bound from the outset to lose sight of the general meaning of 'resurrection'; but we should also no less miss the meaning of Jesus' own resurrection. For unlike everything which the Old and New Testaments report elsewhere about the raising of the dead, the Lord's resurrection means the ultimate deliverance of actual human existence by God and before him. This means that human history acquires its real validity for the first time; it neither simply goes on continuing into vacuity, nor is it simply destroyed. In view of this, death, without which this ultimate conclusiveness is impossible, is the essential and radical renunciation of every concept of the 'how' of this conclusiveness, whether it applies [21] to [4] Cf. here 'Theological Observations on the Concept of Witness', Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975), pp. 152-68 (which contains an extensive bibliography in n. 1).

[5] P. Rousselot, Die Augen des Glaubens. With intro, by Josef Trütsch. (Einsiedeln 1963); cf. E. Kunz, Glaube, Gnade, Geschichte: Die Glaubenstheologie des Pierre Rousselot S.J. (Frankfurt 1969).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'the body' or to 'the soul' of any human life.[6] From the very outset, the resurrection does not mean any kind of continuance on the part of a human existence which would be neutral towards man's salvation; it means that existence's acceptance and deliverance by God. That is why the person cannot be separated from the activity or 'cause' that animated his earthly life, when we are considering the resurrection and its interpretation. The real activity or 'cause' – if we do not give it an idealistic, ideological sense – is always whatever is brought to fulfilment in the actual existence of the human person. Consequently in saying that this is what has permanent validity, we are saying that what is permanently valid is the validity of the person himself. So when we say that the resurrection of Jesus means that his 'cause' did not come to an end with his death, then we must at the same time stress, positively and critically, what we have just said in the previous sentence, if we really want to exclude an idealistic misunderstanding of the cause of Jesus;[7] for otherwise the continuance of the cause would simply mean the validity and efficacy of an 'idea', which is continually engendered and wins ever-new acceptance.

We should also have to go on to ask why, when we talk about Jesus' cause, it still remains clear that – at least during the lifetime of the Lord – this cause remains indissolubly bound up with his person. He himself, after all, was deeply convinced of this, according to his own sayings and his own behaviour. But to talk about his cause seems to suggest that he himself could simply have perished, leaving his cause to live on – though this cause would then no longer really be his cause.

But if Jesus' resurrection continues to be the final, conclusive existence of his person and his cause, and if this person-cause does not simply mean that some man or other and his history go on existing, but that the victory of his special claim to be the absolute mediator of [22] salvation is endorsed once and for all – then faith in his resurrection is an inner aspect of that resurrection itself. It does not simply mean registering a certain fact, which by its very nature could just as well exist even if we did not register it at all. The resurrection of Jesus is accordingly the eschatological victory of God's grace in the world. But for that very reason it cannot be conceived of without the free faith in it which actually exists; for it is only in this that its own essence is fulfilled at all. In this sense we can and may well say that Jesus is raised 'into' the faith of his disciples.[8] But this faith into which Jesus is raised is not really and directly faith in this resurrection; it is the faith which is experienced as liberty from all the forces of finitude, guilt and death. It is liberty brought about by God and it knows itself to be warranted by the fact that this liberty has come into being in Jesus himself and was revealed in him for us. If faith henceforth counts as being hope for our resurrection, then it must believe in this resurrection of Jesus' first of all, and cannot replace his resurrection by something different, without any specifiable 'content'. Of course in the last resort the fides qua (faith as personal act) and the fides quae (faith as object) are always indissolubly linked. But every fides qua as the subject's act of absolute freedom derived from and directed towards God, for him is already, at least implicitly, the fides quae of our own resurrection.

Jesus' resurrection, finally, takes on a unique salvation-history character because through faith we recognise it as being the eschatologically irreversible, historical appearance of God's

[6] Cf. K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death (Quaestiones Disputatae 2), 2nd edn, (London 1969); 'Ideas for a Theology of Death', Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975), pp. 169-86.
[7] The expression 'the cause' (Sache) of Jesus is taken from W. Marxsen, The Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth (ET S.C.M. Press, London 1970). The present author has discussed the problem of the resurrection in the light of Marxsen's views in K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), Lehrsatz 25: 'Der Sinn von "Auferstehung" ', pp. 36-8. The following section is based on these earlier remarks, some of it word for word.
[8] Cf. here K. Hollmann, 'Die Interpretation der Osterbotschaft durch Bultmann', Existenz und Glaube (Paderborn 1972), pp. 146-9; H. Häring, 'Der kirchliche Sinn der Auferstehung', Kirche und Kerygma (Freiburg 1972), pp. 48-50; 65-9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation promise of himself to the world. Of course this takes for granted that the disciples did not experience Jesus' resurrection merely as being the final and conclusive deliverance of a particular person, let alone as merely the revival of a dead person in our era of time and space, with its continuing history. It presupposes that they saw the Lord's resurrection as the final confirmation by God himself of the claim made by Jesus before Easter: the claim that the word, the fate and the person of the Lord means the nearness of the kingdom of God, and that this is a fact that cannot be rescinded. The disciples must have been conscious of this claim of Jesus' in some form or other, even though [23] we cannot define it more closely here. If this were not so the mere conviction 'he is alive' would have no meaning for us in the context of salvation-history. Of course to say this does not mean calling in question the fact that, against the background of contemporary Jewish theology, the resurrection could only be understood at all as an eschatological event – i.e. it was impossible to interpret it simply as just another event in history. Equally we re not overlooking the fact that the experience of the final deliverance of Jesus by God and with God also in retrospect facilitated and helped to sustain the radical interpretation of the claim made by Jesus before Easter. But at all events this kind of interpretation of the Easter experience is sufficient to make us see and hold fast to what Christian faith has to say and has to acknowledge dogmatically today about the soteriological significance of Jesus' death – if it is a faith that is consciously held and has been responsibly arrived at.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[24]

4

CHRISTOLOGY TODAY?

For Christians, questions about Christology are always topical. As believers, and also, it may be, as people in the service of the Church as proclaimers of the message of Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen One, the mediator of our salvation, we cannot be indifferent towards questions of Christology today; for we are at the same time people in a situation in life where this message is not simply a matter of course, but where it is controversial, doubted and rejected.

Of course there are innumerable questions of this kind. We cannot even list or name them here. How, for example, can a person outside definite 'committed' Christianity arrive at faith in Jesus Christ at all, in the sense in which the fellowship of believers acknowledge him? In the face of questions like these we must confine ourselves to a more limited subject. The only point we can and ought to discuss here is the following: how can a person who acknowledges Christ in principle (even if his confession of faith is perhaps somewhat vague and is still involved in a process of search) come to terms with things, when he is also convinced that his personal understanding of this Jesus cannot, and must not, be merely an individualistically isolated opinion, but has essentially to be related to the faith of the Church? For it is the Church, after all, which has passed the Gospel of Jesus Christ on to him in the first place.

TRADITIONAL CHRISTOLOGY

It must be said at once that contemporary Christology too must not simply emancipate itself from the classical position. Christology developed from the New Testament writings (especially Paul and John) [25] down to the statements of the Council of Chalcedon (451).[1] Since that time this Christology has remained valid in the Eastern churches, in the Roman Catholic Church and – we may cautiously say – in the Reformed Churches, at least until the nineteenth century. It certainly cannot now be a question of simply deducing this classical Christology from its sources as being obligatory for our time and in the future too. And by 'sources' I mean, ultimately, a person's original experience with this Jesus of Nazareth (which is still open to us today) and, together with this experience and as part of it, the New Testament itself At the same time I am quite convinced that this process is entirely possible, in spite of all denials by a liberalistic exegesis or by pamphlets such as that of Rudolf Augstein.[2] But it is a task that is primarily the function of proclamation and theology as a whole. It cannot be adequately summed up here in the space at our disposal.

First of all, however, a Christian who wants to lay claim to being 'a churchman' must note the following: we cannot simply leap over fifteen hundred years of classical Christology or push it aside as if it were a matter of indifference. We cannot do this if there is an enduring Gospel of Jesus Christ as the One who gives us an ultimate trust and an ultimate hope for the

[1] Cf. the formula Denzinger-Schönmetzer (Denz.), Enchiridion Symbolorum (Barcelona 1965), 301-2. For information about the background, development and significance of the Council's decision, cf. the now classic volume, A. Grillmeier and H. Bacht (eds), Das Konzil von Chalkedon. Geschichte und Gegenwart, I-III (Würzburg 1951-4). It has frequently been photomechanically reproduced.

[2] Cf. R. Augstein, Jesus Menschensohn (Gütersloh 1972). For criticism, cf. K. Rahner, 'Das Christentum – ein explosiver Irrtum?', Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 7 Oct. 1972 (No. 233), supplement; later printed in R. Pesch and G. Stachel (eds), Augsteins Jesus (Zürich 1972), pp. 40-9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

eternal significance and final validity of our existence; if we derive this ultimate attitude from the Church; and if we are convinced that this bond with Jesus Christ, in spite of all the history and historicity which surrounds it, is fundamentally valid for all future ages and therefore has a genuine continuity in the historical life and historical Word of Christianity. On the contrary, we must accept it as being binding on ourselves, too, fundamentally and as a whole. One reason is that for almost two thousand years Christianity has acknowledged this Christology and lived according to it. It is in this Christology – not through by-passing it – that Christianity has [26] found Jesus Christ to be the mediator and Lord on which it has based its life and death.

Another reason is that this classical Christology still has a meaning and a message for us today. If it were simply no longer comprehensible because of the change in the boundaries of understanding (which is of course undeniable) then we should not even be able to talk about it at all or to reject it with apparent justification. Consequently we should also beware of cheap and hasty lamentations that Christology in its traditional form has become alien, and that 'it just doesn't appeal any more' because the presuppositions behind it, which are necessary for its understanding, no longer exist.

From many points of view a person who attempts today to assimilate this classical Christology must overcome greater difficulties. For instance, its historical pre-conditions and premisses (which are not simply self-evident to us from the start) may loom larger for us with our greater historical awareness. Nevertheless the meaning of this classical Christology can still be understood, and furthermore it can still be seen to be legitimately derived from a more primal experience of Jesus which is open to us now even though it is still historically mediated. Consequently we can come to recognise it as being authoritative and binding for ourselves also, provided we do not adopt the foolish idea that we can produce a new Christology of our own, as its 'only begetters', without the need for living bonds to connect our own Christianity with the history of the Christian faith itself

Christology – like the Christian faith itself– is inconceivable without at least an ultimate continuity of genuine historical tradition, though this continuity is not something external to actual word or concept. Consequently the Christology of the early Church and the Fathers cannot be merely the object of an antiquarian historical interest; it must be binding on us. And this binding quality must not be opposed to the living and primal quality of faith in Christ today. If we were simply to declare that we could not make anything of classical Christology any more, this – if correctly interpreted at least – would not be a reproach to Christology. It would be a reproach to ourselves, and to our own spiritual and mental laziness, the stuntedness of our historical sense, and our bondage to a fashionable present which is not aware of its paltry limitations.

We can and must acknowledge today, too, that in Jesus the eternal divine Logos has entered our history, becoming man in time, the One who was pre-existent in the divine eternity, for whom it was no [27] presumption to be equal with God. We can and must still confess with the Council of Chalcedon that the specific reality which meets us in Jesus (provided that we do not let it come to an end at a point determined by ourselves and our own arbitrary choice) was and eternally remains true man and true God in a unique and incomprehensible unity; so that we can and must talk about this one reality as being really and truly divine and human, without intermixture and division, in spite of the unmixed different elements that constitute it.[3] These Chalcedonian christological statements may sound strange to us at first. The road that leads to them from the simple Gospel may seem to us long and winding. But these classical christological formulations are binding and beneficial, if only because they continually face us with the inexorable question: do we [3] Cf. Denz. 301-2 and the appropriate canon 303.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ourselves meet Jesus at such a radical level that in him we meet God himself – and meet him in a unique and irreplaceable way, as he is in himself – the forgiveness of our guilt, our salvation, and our eternal life?

The classical formulations of Christology are one way (others are also perhaps conceivable) of compelling us, inexorably and inescapably, to take Jesus absolutely seriously – not simply to see him as just one religious genius among others, as a prophet who might be followed by others of the same kind, or perhaps even by greater ones who would supersede him; but to understand him as the unsurpassable and irreversible Word of salvation to ourselves – as the Word of God per se.

Any christological formulation which on the one hand allows Jesus to be quite objectively man, in the most radical sense, and which on the other hand allows him to be, in his life and death, the unsurpassable Word of God for us, could be enough; because it would then also be stating what is really meant by the classical christological formulations. But of course such a formulation was itself first given in this classical form. It does not exist anywhere else in such inexorable clarity, and at the same time in this generally adopted or received form.

That is why classical Christology still remains binding on us today, and is also irreplaceable. We have no reason to be ashamed of the Christology that has been passed down to us. Since today (in contrast to earlier more rationalistic eras) the feeling is growing that one can only talk very paradoxically, analogously or dialectically (or however [28] we may like to put it) about God and his redeeming relationship to us, we have no need to hide from our contemporaries the paradox which is also ultimately concealed in the apparently calmly ontological phraseology of classical Christology; for we have no need to feel that these formulations, even though they may be necessary, are somewhat old fashioned.

THE LIMITATIONS OF CLASSICAL CHRISTOLOGY

But are we therefore also compelled to overlook, forget or ignore the limitations of classical Christology today? These limitations were certainly not so clearly seen earlier, and were not so clearly thought about; for that was, largely speaking, impossible at the time. In our own period, at all events, we should quite freely indicate what these limitations are.

First of all, classical Christology clearly stresses that Jesus Christ was true and perfect man, without any curtailment, except for actual sin (i.e. a real 'no' to God's grace and love). But as it developed, this Christology did in fact tend so to idealise this true man – and to idealise his human dimension especially – that even here he appeared as a kind of semi-god,[4] instead of being the Word of God for us just because he shared in the very reality and fate of a real historical person, including his death. So in actual fact classical Christology not infrequently strayed unintentionally into a monophysitism which was basically criticised for the emphatic distinction it made between the divine and the human. Instead of this distinction there was a mingling of the two in a curious deification of the man, in place of a radical acceptance of the bitterly finite character of the person in whom God appeared among us. The fact that Jesus also believed, hoped, searched and was tempted, and unavoidably capitulated before the incomprehensibility of God may not have been obscured in the loving devotion of believers to the One who was crucified; but it was to some extent obscured in textbook theology.[5] Today's sober exegesis, which emphasises [29] the historical dependency of Jesus

[4] The present author has already complained of this in a number of earlier essays, cf. K. Rahner, 'Current Problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London 1961), pp. 149-200.

[5] Here something might be said about the importance of living piety for textbook theology; for influence by no means flows only in the reverse direction. As the other essays in the present volume make clear, my main intention is not only to discover what theology has to say, but to quicken it in the light of the experience of lived

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and his doctrine, also makes us clearly aware of the limitations of classical Christology, as this was actually expounded, when it did not always remain true to its own principles; and it enjoins us to take Jesus' historicity seriously. A vertical Christology of descent,[6] which was the approach of classical Christology, must today no longer overlook the fact that what the Logos who descended from the glory of God desired to take upon himself was precisely the sombre facts of historical existence with its limits, dependency and baseness, without which there can be no true and full humanity. Today classical Christology certainly has to go on considering what has to be added to Christ's human reality as well, so that it can fulfil its function in salvation-history. With this in mind Christology can, for example, certainly not avoid, even in our period, talking with the Epistle to the Hebrews about Jesus' sinlessness as a man.[7] But what it can and must avoid doing is so to transfigure Jesus even in his earthly life that it is no longer evident that he took our human, poverty-stricken and sombre fate on himself, fully and completely, redeeming us through that very fact.

Classical Christology presents a doctrine of the descent of the pre-existent Logos through his assumption of a human 'nature'; it is an incarnational Christology. For that reason it is further limited by the fact that it does not sufficiently and directly make clear the connection between the incarnate Logos and his function as the mediator of salvation. Of course it established this connection. It attempted to do so either by talking about the sending of the eternal Son into the world for its salvation in the way that Eastern theology did, seeing the taking-on of flesh (i.e. of human nature) as being in itself the saving and deifying acceptance of human nature, or man as a whole; or it proceeded as Western theology did, understanding the Incarnation as the establishment of a divine-human subject who, by obediently accepting the death for which he was destined, can offer God [30] in his holiness expiation and satisfaction for the guilt of mankind. But a connection that is conceived of in either one of these ways will either work very platonically and speculatively, taking as its presupposition a unity of divinity and humanity in one and the same nature (a platonic train of thought which it is difficult for us to follow today); or it will make use of the solution that adopts the categories of Germanic legalistic thinking in the theory of satisfaction. In this case it will draw on the postulate of the divine decree by which the incarnate Logos is appointed to be the atoning representative of sinful mankind. Today these patterns of interpretation come up against considerable difficulties, which we cannot go into here.

But above all a vertical incarnational and 'descent' Christology of this kind, considered in isolation, involves a limitation and a danger. For it first talks only about the adoption of a human nature which remains abstract. It does not simply begin from the very outset with the actual, specific reality of Jesus' life and death. Yet after all it is this which we experience first of all, and it is this that we grasp in faith and hope as what is saving and liberating for ourselves.

The vertical Christology of the incarnation and a horizontal Christology of salvation-history are generally insufficiently related to each other.[8] One might also say that in traditional incarnational theology there is too little Christology in the sense of 'fundamental' theology. That is to say, too little weight is given to the experience of Jesus which grasps him faith, as this mediates actual salvation, or fails to do so. As an example, I should like to draw attention to an earlier essay on this subject: Heilige Stunde und Passionsandacht (Innsbruck 1949, Freiburg 1955).

---

[6] CL here K. Rahner, 'The Two Basic Types of Christology', Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975), pp. 213-23; the beginnings are already to be found in the New Testament, cf. the christological hymn in Phil. 2:5-11.

[7] Cf. Heb. 5:1-10; 7:22-28.

[8] For one particular attempt to relate the two for the whole of Christology, see the doctrinal statements 'Grundlinien einer systematischen Christologie', in K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 15-78.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as being the saving Word of God to us which cannot be superseded, and which finds him in the specific reality of his life and his redeemed death. This is not clearly enough incorporated from the very outset in the incarnational Christology we have described. Up to a certain point it has even been replaced by a doctrine which looks from God to us and not from us to God. This is supported only by some sayings of Jesus about himself, which are historically and exegetically difficult to interpret, and not by his death and resurrection. We might also say that in classical Christology there is too wide a gap between the substance of the doctrine and its function. 'Christ for us' does not lead on to 'a Christ in and for himself'. Instead a Christ-in-himself, conceived of in a doctrinaire [31] way, is made the starting point for what might be called an attempt to arrive retrospectively at a Christ for us, by way of connections set up in the way we have indicated.

But in our time at least it must be clear that we have to find our faith in a living encounter with Jesus the Christ – an encounter which is of course sustained by the Spirit.

NEW APPROACHES

Today a whole number of new approaches to Christology are crystallising. These neither deny nor mean to call in question what classical Christology is aiming at. The point at issue is not even to dispute the permanently normative character of classical Christology, although these new approaches for their part are also absolutely necessary today if access to faith in Jesus as Christ and Lord is not to be made unduly difficult for modern men and women.

To state that these new christological approaches exist does not of course also mean that the new approaches are absolutely novel or that they could or must be developed into a full systematic Christology, which would then stand parallel to classical Christology as something completely fresh and utterly different. It is rather a question of something more modest: the fact that the statements of classical Christology can also be formulated in simpler statements which we find more accessible today and yet which underlie those of classical Christology. But if we are to take this assertion seriously in a really radical way, then these statements already incorporate the whole of classical Christology in themselves. On the other hand they also preserve classical Christology from its intrinsic danger of being misunderstood in a monophysite sense – the danger, that is, of thinking of Jesus simply as God, who merely appears on earth in a human livery.

New approaches of this kind are not to be rejected just because there have already been a number of attempts in this direction since the Enlightenment – attempts which have come to grief because of their rationalism. Of course, no one will expect these to be followed up here in systematic accounts of the Christologies of Protestant[9] or Catholic theologians. That would take us too far and involve the risk [32] of simplifying through brevity or of distorting these attempts at a Christology. Neither are we saying here that behind all these modern attempts there is only one Christology, either Catholic or Protestant, of the kind which we have indicated under the somewhat too portentous title 'new approach'. On the contrary, we can also find very modern christologies, with considerable intellectual and religious power, which are radical Christologies of descent, to such an extent that the death to which Jesus was destined threatens to become the inner destiny of God himself, in an almost gnostically monophysitic way. But I do not intend either to describe or to criticise all that here.

What I mean here by 'new approaches' is really something very simple: quite plain statements about the meaning of Jesus and what he did for us, statements which give us the [9] Cf. one of the author's earliest essays, 'Die deutsche protestantische Christologie der Gegenwart', Theologie der Zeit, Theologische Beihefte zum 'Seelsorger' 1 (Vienna 1936), pp. 189-202.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

impression that, in spite of their relatively easy accessibility, they still contain in full the classic, essential Christology. This requires that on the one hand they are taken really seriously, in a thoroughly radical way; and that, on the other, people do not again interpret them in a monophysitic sense (even, it may be, unintentionally and non-thematically) and then claim that these new functional approaches must support and provide evidence for this latent misunderstanding.

In order to make the precise intention and real meaning of these 'new approaches' clear, let us begin with the quite simple experience of faith in Jesus. Jesus is a person who loves, who is faithful, who serves others, and who does not evade – either inwardly or outwardly – the death for which he is destined. In his death he experiences the ultimate God-forsakenness, and in that very situation yields himself and his fate into the Father's hands. We now believe that the abyss of death in which he was swallowed up is the blessed fullness of divine life; that he lives, and that his history of failure was accepted and ratified by God; that it is now valid for ever; and that he is the risen One. We experience this redeemed destiny of Jesus as God's answer to us, since we are the absolute question which we ourselves cannot answer. It is God's answer to us because Jesus has identified himself with us to the ultimate degree, and because, on the other hand, we cannot do anything else than see our own fate in the fate of our neighbour. Otherwise we would be merely isolated monads, not people who can only find themselves in others by loving them.

[33] This answer for us is Jesus as the One who died and is risen.[10] That is what remains the definitive and irrevocable Word of God to us. God may indeed say many things to us through creation and through history. The history of revelation even shows that a second word of God, which moves into a certain place in our history, can supersede a first word and reduce it to provisional status. Indeed it may itself remain provisional, seen against the incalculable number of possibilities in which God will encounter us in the course of history. But when the whole of our existence and history is all at once withdrawn from us and struck out by what we call death – when such an all-annihilating 'nay' is heard and this, just this and nothing else, becomes the divine 'yea' – then such a divine Word must necessarily be irrevocable and definitive.

God can doubtless, therefore, say something else to us before this, though not afterwards; even if that 'before' may undoubtedly occur in a still current history and although the definitive death-word of God, which means his victory, has already been uttered in that history. This word has been uttered in the death and resurrection of Jesus. It is definitive because after death no history continues and no new possibilities offer themselves.[11] But it is irrevocable because in death, if it is really taken seriously, only God can offer himself unless nothingness is to engulf us. Jesus was crucified and is risen into the incomprehensible darkness of God. This means that he is the Word of God to us, not simply a word. But if in this Word-for-us God promises himself to us irrevocably, then that Word has a unique relationship to God himself. It is a relationship that is specifically different from the ones that speak through the many words of God within the course of our history, which do not irrevocably promise God himself but simply some gift and task which is provisional in comparison with him.[12] This irrevocable and real Word of God to us [34] (real because it is given with Jesus' redeemed destiny to die) could, abstractly considered, naturally have been

[10] Cf. K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 15-78, esp. IV: 'Die Theologie des Todes und der Auferstehung Jesu', pp. 35-50.
[11] Cf. K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death (Quaestiones Disputatae 2) (2nd ed., London 1969) and the essays in the present volume, 'The Liberty of the Sick, Theologically Considered', and 'The Intermediate State', pp. 100-13 and pp. 114-25 respectively.
[12] For a brief summing up of the author's ideas, see 'God's Self-Communication', Sacramentum Mundi V (New York and London 1970), pp. 353-5 (bibliography).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation uttered in some other person. But in fact it let itself be heard in its primal quality and non-derivability only in Jesus. At the demarcation line of death, all other words fall back on the question of man. But it is only in Jesus and nowhere else that we hear this irrevocable Word of God's blessed promise of himself in the absolute calling in question of death; if all other promises of prophets and sages turn into questions in the face of death; if even the doctrine of the immortality of the soul (which is in itself quite rational) can really only offer the continuance of the subject and the limitless question he represents, but not the comprehensive answer to the question which makes everything else questionable; if all this is so, then an absolute relationship to Jesus is our right and duty, in spite of his impenetrable facticity in the midst of possibilities of thought which remain empty. Unless we want to miss encountering him from the very beginning, then we can only accept him as the absolute Word of God's promise of himself to us, in which God himself is involved, which has a history and does not simply sustain that history as if it were a foundation beyond history.

Unless it is untrue to itself, the simplest experience of faith with Jesus, the crucified and risen One, therefore leads inescapably to statements which in actual fact include an ontological Christology of descent and incarnation, but which also from the very beginning simultaneously include, seriously and effectively, the horizontal Christology of salvation history and fundamental theology.

This modest indication of what we mean by 'new approaches' is by no means intended as a claim that everything has undoubtedly been said in a sufficiently express and clear way, though this is essential and indispensable for new approaches too, if they are really to stand up to examination. These new approaches are based on faith's experience of Jesus, his destiny, his death and his resurrection; and we are convinced that it is only this resurrection (the proof of his destiny's enduring validity before God) which lends his testimony to himself and interpretation of himself in the proclaimed Word as its ultimate meaning and ultimate importance. But this does not mean that the experience of Jesus that is meant here has been achieved or can be bestowed on the basis of the bare fact of the resurrection of just anyone; for this fact is necessarily constituted in part by the self-understanding of Jesus as a specific person, the specific Jesus who has himself interpreted himself through his Word in the life he lived. [35] After all, this resurrection of the Lord is not merely to be understood apologetically as an external verification of his self-testimony. We must see it as the inner, essential element of Jesus' testimony to himself, which can only arrive at complete fulfilment in his history.

A person's basic experience of Jesus and his history as we have indicated it ought perhaps to be clarified by even more explanations of this kind, or by similar ones. Of course we could also describe this basic experience under quite different aspects and against the background of quite different horizons of understanding. What seemed most important first of all in this brief essay was only to show that it is possible to make a statement about the experience of Jesus which is ahead of (or perhaps behind) the ontological Chalcedonian Christology of descent and incarnation. Classical Christology still provides, and will go on providing, the norm for us. But, when all is said and done, it belongs from the very beginning within a much wider field of possible christological statements. It, too, belongs to a system of co-ordinates allowing viewpoints and critical questions which go beyond it, though this does not mean that it can really be superseded. To say this is certainly important and involves many consequences; but in spite of that it is really a matter of course, because even in the New Testament, among the many and varied Christologies there, the statements which led to the classic Christology of Chalcedon do not always provide the foundation and beginning. Moreover, the important thing here was also to stimulate the conviction and insight that those christological statements which derive from the original experience of Jesus, the crucified and risen One, lead to Chalcedonian Christology through an inner correspondence and equivalence. The only presupposition is that both the experience and the statements should be taken seriously and that their claims should be pressed without any rationalistic omissions or trivializations. At the same time, we still do not need to fear that classical Christology will founder in these statements, as something that was merely provisional. Nor, conversely, do we need to suppose that these statements are really no more than an ultimately dispensable preparation for the ancient ones.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It would now be useful, and indeed necessary, to work out more precisely and in more detail this mutual correspondence between a new Christology, deriving from the experience of the Lord in salvation-history, and classical Christology. But that is impossible [36] here.[13] I hope, however, that even the indication of these new approaches has been clear enough for us to discover through it (if we look carefully) the contours of Chalcedonian Christology as well. One observation, however, may give a little extra depth to the subject at this point. It would be pointless to try to see essential, ontological Christology and functional, existential Christology as being from the outset mutually exclusive alternatives, between which we have to choose. Of course when classical Christology talks about hypostasis and person (in the earlier sense of what subsists individually and as a whole, but not in the modern sense of a subjectivity whose liberty has been given it by God), about nature and substance, about unity, unification and difference, it is employing terms and categories which can ultimately be traced to the experience of being in general, but not to an experienced subjectivity and its fulfilment. But wherever existentially ontological terms are drawn on in order to describe the relationship of the human reality of Jesus to God – and that seems absolutely possible – an ontological Christology is really also being pursued. Nor does this necessarily involve falling victim to a rationalistic Christology of the consciousness, which would interpret Jesus merely as a particularly good and devout person. For the terms used here are onto-logical in a radical sense, even more than those which are first derived from some arbitrarily chosen objective being.

In addition, every statement which sees itself as ‘functional’, ‘existential’, ‘actualistic’, etc. (if it is not simply to be merely the senseless self-utterance of the speaker) is inevitably related to something in itself, which even the most functional thing must refer to and speak about as its own reality, in the conviction that it is saying something about it. All christological terms, correctly understood, have ultimately an ontological sense. The essence is recognised by its function. That is why a statement about function is always basically a statement about essence. If we talk in any Christology whatever about the existential relationship of the man Jesus to God as something not arbitrary but unique, understanding by this that this unique relationship to God is of course based again on the act of God for this person, then we are pursuing ontological Christology. If in a similar way we then express the relationship of Jesus to man as being also unique and as being the foundation per se of our salvation, then we again have onto-logical Christology – whether this is the result of deliberate [37] reflection or not. For the terms which are unavoidably used in the process are basically more ontological than the ones which underlie classical Christology, even if they are not derived directly from the being which is ‘onto-logical’ because in spirit and freedom it opens on to the absolute being of God, and this direction constitutes its essence.

In addition, classic terms such as ‘hypostatic union’, for example, can really be made comprehensible only if one explains them by going back to a predicative communication of idioms[*]; and this ultimately also involves going beyond a merely ontic Christology.

Moreover in classical Christology the ‘is’ in statements of communication of idiom such as [13] But see reference in n. 10.

[*] Editor’s note: The term ‘communication of idioms’ (idioms = properties) ‘primarily means that because of the hypostatic union the properties of both natures can and must be predicated of the one Person Jesus Christ’. Cf. Karl Rahner and Herbert Vorgrimler, Concise Theological Dictionary (London 1965), p. 90.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'Jesus is God', 'God is man', does not mean identity between subject and predicate, as it does in our other 'is' statements.[14] It only means a unity and a link. If we held the contrary to be true, we should be denying the 'unmixed' character asserted by the Chalcedonian view and should be holding a heretical opinion. The statement that God is 'in' Jesus at least means neither a heresy nor necessarily a truncation of orthodox Christology, provided only that we are aware that God's being 'in' Jesus, in the sense in which it is meant here, indicates a unique relationship which makes the Lord the unsupersedable Word of God for us, and which involves God himself, bringing him into our history.

We may sum up what we have been saying as follows: We must acknowledge classical Christology and yet see that it is not the only possible one, in the sense that there could be no other orthodox statements of a christological kind. For there are in fact statements which also lead to classical Christology and which protect it better and more effectively from misunderstandings than it can protect itself today simply by means of the history of its interpretation. Indeed the [38] usual interpretation of classical Christology urgently and imperatively needs true deepening and supplementing. So the new approaches today would seem useful above all because the monophysitic misunderstanding of Christology is still a real and indisputable danger, both for believers who misunderstand the Church's dogma, and for unbelievers who presuppose that this misunderstanding of the dogma is the doctrine of the Church, and therefore reject it. But every concept of the incarnation which views Jesus' humanity, either overtly or implicitly, merely as the guise God takes upon himself in order to signalise his speaking presence, is and remains a heresy.[15]

[14] On this subject, cf. the author's controversy with Cardinal Höffner, 'Karl Rahner antwortet Kardinal Höffner', Münchener Katholische Kirchenzeitung 64 (1971), 31 Jan. 1971, pp. 12-13; also 'Über die Gottheit Jesu Christj und über die Unauflöslichkeit der Ehe. Ein Briefwechsel zwischen Joseph Kardinal Höffner/Köln und Professor Dr. Karl Rahner S.J../Münster', Kirche und Leben 26 (Münster 1971), 24 Jan. 1971, p. 6, ET The Month, April 1971, pp. 104-7.

[15] For further development, cf. 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London 1966), pp. 105-20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[39]

5

JESUS CHRIST IN THE NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS

What do we mean precisely and specifically when we say that Jesus Christ is to be found in non-Christian religions as well? That is the question we shall be considering here.[1]

First, it must be said in introducing the subject that we shall be considering the question dogmatically, not in the light of the history or phenomenology of religion. In this matter the Christian dogmatic theologian cannot be a substitute for the religious historian, who works a posteriori. After all, his own sources of faith, which are binding on him, are derived from the Old and New Testaments, and even from the Church's doctrinal explanations, which were based on those Testaments; they have developed without any direct contact with most of the non-Christian religions (though we may perhaps except here the Declaration on the non-Christian religions made by Vatican II). Consequently the material drawn from the history of religion which is germane to our question has not been assimilated in these sources at all. In addition, if these sources do deal with the non-Christian religions at all, even from afar, they do so, for understandable reasons, in a rather dissociating and defensive way. Consequently they are highly unfruitful for our question. A dogmatic [40] theologian has to think a priori here, unlike the religious historian, whose task is to discover Christ as far as possible a posteriori in the non-Christian religions. This means that the dogmatic theologian's reflections can provide only something like a provisional indication for the religious historian, which may perhaps guide and sharpen his seeking glance in a task of which the dogmatic theologian cannot relieve him. The question here is, therefore, simply this: what dogmatic principles and reflections have we to postulate prior to a historical investigation, with regard to the question to be formulated and the probable result, when we are considering whether Christ can be present in the non-Christian religions? Whether the religious historian can then himself fulfil this expectation a posteriori, whether he falls short of it in the facts he discovers, or whether he perhaps goes even further – that must remain an entirely open question here.

There are two presuppositions to be made in answering the dogmatic question which we have narrowed down in this way. First of all, we are presupposing a general supernatural divine will to salvation which is really efficacious in the world.[2] This makes possible a belief in supernatural revelation everywhere, i.e., in the whole length and breadth of human history. This presupposition is also expressly taught by Vatican ll.[3] Vatican II is certainly extremely reserved with regard to the question of how such a redeeming faith in a real divine revelation in the strictest sense can come about outside the sphere of the Old and New Testaments. But this does not forbid the theologian's asking in what way there can be such a universal opportunity of faith; and it cannot, either, really release him from asking a question of this kind. The answer to this question – or at least one possible answer to it – does not really have

[1] The ideas developed here are of course closely connected with what the author has already said under the familiar heading of 'the anonymous Christian' and in connection with a transcendental Christology. Consequently some of the material may well be familiar, though for details the reader should turn to the relevant essays themselves. Cf. 'Observations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian" ', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 280-94, where references to earlier work are also given. Cf. also Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 15-78.

[2] This general will to salvation was emphatically stressed by Vatican II. Cf. Lumen gentium (Church), n. 16; Nostra aetate (non-Christian religions) n. 1; Ad gentes (mission), n. 7.

[3] Cf. n. 2 above, but also the general statements in Gaudium et Spes (the Church in the world), n. 2; 10; 22; etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to be given here but may be presupposed (even if, somewhat in the style of Heb. 11:1-40, it still does not clarify the christological character of redeeming faith of this kind). We may just briefly observe that the elevation by grace of man's 'transcendental nature', with a supernatural formal object (objectum formale) which is thereby given (even if this is not objectified and the object of reflection), already crystallises the concept of a supernatural revelation, [41] and (if accepted freely) the concept of faith, into the question,[4] what historical and objectifying mediation the acceptance of such a supernatural and revelatory elevation really has.

If it is permissible to assume that this question can be positively answered and that it is already more or less clarified, then we really only have to ask whether and how such a redeeming faith in revelation can and must reach out to Christ even outside the sphere of an explicit Christianity; or whether, since this is impossible, it is unnecessary; so that in this respect impossibility and good-will release the non-Christian from the christological character of a faith which is in other respects possible everywhere.

The question also remains whether or not the non-Christian religions as specific historical and social phenomena have a positive importance in the coming into being of such an act of faith, interpreted in either the one way or the other – i.e. christologically or non-christologically. The question whether Christ is present in the non-Christian religions or not must then be answered accordingly.

There is a second presupposition too. When a non-Christian wins salvation through faith, hope and love, the non-Christian religions cannot be thought to have played no part, or only a negative one, in this winning of justification and salvation.[5] This statement does not mean asserting a particular Christian interpretation and evaluation of any specific non-Christian religion. Nor is it a question of putting a religion of this kind on a par with the Christian faith as regards its importance for salvation. It is no denial of its vitiated character or its provisional place in salvation-history. Nor does it deny that any such specific religion may also have a negative influence on the genesis of the salvation event in an individual non-Christian.

But having said this, we must go on to say the following: if a non-Christian religion could have, from the outset, no positive influence at all on the supernatural event of salvation in the individual [42] Christian – or if, from the outset, no such possible influence is conceded to it, then the salvation event in a given individual would be seen in completely non-social and unhistorical terms.[6] But this fundamentally contradicts the historical and social character of Christianity itself. The possibility of private revelations, extraordinary visions (especially at the hour of death) and so forth has certainly been envisaged, in order to bring the divine revelation to the non-Christian who has not been reached by the Christian proclamation. But these are arbitrary and improbable postulates, and one cannot see why they should be permitted to take place only in extraordinary and special cases. And quite apart from that, these expedients contradict the basic character of the Christian revelation and the nature of man. For even in his most personal history man always remains a social being, whose [4] For a more detailed explanation of this idea, cf. K. Rahner, 'The Existential, B. Theological, in Sacramentum Mundi II (New York and London 1967), p. 306; also Existence: II 'The Existential, B. Theological', Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 494-5.

[5] Not only is this notion contradicted by Vatican II's declaration on the relationship between the Church and the non-Christian religions (Nostra aetate); the basic attitude reflected in the declaration is also opposed to any such viewpoint. This basic attitude goes far beyond the declaration itself, and we are attempting to develop some important aspects of it here.

[6] So Vatican II's declaration about religious freedom, Dignitatis humanae, also says (n. 4) that the freedom from compulsion in religious matters which is due to the individual must also be conceded to people who are acting as a group. For the social nature of man, as well as the social nature of religion itself, demands the existence of religious groups.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

innermost decisions are mediated through the specific form of his social and historical life. They do not take place in some special reserve, cut off from the rest from the very outset. In addition, in a theology of salvation history, which takes God's universal will to salvation seriously and remembers the tremendous distance in time between 'Adam' and the Mosaic revelation in the Old Testament, the whole intermediate period between the two points (which even Vatican II's constitution Dei verbum[7] passes over somewhat too quickly) cannot be conceived of as empty of divine revelation. And this cannot simply be cut off per se from the whole history of specific religions. For if one simply imagines the world without all these religions, there is no way of saying at all where God and his history of salvation and revelation can be found in the world.

If we want to bridge this intermediate period by postulating a tradition, a 'primitive revelation',[8] then it must once more be said [43] that a postulate of this kind is highly problematical in view of the immense duration of human history. Above all, only the historical and socially constituted religions can really be considered as being the bearers of such a tradition, which is supposed to reach the individual, for it is these which awaken and keep alive the possibility and obligation of man's relationship to the mystery of existence which challenges him, however particular religions may interpret this primal mystery of existence, and whatever concrete form they may give to man's relationship to it – perhaps even vitiating it in the process.

This would suggest that, even allowing for a universal and efficacious divine will that all men since the fall should be saved (with the concomitant universal possibility of a redeeming faith in revelation), we cannot get along without conceding a positive saving function to the pre-Christian religions, at least in this interim period. There would seem to be no prior reason in principle, therefore, why we should (even if we could) deny the non-Christian religions a similar and at least partially positive function for people who have not yet been reached by the Christian message in a way which is directly binding on them. We do not have to discuss here the specific ways in which a non-Christian religion can have a positive function for the possibility of a real faith in revelation. That may remain an open question.

Having made these assumptions let us now turn to the real question at issue. How can Jesus Christ be understood as being present and efficacious in the non-Christian religions, in the light of Christian dogmatics – which is to say a priori to an a posteriori description drawn up in response to this question? We must first of all state quite openly and soberly that the answer is directly related to the question: how is Jesus Christ present and efficacious in the faith of the individual non-Christian? Other considerations, such as the social and institutional aspects of the non-Christian religions cannot come within our scope, in view of what we pointed out at the beginning, however regrettable this may seem. Anything that may perhaps be said about the presence of Christ in the non-Christian religions apart from his presence in the redeeming faith of the non-Christian, is a matter for the theologians who are concerned with the history of religion, and who work a posteriori.

With the presuppositions and qualifications we have mentioned, Christ is present and efficacious in the non-Christian believer (and therefore in the non-Christian religions) through his Spirit. An [44] assertion of this kind is first of all a matter of course, dogmatically speaking. If the non-Christian can have a redeeming faith and if it is permissible for us to [7] Cf. the dogmatic constitution on divine revelation (Dei verbum), n. 3., where, however, the initial development of revelation is described in somewhat too uniform and unilateral terms.

[8] Cf. here H. Fries, 'Primitive Revelation', in Sacramentum Mundi V (New York and London 1969), 355-8 and 'Primitive Revelation', in Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 1468-71. Also K. Rahner, 'Revelation; B. Theological Interpretation' in Sacramentum Mundi (New York and London 1969), 348-53, and 'Revelation: I B. Theological Interpretation', Encyclopaedia of Theology, pp. 1460-6.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hope that this faith really exists on a wide scale, then such a faith is, of course, made possible and sustained by the supernatural grace of the Holy Spirit.[9] And this is the Spirit who proceeds from the Father and the Son, so that as the Spirit of the eternal Logos he can and must, at least in this sense, be called the Spirit of Christ, the incarnate divine Word.

But although this is a matter of course, dogmatically speaking, the statement we have just made has not yet been really taken in, in its meaning and its justification. For the question is simply whether the Holy Spirit's supernatural grace, which confers faith and justification, can be called the Spirit of Jesus Christ when it is active in the person who has not been baptised; and if so, what this really means. Every Catholic textbook of dogmatics will doubtless give an affirmative answer to the first question, and try to make it comprehensible by declaring that this Spirit which makes faith possible and which justifies is given everywhere and at all times intuitu meritorum Christi;[10] and that it can, therefore, rightly be called the Spirit of Jesus Christ. This statement is initially certainly justified and will also be deemed comprehensible (more or less, at least); and it can, therefore, serve as the starting point for our further reflections. But the statement certainly does not answer all the questions which can be raised here. First of all, the connection between the grace of the Spirit on the one hand (which is given everywhere and at all times) and the historical event of the cross on the other (which constitutes a point in space and time) is not after all as comprehensible and clear in this statement as might appear at first sight. Is (we may ask) the connection between these two realities made only via the knowledge and the will of the [45] God who transcends even salvation-history, so that there is after all no true connection between the two realities themselves? Can the event of the cross be thought of as exerting an influence on God, 'physically' or 'morally'? So that as a result of this influence, which in a certain sense proceeds from the world and has its effect on him (even though it is always foreknown), he has always poured out the Spirit's grace on the world? But if this cannot be said in the real sense, because God in his sovereignty cannot be influenced and is unmoved and unalterable, what does it mean when we say that he gave this Spirit because of Jesus Christ's merits, as the morally meritorious cause of this Spirit? If we say that the statement in question does not link Jesus' sufferings (as God's motivation) with God himself, but with the grace of the Spirit (just as one must say of a prayer of intercession, for example, that it is not the cause of God's decision to hear the prayer, but is the moral cause – with which God freely associates himself – of the reality of God's hearing of prayer), then we must ask what this is really supposed to mean. Especially since this inner-worldly moral cause, which is not supposed to 'influence' God himself, is much later in time than its effect.[11] It might be pointed out that in the case of the second example (intercessory prayer) it would probably not occur to anyone to intercede with God for some reality in the world that had already taken place; although this ought also to have a point if the commonly accepted interpretation of intuitu meritorum makes sense.

We must also add the following to these questionable points. We can and must see God's free will to salvation as the a priori cause (a cause conditioned by nothing outside God himself) of Christ's incarnation and cross as well; so that from this point of view, too, it is not [9] This can already be deduced from the statements of the First Vatican Council's dogmatic constitution Dei Filius (cf. Denz. 3008 and 3009) even though this is principally concerned with the way the Christian arrives at faith.

[10] This expression is to be found in the papal Bull Ineffabilis Deus (cf. Denz. 2803), in a context which can seem surprising at first glance. But the definition of the Immaculate Conception is also important for our question, because this is a matter which must be placed before the historical-categorial saving work of Jesus Christ, although it is related to and founded on that. One might also point to the event of justification, which is always an individual event in each given case (cf. Denz. 1530, etc.), but which cannot come about without express knowledge of the historical appearance of Jesus Christ.

[11] For the author's further ideas on this point, the reader should turn to K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 47-50.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

easy to see how the cross of Christ could be the reason for God's saving will towards other people, if this saving divine will after all precedes the cross of Christ, as its cause and not as its effect, and must then be viewed as being related to all men. For a saving will related solely to Christ would be meaningless from the beginning and would contradict the fact that through the saving will of God Jesus Christ is meant from the very beginning to be the redeemer of the world.

[46] We can only emerge from these difficulties (and others which we have not mentioned) if we see the incarnation and the cross as what scholastic terminology calls the 'final cause' of God's universal self-communication to the world, given with God's saving will, which knows no reason outside itself and which we call the Holy Spirit; and if we view the incarnation and cross in this sense as the cause of the imparting of the Holy Spirit at all times and in all places in the world. This Spirit is always, everywhere, and from the outset the entelechy, the determining principle, of the history of revelation and salvation; and its communication and acceptance, by its very nature, never takes place in a merely abstract, transcendental form. It always comes about through the mediation of history. Consequently this communication is from the beginning directed towards a historical event in which this communication and its acceptance, in spite of their freedom, are irreversible and can be grasped historically even in this triumphant eschatological form. But this comes about in what we call the incarnation, cross and resurrection of the divine Word. Since the universal efficacy of the Spirit is directed from the very beginning to the zenith of its historical mediation, which is the Christ event (or in other words the final cause of the mediation of the Spirit to the world), it can be truly said that this Spirit is everywhere and from the very beginning the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the incarnate divine Logos. The Spirit communicated to the world has itself, as such, an inner relation to Jesus Christ (not merely in the divine intention which transcends the world, which would be external to the Spirit). Jesus is the 'cause' of the Spirit, even if the reverse relationship is equally true, as is the case in unity and difference, and the mutually conditioning relationship between efficacious and final causes. Since the efficacious cause of incarnation and cross (i.e., the Spirit) has its goal within itself, as inner entelechy, and fulfils its own being (as communicated to the world) only in the incarnation and cross, the Spirit is from the outset the Spirit of Jesus Christ. Since this Spirit always and everywhere sustains justifying faith, this faith is from the outset, always and everywhere, a faith that comes into being in the Spirit of Jesus Christ, who is present and efficacious in all faith, through this Spirit of his.

Jesus Christ is always and everywhere present in justifying faith, because this is always and everywhere the seeking memoria of the absolute bringer of salvation, who is by definition the God-man, who [47] arrives at his consummation through death and resurrection.[12] We cannot discuss this statement more exactly in all its aspects here, because that would take us too far. Above all, we cannot go on to explain in more detail that the historical bringer of salvation (who makes God's gift to the world an irreversible event and as such brings it to manifestation) is necessarily the incarnate divine Logos, whose earthly reality is fulfilled through his death and resurrection.[13] Nor can we show the precise connection between the first proposition and the second. The two are of course closely connected; but we shall not go into that in detail here. In the context of what we are considering at present, the only important thing is to clarify to some extent what is meant by the proposition that the seeking memoria of every faith (wherever it comes into being) moves towards the absolute bringer of salvation; though again we cannot consider here the question of how far the goal of this

[12] On the following ideas, which are somewhat sketchily outlined here, cf. J. B. Metz, 'Erinnerung', in HphG. Munich 1973. Here memoria is considered in more detail, especially in its more comprehensive function.
[13] In this connection let me remind the reader of the remarks at the beginning of this essay.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

seeking memoria has to be explicit, or whether it need only be implicit. (Indeed we do not even have to differentiate according to whether the sense of faith is meant collectively or individually.) When we talk about memoria, this concept seems from the beginning to contrast with the special character which we ascribe to it when we say that memoria 'seeks'. In the common interpretation of the word, memoria always seems to be related only to what has already been discovered in the past. It does not apply to something which has still to come, generally or for the individual – something which still has to be found, and is therefore still to be sought for. But if we think of Plato's doctrine of anamnesis,[14] or Augustine's doctrine of memoria (though we cannot go into these here), we see immediately that the matter is not so simple. This is indicated, ultimately, by the whole problem about, the relationship between transcendence and history, and between the a priori and a posteriori nature of knowledge. Man can only find and retain what he encounters in history if there is an a priori principle of expectation, seeking and hope in man's finding and retaining subjectivity. And – following a tradition that [48] can be traced through the whole history of Western thought – we may call this principle memoria.

Memoria in this sense must not be understood as if it were the mere capacity for receiving everything and everyone. It is not the simple, empty space into which the chances of history indiscriminately and arbitrarily gather everything which may have happened. Memoria has itself a priori structures, which certainly do not simply anticipate what is free and unexpected in history, but which first of all offer possibilities of perceiving something in this history, of distinguishing it and of assigning it a certain place. Memoria is the a priori possibility of historical experience as such (as distinct from the a priori conditions for the possibility of the a posteriori knowledge of things, which we find in the natural sciences). This general doctrine of memoria can of course only be touched on here.

