4. It cannot be denied that in the tradition of poverty too, and in the tradition of the theology of poverty various motivations and interpretations of poverty have been assigned. The poverty of the ascetics of the apostolic age and of early Christendom prior to the emergence of monasticism properly so called under Antonius and still more under Pachomius was a different phenomenon from the poverty of the coenobites both in its material form and necessarily to some extent in its motivation also. The poverty of the pure contemplative on the one hand, and of the active apostle on the other, cannot, in reality, simply be identical one with the other, and therefore neither can the motivations of the two kinds of poverty be identical. Poverty of life as practised in a given religious order, without diminishing its essential theological identity, derives a distinctive stamp of its own from the distinctive characteristics which apply to that particular order as a whole, and therefore the motivation of this poverty likewise has a different specification from that in other orders. Historically speaking, therefore, we have to recognise fully the existence of these very different motivations in the numerous movements towards poverty and controversies about poverty (all reform movements in the religious orders and all controversies have in fact always entailed disputes about poverty too, and these go far beyond the dispute about poverty in the Franciscan order). History, therefore, fully justifies us in refusing to strive for an absolutely univocal explanation when we come to investigate the theological meaning and motivation of poverty. It is to be expected a priori that the poverty practised in the religious orders is a relatively complex phenomenon, which, as practised in the concrete, is quite incapable of being reduced to any one single theological root.

[177]

II. THE THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF RELIGIOUS POVERTY

We have now to enquire into the theological essence of poverty. But two provisos which we must always bear in mind throughout our enquiry are first that what we have to say will be at an extremely abstract level, and second that we may perhaps not manage to lay bare all the roots of this extremely complex phenomenon. A further point is that any attempt at assigning the basic theological reasons for practising poverty must to some extent do justice to the complexity of the phenomenon. For this reason certain preliminary observations must be made concerning the limits within which we can and must attempt to find an answer to our question at all.

1. In any attempt at finding an answer to our question one point which we must bear in mind from the very outset may be stated as follows: (a) We are trying to ascertain the meaning of evangelical poverty, i.e. that poverty which is recommended by Jesus himself. However many forms religious poverty may have assumed in the course of history, however many modes and fashions of practising it may have been worked out, in all cases, wherever it has arisen, the intention has always been to fulfil the evangelical counsel which goes back to Christ himself. It is true that even in the teaching of the New Testament itself several different motivations are assigned for the practice of voluntary poverty, and these are themselves both susceptible of and in need of analysis. But however true this may be, it still remains a point of absolutely primary and overriding importance that religious poverty in all its forms is intended to be a following of this evangelical counsel, and that all forms of the religious life are conscious of being authorised in their practice of poverty simply by the very fact that Jesus has recommended it, even when they do not succeed in making clear the reasons which Jesus himself had for recommending this practice of poverty. In fact a point which can and must be made right from the outset is the following (and here we are already going beyond the preliminary group of questions which needs to be treated of here, that namely which is concerned with the problem of poverty in its total scope and ambience): one element in this poverty is precisely the inalienable connection with the Lord and his personal lot, a connection for which no more ultimate reason can be assigned. We can say that the practice of poverty is based, among other factors, upon [178] that theology which envisages the discipleship of Christ as a sharing in the lot of Jesus himself and on this basis we can say that the reason for practising poverty is simply that this was, in fact, the lot endured by the Lord himself. The life of the Lord was, in its concrete realities, precisely so and not otherwise. And we cannot assign any more ultimate reason for this than the fact that it was so. Now this concrete reality is received and projected further into the life of the individual who loves Jesus and follows him. But there is a further point over and above this. Everything which the New Testament teaching on poverty assigns as a motivation for practising poverty over and above this central fact must be assigned a place in the poverty of the religious life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(b) A point which must not be forgotten in the theology of poverty is that poverty as practised in the religious orders is concerned with a factor in communal living, and this communal living in turn makes manifest in historical and social terms factors which are inherent in the very nature of the Church herself. In fact the orders are not simply private confraternities of individuals who lead an ascetical life on their own account, and at their own risk, such that the Church still to some extent presides over these confraternities. The fact that these confraternities can provide useful assistance for the work undertaken by the Church's official hierarchy is not the sole reason that the Church concerns herself with them. For in fact, measured by the standards of the meaning and content of the religious life, insofar as the actual practice of this life is concerned, the giving of this help is a wholly accidental factor (as for instance when a bishop founds a community of sisters under vows because he needs to provide cooks for his seminaries and other institutions in the cheapest and most reliable way possible to him). Rather the orders constitute a concretisation, in social and communal terms, of the charismatic element and the element of enthusiasm in the Church which must always be present in her as an essential manifestation of her true nature. There cannot be any such thing as the Church of the final eschatological age in which the evangelical counsels are not lived and practised as a manifestation of the essential nature of the Church herself. Now such a life inevitably goes on to assume certain organised forms. And though the element in the Church which they embody is precisely not institutional but rather charismatic, still, in a certain sense, they do institutionalise even this charismatic element (with all the danger of misinterpretation which such a procedure entails). To this extent, therefore, the orders belong to the essence of the Church in [179] the degree and measure that in them she, the Church, lives out certain aspects of her own nature, making them real and manifest to the world. The orders constitute an element in the process by which the fact that the grace of God has entered the world and has triumphed over it is rendered present. This is the grace that summons man to transcend the limits of his own natural powers as a 'this-worldly' creature, and draws him into the process by which that grace is rendered present which constitutes the very nature of the Church herself. In our attempt to say something about religious poverty this is a point that must not be forgotten. Religious poverty must be viewed in the light of this essential function of the religious orders themselves.

(c) Religious poverty has a function in these religious communities considered precisely as freely committed to communal living. This practical side of poverty, which we experience every day, does not constitute the ultimate essence of religious poverty, but it is one which we neither can nor may overlook. A certain measure of religious poverty (above all consisting in a certain dependence and equality in the mode of life followed by the individual members) is indispensable for the survival of a community committed to communal living down to the intimate details of life such as the orders are intended to be. From this point of view the meaning of poverty is determined by the broader and more comprehensive

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

significance which such a community is intended to have. The significance of the community is also the significance of the poverty it practises.

(d) To the extent that an order has a task to perform for others outside itself, in that the life and work of the community and of each of its individual members is dedicated to promoting a task of this kind (apostolic, teaching, missionary or charitable work, etc.), the religious poverty practised by that order will also be affected by this aim. Alike in its essence and in the mode in which it is practised it will derive its concrete specification from this aim.

2. It now becomes clear not only that these various perspectives from which religious poverty can be viewed are legitimate, and that they make the concept of poverty complex, and therefore rich in overtones, but also that from these various perspectives various explanations of the meaning of poverty can be put forward so that a fresh problem arises once more with regard to how all these explanations can be unified. For it is far from being immediately clear from the outset that these various motivations [180] of themselves lead smoothly and without interruption to the same concept of poverty and to the same mode of practising poverty. Poverty as an evangelical counsel, poverty as an individual following of Christ the poor and the suffering, poverty as an element in the process by which the Church, considered as the eschatological presence of grace in the world, is made visible and palpable, poverty as a principle in the organisation of a community, poverty as a means for drawing the powers of a community together for the fulfilment of its common task for others – all these do not necessarily or ipso facto lead to the same concrete 'poor' mode of life. It may even be the case that they constitute absolute threats or obstacles to one another. Poverty in a radically ascetical sense, for instance, can represent an actual threat to the possibility of living a common life, or take away this possibility altogether. The fact that poverty is subordinated to the interests of apostolic work can appear to make it necessary for the community to be rich to an extent which makes it impossible to speak any further of any real poverty on the part of the individual member of the order, and so of poverty in any ascetical sense.

From this point of view, when we come to consider how the various aspects are to be co-ordinated and reconciled, remembering that no one of them needs to be absolutely excluded, the following point must be laid down from the outset: the poverty which consists in following Jesus and sharing in his lot, in a kind of mystical identification with him, on the one hand, and poverty considered as recommended in the New Testament as a counsel to leave all things, to sell one's goods and give the proceeds to the poor on the other, neither need to cause, nor are capable of causing any difficulties one for the other. Even if they are not absolutely reducible one to another (the uniqueness of Jesus even in the concrete historical realities of his life, in which, nevertheless, this uniqueness still becomes our nomos, is not capable of being adequately resolved into principles which are intrinsically comprehensible and for which a priori ethical explanations can be assigned), still these two ideals of poverty constitute two intrinsically related entities, a fact which will become clear in what immediately follows. A further factor is introduced into poverty in virtue of the fact that the orders constitute elements in the essential meaning of the Church. But this too cannot come into conflict in any way with the two first-named constitutive elements in poverty. For the Church must in fact (a point which must be demonstrated at a later stage), make manifest and visible in the world that grace in which the essential content of the [181] basileia tou theou consists. For it is for the sake of this that it is required of the disciple of Jesus that he shall be poor. But on the other hand it must also be clear from the outset that the further shade of meaning in poverty, its function, namely, in making a technical contribution to the organisation and work of the order concerned (if we may so express the two shades of meaning mentioned above under a single heading) can only be proved to have a right to be taken into consideration insofar as it is dependent upon, and subordinate to, the two shades of meaning which we have just indicated. In cases in which it came to be so emphasised that it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

derogated from, or suppressed altogether the more original and essential meaning of poverty, it would have to be denied and resisted. If an order intends to be and to remain an order following the evangelical counsels, then any apostolic, missionary, pedagogic, charitable, etc., aims which it may have can never be put forward with such emphasis as determinative elements in the communal way of life proper to that order that for practical purposes they can cause the order to turn aside from the ideal of evangelical poverty. If certain aims, in themselves perfectly legitimate, were to demand a mode of life which could no longer in all reason and honesty be described as poor, then such aims would have to be pursued and realised outside the religious community concerned. Indeed it is in principle true that we cannot take a priori as our starting-point the axiom that all the aims which are reasonable and necessary for the Church must for that very reason be capable of realisation in religious communities. The modern tendency to see a connection between the religious life and more or less every conceivable kind of enterprise in the Church has in fact given rise to the supposition that this axiom does apply. But it is, and remains, false and unproved, however much it may exercise an implicit influence as something that is taken for granted.

3. What then is the meaning of poverty in the evangelical sense in the teaching of Jesus? Here we are abstracting from the fact that poverty is first and foremost simply a sharing in the life of the Lord, who was, for all practical purposes, a poor man, or better, lived poorly (Lk 9:57; Mt 8:20; 2 Cor 8:9). We are also abstracting, for the purposes of the question which we have now posed, from the fact that we only encounter poverty in the New Testament as a recommendation of a way of life which the individual can lead as an individual, in other words, that in the New Testament the idea of a communal life lived by those dedicated to poverty in the evangelical sense, and united in a community which is itself poor, has [182] not yet become apparent. A further point from which we are abstracting is the ‘communism’ of the early Christians of the primitive community in Jerusalem (Acts 4:32-37). We do not propose to include this in our consideration because this would have the effect of broadening the field of investigation to an excessive extent. But we have the right to reflect upon the fact that as the Lord himself conceived of it, it is evident that the virginity recommended by him ‘for the kingdom of heaven’s sake’ (Mt 19:12) and the poverty likewise recommended from the same motive (Mt 19:21; Lk 18:22) derive from a single basic presupposition. It is true that no compelling reason is a priori apparent from the first for explaining that this moral requirement or recommendation here put forward by Jesus never existed before his time. From the point of view of dogma and history, therefore, we can actually reckon a priori with the possibility that in his recommendation of poverty Jesus was making his own a programme which was already available in the traditions of later Judaism prior to his advent. But while all this is true, we can say, nevertheless (albeit with a certain caution) that the poverty which Jesus has in mind, and which he recommends to his disciples, is found neither in the Old Testament nor in the traditions of later Judaism, which constitute the religious environment in which Jesus worked. Nor, properly speaking, is this ideal of poverty to be found in the traditions of Qumran. This is a point which cannot be explicitly demonstrated here. But neither is it one which is of decisive importance for the problem with which we are concerned. We also presuppose (to prove this would likewise carry us too far afield at this point) that when Jesus summoned his disciples to poverty he did not intend to inaugurate any social programme. The idea of bringing about a universal economic and social transformation in the world was never in his mind either as a concrete demand or as an abstract idea.

With these provisos we can say: Jesus is conscious of the fact, and explains, that with him and in him the basileia of God has arrived and is being offered to men, that by this coming of the basileia men are placed in a situation of absolute and radical decision of the utmost acuteness and urgency, in other words in an eschatological situation. What is in question here is not the fact that man is, of his very nature, a moral being, and as such always, and in a manner that is constant and unvarying, confronted in all that he does with a decision between good and evil, between assent to and refusal of God himself. Rather it is that now in Jesus the supreme offering of salvation by God has been made present as a supreme moment [183] of opportunity in history. It is that of his own nature in Jesus God compels man to take his ultimate decision. It is in virtue of this fact that, according to Jesus' teaching a situation of radical decision has arisen in the kairos, the time of opportunity, which the life of Jesus represents for man. Now according to Jesus the advent of the basileia of God as understood here means that human riches have become a danger and an obstacle to the acceptance of this kingdom of God in faith to such an extent that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into this kingdom (cf. Mt 19:23 f; Mk 10:25; Mt 13:22; Lk 1:53; 6:24; Mt 6:19-24). This is not to say that possessions as such are ipso facto immoral in themselves, or that the absence of such possessions ipso facto constitutes a moral value in itself. 'A radical rejection of possessions, such as we meet with in Buddhism, in the tenets of the Greek Cynics, and among certain adherents of Stoicism, is foreign to Jesus' (Schmidt, LTK Vol 1, 2nd ed. col 880). Jesus' attitude to the rich is not that of one sociologically opposed to them as a class. But what Jesus does say is that riches, the accumulation of possessions, signifies the direst peril for man in that once he becomes involved in the cares of this present world he becomes blind to the advent of the kingdom, and deaf and unresponsive to the radical summons of God. He does not have at his command that radical freedom of spirit, and of all the powers at his command, which is necessary for him whole-heartedly to receive the kingdom. And for this reason Jesus requires of those who decide to follow him with special closeness in order to receive this kingdom that they shall give their possessions to the poor and become poor themselves (Mt 19:16-30; Lk 9:3; 9:57 f.; 12:33; 18:22).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To the question of why, under which aspects, and because of what qualities inherent in it, riches should constitute an obstacle in this sense, holding men back from preparing themselves for the basileia, Jesus supplies hardly any explicit answer. He seems to regard this as self-evident. He who is rich is full of cares (Mk 4:19; Lk 8:14), wants to have more, gives himself up to enjoyment, takes pleasure in the power, enjoyment and security which his possessions give him (Lk 16:19; 12:15-21). He has his 'treasure' on earth instead of in heaven (Lk 12:33 f.). Jesus' appraisal of the danger which riches entail, therefore, is simply based upon the observation of ordinary everyday realities such as are borne in upon any man of good sense who faces up to them whole-heartedly, does not idealise them, and does not allow himself to be beguiled by them. Taking [184] this as our starting-point it is immediately evident that anyone who sets out to systematise this condemnation of the rich and riches on Jesus' part (cf. Lk 6:24 f.) must constantly bear in mind the genus litterarium in which these words are uttered, which is prophetic and was initially inspired by the concrete realities of everyday life as Jesus encountered them. If we fail to do this we may fall into a state of mind in which we apply these words in a doctrinaire and universal sense, and erect them into an axiom admitting of no exceptions in a way which is quite foreign to Jesus' intention, seeing that he explicitly disassociates himself from any such attitude (Mt 19:26). A further reason for avoiding this is that the ethical ideals which he taught were intended for the heart, whereas to adopt this approach would be, once more, to reduce them to a sort of univocal ethical pragmatism by which we could check and control our actions in all cases, in other words to a kind of pharisaism. A further point is that in spite of Mt 8:20 the impression is borne in upon us, that Jesus was not strictly speaking in a state of abject destitution or really threatened by hunger. He did have money (cf. Jn 12:6) and quite clearly opportunities enough to obtain support from his rich friends when he had need of this. It should be remembered that the opinion of the Old Testament (Prov 30:8 f.) is that the optimum average conditions for the service of God obtain when man is in an intermediary position between the extremes of a degree of wealth on the one hand that satisfies every possible need, and abject poverty on the other. It cannot be said, therefore, that this opinion is simply invalidated by the example of Jesus.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is immediately evident that the motivation underlying the poverty inculcated by Jesus is identical with the motivation he puts forward for voluntarily remaining single for the sake of the kingdom of heaven. In the evangelical counsel of poverty Jesus requires of those who decide to dedicate themselves to following him in an especially close way, and so to being 'perfect' (Mt 19:21) that by their own personal decision they shall bring their own personal lives into a situation which is that of those 'poor' whom he himself pronounces blessed in the Sermon on the Mount, in other words the situation of the 'anawim' who are really poor, socially underprivileged, threatened and suffering, but who at the same time bear their lot 'meekly' and in a spirit of resignation to God, imposing the imprint of their faith upon their external lot and so transforming it to that state to which, in Jesus' intention, the voluntary poor should bring their lives: one in which they totally dedicate their freedom to fulfilling the [185] demands of their interior faith in such a way that it shall be imposed upon their exterior situation, and so responding to the summons of the basileia of God in Christ.

There is yet a further aspect to be considered in addition to what has already been said. Jesus requires of him who voluntarily decides to become poor for the kingdom of heaven's sake that he shall give his riches to the poor. Manifestly for practical purposes this is not the easiest way open to him of becoming poor. Thus, for instance (provided that technically speaking it was just as easy to carry out), the man concerned might just as well burn his possessions in order to become poor. It is clearly envisaged and intended that the poor neighbour shall be the goal and object of the individual's act in surrendering his personal riches. It is the poor neighbour who must be helped. Certainly it is not the mind of Jesus that this neighbour should be regarded as one who has been 'deprived of his rights' and 'disinherited', one who, in other words, has a social and political right to riches. Rather it is because he is a brother in the kingdom of God, because as such he is beloved, because the message that must be conveyed to him in this gesture of faith in the coming of the kingdom of God from above is that this kingdom of God is already there. This kingdom, in fact, unites and combines those men who have fallen into disunity and disharmony through the presence of sin in the world. When, therefore, belief in this coming of the kingdom of heaven is lived out in the concrete in the form of voluntary poverty, then this faith must be expressed in the concrete as faith in the unity in love of those who have been united by God's grace. The individual no longer defends that sphere of his life which is occupied by his worldly goods as the bastion of his own egoistical self-defence against others, but rather gives them a share in these goods because he can regard them in a spirit of trust and love them as fellow citizens in the kingdom. The holding of property in common in some form (though of course this can take the most diverse forms and need not necessarily appear precisely in the form which we encounter in the primitive community of Jerusalem) is an intrinsic element in this poverty considered as the gesture which expresses in concrete fact the new brotherhood of men in Christ (the spirit of brotherhood in the orders, one of the conditions of which is likewise the holding of goods in common might also be viewed from this aspect, for by being placed at the service of these, what was once private wealth is placed at the service of the Church as a whole. Admittedly this is only the case [186] provided that that private egoism which seeks its own personal possessions is not replaced by a collective egoism on the part of a greater community precisely with regard to the Church or other Christians, e.g. with regard to domestic servants employed in monasteries, convents, etc.). This aspect of evangelical poverty is one of the factors which once more must be borne in mind whenever we seek to interpret poverty in a manner which is, theologically speaking, more systematic, considering it namely as an eschatological gesture of faith in the coming of the kingdom of God by grace

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from above. A fact which must never be overlooked in all this is that this kingdom, which is the unity of the brotherhood in love, is also intended to be received precisely by the gesture of voluntarily becoming poor.

Jesus regards the disciple's act in attaching himself more closely to his person, and the voluntary poverty which this entails, as enjoined also, and especially, upon those who dedicate themselves to responding to his call for missionary service (Mt 10:9 the missionary discourse).

We may, perhaps sum all this up by saying: for Jesus voluntary poverty in the evangelical sense is not a sociological programme for the reform of economic circumstances as an end in itself. It is not an element in some system of merely natural ethics which is of universal and unvarying application (to that extent, therefore, not 'ascetical' if we understand this to involve requirements of abstemiousness of a radical kind). It is the outcome of the situation of eschatological salvation. It has meaning, therefore, only to the extent that it requires us to be in a state of radical preparedness for the kingdom of God. But neither the state of being totally devoid of possessions nor that modesty and frugality which is associated with the petit-bourgeois enter of themselves into the meaning of the poverty which Jesus inculcates. This poverty has not yet arrived at the stage at which it is regarded as a way of life for a community. But it probably is regarded as a means of setting the individual free and enabling him to devote himself to missionary activities. It is primarily and essentially a renunciation of riches in that form in which they figured in the historical situation which Jesus knew, together with the ordinary effects which riches had in that particular situation. Thus a 'transference' of the counsel of poverty into all subsequent economic situations, the circumstances of which are constantly changing, is inadmissible. But the poverty which Jesus prescribes is not intended as a mere attitude of mind and conscience, as (in this sense) 'poverty of spirit'. On the contrary it involves, as one of [187] its intrinsic material elements (this still remains true in spite of all the emphasis on the mental attitude of liberating the heart and spirit for the kingdom of God) a renunciation of material goods which is actually put into practice in the concrete.

4. Now when we attempt (passing over the teaching of Acts, Paul and James) to evaluate and to systematise the results we have achieved somewhat more in terms of theology (this will at the same time have the effect of carrying our findings still further in that they will be brought into connection with more general theological insights) then we arrive at the following conclusions:

(a) Christian morality is always a morality of mind and conscience in the sense that the attitude of the heart must be objectified and realised in the dimension of concrete and apprehensible reality which is distinct from this interior dimension of disposition and attitude – in other words it must be realised in 'works'. Now since these works are different from the mind and conscience, which embrace all things, they do not admit of any ultimate assurance that the innermost attitude of the heart is pleasing to God. Yet at the same time these works do constitute the necessary and indispensable material, the material willed by God in itself, in which this innermost attitude (that namely of faith and love) can alone be realised. This remains true however many different forms this objectivation of the interior dispositions may assume, and however much the degree of clarity achieved in this objectivation may vary. All this, therefore, applies to poverty too. Poverty is a combination of interior attitude and exterior 'work', and the dialectical difference which we have found between disposition and 'work' applies to it. The attitude of detachment with regard to material possessions is in itself not yet faith and love, the sole standard by which all must be measured, and yet for those of whom it is required this same faith and love cannot be made effective and real otherwise than by the fact that they are realised in poverty as their manifestation, their 'work'.

(b) Evangelical poverty (considered as the unification of two distinct elements as explained

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

above) is simply intended as a response to the situation in saving history in which man stands by the very fact that the kingdom of God has been made eschatologically present in Jesus. Poverty, like all renunciation (the attitude of 'allowing the world to pass one by' – cf. Didache 10:6 -, the attitude of having as though one had not – cf. 1 Cor 7:29-34 -, the unmarried state, etc.) as conceived of in the New [188] Testament is the realisation of faith in the coming of that grace of God which is God himself, and which transcends all 'this worldly' fulfilment such as can be achieved by man himself. Now because this grace is the absolute self-bestowal of God as he is in himself and because it has only now been revealed in Christ as the glory of God himself which exceeds all earthly measures and all values available to human experience, therefore it is only now that man can respond to this coming of God. He can so respond in virtue of the fact that he (who, so far as his purely natural state is concerned is, once more, one who is held captive within himself by sin, and therefore can only experience his openness to the glory of God, which transcends his own nature, as a deadly pain) suffers the 'this-worldly' values to fall away from him in the act of faith (which God himself, and not his own autonomous powers, inspires him to make) yet to make this same sacrifice without being called to it by God in this way would be meaningless, immoral and contrary to his own nature. The act of faith is realised and made concrete, i.e. in a manner which embraces the entire reality of man, his physical nature, his social relationships and the place he occupies in history, in virtue of the fact that he gives up realities and values when to sacrifice them is either an act of despair (or surrender) with regard to the meaning of existence, or else a transcending of the 'this worldly' order so as to attain to the reality of God himself which comes to us from above in the form of grace.

On this showing the meaning of poverty is that it is the act of faith in that grace which comes from above as the unique and definitive fulfilment of human existence. From this it follows that if faith means salvation, and if it is true that faith must always and necessarily achieve its own concretisation (cf. (a)), then such an attitude of withdrawal and allowing the world to pass one by belongs to every act of faith, whatever the context and whatever the manner in which it is posited. Thus the 'poverty in spirit' which all Christians must have necessarily entails a poverty that is made effective in the sober realities of life even though we may not be able to determine in material terms the limits within which this poverty should be applied. In the very nature of the case, therefore, the boundaries between the poverty of the religious orders on the one hand, and the riches or poverty in the lives of the rest of Christians on the other, must necessarily be fluid. No absolute dividing line can be drawn between the two such as would define them as two essentially different ways of life. And conversely the attitude of detachment and renunciation of the 'world' [189] and of any attitude of absolute self-assertion is an act of that Christian faith which is conscious of the world as that which in all its dimensions positively needs to be redeemed. As such it must also be an act of faith in the fact that the world is capable of being redeemed. It is quite impossible, therefore, for one who makes an act of faith in this sense, and thereby becomes poor, to regard the absolutely essential form in which this faith must find its fulfilment as consisting in a state in which, as far as such a thing is physically possible, he possesses absolutely nothing at all. This would, in fact, be tantamount to saying that freedom from the world is ipso facto and in itself possession of God. Now this is not true. The attitude of transcending the world is only a gesture of faith made possible by the grace of God himself in virtue of the fact that by his grace God bestows himself upon the world, and in doing so actually glorifies it. And this grace cannot be obtained by force, either by seeking for the fulness of the world itself or by fleeing from the world, taking either of these approaches simply in themselves. And furthermore in making the act of faith we can only allow for the fact that the world has a positive value of its own if we maintain a positive relationship with it. The petty-minded man, the man who is timid, undeveloped, frugal in the demands he makes upon life, the man who right from the outset has the standards of the petit-bourgeois only because his own nature is too paltry to make many claims upon life, is certainly not the man who is capable, to any notable extent, of bringing the meaning of the act of faith to its fulness in poverty. The 'ideal' of religious poverty, therefore, can never consist in the fact that the realisation of it is regarded as increasing in precisely the same proportion as the act of externally ridding one's self of material goods. Nor is it the ideal of those who are too easily satisfied with commonplace things, or that of those who, in a spirit of narrow-minded pedantry mount guard over the standards of a petit-bourgeois way of life of this kind and legalistically try to ensure that the rules of the game are kept for their own sake.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(c) The Church taken as a whole not only has to be the Church of the faithful, but has to be seen to be such as well. She has to be the sign of faith in the world. To this extent the concretisation of the act of faith as realised in the act of renouncing 'this worldly' fulfilments (of the most varied kind) belongs necessarily to the mode in which it is manifested, and which it can never be without. It is the mode in which, existentially speaking, witness is borne to the faith, which likewise belongs to the Church's [190] nature as holy, together with the function of authoritatively proclaiming the faith. From this point of view it becomes understandable that the task of ensuring that witness is borne to the Church's faith and in the Church through asceticism of this kind is to be numbered among the essential functions of the Church herself. The Church herself must again and again show herself and present herself as a Church in which the truth is actually lived, the truth, namely, that grace is in the very act of coming and the form of the world passing away, that the Church herself is she who looks for the return of her Lord, she who waits with hope for the eternal kingdom of God as that which is still in the very act of coming – all this in a spirit of faith, hope and love. It is the 'ascetics' of the Church and in the Church who have the duty of ensuring that eschatological witness of this kind is borne to the faith. And because of the fact that this witness belongs essentially to the Church there is always a 'class' in the Church constituted by this element of asceticism. Now the duty of ensuring that witness of this particular kind is borne is achieved in the nature of things more easily and more effectively when the Church has not simply individual ascetics living in isolation to turn to, but an actual corporate body formed by these ascetics in order to give effect to their charismatic mission and function. It is also facilitated and made more effective when this corporate body, together with the individual ascetics in it, is formed and led by the Church herself, endowed with the salvific powers of the Church herself, and constantly directed anew to the task to which they – the individuals in these communities and the communities in themselves – are called by God. Poverty as a 'situation' in life which has been chosen voluntarily, which proclaims and expresses the Church's belief in the coming of grace from above, is therefore, of its very nature, an ecclesiastical function, as also is the whole ascetical movement, and is the outcome of an eschatological vocation as well as of this faith. From this it follows that we must do our utmost to give the practice of this poverty a form such that it can maintain this function of bearing witness to the faith of the Church and in the Church, both internally and externally.

III. ON THE CONTEMPORARY SITUATION WITH REGARD TO THE FORMS ASSUMED BY RELIGIOUS POVERTY

We now arrive at the third and most obscure stage in our considerations. The question which presents itself to be treated of at this point is whether [191] this evangelical poverty should be made real and actual in one specific age, namely our own. Poverty and riches are, in fact, right from the outset relative concepts. They always presuppose the whole range of material goods which an individual has at his own free disposal, instituting a comparison between

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

these and the range of similar goods which are possessed by the average individual in the relevant periods of history considered from the economic and social point of view. There is not much point in calling a pigmy in the forests of central Africa 'poor' on the grounds that he does not have a shirt. It may be that at the time of Jesus a man living in Palestine was 'poor' when he possessed only one instead of two coats (cf. Mt 5:40; 10:10). Today we rightly call an individual 'poor' when he can only call two shirts his own. Poverty, therefore, is a relative concept, bearing upon a specific economic situation. Nevertheless it is not absolutely relative. For in spite of what we have said there is a certain constant factor within the continuous alterations in the economic situation which take place throughout history. As applied to the basic biological act of human existence there are certain upper and lower limits defining the absolute minimum necessary for this existence. It is possible to define in figures which are more or less absolutely constant how many calories a man needs in order not to starve. Because of these constants it cannot be said that the concepts of poverty and of riches are solely and exclusively to be defined from the particular economic situation prevailing at any given time, and it is certainly not legitimate to doubt whether, for instance, 'poverty' as we know it today still has anything material in common with the 'poverty' of the time of Jesus. But on the other hand, because man is not only a purely biological being, in other words because he has needs which are not merely determined by his 'bios' but are rather subject to historical changes without for that reason being simply arbitrary, and because these cannot be established solely by the individual according to his own personal decision – because of all this there enters into the concept of poverty a factor which is variable, subject to historical alterations, and to a large extent beyond the powers of the individual to establish or control. From this a further question follows: What does religious poverty really mean today? And this question will lead us to recognise the fact that in poverty, and in the mode of practising poverty, the mere fact of the changes which have taken place in economic and social relationships has brought about transformations which are not insignificant, transformations which we have not yet sufficiently taken [192] cognizance of in the Church's laws relating to the poverty of religious communities, and which we are still far from having been sufficiently realised and worked out in terms of the constitutions of religious orders. A further conclusion is that there has been a not insignificant shift of meaning in the concept of the poverty of the orders for the Church and her witness in the world, and that we are called upon to make fresh efforts to develop a mode of poverty which is more effective in enabling poverty to fulfil its constant and abiding function in the religious life of the individual, of the order and of the Church herself both internally and externally.

It is very difficult to give any satisfactory reply to this question in a manner which is systematic, clear and comprehensible, and which at the same time is, even to some extent, satisfying and constructive. The reader is therefore asked to excuse the fragmentary and disorderly presentation of the considerations which follow.

1. Our first observation is one which is, perhaps, calculated to meet with that feeling of mistrust and irritation which is occasionally experienced today among members of the orders in dealing with religious ideals; the feeling, namely, that it is a clear and established fact that in the question of poverty the contemporary members of religious orders are only threatened with the danger of becoming more lax, and the sole task of superiors in the orders is to set themselves firmly against any such falling away. If poverty means economic insecurity and a renunciation of that power in society which is associated with possessions then we shall be able to say that the orders considered as corporate bodies, and viewed as a whole, have never been so poor as they are today. If it is true that the individual member of an order shares in the riches or the poverty of his community then this conclusion has implications for the position of individuals in the orders. But surely this conclusion does prove to be unambiguously true. The united resources of a foundation of the Middle Ages, or even of a house of Mendicants of the period or of a Jesuit house of studies of the seventeenth century, and the power which these gave to their holders, represent, when measured by the general economic standards of the relevant periods, a far greater percentage of the total amount of goods available for all than is the case today. But presumably this would still apply even if it were sought to reconcile the proportions between the two sets of figures by pointing out that the proportion of religious to the population as a whole was different then from what it is now. The religious houses have all become poorer than they were, even if the degree of [193] poverty involved is determined by another principle, that is, not merely by the amount of goods available in the absolute, but also according to the proportion these represented of the total amount of goods available to the community as a whole at any one particular period. The fact that this increase in poverty has not been accompanied by a corresponding increase in the degree of economic insecurity experienced, whether with regard to the needs of life at the biological level or otherwise, is simply a consequence of the general economic situation. In other words it may be that even a member of a religious order stood in greater danger of going hungry in former times than he does today. But this is simply due to the fact that this danger has become less for everyone than it was in former times. Again a relatively smaller increase in the degree of economic security enjoyed has probably been achieved for members of religious orders than for many other social groups in comparison with the degree of security which these would have enjoyed in earlier times. This finding is not invalidated by the fact that the decrease in economic security for the member of an order is not, strictly speaking, due to economic factors (as in earlier times) but rather to other causes, for instance the threat which political forces hostile to religion and the Church represent for religious communities. From certain points of view, therefore, it can absolutely be asserted that in guiding his Church God has so arranged matters that the Church and her orders have become poorer than in earlier times. To that extent we do not, strictly speaking, have any need to suppose that we are greatly inferior to our fathers in this question of poverty, even if today we have a typewriter and a wristwatch and other things as well which they did not possess. Of course it is right that the absolute quantity of goods which are available to a member of an order today has increased to a quite extraordinary extent in comparison with earlier times. But that is the outcome not in any sense of a development in the orders as such, or even of a decline from the ideal of religious poverty. Rather it is the consequence of the general economic development. Yet even as such this fact constitutes the basis of the present-day problem of poverty in the orders.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. The first problem confronting us is the security of modern man (and so of the member of an order too). In our present-day economy, in contrast to that of earlier times, everyone, and so the member of an order too, can count with relatively greater security, on the availability of that absolute minimum necessary simply for maintaining life at the purely [194] biological level. Today in the areas governed by our present-day economy the probability that we shall starve is minimal. But strictly speaking it is precisely this security that poverty in its original form, and as practised in earlier periods of the economy, to a large extent gave up. Then a man became poor when in a literal sense he was reduced to begging, and not only starved when he did not succeed in obtaining alms (and there was no guarantee of this), but also, when a general situation of need arose (a failure of the crops, pestilence, etc.), he felt its effects most directly and most severely of all. And again this situation itself arose far more easily and with far less possibility of escaping from its effects. Even if we can say that in spite of this present-day economic situation the elemental anxiety (Angst) and insecurity underlying human life are a characteristic of man to a greater extent even than formerly, still this does not alter the facts as we have found them to be. For this insecurity in our basic personal life, even to the extent that it should be present at all in the lives of members of orders, is not in fact increased by the religious poverty which they undertake, as was the case with religious poverty in earlier times. It would not even be intensified if the members of orders were to practise a more radical form of doing without than they normally do, for even by a more strict withdrawal from goods of economic value both in point of quantity and kind they would not really be coming any nearer to those limits which define the minimum necessary for existence, and so the point at which this radical insecurity of existence arises. Their way of life would indeed be more severe and richer in point of detachment from worldly goods, and we can whole-heartedly defend and praise such a way of life. But even so, when they had reduced their level of consumption to this extremely modest level they would still be wholly secure. For it is precisely this abstemiousness with regard to material goods that is easiest to acquire and to maintain. This is due to another circumstance which also radically alters the situation within which the phenomenon of poverty, including religious poverty, has to exist today. In industrial societies everyone who has the power to work can in fact put it to fruitful and profitable use. But this means that mendicancy has been reduced to a mere peripheral phenomenon. As a means of maintaining the minimum necessary for existence the question of alms only still arises for all practical purposes for those who are incapable of work. Money is a symbol of the power to work productively. It is no longer what it was in earlier times, in the first instance a counter representing some consumer good [195] which is not simply any kind of possession. This means that begging (especially as the resources of the welfare state are also available) is regarded to a large extent as unnecessary and therefore as inadmissible. Even if it can be said with a certain justice that the present-day orders are perhaps compelled to ‘beg’ more than in earlier times to sustain themselves and to educate their younger members who have not yet been put to ‘productive’ work (because these are still not equipped for the apostolate, and those who are so capable do not ‘earn’ enough for their part to maintain the younger members) still this is ‘begging’ of a kind which other cultural institutions too avail themselves of today to assure themselves of a sound financial basis (by ‘donations’, ‘contributions’, financially powerfully ‘associates’, ‘promoters’, etc.). All that this kind of ‘begging’ therefore has in common with what was earlier understood by begging is simply the name, and perhaps a ‘nature’ too, in an abstract and metaphysical sense, but otherwise nothing more. The members of religious orders in our countries do not, viewed as a whole, really need to beg in the old sense any more.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Because we live in a productive economy in terms of work and money, spiritual and intellectual achievements too can be regarded as work which can be turned to profit, and so we can, if we wish, take this fact into account in formulating a theory to cover the rules of poverty. We can say that for all practical purposes, and as a matter of concrete fact, the members of orders too live to a large extent by the just remuneration of their activities, which can be considered as work. Just as with doctors the honorarium which they used to receive in the old days has given way to a straightforward payment for their work, so too it is with the activities of members of religious orders. They find their reward. But precisely because of this their contemporaries in modern times have come to think of them from the economic point of view as having passed from the class of the poor in any ordinary sense into that of those who receive recompense for their work, with all the advantages or disadvantages which the economic situation of such people entails. At any rate the members of orders are no longer classed in men’s minds among the genuinely poor, the class to which many orders at least were still thought of as belonging in the Middle Ages. At the most they belong to those who have to satisfy themselves with a relatively modest way of life. In view of this situation it is of no avail to console ourselves with the thought that in spite of this we who are members of orders still live on a modest and simple scale (even though [196] inevitably our standard of living too has been raised together with the general standards prevailing outside the orders). This may be true but it cannot be denied that because of this development,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

however inevitable it may be, the character of religious poverty as bearing witness has to a very notable extent been deprived of its clarity and its power to convince. With regard to the juridical aspects of our religious poverty, which lay down that all property shall be communal property, this is regarded as a measure which is serviceable from the point of view of technical organisation for a common way of life and for an organisation the members of which have set themselves a common goal (the more so since they are committed to celibacy, and therefore from this point of view alone are destined to live in a restricted community of this kind). But this life in which property is held in common is not thought of as that poverty which is designated as such by the gospel, and which, in virtue of the fact that it involves committing oneself to insecurity and defencelessness, is estimated as an act of faith and as a palpable attestation to faith. It is still conceded that the lives led by one or two individuals among us do have this significance, namely in those cases in which the impression is very clearly borne in upon the onlooker that this individual in particular would be 'earning' far more if he had not become a member of an order. But in general we are not credited with such capacities at all and, moreover, in the majority of cases, it simply is not the case that we would 'earn' far more in the world.

And so the fact remains. Religious poverty as it is still practised now has very little to do with any kind of insecurity (voluntarily undertaken) in one's earthly life beyond that insecurity to which all men are subject. And, furthermore, by reason of the alteration in the nature of work in industrial societies it can have very little to do with insecurity in this sense. And for these reasons religious poverty has forfeited much of its character as witness, which it is radically necessary that it should have if it is to retain its religious and ecclesiastical significance. The insecurity of life which arose from poverty as practised in earlier times has, from the economic aspect, given way to a special kind of security which belongs to life in religious houses, and this security becomes particularly intensified in those cases in which a member of the order identifies himself with his community and modifies his own personal claims to fit in with the economic possibilities open to his community. If he does this then it is hardly possible to speak any longer in any real sense of an insecurity and [197] lack of safety in one's earthly life arising from poverty. If, and to the extent that, insecurity of this kind is still present in the religious life it arises not from poverty but from the threat which forces hostile to God and the Church represent to the way of life followed by religious and clerics. This may be God's way of providing a substitute for this particular kind of insecurity which the poor for Christ's sake are inspired by faith to take upon themselves. But for all this this new kind of insecurity is precisely not poverty.

3. A further problem to which this new economic situation has given rise is concerned with the technical procedures by which the canonical dependence of the individual upon the permission of his superior with regard to material goods is put into practice. There have already been frequent opportunities for drawing attention to the fact that the merely juridical dependence of the religious upon the permission of his superior in the disposal of material goods cannot, of itself, constitute the essence of evangelical poverty. To suppose that the state of being propertyless in this formal and juridical sense, and the dependence upon superiors arising from this, constitute of themselves alone the whole essence of poverty, would mean the destruction of poverty in the true sense. But abstracting from this, a not inconsiderable difficulty arises, and one which cannot be overlooked, from contemporary economic ideas precisely in their bearing upon this dependence. I would not for one moment maintain that it is impossible in formal and juridical terms to put such a construction and interpretation upon all the deeds and omissions of a religious that each of these deeds and omissions on his part with regard to material goods could count as authorised by the superiors of his order. In other words these deeds and omissions of his would not mean that he had any ultimate control over these goods as over private property. But the question is whether this is of itself enough to guarantee that the religious is actually living a life of 'poverty' thereby, and whether this poverty is fruitful in those religious consequences without which, whatever form it takes, it is meaningless. And at this point a special difficulty arises for the times in which we live.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We are all living in a world of material goods which is extraordinarily rich and extremely complex whether we wish to or not, whether we live on a modest or a grand scale. Now it necessarily follows from this that we are all the time positing and having to posit acts controlling the disposal of material goods. And these acts are extremely numerous, extremely [198] varied in character, and constantly being adapted to meet the new and different situations which arise in the material world. But by very reason of the immense number of, and the great differences between, these acts the idea that they are controlled by the permission and agreement of superiors can, for purely technical reasons very often still be upheld only in a formal and juridical sense with no effective basis in reality (so at least it appears to me). In other words in fact, even if not in a formal or juridical sense, the religious of today, whether he admits it or not, has a not inconsiderable range of material goods at his disposal, which for all practical purposes he controls in exactly the same way as if they were his own private property. It may perhaps be rejoined that this has always and inevitably been the case because already even in ancient times the disposal of the handkerchief in the pocket of a religious was provided for and managed in exactly the same way as if the handkerchief belonged to a private individual, and because even in those earlier times it had already become more a joke than a legal fiction which had any effect when a nun spoke of her false teeth as 'our' teeth instead of 'my' teeth. This may all be very true. But the important point is this: the effect of modern economic developments and of the abundance of goods with which everybody today surrounds themselves and concerns themselves as a matter of necessity has been to cause a notable increase in the whole sphere of what is for practical purposes, if not in juridical and formal terms, one's private property to dispose of as one pleases. Thus a problem does exist with regard to bow the economic dependence of the religious upon the assent of his superior can be put into practical effect in the concrete. It seems to me that if we conceal these difficulties beneath formal and juridical façades consisting of permissions which are mere fictions it becomes meaningless and does not promote, but rather derogates from poverty in the true sense. For if we do this then there is a very great danger that the acts by which we dispose of material goods are likewise hidden under the same legal fictions, whereas in reality these acts must absolutely be subjected to the yoke of a genuine dependence if religious poverty is to remain poverty in any real and effective sense at all. If we maintain legal fictions of this kind then we are forcing the modern religious to busy himself with a whole host of superfluities of a bureaucratic kind, for which there will be very little understanding on the part of those who have to work hard.

This is not the place to undertake the task of developing these [199] considerations further in the direction of practical proposals. Here we shall confine ourselves to asking whether the resources actually used, which for all practical purposes already have a permanent value of their own, should not in reality (if not in terms of formal canon law as well) proceed a stage further and come to be openly regarded as goods that are to be treated of as the individual's private property. The reason is that the opposite attitude is merely formal and legalistic bureaucracy, and so far from promoting frugality in one's way of life – a frugality based upon one's personal decision, and for which one makes oneself personally responsible – actually contributes to the opposite effect, and leads again and again to the temptation of believing that poverty is preserved in other acts of disposing of goods as well, because such acts are covered by a show of legality.

4. Attention must likewise be drawn to a further change which has to be made in the concrete mode of applying the ideal of poverty, a change which is forced upon us by the manner in which modern economy has been developed. The quantity of those goods which are productive (taking the term 'productive' here in its broadest sense) has also undergone an extraordinary increase in the life of the individual religious. Naturally there have always been such goods from the first, goods which are designed not simply to be consumed for the maintenance of life in the biological sense, and which are agreed not to be means of increasing one's enjoyment either, but are rather 'instruments of work', the tools necessary for the active pursuit of those aims which an individual religious or an order set themselves. Francis himself must already have realised that even his poor men had need of books, breviaries and churches. But today the quantity of such goods has grown quite immeasurably – almost, one might say to an extent which alters their whole nature. If we abstract from the actual basic essentials the typical instance of a material good in former ages was the consumer good. In order to understand this we have only to recall the controversy about whether it was legitimate to take interest, a controversy stretching over a thousand years. Today the typical instance of a material good is neither the basic essentials of life nor the consumer good, but the machine, the instrument of work, the good that is productive. As a result, therefore, and on the basis of this, the concept of the 'rich' in earlier times immediately evokes the idea of a man who is in possession of great resources for his own enjoyment, one who can live as a 'reveller' (and because he is in possession of the necessities of [200] life which another needs is also in this sense powerful). But the effect of this new concept of the typical material good is that the concept of the rich man has also changed. He is no longer so much the man who has great resources for his own enjoyment (firstly these are, in fact, extremely limited for all men simply from the biological point of view, and secondly in the economy of the modern mass-consumer society the 'poor man' has in this respect no longer so immeasurably less possibilities of enjoyment than the rich as was the case in earlier times), but rather the man who can dispose of a whole quantity of instruments of work, of productive goods and in this sense possessive power is of a quite different kind from the power of former times. At the same time, however, it must admittedly be borne in mind that there are many goods which can serve both as instruments of work and as means of enjoyment (taking both in the broadest sense). A radio receiver can serve both purposes. A further point to be borne in mind is that the fitness of the means for a specific end within a society depends on the circumstances of that society considered as a whole. In the time of Jesus an ass was a useful means of transport. Today it is so no longer.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

On the basis of these observations a fresh problem now arises with regard to the ideal of religious poverty and the mode in which it should be practised. When an order and a religious pursue specific spiritual, apostolic, etc., ends they have today to avail themselves of a far greater number of instruments of work and productive goods than in former times. A serviceable library such as can provide a starting-point for research costs at least ten times as much in the purchase of books as any comparable library in the Middle Ages. And if we should wish to travel in pursuit of such aims we have to go by express train or aeroplane. We use clocks, dictaphones, photocopying equipment, we have electric shavers (because otherwise we would lose too much precious time). It is taken for granted that we have a typewriter and a telephone. Many will actually declare (and they may actually be right in this) that a television set, and not merely a radio receiver, is part of the equipment which is necessary or useful for their work. In the missions a private plane may even be regarded as necessary. Because of the lack of labour forces and for other reasons an immense quantity of technical equipment is already available in every modern religious house. Lifts, oil-heating, hot and cold water laid on, electric stoves, etc. We may go on explaining that in spite of all this everything belongs not to the individual but to the order, and [201] so that poverty is preserved. This is not true. An order that is really rich cannot have any really poor members. But is an order not rich in the modern sense when its members can and do have at their disposal so significant a quantity of equipment of this kind?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course it might be said (and there may even be a certain consolation in this) that the amount of such goods in comparison with the amount of productive goods held by other people in the present age is very modest indeed, in other words that today, too, in relation to the rest of society an order is still poor (indeed that from this aspect – in accordance with what was said in subsection I – the orders have actually become poorer). It might be said that this increase in the number of instruments of work employed brings about effects that are absolutely ascetical, in that they compel the tempo of work (at least for those who are conscientious) to be greatly increased, and thereby force the order too to subject itself to the ascesis of modern work to a point where all the dangers entailed in a manager's position are present in it too, because today the individual religious is stretched to his limits by his work to a notably greater extent than in earlier and more comfortable ages. Perhaps this too, is something that God has arranged to compensate for the loss of poverty. But in this type of penance too, which consists in being worn out by sheer work, the factor precisely of poverty plays no part.

In any case the great majority of such instruments of work always represents, in the eyes of those outside the order, a possibility for greater enjoyment, and can, indeed, very quickly come to be used for such a purpose. And therefore this increase in the amount of productive goods in the life of orders in the present day, however unavoidable it may be, is liable, at least according to the general view of those outside the order, to make them appear not poor but rather rich. For practical purposes, therefore, this derogates from the function of representing the Church which belongs to the essence of religious poverty. A further factor is the influence of this state of affairs upon the mentality of the individual religious himself. He regards goods exactly as other men regard them at the present day, not so much, and in the first instance, as goods to be enjoyed; he does not want to have goods in order to lead a life of ease and to enjoy them (any more than the modern managing director does this, who, in spite of his great 'private resources' has such a burden put upon him, and such difficulties to cope with that a smaller man would be quite incapable of being a managing director because this would mean too much work and [202] responsibility for him). The modern religious (who genuinely is such) also belongs to the modern type of 'man of ambition' who wants to increase the output of his work at an ever-increasing rate, and therefore wants to have an every-increasing amount of goods at his disposal to serve as instruments for his work. On this basis, however, it is far from easy for him to find any connection with poverty within himself at all, at least such that what he means by poverty can be brought under the heading of 'poverty' as it is normally understood. He is subject to one of the severest forms of asceticism (the 'this-worldly' form), and this demands of him that he shall organise down to the last detail the use he makes of his time, his powers and his work. All this he understands. He does not want to 'take it easy'. On the basis of this will to work and to achieve he will absolutely expose himself to a very considerable degree of ascesis at the hands of those who use what he produces, a degree which is, perhaps, significantly greater (measured by the relative standard of the possibilities open to him at the particular time) than that practised by the orders in earlier ages, when the religious could, and in fact had to spend much time, in conversations, slow journeys, setting aside time to care for his daily needs, when life was maintained by the most primitive means by the use of wine, etc. He will say that if that is what poverty means then he has the greatest sympathy with poverty. But not if poverty means a petit-bourgeois mode of living and working in the style of the eighteenth century, and not if it makes it seem as an ideal that a religious house, even today, should as far as possible be made to appear in its interior dispositions to have the same style as houses of a hundred years ago, when such houses were certainly not built by le Corbusier, the architect of the new study-house of the Dominicans in France. The question, therefore, is this: According to the meaning of the ideals of the religious life, is one still poor if while maintaining a strict ascesis in terms of consumption or; enjoyment, one is unembarrassedly 'rich' in all that can fittingly be demanded for the other aims of the order and of the individual religious? Or must it be the case that the amount of instruments of work employed must be on a modest scale even if this imposes a certain restriction on the effectiveness of the work achieved, and must be so arranged that these instruments of work in themselves can also be brought under the concept of poverty? Should we hold this latter view in spite of the fact that it is far from being generally agreed that an order can, or should pursue a legitimate aim with all means which are not actually illegitimate in [203] themselves? Is this question a genuine question? Can any unambiguous theory be found to solve it? Is it not solved in that compromise which life entails in the concrete, and which can never wholly be resolved by any theory? At all events we must certainly be more precise and more honest in viewing from this aspect the practical problems and concrete cases which arise in the practice of religious poverty in the present day.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. Again even at the peril of repeating much of what has already been said in a different form we must put the question explicitly: Can poverty in the form which it inevitably assumes in the present day, and under the economic circumstances which prevail at present, still have that meaning and those religious effects which it had originally, and which constitute the basis upon which its existence is justified? Or, to formulate it in another way, does present-day poverty still possess that formative power for religion which it once had? We have already pointed out certain aspects which do not make it easy for us to answer this question in the affirmative. Poverty used to mean exposing oneself to a certain elemental insecurity in one's existence. Today it affects fewer areas of our lives in this way, and the depths of the insecurity involved have been diminished. Again this insecurity, undertaken for the sake of religion, raised men to the very heights of faith, making them cleave to the eternal goods of grace and entailing an existential self-commitment in hope and trust to God himself. Today in practice (if not juridically speaking as well), a significantly greater area of life is open for the individual to dispose of as he will and as he thinks necessary. And this is in contrast with earlier ages, and once more makes the religious of today a figure far more similar to the man of the world who possesses private property of his own, the more so since the freedom of the man of the world to dispose of his goods as he wills has become notably more restricted in comparison with earlier ages by reason of the greater social intermingling of private property with the economy as a whole as guided and controlled by the state. From this point of view too the formative power of poverty for religion must seem to be diminished. The religious cannot now think of himself as much as he did formerly as one of the anawim of the New Testament in the sense of the small, the humble, the socially weak, with all the religious effects which such an experience was able to have earlier. We have already seen that from the attitude to material goods which prevails today modern man finds if difficult to recognise any meaning in poverty considered as a means of obtaining certain preconceived and legitimate ends, if it is to be [204] anything more than an ascesis in respect of goods consumed. Because in any other kind of poverty he can only see a renunciation of a possibility of attaining to these ends, which are legitimate, and even, under certain circumstances, to be regarded as having a positively religious value, together with all the means necessary for those ends.

There are still further and different considerations which make it appear that the religious effectiveness, and therefore the evangelical meaning also of religious poverty, as able to be practised in the economic circumstances of today, have been lessened and have therefore become questionable. Today for all practical purposes poverty as practised in religious houses no longer really signifies any 'deprivation'. Today too it can indeed demand a not inconsiderable degree of renunciation of enjoyments and similar things, which in other circumstances we could immediately approve of and feel inclined to. But almost all these renunciations are concerned with things which can be renounced in such a way that not possessing them does not signify any real deprivation. When, for instance, I will not to make a journey round the world by aeroplane the fact that it is impossible for me to reconcile this with poverty does not signify any 'deprivation', any pain, anything which affects the way I like to live. But those deprivations which are worthy of the name, and which in earlier times were still quite often entailed by poverty, and which always and everywhere, independently of what attitude we freely adopt, are felt to be such, no longer exist for practical purposes in religious poverty as practised in the present day. Such are hunger, cold, sickness, which for want of means cannot be warded off, the feeling of being thrust down to the lowest social levels and despised, ill-treatment, and being reduced to begging in the true sense. It might be said that by force of present-day economic conditions our modern practice of religious poverty has become so emancipated from practical living that it is in danger of no longer existing in its original sense at all. What happens again and again in life in human society takes place here too in its own way: the earlier nomenclature and the earlier juridical form is still retained, but underneath them something which is, in reality, quite different comes into being. The question arises whether the present-day practice of poverty in religious orders now amounts to anything more than an ascesis with regard to the consumption and enjoyment of goods, as well as to that practice of holding goods in common which must inevitably be maintained wherever a number of individuals live together closely, intimately and on a permanent [205] basis after the manner of a family, if this common life of theirs is to function at all. If we had to concede that the real meaning of poverty, for all practical and effective purposes, did in fact consist in these two elements, then we would have to reconstruct, on the basis of these two elements, the theological and ascetical basis for poverty both in terms of theory and in terms of the concrete mode of poverty too, in a clear and decisive way, and in doing this we would have to renounce many of our ideological ideas upon the subject as out of date. It may indeed be the case that we actually need to embark boldly and unflinchingly upon such an undertaking as this would imply. For it might be said that the ultimate theological essence of evangelical poverty is still preserved even in an ascesis of consumption and enjoyment, though admittedly this is a statement which would need prolonged testing and examination. It might be said that from these two elements in present-day religious poverty (even if no others were present, whereas in reality they are present though less clearly and prominently than formerly) forces could be brought to bear which are religiously constructive and still retain an importance which is absolutely decisive. These would make even this kind of poverty still appear as the basis and rampart of religious life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

6. No ultimate and wholly satisfying answer to this question can be put forward here, but the way in which we answer it depends to some extent upon the answer to another question. This is a radical question which can be stated as follows: Is the mode of life which, for practical purposes, all the orders practise today, with only relatively minor variations, really forced upon them by the concrete structure of the economy, or could this mode of life still retain a form such that it constituted a manifest approximation to the old mode of practising poverty without thereby falling into an anachronistic romanticism? In fact there can be no doubt that in very many matters and in many respects we have simply and unmistakably been forced to adopt a different mode of practising poverty than that which formerly prevailed. And all attempts to break away from this compulsion, however ideal the motivations might be (or however reactionary they in fact are) that lie behind such attempts, would simply be acts of material disobedience against God and the dispositions he has ordained when he imposed the particular situation upon man by sheer force of the changes which have taken place in history. If a Capuchin does not enter the city barefoot today, then he is in no sense being untrue to his ideal of poverty. For his forebears did not go barefoot into the cities [206]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(and this means that even if he did do this today he would not be doing what his forebears did). Nor can he feel obliged by the ideal of his order merely to wander in poverty through the plains of Umbria in the footprints of the Poor Man of Assisi. Nevertheless the question can be raised of whether we members of religious orders, as a result of these changes which are so clearly necessary, have not taken much into our mode of life and mode of practising poverty which has no place there, and which renders our mode of poverty of today unjustifiably remote from the ancient mode. Have we not done this without reason and without drawing the necessary distinctions correctly? Have we perhaps allowed ourselves to be influenced by a reactionary traditionalism on the one hand, and an imprudent eagerness to fall in with the spirit and mode of life of our times on the other (this spirit is always a spectre too), and so neglected to reconstruct our mode of poverty in a manner that is really creative? And is not the result of this that our practice of poverty too often appears as a makeshift and indefensible compromise between the modern mode of living as practised by 'Mr Everyman' and the ancient and traditional monastic forms of life? The fact that something of this kind has in fact taken place in some degree among us religious will only be contested by those who suppose that the mentality of the average religious and the average religious house is totally immune to the general blindness, sinfulness and state of 'thrown-downness' in the world But the question remains how great the degree is of this false and uncreative compromise among us. And the further question is that of whether overcoming these deviations in the contemporary mode of poverty would not lead precisely to the development in clear and manifest terms of an ascesis with regard to goods to be consumed or enjoyed and the institutionalisation of this in terms of modern community life. These are questions which we cannot spend any further time in answering at this point. We cannot do this for the very reason that they would require a detailed analysis of the concrete forms assumed in the mode of poverty envisaged which were adopted in each individual order to answer its own particular requirements.

7. Finally our problem must be viewed from yet another angle, that namely of the social and ecclesiastical function of poverty in the Church, and of the Church herself for the world, which, as we have explained, pertains to the very essence of religious poverty. This too, by reason of the modern structure of the economy, has been brought into a unique state of crisis. Voluntary poverty as lived in a clear and exemplary manner in [207] the Church carried a message and witness for the man of earlier ages who was poor by force of circumstances that there are higher goods than those which we merely consume, that to strive for the possession of these latter must not constitute the true or ultimate aim of human existence, that even he who is poor in the economic sense can make precisely this situation which is imposed upon him, with all the dangers, insecurities, humiliations, etc., which it entails, into a concrete form for expressing his faith in the God of grace that comes from above and of eternal life. The message of voluntary poverty, therefore, is that if rich men become poor of their own free will, when they really do not need eternal life as a palliative for the pains and miseries of human existence, then eternal life is not simply the opium that is offered to the poor. It is a self-evident fact that the function of holding up an example in a world which, economically speaking, was poor in consumer goods and materials, had a greater and more universal range of application than it has in a world which, economically speaking, is rich in these goods and developed intensively in terms of material production. The task of giving a religious meaning to *in*voluntary poverty by providing an example of voluntary poverty is more relevant in a society of those who are poor in material goods than it is in one which is rich in them. If, apart from a very small upper class, the great majority of men is really poor and deprived, then voluntary poverty acquires the function of providing an example which is of universal application to the religion of all. Now if today society is inevitably pluralistic in character, and if for this reason those who are still really poor and deprived constitute only a small group in this society, then it becomes inevitable that poverty no longer has the same universal function to perform of bearing witness as in former ages. The Church has to hold up quite different examples in her preaching and life to cater for other groups in the society. The experience of radical contingency is one which is always present in human life. In earlier times this experience took the form precisely of a threat to life through poverty and the hunger arising from it. Today this same sense of radical contingency manifests itself in areas of human life which are 'existentially' other than those affected precisely by material deprivations, and it is these other areas which now have to be interpreted by the Church in a religious sense and in terms of her faith. A question which might be put forward as extremely urgent, therefore, is this: With regard to the radical contingency proper to man and the fact that he is thrown upon God, what is it that really [208] makes this present in the contemporary industrial society of the masses in this world that is rich in consumer goods, and in the planned economy of our time? Man as he exists today can no longer experience with the same directness and the same urgency as formerly that he has to ask God for a piece of bread. Of course man in himself is constantly in a state of that 'need' which teaches him to pray. But in the concrete this state of existential need has nevertheless a history of its own and undergoes changes. And for this reason, at the present at least, the old mode of poverty is no longer capable of providing an all-comprehending example of the religious meaning to be found in existence for all with such unambiguous clarity as formerly. For this reason religious poverty, considered as the palpable expression of this significance to be found in human existence, has inevitably ceased to have the function which it had in earlier times of providing the universal example of religion for society as a whole. For the same reason too it is no longer capable of providing this in the same degree as formerly because those poor who are still with us either today are presumably for the most part far poorer than the members of orders, and in other words for them the orders as a whole are quite incapable of providing an example of the meaning to be found in poverty precisely as it applies to them (perhaps here we should abstract from the instances of the Little Brothers of Jesus of P. Charles de Foucauld and new confraternities of a similar kind). Does this imply that religious poverty as practised today has – albeit inevitably – simply lost its function of providing an example of religion in the Church, and so too of bearing witness to the faith before the world? This cannot be, seeing that in other respects poverty is an essential characteristic of religious life, and this in turn sustains an essential function in the permanent life of the Church. But even if we concede the fact that this function of religious poverty as providing an example still persists even today, in what precisely can this consist? Here again, in answering this question we find ourselves compelled to invoke the key concept of an ascesis in respect of the consumption and enjoyment of goods. It might be said that the high level of consumption enjoyed by the masses today constitutes a threat to the Church, because she has not yet succeeded to a sufficient extent in constructing examples showing how this consumption can be made to conform to the principles of human ethics and morality. (The most we can say on this point to console ourselves is that the trend to an ever-increasing rate of consumption also at the same time, and in the long run [209] constitutes a far more decisive threat still to communism.) Here religious poverty might discover a new function which is (in its essence) at the same time an old one: that namely of living out an ascesis in respect of consumer goods which is both comprehensible and convincing;[1] not, in the first instance, in the sense that the members of religious orders represent in some degree the finger of the Church raised in admonition as though she were saying 'You must not proceed with a constantly rising standard of living, there is something still higher than this'. Religious poverty has this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1] On the problems of consumption and on 'consumer ascesis' cf. the observations of K. Lehmann in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 130 ff.; 175 ff. (cf. also above pp. 27 ff.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

function, rather, in that the orders, through what we call poverty, provide an example to modern man of that consumer ascesis which shows itself to be the only possible genuine and effective 'hygiene of need' which exists, and which cannot be replaced either by merely 'this-worldly' social techniques (the manipulation of needs on the part of the community and the powers it has at its disposal to enforce its ideas) nor by merely functional but meaningless techniques of psychology. Consumer ascesis exists simply in virtue of the fact that man straightforwardly and manifestly renounces a thousand possibilities of consuming goods (even if this is the outcome of a policy that has been planned and institutionalised precisely in religious poverty) because he has a genuine and living relationship with God, Spirit, person and love, and does not have to conceal and suppress those experiences of his own radical contingency which are always with him, by the narcotics of enjoyment and dissipation in forms which become ever more intense and more refined.

Of course this mode of poverty would have to be developed in such a way that it became noticeable and convincing at the same time. If we are to let our works shine before men (although we keep our hearts hidden in the intimacy of our relationship with God), then there is nothing to prevent us also from devising ways to ensure that our consumer ascesis really makes a strong and living impact and is in the best sense of the term radical (though this does not mean renewing and reviving the mode of life followed in earlier ages). We must also ensure that this consumer ascesis of ours is lived out as such as an example to men, and shown to be a source of invigoration and happiness for the tasks which men have to perform in their lives in this world. The members of religious orders would have to be characterised by a sort of non-conformity with regard [210] to those forms of consumption which are typical for modern times, with their techniques of artificially stimulating needs, controlling and manipulating the processes of consumption and making it desirable to indulge in consumption in order to demonstrate one's position. They do this by deliberately laying emphasis on the factor of social position instead of making consumption serve to satisfy any genuine need. (Even a provincial might believe that he owed it to his position to have a Mercedes 300.) But in all these observations one point on which we must be clear is that the members of religious orders are still far from having worked out any concrete example of how such consumer ascesis ought to be practised as a form (though not the only one) of the religious poverty to which we are committed. The mere fact of developing a few abstract ideas of the kind which have just been presented here is not enough. We are still far from having achieved a concrete and formative example for this modern way of living which we call consumer ascesis. Abstract ideas, general principles can be very true and very important. But they are no substitute for concrete example, which is the outcome of a creativity that is applied in practice. To suppose that abstract principles could be a substitute for concrete example in this way would be just as absurd as to imagine that the principles of pedagogy could be a substitute for the personality of a genuine teacher, or to suppose that this personality itself is simply the sum total of these abstract principles. And even when we have worked out in this creative way a concrete example of a modern man whose life is governed by consumer ascesis, who is able freely to abstain from much which he might do physically and technically, still even then we have not advanced so very much further. We still remain, so it appears, at the stage of an uncreative compromise between the old mode of poverty and the new modern mode of living, for even the orders are invaded by the unbridled lust for consumption, while those in charge of the orders are seeking in a negative and timid way to check and restrain development of this kind.

8. The considerations which are still to follow are proposed for discussion in all modesty and simply with a view to stirring up the spirit which will lead us to seek for a new and concrete mode of applying the ideal of poverty in this way. We live in the age of the masses, and therefore in the age of organisations and of great mass groupings as well. Even the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church and the orders will appear, and will actually come to be such in the eyes of modern man because even they have become, in point of [211] actual numbers, extremely large and so subject to the sociological laws applying to all such major groupings in society. In its bearing upon what we have to say here this has a two-fold significance. Humanly and morally speaking the impression which the Church and the orders as a whole make upon modern man is one that is extremely profane, one that has been 'demythologised'. His estimate of them is almost the same as his estimate of the national health, the unions, the state institutions. They are inevitable, they are heartless, they are hard, egoistical, groupings of men combined for a common interest. The morality of them is extremely problematical. They have very little influence upon him so far as his personal way of living is concerned. Precisely because they take such great pains to penetrate right to the innermost recesses of his private life with their attempts at regulation and standardisation, they have to be regarded with caution and mistrust.

And in fact the greater such mass organisations become the more difficult it becomes for them to succeed in bringing something new and creative into being in, with and in the midst of the inexpressible complexity of the institutional factors, the responsibilities which cannot be pinned down, the effects of bureaucracy (which are inevitable for governing and controlling any major grouping in society). I suppose that all religious confraternities which have any antiquity are proud of the fact that they have not had any need of any movements of reform and fresh formations of a reformist character such as were customary and traditional in the middle ages and at the beginning of the new age, amongst other things precisely with regard to the way in which the ideal of poverty was applied. The question can be raised whether this pride is really justified, or whether the fact to which we point with such satisfaction is not rather an indication of the fact that in this age of mass organisation emphasis has been laid upon the element of the uncreatively traditional in all our major groupings in society to such an extent that it must seem that every attempt at altering the mode of living in religious orders in general and the mode of poverty in particular to any extent can only achieve its object by the founding of fresh communities. It has to be admitted that both observations have some truth in them, and the result of this for our enquiry into poverty in this present age as practised in the religious orders may be stated as follows: In working out a mode of poverty that will be convincing to outsiders as well, the individual and the small units are the more important and have more chances of succeeding than the major religious [212] communities as such. This is not to say that these individuals and minor units could only exist and develop their own mode of poverty outside the groupings of the major orders. But it certainly is our opinion that the mode of poverty practised in these major communities of religious is liable to give an impression of ossification, or else is weakened by compromises with the new age which are regrettable. The result of this is that it becomes inevitable that the continual creative force present in any genuine idea of evangelical poverty creates fresh forms outside the communities of the traditional orders, since these orders fail to give the individual and the smaller unit scope and opportunity to exercise their creativity in working out a new mode of poverty without straightaway attempting to bring everything in these developments under their own authority by applying the rule of their order to them. The question therefore, is this: could not the orders, without prejudice to the discipline of the common life, give more scope for such creative attempts at developing a mode of poverty suitable to modern times? If the appeal of religious poverty is effectively to retain its force is it not absolutely necessary for different modes of poverty to be developed within one and the same religious congregation or order? When we reflect that Ignatius of Loyola actually provided for variation of this kind as a matter of firm and permanent institution in his order (even if in practice not many survivals of this remain today) then we cannot reject a question of this kind from the outset as meaningless. For instance ought not poverty as practised in a modern parish house belonging to an order, with its small family-size unit of religious, to have another form from, and should not its appeal radiate out to different sectors of the population from the poverty of a major study house of religious, which is, and necessarily must be, a little like a barracks of God's love, and therefore should also be different in its mode of poverty, and appeal to a different type of people? Ought we not to have a clearer idea of how the popular missioner, the student chaplain, the missionary to pagan peoples should live out and exemplify religious poverty, each in his own way? When, for instance, we remember the fact that the way of life in the religious orders today is followed more or less in the same manner in Europe as it is in Asia, and that even today it does not for one moment make a convincing impression of asceticism on the Indian, even when, by European standards, it is thoroughly 'poor', then perhaps it becomes clear that these questions cannot simply be rejected with the demand that each order shall require all of its members to follow [213] a single uniform way of life. But it also becomes clear that such questions cannot be solved straightway and right from the very outset by the order making laws to cover them. Rather the individual members and the small units should be encouraged to make attempts of this kind even within a religious community that is already in existence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

9. In concluding at this point, the impression must not be given that we are doing so in the conviction that we have now dealt with all essential questions regarding religious poverty. On the contrary some of these questions have not so much as been mentioned. To provide a comprehensive treatment of this kind we would have, for instance, to reflect in greater detail upon the fact (to name at least one point beyond what has been mentioned here) that the division of labour in the modern economy also has its effects upon religious poverty. Life in the religious orders, too, inevitably falls under the influence of this economic system, which is based upon a highly sophisticated division of labour, and one which in fact even extends to the sphere of spiritual labours properly so called. As late as the eighteenth century any intelligent member of an apostolic order was in a position to understand more or less every enterprise included in the activities and works performed by his order (so that, for instance, a superior was ipso facto able to act as a 'specialist' in each department, and as such able to judge the various kinds of work in which his subjects were engaged). Today this is no longer the case. In none of the active orders is there any one individual who really understands all the 'special avocations' which are included in the work of his order: preacher, professor, financial expert, youth chaplain, etc. – each of these has become a separate calling in its own right, so that each individual can have a real grasp only of one of these callings. The consequences of this not only affect the practical application of leadership and obedience in a religious community, but also have a bearing on poverty. The differences in these particular callings, and arising concomitantly with them, affect not only the education, way of life and mode of fitting in with society in the world as a whole, but also the nature, quantity and value of the instruments of work which are the necessary prior conditions for each of the individual callings to be pursued in an order. These differences in the instruments of work (we might take them in the broadest sense so as to include also the special journeys which scholars have to make for their researches, the need for the specialist to associate himself with specific groups in the secular community, expensive instruments and especially libraries) again have further [214] effects bearing upon the way of life and mode of poverty practised by individuals. From this point of view too it is impossible in practice altogether to prevent different ways of living and working from developing, even within one and the same order. These still persist even if we look realistically, and to some extent with the sharpened perceptions of the sociologist, at life in religious communities. But not much thought has been given to these variations. If we still persist in trying to formulate legalistic rules in our attempt to overcome them then we have not yet really and whole-heartedly come to grips with the reality itself and the difficulties which it entails. From this point of view also there would still be much to consider on this question of religious poverty, and there are other questions still, especially those more concerned with the sphere of moral theology, which have not been treated of: questions concerning the nature of the vow in general and of the vow of poverty in particular. On the other hand these questions, which pertain in the narrower sense to moral theology, are so well known that for our present purposes we can take the answer to them as read.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[215]

PART THREE

The Veneration of the Sacred Heart

[217]

11

THE THEOLOGICAL MEANING OF THE VENERATION OF THE SACRED HEART

When a dogmatic theologian is called upon to speak of the veneration of the Sacred Heart from the point of view of his particular discipline he can, in a certain sense, make it easier for himself to do so simply by referring to Pius XII's great encyclical, Haurietis Aquas, of 15th May 1956. This contains a particularly comprehensive treatment of the subject, one that goes beyond those of Leo XIII and Pius XI, and which includes everything connected with this particular devotion. But precisely for this reason the converse is also true: the very fact that there can hardly be anything left to add to this treatise, which comes from the hand of the supreme teacher of the Church, and the further fact that the actual text requires to be studied again and again in order to grasp the full depths of the doctrine it contains – these two facts together justify us in presenting a few ideas at this point which are intended neither as a summary of the treatise itself, nor yet as a supplement to it, but rather, unencumbered by any such ambitious aims, simply offer a few observations of an extremely subjective and peripheral kind bearing upon this subject.

Man is not God, but rather stands in a relationship to God in his uniqueness. Two points follow immediately from this: first, neither in his being nor in his thinking and loving can he be all in one or have all in one (otherwise he would be God); second, while the mode of his being and the mode in which he achieves the due fulness of his existence is necessarily complex he cannot withhold himself from constantly striving anew to achieve anunity in the midst of this complexity, and from actually attaining to the unity for which he strives (for otherwise he would not be the spiritual being who stands in a special relationship to God in his uniqueness). Because of this his movement outwards from himself into reality is always and necessarily a movement from unity into multiplicity, and this [218] applies to his religion too. His 'credo' comprises a series of articles. The expression of his worship in the liturgy assumes manifold forms. An extreme diversity is to be observed alike in the nature of his religious acts and in the objects to which they are directed. He must love God and man, direct his spirit outwards into a whole range of activities, and at the same time retain his interior life, returning to the innermost centre of his being, transformed as it is by grace, where God and he are alone together. Thus his spirit is necessarily subject to a plurality of acts by the very fact that it has to proceed outwards into the multiplicity of beings, and in this plurality has to seek for the unity of all things. It is this law of his being that sets him in the dimension of time and history (and it is this historical dimension in turn which allows scope for this interplay of many factors to be maintained in his life). What it implies for him is a 'richly variegated' adventure in the life of his mind and spirit, and at the same time, too, that ever-nagging pain which arises from never really quite reaching the point at which he has all in one and one in all. This truth, so simple as it is, yet exercising so overriding an influence upon man in all his dimensions, must be borne in mind if we are to grasp the meaning of the veneration of the Sacred Heart in its central significance and its ultimate implications.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Jesus Christ is the mediator. He is that unity in which God, who in his simplicity is all in one, has assumed the multiplicity of reality and its 'thirst for unity'. He did this when he assumed creaturehood (which is never one in all) and assumed it, moreover, in the mode of a spiritual being (which craves for unity). In assuming it he made it his own reality, which remains eternally his own (even in its multiplicity), and yet it is precisely in virtue of this fact that this reality of creaturehood which he has assumed, while still retaining its multiplicity, is redeemed, set free for and drawn abidingly into the indivisible unity of God (this unity, in spite of having taken this creaturely multiplicity into itself still remaining pure and unalloyed). The fact that the creature is not excluded right from the outset from unity as that which is meaningless is due to the prior fact that he is, he the incarnate Word of the Father, in whom the Father utters himself totally and indivisibly. Again it is because he is in this sense that this multiplicity does not signify something from which man can only flee. God himself has in fact been drawn into the diaspora which the creaturely mode of being represents. Because of this man does not need to lose him when he decides not to depart from this creaturely level, provided only that he takes this situation in which being is diffused and manifold for [219] what it really is, namely as a situation in which this being has, in a true sense, been made one in (though not made one with) the incarnate Word of God. Thus the only way in which man can have all in one (he can only have this in the manner that befits the creature) is for him to have him who is both at once: all (the many) and one (the divine). The veneration of the Sacred Heart is intended to be the ultimate act of adoration, in which we adjure the unique and all-comprehending upholder of that reality and that unity that underlies the multiplicity in our religious life. It follows from this that he who has found Jesus Christ is ipso facto a venerator of the Sacred Heart in this sense. This is true even though he may not realise it, even though he may not call the Word 'heart'. Only he who understands this can, in all sincerity and truth, overcome the dilemma that either the ancients were not good Christians (on the grounds that they did not – explicitly – venerate the Sacred Heart) or the veneration of the Sacred Heart cannot be anything essential to Christianity (since in fact it has not existed right from the beginning of Christianity).

Now, however, this relationship with Jesus Christ has itself once more been subjected to the transforming effects of history. As it develops a whole range of different aspects come to be expressed. It has a history of its own, which advances irresistibly and cannot be reversed (however true it may be at the same time that it is a law of this process of historical development as such that it constantly returns afresh to the origins and sources whence it takes its rise). And for this reason the relationship with Jesus Christ as the unifying medium is itself made subject to the law of inevitable multiplicity. We call him by many names and praise him with many tongues. As the centuries unfold he grows in the spirit and heart of each of us (as in the spirit and heart of the Church herself). He must so grow. And if he grows, in this sense, then so far as the Church herself, her devotions and her theology, are concerned, it is quite inevitable that he should become, once more, in his own person, a vast cosmos of reality and truth, immeasurable and mysterious. And then what is left for the man who simply and humbly accepts his own limitations as a creature, the limitations entailed by the fact that he is in essence complex, and exists in the dimension of history? No other course whatever is still left open to him than to seek once more, on behalf of his own spirit and heart, on behalf of his whole Christian being, for a word to conjure up that unity, a kind of sacred epitomising formula such as will make it possible for him (at least in the here and now) to grasp as a unity that which has been [220] presented to him piecemeal in the history of the Church, her devotion and her theology as the immeasurable fulness of the reality of Christ.

Such key-words do exist, with their power to adjure to epitomise and to unify. In them, in some sense (precisely insofar as this is possible for the creature, which as such can never be capable of initiating any act that is not basically complex and multiple) it has been found possible to gather up the all in the one and 'interiorise' it. Such key-words, present in the devotional life of the Church and in theology, can be modified. Any one of them, from being a single unifying key-word, which conjures up everything at one blow, can be broken down into a word signifying some particular aspect of the original whole. And it can never be said of any one word (at least without thereby falling into the pride of supposing that we can transcend our historical limitations) that it remains for all eternity a key-word with this special kind of epitomising power (probably Logos was once a word of this kind for John himself in which, in a certain sense, his whole theology was 'epitomised'. Today, however, it has become precisely one key-word in theology among many others; other such words, which may once have had this force, are 'sophia', 'gnosis', 'Son of Man', 'Spirit' as applied to Christ). But woe betide that age which no longer possesses any word imbued with a quasi-magical force of this kind to epitomise all in one! Woe betide that age which no longer has any word which can convey to it the unity which has been achieved in the all through the effects of atonement upon it! In its thoughts and aspirations that age is deformed, confused and divided. Its message (however true it may remain) becomes a discordant babel, because its voices are directed outwards in all directions at once, and are devoid of any unity to bring them into harmony. Now it might be suggested that the words 'God' and 'Jesus Christ' do in fact constitute words precisely of this kind. And indeed, if we view them in the absolute, abstracting from the concrete historical circumstances in which they have been used and developed, and concentrating exclusively upon their essential content, it would be correct to say that precisely in themselves they could be words of this kind. But this would be precisely to overlook the concrete historical situation in which both we and these words (which we here take as representative examples) are placed. Viewed in the light of this they could never be the sort of words that epitomise the content of our faith, our devotion and our theology in all their multiplicity precisely because they themselves belong to the materials which have to be summed up in this way. For the [221] first needs to be filled out with content and the second is so full of meanings and implications which are disunited and unco-ordinated among themselves that it needs to be unified.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now let us ask ourselves whether there is anywhere in the contemporary Church at all where we can find such a key word as we have been describing, one that is capable of epitomising the fulness of our religion in this way (from what has been said it will be realised that we cannot simply 'discover' it on the grounds that there may be many such words which, in themselves, are capable of this. For this in turn precisely does not imply that we can choose any one we wish, seeing that the lot assigned to us humans in particular is characterised precisely by the factors of the historical, the contingent and the inescapable). The word we seek, then, is one which is truly evocative, and rouses a response in us. At the same time we must be able at least to guess of this word (even before we have used it enough to realise its full richness and depths) that its epitomising force is such as can penetrate to the very centre of our own being. And it is difficult to imagine that we shall be able to find any other word which has this evocative and epitomising force within it except the word 'heart'. Or can anyone suggest another such? Is there anyone who can say, 'only bend your ears in this direction. Here another word has been resounding all along, with its scope and unifying power. Is it not simply that you have hitherto failed to hear it?' The word we are seeking must, of course, be one which names Christ himself as the unifier. For it is in him alone that God is near (and the word of God really achieves a Christian tone and one that comes to our help in our state of elemental need). But it cannot be one that simply expresses this same Christ by means of a proper name. For if the word we seek had no further force beyond this, then, for the majority of the members of the Church in this age in which we live (for our present purposes we need not concern ourselves with other ages, nor do we need to maintain that what applies to the majority applies in an apodictic and absolute sense to all) this word itself would need some kind of unifying medium to gather up the whole complex range of distinct meanings which have come to be adduced from this word independently of one another in the course of the history of Christianity. Where then is another word, apart from this word, the 'Sacred Heart', which is capable of designating the Lord as him who brings the one and the all into unity, and which itself in turn unifies and brings into man's interior soul, the fulness of him whom it designates in this sense? There is no other such [222] word. No other word has ever been uttered with this force, except the word 'Sacred Heart'. But this word has been uttered in the prayers of the faithful, sometimes whispered and sometimes cried out on the roof-tops (sometimes, alas, in a way that is certainly indiscreet to the point of being in terrible bad taste! But the love which is offered up in this is not such as can easily be measured by the standards of good taste and discretion), and the Church has taken this word up. She has stated that she herself knows no other word with this particular force. We might argue that this word is only one among many possible alternatives, and that tomorrow another word (educed from the fulness that is in Christ) will come to the fore, one that speaks to our hearts with a message of 'all-in-one', and at the same time, having summed up the fulness that is in Christ in this way, causes it to open up, once more, into its richness and multiplicity. Again, it might be argued that in the promulgations issued by the Church in this present day concerning the veneration of the Sacred Heart no account is taken of the fact indicated here that history has produced a whole list of such words. But all such arguments would do nothing to alter our actual situation. Certainly, as a matter of abstract generalisation, this may be one word among many. But in the concrete here and now only the word that stands for the heart of the Lord can be that word for which we seek, and which we can also fail to recognise and to hear, or even reject, even though it is there.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This word has the function of adjuring the heart, that which is innermost and unifying, the mystery which defies all analysis, the unspoken law which is more powerful than all man's ability to organise and coordinate, and all the techniques of organisation of which he can avail himself. It has the function of designating that point at which the mystery of man passes into the mystery of God. The infinite emptiness which lies at the innermost centre of man cries out to be filled with the infinite fulness of God. The heart that is adjured in this word is the heart that has been pierced, weighed down by elemental anxiety (Angst), drained to its last drop, overcome by death. What is designated in this word is that which signifies a love which is selfless and beyond all conception, the love which is victorious in failure, which triumphs when it has been deprived of its power, raises to life when it has been slain. It is the love that is God. The message proclaimed in this word is that where God is prayed to in the words 'My God why hast thou forsaken me?' there he is close at hand. The one spoken of here is one who exists fully on the physical plane, and [223] yet is all in all, so that we can count his wounds and come to rest weeping tears of blessedness because we have no need to journey further once we have found God. Can it be denied that in this word we discover ourselves anew, our destiny in this present age, and what it means to be a Christian, all this being laid upon us as a burden and a grace at the same time, and committed to us as our mission and task? The special quality of a particular age is, in fact, for the most part not that which is most widely acknowledged (in other words yesterday's opinions which have become common and public), but that which is denied and yet, in spite of this, is laid upon us. But in this present age how could this be anything else than the necessity and the task of having to rediscover that heart anew, and at the same time to bear with our heart with all its loneliness, its darkness and dejection and its elemental anxiety (Angst) about God?

What else could we say by way of summing up the whole meaning of our Christian existence except this: that the eternal Word of God, issuing from the heart of the Father, has discovered our hearts, has endured them and keeps them for all eternity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If what we have said is correct with regard to the epitomising and unifying force of this key word, which can be said to express the 'sum total' of our devotion (in the words of Pius XI and Pius XII), then two conclusions follow from this: first we must be reverent and therefore sparing in our use of this word, and second we must begin by learning the real significance of a key word of this kind, with its power to epitomise and to adjure.

We must be sparing in our use of it. Before we use it that which it is intended to epitomise and to unify must first be present. This word, therefore, is not to be numbered among the 'rudiments of Christian teaching' (Heb 6:1). For what is undertaken in these initial stages is a survey in all their breadth and fulness of those truths which are subsequently to be drawn together in anunity. And it is necessary to return again and again to this stage of the initial survey because without noticing it we lose sight again and again of those truths which we have already made our own. Again the word 'heart' would be reduced to an empty formula, utterly drained of the meaning and content it once had if we did not constantly renew our search of the scriptures, using our quiet hours to meditate upon, and preaching by word of mouth the truths which the Christian message contains. But in this we cannot always be speaking explicitly about the heart. This word which refers to the heart of Christ retains its [224] force and its unique function only on condition that we have not already used it to excess in a spirit of exaggerated and unbalanced 'pietism' by employing it in all cases in which we have occasion to speak of Jesus Christ. This word should be uttered and invoked by us only in those cases in which we need to refer to the 'heart' of man precisely in the sense of that interior and hidden 'self' (cf. Rom 7:22; 1 Pet 3:4; Eph 3:16 ff.) that is in him (in virtue of his unfathomable fulness) and in us (in virtue of our emptiness and dissipation of spirit). This cannot be the case on every occasion, however important it may sometimes be (and as it actually was for the Lord himself, who spoke sparingly but at decisive points of our hearts and of his own: Mt 5:8; 11:29; 22:37, etc.).

We must understand the real significance of a word of this kind. For it is not a word merely in the sense of that which gives utterance to a 'concept'. In fact there is a point in every concept at which it becomes open to the infinite, transcends its own limitations, and achieves communication with the All. In fact every word (that is not simply a signal in the merely animal sense) contains undertones and resonances beyond the surface meaning which it is designed explicitly to communicate because it is always, as it were, floating upon a deeper level of meaning which cannot be communicated. But with the majority of words this openness to the incommunicable is not borne in upon us. For the most part they are intended to bring to our notice what can be firmly and clearly grasped in the form of a concept. In the case of the key words,[1] however, the special significance of these is precisely the fact that they are open, and that what they open up to is the inexpressible mystery of God (in our case that God who is the Absolute of inconceivability brought near to us in love). Certainly if these particular words cease to perform this function they can serve simply to express a concept. But precisely as key words in the sense intended here they have died (a more terrible death than the merely physical one). Now they do so die in our spirit when they are heard and uttered simply as concepts. For by taking them in this sense we are utterly failing to understand them in the sense which they are intended to bear for us. It is true that we say of the majority of words which occur in our religious parlance that they refer to a mystery. In uttering these words, however, we may altogether fail to conjure up this mystery, to [225] make it present to ourselves. We may restrict ourselves simply to the surface meaning of the word, discarding and neglecting those deeper levels of meaning which go beyond this, and

[1] On this concept and on the ideas which follow cf. K Rahner, Theological Investigations III, '"Behold This Heart" Preliminaries to a Theology of Devotion to the Sacred Heart', pp. 321-330; also 'Reflections on the Experience of Grace', pp. 86-90.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

precisely the mystery itself which lies concealed beneath it, and we may consign all this to the realm of that which we have simply failed to understand and to grasp. We may take this attitude to the word instead of allowing it to grasp us precisely as mystery, because we fail to grasp this level of significance in it. When we refuse to move outwards from the small circle of light represented by the literal meaning of the word into the wider sphere of sacred darkness that lies beyond then we kill the key word, depriving it of its force and reducing it to a mere word which can be used by the profane, the uninitiated and the loveless too (of whom even the ranks of the theologians can furnish abundant examples).

But how can we avoid depriving these key words of their force and killing them? How can we understand them as they must be understood if they are to retain their pristine force? From what has already been said it will be manifest that this cannot be achieved merely by conceptually enriching these words by 'filling' them with conceptual meaning or even with a conceptualised ('as distinct from a real and experiential') 'inconceivability' and 'infinitude'. In order to 'grasp' what has to be done here (this implies that we have not yet actually carried through what we have initially grasped as right, whereas in this context to 'grasp' something consists precisely in the recognition that here acting is the only right way of knowing) we have to bear this in mind: when we contemplate what has been uttered there descends upon us softly and, as it were, unnoticed, that mystery in which the life-force of that unique truth which is the immediate subject of our contemplation consists. But the actual mode in which this mystery is made present to us is not the direct mode in which a proposition is made present that is uttered and so made a subject of discussion. This mystery is made present not in conceptual terms but rather in being touched and stirred into life. What we are treating of here is not a 'feeling' or a movement of the affections in devotion which cannot be controlled, but rather that without which every concept would have to remain cut off in a state of isolation and incommunicability, in which it could no longer be understood. We are treating of that which belongs to the very essence of intellectual knowledge as such, and upholds it in being, of a reference to the inconceivable and inexpressible, which is itself beyond the power of the human intellect to grasp or to objectify, a reference such that the [226] inconceivable and inexpressible itself is silently present in it. Certainly we can also speak of this reference which points us on to and opens us to the mystery itself (in fact we do precisely this!), but, taken as a distinct phenomenon in itself, this reference is not as such present 'conceptually' by being caught in an unusual kind of concept, for per definitionem it is originally and primarily such that it is precisely not present in this sense at all. It is present rather in the oblique and implicit mode in which the inconceivable is touched upon in the very act of conceiving of something in the true and ordinary sense. In itself this reference to the inconceivable could be present with sufficient force in all words (for all in fact draw their life-force from it), so that these too could be used with as powerful an effect as those key words which we have been discussing. And perhaps the language of Paradise was of this kind, such that the all-encompassing All reverberated in every word, touching men with its clarity and love. And all our words (in which, for the most part, this reference is suppressed and buried beneath the surface by our frantic and convulsive efforts to cling onto the 'idea clara et distincta') ought, ideally speaking, to experience and to undergo a return, concomitant with our own 'conversion', to that state in which they were brought together in a Paradisal symphony in which each one found its echo in the whole (in the unique Word of God). But even as it is, there are certain words which should approach more closely than the rest to this return to the pristine power of their origins as we ourselves make our personal return. And the word 'heart' is to be numbered among these. Only if [we] understand it in this sense have we understood it as it should be understood in very truth, if it is really to be something more than simply one among the many words which we use in our religious parlance, the words in which mere concepts of the realities referred to are expressed, but these realities themselves are not rendered present in the achievement, by the help of grace, of a transcendence that is real and effective.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have already said that the term 'Sacred Heart' stands for that reality in which the unnameable mystery which we call God is made present to us as compassionate and self-bestowing proximity (instead of as one who withholds himself from us in silence and refuses us). This mystery is made present to us where we are in that which is the fons et origo of our earthly being, in the heart. And now we have sought to make a further point over and above this, that we must not merely speak of this heart but understand it too, in such a way that it really can be, for the individual, what it is in [227] itself, that when we utter this word that which it expresses may take place in us; in a word, that when we utter it we may do so with 'understanding' that we may be 'at one' with it. If this word is really and effectively to remain a key word (and only so can it fulfil that epitomising and unifying function of which we have spoken at the outset of these remarks, without which there would be no need either of it or of any special cult of the Sacred Heart) then it must be understood in the manner indicated, i.e. not only as giving expression to a concept, but as containing in its innermost depths that abundance of grace and power which derives from the fact that it has an essential and immediate reference to that mystery in itself to which the word gives a name.

Anyone who finds it difficult to achieve an understanding of what we mean from what has just been said should attempt to approach the matter from a different point of view, and so to arrive at an understanding of it. In any religious concept the reference to God is in reality twofold: first, there is the conceptualisation and objectification of the reality referred to, and second, as that which makes this process possible at all, there is the achievement of transcendence precisely as such, in which we are carried beyond our earthly limitations to God, and so placed in contact with him in this sense as well. In any act of apprehending which takes place in the 'light of faith' and by the power of grace this twofold reference to God achieves a special potency. That which is objectified in conceptual terms is present as something that is given by external revelation in the fides ex auditu of the subject, but at the same time this same reality is also present in the state of being raised to supernatural heights of transcendence, a quality which does not merely make this transcendence a transcendence of being in general, but also imparts a basic orientation to the spiritual dynamism which is in man, which ultimately raises it to the visio beata, at the same time (as gratia increata) actually imparting the reality of what is believed to man. The transcendence which man achieves, spiritually and 'pneumatically' exalted in this way, does not constitute an object for investigation in itself, but neither does this mean that man is simply unconscious of it. It is not simply the mere mechanism of a spiritual or non-spiritual process. Man has a non-objectified awareness of it as that which is concomitant with his objectifying concept, as that which renders present, intimately and silently, that inexpressible 'something more' which accompanies any religious concept, and without which it cannot truly be such at all. Who can seriously dispute the fact that in a genuinely religious [228] act this 'something more' really is present (as something of which man is concomitantly aware even if it cannot in any immediate sense be the object of his speculation)? No-one can dispute this who has achieved a sound grasp of what is meant in the Thomist metaphysic of knowledge by the lumen intellectuale and the objectum formale of the mind; no-one who in theology has achieved any understanding of that formal object which is present in every act that is raised to a supernatural level, and only in such an act, in virtue of the very fact that it has thus been raised to a supernatural plane of reality. No-one can deny it who takes seriously the teaching of scripture concerning the anointing by the Holy Spirit which teaches us all things, or concerning the 'sighs too deep for words' of the Spirit, which has been given to us as the Spirit of God which penetrates all things. But this 'something more', this silent openness to and reference to that which is meant, which is achieved in the very process of positing the act itself (and not simply in the object to which it is directed) can grow, can impress itself upon us more clearly and forcefully, and be received at a deeper and more 'existential' level. When we speak of a spiritual consolation which takes place at the highest point of the spirit in faith, hope and love, what we mean by this is this awareness of what is being referred to here, which is at once more exalted and deeper and, existentially speaking, 'more radical' than knowledge in the more direct sense. It is in this awareness that we should now utter the word 'Sacred Heart'. In the light of this awareness it must then become clearer to us that in a true sense all statements about religion (when they are really true and genuine) have to be made on the basis of this achieved awareness. Only in this way can we ensure that the word that stands for the Sacred Heart is not reduced to one among the many other words which we use in our everyday religious parlance. We can use this word only sparingly. We should use it only when we wish consciously to advert to, as a distinct entity in itself, and interiorly to unify with the rest of our religious knowledge, that 'something more' which is present in what we say when we speak of God's grace and compassion in Christ. And when we do use the 'word' 'Sacred Heart' in this sense, speaking of it hesitantly and softly, then we must speak it in such a way that the word thus sparingly used may be 'understood' in this especially exalted sense; this is the sense in which we shall learn to understand all the words of faith only when the eternal light shines upon us with all its brilliance unimpeded.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[229]

12

UNITY – LOVE – MYSTERY

Our intention in the three considerations which follow is to attempt to discuss certain implications which are contained in the veneration of the Sacred Heart. At first it may appear that these points which we are discussing are at an extremely theoretical level. But it may perhaps be shown in the end that our reflections upon them here bring to light certain relevant factors, the significance and importance of which are not confined merely to the scientific and theological levels, but are above all religious. The first implication latent in this devotion is that of unity.

Unity

1. In reality the veneration of the Sacred Heart does not represent an attempt at concentrating the whole of Christian devotion and the whole fulness of what it means to be a Christian into this veneration of the heart of Christ, or of erecting this veneration into a structure capable of subsuming and integrating everything which Christian devotion contains within itself. This is something that certain devout but unenlightened and over-zealous practitioners of this devotion have already often attempted to do either explicitly or implicitly. It is false, and can only, in the long run, be damaging to Christianity as a whole and also to this devotion in itself. Christianity is more than devotion to the Sacred Heart. But on the other hand it is nonetheless evident that this devotion is not simply one among many others on an equal footing, such as devotion to St Joseph or even to Our Lady, or even to realities which are, in some sense, still more sublime and more central in the world of our faith, which is still, so far as we are concerned, made up of many factors, as, for instance, the Blessed Sacrament itself. According to Pius XI and Pius XII devotion to the Sacred Heart can in some sense be called the ‘summa religionis’. The object of this devotion constitutes the ultimate and innermost centre, the [230] ultimate reality from which everything else draws its light, in which everything else is, in a certain sense, united and held together. It constitutes anunity.

For the moment we mention the term ‘heart’, even in quite general terms, and even apart from the religious dimension in the true sense and the language pertaining to this, we are referring not to one factor among many others, nor even simply to all things in their diversity as drawn together into a subsequent unity. We are referring rather to an interior centre from which the diversification of human reality is unfolded, and in which this diversification, which also belongs to the very nature of man, remains united. It is constantly streaming out from this centre and flowing back into it. At the same time when it allows this multiplicity to flow from it this centre reveals itself, while, when it draws everything back again into its unfathomable depths it becomes veiled. And in fact it is the same with the word ‘heart’ as used in the devotion of the Sacred Heart. When we use this term we are referring to, and calling upon, this one unifying centre of the complex reality of the Son of Man in all its unfathomable depths. We are referring to its ultimate meaning and its immeasurable mystery. Once we have understood the devotion to the Sacred Heart in this sense two points become clear: on the one hand it is neither intended to, nor capable of, embracing the whole of Christianity as developed in all its manifold aspects; on the other hand it is not in itself simply on the same level as any other object of devotion among the manifold realities towards which an act of Christian religion can and should be directed. In virtue of the incarnational structure of Christianity these realities must be manifold, even though any act of this kind is always aimed at God himself who is all in all, and at him alone. Thus it should surely be recognised that the problem of unity implicit in this devotion has not merely been posed as a genuine religious question with a significance that is 'existential' in these present times, but also, rightly understood, has been solved. It is this question and the answer to it that we now propose to spend a little time in considering.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Unity – a question that is age-old, obscure, painful and at the same time blessed! We wander through a complex and manifold world. Right from the outset, if we realise our true selves, we have constantly been exposed to this. We are never in the situation of possessing all in an One. And yet we can never be satisfied with any such One which is not at the same time All. We are ourselves made up of a whole range of complex [231] factors. In our make-up there is spirit and flesh, an interior and an exterior, happiness and pain. We can never stop at any given point in our development. There is nothing that we can simply grasp and hold, and which at the same time stands revealed as the One and All, the sole factor of importance in our lives. And yet we still continue to seek for that unity which is not emptiness, not abstract, not the sort of unity which an abstract concept has, anunity which achieves the power to comprehend and embrace all things only at the expense of a disembodied emptiness with regard to its content. We seek for that unity which is fulness, because we neither can nor will be driven onwards into the indeterminate and the unknown. Also because even though reality as we know it is so diffuse and complex there is still so much unity in it, so much mutual interrelationship, mysterious harmony, mutual attraction of one thing to another, that it is quite impossible for us to do anything else than to search for this unity which consists in the fulness of all things, and this fulness of all things which comprises a unity – that unity which encompasses and covers all things. We do this because we are this act of seeking. Because even the encounter with the manifold and the complex as such, the act of consciously and deliberately distinguishing each individual thing as other from the rest – all this would never be possible if the very roots of our being were not constituted by the premonition of the unity that exists as an infinite goal and the all-embracing sense of the many which is ours in the power and light of our love for unity. But we, the finite, cannot hope to attain to this unity of inexpressible fulness by a process of transcending or compressing the diffusion and complexity in which reality is made present to us. We would fall into the darkness and silence of a lethal solitude if, wearied by this complexity, or despairing of it, we sought to attain the unity we desire in a manner which is neither possible nor fitting for a creature, striving to grasp at it in itself alone as it is beyond all multiplicity, and to hold it to ourselves by force.

The pain we experience, then, is one of tension. There is anunity that we seek, one which, in a certain sense, we have already grasped by anticipation, and one to which the very multiplicity all about us points us on. Yet this unity can never be possessed by itself alone. For just as we withdraw into this unity we must perforce turn back again and go forth into the multiplicity which belongs to the very mode of our existence. And the painful tension which this involves mounts to a climax of need precisely in our specifically religious acts. What a multiplicity and complexity [232] of religious practices is to be found in the life of the Church! How numerous are her sacraments and her devotions also! How incalculable is the host of her saints! While the process by which her teaching has been explicitated in thousand upon thousand of individual doctrines is almost bewildering! How manifold too are the methods and ways of the religious life which are recommended, praised and even required by the Church! The nature of Christianity is in itself simple, but it has been developed and diffused into a whole of such complexity that it demands too much of the individual to calculate or comprehend. And yet if our spirit is awake and alive we cannot simply confine ourselves to a modesty and naïveté of outlook that is petit-bourgeois, selecting this and that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

factor in Christianity which we may happen to have encountered, and being quite comfortable and content to leave the rest to itself. At the same time we cannot achieve an outlook that embraces the whole either, seeing it in its sheer essential interior structure. And there is a further truth that is the converse of this: again and again in the life of the Church and her Spirit there suddenly flames up a mystical movement such as that of John of the Cross which takes the form of an ardent longing for an ultimate unity in which all the different ways of living Christianity, and all the complexities are swept away, and all is resolved in a mysticism in which there are no 'ways', and which is dark and mysterious in character. This takes place in all movements which embody the quest for simplicity and directness our way of living our religion, or which aim at the classic equilibrium and concentration upon the one essential.

3. But how are we to find the unity in the midst of this incalculable fulness? And how are we to find the fulness which this unity embraces? How, above all, are we to achieve this in the living of our religion? We invoke the experience of our own hearts and look to the heart of Christ. If we accept the message of our own heart with faith and love, if we entrust ourselves to that inconceivable heart and centre of all things which we call the Sacred Heart, then we have all along been experiencing something of the true solution to this problem. If there were no original unity prior to all problems of how to reconcile unity with complexity and multiplicity of content in a given whole, and if in that which we call our own heart we were not already disposed to unity by God himself then any attempt at such a reconciliation would be from the very outset futile. We would either lose ourselves in the multiplicity or stick fast at the unity. But because there is this heart created by God himself, because man already [233] possesses a unity bestowed upon him right from the outset, therefore he can proceed from this into the complexity and multiplicity without losing himself in it. He can gather up himself and the world together into a basic and radical unity without either losing himself or sticking fast in this sense – always provided that he commits himself to that unity of absolute fulness which we call God, always provided that this unity which is not man himself, yet without which he cannot exist, receives him by grace into proximity to itself, always provided too that (only one word more!) we have been drawn into the protecting love of Christ, which in his heart is real, close at hand, filled with blessings and single. And this is in fact the case. The unity by which we can really live is not the abstract or creaturely unity of the idea, or the unifying basis of our own nature, but rather the 'superessential' unity which by grace becomes more interior to us than the unity of our own being, and which, nevertheless, is not our own. It is a unity to which we have to commit ourselves because it has been bestowed upon us in grace. In this unity which is full of content, therefore, the conflict which takes place within our own being between diffusion and compression, extroversion and introversion – both taken in an extremely broad metaphysical sense – is reconciled without thereby disappearing altogether. But it is because this unity is so interior to our own being that it is anunity which has been bestowed in grace, which has been received, which must be 'blindly' presupposed, which is not at our disposal. It is anunity which we cannot discard in favour of any one specific individual factor which we choose to take as absolute, i.e. as an unifying centre in defiance of the facts regarding its true constitution.

All this has been put somewhat abstractly. Nevertheless it has a great significance for religion, and specifically for the practice of religion in one's life.

(a) This is because it has a message for us as the superessential unity bestowed upon us in Christ, never left to us to achieve for ourselves, but rather imposing itself upon us from without, and brought close to us in that reality which we call the Sacred Heart. And this is the message which it brings: Go out into the multiplicity and complexity which is yours by nature, and do not fear it. Have trust in the incalculable factors of your life with all its complexities with wisdom and foresight indeed, but with courage and trust as well. As an old

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mystic has put it, you cannot achieve total proficiency in a single exercise. Your heart must go out into the manifold even in the sphere of your religious practices. Do not be too [234] ready to fear that you will lose yourself in this complexity. If you only take to yourself genuinely and whole-heartedly each individual factor, however small, as it comes (Goethe was wise enough to recognise this truth), then you will arrive at the whole, because it is precisely the whole that is inherent in every one of these individual factors, because it is a whole that is the outcome of that which constitutes the unity of them all as such and the mystery which lies at its heart is in turn constituted by the innermost depths of the divine nature itself, which is also the superessential basis of your unity. Do not close in upon yourself too much. You must open yourself and so come to the fulness that you need. Otherwise it may happen that you stick fast within the confines of too much self-mastery, too tight a hold on yourself, too much self-examination. Go forth from the heart and centre of your own being in order that you may find your own heart. This in itself will be the unity underlying the multiplicity. The only way in which it can come home to itself is through the broad spontaneous adventure of living.

(b) But this unity which is bestowed upon us in the heart of Christ, and which has its real and effective symbol in that heart, also brings to us another message, which is the counterpart of the first: Return! Do not let yourself be poured away! Have the courage to return even if you seem to be the poorer for so doing, even if in doing so much seems to escape you, even if the heart and centre to which you return seems to be the dark and lifeless cavity of the grave, silent and empty, dead and death-dealing. Only if you have learnt this through practice, if you can be alone, if you have learnt to be silent, to renounce, to let things go, to be poor, only then can you also find the unity underlying the multiplicity. Only if this centre, this unity that draws all to itself which we call the heart, is actually pierced through and seems to be poured out into a terrible void in futile love for another, only then can you find that unity that can truly be called so; only then will it be bestowed upon you by God without any merit on your part.

(c) And now we seem to have returned to the position that we cannot bring the manifold and the complex into anunity until we have practised how to go forth in trust into the multiplicity, and how to gather up all into anunity in the centre of our hearts. In truth there is no formula to tell us how to harmonise and regulate this twofold movement outwards and inwards, the unity deriving from the single common basis, and the multiplicity that issues from this same basis. There is no formula to enable us [235] to achieve this unification, but nevertheless it has been achieved not by God, not as our work but as his grace, not in our hearts but in the heart of Christ. We know that our life must consist in putting both movements into practice, the outward and the inward. We must constantly be initiating the one movement for the sake of the other, in a continuous process of ingress and egress, without remaining fixed in either state. But the unity between these two outward and inward movements that we practise is something that we do not grasp in conceptual terms at all. It is hidden in God, in his providential control of things and in his love; it can be accepted by us only as unseen, as the divine mystery of our existence. We shall arrive; in all our wanderings we are aiming straight at the centre of the target, if only we are patient in our dealings with one another, because this is our life. If only we look to the unity which God himself bestows upon us, regarding it as the unity which is his alone to achieve and to control; it is anunity which remains hidden from us yet of which, at the same time, we are aware, recognising in faith, hope and love that it is the unity which love itself achieves and directs – which indeed love is. All this we recognise when we turn our eyes to the Sacred Heart.

Love

The second implicit factor which we wish to spend some little time in considering in these

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological meditations of ours on the deeper meaning of the festival of the Sacred Heart is one that is in a true sense self-evident – that of love. The veneration of the Sacred Heart is, in fact, precisely a devotion to that love of God which has been made present to us in Christ Jesus our Lord, crucified and risen from the dead. For this reason it might be thought that of all the factors implicit in this devotion this one comes nearest to being explicit and on the surface, and therefore that no special effort of consideration and examination is needed in order to appreciate its significance. But this impression is dispelled the moment we advert to the fact that what is expressed in this word love is the mystery of reality as such, that in effect there is nothing less capable of comprehension than the reality which is designated by this overworked, hackneyed and degraded word, and which, according to scripture and tradition has to be so designated. Once we realise this then we find it easy to recognise that we need constantly to renew our efforts at finding an explanation in order to understand the element in this devotion which seems to be so completely obvious and clear to all.

[236] 1. First this devotion tells us that love is the very basis of our existence. When we speak of the heart then we are expressing that which is the centre, basis, origin and original unity prior to all multiplicity, which provides all existence with its goal, and constitutes a mutual interrelationship between all beings. And when we speak of the heart of Christ, then we are speaking of that particular origin and goal, that particular basis and centre, from which all that is complex and multiple draws its strength. It is that reality which on the one hand belongs wholly to God as the ultimate and absolute upholder of all things, and on the other has 'externalised' itself and indeed emptied itself in order to enter into the 'otherness' of non-divine being. As the outcome of this movement on God's part outwards from his own fulness into the empty void of the world, created beings have arisen and multiplicity has been initiated, and now these depend for their unity, their basic support and the power to achieve goal upon this centre, itself now existing in a creaturely mode. And when we speak of this centre of the Sacred Heart then we are saying that this supreme Being, who upholds the reality of ourselves, the world we live in and our very existence, and who has himself assumed a 'this-worldly' mode, is he who also sustains the reality of love in all its unfathomable depths. Moreover, the mystery contained in this statement is one which is absolutely beyond all human comprehension. Let us pause for a moment in our consideration of this truth. Withdrawing within the depths of our own hearts let us try to let the secret essence that pervades the world, nature and the history of these, as well as humanity and its history, silently distil itself there. Of course, we shall not come anywhere near to succeeding in this, but still let us try! Some intimation may, perhaps, be aroused in our hearts of the element of dumb self-obtuseness which is to be discerned in nature at the purely material level. It is so dead, so dominated by brute force, so alienated from itself! Our hearts may perhaps, be impressed with something of the unrestrained prodigality of living nature, its cruelty, the life and death struggle taking place within it, the way in which life springs up rank and luxuriant from the decay of death; the seemingly meaningless phenomenon of constant fresh mutations of form springing up within it in an apparently endless succession, the way in which the interests of the individual are constantly and brutally subordinated to those of the species, the wild and lustful extravagance – so at least it seems – of the processes of generation, the reckless waste that there is in nature, the evolving processes within it which seem blind to their [237] own goal – all this may impress itself upon us. Then let us only turn to the history of mankind, the history of the mind and spirit which is almost powerless as it is forced to contemplate this cruel, blind and stupefying world of matter and of bios. Then we may open our hearts to some degree to all the anguish of guilt, of death, of futility, which mankind has added on its own account throughout a million years of human history, that history which has been so blind to its own goal, which has seemed to stagnate in a state of meaninglessness that is agonising. We might open our hearts to the miseries of slaves, of the dying, of those who have been duped, of children who have been tormented and violated. We may consider the loves that have been dishonoured, the ideals that have been betrayed, the trust that has been broken. And then our hearts may be so crushed with horror and despair, may feel that their own basic dignity has been dealt a mortal blow to the point where it feels that what little joy and love, faithfulness and blessedness is to be found in this sewer of world-history and human history does not make the sum total of the world and mankind better, but only more terrible still, because there seems to be just enough meaning in the world to make us able to feel the prevailing meaninglessness in all its deathly pain. And when we experience all this then let us look to the Sacred Heart pierced by the lance and say to ourselves: 'The basis of all reality is love.' Let us say to ourselves: 'It is from this source alone that there streams out all this incomprehensible reality, with its multiplicity, its contradictions, its agonies, its endless journeys to unknown goals, together with its blind alleys, its struggles and deaths, its darkness, its total incomprehensibility.' Let us not forget that when we speak of the Sacred Heart then we are not merely saying: 'Somewhere in the world there is a heart which has felt love and has suffered.' We are not merely making a statement at the 'categorical' and 'this-worldly' level about one particular heart among others. On the contrary this statement of ours is on the 'transcendental' plane, if we may so express it. For what we are asserting is that each and all of the beings in the world stem from this one source, and this one fons et origo which comprehends all things, makes room for all things, judges all things and illumines all things, this original unity, we say, is love. And in making this statement about the heart of the Lord we are almost saying more – if we may be permitted so to express it – than if we simply said that there is a God who is in himself light, blessed simplicity and love. For in making this statement we are not merely saying that above this darkness of incomprehensibility there [238] exists this luminous and blessed unity which possesses itself in love. We are saying that this blessed and luminous upholder of all things in being has, by his creative act, not merely allowed all this dark chaos of the world to spring up from him in all its recalcitrant multiplicity, but that he has taken this anguished and loveless incomprehensibility to his own heart, has himself assumed it as his own reality, has allowed his own heart to fall into the dark abyss of the world, has inserted his own heart into the lethal void of non-divine being, to exist there as the true source of all this reality that is in the world apart from God. When we hold fast to this truth unto death, standing firm despite all disappointments, clinging to it even as we fall into the abyss of death, that state in which our own hearts are pierced through and drained of their life-blood, then we are made blessed – otherwise not. It is not so easy to understand the truth that underlies the veneration of the Sacred Heart.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Love, then, is the well-spring, the sole and unique source of all that reality which we experience with such incomprehension. And if this is the case then it follows ipso facto that love itself is every bit as mysterious as that which issues from it, every bit as mysterious as that infinite fulness must necessarily be which is the origin of all that constitutes the world and being. In the devotion to the Sacred Heart, therefore, there is an act of veneration of, and an act of formal invocation addressed to, a mystery. But this invocatory formula is not really one in the true sense at all because in it man does not exercise any power of his own, but, if he grasps its significance aright, i.e. if he is himself grasped by it, is rather made subject to the power of another. Let us never forget, when we speak of love, that – if we like to formulate the matter in somewhat metaphysical terms – spirit, the state of being that is self-cognizant, freedom, love and everything which follows from such concepts are 'transcendental' concepts, i.e. they stand for realities which cannot be explained in terms of other realities. The knowledge of them cannot be progressively built up from some other and better known entity. They are not deducible from anything else. Rather they must be understood right from the very first, from the first moment that we decide to speak of them and to bring the awareness of them home to ourselves or to others. Concepts of this kind, therefore, are also inexhaustible concepts. They cannot, in any true sense, be limited or circumscribed. Once we have attained to them in some way or at some point they initiate an infinite movement, only gradually filling themselves out with their true meaning, which increases immeasurably in depth [239] through the experience of life, through the grace of God and finally through the immediacy of our relationship with God. In all this these transcendental concepts continue to exist precisely as mere concepts and as a mere 'transcendentalising' experience of our own personal orientation to the infinite mystery. But the process continues until they so to say break out of these limitations and become something more than mere concepts and a mere experience. They do this in virtue of the content implanted in them right from the very first by grace, that content in which their ultimate significance consists, and which is nothing less than the ineffable reality of God himself, and of his world as permeated with himself. And in this way this reality is made present to us no longer in terms of the concepts appropriate to it but directly and in itself. Now among 'concepts' of this sort, in which we are grasped and overpowered in the very act of grasping them, i.e. allowing ourselves to be grasped by them, is to be numbered love – love, that is to say, not merely existing as an abstract concept made explicit in words, but love as it is in itself, even though initially we have only an incipient understanding of it, experiencing it and grasping it merely as promise. The only way in which we can be totally seized and encompassed by this love is for it to unite us with everything, for us to identify ourselves with everything by 'understanding' it, taking the world wholly to our hearts in all its incalculable greatness, all its inconceivable terrors and sufferings; finally for us to ensure that nothing pertaining to this world and its history remains any longer 'alien' to us, that there is nothing that still remains outside our existence, dead to us because we have failed to understand it. And if we understand love as the absolute and integrating power of a process latent in existence that is moving towards the unification of that which is multiple and complex in blessedness, then how inexpressibly far from their own true consummation our lives must seem to us! How very little we can already have understood and actually have achieved of a love of this kind! Considered as that in which our own ultimate fulness will be achieved, love will still be a mystery, because it is only if it is united with the incomprehensibility of God himself. Only if we direct our gaze to the heart of Christ, therefore, do we know what love is: the mystery of the world, the overcoming of the terrors which are in the world, that which unifies and embraces, that which transforms, that which liberates and is tender, that which is only realized in its fulness when the one who loves makes a total surrender of everything pertaining to the movement of his own personal history towards its [240] fulfilment. This is achieved when this love of his is pierced through and silently pours out its heart's blood into the futility of the world, and thereby conquers it. It is this that is described and conjured up in the supreme canticle to love of St Paul: patient and kind, without envy, not puffed up, not pretentious, not passionately attached to its own prejudices, not vexed, not vindictive, devoid of envy, rejoicing in the truth, always ready gently to excuse, believing all things, hoping all things and enduring all things. There is really no word capable of describing this love, because there is nothing else like it which we could use as an external standard in order to define it, also because it is, in itself, the unifying and absolutely original essence of all reality, and therefore there is nothing apart from it except emptiness and nothingness. For it has been written: 'But God is love', and in these two words man finds two different ways of expressing the single infinite mystery of his own existence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. One reflection of this unfathomable love still remains to be mentioned in its own right, that of joy. We Christians must be the blessed ones, those who smile, those from whom the light of their redemption radiates out, those who have been redeemed, those who have been liberated, those who know that the kingdom of God and the fruits of the Spirit signify, amongst other things, that joy which is the wondrous radiance of love itself. What a pity that we should so often be the joyless ones, the morose, those who go forward groaning beneath the burden of the law, the yoke and burden of which seem anything but sweet and light to us! What a pity that we should proceed as those who are under an unbearable strain, those who either have a bad conscience on account of the discrepancy in their lives between the letter of the law on the one hand and the actual shape their life assumes on the other, or else recompence themselves for their adherence to the letter of the law by indulging in a loveless zeal and an attitude of harsh bigotry towards others! If only we had love we would actually be filled with joy because love alone makes bearable that law which it alone can interpret and apply in the glorious freedom of being children of God, far from all servility to the letter of the law; and yet at the same time love does not misuse this freedom or pervert it into an egoism which seems to be attractive but is in reality slavery. If only we had love, that love which takes away pain, and in which we could fearlessly suffer our hearts to be pierced through, then we would be joyful with that joy which proceeds from God and streams from the Sacred Heart pierced by the lance. Then we would have the joy of those who [241] overcome, then our witness would be credible, then others would be able to recognise in us that we did indeed proclaim the euangelion, the good tidings which sound so different from the talk that goes on in the streets of the world, for this is intended to abolish pain, incomprehensibility and death. Then we would be those whose joy no man can take away, those to whom that joy is given which is at the same time the truth of death and of renunciation. But in order to be able to have this joy we must love. We must commit ourselves to the mysterious adventure of love, which only he who looks upon the heart of Christ can guess at.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Mystery

The third point which we wish to consider from among the factors implicit in the veneration of the Sacred Heart is that of mystery. Here some repetition of what has already been said is inevitable. This, however, will do no harm. True religion really begins at that point at which we have the courage to face up to that which is always the same, precisely to that mystery which comprehends all things and envelops all things. In the nature of the case this is necessarily one and single. It is the basis and the end of all religion, adoration and love, gathering up all things in love within its own unity. It cannot therefore be matter for blame that we are speaking once more of points which have already engaged our attention.

1. What has the heart to do with mystery? This is the first question that might be asked. The original and primary connotation of heart is unity, is source. The term ‘heart’ stands for that which expresses itself and yet is always in possession of itself. Heart conjures up the idea of that which is prior to all else, and yet which can only be understood in that which it suffers to spring up and come to bloom, to develop and unfold from within it. Heart connotes the origin of things, which must lead on to that which is beyond itself in order to realise its own nature, and at the same time that which, in all its self-expression and self-discovery, remains the eternally fresh and unquenchable source which is never spent, never becomes empty, and therefore remains ever surprising, ever new – in brief the mystery that is eternally youthful. Whatever aspect we have in mind when we speak of heart, it can only be termed a mystery in a derivative sense. We can only call it so when we have already assigned its causes, found a way of expressing it to ourselves, been able to point to that which went before it. And then ipso facto it is no longer simply the source without origins which is eternally inexhaustible and in that sense an absolute [242] mystery. And yet for all this we can only call something ‘heart’ in the true sense if it has some element in it precisely of this unattainability, which belongs to that which is eternally inexhaustible and without origin, something of the quality of fatherhood, in that it belongs inalienably to the particular individual and can never be transferred to another. We can only apply the term 'heart' to something in the true sense insofar as it has these qualities in it. For this very reason the Fathers have in fact long since pointed out that the Word issued from the heart of the Father. In fact when we use the term 'heart' we mean something original which is inexhaustible in itself, and never drained of its contents, so that when we look into it our gaze can never penetrate to an empty void within. It is something that realises its own nature in the unlimited fruitfulness of its thoughts and deeds, the manner in which it is expressed and presented to the outside world. And yet at the same time in all this its depths are never plumbed. It is never ultimately laid bare or reduced to its constituent elements. In brief it is, and remains, mystery because it is everything and, in a true sense – in that it is altogether itself and to the extent that it is heart – has no norm beyond itself by which it can be defined and regulated. It is not for nothing that we speak of the heart's secrets. It is not for nothing that we say of the all-knowing God that he alone knows the heart of man. It is not for nothing that we praise knowledge in its most exalted form by saying that it is the heart's own message, and it is no random choice of words that leads us to speak of the 'depths' of the heart. The heart would never be understood in its own unique truth if it were not conceived of as a mystery par excellence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. When, therefore, we look to this heart that is the Lord's, we are looking at the sign of that mystery which dominates and encompasses our whole life. There would be no heart if the heart of the Lord were not already there as that which is prior to all others, that which remains for ever mysterious, if it were not for this mystery that lies at the very roots of reality as such. And to that extent this heart points us on to the mystery of God himself. It is not only the human heart of God's eternal Logos, who is the inconceivable mystery of God himself precisely because God is the mystery par excellence. It is a symbol of mystery as such, and therefore, too, of the mystery of the eternal Godhead. We theologians do in fact say, in some corner or other of our system of dogmatics (only swiftly to forget it once more!), that God still continues to be he who is inconceivable even in the immediacy of the beatific vision. But for the most part [243] we interpret this statement to ourselves merely as a statement of the fact that this vision, since it pertains to finite creatures, must still, in spite of its immediacy, be itself finite and so imperfect. For the most part we fail to understand that when we speak of the inconceivability of God even in the immediacy of the beatific vision we are speaking precisely of the true and proper content of this vision and that inner reality at its centre which constitutes it as blessed, because God is only seen as God when he is viewed in his inconceivability, because everything that we grasp about him (in virtue of the fact that we are grasped by him) only appears as divine in the true sense that is proper to it when it extends outwards and onwards into that blessed obscurity which alone constitutes the true day, when in the very act of grasping the divine and being grasped by it, it is experienced as the inconceivable, and this inconceivability is not that in God which we leave aside in our contemplation of him, but rather the very object of our awe, the very quality which we call blessed and surrender ourselves to in love. But for the most part we forget all this, and as theologians we are actually in grave danger of supposing that theology is an unveiling of God in the sense of a breaking down of his inconceivability (even if we recognise that we can only achieve this to a limited extent). We like to feel ourselves to be those admitted to God's secret counsel, distinguished from other people in virtue of the fact that we have grasped more about God, whereas in reality the true theologians are those who have understood better than other men that God is inconceivable. For the most part we call to mind the mystery of God only when we have become confused in our own processes of reasoning, instead of understanding theology as an initiation into the mystery of God and as the systematic breaking down of all our over-hasty conceptions of God, so that he rises more and more above us who are finite and limited. Rises above us, I say. No! – vanishes altogether, rather, standing revealed as the one true God for whom no image of God can ever be a substitute, as the God who is close to us in love precisely as he who is inconceivable, and who has so generously bestowed himself upon us in Jesus Christ and in his Spirit. The heart of the Lord points us on to this supreme mystery of the divine. As the sum total of our religion, the message of this heart to us is: the ultimate basis of our whole existence is mystery. Mystery is not merely a contributing factor in our existence as pilgrims here below, it is the final and definitive factor. This mystery precisely in itself, and in its inconceivability, is what is ultimately true and real in our existence. When [244] the ultimate and definitive truth shines out unveiled, and is no longer viewed in reflected images and likenesses, then this aletheia, which will then have been disclosed, will be the nearness of the mystery itself. This will not be by-passed. On the contrary it will have been made quite impossible to by-pass or evade it. The concept does not yield place to an empty transparency in that which we perceive, but rather to the state of being seized and possessed by truth. And blessedness consists not in the fact that what we see in the beatific vision is forcibly divested of its mystery. On the contrary it consists in the mystery itself as such. The mystery itself is beatitude because man, provided he accepts his true nature in all humility and love, achieves a blessed and loving harmony with the fact that God is all in all and is the Mystery par excellence. And this state of being encompassed by the mystery is even here below the ultimate fulfilment of his existence. Properly speaking, nothing is surer or more obvious to us than the state of silent questioning which extends beyond all that we can call in question and all that we can dominate and control, the state of being faced with questions that are too much for us, and accepting this in humility and love. It is this alone that makes man wise. Man knows nothing in the ultimate depths of his own nature more precisely than this: that his knowledge (both at the everyday level and in scientific disciplines) is only a tiny island in a boundless ocean of that which he has never experienced. He knows, therefore, that the existential question confronting every individual who has knowledge in his own particular concrete circumstances is the question of which he loves most, the tiny island of so-called-knowledge or the ocean of infinite mystery; whether he concedes that in a true sense the mystery is the sole factor which is self-evident and self-explanatory, or whether, according to him, the tiny light with which he illumines this little island of his (this little torch he calls science) is his eternal light which is destined to illumine him forever – Oh what a hell it would be if it were so! The meaning of existence, or the elemental question which it represents for us, is this: whether we learn not merely to regard the mystery as imposing limitations and restrictions upon our being and life, but rather to achieve that positive relationship with the mystery as such in which we accept it, believe in it, love it and adore it, and so achieve blessing. He who does not love the mystery does not know God. His gaze constantly wanders from him, the real and true God, and he adores the image of him that has been made according to our measure and standard instead of God's own. When we [245] direct our gaze to the heart of Christ this can teach us how lovingly to surrender our whole being to the mystery which endures, which from its own depths upholds us in being, which is the love that is beyond all conception, which bears us and, by withdrawing us from the acts of our own self-will and so from ourselves, draws us to our own true blessedness.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. In yet another quite special respect the Sacred Heart points us on to the mystery of our own existence. God is the mystery par excellence not merely in himself but also inasmuch as he freely disposes of us as he wills. This is true inasmuch as the exercise of our own personal freedom in the activities of our lives, the innermost and ultimate decision of our whole existence which derives from this freedom of ours is in its turn encompassed, maintained and determined by the freedom of God. And this divine freedom is beyond us and beyond our powers of cognition, hidden in the silent depths of God himself, so that we are ourselves in turn hidden from ourselves precisely at that point at which we are most of all ourselves, in the autonomous and wholly inalienable decision of our own personal freedom. We are aware of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ourselves, we are thrown upon ourselves and left to ourselves. There is a point in the radiant centre of our existence, even if it is one that is not susceptible of subsequent speculation upon our part, at which we and our own self-knowledge are identical, one and the same. And precisely this point is one which cannot be subjected to our own reflexive thought. We cannot clearly objectify it or define it in any explicit terms. Nor can it be shared with others, and again we cannot check or control it. And so we are ourselves a mystery which remains hidden in the mystery of God. The teaching of the Church herself is relevant here, when she reacts against the doubts of the new age and the strivings for self-knowledge which also constituted a potent force in the Protestant doctrine of the certainty of salvation. The Church is reacting here against the attempts at achieving a self-possession that is conscious and absolute. And she tells us that on the contrary we do not know with absolute certainty whether we are in God's grace, and further whether we have attained final salvation. Certainly this is a factor which does not carry much positive weight in the average Christian life of our times, in which there is so little understanding for those experiences of fear and hesitation and incessant questioning which belong to an Augustine, an Ignatius of Loyola, a Francis of Sales and many others, and also to Luther and Calvin and other representatives of the spirit of the Reformation with regard to the question of salvation: Am I one of the elect? [246] Shall I find salvation? Does God love me with that true, powerful and effective love which signifies and assures salvation for me, sustaining the elemental assent which of my freedom I yield up to God? When man is brought face to face with himself in his innermost depths he arrives in the ultimate state in which he feels himself existentially threatened, troubled, uncertain, overwhelmed by questions which have to be answered, yet which are beyond his powers to answer, those questions, namely, entailed in the basic uncertainty as to what the answer is to the question of the individual's own salvation. And then man notices that he himself is, in his ultimate depths, a mystery, and still remains a mystery even though it constitutes the heart and centre of his being with all its limitations. He notices that as a mystery in this sense he is delivered up to God, the Mystery par excellence, and that he can only do one thing: no longer restrict himself to the faint light of his own reasoning powers and so direct his efforts towards his own salvation rather than to God himself (as though we could achieve a greater certainty of this on our own without God than by letting ourselves fall into the mystery of his predestination), but on the contrary surrender himself to God unconditionally and unreservedly with a love by which he really loves him more even than his own salvation and his own personal assurance of this salvation. But how shall we find it in ourselves to let go of ourselves in this way, and in a true sense no longer to cling onto ourselves, to the innermost heart and centre of our own being at the last, but rather to surrender it to God? That which is most wholly proper and personal to man himself is his salvation. It is with this that he identifies himself in the most radical manner by the ultimate and definitive decision which he takes of his own freedom. Now there is only one point at which he can surrender this totally and unreservedly without thereby being annihilated and without falling into the despair of the damned, and that point is God, whom he experiences as compassion. It is not that he can distinguish and separate out different elements in this forgiving and redeeming compassion of God or in the radical nature of his incomprehensibility and sovereignty, and thereby seize this grace of his own individual salvation to himself as something that he has gained control of by his own powers. No, man must surrender himself totally and without reserve to God in the act which we call faith and hope. But he can only do this if he surrenders himself to God as the love in which he can and must believe, and for which he can and must hope as that which has been freely bestowed upon him. But this act, [247] considered as the outcome of conscious and deliberate reasoning, is only possible for him through Jesus Christ the crucified and risen Lord, through his heart, this heart that has been pierced through, the heart which has itself been subjected to the immeasurable depths of deprivation in death and to a state in which it seemed to be abandoned by God, that heart which surrendered itself to the judgment of God upon the world, this act, I say, is possible only in the presence of that heart which – this is the miracle of grace that is new and quite unique in each individual case – gives us the courage to forget ourselves and to believe in his love as a love which has been bestowed on me in particular (or, to put it more precisely), to hope in it in that act of hope which is more than faith in a merely general sense, and which already in itself leads on to love. We gaze upon the heart of the Lord and the question upon which an eternity depends fills the innermost centre of our being, our heart and our life: Do you love me? Do you love me in such a way that this love truly, powerfully and unconquerably creates an eternity of blessedness that is my eternal life? To this question there is no answer such as would finally put an end to the mystery, or which man could give of his own powers. This question leads on to a mystery which has been brought close to us in this heart of the Lord. But if through this question we are led into the heart of the Lord because it is asked in faith, hope and love, then it is not answered but rather overtaken and overcome by the mystery which is love, by the mystery of God himself which cannot be questioned.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God, eternal mystery, nameless infinitude, unfathomable source of blessings, you who encompass all things and are encompassed by none, you have uttered your own eternal Word into your creation and into our lives in order that your eternal mystery may itself become for us the protection that is your inexpressible nearness to us, and may also become the centre of the world itself. We contemplate this Word of yours that you have uttered. We look upon him who is the heart of the world. We look upon the heart of the Son which we have pierced. All the incomprehensibility of ourselves and our lives lies hidden in this heart. All the elemental fear of human existence is forever contained by it. Everything that is sublime and holy finds its way back to this as its source. Everything finds its true nature there, and realises itself as love. Everything is drawn into the mystery that is the blessedness of love.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[249]

PART FOUR

Prospects

[251]

13

THE FUTURE OF THE RELIGIOUS BOOK

When a theologian is asked whether he believes that there is any future for the religious book he will certainly begin by replying 'Obviously there is'. But if (in the particular case) after this initial answer he begins to ponder the question he may perhaps become somewhat less sure. He asks himself whether he has not answered too hastily, prompted in this by his own subjective interests in the matter. And then, by way of drawing distinctions, he will say that since he is convinced that religion itself has an eternal validity he was in fact basically right in his answer when he foresaw a future for the religious book as well. But this is still very far from saying what form the religious book of the future will assume. The reason why this cannot be foretold is that even the concrete form assumed by religion itself, in spite of the fact that it is, in essence, indestructible, is extremely changeable and is in this very day, presumably undergoing changes which are extremely swift and extremely radical.

Can it be foreseen what guise the religious book will appear in, and will indeed have to appear in, given that it has a future at all?

Of course even in the future religious books will still differ greatly among themselves, and this does not merely apply to their subject matter. It applies to the readers too, for even in the future these will be extremely varied in respect of age, sex, social milieu, experience of life; moreover their particular needs will also be different, as also will be the questions which their particular historical situation makes them feel to be of special concern to them. This is obvious and there is no need to dwell upon it any further at this point, although it may seem that religious authors and publishers often forget whole groups of the population who would read religious books if there were any available suited to their particular needs (for instance in Germany we have fashion magazines of a purely secular kind – such as Für Sie which carry a good page on religion and morals [252] suitably written, and read very readily and with great sympathy because it is 'addressed' in a realistic and effective way to the type of reader concerned, and adapted to the particular needs of this type).