The really important thing is the following: memoria is (or is also – or is indeed above all) the anticipation of the absolute bringer of salvation. It seeks him and is on the watch for him in history (though it leaves open the possibility of formal experience and consequently suffers history without anticipating it in its specific form). In his transcendental nature as spirit and liberty, man always experiences his dependency on the incomprehensible mystery which we call God.[15] He experiences in himself the hope that this dependency is so radical that it will find its fulfilment in the direct self-communication of God, and will be freed, given radical form and sustained by supernatural grace; though this is not a hope he can claim by right. But this transcendental nature of man's to which grace gives radical form is always a matter for reflection, at least at the beginning, and is freely accepted or rejected. Consequently it is communicated through historical experience; for it is through the content of historical experience that man becomes conscious of his own transcendental nature.

This historical experience which mediates his own transcendental nature, elevated by grace, can certainly be of the most varied kind. It does not even always and everywhere necessarily have to be religious, as long as it mediates man to himself as the one who disposes freely over himself, as an individual and a whole. But as history (which is not merely an amorphous mass of things, lying side by side [49] in space or time) it has a structure in which all its individual aspects have their particular place in space and time, and do not all have the same significance. The seeking anticipation of this structure belongs to the nature of this memoria. History is a history of freedom, and freedom is not simply the capacity continually to make new, arbitrary choices; it is the capacity to decide for what is ultimate and final.[16] Consequently those decisions belong to the structure of history [14] Cf. here C. Huber, 'Anamnesis bei Plato', Pullacher Philosophische Forschungen VI (Munich 1964).

[15] The author has already repeatedly discussed this experience under different aspects, cf. 'The Experience of God Today', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 149-65.
[16] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Freedom; III Theological' in Sacramentum Mundi II (New York and London 1968), 361-2,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

expectantly anticipated by memoria, through which history is brought, partly or wholly, to freely realised finality from the open plurality of indifferent (or equally valid) potentialities. If we once presuppose that in still continuing history the finality that has to be achieved in history can as a whole arrive at all at historical manifestation and tangibility, and that this does not simply have to be identical with the abolition of history in general, then we can say that the memoria of man's transcendental nature, raised by grace, seeks hopefully and in anticipation for that event in history in which the free decision for a saving end of all history is made and is within our grasp; and where this decision is made in the light of the liberty of God and man alike, and for the one history of mankind as a whole. This event, which is sought for and expected by memoria in this way, is what we call the absolute bringer of salvation.[17] This is the anticipation of memoria which is present with every faith.

It is, of course, another question (a question which can ultimately be answered only a posteriori, by the history of religion) whether and how far, how explicitly or how implicitly, in mythology or history, this anticipation of the absolute bringer of salvation by the memoria of faith is demonstrable. As we have already said, at this point the dogmatic theologian must pass the question on to the religious historian and to Christian interpretation of that history of religion.[18] Here it seems to me ultimately a secondary question, dogmatically [50] speaking, whether the seeking expectation is objectified in myths about a saviour, or whether it is projected on to historical figures to whom the character of saviour is ascribed – whether the saviour be provisional or final. From his own presuppositions, the dogmatic theologian can say only that religious history must be asked in kindly but precise terms whether saviour figures of this kind are to be found in it, and how. He will say that from the dogmatic point of view there is no reason to exclude such discoveries from the outset, or to write them off contemptuously, as if they stood in such contrast to faith in Jesus, as the eschatological, unsupersedable saviour, that they can only be judged negatively. Saviour figures in the history of religion can certainly also be viewed as signs that – since man is always and everywhere moved by the Spirit – he gazes in anticipation towards that event in which his absolute hope becomes historically irreversible and is manifested as such.

With these two theses about the presence of Jesus Christ in justifying faith (which is made possible everywhere by God's grace and, consequently, is possible in the non-Christian religions, too) we have of course no intention of saying that in view of these theses all aspects and 'Freedom: II. Theological' in Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 544-5.

---

[17] Cf. the account of transcendental Christology in its basic features in '13. Lehrsatz' in K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 21-4.

[18] The division of labour between the dogmatic theologian and the religious historian which is described here must not of course be misunderstood: there is no suggestion that we should draw back from the scientific treatment of the positive material of systematic and dogmatic theology, as if the end of positive theology were even being heralded. The point at issue is rather the attitude of the Christian dogmatic theologian towards positive facts about the non-Christian religions. In any case, the proposed attempt is only to be understood as one possibility among others.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of the one presence and efficaciousness of Jesus Christ can be seen and expressed in the faith of the non-Christian, and of non-Christian religions. Perhaps one might even have the impression that everything that has been said about our question is a matter of course anyway. But it seems to me, first of all, that simply from the standpoint of Christian doctrine we cannot easily go further than this answer to the question we have raised. It appears to me that the main task here has to be performed by the religious historian, who interprets history in Christian terms. If this interpretation were carried out more clearly and precisely, it could well be that this a posteriori religious history of the presence of Jesus Christ in all religions would draw the dogmatic theologian's attention to implications in his own doctrine of that presence which he had hitherto overlooked.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[51]

PART TWO

Man in the Spirit

[53]

6

THE THEOLOGICAL DIMENSION OF THE QUESTION ABOUT MAN

The subject which we are going to be discussing in the following pages – the theological dimension of the question about man – might also be put differently: we might call it the theological dimension of anthropology. But from what aspect can we begin to deal with a subject of this kind? Let us first of all define our points of departure by means of a few preliminary remarks which are essential – or at least useful – both for our understanding of what follows, and for our method of approach.

POINTS OF DEPARTURE

If we are to talk about the theological dimension of the question about man (or anthropology), then this presupposes that there really is something like an anthropology – a question about man that can be asked with some prospect of an answer.[1] This premise is by no means a matter of course.

Of course there is a whole series of sciences which tell us something about man, and whose statements we may here assume to be correct. But to say this is by no means to declare that the question about man is a possible one, or one that makes sense as such. It might very well be said with some justice that the human sciences (i.e., the sciences dealing with man) as well as contemporary criticism of 'humanisms' in our present culture are seemingly bringing man to the point of [54] dissolution. Today human sciences, whether ethnology (Levi-Strauss), sociology, social psychology or depth psychology, are displaying the tendency so to formalise everything about man, and to trace it back to abstract structures that the actual, specific person, as someone who is always unique and bestowed on himself, is disappearing. Modern philosophical anthropology tends to suggest that the interpretation of man as animal rationale has a merely limited character and is purely Western; while in structuralism it allows man as subject to disappear altogether. Modern criticism of the different 'humanisms' and different patterns of culture call in question both the ideal of the honnête homme (which belongs to the tradition of the Enlightenment) and the tragic humanism of the existentialist pattern, as well as Marxist humanism of the Promethean type. They want to make man so sceptical and so bare a figure that he knows that he is poised 'over nothingness', as Augstein's book puts it.[2]

---

[1] For a concise survey of theological anthropology (with bibliography), cf. Sacramentum Mundi: An Encyclopaedia of Theology III (London 1969), art. 'Anthropology (theological)', pp. 365-70. For a more comprehensive account cf. K. Fischer, Der Mensch als Geheimnis – Die Anthropologie Karl Rahners (Freiburg 1974); also K. Rahner's letter on the subject, ibid., pp. 400-10.

[2] Cf. R. Augstein, Jesus Menschensohn. Gütersloh 1972; also the present author's discussion of the book, Das

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The presupposition that there is such a thing as anthropology is therefore not as self-evident as our theme would at first seem to suggest. We shall, therefore, at least implicitly, have to consider at the same time why and how there really is something for which we seek to find a theological dimension.

Another preliminary remark which has to be made is this: if in our reflections we seem to be considering methods rather than content, at least at first sight, this is no cause for criticism. For on the one hand we have to answer the question: where precisely the question about man (which has inevitably to be asked and re-asked) definitely offers a point of contact for a theological enquiry. That is to say, it is a methodological question that has to be put. And on the other hand it is a matter of course that we cannot present a full Christian anthropology here.

There is yet another, third, preliminary point. I do not believe that what I have to say is peculiar to any one Church, or that it cannot equally well be said to Protestant and Catholic teachers of religion, and to other teachers as well.[3] Perhaps I am deceiving myself, and [55] am too little consciously aware of my own theological background. But if my remarks should seem to be too rational and philosophical, and too little based on the Scriptures, perhaps I may ask you to consider the following.

We cannot confront the people we have to do with today with the Scriptures, assuming, simply and from the very outset, that these have formal authority as the Word of God. What the Bible says, what it tells us about ourselves, what the truly central thing is in this statement and promise about us men and women must convince us through its inner truth. This is what must convince us of the authority of Scripture. But it is just this unique content of Scripture which, if we are to put it clearly and succinctly, can also be expressed even without a directly biblical method of exegesis and theology. And it is this, and the preliminary reflections that are required for it, which are what we have been and are still engaged in here.

QUESTIONING MAN

There is no need for a lengthy exposition of the proposition that the question about the theological dimension in anthropology is a fundamental one.

Today above all, the Christian proclamation must appeal to a person who is concerned about himself. This fundamental concern of man with himself does not have to be suspected of being un-Christian from the outset; for after all, Christianity sees itself as a message about man's salvation. If we really come down to fundamentals, a theocentric theology (which we must always have) is not opposed to what one might call an anthropocentric theology.[4]

For the whole point of the message of Christianity is that God, in his own unrelated sovereignty and glory, can be the content and centre of human existence, and in the liberty of his grace actually desires to be so. We, therefore, by no means have to do with a God who 'really' has nothing to do with us. So theocentricism, rightly understood, is, therefore, transformed into anthropocentricism through the grace which God himself communicates. And conversely [56] man can find himself only when he gives himself up in adoration and

---

Christentum – ein explosiver Irrtum? in R. Pesch and G. Stachel (eds), Augsteins Jesus (Zürich 1972), pp. 40-9.

[3] The present essay was originally a lecture delivered on 9 Sept. 1972, in Dortmund, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the 'Religiöse Schulwochenarbeit' in Westphalia. It was published in Donauwörth the same year, under the same title as our present essay.

[4] Here and for what follows, cf. 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 231-49. It should be noted that this essay develops ideas drawn from spiritual theology, on the possibility of the veneration of the saints; cf. ibid., p. 231, n. 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

love into the free incomprehensibility of God, i.e. when he himself transforms his anthropocentricism into theocentricism. An anthropocentric question, as it is put to us here, therefore, has no need to by-pass the essence of Christianity. It is no contradiction of Christianity's essence when we view this anthropocentric question as being a fundamental one and – if one may so put it – enter unabashed and quite 'naïvely' into the fundamental interest which man has in himself, in order to try to understand what God and Christianity mean from that standpoint.

If we are to discuss the theological dimension of the question about man – the theological dimension of anthropology – then we must immediately register a fundamental reservation with regard to this formulation of the subject.

We can certainly talk initially about different dimensions of the question about man, or anthropology. That seems obvious enough, if only because on the one hand there are a number of different human sciences, while on the other these human sciences (today at least) do not see themselves as mere handmaids of a metaphysical anthropology – a philosophy which is recognised as the sole spokesman of man as such. Nor do they recognise a clear relationship of super-ordination and sub-ordination among themselves, even though each of these empirical human sciences tends to set itself up, by a process of extrapolation, as the sole and universal one.

The actual and insurmountable pluralism of the human sciences is enough to show that man is a being with many dimensions, and that these dimensions cannot adequately be traced back to one another, or to a single systematic starting point, which could be arrived at by means of scientific and empirical reflection.[5] So it seems at first a matter of course, or at least harmless, for us to talk about a theological dimension too, in the question about man (or anthropology), and in man himself.

It cannot be denied that, whenever a Christian anthropology based on revelation allows the validity of the other human sciences as at [57] least partial and limited anthropologies, it often puts itself too naïvely and innocently on the same level with these other sciences, as if it were just another of the same kind. At the most, it cherishes the conviction that in this group of human sciences it has the most important and ultimately decisive thing to say about man.

This self-understanding on theological anthropology's part is a limited interpretation of its own role. It is essentially encouraged by the fact that, although theological anthropology sees itself as founded on revelation, it views this revelation as one individual, particular source of knowledge alongside others belonging to secular empiricism and the philosophy of man. From this standpoint it seems to it a matter of course that it – theological anthropology itself – should assert particular facts about man which can be known only through its own source of knowledge and which differ from what the secular human sciences have to say.

But it is not really as simple as this. Christian anthropology, if it interprets itself properly, is not one 'limited' human science among others, differing from these others simply through its source and perhaps also because what it says is more important.

In justifying this assertion, we shall dispense (for reasons of brevity) with a consideration of the exact character of theological talk about man, compared with the kind of statements made by the secular human sciences.[6] Nor shall we consider what precisely theological anthropology says about man, and whether what it says can simply be added to the statements

[5] On pluralism in science and theology, and on theology's relationship to the multifarious sciences, cf. the following essays in Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975): 'Possible Courses for the Theology of the Future', pp. 32-60; 'Theology as engaged in an Interdisciplinary Dialogue with the Sciences', pp. 80-93; 'On the Relationship between Theology and the Contemporary Sciences', pp. 94-102.

[6] On the question of the importance of the human sciences for theology, cf. the essays cited in n. 5; also 'Reflections on Methodology in Theology' and 'The Future of Theology', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 68-114 and 137-48.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of the secular anthropologies. For it could well be that a consideration of what theological anthropology has to say will itself make its comprehensive character clear, and will make it evident that (as we shall see later) theological anthropology does not just add something new (even if it is something of the greatest importance) to the statements of the secular anthropologies. It actually bursts these secular anthropologies radically apart, thereby making access possible, for the first time and finally, to the one mystery which we call God.[7]

[58] In justification of this proposition, we shall first say only one thing here. If we understand a theological anthropology as one limited anthropology among others, parallel to the secular, empirical anthropologies and perhaps (if these are still prepared to put up with such a thing today) parallel to a metaphysical anthropology, we are making this theological anthropology unconvincing for people today – something into which they cannot enter at all. For this inevitably means presupposing a kind of divine revelation which the modern man or woman does not find (or no longer finds) in the realm of his own experience.

A particular factor called God, who makes himself felt as one reality among others but who influences these others, so creating a present which is cut off from other realities in our world of inner or external experience – this simply does not exist. Or at least a factor of this kind is merely the notion, reduced to a number of categories, of what is really meant by God.[8]

We cannot substantiate this proposition any further here. We can only support it by appealing to the feeling about life shared by contemporary men and women. The proposition is not denied by the Christian conviction that God and the world are not identical; we must be clear about this once and for all. For the non-identity in itself, and our recognition of it, still do not make God one special, individual reality, parallel to the realities of the world. It means a difference of a completely unique kind; and to state and bring out this difference truly is one of the most difficult tasks of a Christian theology. It is a task which we cannot, of course, follow up here and now as a separate theme.

If we presuppose this interpretation of the relationship between God and the world, then it is also clear that a revelatory self-manifestation of God in the ultimate resort cannot be thought of only as a particular event in time and space, within the world and its history. We can also no doubt understand without more ado that an interpretation of revelation as being initially and solely historical is opposed to modern mentality, which thinks 'regionally'.[9]

[59] Such a proviso with regard to a common understanding of revelation naturally does not mean a denial that a revelation which (being God's self-communication) already takes place in the most fundamental structures of the world and the spirit, and always constitutes their radical depth, takes objective form; and that it necessarily arrives at objective reflection in what we describe in Christian terms and in our usual vocabulary as revelation. Nor do we deny that the original essence of revelation really has a 'limited' and particular history.

---

[7] On the possible part to be played by a metaphysical anthropology in the eyes of the theologian, cf. 'The Current Relationship of Philosophy and Theology', Theological Investigations XII (London 1975), pp. 61-79.

[8] We have frequently discussed the modern question about God and the possibility of talking about God today, cf. especially 'The Experience of God Today', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 149-65. P. Weβ attempts to discuss this point in Wie von Gott sprechen? Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Karl Rahner (Graz 1970).

[9] At the same time this observation is not simply intended to mean that history is always arid solely a science restricted to a particular area. We cannot consider the problem of history in detail here. We have also discussed it in connection with the question of the development of doctrine; cf. K. Rahner and K. Lehmann 'Geschichtlichkeit der Vermittlung' in MySal I, 2nd edn (Zurich 1975), pp. 527-91. For an initial survey, cf. the relevant articles in Sacramentum Mundi III (New York and London, 1969); A. Darlap and J. Splett, 'History and Historicity', 31-9; P. Hünermann, 'Philosophy of History', 39-43; W. Kasper, 'Theology of History', 43-47; see also A. Darlap, 'Faith and History' in Sacramentum Mundi II, 326-9. These articles may also be found in Encyclopaedia of Theology: A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975) under the following titles: 'History and Historicity', pp. 618-27; 'Philosophy of History', pp. 627-32; 'Theology of History', pp. 632-5; and 'Faith and History', pp. 514-18.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The basic point at issue in these suggestions is this. If we regard theological anthropology simply as a 'limited' anthropology, even though furnished with new, factual content, but numbered among the other anthropologies, with which it is then bound (necessarily and inevitably) to exist in a situation of confrontation, competition and conflict, then we should inevitably be presupposing a concept of God and revelation which would be deeply opposed, at least, to contemporary mentality. We must remember this when in our reflections we talk about the theological dimension of the question about man (or anthropology), and ultimately the theological dimension of man himself. There cannot really be a special theological dimension of this kind within a pluralism of other empirical secular dimensions.

MAN'S EXPERIENCE OF GOD

But then what can talking about a theological dimension possibly mean? In the first place the problems associated with discourse of this kind leave one fact unconsidered: the fact that the Christian and Christian theology are convinced that the reality which we call 'God' [60] exists; that there is a quite particular relationship between man and God; and that consequently statements can and must be made about man which include the word 'God'.
How to reconcile this Christian conviction about a theological anthropology with the rejection of a particularist and 'limited' theological anthropology, of course, depends ultimately on a more precise, and really primary, understanding of the relationship between God and man. If we really come down to it, therefore, it depends on the answer to the question: can a place be found in man's self-understanding for the experience of God which will allow this relationship and this God himself to become after all more than a particular individual fact? For that would mean that theological anthropology itself would become a limited human science, and we should then today be bound to have the impression that its earlier object had long since become secularised and had been taken over by the secular human sciences.

We originally asked: 'where is the theological dimension in the question about man – a question which has other dimensions as well?' In order to progress more rapidly in what we are trying to say, let us now ask instead: 'How and why can and must all questions about man (irrespective of the legitimacy of all provisional anthropological questions) be given so radical a form, and be pinned down so firmly to that form that they themselves all turn into the one theological question which by itself offers the answer for man's free affirmation of faith?'

Perhaps this re-formulation still does not make the question itself properly comprehensible. It will, or would, probably become more or less clear only through its answer. But I hope that it is already evident now that this re-formulation takes us, at least methodologically, out of the predicament we talked about. What we are seeking now is not a reality parallel to the human realities with which the secular human sciences are concerned. It is the radical form of these human realities themselves. The theological dimension of the question about man is identical with all the dimensions of man which the secular anthropologies contemplate, provided only that these dimensions are seen and accepted in their whole radical depth and are consciously considered as such, becoming a theme of their own.

This thematisation of the question about man in its ultimate, radical form – the question which is ultimately man himself and which he does not arbitrarily ask or cease to ask – is not a limited or an [61] additional anthropology, if only because this radical form of the question is nothing other than man's initiation into the incomprehensible mystery which we call 'God'. So that all statements made by a theological anthropology can be read as – and are only correct if they are read as – warnings not to stop in an anthropological statement at any point

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

short of the one where these statements in an apophatic anthropology are dropped into the incomprehensibility of God.[10] Theological anthropology is only truly anthropological when it really sees itself as theology and loses itself in that. But theology is theology only when it becomes the acknowledgment of God's incomprehensibility, before which we can only fall dumb in adoration; before which and towards which we exist, whether we wish to or no; being able only to choose whether to accept this exposure to the mystery per se, entering into it in believing liberty, or whether to repress it sceptically.

Really this understanding of a theological anthropology is a matter of course for a Christian theology, if we start from the fundamental facts of such a theology.

What else could a Christian theology of revelation say about man (if it is not to be made superfluous by the secular anthropologies) except to assert the free relationship of God to man, which cannot exist in a finite reality different from God (and hence a reality explorable by man himself) but which has to be identical with God himself, if we are to be able to think of it as the first and last and unsupersedable object of divine revelation?

But how would God really be understood as God if he were thought of, not as the incomprehensible mystery, which cannot be carried over into the system of co-ordinates of our intellectually penetrating and dominating understanding as one, individual reality, but as if he exists as the incomprehensible ground of an understanding that comprehends everything? An understanding which is always and everywhere already present, sustaining and revealing, at the point where man begins to set up the system of co-ordinates of his understanding of things, where he begins to assert things in science and, [62] in a continual process, increasingly to perfect them or to call them increasingly in question.

But if man is comprehensible theologically only in his dependence on God, and if apart from this relationship (of course with all its presuppositions, implications and consequences) nothing more can be said theologically about man at all;[11] and if this means that God is truly taken seriously as God – i.e. is accepted as the eternally incomprehensible mystery – then the interpretation of a theological anthropology we have proposed is really a matter of course.

But it must be taken seriously. It must not finally disappear again after all, behind the multiplicity of theology's anthropological statements, which are put forward as if they were additions that can simply be made on top of the statements of the secular anthropologies. For to do this is ultimately to misunderstand them.

We should have to examine all the statements of a Christian theological anthropology one by one, showing in each case that every assertion is the radical, critical form of a secular anthropological statement, in which this secular statement is broken up and cast into its own incomprehensibility. In the incomprehensibility of the statement the incomprehensibility of God comes to be experienced, and every secular statement of this kind is forbidden, as if in a court of law, to interpret itself as final, as wholly understood, or as the basis of an absolutely unequivocal self-manipulation on man's part.[12]

When the individual secular anthropological statements are given this radical form, so that they enter into the mystery of God, these statements are set in a certain relationship to one another. It is a relationship which forbids every individual secular anthropology to see itself

[10] The present author's recent reflections here may be found in Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979): cf. 'The Hiddenness of God', pp. 227-43, and 'An Investigation of the Incomprehensibility of God in St Thomas Aquinas', pp. 244-54.

[11] Cf. 'Man (Anthropology): Theological' in Sacramentum Mundi III (New York and London 1969), 365-70, with extensive bibliography; also Encyclopaedia of Theology: A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975) 'Man (Anthropology): III. Theological', pp. 887-93.

[12] This of course also applies to statements about man as such. In fact it applies to these especially, because their relative nature allows man's dependency on God to find expression.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as self-sufficient, and as the mistress of all other secular anthropologies, capable of bringing man as a whole under control in the light of this particular, individual point of departure.

The nature of theological anthropology as the apophatic, radical form of secular anthropology will perhaps be most easily grasped by the average Christian mind if we try to see the dialectical relationship [63] of the various theological statements to one another. We then see clearly that there is no theological anthropology which could really be seen as a system in the true sense, i.e., as a complex of statements which could be built up from any other axiom except this: that man is the being who loses himself in the incomprehensibility of God and can accept this as his innermost salvation without being identical with it. But it is precisely this single fundamental axiom of a theological anthropology which prohibits a real anthropological system.

This emerges, however, as we have already said, in the definitive dialectic in which the individual statements of theological anthropology are related to one another. It is this which causes the lack of system (even to the point of seeming contradiction) and the obscurity of a theological anthropology.

For this Christian anthropology, therefore, man is a being of temporal and spatial history, even to the point where his salvation is concerned, which is to say always and everywhere. And yet he is not totally absorbed by space and time. He is the subject of a liberty that is unique in each case. And yet in that liberty he is a person who lives in a collective history of salvation and is also as such partly determined by it in his individual, unique history of freedom, which he cannot transfer to anyone else. For Christian anthropology, man is essentially the historical being for whom divine revelation and salvation are encountered through his specific history. At the same time he is the being who is always already endowed by what we call the Holy Spirit of grace with the saving reality of God himself, as offer made to his liberty, which can be realised in all history. He is always the sinner who cannot justify himself before God and who is yet surrounded by God's self-communicating love, so that he really always already stands beyond death's demarcation line, which distinguishes God from finite creation.[13]

One could go on for a long time making statements of this kind about theological anthropology. The dialectical relationship in which the statements stand always points beyond these statements themselves into the mystery of God, which cannot be reduced to a system; [64] and without this self-transcendence the statements would neither be true nor theological.

If we could analyse the meaning of these individual statements of theological anthropology more closely, it would emerge that they are really only the radical form of secular anthropological statements. And it would, of course, also be possible to do the same thing in the reverse direction: what are apparently merely secular anthropological statements prove to be secretly theological assertions, if they are only taken seriously in the radical form which is implicit in them.

Thus it could be shown, for example – and shown in both directions – that what we call faith, even in the strictly Christian meaning of the term, is nothing other than the freely accepted, radical form of man's rational nature. The provision is only that this faith should really be understood as being sustained and empowered by the transcendental nature of this very rationality, in which the latter is merged into the incomprehensible mystery we call 'God' with which we inevitably have to do in this experience of our transcendental nature, [13] We have followed up the dialectic of statements like these in a number of essays, trying to bring out differences and contrasts, without falsely trying to relate them or – something that would be equally false – to divide them. This seems to have been overlooked by some critics. Essay titles in all the volumes of Theological Investigations point to this dialectic, which not infrequently provided the starting point for the treatment of a particular question.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whether we consciously define that dependency or not.[14] So it might be shown that the experience of human liberty and responsibility, without which man cannot live, ultimately has its foundation of reconciliation towards all inexorable necessities, absurdities and futilities only if this freedom from a responsibility which cannot be transferred and is yet in need of redemption knows itself to be safely cherished in the forgiving and self-communicating mystery which gives itself as eternal peace in all – but also beyond all – irreconcilabilities and contradictions in man's history of freedom. The doctrine of the incarnation of the divine Logos and his act of reconciliation on the cross is the radical form of the conviction that even man's most radical subjectivity is realised historically; and that it again reaches its final form only when it also takes tangible and irrevocable form in historical happening.[15] The doctrine of the Church merely gives radical form to the doctrine of the social nature of man, and allows this [65] social nature to have continuing importance even in the history of man's most personal uniqueness.[16]

One might go on in this way and see all theological statements about anthropology as the radical form of secular anthropology, which forbids these seemingly merely secular statements to take themselves absolutely seriously and also enjoins them, as individual disciplines, not to set themselves up in such absolute terms that a system is built up which allows man to rule over himself in what is ultimately a cynical way, since it means that he sees himself as being transparently futile and null.

THE LOSS OF REVELATION

When we say that Christian anthropology is 'only' the radical form of secular anthropology, in our sense of the phrase, then the Christian has no need to fear that this statement means the dissolution of a theological anthropology based on revelation and its transformation into a secular anthropology based on rationalism and science, or into a mere secular humanism.

For to give radical form to all the dimensions of anthropology and of man himself means recognising that man is not comprehensible simply in himself alone; but that the experience of his own incomprehensibility and the incomprehensibility of the world and, as part of that, the incomprehensibility of experience means what we call 'God'.[17]

If we give anthropology this radical form, man is to be understood as the being who – at least in the form of the offer made to his freedom – is always and everywhere inescapably endowed with God's self-communication – the Holy Spirit of grace. It is in this that he already experiences the fundamental event of what we call Christian revelation. To see revelation in this way as fundamentally taking place in God's self-communication does not contradict the traditional concept of revelation. For it is a matter of course that this grace which communicates God and so reveals him, which always comes into being in man's transcendental dependency on God (which it elevates) [66] can – and indeed must – for man become a self-given fact which he reflects upon only in the context of mankind's history. It is in history, wherever this reflection authentically takes place, arriving at its zenith in Christ, [14] The author already developed these ideas in detail before the war in his well-known book on the foundations of a philosophy of religion, Hearers of the Word (London 1969). Later an attempt was made to carry the ideas further in reflections on man's freedom and responsibility.

[15] For the basic principles of the author's attempt at a 'transcendental Christology', cf. K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch – Arbeitsgrundlagen für eine interdisziplinäre Vorlesung (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 15-78.

[16] For the author's ideas on 'the Church', cf. the essays gathered together under the heading of 'ecclesiology' in Theological Investigations X (London 1973).

[17] Cf. 'Experience of Self and Experience of God', Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975), pp. 122-32.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that we can talk about Christian revelation in the traditional sense of the word.

After all, man in his innermost nature is a historical being, and consequently the radical form of the dimensions of his being, which are merged by the grace of God into the history of God himself, also means that his history takes on the radical form of salvation-history. For it is precisely that which is the history of man's free acceptance of the transcendental gift of grace, which leads him into the incomprehensibility of God himself.

If we consider these three facts, then it is impossible to say that the radical form of the secular dimensions of man which are open to experience cannot lead to his supernatural destiny, to theology, and to a real theological anthropology. Grace simply means giving radical form to man's being. It is not a new, additional storey planted on top of what is really a self-contained sub-structure known as the nature of man.[18] Consequently a secular anthropology in its radical form is already theological anthropology. Of course this is not based primarily on the arbitrary private reflections of the single and non-historical individual. It develops in the event which we call the history of mankind, which is ultimately the history of man's being as it is in grace. It is not simply some merely static being, lingering behind and beneath history.

What we have tried to indicate up to now are really only hints about the direction in which secular and theological anthropology must move if they are to discover their unity (which does not mean [67] uniformity), and if they are to ensure that a theological anthropology is not seen as something supplementary to the secular anthropologies. It must be seen as their innermost centre, which has found itself, and in this conscious reflection gives man a task of his own once more: the task of an explicit religion.

INSIGHTS AND PROCLAMATION

But even if we grasp these ideas and believe that they are correct, what do they mean for the proclamation of the Christian message today?

First of all they allow orthodox Christian teaching to start unabashedly with man, with his experience of himself, with his existence. And – understood correctly – they allow us to end with man, too. Today this ought not (or ought not any more, at least) to give the impression that things about man which are additional to his own experience and indeed are quite simply beyond what he experiences in his own existence are to be taught. The Christian message which is to be conveyed to men and women does not mean conveying something alien and external. It means awakening and interpreting the innermost things in man, the ultimate depths of his existence's dimensions.

We certainly must not presuppose that man in all the dimensions of his existence is no more profound than he appears to be in the shallowest head and the most superficial heart. We must certainly not expect that the interpretation of his own existence which gives it its most radical and objective form will be actually understood by a process of reflection and accepted by every individual, in every phase of life. Even the most objectively correct and the [18] Cf. 'Grace: Theological' in Sacramentum Mundi II (New York and London 1969), 412-22, with extensive bibliography; also Encyclopaedia of Theology: A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), 'Grace: II. Theological', pp. 587- 94. B. van der Heijden takes the present author's earlier essay De gratia for the starting point of his account in Karl Rahner – Darstellung und Kritik seiner Grundpositionen (Einsiedeln 1973). This is not the place to discuss this, but a historical comment on the essay De gratia may put some of van der Heijden's comments in a different light. As p. 3 shows, he evidently knew only the fifth edition of 1959-60, not the third. For reasons of space the foreword to the earlier editions had to be left out. But this shows that the essay was written in 1937-8 under the pressure of difficult circumstances, while much of it is indebted to H. Lange, De gratia (Freiburg 1929); cf. also and especially the preface to the third edition of 1951.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

subjectively most human proclamation will often fall on deaf ears because of the private and collective situation of the listeners; and this is a difficulty which is often practically unsurmountable. But all this does not affect the right and the duty to present the Christian message in such a way that it is really nothing other than the interpretative call of the reality which is experienced and present in the listener himself, even if it is not understood.

This is not intended to be the propagation of a shallow humanism or a secularization of religion;[19] because in asserting this we are after [68] all convinced – and have to be convinced, if we want to be Christians – that what is preached from the outside has been present as a reality in every man and woman, long before our preaching, in the form which we call the Holy Spirit. It is present at least in the sense of being an offer made to man's liberty. We are convinced, too, that the historical content of our message is simply this: that in Jesus we have the firm historical and revealed assurance that this inner endowment with the Spirit conferred on man's existence is and remains, finally and victoriously, the innermost entelechy or determining principle of mankind's history.

If in the actual history of theology in all denominations this approach by way of man's own understanding of himself has often failed to lead to an orthodox theology, or to a theology whose content is sufficiently differentiated, this is not because starting from man's experience of himself was basically wrong or inadequate, or was bound to stick fast in a rationalistic humanism or horizontalism. It is because this approach is not carried through radically and courageously enough. Moreover, individual efforts in that direction do not sufficiently take their bearings from the way this approach has been carried out in the past – for it has always existed, if we take the history of Christianity and the Church as whole. [20]

Today more than ever, it is impossible simply to begin with the formal authority of Scripture or the doctrinal authority of the Church, if only because, when all is said and done, even the acknowledgement of this authority as source or norm of a Christian theological anthropology also needs a reason and justification. But this legitimation is ultimately simply dependent on man's recognition that the essence of his own existence comes to meet him clearly and convincingly through the agency and authority of Scripture and Church – something which he has always already experienced but which he cannot by himself clearly enough objectify through the processes of reflection, and from which even his own liberty recoils because of the uncanny mystery with which it is faced.

If this means that we are maintaining the thesis that the theological dimension of the question about man is nothing more than the radical depth of all other, seemingly merely secular dimensions of anthropology, [69] we may and should start from just that proposition, without fear of being unorthodox.

It is undoubtedly possible to arrive at the Christian faith by way of the Jesus of history, the sole proviso being that we do not distort the Jesus of history through an abbreviated presentation of him; and that we do not interpret the Christ of faith monophysitically, either openly or in a concealed but implicit way, regarding this misinterpretation as being the very height of orthodoxy.[21] In the same way, even a seemingly secular anthropology leads to a theological one, always providing that we really face up to the incomprehensibility of man's existence, do not avoid it out of embarrassment, and do not think that because we can only stammer over this incomprehensibility, we can let it alone. And always presupposing, too, that we understand the content of the Christian message in that unity and sublime simplicity

[19] On the question of humanism, cf. K. Rahner, 'Christian Humanism', Theological Investigations IX (London 1972), pp. 187-204; and on the problem of secularisation, 'Theological Reflections on the Problem of Secularisation', Theological Investigations X (London 1973), pp. 318-48.
[20] On 'horizontalism', cf. 'The Church's Commission to Bring Salvation and the Humanization of the World', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 295-313.
[21] Cf. 'Current Problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London 1961), pp. 149-200.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which belongs to it, in spite of an unavoidable two thousand years of reflective differentiation.

Of course I realise that to lay down a proposition and postulate of this kind is not much more than to formulate a formal and abstract imperative.

We ought now to analyse the individual dimensions of human existence, showing how all of them – each for itself, and all of them because of their common incalculability – together pull man into the incomprehensibility of God and offer this incomprehensible God of inexpressible mystery as the One who in giving himself provides the goal and content of human existence from within. We ought to show how all dimensions point to the history of man and mankind, in which the irrevocable victory of this promise is manifested in Jesus, the crucified and risen One.

We should have to call upon the dimensions of man as the being of an absolute truth (at least in the form of a limitless, critical question) and the radical responsibility conferred by liberty; the dimension of the private and political existence of man with man; the dimension of man's origin and his futurity. And we should have to show that all their unfathomable depths really conceal in themselves the mystery of God in his turning to man.

All these dimensions could, if we liked, provide brief formulations of the Christian faith in which the radical nature of these dimensions [70] and the traditional content of the Christian faith are defined, and in which the radical nature of these dimensions and the traditional content of the Christian faith reflect each other and make each comprehensible.[22]

But of course all that is impossible here. Nor have we the space to answer the question of how all that we have said can be translated into statements which are more easily accessible to the mind that is less well trained theologically. Another problem we cannot consider here is how far the different anthropological points of approach to which we have referred each have their different importance and their greater or lesser accessibility, according to the point in the history of thought at which they are advanced, and according to the affinity they have to a particular phase of human life.[23] Here we must simply point to other work in which we have tried to provide an answer to these questions too.

[22] In this question I am indebted to R. Bleistein, Kurzformeln des Glaubens (Würzburg 1971). An accompanying volume of texts offers specific illustrations. The present author has also considered this question since 1966, cf. also 'The Need for a "Short Formula" of Christian Faith', Theological Investigations IX (London 1972), pp. 117-26.

[23] This would be the problem of a 'mystagogy' in the Christian faith, which we have repeatedly discussed. For the most detailed consideration of the subject, cf. 'Die Notwendigkeit einer neuen Mystagogie', HPTh 2/1 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 269-71, and 'Die Rücksicht auf die verschiedenen Altersstufen in der immer erneuten Glaubensmystagogie', ibid., 3, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1972), pp. 529-35.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[71]

7

THE BODY IN THE ORDER OF SALVATION

We shall be dealing with this subject here from the dogmatic point of view.[1] But what can Christian dogmatics contribute to this question? Not very much, it would seem at first sight; for it is a very general discipline to which we are looking for an answer, a discipline unavoidably somewhat remote from the specific needs and anxieties of everyday life. But let us recall some theological statements about the body, and from that basis try to work out some theological principle for the elucidation of the particular truths of faith. Let us try, that is, to bring out what all these statements of Christian faith have in common, and to form a theological concept of the human body.

REVELATION BY WAY OF THE BODY

In recalling some theological statements which are part of Christian belief and underlie any subjectively coloured theology, the fundamental thing for us to remember is that the body is created by God.[2] God is the creator of the human body as well as of everything else.

That is to say, the God who is pure spirit, the ineffable mystery, who is incomprehensible and nameless, who dwells far off in unlocated majesty, has also created this body – this actual, visible body [72] that we see, with which we have to cope, whose pleasures and pains we experience. It has been directly willed by God. This body is not just something that came about by chance; nor was it fortuitous in the sense that God really intended something different. It is not merely a by-product. It is not only something which came about by way of man's history – for example, because the spirit turned away from God in some history that took place before the foundation of the world, acquiring this concrete form as a result. Space and time – and therefore history – and therefore the human body – and therefore human sexuality – are not things which God did not really desire. All of them are created by the One whom we call the creator of heaven and earth. Even if it is not a truth of faith, we Christians can and must supplement this today by saying that somehow this specific bodily nature of man's, as it actually is, owes its existence to God's direct, creative intervention. (At least this is what follows from doctrinal statements of the Church which, though they are not properly speaking definitions, are still largely valid, according to a ruling of the Biblical Commission.) This has nothing to do with the question of evolution, for the statement can quite well be made in an evolutionary context too; but I do not need to go into that here. I should only like to emphasise the fact so that we can see how much the Church's teaching authority stresses the fact that man's bodily nature was created, willed, by the one, eternal, holy, just and incorporeal God, and puts this in the foreground of faith's consciousness.[3]

---

[1] This essay was originally based on A. Görres' remarks in 'Der Leib und das Heil: Caro cardo salutis' in K. Rahner and A. Görres, Der Leib und das Heil (Mainz 1967), pp. 7-28. The present writer has discussed the subject in detail in Geist in Welt: Zur Metaphysik der endlichen Erkenntnis bei Thomas von Aquin, 3rd. edn (Munich 1964).

[2] Cf. Denz. 3896 (Humani generis v. 12. VIII 1950 'de humani corporis origine').

[3] On this question, cf. the present author's article 'Monogenism', Sacramentum Mundi IV (New York and London 1969), 105-7 (with bibliography); also 'Monogenism', Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 974-7. Cf. also 'Theological Reflections on Monogenism', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 1961), pp. 229-96; 'The Sin of Adam', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York 1974), pp. 247-62; 'Evolution and Original Sin', Concilium 3 June

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Secondly, this body is made out of the dust of the earth. The vivid account at the beginning of Genesis, which tells us how God formed man from the dust of the earth, like a potter, and breathed life into him, may seem childlike, primitive and pictorial, but it is fundamentally a tremendous and moving story. It is tremendous and moving not only because man, as a specific reality, stands in an immediate relationship to the eternal God, but also because we are told again that God takes what he makes in this way from the dust of the earth.[4] [73] That is stated about the God who can in principle make things with a free, creative 'let there be'. We are told that this independent God (who in his creative activity is not dependent on any presupposition in the way of matter) made man from the dust of the earth. We are not told that he made man's body out of dust – though that is our modern, platonic interpretation. He made man out of the dust of the earth. And that means that from the very outset he took him and set him in the whole world in its totality, by creating him to be his direct partner in a dialogue with himself. The Scriptures let us feel this tremendous tension and the problems involved, even in this simple story, in which God acts as the direct creator, who makes something out of the dust of the earth. It lets the tension and the problem remain, without softening them or trivialising them – the tension and the problem that are involved in the fact that man is created out of dust and is yet created by God.

There is a third point which we must remember about this fact of theology. Original sin is transmitted through procreation.[5] Not, of course, because there is anything sinful or inferior about the act of procreation. But because it is the plain, simple fact that everyone belongs to this one, particular human race, where everyone is related to everyone else by blood; and this makes a person a member and sharer in what we call original sin. We may briefly remark here that original sin simply means that man, because he is a descendant of Adam, belonging to this historical, human family, ought to possess divine grace but does not do so. Grace is conferred on him only if he is also one who has been redeemed by Jesus Christ. But both things are based on this bodily community of shared descent: the fact that according to God's plan man was to be endowed with sanctifying grace, divine life, divine nearness and divine glory; and the fact that he does not actually have all this.[6]

[74] The fourth thing we must remember in this connection is the saying in the first chapter of the Gospel of John, 'And the Word became flesh.' We do not need to describe in detail here the whole depth and breadth of the Johannine concept of sarx. That concept is a more complicated and more subtle one than we need here.[7] But at all events the sentence states that man – and hence the divine Word as well – is truly flesh. We are, therefore, told that the eternal Word of God, by uttering himself into what is not God out of the inner divine silence in which he is with the Father, becomes just what we call sarx – man; but truly physical man, man indeed who bears the marks of death, suffering man, man in his tribulation. We cannot consider all these things here. Let us simply hold on to one thing: that it is a fact of faith that 1967.

---

[4] Cf. Gen. 2:7.

[5] In addition to the articles cited in n. 3, cf. 'Original Sin', Sacramentum Mundi (New York and London 1969), 328-34 (with bibliography); also 'Original Sin', Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 1148-55; P. Overhage and K. Rahner, Das Problem der Hominisation, (Quaestiones Disputatae 12/13) (Freiburg 1961).

[6] For a summing up of the results of the present author's numerous essays on the theology of grace, cf. the articles 'Zur Theologie der Gnade', 'Gnadentheologie' and 'Gnade und Freiheit', Sacramentum Mundi II (Freiburg 1968), 450-65, 465-9 and 469-76 (with bibliography); also 'Grace: II. Theological', Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 587-95.

[7] On the concept 'flesh' in John, cf. E. Schweizer in ThW VII (Stuttgart 1964), esp. 138-41; cf. also R. Bultmann, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 2nd edn (Tübingen 1954), pp. 386-96, ET Theology of the New Testament, (London 1965), vol ii, pp. 227-46; R. Schnackenburg, Das Johannes Evangelium I, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1967), pp. 241-9, ET The Gospel According to St John I (New York and London 1968), pp. 371-3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

when God desires to manifest himself, it is as man that he does so.

I admit that the formulation I have just used really goes beyond what is defined in faith and is an interpretation which the individual theologian has to justify. But I should like to put forward this interpretation here, because it is of great importance for a real understanding of what we are concerned with. If we really want to understand the saying 'And the Word became flesh' in its total depth, then we simply must not assume that we already know what flesh is, or what man is, or – to put it theologically – what human nature is. If we knew all these things, in saying that 'the Word became flesh' we should only virtually be saying: 'We have long since known what the eternal Logos of the Father became; it is something of which we have our own personal experience.' We must go about things in exactly the opposite way. If we want to know what man is, or what flesh means, then we must, so to speak, choose this theological definition of the statement 'And the Word became flesh,' saying: flesh, man as a bodily, concrete, historical being is just what comes into being when the Logos, issuing from himself, utters himself. Man is therefore God's self-utterance, out of himself into the empty nothingness of the creature.

Of course this does not make what man is, or what man as a bodily [75] creature is, any clearer. For all those exact definitions and ways of expression which we have acquired as a matter of course through the sciences and through metaphysical anthropology, etc., are left behind and what man is, is thrust into the absolute mystery of God. For if it is true that what we are is just what comes into being when the eternal Logos utters himself, then it is clear that we ourselves are the absolute mystery. We might say: if an anthropology that sees itself not merely as provisional but as absolute fails to talk about God, it is a heresy. It is not, and cannot be, a Christian anthropology. So when we have to talk, and want to talk, about man in the ultimate, most radical and absolute sense – not about man's spirituality, but about bodily man, man in the flesh, about the sarx, which always means the whole man, but in his actual, bodily nature – then we really have to talk about God. So when as Christians we ask what bodily man is, in the ultimate meaning of the word, then – if we want to give a final answer, not a provisional one – the only answer we can give is, 'And the Word became flesh.' The sarx is what comes into being when the Logos becomes something which it is not already in itself, in its divine nature. It is what comes into being when the Logos desires to be less and to become less than it is of itself. It is what comes into being, what is present, when the Logos manifests itself in the sphere in which it does not desire to be the infinite, blessed, intrinsically luminous Word of the Father, but issues from itself and speaks whither only the finite, creaturely Word can be heard. The flesh which is man is the self-utterance of God himself.

In order to avoid misunderstanding, let me stress that here I am going beyond the clear, simple facts of Catholic teaching in so far as they are binding on Catholic Christians. I am doing so in the consciousness that I am not saying anything heretical, though I am equally aware that in giving this interpretation I am not – so to speak – covered by the explicit teaching of the magisterium. But I think that my interpretation is correct. And I think that it is necessary to say this today. The being of man is what comes into existence when God utters himself into the otherness of nothingness; and that means man, in so far as he is sarx.

A fifth thing must be said at the same time as we state these theological facts. As human beings we are all redeemed through Christ's death. That is a statement which directly affects the body too. This means that if we were only to say what Scripture also says – we have been redeemed by obedience, through the obedient love of the incarnate [76] One – then we should certainly have said something that is true; but we should not have stated this true fact in its concrete, bodily form. When we say that we have been redeemed through the blood of Christ, through Christ's death, through his sufferings on the cross, then we must not mean by this that a spiritual event of love and obedience was unfortunately or strangely accompanied by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

rather unpleasant circumstances. (That has been a danger in standard Catholic scholastic theology ever since the Middle Ages.) We must not consider that it was really a matter of chance or externals, which has nothing to do with what was really intended, nothing to do with the obedience and love of this incarnate Word of the Father's. The statement that we have been redeemed through the death of this Son of God, and through the shedding of his blood (i.e. a bodily event) is the concrete, bodily form of what we express in abstract and formalised terms, as it were, when we merely say that we have been redeemed through the Son's obedience and love, and his readiness to sacrifice himself.[8] We have been redeemed through an event which is, of course, spiritually free and personal in its nature. But according to the Father's will, it took place, and could only take place, in this entirely concrete, bloody reality, given over to death. The place where this love and obedience are to be found is therefore this bodily existence, if love and obedience are what they are intended to be – i.e. redemptive. And this event could be redemptive for us only because it took place as the love of the Son and the obedience of the Son in his actual, specific bodily nature, which we called his death, or his Passion, in which we from the outset communicate with him and are united with him through the unity of the human family.

Let us suppose for a moment – in a kind of hypothetical theology – that the Logos had become an angel. He could then also, of course, have loved God, have trusted him, have obeyed him in this angelic, created and creaturely nature; but he could not have redeemed us through it. This event would not be one which would by its nature take place in a dimension which touches us from the very beginning. In other words, we have been redeemed through Christ's suffering and death, because this event by its nature, as a redemptive act, took [77] place in an actual bodily existence; and we were able to be redeemed through this bodily event, because what takes place in this sphere is from the outset a patrimonium commune, a common heritage for all those who belong to one another in this community of the body, this blood-relationship which binds them in Adam to a common destiny.[9] We may remember the Epistle to the Hebrews, 'He who sanctifies and those who are sanctified have all one origin.'[10] Here we can perhaps see most clearly what Tertullian already said 1600 years ago, 'The flesh is the hinge of salvation – caro cardo salutis.'[11]

Another article of faith is the resurrection of the flesh (not the body, as we shall see). The basic Christian acknowledgment of man's perfecting, his absolute validity before God, is not expressed by saying that we save our souls, but by affirming that we believe in the resurrection of the flesh. Again flesh here, of course, means the whole person. There, are also doctrinal statements made by the Church which talk about the resurrection of the body. But the resurrection of the flesh is the statement which means precisely body and soul, in that very unity in which man is flesh. For if he were simply body, then he would not be flesh at all in the Biblical sense. Flesh means that person who is on the one hand the frailty, the threatenedness, the inexplicableness, the weakness, the obscurity of this individual, concrete, specific entity, and who at the same time knows this and is afraid. In other words, flesh means the one person – it is almost impossible to say 'who is made up of spirit and flesh'.

---

[8] A. Grün has recently attempted to express this idea in his monograph, Erlösung durch das Kreuz. Karl Rahners Beitrag zu einem heutigen Erlösungsverständnis (Münsterschwarzach 1975). But this book is somewhat diffuse and is not entirely satisfactory.

[9] We cannot give separate consideration here to the important problem of monogenism and its relationship to original sin, but cf. K. Rahner, 'Erbsünde und Monogenismus' (published as an appendix) in K.-H. Weger, Theologie der Erbsünde (Quaestiones Disputatae 44) (Freiburg 1970), pp. 176-223. This expressly supersedes some of the work cited in n. 3. Unfortunately the author was unable to complete for publication the more considerable monograph on the subject which had already been announced in some quarters. Other commitments and reasons of health prevented him from carrying this project through.

[10] Cf. Heb. 2:11.