But these considerations apart, can we point to certain specific qualities which are characteristic of the religious writing of the future, given that there is in fact to be such a future at all? (In the answer we find to this question it may turn out that properly speaking these qualities have all along been necessary for the religious book in the true sense, but this will make no difference to the present argument.) The first characteristic which must be demanded of it is that it shall be freed from any 'ideology'. By this we mean that in it the religious element must not appear as some strange and unrealistic superstructure of theory superimposed upon that reality which man experiences both interiorly and exteriorly as an inevitable part of his life, as something that is really and effectively present in it, and which he constantly experiences anew. This kind of religious literature must appeal to man's genuine experience (this means, of course, the whole of that experience, not just a part of it). It must express this to him better than he can express it for himself. It must bring him to a realization of himself, and not simply to 'good thoughts'. In this religious literature the question that must constantly and relentlessly be raised is 'Where and how in the reader is that reality already present which this book is intended to bring to his notice?' There is a constant danger for the Christian here. He can always present the content of the faith in a form in which it has been fitted into an alien ideology, justifying himself in this by reminding his readers that it is, after all, 'revealed', that is, that it comes to humanity ab externo and from the 'sources' of revelation, and that it needs to be adapted and retranslated, etc. But in truth revelation represents precisely the destruction of the ideological façade behind which man hides and 'suppresses' the reality of God and of himself. Revelation tells him precisely what he really is. It is the total and exhaustive interpretation of what he really experiences himself to be. We have only to understand that there is an experience of grace, that God has already come to us in the Spirit prior to his coming to us in the word in order to realise that we have no need to speak of the reality of the faith as though it were another (and happier) world added onto this present one in which we are imprisoned, and existing alongside it. For this reason it can do no harm if the religious book of the future begins with matters which seem to be in the foreground, for it is these that constitute the realities of life. It must [253] begin, then, with human activities, with work, love, death, and all the well-worn and familiar matters with which human life is filled, with the 'spirit of unbelief' which makes hearts sceptical and fearful of giving way to 'illusions', for it appears to such hearts that faith only holds out illusions to man. It is precisely to the extent that the religious book sets itself to burrow down beneath the surface of the 'superficialities' of life, which are obviously present in it, to the factors below the surface (and only so can it be a religious book in any true and effective sense) that it has to begin precisely with these 'superficialities', for it is only through them that we can make our way into the deeper truths. For this reason the religious book of the future must guard against losing its true character by branching out too hastily into speculative theology. It is precisely in these last few decades that (in contrast to earlier ones) an excessively 'refined' theology has evinced itself in such books, which has had a subtle way of turning loose the whole of speculative theology (which in itself is necessary) into the field of devotion (even such a writer as Dom Marmion and similar ascetical authors seem to me to have incurred this danger to some extent). It seems that we can only produce anything or make anything attractive if we turn to those men who live a cloistered way of life in a protected environment, cut off from the world, an environment which must necessarily be, to a large extent, remote from real life. From this point of view, so it seems to me, even the biblical approach to devotion can no longer be considered altogether so suitable in the religious book of the future. Certainly the bible always remains the foundation book of Christianity, precisely because it is genuine in itself and free from ideological prejudices. But for all this, regarded realistically, it has, so far as we are concerned, receded so far back in history from us that it is no longer possible for a religious book to be a florilegium of passages from scripture with a few words of commentary attached to each. Scripture is indeed too remote, historically speaking, from our lives, and we must learn to recognise this realistically, and not be so full of pious enthusiasm as to use it exaggeratedly and without discretion. In all cases in which it is not scientific exegesis that is being aimed at the religious author should quietly spare the reader the long journey (whenever and wherever it is in fact long) from the letter of scripture to the reality signified by it. He should speak directly of this reality itself. And then it is always open to him, in appropriate cases, to say at the end of his investigation 'and this is already to be found in such-and-such a passage of scripture'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[254] A further consequence of this, however paradoxical it may at first seem, is that the religious book of the future will have to be concerned with the genuine basic themes of theology, and not with secondary details of dogmatics, morals and ascetics. Indeed it must itself constitute an original theology in its own right, with a subject matter that is of central importance. It has to be addressed to a man who is forced to live in an extremely 'worldly'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

world, one who has much else to do besides reading religious books, one for whom life does not begin to be interesting only when he enters the realm of the explicitly religious (as perhaps it did for certain poor devils in earlier centuries whose lot was one of drudgery). It must be addressed to a man who has to live the Christian life not as a particular 'calling' which is apart from the rest of his life, but rather as the brightness, the power and the ultimate mystery of his own life. How can such a man effectively bring home to himself the reality of God not as something that is evident or manifest to him, but rather as the inconceivable mystery of existence? How can he make real his encounter with Christ in such a way that Christ 'is present' to him in his everyday life? What is the term 'prayer' really intended to signify? How can we come to terms with love, with our everyday lives and with our deaths? And so on. (However, though there are not many themes, there is one that is inexhaustible for this purpose: simply the single inescapable mystery of human existence.) These are the real themes for the religious book. Thus it will probably come about that the religious book becomes theological in a real and effective sense, while the theological book becomes no less really religious. For only when the pristine unity between them is regained does the religious book become worthy of belief. It cannot presuppose the world of faith as something already given (as earlier ascetical literature did) in order to go on from there to draw out the devotional implications of it for the practice of everyday life. It must, in a certain sense, constantly be making its own original attempts to create this world afresh. For this there is need of a 'new theology' (however unpleasant the associations may be which have come to be attached to this phrase), and conversely theology (considered as a science) will be fully employed if it sets itself to achieve this task, if it is aimed at stating in an effective manner what was really meant by the traditional formulae, why they appeal to an experience which is ultimately existential (this being made possible by grace), and bring one to a confrontation with one's self. Perhaps, therefore, the living theology of the future will have very little 'scientific' about it (i.e. it will [255] not suppose that it can only be true to its own nature if it concerns itself with historical or speculative matters – art for art's sake – these in turn only being of interest to the scientific theologians themselves). Meanwhile the religious literature will be very 'theological' (i.e. facing up to the ultimate and basic questions in a new, honest and radical way). Would it be a pity if the theological and the religious book of the future were almost indistinguishable one from another? In this particular field can the situation not be precisely the opposite of what it is in other sciences? In these other sciences the gulf between the 'specialist' and the 'layman' becomes perforce ever greater, and rightly so: the 'popular understanding' is a sign of scientific inexactitude. But in the realm of theology and religion the cleavage between these two ought perhaps to become ever smaller, and we could even go so far as to regard this diminution as a criterion for the genuineness of both kinds of literature (the theological and the religious). To the extent that a given statement does not adequately express the innermost centre of existence it is also, by theological standards, not scientific (taking all this cum grano salis). In any case the chief task of the religious literature of the future will be to serve as a pointer to the first origins of every genuine exercise of religion. It will not be to work out a complicated apparatus of religious asceticism for which these origins represent axioms and mere presuppositions, which are taken for granted as self-evident.

Accordingly the religious literature of the future will be gentle and discreet in its pronouncements. It will itself undertake the task of unmasking pseudo-religious attitudes, and will no longer leave this task to sociology, depth psychology and the scepticism of contemporary atheism. It must also be able to be read by the new man with the mentality of a contemporary practitioner of the natural sciences and a technician of the modern age – the more so since we are all, to some extent, brought under these influences. In the post-individualistic phase of human history this literature must not give the impression of being an opiate, catering for needs which are ultimately unimportant and designed to soothe the pains of the 'sensitive soul' of the introvert. This literature will have in mind the man who regards himself as confronted by a task to perform in this world. It will not be intended as a substitute for medicine, including psychological medicine, or for depth psychology. Rather it will presuppose these. It will regard moral problems as beginning only at that point at which these really are initiated. It will never speak of God as [256] though it knew all about him and had succeeded in expressing the whole truth of him in theological statements and moral maxims. It will openly recognise and accept the interior 'complexity' of man. It will not be too hasty or indiscreet in seeking to bring everything in man under the aegis of religion. It will prove its genuineness by letting the world be worldly and, precisely in so doing, making it comprehensible as that which genuine religion presupposes.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But the religious book will also have the courage to demand of man that he shall recognise and accept that he is infinitely more than merely a man. He must recognise the blessedness of the pain that is accepted, in which the finite becomes interior to the infinite love in its incomprehensibility.

How should the religious book not have a future? It will be transformed and will endure. It will achieve this even if it takes the form of an unending variation upon a single basic theme: 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' Even then it will endure and will lead us to that point in our human existence at which this existence is thrown headlong into the redeeming mystery.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[257-63]

VOLUMES 7 & 8

LIST OF SOURCES

CHRISTIAN LIVING FORMERLY AND TODAY
Preliminary draft for an address which the author delivered on several occasions during the months of October, November and December 1966 in certain major cities of Germany (Cologne, Frankfurt, Koblenz and Essen). First published in Gul 39 (1966) Vol 5.

BEING OPEN TO GOD AS EVER GREATER
Originally an unwritten address delivered at a conference for Jesuit interns at Rottmanshöhe in 1959. A tape-recording of this was taken and subsequently edited, and the typescript of this served as the basis for a version of this conference which was duplicated and disseminated in this way. A final radical revision and expansion was made when it was published in Gul 39 (1966), 183-201.

INTELLECTUAL HONESTY AND CHRISTIAN FAITH
An address delivered at the invitation of the Society of Catholic High Schools at the university of Vienna (on 14 March 1966). This address was repeated on the occasion of the General Students' Day of the Societies of New Students on 31 May 1966 in Darmstadt, on 4 July 1966 for the Catholic Students' Society of the university of Saarland in Saarbrücken, and on 17 July 1966 at the invitation of the Catholic Students' Society at the university in Bochum. It was originally published in Stimmen der Zeit 91 (1966), 401-417.

DO NOT STIFLE THE SPIRIT
A festal address delivered on the occasion of the Austrian Catholic Day on 1 June 1962 in the great aula of the university of Salzburg. Published in full for the first time in Löschtt den Geist nicht aus. Probleme und Imperative des Österreichischen Katholikentages 1962, edited by the Praesidium of Catholic Action of Austria (Innsbruck 1963), 16-25. For the reprinted version appearing in this volume the address delivered at that time (immediately before the beginning of the Council!) was again revised afresh, but only certain inessential points were corrected (cf. p. 87, n. 1).

THE CHRISTIAN IN HIS WORLD
Inaugural lecture at the Nordic 'Catholic Day' on the occasion of the 1100th anniversary of the death of St Ansgar, held in Hamburg on 18 June 1965. Published for the first time in Stimmen der Zeit 90 (1965), 481-489.

'I BELIEVE IN THE CHURCH'
This study originally appeared in Wort und Wahrheit 9 (1954), 329-339. In the form in which it was then presented the article was concerned with the question of how to understand the dogma promulgated in 1950 of the physical assumption of the Mother of God into heaven (hence the subtitle: 'The New Marian Dogma and the Individual'). For the purposes envisaged in including it in the present volume the essay has been adapted and once more revised, and this reference to the dogma of the Assumption has been eliminated.

CHRISTMAS THE FESTIVAL OF ETERNAL YOUTH
Christmas address delivered over the Bavarian radio on 25 December 1964. The manuscript

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of this address was distributed in duplicated form, and subsequently revised once more for printing in Gul 38 (1965), pp. 401-404.

HOLY NIGHT
Hitherto unpublished in this form.

PEACE ON EARTH
Hitherto unpublished.

SEE WHAT A MAN!
First published in Gul 28 (1955), 1-3.

THE SCANDAL OF DEATH
Address delivered in the course of a Good Friday transmission over the Bavarian radio on 8 April 1966. The duplicated typescript was subsequently revised for printing in this volume. A record of it has also been produced by the Christophorus-Verlag, Freiburg-i-Br.

'HE DESCENDED INTO HELL'
This study has previously appeared under the title, 'Karsamstag' in Gul 30 (1957), 81-84. Considerable alterations have been made to the whole study.

HIDDEN VICTORY
Three short addresses designed to follow one upon another on the occasion of a Good Friday service (The Liturgy of the Word) over the Bavarian radio on 9 April 1966. In its present form it is a reprinting of a slightly altered version, also produced as a record by the Christophorus-Verlag, Freiburg-i-Br. (Cf. above, 'The Scandal of Death').

EXPERIENCING EASTER
Written as a meditation on the 15th Station of the Cross, and published in a book written by Frau A. Röper, Die Vierzehn Stationen im Leben des N.N. (Kevelaer, 1965), 120-132. Stylistic corrections have been introduced here.

ENCOUNTERS WITH THE RISEN CHRIST
First published in Gul 28 (1955), 81-86.

HE WILL COME AGAIN
Published for the first time under the title 'Er wird so wiederkommen wie ihr ihn habt zum Himmel auffahren sehen', Gul 32 (1959), 81-83.

THE FESTIVAL OF THE FUTURE OF THE WORLD
A meditation given on the eve of the Ascension 1961 in the Collegium Canisianum at Innsbruck. First published under the title, 'Christi Himmelfahrt' in Korrespondenzblatt des Collegium Canisianum 96 (1961-62), 68-8.

THE CHURCH AS THE SUBJECT OF THE SENDING OF THE SPIRIT
First published in Gul 29 (1956), 94-98 (title: 'Die Kirche als Ort der Geistsendung').

THE SPIRIT THAT IS OVER ALL LIFE
Meditation delivered on the occasion of Pentecost, 1960 in the Collegium Canisianum. First printed under the title, 'Gedanken an Pfingsten' in the Korrespondenzblatt des Collegium

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Canisianum 94 (1960), 34-40.

SUNDAY, THE DAY OF THE LORD
Address delivered in the course of a 'Holy Hour' of the Pax Romana held at the Eucharistic World Congress of 1960 in Munich on 6 August 1960. Published in Statio Orbis. Eucharistischer Weltkongress 1960 in München, Vol II (Munich 1961), pp. 195-197. The version reprinted in the present volume is based upon a somewhat altered version which the author published in the periodical Der grosse Entschluss 20 (1965), 246-248.

THE EUCHARIST AND OUR DAILY LIVES
First published in Der grosse Entschluss 17 (1962), 391-396; 440-443.

ON TRUTHFULNESS
An address delivered at the Conference of Youth Workers held at Passau, 1960. First printed in Katechetische Blätter 85 (1960), 413-416; 468-474; 511-520.

PARRESIA (BOLDNESS)
First printed in Gul 31 (1958), 1-6.

THE WORKS OF MERCY AND THEIR REWARD
Hitherto unpublished in German. A translation of the text into French appeared in 'L'Evangile de la Misericorde', Hommage au Dr. Albert Schweitzer. (On the occasion of his 90th birthday), ed. by Alphonse Goettmann. (Editions du Cerf. Paris 1965), 345-353.

PROVING ONE'S SELF IN TIME OF SICKNESS
First published in Gul 29 (1956), 64-67 (originally under the title 'Reflexionen zur Zeit der Krankheit').

ON CHRISTIAN DYING
Published in Wort und Wahrheit 14 (1959), pp. 653-657 under the title, 'Zum Tode verurteilt? Über das Sterben im christlichen Verständnis'.

WHY AND HOW CAN WE VENERATE THE SAINTS?
Original version in Gul 37 (1964), 325-340. The text reprinted here has been revised.

ALL SAINTS
Published in Gul 29 (1956), pp. 323-326.

IDEAS FOR A THEOLOGY OF CHILDHOOD
Lecture delivered at the Second International Convention of the SOS Children's Villages at the SOS Children's Village of Hinterbühl near Vienna on 1 October 1962. First published as a continuous whole in Gul 36 (1963), 104-114.

THE SACRAMENTAL BASIS FOR THE ROLE OF THE LAYMAN IN THE CHURCH
First published in Gul 33 (1960), 119-132.

THE POSITION OF WOMAN IN THE NEW SITUATION IN WHICH THE CHURCH FINDS HERSELF
An address delivered at the Convention of the Union of German Catholic Women on 20/21 June 1964 at Munich. Printed in Die Frau im Aufbruch der Kirche, O. Brachfeld, K. Horn,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

U. Ranke-Heineman; E. Gössmann, K. Rahner ed. (Munich 1964), 120-145.

ON THE SITUATION OF THE CATHOLIC INTELLECTUAL
A lecture delivered on 21 May 1966 at Frankfurt a.M. under the title of 'Aufgabe und Varantwortung des Hochschullehrers in der Sicht des Konzilskonstitution "Die Kirche in der Welt von Heute" (at the invitation of the Rabanus-Maurus-Akademie). The version printed here has been revised and in part expanded

THE TASK OF THE WRITER IN RELATION TO CHRISTIAN LIVING
Published under the title 'Über den Buchautor' in the Festal Almanac of the publishing house of Otto Muller (on the occasion of its silver jubilee) entitled Werke und Jahre (Salzburg 1962), 66-86. (Here given in an emended version.)

PRAYER FOR CREATIVE THINKERS
Originally composed for the fifth Austrian 'Formation of Youth' Week, held in Tirol (23 May 1954). Published in Der grosse Entschluss 10 (1954), 9-10.

ON THE EVANGELICAL COUNSELS
First published in Gul 37 (1964), 17-37.

THE THEOLOGY OF POVERTY
First delivered as a lecture in the course of a conference of religious orders, published in Gul 33 (1960), 262-290. Previous title: 'Die Armut des Ordenslebens in einer veränderten Welt'.

THE THEOLOGICAL MEANING OF THE VENERATION OF THE SACRED HEART
A contribution to the Festschrift des theoiogischen Konviktes Innsbruck 1858 bis 1958 under the title 'Vom Ziel unseres Strebens unter dem Symbol des Herzens Jesu' (Innsbruck 1958), 102-109.

UNITY – LOVE – MYSTERY
Meditations held at the Triduum of the Sacred Heart 1962 in the Collegium Canisianum at Innsbruck. Published in the Korrespondenzblatt des Collegium Canisianum 97(1962), 4-15.

THE FUTURE OF THE RELIGIOUS BOOK
Not hitherto published in German. A contribution to the Christmas message of Messrs Paul Brand, publishers, Hilversum – Antwerp, Toekomst van het religieuze boek (Hilversum 1965), 12-17 (together with other contributions by L. Rinser, H. J. Schultz, J. B. Metz).

Note: No reference has been made to the numerous reprintings in German-speaking countries. Translations are mentioned only if the relevant study was first published in a foreign language.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE

I wish to express my gratitude for the help and suggestions given by Fr Edward Quinn, without whose kindness the translation would not have been possible; and also for the friendship of the staff and students of the College of the Resurrection, especially Fr Benedict Green, C.R. Thirdly I must thank the Reverend Mother, S.H.T. and the Sisters of the Company of the Lord Jesus, Ascot Priory, for the warmth of their hospitality during part of the work.

College of the Resurrection
Mirfield

Graham Harrison

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PREFACE

Volumes 9 and 10 of my collected theological lectures and papers contain pieces of work which originated between 1965 and 1967, with the single exception of the 'Small theological treatise concerning Indulgences'. There are considerable differences as to the literary genre, the mode of thought and the style of language of the individual papers. This is determined largely by the concrete occasion which gave rise to each particular study. A detailed list showing how each one came about has been appended to this volume. Since the origin, the aim and the place of publication were to be included, the best course seemed to be to provide as accurate and complete a 'list of sources' as possible. Some of the essays originated as tape-recordings of informal lectures, which were then remodelled and extended in various respects. Many papers were originally sketches for addresses or visiting lectures. Many were written for books or periodicals which were not meant for theological professionals alone. On the other hand not a few of the larger studies are in the nature of extensive and detailed monographs and are intended (in the best sense) for the theological specialist (e.g. 'Atheism and implicit Christianity', 'The Sacrament of Penance as Reconciliation with the Church', 'Towards a modern authoritative Church doctrine of Indulgences', etc.). Correspondingly, the notes or the critical apparatus also have quite different functions in the individual studies: in the case of remodelled lectures and essays, where only a limited period of time or limited space was available and where neither the writer nor the listener (or reader) could countenance repetition, I have taken the opportunity of making it easier for the reader to see the more precise realisation of and the deeper connection between the developed lines of thought by copious cross-references to other writings of mine. This being the case, no claim is made to have supplied a scholarly apparatus or the otherwise usual comprehensive list of sources. On the other hand, however, the theological papers in the more strict sense are intended to supply the most accurate and universal documentation possible. I would therefore like to ask the reader to bear this in mind when he finds that I quote my own works a great deal. The explicitly limited aim of these references is obvious. In any case many people (especially in other countries) have requested pointers of this kind.

[x] As previously, Volume 9 of the Theological Investigations fulfils the aim of collecting together chiefly my theological essays and smaller studies. During this period I also published larger studies elsewhere and I would like to mention them because together with what is published here they constitute a whole: the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1-2 (Freiburg 1966), Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln 1967) 317-420, and the commentary to Chapter 3 on the 'Dogmatic Constitution on the Church' in the Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II Volume 1, ed. H. Vorgrimler (Herder, New York/Burns & Oates, London 1967), 186-218 (tr. Kevin Smyth). Besides these I would like to mention the articles which have already appeared in Volume 7 of the Investigations and the many contributions to the international lexicon Sacramentum mundi (English edition 1968 ff.). In addition three large studies are in preparation for the series Quaestiones disputatae.

Before being included in this volume all the lectures, essays and studies have been thoroughly overhauled stylistically, more clearly arranged, and trimmed down or extended according to necessity. Since the first publication more precise references to the latest literature have been added to many of the articles. These changes - often considerable - throughout the course of several stages of publication have not been individually noted in the list of sources.

The untiring and learned assistance of Dr Karl Lehmann was of the greatest service to me in revising and overhauling the material. I take this further opportunity of thanking him most

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

warmly. I thank my new colleagues in the History of Dogma Seminar of the Faculty of Catholic Theology of the University of Münster for their careful and thorough help in reading the proofs.

Münster

Karl Rahner

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

The Shape of Contemporary and Future Theology

[3]

1

THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL'S CHALLENGE TO THEOLOGY

The question raised here cannot long be suppressed by equivocation: does the Second Vatican Council signify a decisive orientation for present and future theological undertakings or not? It is not just that the Council documents now appear side by side with other statements of the Church, or that a thorough and more precise investigation of the history of this Council has been initiated, and so on. The Council's inner call to the Church can be soon smothered and the Council rendered 'harmless'. There is already a certain tendency to represent the conciliar decrees as being only of 'pastoral' relevance, and thus to relegate them to a particular and circumscribed area, so that practically everything else may remain the same as before. With this in mind we ask how it is that the Council has set inescapable tasks for today's and tomorrow's theology.

I

There can be no doubt that the Second Vatican Council has created a 'challenge' to Catholic theology; that is, it has provided it with new tasks, given it a more dynamic impetus and wider scope for free movement. First of all this Second Vatican Council is of importance for Catholic theology in that the positive teaching of its decrees has in itself great theological significance. For what many Roman theologians had planned prior to the Council, and what many others had feared, did not happen, namely that at the Council the statements were to contain only what had been the received and express teaching of prior official papal doctrine, and that of the professional theology – of neo-Scholastic provenance – of the last hundred years. If this had been so, theology – courteously but firmly directed to these conciliar texts in new Denzinger numbers – would simply have had to pass on what had been taught previously.

The Council was certainly very careful and circumspect in all its doctrinal statements; indeed, it avoided any new definition. But it said a [4] great deal which was not simply a part of the assumed repertoire of professional theology. Of course, a Council can only, and only intends to say what has always been, in some manner, in the Church's awareness of faith, even if in very different modes of awareness.[1] In this respect what the Council teaches cannot be absolutely 'new'; even so there is by no means any need for it to belong to the repertoire of the professional theology of the last century. In actual fact the average person's awareness of faith and religious practice draws its life from a professional theology which is decidedly a [1] For the distinction between what is changeable and what is really changeless in theology and in the field of discipline, cf. K. Rahner, 'The Pilgrim Church', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 270-294.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'received' theology, with its particular selection of matter and historically determined perspectives. A small example: in no text-book or dogma or catechism of the recent past can one find any reference to the fact that the sacrament of penance is itself – among other things – a 'reconciliation with the Church';[2] and although this truth is in accordance with the plainest original tradition, it plays no part in the lives of contemporary Christians. Therefore it is of the greatest importance that the Council should have now broken through the usual themes of the text-books and catechisms of recent times and set free living realities and truths which were present as such neither in yesterday's awareness of faith nor among academic theologians.[3] The really decisive thing is not so much that many questions which were until now matters of dispute have been taken up and – to some extent – decided, setting theology the task of thinking through and justifying the decision and clarifying what still remains obscure; what is much more important in connection with these teachings of the Council is the fact that many themes have been raised which, although they were not really matters of controversy in official theology, did not form part of its clearly-defined subject-matter and therefore found little or no place in the official catechisms and in people's everyday awareness of faith. In this respect the Council provides theology with significant tasks and topics, and it implies the obligation of [5] extending and – consequently – restructuring to a considerable degree the whole thematic compass of theology in many areas and aspects. More express mention will be made of this later. Furthermore, however, the Council is of great importance in a dual aspect: the Council has consciously left open many questions, has revealed them as such for the first time or has expressly recognized them as requiring further theological investigation. These are not only questions which have in any case no real implications for the concrete life of the Church or for man's Christian existence and are only theological subtleties, the private business of the theological specialist. For instance, the question of the collegiality of the bishops was a matter of such violent dispute not because it would have been possible in all earnestness to doubt the issue,[4] but because it was suddenly discovered what were the concrete practical consequences of this doctrine. If particular mention is made of these topics of the Council at a later time, many of them will be of direct significance for the concrete life of the Church, as can be seen in the Constitution on liturgy for instance, where a broader and deepened theology of the Christian cultus and concrete liturgical measures mutually stimulate and benefit each other.

Above and beyond this broadening and deepening of the scope of theology, the Council's whole attitude shows a spirit of freedom, the desire, as Paul VI has formulated it, to study first and then to make a decision, an awareness of problems and respect for specialists (yet without timidly wishing to let them have the last word in their 'professional' and specialist capacity). All this converges on the realisation that the theological routine which has been really very widespread in the Church in the last hundred years, according to which everything of real importance in theology had already been settled, belongs to a theological manner which has been overcome, provided, that is, that theology now really takes the opportunity offered to it by the Council's attitude. For it seems to me that, however praiseworthy it may have been on the whole, the quantity and extent of technical study in the field of Mariology in [2] cf. the conciliar constitution Lumen Gentium, No. 11. For an exhaustive commentary on this passage and the historical background cf. the author's study 'Das Bußsakrament als "Versöhnung mit der Kirche"' in the Festschrift für Kardinal Ottaviani: Das Volk Gottes. Sein organischer Aufbau im Alten and Neuen Testament (Rome, 1967) (containing further references to literature). Cf. 'The sacrament of Penance as a reconciliation with the Church', Theological Investigations X.

[3] Besides the concrete references in the study just referred to cf. K. Rahner, 'Forgotten Truths concerning the Sacrament of Penance', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 135-174.

[4] For the assertion that episcopal collegiality was a factor even in the proceedings of Vatican I, cf. the author's remarks (and further references) in the Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II ed. H. Vorgrimler (New York/London, 1967), Vol. 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the last few decades is also (although not only) a sign of the tacit assumption that, apart from the field of history of dogma which works retrospectively, progress is only possible in peripheral areas of theology. A dogmatic historian of the stature of Landgraf gave this as his candid opinion in private conversation.[5] Indeed, one may even be inclined to think that the [6] Encyclical Humani generis was informed somewhat by this mentality in its quite legitimate defence of theological terms, regarding theology as certainly the product of an evolution, but as now being simply 'complete', apart from peripheral areas: the historical evolution of concepts is recognised, but once they have been developed, they are taken as in every respect beyond improvement. This kind of 'monolithism'[6] has disintegrated. At least in its ecclesiology and in the Constitution on Divine Revelation the Council has shown that this attitude can no longer be justified. The Council has assuredly offered theology a more acute awareness of problems and a wider scope for free theological study.

II

Besides these formal aspects of a general theological approach the Council has given something further with regard to theology. The Council has opened 'dialogue' with the world. It has not already carried it through and of course it could not do so itself in any case. But it has begun determinedly to be aware of the world of the modern human spirit, that is, the world of a pluralistic, scientifically and technologically orientated society with its immeasurable breadth and diversity of insights and tendencies, the world of a split and diversified Christendom and of the world religions, the world of an immense future in process of being planned. And this confrontation is not a confrontation with a world in which one merely happens to live, whether joyfully or disconsolately, carrying on in adherence to the old traditional activities and aims, but with a world in which one has to be engaged in an open dialogue, the result of which is not a foregone conclusion; it is a world which the [7] Church has to help to build and in which tomorrow's Church too will exercise its moulding activity; and that not merely under sufferance from the world, but in a way which the Church itself fully desires. This situation, seen and accepted by the Church, does not mean merely a new, additional and partial region of study for theology – although it does mean that as well; that is, in practice, study of the task clearly set out and delineated by the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. Rather this dialogue situation with the world, consciously initiated by the Church,[7] implies a situation and a task for theology in all its regions and subjects, even those which seem its most esoteric. The whole of theology needs to be aware of this situation. What this means in detail must be said later.

At the same time something came to light at the Council which, it seems, has not yet been a matter for theological reflection and clarification at all. The Church issues a Pastoral [5] Here it becomes very plain that the highly-prized 'freedom from presuppositions' of historical investigation is a problematical matter in theology too. 'Speculative' theological study and historical investigation are always mutually fruitful and reciprocally stimulating. In particular Landgraf's view and interpretation of early Scholasticism bears witness to a narrowing of the historical perspective as a result of dogmatic presuppositions: since Landgraf saw in High Scholasticism largely the unsurpassable perfection of theological thought, he was able to see the multifarious theological situation of early Scholasticism only teleologically in terms of its apogee and flowering in High Scholasticism. Thus it is clear that the dynamic quality of this particular mode of theological thought – and it is in itself highly variegated – which is perhaps especially interesting for us in our present theological situation, was not adequately represented by him.

[6] For a more precise understanding of this concept cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirchliches Lehramt und Theologie nach dem Konzil', Stimmen der Zeit 178 (1966), pp. 404-420, esp. p. 407 and note 4; cf. in this volume p. 86 note 4.

[7] For the fundamental necessity of this dialogue cf. in detail the presentation and relevant literature in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II (Freiburg, 1966), II/1, pp. 102 ff., 265 ff.; II/2, pp. 203-267.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Constitution on the Church in the Modern World: in it she even describes this situation to which she wishes to take her stand, and the task which confronts her. But in this way she shows that she must have and must acquire a kind of knowledge, essential to her activity, which, however, does not spring from divine revelation but from human experience. The Church shows that this necessary profane knowledge by no means arises simply out of everyman's plain, everyday experience; at first sight, at least, this would not perhaps be a particularly stimulating theological problem, since this general everyday knowledge is always available. This profane knowledge which she possesses is won from a secular experience, scientifically and systematically gained through modern history, sociology, scientific psychology and futurology. This is a totally new kind of profane experience, previously nonexistent, and loaded with all the dangerous, dubious and provisional qualities which are associated with strange, scientific, 'empirical' manipulation. It could be said that the Church is no longer merely being involved with the world which God created and made available to simple (although still profane) everyday experience, but also with that world which man is building as his work, as an embodiment of his decisions, dreams, utopias and of his scientific reflection. This is a most strange and dangerous thing, and it has not so far been thought about at all in terms of an ecclesiology.[8]

[8] Proceeding from these presuppositions the attempt will now be made to say something of the tasks of post-conciliar theology. In doing so we are aware of the fragmentary and subjective nature of the following observations. We know too that the mere issuing of demands is a thankless business, that it is easier to give advice than to follow it, and that the true principles are given only by those who actually show the application of them.[9]

III

First of all as far as historical theology in general is concerned, it must be strongly emphasized that it must be extended and developed further. If Catholic theology (I am not including biblical studies here, about which something will be said in particular later) made great strides in the last century, this was chiefly, if not almost exclusively, in the realm of historical theology; the history of doctrine and theology, the history of patristic literature, textual edition, the history of canon law, etc. Doubtless there remain tasks enough in these areas. No intellectual discipline, above all at the present time, can dispense with studying its own history. And theology, on account of its own sublime dignity, owes itself such study. Where talent is forthcoming in this field – and there are men of talent for whom this should be more or less their only field – it should be encouraged. It would not be amiss if the Church authorities were more magnanimous financially in this respect (for such things as the edition of texts, the publishing of special historical monographs, etc.). But surely it need not necessarily be derogatory to the dignity and the truth-seeking impartiality of this historical theology if in future it became better aware of its function and responsibility in respect of the kind of theology called 'systematic' (including 'practical' theology), which in turn can only understand itself correctly as long as it is the servant of a truly living proclamation of the [8] cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur theologischen Problematik einer "Pastoralkonstitution"', Volk Gottes. Festschrift für J. Höfer, ed. R. Bäumer/H. Dolch (Freiburg, 1967), cf. 'On the theological problems entailed in a Pastoral Constitution', Theological Investigations X.

[9] As in what follows a fragmentary programme of this kind is to be set forth, the author may be permitted to draw attention in the notes to own sketches of various topics, lest the impression be given that we are merely dealing here with a number of abstract ideas, incapable of being thought through in concrete terms. Of course the tasks concerned can be tackled differently by other theologians. But reference to many other works would have enlarged the notes disproportionately.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Gospel and of contemporary Christian existence, and is inspired by the awareness of the crying needs in the practical care of souls. If one considers the most accomplished figures of historical Catholic [9] theology in the last hundred years, F. Ehrle, H. Denifle, O. Bardenhewer, M. Grabmann, F. Pelster, A. M. Landgraf and many others, one must conclude in all honesty that their great and scholarly work was practically worthless as far as the proclamation of the saving Gospel of Christ today is concerned, even if one is prepared to take into account highly anonymous and indirect influences. This historical theology was retrospective theology. It need not be so. There are today examples enough to prove this. Consider Y. Congar, M. D. Chenu, H. de Lubac, J. Daniélou, to name just a few. Historical theology today must no longer be as a whole so antiquarian and retrospective. More than before it must be prospective, retracing its steps in order to go forward into a new future of theology and evangelism. Historical theology must not simply ask what has been; it must inquire of the past in order to find the answer to the question, what will be, what is to be proclaimed tomorrow? In historical theology as well there must be as many theologians as possible who sense the demands, the unease, the burden and the danger of theology today for the proclamation of tomorrow and who bear and suffer these things along with their fellows. In the face of tomorrow's tasks presented by the times and by the Council, historical theology must indeed inquire with all precision and impartiality into what was, but it can no longer afford to maintain the art-for-art's-sake view of a boundless historical curiosity for everything and anything, but must ask the past what are the life-and-death questions which future has in store for theology,[10] even if it means that many quaestiones quodlibetales of second- or third-rate mediaeval theologians have to remain unedited and undiscussed.

Naturally, in order eventually to become a fruitful source for systematic theology, historical study cannot dispense with giving the past this opportunity of speaking without prejudice, irrespective of whether what it has to say seems interesting and 'existentially' significant at the first glance. Without the patience required for receptive listening, historical study would ultimately only hear what it already knew; it would learn nothing new. It must certainly not just try to discover justifications to bolster up already developed theses which are already more or less of interest. In order to hear new things it must be able to listen patiently to those traditional things which are apparently wearisome and over-familiar. But this by no means implies that the historical theologian who, [10] qua theologian (i.e. more than a historian of religions), must always listen to the past within the perspective of faith of the present Church's understanding, may only think of the present stage of development of this understanding. He must be sensitive to the evolving awareness, heralded both in the promising and in the distressing aspects of the imminent future.[11] In the field of history as well as in other areas the theologian of today should not be demonstrating his scholarly competence by writing books about questions which interest no-one but himself. He should not merely be showing that people in earlier times also knew – in some fashion – matters which later came to be defined.[12]

There is moreover no need for this to be so. A historical theology can make a very [10] Thus it becomes clear how necessary is an epistemological sketch of the function of the historical mode of thought within theology. Many preliminary studies for this subject can be found hidden away among the works of modern philosophical and historical hermeneutics.

[11] cf. in this respect the parallels in the field of history in R. Wittram, Zukunft in der Geschichte (Göttingen, 1966).

[12] So long as historical thought in theology only results in study of this kind, a real 'historical consciousness' in the modern sense has not yet been attained. Because people on the systematic side have been too rigid to accept new configurations of questions and changed situations, it is often the case that the only thing that remains in view is the critical and destructive side of the consequences of historical investigation, not, however, its productive capacity – which is no less characteristic of it. This implies a hermeneutic self-criticism of the previous conception of history; cf. esp. H. G. Gadamer, Wahrheit und Methode (Tübingen, 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

considerable contribution towards the necessary expansion and broadening of present theology's awareness of problems, even if one hardly expects to find ready-made answers in the past for today's questions. If the historical theologian is inspired by his interest in the issue itself and its future and not only by interest in its past history, he will often find in the past – instead of confirmation of a later dogma – only interpretations of the dogma which were and are controversial and which therefore remain theologoumena.[13] He will seldom succeed – although even that is possible – in finding a consensus in the past in favour of a doctrine not already defined officially by the Church such that he is able to recognise this doctrine as of categorical relevance for present systematic professional theology.[14] But even if this is not the case, historical study can be of service to contemporary systematic theology: it sharpens one's awareness of problems and reveals how authoritative dogma originally arose as a concrete response to the demands of a difficult and problematical situation. [11] This makes it possible, within the broad possibilities of more accurate interpretations, to perceive new interpretations in the present intellectual and spiritual situation. Historical study teaches us to distinguish more clearly between 'dogma'[15] and the theologoumena[16] which always accompany it.

Today this applies above all to the field of the history of moral theology and of canon law. There is still much highly useful and indeed necessary work to be done here by historical theology, as contemporary examples have shown, to reopen the debate – with a clear historical conscience as well – upon certain too simple and too calmly assumed traditional arguments in systematic theology, and to prepare better, more appropriate and more finely balanced answers.[17] Perhaps what has been said ought also to be referred to ecclesiastical history, however difficult it may be to apply it. At the Council it was sometimes possible to gain the impression that very many leading churchmen had heard little of the historical nature of the Church, her institutions and even of many of her teachings, or that at least they had learned little from this.

IV

Biblical studies have found new tasks in the wake of the Council. Not because the tasks did not exist beforehand but because the conditions for solving them have become better and, above all, calmer. The Constitution on Divine Revelation was certainly very careful and conservative in its exposition of doctrine. That is of great positive importance, since it is true in the field of biblical studies as in other fields that the latest thing need not necessarily be the most true and enduring. In the coming decades we shall need courage to stand fast by the undiluted faith of Christendom, which always remains an offence and a focus for temptation, in order, not to defend merely traditional positions, but to resist the scepticism and the [13] cf., for instance, the rich and varied history of the different theological presentations concerned with the creation of the human soul by God. For details cf. R. North, Teilhard and the Creation of the Soul (Milwaukee, 1967).

[14] In the first instance one of the historical theologian's important tasks will be rather to examine the sources more closely to see what are the concrete theological conditions (and limits) of such a 'consensus'.
[15] For this concept and its change of meaning cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, ed. J. Feiner/M. Löhrer (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 639-707 (with literature).
[16] cf. K. Rahner, 'Theologoumenon', LThK X (Freiburg, [2] 1965), cols. 80-82.
[17] In the area of the history of moral theology we refer only to the studies by M. Müller, J. G. Ziegler, H. Klomps, J. Fuchs, J. Stelzenberger, L. Brandl et al. For a historical discussion with regard to the magisterium cf. J. T. Noonan, Contraception. A History of its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists (Cambridge, 1965); also his study, 'Die Autoritätsbeweise in Fragen des Wuchers und der Empfängnisverhütung', Diakonia I (1966), pp. 79-106.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

tendency to disintegration which seem inherent in the [12] methodology of any modern historical science. These features, unaccompanied by any genuine religious experience, are rooted in the assumption that the living totality which is the reality of faith can be deduced from its individual parts and historically determined presuppositions, or that, if this cannot be done, the obligatory character of dogma or its meaning as affirmed by the Church is necessarily rendered null and void.

But the Constitution on Divine Revelation has actually sanctioned the development which already began with Pius XII (in Divino afflante Spiritu and certain statements of the Biblical Commission). The methods which were first developed in Protestant biblical studies, form-criticism in particular, may be used in exegetics and in biblical theology of the Old and New Testaments. This is possible because the techniques do not essentially bear implications unacceptable to dogma.[18] Even if one were to maintain the 'historicity' of the four Gospels, this rather indiscriminate characterization can and must be mellowed by the Constitution on Divine Revelation, and this is basically what happens when one acknowledges the vario modo historicum[19] and the influence of post-Easter theology on the record of the pre-Easter Jesus.[20]

The most immediate task of biblical research itself will be to show that there is a profound difference between the historical Jesus and the Christ of Faith and yet that there is at the same time a real connection between them, and a connection which is adequate to the demands of Catholic dogma. Thus it must show how men of today, with all their enlightened historical knowledge and their sensitivity to differences and developments, looking with the eye of faith may see in the story of Jesus more than merely the tragic fate of a religious enthusiast.[21] This is not only a work of defensive apologetics of the kind undertaken by Grandmaison about forty years ago. Making clear the distinction between the intrinsic interpretation of the historical Jesus and Church dogma (which does not [13] destroy the substantial unity and identity of both) can be of positive value for dogmatic Christology,[22] namely in compelling it to take radically seriously what it says about the true humanity of Jesus, his human subjectivity and setting in history[23] and to make even plainer than heretofore that the 'Hypostatic Union' does not diminish the humanity of Jesus but starkly declares it at its high point of autonomy and distinctness from God.[24] In order for biblical study to attain such a positive value for dogmatic Christology, much closer co-operation is required between exegesis and dogmatics than we have been accustomed to in recent decades.[25] But in this working-together the dogmatic theologian must not expect results from the exegete which the [18] For a historical and factual account of form-criticism cf. K. Koch, Was ist Formgeschichte? Neue Wege der Bibelexegese (Neukirchen, 1964); J. Rohde, Die redaktionsgeschichtliche Methode (Hamburg, 1966); for the Catholic side cf. the splendid study by A. Vögtle, Das Neue Testament und die neuere katholische Exegese I (Freiburg, 1966).

---

[19] cf. the conciliar constitution Dei Verbum, No. 12, and the relevant commentaries.

[20] cf. ibid., No. 19 and the presentation by A. Vögtle, loc. cit. (cf. note 18), pp. 68-96.

[21] For the latest developments in the study of the historical Jesus cf. the large report on the literature by W. G. Kümmel, 'Jesus-Forschung seit 1950', Theologische Rundschau NF 31 (1965/66), pp. 15-46 and subsequent issues.

[22] For an example with particular reference to the title 'the Son' cf. the author's own discussion in Mysterium Salutis (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 356 ff.

[23] With reference to the question of the self-awareness of Jesus cf. the historical study of the problem by H. Riedlinger, Geschichtlichkeit und Vollendung des Wissens Christi = Quaest. disp. 32 (Freiburg, 1966).

[24] cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120; also 'Current problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 149-200 B. Welte, 'Zur Christologie von Chalkedon', Auf der Spur des Ewigen (Freiburg, 1965), pp. 429-458; F. Malmberg, Über den Gottmenschen = Quaest. disp. 9 (Freiburg, 1959).

[25] cf. K. Rahner, 'Exegesis and Dogmatic Theology', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 67-93.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

latter is unable, in all historical integrity, to give. The dogmatic theologian must show better than before that, within a correct understanding of Christological dogma (purified of mythological accretions), the exegete's genuine results are quite adequate as a point of departure and a foundation for dogmatics. So this co-operation is of the greatest practical value for evangelism today, for only in this way can Christology so develop as to satisfy today's conditions of faith.

Furthermore the Decree on Priestly Formation[26] in the future has provided Catholic biblical studies with a larger and more fundamental task than merely the furnishing of proof-texts for theses which have already been selected for exegetical study. Biblical theology is commissioned to determine, as a result of its own studies, what are to be the themes of systematic theology, i.e. not merely to insert the appropriate biblical material into a given scholastic framework (as is clearly the case, for instance, even in von Ceuppen's Biblical Theology). As opposed to the previous analytic and scholastic method (whereby a thesis is propounded, analysed according to its concepts and then proved from [14] 'sources'), there can be no doubt that an a posteriori and synthetic method will facilitate a considerable enrichment and change of perspective of the compass of dogmatic theology. Themes such as a Theology of History, a Theology of the Word, the Hermeneutics of Theological Statements, will then automatically find a place in systematic theology. Or to give a small but important example: up to the present day there is probably not a single official Catholic ecclesiology which expounds a theology of the local church as a concrete actualization of the Church as a whole,[27] a theme expressly recommended by the text of the Constitution on the Church. However, in a dogmatic ecclesiology whose subject-matter had been dictated by biblical theology it would have been assumed at the outset. It is now the business of biblical studies to do justice to this officially commissioned task of being, in a sense, the mistress and not merely the handmaid of dogmatic theology.

V

Something more must be said concerning 'systematic' theology, i.e. chiefly dogmatics and moral theology. First of all it is clear that the Council has rightly proposed many tasks as a result of its express teaching. Theology will have to concern itself above all with the Council's ecclesiology. The Council has naturally formulated its teaching according to tradition. But that does not militate against the fact that it has moved many themes in ecclesiology to the forefront of our theological awareness which will reward and which require further consideration, and which have in addition thoroughly practical consequences. We mention here only a few of these themes, in no systematic or logical order: the more precise relation of papal primacy to the whole episcopate;[28] the nature of [15] the [26] cf. the Decree on Priestly Formation, No. 16.

[27] In detail with respect to the Council cf. K. Rahner, 'Das neue Bild der Kirche', Geist und Leben 39 (1966), pp. 4-24, esp. pp. 7-11; cf. 'The new image of the Church', Theological Investigations, X; cf. the Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II (cf. note 4); also Lebendiges Zeugnis, Nos. 2-4 (October, 1966), pp. 32-45, cf. 'On the presence of Christ in the Diaspora Community', Theological Investigations X; B. Neunhäuser OSB, 'Gesamtkirche und Einzelkirche', De Ecclesia, ed. G. Baraúna, vol. 1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 547-573. Cf. also 'The presence of the Lord in the Christian Community at worship', Theological Investigations X.

[28] cf. The Episcopate and the Primacy by the author (together with J. Ratzinger) (Freiburg and London, 1962), the author's commentary on the third chapter of the Constitution on the Church referred to on p. 5 note 4, and a study of the question of the bearer of full authority in the Church in the Festschrift für Erzbischof P. Parente (special issue of the Roman periodical Euntes Docete), cf. 'On the relationship between the Pope and the College of Bishops', Theological Investigations X.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

magisterium;[29] the relationship of scripture and tradition;[30] the place of law in the Church as the sacramental gift of the Holy Spirit; charismatic roles in the Church;[31] the theology of the diaconate;[32] the eschatological character of the Church;[33] the non-Christian's possibility of salvation;[34] the ecclesiological aspect of Penance[35] (and of all the sacraments); the nature of revelation and salvation-history;[36] the general application of the synodical principle in the Church's constitution; the ecclesiological significance of the Evangelical Counsels and of the religious Orders in the Church; the meaning and importance of what is called the hierarchy of revealed truths;[37] the theology of mission;[38] the possibility of a communicatio in sacris among separated Christians;[39] the theology of the function of the non-Christian religions in collective and individual [16] salvation-history;[40] the Pope's obligation to avail himself of the Church's collegial organs (even if this obligation cannot juridically be standardised any further); the theology of the local community and altar-congregation as the Church;[41] the possibility of a historical development of the jus divinum in apostolic times;[42] the theology of the Word[43] and theological hermeneutics; the Church as sacramentum salutis mundi;[44] the theology of sin in [29] For this problem in the light of the decisions of the Council cf. Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II (cf. note 4).

---

[30] cf. K. Rahner, 'Scripture and Tradition', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 98-112; K. Rahner/J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition = Quaest. disp. (Freiburg and London, 1966); K. Rahner, 'Tradition', LThK X (Freiburg, [2] 1965), cols. 293-99.

[31] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theology of the Restoration of the Diaconate', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 268-314; also 'Die Lehre des II. Vatikanischen Konzils über den Diakonat', Der Seelsorger 36 (1966), pp. 193-200, cf. 'The teaching of the Second Vatican Council on the diaconate', Theological Investigations X.

[32] cf. K. Rahner, The Dynamic Element in the Church = Quaest. disp. (Freiburg and London, 1964); Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 154-160; II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 76 ff., 274 ff. (literature); Vom Sinn des kirchlichen Amtes (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 33 ff.

[33] cf. Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 253-312.

[34] cf. K. Rahner, 'Anonymous Christians', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 390-398; also 'Atheism and implicit Christianity' in this volume, pp. 145 ff.

[35] For further details cf. the studies referred to in notes 2 and 3.

[36] cf. K. Rahner, 'History of the World and Salvation-history', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 97-114; K. Rahner/J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition = Quaest. disp. (Freiburg and London, 1966); in greater detail A. Darlap, Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 3-156.

[37] cf. the Decree on Ecumenism, No. 11, and the question of the simplicity of faith in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 142-145.

[38] For the fundamentally new aspects of the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity cf. J. Ratzinger, Die letzte Sitzungsperiode des Konzils (Cologne, 1966), pp. 59-63; K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 46-80.

[39] cf. the Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches, Nos. 26-27; the Decree on Ecumenism, Nos. 9 and 15. Cf. the commentary by Abbot M. Höck, Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II (New York and London, 1967).

[40] cf. K. Rahner, 'Christianity and the non-Christian Religions', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 115-134; H. R. Schlette, Towards a Theology of Religions = Quaest. disp. (Freiburg and London, 1966); also 'Die Kirche und die Religionen', Umkehr und Erneuerung, ed. Th. Filthaut (Mainz, 1966), pp. 292-311; J. Ratzinger, 'Der christliche Glaube und die Weltreligionen', Gott in Welt. Festschrift für K. Rahner (Freiburg, 1964) II, pp. 287-305; H. Fries, 'Das Christentum und die Religionen der Welt', Das Christentum und die Weltreligionen = Studien und Berichte der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern 27 (Wurzburg, 1965), pp. 13-37; H. Küng, Christenheit als Minderheit = Theol. Meditationen 12 (Einsiedeln, 1965); J. Feiner, 'Kirche und Heilsgeschichte', Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 324-336.

[41] cf. the literature referred to in note 27.

[42] cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflection on the Concept of "ius divinum" in Catholic Thought', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 219-243.

[43] cf. the various works by L. Scheffczyk, O. Semmelroth, H. U. von Balthasar, J. Betz, W. Breuning, H. Fries, K. Rahner et al.

[44] cf. the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Nos. 1, 9, 48, 59; the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Nos. 42 and 45; the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, No. 15; P. Smulders, 'Die Kirche als Sakrament des Heils', De Ecclesia, ed. G. Baraúna (Freiburg, 1966) I, pp. 289-312 (literature); K.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Church;[45] the theology of the Church's historically determined knowledge of truth;[46] and of the equally possible fallibility of this knowledge; these and many other broadly speaking ecclesiological themes have been broached by the Council. In addition to the work of directly commentating the Council's theological texts, systematic theology will doubtless have to concern itself considerably with these matters, and it will certainly have to do and say more than the traditional maxims current in theology before the Council. After this explicit programme on the part of the Council it can really no longer be said that present systematic theology – apart from the retrospective study of the history of dogma – can only conquer new territory in peripheral areas or special fields like that of Mariology, as everything else is already clear and cannot be better expressed.

[17] I may be mistaken, but the description of future moral theology in the Decree on Priestly Formation[47] strikes me as a biting but just criticism of the sort of moral theology generally widespread in seminaries. The Decree conceives the tasks and methods of moral theology quite differently from actual practice to date. For it demands a moral and biblical theology, a moral theology positively orientated towards love, the abandonment of a constricted concern merely for the individual's salvation, a morality of service to the world; these are all things which are so far not to be found in the average text-book.[48]

VI

There is a very understandable and attractive temptation, but one which would carry with it dire consequences for the future, and that is to think of the main task of systematic theology in the next few decades as the writing of commentaries on the Council's documents, and justifying historically and deepening systematically the themes explicitly discussed by the Council. Such a development in the theology of the next few years, however, would contradict the spirit and the intention of the Council. The Council did not intend to invite theology to be the means of the Church becoming turned in on itself.[49] It was the Council's intention to confront the Church of its own time with determination and courage. That was the Council's real aim. But in this situation of a Church which wishes to seek and find modern man and does not intend to be a historical relic of sociologically earlier times, the Church has to face quite different and more radical questions than those like the question of a more refined ecclesiology, for instance, which were explicitly posed by the Council. The latest questions are at the same time the oldest and most fundamental for Christianity. First of all the question of God, which requires in answer a theology of all forms of atheism[50] and agnosticism.[51] This question must ask, within a unified transcendental framework that [18] yet gives full scope for man's whole essence, about God himself and about the possibility and

---

Rahner, 'Das neue Bild der Kirche' (cf. note 27), cf. 'The new image of the Church', Theological Investigations X.

[45] cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 253-294.

[46] cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 727-787 (literature); K. Rahner, 'Zur Geschichtlichkeit der Theologie', Integritas. Festschrift für K. Holzamer, ed. D. Stolte/R. Wisser (Tübingen, 1966), pp. 75-95, in this volume, pp. 64 ff.

[47] cf. Nos. 11 and 16.

[48] Details in the extensive study by J. Fuchs, 'Theologia Moralis Perficienda. Votum Concilii Vaticani II', Periodica de re morali, canonica, liturgica 55 (1966), pp. 499-548 (literature).

[49] For the diverse results of an ecclesiological self-reflection cf. K. Rahner, Das neue Bild der Kirche, pp. 4-7; cf. 'The new image of the Church', Theological Investigations X.

[50] Apart from the paper referred to on p. 15 note 34 cf. the whole issue of Concilium 3 (1967) (March).

[51] cf. J. B. Metz, 'Unbelief as a Theological Problem', Concilium 1 (1965) (June); also, 'Kirche für die Ungläubigen?', Umkehr und Erneuerung (cf. p. 16 note 40), pp. 312-329.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the 'practice' of a genuine experience of God for modern man,[52] for whom God does not 'exist' 'in' the world.[53] This God-seeking theology must not deny the classical distinction between a metaphysical knowledge of God and the theology of the revelation of God, but must comprehend both and unite them in a new perspective.[54] It must take modern man's distress seriously with his experience – perhaps wrongly interpreted – of the 'absence of God', and must suffer this experience together with him.[55] Theology must not merely demonstrate in the abstract that the contingent character of finite being and the formal transcendence of the intellect imply God, such that experience of this contingence and transcendence implies experience of God.[56] It must inquire more precisely where and how modern man can so experience this that he is enabled to realise genuinely and confidently the objective nature of its implications, without desperately having the impression that he ought to be silent about what ultimately eludes language, leaving 'God' – though unexpressed – to the field of the love of one's neighbour, the courage of personal committal to one's own future, or the honest and willing acceptance of a bitter and absurd existence.

Then there is the question of Christ within an evolutionist world view[57] and within the perspective of a salvation-history which embraces the whole of humanity from the very outset, understanding Christ really as the apex of this general history of salvation and revelation.[58] There is the question of a framework of Christological concepts avoiding any undertones [19] likely to seem mythological to the ears of modern man,[59] and the search for a method of retracing the progress of the earliest pre-Pauline Christology from the Historical Jesus to the Christ of Faith.

Further, the question arises of an anthropology[60] which should interpret modern man to himself as he actually experiences himself in an existence embracing more than the 'animal rationale' of an abstract metaphysics; the question of a Christian anthropology which grasps the original unity of nature and grace[61] and does not banish what we in Christian terms call 'grace' to some region beyond concrete existence,[62] an anthropology which does not simply abandon factors like intercommunication,[63] love, the experience of the absurd,[64] of death,[65] to

---

[52] cf. K. Rahner, 'Christian living formerly and today', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3 ff.

[53] In detail cf. K. Rahner, 'Science as a "Confession"?', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 385-400; also, 'The man of today and religion', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 3-20; 'Being open to God as ever greater', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 25-46.

[54] cf. K. Rahner, 'Bemerkungen zur Gotteslehre in der kath. Dogmatik', Catholica 20 (1966), pp. 1-18; cf. in this volume, pp. 127-144.

[55] Besides the papers referred to in note 53, cf. the author's Im Heute glauben (Einsiedeln, [3] 1966), pp. 24-31.

[56] For the new shape of such a philosophy of religion cf. B. Welte, Heilsverständnis (Freiburg, 1966); also his Auf der Spur des Ewigen (Freiburg, 1965), pp. 315-336.

[57] cf. K. Rahner, 'Christology within an evolutionary view of the world', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 157-192.

[58] cf. the studies referred to on p.15 note 40. Also E. Schillebeeckx, 'The Church and Mankind', Concilium 1 (1965) (January).

[59] For further details cf. the studies referred to on p. 13 note 24. Cf. K. Rahner, 'I believe in Jesus Christ', this volume, pp. 165-8.

[60] cf. K. Rahner, 'Theologie und Anthropologie', Wahrheit und Verkündigung. Festschrift für M. Schmaus, ed. L. Scheffczyk/W.R. Dettloff/R. Heinzmann (Munich, 1967) I, pp. 1389-1407, cf. in this volume pp. 28-45.

[61] A more exhaustive treatment in K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 208-228.

[62] cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the experience of Grace', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 86-90; also his Alltägliche Dinge (Einsiedeln, 1966).

[63] Details in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 31 f., 272 f.; 'Reflections on the unity of the love of neighbour and the love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

[64] cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 34 ff.; K. Rahner, 'Christlicher Humanismus', Orientierung 30 (1966), pp. 116-121, esp.. 119 ff., cf. in this volume pp. 187 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

moral theology or the realm of pious literature.

Finally we must include everything which can come under the heading of dogmatic eschatology. We lack a real hermeneutics[66] of eschatological statements; there must be much more radical thought about the relationship between individual and collective eschatology if our proclamation of the 'last things' is to be really worthy of belief today. The fundamental tenor of modern man's existence by no means exempts him from the danger of falling back into an Old Testament attitude towards the 'beyond'; the hope and postulate of an eternal life for the individual are not common assumptions forming a basis for discussion, as in the time of the [20] rationalistic Enlightenment, but attitudes into which men of today and tomorrow must first be carefully 'initiated'. Christian eschatology has not yet been obliged to face up sufficiently to the secular and utopian 'eschatology' of the age beginning now, with its view of a single humanity,[67] its 'hominisation' of environment,[68] and man's manipulation of himself[69] – a period in which man's practice, as opposed to what was previously his theory, appears in a totally new way as his highest and as his specific characteristic. A theology of hope[70] has yet to be developed out of the dry attempts text-books have made concerning the theological Virtue of Hope. We have as yet no theological ontology of hope, showing man as essentially one who exists in hope, and whose hope springs from an independent and original source which cannot be explained adequately simply in terms of a knowledge of the organic and evolutionary character of being and its possibilities. Only such a theology of hope as this could really come to grips competently with the Marxist conception of man.

The dialogue desired by the Pastoral Constitution of Vatican II between the world's hope and the hope of Christianity[71] has yet to take place. In short, the subject-matter which the Council has delivered to tomorrow's theology is not the same subject-matter as discussed explicitly by the Council itself (if we exclude the remarks concerning 'the Church in the Modern World'), but the fundamental themes of the [21] Christian message upon which rests the whole hierarchically structured edifice of Catholic dogma: i.e., ultimate things concerning man's deepest need and his most exalted vocation. This is what tomorrow's theology must ponder if it is to be a theology worthy of the Council. It must carry this out with a faith which is prepared to be vulnerable,[72] which is continually breaking through the clear definitions of [65] Ibid., K. Rahner, 'On Christian dying', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 285 ff., cf. also pp. 25-144.

---

[66] For a first attempt cf. the essay 'The Hermeneutics of Eschatological Assertions', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 323-346, cf. also pp. 347-354 and Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 159-168.

[67] Initial starting-points in K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68, cf. also pp. 43-58; Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 135-153; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 32 f., 33 f., 254 f.; II/2, pp. 40 ff., 42 ff., 109-202, 275 ff., cf. also supra, note 64.

[68] cf. J. B. Metz, 'Die Zukunft des Glaubens in einer hominisierten Welt', Weltverständnis im Glauben, ed. J. B. Metz/J. Splett (Mainz, 1965), pp. 45-62.

[69] For the issues involved cf. K. Rahner, 'Experiment Mensch. Theologisches zur Selbstmanipulation des Menschen', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Aufriß einer philosophischen Anthropologie. Festschrift für Max Müller, ed. H. Rombach (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 45-69, cf. in this volume pp. 205-224 and 225-252.

[70] cf. J. B. Mets, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz, 1968); cf. the author's 'On the theology of hope', Theological Investigations X.

[71] cf. p. 7 note 7 and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Nos. 85, 90, 92, 43, 3, 25, 21, 19, 56, 40, 23, 28; the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, Nos. 20, 16, 41, 11, 38; the Decree on Ecumenism, Nos. 4, 9, 11, 19, 21, 23, 14, 18; the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, Nos. 12, 14, 29, 31; the Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church, No. 13; the Declaration on Religious Freedom, No. 3; the Declaration in the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, Nos. 2 and 4; the Decree on Priestly Formation, No. 19; the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests, No. 19; the Declaration on Christian Education, Nos. 1 and 11.

[72] cf. K. Rahner, Im Heute glauben, pp. 24-31.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formulas into the incomprehensibility of God,[73] a faith which compels theology to realise that this incomprehensibility is something quite simple and natural.[74]

It would also be good for theologians to consider how one might tell a modern man briefly what it is that Christianity proclaims and offers, yet at the same time in a comprehensible way and in a dynamic formula capable of driving him deeper into the fulness of faith.[75] There is no need for us to wish to replace or lay aside Apostolic Tradition. But practically no-one is taking the considerable pains necessary to correct the present tendency, where, on account of the widely different forms of theology and preaching, modern man cannot see the wood for the trees and thus does not penetrate to the 'fundamentals' of the faith which bear the 'hierarchy of truths',[76] which in turn give meaning and credibility to the whole complex structure of Christian doctrine. There are, or were, such 'short formulas'; they need not necessarily consist of only one sentence or of very few. Probably the earliest authoritative extant examples are 1 Cor 15:3-5 and 1 Thess 1:9 f.;[77] the most recent can be found in the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, No.13.[78] But much more could be done in this direction, all the more since one must not be in a hurry to regard the formula 'the Word (the Son) of God became man' as being very meaningful or as commending itself to faith nowadays. As a bare formula, devoid of any further explanation, it can be very easily misunderstood, or so abbreviated that it is rejected almost instinctively as [22] myth. Furthermore it is not safe to assume, in undertaking such a task, that people understand what is really meant when one uses the word 'God'.

VII

It is my opinion that these particular tasks of 'systematic' theology will also result at last in a correct and promising understanding of 'ecumenical theology'. Of course there must be direct ecumenical theology, controversial dialogue,[79] discussing the differences of doctrine between the Christian communions, clearing away misunderstanding, slowly learning to translate the various languages of the disparate theologies into each other, a theological controversy seeking unity and not more and more subtle justification for the disunity of the Churches. Certainly much has already been successfully achieved in this field in the last few decades.

It must be clearly emphasised that we have much to learn, not only from Protestant exegesis and biblical theology, but also from Protestant systematic theology. The task of learning does not only imply that, as far as the traditionally controversial themes are concerned, we must first of all discover exactly what the Fathers of Protestantism, its confessions of faith and its present theology precisely mean in all their various nuances; not

---

[73] cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 689 f., 691 f., 696 ff., 768 f.
[74] cf. the papers referred to on p. 18 notes 52 and 53.
[75] For the need and the point of this kind of short formula, together with a sketch of the essence of faith cf. K. Rahner, Concilium 3 (1967) (March), cf. in this volume, pp. 117-126.
[76] cf. the Decree on Ecumenism, No. 11.
[77] For the exegetical import of these credal formulas cf. K. Lehmann, Auferstanden am dritten Tag (Freiburg, 1968) (incl. exhaustive literature).
[78] The text runs: '[Yet it is sufficient] that a man realize that he has been snatched away from sin and led into the mystery of the love of God, who has called him to enter into a personal relationship with Him in Christ.' (The Documents of Vatican II, ed. Walter M. Abbott, S.J. (London, 1967), p. 600.)
[79] Here it is impossible to deal in detail with the change of style of previous controversial theology. Cf. R. Köster's Luthers These 'Gerecht und Sünder zugleich' in der Interpretation Rudolf Hermanns (Diss. theol., Innsbruck, 1965), pp. 1-62; also R. Köster, Zeitschrift für kathol. Theologie 88 (1966), pp. 121-162 (a revised version of the cited introduction to the dissertation).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only must we go beyond the often frighteningly over-simplified representations of Protestant doctrine found too frequently in our textbooks;[80] above and beyond this there is an almost inconceivable wealth of theological questions and studies in Protestant theology concerning subjects which are not directly and explicitly matters of controversy, but which are all the same of greatest importance for theology on both sides. The relationship of word and sacrament or of institution and the occurrence (of grace), or the questions of theological hermeneutics, for instance, are not only, or even primarily, controversial matters on which the churches are divided, but rather themes of mutual concern, where Catholic theology can learn a great deal from Protestant theology and where in certain circumstances the lines of division of opinion cut right across confessional boundaries. In short, Catholic theology must in [23] future be willing to learn from Protestant theology in the area of systematics also. It is obliged to do so by the Council's Ecumenical Decree. In future the names of Protestant theologians should not only occur in our text-books at the point where 'adversarii' and their 'errores' are cited.

All this, if properly understood, is important and must be strongly emphasised here. But if ecumenism in general is only to have a real chance of uniting Christendom by the progress towards one future Church (which a Catholic too may say, who believes in the enduring and obligatory character of his Church's defined dogma and is convinced that the true Church of Christ 'subsists' in the Roman Catholic Church),[81] the same thing applies all the more to ecumenical theology. All churches and Christian communions will only find the same language and a common confession of faith, not in the first place by discussing present doctrinal differences as they have emerged from the past, but by all taking pains to learn the new language of the future which is to serve to proclaim the Gospel of Christ – without over-simplifying superficialities of Robinson's kind[82] – so that tomorrow's man can understand it. Christian theology for today's 'heathen' is also the best ecumenical theology.[83] Naturally efforts are being made in this direction on both sides. But they are insufficient in quantity and quality, at least on the Catholic side. We do not have the 1,000 volumes on 'atheism' which would be needed if we were to justify the innumerable books of Mariology which we do have.

Given all this, we may make a similar observation with regard to the Protestant side. It is precisely the 'orthodox' theology, with which we are most closely concerned, which is in danger of remaining a theology for an ever-diminishing circle of pious believers, and of being preoccupied with the discussion between the various theological alignments within Protestantism and with the ecumenical dialogue, to the neglect of tomorrow's theology for the 'heathen' with whom we in the diaspora live. But if this theology is pursued by both sides it will be the most hopeful and important branch of an ecumenical theology. Might it not come about, for instance, that when Protestants manage to present the doctrine of [24] Justification in a form which modern man can really find credible – and I am not denying the burden and difficulty of such a new task – Catholic theologians might be able to give their assent to it? If we Catholics can see more clearly, through a theology in dialogue with modern man, that the question of 'morality' and 'works' is ultimately the question of God, his grace and thus the question of faith, might it not be that the Protestant Christian could [80] Of course the same is true of the other side, as far as Catholic doctrine is concerned.

[81] cf. the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, No. 8, cf. the commentary by Alois Grillmeier, Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II (New York and London, 1967) I, pp. 170 f., 199 f., and note 33 (literature). Further K. Rahner, 'Kirche, Kirchen und Religionen', Theologische Akademie 3, ed. K. Rahner/O. Semmelroth (Frankfurt, 1966), pp. 70-87, esp. 79 ff., cf. 'Church, churches and religions', Theological Investigations X.
[82] For a correct Catholic understanding of the simplicity of faith cf. K. Rahner, Im Heute glauben, pp. 32-42; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 142 ff.; II/2, pp. 164 ff.
[83] In more detail cf. K. Lehmann, Concilium 3 (1967).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

come to understand that we Catholics do not after all subscribe to a theology of self-justification, but that for us too 'faith' may be the key word for our relationship with God? If then, instead of justifying the differences and divisions in the Church, conditioned as they are by history, society, psychology and race, by means of increasingly subtle theological distinctions and theories, we determined to strive for a possible common confession of faith, sufficient (though not ignoring the remaining deep differences between the 'schools') for the Church's unity in the matters of Baptism and the Supper of the Lord, and sufficient for a social unity as far as is necessary according to the will of Christ; if the Catholic Christian asked nothing more of the separated brethren than what genuine dogma[84] and ius divinum[85] demand (and we still await a clear decision in this direction); then one can hope against hope for a unity in the Church embracing all who expressly acknowledge Jesus Christ as Lord.

VIII

We must speak of yet another theology and its future tasks: practical theology, usually known to us as 'pastoral theology'. Pastoral theology can no longer be merely a collection of pious recommendations for the simple parish clergy in the holy and effective execution of their office, especially after a Council which intended to be essentially 'pastoral',[86] in which the Church reflected specifically on the novel future she is going forward to meet, and in which there was discussion of the college of bishops, the office of a bishop, bishops' conferences, of the responsibility of the whole Church for mission and of each part of the Church for the whole. Practical theology today must concern itself with the Church's total sphere of action, with the help of theological reflection on the [25] Church's present situation.[87] If a Council discusses 'the Church in the Modern World' in a special Constitution, theology too must deal with the subject with the greatest thoroughness and clarity and in a truly theological way. So far, however, we do not find this particular theme treated as an explicit topic of theology; the Council of the Church has left its usual theology far behind in this matter. One cannot fail to be aware of this, however critical one may be as to the details of the Pastoral Constitution.

Where else should this theme of the Council's be expressed and where should the questions be brought together, if not in pastoral theology? Indeed, the Constitution's title itself declares this to be the case, and it is also emphasized by the Decree on Priestly Formation, which demands an independent discipline of pastoral theology and also that the latter should permeate and fertilize all other disciplines.[88] Canon law alone cannot carry out this task. Not only because its business is more the history and interpretation of existing law than the question 'de lege condenda', but chiefly because the total activity of the Church is not commensurate with the observation of explicit legal norms, neither with those in force nor with those which should be.[89] In an age of cybernetics, of the great social organizations with their self-regulating controls, questions such as how the Church as a whole is to live and act, how the central authorities in Rome should be constructed, how we should have a strategy of [84] cf. the remarks on p. 4 note 1.

---

[85] cf. the study mentioned on p. 16 note 42.
[86] For the problems involved in this concept cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur theologischen Problematik einer "Pastoralkonstitution"' (cf. p. 7 note 8) and the author's introduction in K. Rahner/H. Vorgrimler (ed.), Kleines Konzilskompendium (Freiburg, [2] 1967), pp. 13-33; also K. Rahner, Das Konzil – ein neuer Beginn (Freiburg, 1966).
[87] cf. the study referred to on p. 7 note 8 and the author's remarks in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 178-276.
[88] cf. the Decree on Priestly Formation, Chapter VI, Nos. 19-21.
[89] cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg, 1965), pp. 333-343.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mission and not merely 'tactics', how a diocese should be administered, how we should be influencing the 'politics' of learning and culture with its wide sphere of penetration; all these issues can no longer be entrusted in a paternalistic manner to the wisdom, savoir faire and experience of the leading men of the Church.[90] Of course, the decision must be theirs. But the consideration and study necessary before the decision, in all questions of the Church's present commission, require nowadays scientific method and systematic execution. We need a pastoral theology which, as far as the scope mentioned here is concerned, does not yet exist. The pastoral Council calls for a new pastoral theology, broader in its compass and deeper in its methods, which, within the enduring statements of [26] ecclesiology concerning the Church's permanent essence, and enlightened by a theological view of the present situation, seeks to discover at least approximately what are the imperatives which must determine the Church's concrete action as a whole. Practically everything remains yet to be done in this kind of scientific 'practical theology' with its own formal object and its own method.

IX

The Council's 'challenge' to theology is great; greater, no doubt, than the Council fathers themselves realised. This renewal of theology, its aggiornamento,[91] should be encouraged by those in authority in the Church as well. Not only by the regional bishops' conferences carrying out the task committed to them by the Council thoroughly and with all speed, and finding and issuing a new ratio studiorum for the training of the clergy; not only by the bishops being magnanimous and courageous in providing enough priests for the work of study in spite of the shortage of clergy, which is to some extent real and to some extent imaginary;[92] not only by the bishops encouraging lay theologians above and beyond the requirements for schoolteachers of religion, giving them aims and opportunities for their own theological study, since there is by no means any need for the διδάσκαλοι and the πρεσβύτεροι in the Church to be always the same people;[93] not only by the bishops in their home dioceses maintaining – as far as conditions allow, and in their own interest and in the interest of theology itself – the kind of contact with theologians which they found in Rome (much to the surprise and joy of the theologians and themselves); not only because the Papal Secretariats for Ecumenism, Non-Christian Religions and Modern Atheism can only fulfil their functions as a result of a renewed theology and they should thus help to encourage it; but in a world which has now become a world of science, of 'egg-heads' and specialists, the Church could and ought officially to accept the responsibility of furthering theology in many other ways and institutions of theological study, beyond what has been said here. There is still very [27] considerable progress to be made to make Catholic theology international.[94] Since no-one can do everything, why could there not be internationally agreed and arranged centres of special study in theology to the advantage and with the co-operation of the whole of Catholic theology? Could there not be a collection of funds from the whole Church for [90] cf. the author's studies: 'Kirchliches Lehramt und Theologie nach dem Konzil', Stimmen der Zeit 178 (1966), pp. 404-420; 'Vom Dialog in der Kirche', ibid. 179 (1967), pp. 81-95, both in this volume, pp. 83 ff. and 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations X.

[91] cf. p. 24 note 86.
[92] For this problem cf. the author's indications in N. Greinacher/H. T. Risse (ed.), Bilanz des deutschen Katholizismus (Mainz, 1966), pp. 506-508.
[93] For instance, why should there not also be laymen among the professors of the Catholic faculties? Can one debar laymen from exercising functions not necessarily connected with priesthood without betraying the spirit of the Council? Cf. the composite volume referred to in note 92, esp. pp. 504-506.
[94] The first-fruits of this kind of concrete co-operation are the international theological journal Concilium (1965 ff.) and the lexicon Sacramentum Mundi (English edition 1968 ff.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic theology as for Catholic missions, though on a more modest scale? Could not the contact between Church administration and Church study be closer and institutionally more regulated? Could not the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, which arose out of the old Holy Office, positively encourage theology by creating 'study commissions' on the more important questions which concern it, and by entrusting them to theologians outside Rome as well, working ideally in a team project?[95] In brief we must ask whether the whole business of theological study in the Church could and must not adopt, in its own way, with less self-consciousness and to a greater degree than hitherto, the sociologically and technically determined organizational forms which have become essential and hence usual in modern science and society.[96]

Programmes and institutions cannot replace men of creativity, least of all in theology. It follows that in the future too, theology will remain the gift of the Spirit to the Church. But he will summon and empower it out of the longings and needs of the times. There must be theology, so that 'the Word of the Lord may speed on and be glorified' (2 Thess 3:1). If theology trusts in the Grace of God and is really one with its mission to tomorrow's world, it will become good theology, achieving what the Council has empowered it to do.

[95] For instance, when one studies the Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy one may doubt whether the decision of the Holy Office (now the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith) in 1957 concerning concelebration (DS 3928) would have been exactly the same if an international commission of expert theologians and liturgists had studied the question seriously beforehand.

[96] cf. p. 25 note 90.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[28]

2

THEOLOGY AND ANTHROPOLOGY

This short paper[1] is intended to show that dogmatic theology today must be theological anthropology and that such an 'anthropocentric' view is necessary and fruitful. The question of man and its answering may not be regarded, therefore, as an area of study separate from other theological areas as to its scope and subject-matter, but as the whole of dogmatic theology itself. This statement does not contradict the 'theocentricity' of all theology as expressed, for instance, in St Thomas' doctrine that God is as such the formal object of revelation theology. As soon as man is understood as the being who is absolutely transcendent in respect of God, 'anthropocentricity' and 'theocentricity' in theology are not opposites but strictly one and the same thing, seen from two sides. Neither of the two aspects can be comprehended at all without the other. Thus, although anthropocentricity in theology is not the opposite of the strictest theocentricity, it is opposed to the idea that in theology man is one particular theme among others, e.g. angels, the material world; or that it is possible to say something about God theologically without thereby automatically saying something about man and vice versa; or that these two kinds of statements are connected with one another in respect of their object, but not in the process of knowing itself.

Similarly, this anthropological focus in theology is not opposed to or in competition with a Christological focus. It is not possible to demonstrate this in more detail here; we merely observe that anthropology and Christology mutually determine each other within Christian dogmatics if they are both correctly understood. Christian anthropology is only able to fulfil its whole purpose if it understands man as the potentia obœdientalis for the 'Hypostatic Union'. And Christology can only be undertaken from the point of view of this kind of transcendental anthropology; for in order to say today what the 'Hypostatic Union' is without being suspected of merely reproducing no longer feasible 'mythologies', the idea of the God-man needs proof of a transcendental orientation in [29] man's being and history under grace.[2] A purely a posteriori Christology, unable to integrate Christology correctly into an evolutionary total view of the world,[3] would not find it easy to dismiss the suspicion of propounding mythology.

I

This anthropology is naturally to be understood as a transcendental anthropology. A transcendental investigation examines an issue according to the necessary conditions given by the possibility of knowledge and action on the part of the subject himself. Such an investigation presupposes that the subject of the act of knowing is not simply a 'thing' among others which can be made at will the object of a statement including other objects, but which is not present at all – even implicitly – in statements purely about other objects. If I speak of Australia I have not said anything, not even implicitly, about Java. But in such a statement (from the point of view of its content and import) I have said something implicitly about man

[1] cf. the list of sources for the occasion of this paper.
[2] cf. 'On the Theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120.
[3] cf. 'Christology within an Evolutionary view of the World', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 157-192.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as its subject (in so far as the statement, in order to be possible at all, necessarily presupposes various things about man). I have expressed and affirmed this by means of subjective implication. Therefore, if one wishes to pursue dogmatics as transcendental anthropology, it means that whenever one is confronted with an object of dogma, one inquires as to the conditions necessary for it to be known by the theological subject, ascertaining that the a priori conditions for knowledge of the object are satisfied, and showing that they imply and express something about the object, the mode, method and limits of knowing it.

In general, transcendental investigation does not assume that the material content of the object in question can be adequately deduced from the transcendental conditions whereby it is known by the subject, nor that this content, known a posteriori, is unimportant for the subject's existence (his 'salvation') and for the truth of his knowledge. It does not regard this content as in itself merely indifferent material whereby the subject experiences his own a priori and necessary being. This applies fundamentally and decisively to a theological transcendental investigation and method as well. For instance, not only is it important for a true Christology to understand man as the being who is orientated towards an 'absolute Saviour' both a priori and in actuality (his essence having been [30] elevated and set in this direction supernaturally by grace), but it is equally important for his salvation that he is confronted with Jesus of Nazareth as this Saviour – which cannot, of course, be transcendentally 'deduced'.

On the other hand, to interpret the whole of dogmatic theology as transcendental anthropology means that every dogmatic treatment must also be considered from its transcendental angle, and that one must therefore face the question, what measure of actual material content subsists in the theological subject's a priori 'structures' implicit in a particular theological statement? In other words it means that the transcendental side of knowledge must not be overlooked but taken seriously. The problem we mentioned of the relationship between transcendental, a priori theology and descriptive, historical and a posteriori theology is not solved, of course, by what we have just said. The problem only reveals its depth and acuteness when one is aware of the fact that in theology the final a priori precondition for the subject's theological knowledge, i.e. grace (ultimately the self-communicating God, acting freely in history) is the real content, or rather, the objective foundation of what is known and experienced a posteriori in history. One finds that in theology the a priori character of the subject and the a posteriori quality of the historical object enjoy an exclusive and unique relationship. But we must return to this matter later.

Let us illustrate what we have outlined in the abstract with a few small examples chosen at random.

Theology discusses angels. In this it bases itself on the Old and New Testaments. Traditional academic theology speaks of these angels as of any other objects and phenomena. Certain things are said about them in the scriptural revelation; therefore there are angels. By collating and systematizing the data of scripture an angelology can be developed in the same way that one speaks of anything else of which one has somehow acquired knowledge. If it had so happened that God had not revealed it, then there would be no angelology; but since it has pleased him to reveal it, as he might have revealed innumerable other facts which remain hidden from us (e.g. whether there are body-soul creatures, possessed of 'sanctifying' grace, on other stars), we do have an angelology (but no theology of extra-terrestrial embodied intelligences). A modern man will ask first of all what this utterly strange angel-lore has to do with him, since angels do not occur in his scientific sphere of experience; for what purpose God is supposed to have communicated this knowledge, and whether it is credible at all. Scandalized, he will be driven to examine the course of [31] history of this so-called revelation, and will be tempted to conclude that the remarks about angels in the Old Testament (upon which the New Testament depends) do not give the impression of having been communicated from heaven, but of having drifted into the minds of the Old Testament theologians from their cultural and religious environment. Now into this situation of tension between traditional angelology and scepticism of it, a transcendental theological anthropology is to be introduced. I.e. the question must be asked: where in man's theological understanding of himself is there an area which might be occupied by such a thing as an angelology? What kind of theological self-understanding on the part of man finds expression in angelology? In other words: if we assume heuristically that revelation tells man whence he comes and what he is in the present and future, and only this, can it be made intelligible from this that an angelology belongs within such a revelation? Perhaps what is really expressed in revelation is not the existence and nature of angels as such at all, but man's relationship with them. Angels are assumed as given (and for the moment we may leave it as an open question whether this assumption is affirmed as a proposition or propounded as a hypothesis in anthropological revelation as such). We are not concerned here to show how and within what limits an angelology can be developed from such a starting-point.[4] It is only our intention to demonstrate by means of an essentially small and recondite example what is the significance of this kind of anthropological emphasis and focus in dogmatic theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let us take another example. The doctrine of the Trinity cannot easily be elicited from scripture if one is precise in one's biblical theology.[5] When the doctrine is presented in pure objectivity, the listener often wonders what it means, how he can understand any of it at all, and why it has been revealed for the purpose of his salvation; for it seems to him like a subtle, dialectical game with concepts, in which each proposition appears to eliminate every other one, and in which one can scarcely gather what is left intact in any proposition apart from various words (provided that, in attending to one proposition, one does not forget a large part of what the others contained, and thus understand it in what is from the point of view of controversial dialectic an inadmissible way). Simply to claim that one is concerned here with a mystery, and that the doctrine [32] of the Trinity is necessary in order to be able to make any Christological statement, is on its own insufficient to help us out of the situation. For even in the case of a mystery one must understand why there is more to it than merely an occasion for a sacrificium intellectus in the face of a formula of apparently unintelligible verbalisms.[6] Nor is it convincing to appeal to Christology if one considers that since Augustine academic theology has assumed unhesitatingly that any divine person can exercise a hypostatic function in a human nature; consequently we are saying very little if, when speaking of God's incarnation, we emphasise that it takes place through the Logos, whose hypostatic function per se, under these presuppositions, cannot be distinguished in any way from any other divine person's possible function.[7]

However, if the anthropocentric perspective is applied to the doctrine of the Trinity, many things become more intelligible without at the same time destroying the mystery. We need only make the quite legitimate assumption that, on account of God's absolute self-communication in 'uncreated' Grace, the immanent Trinity is strictly identical with the economic Trinity and vice versa,[8] and we are then able to read the doctrine of the Trinity 'anthropologically' without falsifying it. In other words if we presuppose that our relationship

[4] For a starting-point for an angelology cf. the article 'Angelologie' in LThK I (Freiburg,[2] 1957) cols. 533-538.
[5] cf. recently the comprehensive work of F. J. Schierse, 'Die neutestamentliche Trinitätsoffenbarung', Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 85-131.
[6] For a correct conception of mystery cf. 'The Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73.
[7] For more details cf. K. Rahner, 'Current Problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I, pp. 149-200, but especially the article mentioned in note 2.
[8] In more detail cf. 'Remarks on the Dogmatic Treatise "De Trinitate"', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 77-102.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with God, formed by grace (including its concrete appearance in salvation history), has a directly trinitarian structure; that it is always a relationship with the inconceivable God; that it is communicated by the appearance in history of God's absolute self-committal in Jesus; that this self-committal 'comes home' to us as Love at the innermost centre of our being, without losing its strictly divine character; that the consequent trinitarian structure of our direct relationship with God through grace is also proper to God because of his actual self-communication – if we assume this, then the permanent mystery of the 'immanent' Trinity is made possible.[9] This frees us from the impression of a dialectic of mere conceptual subtleties and renders it intelligible to us why that mystery had to be revealed at that particular moment in the history of revelation, when revelation had progressed to [33] the express awareness that the perfect gift of salvation is not only a gift from God by God, but is God himself. It is also no bad thing that according to this sort of understanding of the Trinity our relation in grace to the three divine Persons does not mean merely an 'appropriation'[10]; incarnation and man's divinisation through grace are more closely related than academic theology usually teaches. It is a further recommendation for this approach to the doctrine of the Trinity that it excludes right from the beginning the impression (which persists in spite of its explicit rejection in academic doctrine) that each divine 'Person' has a distinct centre of consciousness in respect of knowledge and freedom and that this is the real meaning of the word 'Person' in trinitarian doctrine as well.[11] It is not our intention here to develop a doctrine of the Trinity. The example merely illustrates what significance a transcendental anthropological approach can have in all topics of dogma, even in areas where one might perhaps least suspect its fruitfulness.

II

We must be content with these two examples and now turn to ask why this anthropological change of direction in theology is necessary. There are fundamental reasons from the nature of the case, i.e. from theology and its object. Besides this there are reasons from the contemporary situation and reasons of basic theology and apologetics.

1. First of all the reasons or reason from the nature of the case. As a consequence of the nature of every occurrence of intellectual (and hence also theological) knowledge, the question of the object of such knowledge raises at the same time the question as to the nature of the knowing subject. This inextricable interrelation of the 'objective' and 'subjective' side of knowledge does not need, of course, to be discussed or to be equally explicit in every sphere of study. A concrete discipline in natural science does not have to investigate its philosophical foundation as well: the latter is concerned with the mode of being and structure of the subject who is concretely engaged in science. But where the study of a particular field becomes really 'philosophical' in a specific sense – and theology must [34] do this of its very essence – every question concerning any object whatever also formally implies the question of the knowing subject.

A question is first stated philosophically by being put formally as the question concerning a particular object as such in the totality of reality and truth, for it is only in this way that the highest reasons, the philosophical ones, are sought out. If this is done, the subject is also [9] For a deeper foundation for a starting-point for speculative trinitarian doctrine the author refers to his more extensive contribution in Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 317-401.

[10] For the basic problems cf. 'Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace', Theological Investigations I, pp. 319-346.
[11] For the issues involved in the concept of person cf. Theological Investigations I, pp. 156 ff.; but in the first instance the contribution to Mysterium Salutis II to which we have already referred, esp. pp. 385 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

investigated, not only because it is a 'material' part of the totality, but because the totality (as that to which man is transcendentally orientated) can only exist in the subject as such according to the latter's own subjective uniqueness. The philosophical question as to a particular object is necessarily the question as to the knowing subject, because a priori the subject must carry with it the limits of the possibility of such knowledge. Thus the 'transcendental' structures of the object are already determined a priori. A really theological question can only be put, however, if it is understood as being simultaneously a philosophical one in the sense we have shown. For it is only a theological question as long as it sees the individual object with its origin in and orientation towards God.

But God is not one object among others in the realm of man's a posteriori knowledge but the fundamental ground and the absolute future[12] of all reality.

As such he can only be understood as the absolute point of man's transcendental orientation. Thus every theology of this kind is necessarily transcendental anthropology; every *onto*logy is onto*logy*.

If one wishes to avoid falling into a heretical and positivistic fideism, what has been said must be applied also to revealed theology. Revealed theology has the human spirit's transcendental and limitless horizon as its inner motive and as the precondition of its existence. It is only because of this transcendental horizon that something like 'God' can be understood at all. 'Natural', 'philosophical' theology is first and last not one sphere of study side by side with revealed theology, as if both could be pursued quite independently of each other, but an internal factor of revealed theology itself;[13] if philosophical theology, however, is transcendental anthropology, so is revealed theology too.

However, the thesis in question can be given a still more direct theological [35] basis. Firstly, revelation is revelation of salvation and therefore theology is essentially salvation theology. What is revealed and then pondered upon in theology is not an arbitrary matter, but something which is intended for man's salvation. By this statement we do not imply the sort of principle (as in the case of a 'fundamentalism') according to which certain objects can be excluded at the outset from the sphere of possible revelation, for what salvation really is is determined materially for the first time in the event of revelation. But the statement must be taken seriously. Only those things can belong to man's salvation which, when lacking, injure his 'being' and wholeness. Otherwise he could eschew salvation without thereby being in danger of losing it. This does not entail a rationalistic and unhistorical reduction of man to the status of an abstract transcendental being in his merely formal structure as such, as if what is historical and not deducible and what is experienced concretely a posteriori had no significance for salvation. It means that everything of significance for salvation is to be illuminated by referring it back to this transcendental being (which is not the same as deducing the significance from the transcendental being). In this sense, 'reduction' does not mean diminution but the process of establishing by reflex investigation. A comparison may clarify what is meant: the concrete beloved person who is the object of my love and in whom it is realized (and without whom it does not exist) cannot be deduced a priori from human possibilities, but is rather a historical occurrence, an indissoluble fact which has to be accepted. But in spite of this, such love for this concrete person can only be understood when one comprehends man as the being who must of necessity fulfil himself in love in order to be true to his nature. Even the most unpredictable, concrete love, occurring in history, must therefore be understood transcendentally in this way, in order that it may be what it should [12] For the concept of the absolute future cf. Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59 ff.

[13] cf. K. Rahner, 'Philosophy and Theology', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 71-81; for this question the studies by H. Bouillard are also of importance. In addition to his great work on Barth and his introduction to Blondel, cf. his Logik des Glaubens (Freiburg, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be. And this applies above all in the case of salvation. For even if this is a historical event, what it concerns is precisely man's actual nature; it is his nature which is to be consummated in salvation or the loss of it. If revelation and theology are essentially concerned with salvation as such, theology's structure when confronted with any object whatsoever is bound to imply the question as to man's nature, in so far as this nature is susceptible to 'saving' influence from the object involved. In other words, a theological object's significance for salvation (which is a necessary factor in any theological object) can only be investigated by inquiring at the same time as to man's saving receptivity for this object. However, this receptivity must not be investigated only 'in the abstract' nor merely presupposed in its most general aspects. It [36] must be reflected upon with reference to the concrete object concerned, which is only theologically relevant as a result of and for the purpose of this receptiveness for salvation. Thereby the object also to some extent lays down the conditions for such receptiveness.

In addition to these more formal considerations there is a decisive and clearly outlined issue. The Council's Decree on Ecumenism emphasises that not all articles of faith in the 'hierarchy' of truths are equally close to the 'fundamentals' of the Christian Faith.[14] Thus according to the Council there is a foundation, an inner core in the reality of faith, to which all other realities (and articles of faith) are related. In the nature of the case this 'foundation' can only be God himself in so far as he is our salvation through his absolute self-communication, i.e. what we in theology usually call 'uncreated grace'. Salvation is mediated exclusively in and through this grace. Grace must therefore belong at least to the core of the salvation/revelation reality. If grace and the Trinity are understood, the reality of the triune God as such is given as well. For a full understanding of this grace another important condition must be presupposed: this grace is the grace of Christ (and he is not merely external to it as the reason for its being conferred), even in the case of prelapsarian grace. At the same time this means that, within the history of grace (as the self-communication of God acting freely in history), the history of humanity has come in Christ to its own historical and eschatological apogee, irreversibly manifested. If Trinity and Incarnation are implicit in the mystery of grace, it becomes intelligible that grace not only belongs to the core of the salvation/revelation reality, but is this core. (Of course the same could be said of the Trinity, especially qua 'economic' Trinity, and also of Christ as the apogee of God's self-communication to the world, precisely because these three realities mutually imply each other.)

Now it is only possible to speak of this grace in a meaningful way at all within a transcendental anthropological context. For, without destroying the fact that grace is God himself in self-communication, grace is not a 'thing' but – as communicated grace – a conditioning of the spiritual and intellectual subject as such to a direct relationship with God. The most objective reality of salvation is at the same time necessarily the most subjective: the direct relationship of the subject with God through God himself. If what 'grace' is must not merely be expressed in a mythological-sounding verbalism which communicates no experience, it can only be understood from the point of view of the subject, with his transcendental [37] nature, experienced as a being-in-reference-to the reality of absolute truth and free-ranging, infinite, absolutely valid love. It can only be understood in one's innermost regions as an immediacy before the absolute mystery of God, i.e. as the absolute realisation of man's transcendental nature itself, made possible by God in his self-communication.[15]

Without an ontology of the transcendental subject a theology of grace (and hence all

[14] The Decree on Ecumenism, No. 11.
[15] cf. the article 'Gnade', LThK IV (Freiburg,[2] 1964), cols. 991-1000; also 'Selbstmitteilung Gottes', LThK IX (Freiburg,[2] 1964), col. 627.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theology whatsoever) remains fixed in a pre-theological picture-language and cannot give evidence of a starting-point for transcendental experience. This transcendental experience is indispensable today if theology is to do justice to modern man's question as to whether all the talk of 'Divinization', 'Sonship', 'God's Indwelling' etc. is not merely poetic concepts and indemonstrable mythology. Let us emphasise once more that this transcendental direction in the theology of grace means a similar direction for the whole of theology. For today even ontic Christology itself (in spite of its abiding validity) urgently needs translating into an onto-logical Christology, i.e. one which at the outset understands the 'nature' to be assumed not as a thing but as a transcendental spiritual quality. Since nature and being not only 'has', but is actuality and transcendence, the substantial unity with the Logos must be basically expressible in the terms of actuality and transcendence. It must be translated into these terms in order that what is meant by the 'Hypostatic Union' is said really clearly enough and is sufficiently protected from being misunderstood as mythology. All theology stands in need of this transcendental and anthropological change of direction because all theology is dependent upon the mutually determining doctrines of the Trinity, Grace and Incarnation, and these three basic doctrines today fundamentally require a transcendental approach.

2. A considerable objection could be made against what has been said: if it really is so necessary for all theology, surely there must always have been this kind of transcendental anthropological programme and method of investigation? – for good theology has not emerged today for the first time. Since, however, there has clearly been no such investigation, the demand for it cannot be legitimate.

First of all we must draw attention to the very basic difference between proclamation and theology, although in practice proclamation always contains an element of theological reflection,[16] and conversely theology [38] can never adequately transmute the proclamation into theological reflection.[17] Modern theological eschatology for instance has been left behind almost totally in a pre-theological stage of proclamation. By and large the ecclesiology of Vatican II has still not progressed beyond a certain systematization of biblical picture-language, apart from particular sections on Constitutional Law. Seen from this point of view it is by no means a priori impossible that there is as yet no really scientific, i.e. transcendentally reflected theology in many areas and topics. Why should it be impossible? The fact that there is a lot of thinking, talking, writing and 'systematizing' in some way or other in theology (and this is all good and laudable in itself) is no proof that theology has reached that stage of conceptualisation and reflection which must differentiate it from proclamation. This qualitative difference only really occurs, however, where and in so far as there is expressly transcendental thought, i.e. where the a priori presuppositions for knowledge and realisation of the particular realities of faith are explicitly included in one's reflections, determining the choice of terms for theological objects.

At the same time we by no means wish to imply that this transcendental anthropological method has been utterly absent from theology until now. There can be no question of that. We cannot give detailed examples here to show how this transcendental method has been at work everywhere in theology (even if in different intensities), at least since St Thomas, even if it had not yet become completely aware of itself nor comprehended itself explicitly in formal principles.[18]

But in the end, whatever the historical facts may have been, we must say that today's contemporary situation demands a transcendental anthropological programme and method.

---

[16] cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 634 ff., 661 ff.; K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 135-142.

[17] For the concept of kerygma cf. Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 622 ff.

[18] For Thomas Aquinas cf. the outline by J. B. Metz, Christliche Anthropozentrik (Munich, 1962), my introduction, pp. 9-20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Plato, Aristotle and Thomas will remain immortal philosophers from whom we must learn. But this does not alter the fact (even if the kind of philosophy studied in the Church has only taken notice of it in the last forty years or so) that philosophy today and hence theology too cannot and must not return to the stage before modern philosophy's transcendental anthropological change of direction since Descartes, Kant, German Idealism (including its opponents), up to modern Phenomenology, Existentialism and Fundamental Ontology. With few exceptions, e.g. Blondel, it can be said that this whole philosophy is most profoundly un-Christian in so far as it pursues a transcendental philosophy of the autonomous subject, who stands aloof from the transcendental [39] experience in which he experiences himself as continually dependent, with his origin in and orientation towards God. But this same philosophy is also most profoundly Christian (more than its traditional critics in modern scholastic professional theology have grasped), for according to a radically Christian understanding man is not ultimately one factor in a cosmos of things, subservient to a system of co-ordinate ontic concepts drawn from it, but the subject on whose freedom as subject hangs the fate of the whole cosmos: otherwise salvation-history and profane history could have no cosmological significance, and Christological cosmology would be infantile concept-poetry. This inner dividedness is, however, not only a symptom of modern philosophy but of all man's works, and hence a symptom of philosophy in all ages; we must not let it hinder us from seeing what is Christian in this significant epoch of modern culture. We must accept the situation in all its fundamental essence, as a factor henceforward indispensable in a modern Christian philosophy, and so too in modern Christian theology.

Perhaps it might be said that the 'modern period' to which this transcendental anthropology is especially adapted is already a thing of the past or in process of decline together with its philosophy.[19] There may be a little or a great deal of truth in that. But philosophies do not change like fashions; each philosophy disappears into the succeeding philosophy of a new period of history and thus retains what is most characteristic of it.[20] If it is the case that Christian Neo-Scholastic Philosophy, together with theology, have been mostly asleep during the modern period, they cannot be spared the task set by modern philosophy on the grounds that perhaps this philosophy is declining in its contemporary form: the lost ground must be at least made up if theology is really to do justice to the spirit of the age which is to follow the 'modern period'. This is particularly applicable since a conjectured future philosophy corresponding with the constitution of tomorrow's society will have its roots in a part of German Idealism, perhaps in the Hegelianism of the Left and its critique of ideology. If the topics treated in the coming philosophy are hope, society, the critique of ideology, a new form of freedom within a new social bond, the experience of God in man's experience of planning himself etc., philosophy's theme will have become once again man and his being which he has submitted to planning and thus also to the [40] unpredictable future.[21] Therefore, seen from tomorrow's particular and local form of philosophy, the change to a transcendental anthropology constitutes a challenge for today's and tomorrow's theology.

3. Finally we must try to find a basis for this challenge from the point of view of apologetics and theological fundamentals. The tendency towards 'demythologisation' in Protestant theology and elsewhere stems from a serious concern, and with all its premature, heretical and unacceptable characteristics it is aiming at a theology which we shall need in the future (and of which we have an insufficient amount up to now), if the ancient and [19] Naturally this thesis of R. Guardini's Ende der Neuzeit (Würzburg, 1950) cannot be discussed here.

[20] H. Rombach demonstrates well that this series of events is a true characteristic of modern philosophy, Die Gegenwart der Philosophie (Freiburg,[2] 1964).
[21] I have dealt in more detail with the problem raised here in 'Experiment Mensch. Theologisches zur Selbstmanipulation des Menschen', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Festschrift für Max Müller zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. H. Rombach (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 45-69, cf. in this volume, pp. 205 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

abiding Gospel is to be preached in a form sufficiently worthy of belief.[22] It can be said (and in part justly) that demythologisation theology is a new edition of the old theological Liberalism and Rationalism. But have we applied ourselves enough to the genuine topics and concerns of this rationalistic, liberal theology? That is the real question. Both we and orthodox Protestant theology have been satisfied too readily with the idea that the Barthian school has despatched the liberal school in Protestant theology. Although a great many individual themes of Barth's great work will remain, it is Bultmann who has triumphed over Barth on the whole in European Protestant theology.[23] And that is not merely an unjust and tragic accident in the history of ideas.

Modern man feels that thousands of statements in theology are just forms of mythology and that he is no longer able to believe them in all seriousness. Of course this is ultimately false, but there are real reasons behind the impression. It is due not merely to pride and stupidity on the subjective side, and objectively to the mysterious quality of the truth and reality of faith. Let us look dispassionately at today's real cultural situation: if a modern man who has not been brought up as a Christian hears the words 'Jesus is God made man' he will straight away reject this explanation as mythology which he cannot begin to take seriously nor to discuss, just as we do when we hear that the Dalai Lama regards himself as a reincarnation of Buddha. If this modern man hears of two people [41] dying in similar state and condition, and one is said to go straight to heaven because he happens to be the recipient of a Papal Indulgence, whereas the other spends many years in Purgatory because the Pope, as Keeper of the Keys of Heaven, has not opened up straight away; he will regard Indulgences, represented in this way, as a clerical invention against which his own idea of God radically protests. It will not be easy to convince him that God desires the salvation of all men, including children dying while not responsible for themselves, even after the Fall, and yet is unable to allow children dying unbaptised to approach his face because he cannot dispense with his own rule of the necessity of Baptism.

One could multiply these examples at length. There ought not to be so many. Furthermore, it does not seem to me that theology has dealt with these countless difficulties in a sufficiently intellectual way; above all, not in a way which holds out much promise for the practice of religious education. Let us repeat that in apologetics it is little or no use appealing in a positivistic manner to the 'mystery' actually revealed by God. If the fact of a verbal revelation were psychologically so absolutely compelling that doubts were utterly impossible, one could impose acceptance of its content in this positivistic manner as a mystery beyond all discussion. But if modern man finds the content of revelation unworthy of belief through the fault of theology, he will think himself justified, not illogically, in further doubting the fact of revelation. Incidentally these remarks show that we need to strive for a much larger area of mobility for fundamental theology and dogmatics than is usually the case.[24] All these difficulties of modern man can be traced to a common formal structure: theological statements are not formulated in such a way that man can see how what is meant by them is connected with his understanding of himself as witnessed to in his own experience.

Of course one cannot demand (and it would be heretical Modernism to do so) that the attempt must be made simply to deduce strictly all theological statements from man's experience of himself as if they were the latter's objectifying conceptualisation and [22] For this simplicity of faith cf. K. Rahner, Im Heute glauben (Einsiedeln,[3] 1966), pp. 32 ff.

[23] This over-simplification is intended only as a rough observation of what has happened: consequently it by no means excludes the possibility of attempts at a rapprochement of both theologies, especially if they are both progressing towards a larger totality. (Cf. the works of E. Jüngel and others, for instance.)
[24] cf. esp. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 123-131, 132 ff.; Im Heute glauben, pp. 39 ff.; 'Intellectual honesty and Christian faith', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 47-71.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

articulation. That is not what is meant, although this problem is more difficult than the traditional opponents of Modernism mostly think,[25] for there is also an experience of grace,[26] and this is the real, fundamental reality of Christianity itself. [42] If we leave this question here, it must be remembered that the connections between man's experience of himself and the content of the statements of dogma must be conceived otherwise than simply as logical connections of deduction or explication.[27] There are correspondences, above all by virtue of the fact that 'nature' – understood as personal, intellectual and transcendental – is an inner and necessary constituent not abstractly of grace per se, but of the actuality and process by which grace can be conferred. If these connections were uncovered and thought about as the subject-matter required by dogma, rightly understood, dogmatic statements would not only appear more worthy of belief from the point of view of religious education and doctrine; rather, thorough reflection on these correspondences would enable one to penetrate deeper and more effectively to the significance of particular statements and would lead to the elimination of latent misunderstandings, unsuitable schemes of presentation and unjustified conclusions. The discovery of such connections between the content of dogma and man's experience of himself is, in actual fact however, nothing else but the required change to a transcendental anthropological method in theology. Thus today's demand for it is founded on reasons of fundamental theology and apologetics.[28]

III

What are the consequences for theology which will result from the fulfilment of the demand for a theology along transcendental anthropological lines? In conclusion we shall answer this question by reference to a few examples. Above all, by using this method it would be at last more possible to arrive at a credible idea of the process of revelation in its recipient. For it is a very strange thing that the kind of fundamental theology common today has such an indefinite idea of the nature of the process of revelation in the prophet himself, except in so far as it represents the process as a 'miracle' instead of a 'sign' and thereby renders it unintelligible why there should be so many parallels to it in analogous phenomena in the history of religion. The method we are recommending could do much in this field: the transcendental deduction of man as the one who listens to God in history;[29] insight into the fact (and the reason [43] behind it) that the Word of God can always appear only as a heard and believed word and yet can remain the Word of God.[30] Another significant theme, which we shall refer to in a moment, is the understanding of salvation-history with reference to man. It is also worth mentioning in particular the understanding and the correct appraisal of the true nature of the 'sign' (including its distinctness from the 'miracle'). If salvation-history is necessary for salvation, theology must discuss the theme of man's a priori transcendental character as being within and subject to salvation-history, in the same way that history determines the philosophy of history and the latter is even an element of the former. But so far there is as good as no theology of man's 'salvation-historicity' in professional theology: salvation-history is recounted, but there is no reflection upon its formal structures and, above all, upon its transcendental necessity.[31]

---

[25] cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 657 ff.
[26] cf. Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 86-90.
[27] For a factual account cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 756 ff.
[28] cf. 'The Second Vatican Council's Challenge to Theology', in this volume, pp. 3 ff.
[29] In more detail, K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich,[2] 1963).
[30] cf. 'Wort Gottes', LThK X (Freiburg,[2] 1965), cols. 1235-1238
[31] cf. the sketch by A. Darlap, Mysterium Salutis I, pp. 3-153.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We alluded previously to the significance of this method for the doctrine of the Trinity and for Christology, so we shall not go into it in any more detail here. Because there is in professional theology still largely a lack of a theology of salvation-history and of man's transcendental salvation-historicity, the necessary presuppositions for an ecclesiology adequate for today are also lacking. The foundation of the Church in its formal authority and structure is usually treated almost as if God could have founded this Church at any time at all, had he wanted to. In academic ecclesiology the eschatological and salvation-historical position and function of the Church, so essential to its whole character, is scarcely considered. There is no understanding of such an eschatological phase of salvation-history, however, because there is to a large extent no transcendental reflection upon salvation-historicity and the resultant phases of salvation-history. For instance, how can one make it credible that we now have an infallible Pope, if humanity and God together in their common concern for the good of all men were able to manage successfully without such an infallible source of truth for perhaps two million years? Historical changes which are of importance for salvation are only credible if it can expressly be made intelligible that man must have a salvation-history as a result of his very nature, i.e. that, as in other respects, it is not only a matter of the permanently valid essential structures alone as such, but that also in respect of salvation man is connected with concrete history and its succeeding phases. From this point of view it might be possible to distinguish more clearly the true nature of this kind of [44] ecclesiastical infallibility from its perverted form which, like all reality in the human sphere, inevitably and perpetually accompanies it.

No further explanation is needed to make it clear that a good ecclesiology needs all those concepts which can only be acquired suitably as a result of a transcendental analysis of the essence and necessity of human intercommunication. The method we suggest has a large and important field of application in the doctrine of the sacraments too. How else is one to investigate adequately the nature of the symbol, the ability to act as symbol, the necessity of symbols, the basic concept of sign-causality, the nature of the symbol's function in intercommunication, in order thereby to create important principles for the doctrine of the sacraments and for understanding it? If it were clear in the doctrine of grace that grace does not have a character as 'thing' but an onto-logical character – as the condition of willed personal acts in relation to the immediacy of God – it would be more clearly grasped than is commonly the case in the doctrine of the sacraments that infant Baptism should not be taken as the basic model of a sacrament. It would emerge that a sacrament is God's enduring offer to man's transcendental nature, mediated through the historical and symbolical categories of intercommunication, of participation in his (God's) freedom in the concrete decision-making of his existence. Then it would be clear that sacraments really do have nothing to do with magic. Meaningful principles for the frequency of receiving the sacraments could be developed, the number seven could be more easily justified – which cannot really be demonstrated easily in a purely positivistic and historical way. It could also be made clear for instance that Indulgences cannot be thought of as taking effect in any other way but by a more intensive and radical love of man, slowly integrating man's whole being into itself.

If we set aside Faith, Hope and Love on the one hand and the positive commands of the Church on the other, we see that the major part of moral theology is obliged to concern itself with what we are accustomed to call 'natural law'. Irrespective of how we are to determine the precise relationship between this natural law and grace, in any case it is only possible to justify natural law from within, by means of a transcendental deduction of the nature of man and – furthermore – of his fundamental setting in a historical situation with its unique claims on him. It cannot be done by a purely a posteriori collating of factual particulars and conditions of man's individual and social existence, even if they are ascertained to be of 'general' occurrence. For not everything that is, nor even everything that is or seems to be general, is automatically what must [45] be.[32] Particularly in moral theology a transcendental anthropological theology would be able to gain insights of considerable practical importance, especially (though not exclusively!) in the matter of eliminating claims which pose illegitimately as natural law.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In order to be equal to today's demands eschatology needs the foundation provided by a transcendental anthropology, in which man is comprehended as the being who plans himself, looking forward to an open future, as the being who hopes, empowered by God to embrace an absolute future. It is only this kind of transcendental anthropological and formal futurology which can provide explicit hermeneutic principles which are needed today to interpret eschatological assertions,[33] if the latter are to appear worthy of belief. It seems to me that academic eschatology is still not far enough beyond the mentality of the professor of dogmatics who says he never maintained that the Archangel Michael's judgment-trumpet was a 'tuba materialis' but he would certainly defend the view that the sound of this trumpet was a 'tonus materialis'. Instead of really being theology, which always essentially involves criticism of images and models, academic eschatology is often a sort of puzzle in which one tries to unite into a single picture the images of scripture, which cannot be so fitted together in a plastic form, neither do they claim as much. A transcendental foundation of eschatology would reveal that eschatology is not an anticipatory report of the phenomenal aspects of future events, revealed by a God who already witnesses them, but the necessary interpretation, inescapably integral to man's nature, of his present existence – eschatologically subject to grace – within the perspective of its absolute future.

There is no need to add to these observations. They were meant only to open up the view of those tasks which are automatically set by the demand for an anthropological perspective in theology. At the same time we eliminated the possible and manifest misunderstanding that this anthropological transcendental understanding of theology implies a material reducing of theological doctrine generally. The theology we have described surrenders no really obligatory assertions. But it becomes a little more modest in the face of its own commission. In spite of all the hard thought which may be involved in it, it will ultimately become 'simpler' again. Only thus will it enter into the correct relationship with the constantly valid kerygma. What is essential remains.

[32] cf. the essay referred to on p. 41 note 24, esp. pp. 56 ff.
[33] cf. 'The Hermeneutics of Eschatological Assertions', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 323-346.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[46]

3

PHILOSOPHY AND PHILOSOPHISING IN THEOLOGY

The subject under discussion is so difficult and extends over such a wide area that it is not possible to do justice to it and produce a well-rounded discussion in this small compass.[1] We can only take up certain points; whether what is said here is particularly important and relevant must remain a matter capable of question.

We shall not therefore concern ourselves with the old questions, e.g. the fundamental relationship of philosophy and theology, their distinctness and interrelation;[2] the meaning and the limits of an autonomous philosophy and a 'Christian Philosophy';[3] the possibility and obligation of being a believing theologian and at the same time a philosopher; the historical origins of modern philosophy (seen as man's transcendental and existential-ontological interpretation of himself) in Christianity, etc. All these individual questions would lead back, in theology, to the wider question of the relationship of nature and grace (including of course the further question whether this traditional way of setting the problem is the basic one and one which is appropriate today),[4] and this implies the question of the liberation of the secular in its secular autonomy,[5] i.e. the fundamental constitution of the relation of nature and grace by God, who not merely gives, but is grace. In reducing the problem to these [47] terms it must be kept in mind that 'theology' – as opposed to revelation, kerygma and faith – is itself not a primary quantity,[6] but must first arise out of the relation of nature and grace, secular experience and faith. Thus it contains within itself a profane element which is related to theology's whole essence in a different way from the 'nature' which, qua reality and knowledge, is an inner constituent of revelation and faith. So we shall not discuss all these things here.

This whole contribution therefore cannot be anything more than a relatively loosely connected series of observations.

I

There must be 'philosophising' within theology if by 'philosophising' here one understands the activity of thinking about the revelation of God in Christ in the Church's proclamation, implemented with the support of all the means and methods of the intellect and by relating the act and content of faith to everything which man experiences, questions and knows. In the last analysis it is not so important whether this sort of activity should be called

---

[1] cf. the list of sources at the end of this volume.
[2] cf. the author's 'Philosophy and Theology', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 71-81. Also cf. principally G. Ebeling, 'Theologie und Philosophie' I-III, RGG VI (Tübingen,[3] 1962), 782-830 (literature).
[3] For this concept cf. J. B. Metz, LThK II (Freiburg,[2] 1958), cols. 1141-1147 (literature).
[4] cf. K. Rahner, 'Concerning the relationship between Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations I, pp. 297-317; 'Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations IV, pp. 165-188.
[5] cf. the presentation by K. Rahner and J. B. Metz in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 222 ff., 242 ff., 267 ff.; II/2 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 35 ff., 40 ff., 42 ff., 203-267.
[6] For this distinction cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology in the New Testament', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 23-42; also (together with J. Ratzinger), Revelation and Tradition (Freiburg and London, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'philosophising' or not.[7] On the one hand one might say for instance that what is meant thereby is precisely what is meant by the business of theology; on the other hand it can also be asked whether, even if one considers the secular material in such theology, it can still be called 'philosophy' today or whether something else has assumed the position previously held by philosophy as constituting the secular element and function within theology. This something else would not have to be called 'philosophy' if the word were to retain its historically given meaning.[8]

We shall need to speak of this later on. But if we exclude these questions, I think that the statement 'Within theology there must be philosophising' retains an intelligible and important sense which is not as common an [48] assumption as one might imagine, at least in the practice of theology. According to the statement, this 'philosophising' must take place within theology. This ought really to be discussed explicitly, since it can be questioned whether theology today can assume the existence of a ready-made and thought-out 'philosophy' – as maintained in the theory and practice of Neo-Scholasticism – which needs only to be kept in view and 'applied' in theology, or whether this is to a large extent no longer practicable today, even if one has no wish to proclaim the 'demise of metaphysics'. To this question we merely reply as follows: in actual fact and thus for the purposes of instruction there no longer exists today any philosophy which can be assumed as ready-made and already adapted to the needs of theology. This applies equally to the Catholic Christian. In this sense there is no longer a Neo-Scholastic philosophy as a (relatively) complete 'system', since Neo-Scholasticism has in actual fact dissolved into a wealth of philosophies which, while maintaining a more or less conscious and productive contact with the Scholastic philosophy of the Middle Ages and the Baroque, have taken up such a profusion of modern themes and complexes of problems (even though in very differing degrees) that it is scarcely possible today to speak any longer of a single circumscribable Neo-Scholasticism, able to function as the given instrument and the given partner-in-dialogue of theology.[9] And the reverse is true as well: as a result of its own approaches, methods and needs, theology itself puts so many questions and demands before philosophy as far as concepts and the possibilities of systematisation go, that traditional Neo-Scholasticism, as it was until recently and still is, is simply inadequate to meet these needs. Therefore there remains no alternative but to 'philosophise' within theology itself. We need only observe, on the one hand, that this is in accord with the essence of theology, and on the other hand that it implies no prior judgment with regard to an autonomous secular philosophy nor to questions of the present theological teaching curriculum.

Apart from this question, our first thesis contains a certain protest against a dogmatic positivism and a biblicism, two dangers which seem to me imminent today. There is certainly still a dogmatic positivism today. If confines dogmatics to the ordering and structuring of official [49] doctrinal statements and – ultimately – to rendering the latter intelligible by means of the retrospective history of dogma. It does all this only within the terms, conceptual models and horizon of understanding provided by these official pronouncements. This

[7] A purely semantic and historical study will have little result. On the other hand there are even many areas of modern science where people really 'philosophise' in a positive sense, although one would prefer not to use this word for various reasons.

[8] Here we merely refer to the phenomenon that, especially after Hegel, modern philosophy has assumed a different form (compare Marx, Nietzsche, Heidegger and Sartre for instance). One is clearly aware in any case of a certain reticence with regard to the term 'philosophy' or 'philosophise'.

[9] Thus it is obvious that, in spite of the tendency towards a philosophia perennis, Neo-Scholasticism itself since the seventeenth century has not been immune from clearly modern philosophical influences in its approach and method, and bears all kinds of traces reminiscent of Descartes and Kant and of the Critical Method. It was not until P. Scheuer, P. Rousselot, J. Maréchal and others that the step was taken towards an explicit engagement with modern philosophy.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

positivism will not have been overcome as long as this kind of dogmatics works with the concepts and perspectives of a calmly academic Neo-Scholasticism and so cultivates a certain rational and conceptual skill. Of course, this dogmatic positivism exists nowhere concretely in chemical purity. But it exists. If one is correct to regard the manipulating of Neo-Scholastic conceptual forms, in which official doctrinal pronouncements of recent times have been formulated, as still not free from dogmatic positivism, then it must even be said that this positivism is very widespread indeed. It is false because it signifies an unjustifiable and in practice impossible limitation of the true task of theology. It is unaware of the historically determined nature of concepts, even of those used in doctrinal declarations,[10] by absolutising them as being 'natural', intelligible to all, and perpetually adequate for the expression of dogma. It is not aware that the man who is engaged in theology, while retaining the unity of his own consciousness, must be in an open dialogue with the totality of his intellectual and spiritual existence, and that in actual fact this totality is today no longer identical with the secular thought-forms in which the official doctrines have until now expressed the faith and the kerygma. This kind of dogmatic positivism must therefore be exploded; there must be more 'philosophising' in theology in the sense already outlined.

Perhaps the biblicism against which the same demand is directed is only another form of positivism. However, it must be mentioned separately. Of course it is practically possible to carry on the tasks of exegesis and biblical theology in such a way as to be 'philosophising' in our sense to a more or less satisfactory degree. But if this happens, i.e. if what is aimed at is an understanding of the biblical statements, charged and confronted with the whole of the modern secular understanding of existence and the world, then biblical theology is obliged to burst the bounds of its own nature; not only because in this case official doctrine and the Church's historical development of dogma must be explicitly applied, thereby clearly going beyond the nature and capabilities of biblical theology, but chiefly because the secular understanding of existence and of the world must be the object of critical theological reflection. And this is plainly [50] more that biblical theology can do, if it is to be more than simply a poor name for theology in general, precisely because its 'soul' must be scripture, as Vatican II rightly says (though without wishing thus to encourage a biblicism). In addition, if biblical theology is to remain aware of its natural limits, it cannot consequently undertake of itself the task of reducing the plurality of individual, categorised scriptural statements to the single, original salvation/revelation-event which lies 'behind' scripture. Scripture itself lives from the event, and relative to this event scripture is already 'theology' and must always be expressed anew, although this by no means implies that the original uncategorized salvation/revelation-event can ever be attained as such in 'transcendental' purity in isolation, without the mediation of the process of categorizing and objectifying.[11] It cannot be solely the business of biblical theology itself to go back to this original event by means of reflection, nor to go forward into the single and yet perpetually pluralistic totality of man's understanding of existence and of the world. For this reason biblicism represents a misunderstanding of the true essence of theology as a whole, for within it there cannot be as much 'philosophising' as is necessary. It is also un-Catholic, since in the Catholic understanding of faith theology does not begin with an unquestioning and blind acceptance of scripture as the norma non normata of every expression of faith and theology,[12] and since Catholic theology is not faced with the dilemma, on the one hand of dissolving scripture by [10] cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur Geschichtlichkeit der Theologie', Integritas, Festschrift für K. Holzamer, ed. D. Stolte/R. Wisser (Tübingen, 1966), pp. 75-95, cf. also in this volume pp. 64 ff.

[11] Besides the literature mentioned on p. 47 note 6, cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, ed. J. Feiner/M. Löhrer (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 686-689; 698 ff., 700 ff.
[12] For a correct understanding cf. K. Rahner, 'Scripture and Tradition', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 98-112.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

historical and exegetical study into a collection of disparate historical documents of religion, nor on the other hand, of elevating scripture in this theology to a position of absolute authority, involving a boundless sacrificium intellectus. All this must be said not ultimately so much because there is a 'light of natural reason' but because the salvation/revelation-event of faith does not begin in the first place in the express meeting with scripture but precedes it by God's gracious self-communication. On account of God's desire for the salvation of all men this self-communication takes place (at least in the form of an appeal to man's freedom) everywhere and at all times, even before the explicit confrontation with the pronouncements of the Church's apostolic kerygma.[13]

[51] Within theology itself, therefore, there must be philosophising, or, more simply, there must be radical thought, radical questioning and radical confrontation. That is at bottom the most edifying theology. For a theology of this kind needs to keep in mind its task of serving the Gospel of Christ; consequently it must not become an 'academic' curiosity, using the data of faith as objects of speculation without being existentially involved. On the contrary. 'Philosophising' goes on in theology as long as man radically confronts the message of the faith with his understanding of existence and of the world, for it is only in this way that the saving message can speak to the whole man as a free person. It is not possible here to give concrete practical examples of what this demand implies and how it would bring about change in dogmatics and moral theology. Our critical demand does not mean that we think that this kind of philosophising theology does not exist at all, but that even today there is not enough of it, as far as average teaching and, dependent on this, the possibilities of official Church pronouncements are concerned. For instance, where can one find a doctrine of the Trinity or a Christology which goes further than the mere repetition of the traditional formulas, making possible a really kerygmatic proclamation, genuinely orthodox and suitable for teaching, so that what is meant in these doctrinal treatises really adequately comes home to modern man without avoidable difficulties? Can our text-book theology generally talk of 'Angels', 'Sin', 'Penance', 'Purgatory', 'Indulgences', the 'Virgin Birth', 'Sacraments' in such a way that the 'hierarchy of truths'[14] – i.e. the rootedness of all these separate affirmations in the central foundation of the faith – is in each case made clear to modern man and is capable of being assimilated sufficiently by him? Is it not too often the case today that a text-book of dogmatics looks like an expanded version of the index systematicus of Denzinger? Does it become apparent that dogmatics is aware of the present crisis of faith? – without thereby falling into a pious sentimentality? Not, that is, by lamenting the situation, but by making efforts to think, not taking the easy way out, not trying to talk merely to the person who believes in any case, but to the doubter, to the person who is earnestly questioning and to him who does not believe; not by quoting the formal authority of [52] scripture and the magisterium in particular questions of dogma, but by trying to render the matter intrinsically worthy of belief.

II

A second thesis may perhaps be formulated as follows: as opposed to earlier times, a 'philosophising' theology is confronted today with a pluralism of philosophies. It must take up its stand vis-à-vis them and work with them, but they cannot be adequately synthesised by [13] Besides the studies mentioned on p. 47 note 6, cf. the author's writings on 'anonymous Christians'; in particular also the relevant conciliar texts. An analysis of these texts is attempted by K. Rahner, 'Atheismus und implizites Christentum', L'Athéisme contemporain (ed. J. Girardi, in several languages), cf. also in this volume, 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity'.

[14] cf. the Council's Decree on Ecumenism, No. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

each other nor by theology. Theology today is experiencing perforce what we may be permitted to call its 'gnoseological concupiscence'.

What we have just said by no means implies the relativistic or agnostic thesis that there is quite legitimately a pluralism of mutually contradictory philosophies, fundamentally irreconcilable 'per se', or that man may well abandon at the outset the effort of trying to overcome his gnoseologically concupiscent situation by seeking to approach asymptotically an integration of the philosophies and thus a gnoseological integration. But while rejecting this kind of sceptical relativism we must not draw a veil over the unavoidable fact of the contemporary intellectual scene, that today the individual has to exist in an actual pluralism of philosophies, unintegrated and yet mutually coexistent, not separated by a cultural no-man's-land; this pluralism is present and will remain so.[15] Secondary reflection on the matter has produced a new situation and the resultant knowledge has become, in turn, a further factor of the situation. There was certainly a pluralism of philosophies before. But they were either historically separated by the no-man's-land dividing different cultures from each other, or else they came face to face within a common and readily-assumed perspective of understanding as mutually contradictory philosophies, automatically rejecting and excluding each other, or else capable of being integrated and 'transcended' in a wider synthesis. Even when confronted with many philosophies, one man could develop one philosophy, 'his' philosophy, consciously proclaiming it as 'Philosophy'. If one does not have the idea that philosophies are intended for storage in computers and if one remembers that philosophy can only exist concretely in the individual's mind – a fact which no dialogue can change – one is obliged to say that there is today an irreducible pluralism of philosophies, [53] that we are aware of it, and that the fact and the awareness of it are contributory determinants of the theologian's situation and therefore constitute a question for theology.

Therefore our reason for proposing the thesis is not that these philosophies are per se irreconcilable. In so far as they are irreconcilable they show themselves as false; that creates no new, previously nonexistent problem. Rather, the thesis holds because these philosophies, quite apart from the consideration of their truth-value, can no longer all be appropriated and known by the individual and consequently by the theologian, and because at the same time we know this fact as though in a philosophia negativa which is now not merely the consciousness of a materially empty field of awareness, but the consciousness of a historically present reality which has not, however, been mastered and which is in fact intractable. Later on we shall discuss how this 'concupiscent' pluralism of philosophies has arisen; not only from the actual mutual confrontation of the plurality of cultures in a world which has become one and which yet remains unintegrated, not only from the growing differentiation and complexity of the individual philosophies, but at bottom it originates in a pluralism of the human sources of experience, which can never be adequately comprehended. In the plurality of non-philosophical disciplines these sources of experience are ranged, as a matter of historical fact, in a variety of methods, problems and results which it is beyond the individual's capacity to grasp. This means that a comprehensive system of knowledge and education is no longer possible, even if one were to look upon the 'system' as an 'open' one.

Of course there are today new ways of arriving at a certain synthesis of man's diverse kinds of knowledge. For example, there exist now formal homologies between the problems and methods of the particular sciences. These homologies enable even the individual scientist (and the philosopher) in a particular field to gain a certain understanding of those disciplines with which he is not professionally concerned and conversant. However, such new methods [15] cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on Dialogue within a Pluralistic Society', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 32-42; cf. ibid., pp. 21-30; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 208 ff., 245 ff., 261 ff.; II/2, pp. 203 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of synthesising particular aspects of knowledge do nothing to modify the basic fact that concerns us here: more is known and questioned in the modern philosophies than can be dealt with by the individual alone, and the realisation of this inability is itself one factor in our intellectual existence today.

Whatever the more particular reasons may be, therefore, the known and experienced fact is incontrovertible: we know that there is a pluralism of understandings of the world and of existence, no longer capable of being integrated adequately by anyone, whether we call them 'philosophies' or [54] not. We do not need to admit this in a spirit of resignation, for it remains our task and duty to avail ourselves of as much of this pluralism as possible. But the fact remains: every man and every theologian, although he must philosophise in theology, knows less and less of 'Philosophy', since there are continually more and more philosophies, which no single person can assimilate.

At this point too one ought to produce concrete examples, but it is impossible here. Would not a modern philosophy of language be of the greatest importance for theological hermeneutics? But can I understand anything of it, if I must first know something of philosophy and theology? Is it a priori impossible for logistics to be of value for theology too? How shall I make any judgments about it if I understand none of it, and could only grasp it by first having understood the subject completely and as a specialist? How many theologians could say in all seriousness that they really understand something of German Idealism, and that they could deal with its problems and concepts and think within its perspectives? Is such a thing a 'luxury' for the theologian, considering that this German Idealism has been a contributory factor of the cultural and intellectual world we live in, even if we never hear more of it than we find in a newspaper supplement? Is it possible to pursue theology seriously today without knowing anything of the philosophies which have sprung from Marxism and the modern sociologies? Are we theologians justified and excused simply because all 'educated' people are in the same position in their want of education, and because it is considered proper only to speak when those who know differently are not present? Can it really be denied that the relationship of theology's intellectual level to that of other spheres of intellectual life was previously better than today? It is assuredly not that theology's level has dropped but because the other level has risen relatively quicker and more vigorously. But can we take comfort from that? What are the consequences to be drawn for theology from this pluralistic situation? I would like to mention especially two consequences in what follows: in a totally new way there is today inevitably a multiplicity of theologies, or they are in the process of growing slowly. The Church's teaching office with its particular function has been placed in a totally new situation.

III

Let us look at our first proposition: today there is inevitably a multiplicity of theologies. There have always been many schools of theology. This fact [55] was not only tolerated but acknowledged by the Church as an expression of the richness of its life and of the development of the faith within the Church. This recognition is still important today for a right attitude towards the new phenomenon to which we are drawing attention. But the former situation – of the many different schools and approaches in theology – is not the same as what is meant here. The 'schools' of old were either largely separated by a cultural no-man's-land, e.g. the theologies of the West and of the East, or else they existed within a milieu which was to a large extent historically, culturally and philosophically homogeneous, common and available to everyone. Or, on the other hand, the 'schools' opposed each other in clear controversy and contradiction, so that one had to and was able to decide in favour of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one and against another; or else they could be comprehended and marshalled from a common standpoint of the kind we have mentioned, and thus to a large extent could be positively integrated into a higher unity. These former schools and approaches with their demarcated historical outlines do not really exist any longer today.[16]

If we are correct in what we have said about the practical impossibility of integrating the pluralism of philosophies in our historical situation – which we have seen as 'gnoseologically concupiscent' – then there exists today a pluralism of theologies in a much more radical sense, presupposing that we must always 'philosophise' in theology. What present-day theologian seriously has a simultaneous, accurate and sufficiently deep understanding of Scholastic Philosophy and its origins; Transcendental Philosophy in all its profoundly different forms; Existential Philosophy; the various impulses, issues, tendencies, new analyses and perspectives legitimately contributed by Marxist Philosophy; modern Philosophy of Language and hermeneutics; the philosophy which seeks to elucidate theoretically the relation between the plurality of modern sciences; and the philosophies of the East, now appearing on the scene of world civilisation as known but as yet uncomprehended quantities? Above all, who has any knowledge which is at all reliable concerning those particular modes of understanding of the world and of existence which are produced directly by the sciences as such without the mediation of a philosophy, and which are lived out eminently practically and 'unphilosophically', refusing to accept any self-reflection mediated by philosophical theory? No-one. We may say that one must nonetheless know something about [56] all these things. That may be true. But to follow this imperative means in practice that the individual merely acquires a denatured and second-hand version of what really needs to be lived and known. We may say that even today theology together with faith must reflect upon its sphere of origin, which lies deeper and more fundamentally in human existence, prior to this plurality of understanding of the world and of existence. Thus theology can and must be seen as the study of faith at a level prior to that of the profane sciences, speaking to man before he 'goes out' into the unintegrable pluralism which is his existence and his world. That may be equally correct, and it may provide the impetus to a new and more original self-interpretation of theology. Theology is then no longer understood primarily as a revealed synthesis and amplification of the profane view of existence, which it surpasses, but as its deeper source and thus also as the slender root which alone makes possible such pluralistic and unintegrable interpretations of existence. The result of this theology is not a synthesis of the pluralistic experiences of existence, but a transferring of them to the intractable mystery of God in humility and hope. It may even be that, starting from this sort of consideration, we may be able to grasp the nature of what is called the 'basic theological course' which is the subject of much discussion, but which is hardly understood at all.[17]

However, all this does not change the fact that, on account of the unintegrable plurality of modern experiences of existence, side by side with each other, mutually acknowledged and yet not really known, there are or will be many theologies. It will no longer be possible to apply oneself to clearing up their differences and dissolving them in another synthesis. For ultimately it is in practice impossible to distinguish adequately between what is common to all men's understanding of existence – and there certainly is such a thing – and its plurality of historical appearances. Therefore there cannot be a theology which only works with this common material. Every theologian will bring to his theology the particular form, the [16] In so far as they are still actually present, compared with the whole modern cultural situation they lead an esoteric existence which today no longer directly affects the concrete social and sociological position of theology as such.

[17] For some preliminary observations cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Contemporary Intellectual Formation of future Priests', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 113-138, esp. 123 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

historical and fragmentary nature of his own given understanding of existence. He will no longer entertain the innocent naïveté of earlier times in thinking that his contribution alone is what is important and decisive, truly metaphysical and supra-historical, and that further distinctions are peripheral and matters of small moment.

In speaking of many theologies we emphatically do not mean that they [57] exist as mutually delimited and separable. In that case they would resemble the old theological schools: one theology is acquainted with the other; they are mutually distinct and contradictory. The modern pluralism of philosophies and theologies consists rather in the fact that no clear, coherent, individual pictures can be formed any longer. Each theology and philosophy knows too much to be merely itself, and too little to become the only Theology or Philosophy.

A second-order situation has arisen in this cultural 'concupiscence': previously what constituted a situation's promise was that there was something in it which remained unreflected, not amenable to objective presentation; today it is precisely what has been once objectified and the subject of reflection which eludes us. Previously it was the as yet unconquered future – nowadays it is the uncontrollable past. If one wishes to say anything 'new' in this field, one does so with the fear that it merely seems new because one does not know enough and therefore cannot know that it has already been said somewhere at some time, or because it is unimportant and second-hand erudition. Like in a big city: there are too many neighbours for any one to be a real neighbour. We have a completely new kind of Alexandrinism: in earlier times it was possible to reach the end of a circumscribed culture; thereafter it could only be kept in order; beyond it were only barbarians (i.e. an unfruitful land, its promise as yet only dimly sensed). Nowadays we know that we have come to the limit of all possible kinds of old-style civilization.

Of course there is still a new future in spite of all this. But it will come from a different direction. It will come from dialogue with the sciences. But we shall speak of this later. In the future, man will not objectify himself in his art and philosophy as the rational and theorising being, offering himself in this role as theology's dialogue-partner; he will appear as practical man in the works of his hands, which change him in a way he cannot clearly express.

But if we turn aside from this hoped-for new land, we see philosophy and theology too (even if the latter's history is not exclusively dependent on that of philosophy) like a wide plain full of nothing but allotments: it is impossible to walk through them all or to plant them all oneself; in every one there is something which the garden next door does not contain. Neighbours good-naturedly exchange a few onions over the garden hedge, or mischievously throw their weeds over; but there is no longer any large, grandly-conceived and well-planned garden in which every kind of plant can be found growing. Compared with the Neo-Scholasticism of nineteenth-century theology and the situation before the first World [58] War, Catholic theology and other theologies in the last forty years give the impression of a great new departure. This is indeed the case; it is a most laudable phenomenon; but it sprang, primarily at least, from the fact that there was an almost inconceivable amount of progress to be made in dialogue in order to catch up with modern philosophy and the historical sciences. The real situation, therefore, will not be revealed until this task has been completed. Will it take a very long time? Will the work change imperceptibly as if of its own accord, and become a dialogue with the new partner of whom we have yet to speak? Or will theology become as Alexandrine as philosophy, in so far as it tries to live only from its own resources? In fearing this danger we are not transgressing against our faith in the power and dignity of theology. The Gospel message comes from the Ever-living God. But theology as such, however important it certainly is for evangelism and for faith, always remains a human piece of work, and hence not necessarily more creative and vibrant than philosophy.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

IV

We now turn to our second proposition, which draws the practical consequences from the situation we have just described: *the Church's teaching office has been put into a totally new situation as a result of the plurality of theologie*s.