[11] Cf. Tertullian, De carn. resurr. VIII (CSL 47) 36, 27-8 and (CCL 2) 931, 6-7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We shall see later that although this formula is a common one, and is quite justifiable, and although it also corresponds to what the catechism says, it, too, really fails to bring out clearly enough the facts of the true reality of the Christian view of existence. At all events we must say that in as much as Christianity confesses the resurrection of the flesh [78] – and confesses it as a central article of its faith, which expresses in this single formula the whole of man's future hope and the acknowledgement of his one, total, final validity – it has included from the outset in man's unity what we, in our modern Western way, call the body, and really acknowledges only this single person.[12]

A seventh point which we deduce from these facts about the Church's teaching is that man is a unity made up of body and soul. The doctrine of the Church – its express, defined doctrine, – does not merely state that man consists of body and soul. It also obliges us to maintain the real, true, radical, substantial, original unity of body and soul.[13] Not, of course, in the sense of identity or uniformity, and not, of course, in the sense that the one can simply be deduced from the other. (We cannot simply derive what we call the body from its spirituality, in the spiritualistic sense; and even less can we deduce man's spirituality from his bodily nature, in a materialist sense.) But although that is impossible; and although the Church has made doctrinal statements – e.g. at the Fifth Lateran Council – about human spirituality and about the immortality of the human soul; and although the Vatican Council of 1870 condemned the people who were not ashamed to say (as the Council put it) that nothing exists but matter – yet the real, true, original unity of body and soul is an article of the Catholic faith, and was particularly defined at the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. [14]

THE CONSEQUENCES OF A THEOLOGY OF THE BODY

We need only briefly point here to the results of the theological facts we have discussed, for the aspects that suggest themselves are in any case so numerous that we cannot mention them all. So we must first understand why the Church as a concrete, bodily, sociologically constituted community sees itself as the Church that is necessary for salvation. And this is understandable if the Church teaches that sacraments consisting of physical elements are necessary for salvation. (Why and in what sense, in spite of this statement about the necessity for salvation of certain sacraments, other people may none the less [79] expect to be saved who do not belong in actual bodily terms to this visible Church – e.g. are not even baptised – is a question that need not concern us here.)

At all events, we see that from this theology of bodily existence (which runs through the whole of Catholic dogma) it also follows that the Church cannot merely be a spiritual power of conviction or opinion, and that it does not merely begin at the point where we pass beyond what is sociological, social, earthly and tangible into a pure spirituality of the mind. This bodily existence also asserts itself in the doctrine of the Church and the sacraments.[15] We might put it paradoxically and say that the average Christian almost has the impression that the world is concerned with the body, with visible tangible realities; while the Church and its [12] Cf. 'Jesus' Resurrection' in the present volume, pp. 16-23.

[13] Cf. the constitution 'Fidei catholicae' of the Council of Vienne (1312): 'De anima ut forma corporis', Denz. 902.
[14] Cf. 5th Lateran Council (1513), Denz. 1440; Council of Trent (1546), Denz. 1512; 1st Vatican Council (1870), Denz. 3002 and 3022.
[15] The present writer has already expressed his views on the theology of the sacraments several times, cf. Kirche und Sakramente (Quaestiones Disputatae 10) (Freiburg 1961); 'Die Sakramente als Grundfunktionen der Kirche', HPTh I (Freiburg 1964), pp. 323-32; Die siebenfältige Gabe. Über die Sakramente der Kirche. Munich 1974.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pastoral care is concerned with that strange thing called the soul, which is so difficult to grasp. To put it even more paradoxically and in perhaps exaggerated terms, we might almost say that the exact opposite is true. Christianity is continually concerned with the body. It is a bodily, concrete, shaping, speaking, acting, organised, ecclesiastical, sacramental religion, a religion which concerns itself in its dogmas with concrete things, and expresses something through these dogmas. And it leaves entirely to God, and God alone, whatever elements of this spirit-endowed body go beyond the purely physical.

We might point to a whole number of things here. Even though the Church allegedly deals only with the soul, it does not judge the innermost heart. It sticks to what is tangible. It says: this or that formulation is correct. But what you have thought in your ultimate, deepest, innermost, most subjective heart of hearts – that I neither know nor have any control over. And if you want to think something new and clever and deep in your theology, or in metaphysics and philosophy, then you must express it in such a way that it fits into this community, so that it sounds comprehensible to other people, and so that it can be written into a catechism. We might say, even the teaching authority of the Church is concerned with what is bodily. And this is true of pastoral care and the sacraments too. The same [80] may be said about the truths of faith: there are none which do not also touch on man's bodily nature.

But then we might well ask: what about the mystery of the Holy Trinity? Of course God does not have a body in our sense. I am not attempting to conjure something bodily into God by some subtle means or other. But the fact remains that we have heard about the Holy Trinity and we are concerned with it only in so far as, and because, the Logos has become flesh, since he uttered himself to us in bodily form. He did not even do so merely in a human word – although that too would have been something bodily. He uttered himself in the human concreteness of a fleshly, bodily history. That is the reason, and the only reason, why we have anything to do with the mystery of the Holy Trinity.[16] And I believe – though this again is more of a theological statement than a directly expressed truth of faith – that we must also say that the beatific vision, the direct contemplation of God, is based on a grace which would not exist, and probably could not exist, unless the divine Logos had taken, and remained, flesh. We must never forget that the Christian, authentically Catholic truth of faith about the Incarnation of the Father's eternal Word does not mean that God put on some kind of overall called humanity, because his world had somehow broken down, contrary to his original plan, so that he had to repair God the creator's original plan down here in this world of ours. It means that God is man to all eternity, so that to all eternity we cannot think rightly about this God or express him properly unless we add to our thinking what we men and women all are as well. There is no longer any theology, to all eternity, which is not anthropology too.

a) The Fundamental Concept of the Body

The doctrine we have described, with all it has to say, obliges us to make a distinction, but also to realise that this distinction excludes the possibility of an existential cleavage between body and soul. People have reproached Greek (which is to say Western) theology, to some extent unjustifiably and in too wholesale a way, with having broken up the ancient biblical anthropology of unified man (which belongs to the New Testament as well as the Old) into a Greek [81] duality of anima and corpus, soul and body, thus distorting or even corrupting the original biblical message.[17] This is certainly an exaggeration. We do not need to agonise in [16] Cf. the brief remarks under the heading 'The Mystery of the Trinity', Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979), pp. 255-9.

[17] Cf. here 'The Unity of Spirit and Matter in the Christian Understanding of Faith', Theological Investigations VI (London 1969), pp. 153-77; also, as summing up, J. Splett, 'Leib-Seele-Verhältnis', Sacramentum Mundi III

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this connection as to whether what we have to understand theologically by body and soul can really be made to coincide entirely with what Graeco-scholastic philosophy understands by the same words. Let us confine ourselves to theology. If we do, I believe, in view of normal theological usage and the teaching authority of the Church, that we can and must say that it is undoubtedly legitimate to go on making a distinction between body and soul. To say this is by no means simply to state the obvious – what everyone knows and accepts. If we start from the anthropology of the Old Testament and the New Testament too, the distinction is correct, but by no means an absolute matter of course. When the New Testament talks about the soul, it means something which does not have very much to do with what we understand by the term. According to biblical theology it is quite possible to hold that the whole anthropology of the New Testament is still entirely the same as the biblical theology of the Old; and in Old Testament theology there is really only the one, bodily person who – since he is God's partner – is of course what we call 'spirit' as well, but in such a way that the Old Testament never really distinguishes between the body and the spiritual soul in our philosophical (platonic), scholastic sense. Still, however that may be, I believe that the distinction between something which we call body and something which we call soul – a distinction which is made and assumed as a matter of course in the Church's doctrinal statements – is quite legitimate. So the Council of Vienne, for example, could define the substantial unity of body and soul and say that the anima (soul) was the forma corporis (the form of the body). And so the Fifth Lateran Council could define the immortality of the soul as a truth of faith which is binding on us, the body of course not being immortal in this sense.[18]

This being so, there is no need for me to justify the statement any further when I say that to make a distinction between body and soul is not merely possible but is also theologically correct, is required by [82] the teachings of the Church, and is completely justifiable. But this distinction does not mean that it is possible to make a cleavage in the real or existential sense between what we call body and what we call soul; and in our context this is the important thing. In other words, this distinction is a metaphysical one – one might even say a meta-existential one. Not that it does not have great importance for man's existence, for the actual conduct of his life. Of course it does. But it is a metaphysical and meta-existential distinction in the sense that in actual fact man never encounters mere body and never encounters pure soul. What we call 'inwardness', our innermost heart, is the inwardness of an actual, bodily spirit, an incarnate spirit. And what we call man's externals are the external form of this very same incarnate spirit.[19] Wherever we encounter ourselves, wherever we are within our own grasp, as it were, inwardly or outwardly, we have to do with an actual, concrete person. And we can never so to speak materially separate these two from each other. The loftiest spiritual thought, the most sublime moral decision, the most radical act of a responsible liberty is still a bodily perception or a bodily decision. It is still incarnate perception and incarnate liberty – and hence, even by virtue of its own nature, it is still in interplay with everything that is not free, not spiritual, and so on. And conversely, even the most external thing about man is still something that really belongs to the realm of his spirituality; it is still something that is not just mere body.

b) Indivisible Unity

(Freiburg 1969), 213-19 (with bibliography); also 'Body', Encyclopaedia of Theology. A Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 157-61.

[18] Cf. references to the conciliar statements in nn. 13 and 14.

[19] For the author's basic ideas here cf. K. Rahner, Geist in Welt: Zur Metaphysik der endlichen Erkenntnis bei Thomas von Aquin, 3rd edn (Munich 1964).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

According to the doctrine of the Church, we have to go further than what we have just said. We must even maintain that an existential cleavage between the body and the soul is actually impossible.

Catholic doctrine is convinced that the Logos as its very self not only took up his dwelling in the summit of the human soul, as it were, but really became flesh. When we remember what we said about our having been redeemed through the death of Jesus Christ and through his passion, then we are bound to conclude that it is impossible to draw a smooth existentially pure line of demarcation, [83] so to speak, between the bodily nature of the Logos and his human spirituality. For if that became possible, I should of course have to say that whatever actually lies beyond that demarcation line – the line drawn between Christ's human spirituality and his bodily nature – can no longer be of any significance for redemption. But it is! We have been redeemed through Christ's death and his blood. This must of course include his obedience and his love. But the converse applies equally. In this obedience and love of Christ the whole concrete and specific character of his passion is embodied in such a way that the two are not actually divisible. In other words, the unity of man has been originally so designed by God the Creator that although man knows that he is a unity of different elements, in the existential implementation of his existence he can never, as it were, get behind this unity, so as to take sides purely with the spirit or purely with the body.

As a result there is, for example, no Catholic ethic which could leave the concrete fact of bodily existence and what happens in it on one side as being irrelevant. And consequently there is no consummation of salvation through the sacraments which could detach itself from this sphere as being a matter of indifference. It is the impossibility of any existential cleavage of this kind which really emerges from the theological facts which we talked about earlier.

But we must now look at these facts again in somewhat more detail. And that brings us to the theological and metaphysical essence of the bodily condition, which emerges, in my view, as a theological conclusion from these theological facts.

c) Man as Spirit

In order to make my meaning clear, I should like to begin again with another point. I have already stressed that it is permissible for us to say – and indeed that we must say – that man is made up of body and soul. This is of course frequently stated in the catechism. All the same I believe that every Thomist theologian and philosopher will be bound to agree with me when I say that this mode of expression is really an empirically inexact one. It only conveys man's essential being in a highly primitive way, because man is not really built up out of body and soul, but out of spirit and materia prima, or 'first matter' – what one might translate as empty otherness. To say this is to make a statement in terms of Thomist philosophy or metaphysics; [84] but this seems to bring out and integrate the facts of theology which I have been talking about, better than other possible Catholic philosophies. But what does this Thomist statement tell us?

When I say that man is made up of body and soul, I am assuming (even if this is not what the Church's teaching as such intends to say) that another true, concrete human bodiliness is being encountered which in its specific form has not as yet anything to do with man's spirit; the spirit is then added, and the whole is then man. But when I look at the matter thomistically, then I have to say that what I experience as man's bodily nature is itself the reality of the spirit, yielded up into that mysteriousness which is only accessible to metaphysics and which scholastic, Thomist philosophy calls 'first matter'. The body is already spirit, viewed in that aspect of self-consummation in which personal spirituality yields itself up in order to encounter directly and palpably what is different from itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Bodily existence is not, therefore, something which is added to spirituality; it is the concrete existence of the spirit itself in space and time. Physical nature or the nature of the human body is not something already existing in itself. It is the self-expression of the spirit reaching out into space and time.

If we want to be sure whether we have understood the point at issue here, we only have to ask whether we find it self-evident to say that the body can be seen, but not the soul. If the answer is, 'Yes – of course that is so,' then we have not understood exactly what the point at issue is. I am naturally assuming that the answer to our question is, 'No – that is not the case.' If we wanted to give a Thomist answer, we should have to say, 'Yes, the soul can be seen, but only in part' (though 'part' does not here mean a quantitative section); in an ambiguous sense, I can see man's spirit. What I see the spirit of man in space and time to be is, in an ambiguous sense, precisely what I call body.

And if we say that, all the same, the body is still what I can see with my eyes; and that what I experience when I shut my eyes and think about God or my mother – i.e., what is 'within' me – belongs to the soul, then we ought, more correctly, to say, 'No, that is a different part of my reality, but it is just as much body-and-soul as what I can look at from the outside.' The intensity of the spirit's presentation as body can of course differ considerably. If I put someone like Kant on the scales and see that he weighs ten stone, then of course I have seen less of Kant than I would have done if I had talked [85] to him. The intensity of the spirit's bodily existence can be great or small, inwardly or outwardly. But what I call the body is the outgoing of the spirit itself into the emptiness of space and time, which we call 'first matter', in which this spirituality now itself appears; so that outgoing into its bodily form is the condition which makes spiritual and personal self-discovery possible, not an obstacle in its way. There is no coming to oneself except by way of exit into the bodily reality into which the spirit first reaches out and finds itself, forming itself and going out of itself. And it is only this which makes personal, spiritual freedom possible. Of course this bodily nature, as the spatial and temporal existence of the spirit itself, is always an entering into the truly Other.

d) Christian Dualism?

It would be wrong to interpret what we have just said as being an absolute and radical metaphysical expressionism. The bringing-oneself-to-manifestation means bringing oneself truly to view in a truly other. And consequently this bringing-of-oneself-to-manifestation in another is really the bringing-of-oneself-to-manifestation in another through a subjection of oneself to an alien law. And if we now object that this really comes down to the same thing – that here we have the same dualism between body or spirit and first matter which we challenged when we met it earlier in the form of dualism between body and soul – then the following must be said. Of course in a Christian anthropology we have a dualism which is never ultimately abolished in man himself but only in the transcendent divine unity of the Creator of heaven and earth, of spirit and matter. But even in a dualism of this kind we do not fall back into the Greek or neoplatonic dualism of body and soul, which we objected to earlier; because in our dualistic conception – if we want to call it dualism at all – we are clear that what we actually encounter is always what has already been unified.

This has tremendous consequences. Everything that I experience as effect from outside in the sphere of my bodily existence, I experience from the very outset as the reality formed by me, which comes to me from outside. There is no suffering which I do not already experience as action, and there is no action which is not already suffering. There is no impression from without which is not already expression from within. What can actually be encountered is always [86] the already completed synthesis of what is alien and what is already given from

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

within. This metaphysical doctrine about a true difference between materia prima and spirit can maintain this without, therefore, having to fall back into a primitive empiristic dualism between a directly encounterable so-called body and a directly encounterable so-called soul – a dualism which, as it were, risks an existential cleavage.

But this means two important things. Firstly, since man, out of the substantial roots of his spiritual personality, utters himself into matter (this utterance being bodily identity itself) this utterance necessarily becomes ambiguous for man. Why? Whatever can actually be encountered by psychology, physiognomy, and so on is really the spirit. But it is the spirit which has uttered itself inwards into the otherness, the other form of being of materia prima, of space and time, of determination from without inwards. Whatever can be encountered is always merely the synthesis of the two. This one, already united synthesis between personal actio and passio cannot be completely abolished by man; for otherwise, as self-investigating spirit, he would have to be able to take up a position in which he 'would not always have to carry out the synthesis. In other words, he cannot existentially say exactly that one aspect of a particular concrete thing comes from within and another aspect of it comes from without. The bodily nature of man is man's utterance about himself which has become ambiguous. For man it is necessary and remains necessary for ever, for himself and even more, of course, for others. That is one of the points that emerges from what we have said.

The second point picks up a number of things which we mentioned before, in the first part of our discussion, and is this: this utterance in which man presents himself and completes his own spiritual and substantial foundation is an utterance into the common sphere of space and time. In other words, man utters himself and constitutes himself in his concrete nature and thereby opens himself by that very fact to the break-through from outside. In his bodily nature he enters into a sphere which does not belong to him alone. Now of course we might say that this is merely an abstruse way of stating the most obvious truism one can imagine. For whoever doubted that since I have a cheek, someone else can smack my face? And that since I have a head, a brick can fall on it? Or that since I have a body, I must have a mother? Of course this is a truism. But we now have to understand this truism in such a way that we really grasp the fact that these truths belong so radically to man's nature that they cannot be overridden [87] in any way at all, and indeed ought not to be overridden either. Consequently it is precisely man's task to be true to this nature of his and not to try to escape from it. There is no area in which what we have just said is not true. There is no 'inwardness' which does not also stand open, as it were, to what is without. The ultimate, most personal freedom, which is to be found where man is inevitably himself, without any substitute or any excuse, at the heart of his being (or however we like to express it) – the place, that is to say, where he is virtually the absolute and irreplaceable subject – is where he still has something to do with Christ, and with all other men and women too. For there are no spheres which can be cleanly separated from one another in an existential cleavage.[20]

Although this seems so obvious, it has its tremendous consequences. It means, for example, that it is not a matter of indifference for me as spiritual person how the material sphere in which I live is constituted. I cannot and must not say, 'What is out there is a matter of indifference. That is not the important thing. I shall withdraw to the unconquerable fortress of my innermost spiritual personality.' That would be Stoicism or something else of the kind – perhaps something splendid in itself; but it would be completely un-Christian. Two thousand years ago someone died on the cross in all the darkness of his death out of love for the Father. And this took place from the very outset in a sphere which is my own reality. How I am now [20] Here personal 'intersubjectivity' (for the neglect of which the present writer has often been criticised) also has its place. This was admittedly not sufficiently prominent in the account; but all the same the criticism in its usual form is inaccurate and unjustified.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to react to it is another matter.

e) Our Reality as Open System

Through bodiliness the whole world belongs to me from the start, in everything that happens. Of course we must not get the impression in this connection that our body stops where our skin stops, as if we were a sack containing a number of different things, which clearly ceases to be what it is where its 'skin', the sacking, stops. No. Let us think in quite simple terms (without going into details) about modern physics. In some sense we are an open system. Of course I can say, 'This chair is not part of my body.' But when we ask in terms of physics what that actually means, then the matter becomes very [88] obscure. If there were no moon or no sun, our bodies would be different, too. In a certain sense – and I am exaggerating here, in order to make what I want to say clearer – we are all living in one and the same body – the world. And because that is so (and this is really the metaphysical, theological premise) something of the nature of original sin, and something of the nature of redemption can exist too. This one total physical existence as the common space which makes intercommunication between individual spiritual subjects possible from the start – this one concrete space can of course be accepted by the individual spiritual subject in various ways: it can be loved, put up with, or hated.

Let me draw attention to one small result of this, although it really takes us too far. The transfiguration of the End-time, therefore, means the resurrection of the individual, and a new earth and a new heaven. And let us just ask ourselves whether what we call blessedness, heaven and hell, might not be thought of as being distinguished for us in a matchless way by the manner in which a particular person accepts this common reality. Since everyone, as spiritual person, lives essentially in the space of existence that is common to all, into which he continually acts – and acts into the whole – and from which he continually receives, he is continually active and continually passive. What he specifically experiences as himself is always the unity of the act suffered, committed by everything towards him, and the self-fulfilment from within, which he actively expresses outwards. We can see in this way what the communion of saints really means. This one 'concrete' existence in which we consummate our own spiritual, final liberty, is itself involved in a dynamic history which sometime ends in transfiguration, in a reality not only of the spiritual person, but also of his common sphere of being.[21] The question then arises: how do I accept the final condition of the sphere in which I necessarily am? Do I accept it as the transfigured world, or as what the Bible calls hell fire?

The body is therefore nothing other than the self-consummation of the spirit in space and time. But this self-consummation of everything except God is of such a kind that it is essentially ambiguous and takes place in a sphere of existence in which all men and women communicate with one another from the very beginning.

[89] In the narrower sense of the word, the body is that through which I fulfil myself in the one world in which all spiritual persons exist. And it is from this starting point that we should have to think through anew the individual and more specific features of a Christian view of the body.

[21] This one, all-embracing history is one of Christianity's essential features. To use a traditional term, it may be described as 'catholic'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[90]

8

MYSTICAL EXPERIENCE AND MYSTICAL THEOLOGY

The only purpose of the ideas I am about to develop is to peg out the ground for what is dealt with – and what can be dealt with – in a Catholic theology of mysticism; for there is really no generally accepted theology of mysticism, as a distinct part of Catholic theology.[1]

What we do have, however, are great mystics who testify to their own experience. Among these, and among the classic Spanish mystics particularly, there are some who have tried to some extent to reduce their experience and their mystic 'way' to a theological system. But reflections on mystic experience which attempt to reduce that experience to a system always run across the conceptions of faith and theology which a mystic inevitably brings with him. For it is these that he applies when he tries to describe or systematise his original experiences so as to be able to fit it into the co-ordinate system of his other philosophical and theological opinions and convictions.

That is why classic Spanish mysticism in particular displays an unusual variety of accounts and systematic summaries of mystical experiences, although this does not imply any doubt about the real experience that lies behind them. Apart from works of this kind, we must at least mention the spiritual literature, which cannot be overlooked, in which mystical experience continually finds expression and is clearly the ultimate source of its genuineness and vitality. But of course it is even less possible to talk about a generally accepted [91] theology of mysticism in the case of these occasional testimonies to mystical experience which only become influential now and again.

One of the most important presuppositions for a theology of mysticism is still lacking in spite of a few beginnings – an adequate study of the relationship between Christian and non-Christian mysticism. The same may be said about the relationship between mystical and parapsychological phenomena. Of course attempts at a systematic theology of mysticism have been made, even if they have not been expressly called that. We can find them from the period of Spanish mysticism at least down to our own time.[2] But unfortunately interest in a mystical theology of this kind seems largely to have died away today.

It must, however, be said that such attempts as we have, generally deal too briefly and in too simple-minded a way with the ultimate fundamental questions. Their various sections often more or less repeat descriptions of mystical experience and the mystic way which were already worked out in Spain in the classical period. Sometimes in the course of this repetition they smooth out or blur fundamental distinctions, or use somewhat superficial arguments to prolong the dispute over the question of whether 'infused contemplation' or other mystical graces belong to normal Christian strivings for perfection, or whether they are merely special gifts, relatively seldom conferred, which can even be lacking in 'the heroic virtues of the saints'. These representations of mystical theology are often somewhat too naïvely and unreflectively dominated by an 'extrinsic' conceptual scheme, according to which direct

[1] The original version of these ideas is to be found in the preface to C. Albrecht's book, Das mystische Wort: Erleben und Sprechen in Versunkenheit, ed. H. A. Fischer-Barnicol (Mainz 1974). The present writer knew the author personally and feels indebted to him in more than one respect.

[2] I am deliberately avoiding the problem involved today in the very term 'mysticism'. Here it is used in a wide and formal sense; but these remarks do suggest starting points for an understanding of the way the term is really interpreted, and what are the experiences supposed to be summed up and described by the term, cf. H. Fischer, 'Mysticism', Sacramentum Mundi III (New York and London 1969), 136-42 (with bibliography); also 'Mysticism', Encyclopaedia of Theology: a Concise Sacramentum Mundi (London 1975), pp. 1004-11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

divine 'intervention' is thought of in the case of mystical phenomena. What contemporary theology has to say about the relation between 'nature' and grace, and about the unity of the two, is hardly brought to bear at all here.

THE MYSTIC AND HIS EXPERIENCE

The first basic problem which a theology of mysticism would have to elucidate is how the mystic stands in relation to what he experiences [92] as having been conferred on him in 'absolute proximity'.[3] For if, and to the extent in which, the 'mystical' subject is not, in mystical experience, merely thrown back on himself through objects belonging to the categories of everyday, but encounters the 'mystery' per se, or reality itself, or God (or whatever name we may give to this 'something' which is not from the outset identical with the mystical subject) then identity and difference in this experience become a problem. For there is simply no other way of talking about religious mysticism. Experience can basically present the experiencing person and what he experiences as being one; or it can at this precise point bring out and really actualise for the first time the difference which still exists between God and the creature, even in the highest degree of grace. Seen in the abstract, this remaining distinction in mystical experience could be overlooked for various reasons, although a true metaphysics and a true Christian theology must require it to be present. Perhaps a conceivable 'mystical' experience of the unity between subject and 'world' is also too quickly equated with an experience of the unity between the mystical subject and God. Possibly, too, the elimination of egoistical, particularist individualisation in a mystically experienced radical love for the self-communicating God simply leads, in subsequent reflection, to a mistaken belief in an absolute cessation of the finite subject. All these reasons and possibilities would make it seem particularly interesting to hear what the mystic himself has to say. How does he feel and interpret his experience? For we should not depend solely on the views of the metaphysician on the human spirit and its absolute transcendental nature, nor merely on the theologian, with his account of the difference between God and created being. We must also hear the views of the person who himself experiences most clearly and with the least distortion the relationship which exists between the human subject and the reality which we call God.

GRACE AND FAITH

But mystical theology is immediately faced with a second problem. This arises when we come up against the relationship between grace [93] and faith on the one hand and mystical experience on the other. Yet, traditional mystical theology continually finds itself in considerable difficulty when it calls mystical experience 'grace(s)', because behind mystical experience it would like to perceive a special intervention on God's part, confined to a particular point – a totally undeserved intervention, in which the inaccessible God communicates himself in a quite special way. But what is the relation between this grace and those other graces which Christianity proclaims as God's offer to all men? Even if mystical grace is basically viewed as the development of the supernatural capacities of justified man, the answer to this question remains unclear. This becomes most evident in the question about [3] Cf. for example the two essays about the doctrine of the spiritual senses in Origen and Bonaventure, 'The "Spiritual Senses" according to Origen' and 'The Doctrine of the "Spiritual Sense" in the Middle Ages', Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979), pp. 81-103 and 104-34 respectively.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the difference and the similarity between mystical experience and that 'experience'* which we term Christian faith and which is sustained by God's Spirit. According to the usual account, God is supposed to communicate himself so 'directly' in mystical illumination and mystical unity that it is really no longer possible to see why faith is not superseded by this mystical light, at least at the moment of illumination itself. A true theology of grace, faith, possession of the Spirit, the indwelling of God etc., deals with realities which cannot be merely understood as objective gifts, existing beyond the consciousness, as a modern Molinist misinterpretation would suggest. It cannot possibly interpose between faith and the experience of grace on the one hand, and glory on the other, some intermediate state which differs essentially from both, theologically speaking.[4] That would have to transcend the gift of grace to the Christian, which is always associated with the experience of grace. It would have both to surpass it specifically, in the true sense, and in its significance for salvation. It would not be a temporary participation in the contemplation of God which (contrary to certain views in some mystical theologies) is after all supposed to be reserved for those who through death have entered into the true finality itself. The deification of man and the possession of uncreated grace, which Christianity grants to all the justified, cannot in a real sense be surpassed by anything which is not glory and the direct contemplation of God. But these are reserved for man's final consummation. Mystical experience cannot [94] leave behind it the sphere of 'faith' and the experience of God's spirit which faith confers, by means of a new experience which would no longer be faith at all. On the contrary, mysticism can be conceived of only within the normal framework of grace and faith.

This means that whenever mystical theology aims to be more than 'parapsychology' in the broadest sense of the word (which covers everything which average, everyday consciousness knows nothing of) it can only – according to its own principles – be part of genuine dogmatics. This proposition involves two things. On the one hand, it does not say that the dogmatic theologian as such can and must say something about mystical experiences to the extent in which these differ psychologically from the everyday experiences of Christian grace. If this were to be the case, even down to 'essential' differences of a psychological kind, then either the mystic himself or the empirical psychologist would be the competent authority; it would certainly not be the dogmatic theologian. The dogmatic theologian can only determine that on earth there cannot be any higher experience in the theological sense than the experience of faith in the spirit of God. But this means that every genuine mystical experience (as distinct from natural phenomena of interior absorption or suspension of the faculties etc.) can also be understood as merely one mode of the experience of grace in faith. Probably even the mystic himself and the psychologist would have to explain more precisely where this mode of Christian experience of grace in faith comes from.

Secondly, the proposition I have put forward does not assert either that a theology of mysticism can be worked out only with the usual methods and sources which traditional dogmatics work with, too – i.e. the Scriptures, the doctrines of the Church, its tradition etc. If mystical experience is distinguished strictly from conceivable natural (and hence basically learnable) phenomena of interior absorption or suspension of the faculties, as well as from parapsychological phenomena in the normal sense of the word; and if it is just one variety of the experience of the Spirit offered to everyone; and if therefore a theology of mysticism is part of dogmatics – then the specific object of that experience of the Spirit through grace which is given to people with faith, hope and love in God's communication of himself must belong to the mystic's domain. The unique mode of this experience of the Spirit may include

* The German word for experience – Erfahrung – originally meant 'to travel through – a correct and significant indication here.

4 On 'the grace of faith' cf. especially 'Anonymous Christianity and the Missionary Task of the Church', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 161-80.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation elements of a 'natural' kind. But, described empirically, it will certainly belong to the theology of revelation, because this experience tells us about real, deifying grace [95] and because even customary revelation in the Word only objectifies in words through a process of reflection what fundamentally happens and is experienced in God's self-communication through grace. This is also true because the pure and authentic objectification of God's self-communication has actually found expression in Jesus Christ, as its irreversible climax and zenith, and afterwards in Christian doctrine as statement of the truth.[5] The experience of grace is, therefore, possible in non-Christian mysticism as well, and a corresponding theology of mysticism could be a piece of revelation theology, even though it would always continue to take its direction from the theology which is related expressly to the crucified and risen Jesus. For in Jesus the mystical event of the surrender to God as he really is finally succeeded through his saving death, and has therefore become historically and victoriously manifest.

NATURE AND GRACE

The relationship between nature and grace inevitably brings us to a third basic problem of mystical theology.[6] Both terms are, of course, understood here in their strict theological sense. As we said above, mystical experience must not be interpreted as something which fundamentally transcends and supersedes the supernatural experience of the Spirit in faith. That is why the 'specific difference' of such experience, as distinct from the Christian's 'normal' experience of the Spirit, must belong to man's 'natural' sphere. It would consequently be the special mode of an experience of transcendence and 'return' to the self which is in itself natural. This does not contradict what we have just said about mysticism as the experience of grace. Psychologically mystical experiences differ from normal everyday processes in the mind, only in the natural sphere; and in so far as they are fundamentally learnable. Like every other act of man's – for example a [96] conscious act, a free act or an act of reflection – these really natural spiritual processes can also be 'elevated' through God's self–communication, habitually or at any given moment. That is to say, they can acquire radical form, in the direction of the immediacy of the self-communicating God. This normally takes place in the normal 'supernatural' acts of faith, hope and love, which constitute the Christian life as such.

The particular psychological, and really natural, character of such experiences can help to make them take deeper root existentially in the person's inmost being, so that as supernaturally exalted acts they can in a higher degree give their stamp to the whole subject, forming him through and through. This greater personal profundity of the mystical act also brings with it a greater reflectiveness in the experience of transcendence, which is really natural, though exalted by grace. A theology of mysticism by itself cannot decide whether this experience is achieved in some miraculous way (preternaturally), or whether it can also be attained by natural means, through practice, on the basis of certain pre-conditions; or whether both may be possible, according to the level at which the phenomenon occurs. Open though the question therefore is, the possibility of purely natural phenomena of interior absorption would of course also be conceivable – phenomena, that is to say, in which the [5] This problem is more closely, if briefly, formulated in 'Grundlinien einer systematischen Christologie' in K. Rahner and W. Thüsing, Christologie – systematisch und exegetisch (Quaestiones Disputatae 55) (Freiburg 1972), pp. 15-78.

[6] The present writer has frequently, and in detail, expressed his views on the relationship between nature and grace. For his fundamental viewpoint, cf. 'Concerning the Relationship Between Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations I (London 1961), pp. 297-318; also later discussions about the concept of the 'supernatural existential'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mediation of the experience through categories was wholly or partly lacking. If we then want to talk about 'natural mysticism', no fundamental objection can be raised;[7] – but it would undoubtedly be better to keep the term 'mysticism' for those psychologically unusual experiences which we referred to above, which are exalted by grace and really include supernatural experience of the Spirit.

In this case we should still have to answer the more precise question whether existentially central neutral phenomena such as interior absorption and so forth, are really only natural, or whether they are [97] simply apprehended as such in the process itself and in the reflection that follows, although they are actually always exalted supernaturally by what we call Christian grace. This is a question for the theology of grace. If we now see the supernatural elevation of the spiritually personal acts of man (acts of really unlimited transcendence) only as intermittent – as taking place in time and space, at a certain point only, and as happening under certain predetermined conditions – then the answer must be in the first sense, that there are natural phenomena of suspension of the faculties which are really only natural. But if another theology of grace assumes, legitimately enough, that man's transcendental nature was always and everywhere and from the very beginning finalised and given radical form by God's self-communication in grace, which streams from the midst of existence outwards in the direction of the divine immediacy, then we should have to answer in the second sense.[8] Here it is also a matter of indifference whether the supernatural gift of grace takes the form of a mere advance gift, or the form of acceptance or rejection, as one aspect of human liberty. Every natural act of suspension of the faculties and so forth, would in this case always and everywhere be elevated by grace, and hence be an act of real mysticism and an act of salvation, even if this unique character of the mystic event were not yet particularly clear, or were perhaps overlooked in subsequent reflection, or were misinterpreted subsequently, in line with pantheistic 'mysticism', as a manifestation of undifferentiated unity.

Our own reflections here make us decide in favour of the second answer to the question, even if the space at our disposal makes it impossible to present the presuppositions and viewpoints of the theology of grace which are behind this choice. For mystical theology it is essential to make clear at this point that mystic experiences sustained by the Spirit, which make God's spirit accessible, do not differ from normal Christian existence because they are of a higher nature simply by virtue of being mystical experiences of the Spirit. [98] They are different because their natural substratum (for example an experience of suspension of the faculties) is as such different from the psychological circumstances of everyday life.

THE NORMAL WAY OF SALVATION AND MYSTICAL EXPERIENCE

After what we have just said, an approach might perhaps also be formulated which would

[7] We have already indicated the problem involved in the use of the word mysticism today (cf. n. 2). Individual writers give the term their own particular emphasis, in accordance with their way of looking at things and their own approach. Cf. C. Clemen, Die Mystik nach Wesen, Entwicklung und Bedeutung (Bonn 1923), but also the work of C. Albrecht – Psychologie des mystischen Bewußtseins. (Bremen 1951); Das Mystische Erkennen (Bremen 1958), – where the concept of 'suspension of the faculties' is worked out. D. Baumgardt makes a distinction in the mysticism of inwardness, nature and history, according to the object or place; cf. his Mystik und Wissenschaft (Witten 1963).

[8] Contrary to B. van der Heijden's opinion in Karl Rahner. Darstellung und Kritik seiner Grundpositionen (Einsiedeln 1973), the present writer's theology of grace is not initially derived historically from a treatise of traditional theology. It is based on much earlier attempts at a theological consideration of the experience of grace, which Ignatian spirituality is particularly aware of, and which is also of special interest to people concerned with that spirituality. The experience of grace is continually shared by every Christian in the forgiving encounter with God in the act of repentence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

make it possible to answer the question whether mystical 'experience' is a normal stage of development on the way to Christian perfection, or whether it is an extraordinary phenomenon which is not to be reckoned with, even in a highly intensively lived Christian life. Following what we have said, we must again stress here that mystical experience, where it touches on man's union with God through grace and on the believer's experience of the Spirit, does not represent a 'higher' stage of the Christian's life in grace. That could at most be claimed indirectly, in so far as the mystical phenomenon can, as cause and effect, be an indication that a Christian has accepted the offered grace of God's communication of himself to an existentially intensive degree. Apart from that, however, this question, too, would have to be left to empirical psychology. Always presupposing that psychology is capable of saying something about man as the singular and plural subject of an ultimate history of freedom before God (a history directed towards finality), it ought to try to make us understand how such radical self-discovery of the subject is possible in the unconditional surrender to the mystery which we call God – a surrender which comprehends the whole of existence – without these natural phenomena of suspension of the faculties. If this were possible, then our new question would have to be answered in the negative. Not every personal and Christian maturing process in the direction of an asymptotic – a continually approaching – perfection, which the Christian hopes to achieve in this life, also includes natural phenomena of suspension of the faculties, even though these may possibly be a useful auxiliary. That is why mysticism is not necessarily part of every Christian life.[9]

If, in reply to this conclusion, the appropriate psychology were to explain that these really natural phenomena – where the faculties are [99] suspended and so forth – are necessarily part of a personal maturing process, even if they are not always 'technically' cultivated and are perhaps frequently not subjected to reflective processes, then mysticism in the true sense would also be a normal manifestation. It would be part of the process of becoming a complete person and a complete Christian. At the same time, it would still be an open question whether, how far, and with what result, such mystical experience is a matter of conscious reflection, in the good or bad sense.

As we said at the beginning, what we are concerned with here is merely to find guidelines, or a framework, or certain premises for a theology of mysticism. This is necessary today if Christian life is not to be secularised and to end up as a flat, humanitarian affair, and if the 'charismatic' movements which are everywhere gaining a footing in the Churches in our time are to find the way to a genuine self-understanding, and come to terms with themselves in a self-critical way.[10] Finally, a mystical theology must also acquire new life in the West so that we can enter into a sympathetic and critical dialogue with the mystical theology and the [9] It will be clear from what has already been said that this conclusion is dependent on the content one associates with the word 'mysticism'. The choice arrived at here, however, is supported by general linguistic usage; cf. also I. Behn's well-known book, Spanische Mystik (Düsseldorf 1957).

[10] A number of other essays in this volume take as their starting point the modern phenomenon of 'charismatic' movements. These essays should also be taken into consideration as supplements to the question we have been dealing with here, and as deepening the viewpoint. On the presuppositions for possible dialogue with Christians in the Eastern churches on the basis of their experience, cf. V. Lossky, Die Mystische Theologie der morgenländischen Kirche (Graz 1961), ET The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (Cambridge 1957).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation mystical phenomena of the East.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[100]

9

THE LIBERTY OF THE SICK, THEOLOGICALLY CONSIDERED

An essay on the liberty of the sick, seen from a theological standpoint, is not just the same thing as an account of the Church's doctrinal statements on the subject. Of course this essay is not intended to go beyond the limits of what the Church's official doctrine says about the liberty, of the sick, either directly and expressly, or indirectly and implicitly. But in so far as the teaching of the Church has actually been formulated, it does not come to grips closely enough with what we mean by the phrase 'the liberty of the sick'. Consequently, however carefully the theologian may take the Church's doctrine into consideration, he is bound to try to say something about this subject on his own account and at his own risk, in the light of the theological data and using theological methods.

Here we shall be limiting the subject to those illnesses in which the sick person is confronted, objectively and subjectively, with death as something that is threatening him and that is pressingly close.[1] A cold, an upset stomach, or any illness which does not really force the person affected out of the circle of the people who are actively able to control their lives freely, does not present any theological problem of its own.

In the first section we shall say something about the nature of liberty as the theologian sees it. From the theological standpoint, [101] liberty is something other than a merely psychological freedom of choice in the individual act, and it differs, too, from a purely legal and civic responsibility for one's actions. Of course this first, theological section is bound to be no more than a fragment; and it stresses – and to some degree isolates – those elements of liberty, in its theological essence, which are of particular importance for our question.[2] In the second part we shall ask what the liberty of the sick as such consists of and we shall finally inquire about the invalid's claim to liberty where this touches on his relationship to his doctor.

ON THE ESSENCE OF LIBERTY

First of all we must mention a number of features of human liberty which are specifically theological and which are of particular importance for our subject. When the word 'liberty' is used in the secular sphere, it is either understood sociologically, as the absence of social compulsions and estrangements; or it is meant psychologically, as the person's freedom of choice in any given act of decision – always provided that we do not adopt the determinist view, which denies the existence of psychological freedom of choice in general, and tries to interpret responsibility, social sanctions and so forth without the concept of free choice. The theological concept of liberty certainly implies the concept of psychological freedom of choice, but it is more comprehensive and more radical.

The theological concept of liberty is theological in the first place because it explicitly or

[1] The original text of this essay was published in StdZ 193 (1975), pp. 31-40, but notes and cross-references have been supplied for the present volume. Some points considered here have already been dealt with by the present author in Zur Theologie des Todes (Quaestiones Disputatae 2), 4th edn (Freiburg 1963); ET On the Theology of Death (Edinburgh and London 1961). The new angle from which the subject is treated here may, however, open up some fresh aspects.

[2] On the problem of liberty, cf. especially Gnade als Freiheit, Herder Bücherei 322 (Freiburg 1968), with the second group of essays: 'Ermächtigung zur wahren Freiheit', pp. 31-89.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

implicitly includes the thesis that whenever there is a radically responsible, true freedom of choice, there is also a definite relation to God. This is so even though in certain circumstances – in fact very often – this relation is not conscious or considered, in any explicit sense. Real, personal freedom of choice is possible only when individual good and individual value are exceeded – even if unconsciously – in man's transcendental self, in anticipation of the Good in general and per se. But this means the existence of a theological dimension of liberty – relatedness to God – even if this is not the subject of conscious reflection. And this is inescapable, whether this relatedness is conscious and reduced to terms and terminology [102] or not. It is inescapable, whether liberty accepts this relatedness in true self-affirmation, or whether it rejects it in that ultimate denial of the self to which we theologically give the name of sin.[3]

Liberty in the theological sense, therefore, deeply and fundamentally, is not merely the ability to do one thing rather than another, let alone the possibility of always being able to do the opposite of what one has done before. It is rather the possibility open to the free subject or person of disposing totally and finally of himself and his life, as an individual and a whole. Liberty in the theological sense means, first and last, the one and total subject himself in so far as he is object for himself – in so far as the actor, the act, and what has been performed are one – in so far as the one and total life is set in irrevocable finality through this act of liberty; in so far, that is to say, as what we are accustomed to call the eternal being of man comes into existence. And by eternity we do not mean an endlessly continuing time that succeeds our earthly life. We mean the freely ordered finality of the person and his earthly life before God.

These indications of the theological nature of liberty show that there are two different groups of related problems which we must consider in a little more detail. The first is the problem of the relationship between liberty in the theological sense, and the individual, empirical, single object, which can be objectified and expressed in words. The second is the problem of the relationship between liberty and time.

As far as the first problem is concerned, we must here briefly say that the fulfilment of human liberty (by which we mean the self-determination of the total subject in the direction of finality) is, of course, inevitably mediated through some individual object of an a posteriori kind, existing in space, time and history. It is to this that liberty chooses to be related in its act of choice, though of course in order to establish its own real nature, which is the self-fulfilment of the person or subject. But this individual object, which is indispensable if liberty is to be consummated, in itself gives no final and certain information as to what the self-consummation of the subject really [103] is, and whether it is for good or evil. It is possible for a person to align himself with God for his salvation, at least unconsciously, because he lets himself fall into the incomprehensibility of his existence in serene hope; though it may well be that the object on which this saving disposal of the self is exercised is materially not only very unimportant and limited, but even ought not to exist, and ought not to be realised at all, if it is tested against the obligatory norms and circumstances of this world.[4]

It is therefore, fundamentally speaking, quite possible for personal liberty to be fulfilled

[3] For additional material which may give added depth to our view of the subject, cf. what has been said about 'choice' in the following essays in Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979): 'Experience of the Spirit and Existential Commitment', pp. 24-34; 'Modern Piety and the Experience of Retreats', pp. 135-55; and 'Reflections on a New Task for Fundamental Theology', pp. 156-66.

[4] For the idea of decision as fundamental option, the author is indebted to Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises. His theological work has been continually influenced by the desire to work out the theological implications of the spiritual stimulus he has found there, and to make that stimulus fruitful theologically, cf. the essays quoted in n. 3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even when the material for decision which is offered to the actual free subject a posteriori can no longer be fitted into the 'normal' contexts of human life and society, with its structures and norms, where the person who is 'served' by his experience only in this way is no longer 'responsible' in the civic and psychiatric sense. It is quite conceivable, basically speaking, for a free and personal self-ordering of the subject to get along with a much smaller amount of mediating material than we have to assume and demand in normal civic life if we are to concede responsibility to someone. It is conceivable that a particular objective material which is presented to a person from outside and is in itself conceptually understood, may not be eligible at all as material for the person's real self-fulfilment, because of the actual structure or make-up of the person himself.

The second problem is the obscure relationship between liberty and time. Theologically, liberty must be understood as the personal self-determination of the subject, through which he completes himself as a whole, together with his whole earthly life, in the direction of its final and ultimate form.[5] But then the conceptual scheme which Christian practice and pastoral care employ is insufficient. For there the assumption is that the final fate of men and women, in the sense of salvation or perdition, is simply determined by the final free act [104] in time, in the history of a given individual. It is decided by an act which stands at the end in temporal isolation, as it were, and this act by itself governs the whole of the person's previous life. On the other hand, the fundamental option of a person over the totality of himself as subject and over a life extending over a period of time, cannot be thought of as simply taking place outside time and history, and as revealing itself from this meta-historical point only in the many temporally distributed acts of the person. Even free acts, in which the person orders himself and his life in its totality, must take place in history, and must have a place in time and space within the history of the person himself. Otherwise history – and salvation-history above all – becomes a semblance without an essence, on to which a liberty which is above time is projected.

Because of the incongruence we have already indicated between the material through which liberty is mediated and the original act of liberty as the self-ordering of the personal subject himself, the place and time at which such an act of liberty takes place in a person's life can never be unequivocally stated. Nor should we maintain that a fundamental option of this kind is possible only once, and that it cannot be revised later by the same existentially radical act of decision in the form of a later choice. It is true that human liberty as self-ordering does not imply the arbitrary revisability of its decisions, as if these decisions could continually be remade indefinitely; it wants these decisions to take the form of final decisions. But as liberty that is finite and materially mediated, it always exposes itself to still current time; and so it arrives at the fulfilment of its own nature only through the fact that time stops, because of an event which is not simply within the power of liberty itself, although by virtue of its own nature it lays itself open to that event.

THE LIBERTY OF THE SICK PERSON

Here the liberty of the sick means quite specifically the liberty of the sick person in his confrontation with death. This relationship between liberty, in the theological sense, and death is of a quite particular kind. But it is easily understandable if we remember what we have just said about liberty in the theological sense; and if at the same time we take into [5] On the question of time, seen theologically, cf. the essays on the subject which have been gathered together from the different volumes of Theological Investigations and printed in paperback form in K. Rahner, Zur Theologie der Zukunft (dtv 4076) (Munich 1971).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

account the Christian conviction that in death a person's free history assumes its final form. This means that the final 'Judgement' of the person takes place. It means that the person who in his [105] liberty always has to do consciously or unconsciously with God, finally finds him or loses him.

The situation of approaching death is really an unusual situation for liberty. For death brings to an end the time and space in which a person orders himself in the direction of finality. At all events the free subject cannot be certain that a radical, fundamental choice has already been made in his lifetime in such a way that there is no longer any danger of its being upset again in sickness or dying. This means that the situation of approaching death is really a radical challenge to liberty to decide finally for God on the very basis of the 'material' offered by the process of dying, with its helplessness and loneliness. It should decide for God by accepting serenely and hopefully this 'hopeless' situation of radical helplessness and of being engulfed by the incomprehensibility of what we call God.[6]

This means that a person ought to die 'consciously' as far as possible. He ought not simply to suffer death but should also paradoxically suffer it actively as an act of liberty. He therefore has the right to know that he is going to die, and when. If and in so far as this knowledge can reach the dying person only by means of a communication made to him by the people round him, this communication must not be withheld. If the moment when this communication is made, and the way in which it is made, are chosen properly, it does not have to come as a frightening shock to the dying person. The very helplessness which the patient experiences inwardly can awake a gently composed awareness of death as the situation confronting him. For unless it is a completely sudden death, biologically speaking, the dying are aware of the situation they are in, even if they suppress their awareness for a while.

Because, and in so far as, death (or the act of dying) is a special situation for liberty in the theological sense, man has a right, and even something of a duty, to mould the situation in such a way that it offers as many opportunities for liberty as possible, even in an empirical sense. An alleviation of suffering which does not simply reduce the sick person to unconsciousness, but leaves him conscious and makes a greater serenity of spirit possible than would be the case if he were overwhelmed by pain in the physiological sense, is therefore [106] not merely a claim made by the vital self-assertion of the patient himself. It is also a demand of liberty in the theological sense, which rightly desires to win for itself as extensive a space as possible and, as far as possible, right up to the frontier of death. The alleviation of pain is not merely important for the patient's physiological and psychological well-being. It is also important in the struggle for the greatest possible area of liberty in the theological sense – an area where a history of salvation may be played out.

What we have just said, however, is not a final answer to the problem of an alleviation of pain which makes the sick person more or less unconscious and incapable of responsible decision. In our present context we need only say that there is no need to dispense with an alleviation of this sort, as long as it does not mean directly killing the patient, and as long as the nature and violence of the pain would in any case permit no more extensive area of liberty.[7]

'STYLES OF DYING'

[6] In view of the process of dying, the present author does not share the familiar 'hypothesis of a final decision' which is supported by L. Boros in The Movement of Truth: Mysterium Mortis (London 1965).