First of all we must say something more about the pluralism of theologies. As we have said, there are going to be many theologies, even if no Catholic theology will subscribe to the kind of premature agnosticism which characterises authoritative pronouncements of earlier times as mere 'interpretations' of the actual content of faith, no longer necessarily 'relevant' today. For the irreversible plurality of theologies does not mean that we must deny their ability to act in dialogue, nor that they can learn nothing intelligible and compelling from the Church's ancient doctrinal pronouncements. But today it is to the plural theologies that these official pronouncements are addressed. It is already becoming obvious: how could there be a system of dogmatics today able to function equally intensively from the points of view of biblical theology, history of dogma, scholastic metaphysics, existentialist ontology, salvation-history, aesthetics, politics, comparative religion? The attempt – laudable in itself – to leave out none of these aspects can only result in practice in none of one's aims being achieved to any satisfactory degree. This remains true even in the case of a team project. A book produced in this way is to be read by one individual who cannot bring to it all the preconditions [59] necessary to understand completely what all the team members together have written. Besides this a workable 'team' would no longer be able to cope with the rate of production of modern theology. One might say that this is only impossible in practice, not in theory. But the practical impossibility remains.

It may be asked, therefore, whether there may not have to be in the long run two forms of theology running parallel: one trying to do what it can to undercut today's cultural pluralism, making use only of that side of existence which is still common to all and which will remain so. It would work with this common experience and 'redeem' it by responding with the answers of faith, even if only able to do this in an approximate way. In this way it would develop a kind of higher Catechism, or perhaps the 'basic theological course' we have already referred to. On the other hand there would be the other kind of theology, with the courage to let itself disintegrate into many theologies. All of these in their own way would confront the individual pluralist views of existence, no longer communicable to each other, and, assimilating them and criticising them more closely, would become established in particular spheres of mutual comprehension. There are of course limits to this kind of pluralism. It does not mean that theology in the Church can say whatever it likes. The Church's teaching office, the common confession of faith and the possibility of anathematising certain propositions remain. Possibly in the rather more distant future the teaching office will have an easier task in one particular respect: the pluralism of theologies and the unimaginable possibilities of conceptual forms, language and fine shades of signification mean (if I may put it thus) that a theologian who has been censured on account of a particular statement has many more 'ways out' than at present without endangering his honesty and obedience. He will have more opportunity to keep saying what he means in different ways; whereas before a particular formula could seem to be the only possible way of objectifying the particular, apparently indispensable experience of religious faith. In the past, censure struck the censured person at an existentially deeper level than will be the case in the future; it is to be hoped that tomorrow we shall be more aware of the inadequacy of our own language and its unintelligibility to others in such a pluralistic situation than most of our modern Western-style intellectuals seem to be.

However, out of this pluralism of theologies arises a new situation for the Church's

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

teaching office, which we shall mention in brief; we cannot deal with its whole range of problems here.[18] It seems to me that the [60] position can be clearly seen if one compares, for instance, 'Humani generis' with Ottaviani's letter of July 1966. In the Encyclical we can sense the confident awareness that it is able to formulate the opposing position unequivocally and to demarcate its own official doctrine by positive statements; in the Cardinal's letter we are aware of a certain embarrassment in the face of theological trends which are scarcely tangible and not commonly available or intelligible. Consequently it manages only to ask questions and to give general warnings instead of making doctrinal pronouncements. If we put the matter at its most acute: how is the bearer of teaching authority in the Church to give his verdict on a particular theology if he is not and cannot really be acquainted with it? – if he cannot really understand it except by knowing the profane presuppositions on which it is based and which he does not share? One may ask whether in the future there should not be ideally as many 'teaching authorities' as there are theologies. To give a very small example, are there in Rome the kind of consultant theologians, fully conversant with the ontological and existential presuppositions which have led to the translation of 'Transubstantiation' into 'Trans-signification' or 'Transfinalisation'? Can such specialised knowledge be expected and required?

We have indicated a problem, but no solution. If the problem does not seem a very urgent matter, it is chiefly because the theologies constituting this new situation for the teaching office are not yet as clearly formed and differentiated as will probably be the case in future.

V

We have already referred to a further important factor in the present relationship between philosophy and theology, and we now turn to consider it especially. In future, theology's key partner-in-dialogue, to which it will have to relate its 'philosophising' in the sense we have adumbrated, will no longer be philosophy in the traditional sense at all, but the 'unphilosophical' pluralistic sciences and the kind of understanding of existence which they promote either directly or indirectly.

This is in many ways a platitude, since it is plain that the historical sciences have already stirred up and changed theology more than modern philosophy has done. The natural and social sciences, too, by creating [61] modern technological man, by their world-picture and the many questions resulting from it, have changed theology's situation to a profound degree.[19] If we observe very little of this in our text-books as yet, it indicates a failure, not a legitimate detachment of theology from science. In spite of this we must inspect our proposition more closely, for it is not as natural and innocent as it at first seems. We do not intend to debate the question of the 'demise of metaphysics'. This 'demise' is indeed proclaimed on the most varied quarters, but in itself it is not a clear thesis at all. What is quite clear is the concrete pluralism of the sciences, which, with all their topics, a posteriori methods and wide-open field of activity, do not consider themselves as dependent branches of philosophy, however much they may have arisen out of Western metaphysics.[20] These [18] cf. an introduction in K. Rahner, 'Kirchliches Lehramt und Theologie nach dem Konzil', Stimmen der Zeit 178 (1966), pp. 404-420; also 'Vom Dialog in der Kirche', Stimmen der Zeit 179 (1967), pp. 81-95, cf. in this volume pp. 83 ff. and 'Dialogue in the Church', Theological Investigations X.

[19] cf. K. Rahner, 'Experiment Mensch', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Festschrift für Max Müller, ed. H. Rombach (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 45-69, cf. in this volume pp. 205 ff.

[20] Naturally we cannot enter into detail historically regarding the different theses as to the origins of modern science in Western thought and philosophising. Cf. M. Müller's systematic treatment, 'Wissenschaft', LThK X (Freiburg,[2] 1965), cols. 1189-1193 (literature).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sciences do not acknowledge philosophy as the prescriber of their fields of operation, but rather as one of the factors involved in actual practice and as the necessary spur of criticism. Thus they take their decision about their understanding of existence before philosophy is able to have its say. At most it is accepted as reflection on the pluralism of these sciences and their methods, and it is only regarded by them as valid in the role of a formal theory of science.

Even if one submits modern science's understanding of itself to critical examination, questioning the transcendental a priori conditions of all science whatsoever, considering the ontological implications of a formal theory of science and thus drawing up an ontology of a particular kind, the fact remains that earlier theology had as its only standard partner-in-dialogue a SINGLE philosophy, united in spite of all its internal tensions and controversies. Although this was in fact the product of history, its historical conditioning had not yet become the subject of reflection by a positive historical science; philosophy had a history, but its history was not something which called philosophy itself in question. To the extent that there already were sciences in the mediaeval 'Universitas litterarum', they had scarcely any theological relevance. Today things are different: there are sciences which consider themselves no longer as tools and handmaids of philosophy, but they are relevant to theology; most important of all, theology no longer lives in the context of a single philosophy, established [62] as the primary and autonomous standard. Philosophy may not conceive itself as a 'complete system'; it must be aware that it cannot adequately reproduce man's total potential and therefore cannot be his absolute lord and master. This applies today chiefly because the sciences are fellow-contributors to man's understanding of himself without having been empowered to be so by philosophy. They perform this function by doing things, reaching out in power and grasping the future, and consequently they exhibit a very problematical relation to the abiding 'essence' of man.[21] How far this view of science is justified, how far it can be called in question by criticism – in turn implying philosophy, which thus enters into a new stage of self-understanding – these matters need not concern us at the moment, for in any case theology must pursue its task in its actual situation and can do nothing to alter it immediately. At least in the concrete situation determined by the cultural, intellectual, social and natural sciences, it is science, no longer mediated by philosophy, which constitutes theology's partner-in-dialogue. If this is only visible to a very modest and limited degree in theology as it appears at present – and then mainly in isolated particulars, not in a confrontation with the 'spirit', the 'ethos' of these sciences with their 'openness' towards what cannot be predicted in the world – it says nothing against our thesis but against theology as it actually is in practice. By nature theology ought to be more suited to this partner than to philosophy. For theology is primarily concerned with history and the future. Whereas philosophy can really only consider the facts of historicity and orientation towards a future in a formal manner, the sciences represent history and future; especially if one remembers that history and future are not things but are created by man and his practical awareness, and thus bear 'science' within themselves as an essential factor.

It would only be possible, of course, to give a clear content and colour to this latter thesis if one could describe in concrete terms a theology which had developed within the situation of the modern scientific world-view right from the very beginning, not merely by the process of supplementary and concessionary apologetics, and which was conditioned in part by the unsynthesised pluralism of mutually alien sciences, thereby constituting the plurality of theologies such as we have mentioned earlier. It need imply no detraction from the autonomy of the theology of the [63] Christian Revelation if it were to take up its place deliberately in [21] cf. esp. J. B. Metz, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz, 1968), K. Rahner, 'Christian living formerly and today', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3-24, esp. pp. 16 ff.; also Theological Investigations X, 'On the theology of hope'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the open context of modern science. It is certain that if it did so, a different form of theology or theologies would emerge. To sense this one only needs to imagine what a dogmatics would look like which had grown out of a context of a whole-heartedly embraced and experienced unity of spirit and matter, a context of a dynamic open world of the future, to be seized in hope and action, a world constituting the sphere of man's battle against his self-alienation for the hominisation of his environment, the context of a single history of religion, a single political world.

We cannot say anything further about all this here. But I hope it has become clear that traditional philosophy's loss of function in modern society and science must not lead simply to an 'unphilosophical' mode of study in theology. Pure positivism does most harm in theology, although the latter remains a 'positive' study and although its particular opportunities lie in that direction today too. Theology must not merely be aware of the change in philosophy: it must plan out its own intrinsic relation to philosophical thought and other forms of man's interpretation of existence. If this task is really taken seriously, 'thought' will retain its great importance for theology. One might even say that the future of theology as a human endeavour for the presentation of the Gospel depends not least on the courage to pursue this 'thought'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[64]

4

THE HISTORICITY OF THEOLOGY

The Society of St Paul (Paulusgesellschaft) in Germany and Spain desires to be a place where dialogue is carried on between theology and modern science;[1] the partners in such a dialogue, if it is to be real, must presume a readiness to learn on both sides. Otherwise there will be a one-sided harangue instead of a dialogue. The desire to learn through dialogue presupposes – perhaps in a different manner than is the case in one-way instruction – that each dialogue-partner takes into account the possibility of a mistake on his own part. We do not need to examine here whether, in what way, and with what reservations this presupposition can be adopted in a dialogue in which an authoritative Church discusses its own dogma with modern science. However this difficult question is to be answered in greater detail – and the Council's Decree on Ecumenism contains some important points on this matter – theology can and must make this presupposition on entering into dialogue with modern science. It is possible for theology to appear capable of error, threatened by error, and often indeed actually to err. This is not only because theology has to discuss many things with present-day arts and sciences which are not matters of defined Church dogma and for which, therefore, no irrevocable concurrence can be demanded on the part of the faithful. In cases like these the theological partner must consequently presuppose the fundamental possibility of error on his own side as well. But the assumption is chiefly valid because even when presenting and defending Church dogma the theologian cannot simply repeat the defined precepts of Councils and Popes alone. For them to be the object of a dialogue he must rather explain them, explicate their concepts, locate their propositions in a wider framework [65] of understanding; he must continually try to eliminate possible misunderstandings, demonstrate consonance with other assertions of faith and truths of reason, and translate them so that they correspond to the partner's given perspective of understanding (for the latter is never a mere tabula rasa, but always understands according to previously established preconditions, which are fundamentally incapable of being the object of adequate reflection and thus cannot be tested). In this difficult undertaking the individual theologian – and only a concrete person can be a partner-in-dialogue – is of course supported by the whole of theology which is guided by the Church's official authority and the Spirit, but he takes on this task on his own account and risk. Since he must say what is especially his, even when discussing defined truths of the faith; since he only possesses infallible dogma in his own individual, subjective and conditioned understanding; since he cannot adequately separate these two elements; since in the case of dogmatic concepts there can be no adequate definitions, utterly transparent to reflection (as perhaps in the case of the axioms of mathematics and geometry), the individual theologian can and must quite candidly take into account the possibility of error on his side and the consequent necessity of himself changing, even when in dialogue concerning Church dogma.

This possibility of error in theology, the readiness to undergo change intellectually, not only as a passive object of a process of change, but as a subject by a free decision (which is at the same time the most difficult, bitter and yet most felicitous form of change and 'evolution') finds its ultimate justification in the historicity of theology. A Society concerned

[1] The scope of this lecture was determined by its origin and location (see the list of sources); this also explains the lack of footnotes. For a comprehensive documentation and reference to other literature cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, 'Kerygma und Dogma: Geschichtlichkeit der Offenbarungsvermittlung', J. Feiner/M. Löhrer (ed.), Mysterium Salutis I (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 704-707 and 783-787.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with dialogue between Christian theology and modern science, therefore, does well at its inception to think about the historicity of theology. In this it is considering one of the most important presuppositions of its own being. Of course, the present discussion must necessarily and inevitably remain fragmentary and incomplete. For behind the problem of truth and history lies in fact the whole problem of the metaphysics of all knowledge whatsoever, from its beginnings right up to the present day. The possibility of uniting absolute truth and the historicity of truth is one of philosophy's most fundamental questions. It is clearly impossible to say anything really sufficient on this score in one short hour.

So we shall only attempt to show according to theological considerations that theology must take account of its historicity, and what practical consequences arise from this for the Christian who is also a man of science.

[66]

I

The experience of a history of revelation, i.e. a history of the saving truth imparted to us by the free personal act of God, is one of the most fundamental data of theology and of Christian dogma itself. No Christian can doubt this assertion. It can be found explicit at the beginning of the Epistle to the Hebrews (1:1). It is an astonishing and mysterious statement. It is an everyday experience of individuals and humanity as a whole that no-one can ever know everything knowable, that everyone is made aware of new knowledge of which he was previously ignorant, that man discovers what is useful to him only slowly and as a result changes his everyday life very significantly. It causes us little surprise. But that truth should have a history, truth which is ultimate, constituting its own very essence, which is itself an analogous, many-layered reality, truth which is decisive for man's ultimate salvation, speaking to man's most inner and immortal centre at the point where he borders on the eternal God – that is an astonishing assertion, by no means self-evident. Throughout the course of Christian history there have been plenty of theories which did not wish to recognise the truth of this, or at least tried to water it down.

Indeed it is strange: for the ultimate, the eternal is surely that to which man must stand in a relation of freedom, able to say Yes or No, if he is to work out his own salvation and not merely be saved passively, or be rewarded for one kind of salvation with a totally different kind. But if one says that man is always and everywhere concerned with this most inner peculiarity of his, this transcendence in respect of God and its existence in grace; that this dark brightness at the centre of his being is always present, either for his salvation or for the reverse, and is thus outside the history of his truth – like an immovable star above the restless ocean of time – there seems to be no longer any history of saving truth, or else the existing history of revelation seems not to be a history of the truth decisive for salvation. But it is to be maintained, however, that there is a history of the revelation of saving truth. That is why our assertion is so surprising. If such a thing does exist, then there is also a history and a historicity of theology, and it remains problematical how and why a history of revelation can come to a close, bearing in mind the continuing history of civilisation and the immeasurableness of God; how it can be complete (at the death of the Apostles, as we are accustomed to say) and only pursued further in the form of a mere history of the development of dogma and theology.

[67] Whatever the result of the fundamental theological question with regard to the truth of salvation, i.e. how it can both be decisive for salvation and at the same time have become historical, one thing needs to be clear in any case (and it is of the greatest importance for the understanding of the historicity of theology too): the history of revelation may not be watered down to a succession of individual propositions, communicated one by one by God to the bearer of revelation, and by addition causing the 'deposit of faith' to grow gradually, until in the revelation in Christ it has reached its final extent and now only requires to be administered and tapped by the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This kind of quantifying model for the history of revelation is no doubt unsatisfactory. Not only because in this case it remains actually obscure why the Incarnation of the Divine Logos, of Truth, in the flesh of history is not the beginning and the centre of this quantitative summa, but – from a temporal view – the final addition to a body of saving truth which had sufficed to create man's saving immediacy before God without this addition for thousands and thousands of years. (No wonder that mediaeval theology, afraid of the historicity of revelation, always postulated an explicit belief in the coming Saviour at least on the part of the 'Patriarchs'.) Such a merely quantitative growth of revelation is insufficient as a model for its history for many other reasons as well. An individual truth exists only within a totality of truths, in a wider perspective of understanding. This may not always be very clear in each case because this totality of meaning, the perspective of understanding, the intellectual system of co-ordinates and references within which and by means of which any particular statement can alone be understood, may be felt as utterly self-evident and hence inaccessible to reflection. But all the same it is so. What is apparently a quantitative additional growth to a previous totality of knowledge in fact changes the totality, introduces new perspectives and puts new questions to previous insights. Answering these questions again modifies previous knowledge.

What has been said could be illustrated with particular examples in the history of revelation. For instance, the advent of the belief in angels in the field of revealed faith makes clearer God's transcendence (and vice versa); insight into the possibility of a positive fulfilment of life in the beyond changes the whole moral evaluation of life (and vice versa); it is only the New Testament doctrine of participation in the holy God's divine life through his 'pneuma' which first implies the doctrine of Original Sin. In the New Testament a real theology can be seen, i.e. it is apparent that God does not effect revelation by simply adding new [68] 'propositions' 'from outside' to the basic substance of the Christian Faith (Jesus as the Risen eschatological Bringer of Salvation), but that the total basic Christian message unfolds and develops from an inner dialectic and a dynamic source. Each factor of this totality is always dependent upon every other factor, and grows and develops – however much it may remain the same – together with the others.

In this process, the cultural, religious and secular environment in which the history of the revelation-event takes place acts as a spur to the latter's growth itself, as a precondition without which this history is not even conceivable. For revelation is not revelation of concepts, not the creation of new fundamental axioms, introduced in a final and fixed form into man's consciousness 'from outside' by some supra-historical transcendent cause. It is revelation by means of concepts taken from the history of human civilisation (although, of course, the latter stands continually in the light of the grace of the self-revealing God). Thus these concepts always have a prehistory, they are connected by thousands of root-fibres with the whole of man's historically developed understanding of himself. For example one only needs to investigate the words 'pneuma', 'logos', 'flesh', 'blood', 'righteousness', 'redeemer', 'sinner', etc. in the New Testament as to their precise and actual meanings with all their aspects, nuances, differences of usage and accompanying undertones; also the closer and more distant environment, the 'field' of meaning, of the terms. If this is all taken seriously one finds oneself in the midst of the vast, labyrinthine history of these terms, which can be by no means adequately 'defined' (and thus disposed of) by a mere 'definition of terms'. This is especially the case since such a definition would again have to use terms which could not be laid down by means of simple, indivisible and yet unequivocally 'clear' elements.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is not the place to examine how, under these presuppositions, the Divine Revelation can and must be conceived to happen. At all events the idea found in academic theologies is impossible or at most acceptable only as a very formal pattern. This idea assumes tacitly and without reflection (and by and large without any further consideration at all) that the transcendent God inseminates fixed and final propositions into the consciousness of the bearer of revelation (albeit by using a given human terminology not susceptible to historical change). This kind of idea would almost eliminate the possibility of a real history of revelation.

[69]

II

In a word, if there is a history of revelation, then and only then is there a real history of theology, recognising a real historicity as one of its essential elements. Of course this assertion can be proved directly by reference to historical empirical fact. If it were not true, the theologian would not need to write and to study the history of dogma and of theology. But he does. And yet our assertion can only be proved, in the sense in which it is meant, provided that existing history of dogma and theology itself is not misinterpreted by the theologian.

Here too there is among theologians an unreflected ‘model’ of the history of dogma and theology beneath the surface which denies its true historicity. It is understood as a system of logical relations and consequences of the basic data of faith (articuli fidei), projected separately and in succession on to the stream of time although in reality they are timeless and supra-historical, capable of being reunited as a system. It is certainly the case, if this ‘system’ exists, that the concrete logical relations and origins of individual statements can be viewed and justified in a deductive theology of this sort. But this applies only if the system exists, only if the particular statement, the new or metamorphosed concept, the new dogmatic formulation already exists. (This is of course always the case in this kind of logical, ‘timeless’ operation, but it does not thereby become automatically ‘real’.) One only needs to ask the naïve proponent of such an unhistorical view of the history of civilisation to anticipate the future of theology in the next few millennia by means of his method – which he ought to be able to do if he is right, and yet cannot do – to see the inadequacy of this kind of rationalistic interpretation of the history of dogma and theology.

The real and effectual logic of this history takes place only within it. The logical deductions of a theologian coming afterwards and distilling later dogma from the original data of revelation are only possible, however, because this process of distillation has already occurred in history. They are only conceivable as the realisation of what has already happened in history, and the theologian remains dependent upon this actual history notwithstanding all possible logic. If the ‘syllogism’ (in the broadest sense of the word) is already there, its context can be understood. But it must be there already. Understanding it does not mean that it therefore is. Today it is possible to speed up the solution of problems which are quantifiable by calculating machines and thus to hasten what one might call the ‘history’ of these calculations. But I do not think that computers [70] could be built for theology to any significant degree, chiefly because no-one would know how to programme them. Theology must work fundamentally with analogical concepts, and these are not suitable for quantifying thought-processing. The first and characteristic event of theological logic is and remains this history itself which has a completely logical energy and structure, but one which can only really take place within this actual history. The historical situation, as the concrete context in which the ‘logical’ occurrence first takes place, is indispensable to the occurrence. And since the total historical context of subsequent events of this kind in the progress of dogma cannot be foreseen, the future history of theology cannot be predicted or calculated in advance, in spite of the utmost rational discernment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The following simple example may serve to illustrate what is meant with regard to theology's genuine historicity (and hence its fundamental openness to the future at all times and in all matters): one has the impression that many not insignificant theologians admit the growth of many important theological concepts (how could anyone still deny the fact today?), and ultimately also that these concepts are not merely different words for a terminology which was already present beforehand. The concrete – and unreflected – interpretation of these theologians, however, runs as follows: once these concepts are there, they acquire a fixed and final character, by virtue of which they are removed from the situation of perpetual openness to the future in history, and stand like fixed stars, immobile and unquestionable, shining down on the future history of theology. Then these same theologians declare in all goodwill and innocence that one must naturally explain these terms, make them intelligible and continually think them out anew etc. For they too assume and know that it is not enough simply to say 'person', 'nature', 'hypostasis', 'Hypostatic Union', 'substance', 'accidence', 'Transubstantiation' etc. in order to understand what is really meant and also what is not meant thereby. In any case it is only too evident in the history of theology that these individual explanations turn out very differently, and cannot in reality be reduced to such a formula as could be generally accepted, and which was also at the same time so clear as to appear to need no further explanation at all. But in listening to these theologians one becomes aware of the following: this explanation of 'perennial' concepts must surely apply necessarily to other terms: but the latter have in fact a continuing history of their own. Thus the concept which was previously assumed to be 'perennial' is once more submerged in the fluid stream of the history of theology. There is a further objection: under certain circumstances at [71] any rate the explanation ought to be better and more intelligible, with a wider range of aspects, and it ought to be more careful and lucid in its guarding against misunderstanding than the concept it is explaining. Otherwise the 'explanation' becomes a confusion. Why should not new concepts be formed from these explanations in the course of their historical evolution, to overtake and replace the concepts explained in former times, not declaring their meaning to have been false but transcending this meaning in the new concept by a more comprehensive, sensitive treatment and more effective protection against misunderstanding? This is what happened before: pre-Chalcedon Christology – at least in the East – did not possess the concepts used by us today and yet had to express the Hypostatic Union. Our meaning is the same as this ancient Christology, but we cannot use its ways and means of expression as formerly, for we have different concepts, not merely different vocables, from those of Cyril of Alexandria. In these concepts much is clear to us (and much is perhaps less clear) which was not so at that time. What happened in the past will be the case in the future as well. The slow pace of this historical progression in the history of theology may be justifiable in a particular field in the very nature of the case; in many areas a retarded or stagnating development in theology will be an unhealthy sign for this theology itself. Basically, however, one cannot simultaneously look forward to a future history of the development of dogma in particular themes, and yet regard it as closed in other areas and declare all further history to be forbidden.

Our place is in history and it is only in its forward-moving course that we possess the eternal truth of God, which is our salvation. This saving truth is the same within history, but, while remaining the same, it has had and still has a history of its own. This 'sameness' communicates itself to us continually, but never in such a way that we could detach it adequately from its historical forms, in order thus to step out of the constant movement of the flow of history on to the bank of eternity, at least in the matter of our knowledge of truth. We possess this eternal quality of truth in history, and hence we can only appropriate it by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

entrusting ourselves to its further course. If we refuse to take this risk, the formulations of dogma wrongly claimed to be 'perennial' will become unintelligible, like opaque glass which God's light can no longer penetrate.

In addition, theology must not ignore the fact that on the one hand it must employ already given concepts which it has not itself subjected to exhaustive reflection, but on the other hand these concepts of pre-theological origin continue their history in the extra-theological realm. The content of meaning of the terms used continues to change and thus can [72] lead to deeper insight or to misunderstanding when these concepts and words are employed in theological formulas. Nowadays, for example, on hearing the word 'person' we are bound by an almost inevitable historical conditioning to imagine something which is by no means safely allowable when used in the context of trinitarian and Christological dogma. This is the case even with simple words like 'marriage', 'bread', 'wine'. The subtle theologian may be able to look after himself to some extent in these cases. But what about the ordinary theological 'consumer'? All, however, have to bear the burden of history, which is laid on theology too.

III

What are the implications for a theology which is aware of its historicity?

1. Theology must take into account changes determined by the total historical situation in which it exists. The history of theology must not be imagined as the unfolding of a complete system which, though taking place in time, unfolds solely according to the conditions of the system itself and its structure and can be predicted – assuming that the system is transparent from the beginning. This is not the case, even if the presupposition has to be made that what is developing in history (the depositum fidei) cannot itself grow any more. Here, too, history takes place within and springing from a real, cultural and sociologically conditioned total situation, which cannot be adequately reflected upon and which is thus not completely foreseeable in all its implications and consequences. Faith itself (as fides qua and quae) is the ultimate, comprehensive interpretation of human existence, involving its real concreteness in which the whole salvation of existence is to be effected. And so even if it were possible to express an abstract assertion about the nature of man, devoid of any historical reference, it would be insufficient as a statement of faith, confronting man in the concrete flesh of his history.

It is precisely expressions of faith (and thus theology) in respect of man which must by their very nature involve themselves above all in man's historical situation. This means dialogue with and within this situation in so far as the latter has itself been the object of scientific and theoretical reflection; it also means courage to become involved with the unreflected situation, accepting it and speaking from within it in the Christian hope that the truth of God, which must needs be expressed, will not – by the Spirit of God – be substantially corrupted (either objectively or subjectively) by being expressed from within the particular historical situation, even when unaccompanied by a final and transparent confirmation [73] as to the legitimacy of the historical situation. It is obvious from this point of view that a complete, self-enclosed theological system is an absurdity. Seen in this way theology is and has always been eclectic theology. A truly living theology is free from the fear of not being sufficiently pure and systematic; the fear that it must not draw concepts, complexes of problems and perspectives from simply any quarters. This anxiety is unfounded in any case, because, when seen from the point of view of the history of ideas, the only material source for theology – scripture and tradition – has itself been involved in 'eclecticism' and in consequence has always gone without a material and adequately transparent synthesis of its plurality of data. It has never been able to ascertain positively and adequately whether and in what manner everything fits together.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. If we exclude the fundamental change in the modern world from the cosmocentricity of the Classical and Mediaeval times to our modern anthropocentricity (i.e. the explicitly transcendental perspective of modern times), we see that the situation in which and to which theology's assertions must be spoken is characterised by three things:

(a) Firstly, by the rational world-view of the natural sciences, according to which every factor is explained by its antecedent factor and points to a subsequent factor – at least as far as methodology is concerned – and in which the world is a dynamic and developing system (though not capable of being adequately translated by us into our system in any positive and material way). Theology has not yet come to the end of this matter in its open and critical dialogue with today's situation; in its dialogue with a 'methodological atheism' (and its consequences for man's basic constitution) which inheres immanently in the presuppositions of this world-view, theology has not yet concluded its examination of the legitimacy and the limits of such methodological atheism; nor in respect of the possibility and the essence of the 'sign' (Wunder); nor with regard to the meaning of the idea of the 'abiding', unchangeable nature of man, and of the moral and juridical aspects of natural law; nor as regards the meaning, the implications and limits of an evolutionist world-view in general and the possibility of integrating Christian salvation-history into such a world-view.

(b) Today's situation is determined by the processed experiences of human historicity and the connection between all the individual elements and phases of history both in the time-continuum and in the interdependence of the various human dimensions (biological, social, cultural, etc.). Since it is nowadays interpreted almost inevitably after the manner [74] of the natural sciences, this experience is sealed off from experience of what is absolutely new and simply unpredictable in new historical phenomena. Irrespective of whether and how far this mentality is correct or incorrect, one can only deal with it effectively provided that one has expressly understood in a theological manner that man's whole history, from its very first origins, has been knit together with divine grace, that one of the constituents of man's historical existence is always inevitably his supernatural existentiale. Consequently theology cannot expect salvation-history as officially expressed to appear without any real continuity with the history before and around it. As this dynamic relationship of grace and revelation in the whole of history has not yet been sufficiently pondered upon by theology, the latter's dialogue with the modern situation with regard to historicity has not been developed enough.

(c) The situation of the modern world is that of a world which has become dynamic, in which man consciously plans and creates himself and his environment with a view to the future. This is another aspect of the modern situation with which theology has not been sufficiently concerned. It is true that since Leo XIII it has asserted more clearly the principles of human social organisation according to natural law, but it has regarded them chiefly as being contained in assertions concerning society's permanent essence, and thus as factors instrumental in conserving order and stability. But theology has neither given close enough examination to the historically conditioned 'models' behind this kind of vague 'principles', nor has it sufficiently developed – out of the dynamic quality of the times and of the Christian message – the imperatives and prototypes needed for the this-worldly future which is to be actively created. The dialogue with this aspect of the situation was actually not declared necessary until the Second Vatican Council. As far as the future of theology itself is concerned, all depends on the task being begun now in earnest. A Christian eschatology must also develop a theology of the relationship between Christian existence and projected this-worldly utopias. Just as Christianity, as a result of its unique understanding of the world, has emancipated from itself a secular world so that the latter may grasp its freedom and its own significance, so too, from the position of its own eschatological view of the future,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christianity must allow a this-worldly vision of the future to emerge legitimately from within. If it does this, theology will change.

3. The situation in which theology carries on its dialogue with the world is conditioned in part by sin. It is strange how little the Christian [75] teaching about sin is explicitly applied to the field of knowledge. Of course sin in this field, where it basically takes the form of an actus intellectualis as such, is radical error, personally committed. And Christian theology has a lot to say about truth and error. But quite apart from the fact that theology only deals in a very defective way with man's achievement of truth or falsehood from the point of view of its moral character as 'decision', guilt (as concretely objectified in e.g. the cultural, social situation of a particular time) in the field of knowledge can be incurred in quite different ways besides merely through propositions which, taken by themselves, must be described as 'falsehood'. Prejudice, bias, deafness to other aspects of reality, obstinate conservatism isolating itself from new knowledge, premature emphasis, heresies which come to light in a way of life but which consequently or instinctively withdraw from theoretical expression, the failure to take other opinions seriously, the impatient haste or obstructive lethargy which can miss truth's real kairos as that which brings salvation (in ecclesial jargon termed misunderstanding the 'opportuneness' of a truth), an unbalanced urgency in presenting a particular truth – these and many other possibilities of sin exist apart from the falsehood of a proposition even in the realm of the most rarefied and pure theoretical knowledge.

If man's concrete situation is determined therefore (whether he himself deals righteously or sinfully) in part by sin as a general 'existentiale' of human existence, this applies also in the ways we have mentioned, and in other ways, to man's situation in respect of his knowledge. Man's situation in knowing is not only historically finite (contingent, bound to a particular perspective), but it is also always partially conditioned by man's sin in the matter of objectification. Human reflection is quite unable to 'rid itself' adequately of sin prior to any thought within the situation (for to do so it would again require to think 'in a situation'). Theology's historicity is therefore also determined in part by sin. It could be said that even the situation in which truth is found is determined in part by 'concupiscence', and this conditioning factor can never be adequately eliminated. Consequently even the concrete attaining of truth itself, which is always more than the mere 'possessing' of the truth of a true statement, is subject to the question as to whether one has dealt righteously or sinfully, a question which can ultimately only be answered by the judgment of God.

What has been said however, implies two things for theology and its historicity:

(a) Theology's dialogue with and within the present situation neither [76] can nor need be pursued with the idea that theology's partner-in-dialogue is the bearer of a knowledge which does justice in all things to the truth and to the present hour. Within and in spite of its own historicity theology has a thoroughly critical function to exercise with regard to the 'spirit of the age'. Theology changes the concepts it adopts for its own communications, and must have the courage to contradict and to contest ideology's absolutising of insights which may be in themselves correct. At the same time theology must always retain the self-critical awareness that it will by no means always recognise the sinfulness of the spirit of the age easily and as a matter of course wherever it crops up and in its most decisive instances; it must be aware that it is itself always in danger of unwittingly protesting against a coming situation merely in the name of an earlier historical situation. It must realise that the very act of contradicting a time-bound ideology demonstrates the historicity of theology, for the latter cannot choose its opponent for itself and in a strange way it falls beneath its opponent's law in contradicting it.

(b) But theology must also know about the sinfulness of its own historicity, not only the sinfulness of the situation in which it finds itself. Setting aside for the moment the error which always clings to it, we may observe in theology that very concrete form taken by man's sinfulness in the field of knowledge. Theology itself can be tedious, complacent; it can be narrow-minded in not taking the questions of the times seriously and not being open to bear the full weight of them, with the result that they are not really brought to mind. Theology may imagine that a formal framework can be a substitute for a concrete answer to a genuine problem. It may think it has the answer already before it has taken account of the new questions; it may think that the proof must be correct because the conclusion (perhaps taken as settled from another quarter) is correct. It can imagine too easily that it has uncovered a contradiction when it is in reality only too weak and comfortable to find a synthesis. It can be tempted to regard Church orthodoxy as automatically demonstrating scholarly competence. It can imagine that the great questions of God and the world have been discussed enough and that all that is required is to pass on the sacred formulas like an inheritance of ancient and precious jewels; it can harden its heart and not see behind the opponent's false assertions the deep distress of a fellow man; it can forget that not all talk about truth is automatically done in love, although this ought to be the case. It is possible for theology to be carried on in a sinful manner. This is because the theologians are themselves sinners. Theology's dialogue with the spirit of the age can only be pursued correctly if theologians [77] always tacitly reckon with the historicity of their own theology, in which their own sinfulness is objectified.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

4. As is apparent from what has just been said, the historicity of theology implies the possibility and the effects of error even in theology not officially condemned (at least at a particular time) by Church authority. Theology must take account of this in its dialogue. It is unfortunate that although this fact is not denied in thesi, and is also admitted as a historical fact, it has not been recognised as a subject-matter for theology as such. Thus it happens, for instance, that the kinds of theological error are distinguished by the so-called 'theological qualifications' according to their occurrence in particular propositions; but error is not distinguished in its inner essence itself. However, it is by no means easy to say where and what an 'error' is, where it is only 'ignorance', where the abstractio which is not yet a mendacium begins and ends, where a particular individual perspective, within which a particular reality is seen, claims such absolute validity (in actual fact, even if it is not claimed in theory) that it becomes effectively an error. The question hardly ever arises as to the significance of the presence of two propositions, which seen objectively are mutually exclusive, within a single consciousness – though, indeed, in different degrees of clarity and agreement. When does a distinction introduced into a statement make it clearer, when does it reveal it as previously wrongly understood, i.e. as error? At the same time it must be remembered that, because of its concrete actuality as the object of our thought, even a statement which must be designated simply as true (e.g. a definition) can enter into a field of meaning and frame of reference which latter, since they are themselves not proof against error in their construction, again make the question of the truth of the relevant proposition much more difficult than it at first seemed. And if even the truest statement does not say everything about the reality it intends, but selects its material, it is only too easy to draw consequences from it which are unwittingly and tacitly based on the assumption that the whole of intentional reality is hidden within the proposition in question.

One ought to demonstrate all this with examples in greater detail than is possible here, in order to communicate the importance of the questions raised. It is not easy to distinguish error from ignorance in theology. If, since the Council of Trent at least, the celebrant's special function at the Mass was so one-sidedly uppermost in the average awareness of theologians and the faithful that all that remained for the Christian was mere attendance at Mass, was that ignorance or error? If someone maintains the dogma of Original Sin but is simply unaware that this sin and personal [78] habitual sin are united in an analogous and not in a univocal concept, has he then made a true statement and merely been ignorant of a second and different one, or has he misunderstood a dogma and committed error? Why is the dogma of 'Transubstantiation' true (which no-one will doubt), although the substantia panis does not exist in the sense in which it was conceived at the time when the dogma was formulated? Now we can make 'distinctions' in these cases, but precisely that was impossible in earlier historical situations. Why and in which cases does this kind of inability to make distinctions not constitute an error in the earlier understanding of the particular assertion?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

However these questions are to be answered, there are errors in theology, even in the theology not officially condemned. This is proved by the history of theology, and not only the history of times long past, e.g. when the Immaculate Conception was not only not known, but was a matter of admitted dispute. It has also been so in our most recent past. The changes which have appeared during the last hundred years up until the most recent time cannot all be included under the heading of 'the transition from the implicit to the explicit', from the less to the more precise, or as the simple addition of new supplementary insights. There has also been the transition from error to true insight, not without struggle, pain and bitter personal sacrifice. Much of what is and what must be taught today – this applies even to Vatican II – with regard to questions of biblical studies, questions of the nature of marriage, freedom of conscience, sociological questions, questions on the borderland between science and theology, problems in the history of dogma – much of this was at an earlier time disputed, fought over and highly suspect in theology; opposed to it was the sententiae communis protected and propagated by the magisterium, even though not, of course, in a definitive and obligatory form. The generally accepted academic theory that there are sententiae per se reformabiles in the theology and in official teaching as well, is not merely a theory but also – if we are honest – a theory confirmed by fact.

It is not fortuitous that Vatican II (against considerable opposition from conservative theologians on the Council's Theological Commission) asserted that the Church's magisterium is infallible not when propounding a doctrine in a merely general way, but when it declares one as commanding the absolute assent of faith. Of course that does not mean that where this is not the case one can think and teach whatever one wishes, as if there were no such thing as the obligation of theological assent (even if the latter is itself capable of reform). But the facts and the Church's doctrine oblige the theologian to be modest and self-critical, [79] taking the possibility of error into account even when presenting a traditional doctrine and one which is favoured by the Church's teaching office. Theology must be aware of this since it does not only live its historicity, as it did almost exclusively in the past, but nowadays is also consciously aware of it. It must ponder the matter and always seriously include it anew in its calculations. In one respect, therefore, it will move more slowly and hesitantly (it may be symptomatic that not a single new definition was produced at Vatican II), but on the other hand it will often more easily find the courage to give up an obsolete position without each time having to apply too much skill in interpreting traditional formulas. In this new situation, where theology has become capable of reflecting upon its own historicity, it is indeed hard to have to become conversant right from the start with a genuine synthesis comprising a correctly understood obligation to the past and the courage to commit oneself to the present and the future; but it is also quite clear and does not dispense one from the necessity of giving up theological positions which are no longer tenable. This courage is a better act of faith than the anxious conservatism which only gives up such a position when development has far outrun the mental framework of the thesis in question, so that the latter can only be found haunting text-books; and the damage done by this time is very great as regards the readiness to believe and the confidence in the Church's teaching authority on the part of intellectuals and also of ordinary people.

In theory and practice the most important form taken by such a possible error in theology (irrespective of whether anyone does or does not want to call it an 'error') is when a really important, indispensable (and possibly also defined) affirmation reveals certain 'impurities',

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

standing within a field of meanings and problems which cannot make the same claims as the affirmation itself, or being illustrated by a model which is not timeless but itself subject to the process of historical change. What is decisive is that this 'impurity' cannot be observed automatically at all times and in all cultural periods; thus it is not so easy to decide later on whether this 'impurity' (the model, or, in short, that which is implicitly and unconsciously understood in addition to the true theological propositions) was originally put forward with the same absolute claims as the particular affirmation itself, and hence whether it shares the latter's theologically obligatory character or not. In the end one can show historically that the formulation of the indispensable theological statement originally included the implicit, unconscious content which justly appears to us today in such a problematical light, and which we eliminate [80] from our understanding of the indispensable affirmation. Once we have this 'distinction', once it is accepted and current everywhere, the problem is over. And even the most conservative theologian will then say that the affirmation in question was always understood within the context of this distinction – which is of course by and large a somewhat unhistorical interpretation of the history of theology. But a long struggle is required before this 'distinction' becomes accepted, and the immediate impression is that the 'distinction' is actually destroying the true affirmation itself and is arbitrary. Indeed it may be that the 'progressive' opponent of the 'impurity' is actually of the opinion that his denial of the impurity is also a denial of the affirmation itself, because he too is incapable of envisaging such a distinction. The historicity even of theological truth is revealed most clearly by this rejection of a particular model. And it is not a rejection in favour of a metaphysical affirmation which is now 'pure', but a rejection in the transition to a new model which is not amenable to adequate reflection at all. (Every concept needs a conversio ad phantasma.)

Plenty of examples could be found for what is meant. Only a few can be indicated here. The statement 'There must be private property' is correct. But how much was thought to follow from this in practice from the middle of the nineteenth century on! How much that by no means follows, and yet which was thought to be justified by this affirmation. Augustine was correct in saying that Original Sin was passed on generatione. But as yet he was unable to distinguish this concept from the libido generandi. And that was wrong. Viewed historically, did he intend something incorrect by this statement? 'God inspired the Bible' is an indispensable affirmation. But it was previously thought to mean all manner of things which have had to be given up. 'The Gospels are historical accounts' – a true statement. But what does that mean precisely, and what does it no longer mean, although it was thought to do so in earlier times? 'Original Sin as such incurs damnation' – a correct statement. But how am I to imagine this 'damnation' in greater detail? May I, must I immediately imagine it (like Augustine) as the damnation which results from personal sin? Does this statement oblige me to maintain that there really is this kind of damnation resulting merely from Original Sin, or is it only a question of a hypothetical statement? 'Marriage is an institution orientated towards procreation' is a true statement. But does this 'definition' exhaust the nature of marriage? Or has not the affirmation often been taken unconsciously – and wrongly – as an adequate definition of marriage? 'In a society all have not the same function' – a true statement. But has it [81] not been unconsciously understood as sanctioning an undemocratic, paternalistic society? 'Error has no rights' – a true statement. But have not false consequences long been drawn from this? Has it been made clear that it was itself wrongly understood, and that hence an error has been propounded?

Error exists, therefore, in theology. It cannot easily be separated from defined dogma straight away. Theology's possibility of error is the most radical indication of its historicity, in so far as the latter is related to the knowledge of truth as such.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

IV

This historicity is accepted and realised by the dialogue continually maintained with the spirit of a particular period, expressed in its sciences. Inasmuch as in this dialogue theology is the representative of God's Revelation and the Church's Faith, it need not regard the other partner-in-dialogue as of equal status with itself. This question too is not so easy, however, because even on the secular and non-ecclesial side, viewed objectively, it is not merely human intellect and worldly experience at work, but most decidedly the effects (perhaps hidden and anonymous) of the illumination of supernatural grace and faith and the impulses of the Holy Spirit.

But however this may be, the Church speaks (at different levels, and hence also through the mouth of its theology) as the historical and social representative of a truth from which she cannot fall, as a result of the eschatological promise of God and his grace. The 'world' does not possess this promise (or rather, possesses it only through the Church). Although, however, the dialogue between the Church's theology and the world is not simply a dialogue between two equal partners seeking truth in the same way, it is still a real and open dialogue. This is simply because the Church, on account of the historicity of her theology, is a learning Church, because her pilgrim's course through history also follows the path of truth. For she is guided into all truth by the succouring Spirit of God himself. But this same Spirit leads her ever anew into the truth which she always possesses, through confrontation with her constantly new situation. And since this same mystagogy of the Spirit challenges man's free endeavour and his responsible decision-making to enter into the truth of the Church, the Church today is pledged to carry on the dialogue with the world as a way of perpetual self-realisation and reappropriation of her truth. For there has never before in history been so much 'raw [82] material' for the Church's faith to confront. The Church is faced with an inconceivably immense task. The course of history, especially the history of science, is accelerating at a previous unimaginable rate. Consequently this applies also to the course of the history of theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[83]

5

THEOLOGY AND THE CHURCH'S TEACHING AUTHORITY AFTER THE COUNCIL

On the 24th of July Cardinal Ottaviani as Pro-prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith sent a letter to the chairmen of the bishops' conferences. This letter, which was originally intended to be confidential, was concerned with certain tendencies and dangers in modern Catholic theology and in the Church's theological mentality. Evidently the confidential nature of the letter could not be preserved. Very soon larger or smaller reports or excerpts appeared in the press. Consequently it was decided at Rome to publish the letter in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis.[1] As a result it is available to everyone and has thus also become an object of public reflection and discussion.

The content of Ottaviani's letter to the bishops is as follows:

The letter begins with the assertion that it is the task of the whole people of God now to really translate into action what has been decided at the Second Vatican Council in matters of doctrine or discipline.[2] The letter continues that it is the task of the episcopate to watch over, to lead and to further this 'movement of renewal' begun by the Council (one may add that all three tasks are to be attended to equally). This must happen in such a way that the genuine unfalsified content and intention of the Vatican documents and decrees is respected in every detail. It is the task of the bishops themselves to protect this doctrine since they are held to have a real commission of authoritative teaching under Peter as their head. However, it is to be regretted that news has come to Rome from various parts of the Church concerning abuses in the interpretation of the Council's doctrine and irresponsible opinions, appearing here and there and causing not a little confusion in the minds of many of the faithful. [84] Of course it is imperative to distinguish properly between the deposit of faith and any other opinions; consequently all attempts to understand the doctrines of faith better are to be encouraged. But from the reports of learned theologians and from the study of published theological works the Congregation has become aware of not a few theories which 'to a certain extent' affect dogma and the fundamentals of the faith itself and are no longer keeping within the limits of a legitimate freedom of opinion and hypothesis.

The letter then gives instances to support this observation, emphasising explicitly that it is quoting examples of these 'errors', not giving a balanced and exhaustive description of these theological dangers. Ten of them are enumerated. 1. Concerning revelation: recourse to scripture with an intentional exclusion of tradition, including the restriction of biblical inspiration and the infallibility of scripture, and the false evaluation of historical texts. 2. Concerning the doctrines of the faith: here and there people are of the opinion that dogmatic formulas of faith are so much involved in the flux of historical development that even their objective import can change. 3. Concerning the teaching office, especially the Pope: it is often so neglected or slightly regarded that it is almost seen as a matter of opinion. 4. Concerning the existence of an objective, absolute, firm and unchangeable truth: certain people practically refuse to acknowledge such a thing and subject truth to a kind of relativism, asserting that truth must necessarily follow the rhythm of the development of consciousness and history. 5. Concerning Christology: certain concepts are used in the re-examination of Christology which are hardly compatible with defined dogma; a 'Christological humanism' is spreading (serpit), reducing Christ to the level of an ordinary human being who only gradually became aware of his divine sonship; the virgin birth, miracles and even the resurrection are only held verbally, and in actual fact are made into purely natural matters. 6. Concerning sacramental theology: quite apart from the other sacraments, in the case of the Eucharist certain facts are overlooked or not sufficiently attended to; certain people, pursuing an exaggerated symbolism, proceed as though there were no transubstantiation but only a kind of 'trans-signification'; the truth of the sacrificial aspect is unjustifiably neglected. 7. Concerning the sacrament of Penance: besides the neglect or denial of the personal confession of sin, some people conceive this sacrament as a 'reconciliation with the Church' without

[1] cf. AAS 58 (1966), pp. 659-661.

[2] We would commend this statement – issued by such high Church authority and by a man who is entirely above the suspicion of indiscretely craving for novelty – above all to those circles in the Catholic Church in Germany (e.g. certain of the 'Una voce' groups) who apparently regard it as their privilege to defend ancient truth and hallowed tradition, and who under certain circumstances are not afraid to attack representatives of the Episcopate with most ridiculous suspicions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

emphasising sufficiently that it is also a reconciliation with God. 8. Concerning Original Sin: there are those (nec desunt qui) who attach little value to the teaching of the Council of Trent or interpret it so that Adam's original sin and the transmission of the guilt of sin itself become obscured. 9. Concerning moral theology: not a few are spreading error concerning the objective nature of morality, denying natural law, advocating a situation ethics and corrupt opinions on the morals of sex and marriage and human responsibility in this field. 10. Concerning ecumenism: however much all the work done in this area is to be praised in its encouragement of love and unity with the separated brethren, the Apostolic See (!) regrets that there are people who wrongly interpret the conciliar Decree on [85] Ecumenism and understand ecumenical work in a way which detracts from the truth of the unity of the faith and the Church in a dangerous indifferentism and irenism.

Finally the letter observes that the errors and dangers which are propounded and incurred in individual instances here and there have been set before the bishops in this short summary so that each bishop can concern himself with overcoming or preventing them in accordance with the duties of his office.

As one can see, there is no mention of particular countries where these errors and dangers can be observed particularly. Although the ten points quoted are said to be examples, their theological compass is so wide (more or less explicitly) that practically the whole of theology can be subsumed under their headings except the question of God and modern atheism. Ostensibly the letter is concerned only with dangers and errors of Catholic Christians[3] and theologians, but one may wonder here and there whether in fact it was not also aimed beyond this sphere at Protestant theology or bore in mind the echo which the latter has had among us, which, though not in a tangible written form, is revealed in many people's attitude of mind and in oral theological discussion. The text scarcely discloses whether the extent and urgency of the errors and dangers are regarded as greater in particular topics or whether they are all roughly equal in this respect.

It is the intention of this essay to set forth a number of theological observations which arise or are at least possible from reading this letter. They can only be discussed very generally here as it is clearly impossible in a short essay to deal with the themes raised by the ten errors and dangers referred to.

I

First of all let us make one or two observations concerning the spiritual and intellectual climate within which Ottaviani's letter is to be read. It is one of a certain insecurity and perplexity. To admit this is not unworthy of a Christian nor of authority in the Church. There are questions which are of great import and yet for which no immediate answer is forthcoming. A situation can be opaque; it can have many levels; it can be difficult to weigh up the individual tendencies, currents and opinions or to know when a particular thing is perhaps loudly proclaimed in the Church and yet remains peripheral and uncharacteristic of the majority [86] of theologians and Church people. It can be hard to recognise what is a short-lived fashion, due to disappear of its own accord, and what is the beginning of a more serious danger to come; or what is only theology making up for lost time with rather a lot of noise because it was previously dominated by a stagnant theological conservatism, which stubbornly and in fear isolated itself from the real questions. Consequently it remains difficult to say where tendencies appear which really threaten the faith of the Church. The letter does not attempt to draw a veil over this situation of uncertainty. It draws attention to complexes of problems and questions, gives warnings, but does not reach any really doctrinal decisions, not even of a preliminary kind. That is quite within the rights of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Indeed, it is its duty.

In addition there is this: today it is in the first place never merely a question of repeating the ancient truth, presenting it authoritatively and saying No to deviations from it. We are [3] The Protestant Church is itself suffering even more from the issues raised here, as is clearly shown, for instance, in Bishop Hanns Lilje's Pastoral Letter: 'Hirtenbrief über den Kirchentag', Lutherische Monatshefte 5 (1966), pp. 462-470 (cf. in the same issue of the journal Bishop H. Meyer, 'Theologie und Gemeinde', pp. 470 ff.). Naturally, however, we cannot discuss this different situation here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concerned with presenting this truth in such a way that it really 'speaks to' men and is accepted willingly as being intrinsically true. Whatever the formal doctrinal position may be, it is not sufficient in actual fact to refer back to the formal juridical authority of the Pope and the bishops. Whether we wish it or not, we are subject to the necessity of finding a way between, on the one hand, a 'monolithism'[4] to which everything was clear and where at least anything of any importance could be decided on easily, unambiguously and, above all, quickly and was in fact so decided in a papal declaration of some kind (Encyclical, papal address, declaration from the Holy Office etc.), and on the other hand the tangled chaos in which theologians and laymen feel that in matters of faith they can think and say anything and everything they wish.

The first way is no longer possible as it was pursued previously. It is clear that Vatican II preferred a different method, was more careful and reticent in dogmatic pronouncements, gave more scope to 'dialogue' within the Church, and allowed the different theological currents to be expressed in a less inhibited manner. It has been shown that in many [87] questions an unequivocal and obligatory doctrine can be less easily formulated than was thought to be the case twenty years ago. Complexes of questions, theological terminology and methods have become so diverse in recent decades that it has become much more difficult to say exactly what a theological idea really means when it is 'translated' into another theological language – a task which is necessary, however, in the modern theological pluralism.

The second way, for a Catholic understanding of the faith and the Church, is a false path: there must be a confession of faith in the Church; it is not the case that there are merely equally valid 'interpretations' of the most diverse, disparate or even contradictory kinds in the Church, behind which the common 'meaning' is found only as what is unutterable and inexpressible. There is an authoritative teaching office which is able to express the Church's faith in genuine human conceptuality as true and binding on everyone. It can reject a contrary affirmation and can command assent in saying that such an affirmation is contrary to the truth, however much all the Church's expressions of faith on the one hand point in the direction of the incomprehensibility of God, and on the other hand include the element of congruity within a community of language which could be otherwise.[5] Naturally it cannot be our task in this short essay to provide a foundation for this 'inbetween' situation in a theological theory of knowledge or even to give practical rules for following this 'via media'. In this area much remains to be done.

The tendencies and views mentioned by Ottaviani do exist. They exist in the German-speaking world too, although not all in the same degree of clarity. Of course these views do not exist as a complete system. Nor can all the dangers and errors be found to the same extent in German theological literature. It is rather that many of these things are present in the form of a particular mentality, or only come to light in private oral discussion. Naturally these tendencies are clearly expressed in Protestant theology except in the case of specifically Catholic themes likes transubstantiation for example. So it would be very remarkable if they were absent from Catholic theology in the German-speaking world (especially today when both theologies influence each other much more than ever before). We have these tendencies

[4] The reader is asked to excuse our using a word from the realm of politics in this context. But it seems briefly and clearly to characterise a particular way in which Church authority (which is not simply identical with the rights and duties of the magisterium itself) used to react before John XXIII and the Second Vatican Council. This attitude, which prevailed since Pius IX and above all since the fight against Modernism, may have been justified in its time, but it is nowadays no longer appropriate to the situation and must change, precisely so that the magisterium can exercise its function effectively.

[5] cf. K. Rahner/K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, ed. J. Feiner/M. Löhrer (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 686-703, esp. 693 ff.; cf. ibid., pp. 727-782 (literature).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

too. We shall not illustrate this with individual references, since in the first place it by no means depends on how far the tendencies and attitudes mentioned have found expression in actual theological literature. But we must observe (1) that, as we have [88] said, these tendencies have certainly not been formulated as a 'complete system'; and (a) that there are also questions not mentioned in the letter, although they are just as important (if not more so), which must be attended to. The question of God, of the possibility of experiencing him, the question of atheism and all that is connected with atheism as its foundation – these too belong among the problems which find themselves in a situation of insecurity.

The individual spheres of problems referred to in the letter are also (though not exclusively) concerned almost always with genuine questions and obscurities, with the difficulty of finding a genuine synthesis of the inheritance of faith with what constitutes the modern mentality and with the new questions and insights of the theological and profane sciences. Consequently nothing is effected by giving a simple 'No' to all this and by repeating traditional doctrine of which even the very formulation is monotonous to the ear. This was often stressed by the Council too. But Ottaviani's letter makes rather too little mention of this. In addition the letter's treatment of the issues is unfortunately marked by a vagueness, inevitable to a certain extent, but which is not very helpful. One is obliged to say this in all modesty and openness, even while bearing in mind that this letter was a request to the bishops and did not intend to be a long exposition of theological doctrines.

For instance, when is the vis inerrantiae et inspirationis incorrectly 'constricted' (coarctant)? For there is a legitimate and necessary drawing of boundaries. When is the objective meaning of a dogmatic formula wrongly altered? For there is a movement of change in theology which, for instance, purifies the enduring meaning of a dogmatic formula of accompanying misunderstandings which were previously almost inevitable, or which separates it from interpretations which were previously not so clearly distinguishable and now may be freely discussed.[6] When has the doctrine of the Church's teaching authority been under-valued? For there has been progress in theological knowledge (in the last century too) which has caused reformable doctrines of the teaching office to be recognised as being also de facto to be reformed.[7] When has there been a false relativism? There exists a development and a history of doctrine, which cannot be interpreted merely as the result of new supplementary [89] items of knowledge but which understands the ancient, 'enduring' truths in a new way. Which new concepts are being tried out in Christology which are incompatible with the Christological definitions? For there is in Catholic theology a process of rethinking of Christology, which is clearly necessary and must work with a modern conceptuality without incurring theological censure. When has the definition of 'transubstantiation' been damaged, when is the concept of 'Agape' plus aequo emphasised at the expense of 'sacrifice'? There are certainly many obscurities in the doctrine of original sin, but when can one speak of 'obscuring' the doctrine if biblical aspects are stressed which are not clearly visible enough in the traditional doctrine? If we are right in rejecting a 'situation ethics' (which?; and what does it imply?), what is the sound core which it does have and which is not sufficiently clear in traditional moral theology? What are the perniciosae opiniones in modern sexual morality and how can they be distinguished from the good elements of progress beyond the teachings of Pius XI and XII, which have doubtlessly been accepted or at least prepared for by the Council? When and by what means is a correct ecumenism perverted by a false irenism and indifferentism?

One cannot deny that the tendencies and dangers mentioned in the letter actually exist. Nor [6] cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur Geschichtlichkeit der Theologie', Integritas. 'Geistige Wandlung und menschliche Wirklichkeit', ed. D. Stolte/R. Wisser, Festschrift für K. Holzamer (Tübingen, 1966), pp. 75-95, in this volume, pp. 64 ff.

[7] One only needs to consider the concrete example of evolution (in relation to the concept of Creation, etc.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can one say that a letter of this sort, or the Church's teaching office in Rome, could do much more than giving this kind of very general warning. But it is precisely this which reveals the situation: modern theology inevitably deals with a mass of problems and methods of conceptual expression and is so weighed down by the awareness of the ambiguity of all statements that it is not so easy as previously to replace a real or suspected error with another, positive and unequivocal statement in which men of goodwill recognise that not only something correct is said but also something which is equal to their 'concern'.

The situation must be looked at and appreciated soberly; for only then can one ask how the Church and her teaching authority relate in the most correct and effective way within this situation. It is a situation of a pluralism of scholarly theological methods and terminologies, an inconceivable breadth of scope of theological problems, in the face of which no individual theologian can be an adequate specialist at all. For this reason the theologians' theses are no longer simple Yes or No answers to a doctrine which has been traditionally handed on and is fixed and formulated, equally familiar to all, but they are often related to the particular doctrine in a uniquely disparate way. These theses are mostly formulated in a 'dialogue' with philosophies, profane theorems, world-views, which are [90] themselves ranged quite disparately beside one another and are not known and understood in their plurality by any one individual. However much one must always strive to speak with one language, to understand each other mutually, these attempts have material limits today. The attempt to produce an absolutely homogeneous theology from the point of view of terminology and the questions it deals with, accessible to all theologians, if it could succeed at all, would end up as the theology of a small sect, unable to address itself to its environment any more. In addition, this situation is characterised and made more difficult by the fact that not a few contemporary Christians maintain in themselves a strange 'unity' of two attitudes: on the one hand the tendency towards 'reinterpreting' doctrine, often with little respect for authoritative Church doctrine, whereby the desire for novelty easily dominates over the preservation of what is permanently valid in ancient doctrine, and on the other hand the desire to stay in the Church and to make room within it for one's own understanding of the faith. If one may put it crudely: before, one simply said No to an affirmation of authoritative Church doctrine and left the Church; now one tries to interpret this doctrine in one's own way and desires it to become commonly held in the Church. By this over-simplified but not insignificant description of the situation we do not mean that authoritative doctrine needs no interpretation but only to be simply repeated, precisely in order that it shall remain and be believed. But the question is, what are the limits of such an interpretation? What are the limits which cannot be exceeded, so that the Church may have the definite courage to say No when they are exceeded, and that the proposer of the interpretation may have the courage and honesty to leave the Church, whose confession of faith he can maintain only verbally and not according to the actual issues? We cannot here answer the question as to how this peculiar 'unity' of two such opposed attitudes is to be explained. In brief one might say perhaps that this 'unity' is symptomatic of the transition from an individualistic to a 'collectivist' age. People (still) wish to think individualistically and yet belong to a community of a similar mind. We cannot deny that such an intention has its justification and is – correctly understood – a task for a meaningful future. The question is only how both can be joined in one in a genuine manner.

II

In a situation like this, which will surely last for a long time, the former ways and means of doctrinal leadership are evidently insufficient. Today [91] all authoritative representatives of doctrinal world-views (not only the Catholic Church) are faced with the question of how the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unity of the obligatory doctrine can coexist side by side with the much quicker development of knowledge in freedom, and how those who make authoritative decisions in these matters are to respond in this situation.

There has been as yet far too little reflection on this matter. The letter also seems to be a symptom of this now inevitable embarrassment, which is, however, without doubt a healthy sign: one is rightly aware that one cannot do simply everything and commit everything to the 'free discussion' of 'autonomous scholarship', and at the same time one cannot see precisely how and what one is to decide clearly, in order that the decision is both correct as far as the particular issue is concerned and also effective.

It is here that the bishops themselves have a task, so that they need no longer simply wait for authoritative decisions or 'doctrinal political' measures from Rome, as was mostly the case before, content to be relieved of this difficult office of teacher in the modern Church by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Here we see a strange convergence between the theoretical teaching of Vatican II concerning the bishops' teaching authority, which they possess iure divino and on which they must themselves lay hold, and the concrete situation which calls for such a teaching authority. The bishops cannot pass on this task of theirs either to the authorities in Rome or to the theologians.[8] What the dogmatic constitution on the Church of Vatican II said about the office of a bishop is not to remain mere pious print. Furthermore it would be highly dangerous if Rome's effectual authority – the effectiveness of which is not unlimited – were over-taxed. The bishops can address themselves to a particular, regionally diverse situation with better prospects of actual effectiveness than Rome. For while Pius XII was in office Rome did not always proceed sufficiently carefully and sympathetically, with the result that (if we are seeing things as they unfortunately are) it doubtless lost a certain amount of effective authority even among those who were not in principle opposed to this doctrinal authority. Therefore that authority of the bishops which is humanly speaking more effective in particular concrete circumstances, should not be by-passed. It can be more effective – in the human sphere above all – because it can react more appropriately to a concrete situation, confronting and appreciating not only opinions [92] but also those who hold them. It is, or could be, therefore practically speaking more capable of dialogue. Ultimately too it is more effective since, being the penultimate authority, it can 'risk' more (and should have the courage to do so).

In not a few cases the clergy must understand more clearly than before that by no means everything which is discussed in theological science is also suitable for the pulpit. The pulpit is not the proper place for dubious 'demythologisings'. This distinction does not imply in any way that the preacher may say things in the pulpit which he could not defend before the honest and truth-seeking conscience of the scholarly Church theologian. The distinction is based on insight into the sermon's purpose: the salvation of man in the concrete, of the man who is listening and who can be hurt even by what is, in the abstract, a correct statement, if it is said wrongly. Indeed, the letter itself says that the bishops themselves are to do something about this and not merely make reports, and to this extent the letter is 'post-conciliar' in the best sense.

One ought to try as far as possible to foresee doctrinal and practical developments, to lay hold on them in good time and direct them into right paths, separating what is inevitable and correct from what is extreme, eccentric and mistaken. Many of these tendencies which are just becoming apparent to us will very soon become more pronounced and more threatening. We must take that into account quite soberly. The questions which are also raised in the letter will be asked more loudly and more publicly; e.g. the question of 'error' in scripture; the [8] It is interesting to observe the parallel situation that Bishop Lilje too has to defend himself against the accusation that he is not exercising his episcopal teaching authority (cf. supra, p. 85 note 3).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

relationship, in theory and practice, of the man who is both Catholic and theologian to non-definitive decisions of the Church; the manner of knowing God; the nature of original sin; the virginity of the Mother of God; the meaning of God becoming man etc.; also the more practical questions of life and piety will become more urgent, e.g. the concrete forms of the Eucharist (Benediction, 'visits', processions, Exposition); of the confession of devotion; of sexual morality; of mixed marriages; the ethics of education (confessional questions concerned with schools); the celibacy of the secular clergy etc. We can imagine that these and many other similar questions will be asked more insistently and clearly everywhere in the foreseeable future. Something ought to be done in this respect in good time. If false views have already become entrenched and are proclaimed loud and clear in the Church's public consciousness, it is already almost too late. But much is still possible now, at the beginning of the development. It should therefore be actually taken in hand. Nothing is gained by a fearful, deadly silence.

[93] In this matter it is inadmissible to think that everything is clear and that only muddle-heads have new problems with the old questions, which have been answered clearly long ago. For instance, there still seem to be canonists (and bishops too?) who proceed as though a Catholic is morally not permitted – by virtue of divine law – to contract a particular marriage if the children cannot be guaranteed a Catholic upbringing. That is incorrect.[9] Or it is thought to be completely left to the Church's discretion – not only according to canon law, but also morally – under what conditions a mixed marriage may be permitted. That is not right. The question of the 'infallibility' of scripture has not been answered and solved by the Council alone in such a way as to do real justice, in a positive manner, to the legitimate difficulties and problematical situations of the exegetes (and nowadays of the laity too). The question of Christ's knowledge concerning himself is one for which the exegete demands a better answer of the dogmatician than before, in order to deal with his problems. Nowadays, in spite of 'Humani generis', one may surely be permitted to assume that a theory of polygenism does not contradict the doctrine of original sin as defined at the Council of Trent. But this ought to be substantiated in greater detail and it ought to be shown that a polygenism of this kind does not require such a reinterpretation of the doctrine of original sin which would dissolve the dogma effectively into a weak rationalism. The doctrine of original sin must be re-thought no less in other points too, even if one is obliged to respect completely the teaching of Trent on this issue. The open questions in practical sexual morality are well known. Text-book theology has often arrived at an answer too easily. What degree of moral maturity is needed to constitute an indissoluble marriage is a dark question, and its answer has very practical consequences which the canonists have by no means been considering clearly enough or long enough. There are plenty more examples like this.

In many cases Rome itself will only be able to give a 'skeleton answer' (like the Council). Such an answer is important. But it is often not sufficient to protect the orthodox doctrine in a way which does not demand an unjustified sacrificium intellectus or permit the propounding of actual heresy or theological error under cover of an apparent verbal respect for authoritative doctrine. A certain formal and juridical mental attitude which one finds in Rome (and which is understandable and even unavoidable) cannot deal on its own with this situation, in the first place [94] because, as the final authority of the whole Church, it cannot easily speak the theological and human language which is appropriate and understood in a particular cultural setting.

The bishops have a task here; but they must recognise that a solution has yet to be found [9] Details in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 99-103; also the thorough study by J. G. Gerhartz, 'Die Mischehe, das Konzil und die Mischehen-Instruktion', Theologie und Philosophie 41 (1966), pp. 276-400.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and cannot be presumed at the outset. Furthermore the solution must not be present simply anywhere, but must be communicated to the general awareness of the clergy, in order to protect the latter from either reactionary or heterodox 'solutions'.

In the face of this situation of open questioning, the clergy in the first instance, but also the laity, must be made far more clearly aware than before that an attempt at a solution made by individual theologians in the Church is not automatically acceptable in respect of dogma – seen from a practical point of view – if it is presented by a personally respectable theologian and has received the episcopal Imprimatur.

Today it is absolutely impossible to discuss such problems in camera caritatis, excluding all public participation and exposing only the matured solutions to the public gaze. Here too it is no longer possible to conduct 'privy council politics', although that does not mean that any theological nonsense ought necessarily to be allowed to pass the episcopal censure. It is quite in order and necessary for the episcopal censuring authorities to be magnanimous and tolerant in the case of scholarly publications (and conversely stricter than usual with pseudo-pious products which are only apparently 'popular'). In the case of scholarly theological literature the episcopal censor should be limited to a 'coarse filter', simply because it is scarcely possible today to do otherwise without obstructing necessary theological discussion. The latter is indispensable today even in important theological questions, not only in questions which have been regarded as 'open' (and of no consequence) from time immemorial. If that is the case, however, it must be clear to the clergy (especially the young clergy) and laity that in actual fact an Imprimatur gives no definite guarantee of the objective reliability of the view expressed. Consequently it may be a theologian's right and duty to question the orthodoxy of another theologian's theory, even if the latter were published by episcopal permission. Of course, a challenge of this sort is stated at the particular theologian's own risk and carries only as much weight as the reasons he gives. But it can be permitted or even invited. In so far as this does not happen enough, the wrong opinion grows up that everything which appears beneath an Imprimatur is orthodox and may not be doubted. Because this false view prevails the episcopal censors are obliged to become more anxious and rigorous. As a [95] result the theologian's function with respect to the ecclesiality of a new attempt at a solution of a theological question is excluded, to the disadvantage both of the issue itself and of episcopal authority, which consequently has to be over-strained. It is a false politeness and collegiality when theologians are too concerned to take pains to be 'indulgent' with one another. The indisputable decline in theological criticism is to be deplored in this respect, and it is an extremely dangerous situation.

One must not imagine that in relatively weighty theological questions there can or ought to be no continuing differences of opinion which even the Church's teaching office cannot resolve (at least after a lengthy period of time). The Council has declared the reverse to be fundamentally the case, and has given concrete examples of it. One could quote cases – even in post-conciliar Germany – where this freedom in disputed questions has not been sufficiently respected by Church authorities.

However, it must not be thought that today one can either leave each question alone or that it can be cleared up in a purely scholarly dialogue with the agreement of all theological parties, without the teaching office having to step in authoritatively. The bearers of doctrinal authority (each according to his fundamental and respectively different authority and according to the importance of the matter in hand) must have the courage to say No under certain circumstances, even if they have not been able to 'convince' each and every person beforehand by exhortation, theological discussion of the issue itself, etc. After all, the Church has a common confession of faith which must be protected; the Church is more than a theological debating society; furthermore it is not possible to distinguish what is purely 'fundamental' from what is 'secondary', guarding the former and unconditionally

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

surrendering the latter. The sense of the Decree on Ecumenism No. 11 is that there are things which, although not fundamental or only peripherally so, all the same constitute indisputable dogma in the Catholic Church. On the other hand even what is fundamental is under certain circumstances threatened nowadays by erroneous interpretations, even if they are able to maintain a certain verbal reverence for Church definitions. What is 'indispensable' and what is not is decided in the final analysis by the theology of the magisterium, not by the theology of the theologians. The latter have, however, an irreplaceable function in the Church, such that today the bishops have less right than ever before to make decisions simply on the basis of what they learned at one time in some fashion or other, but must keep on continually informing themselves anew. We have already mentioned that in having the courage to take such a decision they must not only make the [96] one which is correct according to the matter in hand, but must also proceed in a humanly understanding and 'winning' way. In this latter respect the bishops have moral duties as well; and it cannot be so readily assumed as people would sometimes have us think that these duties are objectively fulfilled.

Since the bishops are obliged, in the modern complexity of theological problems, to have recourse to advice from theologians, and since the Spirit's aid to the Church is not exclusively available to the bishops and to no others, the bishops will have the right, and under certain circumstances the obligation, to let a theological view go uncensured when it is supported by a considerable body (and this need not be a numerical majority) of theologians who have demonstrated their competence by their teaching and life in general. Certainly this rule presupposes that the bishops have the practical possibility of knowing when a view is present (and what it concerns) which is subscribed to by a considerable section of theologians who think it correct or open to discussion. On the other hand not every opinion of an individual is immune to episcopal objection simply because the particular individual is respectable from the human and scholarly points of view. Naturally every theologian maintains that his view (as being correct or open to discussion) is the result of theological 'science' or some other science, and everyone is only too tempted to regard himself as the mere spokesman of this particular objective 'science'. But that on its own need by no means keep back the bishop in his teaching office from saying an unequivocal 'No' in certain circumstances.

More of these rules could be set up and refined 'casuistically', but ultimately no rule can relieve the bishop of his 'decision' in the specific sense of the word. Ultimately he must decide according to his knowledge and conscience how much courage he needs to use his authority and what measure of caution must be prescribed for using it in the concrete instance. If, objectively speaking, he prescribes wrongly, he can act wrongly in either direction. But he must have the courage to take this risk all the same. He has no absolute security against such a contingency. It is not pleasant, where matters of truth and the intellectual integrity of individuals is concerned, to have to come to a decision under certain circumstances knowing that the decision cannot be regarded as 'irreformable'. But human life and the Church's life of faith are not thinkable without these vulnerable and yet valid decisions. Even theological scholars for the most part do not get beyond such provisional decisions – which are all the same valid here and now – even where they are pronounced under the strange conviction of being merely mouthpieces of 'objective [97] science'. So the right to make decisions of this sort is all the more to be granted to the official authority. For the faith and the Church are not made in the theologian's retort, but are carried by apostolic proclamation in the message which is entrusted primarily to Church authority, to the bishops. The vulnerability of reformable decisions of this kind does not excuse the office-bearer from exercising the duty of his office. But the 'censured' theologian cannot at the outset fundamentally refuse to accept the decision of the bishop's teaching authority and guardianship simply because it is not a priori above the possibility of error, not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'irreformable'.

III

What measures can be taken practically to do justice to these – self-evident – observations and rules? To this question we shall give a merely partial answer in question form.

How can collaboration between bishops and theologians become concretely closer? Why does not the episcopate provide the highly somnolent 'dogmaticians' study group' with tasks, by giving particular advice and suggesting important themes for conferences, etc.? (The same applies to the similar 'society of exegetes'). In the late Middle Ages and in the sixteenth century there were more institutions than today through which theologians expressed themselves as unities and bore collective responsibility. Today it is surely even more necessary. Surely the practice of theologians acting as consultants for the commissions of the bishops' conference ought to be more clearly institutionalised, so that it actually functions correctly and one knows who is responsible for giving advice?

Ought not the episcopal book censorship to be reformed? And why in our case is the provision of canon law not observed whereby the censor has to be responsible by name for his decision? Ought he not to do this when a book is rejected too? Are the censors always competent? Are they both courageous and cautious? Is it certain that the preliminary censure has still more advantages than disadvantages today, or does it not lead to a false evaluation, i.e. an over-valuation of those books which have only just passed the censor? Would not other forms of episcopal reaction to theological work and views be more effective and appropriate today?

It is not necessary today for the episcopal teaching office (in addition to agreeing to the appointment of professors and the filling of similar posts, sermons, the pastoral letters which for the most part seem rather antiquated, and the episcopal book censorship) to be exercised in other ways, best of all perhaps as the official statement of a bishops' conference? [98] E.g. by the bishops' conference issuing teaching letters and publishing its recommendations etc.? Theoretically the bishops' conference has for a long time had an institution for implementing the work of critical and productive contact with theology today and current cultural life as it is theologically relevant. One sees little sign of it and is tempted to doubt whether this institution, as it appears to exist, is even capable of informing the episcopate adequately on all these questions. Is it sufficiently provided with the necessary personnel and technical equipment for such a task?

Could not the 'priests' council' which is to be formed in the individual dioceses be in addition an instrument for keeping the bishop informed about doctrinal tendencies and unrest among the clergy, and for instructing the clergy correctly on such questions? Are the possibilities provided by deanery conferences, theological conferences for priests, conferences for Catholic academies (why not also for members of the clergy themselves?) sufficiently exploited for the purposes we have mentioned? Could not the bishops, without interfering with the free play of theological scholarship by excessive direction, influence the specialist theological journals to apply themselves more to modern questions of theology than to merely learned historical research (the importance of which we do not contest)?

Are the bishops really sufficiently aware of theology's urgent need of their encouragement at an academic level? Are all the bishops definitely willing enough to choose carefully and make available people who will eventually take up theological lectureships? Can this still be left to the individual bishop? May it still happen that a bishop refuses to free theologians for further study on account of a shortage of priests, in the hope that another bishop will do so in any case? Is it not possible to believe that the future of Christianity and the Church will be better served by a highly educated and lively clergy, able to deal with the mentality of our time, than by a quickly trained clergy prematurely expended in the routine work of the care of souls?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Is it not the case that educated people in the Church are very defectively taught by the mass media as regards theological questions? We do not mean to recommend that a more anxious watch be kept over religious broadcasting etc.; that would be quite out of place; but it is possible to have the impression that the bishops do not make available people of high enough qualifications for such a task. Is one not struck by the fact that in a broadcast religious discussion the lay contribution is often better and more relevant than what is presented by the Church in a narrower sense?

[99] The solution of the problems referred to by Ottaviani will depend in the future largely on the training of young theologians. Is the new programme of studies which was committed to the bishops' conferences by the Council being pursued energetically enough? In practice is it not in danger of withering away or being wrecked by the specialist egoism of the individual professors? Are people aware that under certain circumstances professors, who are only exalting their own subject, do not make good advisers in the reform of studies, especially if, as is sometimes the case, they do not understand very much about modern pastoral care, the mental outlook of young people and the level of intelligence of the people who are nowadays coming to theology? So far what has been made known as a result of deliberations about the reform of theological studies in Germany seems merely like a tedious bargaining over lecture timetables. Do people seriously think that that is enough? If the subjects studied are left as they are, unless the ultimate aim, i.e. the training of future pastors, emerges more clearly than heretofore as the principle of form and organization of the studies, unless the actual level of intelligence of the young theologians is more realistically taken into account, unless the theologian's academic instruction is brought into a closer relationship with the existentially religious forming of his personality, the reform of studies will collapse.

Is it not possible to come to a clearer understanding as regards those questions touched on in Ottaviani's letter? How does one transform a mere defence against erroneous or dangerous views and tendencies into a theology of 'offensive'? Could not the bishops encourage such a theology (and not just tolerate it benevolently) where traces of it are to be found?

Without diminishing the Church's basic duty to conserve and defend the whole inheritance of faith, has not the Church's teaching authority the right (and perhaps the duty), trusting in the inner power of Christian truth, to organise centres of concentration instead of fighting battles on all points and frittering away its not inexhaustible resources of strength, gaining a victory nowhere? It ought not to be thought that man has always to be doing 'here and now' all the things which he could do. For instance one can fight false views regarding the theory and practice of Indulgences; but the fight against atheism, conducted properly, is certainly a more pressing problem.

Would it not be possible to pursue quite generally a more offensive theological 'cultural politics' (in the best possible sense), with bishops and theologians more clearly forming a community than is the case at present, where theologians constitute merely the critical element and the [100] bishops represent merely the conservative element in the Church? – a strategy in which the theologians themselves take a clearer part in the offensive of defending the Church's doctrine, and the bishops' role is more clearly that of critically examining this same doctrine? Collaboration between bishops and theologians proved its worth at the Council. Will it be continued, or will everything back in the home situation, after the passing of the Council, remain as it was before the Council?

Everything that has been said is to be understood as a few observations upon Cardinal Ottaviani's letter. It would be truer to say that the letter has provided the stimulus rather than the subject-matter of these remarks. For it is plain that our observations have not entered

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

deeply into the individual theological problems enumerated in the letter. They are thus concerned with a preliminary area of discussion. It may be that some readers have the impression that these notes hover between 'reaction' and 'progress' in theology.[10] But perhaps the author may hope that such an impression is fundamentally a false one after all. Not every compromise is dishonourable. Insight and action are always aiming for a centre which cannot be reached directly. For many, the extremist cuts a better figure than the one who continues patiently to seek this centre anew. But there is need today of that patience which seeks the centre.

[10] On the serious and difficult nature of the questions posed by the Council cf. the author's essay 'The Second Vatican Council's Challenge to Theology', in this volume, pp. 3 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[101]

6

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY WITHIN THE TOTALITY OF THEOLOGICAL DISCIPLINES

The question raised in this paper[1] is 'What does practical theology expect of the other fields of theological study?' First of all we must define the limits of our discussion of the matter in question. The approach and the situation of modern practical theology among the Protestant churches cannot be described. And as far as practical theology within the Catholic Church is concerned, the author is really more of a dilettante who has strayed into this field by a number of chance occurrences. There may be advantages in this if one regards it as a sign that a dogmatician can be interested in practical theology and that, therefore, such an interest can justifiably be expected from him. Seen thus it is perhaps not so untoward that practical theology's demands upon other theological studies should be put forward not by a representative of practical theology but by an 'outsider'.

Since there is no really clear and generally accepted agreement on the Catholic side as to what practical theology is and should be, and consequently there is amongst us no general consensus as to its relationship with the other departments of theological study and as to what demands it can and must make on the latter, the author has no choice but to say – on his own account and at his own risk – what he himself imagines practical theology to be. Anything which follows as a result of this is subject to the proviso that one cannot speak in the name of a single Catholic theology. At the same time of course this does not mean that the author's view is simply unique within Catholic theology or claims any patent for its personal originality. In any case we possess a sketch of a practical theology of this kind in the Handbook of Pastoral Theology, even if such a composite work naturally reveals many deficiencies, since not all its contributions adequately realise the fundamental conception [102] equally well if at all.[2] H. Schuster gives an account of the history of practical theology's understanding of itself from the Catholic point of view in the first volume of the Handbook.[3] The author regards the name 'practical theology' as better than our more usual 'pastoral theology' because the latter indicates a false constriction of the discipline's field of activity, as we shall mention directly.

I

Practical theology is that theological discipline which is concerned with the Church's self-actualisation here and now – both that which is and that which ought to be. This it does by means of theological illumination of the particular situation in which the Church must realise itself in all its dimensions. We shall now amplify this essential description. For a detailed justification of this we refer to other studies.[4]

---

[1] cf. the details in the list of sources at the end of this volume for the occasion of this lecture.

[2] cf. F. X. Arnold (from Vol. III onwards F. Klostermann), K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L. M. Weber (ed.), Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie. Praktische Theologie der Kirche in ihrer Gegenwart I (Freiburg, 1964), II/1-2 (Freiburg, 1966); III. Several translations are in preparation.

[3] cf. the second chapter, 'Die Geschichte der Pastoraltheologie', I, pp. 40-92; cf. also F. X. Arnold, 'Pastoraltheologische Ansätze in der Pastoral bis zum 18. Jahrhundert', I, pp. 15-39.

[4] cf. apart from the contributions of H. Schuster and K. Rahner in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie (esp. I, pp. 93-114, 117-215, 323-332, 333-343; II/1, pp. 181 ff., 233 ff., 256 ff.; II/2, pp. 19 ff., 46 ff.) esp. H. Schuster,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Church is a historical quantity. Without endangering its abiding essence it is true to say that the Church not simply is, but must be continually 'happening' anew. This 'occurrence' of the Church, however, is not simply its being in essence perpetually present in a space-time always external to it, but the historical form of this essence – unique in each instance – to which the Spirit of the Church calls it through its particular and unique historical situation. Because of its Spirit's eschatologically [103] triumphant grace the Church cannot be untrue to the particular 'occurrent' form of its self-realisation to such an extent that it simply ceases being the Church of Christ; but that does not alter the fact that the Church has the task of making a commitment to realise this particular historical form in responsibility and freedom, and can therefore also fall far short of it. Consequently the Church must reflect consciously upon the question how the Church's self-actualisation is to take place arising out of and in response to its particular given situation in each instance. Practical theology is the scientific organisation of this reflection.

This practical theology is a unique, independent science, a fundamental one in essence in spite of its reciprocal relationship with other theological disciplines, since its business of scientifically critical and systematic reflection is a unique quantity and its nature is not deducible. For it is reflection orientated towards committal. It follows from a correct evaluation of the relationship between theory and practice; from an appropriate understanding (from the point of view of existential ontology) of the nature of freedom; from a right theology of the intractability of the Holy Spirit as the principle of the Church's history; from a correct understanding of the nature of hope; from all this it follows that the Church's committal to the particular self-realisation to which it is called at any one time cannot adequately be deduced from its essence. And so the aim of practical theology – precisely this continually new self-actualisation in committal on the part of the Church – is not the mere consequence of an 'essential' theology of the nature of the Church, the Word of God and the kerygma, the nature of the Sacraments, the service of love etc., however possible and necessary this may be. If, in spite of this, this non-deducible factor which inheres in each committal is to be the object of a reflection sui generis which sees into the future, seeking what is to be done here and now, extending the horizons of the possible future, trying the spirits which are proclaiming the future, then the process of reflection upon it, scientifically organised, is an independent and primary science and not only an 'application' of the results of the essential sciences within theology, whether the latter be systematic or historical. It is true that the decisions of the Church are not really made in practical theology, for that is a matter for the whole Church (and within this totality it is a matter for official authority), even if the theory of practical theology, as actually carried on, is itself one factor in the Church's practice. But in being this kind of theory practical theology is not simply an 'essential' science but a quite unique one, a testing of the spirits with a view to the act of committal; it implies a prophetic element – which one may be permitted to call [104] 'political' – since it must be aware of the impulse of the Church's Spirit, which is not simply identical with the perpetually valid truth in the Church, but translates the latter into the concrete challenge valid at the particular hour. Practical theology can and must be this, because the theoria realised in

---

'Wesen und Aufgabe der Pastoraltheologie', Concilium 1 (1965), pp. 165 ff.; K. Rahner, 'A Theological Interpretation of the Position of Christians in the Modern World', Mission and Grace, Vol. I (London, 1963), pp. 3-55; K. Rahner, 'The Second Vatican Council's Challenge to Theology', in this volume, pp. 3-27; also 'On the theological problems entailed in a Pastoral Constitution' and 'Practical theology and social work in the Church', Theological Investigations X; cf. also F. Klostermann, 'Pastoraltheologie heute', Dienst an der Lehre, ed. Catholic Theology Faculty of the University of Vienna = Wiener Beiträge zur Theologie X (Vienna, 1965), pp. 51-108; F. X. Arnold, 'Was ist Pastoraltheologie?', Wort des Heils as Wort in die Zeit (Trier, 1961), pp. 296-300; K. Delahaye, 'Überlegungen zur Neuorientierung der Pastoraltheologie heute', Gott in Welt. Festgabe für K. Rahner, ed. J. B. Metz, W. Kern, A. Darlap, H. Vorgrimler, Vol. II (Freiburg, 1964), pp. 206-218.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

actuality is also an internal factor of the Church's practice and only remains genuine theoria under this presupposition. In a word, it is 'theory' and thus science. But it is the theoria which indwells the practice itself as an internal factor and which is thus not simply identical with the objectifying 'essential' sciences, which simply ascertain from a 'neutral' position what is the case, or what must always be, or what will surely occur independently of decisions. Consequently it is 'critical' towards the Church although it cannot annexe the latter's decisions. It attempts to be of service in continually overcoming the Church's given deficient self-realisation and transcending it in the next new form to which the Church is being called. It exercises a critical function in respect of the other theological disciplines since it is always questioning whether they are adequately making the particular local contribution required of them (and of which they are capable) towards the Church's self-realisation in committal. In spite of this critical aspect practical theology is an essentially ecclesial discipline, since it is not only concerned with the Church in its relation to its activity, but comprehends itself as the factor of reflection which inheres in this activity and is not merely applied to it from outside. As a result it is dependent on everything which constitutes this Church's continuing essence.

Practical theology's subject-matter is everyone and everything in the Church, i.e. all those who participate in the Church's self-realisation, not only those holding office in the Church and in its official care of souls. Consequently its subject-matter is not only the 'care of souls' in the more narrow sense, but the totality of that particular action required of all members of the Church at any one time, in so far as this action is a factor in the life of the Church as such.

Everything is its subject-matter; i.e. the Church's self-realisation in all its dimensions. From this point of view homiletics, catechetics, the study of mission and welfare work are partial fields within practical theology as such, although this does not eliminate the question of these partial disciplines' technical and practical independence.

II

The task of practical theology as an original science demands a theological analysis of the particular present situation in which the Church is to [105] carry out the especial self-realisation appropriate to it at any given moment. In order to be able to perform this analysis of the present by means of scientific reflection and to recognise the Church's situation, practical theology certainly needs sociology, political science, contemporary history etc. To this extent all these sciences are in the nature of ancillary studies for practical theology. However, although the contemporary analysis provided by these profane sciences is necessary and sufficient for its use, it cannot simply draw on it uncritically as though it were already complete and given. Practical theology must itself critically distil this analysis within a theological and ecclesial perspective, a task which cannot be taken over by any other theological discipline. This contemporary analysis does not remain its only task, but it is indispensable. For the committal to the Church's particular relevant self-realisation cannot be unequivocally deduced solely even from a dogmatic knowledge of the essence of the Church and the reflex insight into its contemporary situation. Practical theology, on the other hand, can supply – asymptotically at least – the element of reflection and the offer of possible solutions. Beyond the confrontation of the Church's essence with the contemporary situation, practical theology should contain an element of creativity and prophecy and be engaged in critical reflection.

At this point we take the liberty of adding a small observation, even if it is perhaps not absolutely necessary for our subject. Today it is possible to observe that the concrete achievements of science as such are by no means exclusively due to university scientists.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Besides universities there is an increasing number of other places of research, institutes, learned societies, etc.; even in public and economic administration itself there are scientific organisations which do not merely apply science but carry out actual research. We cannot here enter into the reasons for this – no doubt inevitable – partial migration of science away from the universities. But it can be questioned whether, as regards practical theology, an analogous process is not to be expected and even thought necessary and desirable. In concrete terms: can today's and tomorrow's practical theology be merely a university study sustained by the confidence that its work and its results will to some extent be taken note of benevolently by the 'practitioners' in office in the Church, while in general these practitioners still continue in actual fact to live, make decisions and take action in the future on the basis of their own individual experience of life, which has not been subjected to critical reflection? Or would it be desirable, for instance, for the Church's authorities to have something in the nature of a practical [106] theology being studied scientifically alongside them, since they stand in need of it and since much of what is needed from it can only be seen in enough detail as a result of the closest contact with the practice of the Church? University theology, almost as a result of its very nature, lacks this rapport to a large extent. The politician is someone quite different from the student of political thought. But if it is the case today that life is becoming irresistibly subject to science, the student of political thought and the politician must carry on their work in such close collaboration – organisationally too – that the study of politics can no longer be pursued exclusively in the university. Is not the same sort of thing valid for practical theology too? Would it not be fruitful if the university were to train representatives of practical theology who would then continue to work scientifically within the Church's official organs and in direct contact with it and its tasks, exercising an advisory, critical and prompting function on the basis of this work?

III

What does practical theology, understood in this way, expect of the other theological subjects, and what must it demand from them?

Firstly it demands the recognition of its originality and significance as a theological discipline in its own right. As far as the other disciplines are concerned that is by no means a readily acceptable view. For the most part the representatives of the other disciplines look on practical theology as a mere hotch-potch of practical consequences which follow automatically from these disciplines. In the Romance countries, for instance, we do not yet have any really serious and distinct discipline of 'practical theology' and in this respect the demands of the Second Vatican Council have not yet begun to be met. Or else the representatives of the other disciplines regard practical theology merely as a collection of psychological, didactic, sociological rules of prudence, gained directly from the ordinary practice of the care of souls. No wonder that one's instinctive attitude – not explicitly stated of course – is to make for the most part less imposing demands on the practical theologian's intellectual and scientific competence than in the case of the other theological disciplines. So the first thing required of the other theological studies is a right epistemological understanding of practical theology – with all its consequences. Although we are not able to pursue this matter further here, it implies certain effects as regards the number of and the manner of appointment to professorial chairs, the arrangement of courses, and the provision of the necessary finance, etc.

[107] The second demand – still of a general character – is the demand that the other theological disciplines should recognise the element of practical theology which must be contained within themselves, and that they should cherish it. The whole of theology is an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesial field of study in all its disciplines, precisely because (and in so far as) it exercises its critical function with respect to the Church as well, since this criticism is always immanent in the Church's faith as such. But this also means that all theological disciplines must serve in the Church's self-realisation, and therefore contain within themselves an element of practical theology. As a discipline in its own right it cannot deny the relatedness of the other disciplines to the Church's self-realisation and thus to her faith, her message, her sacramental practice, to the life of the Church, her love issuing in works and her critical service to the world in all its dimensions, although in this respect practical theology always has to act in stimulation and criticism of the other disciplines.

For instance it cannot itself actualise the Gospel message in an existential hermeneutics intended for its proclamation today; exegetics and systematic theology must do this together; the material content of homiletics is, at least fundamentally, the province of dogmatics itself. Practical theology will leave the more precise formulation even of the ius condendum to canon law, even if by its very nature it must press for a continually new ius condendum appropriate to the Church's situation at any particular time. If it carries out itself an analysis of the Church's present situation by means of theological reflection, practical theology does not thereby become engaged in contemporary Church history, simply because this analysis is impossible without Church history and particularly contemporary history. However, by criticism and new ways of questioning it will make Church history (as a theological and ecclesial science) aware that a Church history studied theologically is not the satisfaction of historical inquisitiveness but the critical implementation of that anamnesis of the Church's past without which she cannot sufficiently take possession of her present, adopting it as the germ of her future. Practical theology will not itself carry on the dialogue with man's profane understanding of existence, as that is a matter for fundamental theology and dogmatics; but it will continually make these disciplines aware that their tasks are not to be fulfilled in the unhistorical and sterile realm of eternally valid truths, but in the historical situation which is ours at any one particular time.

When we said previously that practical theology is concerned with the Church's self-realisation in the continually new given contemporary [108] situation, which it illuminates theologically, that does not mean that it either must or can itself determine the content of the Church's self-realisation in all its dimensions by means of theoretical reflection, but that it is to submit to reflection the tasks of the other disciplines as they touch the Church and arise from the contemporary situation. By means of its own analysis of the present, which is not the business of other theological disciplines, it will carry out a process of reflection which can now no longer be provided in a scientifically responsible and satisfactory manner by these other disciplines. Today they must allow the compass of their tasks, in so far as they are set by the Church and her future, to be prescribed by another discipline; by practical theology. To this extent practical theology takes precedence over the other disciplines, although the reverse is the case in other respects, i.e. to the extent that these other theological disciplines, as the essential fundamental alignment, constitute the precondition, perspective and standard for practical theology.

Practical theology challenges the other theological studies to recognise the task which inheres immanently in them, orientated to the practice of the Church; the second demand it makes is that they should apply themselves to this task. Of course that does not mean that practical theology is only a sort of formal conscience for the other theological disciplines. For on the one hand it implies, as its subordinate departments, the study of mission, catechetics, homiletics and the study of welfare work. However difficult it is to separate these individual disciplines from those which they presuppose as their foundation, it is in any case immediately apparent that practical theology is not only the critical and formal conscience of the other disciplines. Then there are many concrete factors in the Church's self-realisation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(i.e. the whole 'organisation' of the 'care of souls'), which are not considered by any other theological discipline, especially what is 'institutional' in the Church's self-realisation, which is not simply coextensive with its right to be so, but far exceeds it. Conversely, what has been said previously does not deny the fact that practical theology can take on in addition subsidiary tasks which in themselves belong to other disciplines but which, under certain circumstances, the latter are not actually dealing with. So far for example there are many questions which Catholic dogmatic ecclesiology has not considered sufficiently, although they are really its province and are of the greatest importance for practical theology. In such a case practical theology can pursue a piece of dogmatic ecclesiology in a subsidiary role. The same thing can happen as regards dogmatic sacramental theology, canon law, moral theology, ecumenical theology, etc.

[109]

IV

We shall now try to fill in the details of this fundamental demand as it is addressed to the individual theological disciplines, even if it is unfortunately only possible here to formulate these demands and expectations in a very general and vague way. In addition it must be observed that the epistemological kind of question as to how the theological disciplines are related to each other at a more intimate level, forming the totality of the theology of Christianity and the Church, must be set aside.

1. Firstly, as far as exegetics and biblical theology are concerned, the question as to how far this discipline itself has the task of actualising the Word of God in scripture and how far it shares it with 'systematic theology' is a problem which cannot be solved here. In any case, as Christian theology, which is something other than the mere study of religion, this discipline is in the service of the Church's kerygma and must make its contribution to the correct and effective proclamation of the 'Gospel' in the Church according to scripture. It is a basic conviction of the Christian Faith that this is possible, in spite of – or rather because of – the methods of modern scientific exegesis as genuinely practised. An exegesis which does not share this conviction ought to withdraw from theology and become attached to a profane field of religious studies, if it is still thought interesting. Christian exegesis must serve the Church's kerygma; it must not only supply the critical standard but also be of positive assistance. It is precisely practical theology which will have to put this fundamental demand to exegesis, clarifying it and showing its specific application. This does not mean that it interferes thereby in the autonomous field of exegesis, but speaks in the name of the whole of theology, of which exegesis forms one part, receiving its task, its justification and its autonomy from this whole. Here I must admit that I cannot say precisely what practical theology's demands upon exegesis would look like in more specific and concrete terms, nor how it could be executed technically. But to say this is only to touch upon the more general problem of how to overcome the mutual alienation of the sciences and also of the theological disciplines. In my estimation in any case, practical theology ought to ask exegesis and biblical theology to be providing continually (as well as the increasingly detailed studies which tend to become boundless, and which are no longer digestible from the preacher's point of view) the kind of theological literature which the theologian and preacher (who can no longer be an exegetical specialist in the strict sense) finds useful in his work and which keeps him close [110] enough to scholarly exegetical research. This may mean a new kind of 'middle' position between precise research and haute vulgarisation. The true exegetical specialist should not think it beneath his dignity to write such books, but regard it as a higher task. Of course these wishes on the part of practical theology will be largely identical with the wishes which systematic theology lays before exegetics. There is nothing strange in that; it is rooted in the very nature of the case.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. As far as practical theology's demands upon systematic theology (i.e. chiefly fundamental theology, dogmatics and moral theology) are concerned, it must be said at once that a more intensive dialogue between both disciplines would be desirable, to discuss their different nature. We have already observed that systematic studies continually tend to be quick to misunderstand practical theology as the mere practical consequences of the theses of systematic theology or as a straightforward echo of actual practice.

Furthermore, practical theology must draw the attention of systematic theology to the fact that the latter does not carry on its business in a vacuum, not subject to history and for its own sake, but in the concrete situation of the times and of the Church. It cannot set its own tasks and priorities just as it likes. It seems to me then, that this implies the following consequences for Catholic theology: Catholic systematic theology in universities – together with the historical work which accompanies it – seems to me today still to have too strong a flavour of historicism, too calmly pursuing historical theology detached from the question of proclamation today. It still tends to deal too intensively with peripheral dogmatic questions, to concern itself too little with the central issues involved in a new reflection upon the fundamental assertions of the faith, and (since Vatican II) it is in danger of focusing its whole attention on the Council's explicit theses, which neither were nor could have been the themes laid upon us today. It might very well be one of practical theology's tasks to investigate the strategy and 'politics' which lie unexamined and inexplicit behind the study of systematic theology; it would have to initiate an examination of the hidden tendencies and governing images of systematic theology as it is actually practised, from the point of view of a sociology of the Church, including statistical investigations; for the actual practice of theology is one factor in the Church's self-realisation and thus also subject-matter for practical theology. This kind of analysis of what is actually done and not done in the rest of theology could then lead to the question as to what should be done and what ought not to be done, or at least, not done with such over-emphasis. To my knowledge [111] for instance there is today nowhere a text-book of fundamental or dogmatic theology for the young theological student which presents the subjects wholly in a way which is both good from a didactic point of view and appropriate to the demands of the present situation. And we simply accept this fact without a qualm. Ought not practical theology to protest loudly about this matter? Surely it is part of its real task, if it is to reflect critically and creatively upon the Church's particular self-realisation presented at any one time in all its dimensions (i.e. also in the field of theology)? While maintaining all due respect for the freedom and autonomy of the individual theological disciplines, it is surely part of the dignity of these disciplines that they can accept criticism where they are proceeding against their own aims, at least by default. Surely this kind of admonition cannot today be based merely on an unregulated private experience, but rather it must be established in a very precise and exact manner? But by whom, if not by practical theology?

3. As far as Church history is concerned, practical theology will first of all be surprised to find that we – as Catholics – have a greatly underdeveloped theological reflection concerning the real nature of Church history. Consequently the compass of Church history and its relation to the other theological disciplines and to the Church itself in its concrete form remain highly obscure. Of course, as such Church history has to do with the past and not directly with the future; it is not a prophetic oracle, nor is it a drawing-office of creative programmes as to what is to take place in the Church today or tomorrow. But if it is really interested in genuine theological issues and looks into the past from this standpoint, it could recognise – in accordance with its own true nature – much of the past as initiating future possibilities and tasks for the Church. For instance, is our Catholic Church history aware of a theological structure principle of its object of study in its temporally occurrent form? If it had

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this knowledge, the real significance of 'what happens' could be made clearer, and this would be of the greatest importance for the Church's practice tomorrow, even if it were not just an easy recipe for it. From the point of view of the open questions of the future which practical theology endeavours to uncover, the past could be asked to reveal its own theological mystery, thereby shedding more light on these questions and bringing into view a horizon in which an answer could be sought. If a Christian can only grasp the Old Testament in its deepest essence from the standpoint of the New, why should he not understand the Church's past better from the standpoint of that theology which anticipates the Church's future in its formal nature and tries, in [112] practical theology, to plan out its more immediate possibilities in concrete terms?

In truth, an answer is not an answer unless it is surprising and unexpected. But it is also true that no-one receives an answer if he has no question. The horizon opened up by a correctly formulated question in no way violates the answer – if one is forthcoming – so that one only hears what one wants to hear. If history (Geschichte) is to be the teacher of the present and the future – and to say this is not an unscientific self-alienation of history (Historie) – one must know to some extent (including all possible surprises in one's calculations) what kind of instruction for the future one expects from history. And on this matter surely practical theology could have something to say to Church history, and might expect the study of Church history to take advice from history on these matters? It is unfortunately impossible here to clarify by means of concrete cases what we have said in this very abstract manner. Ultimately the Church's past achievements are only interesting in connection with what lies ahead of her. If the Church historian is imbued with this awareness, he will write Church history which is also of service to practical theology. But not otherwise.

4. The relationship between canon law and practical theology is or ought to be very close. First of all practical theology must cherish its independence vis-à-vis canon law. Practical theology is not identical with the sum total of observations concerning the more concrete implementation of canon law. Only a small portion of the life of the Church is accessible to legal ordering. Practical theology ought to defend the remaining sphere of the Church's life which is not subject to legalistic manipulation. That is not as obvious as it sounds, since our Catholic canon law tends to formulate moral norms in its own sphere, which on the one hand are not really legal norms at all, and on the other hand it tends to manipulate them as if they were legal norms. In so far as canon law is not only concerned de lege condita (historical, interpreting and casuistic) but is also seeking the correct law which ought to exist and yet does not at present, the lex condenda, and in so far as this law of the future is not only that law which develops out of the immanent dynamic of the currently valid law, it is the task of practical theology to discover aims and horizons for canon law in respect of this lex condenda. Today this can only take place as a result of a scientifically critical and simultaneously theological analysis of the contemporary situation. This, however, cannot be the task of canon law. For it is not a legal matter and at the same time constitutes such a difficult and extensive reality, demanding its own methodology [113] for study, that it cannot be investigated as an appendage by canon law merely because the latter as the science de lege condenda happens to need some knowledge of it. Criticism of current law and fundamental exposition of the recommended law are therefore tasks of practical theology and imply as many demands of practical theology upon canon law. The relationship here is similar to that between the study of politics, sociology, etc. on the one hand and jurisprudence on the other. Just as profane jurisprudence must accept observations from these other profane disciplines although they are historically junior to it, the same applies also to canon law in relation to practical theology.

5. Finally something must be said concerning practical theology's demands upon the study of liturgy. This question depends to some extent on whether liturgiology is to be understood as a subordinate discipline of practical theology or not. However that may be, modern liturgiology has taken as its object the scientifico-theological reflection of a liturgy yet to be created, and deals no longer primarily with the history and appraisal of existing liturgy. Thereby it has developed a broader and more comprehensive concept of liturgy than was the case previously within a markedly ritualistic and rubricistic understanding of liturgy. As a result, in any case, liturgiology has come into the immediate neighbourhood of practical theology. The question of the liturgia condenda is above all a question of practical theology seen from the standpoint of its whole task, or at least one requiring an answer for which practical theology must create the presuppositions. For one can only answer the question as to how liturgy ought to be done today if one knows what Christians are like as contemporary men, if practical theology approaches its problems with the help of sociology of religion etc. Precisely because liturgiology has now become in actuality quite independent, practical theology as a whole will continually have the task of delivering liturgiology from the dangers of a romantic glorification of the old forms of the liturgy, the danger of an aesthetic view, of a rubricistic legalism and also of the private whim of the connoisseur. It will lead to a liturgy which can really be a liturgy of the People of God here and now.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We cannot discuss here the question of the relationship between practical theology and the profane disciplines which constitute its necessary ancillary studies (like psychology, sociology, etc.). It will be clear too that we have only touched upon the relation of practical theology to those theological disciplines which to a certain extent have a fundamental and normative significance for practical theology. The prime intention [114] of this contribution has been to demonstrate the urgency of the basic task. If we find ourselves only at the beginning of our endeavours and deliberations it may be all the more a health-giving challenge to pursue the matter with more energy and with greater sensitivity. If that were done, even to a small extent, it would be a good beginning.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[115]

PART TWO

The Doctrine of God and Christology

[117]

7

THE NEED FOR A 'SHORT FORMULA' OF CHRISTIAN FAITH

In order to be effective vis-à-vis modern unbelief the mission of the Church calls for a kind of witness to the Christian faith which can be really intelligible to modern man. This truism implies a demand, however, which is by no means easily fulfilled and is often neglected. For this message must be so expressed that what is essential is clearly distinguished from everything of secondary importance and can be actually 'realised'. Otherwise a modern 'pagan' is not able to distinguish this essence of Christianity from the Church's often uninviting and repellent appearance (in sermons, religious practice, social conditions, etc.), and consequently applies his – partially justified – opposition towards Christians to Christianity itself. Thus the Christian message must be such that it clearly criticises Christians and concrete Christianity. This message must be able to express what is essential in brief to today's highly preoccupied men, and it must go on saying it. Such repetition is not wearisome so long as it is really concerned with what is decisive and essential, not as an 'ideology' which impinges on man from outside (and which changes nothing as far as the 'facts' are concerned), but as the experienced and lived reality of man's life itself.[1] Such a 'short formula' is especially urgently required in our pluralist society. In earlier times a homogeneous society itself 'lived' Christianity, at least as a 'religion', even if perhaps not always as a personal 'faith'. In a situation where one was already impregnated with Christianity as social custom and 'ideology' before being capable of and compelled to a personal decision of faith, it was possible to be unconcerned as to the doctrinal mode of communication of Christianity. This kind of 'postponement' was true of Baptism and also to a certain extent of life in general. It was not necessary to be very concerned about the correct proportions of what was said; secondary things could be communicated more urgently as if they were primary; one could [118] permit oneself rather to neglect that single whole of Christianity as such, whereas nowadays it is precisely this 'whole' which is the precondition for a correct understanding and realisation of the 'particular' within it. Nowadays the baptised person too, even if he is born into a Christian family, lives in a situation of existence which largely does not communicate Christianity. Simply from the fact of the situation in which he finds himself, even a baptised person is in many respects more 'pagan' than ever anyone has been since Constantine. He must understand sufficiently clearly what is particular and really distinctive in Christianity, those things by which he is to be distinguishable from his environment.

[1] This statement cannot be suspected of Modernism if one bears in mind that the grace of Christ always precedes the external preaching of the Gospel.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If one considers this and other requirements, one must needs be surprised that there are so few 'short formulas' expressing the essential nature of the Christian message briefly and in terms which are intelligible today. 'Briefly' is here of course a very relative concept. Such a 'formula' does not need to be as short as the Apostles' Creed or any other authoritative confession of faith. But on the other hand the modern 'Shorter Catechism' is definitely much too long, and furthermore, it does not really correspond, for other reasons too, to what is meant here. Nor is it a question of finding an identical formula for all countries and all of today's culturally and socially differentiated groups. In our continually and rapidly changing world a short formula of this sort would be doubtless short-lived by comparison with something like the Apostles' Creed. It is therefore all the more necessary that there should be such formulas to be appropriated by man's spirit, heart and mind. They must be capable of being directly and 'existentially' assimilated, self-explanatory and not requiring a long prior elucidation, in order to commend themselves to men. They must be illuminating within the particular man's perspective of understanding and experience of life, as far as possible using his modern vocabulary and employing those presuppositions which are self-evident to modern man (whether they are actually so per se more than others or not). They must not presuppose as already given anything which is not immediately intelligible as 'given' and cannot be fundamentally experienced. These requirements of a short formula of this kind are not indeed as clear and evident as one might be inclined to think.

We may illustrate this with a small example: probably all these short formulas of faith[2] – beginning with the New Testament – presuppose that [119] the hearer understands the word 'God' correctly and can easily realise this correct meaning existentially. But is that the case today? Is it still possible today to say with Thomas that Quid est Deus is 'clear' and 'familiar' to everyone and that accordingly the question only remains as to whether this 'God' also exists? Things are simply not like this today.[3] Nor is a quickly proffered 'definition' of 'what' is meant by the word sufficient, however logically lucid it is. Ought not a short formula of this kind to begin much 'earlier', where what is really meant by 'God' is experienced in one's own actualisation of existence? But where could a point of departure be found for such a modern understanding of the meaning of the word 'God' and for its existential realisation? What kind of starting-point is it which would have to be actually expressed explicitly, even if only briefly?

From this simple discussion it is immediately apparent to how large an extent the scope and proportions of a modern 'short formula' of this kind would differ from those of other times. The chief question would be therefore, what such a short formula would look like if it were to be suitable for a situation of which real atheism is a decisive co-determinant for the first time in the history of the world. The same would be said as regards the Christological assertions of such a short formula. This Christological content must be formulated from the very beginning in such a way that it does not sound like a myth of a distant age and so that modern man does not have the impression that it is at the outset impossible to ascertain what really happened in times past, and that therefore what is past certainly cannot be important for today.

[2] It is possible to understand the Old Testament Decalogue as a short formula of this sort, for it should be thought of as the charter of the covenant rather than as a codification of mere moral norms (or even norms of natural law) for the individual.

[3] cf. Karl Rahner, 'Bemerkungen zur Gotteslehre in der katholischen Dogmatik', Catholica 20 (1966), pp.1-18; in this volume pp. 127 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Before directly presenting such an attempt – intended only as an experiment[4] – we shall say something further to a deeper knowledge of 'short formulas'. We are only drawing attention to a demand which must be made upon the concrete proclamation of the Gospel, on dogmatic theology and also on pastoral theology in this age, which is characterised by an ideologically pluralistic society and by atheism.

Here we mention one or two things in support of this demand. The history of these 'short formulas' is as old as Christianity itself. In the [120] New Testament the formula 'Jesus is the Messiah' (cf. e.g. Acts 9:22; John 20:31) was a formula which more or less told a Jew of the Old Testament religion everything he needed to know and confess in order to be a Christian. It was a formula which was basically directly intelligible to him.[5] Romans 10:9 (Jesus as the Risen Lord) is also a short formula of this kind, expressing clearly and distinctly in its concentrated form the minimum of the Christian faith necessary for a 'theist' at that time. If one had grasped what was said in this way and adopted it in reality, one was at that time without doubt a Christian. 1 Thessalonians 1:9 is likewise a short formula directed particularly at the situation produced by the meeting of paganism and Christianity. If one wanted to write a patristic history of these short formulas, part of it (but not the whole) would be the history of the creeds, bearing in mind that in addition to official Church confessions of faith in the stricter sense there were always the more 'private' formulations of faith (as, for example, bishops' declarations on the occasion of their taking office). Similarly under this heading come small writings like Augustine's Enchiridion (in spite of its more detailed character: PL 40, 181-196). For instance, Luther's powerful paraphrase of the Apostles' Creed in his Short Catechism is also such a short formula. The most recent attempt at – or rather the most recent demand for – this kind of short formula (in a single sentence) can be found in Vatican II's Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity: in his fundamental position as a baptised person the believer must grasp the fact that in Christianity he 'has been snatched away from sin and led into the mystery of the love of God, communicated to him in Christ' (No. 13). Naturally even a short statement like this is on its own by no means equivalent to a short formula, but it implies the demand for such a short formula and to a certain extent it shows the way towards it. For it is plain that the statement is not afraid of an 'anthropological' perspective on the part of the affirmation of faith; it presents the substance of faith in the form of a statement about man; man is the one to whom the divine self-communication is addressed and who, in receiving this divine self-communication, comprehends both what he is himself and what God is.

In everyday life today there are advertising slogans, party programmes and manifestoes by means of which social groups aim to tell other people what they are and what they intend to do. These communications are produced as a result of the greatest care and trouble, and they cannot be replaced by weighty volumes or a long series of lectures, whilst at the [121] same time they must fulfil all the necessary conditions so that what is said can really strike home and take effect in our situation of a pluralistic mass society. Something like this is also needed for the Church's proclamation in the Age of Atheism.[6] Such a short formula of the Christian message – and today we probably need several – cannot be found in the ancient creeds even if the latter remain the regula fidei. Perhaps dogmatics and catechetics will soon take up this challenge, if it is recognised as valid. It signifies a task not only for the teaching

[4] In the following section (II) the author presents an extended version of an earlier attempt. Cf. K. Rahner, 'Kurzer Inbegriff des christlichen Glaubens für "Ungläubige"', Geist und Leben 38 (1965), pp. 374-379.

[5] For a thorough treatment of the approach to these early confessions of faith in the New Testament cf. K. Lehmann, Auferstanden am dritten Tag (Freiburg, 1968).

[6] There is no need to explain in detail that 'religious propaganda' of this kind is inseparably connected with the specific intimacy of personal faith. Cf. K. Rahner, in F. X. Arnold, K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L. M. Weber (ed.), Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 146-151.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of religion, but also for dogmatics, philosophy and the history of ideas. The proper starting-point for a correct expression of faith in God is a question which reaches far beyond the problems of the teaching of religion.[7]

II

In what follows we shall present an attempt at this kind of 'modern' confession of faith. It is indeed no more than an attempt. The emphases could be placed differently and it could be longer or shorter. Naturally it can only be intelligible to educated western man, if at all. But I do not find this in itself a drawback: ought we to try to make a thing suitable for everyone by rendering it not really acceptable to anyone? Was not the ancient Creed 'generally intelligible' as a traditional sacral formula by being suitable for only a very small cultural field? If anyone says that he finds this attempt useless we shall certainly not take offence at his opinion, provided that he himself knows better how to communicate just what we Christians actually believe to an 'unbeliever' of our own time, in his own environment, and can state it briefly. How would it be if the new Secretariat for Unbelievers in Rome were to produce examples of a short catechism for unbelievers? These examples would follow the teaching of the Decree on Ecumenism that there is a very important distinction between the 'fundamentals' of the faith and other truths, and they would underline the abiding value of the ancient formulas not by repeating the latter but by explaining them. And must this decidedly necessary process of explanation (which even the most stubborn defender of the abiding validity of the ancient formulas recognises as justified and necessary) [122] always be very much longer than the formulas it is supposed to be explaining? Why? If this is not the case, even our stubborn defender must be able to produce a short 'creed' containing the ancient abiding truth and yet expressing it in a different way as compared with traditional formulas. As we have said, the present attempt is to be understood in this sense. Its only purpose is to enable many other people to do the same thing more quickly and better.

Whether he is consciously aware of it or not, whether he is open to this truth or suppresses it, man's whole spiritual and intellectual existence is orientated towards a holy mystery which is the basis of his being. This mystery is the inexplicit and unexpressed horizon which always encircles and upholds the small area of our everyday experience of knowing and acting, our knowledge of reality and our free action. It is our most fundamental, most natural condition, but for that very reason it is also the most hidden and least regarded reality, speaking to us by its silence, and even whilst appearing to be absent, revealing its presence by making us take cognisance of our own limitations. We call this God. We can ignore him, but even in an act which professes to be unconcerned about him, God is once more affirmed as the sustaining fundamental of such an act, just as logic is still operative even in an act which denies the validity of logic, or just as an action which affirms absolute meaninglessness considers itself more meaningful than the acceptance of a meaning for existence, thus explicitly affirming once again that meaning is fundamental to reality. In its capacity as the very ground of the individual absorbed in knowing and acting, the holy mystery we call God is at once what is most internal to ourselves and also what is furthest from our manipulation and has no need of us. Our proper response to it is reverence and worship; Where these are present, where man accepts his being in an attitude of absolute responsibility, seeking and awaiting this ultimate meaning in trust, he has already found God, whatever name he may give him. For his ultimate name can only be uttered, finally, in loving silence before his incomprehensibility.

[7] For the historically different ways of access to faith cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp 142 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

However hard and unsatisfactory it may be to interpret the deepest and most fundamental experience at the very bottom of our being, man does experience in his innermost history that this silent, infinitely distant holy mystery, which continually recalls him to the limits of his finitude and lays bare his guilt, yet bids him approach; the mystery enfolds him in an ultimate and radical love which commends itself to him as his salvation and as the real meaning of his existence (provided only that he allows its possibilities to be greater than his own finitude and guilt). This love – [123] experienced at the ground of being, which is nothing other than God's absolute self-communication, in which God gives himself and not only what is finite, in which he becomes the infinitely wide horizon of our being – we call divinising grace. It is offered to everyone as light and as the promise of eternal life, working freely and graciously in every man, welling up from the origin of his existence and – even though perhaps not named as such – appearing everywhere where in the history of man courage, love, faithfulness to the light of conscience, endurance of darkness by faith in the light, or any other witness to the ground of his being is at work and is made plain as the holy mystery of the loving nearness of God. That history which reveals more and more clearly God's pledge of himself in radical self-communication to man, accepted in faith, hope and love, we call salvation and revelation-history. It is the 'categorial' historical form in which God's self-communication, 'transcendentally' given from the very beginning in the ground of man's being (by virtue of the deification of man through grace, effected by this self-communication), becomes more and more apparent. It is true that this history is often marred and darkened by the history of the guilt by which humanity shuts itself off from the grace of God in the mystery of self-refusal and wishes to understand itself from within itself alone. But in spite of this it is always and everywhere present, since the mystery of the God who reveals and communicates himself in love is more powerful than the mystery of human guilt.

This history of man's self-discovery as one who is (at least as far as God's offer is concerned) divinised in the ground of his existence, the history of the concrete expression in space-time of this self-discovery in God (both always by virtue of the divine self-pledge, called grace) reaches its historical apogee and unsurpassable goal – which secretly sustained this whole historical movement from the very beginning – in the one in the midst of divinised humanity whom we call simply the God-man. It is he whom everyone seeks, not expressly but in reality all the same, in wishing the ultimate question (of one's own being and of one's destiny in death) and the ultimate acceptance (of this question by God) to appear together, experienced in the concrete terms of one's own history, and thus be completely existent and finally affirmed. To this extent every man who is true to his conscience is for us an Advent Christian, looking forward to the one Man in whom his own question (we do not merely put questions; we are questions) and God's acceptance have become one and have finally appeared in one person. As Christians we have the courage to believe that this looked-for one is found. He is Jesus of Nazareth.

[124] The man who has experienced God in Christ in this way wants to and must confess him. Not as though he thought that the others, who are not able to call the consummation of their secret experience by name, are not embraced by God's mercy (by which he gives himself to us, provided only that we do not refuse him). But the man who has found Christ must bear witness to him before his brethren. In the first place that simply means that he obediently accepts life and death as they are. In this way he meets Him. Further, it means looking towards God and the continually renewed acceptance of His forgiveness, and finally the explicit confession of His Name, of the hope we find in Him.

Christ is the one in whom God's self-communication to man and man's acceptance of him have become materially and existentially 'One' by the action of God. In him, God is unsurpassably and irrevocably present where we are, and in him man exists not only as the question in respect of God, but, as God's pledged acceptance, has become God himself in appearance: the Son of Man, the Son of God in the true and unconditional sense of the word. The Christian recognises in faith that the historically concrete realisation of this goal of salvation-history, which sustains and perfects the latter and causes it to triumph irrevocably over the history of evil, is given in Jesus of Nazareth. Throughout its whole history humanity looks for the God-man as the fulfilment of its own salvation-history; it has found no-one but Jesus of Nazareth in whom it is able to recognise the God-man; by his wonderful life, his death and resurrection he shows himself to be this God-man, the presence of God himself in the history of mankind. In him, God is irrevocably the one who has accepted us in love and has made us possessors of his infinite wealth of truth, life and eternity. The Christian believes in the death of Jesus, in which mankind has delivered itself with its own ground and goal to the grace of God, and in the complete perfection of the man Jesus (called his Resurrection), in which mankind has already begun to possess the life of God himself directly, breaking the bounds of its space-time history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In so far as God, in his self-communication, still remains the holy and inconceivable mystery who, in giving himself away, does not lose his divinity, we call him Father. In so far as God communicates himself to us as our most real and eternally valid life by the means of divinising grace at the ground of our being, we call him Holy Spirit. In so far as the genuine truth of our being appears in history in the God-man, we call him the Word and the Son of God. In so far as these two mutually sustaining and determining ways of God's self-communication actually communicate God himself and not a creaturely, finite representation of God, we acknowledge [125] that in his own life God himself, while remaining one, is distinguished as Father, Word and Spirit, so that we call him the threefold God, or the Three Persons: Father, Son and Spirit, one God.

The community of those who come together in faith around Jesus, in hope waiting to participate in his perfection and in him bound together in love with the Father and with each other by his Spirit – this community we call the Church. He himself founded this Church in the persons of his first disciples and provided it with his Spirit in the 'twelve' messengers to whom he entrusted his commission. He united this apostolic community in Peter as its head and gave it a constitution which these authorised messengers had authority to hand on. Thus he gave the Church the task and the powers of representing him and witnessing to him throughout history until its end, so that he should remain God's self-committal to the world in the dimension of historical concreteness, and as such should be continually at work. In this way, in its origin in and in its witness to Christ, the Church is the historical sign of God's victorious will for Salvation, conquering all man's guilt. To this extent the Church is the 'sacrament' (i.e. the holy, effectual sign) in which the world's divinisation appears and, in appearing, establishes itself. As the historical presence of God's unrevoked pledge of himself in Christ, the Church's testimony, wherever it is expressed in a definitive witness on the part of its authoritative teaching office, is protected from slipping from God's truth; and in so far as the word spoken by the Church by means of holy symbols communicates grace (which lives in the Church) in its full measure to the individual in the decisive situations of his life, it is an effectual word, carrying with it what it signifies: this word is itself a sacrament.

Just as man in his personal life is familiar with words which involve him totally and which reveal precisely what is happening while they are being said – for instance, words of ultimate love or of forgiveness – so in a similar way the Church is acquainted in its own field with words by which it pledges itself to man as what it actually is: the sign of mercy and of the love of God to all.

Seven of these effectual words of grace are known to the Church: the sign of grace (called Baptism), in which the sinful human being is dedicated to the triune God by the rite of washing and is also accepted into the Church as a member – in the concrete historical dimension – by the forgiveness of his sinfulness and by sanctifying by God's Spirit; the express promise of the Spirit in conjunction with the imposition of hands (Confirmation), enabling and empowering the baptised person to be a witness by life and testimony to the fact that God loves the world, even [126] in the presence of those who think they are unable to believe in his love; the word of judgment and forgiveness (Penance), in which the Church reconciles the culpable person to herself and to God; the word by which the Church commends the baptised person in imminent danger of death to the God of eternal life (Holy Unction); the word (Ordination) by which the Church imparts to one of her members by the imposition of hands a share (in three stages) in her authority and the power of that authority; the word (in the Sacrament of Matrimony) which lays the foundation for the marriage bond and at the same time reveals it as the reflection of the unity and fertility of the love of God towards human kind gathered into the Church in Christ. In addition to these six signs of sanctifying grace there is the seventh and greatest in the holy meal of the community of Christ, in which the latter is mindful of the death and resurrection of its Lord as its salvation and is united anew with Him in the rite of the meal under the signs of bread and wine: the Sacrament of the Altar. Thus the Church is at the same time the visible community of the redeemed and also the sign by which God's Spirit effects the world's salvation and renders it visible in concrete history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To the extent that the Christian is united with his Lord by his Spirit in faith, hope and love, he knows that he has already been set free from all intramundane forces and powers (sin, law, death) into the infinity and finality of the life of the true and living God. But he also knows that he must share with his Lord his destiny of death, until he too, at the point where his life and death seem to enter the most extreme degree of forsakenness by God, the ultimate darkness of guilt, lays his existence into the hands of the living God. He knows that his life must be an act of unconditional love to God and his fellow men, which far exceeds the fulfilment of all law. He confidently looks forward to the end of his life and the end of the history of mankind, when what is already present now in faith and lowliness will appear unveiled and perfected to all who have loved: the life of God, who is all in all.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[127]

8

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF GOD IN CATHOLIC DOGMATICS

There is always something dubious about methodological investigations: it is only too easy for the thing under discussion itself to slip out of sight. But we may observe further limitations in such a procedure. For several reasons we cannot undertake here a new and basic foundation for the methodology of the Catholic Doctrine of God. We are really presenting only 'observations'.[1] Nor is it our aim to do any more than this, in a way, for it is not our intention to propound any particular, strikingly new thesis in order to contradict what is usual in Catholic theology, or which would develop a new programme, proclaim a radically new orientation and seek once more to revolutionise theology. Nothing is further from our intention. Not only because it is contrary to the nature of Catholic theology but because it seems contrary to the reality with which we are concerned here, namely God. For if one can think of anything at all under this heading which repays constant pondering, it is clear at the outset that it would be to go sadly astray and to miss the point completely if one were to say of a particular radicalism of a system, a thesis or an opinion – as opposed to any other system, thesis or opinion – that 'this is God, and not that'; that 'this is the true experience of the true God and that is not'. The true radicalism in the doctrine of God can only be the continual destruction of an idol, an idol in the place of God, the idol of a theory about him. What it cannot be is a statement about him which distinguishes him from another object on the same plane, or which distinguishes this particular way of having-to-do-with-him from any other mode of approach to him. If it tries to do this [128] it must come under the hammer of its own principle of 'destruction', for one cannot gain control of God by a wild radicalism in negative theology either, since negative theology cannot give Him to us if He had not always given Himself to us already.

This principle is found in the sober humility of the true relationship with God. The unique character of our relationship with God and his existence for us is shown by the fact that when we have renounced a knowledge of God which conquers him by means of affirmation or negation, God does not disappear, but precisely at that point commits himself to us; furthermore it is shown by the fact that this renunciation (ultimately the renunciation of being God) is not one pole in the human dialectic between Yes and No, but is rooted at the very basis of this dialectic, and that God only appears when he is accepted simply, humbly and unselfconsciously in worship and obedience and when he is not torn to pieces in all the talk of reflection. Finally it is also characteristic of our relationship with God that all these considerations must be thought out in very strict terms all the same, notwithstanding the foregoing. Anselm says: consideratio rationabiliter comprehendit incomprehensibile esse. If this truth were given pride of place as the very first condition of our existence, as that which upholds everything else, itself unsupported by anything (such that every attempt to reach down to the basis of this primary condition finds itself still 'upheld' by the latter, thus placing us before the question whether we are to accept it or not), all reflex dialectic – which is necessary and must opt for saying Yes or No – is only preliminary; but it is a necessary preliminary. Consequently a certain calmness of approach is justified with respect to

[1] The author may be permitted to refer in addition to other studies which will perhaps supplement the thoughts expressed here (apart from the references given below in the subsequent footnotes): Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 385-400; Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73; Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 3-20; Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 25-46.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological reflection about God. But for this very reason we may not proclaim any theological affirmation in opposition to others in too absolute a manner, as theology itself does not do, so long as it is genuine and erects no idols to be worshipped. However – and this is what I really wanted to say – this seems to me to be the ultimate legitimation for my making a few observations on the theme committed to me. What is said in systematic terms is only true here provided that it is understood as something occasional and fragmentary, and provided that it is prepared to disintegrate into 'observations'.

I intend to arrange these observations, loosely related as they are, by first presenting some remarks concerning the Doctrine of God within Catholic dogmatics, chiefly as regards its scholastic form.[2] (This is to a certain extent an issue internal to Catholic theology; however, in an age [129] of ecumenism it may also claim to be of interest to Protestant theologians.) Then in the second part I shall append some further observations in an attempt to reach beyond the confines of this Catholic academic question.

In this first part I make some observations which arise from a simple glance at the history of this treatise in Catholic dogmatics. In line with the beginning of each of the Creeds, it is an uncontested practice in Catholic theology (although it is not really as evident as it seems) that dogmatics must begin with the doctrine of God if it is to be anything like systematic in its procedure. Of course, this way of beginning in Catholic theology has been called in question to a certain extent because, since the advent of modern times and the Enlightenment, the 'beginning' of so-called 'fundamental theology' has been prefixed to this original 'beginning'. Naturally, a problem has arisen in this way which, if the unity of theology is an ultimate necessity, cannot be solved by saying that this 'fundamental theology' is a discipline on its own with its own method and its own subject-matter, distinct from dogmatics as the study of the content of dogmatics. The issue becomes even more difficult because today, on account of theology's object being seen in salvation-history – which bars the way to a systematic treatment – the question of a fundamental and formal theology[3] as the starting-point for dogmatic theology has been recently raised. (Not to be confused with 'fundamental theology' in the usual sense.) Furthermore there is the fact that today the problems involved in an existentially effective fundamental theology apart from and prior to dogmatics have again been seen more clearly in Catholic theology, and so the tendency is to merge the two together.[4]

However that may be, it was certainly the case in the earliest epistemological discussions of the theology of the Fathers that the θεολογι/α came before the οι0κονομι/α, the doctrine of salvation. For instance, the doctrine of God stands at the beginning of Origen's περι∴ α)ρξω~ν, the first systematic treatment of the faith of the Church. Behind this tendency there are naturally the presuppositions of Greek metaphysics, the theoretical interpretation of man as a contemplative being orientated towards eternity; these presuppositions cannot be justified without further ado by appealing to scripture. But in any case it remains an open question whether man – ultimately at least, both within and in spite of such historically determined [130] and unsupported presuppositions and perspectives – does not always remain a being who is freely open even with regard to his own systematic endeavours, and who thus always knows more than the formal method of his systematics should actually permit him to know. Consequently even such a problematical beginning need not constitute a mortal blow for a genuine faith. In mediaeval theology, where theology's formal object is

[2] This is a kind of revision of the remarks given by the author in the LThK IV (Freiburg,[2] 1959), cols. 1119-1124.
[3] cf. K. Rahner, LThK IV (Freiburg,[2] 1959), cols. 205-206; Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 1-37.
[4] For a preliminary treatment see K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the contemporary intellectual formation of future priests', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 113-138, esp. 123 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'God as such' (e.g. Thomas I, 1, 7), this way of commencing dogmatics with the doctrine of God must have seemed even more obvious. But even in circles where this definition of theology's formal object was not held in such esteem, Catholic theology has almost always assumed that dogmatics should start with the doctrine of God and not, for instance, with the reality of Christ, 'Sophia', the Kingdom of God, faith, justification, man's religious subjectivity, or the like. And this is perfectly understandable. For according to a Catholic understanding of grace God does not apply a saving 'something' to man, but gives his very self as our salvation in a most radical manner, so that God-in-himself and the God-of-our-salvation are strictly identical. If as a result of this the idea of the priority of the Doctrine of God is not utterly compelling, for this very reason every dogmatic treatise must speak of this God who communicates himself in grace, and of this God alone; thus we can say that a correctly understood Doctrine of God, placed at the very beginning, expresses precisely that. In doing so it avoids making such a doctrine of God a purely regional and isolated study, but on the contrary takes the shape of a formal anticipation of what all theological studies are concerned with. Understood in this way the almost universal practice of the priority of the Doctrine of God in Catholic Dogmatics is – if not utterly compelling – sufficiently justified, especially since man, not being God, never has such an α)ρξη& at his disposal. In expressing it he can never really have said everything, he can never completely comprehend the flow from its source; for in reality he only has the source by entering the flow many times at many points.

Even historically speaking, the relationship between the general doctrine of God (De Deo uno) and the doctrine of the Trinity is more problematical. One cannot elicit a unified conception of this relationship from a study of the history of Catholic theology. The order of the treatises which is almost universally accepted today – first De Deo uno, then De Deo trino – has probably become general custom only since Peter Lombard's Sentences were ousted by Thomas' Summa Theologica. The Apostles' Creed with its trinitarian structure would only provide a clue to solving the problem of the unity and diversity of these two treatises [131] if one were to understand – in common with the ancient θεο&φ terminology[5] – the word 'God' as the Father of the trinitarian confession, and, taking a Greek kind of trinitarian theology (linear with respect to the world), to discuss in addition the whole 'being' of God in the first chapter concerning the Father. It is noteworthy that Peter Lombard subsumes the general doctrine of God under his doctrine of the Trinity, which M. Grabmann,[6] for instance, regards as one of Lombard's 'chief errors'. Noteworthy is also the fact that we do not yet find a clear division in the Summa Alexandri either, whereas Thomas, for reasons which have not yet really been explained – whether in opposition to the Arabic systems or from apologetic or pedagogic motives – clearly follows the Augustinian and Latin method: he does not treat the general doctrine of God as the doctrine of God the Father, the sourceless origin in the Godhead, but, by way of anticipation, as the Doctrine of the nature of God which is common to all the Persons. Only after that does he commence his doctrine of the Trinity. And so it has remained in general right up to today. For example the new Spanish Jesuits' Dogmatics gives an uncompromising and explicit defence of this method.[7] In still more recent times, for instance in the case of Anselm Stolz and M. Schmaus, one can sense this problem again. M. Schmaus subsumes the treatise De Deo uno as the doctrine of 'the fulness of life of the three-personal God' under the first section of his dogmatics which deals with 'God the Three in [5] cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 79-148.