[7] On the problem of illness and the sick person cf. especially 'The Saving Force and Healing Power of Faith', Theological Investigations V (London 1966), pp. 460-7; 'Proving Oneself in Time of Sickness', Theological Investigations VII (London 1971), pp. 275-84.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the course of Christian history, the awareness that death (i.e. the act of dying, as distinct from the state of having died) is a special situation for liberty in the theological sense has given rise to what Arthur Jores has called different 'styles of dying'.[8] It is not merely a question of administering the 'sacraments of the dying' (which is not simply and directly obvious). There is not merely a special sacrament for the sick who are near death.[9] Formerly there was also a social and religious ritual for dying, which has largely faded into disuse today. Dying was not merely seen as a biological happening. It was a personal, historical, free event, which quite actively brought life to its final state: eternity. The dying person gathered his family round him, gave them his final blessing, expressed his last wishes, affirmed his [107] faith and hope in a gracious God, prayed the prayers for the dying with those round him and so on. All this can be significant as the completion and proclamation of the task of dying as part of a person's own history of freedom. The sober courage befitting the Christian in the hour of death, and indeed a great deal else in this traditional style of dying, may seem to be the reflection of a genuine kind of liberty in the face of death. All the same, this particular 'style of dying' is, when all is said and done, historically conditioned in many ways, and need not in itself be permanently adopted. (We shall come back later to the sacraments of the dying, which are distinct from the other 'stylistic' elements of dying in its traditional form.)

That is one side of the matter. But it is impossible to maintain that the total and final consummation of liberty on the part of the human subject in the direction of finality – i.e. death as total act of liberty – always takes place in immediate proximity to death in the medical sense. In most cases the doctors will have before them a dying person whose condition in any case makes it difficult to conceive (without arbitrary hypotheses) how he could be capable of any radical personal act in this situation – by which I mean an act through which he freely disposes of himself and the ultimate meaning of his life in a thoroughly radical way. Moreover, there is no cogent theological reason for postulating the opposite of what the medical situation would lead us to suppose. The act in which a person freely orders himself in the direction of finality can, even in the case of a 'responsible' person, take place much earlier and can, for internal or external reasons, be the final act of this kind even though it takes place a considerable time before death in the medical sense. Dying in the medical sense and dying as an act of liberty need not coincide chronologically. What took place and could take place in life as an act of free and final disposal of the self, on the basis of a relatively modest and not at all explicit 'material' for the exercise of liberty, is not necessarily also possible in the case of dying in the medical sense, not even if the 'material' there is more explicitly religious and the situation of the dying person is a 'devout' one.

HUMAN AND RELIGIOUS HELP IN DYING

There are people who under certain circumstances are called to help the sick person to arrive at a clearly religious death and an explicitly religious act of liberty in dying. (This help does not always have to [108] be an official pastoral duty. It may also be a humane and Christian duty of love on the part of nurses and doctors.) For these people what we have just said has particular consequences. These helpers should draw on the gift of 'testing the spirits', so as to try to help the dying person to the attitude which is open to this particular individual in the light of his life history and his religious knowledge and capabilities. A helper of this kind should not therefore exploit the sick person's weakness in order to clothe his death with the [8] cf. A. Jores, Menschsein als Auftrag (Bern 1964), especially pp. 114-17 and 121-34.

[9] On the sacrament of the anointing of the sick, cf. K. Rahner, Kirche und Sakramente (Quaestiones Disputatae 10) (Freiburg 1960), especially pp. 100-4; 'Bergend und heilend – Über das Sakrament der Kranken' in K. Rahner, Die siebenfältige Gabe – Über die Sakramente der Kirche (Munich 1974), pp. 115-37.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hastily donned garment of a religious act which he is not actually able to perform existentially, and which, therefore, contributes nothing to his eternal salvation. If a dying person rejects the visit of a priest or pastor, or any other religious help, his wish should be respected. There should be no attempt to enlist the indiscreet help of relatives or nurses, in order to influence him to the contrary. These people may perhaps be more concerned about social 'respectability' than about the religious meaning of the anointing of the sick and the viaticum, or the eternal salvation of the sick person. (But this is not intended to lay down rules for a person who is charismatically endowed and who can trust himself to achieve a deeper and more genuine conversion or repentance in the spirit of the sick person.) When a dying person is no longer able to arrive at an obviously religiously articulated acceptance of death, or a free and saving act, the question of his salvation is completely open for the person who is at his side. It is a question he cannot decide. For the dying person the personally decisive hour of salvation may have taken place much earlier, while he was still in the midst of life, and the material for his free act may not have been expressly and verbally religious at all.

When it is possible to help the dying person to find an expressly religious significance in his death, and when this is accepted by the sick person, the most important thing, even for Catholics, is that the dying person should arrive at a religiously existential attitude towards death. Receiving the 'Last Sacraments' is only secondary to this. In the case of a Catholic who has practised his religion with normal zeal, these things normally coincide. But this is not true of people who have hitherto been used to little or no expressly religious observance. With these people it may be possible under certain circumstances – and it is also theologically legitimate – to help them to acquire a right inner attitude to the possibility of death (hopeful resignation to their fate etc.). There is no need to expect them immediately to accept a sacramental act. That would only overtax and shock them. Of course [109] in a situation of this kind an earlier sacramental practice, which the dying person was accustomed to a long time previously, can be revived without any great difficulty, so that the sacramental event, in its tangibility and clarity, may facilitate and confirm the act of hopeful resignation to death as God's decree. But this is not always the case, and where there is any doubt the decision should be in favour of help in the existential acts of the dying person. Nobody should force a sacramental event on him which, quite innocently perhaps, he cannot really endorse, and which for that reason he quite rightly refuses.

Of course a position of this kind also means that the people surrounding the sick person are not simply released from the outset from the duty of giving any kind of religious help, just because the invalid is incapable of receiving the sacraments or rejects them. Explicit contrition for the sins of one's past life is really an essential part of a free and living act at the hour of death – if, and in so far as, this sense of sin is alive in the person or can be awakened out of its suppression. But the hoping act of acceptance of one's own situation can be implicit contrition. A person may sometimes succeed in achieving that more easily than in finding an express relationship to past events, to which he no longer feels related. This must also be remembered in connection with religious help for the sick – for example, with regard to the content of prayers said in the presence of the sick person.

THE FREE CHOICE OF DOCTOR

When we come to the claim which the liberty of the sick makes on the physician, we must first of all say something about the free choice of doctor. This is an essential sphere for the liberty of the sick person. If illness were a purely biological event which took place in some realm detached from the actual free person himself, it might be judged an open question

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whether the sick person must basically have the right to choose his doctor freely, or whether the State could prescribe a health-service functionary, in the same way that it prescribes other functionaries without asking our permission first.

But for the free person as such, a severe illness means a particular and unique situation. In order for him to fulfil his inner liberty, a person must in principle be conceded as wide a sphere of liberty as possible. Consequently the free choice of doctor is one of the essentials for liberty. Institutions and procedures such as the licensing of medical [110] personnel, the appointment of official doctors for particular groups of people, the compulsory medical examinations required by the State – all these things should continually lead us to ask whether they are not reducing the free choice of doctor more than is absolutely necessary. And 'absolutely necessary' means more than is legitimately required by circumstances and by the legitimate pursuit of other benefits for society as a whole.

It is undoubtedly true that the free choice of doctor is often a mere faded ideal, which for social and economic reasons is largely becoming an illusion. Where this is the case, these social and economic conditions must be altered, in order to facilitate, in real terms, as free a choice of doctor as possible. Of course the right to a free choice of doctor must continually be a matter of fresh compromise with other human values and rights. We must not see it in isolation. But we might also ask whether the possibility of choosing one's doctor freely is not restricted by the unjustifiably high fees which doctors themselves charge. We might well ask whether it is right for doctors' fees to be thrown open to free competition, like the prices of other commodities, and whether to do so is not a contradiction of the sick person's right to choose his doctor freely.

THE RIGHT TO DIE

Part of the sick person's liberty with regard to his doctor is the right to die. We need not inquire here whether under certain circumstances the sick person may even have a duty to claim this right. At all events, the patient, as a free person, is not simply the object of the doctor who allows himself to be guided solely by his aim to prolong the biological life of the sick person for as long as possible, without any reference to other points of view held by the patient himself or by society. There are other values and aims which may make the sick person (or, it may be, someone close to him who represents his interests and is also called to defend his other rights too) freely express the wish not to be prevented from dying.

It is true that, according to the general Christian and Catholic view, it is not objectively and morally legitimate to will an action which is aimed directly at causing the death of the sick person. That is to say, no direct control over a person's biological life as a whole can be morally justified. But according to the view of Catholic moral theology, this does not mean that the patient or the doctor has the [111] positive duty to apply every conceivable and actually possible means to prolong biological life. It is the generally accepted view of Catholic moral theology that the application of measures for a positively useful purpose – for example the relief of pain – is permissible even when these measures involve a certain curtailment of the patient's life, if this is an unintentional though known and accepted side-effect. For this is no different from what happens at other times in human life, when a person puts up with something which is harmful from a purely biological point of view if he can thereby arrive at a higher quality of living.

There are theoretical obscurities about these specific rules, which try to distinguish between the legitimate permitting of a person to die, and direct killing. These need further clarification. This clarification might perhaps bring about a considerable re-structuring of the answer to the problems we have touched on here. There are also practical difficulties about

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the actual application of these rules. But since it is impossible simply to get rid of the problems themselves, we may and must meanwhile work with rules and distinctions of this kind, in order to find a 'middle of the road' between euthanasia on the one hand (by which we mean the direct killing of a sick person at his request) and an absolute, unconditional will to preserve biological life, without taking any other points of view into account. If we reject euthanasia in the sense in which we have defined it, and if we hold the preservation of biological life at all costs (even at the cost of inhumanity) to be wrong, then we shall have to accept the validity of the rule-of-thumb view we have indicated. We must simply see it as a pure rule of thumb, and hope that the moral theologians will clarify the problem further in the future. [10]

A more specialised question arises in this context too. Does the sick person's right to be allowed to die merely permit the doctor to accept his wishes, or does it actually lay on him the duty of allowing the patient to die? In a conflict between the patient's wish for a speedy end, and the doctor's will to preserve life for as long as possible, the doctor will in practice generally have his way and will override the patient's wishes. This will be the case especially if he has the impression that the patient's desire is the expression of his illness and his [112] pain, rather than a genuine, personal decision; and if he is understandably reluctant to do anything except fulfil his primary task as doctor – to defend and preserve life. But this is not a solution to the problem. Does the genuine, personal, carefully considered decision and will of the sick person to accept death, even if it could be postponed for a certain time, correspond on the doctor's side to a real moral duty to carry out his patient's wish? For as doctor he has not merely entered into the service of a physiological defence of life. When he accepts a sick person as patient he accepts the duty to serve a person and his total and entire life history (even if under a particular aspect).

It might be said that a problem of this kind is highly academic and arises only in rare cases, because it can only be a question of the will of a sick person during his illness, not while he is still in good health. A decision of this kind made in health cannot simply be accepted as being valid in the situation of illness. In illness itself a truly personal will of this kind seldom exists, and the doctor is seldom able to discern unequivocally that it exists. But we cannot view such cases as impossible, and that means that the problem exists. In addition there is the problem of whether the relatives of an unconscious and dying person can on his behalf express the will to allow him to die, and can express it in such a way that the doctor has the duty to carry out their wish.

The question seems an obscure one. For in general a person's wish, even though it may be morally legitimate, does not imply another's duty to enable him to carry out his intention. Also – unless there is an express agreement between patient and doctor – it is impossible to prove that the acceptance of medical duties towards a particular patient necessarily implies the readiness to carry out the patient's wishes in this particular respect. Admittedly the opposite cannot be proved either, in view of the doctor's role towards the patient as a total person. We must also consider whether a doctor can opt out of a doctor-patient relationship which was freely entered into on both sides, if he is clearly confronted with the sick person's will to be allowed to die. This question is hard to answer too; for on the one hand a relationship that has been freely entered into can equally freely be terminated; on the other hand, a sick person in the cases we are assuming here will find it hard to find another doctor.

Basically speaking, I incline to the view that the doctor does have the duty we have been discussing. This is the only way in which an inhumane and undignified prolongation of life can be prevented. And [113] a doctor who recognises this duty will more easily get over his [10] For moral theology's view of euthanasia, cf. the articles by W. Schöllgen in LThK III, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1959), 1207-8, and H. Vorgrimler in LThK IX, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1964), 1053-4; also the bibliographies.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understandable reluctance to let a person die, even though he could have preserved his life for a while longer. But in these questions even Christian ethics no longer succeed in formulating rules which are factually unambiguous, directly applicable and generally comprehensible.

Liberty is a mystery. In its fundamental character, it is the necessity imposed on man to decide freely for or against the Incomprehensibility which we call God. It is the possibility of letting oneself fall in hope and in unconditional trust into this Incomprehensibility as goal, bliss and human fulfilment. The highest power which liberty has is consummated in the helplessness of death. The doctor, too, is drawn into this individual history of liberty and death. He can really fulfil his very own, specific task (as distinct from other human acts) only if he is more than a physician – if, in the fulfilment of his medical task, he is truly man and even (anonymously[11] or expressly) a Christian. For that reason the liberty of the sick person, which arrives at its final frontier and its completion in the process of dying, cannot be a matter of indifference to him. He, too, is fighting for the space for, and the right to, this same ultimate liberty. He – as well as the sick person – should resign himself in silent and serene hope to the mystery of death, after he has fought for this earthly life to the last possible moment. The doctor is a servant of liberty.

[11] For 'anonymous' in this sense, cf. 'Anonymous and Explicit Faith', Theologica1 Investigations XVI (London 1979), pp. 52-9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[114]

10

‘THE INTERMEDIATE STATE’

How dogmatically binding is the concept of what we call ‘the intermediate state’? I should like to offer a few ideas on this subject here. What is meant by the doctrine of the intermediate state is that between the death of any individual person, if it takes place before the general eschatological perfecting of all men, and the final consummation of all history (which we generally call ‘the resurrection of the flesh’ and ‘the Last Judgement’) there is an intermediate temporal state. Initially, we need not go into what the word ‘temporality’ could mean here, or how precisely we ought to conceive of it. What we are interested in is that, according to the definition of Benedict XII,[1] the glorification of the body does not take place ‘simultaneously’ with the personal state of the beatific vision, or purgatory or damnation, which ensue immediately after death.

My intention here is not to deny the doctrine of the intermediate state. I should only like to point out that it is not a dogma, and can therefore remain open to the free discussion of theologians. We shall leave the question open, whether in our time the doctrine of the intermediate state does not perhaps enjoy a certain merit on kerygmatic or didactical grounds, or for reasons connected with religious instruction, or with the history of thought. Where this intellectual framework is still alive and undisputed, and where it can without difficulty make clear to people what is really meant – the blessedness [115] of their souls and the glorification of their bodies – no objection can be levied against it, even today. There is no reason against the proclamation of the real truths involved in the form of this particular notion. But again we need not go into that here.

Basically, I should like to postulate only the following: it is by no means certain that the doctrine about the intermediate state is anything more than an intellectual framework, or way of thinking. So whatever it has to tell us (apart from statements about the commencement through death of the final form of man’s history of freedom, and about the inclusion of the body in this final form) does not necessarily have to be part of Christian eschatology itself. We might put the matter differently and say: no one is in danger of defending a heresy if he maintains the view that the single and total perfecting of man in ‘body’ and ‘soul’ takes place immediately after death; that the resurrection of the flesh and the general judgement take place ‘parallel’ to the temporal history of the world; and that both coincide with the sum of the particular judgements of individual men and women. As long as he can produce good reasons for his view he can go on maintaining his opinion, always provided that he does not mean that the time scheme of world history itself can also be eliminated from his theological statement.

If we are properly to appreciate the arguments for the latter thesis, in the form to which we have narrowed it down, we must not overlook the fact that it is essentially a negative one. That is to say, it explicitly does not aim to offer any stringent proof which would lead to a direct denial of the intermediate state. However, we can here only briefly indicate the line of argument; for my aim is merely to encourage a further investigation of the question.

The doctrinal statements of the Church as we have them, in the dogmatically binding form in which Benedict XII and others put them forward, were not really concerned thematically

[1] Benedict XII, pope 1334-42. Cf. his constitution Benedictus Deus of 1336 (Denz. 1000-2). According to the preliminary remark in DS this is a definitio ex cathedra, cf. A. Ahlbrecht, ‘Zwischenzustand’, LThKX, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1965), 1441-2 (with bibliography).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and directly with the question which we have defined above. They are concerned to make other assertions, even though they do rest on the assumption that there is such a thing as an intermediate state (a presupposition which they do not really consider as if it were a separate question of its own). For this is what seems to follow from the fact that the glorification of the body has not yet taken place, although the person has already passed through death. It is this unconsidered assumption, therefore, which lies behind the doctrinal statements we have referred to. The statements themselves talk about the things which they want [116] to say clearly and unequivocally, in the light of this assumption; but they do not teach the assumption itself as a truth that is binding for faith. There is no doubt that what the defined statements want to do is to stress the perfecting of the soul and the glorification of the body as Christian truths. Anyone who thinks that he can maintain this doctrine in all its fullness without continuing to presuppose an intermediate state in the sense in which we have defined it, is not compelled to go along with the underlying assumption behind the doctrinal assertion. We might illustrate this by taking just one specific example from the recent history of theology: monogenism – the idea that mankind stems biologically from a single pair of ancestors. Anyone who can make it plain today that we can adhere to the doctrine of original sin even without the notion of monogenism, is not bound to acknowledge monogenism for the sake of original sin; even though traditionally and hitherto the two tenets have always been formulated together.[2]

WHAT DO THE SCRIPTURES SAY?

But is not the tradition we have mentioned in connection with our question really derived from holy Scripture? In other words, ought we not to judge the presupposition too as belonging to revelation? In order to understand and interpret the statements of Scripture correctly here, we must remember that in the Scriptures ‘the resurrection of the flesh’ is not understood as being the final destiny of the body as such. On the contrary, the statement always means the destiny of the one and total person who as such is ‘flesh’.[3] It is true that Scripture is also familiar with the phrase ‘to be with Christ’, which belongs to the Christian’s death – that is to say, entry into paradise ‘today’, at the moment of death.[4] But the two assertions belong to two quite different series of statements or statement complexes, and they are not harmonised in the Scriptures by means of the notion of the intermediate state.

[117] If we are to see this clearly, we must notice the origin and history of the two statement complexes in the New Testament. The relatively late doctrine about the future resurrection of the righteous, and then of all men (which was still disputed at the time of Jesus), was based on the conviction that God demonstrates his mighty will to salvation for his people of the covenant.[5] This divine will salvation is subsequently applied to the individual as such, because this individual is to participate in the final salvation of God’s people, even if he dies before that people is finally redeemed by God. He must be saved, he must ‘rise again’. But this salvation means the one and total person, not merely his body; for even the ‘Sheol’

[2] For details see the recent account by the present author in the digression ‘Erbsünde und Monogenismus’ in K.-H. Weger, Theologie der Erbsünde (Quaestiones Disputatae 44) (Freiburg 1970), pp. 176-223. Here the author also considers his own earlier remarks on the subject.
[3] Cf. also the essay ‘The Body in the Order of Salvation’, pp. 71-89 in this volume.
[4] C. Luke 23:43; John 5:24.
[5] Cf. Paul’s behaviour before the Sanhedrin, Acts 23:6-8; also Luke 20:27; Acts 24:15, 21.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of the Old Testament[6] is anything but the salvation of the 'soul'. Consequently we can in no way appeal to 'Sheol' for the idea of a (happy) intermediate state. So when we read in the New Testament that at the moment of death a person is already 'in paradise', or 'with Christ', this only means that death, too, belongs to the powers and forces which ultimately cannot harm the man or woman who lives through his faith in Jesus Christ. The actual way in which this idea is to be realised (and above all the way in which it can perhaps be harmonised with the doctrine about the eschatological raising of the dead) is not considered in any detail in the Scriptures. Can the two statement complexes be made to coincide, partially or wholly? That is the very question which must remain open. Traditionally, people have tried to reconcile the two ideas theologically by means of the notion of the intermediate state. But the success of the attempt is just what we are calling in question here. At all events, this idea must be laid to the account of this late theology; and it is that theology which risked this formulation. It is not in itself New Testament doctrine. In this connection it is interesting to note that, in interpreting the liberation from Sheol of the people who died before Christ by the dead and risen Christ himself, the great majority of the Fathers understood it in the light of Jewish teaching about the resurrection. They saw it as a physical resurrection, not as the freeing of the soul alone for the contemplation of God. The attempt to harmonise the statements of an individual and a collective eschatology is accordingly a problem of theological history in the first place. At [118] the period of Benedict XII it received an answer to some degree, and at least temporarily, through Benedict's decision, according to which the soul was assigned a perfection of its own, which is completely independent of the future fate of the body. But even this decision does not forbid anyone to teach that the soul may possibly enjoy greater blessedness after the resurrection of the body.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE HISTORY OF THEOLOGY

After all that we have said, we must come to the conclusion that the genesis of the idea of an intermediate state in the Middle Ages was a stage in the history of theology, but no more than that. It is the attempt to reconcile the collective and the individual view of eschatological perfection. But the word 'intermediate' is not really covered by what is meant. It has to be understood as the 'intermediate' point between two other points in a movement of thought which, though it starts from two different statement complexes, is supposed to come together today in complete identification, by way of the partial identification of the statements with the help of the notion of the intermediate state. But to see and formulate the matter in this way by no means involves asserting that in our own time we no longer need to think about the nature of collective, cosmic perfection, simply because we want to bring together the collective aspect of eschatology, in the resurrection of the dead, and the individual eschatological blessedness of the individual soul, without any such intermediate state – that is to say, without an intermediate period of time. For we ought at least to read what we have said about the individual into the concept of the final consummation, as one element of a progressive transformation of world history and the cosmos in general.

But the idea of the intermediate state also comes up against considerable intellectual difficulties, even if we ignore for a moment the problems which could not even be entirely suppressed in classical theology. These difficulties are above all those which are related to the question of 'time' 'after' death. The assumption of an intermediate state raises new,

[6] For an explanation DB points to 'enfer' (hell) and Hades; cf. DBS II (Paris 1934), 1063-76. Haag, Bibel-Lexikon, 2nd edn (Zürich 1968), 1537, refers the reader to 'Hölle' (ibid., 758-9) and 'Totenreich' (ibid., 1773-4).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

difficult problems here, which do not crop up at all if the one and total person is removed from empirical time through his death. How are we to think of time and the temporality of a departed soul, if on the one hand the soul is already with God in its perfected state, but on the other hand has 'to wait' for the reassumption of its function towards its own body? Does not a word such as [119] aevum, or the like (which designates the duration of a finite but completed substance, no longer possessing a free history of its own), simply cover up the problem, instead of illuminating it? Do not words of this kind smack somewhat of mythology? Do they not blur what is really a radical difference – the radical difference between, on the one hand, a temporal state which is not merely our experience of time in the sense of physics, but which has freedom as its very essence; and, on the other hand, the final consummation of the history of freedom which can then no longer be thought of in terms of time at all? For otherwise we should be immediately faced once more with the question, why in such an aevum (or whatever we like to call this 'time') free history is no longer possible. Here, however, as we said above, we shall leave these problems about time on one side, although people were highly conscious of them earlier as well, in connection with the notion of the intermediate state. But there are still other difficulties today.

The classical doctrine of the intermediate state must reckon speculatively with an anima separata. But this idea leads to a number of dilemmas, which seem insoluble if we take as our premise the doctrine of the soul which defines it as being the forma corporis, and which asserts the real, substantial unity of body and soul.[7] For if we really take seriously this doctrine of the anima as being the forma corporis through its own substantial reality, the act whereby the body is 'informed' by the soul is not an additional and (in the scholastic sense) 'accidental' determination of that soul. The informing is identical with the soul itself. A denial of this statement would mean the abolition of a real substantial unity of man, whether this be admitted or not.

But then, how can there afterwards still be an anima separata? Can the soul lose something with which it is identical, without itself ceasing to exist? Earlier, I myself tried to avoid this dilemma by postulating a cosmic relation between the finite human spirit and matter, that is to say, the one matter of the world. This relation would then still remain and would be preserved even when the precise way in which, during its earthly life, the body is formed through this relation between matter and spirit ceased to exist. But it must be admitted that the whole problem becomes much easier if this enduring relation between spirit and matter is expressed scholastically as the [120] enduring 'informedness' of the glorified body by the perfected spiritual soul. Indeed, probably no metaphysically thinking theologian would continue to maintain today (for either philosophical or theological reasons) that the identity of the glorified body and the earthly body is only ensured if some material fragment of the earthly body is found again in the glorified body. For this kind of identity cannot even be found in the earthly body, because of its radical metabolic processes. And this kind of thinking is completely inconceivable with a modern conception of matter, since for modern natural philosophy it is extremely problematical, if not impossible, to split up mere matter into so many 'substantial' and clearly divisible particles, as pre-scientific experience believed could be done. How would it in any way serve the identity between the earthly and the glorified body if we were to think into the resurrection body a material particle of this kind, which had earlier been the 'property' of the earthly body? Anything of this kind is today simply no longer tenable or conceivable. For us, identity consists, now and in the future, of the identity of the free, spiritual subject, which we call 'the soul'. That is why even empirical experience of the corpse in the grave can no longer provide an argument for there having been no 'resurrection'. So why should we not put the resurrection at that particular moment

[7] Council of Vienne, 1312: Constitution Fidei catholicae, cf. Denz. 902.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

when the person's history of freedom is finally consummated, which is to say at his death?

PHILOSOPHICAL BACKGROUND

A modern philosophy may be able to affirm and go along with the doctrine of the real distinction between body and soul, since this also makes it comprehensible that the person as subject of what is transcendent without limit, and therefore as the subject of freedom, cannot simply be matter in the normal sense of the material objects with which we are otherwise familiar.

But this means that for such a philosophy man counts empirically and ontologically, first and last, as being one. A pluralism of substance in him can only be viewed as the multiplicity of metaphysical elements, that is to say, ontological principia entis. It cannot be seen as the fundamental multiplicity of substantial realities, thought of as existing in themselves. At all events, contemporary philosophy only recognises man's spiritual life in so far as it is also and at the same time material in any given case. It simply does not exist in any other [121] way and cannot be understood by philosophy in any other way either. Even the most spiritual act of man always has in reality a material element. An act of this kind may perhaps be thought of in abstract terms as being purely spiritual, but this is simply a process of intellectual conceptualisation.

On these presuppositions, the evidence for man's 'immortality' offered by a metaphysical anthropology cannot mean that the 'soul's' immortality has been established. On the contrary, the aim must be to show here that man, as a being of transcendence and freedom and of absolute responsibility in hope, must not think of himself in any way other than as a being who, through his own history of freedom, acquires finality before God. I believe that it is quite possible to show that this is so. In other words, in modern philosophy generally, what we traditionally distinguish (talking about the immortality of the soul on the one hand, and the resurrection of the body on the other) can only be grasped as being one.

But this means that the notion of the intermediate state recedes from the outset behind the questions which a philosophical anthropology is faced with today. It must be noted here, however, that the dogma of the resurrection of the body – as long as it is not misinterpreted in a mythological sense – can by no means be known only by way of revelation. Consequently it may be said that, in view of its understanding of the unity of man, modern metaphysical anthropology can never (or only with the greatest reservations) consider that an intermediate state, or an absolutely non-material mode of existence on the part of the spiritual subject, is possible.

The traditional scholastic doctrine about the anima as forma in se subsistens, which can then also exist as separata, is, in its own sense, not directly affected by this. That is to say, it can remain correct and meaningful, provided that it is no longer intended to mean more than that through his death man is not destroyed, but arrives at perfection. If, on the other hand, the doctrine is linked also with the notion that a soul can go on existing just by itself (since it no longer has its body), then this proof (which is really the only one which scholasticism puts forward) rests on an assumption for which there is no evidence. Indeed it can quite well be disputed, as is clear from what we said above. For it means quite simply the soul's absolute liberation from the body after death.

But quite apart from this assumption, a forma in se subsistens, which can be free of the body, has no sound reason in itself. For – once one [122] has penetrated the determining conditions – why should a doctrine of the intermediate state still be forced on to a contemporary anthropology? For it is not at all certain that in theology this notion was ever more than a conceptual aid, designed to make clear (in the light of existing secular

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation philosophical or vulgarly empirical views) that the Christian may be responsible before God for the final nature of his own free history. At the same time he would understand from this standpoint, too, that he cannot on his side exclude from this promised finality, a priori and platonically, what we know as his specific historical character, which is to say his body.

THEOLOGICAL OBJECTIONS

But the theologian might still have something more to say here. Against the view we have expounded, he might put forward the idea that the doctrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin into eternal glory 'in body and soul'[8] proves after all the very fact that apart from Jesus other men and women are not granted such a destiny immediately after their death. But the definition of the Blessed Virgin's assumption does not tell us that this was a privilege which was reserved for her alone. Whether, when this dogmatic declaration was drawn up, those involved may privately have thought something like this is unimportant today. The patristic tradition (which there was certainly no intention to disavow through the dogma) often talks about such finally glorified persons. We may think, for example, of those whom the risen Lord liberated from Sheol. At the same time, there is a factual difference in the case of the Virgin Mary which also lent the express assertion its special cogency, for – other than the rest of the saved – she enjoys a position in Christian salvation history which is hers alone. For this reason it was quite justifiable to state the truth explicitly, even if it really applies to everyone who achieves blessedness. At all events we cannot view it as illegitimate to make this statement. After all, the degree of theological certainty differs according as to whether one and the same statement is made about Mary, the Mother of the Lord, or about the redeemed in general. However that may be: if we want to defend Pope Pius XII's dogma convincingly and effectively (especially to Protestant theology) the task is made considerably easier (and has considerably more chance [123] of success) if we assume that it is superfluous to posit an intermediate state in considering the eternal salvation for which all men and women are destined.

Of course numerous other objections can be raised against this proposition, with the help of Scripture and tradition. There seem to be texts enough in which the matter is described in such a way that there would seem to be an intermediate state of this kind – texts which in no way reckon with the possibility that the human body, too, could already be glorified at death. But, as we have already said, do these texts really intend to expound an intermediate state as a truth binding on faith? Or do they merely presuppose it because at the time when they were formulated, in the aftermath of Platonism and under the influence of a naively empirical view of the corpse in the grave, nothing else could be said with regard to what they had to expound clearly as being a genuine part of actual Christian faith? That is the hermeneutical problem with which we are presented here.

After what we have said, however, we may now venture an answer to this. If earlier these questions were not distinguished, and if they could not be distinguished at the time (for reasons which although by no means genuinely theological, were connected with the history of thought), this does not mean that today, too, we are obliged to neglect the distinction between the binding content of a statement and temporally conditioned modes of expression based on an intellectual framework belonging to a particular period. Anyone who wanted to call this hermeneutical principle in question today would have to cling to other intellectual frameworks or ways of thinking as well, as if they, too, were statements of fact, even though they have meanwhile been abandoned, with the tacit or express approval of the Church's [8] Const. Ap. Munificentissimus Deus, of 1 Nov. 1950; cf. Denz. 3900-4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

doctrinal authority. This would mean that we should have to believe that the earth is the centre of the universe, and that animal species are constant. We should have to adhere to monogenism, a 'materialist' view of the resurrection body, hell-fire in the physical sense, and the idea of a unified 'substance' in the eucharistic bread. We should have to believe that angels are located between the earth and the moon; that the longevity of the human race is strictly limited; that hell is to be found in the centre of the earth, and so forth.

In my view, the idea of the intermediate state contains a little harmless mythology, which is not dangerous as long as we do not take the idea too seriously and do not view it as binding on faith. Seen in that light, the strenuous efforts we have made here have [124] perhaps used rather too heavy an artillery. On the other hand, it is impossible to overlook the difficulties many people find in this idea today. For these people it may be a help to say that the idea is not really strictly binding from a theological point of view, and that consequently it is open to the individual believer to follow the theological arguments which he finds convincing. And, as we said at the beginning, that is all we intended to establish here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[125]

PART THREE

The Ministry and the Spirit

[127]

11

OPPOSITION IN THE CHURCH

THE POSSIBILITIES AND THE LIMITS

Criticism and opposition are part of human life in all its dimensions. But as a general rule they have a point only when the subjects and aspects concerned have a positive significance, fundamentally speaking, and therefore demand the courage for affirmation and inner open-mindedness. Anyone who can only criticise and oppose out of irritation repudiates himself, not the reality he is criticising. An allergic reaction, aggression, criticism and opposition can certainly be justified when someone is faced with any of the real facts of experience. But these are not a person's ultimate and sustaining basic attitudes.

When we talk here about opposition in the Church, we are not talking about criticism from outside, or about opposition in which someone says 'No' to the Church because he is outside it and – for whatever reasons – rejects it fundamentally and wholesale. What we are considering here is opposition within the Church. And this presupposes that the opponent still has a basically positive relationship to the Church. But we must realise at the very beginning that a positive relationship of this kind to the Church (and hence the position from which opposition within the Church operates) can be very varied and very intricate, both theoretically and practically. Accordingly the opposition itself will vary too; and the possibilities and limits of that opposition will not be the same for everyone.[1]

[128] A person may be baptised as a baby; as he grows up he may have some connection with the Church's doctrine and life; he may support the Church financially; may draw on what the Church has to offer religiously, to some extent or other; and may not think of leaving the Church, for individual psychological and social reasons of the most varied kind – reasons which may perhaps be judged in a thoroughly positive way. Yet that person will not necessarily have that relationship to the Church which it fundamentally requires of its adult members, in the light of what it understands itself to be. For this relationship to the Church exists only when faith in its true Christian sense exists, too, and when, together with this faith, the Church is affirmed as well, as an integral part of its reality. That is to say, there is a proper relationship to the Church only when, in an absolute commitment of one's own existence, the God is apprehended who promises himself once and for all in Jesus, the crucified and risen One; and where, in this ultimate commitment to God in Jesus, the community of faith sustained by his Spirit is also accepted, as the irrevocable place of this faith; and is accepted in its fundamental institutional character as well.

[1] The term 'opposition' generally means 'contrast' or 'resistance'. It is used mainly in politics and sociology (cf. Brockhaus Enzyklopädie XIII, 17th edn 1971, 762) for groups who want to destroy the influence of another group. The term is not used in that sense here (cf. below). On the contrary, here it means the attitude of independent criticism, or an independent opinion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But many Catholics who belong to the Church as a social institution do not have this real, believing relationship to the Church, or do not possess it clearly enough. They are members of the Church, perhaps because of family or social background, or the way they were brought up, or because they have a respect for it – all of which are reasons that precede faith. Because of the permanent temptation even to genuine faith, it is impossible to say with well-considered certainty in any specific, individual case, whether a Catholic has that relationship to the Church which is founded on faith, or only has faith's more limited, preliminary forms.

The nature of this relationship to the Church will also mean that opposition within it will take essentially different forms too. And individual Catholics will define the limits of their opposition in very different ways. If a person's relationship to the Church is merely a provisional one and is in no way based on faith's ultimate decision for God in Jesus Christ, that person will probably also consider that in certain circumstances opposition in the Church can be accentuated to the point of leaving it altogether. On the other hand, the person who takes the absolute character of his believing commitment to God in Jesus Christ with radical seriousness will not view a withdrawal of this commitment as being for him a real, inner possibility. In so far [129] as he then makes this 'yes' to the Church part of his absolute commitment, he can and will quite unequivocally understand opposition and criticism in it only within the context of the Church itself. These varying forms of criticism and opposition ought not to be ignored. But here the important thing is above all the critical attitude which a believing – that is to say absolute – relationship to the Church presupposes.

THE POSSIBILITY AND NECESSITY OF CRITICISM WITHIN THE CHURCH

The first thing that must be said about our subject is that, fundamentally speaking, there can and must be opposition and criticism in the Church, as one of its inner elements. Of course this critical opposition, which is part of belonging to the Church, must immediately be differentiated according to the actual facts which are the subject of criticism in any given case. A critical question about the sense of a defined dogma in the faith of the Church is quite different in kind from opposition to the Church's legal, pastoral or liturgical practices; for the Church itself declares that these things are historically conditioned and can be changed. A basic calling in question of the Church's authority in general and as a whole is something different from a protest against a concrete measure which, for example, a bishop may enforce, appealing thereby to the authority of his office.

But for the moment we will leave all these necessary and indeed highly essential differentiations on one side. They must not be allowed to obscure the basic thesis: the thesis that the Church's self-understanding and its own faith do not merely permit the Catholic to have an oppositional relationship to the Church (at least in the sense we have described), or make this unavoidable. An attitude of this kind is actually required of us.[2]

Even as a Christian, the Christian is a human being first of all. As human being he is unavoidably and rightly a critical being; and the scope of his 'criticism' is fundamentally identical with the scope of [130] his existence. It is true that he must always be aware that critical reflection never adequately catches up with the assumptions on which he lives; and that consequently the human person, with a certain quite legitimate naivety and originality, still has the right to live according to principles which he has not adequately reflected about [2] The attitude meant here is anchored in a basic attitude of mind which is essential for the Christian: repentance, or readiness for a new beginning. It is not only absolutely necessary for the individual Christian, but is also essential for the Church as community. On these related ideas in the thinking and work of the present author, cf. K. H. Neufeld, 'Fortschritt durch Umkehr – Zu Karl Rahners buβgeschichtlichen Arbeiten', SdZ 192 (1974), pp. 274-81.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in a critical way. But in spite of that, man – and therefore the Christian too – is a critical being. And this also applies to the faith to which he is totally committed. Absolute commitment in faith can certainly coexist with critical enquiry about that faith in any specific individual, and the two do not have to be mutually exclusive – even though considerable theoretical and practical difficulties are inherent in a co-existence of this kind.

From its own point of view, the Church undoubtedly desires to be a power which is open to critical questioning. Its faith and the basic character which derives from that faith can be grasped only in free assent. And a free assent of this kind is possible only when the actual, specific existence of the assenting person is involved also.

The faith of the Church and the specific existence of the human person therefore exist in a permanent correspondence. On the one hand the Church is invoked by faith and, on the other, that faith is critically questioned by the believer. It is only in this way that the believer can grasp faith existentially – and because of man's historical character this is a continually new task. In the case of the true believer this critical undertaking will be continuously underpinned by an absolute assent of faith. It is borne up by a continuously renewed hope that in the future, too, this critical process will never destroy the ultimate commitment of faith.

Other realities in the Church are even more open to question, because of what they themselves understand themselves to be; for they view the Church itself as historically conditioned, as resting on human decisions, and therefore as alterable. Every member of it is empowered and obliged to help to shape this historical process of the Church, in proportion to his function and the possibilities open to him. In its fundamental nature the Church is a community of faith, faith in Jesus as the crucified and risen Lord, and in the eschatologically abiding historical presence of this faith (of course also in a basically institutional form). Apart from this fundamental character, the Church's constitution is alterable and hence open to criticism. The same applies to its liturgy and sacraments to a large extent. It applies even more to its concrete relationship to the historical, cultural [131] and social situation in which it lives. And it applies also, naturally, to the specific and individual decisions of its office-holders.[3]

In short, from the point of view of the Church's self-understanding, a critical attitude on the part of the Catholic Christian to it is an essential characteristic of its nature. It does not mean any weakening of its character as Church, let alone a calling in question of that character itself. This applies both to the individual and to groups in the Church, who have no need to be empowered 'from above' before they can be set up. Of course in all this we must not overlook the fact that criticism cannot be the first and the last thing, either in human life or in the Church; and that criticism, if it is to be criticism of the Church from within, must rest on the basis of an ultimate assent to the Church's message and its self-understanding.

THE POSSIBLE DIRECTIONS WHICH CRITICISM OF THE CHURCH FROM WITHIN MAY TAKE

When we enquire in what direction criticism within the Church should be directed, we must remember that criticism does not necessarily have to be of an explicit and formal kind. Nor does it always have to be sustained by groups which have been formally constituted. It can also crop up under quite different names, and diffusely, so to speak.

Criticism can first of all take the form of a demand that the official proclamation of the [3] Cf. some fundamental observations on the subject in 'Basic Observations on the Subject of Changeable and Unchangeable Factors in the Church', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith make a more adequate attempt to bridge the gap between our contemporary awareness of things and the concrete way in which faith is proclaimed. This is, therefore, a criticism of theology, and of the proclamation of faith which is dependent on theology. This criticism is, of course, useful only when its demands respect the faith of the Church, its permanent identity and its historical continuity. But the boundary between permanent faith and an obsolete statement of that faith cannot always be drawn immediately and unequivocally. In this sector, too, petrified conservatism is just as possible as fashionable progressivism. This means that criticism and counter-criticism are often long-drawn-out processes which produce a sense of bitterness on both sides. We have to see them through with mutual tolerance, patience and hope; and all parties must clearly acknowledge [132] Christianity's one and abiding faith in God in Jesus Christ.

Legitimate opposition and criticism may also be levelled at the Church's lack of commitment in its task towards 'the world' (that is to say, modern society, with all its individual structures and tendencies), or at the insufficiency of that commitment or its wrong orientation. This is fundamentally important but it is often fashionably distorted. Such criticism is justifiable and necessary if the Church is to fulfil its critical function towards the world and society truly and decisively. In this sector no one in the Church – neither authority nor critics – is safe from mistaken attitudes and false decisions which can have unforseeable historical consequences. Discretionary judgements and decisions must continually be made. The Church cannot be exempted from this task, and is even so continually exposed to the danger of blunders and errors. That explains the necessity, and the difficulty, of all criticism.[4]

These two somewhat arbitrarily chosen examples of the direction opposition and criticism may take, show that the objects of the criticism vary considerably. When we talk about criticism and opposition, we tend to think – perhaps too much as a matter of course – of authorities: priest, bishop, episcopal conferences, the pope. Of course the authorities and office-holders are at the receiving end of opposition and criticism. But we must not overlook the fact that criticism can and must be directed towards other people as well. The Church as a whole, in its different formal and informal groups, can be the recipient of criticism. For it is not as if only the office-holders cherish attitudes and make decisions which are open to criticism. The narrow-minded mentality of individual parishes, the traditionalist theology which is animated by academic historicism rather than by the problems of human existence today, the institutions supported by the laity, which only defend the status quo – in short, every kind of, false and anachronistic attitude shown by individuals or groups in the Church – are at least just as important targets for opposition and criticism, especially since it is not as if reactionary authorities, with all their limitations, were confronted by an enlightened laity filled with positive aspirations for the future. It happens just as often that the office-holders, together with their outlook and the decisions [133] which emerge from it, merely reflect the mentality and attitudes of a large proportion of the rank and file of the Church. And it is by no means always certain from the outset that the critics are always right. So criticism always necessarily evokes counter-criticism.[5]

[4] The present author's short book Strukturwandel der Kirche als Aufgabe und Chance, Herder Bücherei 446, 3rd edn (Freiburg 1973); ET The Shape of the Church to Come (London 1974), was written with the aim of concrete criticism and stimulus of this kind.

[5] On the 'uncontemporary Church' cf. Strukturwandel der Kirche als Aufgabe und Chance, Herder Bücherei 446, 3rd edn (Freiburg 1973), pp. 38-41, ET The Shape of the Church to Come (London 1974), pp. 35-7; and for the ideas arising from a particular case, 'Die Pflicht zur Diskussion' in Chancen des Glaubens, Herder Bücherei 389, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1971), pp. 227-37; ET 'The Duty of Discussion', in Opportunities for Faith (London 1974), pp. 40-5, 214-22.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

FORMS OF CRITICISM WITH THE CHURCH

What possible forms of criticism can there be within the Church, and what forms ought we to reject? What must be rejected in the first place is the attempt to undermine the Church, and to give it a completely new function. We may leave on one side here whether there have already been attempts of this kind in Church history, if perhaps under a different name. Today, at all events, one can notice here and there (and not only in Western Europe, but also in Latin America, for example) that people do not leave the Church, even though they reject what it understands itself to be and the substance of its faith, as this has been passed down to us; instead they want to remain within it in order to undermine it and reshape it completely. The underlying conviction here is that the Church, with its considerable membership and with its extremely powerful and differentiated institutions, still represents an immense power potential, even in today's secular societies. The idea is that, instead of patiently letting the Church die, in a long-drawn-out process, it should be altered in such a way that both it and its social power potential are placed unequivocally and solely at the service of those secular social aims and purposes which are viewed as being the right ones, with the greatest promise for the future. In other words, the aim is to reshape the previous dynamic of a vertical eschatological hope into an exclusively horizontally directed utopian power for worldly and secular changes in society; and here it makes no difference whether these goals are to be realised in an evolutionary or a revolutionary way.[6]

[134] We do not find these tendencies only – or even primarily – where totalitarian States put the Church (in so far as it is not already dead) at the service of their own political goals, and at most allow her a provisional right to existence in that light, preferring to make a pact with an official Church which inclines to too rash and too shortsighted a compromise, rather than to co-operate with the living and critical forces in the Church. There are tendencies towards undermining and remodelling among ourselves, in the 'critical Catholicism' of the West as well. It goes without saying that the true Christian believer will reject these tendencies, and must do so; for Christian faith is faith in God and in an eschatological salvation for all. It is not merely a hope for a future, emancipated humanity which is to be realised in some transcending but untranscendental utopia.

An attempt of this kind is doomed before it starts, in the sense that it has no true chance of becoming an ultimate Christian decision of faith. A Church which, according to this view, would merely be the old-fashioned precursor of a secularised, emancipated society, is too uninteresting. It would be dead historically before it had even been modified along these new lines. And it would only be the executive officer of a secular society which has no need of a Church of this kind at all. People who stay in the Church – really only because of their individual background and upbringing – and want to remodel it into a secular association for humane purposes, or to make it a buffer against the upholders of an established social power, would be better able to pursue their intentions usefully and effectively outside it. The Church is not a suitable medium for these aims. One can perhaps undermine parties, and try to change their self-understanding; but the Church is not a suitable object for an undertaking of this kind, even from a worldly point of view.

If we ask about the possible forms of internal criticism and opposition in the Church, then we must not overlook the fact that there can be, and are, informal, non-institutionalised forms of opposition and criticism in the Church as well. These are ultimately perhaps more decisive than criticism and opposition, which see themselves as such and therefore institutionalise themselves. Ways of thinking and movements which – without being expressly 'against'

[6] On the problem of 'horizontalism' and 'verticalism', cf. 'The Church's Commission to Bring Salvation and the Humanization of the World', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 295-313.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something – develop new living energies directed towards positive ends, can in actual fact; through their persuasive character, exert a highly critical function, because the better and more living thing they are aiming at constitutes a silent but effective criticism of what is merely traditional.

[135] We could give examples from the history of theology and thought, down to most recent times. Ways of thinking and conceptions have almost silently made their way, in a kind of meta-historical process, and have been absorbed into the total consciousness of the Church, without having been preceded by the fierce questionings and controversies which might have been thought appropriate to the significance and profundity of these changes themselves. We may cite the absorption of Greek metaphysics into theology from Origen onwards; or the victory of Aristotelianism in Western theology in the thirteenth century; or we may call to mind the contemporary attitude to universal salvation, compared with Augustinian pessimism. Of course these changes were accompanied by struggles and crises. But compared with the extent and profundity of the process itself, these struggles and crises were trivial.

Informal criticism and opposition of great influence do therefore exist in the Church itself, and not merely in the theological sphere. We find it even more in questions of attitude, in Christian life, in liturgy, in the relationship of believers to the world, and so forth. We can always have the hope that living forces in the Church will bring about changes, even when they do not expressly declare themselves as criticism and opposition.[7]

Of course there can and must be formal criticism in the Church as well. In most cases (though not necessarily and exclusively) it will be directed against the Church authorities, and will call in question alterable structures or specific decisions and actions on the part of those authorities. To have real prospect of success, such criticism will generally be sustained by groups and not by individuals.

GROUPS AND PARTIES

The actual, specific form of critical groups of this kind can, of course, vary greatly. There can be groups which exert a considerable critical function, even though their real and primary intention is directed towards positive purposes, and not criticism at all. We may think, for example, of the different religious orders which (at least in their early years) exerted a critical function of this kind. Today we may [136] think of the various ‘charismatic’ or ‘pentecostal’ movements, which have become quite widespread in the United States.[8] They do not see themselves as critical groups. All the same, they probably have a not unimportant critical significance for the Church. We may think of groups of worker priests in France, or of similar groups in Spain and Latin America, for whom social criticism plays a greater part. These groups pursue directly positive goals in secular society; but they none the less have a critical task to perform in the Church’s particular situation.

It is, further, quite conceivable that critical groups should grow up within ecclesiastical institutions themselves: in parish councils, pastoral councils, diocesan clerical councils, synods etc. The critical intention of groups of this kind, within a particular institution, will

[7] The great spiritual uprisings which led to the foundation of the great religious orders, of course, belong to this context (cf. below). It must be stressed in general that all the energies of a living Christianity can be implemented only in a process which must inevitably have a critical component.

[8] On the ‘pentecostal’ movement in the Catholic church, cf. K. and D. Ranaghan, Catholic Pentecostals (New York 1969); E. D. O’Connor, The Pentecostal Movement in the Catholic Church (Notre Dame, Indiana, 1971); D. L. Gelpi, Pentecostalism. A theological Viewpoint (New York 1971); and Pentecostal Piety (New York 1972).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

normally play a prominent part. For it is this that gives them their specific function, especially since it must be presupposed that they fundamentally endorse these institutional bodies themselves, with their advisory functions or powers of decision.

Should we (or must we) talk about parties or about groups in this context? It is largely a question of terminology. But it depends on the facts as well. We may associate the term 'party' with a political grouping in a parliamentary democracy. In that case we understand by the word 'party' a group striving for political power, which aims to fulfil goals which are not shared by all members of the country, or citizens of the State, and which has a permanent organisation. In that case we ought not to talk about parties in the Church. Nor should we aim to have critical groups which incline towards acquiring a monopoly of power, in the way that political parties do.[9]

For various reasons, which do not need to be developed here, parties of this kind are hardly adapted to the nature of the Church, even though we might say that the formation of parties within it is [137] primarily a political question, not a dogmatic one. Organised parties in the Church would lend an institutional, absolute, permanent and fixed form to religious differences. People and groups would remain permanently at enmity with one another. Ecclesiastical parties would be mixed up with political parties and different political systems. The result would be nothing less than the danger of a schism in the real sense. Consequently there were no parties at the Second Vatican Council, however distinct the various trends may have been. In all the decisions that were taken, great weight was laid on achieving a bigger majority than any individual group could produce by itself, even if that group alone was actually in a position to provide a majority as such.

A warning like this against the formation of parties in the Church is not of course intended to recommend or legitimate a state of affairs in which individuals or individual groups have no influence at all on the people who are in positions of power in it. That would really be precisely the same thing as the establishment of a particular party with absolute power, even though it rejected the name as such and wanted to give the impression that it alone was the representative of the whole, true Church.

There is, therefore, no objection to be made if groups are formed within the Church's institutions with distinct ways of thinking and aims. On the contrary, there is much to recommend it. These are party groups in a certain sense, and can provide a greater and more comprehensive flow of information among their members, can offer a better opportunity for intensive discussion, and guarantee a more regular, intelligible solution of conflicts within the institution in question. But there must be no party discipline in these groups, and no 'party whips'; that would be contrary to the nature of the Church. They should have ever-open doors, should be self-critical, and should not view their opponents as enemies. Moreover, they should not, out of group fanaticism, reject the compromises which are always necessary, in view of differences of mentality in the Church. They should not be worshippers of a mere formal democracy. They should also be able to leave controversial questions open. And they should prefer to elect persons, not the representatives of a particular 'party line'. Otherwise groups of this kind could damage the very character of the Church. For it ought to be the very place in which social antagonisms are overcome and absorbed, not multiplied by ecclesiastical antagonisms as well.

[138] Even in the institutional sphere the Church must present itself as the community of faith, love and prayer in spiritual unity, in free consent and concord, and with mutual open-mindedness. The Church confesses Jesus as the One who was victorious in defeat; and one of [9] For a detailed consideration of the problem of 'democratisation' in the church, cf. 'The Teaching Office of the Church in the Present Day Crisis of Authority', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 3-30; 'On the Theology of a 'Pastoral Synod', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 116-34.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

its fundamental convictions is that the goals we have described cannot be seized by force, or by means of institutions and their power. We can arrive at them only through the bold powerlessness of the Spirit and of hope. Neither should groups within the Church view its authorities arrogantly as mere 'adversaries' of the Spirit, whom they reserve for themselves. They should rather try to activate the potential of hope (if we may so describe it) and to draw on that; and today this is often much greater among office-holders than resentful critics of the Church in its existing form believe. The attempt must be made. If the groups we have talked about were expressly or tacitly to be transformed into real, organised parties, then it must be feared that elements of essential importance would simply wither away, namely the living enthusiasm which is so necessary in the Church especially; the creative imagination that reaches out towards an unknown future; and the courage to think or do the unusual.[10]

[10] Cf. here 'Angst vor dem Geist' and 'Über das Experiment in christlich-kirchlichen Bereich', both in Chancen des Glaubens, Herder Bücherei 389, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1971), pp. 52-7 and 238-47; ET 'Fear of the Spirit' and 'Experiment in the Field of Christianity and the Church' in Opportunties for Faith (London 1974), pp. 40-5, 214-22.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[139]

12

'MYSTERIUM ECCLESIAE'

ON THE DECLARATION MADE BY THE CONGREGATION FOR THE DOCTRINE OF THE FAITH ON THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH

On 24 June 1973, the Congregation for Doctrine published a 'Declaration (Declaratio) in defence of the Catholic doctrine on the Church against certain errors of the present day'. The Declaration was accompanied by the observation that Pope Paul VI had confirmed the declaration on 11 May 1973, and had ordered its publication.[1] In spite of its papal imprimatur, the Declaratio is of course the work of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, and has not the same authority as an act issuing from the pope himself. As a declaration of this kind, it cannot contain anything to [140] which a Catholic Christian has to give the absolute assent of faith; it is not, and does not claim to be, an 'infallible definition' of the magisterium. Of course this does not mean that many statements which represent the dogmas of the ordinary and extraordinary magisterium may in fact require this absolute assent of faith, because of their content and their binding character; but in this case the binding character is not lent by the document itself. Of course this general statement leaves many specific questions open, especially since the Second Vatican Council (which is frequently quoted in the Declaration) was not prepared to issue any new statements of faith. This means that, in spite of the appeal to definitions laid down by the First Vatican Council, the exact 'theological note' remains an open question in many other cases.

The Declaration is therefore an 'authentic' expression of the Roman magisterium. What this means in more precise terms does not have to be explained again here. The reader should turn to the letter on the magisterium issued by the German episcopal conference on 22 September 1967.[2] On the basis of that it must be said that, however much we may recognise the positively binding character of the document, the possibility that it may contain errors cannot a priori be excluded. Consequently a question of this kind may be investigated without reserve by Catholic theology, even though in the case of official definitions or

[1] ET What We Believe: Declaration in Defence of the Catholic Doctrine on the Church against Certain Errors of the Present Day (London 1973). For the official text of the Declaration, cf. AAS 65 (1973), 396-408; Cf. also 'Irrtümer über die Kirche? Eine Dokumentation zur Erklärung der Glaubenskongregation vom 5. Juli' in Herder Korrespondenz 27, pp. 416-21 (German text) and 421-2 (comment by the secretariat of the German episcopal conference); 'Die Erklärung der römischen Glaubenskongregation "Mysterium Ecclesiae" in Herder Korrespondenz 27 (1973), p. 487. It is generally accepted that the immediate occasion for the Declaration was the debate on infallibility started by Hans Küng. The original text of the present essay had to take express account of this topical question, which, however, may count today as superseded, at least from this point of view. Consequently the sections of the essay which had a particular bearing on that point have been omitted here, particularly since the present author's views on this particular case are sufficiently well known; cf. Zum Problem Unfehlbarkeit: Antworten auf die Anfrage von Hans Kung (Quaestiones Disputatae 54), 2nd edn (Freiburg 1971), and 'Schluβwort unter eine Debatte: Rahner-Küng' in Publik-Forum No. 11, pp. 12-15 (1 June 1973).

[2] The 'Schreiben der deutschen Bischöfe an alle, die von der Kirche mit der Glaubensverkündigung beauftragt sind' ('Letter from the German bishops to all who have been entrusted by the Church with the proclamation of the faith') was distributed as an offprint by the secretariat of the German episcopal conference (2nd edn, Trier 1968). Cf. 'On the Encyclical "Humanae vitae" ', Theological Investigations XI (London and New York 1974), pp. 263-87, and 'Heresies in the Church Today?', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 116-41. The above letter is considered in detail in 'The Dispute Concerning the Church's Teaching Office', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 86-97.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dogmas of the ordinary magisterium (where these really are such, and are properly interpreted) no errors in the real sense may be detected. The interpretative possibilities which the document expressly concedes as regards magisterial declarations (and even dogmas) of course apply to the document itself as well.

The document has six sections, as well as an introduction. These sections are sometimes only loosely linked with one another. They deal with the following subjects: (1) The oneness of Christ's Church; (2) the infallibility of the universal Church; (3) the infallibility of the [141] Church's magisterium; (4) the Church's gift of infallibility not to be diminished; (5) the notion of the Church's infallibility not to be falsified; and (6) the Church associated with the priesthood of Christ (the general priesthood, and the official priesthood of its ministers). In the following pages we shall try to give a brief account of what is said in these different sections, and to add a critical appraisal. And here we shall allow ourselves the right to discuss the different points at greater length or more briefly, as the case may be.

The One Church of Christ

We shall pass over the introduction and turn directly to the first section, on the Roman Catholic Church as the 'one Church' of Christ. In view of the importance of its subject, this section is extremely brief. Broadly speaking, it merely repeats statements made by the Second Vatican Council.[3] Of course, one of the convictions of a Roman Catholic Christian is that he cannot quite plainly and simply concede the character of being the Church of Christ to the various other Christian Churches or ecclesiastical communities to an equal degree. An ecclesiological indifference of this kind is not practised, and cannot be practised, by the other Christian Churches towards one another either. All the same, we might have expected – and perhaps had the right to expect – that the document would show more of an ecumenical will towards real progress in the direction of Church unity here.

The fact that the Roman Catholic Church traces its origin to Jesus and his declaration to Peter is undeniable; but here it is stated too simply, from a historical point of view. We read that the Roman Catholic Church contains 'the fullness of the means of salvation', 'all divinely revealed truth', and 'the original Apostolic tradition, living and intact, which is the permanent heritage of doctrine and holiness of that same Church'; but it would not have been out of place to add at least a word to the effect that in the Catholic Church as it actually exists, the whole 'fullness' of what the Church contains is actually realised in its different parts and aspects to a very varying degree, and that much exists only potentially – especially if we compare merely [142] potentially given elements of this kind with the degree in which they are realised in other Churches.

Why does this text avoid the issue by means of the statement that the Church is a Church containing many sinners, which is of no relevance in this particular context? Why does it not talk about the fact that in the course of history this sinfulness (if we see it properly) has also produced a frightful number of errors and distortions of the Christian spirit 'in the head and the members'? And that the Church is not merely a sinful Church, but an erring one as well, even though it cannot fall away from the truth of Christ when it teaches and believes with the absolute assent of faith?[4]

Why was the dividing line between the Roman Catholic Church and the other Churches not also seen in the light of the fact that the actual relationship between the Churches has changed

[3] Especially the dogmatic constitution on the Church 'Lumen gentium' (text in The Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1966), pp. 14-101.

[4] Cf. here the present author's more recent reflections: 'Schism in the Catholic Church?', and 'Heresies in the Church Today?', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 98-115 and 116-41 respectively.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

considerably since our divisions began? At least we can find no trace of this idea. When the document says that a Catholic must not imagine that the Churches, though 'divided, still possess a certain unity', that is simply not correct. The Churches today do 'still possess a certain unity', and it is this very fact which enables and obliges us to strive for full unification.

Apart from this point, everything which is said in the first section may be binding on a Catholic. But many things are not said at all which ought to have been said, if we want really to reach the spirit and heart of the 'divided' brethren. In the spirit if not in the letter, this text lags behind the Second Vatican Council, although in the Council's spirit it might have taken us further by means of its theological reflections on the unity and division of the Churches, and on the self-understanding of the Catholic Church. For according to this very self-understanding, the Catholic Church is only what it ought to be, according to the will of Christ, when it has come to terms with the things in its own history which, whether culpably or not, have contributed to the division of Christendom (and even an orthodox Christian may doubt whether enough has been done here), and when all the Churches have once more become one. The first section would not have had to be much longer in order to say something clearer in this direction, and something with more promise for the future.

The Infallibility of the Church

The second section of the document is divided into two parts. The first deals with 'the infallibility of the universal Church'. The second stresses the special function of the bishops' magisterium for the faith of the whole Church. This leads on to the following three sections. As far as the first part is concerned, we must first of all stress with satisfaction that the treatment of the Church's magisterium, which is infallible in certain circumstances, is subordinate to the statement that it is the Church as a whole which abides in the truth of Christ (though of course this truth is also articulated in the form of particular tenets). This is an advance which should be appreciated, and it is expressly and gratefully acknowledged.

Admittedly, when we read that the new people of God is itself infallible in faith, through 'a certain shared infallibility', bestowed by God, 'and restricted to matters of faith and morals, which is present when the whole People of God unhesitatingly holds a point of doctrine pertaining to these matters', then we might have wished for a more precise and careful formulation. For one thing, the limitations indicated by the word 'shared' must not be overlooked and ought to be considered by theologians much more carefully. For another, have there not also been convictions 'unhesitatingly' shared by 'the whole people of God' (in so far as this is an empirically comprehensible entity, and consequently at all relevant for the determination of faith) that this or that was part of faith, even though this firm conviction was mistaken? Instead of 'unhesitatingly holds' the document should have talked about 'an absolute assent of faith'.

Of course in this case another question would have become even more inescapable: how can we empirically determine this absolute 'assent of faith' as distinct from other firm convictions and opinions? For even 'generally shared' and 'firm' convictions can be erroneous. The difficulty we are faced with here is, therefore, very considerable, because in the case of particular dogmatic statements dating from earlier times we have to distinguish between the assent of faith and other 'general' and 'firm' convictions; and yet today we cannot clearly decide by historical means alone whether this distinction was consciously made. (When we are considering the period of the Council of Trent, for example, how are we to distinguish historically between the assent of faith to original sin – which was correctly understood – and the firm conviction of monogenism?) But again, we are grateful [144] to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

document for deciding, with Paul VI, that the official doctrine of the Church 'is nourished by the ecclesial life of the whole People of God'. That is to say, there is no one-way relationship between the two; it is a mutually conditioning relationship.

The second part of the second sanction is concerned with the special function of the Church's magisterium as represented by the pope and the bishops, compared with the total faith of the Church. Of course the pope and the bishops are not merely 'experts in Catholic doctrine'. Of course the pope cannot merely represent an already existing, silent consensus in the Church. Of course, in certain situations and according to certain norms (which no one will expect this section of the document to discuss), he can make a decision about a disputed question which is really a question of faith – a decision which can even be ultimately binding.

But must these axioms be formulated by saying that the hierarchy 'alone' has the 'exclusive' task of teaching the Gospel 'authentically'? G. Philips warned about 'exclusive' formulas of this kind at the Council, on an occasion when the 'highest authority' intervened. Of course, the specific task of the hierarchical magisterium can be defined in such a way that this authority belongs to that hierarchy 'exclusively'. But even in the Church there is an authority of 'the thing itself', an authority of theological scholarship, an authority of the person who is charismatically endowed, and so forth. And without these the one authentic doctrine of the magisterium and the authority of the hierarchical magisterium cannot exist. Even less can it be efficacious; because all the elements in the Church always condition one another. The 'considerable assistance' which the fifth section says the theologians offer to the magisterium is in fact an indispensable aid, seen historically and theologically, which in no way detracts from the magisterium's dignity and specific function. The actual carrying out of the functions of the hierarchical doctrinal office is never 'exclusive', and it is not a one-way process. It is never merely 'from above', because it presupposes the life of the whole people of God, and presupposes, too, that this people 'abides in the truth'.[5]

A more fundamental desideratum must be understood in this light. The function of the magisterium is not linked clearly enough or with sufficient inner cogency with the infallible faith of the whole Church. [145] It would have been more in keeping with contemporary theology and with vital and active acknowledgement of the authority of the hierarchical magisterium, if the magisterium's authority had not simply been based on the formal, 'legal' authorisation of Peter and the other apostles, and therefore of bishops and pope. We might wish that its existence and unique character had been made comprehensible in the light of the Church's character as the eschatologically definitive community of faith.

The Church is governed by a mutually conditioning relationship, as must be the case in a unity consisting of pluralistic elements: the community of faith would not exist at all if it did not have institutional form; in that way the faith of the whole Church is essentially co-conditioned by the specific function of its authentic teachers. On the other hand, their function is conceivable only as one aspect of the eschatologically indestructible community of faith. It does not supervene from outside, by means of an authorisation which is simply conceived of in juridical terms. A true understanding of the Church's infallibility is possible only if we heed this relationship between the authority of the magisterium and the whole Church's invincible grace of faith, from which even the office-bearers, with their specific function, live.

The Infallibility of the Magisterium

The third section repeats in the briefest possible terms the traditional doctrine about the [5] Cf. the essays on ecclesiology in Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 3-134.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'charism of infallibility' which makes it possible to utter statements which are 'necessarily immune from error'. There is no attempt to give a reason for the First Vatican Council's definition of this infallibility.[6] It may of course be said, pointing to the first paragraph of the document's final declaration, that nothing of this kind was intended, and could not be attempted in view of the brevity required. But if what is in question is not an individual doctrine of faith (which can be safeguarded by an appeal to the general formal authority of a council or a papal definition), but is the formal authority of councils and the pope in general, then it is not enough to counter opponents, doubters and interpreters of this doctrine simply by quoting the statements this authority has made about itself. And this is [146] especially the case because today not only the infallible authority of the pope (which Vatican I taught in its capacity as council) but also even the authority of councils themselves is being called in question or narrowed down. A section of this kind does very little to substantiate the teaching of the two Vatican Councils, especially since it issues from an authority which is itself subordinate to the authority of pope and councils.

This brings us to a question of which the Church's authorities have up to now shown insufficient awareness and to which they have provided no adequately clear answer. To put it honestly and soberly: the Roman authorities apparently proceed from the assumption that they have to state correct doctrine and issue the correct edicts, appealing to their formal authority; and that when they have done this they have performed their task adequately. They still presuppose as a matter of course that what they have in front of them is an obedient flock. But today, more than in earlier times, they must see to it, not only that they are right, but also that they are seen to be right. They ought to present their authority in a more living and primal way, deriving it from the centre of the Christian faith. They ought to interpret their authority to contemporary believers persuasively. And they must not simply assume that the faithful are convinced of the authority of the papal office and the bishops, simply because they want to live in the Catholic Church.

A Roman theologian once said to me, when I pointed this out, that these things were the function of theologians and preachers, not the function of the magisterium itself. Of course theologians have tasks of which the magisterium should not and cannot relieve them. But this does not free the teaching authority from its duty, which is not simply to repeat the old formulations but as far as possible to present them in a modern and persuasive way. Otherwise progress in the official doctrine of the Church would be superfluous. All progress could lie only in the realm of theology. But this would contradict the document itself and would make a clear-cut distinction between statements of faith and statements of theology which does not and cannot exist.

Let me draw attention to one other statement in this section: the Church's doctrinal authorities must apply 'appropriate means' in order to ensure that its teaching really does represent divine revelation in any given case. For in this task it does not receive any 'new revelations' – nor, consequently, is it revealed that a particular, already [147] existing doctrine is actually part of revelation. It is good that this should be said, although it has already been expressed in the proceedings of the First Vatican Council and in the text of the Second. But could not the magisterium say more clearly what these 'appropriate means' are? And what kind of procedure must it adopt, or does it intend to adopt, in the intellectual and social climate of today, in order to make a judgement?

As long as he is left in the dark about the nature of these necessary processes in arriving at a judgement, before decisions are made about doctrine, the average Christian and theologian has all too easily the impression that, without admitting it, Rome is convinced that it can operate with new revelations (at least where what is at issue is whether a particular statement

[6] Cf. 'Constitutio dogmatica I "Pastor aeternus" de Ecclesia Christi' of the First Vatican Council, Denz. 3074-5.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation is included in revelation). It is not then surprising when some people mulishly kick against the magisterium. In order to make its authority effective, the magisterium ought today to make clearer and more transparent what the document calls the necessary processes by which it arrives at a decision. To take one specific example, something like this was attempted by commissions of bishops and theologians at the order of the pope in connection with 'Humanae Vitae'. Unfortunately the final decision bypassed these commissions entirely. A doctor of the Church, Cardinal Bellarmine, gave an urgent warning against proceedings of this kind a long time ago.[7]

Warnings

The fourth section is a warning against any diminution of the Church's infallibility. We are told that 'the faithful are in no way permitted to see in the Church merely a fundamental permanence in truth, which, as some assert, could be reconciled with errors contained here and there in the propositions that the Church's Magisterium teaches to be held irrevocably, as also in the unhesitating assent of the people of God concerning matters of faith and morals'. The doctrine put forward here about the nature of truth and the freedom from error of the Church's dogmas is complex and subtle. Its expressly [148] formulated statements give rise to a whole number of further problems, so that the theologian feels confirmed in his ultimate uncertainty. For this document does not say clearly what an erroneous theological proposition is, or how such a proposition is really to be distinguished from propositions whose historical character and imperfection this document admits, even in the case of dogmas. In fact, to put it briefly, the sentence we have quoted from the beginning of the fourth section of our document is correct. Apart from that little more can be said about this section.

The teaching of the Second Vatican Council about 'the hierarchy of the Church's dogmas' is reiterated. But when the document goes on to say that 'all dogmas must be believed with the same divine faith', this is too easy a way out; and the existential and ecclesiastical significance of the hierarchy of truths becomes illusory. Of course a Catholic Christian cannot absolutely deny any of the dogmas. But does every Catholic have to affirm every single dogma as such with a positive, absolute assent? If we presuppose this, then the doctrine about 'fides implicita', the theological question about the extent of what has to be explicitly believed as necessary for salvation, and really the teaching about the hierarchy of truths as well, would in fact no longer have any practical significance. We cannot go on to show here the great ecumenical import of this question. Of course, I do not mean to maintain that our text intends to say that every dogma has to be explicitly 'believed' in the sense we have rejected as inadmissible here. But would it not have been possible more clearly to avoid misunderstandings of this kind which harm the cause of ecumenism?

The Historical Character of Dogmatic Formulations

The fifth section seems to be the best in the whole document. The first part deals with the historically conditioned character of all statements of faith. Here the theologian can read statements which were largely foreign to the magisterial statements about the development of dogma. Up to now – really until Paul VI – it was conceded to a certain degree that dogmatic

[7] Cf. 'Epistola ad Clementem VIII circa controversiam de Auxiliis' (1602). The Italian original is printed in I. von Dollinger, Beitrage zur politischen, kirchlichen und Cultur-Geschichte . . . , vol. iii (Regensburg 1882), pp. 83-7; German translation in I. von Döllinger and Fr Reusch, Die Selbstbiographie des Cardinals Bellarmin (Bonn 1887), pp. 260-4.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formulations have a history of their own. But, broadly speaking, it always seemed as if the magisterium admitted only to an earlier history, which had now reached a culmination never to be surpassed, (and which could not really proceed any further). Moreover, the terms used in the present dogmatic formulations [149] were insistently claimed to be unambiguous and easily understood by everyone.[8]

What we hear in the first part of the fifth section is more courageous and more in accordance with historical reality. From the point of view of the stage reached by theology, what is said here could and should really have been said in Pius XII's encyclical 'Humani generis' (1950). But let us be glad that this teaching has been formulated now, even if very late.[9]

The document establishes first of all that the transmission of divine revelation is impeded by historical situations. Even dogmatic formulations are conditioned by terms which are dependent on the language and total situation of a particular era of thought. In this section it is assumed as if it were self-evident (and hence all the more significantly) that the Church's magisterium cannot simply on its own, in complete self-sufficiency as it were, form and determine the terms which it wants for its statements. The document stresses that a dogmatic truth may be imperfectly defined first of all, and that later, in the wider context of other truths of faith and other naturally communicated knowledge, it may be stated more fully and completely, so as to answer new questions, or in order to distinguish the truth of faith from newly arisen errors. The declaration says explicitly that the Church's magisterium can under certain circumstances enunciate dogmatic truths in terms which bear traces of 'the changeable conceptions of a given epoch'. We are told, however, rather curiously, that anything of this kind only happens 'sometimes' and that there are also truths of faith which could be expressed without historically conditioned terminology of this kind. Here the authors of the document are evidently still influenced by the earlier notion of 'natural' and general human terminology, which can always and everywhere be understood without further explanation, and which is independent of the wider context of the history of thought as a whole.

[150] But ultimately that is a matter of indifference for a theology of dogmatic development. If there can ever be dogmatic formulations using terminology which is historically conditioned, then it is not difficult theologically to concede this to all theological statements. Whether this happens sometimes, or is really always so, is a question of dogmatic and theological history that has no essential theological relevance. We are also told that certain dogmatic formulas remain living and fruitful (always providing that they are newly explained), but that others can be, and have been, replaced by new formulations which give clearer and fuller expression to what is meant by the old ones. Dogmatic formulations do not always communicate their real meaning to the understanding of faith 'to the same extent'.

All these statements in the text are made in somewhat too 'retrospective' terms. There is no very explicit look at the future (even though we are told that not all the ancient formulas will have permanence to the same degree). But even so it is clear that the document is aware that, even today, the history of dogma and theology has not come to an end. It will and must continue. Old dogmas will have a continuing history which we cannot foresee.

Of course other things are stressed too. Firstly, that changes of this kind in dogmatic statements have to take place under the control of the magisterium; secondly, that in the historical succession of the formulations, what is really meant remains the same; thirdly, that [8] We cannot discuss in detail here what is really an important presupposition of the document: that the history of dogma and theology is really progressive purely in the positive sense, with improved formulations etc. This tacit assumption is problematical (in general, but also in view of the rank and dignity of the New Testament etc.). Basically speaking, we ought probably to reckon with the contrary development as well; or at least the history of dogma ought if possible to be conceived of without any 'progressive' pattern of this kind.

[9] Cf 'Humani generis' in AAS 42 (1950), 561-78 (of 12 Aug. 1950).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the old formulations are still quite suited to define revealed truth if they are understood correctly – and that John XXIII taught nothing else at the opening of the Second Vatican Council, even if he and Paul VI stressed that the ancient dogmas must be so expressed that they truly reach the minds and hearts of the people of our time.[10] If it is denied in this context that dogmatic formulations are merely 'commutabiles approximationes' (alterable conceptions, which only represent what is meant approximately), we must distinguish more precisely than the text does in its attempt to ward off 'dogmatic relativism'. If, as the text expressly says, statements of this kind can be replaced by new ones, which are better and more in accordance with the particular intellectual and spiritual situation, then this presupposes a certain, [151] perhaps necessary, change. Dogmatic formulations are therefore not simply 'incommutabiles'. And if one dogmatic statement can express the same content in a better, more living, more fruitful, more complete and more perfect way than another (as the document says), then the term approximatio does not necessarily have the heretical sense of a dogmatic relativism. It can also mean exactly what this document intends. If a dogmatic formula were to be totally identical with the reality meant – if, that is, it was not an approximatio in any way at all – how could there ever be a history of dogma, which the document itself says exists? How could we then talk about better or less adequate dogmatic formulations, let alone about formulations that have to be superseded?

What the document teaches about the historical character of dogmatic formulations is certainly still abstract and formal. Nor has it completely resisted the temptation to make things easy for itself by making a simple distinction between modes of expression and content (though there can never be content without a certain mode of expression). But all the same it contains important implications which are no longer avoidable if this doctrine is to be reconciled with other undeniable facts and perceptions. Like the document, we may start from the conviction that an incomplete or imperfect statement does not necessarily have to be wrong; and that a more complete and more perfect statement does not falsify the one it supersedes. But what does this common conviction mean exactly, when it is applied to particular dogmatic statements, if we read these statements in their earlier historical context (which the document actually requires of us, so that we may determine their true, permanent meaning), remembering thereby that the Church's magisterium can err, and has often erred, in non-defined statements? And that such errors (since they affect the total intellectual consciousness) also influence the actual, apperceived sense of the dogmas? What is the meaning of the statement that there are more imperfect and more incomplete dogmatic statements, if we assume (as we must) that the incompleteness of a statement cannot be taken to mean that, while part of the subject considered is absolutely clearly, perfectly and completely formulated, another, different part of what is meant is left unstated – if, that is, one is unable to escape from this difficulty by quantifying the statement's content?

What is the position when a new statement has to be added to an old formula so that it may be perceived in living and fruitful form, [152] and in its original sense (a proceeding which the document also views as necessary); but when this new statement is not in fact provided, or not yet provided, by the magisterium or by the majority of theologians? This possibility cannot be excluded a priori, if there is such a thing as a history of dogma, which has to lead to newer, better reformulations necessary for a particular period, but if (as many examples show) this history proceeds too slowly. What is the position with regard to ancient formulas which can no longer perform their proper service in a later period? If we say with the document that they have only to be explained in the proper way by the magisterium (with the [10] Cf. The Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1966), pp. 710-19 (Pope John XXIII's opening address), and 'Das Zweite Vatikanische Ökumenische Konzil' in Herder Korrespondenz 18 (1963/4), pp. 76-83 (Pope Paul VI's opening address).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

valuable help of the theologians) for them to remain living and fruitful, that is all well and good. But it helps only if we assume that these explanations are actually made (and are in some way or other permitted by the magisterium) when the new need arises because the ancient formulations have proved inadequate. But this is very often not the case. What happens when ancient formulas, which remain, or which have to be replaced by new ones meaning the same thing, actually incorporate errors? What happens when this incorporation is not consciously recognised, or when it is not immediately admitted that the connection between true and false can be dissolved once this connection begins to cause difficulties?

Let me give one example of what I mean. For a long time the inspiration of Scripture was understood in such a way that inspiration was held to exclude pseudonymity, in cases where today we quite calmly admit it. Indeed this was an interpretation which took a long time to crumble away. To take another example – we are still labouring today over the question of whether the tridentine dogma of original sin can be reconciled with polygenism; that is to say, whether the monogenism which was associated with this doctrine can be detached from it, even though ancient theology never thought of such a possibility, or could do, when it formulated this dogma.

Finally, there is one more thing that must be considered. The fifth section of the document somehow starts from the assumption that it is possible to distinguish the real meaning of a dogma from its changing formulation. It assumes that we can grasp the two things separately, compare the one with the other, and so determine the lesser or greater aptness of a dogmatic formulation. But if this is not the case (as a comparison between 'the thing in itself' and its interpretation in any given instance shows) – if, therefore, we can never determine and overcome the historical character of a formulation by means of a [153] non-historically conditioned formulation – how are we to think of this historical development, which the document itself concedes? Is it possible to conceive of it in such a way that it covers the identity of faith, the continuity of the formulations of faith, and also the legitimacy of new formulations?

Of course it is impossible to expect the document to give a clear and unambiguous answer to all these questions, especially since the magisterium receives no new revelations, and theology, up till now, has failed to present the answer in an adequate and generally accepted way. But we can see from these reflections how difficult it is to determine where an 'incomplete', historically conditioned formulation (which must none the less count as being true for all time) stops, and what is really an error begins. With regard to the distinction between incomplete and erroneous statements, there is another point as well. Basically speaking, it is very hard to determine the background of understanding of a statement, and hence the point from which we have to determine its meaning, and, therefore, its quality as being true or erroneous. This is so, at least, in the case of 'metaphysical' and religious statements, where indeed reflection cannot determine these things adequately at all. This applies to earlier periods as well. That is why the meaning of a particular formula in the light of an earlier interpretative standpoint cannot be clearly determined by historical means alone. We can see this, too, from the difference in the interpretation of ancient and new formulations by the different theological schools.

In short, truth and error cannot be so easily and unequivocally distinguished without recourse to linguistic prescriptiveness in Church and society; or to the tenet that fundamentally the Church abides in the truth; or to the other constitutive elements of the Church's unity; or to the experience of a unity existing between experience of the Spirit and statements of faith.[11] We must not think that the question of this distinction between truth and [11] This phrase may indicate how this essay can be fitted into the overall theme of the present volume, cf. also below.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

error can be settled on the pattern of statements like 2 + 2 = 4, which are directly verifiable or which we find self-evident. Nor is it enough to point out that a statement is true if it does not miss the mark of the reality that is meant. For we are still faced with the question of what the statement, which is supposed to correspond to a particular reality, [154] really means. There is no other way of deciding the question of the truth, since, after all, the statement cannot be compared with, or checked against, the reality it represents. If we appeal (of course rightly) to the formal authority of the magisterium or of revelation, then we are only pushing the question out of theology into fundamental theology.

Now, I have certainly no intention of maintaining that there is no answer, and can be no answer, to questions of this kind; or that the problems they present justify dogmatic relativism or scepticism. But even if these problems cannot be worked out here, it will surely be permissible – with all respect for a document of this kind – to ask whether, in view of the implications of what it says, it was drawn up with the necessary awareness of the problem, and of the consequences (even disciplinary ones) which follow – or do not follow – from these declarations, once one becomes aware in this way of the problems involved.

The Priesthood of the Church

The sixth section deals with a completely new subject: the universal priesthood, and the particular, ministerial official priesthood. One may well have the impression that the document (deliberately or at least in fact) is also directed against the recently published memorandum of the German ecumenical university institutes, which is concerned with the possibility of a mutual recognition of the ministry of the different Churches.[12] It cannot be said that the document makes much progress, or introduces much ecumenical hope into this question. The doctrine about the sacramental character of priestly ordination is too rapidly adopted as the starting point and foundation for the doctrine of the priestly office; whereas that doctrine really seems rather to be a conclusion drawn from an interpretation of the official priesthood which can be apprehended even before the doctrine of its sacramental character. It may be pointed out to theologians and ecumenically concerned people who are disappointed by this section that [155] the document itself declares that the essence of the sacramental character is explained in different ways by theologians, and that the celebration of the Eucharist without an ordained priest is declared to be invalid only if it is wilful and presumptuous (‘proprio ausu’). The question of when ‘wilfulness’ of this kind exists, therefore, remains an open one. Equally open is the question of how the permanent character of priestly ordination has more precisely to be constituted and explained.

Why should a theologian not admit to a certain helpless perplexity at the end of reflections of this kind? Why should he not say that, even though he views the substance of the document as binding, he is still unclear what disciplinary measures are to be envisaged – or perhaps not to be envisaged – for the, people against whom this document is directed? Why should not a theologian honestly say, on his own account and at his own risk, that the whole complex of questions which is dealt with here does not seem to have been clarified to such a degree that practical consequences ought now to be drawn? Why may he not hold the opinion that (as the first part of the fifth section says) there is much more to be discovered and formulated, in a further process of theological clarification, if the ancient formulations (which a theologian must not deny) are to be clarified and modulated in such a way that they can be [12] Cf. Reform und Anerkennung kirchlicher Ämter. Ein Memorandum der Arbeitsgemeinschaft ökumenischer Universitätsinstitute (Munich, Mainz 1973). For the present author’s views on this memorandum, cf. ‘Vom Sinn und Auftrag des kirchlichen Amtes’ in Frankfurter Aligemeine Zeitung (no. 38) of 14 Feb. 1973, p. 8 and Vorfragen zu einem ökumenischen Amtsverständnis (Quaestiones Disputatae 65) (Freiburg 1974).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understood and assimilated today to the degree we may expect, in view of our contemporary intellectual and spiritual situation, and in the light of the present state of dogma? Is it not permissible to think that it would not be particularly beneficial for the Church, its doctrine, and the authority of its magisterium, if a purely formal declaration of obedience were to be demanded or exacted of the faithful, if this were really to leave all the factual questions open?

It seems to me as if neither side has really said exactly what it means by 'error' in dogmatic statements. And there seems, therefore, no need to put an end to the controversy as yet. If on the one hand there is understanding for the difficulties of theology, and on the other a clearly perceptible respect for the Church's magisterium, a provisional continuation of the controversy does not seem to me to be damaging for the Church. Especially since – with the two provisos we have named – no tangible difference would have to be made in the practice of the Church's life, even in the dimension of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[156]

13

THE AREA BISHOP: SOME THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS

In the summer of 1968 Cardinal Döpfner divided up his diocese (Munich and Freising) into three pastoral areas, entrusting each of them to one of his three auxiliary bishops.[1] The one Vicar-General retained authority for the whole diocese, but each of the auxiliaries was to have an 'ordinary, representative authority' for the area entrusted to him. The idea was that the auxiliary, as episcopal vicar, should devote himself to constant contact with the parishes and parish priests; that he should make visitations; and that he should relieve the diocesan bishop in his episcopal functions. As auxiliaries, they are subject solely to the archbishop and are ordinary members of meetings of the ordinarial sessions.

What we are about to consider here are not questions of Canon Law, or pastoral care or theology. Nor are we concerned to evaluate as such the measure which provides the immediate occasion for these remarks. We shall only try to gather together a few ideas – most of them open to discussion – about the task of a regional bishop. These ideas belong to the framework of ecclesiology and sacramental theology. Whether they can throw any light at all on this particular task (which goes beyond the general theological problem presented by the 'suffragan' or 'auxiliary' bishop) must emerge from the reflections themselves.

[157]

PRESUPPOSITIONS

Here we can only indicate the background for what we want to say, in terms of our general thesis. We cannot give a proper theological justification. In the first place, even in the Church social realities can present themselves in various forms and interpretations, without being really different in essentials. This applies to the sacraments too (since they are public events in the community or society of the church) if, for example, these sacraments confer an office, or in some other way alter the circumstances of an individual in the Church as society. What happens in a proceeding of this kind, and what is intended, can be very different from what the minister or recipient of the sacrament explicitly 'thinks' at the time. An example might be a sacramental marriage between non-Catholic Christians who are convinced that the wedding ceremony has no sacramental character. Or a mediaeval bishop who administers the sacrament of episcopal ordination, even though he shares Thomas Aquinas's opinion that this ordination is not a sacrament at all. Or a bishop who, in earlier times, ordained an acolyte or sub-deacon, believing that in doing so he was administering a sacrament. We can recall the distinction, which may have existed objectively, but not subjectively, in the consciousness of a priest in pre-mediaeval times, when he anointed a healthy person on the one hand, and then again someone who was seriously ill. Here we need not explain the reasons for the difference we mean; nor do we have to describe how the difference can be bridged, so that one can talk in a humanly significant sense about the administration of a sacrament even though one actually believes that no sacrament exists. Here, initially, it is perhaps enough to show how the distinction can be applied: a sacrament can in fact be conferred even if the person who administers it does not think he is conferring one; and a sacrament is not necessarily present

[1] Cf. Amtsblatt für das Erzbistum München und Freising, 1968, no. 13, pp. 260-1; also Vatican II, Christus Dominus (bishops' responsibility for pastoral care), nos. 25-7, in The Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1966), pp. 414-17; and Pope Paul VI, Motuproprio 'Ecclesiae Sanctae' 6 Aug. 1966, nos. 13-14; in AAS 58 (1966) 757-87, especially 765-6.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even though the minister believes that he is conferring one.[2]

The ministry of the Church is really indivisible. As such, as one and entire, it corresponds to the nature of the Church as the presence of God's irreversible, eschatological promise of salvation in Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen Lord; and as the community of faith, [158] which inevitably has an institutional form. This Church as such possesses a governing ministry whose fundamental authority lies in the proclamation of the public, manifesting Word of eschatologically victorious grace.[3] Since the eschatological community of faith rests on the Christ event, as God's final saving act in history, the ministry of this community also derives from Jesus Christ and is founded by him. This means that a derivation of ministry in the Church from the historical Jesus which can be expressed in historical terms cannot be denied, in so far as this can really be historically proved or shown to be probable. If we see the historical Jesus as 'founder' in this way, then it is really a matter of course that this ministry, or its authority, can be expressed, divided and subdivided in different ways, vertically and horizontally, according to the requirements of the Church in its particular, specific situation. Of course this does not call in question the one, comprehensive Petrine ministry in the Church – all the less because ministry in the Church, besides being generally derived from Jesus Christ (as we have just indicated), also has a direct and obvious foundation in Scripture. It should also be clear that the development of the Church's constitution in the form of this one ministry, and the way it has been divided up, implies irreversible decisions in particular cases, if not in all. (This at least applies to the apostolic period, which we may view as having continued for as long as it took for the New Testament writings to come into being.) And these irreversible decisions can therefore be seen as 'ius divinum'. But – always presupposing these defining guidelines – the ministry of the Church is fundamentally much more flexible in configuration and specific form than people think. This normally applies both to the traditional division of the one ministry (as potestas ordinis) into its three grades of bishop – priest – deacon, and to the more precise content of this vertical division. But it also applies to the question whether the transmission of another, separate, important individual ministry in the Church can have a sacramental character; and whether a particular ministerial authority can be possessed, at least in essentials, by a collective holder as such.[4]

[159]

THE AREA BISHOP

What really 'happens' when a priest is consecrated as auxiliary bishop, and is entrusted with [2] What is said here again rests on certain presuppositions. For example, not only has the consciousness of administering a sacrament changed in the course of time. The concept of 'sacrament' has altered, too. Here we are using the word 'sacrament' in the strict, contemporary sense.

[3] Cf. 'What is a Sacrament?', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 135-48.

[4] This question cannot simply be answered in the negative from the outset; for the entire episcopal body is the collective holder of the Church's supreme jurisdiction and teaching authority; and it can be viewed historically as the collective holder of sacramental power in Eucharist, penance, the anointing of the sick and ordination. In this connection, therefore, it is possible only to ask whether, through a decision iuris humani in the Church, such a collective holder of sacramental power can be nominated as the sole legitimate one. Seen from both aspects (and taking into account the very close correlation of the power of jurisdiction and the power of order) the question remains open – at least partly – as to whether a 'synodal' governing body in the Catholic Church is not fundamentally conceivable even today, where we have a 'monarchical' holder of authority. This question has nothing to do with the assertion that a change of this kind is also desirable. Nor does it in any way deny that such a 'synodal' body would possess those powers that are described in traditional ecclesiology. The question is only whether, and to what degree, the holder of this authority has to be an individual, or can also be a group – as, for example, in the case of the Church's supreme governing body, in the episcopal college. For more detail, cf. 'Aspects of the Episcopal Office', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 185-201.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the tasks of an area bishop? In this question we shall be guided by the caution enjoined by our preliminary remarks; but it will probably be permissible to leave the problem of the correct Canon-Law terminology and its development on one side.[5] In the first place, a number of problems do not arise at all in the case of the institution of area bishops which otherwise exist at episcopal ordinations; for the area bishop has no territory of his own and/or (in the case of a 'personal bishopric') has no group of people actually assigned to him as his own 'flock'. Usefully and legitimately, even people who have no territorially defined area of their own can belong to the highest administrative body of the whole Church (the entire episcopate with, and under, the pope). This cannot be denied, above all, by the person who sees the essence of the episcopal office (even in the case of a 'local' or diocesan bishop) as lying precisely in his adherence to this highest administrative body, or at least as being most clearly tangible there. All other definitions of the essence of the episcopal office (as distinct from the priesthood) can in fact be maintained only with difficulty and inconclusively; because all the bishop's territorially limited powers of jurisdiction can also be held by someone who has not been ordained as bishop; and because it is at the very least uncertain whether a simple priest does not possess the sacramental power [160] to confirm and to ordain other priests.[6] But in the Roman Curia (and to some extent outside it as well) there are not a few titular bishops; and there seems to be no reason in their case why they should have been co-opted into the Church's supreme governing body through episcopal ordination, even though they really have a subordinate function, and certainly are not – with others – the collective holder of the Church's supreme leadership.

Compared with these, the area bishops have a clearer legitimation: they have a real, tangible flock; in the cases which give rise to our present discussion, this flock is bigger than many a diocese whose bishop counts as part of the episcopate as a whole, without being any problem or question about it. In view of these facts, consecration of an area bishop of this kind can certainly be understood as being 'relative' to a certain flock, irrespective of whether the official Canon Law interpretation holds an ordination of this kind to be absolute or relative. This may be said even if, according to Christus Dominus (nos 22-6), there can be no doubt that 'the primary aim is to divide up dioceses of excessive size. The appointment of auxiliary bishops is only a subsidiary measure – if, that is to say, a division of this kind, though really required, seems to be impracticable.'[7] But in, actual practice the simple division of excessively large dioceses cannot be appropriate for today (cf. Christus Dominus, no. 22, which relates to dioceses consisting of large cities, which are to be made better adapted to their task by a new internal structure); and in these cases the appointment of an area bishop is quite legitimate, even though this is really a measure that is 'subsidiary' to the division of a diocese.

[161] But the real theological problems which arise from the institution of an area bishop have hardly emerged from these practical and legal definitions. First of all we must consider the fact that, according to Christus Dominus and the Motuproprio of Pope Paul VI's,

---

[5] Cf. here K. Mörsdorf in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, ed. H. Vorgrimler (New York and London 1968), vol. II, pp. 243-5.

[6] In relation to the individual diocese the power of active episcopal ordination would really be superfluous if one really presupposed that every priest had the power of confirmation and priestly ordination, even if this power were restrained. Here the idea we have indicated is intended only to show that the distinction between bishop and priest is not as simple as people sometimes think; and that (though we cannot maintain his opinion today) Aquinas was not so wide of the mark when he held that the distinction between priest and bishop is only one of jurisdiction. But if for this reason membership of the Church's supreme governing body is not simply to be thought of as merely following on the episcopal office, but is essentially and primarily co-constitutive of it, then it is easier to understand why this membership does not necessarily and always presuppose a territorial diocese; for this characteristic of the 'normal' episcopal office cannot constitute the office as such.

[7] Cf. n. 1 and n. 5.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'Ecclesiae sanctae', it is even possible to conceive of 'vicarii episcopales' who are not bishops at all.[8] We may, therefore, ask whether the pastoral situation of a large diocese really requires area bishops, if their function can also be carried out by simple priests. The fact that this is possible cannot be denied, as far as the power of jurisdiction and the powers to confirm are concerned. Quite apart from the fact that, dogmatically speaking, the valid ordination of a priest by another simple priest does not appear impossible (given the necessary conditions), the necessity of active ordination cannot be used as a legitimation of the institution of an area bishop, especially in view of our contemporary shortage of priests. Priestly orders can easily be conferred by the local or diocesan bishop himself. He needs no episcopal auxiliary for that. But it would be wise to avoid conferring any particular lustre on the exercise of the episcopal vicar's functions through episcopal consecration, and the latter should not be used in order to win particular status for this office. If the theology underlying the sacrament of order is taken to be genuine and true, only the content of the actually intended and actually existing power can provide the legitimate reason for the sacramental transmission of ministry. But this transmission should not aim through its sacramental character to give the ministry itself any higher significance or any special lustre. That is why the episcopal consecration of some Roman curials is felt to be unsuitable and nonsensical. But what is the position with regard to the episcopal consecration of the area bishop, if at first sight he is no more, and has no more extensive powers and functions, than a non-episcopal vicar would have who is not himself a bishop?

ORDINATION

We shall try to give a double answer to this by no means easy question about the significance of episcopal ordination. We shall assume that the office of an area bishop, since it actually exists, must to a certain degree have some theological significance.

We may presuppose that it is quite legitimate that very many [162] members of the entire episcopate, as the Church's highest governing body, should be the representatives of numerically small groups of believers, since there are about 2300 ordinarii loci in the whole Catholic Church and – since the Church as a whole numbers 560 million members – under each of these local ordinaries there will be on an average about 240,000 Catholics. (For the purposes of our discussion we are, quite legitimately, including in the number of local or diocesan bishops the non-episcopal ones as well.) From this point of view it seems to be quite right that a diocese of several million believers should be represented in the total episcopate by several bishops. For legitimate reasons (which are actually connected with what a diocese is, namely the local church which represents, to a more or less adequate degree, the whole Church in all its contemporary complexity) such a diocese can and should, perhaps, not be divided. If we acknowledge the validity of this reasoning, then we must admittedly also, to be consistent, really concede to an area bishop the powers and rights which naturally emanate from his membership of the entire episcopal body. And it must honestly be said that this reason for the existence of an area bishop as episcopal vicar can be given validity only if these bishops also actually have something to do with the episcopate as a whole, as the Church's supreme governing body. This would hardly be the case if an area bishop could be active in this respect only at a General Council, and if the Roman episcopal synod were a barely tolerated institution where 'merely' regional bishops did not a priori count at all.

There is another answer to the question as well. In order to make it more comprehensible, let me start from a fictitious case. Given the necessary preconditions and legitimate reasons, a [8] Cf. n. 1. The Motuproprio is dated 6 Aug. 1966, cf. no. 13-14.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

bishop nominates one of his priests to represent him in a certain area of his diocese, but without having any intention of consecrating this priest as bishop. Let us suppose, for the sake of simplicity, that the bishop makes this 'nomination' using the rite of the laying on of hands, and the prayer for grace to exercise the ministry properly. In this case, or so we would maintain, this transmission of ministry would be a sacrament, even if the bishop were not actually and consciously aware of it.[9] The ecclesiastical ministry is conferred eo ipso in a sacramental rite when an important and new part of this ministry is conferred and where [163] there is that tangibility and legitimacy in the public eye of the Church which is necessary for a sacrament. The sacramental character of a transmission of ministry is not an arbitrary addition to that transmission (supposing it to take place under the necessary conditions); the one is given ipso facto with the other. For we must simply assume that the Word of the Church (which fundamentally has an exhibitive character, because of her eschatological nature) is opus operatum and a sacrament when it is uttered with the full commitment of the Church in a critical situation in the life of an individual, or as the highest realisation of the fulfilling commitment of the congregation (the Eucharist). If this is not the case, it is impossible to give a theologically convincing justification for the sacramental character of most sacramental happenings. For they are lacking in adequate biblical justification; and there is no explicit, sufficiently obvious evidence from tradition going back to apostolic times. But if we start from the assumptions of a sacramental theology such as we have merely indicated here, then we must say (in our fictitious case) that what we have here is a sacramental transmission of ministry. An important, new and highly central ministry now exists, one which cannot simply be seen as an unimportant or merely external modification of a ministerial authority that is already possessed. Something new and more important is conferred, as for example when a layman is consecrated as deacon. But the inner nature of the event when part of the one ministry of the Church is conferred on someone, makes that event a sacrament (always given the presuppositions which we do not have to consider in detail here). It is not that a sacramental event is arbitrarily added, for incomprehensible reasons, in some cases where the partial gift of ministry is concerned, while in other cases it is not –even though the cases are factually of equal importance. We must point back to the presuppositions we have named here.

It might be objected to this notion, that if this is correct, then every conferring of the ministry of episcopal vicar would be a sacrament; but that in fact, as has already been said, there are episcopal vicars who are not bishops. Many objections might be raised here. Without lapsing into heresy, it might well be maintained that even the episcopal vicars would be sacramentally appointed to their ministry through an episcopal consecration; for the considered interpretation of this event as it is generally understood by theologians and canonists [164] does not necessarily have to be correct.[10] Can the appointment to this ministry not very well be sacramental without its having therefore to be understood as a real episcopal consecration? It is by no means absolutely certain that an important and new transmission of ministry which, by reason of its inner nature, is then also a sacrament, can actually be conferred only in the three ordinations of deacon, priest and bishop. But quite apart from all that (and if we go back more specifically to the fictitious case we started from), we can simply say that what is in question from the outset in the appointment of a mere [9] Cf. n. 2. The meaning of 'sacrament' is differently defined in the present case.