[6] Die Geschichte der kath. Theologie seit dem Ausgang der Väterzeit (Darmstadt,[2] 1961), p. 42. On the relationship between the two treatises 'De Deo uno' and 'De Deo trino' cf. K. Rahner, Mysterium Salutis II, ed. J. Feiner and M. Löhrer (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 317-397, esp. 323 ff., 340 f., 395 f., and in the same volume M. Löhrer, pp. 291-315.
[7] Patres S.J., in 'Hispania Professores', Sacra Theologiae Summa II (Madrid,[4] 1964), pp. 12 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One'.

Furthermore, the doctrine of God of all the more recent Catholic dogmatics always contains a section on man's knowledge of God. That may seem strange, for at a first glance the theme seems to belong rather to dogmatic anthropology. For this accepted procedure to be really substantiated, as is quite possible, it would be necessary to deepen this section of a doctrine of God so that the following were made clear: Firstly it is concerned with that particular knowledge about God which arises, in an ultimate and indissoluble unity, from that experience which grasps in an original unity human existence, creatureliness transcendentally situated in the sphere of grace and of revelation-history, the consequently implied [132] possibility of a 'natural' knowledge of God, and the continual temptation to atheism in man's tenacious sinfulness. In this case the question of 'natural' knowledge of God alone, in the terms of Vatican I, cannot occupy the centre of attention, but must take its place as the reductive element within a total experience of God. And secondly it must be made clear that in this case knowledge and what is known, belief and what is believed stand in a particular, unique relationship with one another, such that the knowledge of God cannot (or can only retrospectively) be regarded as constituting a regional sphere of knowledge side by side with other regional spheres of knowledge, but is the fundamental source and ultimate horizon of all knowledge whatsoever in the unity of human existence. This knowledge of God is always there and can always be 'held fast'; its conceptual interpretation is always one factor of it itself to some degree and in some form, but it is not simply identical with it. As a result of this, knowledge and what is known can only be grasped by reflection in one, the doctrine of God is dogmatic anthropology and the doctrine of God itself, just as, by analogy, ontology is precisely onto-logy, i.e. the doctrine of being and also the doctrine of the knowledge of being, in an indivisible unity.

As far as the inner structure of the treatise is concerned, where the doctrine of God is distinguished from the doctrine of the Trinity, it has been customary for a long time, following the presentation of the theme of the being of God, to supply a discussion of the attributes of God. In such a discussion it is usual for issues to be dealt with which find a place equally well in the doctrine of Creation or in the doctrine of Grace, like the questions of God's foreknowledge (sovereignty) and of predestination. The discussion of God's attributes pursues an almost exclusively metaphysical, i.e. not originally theological path: we usually divide them into active and passive attributes, and the latter are again distinguished as transcendental and categorial. We shall say more about this shortly.

However, these clear and tangible features in the history of the treatise's inner structure do not supply any considerable impetus towards solving the theological issues themselves; the Catholic treatise De Deo uno is to some extent aware, at second hand, of the questioning or contesting of a rational knowledge of God, and against such a denial it repeats the Anathema pronounced by Vatican I. But so far the reformation, the change from the technical Greek way of thought to the correct anthropocentricity of modern times, the historical shift from the question of a gracious God to the question of where and how one can find God and man at all (and both at the same time), the question of reconciling transcendence and historicity, transcendence from above and from past origins [133] and transcendence from ahead in the future, the question of the interweaving of faith, hope and love in the knowledge of God itself, the question of the constant possibility of atheistic unbelief[8] as an internal factor of faith in God – all these have not really become a part of the history of the treatise. And to allow these issues to affect its future history would not be to deliver a mortal blow.

In the second part of this section we shall make a few more systematic observations (if that [8] cf. J. B. Metz, LThK X (Freiburg,[2] 1965), cols. 496 ff.; J. B. Metz, 'Unbelief as a theological problem', Concilium 1 (June 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is not a contradiction in terms).

We have already said that in its own particular dogmatics – notwithstanding 'fundamental theology' and the possibility of a formal and fundamental theology – Catholic theology places the doctrine of God at the beginning. Let us leave it so. Revelation-history and salvation-history (and consequently the nature of theology) as God's self-revelation, together with transcendental and 'eccentric' man, whose fundamental vocation is to obey this self-revealing God in faith (and who can only be himself by receiving his being from the mystery which envelops him, and would not find the true God if he only considered him from the standpoint of ad nos, i.e. by measuring the ad nos from our point of view instead of accepting it from God) – these two factors demand that man should not speak first of his own salvation, but of God. In other words he must begin again, and correctly this time, after he has finished talking about himself and his sorry state. This time he must say that his true salvation is precisely the God who does not exist solely to be our salvation, and that our true salvation – which is wrought by him and not by us – disappears into his incomprehensibility. This does not exclude, but includes the fact that all remaining dogmatics is already contained in this doctrine of God. But besides being said in toto in each treatise (and hence necessarily more than once, since we cannot say everything in toto at the same time), the whole of dogmatics must first of all be uttered as the doctrine of God so that it remains clear that we must speak of God and not, after all, of ourselves, even if this speech is only meaningful as the final sound indicating the adoring silence before God. Instead of excluding it, this way of beginning includes the fact that this very treatise, because it is theology, reflection, and not the original source of the history of faith, must not forget the origin of our real knowledge of God in Christ and must make all affirmations whatever about God in such a way as to include the experience of salvation-history. Thus it will (as far as possible) strive against the danger of tacitly making an abstract metaphysical [134] schema into the norma non normata of what, how and who God 'can be'.[9]

The mere sequence of the treatises De Deo uno and Dc Deo trino, as if the second treatise were only supplementary to the first, and as if only the second contained affirmations going beyond metaphysics (even though of a metaphysics requiring to be confirmed and secured), is apt to obscure the concrete history of theology, i.e. the two possibilities which present themselves in the orthodox conception of the doctrine of the Trinity itself, and it presupposes wrongly that the history of revelation itself followed such a sequence, i.e. from the revelation of God's being to the revelation of the Trinity. One could just as well say – indeed it would be more correct to say – that the history of revelation first of all shows God as a Person without origin, the Father, who has then revealed himself (as we say in technical terms) within this relationship with the world as a self-communication, as the source of divine life-processes, capable of creating persons. These life-processes reveal their divine immanence characteristically in the economic trinitarian relationship of God in Christ and in his Spirit which is given to us. So the sequence whereby the treatise De Deo uno precedes the doctrine of the Trinity is not necessarily to be seen as the result of the infiltration of philosophy. Thus the question seems to be more didactic than fundamental whether and in which order the two treatises should follow one another, or whether they should be assimilated to each other. But on the other hand it is most important, if the general doctrine of God is placed first, not to present it as though there were no doctrine of the Trinity at all (as occurs in standard Catholic dogmatics). If the creation of what is not divine is understood dogmatically at the outset as a factor and a condition for the possibility of God's absolute self-communication, in which [9] A typical example of this is the undialectical idea of God's 'immutability' which pays little or no heed to the dogma of the Incarnation. Cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 112 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

absolute Love gives its very self and not something other than itself, creation as the freely uttered Word of the unfathomably Inconceivable is then seen as the beginning and the 'grammar' of the divine self-expression communicated into the void. Thus it is the beginning of the trinitarian self-revelation.

It may be counted as a positive achievement of the more recent academic tradition (although the latter does not have a real understanding of itself everywhere as yet) that the study of the knowledge of God is taken as a part of the doctrine of God. For as we have already said, there is a unique relationship between this knowledge as a subjective act and what is known thereby, a relationship which essentially cannot be found elsewhere. Thus [135] we can see a transcendental factor at work in man's necessary recourse to God in knowledge and freedom in respect of any object whatsoever, and this inevitably involves an implicit, non-objective experience of God which is always unthematic and capable of being overlooked. Hence too the unique character of the religious act in general[10] (above all with its original and integrated structure), the necessity of a total involvement flowing from the very essence of this knowledge, since the concept of God in this knowledge only avoids being an idol by referring to the God who, without an image of himself, standing fundamentally over against man, gives himself.[11] In the same way we can understand man's basic constitution in the experience of God, according to which man does not experience himself as an autonomous subject who creates a subject/object relation or anticipates it in his transcendental autonomy, but is aware of himself as the one who is destined, consigned and 'uttered' by the inexpressible Mystery.

All this means that one is justified, even obliged, to maintain the unity of the treatise on God and on the knowledge of God. Furthermore it must be made more radical so that the treatise on the knowledge of God is not only one piece of the whole doctrine of God but the doctrine itself, and so that it actually speaks only of God and not about ourselves, since talk about ourselves is ultimately nothing but the challenge to be silent, to adore, to hide oneself in the inexpressible Mystery, which commits us to ourselves in order to commend itself to us and sustain us. Where this unity of θεολογι/α and θεο_φ λε/γων is reflected upon – a unity which is not produced by us, but which itself sets us in existence – we must naturally speak of the possibility of such a reflection, which is always already present. In other words we must be aware of the possibility that we must not only be silent about God, but may also speak of him (and therefore must speak of him). Expressed in Catholic terms this doctrine of the transcendental necessity of the priority of the experience of God and its necessary expression in explicit speaking about God (with all the dangers of conceptual idolatry) refers to a knowledge which is both transcendental and unavoidable and is always sustained by the offer of God's self-communication in grace. Consequently the doctrine of the natural knowability and knowledge of God is not a knowledge which appears in isolation, but one element, only subsequently isolated, in a single knowledge of God, authorised by him in its direct relation to him, which, when [136] it is accepted, is already faith. Needless to say, this supernatural transcendentality (if we may term it thus) of the knowledge of God must be understood from the very beginning such that it only exists in the encounter with history, and consequently not only is it always open towards salvation-history and the revelation of the Word but it experiences the latter as its own history.

From this it is clear that the doctrine of God cannot (and not even primarily) be concerned with making statements about God's metaphysically necessary attributes, but above all concerning the workings – maintained throughout salvation-history – of God's freely adopted disposition towards man and the world. These two things are for the most part not clearly

[10] cf. J. B. Metz, LThK I (Freiburg,[2] 1957), cols. 256-259.
[11] Not, of course, in the sense of ontologism, but as a result of man's transcendental being-in-reference-to God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

enough distinguished and related to one another in the official Catholic doctrine of God. His faithfulness, mercy, love, in short the concrete relationship of God to us which we experience in the unity of the transcendental experience of grace and salvation-history, and which we have to express in the doctrine of God, are not merely the theologically attested necessary 'attributes' of God's metaphysical being, but considerably more. For God could deny us the very faithfulness, love etc. which he actually shows towards us, without ceasing to be faithful and loving in a metaphysical sense. And to recognise this possibility, to confide in the marvel of the free love of God, is to open up the horizon within which his attributes can really be grasped as being divine, i.e. such that a knowledge of them does not give us any power over him. From this point it might be possible for the Catholic doctrine of God to find a way of approach towards understanding and using the Lutheran theologia crucis. Even less than his attributes, God's dispositions cannot be united in a single, positive concept by us; we can only say formally, aiming at the unity of God asymptotically, that in God they must be one, transposed into each other in perfect harmony. For us they remain materially and positively unamenable to synthesis, and thus the way they affect us has a history (which as a result of the divine act of self-communication to us is the genuine history of God), and the consequent history of our response therefore neither can nor needs to consist in a metaphysical equilibrium in our attitude in respect of God's free disposition towards us. For instance we have more reason to praise his mercy than to fear his justice, because he has allowed his grace to overflow and not his anger, and we must not let this fact be obscured by a dialectic balancing between divine attributes of God in themselves, in an attempt to manipulate him by means of the understanding. In a similar way other themes usually treated in a doctrine of God, like God's foreknowledge, predestination, God's [137] freedom in grace, could be liberated from an abstract formalism; it could lead to the theological counterpart of Heidegger's secularised concept of the history of Being (Seinsgeschichte).

II

Following these semi-systematic observations on the doctrine of God in Catholic dogmatics I take the liberty of adding some further unsystematic remarks more or less at random, concerning particular points arising in connection with the doctrine of God. At the very outset it is strange to be talking 'about' the doctrine of God, as opposed to stating it, for in the nature of the case the affirmations of this doctrine can only refer to what is meant in a very indirect way. However, that may perhaps excuse the unsystematic nature of these remarks.

1. First of all, the following plain threefold presupposition characterises the Catholic doctrine of God.

(a) The calm and unembarrassed acceptance of the pluralistic structure of human knowledge and thus of theology too. Our knowledge has an ultimate subjective and objective unity. But so far as we think in terms of propositions, we are not standing at the focus of this unity, but are situated in a plurality of modes of knowledge. Consequently there is no formula which can say everything at the same time, no single idea from which everything else could be deduced. We are rightly always engaged in systematising (however we are to understand this word more precisely), but we never have a system; we always know more than what we have already systematised, and this unsystematised extra in our fundamentally plural experience is not merely supplementary to what we have mastered by system, but constitutes an incommensurate challenge and threat to it and is its future corrective. God is the presupposed objective and subjective unity, but he is also the God whom we can only approach by thought; we cannot ourselves join with him in realising this pluralism which he established and sustains in his creativity. It is thus clear that, as the first treatise, the doctrine

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of God is not complete until the end of the last dogmatic treatise. It is only possible at all in so far as we have continually exposed ourselves patiently to the claims of the many theological treatises. Hence it is also clear that we must always be aware – without letting ourselves become irritable or annoyed – that in a doctrine of God we have forgotten and omitted much that we could and should actually have known.

(b) The patient desire for historical continuity in theology also applies [138] in the case of the doctrine of God. If we wish to say something new and find what has been said of old to be inadequate, we may calmly count on finding implications of it in earlier theology. In spite of Seinsgeschichte and the recognition that the history of theology reaches right down to a real history of revelation and a real salvation-history and is not merely the playing of surface waves above the unmoved depths, the religious man, the man of faith, standing in the midst of his history where the issue is the issue of God, already possesses the totality of what can and must be pondered upon by theology. For genuine and fundamental knowledge consists in the unreserved surrender in faith to the absolute Mystery, the surrender to the self-communication of this Mystery, which, though holy, yet gives itself and forgives in direct intimacy, the surrender to its inscrutable ordering of history. This being so, we cannot really proceed in a revolutionary manner, as if the men of old did not know the God of whom we wish to speak. We can only claim to use the speech of reflection about him in such a way that it introduces us better to the faith which was always there. And this we must do with the painful and sobering thought that when we have poured out our pail of knowledge into the ocean of the incomprehensible God, we have really poured it back into the ocean whence we drew it in the first place.

(c) The courage to engage in metaphysics. There is no theology which does not carry on metaphysics, simply because in theology too there must be the process of thinking. I am sometimes amazed that theologians are quick to declare that a metaphysics must be false or unsuitable for theology simply because it is a matter of dispute. How can they not see that their own theology too is itself a matter of dispute, and yet they do not straight-way regard this as a criterion for saying that their own theology is false? The man who has not the courage to pursue a metaphysics (which is not the same as a closed system), a metaphysics which can be contradicted, cannot be a good theologian. Even when one is conscious of possessing a constantly inadequate metaphysics, it is still possible to rely on it, to use it in addressing the true God and in directing man towards the experience which he always has already from God. For it is man's inalienable blessing that his words say more and purer things than he himself knows and can enclose in his impure words, provided, that is, that his pride does not make him keep silent just because, as soon as he begins to speak about God, his words immediately sound foolish. In using them one always becomes ridiculous, even if neither the others nor oneself notice it straight away; the same is true if one uses the ancient words, the tired and rickety words of tradition.

[139] 2. It seems to me that Thomas separated the question an Deus sit rather too much from the question quid sit Deus.[12] Of course one can ask whether there is such a thing as that which everyone calls God, without first of all explaining in greater detail what is meant thereby. Naturally, as individuals always determined by history, we would not think about God unless we had already heard of him indirectly. But if it is not to be merely a question of the existence of a mere empty cipher, the question of the existence of God must be launched as a question concerning the real God. And as opposed to more arbitrarily chosen objects of knowledge, which can be known as possible prior to a knowledge of their existence, in the case of God possibility and actuality can only be grasped in a single act of knowledge. Thus from the point of view of ontology, the theology of creation, the theology of grace and of [12] cf. e.g. S.T. I q.2, a.2, ad 2 et 3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existence (and all four in one) the question of God can apparently only be stated as one which has necessarily already been asked and which has the answer in itself and has not received it from elsewhere. Hence at the same time the question itself says both that God is, and also who he is. If we are not to miss God right from the very outset, the question of God must on no account be put as a question about an individual existent within the perspective of our transcendence and historical experience, but only as a question concerning the very ground sustaining the 'question' which we ourselves 'are', concerning the origin and future of this question. Consequently it already of necessity contains within itself simultaneously the answer to the questions 'whether?' and 'what?'

3. Naturally I cannot at this point give a sufficient answer to the question of the so-called proofs of the existence of God in themselves and as an element in a doctrine of God. However, I may be permitted to make a few observations. Usually, the Catholic dogmatic doctrine of God does not discuss these proofs as such but assumes them as a task of metaphysics which has been successfully completed. Even in the section of the doctrine of God concerned with the 'natural knowability of God' it is usually said that according to dogmatic sources such proofs are possible and actually exist. But on a closer investigation one would have to say that this dogmatic doctrine of God ought itself to present these proofs, at least in nuce. For can it say that there are such things without giving an idea of what is actually meant by them and what may not be meant? But can one give an idea of the essence of the proofs without actually performing them if (as is surely the case) their 'essence' and their transcendental necessity – their 'existence' – can only be grasped together at [140] the same time? Furthermore, can the proofs be understood in any other way but as one element in the single, ultimately indissoluble experience of God in faith, as that element which is present (though rejected and repressed) even to the real unbeliever in so far as his unbelief is capable of leading to his judgment and loss of blessedness? That is the real theological reason why Catholic dogmatics holds fast the possibility of the so-called proofs, the possibility of a natural knowledge of God, just as it maintains the distinction between nature and supernatural grace. But that is not to deny that this 'proof of the existence of God' is absolutely sui generis and cannot be calculated as an individual item of knowledge by the formal and univocal procedure used in the case of any other piece of knowledge, nor is it the application of general axioms (in themselves quite independent of any application) to a particular case. Rather it is the result of the manifestation of the very ground of all such axioms, which is and remains the ultimate Mystery. In Thomas' theology and ever since, in spite of his quinque viae, there is and can be only one proof: in the whole questionable nature of man seen as a totality, which man is aware of in the concreteness of his existence striking him in a perpetually novel and existential way, provided that he does not run away from it.

4. In a Catholic doctrine of God the question of atheism ought to be considered much more seriously than is actually the case as a rule. And the first question must be the 'atheism' of the believer himself. If there can and ought to be a Catholic doctrine simul justus et peccator,[13] its modern historical form should be concerned with the man who, by virtue of the grace which he simply assumes without proof, is always breaking out of his atheism into faith in God.[14] There would have to be an exposition of the fact that theism can be the mask of a concealed atheism and vice versa, and that in this sense ultimately no-one can say of himself whether he believes in God or not, in the same way that the Council of Trent taught justification's

[13] R. Köster's 'Luthers These "Gerecht und Sünder zugleich"', Catholica 18 (1964), pp. 136-160, 210-224.

[14] Because the concrete and actual free realisation even of a 'natural' knowledge of God is a moral act which, 'elevated' in the existing order of salvation by supernatural grace, is also materially faith. For supernatural saving grace constitutes a transcendental horizon for freedom and knowledge, and the deliberate acceptance of these automatically implies an element of non-propositional, transcendental 'revelation'. Cf. K. Rahner/J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition (Freiburg and London, 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existential hiddenness from the reflection of the individual conscience. We shall only be able to speak in justice, love and humility of [141] the atheists outside when atheism is admitted as the constant inner temptation of the theist, as a condition of faith.

I regard it as an oxymoron, which does not really lead us any further, when Tillich[15] says that it is just as much atheism to affirm the existence of God as to deny it. If that were true, one would be obliged to abandon the question of God as something about which essentially nothing can be said. But the only possible absolute atheism would be if one said one could manage to leave the question of God alone to such an extent that it did not arise at all, and thus did not even need to be dismissed. This cannot really be disproved by a priori metaphysics but by the a posteriori historical and yet unavoidable fact that man's existence actually does ask the question. This question can become stifled and suppressed; it may be necessary to dig for it; if it were not present already, it would be senseless to wish to inculcate it. That it can only be disproved in this way is what is really meant by scholastic theology where it says that God can only be known a posteriori. For this a posteriori point of departure is not intended to make the knowledge of God into a particular individual pursuit within the homogeneous field containing all other items of knowledge; it only says that, like his existence itself, the individual has laid upon him the transcendental necessity of being aware of himself and of the question (in whatever form), and that this necessity is his destiny, communicated to him as the question of the freedom committed to him and of the necessary nature of this freedom. The only thing which seems to me to be correct in Tillich's statement is that, if God is included as one object in an arbitrary series of other objects (similarly demonstrable) and knowledge of him is treated like any other knowledge, this kind of theism is in reality atheism, because it has no understanding whatsoever of the God referred to by genuine theism. A theism of this kind would be erecting an idolatrous image upon a foundation laid and ordered by ourselves, instead of reaching God on the intractable foundation which sustains us and which is God himself.

5. Is God in the doctrine of God, or does it only consist of talk about God which actually conceals and drives him away? Certainly he is not identical with this way of talking; for it is our way of talking, and we are finite and sinful. Similarly it is our speech when we talk of God according to God's revelation. For we only possess this revelation as one which has reached us, which we ourselves have heard, and so too as a revelation spoken by us. And it is certainly true that there is a radical distinction [142] in the relation of the form of what we say to the content of what is said, depending on whether we are speaking of some temporal thing within our speech horizon or of God, who is not of this nature. Our speech is indeed strange and uncanny when we are obliged to speak of God with temporal words – since we have no others. And least of all can we compare what we say with the One of whom we speak, since for the purposes of such comparison, he would be present only in the terms of our speech. Strictly speaking, in theological talk as such it is not God who is present, but ourselves.[16] But we are the ones who are spoken of, related to and destined from the Incomprehensible. And so it happens that talk about God comes from him, without itself possessing him. If we speak of our origin and destiny in this way, and thus speak of God, it is still speech. But it speaks of what we are as what we are. And there we have God, as the unutterable Mystery, banishing us from him and yet in his grace promising and giving us himself. That which we ourselves are, which gives us God himself, and whence we speak, does not make God subject to us, does not make theology into anthropology. On the contrary it actually makes us subject to [15] Paul Tillich, Systematic Theology (Nisbet, 1953 [University of Chicago, 1951]), Vol. 1, p. 227.

[16] It cannot be objected that this is always the case whenever one talks 'about' something. For when, in talking about other things, we are presented with ourselves, we have already anticipated the world (that which is referred to in speech), at least as far as its formal structures are concerned. But where God is concerned this relationship never exists.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God and yet at the same time – how can we say it in any other way? – his children.

This nameless something which we can neither grasp nor circumscribe, which lies behind us as our perpetual creation in grace, is both revelation and mysticism; as creation it always lies behind us and as the absolute future it lies ahead of us, confronting us with the concreteness of our individual and collective history and bidding us enter in (ultimately into the love of one's neighbour); this is how it actually presents itself to us; this is how we possess God himself. Provided that our explicit talk of God in the dogmatic doctrine of God really comes from this source, it possesses God although it is ours, although in itself it only refers to its origin. Whether, when a particular person is talking, it really comes from this source or is ultimately only the moribund babblings of what was once genuine in other people, no individual can know for certain. He can only tremble and hope. But since a man can believe that Jesus of Nazareth spoke in such a way because through death and resurrection he was 'uttered' absolutely by God as his Word; since a man, in loving his neighbour – and not, in the first instance, himself – must believe in hope [143] that other men can speak in this way; since a man in the fellowship of Jesus believes in hope that this very speech, springing from its original source in God, is really present, he can as an individual confidently join in this speech about God, boldly entrusting his theological issue to God. He too will assuredly possess something of this genuine speech; he must not think of himself and of his sinfulness but calmly pursue his theology and commit it to God, from whom it can originate. And when he has spoken he should once more be silent in adoration, drinking draught by draught the everyday cup of God-less-ness, waiting for death, giving thanks for the joy of life – i.e. accepting it as sent to him in love – holding on to the theologia viatoris et crucis until at last the eternal light dawns. For the present we are held suspended in the very midst of it; even in the realm of thought we have no abiding city, even in theology we are pilgrims. But that is how it must be.

6. In the doctrine of God there is no real difference between the Deus in se and the Deus extra se. At least since Christ and in him we are both obliged and empowered to be continually overstepping this distinction. For to communicate himself to us 'in se' is exactly what he desires. And it is the paradoxical miracle of his love (i.e. of himself 'in himself') that he is able to do this without becoming finite and without violating our creatureliness. This process of becoming identical (and not just being identical) is the real content of salvation-history, which is the history of the unchangeable God. He really can become something in this history, precisely because (and in the final analysis not 'although') he is infinite and unchanging, the absolute power, capable of doing this.

7. Can it be said that in this age there can no longer be an alliance between theology and philosophy in a Catholic dogmatic doctrine of God? If anyone thought that there were no metaphysics in theology, the answer to this question would have to be Yes. For in theology at least very accurate thought is needed; but any thought which questions and ponders itself as a whole (and how could one avoid doing this in the case of the doctrine of God, which is concerned with God and the knowledge of God, i.e. the onto-logical origin of everything?) is metaphysics. For that reason it is nonsense to talk about the end of metaphysics, however much one may wish to say that a particular form of metaphysics has been eclipsed. So the Catholic doctrine of God will always imply and maintain a fundamental unity of theology and metaphysics, even if one would not wish to speak of an 'alliance' between them. Of course, this does not answer the question as to the precise relationship between metaphysics and theology, nor the question as to how these two disciplines [144] have come, in a historically justified manner, to separate out from one another into two independent units, although from their very nature neither of them can be or wish to be 'regional' disciplines, but rather are concerned fundamentally with everything (including themselves).

The questions we have just raised will be answered sufficiently when reason and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

metaphysics understand that it is they which pose the open question and refer man back to the experience of his interior and external history, and when theology grasps the fact that it can only give God's answer – God as the answer for all time – provided that it keeps the question open. (For the question into which the answer is projected has always been answered already by God – not by us.) And both philosophy and theology – in their different ways – must understand that in answering the sinner too and man in general, God has granted the question. If this question were not granted, both the answer given would lack a question and the question would lack an answer, or both would dissolve together into a flat commonplace. Of course all this does not mean that the old alliance between theology and metaphysics is to remain exactly as it was before. For above all in theology the doctrine of God must not talk in terms of its own metaphysics, but the metaphysics which is committed to us today as our lot in history, whether through our own fault or not. The actual form of this metaphysics certainly no longer has the homogeneity, the balance of language, and of presuppositions and perspectives calmly assumed which was once the case. Consequently Catholic theology no longer has simply one language; it must learn many languages, and thus it probably speaks them all thoroughly badly. But it will be of the opinion, furthermore, that in being obliged to speak today in many metaphysics, it is not simply uttering propositions which oppose each other with an absolute lack of mutual understanding – like a simple Yes and No – but rather that there is a philosophia perennis in them, not besides them, for which one must listen sympathetically, as it cannot be distilled out. Thus a dialogue is possible with these diverse metaphysics; and theology can be expressed in their language, for theology is a human language too, and every human language which is not itself dead points, questioning, towards the unutterable Mystery with which alone theology is ultimately concerned.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[145]

9

ATHEISM AND IMPLICIT CHRISTIANITY

I

Implicit Christianity – it could also be termed 'anonymous Christianity' – is what we call the condition of a man who lives on the one hand in a state of grace and justification, and yet on the other hand has not come into contact with the explicit preaching of the Gospel and is consequently not in a position to call himself a 'Christian'.[1] Theologically there can be no doubt that there are such people, as we shall show later in more detail. It is in itself a question of secondary importance whether this particular state should be called 'implicit Christianity' or not. Yet if one attends to the implications of this phenomenon the question can be answered unreservedly in the affirmative.

In addition there is technical justification for the use of the concept. For everything which is explicit in the proclamation, the sacraments and institutions of Christianity is instrumental in securing the possession of the grace of justification (and maintaining it until the end as the foretaste, the initial instalment of eternal life), to such an extent that, as the 'pars potior' and goal of everything else which is 'Christian', it may itself be called 'Christianity', especially since this grace is the grace of Christ. Furthermore the concept of being 'implicit' is thoroughly common in theology: it even occurs in a related context in fides implicita, votum (baptismi, Ecclesiae) implicitum etc. However, we have no objection to anyone wishing to avoid the term 'implicit Christianity' for various reasons (e.g. the danger of misunderstanding). But he would be obliged to provide another term saying what is meant in just as clear and brief a manner. The same applies to the synonymous term 'anonymous Christianity', which is distinguished from the other only by underlining the implications of this state as such for other people.

[146] For the sake of full conceptual clarity we must emphasise this: By virtue of God's desire for universal salvation, the 'objective redemption' constituting a fundamental factor in every man's 'subjective' state of salvation, the 'supernatural existentiale' and the continual offer of the grace of God's supernatural saving activity, even the unbaptised person (in the state of original sin as well) is in a unique situation. Prior to any existential attitude which he takes up, whether in faith and love or unbelief and sin, he is in a different position (and he himself is different too) from what would be the case if he were only the result of his 'nature' and his original sin. He can never be simply a 'natural' man and a sinner. By virtue of the grace of Christ (as possibility and obligation), which is at least a constant offer, he is always in a Christ-determined situation, whether he has accepted this grace or not.

Terminologically, however, it is better not to call this existentially (but not existentiell) 'Christian' position on the part of every man 'implicit' or 'anonymous' Christianity straight away. Otherwise we obscure the radical distinction between grace merely offered and grace existentially accepted in faith and love.

The basic thesis of this study is that even an atheist may possess this kind of 'implicit' Christianity.

---

[1] cf. K. Rahner, 'Anonymous Christians', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 390-398; further reference in Kl. Riesenhuber, 'Der anonyme Christ nach Karl Rahner', Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 86 (1964), pp. 286-303.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This basic thesis is by no means self-evident. For it must be said that right up to most recent times official text-book theology has fairly unanimously supported the view (in spite of various theological qualifications) that it is impossible for a normal responsible human being to entertain a 'positive atheism' for any considerable time without becoming personally culpable.[2] Since in this context there is no sense in weakening this culpability as though it were only 'venial', the official view involves a denial of the possibility of 'implicit Christianity' for any length of time in an adult atheist.

On the one hand one is obliged to appreciate the weight of the official view: in scripture God's knowability seems so clearly given and atheism seems to give evidence so definitely of being man's most terrible aberration, that it was only thought possible to understand it as a sin in which a man freely turns away in the mysterium iniquitatis, evilly suppressing the truth which everywhere impinges on him (Rom 1:18).

On the other hand it must be said that until now neither text-book theology nor scripture has been confronted with the experience of a [147] world-wide and militant atheism, confident of its own self-evident nature and because of this it was possible to regard the earlier, ubiquitous, theistic 'common opinion' as something necessarily so, as an eternally valid quality of human nature. This was a mistake: it led to the official text-book view we mentioned being taken as self-evident.

Next, for the sake of brevity, it will be simplest if we have recourse to the doctrine of the Second Vatican Council in order to illustrate our basic thesis theologically. The texts concerned are Nos. 19-21 of the first chapter of the first part of Gaudium et spes, the fifth paragraph of No. 22 of the same chapter, No. 16 in Chapter 2 of Lumen gentium and finally – since what has been said about the polytheistic religions of mission lands also holds good in the case of atheism as the product of a different historical and sociological situation – No. 7 of the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity.

It emerges from our definition of 'implicit' Christianity that the basic thesis can be suitably demonstrated in two stages:

1. According to Vatican II not every instance of positive atheism in a concrete human individual is to be regarded as the result and the expression of personal sin.

2. Such an atheist can be justified and receive salvation if he acts in accordance with his conscience.

II

1. In the first place, therefore, although it is relatively exhaustive in its treatment of atheism, the Council makes no reference to the traditional text-book view that positive atheism cannot be entertained for any considerable period of time, by a fully developed person of normal intelligence without involving blame on his part.[3] Furthermore it is safe to say that the Council not only left this thesis[4] alone, but actually assumed a contrary thesis, i.e. that it is possible for a normal adult to hold an explicit atheism for a long period of time – even to his life's end – without this implying moral blame on the part of such an unbeliever. It is true, however, that this view is not taught explicitly: for example it is not pointed out that on the one hand we are faced with an explicit atheism, very widely [148] extensive in society,

[2] A more detailed treatment is given in K. Lehmann, 'Die Auseinandersetzung mit dem westlichen Atheismus und der pluralistischen Gesellschaft', Die Zukunft der Kirche, ed. O. Mauer (Herder-Vienna, 1968).

[3] 1n what follows the author is taking up some observations which have already appeared in Concilium: 'The Teaching of the Second Vatican Council on Atheism', Concilium 3 (March 1967), pp. 5-13.

[4] For its foundation and a more detailed interpretation cf. e.g. 'Patres Societatis Jesu facultatum theol. in Hispania professores', Sacrae Theologiae Summa II (Madrid,[4] 1964), pp. 23-24 and notes 21-22.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

characterised by a straightforward self-confidence, and on the other hand that in accordance with general Christian principles we do not have the right to declare these atheists to be living in a state of unequivocal and severe moral blame before God. The absence of the traditional view seems to be at the same time highly suggestive and most remarkable if one considers that, provided that it were assumed to be correct, the text-book answer would be the decisive statement concerning atheism. But in the description of atheism in Nos. 19-21 the traditionally held view appears to such a small extent; in No. 19 (third section) where the question of blame is touched on in half a sentence, there is reference to the evident truth that the holding of atheism is culpable provided that the person intentionally banishes God from him or intentionally and wilfully excludes religious questions from his consciousness. But by no means is it said that every concrete case of atheism in a man can only continue for a considerable period of time if he is wilfully trying to exclude God or the religious question in this way. When we come to demonstrate the second part of our basic thesis as the teaching of the Council it will be even clearer – it will be conclusive – that we are right to interpret the Council's silence thus. For if it is possible for an 'atheist' to be justified by grace, not every instance of atheism can be the result of the personal culpability of the atheist in question. It is an artificial and ultimately nonsensical excuse to say that atheism of this kind is always culpably induced, but can persist afterwards even if the guilt itself – which need not necessarily have consisted formalissime in the culpable reception of atheism as such – is cancelled by a moral change of heart: it does not dispose of the decisive issue, which is the possible coexistence of atheism and justification.

Later on we shall come to speak about the possibility of coexistence of a conceptually objectified atheism and a non-propositional and existentially realised theism. From this it will also be apparent that the Council's pronouncements in Nos. 19-21 concerning the unavoidability of the religious issue do not contradict what we have just said. Of course the Council's reticence with regard to the question of blame in atheism does not imply a trifling with the problem, for: 'the Church has already repudiated and cannot cease repudiating, sorrowfully but as firmly as possible, those poisonous doctrines and actions which contradict reason and the common experience of humanity, and dethrone man from his native excellence' (No. 21).[5] But after the Council, Catholic pastoral [149] theology today will no longer be immediately under the impression, even when confronted with a committed atheist, that it is dealing with a fool or a knave; hence in a totally new way it will have to consider – with the Council (cf. No. 21) – what the real causes of modern atheism are, if it cannot be attributed simply to dullness of the mind or perversity of the heart. Without intending to give an exhaustive list or a deep analysis of such causes of atheism, the Council itself has indicated some of them. But in doing so it has not released Catholic theology, and Christian philosophy, pastoral theology and the teaching of religion from their task, a task which has not, as yet, been adequately tackled.

2. The second element in our basic thesis on atheism which is confirmed by the Council and which – judged by the accepted traditions of scholastic thought and religious practice – may cause offence is the conviction that even an atheist (holding the concepts and theory of atheism, as we shall explain in detail later) is not excluded from attaining salvation, provided that he has not acted against his moral conscience as a result of his atheism. We have already said that this proviso cannot be taken for granted, i.e. the atheist's blamelessness is thus not simply an immaterial hypothesis. This is observed by the Constitution on the Church Lumen gentium (No. 16): 'Nor does divine Providence deny the help necessary for salvation to those who, without blame on their part, have not yet arrived at an explicit knowledge of

[5] For an authoritative condemnation of atheism previously cf. Sacrae Theologiae Summa II, p. 20, and K. Rahner, 'Atheismus (systematisch)', LThK^{2} I, col. 985.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God, but who strive to live a good life, thanks to His grace.'[6] But for salvation both supernatural faith and the grace of justification are necessary. Technically speaking it cannot be here a question of those (entitatively natural or actually supernatural) graces which constitute an as yet remote preparation for justification and the consequent attainment of salvation which are mediated by (among other things) an explicit theism. For otherwise we would be merely stating the obvious, saying in effect that by the grace of God an atheist can become a theist and thus can be finally justified. Nor would this fit the context of the constitution, which is concerned with the different kinds of non-Catholics in so far as they are and actually remain non-Catholics. Thus No. 22 of the Pastoral Constitution says: 'All this' – the blessed Resurrection – 'holds true not only for Christians, but for all men of good will in whose hearts grace works in an unseen way. For, since Christ died for all men, and since the ultimate vocation of man is in fact one, and divine, we ought to believe that the Holy Spirit in a manner known only to God offers to every man the possibility of being associated [150] with this paschal mystery.' There is no reason to exclude atheists from this declaration. For it refers explicitly to No. 16 of the Constitution on the Church which concerns those who have not yet come to a conscious recognition of God. Moreover, mention of 'ways known only to God' is also made in the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (No. 7), where the 'heathen' who have not yet been reached by the Gospel are recognised as having a real possibility of supernatural faith and salvation even in their condition. But it would be arbitrary to wish to attribute a fundamentally much greater chance of salvation to a polytheistic heathen, who according to Paul is still 'without God' (Eph 2:12),[7] than to a modern atheist, whose 'personal' atheism is in the first place no less a product of his cultural situation.

With regard to all the texts quoted, as we have already said, it obviously cannot be a question of assuming at the outset that these atheists will become conceptually and theoretically explicit theists before death and thus saved. For in that case the texts would be merely repeating the platitude that an atheist can attain salvation when and in so far as he ceases to be one. Such an interpretation would deny any serious meaning to the texts; in producing them the Council would have been wasting its time.

III

Something really new has been said in these two elements of the Council's authoritative doctrine. If we consider the explicit statements of Scripture[8] and the traditional verdict on atheism, as well as the cautious reticence of Protestant theology with respect to the unbaptised person's possibility of salvation, we cannot say that this 'salvation optimism' as regards non-Christians (including atheists) is simply a theological truism for here we can see the development of something which really only began with Pius IX (DS 2865-2867) and led to the Holy Office's declaration of 8th August, 1949 (DS 3866-3873). Moreover this line of thought has really been developed further to the extent that, in a much clearer way than before, atheists too have been explicitly included in this 'salvation optimism'.

[151] These declarations have rendered obsolete even the earlier, moderately optimistic interpretations of the situation of non-Christians and heathen and atheists too which were to [6] cf. the commentary on this text by A. Grillmeier, Commentary on the documents of Vatican II, ed. H. Vorgrimler (New York and London, 1967).

[7] cf. H. Schlier's exegesis of this passage: Der brief an die Epheser (Düsseldorf, [4] 1963), p. 121.
[8] cf. the concise synopsis in LThK[2] I, cols. 985-986. Many scriptural statements about the fate of unbelievers need to be understood more clearly than has been the case until now in Catholic exegetics, as eschatological, prophetic 'admonitions' in a very particular literary form.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be found in text-book theology. According to the latter, such people outside the jurisdiction of Christianity were recognised as capable of attaining a 'natural' salvation (similar to that which the text-books acknowledged in the case of children dying without being baptised) but excluded from a really supernatural salvation. The Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (No. 7) expressly states that these people too, by the grace of God and in ways not known to us, can reach a real saving faith even without having accepted the explicit preaching of the Christian Gospel. And wherever the word 'salvation' occurs in the other texts we have quoted, what is meant is genuine supernatural salvation, more particularly since it is expressly declared that all men have only one vocation to salvation, and since the attainment of this salvation is understood as participation in Christ's Easter mystery.

Thus according to the teaching of Vatican II it is possible for an atheist to be living in the grace of justification, i.e. possessing what we have called 'implicit Christianity'. In this short investigation it cannot be our business to show how this conciliar doctrine is deduced from the genuinely original sources of revelation, nor how it is defended against the seemingly weighty objections which could be brought against it by Scripture and Tradition. The Council itself only gives a very brief and general justification for its approach. To a certain degree the Council makes its own case – the possibility of the unbaptised non-Christian's salvation without contact with the Gospel (thus including the atheist) – more difficult to defend by requiring a real supernatural faith even in such a case, i.e. not escaping the issue by saying that such a person attains supernatural salvation at the end of his life on the basis of a mere 'natural' morality.

In connection with the Council's teaching our basic thesis implies:

1. the thesis of God's will for the salvation of all men in Christ (he will is understood as 'infralapsarian'), and the availability of his grace, and the doctrine that there is only one supernatural goal for all men; and

2. the conviction that not every individual atheist can be regarded as a gravely culpable sinner.

The Council neither poses nor answers the question of how one arrives at the second part of this argument from a theological point of view. In this matter one can only say that on the one hand it rests on the theological conviction that one cannot and must not judge any man, but that each [152] particular empirical state of affairs, ambivalent in itself, appeals to the judgment of God alone; and on the other hand that the modern historical situation of the previously nonexistent experience of a world-wide and growing atheism, whose culture and social forms are not directly conditioned by morality, makes it improbable that in each case atheism is the result of the incurring of personal guilt.

All the same, our basic thesis, confirmed as it is by the Council, has provided us with difficult theological problems. This is clear in the Council's statement that the 'ways' in which such non-Christians reach salvation and justification are 'known only to God'. Naturally a statement like this does not forbid further theological study of these 'ways', but it shows that the Council was aware of a certain tension in what it said, even if this tension did not weaken its courage, in faith, to speak of this universal salvation optimism.

So far our observations on the possibility of implicit Christianity in an atheist have only served to set the task, not to give the answer we are looking for. We must now attempt to do this.

IV

In saying that according to the teaching of the Council an atheist does not automatically forfeit salvation, even if under certain circumstances he remains an atheist to his death, the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

question arises from the theological point of view as to whether in that case simply a 'good will' suffices to replace the knowledge about God and belief in God.

We have already seen that the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (No. 7) teaches the possibility of salvation for all men, and we have included atheists too in this category in so far as they are without blame. But the Decree expressly says that the people referred to attain salvation in so far as they come – by paths known only to God – to a saving faith.[9]

The question, therefore, is whether and how an atheist can demonstrate the preconditions under which this faith is at least conceivable. Here one cannot immediately refer to the minimum content of faith[10] which traditional theology, basing itself on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb 11:6),[11] declares to be sufficient under certain circumstances for a supernatural, [153] saving faith. For this minimum content is precisely belief in the existence of God and in him as guarantor of the moral order. Put differently, the problem is that if belief is required as assent to the divine revelation, 'something' must be believed. Even if we were to avoid the question as to how the atheist is to recognise this content as a revelation from God and not as the result of natural insight, the question remains just what this particular individual can embrace as an object of faith, in order for us to be able to talk about it being 'faith' at all.

In this connection the Council's texts which we have quoted always assume that the atheist in question is one who acts in accordance with his conscience, seeks truth and fulfils the demands of his moral consciousness; for to be considered free from blame and within the sphere of God's will for salvation, although he has not (yet) found God, he must act in line with the demands of his conscience. But is this 'content' of the atheist's awareness sufficient to provide an adequate object for saving faith? We must answer this question in several stages.

By reference to the doctrine of the Epistle to the Hebrews one is justified in answering provisionally: Yes, provided that this conscious content includes at least implicitly a knowledge about God, and moreover that this 'content' is affirmed by a free act elevated by grace in the manner of faith. Now this is in fact the case. It can be maintained as such, at least under certain epistemological conditions. The person who accepts a moral demand from his conscience as absolutely valid for him and embraces it as such in a free act of affirmation – no matter how unreflected – asserts the absolute being of God, whether he knows or conceptualises it or not, as the very reason why there can be such a thing as an absolute moral demand at all.

This preliminary answer needs a deeper grounding, and we shall attempt to do this in a more thorough treatment. Once we have assumed this kind of affirmation by the conscience of an absolute demand, it is not so important how far, in such an act, a man is or is not consciously aware of these presuppositions (both objective and subjective) which inform his concrete knowledge and action. It may even be that he is not able to reflect conceptually upon the subjective factors involved in his concrete spiritual action. Whenever a simple man in his everyday life acts sensibly and with insight, i.e. also logically, the ultimate principles of logic are not only found as the objective basis of his intelligent insight and [154] action; he has also embraced them, they are his spiritual 'possession', although as a simple man he would be probably quite incapable, even after instruction, of understanding the abstract principles of Aristotelian logic as such in its abstract formality.

---

[9] See the study already quoted in note 6 and the further literature mentioned in it.

[10] For the dogmatic side of this doctrine cf. Sacrae Theologiae Summa II, p. 804 (see note 5 above), with the differentiated views of Mitzka, Beraza, Pesch.

[11] cf. especially the commentary by O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer (Göttingen,[12] 1966), pp. 386-387; E. Grässer, Der Glaube im Hebräerbrief (Marburg, 1965), pp. 132 ff. et passim.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This modest observation from everyday life can be heightened theoretically and applied to our question. In every one of its acts, human knowledge is to a certain extent dipolar: it implies a subjective knowledge of the knower himself and his act on the part of the subject as such, while at the same time this same knowledge has a known and conceptualised object which is its goal and with which it is concerned. In knowing about oneself and one's act one always knows something. The objective content of such an act can also be something which is known without reflection on the subjective side of the same act, i.e. when the subject, knowing itself subjectively, makes itself in addition the object of its judgment. But even in such a case the dipolarity, the difference between the subject present to itself and the known object, between knowing-ness and what is known, is not destroyed. Furthermore it is quite possible for such an act, the content of which the self-knowing subject of this act wishes to present to itself, to be inadequately or falsely interpreted by this selfsame subject, although on the subjective side what has been interpreted is present in its known reality. For instance, a man who performs an intellectual act knows 'subjectively' what an intellectual act is, because the subject with its intellectual act is present to itself in a real identity. In spite of this, however, a theoretical psychologist who is a sensist, denying in a materialist manner the subject's intellectuality, is bona fide capable of giving quite false theoretical explanations of his own intellectual act; i.e. what he experiences subjectively he may translate objectively falsely into objective concepts and statements.

Now in so far as every instance of intellectual knowledge and freedom on the part of the subject and his act is a 'transcendental experience', i.e. an experience of the intellect's unlimited rootedness in absolute Being, on the subjective side every instance of knowledge is a real, even if implicit (i.e. not necessarily objectified) knowledge of God, although we cannot show this in greater detail here. What we commonly call 'knowledge of God' is therefore not simply the knowledge of God, but already the objectified conceptual and propositional interpretation of what we constantly know of God subjectively and apart from reflection. Knowledge of God is certainly a posteriori to the extent, on the one hand, that even the subjective act – which by virtue of its transcendental nature always knows about God – is historically contingent; in order to be itself this [155] subjective act always requires an 'objective' object, without which it cannot exist at all, but which it experiences a posteriori. Besides this, knowledge of God is also a posteriori in so far as the conceptual and propositional objectification of the transcendental experience first needs a vehicle to pass among the a posteriori given objects of knowledge of the world, in the way expounded in detail in the classical 'proofs of the existence of God'. On the other hand the knowledge of God is not a posteriori simply in the sense in which the knowledge of any external object is, e.g. the knowledge of the existence of Australia. It is true that there is no innate idea of God in the sense of an inborn conceptualised content, but nevertheless the conceptual and propositional knowledge of God is the objectification of that rootedness of the intellect in absolute Being which is always present to man's transcendental intellectuality; that rootedness which is a concomitant experience in every intellectual act, whether of knowledge or of freedom, irrespective of the particular object with which this act is concerned.

V

If we adopt these assumptions (which we have really only touched upon here) we can draw up a sort of table of the fundamental types of man's relationship with God. In doing so it must always be borne in mind that a conscious or known reality present to man's mind may exist in the mode of free acceptance or free rejection, since man is not merely a being who is intellectually knowing, but is also always a free being.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

First possibility: God is present in man's transcendental nature and this fact is objectified in a suitably and correctly explicit and conceptual theism, and moreover is also freely accepted in the moral affirmation of faith (in the practice of living). In this case we have what constitutes simply correct theism, what we might call transcendental and categorial theism, accepted and affirmed by man's freedom in both these dimensions. In this way it represents in every respect a proper relationship between man and God such as we may assume in the case of a justified Christian.

Second possibility: Both transcendental and categorial theism are present, man knows of God in his transcendental experience and also his reflection upon the latter is correct, but in his moral freedom he rejects this knowledge, whether as a sinner, denying God, or going on to reject the God whom he has correctly 'objectified' conceptually in real free unbelief. This is the category in which the 'atheist' was thought of previously in religious and in specifically Christian matters. It was [156] assumed that he had an objectified and more or less correct idea of God but rejected him in sin or freely turned away from him either in a merely practical 'godlessness' or in theoretical atheism as well.

Third possibility: The transcendental experience of God is present of necessity and is also freely accepted in a positive decision to be faithful to conscience,[12] but it is incorrectly objectified and interpreted. This inadequate, false (and under certain circumstances totally lacking) idea of God as such can be again the object of free acceptance or rejection in various ways, but we need not concern ourselves with that in any greater detail here. For instance, consider the case of a polytheist who, in the dimension of free reflection, freely 'believes' this polytheism or freely and 'atheistically' rejects it, without replacing it by a correctly conceived theism. In either case this third instance is the sort of atheism which is innocent in the sense of Vatican II. It is atheism on the plane of categorical reflection, coexisting in the subject with a freely affirmed transcendental theism. There can be such a thing as innocent atheism because of the difference between subjective transcendentality and categorial objectification in concepts and sentences, producing this coexistence of transcendental theism and categorial atheism. For the said 'difference' is necessarily present in every act of the mind. The components of this innocent atheism are: on the one hand the subject's continual transcendental dependence on God and the free acceptance of this dependence, especially in the moral act which respects absolutely the demands of conscience – i.e. a transcendental theism 'in the heart's depths' – and on the other hand the free rejection of the objectified concept of God, i.e. a categorial atheism in the forefront of conscious reflection, a rejection which cannot in itself be regarded as culpable.

Fourth possibility: The transcendental dependence on God is present; objectively it is interpreted falsely or insufficiently correctly in a. categorial atheism, and this transcendental dependence on God is itself simultaneously denied in a free action by gravely sinful unfaithfulness to conscience or by an otherwise sinful, false interpretation of existence (as being 'totally absurd' or of no absolute significance, etc.). In this case the free denial does not refer merely to the categorial interpretation of man's transcendental nature, but to existence and thus to God himself. Here we have culpable transcendental atheism, which excludes the possibility of salvation as long as it persists.

[157] By presenting these four basic types of man's relationship with God we do not wish to suggest that the table could not have been drawn up differently, especially as we ourselves have indicated further subordinate possibilities within this 'system'. Furthermore, by naïvely distinguishing the correct from the false conceptual objectification of man's necessary

[12] Whereby the consciously reflected object of this act of obedience to conscience is not explicitly God, but another moral object as envisaged by the conciliar texts quoted above, where the atheist is conceived as acting morally.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

transcendental dependence on God we have made an over-simplification which does not correspond to concrete reality. For here there are naturally correct and less correct conceptualisations (e.g. an idea of God revealing partially false, pantheistic or polytheistic tendencies and blemishes). Indefinite transitions and fluid boundaries are also compatible with the exercise of freedom. So the system we have outlined is no more than a rough preliminary sketch. But it may be sufficient for our purposes all the same.

VI

Our whole concern here is to reach an insight into why there is in fact in man the possibility of innocent and of culpable atheism, and the knowledge of how on the one hand a man's innocent atheism by no means destroys every really fundamental relationship with God, created by man's constant transcendental rootedness in God; and how on the other hand, in spite of this possibility, culpable atheism consists not necessarily merely in transgression in connection with any particular moral situation but in an ultimate 'No' to man's fundamental dependence upon God himself i.e. in a free 'No' to God himself.

It must be further remembered that the categorial affirmation of God – as a theoretical and categorial action – is by no means a guarantee that the man concerned really seriously accepts his transcendental dependence on God at the very heart of his transcendental freedom of choice. Put simply, a man, even a 'Christian', can accept God as objectified in knowledge and freedom, and can even declare that he is a 'theist' and think that he is keeping to God's moral norms, and yet deny him through immorality or unbelief in the depths of his heart. This is just as possible as the coexistence of a categorial atheism with a (freely affirmed) transcendental theism. So, too, categorial theism can coexist with a transcendental theism which is itself freely rejected, thus becoming freely adopted transcendental atheism – in spite of the abiding experience of rootedness in God.

In the Pastoral Constitution the Council taught that there is also a culpable atheism. But it was not made clear enough how such an atheism is possible as an atheism really directed at God himself. The Council recognised the existence of innocent atheism, but without plainly showing [158] how salvation and faith are reconcilable with it. The distinction we have indicated between transcendental and categorial atheism/theism provides a theoretical understanding of this teaching. Innocent atheism is always only categorial atheism, atheism on the plane of conceptual and propositional objectification, where it is ultimately immaterial whether this atheistic objectification as such is accepted or freely rejected by the person concerned, since this particular free act only involves the categorial object. On the other hand transcendental atheism (which is really possible) it always necessarily culpable, since God is always present to man in the dimension of man's transcendentality, and therefore can only be rejected by a free decision, not by knowledge as such. In this dimension the 'matter', namely God, is necessarily correctly present, so that his rejection cannot be justified or thought to be justified on the grounds of an inadequate or falsely objectified concept of God in the dimension of categorial reflection.

VII

If what has been indicated here in very few and inadequate words is understood, pastoral insights emerge concerning the correct approach on the part of the person proclaiming theism or the Gospel. These insights might suitably serve to deepen and systematise the Council's necessarily very brief remarks on this approach. The preacher of the Gospel is never

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

confronted with an atheist who has so far had simply nothing to do with God; the preacher's relationship to this particular listener is never like that of a geography teacher teaching a small boy for the first time that there is such a place as Australia and demonstrating the fact. Where free, responsible human beings are concerned, the preacher of the Gospel is confronted fundamentally with a man who already has a real experience of what is meant by God, but who for various reasons (either free from blame or – under certain circumstances – culpable) is not able correctly to interpret his own experience of God in conscious reflection and consequently rejects the concept of God presented to him from elsewhere, as being either false or meaningless for him. To combat a categorial and conceptual atheism of this kind one must not remain solely on this particular plane as such; one must not only present proofs of the existence of God as if the latter were of the same structure and amenable to the same methods as the existence of an object which is merely accessible in purely a posteriori experience. If this were the case, under certain circumstances a man might be justified in rejecting the existence of such a God as being a matter of no interest and not worth bothering his head about.

[159] Even if it is possible at all to speak to an atheist on the level of the 'proofs' so well known to us, to be successful today such a dialogue unavoidably presupposes that the atheist has been made aware of his own transcendental knowledge of God through a kind of 'mystagogy'. If he is really acquainted with unconditional faithfulness, absolute honesty, selfless surrender to the good of others and other fundamental human dispositions, then he knows something of God, even if this knowledge is not present to his conscious reflection. Of course, in a particular concrete instance, it can be very difficult to bring to the surface the theological implications of these fundamental dispositions and objectify them in conceptual form. In any particular case the attempt may simply fail. In itself that is no more strange than the fact that it is sometimes impossible to make formal logic clear to a person in the mode of theoretical reflection although he employs this very thing in his everyday affairs and has insight into the 'logic' of these affairs. In any case, however, the traditional 'proofs' can only be presented successfully to a person who is not already an explicit 'theist' provided that rational reflection is joined by this kind of 'mystagogy'. Depending on the case in question, this mystagogy must naturally also deal with the difficulties from which arise, according to the Council's Pastoral Constitution, the various forms of modern atheism; the protest against evil in the world, the supposed lack of any religious experience, the supposed threat to mankind in the idea of God, the strange ideas which people connect with the concept of God, etc.

Provided one understands what is meant by the transcendental theism we have described it is clear, furthermore, that according to genuine theism God is not present in our everyday experience like the other objects of our a posteriori experience. He is not an existent within the sphere of our experience but the precondition of our transcendental horizon. A theist or an apologete of theism must not proceed, therefore, as though God were – not of course an object directly present to our sense-experience, but – to all intents and purposes capable of being known rather like an electric current, which, not itself directly visible can be deduced from its effects.

Here we have a way in to an understanding of the phenomenon in atheism referred to by the Council itself when it says that certain atheists are held fast in a 'scientistic phenomenalism' and are unable to understand, so they say, what might be meant at all by the word 'God'. According to a proper understanding of the nature of the knowledge of God there can be no question of expanding and deepening the area of empirical experience by the same methods. What is required is rather to help man to appreciate [160] that there is another mode of experience, a transcendental experience in intellectual knowledge and freedom, according to which what we mean by 'God' can be understood and known as real; and furthermore that what is meant by this transcendental experience, referential to God, is the precondition for every a posteriori experience whatsoever, whether in everyday matters or in science, even if it is not and cannot be the task of these a posteriori disciplines to reflect upon their own presuppositions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The first Vatican Council expressly defined that God is incomprehensible (cf. DS 3001). No Christian doctrine of God and his knowability denies this. But the dogma is often forgotten in the practice of our apologetics of theism. For one cannot first of all know God – as one knows anything else according to its existence and nature – and then subsequently 'add on' the attribute of incomprehensibility. Both the proof of God's existence and the 'mystagogy' which is absolutely necessary if the former is to be successful must relate, from the very beginning, to the absolute mystery[13] which pervades and penetrates our whole existence; this mystery must be brought together with theoretical knowledge and the existential actualisation of life, and then one can say: This is what we mean when we speak of 'God'.

VIII

So far we have only taken the first of the steps (cf. V above) leading to a theological understanding of how an atheism which is not blameworthy can constitute 'implicit' Christianity. For what we have said up to now only serves to make it clear that a blameless categorical atheism can be a freely accepted, transcendental theism. But on its own this does not constitute the 'implicit' Christianity in which a man by grace accepts the self-imparting God in faith, hope and love.

In order to proceed further we must bear in mind that in the actual order of things the 'atheist's' transcendental, freely accepted theism, which here concerns us, is elevated by supernatural grace because of God's will for universal salvation, and man's essential transcendentality – at least in so far as it is freely accepted – finds its ultimate goal, by grace, in the God of Eternal Life. Although one must admit that the Council has expressed itself cautiously and somewhat indefinitely, it may certainly be said that as far as the texts we have quoted are concerned the Council professes no acquaintance with a merely 'natural' morality. Of course the latter does [161] exist, but it is integrated into the concrete order of God's desire for mankind's supernatural salvation as a distinguishable, but not isolated, factor in a larger whole, of which God's offer of saving grace to all is also a part.[14]

In Catholic theology no-one can deny the possibility of justification and supernatural sanctification prior to Baptism (given the presence of supernatural faith, of which we shall say something in particular later, and an implicit votum baptismi). Thus there is in any case a divine offer of supernatural grace and the possibility of freely accepting it prior to Baptism, apart from the sacrament.[15] We have only to assume that this offer and the free acceptance of it (thus made possible) is always and everywhere present (on account of God's desire for universal salvation, not because of the natural goodness of a moral act) where a man freely accepts his own transcendentality – which includes an implicit, transcendental theism – by

[13] cf. K. Rahner, 'The concept of mystery in Catholic theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73.

[14] It would be arbitrary to wish to understand the 'grace' which is continually referred to in these texts with regard to the non-Christian or atheist merely as God's entitatively natural assistance towards the fulfilment of the natural moral law as such. For this theological issue cf. K. Rahner, Theologie des Todes (Freiburg,[5] 1965), pp. 79 ff.

[15] For extra-sacramental justification cf. K. Rahner, 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

means of a moral decision in absolute faithfulness to his conscience, by means of 'righteousness of life' etc. We assume, therefore, that under these conditions there is always an occurrence of what Thomas calls infusio et acceptatio gratiae. In that case the concrete order of salvation together with the freely accepted transcendental theism which can even be found in an atheist, produces implicit Christianity.

The reason why traditional theology up to now for the most part has always counted on there being a phase of merely 'natural' morality in the course of a 'heathen's' life (and so too has been inclined to acknowledge only a 'natural' moral goodness – if any – even in the case of a bona fide atheist) is because on the one hand it is correctly assumed that justification is impossible without revealed faith, nor can a fides virtualis be a substitute for it, as for instance Straub suggested; and on the other hand it was thought impossible to imagine such a revealed faith in the case of a 'heathen', let alone an atheist. The reference in the conciliar texts to the 'ways known only to God' witnesses above all to this difficulty, but also shows that the Council, particularly in the Decree concerning the Church's Missionary Activity, nevertheless has no doubt that this faith is possible even in the instances which are of interest here; moreover it does not restrict this possibility to cases of extraordinary, miraculous [162] intervention on the part of God such as have been appealed to by previous text-book theology (private revelation, special illumination, etc.).

This obscure issue can be pursued further if one bears in mind, in this context as well, the well-known Thomist doctrine that every supernaturally elevated moral act on a man's part has, in connection with its essential elevation, a supernatural formal object which cannot be reached by any merely natural intellectual or moral act on his part, even if in both cases the material object, the objective, a posteriori content of the act, is the same.

If we assume this thesis, which Thomism has rightly regarded as fundamental to its 'system' and which can be held to be at the very least above reproach in theology, and apply it to our context, it gives us the possibility of revealed faith which we require for our cases: The communication of a supernatural formal object (in other words, the supernatural perspective within which, in a non-reflex but real manner, morality's material objectivity is grasped; the revealing of man's intellectual and spiritual trancendentality in its direct relation to God) is in a true sense 'revelation' already. It is constituted as such by the offer of saving grace itself (logically or temporally) prior to the a posteriori and historical communication of an objective content by means of historical revelation. The supernatural elevation in grace automatically involves revelation and the possibility of faith.[16]

Naturally this revelation is not simply identical with revelation as it is usually (and correctly) understood. It is obvious that much ought to be said about the relation of this 'transcendental' revelation (or rather, the transcendental element of revelation) to the categorial, historical, verbal revelation (or the categorial element of the single revelation). Certainly this relationship must not be thought of as if the transcendental element of revelation (constituted by grace) rendered the categorial element superfluous or threatened its meaningfulness.

But in the first place, if one considers that in any case this transcendental element is present in revelation and faith because the verbally objectified, categorial revelation can only be spoken in 'Pneuma' and heard in faith; and secondly, if one does not wish to have recourse to improbabilities (i.e. original or private revelation); and thirdly, if one still wishes to maintain the possibility of saving, supernatural faith and, in line with the Council, the existence of revelation for all men; then the only possibility [163] left is to say that the elevation through grace of man's freely accepted transcendentality is in itself revelation, because it involves an [16] For this concept of revelation cf. K. Rahner/J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition (Freiburg and London, 1966); K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich,[2] 1963).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a priori formal object of man's mind, not necessarily reflected in consciousness, which, qua formal object, cannot be reached by any natural intellectual ability but arises from God's self-communication in grace. It is a revelation without which a categorial, historical, verbal revelation – although it could constitute an utterance to do with God and 'about' him – could not be the 'Word of God' in its most proper sense.

These brief notes must suffice here to demonstrate how transcendental theism freely accepted on the part of a categorial atheist can be – or rather, actually is – revelation and the possibility of saving faith.[17] This is the case if it is assumed that this transcendentality of the mind, implying a theism, with its free acceptance, is elevated by grace. And we may assume this because of God's desire for universal salvation. Under these presuppositions the Council's optimism concerning salvation is theologically justified. Now a theism which is elevated through grace and which is freely accepted (by the grace supplied by the possibility of faith) is a justifying theism and hence an implicit Christianity. And this kind of existential transcendental theism (although not necessarily the object of reflection) is also possible in the case of a (categorial) blameless atheist, whose actions are good and arise from an absolute commitment; therefore this kind of atheist can be an implicit Christian.

In its Pastoral Constitution Vatican II most strongly emphasises that modern atheism requires new and most serious thought on the part of the Church and the preachers of the Gospel. This declaration must not remain a mere pious tag, a part of the inventory of courtesy used in dealing with an opponent. There really are questions which must be asked and answered anew if it is really intended to engage modern atheism in a real dialogue. These questions do not merely concern the 'didactic' and 'pedagogical' methods best employed in speaking with today's atheists. They are questions to do with the thing itself. Thus the question in pastoral theology as to how to come to grips with modern atheism changes very quickly into the question as to what is actually meant by [164] 'God',[18] and how we theists and Christians come to have a direct approach to this incomprehensible mystery of our existence, which sustains us and at the same time constantly calls our whole being in question, a direct contact which cannot be reduced to the sociological phenomenon of Christians sharing common assumptions and talking among themselves about God, merely [17] For a treatment in greater depth cf. the author's studies: 'Concerning the relationship between nature and grace', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 297-317; 'The Christian among unbelieving relations', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 355-372; 'Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 165-188; 'History of the world and salvation-history', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 97-114; 'Konziliare Lehre der Kirche und künftige Wirklichkeit christlichen Lebens', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 479-498.

[18] For details in this issue cf. K. Rahner, 'Christian living formerly and today', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3-24.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

thinking they know who he is and why our life itself is meaningless without God.[19] In maintaining this one has uttered an ultimate truth about our life; but to really grasp it, life must first be experienced as meaningful, one must face the question whether one accepts this experienced meaning or not and know, in this experience and its acceptance, what is really meant by 'God'.[20]

[19] Cf. K. Lehmann's 'Some Ideas from Pastoral Theology on the Proclamation of the Christian Message to Non-believers Today', Concilium 3 (March 1967), pp. 43-52.
[20] cf. K. Rahner, 'The concept of mystery in Catholic theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[165]

10

‘I BELIEVE IN JESUS CHRIST’
Interpreting an article of faith

Today one cannot say anything of religious and theological significance about Jesus Christ himself without also describing the essence of faith itself as an act whereby Jesus is seen as the Christ. In referring to this faith first of all as an occurrence – and as having a ‘content’ only within the particular context of that occurrence – it must be clear at the outset that this faith is to be understood as more than the merely private subjectivity of which we today are justly suspicious, by being faith within the Church and under obedience to what the Church’s authoritative faith says. Hence we can immediately see the point of a mandatory Confession of Faith today too. The man Jesus commits himself to men in the faith of the Church and with the Church. To wish to find this faith by relying solely on oneself would be a fatal individualism.