[10] If, according to Pius XII, the three stages of ordination which we also recognise intellectually are conferred only through the laying on of hands, then we might still ask whether such a positive ecclesiastical directive is also applicable to the conferring of ministries which are not envisaged in Sacramentum ordinis. This mode of the transmission of a ministry through the laying on of hands is certainly not divine Law. Really such a transmission of ministry can be thought of as taking place in any way, provided it is evident and clear. Cf. Vat. II, De Ecclesia, n. 29, and Pius XII, constitution Sacramentum ordinis, 30 Nov. 1947, Denz. 3857-61.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

episcopal vicar who is not a bishop is the temporary conferring of a ministry. But this ministry has no new sacramental authority (for confirmation and active ordination); and consequently the appointment of a mere episcopal vicar is essentially distinguished from the transmission of ministry which we are considering here and maintaining to be sacramental. For this reason the conferring of ministry on a mere episcopal vicar does not take place with that absolute involvement on the part of the Church (and the recipient) which is actually given in our case (irrespective of whether this is consciously perceived or not) and which is necessary – but is also a sufficient presupposition – for a sacramental event as such. One could finally point to the fact that, at least in fact, the Church does not recognise as a sacramental event (i.e. that total involvement on the Church's part which makes its word opus operatum) any transmission of ministry that is not associated with, and illustrated by, the laying on of hands. Should not the Church recognise certain transmissions of ministry as sacramental (at least as part of the one Ordo) because these ministries – by reason of their importance – undoubtedly enjoy the divine promise of grace, and because this promise must consequently be manifested by the Church in its social and historical apprehensibility too through a sacramental act? But as far as our actual question is concerned, that may be passed over. The objective difference between [165] a mere episcopal vicar and the diocesan bishop which we had in mind in our fictitious case, seems to be considerable enough to warrant our interpreting the conferment of the former ministry as non-sacramental, and the conferment of the latter as sacramental.

But what significance does this fictitious case have for our actual subject? It shows that we cannot think of the ministry given to an area bishop (which is at least in some respects understood as being irrevocably conferred) as being non-sacramentally conferred. If we leave on one side (as we shall no doubt be permitted to do) the possibility we have suggested above – that is to say, a sacramental assignment of ministry which would be neither priestly ordination nor a real episcopal consecration – and assume that this office is passed on through the laying on of hands, then we can say that the appointment of the head of a large area within a diocese carried out in this way, together with the powers conferred with this appointment, and conferred to some extent irrevocably, cannot be understood in any other way than as a sacramental, episcopal consecration.

SUMMING UP

An area bishop is appointed through a sacramental transmission of ministry because, and in so far as, he is co-opted into the whole episcopate – appropriately so, since he is the legitimate co-representative of an unusually large and indivisible diocese; and because, and in so far as, the appointment to this ministry (which is conferred through the laying on of hands) is so new and important, compared with the merely priestly office, that it is eo ipso a sacrament – to be specific: an episcopal consecration.

In saying this we have of course not even glimpsed most of the theological questions raised by the appointment of area bishops, let alone the questions which arise for Canon Law and pastoral theology. One question, for example, might well be, how and why the equal position of an area bishop in the whole episcopate (where he is quite evidently not subordinate to his diocesan or local bishop) is reconcilable with his subordinate position vis-à-vis his local bishop in his particular diocese. We can certainly not escape from this difficulty simply by calling to our aid the distinction between the power of order (in which the two bishops are equal) and the power of jurisdiction (in which there is a distinction between the two); for it is the whole episcopate which is the supreme holder precisely of the power [166] of teaching and the power of jurisdiction in the Church. We might again ask, even more earnestly,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whether and why the character of a member of the Church's supreme governing body is reconcilable theologically with a simultaneously subordinate position in relation to another bishop. The Church's ancient patriarchal and metropolitan constitutions and structures do not provide a theologically adequate justification for this because on the one hand we can raise the same question in regard to these constitutions, and because, in the ultimate resort, it is still an open question whether some minor 'bishop' in early or later times, though certainly bearing a bishop's title and going under this legal designation, was not in actual fact merely a priest or 'itinerant' bishop, without perhaps really being a bishop at all. Even today, no truly definable border-line can be clearly and convincingly drawn between priest and bishop which is absolute as regards the power of order; and, as far as jurisdiction is concerned, many a simple bishop was in hardly a better position towards his patriarch or metropolitan than a dean or other head of part of a large diocese. But we cannot go on to talk about these questions and others like them here, even though they inevitably arise in connection with the institution of area bishops.

Let me, in closing, just say one thing. It is not in accordance with the spirit of the Second Vatican Council or with the character of an auxiliary bishop as a fully authorised member of the entire episcopate (and if he is not to be that, then he should not be consecrated as bishop at all) if bishops of this kind are to be viewed and treated in an episcopal conference more or less as semi-undesirable members of merely secondary rank.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[167]

14

TRANSFORMATIONS IN THE CHURCH AND SECULAR SOCIETY

Do transformations in the Church perhaps have some effect on secular society today? And if so, what kind of effect? I should like to try to answer this question here, at least in broad outline.[1] But before we can start to consider the subject we have defined in this way, we ought to agree about the sense in which we are talking about the changes and transformations of and in the Church. We may, however, take it to be a statement of fact when we say that, for a considerable time now, the Church has been involved in a process of change; and that in the coming decades this process will probably be more widespread and more evident all over the world. What is actually happening in this process, however, has been described in a multitude of bewildering interpretations; and the word 'transformation' or 'change' certainly suggests many things that are not meant here.

In the first place, it cannot be a question of a transformation which would affect the very nature of the Church – the Church which a definition that has come down to us from scholastic theology describes [168] as iuris divini.[2] Of course this term itself is not as clear as people casually suppose; and that means that it is weighed down by particular problems of its own. Naturally there is nothing in the Church which is in itself plainly and simply, quite expressly and in the abstract, iuris divini, and which in actual, specific fact is not also historically conditioned and subject to change. So a transformation of the Church cannot mean that there can ever be a time when the living fellowship of believers ceases to confess, as the incomprehensible foundation and goal of all history, the living God who in Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen Lord, has irrevocably promised himself to the world as victorious grace and forgiveness. The transformation of the Church will not mean, either, that sometime or other the petrine and episcopal structure of the ecclesiastical society will cease to exist. And yet it is a matter of course that this Church will continually experience changes which it cannot estimate in advance, particularly in the dimension of its social character and its Law. And even the papal and episcopal function in its specific, ecclesiastical form is therefore not excluded from far-reaching changes.

WHAT TRANSFORMATION?

The following ideas are designed to centre on those lasting and, above all, institutional

[1] This essay is based on the revised manuscript of a lecture given at a symposium in Madrid in the spring of 1974, in which the present author took part, together with Professors Jürgen Moltmann and J. B. Metz. The subject was chosen by the organisers of the symposium and was based on the little book Strukturwandel der Kirche als Aufgabe und Chance, Herder Bücherei 446, 3rd edn (Freiburg 1973); ET The Shape of the Church to Come (London 1974). In the analysis of the various situations, the reader will discover much that has already been said; but the essay as a whole contains sufficient fresh material to justify its inclusion in the present volume.

[2] Cf. 'Reflection on the Concept of "Ius Divinum" in Catholic Thought', Theological Investigations V (London 1966), pp. 219-43; also in Theological Investigations XIV (London, 1976), the following essays: 'On the Theology of a Pastoral Synod', pp. 116-34; 'Aspects of the Episcopal Office', pp. 185- 201; and 'How the Priest Should View his Official Ministry', pp. 202-19. Recently, in connection with reflections on the Church's office and ministry, the present author has also proposed the creation of a 'law based on the nature of the Church', as the foundation for its hierarchical structure; cf. Vorfragen zu einem Ökumenischen Amtsverständnis (Quaestiones Disputatae 65) (Freiburg 1974), especially pp. 35-9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

changes in the Church which have already been made or which we may expect in the foreseeable future, on the basis of the fact that, in all countries, and even in the so-called Christian parts of the world, the Church has become, or is beginning to become, the gnoseological minority. Of course it is true that the points of departure for this vary greatly, just as the development itself is coming about with varying swiftness and in ways which differ from case to case. But the living space of the Church today – which is to say the secular pluralistic or even authoritarian anti-Christian societies and [169] States – brings with it a minority status which either already exists or can be foreseen for the near future. This minority status inevitably brings change with it, even if the changes are slow and meet with resistance in the Church. And these changes are to be found even in places where Christians who belong to the Church are still in the majority numerically, in that particular society as a whole. According to the principles of civic tolerance (which after all are religious and Christian principles as well[3]), Christians must in this case recognise the social legitimacy of large minorities of considerable cultural and political importance; and they must, therefore, submit to the Law of a pluralistic society.

What emerges for the Church in the way of change in this situation, where the Church is part of modern, secular society, or what suggests itself in that direction, particularly where the Church's institutional form is concerned, can – as we have already said – vary in nature, extent and urgency in the different countries and continents. But it is self-evident that, in view of the minority status of Christians and the Church, changes in ecclesiastical structures will come, even if they are opposed by the Church in its official character, and in spite of the dislike of traditionally attached groups of Christians. Moreover, since ultimately these changes rest on a common cause, they will generally crop up everywhere in similar form. But we should be better able to recognise and interpret them if we could investigate their cause more exactly – that is to say, the conditions that contribute to these changes in the history of thought, in social and political life, and no doubt in salvation-history, too. Of course, we cannot carry out this investigation here. In our present discussion we shall give only a few indications which may help to illustrate the transformation in and of, the Church, before going on to consider in more detail the possible influence of this process on secular society.

A first characteristic of these changes in the Church is the fact that its mind is no longer identical with the mind of the public as a whole. On the contrary, the two are related to each other in an inevitable process of mutual dependence and reciprocity. Seen empirically, the secular mind of society shows itself to be, if not the all-powerful part of this relationship, at least clearly the more powerful part. We cannot overlook the fact that now this secular social consciousness, which [170] sees itself expressly as non-Christian, none the less includes, if anonymously, much that is Christian; and it can be partly marked by what a Christian calls sin. Consequently it is not a question of Christianity and the Church on the one hand, and a neutrally secular and secularised consciousness on the other. The mutual relationship is much more complex than that; for again, the actual consciousness of people in the Church itself is also partly sustained by the contemporary secularised consciousness of the society around them – quite apart from the fact that even the Church's awareness can also be distorted by sin and error in particular cases.

This closely interrelated relationship between awareness in the Church, as a minority group, and the pluralistic mentality of secular society, determines a second characteristic of change for the Church. Its proclamation of its faith, and the theology required for this, present themselves today in a much more 'pluralistic' form than formerly. For by reason of its nature and of the task assigned to it, theology is a reflection about Christian faith in its actual [3] Cf. here especially Vatican II's 'Declaration on Religious Freedom'; text in The Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

relationship to reality and to the task man is entrusted with in life. This means that from the very beginning it is necessarily related to the whole of human existence. But, even before theological reflection, man is a pluralistic being who can never adequately synthesise the protean manifestations of his reality, his history and his experience – and today less than ever. The human situation cannot be abolished, but it is only today that people have become more clearly and more fully aware of what it is. Of course, this situation also has its effects on the theology of the Church, particularly because theology (as distinct from faith, which derives from the experience of Jesus and the incomprehensibility of God) contains in itself a number of different approaches and outlines for the future in this world. The influence of all these different secular, pluralistic backgrounds to understanding derives from man's free position in finite time. For that reason it can never be entirely compensated for, which is one reason among others for the pluralism in theology which people are very conscious of today but which is insurmountable. There will never be another scholastic theology, which could be understood by everyone in the same way and could be practised by everyone. It is impossible to show in detail here what this assertion means for the Church's magisterium and what consequences that magisterium ought to draw. But these consequences already exist, even if they have not yet been sufficiently recognised and taken into account in official quarters.

[171] A third characteristic arising from the Church's minority status in our time is the new and growing importance of the rank and file, or the 'grass roots' of the Church's people.[4] For the real, specific impact of its office and ministry depends to an increasing degree on this rank and file. However, the theological legitimation of the Church's official ministry may be thought of in a Catholic ecclesiology as coming 'from the top'; today at least its real effectiveness, its 'power', is no longer simply presented as a given fact for the response of the rank and file, as it was in earlier times. Today it follows from their good will and is dependent on that. Whether one welcomes this phenomenon or not makes no difference to the facts. However long the process, which began with the Second Vatican Council, may continue before tangible and established results become crystallised, it may already be said now that, through the dependency of the Church's ministry and office on the grass roots which we have already mentioned, the mutual relationship between the two is going to assume a more democratic form.[5] The rank and file of the Church will also acquire a legally institutionalised and important influence on the 'official' Church in some form or other; and the latter will no longer exercise its function in a closed circle of officials, who make all the decisions themselves.

THE PRACTICAL CONSEQUENCES FOR SECULAR SOCIETY

Having said that, let us break off our brief discussion about the transformation of and in the Church. Can we now perhaps go on to talk about the effect of these changes on secular society? Before we consider this subject, it must be emphasised that we have no intention here of describing and elaborating all the real, essential services which the Church can perform in secular society, in the light of its nature, its mission and its life. In the future as in the past, it will continue to be of the greatest importance for secular society that the Church believes in the living Lord of all history, and in the blessed end of this history which he has promised; that, contrary to all the hopelessness which this history continually reiterates, the Church goes on [172] hoping; that it prays for, and feels responsible for, the poor and the [4] On this term cf. K. H. Neufeld, 'Berufung auf die Basis?' in Entschluß 28 (1972/3), pp. 469-81.

[5] Cf. 'The Teaching Office of the Church in the Present-Day Crisis of Authority', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974); and in the present volume 'Opposition in the Church', pp. 127-38.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

oppressed, for people who have not had their fair share of things in this world, and for the dead; that the Church stands in the way when people want to turn history into a mere tale of victors and survivors;[6] and that in the world the Church continually upholds with vital force a position from which both proved tradition and the tempting future can be quite soberly and critically called in question, and in the face of which no tangible historical reality can claim to be God, either theoretically or practically. All this and much more besides is of vital importance for secular society too. And, of course, this is more important than anything which we can now mention as being the result for secular society of changes in the Church determined by a particular period.

But all the same, we must, because of our subject, address ourselves to just this possible influence. Now that we have narrowed things down, we shall think in more detail of two possible effects of structural alterations in the Church. Even so, not all the details can be described in our present framework, especially since it is fundamentally not at all clear whether the unique features of the transformation we have described can really have any effect on secular society – whether ecclesiastical changes of this kind can be translated at all into secular contexts and can encourage similar manifestations there. If we once presuppose that this is possible (i.e. that these alterations, which are wrung from the Church, so to speak, because of its minority status, could provoke analogous effects in secular society), then in spite of its actual situation the Church could perhaps play a part even in a pluralistic society, in which it would not simply run after the secular historical transformation, but actually set an example by running ahead of it. For its status as a minority no longer allows the Church to surrender its development to the law of inertia, as secular society still does. A swifter and more deliberate implementation of necessary changes can therefore give the Church the position of a pace-setter in the society around it. But we must quite certainly not make our Christian faith and our church membership dependent on a hope of this kind.[7] So ought we simply to deny that hope from the [173] very beginning, as if it were quite certain that the power of the Church to influence world history to any considerable degree has been exhausted once and for all? We do not share this opinion either.

a) Shared Basic Convictions

In my view, the initial contribution which transformations in the Church can make to secular society seems highly remote. But even a secular society with its institutions cannot – in spite of its liberal and pluralistic self-understanding – live and get along without a certain basic stock of common convictions which are respected by everyone in that society. This basic stock cannot simply be replaced either by particular maxims and institutionalisms which happen to be obviously useful, or by the pure brute force of the State, any more than it can consist of an inexhaustible heritage of tradition stemming from the past, or can automatically renew itself again purely and simply out of the depths of human nature itself, as it were. On the contrary, society itself has the task and the duty – and indeed is continually faced with the necessity – of quite deliberately preserving this basic stock of common convictions by its own methods; and where necessary it also has the task and duty of regenerating and changing these shared convictions.

The power and possibility of preserving this basic stock of convictions and altering it in accordance with the times, certainly belong to everyone, basically speaking, because of the [6] CI the lecture given by J. B. Metz on the occasion of the same symposium in Madrid, 'Kirche und Volk', printed in StdZ 192 (1974), pp. 797-811.

[7] This would seem to be the case, for example in G. Hasenhüttl, Herrschaftsfreie Kirche (Düsseldorf 1974).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dignity every individual enjoys. But in fact this power and possibility have principally to be implemented by the people who actually have the power to do so, and who bear special responsibility in this direction – that is to say, the representatives of the State. In saying this we are already presupposing that State and society are never quite identical as historical entities, and that an identity of this kind would not even be desirable. So when it is a question of breaking down structures of dominance and constraints and human self-alienation (to name in catchword form some of the generally familiar basic social and political demands), then the power to do this lies with particular individuals or groups. For it is they who define the sphere of freedom open to any individual, and they define it before the individual is consulted at all. For it is simply impossible for everyone adequately to think through all the processes of decision, irrespective of whether they affect them as individuals or whether they affect society. And this means that it is [174] equally impossible to institutionalise these processes of decision in such a way that they are sufficiently clear to everyone. We must therefore start from the assumption that there will always be more powerful people and less powerful people in a State, and that the more powerful ones are given in a special way the task and responsibility of preserving the basic stock of convictions that we have been talking about.

The question that emerges can, therefore, only be how the power of the State can specifically attempt to achieve the necessary regeneration of this basic stock of common convictions and norms which is essential for society – a regeneration which must be tackled again and again; and how they can do this without infringing the individual's freedom of conviction and way of living, which must be safeguarded to the greatest possible degree. It is not an easy task, continually to try afresh to reconcile, on the one hand, freedom of conviction, and the opportunity to proclaim that conviction publicly and to realise that freedom in specific terms, and, on the other hand, the positive cultivation and maintenance of common social basic convictions. A glance at societies and States in the world today – whether they are predominantly democratic or authoritarian in form – shows clearly that this effort cannot be avoided simply by making a radical choice for one alternative or the other. But we have no need to enter into that in any more detail here.

If we take the historical character of all human truth seriously, then of course no ready-made principles can be put forward in this question either – principles which we should only have to apply for the problem in a specific society to be solved once and for all. Faced with this historical decision, no one can be spared the difficulty of searching, of experiencing, of struggling without the benefit of any tangible arbiter. On the other hand, this does not exclude the possibility of perhaps evolving patterns which are better adapted than the earlier ones to help us hold our ground in this ever-new and ever-necessary struggle between freedom of opinion and the need for a common social 'ideology' (to use the word in an entirely neutral sense); and for holding our ground without infringing the respect due to one another. The result will in any case be a precarious one and can never be any more than a temporary balance between the two co-existent entities. The need for these new patterns is becoming increasingly clear in all the secular societies of the world; but it will probably be [175] legitimate to maintain, without any further proof, that they are still largely lacking.

b) The Formulation of Fundamental Convictions

In this sense transformations in the Church and the new structures arising out of them could provide a model for secular societies, too. It is true that the Church is still involved in the process we have indicated, but it ought to survive in such a way that the new equilibrium between authority and freedom in its own life may ultimately bring with it patterns which may be of use beyond the sphere of the Church itself. There is no doubt that in the past the Church has preferred authoritarian forms, and has cultivated them especially for the protection of the common convictions of its faith. In view of its present-day minority status, and since the 'secular arm' can no longer be counted on for support, these forms are no longer effective. This is true even where a person against whose views the protest of the Church and the magisterium is directed, basically recognises the Church's teaching authority. That is why today a relatively wide consensus in the Church's general sense of faith, and in theology, is a necessary precondition even for authentic declarations by the magisterium, so that it can act legitimately and can count on being really effective.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have already said enough about today's pluralism; we have pointed to the lack of a common background of understanding, shared as a matter of course. This, and conscious historical examination of the historical influence and contingency of ideas which were up to now, largely speaking, unquestioningly shared, are now, to a previously unknown degree, hampering utterances on the part of the Church's magisterium which would be both generally binding and generally comprehensible. If the authorities concerned, therefore, wanted to fall back on authentic but non-defining declarations, they would renounce their binding character and could reckon only with a limited effect on the actual awareness of the church member. On the other hand, however, in our time, in contrast to earlier situations of mind and faith, new definitions presuppose a whole series of conditions which are difficult to fulfil. For that reason, in the future we shall probably only seldom, or never, have to reckon with definitions[8] [176] which are more than an emphatic repetition of earlier statements.

In addition to all earlier difficulties, today the historically conditioned conscious or unconscious variety in backgrounds of understanding (which cannot really be synthesised at all in the actual consciousness of either the individual or even the representatives of the Church's magisterium) raises an alarming question: are the existing, officially valid formulations of faith really so alive in the consciousness of individual church members or church groups that they really cover and express the same convictions of faith? For example, the notion of a hierarchy of truths, which found expression at the Second Vatican Council,[9] also shows that agreement in the sense of faith (which used normally to be presupposed) is not so tangibly and susceptibility present as had probably been assumed. The ecumenical strivings towards unity in faith point in the same direction, since they reckon as a matter of course with differences in the histories of faith in the future too. In earlier times, when the Church's teaching authority was exercised, a uniformity of faith was usually assumed to be both the premise and the goal; at the very least, this goal cannot be so easily reached or determined as people once thought.

Moreover, in our period the magisterium also has to take account of a series of unique features in the human situation which used to be treated differently. For today the bona fides of the individual believer and theologian must be taken into consideration in a totally different way, if they seem to stray from the Church's sense of faith. It is impossible to do anything else in a society which in general proclaims freedom of conscience, if the Church does not want to lose all credibility with regard to its own message. One could say and add many things here. But in spite of everything, I will not pretend that we in the Church already know exactly how today (in contrast to earlier times) the authority of the ecclesial community of shared faith can be reconciled with the authority of freedom.

---

[8] Cf. 'Pluralism in Theology and the Unity of the Creed in the Church', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 3-23; 'The Future of Theology', pp. 137-48; 'The Teaching Office of the Church in the Present-Day Crisis of Authority', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 3-30; and above all 'On the Concept of Infallibility in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 66-85, esp. pp. 71-5.

[9] Vatican II: 'Unitatis redintegratio' (Decree on Ecumenism), no. 11, in Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1966), p. 354.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[177] What institutionalisms would then have to exist in the Church today, for the abiding authority of the magisterium to co-exist in a positive way with freedom of conscience – even though the co-existence may perhaps always have to be one of agonised tension? For it is in the conscience that the Church's sense of faith continues to develop; and this process cannot simply be controlled by the official authority of the Church. What must be preserved, finally, is also the legitimate liberty of theology, and difference in the development of the sense of faith in individual Christians, whose living conviction also has the right to be openly expressed, even if it does not simply coincide with the Church's sense of faith.

Now, of course, secular society should not, and cannot, simply take over or imitate the methods whereby the Church has to master the difficulties which still have to be solved for the future. The consciousness of society and Church are too different in origin, content and goal for that. But the new problems which force themselves on the Church and on secular society have a common origin, generally speaking;[10] so if the former were to arrive at a decision more quickly, it could develop practicable solutions for its problems which would also be of significance for secular society. In order to do this, without falling back into a mediaeval state of mind, or without continuing to maintain an attitude of this kind, it would have to find a way to preserve freedom of thought on the one hand, and yet to preserve and develop a common basic conviction (without which every society collapses) on the other.

How we are to conceive of this in concrete terms – how there is, and can be, a free, anti-authoritarian and yet effective magisterium in the Church – ought to be developed here at more length than space allows. Only a few somewhat random ideas may supplement and clarify this suggestion.

When all is said and done, secular society, with its state organisation, is also distinguished from the Church in our pluralistic world by the fact that no one can opt out of secular society, whereas he certainly can from the Church. This gives rise to a highly complicated dialectic of a double kind as regards the rigour and flexibility which [178] are called for with regard to membership of the one or the other society. For this question one ought to consider the possibility of an ecclesiological 'marginal group', since here traditional ecclesiology can offer only the sterile, inappropriate and insufficiently differentiated word 'catechumen'.

What ought to be developed, too, would be a theology of coexistence, starting from statements which are apparently simply contradictory, logically speaking, but which, because they belong to different levels, existentially and socially, are not truly 'irreconcilable' after all. What ought to be brought out here is ultimately only this: with an eye to the possible co-existence between liberty of faith and the mutually binding confession of faith of the ecclesial community, the Church ought to develop new modes of action and new institutionalisms. Here its opportunity would be that, because of its minority situation, it is under great pressure from outside to push forward with these developments much more rapidly than is possible elsewhere. In this way it could become something of a model for secular society, which is faced with similar problems. For secular society does seem to stand in some perplexity before the dilemma of a social and state ideology enforced by authoritarian means on the one hand, and the increasing disappearance of common basic convictions on the other. But basic convictions are necessary for society, too; otherwise it would degenerate into anarchy, for which the 'remedy' would then probably again be the tyranny of a coercive ideology.

c) The Role of the 'Grass Roots'

[10] Tertullian, Apologeticum 39, 7 (CCL 1), 151. On the problem of the connection between the Church and secular society in general, cf. also 'The Function of the Church as a Critic of Society', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 229-49; also Freiheit und Manipulation in Gesellschaft und Kirche (Munich 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At the beginning we mentioned, among other things, that in a Church whose official authority is no longer supported by secular society, the 'grass roots', freely developing groups of believers, takes on an entirely new importance for the Church, and for the effectiveness of its office and ministry. What does this statement really mean? An assessment would require us to trace the beginnings of a free activity of this kind from 'below' – the beginnings, for example, which found expression in the Second Vatican Council. We should have to know what tendencies were (and are) of determining importance for the further development of these beginnings; why such attempts have undergone considerable setbacks since the Council; whether and under what conditions these personal 'grass roots' communities are [179] conceivable as the fundamental cells of the Church which are required today; how they are related to traditional parishes; and what new conceptions about the priest and his function could emerge as a result.

Unfortunately we cannot do more here than merely mention these points. But their bearing for our subject as a whole can be summed up with considerable clarity. The Church, in its present minority situation, where it is no longer supported by the secular powers of society, can only be the Church – and can only continually become the Church – by deliberately being the Church from below. Sociologically, it can no longer be a Church which is presented to the rank and file and confronts it. But this means that the relationship between the basic community and the authorities must also take a very different form from the one we have hitherto been used to. Nor will this new form leave structures and institutions untouched.

The problem in secular societies, seems to me to show entirely analogous features. For whether we look at the Western democracies with the different nuances they give to their 'concept of democracy', or at the Socialist countries, with their different party oligarchies – everywhere in the world the relationship between the masses, the basic community, the people and the elite – the leaders – seems to be disturbed. The gap between them, at all events, is a wide one. Parliamentary representation is increasingly losing its earlier standing, and not infrequently gives the impression of being a mere façade behind which other powers and forces exercise their influence without any control at all. In that way it becomes ultimately unimportant which small and largely anonymous groups obtain this dominating position.

In the Socialist countries, the people are claimed to be the active upholders of economy and State; but even so, here, too, the observer of the different attempts at finding practicable models sees the same problem: how huge masses of the people – now educated anyway to a point where they can no longer be treated as minors – can remain in sufficient contact with the indispensable apparatus of higher officialdom for decisions to be made by the people (always assuming that something of the kind is really wanted).

Where this problem is concerned, the situation, the task and the means are certainly very different in the Church and secular society. But there will probably be no argument about the fact that the problem of active participation by the rank and file in the decisions of the leadership in both does exist. On both sides people are searching [180] for forms and structures for a participation of this kind. We too should not simply think that this problem has already really been solved, and that our task is just to remain true to the democratic constitution, and at most to purify it in its already existing form.

After all that we have said, it will probably now no longer appear far-fetched to seek for models for secular society in the Church. But really this is nothing new. We can read of Christianity's early period: 'See how those Christians love one another'; so might it not later also be said of us: 'See how they really live together, in liberty and without coercion?' This hope may sound highly utopian, especially since the insight and will for profound alterations still seems hardly to exist in the Church. Perhaps the inexorable results of its minority status

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

will have to force themselves even more urgently and inescapably on its consciousness. All the same, we believe that the Christian's sense of responsibility for secular society, which was newly proclaimed by the Second Vatican Council, can certainly enable us to perceive our duty and strengthen our determination to see that the relation between the rank and file on the one hand, and the official ministry on the other, is embedded in the structure of the Church in such a way that it may even take on, to some degree, an exemplary significance for secular society; and that in this way out-of-date patterns of inter-human relationships will cease to be cultivated when they have been abandoned everywhere else.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[181]

PART FOUR

Signs of the Times for the Church

[183]

15

THE ONE CHURCH AND THE MANY CHURCHES

Our subject is the one Church and the many Churches.[1] We might also say, the one Church of God and of his Christ, and the many Churches of men and women. When we talk about the many Churches, we are looking at the Church as a historical specific social entity, with a human word, in which the Word of God finds expression, with sacramental signs and tokens, with institutions, with an office and ministry, and with everything else that belongs to a human society. It is obvious to us that the Church and the Churches do not consist merely of what belongs to them in their character as historical, social entities. We know that their real theological essence means the Spirit and grace; and that for them the decisive things are the faith, hope and love which in them come to fruition – indeed that these realities are to be found beyond the Churches themselves, wherever a person overcomes his own nature and listens to the voice of conscience. And we know, too, that all the tangible social realities to the Church and the Churches have significance only to the extent in which they are the sign, the incarnation and the mediation of these realities of grace, which link man with man, and so with Jesus Christ, and hence draw men and women into the mystery which we call God. But when we talk about the one Church and the many Churches, we also have to remember their historical and social dimension. For it is in relation to that, that the question of unity, diversity and division is raised.

[184]

THE PRESENT SITUATION AS AN ECCLESIOLOGICAL PROBLEM

Interpreting the question in this way, we can approach it from various directions. For a Catholic dogmatic theologian it would seem most obvious to start from dogmatic ecclesiology – which means, in specific terms, the theological self-understanding of the Catholic Church; and from that starting point to ask how we have to understand the unity of the Church theologically. We would then enquire how, in principle, even in a Catholic ecclesiology, the one Church is the communion of many particular Churches, with their own history, their own form, and each with the unique character of its own life. We would ask what difference in the particular Churches is irreconcilable with the theological character of the one Church, and therefore ought not to exist; what relationship the latter has to these

[1] The same question is considered by the present author in somewhat different form in ‘Church, Churches and Religions’, Theological Investigations X (London 1973), pp. 30-49; ‘On the Theology of the Ecumenical Discussion’, Theological Investigations XI (London 1974); ‘Perspectives for the Future of the Church’, Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 202-17; also ‘Theologische Deutung der Gegenwartssituation als Situation der Kirche’, HPTh II/1 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 233-56.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

many Churches; what positive theological status this Church can none the less concede to these many Churches; and why, how, and with what reservations the Catholic Church in its specific existing form sees itself as the Church of Christ.[2]

But here – for reasons which will soon emerge – we shall first of all choose another starting point, and shall pick a different approach. We shall search for a starting point and approach that is empirical, and begins with the sociology of religion. In doing so we are of course well aware that with this method we shall reach only part of the questions raised by this subject. When we talk about the many Churches, we do this almost inevitably under the influence of an interpretation of them – a way of looking at them – which may be theologically justifiable and even necessary, but which does not correspond to reality where the sociology of religion is concerned, or which – better – leaves out this sociological aspect altogether. For we do not merely conceive of each of these Churches as what it undoubtedly is – a social institution, with its different sections, its officials, a particular law, a particular history, and so forth; we tacitly assume that in every religious organisation of this kind a certain, clear conviction or profession of faith is to be found, a creed which plays [185] a prominent part for the people united in this society, and is binding on them, and which therefore, distinguishes it from other ecclesiastical societies; because it is these credal discrepancies which divide these churches.[3]

From a historical and theological viewpoint, this way of looking at the Churches and their divisions may be correct. Formerly it was certainly the only way. For earlier it was this confession of faith that held each Church together; and every confession of faith that distinguished one Church from the other Churches took the form of a clear conviction – at least among the church leaders, who were also the socially authorised representatives. These leaders also really did have behind them the people in the Church whom they represented and could certainly feel themselves to be their spokesmen and representatives. For on the one hand these people, in so far as they had a theological opinion at all, did not (and could not, sociologically speaking) have any opinion other than that held by these representatives, who were also authorised by society and by the State. And on the other hand, these representatives succeeded to a certainly considerable degree in mediating to their people the denominational creed which divided one Church from another. This meant that in each Church they succeeded, practically speaking, in producing a homogeneous denominational consciousness with an individual impress of its own. In this sense the Protestant Churches, too, were themselves, by way of their theological representatives, clerical, in spite of the wide individual theological differences which existed between them down to the end of the nineteenth century, in spite of their acknowledgement of the universal priesthood of all believers, and in spite of the sects and revival movements which continually sprang up from below. That is to say, a sociologically demarcated and institutionally formal group (of pastors, with the princes as supreme episcopate)[*] were, in theory and practice, responsible for their particular people as a whole. In this way (and this is also true from the point of view of the sociology of religion) each Church, divided from the others, was able to form a homogeneous denomination.

[186]

[2] On this terminology, cf. Vatican II; Decree on Ecumenism, art. 3 and 19, as well as the 'Dogmatic Constitution on the Church', art. 15, in The Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1966), pp. 345-6, 361-2 and 33-4 respectively. Cf. the commentary in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, ed. H. Vorgrimler, vols I and II (New York and London 1967 and 1968).

[3] Cf. 'Transformations in the Church and in Secular Society', pp. 167-80 of the present volume.

[*] The author's analysis here is based on the historical character of the Protestant Churches in Germany [translator].

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE SITUATION OF THE CHURCHES FROM THE VIEWPOINT OF THE SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION

But what is today the real situation sociologically, and what is the relationship of the many Churches to one another, seen in this context? If we want to describe this situation and this relationship by means of common sociological terms, without making any claim to expert knowledge of the sociology of religion, we can and must probably say something like the following. For historical reasons, a great many people – what we may call the rank and file of the Church – live under the cover of a particular religious organisation. Each of these separate religious organisations has a 'statute of association', which is known as a profession of faith, and this is regarded as more or less binding, even though the compass of this profession and its binding character may vary greatly in the individual Churches. But the specific character of this statute of association and its difference from that of other Christian religious organisations is, practically speaking, known only to the administrative officials and the professional theologians. For the rank and file in the Church in its widest sense it is unknown or of no interest. When the rank and file of the Church itself (assuming that they know and affirm the separate character of these religious organisations) find the other religious organisations alien and reject them, this is usually for historical, cultural, psychological and institutional reasons. Yet according to the unanimous judgement of the functionaries and theologians of the divided Churches, reasons of this kind are not necessarily bound to divide them at all. We may think here, for example, of external differences in forms of worship, or religious customs, or differences of a cultural kind, or a historically conditioned style of Christian living, and so forth. What the rank and file receives from its particular Church, practically speaking, is largely common to all Christians: belief in God as the guarantor and goal of the moral order; hope for the forgiveness of sins; recognition of Jesus Christ as the mediator of salvation in some form or other, even if it is a cloudy one; prayer; hope for eternal life. One might put it very crudely and say that the 'official' reasons for the division of the Churches are not known at all, or hardly at all, to the ordinary members of the different Churches; while the sociological reasons, which in actual fact cut off the Churches from one another, are theologically and officially for the most part irrelevant. To put it in a somewhat malicious and certainly [187] exaggerated way: from the point of view of the sociology of religion, the divided Churches are like shops next door to one another, in which the customers buy the same things, because the same things are on sale in all of them; and where the thing which is to be had in only one of the shops is not bought at all.[4]

Today this is the case not only in the Protestant Churches (where philosophical or ideological pluralism and the mental and spiritual differentiations of society make a swift and clear impact, because of the fundamental understanding of the Church and faith). It is true of the Catholic Church, as well. There, too, there are enough people for whom the seven sacraments, papal infallibility, veneration of saints, and of Mary, indulgences and much more, play no part in their real religious lives. There will probably be even more of these people in the future; and they are to be found not only among the 'modern pagans' – the indifferent, the merely baptised, and the people who only pay their financial dues – but even among the people who practise the basic substance of Christianity in the Church. These people deny, doubt or ignore in practice all the tenets we have mentioned, without of their own initiative feeling that this is a reason for leaving the Catholic Church, and without the authorities of the Catholic Church having any easily applicable, practicable ways of excluding them 'officially' – at least unless these differences make themselves clearly evident

[4] The situation analysed here has been of concern to the present author for a considerable time, and has given rise to a number of theological reflections. It is also the basis of the ideas in the essay, 'Third Church?', pp. 215-27 of the present volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation in the Church's public life.

DANGERS AND NEW OPPORTUNITIES

We have done no more than mention this sociological situation, without being able to go into the reasons for it. But what does this situation mean for the question of the one Church and the many Churches?

Union without Regard for the Question of Truth?

First of all we might think – and many Christians really do think today – that the historical and sociological transformation of religion has long since overtaken the traditional differences between the Churches. To take an example: in the actual consciousness of the [188] Protestant Christian (as distinct from the professional theologian) the articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae about the merely imputative justification of man through fiducial faith alone no longer really plays an important part; and the position is no different, sociologically and psychologically, on the Catholic side. So we might well think that a union of the Church (even an organisational one) no longer presents insurmountable difficulties today (provided only that we really take this sociological and psychological attitude on the part of church members seriously), or that the difference in religious organisation between the individual Churches is unimportant when we come to the theological unity of the Church.[5] In terms of the very broad metaphor we used earlier, we might think that the various shops could well amalgamate, because in fact they simply sell the same goods anyway, and the old white elephants (which will never be sold any more) could be taken out of stock right away. Or we might say that the actual number of these shops, even if they continue to exist, makes no difference to their similarity and hence fundamental unity; indeed it even offers the advantage of a certain useful competitiveness and avoids an undue organisational concentration.

There are many practical indications that a number of Christians in the various Churches do think like this – indications which we cannot consider in detail here. We need only consider the movement for complete intercommunion, ahead of the settlement of doctrinal differences between the denominations, or tendencies towards a fusion between Catholic and Protestant student congregations; or the movement towards common church congresses, and the participation of Protestant Christians and theologians in Catholic synods – even though things of this kind are still open to varying interpretations.

Actual Facts and Norms of Existence

But in reality the matter is not as simple as it seems if we look at it only on the basis of these facts, drawn from the sociology of religion.

First of all, attention must be drawn to one basic truth. It is in general a dubious matter simply and without closer inspection to proclaim existing facts as being the norms of existence without more ado, thus making a de jure out of a de facto. In our case we must ask [189] if to do this would not be like deriving sexual morality as it should be from the facts of [5] This subject is developed further in the essay 'Is Church Union Dogmatically Possible?', pp. 197-214 of the present volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Kinsey Report. But we shall not develop that any further here.[6]

A Secularisation of the Church?

Before we draw conclusions for our subject from the facts we have indicated, which are drawn from the sociology of religion, we must seriously consider something else. A large number of people who today still help to determine the sociological picture of the different Churches and make the unique character of these Churches and their difference from the others indistinct, are actually, if we look at them more closely, no longer Christians at all. People like this are often 'enrolled' or 'registered' members of their respective Churches because of their social background, or their parents, or their earlier education in a church school, or because of a social code of behaviour. They are not members because of a real, fundamental Christian conviction. This can very often be the case even if the person in question has not as yet noticed it. He may actually be intensively engaged in working for a transformation of the Church's image, in terms of church politics. If we look more closely we shall notice that people like this are chiefly animated by what is of course a highly estimable humanitarian involvement – perhaps especially in the direction of social politics – and, it may be, by a very vague and diffuse religious feeling, a kind of philosophical and ethical theism. They are not impelled by convictions of faith which, according to the origin and the common basic conviction of all Christian denominations, are specifically Christian and indispensable for a true Christian Church. That is to say, these people do not even vitally share, as a living and absolute conviction of faith which has to be adhered to, what the basic formula of the World Council of Churches describes as being the common profession of faith of all the Christian Churches.[7]

[190] Men and women like this are of course, as people, often of the first order; but theologically they are Christians only in a social sense, for some fortuitous historical reason, even if they have not noticed this consciously. And people of this kind will actually explicitly or implicitly try to undermine the Church, so to speak. That is to say, they will try to make their own mentality the legitimate, even officially recognised 'creed' of their Churches, beyond which nothing may be demanded in that Church in the way of creed and conviction of faith.

Purely empirically and sociologically we cannot, of course, even know with certainty a priori that such an attempt to elevate what is really an individual's secularised mentality into the character and creed of his own particular Church will not succeed. Nor can it be known in advance how far such an attempt (which does not have to be undertaken explicitly and purposefully) will succeed in any individual Church.

The success of such an attempt would transform the Church in question into at best a movement and institution for a kind of moral rearmament, furnished with a few traditional ornaments of a Christian folk lore. It would take from the Christian Churches the chance of being truly Christian and would ultimately dissolve them into a secularised society with their own ethical ideas. But apart from that, the Catholic Christian, at least, will cling stubbornly to the hoping conviction of his faith that this attempt to secularise his Church (even if it be not called that) will not in fact succeed, even if in overcoming this trend the Catholic Church in [6] On this problem, cf. K. Rahner, 'Theoretische und reale Moral in ihrer Differenz', HPTh (Freiburg 1966), pp. 152-63.

[7] For the text of this declaration, cf. Die Einheit der Kirche. Material der ökumenischen Bewegung, Theol. Bücherei 30 (Munich 1965), pp. 82f. (also pp. 83-93). For a critical discussion, cf. R. Bultmann, 'Das christologische Bekenntnis des Ökumenischen Rates', EvTheol 11 (Munich, 1951/2), pp. 1- 13. For its history, cf. R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517-1948 (London 1954).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

its abiding Christian sense were to become numerically very small.

It is quite conceivable that to maintain the basic Christian substance of faith as the indispensable creed and essence of the Church and the Churches will lead to a numerically considerable emigration of many people, if these people have hitherto belonged to them for historical and social reasons, and if this basic Christian substance of faith (which they no longer really share) does not really provide the true theological and existential foundation for their membership of the Church.

FROM THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH TO THE COMMUNITY CHURCH

If we once presuppose that this will be the situation in the future, then the problem of the Church and the Churches presents itself in a quite different light from today. For today the dogmatic problem of the relationship between the Churches is overlaid and obscured by [191] the sociological situation of the still existing established ones. If the members of the future Churches (which will not be established, or at least not to the extent in which they have been hitherto[8]) want truly to live from the free personal assent of faith to the real fundamental substance of the Christian faith, i.e. the living God in the immediacy of grace, Jesus Christ as the absolute and eschatological bringer of salvation, and the eternal life which transcends the possibilities of this world – and if they want to form the Church in the light of all this, then two points presumably emerge for the relationship between the denominationally divided Churches.

Growing Consciousness of Denominational Differences [9]

First, the people belonging to these future Churches could find that the denominational differences which used to separate them had once again become alive and relevant, in a certain sense and to a certain extent. For although historical reasons have played a very considerable part in the story of the divisions between the Churches of the West, yet in earlier times Christians did, all the same, experience their denominational, 'dividing' conviction as the articulation and result of the ultimate decision of their Christian faith. They did not feel that denominational differences were simply controversies which were added on top of an absolutely clear, basic Christian conviction common to all; their differences seemed to them to emanate quite conclusively from their ultimate, fundamental understanding of Christianity. So they always asked themselves – in spite of the Apostles' Creed which they had in common, and in spite of their one, common baptism – whether they really had the same fundamental Christian substance in common, or whether the denominational differences, secondary though they might appear in certain sense, did not all the same betray an ultimate difference in the fundamental understanding of Christianity. If this ultimate, basic substance of [192] Christianity again becomes radically evident, and if it moves again into the centre of Christian existence, because the Churches are detaching themselves from a secularised (even if thereby humanised) world, the people who then still belong to them could really become conscious of these denominational differences in a much sharper and more challenging way.

[8] On the concept of the 'established' Churches in the particular German sense of Volkskirchen, cf. K. Rahner and N. Greinacher, 'Religion und Kirche in der modernen Gesellschaft', HPTh II/1 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 231-3.

[9] These ideas seem at first sight to contradict what is said in the essays 'Is Church Union Dogmatically Possible?' and 'Third Church?', both in the present volume (pp. 197-214 and 215-27 respectively). But here it is a question of a deepening of the 'basic Christian substance' – which these other essays also presuppose as being necessary.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is quite possible that someone will then say, out of the very personal involvement of his faith, 'Because I believe in Jesus Christ as the sole mediator of salvation, I can only (for example) reject the primacy of the pope, in a final primal, Christian protest.' And another will say, 'Because I believe in the permanent incarnational, and thus social, presence of Christ's eschatological grace in the Church, the primacy of the pope is really for me self-evident.' It is, therefore, on the one hand quite possible that through the sociological transformation from 'established' Churches (into which one is, in a sense, born), into Churches that are dependent on personal decisions of faith, the theological difference between them will again become clearer; and that in this way the question about the many Churches and the one Churches will again take on existential importance.

The Meaning of the Fundamental Substance of Christianity

But this, secondly, does not mean that our question returns us to the historical point at which it first became a question, in the sixteenth century. For there is a radical difference between the situation at that time, on the one hand, and the situation of faith now and in the future on the other. It may well be that the ultimate basic understanding of Christianity was not adequately considered or sufficiently differentiated, and expressed itself only indirectly in what were, after all, secondary differences of doctrine. But even though this has not been clearly enough recognised, that basic understanding was still taken for granted on all sides of the confessional dispute. It was the starting point of these controversies, but not really the question on which everything hinged. Faith in the living God, in his verbal revelation, in Jesus Christ, in eternal life, in the possibility of addressing God personally in prayer, were matters of course – unquestioned assumptions – in some sense static parameters of understanding. And within these parameters the denominational controversies centred on questions which were of relatively secondary importance.

Today things are radically different. The traditional points of controversy [193] dividing the Churches can still be seen as genuine questions from the standpoint of these basic Christian convictions; but the real, fundamental question of the person of today, if he wants to be a Christian, is concerned with the basic substance of Christianity itself. In specific and existential terms, he will be a member of a Church tomorrow, not because he takes the basic substance of Christianity for granted, and chooses that particular Church to be his own because it corresponds to his own conviction in its articulation of the secondary questions of Christianity. He will be a member of a Church because he affirms this basic substance of Christianity in faith, and is therefore determined to become a member of the Church as such. The basic substance of Christianity will itself be formative of the Church, since it is this that is called in question and consequently affirmed in a personal decision of faith. And the traditional points of controversy will be clearly felt to be secondary.[10] In such a situation, which crystallises only slowly, the traditional points of controversy between the individual Churches will simply take on a quite different importance. They will still be genuine questions of faith – indeed they will become so again – but any particular question will be enveloped by a much more radical question of making a decision of faith which is intellectually honest and existentially realisable and which relates to this real, basic substance of Christianity. In this situation, we may expect and hope, the question about the traditional points of controversy between the different denominations can be raised in a much more [10] cf. here the notion of the 'hierarchy of truth', which has its special significance precisely in questions of this kind; Vatican II, 'Decree on Ecumenism' No. 11 in The Documents of Vatican II, ed. W. M. Abbott (London 1966), p. 354; commentary by J. Feiner in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, ed. H. Vorgrimler, vol II (New York and London 1968), pp. 118-20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation relaxed manner, freed from a great many emotionally laden factors; for it will be raised by people who are searching together in a totally new way for the innermost centre of the Christian faith, which at heart is no longer the self-evident presupposition of all Christians but is common to them all as their real task, their burden and their salvation.[11]

[194]

Easier Conversation between the Churches

If in this way, the denominational points of controversy, despite taking on a quite new lease of life, move away from the real centre of the actual Christian decision of faith and really shift to its fringe, then there is much more hope that they can be cleared up, and that we may progress in the direction of a common Christian profession of faith, even in secondary, denominational points of controversy. We may at least hope for this, because the realities in the Churches, to which these theoretical differences of doctrine are related, will present themselves in a quite different historical and social form from the one they assumed in the Reformation period. We only have to realise how much the image of the Catholic Church empirically experienced in the sixteenth century differs from that of the twentieth – how differently the papacy, the Mass, the relationship of Catholic theology to Scripture, indulgences, and many other things, presented themselves then and present themselves today.

In short: in a future situation which has already begun, a situation in which what is radically at stake in all denominations is the question of faith in the ultimate essence of Christianity as a whole, there will be a more genuine opportunity to solve the denominational differences of the past.[12]

The sociological state of affairs within the individual Churches certainly cannot make the question of truth appear unimportant, but – if it still exists in the future, in spite of the departure of a not inconsiderable number of people from all the Churches – it will still be able to help to overcome the immobility of the Churches' leaders who almost unavoidably think and work more for the preservation of their own status quo than for a further development of the Churches towards a future of the one Church.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH OF THE FUTURE AND THE UNITY OF THE CHURCH

Although it would have been quite legitimate to do so, we have not taken as our starting point the question of truth; though it is this which stands between the individual Churches, and it is the varying [195] answers to this which prevent the unity of the many Churches in the unity of the same confession of faith. We have rather, very empirically and a posteriori, started from a sociological situation in the Churches which, at first glance, could almost suggest the view that the differences in theological doctrine have long since become out of date and unreal. But through this very approach we have come to see that this sociological situation engenders the theological question about the truth in a new and notable way. This has to be so, ultimately, simply because a free society of a religious kind cannot come into being in any way other than through a common creed. Otherwise it inevitably sinks into an ultimately uninteresting affair of folk lore – into a social relic which can only be explained historically and awaits complete dissolution. Today, and tomorrow, too, the question of the one Church and the many Churches cannot be decided irrespective of the question of truth, even though it

[11] cf. the present author's attempt in 'Mitte des Glaubens' in A. Exeler, J. B. Metz and K. Rahner, Hilfe zum Glauben, Theol. Meditation 27 (Zürich 1971), pp. 39-56.

[12] cf. the brief meditative essays by the present author collected under the title, 'Grundfragen', Wagnis des Christen – Geistliche Texte (Freiburg 1974), pp. 13-56.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

may be a separate question what truth means in this connection, and how truth is to be realised in a Church. But this very sociological starting point has also shown that the question of truth really does present itself in a different way nowadays, compared with 450 years ago, and that this new situation also offers new opportunities for a common answer to the real question of truth.

For the Catholic who is a real Catholic – theologically, not merely in a sociological sense – one element of his Catholic faith is the living conviction that, if at some time or other there is to be a single Christian Church in our present era, it will be in a theological sense Catholic. But of course it will be the Catholic Church of the future, which will certainly show a legitimate, historical continuity with the present one, but is all the same not just the Church in the specific form in which it now presents itself to historical and empirical observation.

This Church will very clearly be the communio of the Churches which, in the light of their own historical origins and presuppositions, will bring and incorporate into this one Church all that God has given them in the way of positive Christian truth.

Once it has become clearer that all positive concerns of the Reformation Churches can also find a natural home in the Catholic Church; and when it has become even clearer theologically than hitherto that the threefold sola of the Reformation is absolutely Catholic (as long as it is not understood heretically but in a Catholic sense, i.e. positively as 'yea' and not as 'nay') – then the Reformation Churches [196] can also be asked, at least with hope, whether they cannot acknowledge that the legitimate and full historical continuity between the present-day Churches and the Church of our beginnings is not to be found most clearly in the Catholic Church. They can be asked whether they cannot also recognise this in concrete terms, in shaping and unifying the Church, without having to feel that they are merely returning to an existing unity. Even under these pre-conditions, they could see themselves as Churches forming a unity of Churches, which is the sole hope of the future.

Whether such a unity of all the Christian Churches will one day be achieved in actual fact within world history, or whether Christ will be the Shepherd of the one flock only when history has come to an end – that we cannot know. But as Christians we must continually remind ourselves of one thing: we have to do what we can so that out of the many Churches the one Church of Christ may develop, even as an historical concrete reality; but we must not permit this to mean the simple abolition of the diversity of the Churches as communion in the one Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[197]

16

IS CHURCH UNION DOGMATICALLY POSSIBLE?

There is a considerable difference in all the Christian Churches between 'official' teaching and what is really believed by most members of the Church in question. It is this fact, at first sight surprising, which has provoked the following reflections.[1] But first of all we must say more precisely what we mean, before we consider its theological significance. After that we can go on to indicate its possible consequences.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE OFFICIAL DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH AND ACTUAL BELIEF

What we mean here is something that can be found in all the Christian Churches. That may be said, even though the 'official' doctrine in the different Churches is not upheld by the same body and has a different value, in accordance with the self-understanding of the individual Churches; and even though the gap between what is actually believed and what is officially taught may vary in extent.

This difference has by no means to be merely – or even primarily – one which takes the form of a real, direct and, as such, observed contradiction between an official statement of the Church which is declared to be binding, and the conviction which an individual member or group of members in that particular Church holds and maintains; although contradictions of this kind can exist too. It is rather that the actual awareness of what faith involves differs in its whole [198] structure from official doctrine. It may perhaps have a less explicitly expressed content; it may stress things differently, where the significance and binding character of particular theological statements are concerned; or it may take a different view of the significance of a particular doctrine for the actual life of the Christian.[2]

As we have already said, this difference can be found in all the Christian Churches. It is true that the gap is most clearly evident and most easily discernible in the Roman Catholic Church, because there we have a directly tangible, active magisterium and a precisely tangible or definable official church doctrine whose binding quality can be exactly stated and graded. But in the other Churches, too, there is something like an official doctrine. All the Christian Churches have their confessions of faith; all recognise Holy Scriptures as binding (at least in principle, even if the theological interpretation of what the word 'binding' means can again vary considerably); all of them have something like ministers, who feel themselves to be the representatives and spokesmen of their Church's convictions of faith; and all have something like professional theologians, who in some way or other claim to speak in the name of the Churches, with at least some degree of binding authority. Yet if here, too, we may speak of an 'official' doctrine, that doctrine is by no means certainly and from the outset identical with what actually goes on in the heads and hearts of church members.

---

[1] The author admits that he has often thought about this. Cf. 'Ecumenical Theology in the Future', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 254-69, and elsewhere. But these essays do not cover exactly the same ground.

[2] This was already a much earlier finding of the present author's; cf. Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln 1950), and the various remarks on the subject of heresy, e.g., 'Schism in the Catholic Church?', Theological Investigations XII (London 1974), pp. 98-115; and 'Heresies in the Church Today?' ibid., pp. 116-41.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fact that we are considering here is, of course, first of all a self-evident truism. Churchmen and theologians in all the Churches are well aware that a large proportion of church members who belong 'officially' and sociologically to that particular Church, and who are also more or less practising members, are not particularly interested, are poorly informed, and are influenced in their actual sense of faith (beyond the doctrine and proclamation of the Church itself) by a great number of secular factors, which may be sociological, or may belong to the history of ideas and the climate of thought, or to the psychology of the individual. This means that it is quite impossible for the actual faith of most church members to be simply a pure and [199] unclouded mirror of the 'official' doctrine of faith or of the 'pure Gospel'. Here and there people have also given theological consideration to this fact: for example in Catholic theology, when its fundamental theology considers how the rudes can arrive at an adequate judgment of credibility about the existence of a divine revelation; or when elsewhere theologians have considered the meaning of fides implicita; or when the question was raised about what a person must definitely and expressly believe for him to achieve salvation, or for him to count as a member of the Christian Church; or when closer consideration is given to the question, under what circumstances and conditions an erroneous opinion (if it is obstinately maintained in public, for example) excludes a person from the Church.[3] The same considerations lie behind the continually formulated, brief summaries of the Christian faith, which are based on the assumption that the average Christian does not explicitly know very much more than this about the substance of faith. Something similar will also be found in the doctrine and practice of other Churches. The possibility of disciplinary proceedings in doctrinal questions, for example, makes this clear.

But in spite of this (or so it seems to me, at least, in the light of my limited experience), this difference between official doctrine and the actually existing sense of faith hardly plays any part in ecumenical theology and ecumenical dialogue as it is actually carried on. Or if it does, it is only very recently, and then it is a point taken up at the 'grass roots', rather than by churchmen and theologians. Ecumenical dialogues pursue their ecumenical purpose by comparing the official doctrines of the various Churches. Controversial theology is a controversy between the various confessions of faith writings. This is how theologians talked to theologians until very recently. For them it was an obvious assumption (even if it is really not obvious at all) that they were able to speak in the name of the actual persuasions of the members of their particular Churches. This tacit assumption, which was acted on almost up to the present, is simply a relic from earlier times, in which an elite (whether it was 'the powers that be' in the Church or the State, or whether it was the professional theologians, who alone were competent for these questions) considered [200] themselves to be the representatives of a particular conviction. They therefore felt they could expect the rest – 'the man in the street' – to hold the same opinion; or that this ordinary member of the Church would in actual fact be brought to hold that opinion, through the power of secular or ecclesiastical social institutions; or that at least he would not raise any sort of socially relevant opposition against this view. In the light of this mental and sociological situation, it is understandable that the only question asked in ecumenical conversations was about the compatibility of the official teachings of the various Churches. Indeed faith as it actually existed in the Churches was hardly the subject of theological discussion at all.

THE NORMATIVE SIGNIFICANCE OF ACTUAL FAITH

[3] cf. C. Pesch, Praelectiones Dogmaticae VIII, 4th-5th edns (Freiburg 1922): 'De fide theologica', esp. n. 297ff., and 'De necessitate fidei', n. 426ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This means that theology ought to reflect more explicitly on the theological relevance of this actual faith, before considering what ecumenical significance this faith has. First of all one thing ought to be seen more clearly, and more explicitly stated. This faith is what is actually meant, or ought to be meant, when we are talking theologically about the faith of the Church – this faith, primarily, and not the official faith the Churches profess. For it is this faith, and not initially the faith of the official creeds, which exists in the minds and hearts of people who are Christians. This is the faith that is lived, which counts before God and brings salvation. That is really a matter of course. But we lose sight of it as a natural assumption if, at the moment when we inquire about the saving faith of Christians – the faith that finds salvation – we immediately think about the faith which is officially taught by the Church, and cease to ask ourselves at all how much of this faith really exists in the actual faith that is held and personally implemented by the individual Christian in the Church. Of course we can say that even a real faith of this kind has its implications and inherent powers and unreflected backgrounds and depth; and that these are more clearly objectified in the official doctrine of the Church. That is to say, we might claim that, when all is said and done, the actual faith of the Christian still implies, in an unreflective way, the official doctrine of the Church. Of course we can also, in a sublime theology, describe the most essential and ultimate facts of Christian faith (even in its official interpretation) so formally and existentially, trying thereby to discover its essential saving character, that not very much material content is required to [201] constitute this faith, and on the other hand a faith of the loftiest theology, seen in this way, can also be regarded more or less convincingly as being shared by every Christian.

A Catholic theology of faith can appeal to fides implicita,[4] saying that the normal Christian always and from the outset relates his faith (as fides quae – faith as object) to the faith and creed of his Church. Though this faith may be highly fragmentary, this personal faith of his is therefore always more than it first seems to be; and because of its relationship to the Church's understanding of faith, the individual may still be considered to hold this 'official' faith of the Church. All that may be quite correct. But it does not do away with the gap between faith as it is actually lived and the official faith of the Church. For it is precisely this distinction that is presupposed in the attempt to bridge the gap we have described.

In addition, the following criticism must be made, especially where a Catholic theology of faith appeals to fides implicita. In earlier times the theologically uninstructed Christians belonging to the Church, with their rudimentary faith ('rudimentary' always in the sense of fides quae, not necessarily as fides qua, or personal faith) may have related this faith of theirs clearly and firmly to the teaching authority of the Church. This was partly due to their general attitudes of mind (with its willing acceptance of authority) and their sociological background. And in their case fides implicta may well – for highly understandable reasons – have fulfilled the function which the scholastic theological tradition ascribed to it. But nowadays, even in the Catholic Church, the authority of the Church's magisterium, generally speaking (even where its own definitions are concerned), no longer in fact provides that absolute fixed point and unquestioned presupposition which is necessary for a fides implicita in the Church and which throws open the individually conditioned subjectivity of a person's faith to the Church's sense of faith as a whole. This means that even a Catholic theology of faith can no longer so easily bridge the gap between actual belief and official belief by appealing to the fides implicita of the Catholic Christian.

The following must also be said about the theology of actual, existing faith. It is not merely [4] On fides implicita cf. C. Pesch, Praelectiones Dogmaticae VIII, 4th-5th edn. (Freiburg 1922), n. 195. Cf. also 'Dogmatic Notes on "Ecclesiological Piety" ', Theological Investigations V (London 1966), pp. 336-65.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

– in distinction to official doctrine – [202] the faith by which Christianity lives and which brings the Christian salvation. We have continually to ask anew – and not merely theologically – how and why this faith can exist and can be a saving faith, even in its most rudimentary and implicit form (for example, in a person who maintains in good faith that he feels forced to be an atheist). The official faith of the Church is by no means simply and in every respect the factor that hovers over faith in its actually existing form, as a reality still to be attained, and as the absolute norm which actual faith merely has to reach. Of course we can quite well view the official teaching of the Church as normative for actual faith. People do so in all the Churches, even if in different ways and with different theological justification. But we must not forget that this official fides quae, in the sense in which it really exists for us and in which we can really grasp it, is itself an objectification and a historically conditioned codification of an actually lived faith on the part of the Church. So much so that this is even true of that official doctrinal faith which is normatively given in Scripture itself. The faith of the Church's teaching authority cannot therefore ultimately have a normative power for the actual faith of the Church in so far as it is qualitatively quite different from the latter. It can have that normative power only because, and in so far as, it is the successful reflection of just this actual faith of the Church, which includes the faith of many men and women, many different experiences of faith, and the faith of many different periods.

Nor does a view of this kind have to come into conflict with Catholic ecclesiology and its doctrine about the authoritative magisterium of the Church. For this magisterium means precisely the concrete, socially institutionalised way in which the Church's actual faith (which always logically precedes the teaching of the magisterium) becomes more clearly aware of itself, and brings its binding significance to bear on the individual.[5] It is therefore always true that the Church's actual sense of faith ultimately has its normative power and its critical authority within itself. It does not derive these things from any magisterial teaching. This is also true for a Catholic fundamental [203] theology and ecclesiology, contrary to what a first glance would suggest. It is true, if only because the Church's magisterium is not at all a primary datum of faith, sustaining all the rest, even in a Catholic understanding of the Church. It is itself sustained by a fides quae and a fides qua which are ultimately based, not on the conviction of the Church's teaching authority, but solely on the power of the Gospel of God and his Christ, which is given by the Spirit. If this means that actual faith has its own self-critical energy, this does not exclude – but (at least according to Catholic interpretation) includes – the fact that where this actual faith of absolute commitment (which Catholics call fides divina et catholica), has taken objective form in a particular statement, this commitment remains fundamentally valid for all time. This means that a statement of this kind can, as expressing the Church's teaching authority, still be implicitly normative later on for actual faith, where this faith again falls to some extent behind its earlier objectification (and of course it must not deny this objectification altogether).[6] Consequently, always assuming that this actual faith is seen as having its own self-critical mobility and indebtedness to its own history, we can quite well say that it is even a critical court of appeal against the official teaching existing at any given time, since this teaching itself in a sense a 'snapshot' of actual faith, deriving from an earlier period, even if it is successful and hence authoritative.

As I have already said, this correct and important statement, (which really reverses the [5] The present writer has frequently discussed the problems associated with the magisterium today. What is to some extent a summing up may be found in the following essays, all in Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976): 'Does the Church Offer Any Ultimate Certainties?', pp. 47-65; 'On the Concept of Infallibility in Catholic Theology', pp. 66-85; and 'The Dispute Concerning the Church's Teaching Office', pp. 86-97; etc.

[6] Attention may be called here to the collection of essays edited by the present author and also containing his own views, Zum Problem Unfehlbarkeit – Antworten auf die Anfrage von Hans Küng (Quaestiones Disputatae 54) 2nd edn (Freiburg 1972).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

usual interpretation of the relationship between actual and official faith) does not entitle us, in a purely empirical, demographic and statistical way, to elevate this de facto faith into the sovereign judge of the official faith in the Church pure and simple. What we have said, that is, does not mean permitting average Christians, out of a very superficial awareness, to vote on what is binding in the official doctrines of the Church today, and what is not. A view of this kind is not infrequently to be heard today. But it is not the conclusion to be drawn from the real priority of actual, existing faith compared with 'official' faith; indeed it springs from a misinterpretation of that actual faith.

But though we must presuppose and clearly maintain all this, it [204] ought to be possible to bring out the correct priority and the normative significance of the actual faith of the Church for official teaching in the Christian Churches and in their theologies, and to bring it to bear more courageously and unreservedly. If this actual faith is in fact the real faith which creates salvation, why are we theologians generally so suspicious of it in its actual form, its actual structure, its 'dosage', its perspectives, and so forth? Why do we generally feel this actual, existing faith to be merely a regrettable dilution and fashionable distortion, simply because we are much more familiar with the earlier historical objectivation of the actual faith which we – basically correctly – call the official faith of the Church, which we see as normative for present-day de facto faith? As I have already stressed, it is not a question of simply denying the truth and obligatory claim of particular individual statements of faith laid down by the magisterium, just because these statements are not part of – or are no longer part of – the superficial and empirical findings of present-day, actual faith (though these findings must not simply be identified with the actual faith itself), or because they are not found to have the same clarity and binding force they had formerly. To this extent theologians certainly always remain the advocates of giving a binding significance to the historical experience of faith of earlier times, which has taken objective form in earlier definitions, confessions of faith, etc., and without which the Christian would fall victim to the blind fashion of his own limited point in time, and his own shrunken present. But this does not seem to alter the fact that in the theologies of the Church, in ecumenical dialogues, and in the actions of the Churches' teaching authorities, the normative significance of actual faith does not carry sufficient weight. What makes itself felt in this faith is not infrequently too hastily viewed merely as danger, impoverishment, one-sidedness, fashion, or superficial modernism. If there is a 'hierarchy of truths' in the Christian sense of facts, if there is not merely an objective hierarchy of truths but also an existential one, which necessarily changes, individually and collectively, why is theology such a poor reflection of this existential hierarchy of truths, which always exists historically at any given time?[7] Or why is the reflection so long delayed? These questions, though I have expressed [205] them very vaguely and generally, are probably of the greatest importance for ecumenical discussion, because this actual faith does not, or does not seem to, vary nearly so much in the different Churches – as might be thought when, in ecumenical discussions, it is more or less taken for granted that Christians of individual Churches will also embody in their actual faith just those controversial theological points of doctrine about which the theologians and churchman of the divided Churches are at variance, or at least were at variance earlier. If we were more clearly convinced in actual practice about the normative power of faith as it really exists, much of our ecumenical discussion would perhaps have to be different, to be better, and to move more quickly than it does today, in the stagnating work of the ecumenical movement.

But really something else ought to be said first about the theology of actually existing faith. We ought above all to investigate the different degrees of assent with which the actual faith

[7] Vat. II: Unitatis redintegratio (Ecumenism) n. 11; for comment cf. 'The Faith of the Christian and the Doctrine of the Church', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 24-46.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of the Christian is related to individual theological tenets; and we ought to interpret this theologically. This differentiation is not simply identical with that which Catholic theology makes with regard to the 'qualification' of theological statements.[8] For what is under consideration there is an objective difference in the binding character of individual theological statements. And we are not now discussing how far it is possible to establish this, or in what way it is ultimately connected with, and dependent on, what we mean here. For what we are discussing here are the degrees of subjective assent to theological statements in the actual faith held by Christians in the actually existing Church. What we are concerned about is only that in the Christian's actual sense of faith, in regard to individual theological statements, there are variations in firmness of assent – or rejection – and in personal involvement; and the extent to which the statements are taken seriously varies too. Moreover these variations are not simply and in every case identical with variations in the theological 'qualification' which the Church's official teaching and theology make for these statements for and through themselves. These to some extent 'subjective' qualifications – which are of the most varying kind and gradation – in the [206] actual sense of faith of Christians (in all the Churches, ultimately) also depend largely on the extent to which these theological statements contradict the content of the secular scientific and pre-scientific consciousness, and also on the different degrees to which that content is taken seriously. Though it may be that in general this contradiction is not very explicitly thought about.

In this connection one point is probably important. The subject-matter of man's consciousness is gradually becoming unsurveyable, and it is increasingly difficult, or indeed impossible, for him to integrate that subject-matter into a controllable 'system'. This means that he has perhaps a greater feeling than he had earlier for the provisional and hypothetical character of his knowledge and convictions, their openness to doubt and revision. So he is inclined to judge them as provisional opinions rather than as convictions which he has to hold and defend in an absolute way. This does not merely apply to the theological assertions he consciously holds. It is also true of what he knows in the secular sphere. He is inclined to view all knowledge of this kind as provisional working hypotheses, which for the moment help him to come to terms with life, until he arrives at a better explanation, once new experience of life has shown him that the previous working hypothesis is not after all quite sufficient – though this does not mean that he would have to reject the hypothesis wholesale – as totally erroneous, in the old absolute style.[9]

This open attitude towards the provisional nature of knowledge which dominates the theological and secular consciousness of the man or woman of today, ought probably to be more explicitly reckoned with, in ecumenical discussions as well, than has usually been the case hitherto. Up to now, people let controversial theological statements of a more or less absolute kind rebound against one another; and the only question was which statement would win. This earlier way of thinking was not basically surmounted even if under certain circumstances a certain theological statement might be declared as not objectively absolutely binding, and so could be eliminated from real controversial theology (for even that was a decision which was fundamentally supposed to count as binding); or by introducing into the field of controversial theology a more closely differentiated theological [207] statement which could supersede the previous polemical opinion. Even so, fundamentally speaking, both sides always presupposed that absolute decisions had to be made, of which only one could be correct and capable of commanding real commitment in a cogent and binding way.

---

[8] Cf. A. Kolping, 'Qualifikationen', in LThK VIII, 2nd edn (Freiburg 1963), pp. 914-19; 'What is Heresy?', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 468-512, where the term is applied in connection with the believer.

[9] P. E. Hodgson clarifies the character and origin of this modern way of thinking from the scientist's point of view in 'Zweifel und Gewißheit in den Naturwissenschaften', StdZ 193 (1975), pp. 187-98.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The logical irreconcilability of the statements was taken as a matter of course – as evidence that the ways of thinking which formulated them were equally exclusive. But working hypotheses, provisional opinions and statements of this kind, and the attitudes that are embodied in them, have not at all the character which were ascribed to statements as a matter of course in earlier theological controversy.

Now, in saying this I do not mean to maintain that in theology it is permissible to work simply with a modern mental attitude of this kind; for in the sphere of faith and – as an offshoot of that – in the sphere of theology, there are absolute decisions as well (dogma, acknowledgement of a statement as being articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae); nor should we ignore the danger of an ultimately cheap and comfortable relativism in a mentality of this kind. But this mentality is also to be found, and is actually at work, in the real, existing faith of Christians today and could, if it were applied at the proper point, very well have a positive function. All differentiations in the 'qualification' of theological statements, even in the actual sense of faith of Christians and the Churches, are ultimately the result and expression of the historical nature[10] which belongs to the faith of people and Churches, and which is today as such the subject of reflection. This reflection makes possible and permissible explicitly formulated and accepted ways of behaviour which only used to be matters of fact, without our reflecting about them as such, and without their being fully implemented. Perhaps the ecumenical significance of these notions will be clearer if we now try to draw a fundamental conclusion for our ecumenical task from what we have said.

THE CONSEQUENCES FOR AN INSTITUTIONAL UNION OF THE CHURCHES

What fundamental conclusions can be drawn from these reflections for our ecumenical task? We must allow for the possibility, basically, [208] that other facts which we have not considered here may involve conclusions which could nullify what the ideas we have put forward would seem to suggest. But with that proviso, we should probably be correct if we maintained the following: actual, de facto faith as we find it in the Churches does not today stand in the way of church union on an institutional level.

In saying this we are not thinking primarily of the fact that, in my opinion, ecumenical conversations at the summit level of expert theology – even where the official doctrine of the Churches is concerned – are hardly aware any more of any really insurmountable points of controversy – points which one cannot see how to eliminate (at least apart from the question of the papal office, as this was defined by the First Vatican Council and as it is binding on the conscience of a Catholic Christian). The Reformation's three-fold sola no longer means any doctrine about which the theologians of the Christian denominations could not agree, as long as they really desire union, and do not use their theological acumen to discover and play up new denominational differences once the old ones have been overcome. But, as we have said, this is not what we are discussing here.

What we are thinking about is the actual, average sense of faith of Christians in the different Churches. We are thereby presupposing the normative character of this actual faith, which I have – I hope cautiously – defined, and which requires the official teaching of the various Churches and their theologians to take this de facto faith seriously. We are further presupposing that the variations in the sense of faith indicated above are quite legitimate in the context of the existential hierarchy of truths which belongs to faith, and in the context of [10] On the question of historical contingency, cf. also 'The Historicity of Theology', Theological Investigations IX (London 1972), pp. 64-82; cf. also 'On the Concept of Infallibility in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 66-85.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the 'qualification' of the theological statements, etc., are part of faith. But given these presuppositions we would say: the average faith of contemporary Christians in the various Churches hardly shows any differences. And so we must ask: why, really, should the official doctrinal differences between the individual Churches forbid that institutional unity which is the expression of a factual identity in the actual faith held in the individual Churches?

First of all, it will surely be permissible to say that what we have said really represents the true state of affairs. We are not talking about the theologically highly nuanced sense of faith of churchmen and professional theologians. We are talking about normal Christians in the different Churches, and certainly include the people who participate keenly in the life of their Church. But of these people it can be [209] said that their sense of faith (always presupposing the breadth of variation in that sense within every individual Church) is identical with that of Christians belonging to another denomination. They believe in God; they entrust their lives to this living God of grace and forgiveness; they pray; they are baptised and celebrate the Lord's Supper; they recognise Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen Lord, as the definitive guarantor of God's saving bestowal of himself on them; they live the gospel; they know, too, that to be a Christian in this sense obliges them to participate in a corresponding community of faith, the Church. The traditional points of controversy between the Churches (if we leave the papacy on one side for the moment) are unknown to them, or are unimportant, or are at most noted and accepted as part of that provisional and relative character which we indicated above (which is in itself not necessarily existentially unjustified), and which is accepted nowadays as belonging naturally to the historical contingency of the human situation. This description of the actual faith which is identical in the different Churches cannot of course be substantiated more precisely here. But can this assertion seriously be disputed? Of course there are very many differences in the various Churches with regard to actual church practice, devotional style, and so forth. But quite apart from the fact that there are at least just as many differences of this kind in one and the same Church, if we look at different countries and social groups, differences of this kind between the denominations cannot claim to legitimise the division of the Churches theologically (or if they do, the claim is an illegitimate one, even according to the official principles of the Church). Faith as it is actually experienced is today the same in the different Churches, among average Christians. Has this fact consequences for the possibility and legitimacy of an institutional unity?

Before we venture to answer this question with an outright affirmative, we must clear up a number of difficulties, some of which have already been indicated while others which will seem obvious, at least to a Catholic theologian and churchman.

1. First of all, under the doctrinal aspect, it will be said that in this one Church at which we are aiming (which must also be a Church with a creed and teaching), there must be safeguards for the conviction of faith of people who, for example, hold the Roman Catholic faith – people, that is, who view as irrevocable elements of their faith doctrinal statements which are not shared by other Christians. We can first of all counter this objection, however, by saying that Christians [210] who view a certain doctrine as being co-constitutive of their Christian faith must maintain this conviction in this united Church; and the chance to do so must be given them in that Church, both humanly and institutionally. But the objection can also be answered by another question. Does this conviction of faith also involve the doctrine that everyone who lives in the same Church as this believer has to share the conviction in question positively and explicitly? Or is it enough if this doctrine is not positively condemned by the teaching authorities and is not so publicly and decidedly rejected by the individual members of the same Church that the rejection amounts to a genuine commitment of faith. The objection we are considering (on the part of the Catholic Christian, in this hypothetical case) could be answered by asking whether the person who makes this objection can deny that one can legitimately decide, theologically, for the second alternative with which we

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

countered the objection (i.e., tacit acceptance)? Can he deny this in view of the actual sense of faith within the Catholic Church and the official reaction to it – which either does not exist, or is quite content as long as a doctrine defined by the magisterium is not explicitly and officially denied and declared incompatible with true Christianity? In other words: if in the Catholic Church today, and in the actual sense of faith of its average members, many dogmas outside the real core of the Christian faith – on the 'fringe', that is, of the hierarchy of truths – are either not known at all or are at least not consciously, inwardly realised with a final commitment of faith; and if the official Church tacitly accepts this situation – not seriously protesting against it at least, as long as such an officially absolute, binding doctrine is not expressly and publicly rejected outright by a church member – one could, even from a Catholic standpoint, well consider that a similar attitude on the part of the Church's authority would be theologically possible in this institutionally united Church of the future.

From the doctrinal standpoint, we should then only have to ask whether most Protestant Christians, who would have to help to implement an institutional union of this kind, would feel absolutely bound in conscience, because of what they believe, decidedly to reject a particular Catholic doctrine as undoubtedly contrary to the gospel? In today's state of scholarly ecumenical dialogue, and in view of the actual sense of faith within the Protestant Churches, we may be permitted to answer this question in the negative. The Protestant conscience, in its bearing on faith, does not perhaps in its existing [211] form positively assent, with a believing affirmation, to quite a number of specific Catholic doctrines; but, provided that these Catholic doctrines are themselves properly interpreted, the actual, average Protestant, in his sense of faith, will not meet these Catholic assertions with a positive anathema. Nor does the theology taught in these Churches oblige him to do so.

Of course, even if we agree with what has just been said, we cannot reckon on the fact that simply all the people who have been baptised and call themselves Christians could in conscience join such an institutionally united Church, or that they would do so. There are certainly many Christian denominations and sects who would not agree with the expressly confessed and taught basic substance of the Christian faith which would have to be the confession of faith of these united Churches (the substance that is stated, for example, in the confession of faith of the World Council of Churches, with its christological and trinitarian content). And the same would, of course, have to be said about many individual Christians.

But if in the case of the major Protestant and Orthodox Churches we may assume that the actual sense of faith of the average Christian (even in its empirically and directly tangible form) has a positive, open relationship to the official teaching of these churches – even if the actual sense of faith is not simply identical with official teaching – then we could after all expect a great proportion of Christians in all these Churches, and in the Catholic Church too, to agree with such a differentiated unity of faith, which would in no small degree be left to further historical development. The 'sometime' Catholic Christian in a Church united in this way could hope that the further history of the faith of this united Church would lead to the point when the 'sometime' Protestant or Orthodox Christian could give an absolute assent of faith to doctrines which were hitherto specifically Catholic. (And this is the hope he must have even now in his present Church, with regard to many individuals and many groups, if he wants to come to terms theologically with their actual sense of faith). The 'sometime' Protestant or Orthodox Christian (particularly if he is a theologian) will hope that the further historical development of the (actual and official) sense of faith of this united Church will arrive at the point where – as far as the more precise theological interpretation of Catholic doctrines is concerned, as well as their more precise practice-determining value – these doctrines will become so 'Protestant' or so 'Orthodox' that they will seem to him, not merely acceptable, [212] but the positive expression of his own fundamental conviction.

But given these presuppositions, and since it is this hope that already sustains all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecumenical work, why should it not be possible to live this hope today, letting it find living expression within a Church which is sufficiently united, but not to a unifying degree? For in actual (and as such normative) faith the Christians united in this Church would be one. 'Sometime' Catholics would of course, in appeal to the faith experienced in the history of the Church, cling in faith to those doctrines which they have hitherto believed and which they can and should maintain in this united Church. (In a similar way, even today a Protestant theologian may maintain a certain doctrine as 'in itself' belonging to the Protestant faith, although his view is not generally accepted in the Church to which he belongs.) A 'formerly Catholic' doctrine would be nowhere decidedly condemned as contrary to faith – at all events not by the teaching authority. Within the limits we have indicated, only that unity of faith would be institutionally ratified which already actually existed. And as far as actually existing faith is concerned, unity is no greater than this today even in a single individual Church.

2. A second difficulty must be explicitly named and answered – a difficulty of a directly institutional kind. When he is faced with the notion we have put forward of a possible unification of the Churches, the Catholic will ask: 'What about the papacy? Because for us Catholics the papal office is not merely a dogmatically binding doctrine; it is a concrete entity which is constitutive of the Church.' This Catholic will perhaps say that he could agree with the Church we are striving towards, if it were only the papal office as doctrine that we had to take into account. But it is an actual institution, with rights and claims, and he cannot conceive of any Church in which this institution was not existent and operative.

The answer to this is as follows. Of course a Catholic Christian and theologian, for whom – in so far as he is these things – the doctrine of the First and Second Vatican Councils is of course binding, cannot conceive that any Church could be acceptable in which the papacy, as papal office, did not exist. Of course the Catholic Christian and theologian will interpret this petrine ministry, inasmuch as it exists in the Church of today and tomorrow, in accordance with faith, in the sense of the two Vatican councils. But can the papal office as a concrete institution in a future Church only be thought of [213] in such a way that the powers which it actually claims and realises would have to founder immediately on the absolute protest of faith made by 'sometime' Protestant or Orthodox Christians?

I think we can say 'no' to this question. But of course in saying no, we must make two assumptions, although we may take it that they are assumptions that could be fulfilled. On the one hand, the relative independence of the particular Churches (with their different historical origins and traditions) must be conceived so broadly, and must be so guarded institutionally and legally that there will be no danger (at least in practical terms) of Rome's appealing to the prerogative of the papal office and the self-concept of the Roman Church, and intervening in the life of these particular part-Churches. There must be no danger, at least, of its intervening in such a way that these Churches would inevitably be faced – in human or institutional terms, theologically, historically, and so forth (whether in the absolute or merely relative sense is irrelevant here) – with a contradiction which would lead to schism. According to Catholic dogmatics it is certainly possible for the full authority of the papal office to impose a legal self-limitation on itself (iure humano), as it does in a similar way in a concordat. In this way the feared dangers of a papalistically unified Church could be eliminated.

Secondly, there is no need to fear that the teaching authority of the pope expressed in decisions ex cathedra will be so fully taken advantage of and realised in the future that the conscience of 'sometime' Protestant and Orthodox Christians will be faced with the dilemma of having to accept positively the Vatican's interpretation of the papal teaching authority as binding on faith, or of having to reject – even in actual content – supposedly 'new' ex cathedra papal decisions. For reasons connected with the mental climate and the history of thought (which initially have nothing to do with ecumenical strategy and tactics) we shall not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the future have to reckon with ex cathedra decisions by the pope which go beyond the continually reiterated assertion of the basic substance of Christianity in accordance with particular historical situations. In actual fact we shall have to reckon with them even less, as Christians and Christian faiths bring their own weight into a unified Church.

Here we cannot describe and justify in detail this thesis about a material limitation to what the First Vatican Council stated to be the formally unlimited papal magisterium – a limitation conditioned by [214] the historical situation of theology and thought.[11] But if we assume for other reasons that this thesis is sufficiently cogent, then the acceptance of the papal office, even as magisterium, in the sense to which we have narrowed it down, does not need to lead to conflicts with Protestant and Orthodox Christians and Churches which would make such a union of Churches seem inopportune from the outset, or would undo it again. We must remember here that no Christian in any Church at all can be absolved from the hope that the Church to which he is attached (in whatever way) will be prevented from any development that would lead to an absolute conflict between the individual conscience of the Christian and a decision made by that Church itself. So why should we not be permitted to demand this hope in a unified Church, and in the direction of a unified Church? Why should it not be a hope required of all Christians, each in his own way and in accordance with his own historical origins?

Having narrowed things down in this way, and having formulated these provisos and limitations, we can, I believe, answer our original question in the affirmative. We can in fact say: the major Christian Churches of today could unite, even institutionally; their sense of faith presents no insuperable obstacle. If this is correct, then today the ecumenical question is a question for the authorities in the Churches, rather than a question for the theologians. The authorities in the different Churches must not behave today as if they could do nothing at all for the present, because the theologians cannot come to an agreement.

[11] On the limitation of the papal magisterium in the light of the history of theology and thought, cf. especially 'On the Concept of Infallibility in Catholic Theology', Theo1ogical Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 66-85.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[215]

17

THIRD CHURCH?

CHRISTIANS BETWEEN THE CHURCHES

Protestant and Catholic Christians today can think together about the Reformation and talk about it because, in their different ways, they have been determined by this tremendous event in church history and world politics for more than 450 years.[1] Christians may disagree about the deeper theological interpretation, but they are all affected by it, because they all confess Jesus Christ as the centre of their faith and the Lord of their lives.

But the antecedents of Christians in their unity and disruption are only comprehensible in terms of an abiding task, as a future for which all are responsible and which all have to recognise as the charge laid upon them by their common Lord. Under this aspect one must take an especially questioning look at those Christians who in fact, or at least in some kind of religio-sociological way, stand between the institutionally constituted Churches, and who seem to form something like a third Church.[2] In using the expression 'third Church', however, we must always remember the question mark that follows the title. But to say this gives us the starting point for a genuine question.

NEW PARTNERS

In recent decades, new partners have joined the controversial theological and ecumenical discussions between the different Churches of [216] the West. These partners did not exist earlier, and to exclude them, or overlook them, would inevitably make the dialogue we are seeking an antiquated affair. These new partners are the secularised, secular and pluralistic world; its widespread and sometimes militant atheism; the modern secular sciences; the forms of Christianity which have developed outside Western civilization and culture; rational or rationalistic positivism, with its new horizons of understanding; and so on. But, partly as a result of the new dialogue situation we have described, one of these new partners in the discussions between the Christian Churches is what we may call the 'third Church'–although we still have to explain what we mean by the term. We shall go into that first, and then consider the question of how the Churches themselves ought to react towards this new phenomenon in the sociology of religion.

What does this catchword mean? Let us ask first of all: what used to be the position? Then the reasons that have led to the emergence of the 'third Church' will become clear by themselves. Until well into our own century, the Christian Churches of central Europe had almost everywhere their own clearly defined geographical areas, in which they lived. Generally they had political, governmental powers assigned to them which offered protection to the particular denominational Church in that area, through a kind of symbiosis between Church and the public life of the secular State. Different territories had their own denominational character, and this helped to determine public opinion prevailing in that particular area. Moreover, in the existing structure of society, it was almost unavoidable, in

[1] The present essay is based on a lecture given on Reformation Day, 1972, in Munich. An extract was published in Evangelische Kommentare 6 (1973), pp. 14-17.
[2] The essay 'Is Church Union Dogmatically Possible?' pp. 197-214 above, takes more account of the theological aspects of this subject.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

terms of secular and religious education, that the determining religious convictions of a particular territory should have depended more or less on a social elite, which sustained both public power and education. In concrete terms where Christians views were concerned, the spokesmen of the élite were the Church's ministers and theologians. The convictions of 'the upper echelons' were passed down to the rank and file. Here, too, exceptions only prove the rule. It may remain an open question whether the identification of a territorially limited society with a particular denomination was especially Christian or not. At all events there were reasons enough for this trend, and without these reasons the denominational homogeneity of such a society (and hence its separation from other groups with a different denominational character) could not be explained.

But nowadays the secular sociological reasons for the earlier homogeneous [217] denominational Churches and their ties with a particular territory no longer exist. The Churches in question have slowly been transformed into the confessional communities which are usual today; and in the course of this development what evolved too, almost by itself, was the phenomenon of 'the third Church'.

For in Europe today other Christian denominations and Churches are to be found on what was once the territory of one particular Church, even if the discrepancy in the percentage of members generally still betrays something of earlier conditions. But even if we take that into account, conditions are levelling out. So today the Christian who belongs to a particular Church has to live in the diaspora – the dispersion –[3] even if the extent to which this is true still varies very much.

Modern pluralistic, secularised and largely atheistical society, at all events, no longer offers the Christian Churches any support by means of public opinion, or state religion, or accepted models of individual and social life. At least where these supports still exist at all, they are in the process of being torn down.

Under the influence of this situation, earlier assumptions belonging to a particular stage in the history of thought, earlier ways of living and of looking at life, all of which led to, or were connected with, confessional doctrinal differences, are, of course, also receding into an ever more remote past, in the awareness of modern men and women. They are, largely speaking, no longer realised at all, so that the modern Christian can hardly enter into the problems of controversial theology that used to exist, or feel in any way personally touched by them; and so he is bound to remain largely uninterested in the settlement of these questions, unless he clings out of pure loyalty to the denomination which has been passed down to him and to which he belongs as a simple matter of fact. Generally such questions seem to him one aspect of those historically conditioned distinctions which exist between the old denominational Churches but [218] which are really a matter of culture and folklore, having no actual theological significance which could be constitutive for the Church.

For ultimately the whole consciousness of modern men and women (even from a Christian and theological standpoint) is co-determined today by innumerable new influences which used not to exist at all for the individual and collective consciousness. Nowadays these influences are almost inevitably shifting the content of traditional theological awareness, or giving it a different – and in fact a lesser – importance.[4]

What we have called the 'third Church' can now be seen against this background. These [3] The present author has been concerned for years with an analysis of the 'diaspora situation' of the modern Christian. But he still has the impression that it is even now too little understood and accepted in its pressing reality and challenge. Cf. 'The Christian Among Unbelieving Relations', Theological Investigations III (London 1967), pp. 355-72; 'The Christian in this World', Theological Investigations VII (London 1971), pp. 88-99; and above all Strukturwandel der Kirche als Aufgabe und Chance, Herder Bücherei 446, 3rd edn (Freiburg 1973).

[4] On the notion of the 'pluralism' of the modern mental and spiritual situation, cf. for example 'The Faith of the Christian and the Doctrine of the Church', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 24-46.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation are people who, in what they see Christianity to be, in their style of living and their interpretation of themselves, hardly differ from one another; and moreover they do not want to be distinguished from one another, in spite of their religio-sociological adherence to this or that denomination.

PEOPLE BELONGING TO THE THIRD CHURCH

Of the group we have named, we must pay special attention, in the framework of our subject, to the people who more or less think and live only in terms of the 'common Christian' ground, without therefore also wanting to leave their traditional denomination publicly and decidedly. For their intention is by no means to live as Christians outside the major 'denominational' Churches. They do not want to live completely without any Christian community, nor as members of a group which, from the point of view of the major Churches, could be classed theologically or in the sociology of religion as a 'sect'. The 'third Church', as we see it here, grows up within the traditional Churches – for the moment, at least. Its members ascribe no importance to the traditional doctrinal differences between the Churches, while for themselves they do not see that differences of this kind provide a sufficient reason for forming a separate Church. Perhaps they cannot even formulate these differences, or do not know what they are. When Christians of this kind none the less give their own Church a preference over others (and with a certain emphasis) it is for reasons which the officially valid theology of the Churches, on the other hand, does not judge as dividing one from another. This [219] kind of choice between the Churches is in fact rather like the decision of two Catholics, one of whom prefers High Mass with music by Mozart, whereas the other prefers a modern Eucharist in the vernacular.

But it may be that these 'third Church' Christians even explicitly consider that the controversial theological differences which divide the churches are unimportant, theologically and for faith. They generally go on to demand that the different denominations should be united as quickly as possible; or they emphasise firmly that the differences between the various Churches are only of a historical, cultural, sociological or institutional kind, and have no real theological importance. This means, they say, that the real unity of the Christian Church in faith and theology has as such existed for a long time and does not have to be re-created. They have the impression that they have long possessed a common creed, which reaches beyond the limits of the separate denominations: belief in God, the hoping conviction that God has promised himself to them, forgivingly and savingly, in Jesus Christ, practical experience of the meaning of prayer, hope for eternal life.[5] This creed could undoubtedly be differently formulated, and then differently interpreted, but that is not of decisive importance. At all events, beyond a fundamental, simple confession of faith of this kind, these Christians discover nothing which really absolutely plays a part in their own decisions of faith, and which would really essentially distinguish them from the great majority of Christians belonging to other denominations. If they are, in addition, a little better instructed theologically than the average, they believe that they are right in their impression that the old differences of controversial theology between the Christian Churches have been eliminated by the theologians in their ecumenical dialogue. The interpretation of hitherto disputed points of doctrine which is aimed at convergence seems to confirm this; and so does the discovery that denominational differences of opinion are no longer given the importance which used to [5] Properly understood, this question touches on a subject often considered by the present author: the short formula of the faith. Cf. 'Reflections on the Problems Involved in Devising a Short Formula of the Faith', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 230-46. On the discussion about this subject cf. also R. Bleistein, Kurzformel des Glaubens, 2 vols (Würzburg 1971).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be taken for granted.

The phenomenon of the 'third Church', of course, displays highly varying degrees and nuances, according to the areas in which it is [220] found, the degree of Christian and denominational education which its members enjoy, and the social and cultural situation in general. What is more important than these variations is the fact that today the 'third' is an indisputable fact.

THE THIRD CHURCH IN THE LIFE OF THE CHURCH AS A WHOLE

The 'third Church' is making itself felt in the Church's own life too. For example, common ecumenical services would be impossible and meaningless if the participants had the impression that all and everything in the Christian faith of people who are denominationally divided always and unequivocally has a denominational impress. In theory and practice, there is also the problem as to whether it is possible and opportune to have a common Christian religious instruction which – even though bi-confessional – would not merely be confined to information about religion as a scientific study, but which would also be designed to be a common Christian witness. 'Mixed marriages' no longer count, generally speaking, as undesired by both Churches, or as only possible, in human and Christian terms, in particularly favourable cases. They are often even regarded as desirable; and the impediments put in the way by canon law are correspondingly challenged as un-Christian. There is a call for ecumenical wedding ceremonies. People are demanding common versions of the Bible, common liturgical formulas, and common prayers. Intercommunion or open communion is more or less taken for granted by many people, so that the resistance of the official Churches is rejected as incomprehensible and un-Christian. Different revivalist movements of a 'charismatic' kind – the Jesus people, the pentecostal movement, and so on – unite Christians from the most varied denominations. Common undertakings of social action or protest, in shared Christian responsibility for society and the world, are now widely taken for granted.[6] All these signs of unity and common ground between the Christian Churches are, of course, neither theologically nor practically simply conditioned by the phenomenon of [221] the 'third Church'. But the actual power and matter-of-factness of all these ecumenical activities in the Churches, which their 'official' authorities often find a nuisance, are due to the fact that the actual upholders of ecumenical initiatives of this kind largely belong to the so-called 'third Church'.

The question about the correct view of this phenomenon, and the answer to it, must be directed in the first place to the people who, in some form or other, belong to this third Church. But it is also a question for the Church's official ministers and theologians, since these are socially the most obvious representatives of the distinction between the different denominations. According to the description we have given, that means nearly everybody, though in different degrees, corresponding to their theological training, the particular character of their attitude to faith and the closeness of their relationship to a particular denomination in its institutionally tangible form.

What should we say to the Christian who more or less belongs to the third Church? Of course to lump these believers together is a problem in itself, because they differ considerably from one another. But for the moment let us leave on one side the question whether these Christians simply experience and live by what is common between the denominations –

[6] The theological presuppositions and basis for the common action of Christians belonging to different denominations have certainly not been sufficiently considered and clarified; indeed the question itself has perhaps not even been seen. The present essay is designed to offer some stimulus in this respect. Cf. also the ideas in 'On the Theology of Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 24-67.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whether this is what they feel the Christian faith to be – or whether in addition they basically judge denominational differences to be meaningless for faith and theology, seeing them as purely historically conditioned, external circumstances. Of course here we can only address ourselves to the people who preserve and cultivate some concrete link or other with their traditional denomination. To these people alone, but to all of them, let me say the following.
The ecumenical features of Christianity and the Church will not be realized solely by a third Church which simply by-passes the existing Churches and their history, their traditional institutions and specific offices – a third Church which tries to arrive at unity between Christians through complete indifference toward the Churches that have existed hitherto. Complete indifference towards the authorities in the denominations, or perhaps actual, even state-registered withdrawal* [222] from the Church cannot do justice to the reality of Christianity. The true way to realise our Lord's charge to live in his one Church and to bring about the unity of Christians, cannot therefore bypass the denominational Churches. A third Church which tried to do so would bring about an increasing erosion in the substance of the Christian faith, right down to the innermost heart of the message about the living God and the one mediator. What has to be united cannot be united simply by dissolving the subjects of the union.[7]

The attempt to establish the third Church as something on its own would lead to this very thing. For the unity of creed necessary even for this Church could be achieved only by continually curtailing more and more of the substance of its own beliefs. Why? Because on the one hand this Church, too, would have to bring out clearly what Christians have in common, if it wanted to sustain the unity of a genuine and living Church effectively. On the other hand, the formulation of a Church creed which was no longer upheld by the beliefs of the 'previous' Churches and supported by the power of their history, would be bound to lead to an ever-thinner and ever more non-committal expression; and in the end the third Church would find itself in the position already occupied by mere humanism of a purely horizontal kind. But if the third Church were to tend towards a churchless Christianity, then – apart from real theological considerations – we can say only one thing, and it is this. Especially in a period when, in order to be able to exist at all, men and women have to overcome a great deal of the individualism which has determined the spirit of the West ever since the Enlightenment, truth and fellowship cannot be preserved and disseminated if people settle down outside institutions.[8] Christians certainly do not all have the same ideas about what the Church is and ought to be; but it has none the less been the permanent conviction of the whole of Christianity, in doctrine and practice, that faith and its liberating power need to be upheld by a fellowship which is also socially institutionalised – in this sense the Church. And the attitude of mind and experiences of our own time do not allow us, of all people, to disavow this conviction.

[223] The simple, basic elements of the Christian conviction of faith, which the 'third Church' shares as well, can be the innermost centre from which a Christian can live, and should live, in his accustomed denomination. These basic elements do not provide a valid reason for more or less leaving his Church in actual practice. As long as the Churches have

* In West Germany, members of the Roman Catholic and Evangelical (Protestant) Churches register as such, since the State (on the Churches' behalf) collects a church tax from these registered members. It is possible, however, to opt out of either Church, and to pay taxes to neither; but this choice is also officially recorded by the State [the translator].

7 Cf. 'Basic Observations on the Subject of Changeable and Unchangeable Factors in the Church', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 3-23; and 'Does the Church Offer Any Ultimate Certainties?', ibid, pp. 47-65.

8 Cf. 'Modern Piety and the Experience of Retreats', Theological Investigations XVI (London 1979), pp. 135-55, where the post-modern phenomenon of higher forms of socialisation are considered in detail.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not arrived at Christian unity, they are the specific place where the common Christian conviction has to be lived, if it is not slowly to melt away and become ineffective.[9]

That is why the third Church must not by-pass the existing Churches; it must make itself effective in the right way within them. Anyone who is convinced of the human, Christian and theological weight of the ideas which lead to the third Church, should also have the courage for the long march through the ecclesiastical institutions, to express it in modern catchword terms. In our contemporary social situation, we cannot overcome old-fashioned traditionalism and outmoded ways of proclamation and styles of living by way of extremely tiny sects. Yet it is these sects which would be the inevitable result of the completely unreal and utopian attempt to found a genuine major Church (parallel to the previous denominational Churches), whose substance would be contributed in every respect by the third Church. If we do not want to lose ourselves in intangible ideas, thereby losing sight of the Church, and ultimately of our own historical character, too, in the process, then Christians of the third Church have only one task. That is: out of the shared Christianity that exists and is lived, and seriously and fairly taking account of official doctrine and the actual history of the denominational Churches, they have to draw even closer to the institutional Churches (and not in theology alone) until they, too, represent and embody the one Church of Jesus Christ, in spite of all their local and particularist differences.

This general principle does not of course solve all the separate problems. Intercommunion, mixed marriages, common and effective witness to the gospel in our contemporary world with its needs – all these things still call for numerous detailed solutions. Under certain circumstances Christians of the third Church should emphatically urge the official ministers of their Churches to find a Christian answer [224] to these special questions. It is surely self-evident, and needs no special emphasis, to say that in finding these solutions we must keep the unity of the Church in mind; and also that the third Church itself has the right to expect the theological respect it deserves, as well as an appreciation of its sociological position in the existing Church. But there should be no attempt to provoke anarchy in the Church through over-hasty radical cures, which really only mean a relapse into an old-fashioned individualism and can only exacerbate the plight of divided Christendom even more.[10]

Up to now we were really only supposed to be listening to sober everyday experience, not to learned theological arguments. Anyone who suffers in the Spirit from the Churches within the Churches will not give himself over to the impious utopia of a third Church as an isolated power parallel to the others. On the contrary, he will live actively in his Church and, out of his own immediately apprehensible experience of faith, find the open courage for the greater riches of the Church, which earlier lay in its doctrine and life, and are still to be found there today. We shall not ultimately advance the Church if we become disheartened, or take up an ultimately arrogant attitude towards the Church of sinners and the official ministers who, like the rest of us, fall continually short of the Gospel of Jesus, which always demands too much of us all. It is in love for these Churches, enslaved and poverty-stricken though they are, that we shall make progress. It is not the destructiveness of indifference or purely corrosive criticism that can achieve anything. It is the all-renewing Spirit of the Lord; this is especially true because this Spirit is still alive in us only because the Churches have existed. This all applies in a quite particular degree to the solution of the ecumenical question. But if we look at the results of ecumenical efforts in the last thirty or forty years in the different Churches, then we have really no reason to doubt that the task of the third Church, properly understood

[9] On the substance of faith which has to be preserved, cf. 'On the Theology of Ecumenical Discussion', Theological Investigations XI (London 1974), pp. 24-67.

[10] Except in this briefly indicated sense, it is impossible to understand attempts – however well meaning they may perhaps be – such as G. Hasenhüttl's new contribution; cf. his Herrschaftsfreie Kirche. Sozio-theologische Grundlegung (Düsseldorf 1974).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and lived, has the promise of fulfilment in the Churches.

[225]

THE THIRD CHURCH AND ECCLESIASTICAL AUTHORITY

The fact of the third Church does not only pose a problem for those Christians who feel they could belong to it. It also poses a question to official ministers of the individual Churches,[11] though this is in no way to be seen as an accusation. In this connection a whole series of aspects emerge which these officials perhaps do not always see and appreciate sufficiently.

Officials in all the Churches are always subject to the temptation to identify the faith of their own Church, tacitly and if as a matter of course, with the faith which is formulated in their respective articles of belief, or in the heads and books of the theologians of that particular Church. That is why official ministers and theologians often view the actually existing faith of Christians purely and in every respect as a cruder and more rudimentary version of the faith they know and administer. That is why the official ecumenical dialogue is almost always, as a matter of course and without any further inquiry, a discussion designed to overcome differences of doctrine between the denominations in their official creeds. But the question whether these official differences exist at all for the faith of most members of the divided Churches, or whether they play any serious part, simply does not arise. In saying this I do not mean to deny the particular and irreplaceable importance of theologically differentiated faith, as it is expressed in the official doctrines of the Churches. But in the question we have raised here, what is at issue is something different.

Has it really become clear theologically that the faith that saves is not the faith of the creeds and articles of belief, but the faith that actually lives in the heads and hearts of contemporary Christians? If faith really means the salvation of people, then we must first of all make this fact clear to ourselves. But in the official ecumenical practice of the Catholic Church, for example, the statement of the Second Vatican Council about the 'hierarchy of truths'[12] even now sounds [226] like the title for a book that still has to be written.

If we were to take the common faith of the third Church in the divided Churches completely seriously, then we ought surely to ascribe greater importance to it, in our ecumenical dialogues too. Moreover we should have to take into account the fact that today, in the case of many statements if not yet all, the statements that divide us have a much lesser logical and existential importance than the statements which express our common, fundamental Christian convictions. This is a fact that has not yet been sufficiently appreciated at the theological level. Epistemologically, many statements have a provisional character. They are hypothetical and hence replaceable by other statements which are better, more subtly nuanced, or have more integrating power. Perhaps all that is meant is that something is not realisable here and now, but does not therefore have to be denied altogether. These and other characteristics of the statements which still divide Christians today must be perceived more clearly. For the official ministers, what emerges naturally from this is a question: given certain other provisos which we cannot go on to consider here, could the faith of the third Church provide a sufficient foundation for a unity of faith among the Christian Churches? At all events, the theological relevance of the third Church (beyond its mere significance for the sociology of religion) has not yet been sufficiently thought about. And the consequences for [11] Of course we are not considering here the ecumenical interpretation of the official ministries of the Church, which has been under recent discussion; on that cf. Vorfragen zu einem ökumenischen Amtsverständnis (Quaestiones Disputatae 64) (Freiburg 1974), where the present author develops his ideas on this subject.

[12] On the 'hierarchy of truths' cf. Vatican II: 'Unitatis redintegratio' (decree on Ecumenism) n. 11, and the present author's comments in 'The Faith of the Christian and the Doctrines of the Church', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 24-46.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Church's actions and the actions of its official representatives have certainly not been grasped.[13]

Ultimately the term 'third Church' in the positive sense in which we have used it here, is only a term for the great and decisive 'one' in which the Christians of the different denominations and Churches really do already come together today when, each in his own way, they confess the triune God and Jesus Christ as sole mediator. It is not true that the denominational differences – weighty though they indisputably are – divide us to such an extent, and in the different Churches so determine what we have in common, that this common ground is pure illusion – though this is what people on all sides have sometimes maintained in their excessive polemical zeal. Common Christian ground really does exist. It binds us together even now. In [227] all of us it creates salvation for eternity and gives us the power to persevere in the time in which we live. It goes further than mere human solidarity and tolerance. It makes possible and governs everything which already exists today in our ecumenical closeness and our common ecumenical activity. So the ecumenical movement must not peter out and become resigned to failure. What we have in common must become still more vitally realised in all the Churches; it must find new forms of expression and determine the actions of all Christians more forcibly. Paradoxical though this may sound, it must discover its own presence and reality at the very point where there is apparently only a secular world, because the breath of the Spirit who builds the Church also blows through the highways and by-ways of the world. This common Christian ground of the third Church must not be interpreted overhastily, or in too simple-minded a way, as a contradiction and denial of the existing denominational Churches – even though it certainly calls in question the actual existing form of all the Churches and is a breakthrough in the direction of that unity in faith which is laid upon us all. On the contrary, it is that very 'oneness' which God in Jesus Christ gave to all the Christian Churches, the oneness which was accepted by them all, from which they all live, and which is to be the living seed from which the fulness of unity can flower.

[13] Cf. 'Ecumenical Theology in the Future', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 254-69; esp. the section 'Church Christians Without Any Confessional Awareness', pp. 264-8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[228]

18

RELIGIOUS FEELING INSIDE AND OUTSIDE THE CHURCH

There is a kind of piety that springs from the Church, is upheld and sustained by it, and is related to it.[1] By piety we mean here the personally adopted and freely accepted relatedness of a person to God in faith, hope and love; but a relatedness that is Christian, being mediated through Jesus Christ. The faith in Jesus Christ which sustains this kind of piety rests on the Church's message. It knows that it is related to the sacrament of baptism (which incorporates a person in the Church) and to the historical phenomenon of God's salvific turning towards man in Jesus Christ. But though it is this divine turning to the individual person himself which empowers his devotion, the devout person experiences it as having taken place through God's turning to his people as a whole. God's efficacious manifestation of himself in the sacrament belongs to the mutual relationship between God and man. Thus piety, since it is the relatedness of the whole person to God, necessarily has a common and even a social dimension as well. But it is something truly belonging to the Church itself, rather than smothered by external legalism and ritualism, only when all the attitudes and acts which are related to the social character of the Church are really animated by the innermost, free turning of man to God which is sustained by God's grace.

CHURCH PIETY

The church-relatedness of personal piety is highly variable and has its individual and collective history. For man's relatedness to God, and [229] the nature of that relationship as it is related to the Church are certainly connected, but are not identical. There is a piety which effects salvation and is yet outside the Church. (We shall later describe and specify what we mean by this.) But within the piety of the Church, there are quite legitimate different forms in individuals, in social groups, and in different periods. Ultimately all these variations will be parallel to the historical possibilities available.

In piety, both elements, the Church and the individual, are related to each other. The nature of man makes it impossible for either one of them to be fully eliminated; and yet the mutual relationship of these two factors is not rigid and unalterable. The Church's part in piety can be subjectively experienced as the sustaining foundation for its understanding, its certainty and its vitality; but this ecclesiastical form can also be experienced as something secondary, as a kind of merely tolerated appendage of piety in its solitary relationship to God, the certainty and power of which come from within. From what we have said it has already become clear that we cannot expect very much of the contribution of the Church to the piety of the individual. In the practice of the Church and in its edicts there is something like a minimum requirement in this respect (Mass on Sunday, confession once a year, Easter communion, the baptism of infants, etc.). But here almost everything is a fluid, variable offer on the part of the Church, and its pastoral and human expediency must continually be reassessed. The contribution of the Church to personal piety can also vary in accordance with the picture of the Church which is viewed as the standard and model. This varies between the Church seen as an institute for salvation, and the Church seen as the community of the saved.

[1] The ideas in this essay grew out of a working paper which the author prepared for a commission of the German Episcopal Synod. It has been extensively revised.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Accordingly the individual feels himself to be either the guided recipient of the Church's saving gifts, or as the co-sustaining and co-responsible member of the Church's fellowship. The Church's part in piety can also vary according to whether the individual experiences the Church as the Church universal – the Church extending to the whole world – or as the individual congregation of brethren.

In considering the different ways in which piety is related to the Church, we ought not to try to reconcile the variations through an all too hasty 'both-and'. Pastoral life and the life of the Church as a whole must permit these variations and endure the tension between them. It must not, by means of a tactically shrewd – or slick – 'both-and' demand all degrees of attachment to the Church from every [230] individual. For in doing this it would force many people, who seem to be less devout in the Church's sense, into the situation of 'fringe' Christians. On the other hand, there can also be new forms of piety in its Church-related form, whose intensity of practically lived brotherly love must not from the outset be measured against the average type of normal church practice.

Piety in its churchly guise can also occur in mistaken forms. The partial debasement of this form of piety may even characterise a lengthy period in the Church's history; though this may not be explicitly thought about, and the collective conscience of the Church may not react to it with sufficient emphasis. There is always a deterioration when church forms of piety are given independent importance, compared with piety itself, so that piety, which is something absolute in itself, is turned into the instrument for binding people to the Church; or when devotion to the Church is judged, clearly and unequivocally, as the criterion for a person's relationship to God; or when piety understands the Church as a sect and tries to turn it into as closed a social ghetto as possible; or when there is triumphalism; or when attachment to the Church degenerates into group egoism, so that freedom of the spirit to see good outside the Church is lost; or when the individual uses his membership of the Church as a protection against God; or when people forget that the Church is there for the world, and not the world for the Church; or when the smooth running of the Church's life and activities is made too much of an ideal; or when the Church's institutions and proceedings cease to be continually challenged by the question whether they really bring about faith, hope and love in the world; or when a brotherly relationship between hierarchy and the faithful remains pure theory; and so on. The struggle against mistaken forms of this kind is important. For experience of them seriously blocks access to an understanding of and true attachment to the Church for non-Christians and non-Catholics.

At all events, attachment to the Church must basically be judged only as a particular and, in the true sense, secondary element in piety. It is particular and secondary because piety and attachment to the Church are so much to be distinguished from each other that there can be a saving piety which is not bound to the Church at all. For fundamentally, even in the Church's own piety, the experience of God and Jesus Christ is more primal than the experience of the Church. This at least is true for the basic structure of the objects of [231] faith and the reasons for faith. It is by no means a denial, either of a mutually conditioning relationship between all the springs of faith (of which the experience of the Church is one), or of the fact that 'normally', devotional experience does in fact generally come about in the fellowship of the Church.

PIETY OUTSIDE THE CHURCH

There is a piety outside the Church, even apart from the plurality of the Christian Churches and the forms of devotion which are specifically related to any one of them. The statement is at first self-evident to everyone who knows the history of the non-Christian religions, which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is not yet simply at an end, even in the so-called Christian countries today. But what is meant is also that there is a specific Christian piety outside the Churches as such, and Christian groups or sects – a relationship to God, that is, which knows itself to be in some way or other empowered by Jesus Christ.

This non-church piety can very well be efficacious for salvation. The Christian ought not to see it as a mere human attempt to set up a relationship to God 'from below'. For it is really inwardly sustained by the free grace of God, which is offered everywhere and effects salvation wherever man obeys the absolute command of his conscience, and realises and objectifies this obedience, at least in some form of devotion, as an explicit relation to God. So the Catholic Christian and theologian can basically recognise that in fact all conscientious, honest piety is saving, is sustained by grace, and is in this sense already Christian in the anonymous sense.[2]

The Christian message aims to make real, explicit Christians, and is hence not simply the indoctrination from outside of some hitherto unknown fact. It is the awakening of something which is really already existent through grace and is already experienced, even if it is not the object of explicit reflection. It is in a sense the ontogenetic repetition of a phylogenetic human history, as God's self-communication to the world, which is always already sustained by grace. To give ecclesiastical form to this saving piety as it exists outside the Church means the complete self-realisation of a piety that has always [232] existed through grace, in explicit encounter with Jesus and his institutionally constituted community of faith. So incorporation in the Church is not the beginning but the end of the grace which, in its sovereign freedom, calls some people among others. These people form the Church, which is the historical sign of the victorious presence of God's grace in the world, and is therefore (in spite of the universal trend of Jesus' message) an actual, particular sign in human history of the fact that God is present through his grace in all piety, wherever conscience obeys that call than which there is nothing higher here and now.

Even in a piety of this kind, as in every free human act, we have to distinguish between the ultimate, primal, free and grace-sustained alignment of knowledge and freedom towards God, and its material, historical objectification in space and time, and in word and deed. The objectifications we come across in society and history can degenerate to a greater or lesser degree without this necessarily meaning that they have completely lost their ultimate alignment with God and their significance for salvation. Analogously, we might point out here that an objectively erroneous but subjectively good conscience can perform acts which contradict what is actually enjoined by the moral law; yet in these acts obedience to conscience and to God may none the less be realised. Of course we cannot go into the different social and individual shapes and forms of such degenerations. The greater the debasement of the religious act, the more the chance will be diminished that its final subjective intention will after all be related to God himself. In our present religious sub-culture outside the Church, it would be useful at some point or other to give a more precise account of such more or less explicitly religious practices, in their typical manifestations and degenerate forms; because such phenomena are not usually viewed clearly enough for us to form any kind of link with them, whether it be acceptance or rejection.

This piety has, of course, its socially conditioned patterns and origins. We only have to think, for example, of the common forms of superstition or of popular astrology, and so forth. In our cultural sphere much of this still has a Christian origin and frequently still bears the partial impress of the earlier teachings of the Christian Church.

---

[2] The author has discussed numerous other aspects of the same basic problem under the heading of the 'anonymous Christian'. For further details, cf. 'Observations on the Problem of the "Anonymous Christian" ', Theological Investigations XIV (London 1976), pp. 280-94.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[233]

THE EXPERIENCE OF GOD AS PIETY OUTSIDE THE CHURCH

The most primal and sustaining ground of all piety outside the Church is the experience of God.[3] It is only in the light of this experience that its nature and existence can really be interpreted. We have to distinguish here between a primal experience of God, and a reflective, verbally objectifying knowledge of God. For there is a fundamental difference between personal spiritual experiences (for example, love, joy, fear) and their verbal objectification in reflective form (for instance, talk about the existence and nature of joy, love and fear, which attempts to define these experiences). Of course there is a connection between the two as well. Consequently the verbal objectification of such primal experiences can be inadequate, and indeed wrong.[4] Primal experience can certainly be related in intention to an object different from itself (for example, true, primal love for another person, which precedes any theoretical, reflecting interpretation by the loving person). An 'object' of this kind could exist in an a posteriori experience or in information coming from without (for example, the knowledge of a certain beloved person). But it is conceivable that an originally intentional act of this kind, simply through its a priori intentionality, is already aware of an object or its necessary structure.[5]

Such a primal experience of God, as distinct from a verbal, objective knowledge of him, really does exist, irrespective of the way this knowledge of God may be considered as having come about. Of course, if we are to avoid ontologism and the mysticism which appeals to particular experiences, the primal experience of God can only be thought of as the experience of God which belongs always [234] and everywhere to man's transcendental nature, as the direction towards which this transcendental nature tends.

The traditional distinction between nature (man's natural spirituality) on the one hand, and grace (his elevation through grace) on the other, is not of decisive importance here. For if we pre-suppose that man is always and everywhere (at least potentially, since the offer is made to him) 'elevated' through grace, because of God's universal will to salvation, then a primal experience of God can exist and can be appealed to; there is no need to make a more precise distinction as to whether a particular aspect of this experience already belongs to man's natural spirituality, or only occurs (even if always and everywhere) because his spiritual nature has been elevated by God's self-communication through grace. For grace can only be understood from the outset as the radical form of the fundamentally unlimited transcendental nature of human knowledge and liberty, which tends towards the immediacy of God, and whose culmination and consummation is the direct vision of God himself.

The experience of God we mean here is of transcendental necessity. It therefore exists always and everywhere, whenever man implements his spiritual knowledge and freedom, even if this is often not explicitly formulated. It exists even when he denies this transcendentally necessary relationship to God, explicitly and in objectively verbal form. If

---

[3] Cf. 'Experience of Self and Experience of God', Theological Investigations XIII (London 1975), pp. 122-32.

[4] A materialistic anthropologist may very well misinterpret the nature of love, liberty, responsibility, etc., even when he himself genuinely experiences these things. He does not necessarily have to notice the contradiction between his own primal experience and his interpretation.

[5] From the logic of what he knows, which is experienced a priori, a person is aware, for example, that every object which he encounters at any time or in any place will correspond to the fundamental conditions of the human act. In this light the difference between a primal experience of God and a theoretical doctrine about God must be comprehensible, at least conceptually. And here it is unimportant that this doctrine is communicated through others and may in certain circumstances be seen as being information about an object which is in this way communicated to the listener for the first time, or whether it is conceived of as the correct interpretation of a primal experience.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this transcendental necessity were denied, then we should have to understand God as an arbitrary object, the experience of which could be either avoided or permitted with equal justification. An appeal to the supreme objective significance of God would come too late to legitimise the necessity and the value of the knowledge of God. There would be simply nothing in the constitution of the perceiving subject which could oblige us to ask whether a reality such as God exists at all, especially since he certainly does not belong to the objects of a posteriori experience which force themselves on our attention. Man's a priori transcendental experience (like everything which is consciously existent in man) can be present in both modes – as free acceptance or as rejection. And again, acceptance and rejection can exist without their being the object of explicit reflection; or they can be parallel to, or be the result of, an explicit objectification of this transcendental relation to God. This would be the point from which we should have to trace the different possibilities of supposed or real atheism.

THE EXPERIENCE OF TRANSCENDENCE

The foundation for this transcendental experience of God is man's own experience of transcendence. Both are expressions in man of one and the same reality, though the first only expressly stresses the ultimate trend and goal of man's transcendental nature. A more precise phenomenology of the experience of transcendence (if this analysis were carried through correctly and more or less exhaustively) should show that its trend does actually reveal an understanding of the real God.

Here we can only describe the experience of transcendence very incompletely. Its essential characteristic is that man's knowledge and liberty always reach out beyond the individual object of inner and outward experience; that this anticipation is the condition that makes objective knowledge and the free act possible, since it is absolutely unlimited, going beyond every declarable object, because every conceivable limitation in the act of being thought of is already exceeded. In so far as the experience of man's transcendental nature really establishes itself, experiences itself as being sustained by the direction in which it tends, and knows that Nothingness is nothing – this goal towards which transcendence tends can only be thought of as the infinite, unlimited reality which remains at root a mystery: that is to say, God. This goal as incomprehensible mystery is – though not as object in the sense of ontologism – really the beginning of the movement of transcendence.

Of course this experience of transcendence, which has God as its direction and its goal, cannot be grasped, in its concrete, specific originality, in the abstract terms we have used to describe it here. A mystagogic pointer to this experience must therefore remember that the person who is not himself trained in philosophy has this experience as a matter of course, but in quite definite shapes and forms. We are not concerned here with the transcendental in absolute and diffuse form, for that is always a given element in the implementation of knowledge and freedom; it is a matter of more intensive realisations which force this experience of transcendence more clearly on the reflective consciousness as well. In this way these realisations make it possible for the 'ordinary' person to reflect upon his experience of transcendence with the help of an explicitly verbal thematic treatment of the subject of God, which is already to be found in the sociological environment.

[236] In the nature of things, these primal experiences always arise where the movement of transcendence allows the finite character of the specific object as such to be experienced.[6]

[6] By a specific object we mean here in the first place the other, finite and immediate 'Thou' – the people with whom we share and experience the world, not simply the environment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Through them, the finite character of specific objects, as something that can neither be overcome nor fulfilled, can become the express subject of reflection, just as much as the affirmation of a fulfilment no longer finite, which still none the less exists even in a 'negative' experience of this kind. Pre-eminent experiences of transcendence may be experience of the fear that threatens everything, and experience of surpassing joy; experience of an absolute responsibility, faithfulness or love, which are no longer adequately justified specifically; and experience of the absolute logic which substantiates the individual object but cannot be substantiated by the object itself. We must of course distinguish between forms which coalesce through a free acceptance, and those which come into being in the radical disintegration between the transcendentally necessary affirmation of God, which is not the express subject of reflection, and rejection of God made in an act of human liberty, whether this be the express subject of reflection or not. For one and the same subject experiences himself, knowingly and freely, as being exposed to several experiences of transcendental necessity; and this subject, in his own unity, feels that these have to be reconciled with one another – though the subject himself can never reconcile them.

But wherever someone still unconditionally hopes beyond all empirical hopelessness; wherever a particular joy is experienced as the promise of a joy that is limitless; wherever a person loves with unconditional faithfulness and resolve, although the frailty of such love on both sides cannot possibly legitimise this unconditional determination; wherever radical responsibility towards a moral obligation is maintained, even when it seemingly leads only to disaster; wherever the relentlessness of truth is experienced and unconditionally accepted and grasped; wherever the unsurmountable discrepancy between what is individual and what is social in the plurality of man's different destinies is endured in a seemingly unjustified resolve of hope for the meaning and blessedness which reconciles everything – a resolve which cannot even be given objective form – in all these situations God, as the condition which makes all this possible, is [237] already experienced and accepted, even if this is not expressly and objectively formulated. This is true even if the word 'God' is never heard and is never used as the term for the direction and goal of the transcendental experiences known in this way.

Experiences of transcendence of this kind are not just sporadic. They are more widespread than that, and may occur in any given event of human knowledge and freedom, without so much as the beginnings of an express and objective formulation. As the condition that makes knowledge and freedom in everyday life possible, this transcendental experience of God is experienced in its necessity and inescapability, so that the person is faced with the question whether he will also make this inescapability the centre of his existence, in free, primal trust; or whether he will suppress it by escaping to the surveyable individual realities in his life which he can control.

But this does not mean any depreciation of the explicit doctrine of God, or of objectifying reflection about this experience. Man is not merely a transcendental creature; he is also a creature of history and reflection. The fundamentally highest stage is reached when he reflects on the transcendental conditions of objective knowledge and of historical experience – when, that is to say, he reflects about the trend and goal of man's transcendence in whose framework history is pursued. But the individual cannot legitimately escape from the common awareness of mankind. He must explicitly want to have to do with God. On the other hand, the conscious verbal and social formulation of the primal experience of God in history and society means for the individual a radical possibility of reflecting on his own transcendental experience of God and of entering into the history of this reflection as purely and completely as possible.

All that we have said up to now is inevitably abstract and very general. Of course it must be translated into different language if it is to be effective in religious education or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

catechetical instruction or missionary work. But people must be warned against demanding today the pure and simple 'concrete', graphically descriptive language that was possible once. The reason why religious language that sounded much more concrete used to be possible was that people felt able to localise God's workings at particular points in the world and history far more unreservedly; and from these points they could talk about God specifically, so to speak. We cannot go into the question here of whether and in what sense a more or less specific experience of God of this kind is still possible today. At all events, in a radical [238] sense, for us God is only conceivable at all as the final ground and ultimate goal of reality; he is experienced within the sensory world at most indirectly. In view of this, contemporary language cannot, ultimately speaking, avoid being abstract to some extent. This abstractness does not need to frighten us, because man is becoming increasingly aware that language which helps him practically to understand and deal with his material environment is also becoming more abstract. This defence of abstract talk about religion is, of course, not meant to suggest that the language used here is the only one possible, if we want to talk about God.

THE POSSIBILITY OF THE TRANSCENDENTAL EXPERIENCE OF GOD

People must be warned against appealing too quickly and without closer inspection to particular religious, more or less 'mystical' experiences, in order to demonstrate that an experience of God is possible. 'Mystical' experiences are either very intensive cases of an experience of God which is basically open to all; or they rouse the suspicion that they are psychological phenomena which can be explained by particular psychical causes. The grace of a transcendental experience of God that is given essentially radical form by his elevating grace is open to everyone, at least in the sense of an offer which a person can freely accept or reject. That is merely a translation of the binding Catholic doctrine about the universal and efficacious divine will to salvation. It is probably true that not everyone has the grace of free acceptance and love at every moment in his life. But we can hope – even though we cannot know with certainty – that the history of every person ends in perfected salvation, and that therefore the effective grace freely to accept the transcendental experience of God will be given at some time or other.

But the grace of acceptance is something which in everyone cannot be reflected on with certainty. Proper reflection on the transcendental experience of God in a knowledge about God which is consciously formulated is certainly again grace, which experience teaches us is not given to everyone. According to the conviction of Vatican II, it does not even have to be given as offered and sufficient grace to every person in every social and historical situation. But this only means that the particular person, in his own psychological and social situation, is not actually in a situation when he can sufficiently reflect on his existing transcendental experience of God, and recognise it again [239] in what is said to him about God from outside. This basically happens, however, even when an intelligent person in his own particular situation finds it impossible to understand calculus, for example, even when it is explained to him by a mathematician. The claim that the grace of experiencing God has not been given must not assume a mystical-psychological misunderstanding of this grace; nor does it dispense us from a continually renewed attempt to help others to a reflective understanding of their own transcendental experience of God, and thus to make theists of them, even in the dimension of objectifying awareness and of religious society.

A definite mystagogy in the individual's reflection on his personal transcendental experience of God would admittedly have to be slowly developed, in a better way than hitherto. We do not have to think that the word 'God' has to stand at the beginning here. In a situation in which religious language no longer enjoys undisputed rule in society, the word

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'God' will be more likely to come at the end. But this allows a concept of God to be formed which will not later produce a highly dangerous crisis of religious consciousness because of its infantile nature. This mystagogy in the self-realisation of the transcendental experience of God must of course link up with experiences which the consciousness declares are clearly and existentially important and which bear in themselves the transcendental experience of God in such a way that they compel the person to a conscious formulation of this experience. These experiences are always embedded in the whole of existential human experience. Where this perhaps more or less miscarries in early childhood – because the experience of love, faithfulness and security between people, and so forth, is not adequately attained – conscious formulation of the primal experience of God is of course very difficult too. Only where life is freely accepted in general as having a sheltering significance, in an ultimate primal trust, will man in his freedom be also prepared to carry out the conscious formulation of this primal trust in the direction of God. The awakening of this primal trust does not take place effectively merely through words. It comes about through participation in the life of another person who, in his serenity and love, may be able to provide a fruitful model for this primal trust.

From this standpoint we can also acquire an understanding of the connection between the experience of God and man's relatedness to Jesus Christ. Christ is the 'fruitful model' per se for a committed reliance on the mystery of our existence, which we call God. The [240] believer calls the absolutely radical form of our transcendental relatedness to God, the Spirit of Jesus Christ. It is in looking at the history of Jesus that the Christian finds the historical legitimisation for committed reliance on God, whom Jesus called his Father. Transcendental experience of God and the historical experience of Jesus come together in a mutually conditioning relationship; Spirit and history are a unity in which God is at once man's origin and his end.

It is of course also conceivable for someone to have been indoctrinated about God by the religious society, without himself being able to enter very clearly into this expository process in the light of his own personal transcendent experience of God. He too 'can of course let the philosophical and theological dynamic that is also part of this objectified concept of God work on him, so arriving at an ever more purified and more subtle concept of God. On the other hand, he does not need to be pestered with the difficult expository process at all, unless his individual or social situation makes such an attempt necessary. In people with a sound philosophical training, this expository process is not necessarily always facilitated by their education; it can actually be made more difficult as well, so that in certain circumstances they stop short at a 'troubled atheism' in the reflective dimension, where the horror of being without God is seen, admitted and suffered, and yet this state cannot be specifically overcome on the level of knowledge about which they can reflect.

THE ONENESS OF PIETY IN THE CHURCH AND OUTSIDE IT

History is the material on which every transcendental experience works. This applies even to the transcendental experience of God. Church piety is therefore nothing other than the fulfilling completion of the transcendental experience of God that is given everywhere, and which is reflected upon in the contemplation of the historical fact of the dead and risen Jesus of Nazareth. The historical contingency of this material gives church piety its obvious

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

tangibility and concreteness; but it also lays it open to attack.[7] This means that today the piety of the Church must always be clearly 'fed back' into that primal experience which is its basic material and which it interprets. Otherwise [241] it cannot be lived without reservation in its historically contingent form (in the human word, and in the worship and law of the Church); nor can it stand up to its openness to attack from atheistic humanism or from people who point to the many other existing religions.

The question here is not whether there is or can be a transcendental experience of God which is reflected upon without the mediation of any specific object. An intensive transcendental experience of God will certainly be possible where the mediating, finite object recedes: where the nameless reality of God is experienced in quiet recollection, in silence, where the conditions of space and time recede, where emptiness is experienced as plenitude, where silence speaks, where death is seen as the life that presses forward to meet us, and where earthly reality is pure, unalloyed promise. Here religious life has an immeasurable field of profundity, down to the phenomena which we usually call mystical. For the Church to make this experience again its own, in a fundamental sense – that is to say, to make it part of its life in the Spirit, for which everything else is merely the instrument – means completing the unity between piety within the Church and piety outside it. Initiation into meditative experience ought to be an art in which the spiritual adviser, the 'director of souls', is proficient. It is one aspect of the contemporary priest's uncertainty about the role he has to play that there is so little understanding of this in the Church. Today's priests have nothing to say about the experience of God.

Against these ideas, the objection may be raised that here everything is too much based on theologumena which are open to dispute and are, at the very least, not generally accepted. This might be countered by saying that no dogma can be preached without the use of theologumena. But if we take seriously God's universal rule for the salvation of all mankind, if we presuppose that a person cannot find salvation without some encounter with God, and if we do not make this into some sort of mystical miracle which can just as well be denied as affirmed – then every Christian is bound to assume that everyone has had some encounter or other with God which already precedes God's proclamation in the Word; for even the person who has not encountered this proclamation in the Word in an effective way, or at all, is to find salvation. Every preacher must say what he thinks about this experience of God, which inevitably precedes his preaching, and must explain how he thinks he can appeal to it. But [242] the question remains whether an answer which is really different in fact from the one we have given here can be formulated in a different terminology.

[7] The material could even be different and would still in any case retain its contingent origin. This is necessary, but it is hard to endure, precisely because it is supposed to be, and is, the concrete form of a transcendentally necessary relationship to God that is universally valid.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[249-252]

VOLUME 17

LIST OF SOURCES

CHRISTMAS IN THE LIGHT OF THE IGNATIAN EXERCISES
Hitherto unpublished text of a sermon preached at Christmas 1974 before a Jesuit community; slightly revised for print.

JESUS' RESURRECTION
The text is based on hitherto unpublished material used for a lecture which the author gave on the occasion of receiving an honorary doctorate from the University of Louvain. The original character has been retained in spite of some revision and expansion for print.

CHRISTOLOGY TODAY?
The text is based on a hitherto unpublished lecture given at the University of Saarbrücken in December 1973. It has been revised for the present edition, and notes and cross-references to other work of the author's have been added.

JESUS CHRIST IN THE NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS
Published in Offenbarung, Geistige Realität des Menschen. Arbeitsdokumentation eines Symposiums zum Offenbarungsbegriff in Indien, ed. G. Oberhammer (Vienna 1974), pp. 189-98.

THE THEOLOGICAL DIMENSIONS OF THE QUESTION ABOUT MAN
Lecture held before those responsible for the Religiösen Schulwochenarbeit in Westphalia on 9 Sept. 1972, in Dortmund. The original text was published in a collection under the same title as the present contribution (Donauwärth 1972), pp. 9-28. It has been revised for the present edition.

THE BODY IN THE ORDER OF SALVATION
Originally published in K. Rahner and A. Görres, Der Leib und das Heil (Probleme der Praktischen Theologie - Festgabe zum 60. Geburtstag von Weihbischof Josef Maria Reuss), vol. iv (Mainz 1967), pp. 29-44. Stylistic improvements have been made for the present edition; and above all notes have been added.

MYSTICAL EXPERIENCE AND MYSTICAL THEOLOGY
Revised text of the preface to C. Albrecht, Das mystische Wort. Erleben und Sprechen in Versunkenheit, H. A. Fischer-Barnicol (Mainz 1974), pp. vii-xiv.

THE LIBERTY OF THE SICK, CONSIDERED THEOLOGICALLY
Published in StdZ 193 (1975), pp. 31-40. Notes and cross-references have been added for the present edition.

THE INTERMEDIATE STATE
Written for a Spanish periodical. Here published for the first time in German.

OPPOSITION IN THE CHURCH
Originally published in StdZ 192 (1974), pp. 812-20. Notes and cross-references have been

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation added for the present edition.

‘MYSTERIUM ECCLESIAE’
First published in StdZ 191 (1973), pp. 579-94. Matter of purely ephemeral interest has been omitted. Notes and cross-references linking the material more closely with the author’s other work have been added.

THE AREA BISHOP: SOME THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS
Originally published in Weltkirche, Festgabe für Julius Kardinal Döpfner, ed. H. Fleckenstein, G. Gruber, G. Schwaiger, E. Tewes (Würzburg 1973), pp. 478-87.

TRANSFORMATIONS IN THE CHURCH AND IN SECULAR SOCIETY
The text is based on a hitherto unpublished lecture, given in spring 1974 in Madrid at a symposium. It has been revised and notes have been added for the present edition.

THE ONE CHURCH AND THE MANY CHURCHES
The article is the revised text of a lecture held in June 1968 in Münster, published in Orientierung 32 (1968), pp. 155-9, and in expanded form in Philosphia. Festschrift für J. I. de Alcorta (Barcelona 1971), pp. 477-89.

IS CHURCH UNION DOGMATICALLY POSSIBLE
Originally published in ThQ (1973), pp. 103-18. The text has been slightly revised and cross-references have been added.

THIRD CHURCH
Lecture held on Reformation Day 1972 in Munich. Already published in shortened form in Evangelische Kommentare 6 (Stuttgart 1973), pp. 14-17. Revised for the present edition.

RELIGIOUS FEELING INSIDE AND OUTSIDE THE CHURCH
Based on a working paper for the German Episcopal Synod. Originally published in StdZ 191 (1973), pp. 3-13.

SOME CLARIFYING REMARKS ABOUT MY OWN WORK
Originally written to accompany P. Eicher’s book, Die anthropologische Wende. Karl Rahners philosophischer Weg vom Wesen des Menschen zur personalen Existenz, Dokimion 1 (Fribourg 1970), ix-xiv. Some purely personal remarks by way of introduction and conclusion have been omitted in the present edition.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Theological Hermeneutics

[3]

1

YESTERDAY'S HISTORY OF DOGMA AND THEOLOGY FOR TOMORROW

The author of the following reflections from the field of systematic theology is not at all sure if he is right to assume that he is raising what to some extent is a new question or whether it only seems to be new because of his inadequate knowledge of the relevant literature. Even then however he could take comfort in the thought that many others might also lack this sort of knowledge and consequently that his reflections could be useful to them.

To anticipate formally the basic question to be considered, it may be stated as follows: From the period of Catholic modernism – that is, roughly speaking, from the beginning of the present century – reflection has been largely concentrated on the nature of the development of dogma as such. It was not a question only of describing in a historical sequence the history of particular dogmas (this had been done from the time of Petavius [d.1652], with increasing interest of course and with continually improved methods), but mainly of examining the more general problem of the nature of development of dogma as such and as a whole and of the limits to this development. In this connection various theories were put forward, all of which aimed on the one hand at upholding the permanent identity of the Christian faith and on the other hand at recognizing without embarrassment the undeniable fact that the Church's faith and dogma have had a history, and at seeing these two realities as compatible, at reconciling the identity of faith and its actual history. It is no part of our task here to set out these different theories of the development of dogma, which tended mainly toward an increasingly relaxed acceptance [4] of the true historicity of dogmas, in order to avoid seeing this history of dogma simply (as happened at first) as a logically conclusive explication of what had always been said, simply restating the old truth in new words. What is important here however seems to be the hitherto too little or perhaps not at all considered feature of the theology of development of dogma, that it has been too retrospective within the field of Catholic theology: in other words this theory of the history of dogma made too little effort to develop out of its historical observations methodical and hermeneutical principles which could and should be applied to open questions of a current or future development of dogma.

In the first half of the twentieth century there were historians of dogma (we may recall, for example, great historians of theology such as Martin Grabmann or A. Landgraf) who tacitly or expressly favoured the opinion that (apart from marginal areas like Mariology) the history of dogma had more or less reached its close, that – admittedly after a very long process of development – dogmas had now been given their definitive formulations, and consequently that theological science (apart from passing on its final achievements in systematic theology) could continue to work as an academic study almost in principle merely as a retrospective survey of the history of dogma. Certain papal doctrinal statements too (as recently as those of Pius XII) on the Catholic understanding of the development of dogma give the impression of admitting a history of dogma for former times, but of regarding the results now attained (especially with reference to the terminology involved) as unsurpassable, not in need of any

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

further interpretation and no longer open to any real modification in the future.

It is however really obvious that the history of dogma (in the widest sense of the term) continues and must continue. The task of transposing Christian faith into modern horizons of understanding is not one which the Church and its theology have yet adequately fulfilled, although this does not mean that the task has not been appreciated at all or is not yet being slowly taken in hand. But there is still a vast amount to be done in regard to this task, which has existed from the time of the Enlightenment. The history of dogma therefore continues and must continue. But then the question arises whether it might not be possible to derive from what has happened hitherto in the history of dogma and the history of theology insights [5] and principles (of the most varied kinds), the knowledge and application of which could be useful and perhaps indispensable for current and future history of dogma.

It seems obvious that a question of this kind must in principle be answered in the affirmative. But has there been sufficient reflection on these experiences in the course of the history of dogma and on the insights and principles drawn from them for the progress of this history? Are these insights and principles available to the history of dogma at the present time, when new controversies and new confrontations between the magisterium and academic theology are emerging, when ‘new’ interpretations of the old dogma are being put forward? Are they stated clearly enough to be able to determine this theological development, to allow it perhaps to run its course more peacefully and rapidly, to help to avoid unnecessary conflicts between the magisterium and modern theology, between ‘conservative’ and ‘progressive’ Catholics?

Whether this is an old question or a new one is in fact irrelevant. But if we observe or are involved in those concrete events in the Church today which can be subsumed under the notion of development of dogma, we shall not be able to say that the answer to the question is so clear as to make an adequate impact on the course of these events on all sides in theological controversies. Otherwise, would it have been possible, in the schemata prepared by the commission of the Second Vatican Council before the latter’s opening, to put forward as definable truths propositions which twenty years later can scarcely count on a majority among the theologians in the world or among the ordinary believers: propositions, for instance, like those on monogenism or on the limbo of infants? Otherwise, how are we to explain the widespread discontent of many theologians (and especially of moral theologians) in regard to declarations of the magisterium after the last council, theologians who have the greatest respect for the Church’s teaching authority and its intentions but who also have the impression that in these declarations too little account is taken of the historicity and historical relativity involved in former statements of the magisterium? Too much of what was said in the past is merely ‘repeated’; statements are made with too little open contact with the modern human sciences or even with contemporary theology.

The following reflections will be concerned with these insights and [6] principles. And it is a question here only of quite simple, really obvious insights and principles, not of profound and difficult hermeneutical theories in the light of which the present course of the history of dogma and theology would, as far as possible, have to be guided. A deeply probing theory of hermeneutical principles of this kind for the further course of the history of dogma is not possible here, if only because this sort of thing would presuppose an exact and definite theory of development of dogma as a whole, which of course does not exist in any generally accepted form and certainly could not be worked out here. The insights and principles to be put forward here are derived – as will become apparent – from the straightforward observation of events of the history of dogma up to the present time. These will simply be mentioned. At the same time there will be no attempt to work out a system even of these insights and principles; they will merely be placed one after another in a somewhat arbitrary sequence, since a ‘system’ of such principles and its substantiation is of course also

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

impossible here. The principles will be illustrated and authenticated by brief allusions to particular occurrences in the history of dogma. At the same time there is no need to offer historical documentation for these examples from the previous history of dogma, since they are well known and the documentation of the historical sources is easily accessible for anyone who is interested in it.

With these occurrences from the previous history of dogma (together with the history of theology) it is not of decisive importance for us here whether it is a question of the history of a dogma in the strict sense of the term or merely one of the history of a doctrine put forward by the magisterium as indeed 'authentic' but with minimal binding force. There is no need to explain the special reasons why in the present context this distinction, important as it is in itself, can be neglected with reference to our examples, which are themselves presented unsystematically. But what is important in regard to these examples is the fact that in many if not all of them this development led to 'new' dogmas or to 'new' doctrines presented as authentic by the magisterium. This means that the hermeneutical principle implicitly involved in such a doctrinal development (if the implications can be clearly shown) are tacitly recognized as legitimate by the magisterium itself; not only the new teaching, but also the way that led to it (by and large), is recognized by the magisterium as legitimate [7] and thus as applicable at least in principle to other cases to the extent to which the magisterium accepts this 'new' doctrine as its own and puts it forward as binding. What exactly is meant by this will be seen from the examples with which we are attempting to illustrate and authenticate the insights and principles to be put forward for a still continuing and future history of dogma and theology. With these reservations and demarcations of our theme we may now attempt to come directly to the essential problem.

I

In the future also the history of dogma will be beset with friction, accompanied by struggles, conflicts, denunciations. All this happened so often in the past that we cannot expect things to be different in the future, even though the human style of these bitter controversies as a driving force of history today and (it is to be hoped) in the future is assuming by and large more humane and more tolerant forms.

In the past the Church's official declarations and determinations of obligatory teaching generally presented the matter as if the true doctrine had 'actually' always been clear and obvious even before these official determinations, as if the opponents of these teachings had been stupid and malicious and as if the doctrine concerned – being obvious and comprehensibly explained directly in Scripture or in earlier tradition – had been questioned and disputed only out of malicious impiety. Countless examples of this could be cited, but we shall spare ourselves the trouble of enumerating them here. This denunciation of opponents as stupid and malicious was (it might almost be said, from the New Testament onward) the style that declarations of the Church's magisterium formerly simply took for granted, which today seems to have been abandoned.

But, as opposed to this interpretation of history, it is obvious that, after achieving the result of a particular teaching, this history itself Continued in the midst of many difficulties, obscurities, and frictions that cannot be blamed unilaterally on stupid and malicious heretics, but are involved in the very nature of the case and amount to the toll exacted by the historicity of human knowledge, even in the dimension [8] of faith. As new questions emerge in a way that cannot be blamed simply on the malice or human presumption and pride of theologians, it cannot be maintained that everything is actually clear from the outset or that an answer is immediately available for every question. This way of thinking is possible only in the light of a theory of development of dogma that sees the latter as a purely logical explication of what was already present and the concrete occasions of an historical character for such a logical explication as purely external stimuli, without which the explication could still have taken place in principle. But such a theory of the development of dogma fails to appreciate the historicity of truth itself and will scarcely be seriously maintained today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The average theologian today may simply take it for granted that the Council of Chalcedon was right and that it interpreted the Council of Ephesus correctly. But what difficulties, obscurities, and terminological confusion had in reality to be overcome in the couple of decades between the two councils and how great were the difficulties afterwards which well-meaning defenders of a Cyrillic Christology of Ephesus felt after Chalcedon (actually up to the present time) in pursuing this path as the right and necessary one?

If the history of dogma and the history of theology went on in the past only in the midst of friction and bitter struggle, we cannot simply expect to be spared this sort of thing today and tomorrow. There has been, if for once we may be so rash as to use the term, a change of emphasis in the Church's awareness of the truth. Where the stress was formerly laid on the objective dignity of truth as such (which was also assumed only too readily to be clearly evident in itself or in its fundamental theological presuppositions and to be accessible to every intelligence [cf., for example, DS 3009, 3013]), there is now a recognition and respect for the dignity of the subjective conscience in regard to truth, which can never be eliminated and which found its distinctive confirmation, again after considerable conflict, at the Second Vatican Council. It is to be hoped that this respect for conscience will determine more than formerly the style of such controversies (including the very practical consequences which must be thought out more carefully than they have been hitherto). The result will be that a questioning of this change of emphasis can never be explained again as formerly almost solely by stupidity or malice and that it will be impossible to declare the questioner a 'subjective' heretic.

II

In the future also the history of dogma can continue with considerable revision of former (authentic) declarations of the Church's magisterium. The situation is not, as is frequently implied in textbooks of the history of dogma, that the history of dogma and theology runs only from what is less to what is more clear, from global to more articulate statements, that it is merely a beautiful and undisturbed 'unfolding' of the original substance of faith.

While the development of dogma in the strictest sense may run definitely and, in the last resort, on a 'single track' – in other words, an actually attained and absolute assent of the Church's sense of faith is not revisable (as 'erroneous') retrospectively (although this process which led to an absolute assent of faith remains open to the future) – that is not to say that a development of faith and theology has taken place and will take place in the future only in the sense of a frictionless explication. On the contrary, this development is very often also marked by wrong decisions on the part of the magisterium, wrong decisions which add a further element of friction to that which is necessarily always involved in the historicity of truth, disturbing the course of historical development and making it humanly more difficult and more bitter.

Again, all this is obvious if we look back, but not readily noticed by the Church's magisterium in the present course of history. In practice, the magisterium not infrequently acts as if its authentic but basically revisable (and therefore possibly erroneous) doctrinal statements were factors to be respected for ever. Consequently these doctrinal statements then refer to earlier examples, even though the latter as such are not absolutely binding, that is,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

strictly speaking, they prove only that the earlier teaching was the same as the present and therefore scarcely give a greater weight to the new statement than it would possess without such a quotation; this is evident today since, after learning from the history of dogma of the temporally long duration of an authentic teaching, as distinct from former times we shall not attach so much importance to proving its objective correctness. (We may recall for instance the approval of torture and of the burning of heretics from Innocent IV, against Nicholas I [DS 648], up to Leo X [DS 1483] or the prohibition of usury even in times when it certainly could no longer be justified by the existing economic structure.)

[10] At the present time also it is scarcely possible to find a declaration of the Church's magisterium in which the universal principles of any normal fundamental theology even of the most orthodox kind in regard to the degrees of binding force of such declarations are provided expressly and openly together with the particular declaration in question. Even today, for dubious ('educational') reasons, the impression is given in such authentic declarations that they are obviously not open to revision and that they could not possibly turn out later to be mistaken and to place an obstacle on the path that the history of faith and theology will actually follow in the future. But there are and there will continue to be such obstacles, since the Church's magisterium can err and often has erred in its authentic declarations, and this is obviously possible also in future.

It is scarcely necessary here to cite further examples from history of these wrong decisions. For the fact itself was quite frankly acknowledged in a letter by the German episcopate. Nor is this the place to consider how precisely the respect due to such doctrinal statements can be combined with the necessity and permissibility of allowing for the possibility of error in these declarations. In this connection it need only be said quite frankly and without prejudice that this question was not given a sufficiently clear answer even in Lumen Gentium at the Second Vatican Council, since it is not explained (no. 25) how the recognition of the 'supreme magisterium' and the 'sincere adherence' demanded for merely authentic doctrinal declarations of this magisterium can co-exist with a critique of these statements which may be the right and even the duty of theologians.

III

Even truths that are absolutely binding dogmatically can be stated and handed down with ideas actually held at the time, with conceptual models and accepted modes of understanding, which are transmitted inseparably and as a matter of course with the essential statement and later turn out to be entirely without binding force or even to be false.

It can and must rightly be said (as we mentioned above) that the history of dogma properly speaking moves along a single track and [11] cannot be revised retrospectively in such a way that a defined proposition could later be declared to be absolutely erroneous; nor could this happen even if the kind of explication of faith used in this connection cannot be established conclusively in a purely logical argument from more fundamental data of faith. None of this however excludes the possibility that in the transmission and expression of dogmas properly speaking there may be inseparably mingled ideas, interpretations, etc., which are not part of the binding content of the article of faith concerned but which have not been explicitly separated from this article at a particular epoch in history by traditional theology or even by the Church's magisterium, and for historical reasons cannot be separated up to a certain point in time. There may be such amalgams (if we may use this admittedly problematic expression) even with dogmas properly so called.

Not every idea then that was actually but without further reflection brought to bear at a particular time on the elucidation of the meaning of an article of faith is in principle really an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