This faith occurs as a result of an absolute trust, by which one commits oneself to the other person and thereby embraces the rights and privileges of such a total self-abandonment with a hope without reservations. This extends to all areas of existence which, on account of the absolute quality of this self-abandonment, do not need to be seen in toto nor to be specified in advance. The person to whom one thus commits oneself can be addressed in the most varied ways depending on the dimensions of one’s own self and the nature of one’s absolute committal: simply ‘Lord’, ‘Son of God’; ‘Pardoner’, ‘Saviour’ and a thousand other names which have become his since the New Testament. Hence it is an important but secondary question, which of the many aspects of this total claim is most suitable for any particular man’s encounter with him; whether the apparently completely private aspect, for instance, whereby one confidently lays hold on his forgiveness of one’s own guilt, or within the cosmic perspective of universal history, whereby one accepts him in trust as the Omega of the development of the universe, the meaningful conclusion of history. The most diverse approaches to him are all intended to be gateways to the one radical self-committal of the whole man to Jesus Christ and it is only in [166] this sense that they have any meaning at all. Similarly we are not concerned here with the question of what is required for a person so to find the concrete man Jesus that this act of total self-surrender to him successfully takes place. Although it is no less decisive for the understanding of Christology and the subject under discussion, we cannot here enter into detail as to why what we mean when we say ‘God’ is the same as what is known and accepted as the ultimate ground of this free act of confident, hopeful and loving self-surrender to the other person. Once we have assumed this, we can say the following: where someone is justified in trusting himself to another person absolutely, and where this other person on his own account is able to accept this absolute trust and give it a basis, authorised by God and by no-one else, then this other person is in such a unique and radical union with God that the relationship can be rightly and radically interpreted for all time in the way orthodox Christian faith affirms – irrespective of how such a committed person himself understands and interprets the experience.

If we are honest, we modern men will admit that the doctrine of God’s Incarnation seems at first sight like pure mythology which can no longer be ‘realised’. But if we listen closely to what real Christian doctrine says about the God-man, we notice that there is nothing to be ‘demythologised’ in this fundamental dogma, but that it only needs to be understood correctly to be completely orthodox and at the same time worthy of belief. If we say ‘God is made man’ in the ready-made patterns of our everyday speech, we either think automatically of God

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

being changed into a man or else we understand the content of the word 'man' in this context as an outer garment, a body in its constituent parts or something similar, by means of which God himself renders himself visible on the stage of his world's history. But both interpretations of this statement are nonsensical and contrary to what Christian dogma really intends to say. For God remains God and does not change, and Jesus is a real, genuine, and finite man with his own experiences, in adoration before the incomprehensibility of God, a free and obedient man, like us in all things.

Then what does this fundamental affirmation of the Christian Faith mean? It is unexceptionable and legitimate from the point of view of Dogma if we consider on the one hand that, in the sense we have outlined, a man who is able to receive an act of unconditional trust in God authoritatively and on his own account, must be in a quite unique union with God; and it is conversely also legitimate to try to formulate the fact of this union, the abiding mystery of the Divine Sonship of Jesus and of the Incarnation, in primarily existential categories, i.e. in terms which [167] express man's total spiritual and cognitive nature. Man exists all the time as one who comes from somewhere and as one who is spoken to; as one who answers Yes and No and who comes from and returns to the mystery we call God. This fact of issuing from an origin and proceeding to an end is the essence of the spiritual creature. The more radically this fact is realised in actuality, the more independent, i.e. the freer man is. Therefore the realisation of thus originating in a source and being bound for an end is to an increasing extent the gift of God and man's act. If a man receives this human essence from God in such absolute purity and integrity and so actualises this relationship with God that he becomes God's self-expression and his once-for-all pledge of himself to the world he calls into existence, we have what we call 'Incarnation' in a dogmatically orthodox sense. Similarly in the doctrine of the Unity of the one Divine Person and the two – Divine and Human – Natures, the mystery described in ontic and substantial categories is the same as that which can also be expressed in existential terms. The only necessary condition for interchanging the types of statement is the awareness that every existential statement automatically includes an ontological one and vice versa.

It is essential, however, that we understand that this act on the part of such a man is already the act of God in creating and sustaining him as he is. It is also absolutely necessary not to misunderstand the relation between God and the human person as a merely peripheral and supplementary 'state of mind', leaving man's actual existence basically untouched, and unable to influence it radically. To understand this correctly one only needs to grasp the fact that God has not merely 'uttered' man as the open question which we are in respect of him, but that he has uttered this question in such a way as to provide it with the possibility and potential of accepting itself as such unconditionally and totally – thereby accepting God himself.

The message of the faith concerning Jesus Christ is neither myth nor fairy-tale, but it tells of the unique occasion which saw the radical achievement of the ultimate possibility of man's existence. Faith has the courage to accept Jesus of Nazareth as the one who, from the depths of his being, grounded in God, has surrendered himself in obedience to this God and has been accepted as such by him – this is made plain by the Resurrection. He was able to do this because he was and is the one who had always been accepted by God. What he is in reality occurred and appeared in history in his life, namely in God's pledging of himself to the world, made irreversible in and through the radical, divinely-initiated acceptance of this pledge in the true man Jesus.

[168] Looking now from the other angle, whoever experiences in faith that he trusts Jesus of Nazareth absolutely, that in him God gives his pledge unconditionally and irreversibly, that in respect of Jesus his own concrete encounter with another person in trust and love becomes absolute and he thus experiences what is meant by 'God' – such a man may

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

interpret this experience how he will, well or ill, adequately or unsatisfactorily; in reality he believes what we orthodox Christians call 'Incarnation': the uncompounded and inseparable unity of God and man, in which God remains totally God, man is radically man, and both are One, uncompounded and inseparable, in this Jesus who is the Christ of faith. If we entrust ourselves to him in a radical way, and exist in attendance on him alone, we experience directly who he is, and this trust of ours is founded on who he is. This circle cannot be broken. Whether one knows it explicitly or not, one is always seeing God and man in one. The Christian believes that in Jesus of Nazareth he finds both as One. Love for all other people finds its justification here and discovers its ultimate ground, and all such love leads to the one man in whom this union of God and man, intended for everyone, appears in its historical uniqueness and utter finality – Jesus Christ.

The Church is right to value highly its ancient Christological formulas, the product of a long and troubled history of the faith. Every other formula – and there may be others – must be tested to see whether it clearly maintains that faith in Jesus does not acknowledge merely a religious genius or the prophet of a passing phase in the history of religions, but the absolute Mediator of Salvation now and always. But wherever and in whatever way a person accepts this in faith and trust, he enacts in such faith what Christianity confesses concerning Jesus of Nazareth, Crucified and Risen.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[169]

11

ONE MEDIATOR AND MANY MEDIATIONS

I

In itself this title could be said to mean several different things. However, if we look at it in the context of theological controversy, the theme will be obvious to everyone: 'orthodox' Protestant Christendom – above all in its theological dispute with the Roman Catholic Church – witnesses to its belief in the one and only Mediator of salvation (forgiveness, justification and sanctification): Jesus Christ. It is believed that although the Catholic Church subscribes verbally to this same belief (which no-one can seriously deny), it is not in actual fact genuinely and unequivocally faithful to it,[1] since Catholic doctrine and especially its actual religious practice are very familiar with many other mediations of salvation 'besides' Jesus Christ.[2] These could be divided into personal and institutional mediations: on the one hand Mary and the other Saints, and on the other hand the whole wealth of institutions, like the institutionally protected authority for doctrinal truth[3] and the opus operatum of the sacraments.[4] Here we must restrict ourselves to the question of personal [170] mediations, setting aside the issue of mediating institutions.[5] Similarly we shall not raise the old controversial question as to whether the Catholic doctrine of justification concerning freedom and 'merit' in the process of salvation is or is not injurious to the 'merit' of the one Mediator.[6] Furthermore we shall not discuss the question of the relationship between the redeemed person's function as regards the Church within history and his function of heavenly intercession,[7] which must naturally not be thought of as a continuation of history, but as

[1] There is a summary of the contemporary discussion in C. A. de Ridder, 'Maria als Miterlöserin?' = Kirche und Konfession 5 (Göttingen, 1965).

[2] cf. the tendency towards this criticism in G. Miegge, 'Die Jungfrau Maria' = Kirche und Konfession 2 (Göttingen, 1962), pp. 150-172 (Miterlöserin), pp. 200-212. The same accusation is implied if one tries to look at Mary from the point of view of the phenomenology of religion, and fit her into a general, undifferentiated trend of religion as a whole as 'mediatrix omnium gratiarum'; cf. RGG^{3} IV, 769 and 1064. Cf. also W. Delius, Geschichte der Marienverehrung (Basle, 1963), esp. pp. 154, 160, 165, 259, 266 f. (Mittlerin), 258-320. Cf. also A. Brandenburg, Maria in der evangelischen Theologie der Gegenwart (Paderborn, 1966), pp. 71 ff. (The encroachment of paganism into the Christian sphere through Catholic theology?)

[3] Of course this does not mean that these institutional mediations may be treated as though they were static, material objects, without reference to persons and their expression in and through persons.

[4] cf. also K. Rahner, 'Personal and Sacramental Piety', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 109-133; also Kirche und Sakramente (Freiburg,^{2} 1963), pp. 11-67.

[5] An initial approach to institutional forms is given in K. Rahner, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 295-312; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 61-79.

[6] cf. DS 1583. For recent discussion concerning 'meritum' cf. A. Forster, LThK^{2} X, cols. 677-680; M. Flick and Z. Alszeghy, Il Vangelo della Grazia (Firenze, 1964), pp. 638-683 (literature); H. Küng, Justification (E.T. London 1964), pp. 257 ff.; P.-Y. Emery, Le Christ notre récompense (Neuchâtel, 1962). Most recently cf. O. H. Pesch O.P., 'Die Lehre vom "Verdienst" als Problem für Theologie und Verkündigung', Wahrheit und Verkündigung. Festschrift für M. Schmaus, ed. L. Scheffczyk/W. Dettloff/R. Heinzmann, Vol. II (Paderborn, 1967), pp. 1865-1907 (literature).

[7] For an introduction cf. K. Rahner, 'Some theses on prayer "in the name of the Church"', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 419-438; P. Molinari, Die Heiligen und ihre Verehrung (Freiburg, 1964); B. Kötting, 'Heiligenverehrung', Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe I (Munich, 1962), pp. 633-641 (literature); K. Rahner, 'Why and how can we venerate the Saints?', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

history's abiding validity before God.[8] Having thus narrowed our field, let us turn to our original theme. Catholic theology is reproached with having transgressed in a totally intolerable way against the dogma, verbally common to the whole of Christendom, of the sole and unique mediatorship of Jesus Christ:[9] we [171] call on the Saints; we defend and justify this practice itself, not merely commending 'veneration' of the Saints;[10] above all not only do we teach theoretically the function of Mary as 'mediatrix of grace', but make her into an actual mediatrix 'between' ourselves and Christ in a popular devotion of vast proportions. In this way, it is held, Christ is for us not the one who stands between us and God as sole Reconciler and Mediator, but he stands over against us on the side of God as the one with whom we have to be reconciled, so that we need the many mediators, the Saints and chiefly Mary, in order to bridge this gulf.

It cannot be my task here – although in itself it is the more important issue – to present the statements of authoritative doctrine and Catholic theology in its received form concerning this problem. Instead I shall just refer to a few passages in Denzinger, chiefly from the Council of Trent and Vatican II. There it is stated that Christ is the principle of salvation itself,[11] that all our boasting is in Christ,[12] that he is the source of merit in justification, which occurs without our deserving it, the sole source and mediator of all grace.[13] It is maintained that the invocation of the Saints does not prejudice the honour of the one Mediator.[14] Furthermore the Second Vatican Council declares[15] that when we ask for the help of the Saints, the benefits which come from God are obtained through the supplication of Christ, who alone is our Redeemer and Saviour. Concerning Mary the Constitution on the Church says[16] that Christ is our sole Mediator and that whatever significance Mary has for salvation, it does not obscure the sole mediatorship of Christ but is a free gift to Mary from God, springing from the wealth of the merits of Christ, grounded and [172] totally dependent upon his mediatorship, and drawing all its power from it.[17] Thus it by no means excludes a direct

---

[8] cf. the author's studies referred to in the last note. In addition: 'The life of the dead', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 347-354.

[9] In the New Testament the concept of the mediator appears relatively seldom. (Cf. Gal 3:19 f.; 1 Tim 2:5; Heb 8:6; 9:15; 12:24.) Cf. esp. A. Oepke, ThWNT IV, pp. 602-629, esp. 624 ff.; F. J. Schierse, 'Mittler', Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe II (Munich, 1963), pp. 169-172; O. Cullmann, Die Christologie des Neuen Testaments (Tübingen, 1957), pp. 88, 99 f.; C. Spicq, 'Mittlerschaft', Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch, ed. J. B. Bauer (Graz, 1959), pp. 563-573, also in II (Graz,[2] 1962), pp. 869-879; O. Michel, Brief an die Hebräer (Göttingen,[12] 1966), pp. 292 f., 468; O. Kuß, Der Brief an die Hebräer (Regensburg,[2] 1966), pp. 29, 32, 108, 112, 119, 146, 155, 214; F. J. Schierse, Verheißung und Heilsvollendung (Munich, 1955); H. Hegermann, 'Die Vorstellung vom Schöpfungsmittler im hellenistischen Judenturn und Urchristentum' = TU 82 (Berlin, 1961). For the use of the concept 'mediator' in dogmatics cf. esp. J. Ratzinger, 'Mittler', LThK[2] VII, pp. 499-502 (with more literature). Cf. also L. Thunberg, Microcosm and mediator (Maximus Confessor) (Lund, 1965). Also: M.-F. Lacan, 'Le Dieu unique et son Médiateur, Gal 3:20', L'homme devant Dieu. Mélanges offerts au Père Henri du Lubac (Lyon, 1963), Vol. I, pp. 113-125; N. Kehl, 'Der Christushymnus im Kolosserbrief. Eine motivgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu Kol. 1:12-20' = Stuttgarter Biblische Monographien 1 (Stuttgart 1967), pp. 99-108.

[10] Studies of the veneration of the Saints by Protestant theologians: M. Lackmann, Die Verehrung der Heiligen (Stuttgart, 1958); H. Asmussen, Maria, die Mutter Gottes (Stuttgart, 1950); P.-Y. Emery, 'L'unité des croyants au ciel et sur la terre. La communion des Saints et son expression dans la prière de l'Eglise', Verbum Caro 16 (1962), No. 63, pp. 1-24. Cf. also L. Höfer, 'Ökumenische Besinnung über die Heiligen' =Begegnung 1 (Lucerne, 1962).

[11] cf. DS 3915.

[12] cf. DS 1691.

[13] cf. DS 1523, 1526, 1529, 1530, 1560, 3370, 3820.

[14] cf. DS 1821.

[15] cf. the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Church Lumen gentium, No. 50.

[16] cf. ibid., No. 60.

[17] Ibid.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

union of Christ with the believer.[18] Consequently the various possible forms of mediation must never be thought of like a succeeding series of 'instances'. According to the Council, if Mary's function in salvation-history as one who has abiding validity before God leads to her being addressed in terms such as 'Advocate', 'Co-helper' and 'Mediatrix',[19] it is to be understood as neither taking away from nor adding anything to the rank and efficacy of Christ the sole Mediator.[20]

So we see that Vatican II by no means ascribes to Mary the title and function of a mediatrix in the strict theological sense, but rather takes the freer language of pious affection under its protection[21] when the latter [173] has recourse to the title 'Mediatrix'. For in using this title it is expressing the fact that in the economy of grace in Christ, as a result of and by virtue of his mediatorship, everyone depends on everyone else and is of significance for everyone else, that everyone has a task subordinate to Christ (munus subordinatum), and that the receipt of salvation also implies the receipt of the TASK of salvation, a 'participata ex unico fonte cooperatio'.[22] For this reason it is applicable above all to Mary, whose function belongs to the plane of solidarity in salvation which is true of all the redeemed, not to the plane of Christ's sole mediatorship.[23] These 'mediations'[24] exist, therefore, because justification is God's unmotivated gift, the act of freedom set free in Christ, and because this act of salvation in Christ by grace always implies a significance for everyone; salvation is not solipsistic.

In saying this it is only our intention to reveal a starting-point for the authoritative teaching of the Church and the more general theological doctrine concerning the many 'mediations'

---

[18] Ibid.; cf. O. Semmelroth's commentary on the numbers quoted in Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II (New York and London, 1967), Vol. I. R. Laurentin, 'La Vierge Marie au Concile', RSPhTh 48 (1964), pp. 32-46. Further literature in Laurentin, 'Bulletin Marial', RSPhTh 50 (1966), pp. 496-545.

[19] We cannot go into the history of the various titles and their application to Mary. Cf. H. M. Köster, 'Miterlöserschaft', LThK^{2} VII, cols. 486-487 (with comprehensive references). R. Laurentin gives references to the very important supplementary literature produced in recent years in the Bulletin just quoted. On this issue cf. esp. P. Sträter, Katholische Marienkunde (Paderborn, 1947 ff.) II, pp. 241-313; Heilsgeschichtliche Stellvertretung der Menschheit durch Maria, ed. C. Feckes (Paderborn, 1954); H. M. Köster, Unus mediator (Limburg, 1950), pp. 108-149, 171-183; H. Seiler, Corredemptrix (Rome, 1939), 'Die Lehre der Päpste Pius IX. bis Pius XI. über die Mitwirkung Mariens im Heilswerk und Auslegung dieser Lehre'; J. Bittremieux, De mediatione universali B.M.V. quoad gratias (Bruges, 1926); G. M. Roschini, La mediatrice universale (Rome, 1961); F. H. Schüth, Mediatrix (Innsbruck, 1925); R. Laurentin, Kurzer Traktat der Marianischen Theologie (Regensburg, 1959), pp. 76-116; W. Sebastian, De BMV universali gratiarum mediatrice (Rome, 1952): Franziskanertheologie 1600-1730; J. Ude, Ist Maria die Mittlerin aller Gnaden? (Bressanone, 1928), pp. 41-133. Also cf. the various studies in the collection Maria. Etudes sur la sainte Vierge, ed. Hubert du Manoir (Paris, 1949-1961). H. Lennerz, De beata virgine. Tractatus dogmaticus (Rome, 1957), pp. 197-230, 231-289. Cf. also the works quoted at the beginning of this essay by C. A. de Ridder, W. Delius, etc.

[20] The Constitution on the Church Lumen gentium, No. 62 (with the commentary by Semmelroth, loc. cit.).

[21] 1t must be borne in mind that the Church's commonly understood dogmatic terminology throughout history comprises very different literary genres. Besides the doxological, hymnic, catechetical, juridical and other styles, there is in dogmatic assertions the rather more speculative as well as the more devotional tone. One would have to show the respective justification of each of the various modes of expression. No doubt each one has its own particular danger. (A devotional mode of speech, for example, inevitably runs the risk of giving way to excessive emotion and vague enthusiasm, undisciplined dogmatism and pious exaggeration.) But all this would have to be demonstrated in detail to clarify the above statement. Cf. Lumen gentium, No. 62.

[22] Lumen gentium, No. 62. Cf. also on this issue A. Brandenburg, Maria in der evangelischen Theologie der Gegenwart (Paderborn, 1966), pp. 118-145, 146-154; M. Thurian, Maria (Mainz, 1965), pp. 233-237; K. Rahner, 'Zur konziliaren Mariologie', Stimmen der Zeit 174 (1964), pp. 87-101.

[23] For a correct basic principle in Mariology cf. K. Rahner, Maria, Mutter des Herrn (Freiburg,^{4} 1962), pp. 15-38; also 'Le principe fondamental de la théologie mariale', RSR 42 (1954), pp. 481-522.

[24] The existence of the thing itself cannot be assessed simply according to the verbal occurrence of terms like 'mediator', etc. In the New Testament even the mediating function of Christ himself is expressed in very diverse ways. Cf. ThWNT IV, pp. 624 ff. and LThK^{2} VII, cols. 498-499. The same is the case in dogmatics with the titles accorded to Mary. A comprehensive example of what is intended in exegesis is provided in W. Thusing, 'Per Christum in Deum' = Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen NF 1 (Münster, 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and their relationship with the single, radically unique mediatorship of Christ. We cannot discuss and defend the further development and the details of the doctrine itself at this point. It is our intention rather to proceed in the opposite direction: we wish to conceive these 'mediations' not as dependent subordinate modes of participation in the unique mediatorship of Christ, but, reversing the process, we shall try to understand the mediatorship of Christ as the eschatologically perfect and consequently the highest, the unique 'case'[25] [174] of human intercommunication before God and of the solidarity in salvation of all men.[26] This also makes it clear right from the very beginning that Christ's unique mediatorship does not suspend this saving intercommunication and solidarity, but perfects it, since the latter is both the necessary precondition for Christ's mediatorship, and also its effect.[27]

II

We shall therefore put forward the following thesis: the condition required for the possibility of the saving mediatorship of Christ and its personal realisation in faith is the intercommunication of all men right down to the ultimate depths of their existence, to their very salvation, and the concrete and existential 'realisation' and experience of this radical intercommunication. This intercommunication is part and parcel of man's concrete being[28] and is therefore a constant. The experience of it (whether accepted or rejected) is the precondition without which such a thing as the mediatorship of Christ could neither be understood at all nor held to be credible.

Here it is unnecessary to engage in a lengthy explanation of how, for a distinctly Catholic theological anthropology, this saving intercommunication and solidarity, as a factor in the constitution of man's concrete being, contains a 'natural' and a charismatic/pneumatic element. Both precede the individual's decision for or against salvation as its condition and perspective, contributing to making the decision possible and determining it in such a way that, in spite of its transcendental character as a condition of Christ's mediatorship, it can be understood as a condition which the Christ-event itself actively presupposes for its own actualisation. In this way it does not prejudice the majesty and independence of Christ's mediatorship.[29]

We shall now endeavour to elucidate and substantiate the proposed thesis piece by piece. Naturally we cannot do this here by referring in [175] detail to the sources of theology, Scripture, Tradition and their expression in authoritative Church pronouncements. We shall give a plain account in the hope that the listener will himself gather what is being referred to or will supply his own illustrations.

It must first be said by way of introduction that even in a context of theological controversy it is no longer permissible, in discussing a theme such as this, to treat the idea of Christ's mediatorship as if it were unquestioningly accepted. It is by no means self-evident just what

---

[25] Apart from the author's larger studies on the theology of the Incarnation cf. the small sketch 'I believe in Jesus Christ' in this volume, and the preliminary plan for a speculative doctrine of the Trinity in Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 317-401.

[26] Not only providing a way to a deeper understanding, but also taking up a whole range of essential Old and New Testament motifs. Cf. J. Scharbert, 'Die Rettung der "Vielen" durch die "Wenigen" im AT', Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 68 (1959), pp. 146-161; also Heilsmittler im AT und im alten Orient (Freiburg, 1964) (with literature).

[27] On the fundamental legitimacy of this view cf. the author's essay 'Theology and Anthropology' in this volume.

[28] For a few observations on this cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 31 ff.

[29] cf. H. Küng, Justification (E.T. London 1964); and K. Rahner, Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 189 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this concept means or can mean, nor how it can be believed seriously today in this age of 'demythologising'. It is not as if we only had to ask whether this 'mediation' – as something self-evident both in its meaning and in actual existence – permits of another kind of mediation 'beside' or 'beneath' itself. For what does it mean to say that Jesus has redeemed us by his blood? How can we think of a reconciliation with God at all? How can the forgiveness of our radical sinfulness be conceived in any other way than as the pure act of God alone? Precisely what does one mean by saying that this very act of God alone, of which he is the sole subject and the unconditioned origin, has happened in Christ, has come to light in Christ and nowhere else, and is addressed to us in him? How can Jesus do more than give us courage to believe in the forgiving love of God, which exists but is not effected by him? What is a mediator, if he is constituted in the same way as those to whom he mediates? How can this mediatorship be conceived if it is to be valid also for mankind before and outside the compass of the preaching of the Gospel of the death of Jesus? When applied to our relationship with God, are not words like 'blood', 'sacrifice', 'propitiation', 'God's anger', 'Atonement' etc., verbal relics of a mythological age? Do we know what they really mean for us? Above all we are faced with this question: what is the transcendental horizon of understanding, and thus the hermeneutical principle, which will lead to an understanding of the mediatorship of Christ which can be protected from misconceptions? What and where is the unavoidable existential experience within the perspective of which we can really encounter the unique historical fact of the redeeming death of Jesus and find it credible?

There must be such a horizon of understanding, and nowadays it must no longer exercise its influence hidden from reflection; it must be especially and explicitly shown. This may be dangerous, because if it is interpreted falsely or incompletely, the wrong hermeneutical principle will also corrupt the reality and its expression which was to be rendered intelligible by reference to this horizon. It may be that the hermeneutical circle, [176] embracing both the horizon of understanding and what is to be understood, in which each must clarify the other in a mutual exchange, and which itself has a history, cannot be broken. But all the same we must ask this question: Where can the experience of a horizon of understanding be found within which the message of Christ's mediatorship can 'strike home' at all? On its own, the experience of man's unavoidable guilt does not provide this horizon. Lostness does not itself automatically give rise to a rescue, let alone lead one to understand how such a rescue is conceivable.

III

This horizon of understanding is man's experienced, intercommunicative existence, which is always committed to us for us to accept or reject freely. It is ultimately a matter of no significance to what extent we succeed in reaching an adequate reflex interpretation of this intercommunicative existence. It is there and it is constantly experienced, whether it is interpreted well or ill, according to pre-philosophical or pre-theological categories or according to existential ontology or theology. Nor does it matter ultimately whether this experienced, intercommunicative existence is explicitly recognised in its express relation to the question of salvation or not. For this intercommunicative existence is experienced as being unlimited: the experience would automatically cease if it were thought of as limited to a particular area of human existence, e.g. to the biological or political area, or the private area of a love which excludes others. Intercommunication in all its tenaciousness, according to which the other person is necessarily always present, sustaining and making demands upon me, would be a mere surface appearance if I could withdraw to a region where I was simply alone, where no-one could follow me or was necessary for me any longer, and where there was no-one for whom I was partly responsible. If, therefore, the question of salvation is an unavoidable element of human existence, intercommunication is also a factor of existence, whether for or against salvation. Here too no-one is alone; each one supports every other person, in the matter of salvation everyone is responsible and significant for everyone else. The commandment to love one's neighbour[30] was not given to make our social or private lives bearable or agreeable, but to proclaim everyone's concern in everyone [177] else's possibility of salvation.[31] It goes without saying that concepts like 'people (of God)' in salvation-history,[32] 'covenant',[33] 'Body of Christ',[34] 'Prayer for one another'[35] etc., presuppose this kind of intercommunicative existence. The reality and experience of this intercommunicative existence which is so important for salvation is made concrete in the absolute quality and unfathomable depths of the love of one's neighbour, in the puzzling experience that in the fate of any individual we are confronted and put face to face with the fate of all human kind, and that this experience cannot be explained away rationalistically as abstraction, induction or the seeing of all 'cases' in a single 'case'.[36] Everyone is aware of this in the experience of his being weighed down by a guilt which is not merely his own, in the experience of his own historicity. This historicity is on the one hand a co-determinant of the most ultimate aspects of one's own existence, and on the other hand it is itself partially the result of the historical decisions of other people. But one cannot draw a boundary between these two, between the passive and active effects of others.[37]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[178] It is impossible here to give a detailed account of how this intercommunicative existence always takes place before God, coming from him and proceeding towards him, however unconsciously and anonymously.[38] It would be of fundamental importance, however, for what follows. The experience of being-in-reference-to the absolute mystery we call God and the experience of intercommunication mutually determine each other, because the world, which, according to Catholic teaching, can lead to a recognition of God, is not only a world of things but the world to which self-experiencing man belongs: within himself and his intercommunication he recognises God. Consequently a closer knowledge of God's relationship to the world, together with the history of this relationship, are partial constituents

---

[30] cf. K. Rahner, 'The "commandment" of love in relation to the other commandments', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 439-459; 'Reflections on the unity of the love of neighbour and the love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

[31] cf. also the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 31 f., 271 ff. (with literature).

[32] cf. N. A. Dahl, Das Volk Gottes (Darmstadt,[2] 1963); H. J. Kraus, Volk Gottes im AT (Zürich, 1958); F. Mußner, 'Volk Gottes im NT', Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 72 (1963), pp. 169-178.

[33] The fact that the covenant is made between unequals rather than equals does not contradict this principle. The structure of intercommunication must not be thought of as having a homogeneous and even surface. Cf. Kl. Baltzer, 'Das Bundesformular' = WMANT 4 (Neukirchen, 1960); D. J. McCarthy, 'Treaty and Covenant' = An Bibl 21 (Rome, 1963); also his 'Der Gottesbund im AT' = SBB 13 (Stuttgart, 1960); J. l'Hour, 'Die Ethik der Bundestradition im AT'= SBB 14 (Stuttgart, 1967).

[34] E. Käsemann drew attention very early to the collective structure of this concept, and maintains this biblical view of intercommunicative existence against all tendencies to individualism. Cf. E. Käsemann, 'Leib und Leib Christi' = BHTh 9 (Tübingen, 1933); and now E. Güttgemanns' study, 'Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr' = FRLANT 90 (Göttingen, 1966), pp. 199 ff., 206 ff.

[35] cf. note 7 above, including the author's studies.

[36] Thus it becomes once more apparent that the concept of neighbourly love to which we refer must not be understood in an introverted and 'private' sense, but, in an original sense, gains 'political' dimensions. Cf. on this aspect J. B. Metz, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz, 1968).

[37] cf. in the first place K. Rahner, 'Ursprünge der Freiheit', M. Horkheimer/K. Rahner/C. F. v. Weizsäcker, Über die Freiheit (Stuttgart,[2] 1965), pp. 29-49, esp. 34 ff.; also 'Der Friede Gottes und der Friede der Welt', Der Streit um den Frieden, ed. R. Schmid/W. Beck (Munich-Mainz, 1967), now also in this volume; also 'The theology of power', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 391-409.

[38] A discussion of principles in K. Rahner, 'The concept of mystery in Catholic theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of a closer understanding of man's intercommunicative existence. God himself initiates an absolute intercommunication between himself and man, i.e. in absolute self-communication – which we call 'grace' – giving himself in a direct partnership and intimacy, and not only showing himself to be the radically unapproachable Distant One, separating himself from the creature, the 'other'; to this extent (and only thus) we have the possibility of a radically serious, ultimate and secure interpersonal communication. (The mere formal concept of intercommunication cannot, of course, provide such a full content on its own.) But the reverse is also true: wherever this intercommunication is set free, accepted and experienced in its unlimited, unconditional and dynamic nature, there is – at least anonymously – the experience of the relationship of grace between God and man, springing from God's free self-communication. Man is loved in God, and God in man.[39] Where interpersonal communication reaches the ultimate possibility of its actual being (secretly supplied by and through God himself), it is already a meeting with God (whether this is acknowledged expressly or not),[40] since it is itself founded on God's self-communication.[41]

This union of men in an intercommunicative existence, which exhibits the most varied elements – although we cannot discuss them here (the [179] physical unity of the cosmos, the space-time unity; biological unity; intercommunication in the unity of a single history of truth and love, untruth and hate; the unity of rootedness in God, etc.) – itself has a history which is of relevance for salvation. It is a history in which the intercommunications sustaining it and taking place within it are never simply the same ones: each instance is unique, since this history of intercommunications is not built up out of equal atoms, but is shaped by persons who are unique at any one time. Furthermore, this history is a one-way history, and is proceeding towards a goal.

IV

When this history of human intercommunication and of the relationship between God and mankind together in one reach their eschatological meridian,[42] i.e. when the occurrence of the offer and the acceptance – both given quite freely – of the divine self-communication in God's Pneuma[43] becomes irreversible and appears historically as such for the believer, we have what Christian Dogmatics calls 'Incarnation', the death and resurrection of the divine Logos.[44] Naturally we have no time here to give a more thorough justification for this assertion.[45] We shall only draw out its implications for our particular theme.

If it is correct, it follows that the Father's Word made flesh is the Mediator of God's self-communication (which is also always a forgiving communication) in so far as he is the [39] Details in K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the unity of the love of neighbour and the love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249; also Glaube, der die Erde liebt (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 83-99; note 31 above.

[40] cf. K. Rahner, 'Anonymous Christians', Theological Investigations VI, pp. 390-398 (with further literature).
[41] In scholastic terms, because, as a theological virtue, the infused virtue of 'caritas' is a strict unity of the love of God and the love of one's neighbour. For further theological clarification cf. the essays referred to in note 30 above.
[42] cf. K. Rahner, 'Christianity and the "new man"', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 135-153; also 'Christology within an evolutionary view of the world', op. cit., pp. 157-192; also A. Darlap, Mysterium Salutis I, ed. J. Feiner/M. Löhrer (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 99 ff., 59 ff., 147 ff.
[43] cf. the more precise treatment in the author's attempt at a speculative doctrine of the Trinity, Mysterium Salutis II (Einsiedeln, 1967), pp. 317-401.
[44] Besides the essays referred to in notes 25, 27 and 42 above, cf. also K. Rahner, 'On the theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120; also 'Current problems in Christology', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 149-200.
[45] Esp. the essay referred to in note 27.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

eschaton of the history of this self-communication. History hangs upon its own future and is mediated by it, i.e. it is as it happens throughout its whole course, and it takes place in reference to its fulness and its victorious end. Consequently it is in this sense that the Word made flesh is the Mediator of God's self-communication and, within this, of the ultimate, radical depth of human intercommunication as well. We may understand his function [180] as Mediator in this way – or rather, we must do so – for the following reasons:

1. 'Grace', 'faith', 'Spirit', 'justification' were effectual even before Christ and took place throughout the whole length and breadth of history, even where there was no explicit preaching of the Gospel.[46]

2. All salvation occurs intuitu meritorum Christi.[47]

3. It is not the Christ-event which provides the foundation for God's will for our salvation, i.e. God's desire, effectual throughout the whole of history, to communicate himself;[48] the Christ-event is itself the 'effect' of the latter. Because God loves the world, he sent his Son.[49]

Christ's mediatorship can be said to 'effect' God's will for salvation in respect of an individual in so far as the highest and ultimate factor in any action must always be called its 'reason', in so far as the history of God's self-communication has become irreversible in this individual and has thus appeared historically as eschatologically victorious, and in so far as every individual person is seen as a member of mankind, to whom God's self-communication is addressed. Seen as a unity, the whole of this history of the salvation of mankind is the object, the goal and the 'reason' for the divine desire for salvation – if such a word may be used, bearing in mind God's sovereignty.[50] All factors of this salvation-history are, as such, factors of a single history willed by God in the decision to empty himself in self-communication, and they are all therefore mutually conditioning. But this mutual conditioning relationship itself has a structure, so we both can and must say that, in a unique sense, the highest and ultimate factor of this single totality, willed by God, determines and sustains everything else.

V

From this standpoint it ought to be possible to understand the relationship of Christ's mediatorship to those intercommunications which are [181] also of relevance for man's salvation and which thus signify as many mediations of salvation.

If what has been said so far is correct and has been understood properly, we can make the following assertions:

1. Wherever salvation occurs in the individual's salvation-history, it also mediates salvation for all others. For a salvation-event of this kind, whether expressly or not, is in addition necessarily always involved in intercommunication: i.e. it is the love of one's neighbour, it is an event within the single totality of all salvation-history whatsoever, an event willed and effected by God, finding its context and its goal in this totality. Consequently these mediations are essential constituents of salvation-history. Every person who abides in [46] For details cf. K. Rahner, 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 253-286; in this volume, 'Atheism and implicit Christianity'.

[47] cf. DS 1523, 1530, 1529, 1560, etc.
[48] cf. K. Rahner, 'Heilswille Gottes, allgemeiner', Sacramentum mundi II. International theological lexicon (Herder, 1968 ff.); also 'History of the world and salvation-history', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 97-114; also pp. 115-134, and the studies referred to in notes 25 and 42 above.
[49] cf. John 3:16 and I John 4:9 f., and R. Schnackenburg's commentary in The Gospel according to St John I (trans. Kevin Smyth, London and New York, 1968), pp. 398 ff.
[50] Further remarks in the essays referred to in note 48.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith and love is in this relationship because of all the other people, since each person is intended by God to be an 'element' – even though a unique and irreplaceable element – of the single salvation-history, and since God's Pneuma, imparted to us and forming the context and history in which salvation takes place, both presupposes human intercommunication and makes it more radical. According to Catholic teaching it is therefore obvious that mediations of this kind are not only the function of particular 'Saints';[51] they are effected by all faithful and justified people. Similarly, too, these mediations are not extraordinary, special functions of all believers, but they are identical with the latter's realisation of salvation which is always present, ultimately secure and perfected, before God and is sustained by his gracious will, which desires the single, total salvation-history and also the salvation-history of each one of its 'elements' as such. Since these mediations depend on, and actually are intercommunications, what has been said by no means excludes, but rather implies, the fact that these mediations can also become present to consciousness, indeed, that they should become so to some degree, thus taking the form, for instance, of explicit intercession and requests for intercession.

2. Since the world is the one world to which God communicates himself in his Pneuma; since in this world each person is present as he is for everyone else and because of everyone else; and since this world with its salvation-history is a real history, which is proceeding towards its goal and constantly lives in dependence on its goal; this world of intercommunication, as history, has one apogee and only one goal: this is Jesus Christ, who, [182] as the God-given apogee of this history, is its sole and absolute Mediator. Far from excluding the saving, intercommunicative character of the world's salvation-history, it implies it. All intercommunicative mediations of salvation are dependent upon their single goal and their eschatological consummation in Christ, but for that very reason they actually exist; they are not merely secondary, ultimately superfluous consequences of Christ's mediatorship; they are the very preconditions which Christ's mediatorship creates for itself. In other words they constitute the conditions for the possibility of such mediatorship, conditions provided, of course, by God's sovereign grace itself in and through its will towards Jesus Christ – just as, conversely, Jesus Christ is willed 'for us men and for our Salvation'.

VI

In order to do justice to what has been said, two further things must be mentioned.

1. If Jesus Christ is not to become an abstract idea, a Christ-principle, and hence a mythological figure unworthy of belief, then this concrete, historical Jesus of Nazareth must be capable of being loved; he must not be merely another word for the incalculable sovereignty of the grace of the transcendent God. But how am I to accept and really love him as a concrete man (not merely accepting a theoretical truth about him) and how can this love of this particular concrete man be my salvation, if I am unable to love and be loved by other men, with whom I am in close, concrete proximity, in a mutual love (naturally in God's Pneuma and in relation to God) which is not only commanded but is actually salvation itself? I admit this quite openly: if I sometimes feel shocked by the overwhelming sort of Marian devotion in which a pious Catholic rushes to Mary's bosom, loves her, entreats and importunes her in utter confidence, as if nothing in religion were so important, then I ask [51] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church of the Saints', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 91-104; also, 'Why and how can we venerate the Saints?', Theological Investigations VIII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3-23; and 'All Saints', ibid., pp. 24-29.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

myself in self-criticism whether it only shocks me because I myself am incapable of realising in a total and unselfconscious way this legitimate concrete form of human intercommunication which belongs to a living Christianity. For after all, my embracing of salvation in faith and love refers to Jesus (and not to an abstract idea of Christ), a Jesus who is at the same time the Crucified and the Jesus of Nazareth who stands 'at the right hand of God' (Acts 7:56), and who now lives in God as the concrete Man.[52] But if this is the case, how could I regard [183] as reprehensible this direct, trusting love towards another person in God's glory.[53]

2. How, in an age of socialism, which by no means must be impersonal, or in the face of the Indian concept of the God-manhood of humanity as such, can the uniqueness of Christ's mediatorship be credibly proclaimed, unless one understands this uniqueness as that which gives the interdependence-in-salvation of all men its eschatological guarantee, its victory, its historical form and manifestation? How can this be done if it is only understood as the individualistic relationship of each person to the one Christ, as if each person in his own individual process of salvation could have nothing to do with anyone else?

Certainly, the Gospel says a hard 'No' to false self-interpretations on man's part, and makes it our duty to say no in such cases. But all the same this is only permitted when man's interpretations have the effect of closing everything down rather than opening up possibilities. But which case is it – 'opening up' or 'closing down'? – if we say that for man's salvation he needs to live in that single love of the Pneuma which joins all men together and hence makes each man of saving importance for each other man, provided that it is understood in faith that this single body of love has found its unique, victorious, eschatological consummation in Jesus Christ? This is an action of opening up, not closing down. Or should the members of the Body of Christ all be solely concerned with the Head of the Body and have nothing to do with each other? At least, not so far as their relationship with Christ, their salvation, is concerned? It is undoubtedly clear that all 'mediation' is a mediation to the end of immediacy, and not a 'medial' something which is inserted between and thus keeps separate the objects of mediation. And in a formally similar manner it applies also to the mediation of Christ's manhood to God and the mediations on the part of one justified person for another in relation both to Christ and God. If the man Jesus' mediation to God does not destroy God's immediacy but actually constitutes it as such, it cannot be held that any 'mediation' to Jesus Christ, even at the level of concepts, straightway eliminates the possibility of a relation of immediacy with him.

I am far from thinking that everything necessary has now been said on this issue. For supplementary material I refer to the studies already mentioned concerning the unity of the love of God and the love of one's neighbour, and the veneration of the Saints. One ought also to go into the [184] many existential difficulties which man finds nowadays in respect of the veneration of the Saints, bearing in mind that nowadays these difficulties apply equally to the mediatorship of Christ. My sole intention was to say this: the saving intercommunication of all (justified) men is the existential ontological precondition for the mediatorship of Christ. The existential experience of this intercommunication is the perspective within which the experience, in faith, of Christ's mediatorship is alone possible; and the converse of this affirmation is also true. This saving intercommunication has its own history and achieves its victorious, eschatological consummation and its historical appearance (conquering unbelief –

[52] cf. K. Rahner, 'The eternal significance of the humanity of Jesus for our relationship with God', Theological Investigations III, pp. 35-46.

[53] However much the concrete practice of the veneration of the Saints becomes clouded over and succumbs to wrong tendencies, the fact cannot be obscured that this theological foundation is thoroughly legitimate and does not contradict the spirit of the New Testament. In their indignance at abuses, however, people have often eliminated what is essential as well.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even the disbelief in this very intercommunication) in Jesus Christ who, as the eschatological meridian of this history, sustains it and is thus in this sense the sole Mediator. What in Catholic terms we call the mediations of the Saints is essentially nothing other than this saving intercommunication of everyone with everyone else. It can be further differentiated, in so far as we know in faith something of the particular function in salvation-history of a particular person, the Blessed Virgin for instance. But such differentiation changes nothing as far as its essence is concerned.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[185]

PART THREE

Theological Anthropology

[187]

12

CHRISTIAN HUMANISM[1]

Perhaps a question-mark ought to be put after this title, for as it stands it leads one to expect that a theologian is going to clarify and give reasons as to how Christianity and humanism form a unity, how humanism, when it is genuine, full-blooded and is really being itself, is actually Christianity. But the question which needs to be answered before making such a proud affirmation is so difficult, and has so many levels, that it seems to be more appropriate to present the thoughts of a Christian theologian who is asking himself, first of all, what the relationship is which exists between Christianity and humanism. In the first place it is no simple matter to say what Christianity or humanism really are. Consequently their relationship with one another is not so easy to define either. Even if one takes for granted ecclesial Christianity's understanding of itself with its authoritative theological affirmations, this very understanding can be still interpreted in many different ways, and depending on the particular interpretation one can arrive at very different definitions of the relationship between Christianity and humanism. Christian anthropology itself makes so many and such opposite assertions about man that, even if they are not interpreted as logical contradictions, they put such heavy demands on any particular man's actual ability to reconstruct a 'realisation' of these assertions, that in actual fact there are greatly differing interpretations of man even within Church orthodoxy, and consequently greatly differing attitudes to humanism. Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Pascal, Teilhard de Chardin – all of them Christians – have very different Christian ideas of man and thus of humanism. And what of the very concept of humanism itself! Nowadays everyone wants to be a humanist. And at the same time there is less agreement than ever as to what a man really is.

[188]

I

Initially it seems quite easy for a Christian theologian to answer this question. He knows about man, he knows about God, and he knows about the God-man. And thus he confesses an absolute humanism. He can say that no-one can take man more seriously than the Christian. And he can say (which no pre-Christian or non-Christian religion and no modern ideology would actually dare to do) that Christianity acknowledges an absolute meaning and validity in every concrete human being and forbids anyone to try to escape into the void of the mere perishable and perishing world of time, laying upon him the task of believing that no-one can escape himself or be rid of himself, and that it is good to have to retain his own self. The theologian is aware that this inescapable responsibility for oneself, which Christianity proclaims, must take the shape of self-forgetfulness in the love of one's fellows, or else it

[1] For the origin, purpose and the limits of this paper cf. the list of sources at the end of this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

becomes the hell of one's own egoistic isolation. This love of one's neighbour must be so radical and absolute, and must overcome subjectivity itself (as the possession of oneself) in its very essence to such an extent that it is henceforth only possible as something which happens, which comes to us from an absolute origin which is not ourselves, but which rather sends this love of our neighbour to us as its own love. In this way there exists an original and ultimate unity of the love of God and of one's neighbour,[2] whether explicit or unconscious, so that the love of one's neighbour is only sufficiently radical when it is an expression of the love of God, and the love of God only occurs (and man only knows who God is) when man loves his neighbour.

The theologian is aware that – if man is essentially a 'political' being[3] – this love of one's neighbour must not be the mere inclination of the affections or private intercommunication, which can be the most sublime form of egoism precisely because it can be so intimate and bring such happiness, but must become the sober service of 'political' love as well, whose concern is the whole of mankind, turning the most distant person into the nearest neighbour and having occasion to hold the nearest person sternly at a distance.

[189] The theologian is aware that Christianity is Jesus Christ, i.e. that a man can be loved who, himself the servant of all and only genuinely loved as such, is God's own destiny, with the result that for all eternity Christianity can possess no theology which is not at the same time anthropology, the two uncompounded and inseparable.[4] Furthermore the theologian will demonstrate how, in this same Jesus Christ, the unity of the love of God and the love of one's neighbour, the presence of God and his love within man and in the love towards men, is eternally secured.

The theologian is aware that, since the necessary setting for the individual's salvation is the Church as the unity of mankind and its history theology must always be 'political' theology. He is aware that he may only look at the salvation of an individual as one which is not achieved fully except within the absolute future of the whole of mankind, as the ultimate result of the love of all the others in the absoluteness of God. In other words, the salvation of an individual soul does not consist in escaping from the history of humanity but in entering into the latter's absolute future,[5] which we call the 'kingdom of God'.[6]

The theologian is aware that, according to Christianity, salvation is achieved not only within the explicitly religious sphere but in all dimensions of human existence, i.e. even where man does not interpret his actions in a consciously religious way,[7] but where he loves in an absolutely responsible manner, serves his fellow-man selflessly and willingly accepts the incomprehensible nature and the disappointments of his existence, hoping ultimately to embrace its as yet unrevealed meaningfulness.

---

[2] cf. K. Rahner, 'The "commandment" of love in relation to the other commandments', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 439-459; 'Reflections on the unity of the love of neighbour and the love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 231-249.

[3] cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie. Praktische Theologie der Kirche in ihrer Gegenwart, ed. F. X. Arnold, K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L. M. Weber (Freiburg, 1966), Vol. II/1, pp. 31 f.; J. B. Metz, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz, 1968).

[4] cf. further K. Rahner, 'On the theology of the Incarnation', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 105-120; in this volume: 'Theology and Anthropology'.

[5] For this concept cf. K. Rahner, 'Marxist utopia and the Christian future of man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 59-68.

[6] For the biblical significance of this Christian fundamental category cf. R. Schnackenburg, Gottes Herrschaft und Reich (Freiburg,[4] 1965); H. U. v. Balthasar, 'Zuerst Gottes Reich' = Theologische Meditationen 13 (Einsiedeln, 1966).

[7] K. Rahner, 'Anonymous Christians', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 390-398 (literature).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus he is aware that in this sense the whole of the human sphere is religious and the whole of the religious sphere is humane.

The theologian is aware that, if one assumes the power of sin, man's multifarious development not merely reveals 'friction phenomena' but is continually threatened by the absurdity of real sinfulness which we cannot ourselves eradicate;[8] from the example of the man who struggles and dies [190] on the cross Christianity knows that the most ultimate and radical love of others in God implies this very fate: one only passes from death to life by loving the other person; and in loving him one knows that it is only with God's help that one can avoid withholding oneself ultimately from the other person, that one must carry on loving, right to the very end of a pointless death.

II

So far so good. The theologian can be convinced that there is a Christian 'humanism' in the preliminary sense just mentioned: Christianity proclaims a genuine and radical 'humanism'; what it acknowledges concerning God, Christ, freedom, responsibility and judgment is not an arbitrary or superfluous superstructure of theology[9] or even a venom manufactured by man for his practical defence, but the ultimate and radical form of man's dignity, because the Christian message affirms man himself as really absolute and yet does not show itself unworthy of belief in the face of the brutal experience that man is a wretched animal and a merely ridiculous episode in natural history, such that it is in the end of no consequence what the individual does or what becomes of everyone.

The theologian can declare that he really does not see how, in the absence of this 'ideological' factor of the conviction of the absolute dignity of man and of humanity,[10] the actual course of the history of mankind, in which the latter reaches out in hope towards its future, is at all conceivable. He will declare, therefore, that anyone who is convinced of the irresistible nature of the process implicitly experiences and proclaims, in his own actions, this apparently 'ideological' factor as the innermost truth and reality of this world; that in other words he by no means understands it as a superfluous or harmful 'ideology'.

Furthermore the theologian could ask the non-Christian whether he would be able to maintain that a Christianity understood in this way is not a humanism. He could ask him whether he ought not to be glad that Christians endeavour to be human in this way, even if it is his own opinion that much of this Christianity is ideology or mythology, which it uses to interpret, clarify and render effective its humanism.

He might ask the non-Christian whether he knows of a more radical [191] humanism: whether, comparing theory with theory and not unfairly comparing humanist theory with the miserable practice of Christians, he is certain that his humanism is better practically, i.e. more effective. He could ask his liberal and enlightened brother whether even today he still regards him with suspicion as a clerical suppressor of the freedom of conscience and as a defender of the Church's positions of power in society, or whether it would not be better if the Christian and the 'liberal' were to work together so that the individual's personality and freedom are not smothered in the society of the future. The theologian could ask his Marxist brother where he sees the 'opium of the people', or 'for the people' in this Christian

[8] On this problem cf. K. Rahner, 'Guilt and its remission: the borderland between theology and psychotherapy', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 265-281.
[9] For the critique of ideology with reference to Christianity cf. K. Lehmann, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 109-180 (literature).
[10] A theological interpretation of these fundamental concepts is attempted in Theological Investigations II, pp. 235-263.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

humanism, and whether, for example, it is really necessary for a politically powerful Marxism to persecute this Christianity in order to free mankind from servitude and self-alienation. He could ask him whether the freedom of this Christianity could not be guaranteed, even if, for various good reasons, one had certain reservations about the liberalistic concept of freedom; whether it is not good for a society (lest it should degenerate into a tyranny) if a Christian humanism endeavours to rescue men too, and if – instead of wasting much time in theoretical dialectic – it is left rather to actual practice and the future to show which side has the greater love, where the ever-living sources of strength are which defend mankind, and which theory is confirmed by practice.[11]

III

So far it seems that, for the Christian theologian, all is well. But in reality he has only just begun to embark on a dialogue with himself. He invites the Christian and the non-Christian to listen to this process of self-questioning in the hope that both of them will be able to make it their own.

The first question the theologian asks himself is whether he really knows what and who man is. Of course, thinking within the tradition he has received, he will say that he is able to utter a great many ultimate, radical things about man, even God's revelation concerning man; and that there is nothing clearer, more certain, more sublime and more beneficial than this very same Christian anthropology[12] with its highly concrete, material content.

[192] On the other hand, drawing on the experience of the last hundred years, the Christian theologian will admit that in this age of a scientific anthropology, which no longer mythologises poetically and is no longer an exclusively theological discipline,[13] man has learned an immeasurable amount about himself which the Christian revelation has not taught him; and that for this very reason there already exists a humanism today (assuming that one does not look presumptuously upon this scientific anthropology as of no consequence from the human point of view). Nor can he interpret it as a self-awareness on man's part which was always present or which is itself a product of the message of Christianity. Hence it is doubtless true that theological anthropology finds itself in a totally new and threatening situation if, as is the case, it is placed side by side with a scientific anthropology which did not exist at the time when Christianity was alone in revealing and clarifying man's nature to himself. But all the same the theologian will still maintain that all the empirical, scientific anthropologies, which can only exist now in a permanent state of pluralism, can only bring man to himself whole and single provided that he hears the message of Christianity. Otherwise he necessarily cannot know what the totality of his variegated knowledge about [11] On the foundations and prospects of such a dialogue in theory and practice cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on dialogue within a pluralistic society', Theological Investigations VI, pp. 31-42.

[12] On the material content of a Christian anthropology of this kind cf. the remarks in LThK I (Freiburg,[2] 1957), cols. 604-627 (J. Schmid, A. Halder, K. Rahner).
[13] We cannot trace the development of this concept here. Cf. O. Marquard, 'Zur Geschichte des philosophischen Begriffs "Anthropologie" seit dem Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts', Collegium Philosophicum. Studien J. Ritter zum 60. Geburtstag (Basle, 1965), pp. 209-239 (literature); in addition the essays by L. Oeing-Hanhoff, N. Hinske, O. Marquard and O. Pöggeler, Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Aufriß einer philosophischen Anthropologie. Festschrift für M. Müller, ed. H. Rombach (Freiburg, 1966); H. Pleßner, 'Immer noch Philosophische Anthropologie', Zeugnisse. Th. W. Adorno zum 60. Geburtstag, ed. M. Horkheimer (Frankfurt, 1963), pp. 65-73; A. Gehlen, Anthropologische Forschung (Reinbek bei Hamburg, 1961).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself means, nor why this known totality is of such absolute significance,[14] the significance without which man's understanding of himself cannot be a humanism at all.

But all this does not answer the question which the theologian puts to himself, whether he himself really knows what man is. For what does his own anthropology really tell him about man? That he is the being who loses himself in God. Otherwise nothing. For only what is implied in this statement or can be said about man in this connection, is a genuinely theological affirmation of his anthropology. Any other statement about [193] man is only of theological significance provided that it can be referred back to this one, and provided that it is made clear (in whatever way, whether transcendentally or otherwise) that its denial would destroy man's being-in-reference-to God. But what does man know about himself in grasping this being-in-reference? What is there in this which he can apply to his theory and practice, if God is after all the ineffable, intractable Mystery? So long as it was thought possible to know something about God which constituted him as one quantity among others in the cosmos of extra-human realities[15] which mutually determine and explain each other, it was easy to believe that in saying that man is dependent on God, made 'after His image and likeness', one had made man intelligible for the purposes of his own gnosis and practice. But if in our knowing and acting, we are only aware of God as our origin (our 'whence?') and our future (our 'whither?'), i.e. simply as a pure mystery[16] which is not a 'constituent' of the world of men – because otherwise God is confused with an idolatrous hypostatisation of a particular dimension of man – what is the good of saying to a man that he belongs to God? Ought not one to be silent before this ineffable mystery which silently overwhelms our existence? Not because religion is banished to the individual's interior sphere as was thought by naïve, old-fashioned Liberalism, which had no concept of man as a 'political' being, but because man is always tempted to live in a state of aversion to this seemingly unbearable and intractable mystery, in order to be at least a man?[17] Must not one say, 'What we know about man, we know from him himself and not from God; for we only know about God from our knowledge of man'? This applies equally to revealed theology, for this too not only works with human concepts originating from beneath and not from above (as far as their ultimate matter is concerned, which in part determines their usage), but actually only tells man that this unfathomable mystery as such is permanently present in Jesus Christ and wishes to communicate itself to us absolutely in the 'Spirit', creating a relationship of absolute immediacy with the incomprehensible God. Is theology in this case [194] anything more than an anthropologia negativa, i.e. the experience that man continually loses track of himself in the uncomprehended and intractable mystery? And even if one emphasises that this anthropologia negativa does not turn God into a function of man but places man before the mystery which absolutely is, its being in no way dependent upon man but rather causing him to suffer the ultimate agony of his finitude, of what use is that to a humanism? Would not it still be the case that, in so far as they simply live, men live godlessly, i.e. secularly, and encounter God (whether he is named or unnamed) only in death? This is by no means an argument against theism. In the first place because man dies in any case and death is not an [14] Naturally these remarks depend ultimately on the particular concrete theological understanding of the relationship between nature and grace. Cf. Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore, 1961), pp. 297-317; Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 165-188.

[15] With respect to the preconditions for a relationship with God today cf. K. Rahner, 'The man of today and religion', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 3-20.

[16] cf. 'The concept of mystery in Catholic theology', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 36-73

[17] In this connection the following must be borne in mind: Does not this action of turning-away also imply the most radical turning-towards? Is not theologia negativa also a 'theology', an act which one must admit to oneself? How could such an act be avoided, since, in proclaiming that God is dead, one still presupposes him?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

event at the end of life but the event of life itself, assuming that man is not thought of as vegetating like a mere animal, unaware of what is happening.

IV

In any case, however, as a kind of reduction of 'present' existence, which is capable of being manipulated and enjoyed, into the mystery of God, theism implies the elimination of each and every particular, concrete humanism in so far as it claims to be an eternal, absolute quantity; theism relativises every concrete humanism. And since in fact humanism is not the affirmation of an abstract formal idea of 'man' but the affirmation of a particular, concrete, familiar, beloved and cherished mode of historical existence, Christian theism, by contrast, is the very denial of such a humanism as an absolute quantity. Naturally this does not mean that it forbids a humanism of this kind. On the contrary, a genuine negation as an act can only take place with reference to a concrete affirmation. One can only negate by positing something, not by refraining from doing so under the misconception that one can achieve a pure negation. In this way every man necessarily carries out his own humanism, i.e. his concrete understanding and actualisation of existence. But it is precisely the latter which comes under criticism when man, in being a theist, lets it be swept away into the intractable, nameless mystery of God.

This Christianity does not erect a particular concrete humanism but denies it an absolute value; Christianity accepts the experience of its own humanism as one which remains constantly questionable.

Of course one can call the very affirmation of the dignity and value of man, of the responsibility of man's freedom, his spiritual and social nature – 'humanism'. In this sense one can call Christianity Humanism, and hence it can enter into a dialogue with the other humanisms as to [195] whether the substance affirmed on one side is also affirmed on the other, how it is to be understood more precisely, and what it implies. But a dialogue of this sort concerning the formal, abstract aspects of a humanism will soon run aground: on both sides the understanding of this abstract existentiale itself is co-determined by the particular concrete humanism in relation to which one understands it, since one can never make an adequate concrete distinction between the horizon of understanding and what is understood within it. Hence the dialogue between the humanisms must consist, not in merely theoretical endeavours, but in their concrete confrontation, as the practical attempt to gain one's partner-in-dialogue for one's own concrete humanism, i.e. as (political) action, not pure theory.

This understanding of the humanist dialogue is most fundamentally appropriate for Christianity[18] if, on the one hand, it wishes to commend itself to others and if, on the other hand, it does not see itself as an abstract idea but as the absolute, concrete, historical fact of Jesus Christ and his Church – neither of which can be adequately theorised. As the fulness of the life of individual Christians and of their fellowship together, Christianity thus involves a concrete humanism, i.e. the historically given concrete humanity as it is lived out by Christians. To this extent, on the one hand, it seeks to win others to its concrete humanism, and on the other hand it is always ready, in the practical historical dialogue, to let its concrete humanism be subjected to radical change.[19] For Christianity as such – and this is the decisive point – cancels every concrete humanism by revealing its questionable nature before the incomprehensibility of God. Christianity's concretissimum, for which alone it stands, is Jesus [18] cf. the author's essay referred to in note 11 above, and also the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 102 ff., 254 ff., 265 ff.; II/2, pp. 168 ff.

[19] We draw attention to the fact that the Church itself needs dialogue intra muros; cf. the author's 'Concerning dialogue in the Church', in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christ, who, in accepting death and suffering for us (and in no other way) has created our relationship of immediacy before God, and the Church, which looks for the Kingdom which is yet to be fulfilled and which is not identical with the humanism we ourselves have produced or shall produce in the near future.[20] Christianity renders every concrete humanism contingent, i.e. dispensable in favour of another, future humanism, by situating every one within God's open future.[21] In its conviction of man's [196] freedom, rooted in and orientated towards God, Christianity opens up the permanent possibility of an inhuman 'humanism'. But in consequence the only humanism which is inhuman is one which denies man's dependence on and relation to the intractable and incomprehensible One, thus positing itself as absolute and refusing to allow its own nature to be called in question by possibly taking a new decision to embrace another future, materially determined by history, which realises in concrete form the will to accept God's absolute future.

To the extent that Christianity, as the acceptance of the inconceivable mystery we call God, forbids man to try to understand and manipulate himself with reference to himself alone, at one and the same time it both calls into question each concrete humanism and also opens the way to an ever new, future humanism with its intra-mundane categories; for one can only be ready to realise God's absolute future if one is open to future intra-mundane humanisms. In spite of different emphases at various times the Church has always refused to decide between these two attitudes, which appear as opposites in Tertullian[22] on the one hand and in Clement of Alexandria[23] on the other. In fact they both belong to the nature of Christianity: the Church holds each concrete humanism at a distance as being contingent, questionable, provisional in respect of the future, and even sinful; and yet at the same time obliges the Christian to decide in favour of a concrete humanism, since only thus can he actualise a really serious Christianity, i.e. his will, in faith and hope, for God's absolute future. When today the Church declares that Christianity is compatible with any culture[24] and is not bound to any particular one, e.g. 'europeanism' or its imperialist and colonialist export version, it acknowledges (by implication) that a pluralism of humanisms is legitimate. Evidently this acknowledgment cannot refer solely to those humanisms which already exist, especially as the latter are threatened with being submerged in an intermingled world civilisation, but must apply above [197] all to one or more (that is an open question) future humanisms. And it is to this (or these) that men must open themselves creatively in a free historical decision. Christianity commits itself to and authorises the continually new humanism of the future, which is not actually Christian as such itself. It does not sanction a particular concrete humanism. But Christianity pronounces judgment on any humanism which sets itself up as absolute and thus explicitly or implicitly tries to inhibit man's openness to further concrete history and hence to God's absolute future.

V

[20] On the limitations of any intramundane future planning cf. K. Rahner, 'Experiment Mensch', Die Frage nach dem Menschen (cf. note 13 above), pp. 45-69, esp. 62-68; in this volume: 'The experiment with man'.
[21] In this sense Christianity is capable of the most radical elimination of what is ideological in intramundane future utopias; cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 42 ff., 159 ff., 168 ff.
[22] cf. H. v. Campenhausen's short treatment in Lateinische Kirchenväter (Stuttgart, 1960), pp. 12-36; J. Klein, Tertullian, Christliches Bewußtsein und sittliche Forderungen (Düsseldorf, 1940).
[23] cf. F. Quatember, Die christliche Lebenshaltung des Klemens von Alexandrien (Würzburg, 1947); F. van der Grinten, Die natürliche und übernatürliche Begründung des Tugendlebens bei Clemens von Alexandrien (Bonn, 1949); W. Völker, Der wahre Gnostiker nach Klemens von Alexandrien (Berlin, 1952).
[24] cf. the statements of the Second Vatican Council: the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Nos. 9, 53-59, 62.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The theologian must consider a further factor if he intends to concern himself with the problem of a so-called 'Christian humanism'. It is contained in what we have said already, but we must emphasise it more particularly here. Christianity is the religion of the Cross. Whether one calls it 'death' or the radical 'change' of which Paul speaks, it is a fact that in a Christian humanism man (man, humanity, individual and collective history) is subject to the law of death, and the sign of a genuine humanism is a Man nailed to a Cross. What does this signify for a Christian understanding of humanism? If there is no life without death, if death itself is a mystery,[25] all humanism whatsoever becomes a very obscure question. For how can man understand himself if he cannot understand death? It would be a very dubious kind of humanism which tried to pass over this question. The person who says that death is only a question for an egoistic individualism[26] has already given an answer and thus recognised that there is a question, for he cannot make us believe that one day this 'egoism' will die out, removing the necessity for this particular answer. Is it at all possible for man to be weaned away from this question so that it never occurs again, without altogether abolishing the very humanism which maintains and defends the dignity of man? Then what does Christianity say if it does not wish to avoid this question? And what does this imply for our understanding of humanism?

First of all I would like to make a preliminary observation, even at the risk of seeming callous and brutal, and although I know only too well [198] that, as 'I' (though not as a Christian), I would not wish to be obliged to face up to what I shall now say. The Christian as such ought not to place such great importance on the death of an individual. Dying goes on everywhere, even in the brutal cases of children dying of starvation or people being strangled by cancer and so on. God evidently does not regard death as a scandal in the world which is his world, his creation, for which he is responsible. If one says that death is a phenomenon attributable to man's freely incurred guilt,[27] that is true, but it only begs the question, for in that case God must be held responsible for allowing this guilt to enter the world, since he could have stopped it from doing so without vitiating man's freedom. What I mean is merely this: Western humanism's high degree of embarrassed aversion to death[28] may well be very 'human'; to the extent that it encourages a certain sensitivity it may even be what is required of Christians as Christians here and now. But Christianity has not been issued with a straightforward and clear command to entertain this 'allergy' towards death at all times and in all places. If it is the case that Christianity in earlier times exhibited far less of this 'reverence for life' in home politics and war strategy, that the hectic Westerners who call themselves Christians in practice only act to a very limited extent in accordance with their theoretical death-allergy; and that wherever it wanted to seize the reins of power or actually succeeded in doing so, actual present-day Marxism calmly sacrificed, for the sake of the future, immense numbers of men, and not only in war, passively, but actively too, perhaps Christian, liberal and Marxist humanists ought to sit down and discuss soberly and honestly what value they really place on the death of the individual. Otherwise humanistic speeches about the dignity of human life will become degraded into propagandist party polemics. It is strange how quickly we acquire a good conscience when it is only our 'opponent' who must die. So the question is, what precisely is an honest humanism's attitude to death? But this is only mentioned here by the way.

---

[25] On the following remarks the author refers to his study: Zur Theologie des Todes (Freiburg,[5] 1965).

[26] This answer can be found today among those Marxists who have cut themselves loose from crude materialism or an objectivistic concept of dialectic, and who now admit once again questions concerning the meaning of life and death as such (e.g. L. Kolakowski, A. Schaff, M. Machovec, E. Bloch).

[27] Details in K. Rahner, Zur Theologie des Todes, pp. 33 ff., 43 ff.

[28] cf. E. Waugh's well-known satire, The Loved One, for example; also P. Berger's investigations (e.g. The Noise of Solemn Assemblies [New York, 1961]).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But what is the Christian view of death which is to be a co-determinant of a genuine humanism? In the first place death's plain, straightforward purpose is biologically to make room for more life, for other people. Not that this eliminates its questionable nature, as if it showed that the radical protest against death is unjustified. But initially it does make room for other people. And since it must be freely enacted by a person, death, even in its most primitive aspect as a biological phenomenon, has an inter-communicative [199] or 'political' character, i.e. it is possible for it to be a radical act of love towards the most remote neighbour. This is especially the case since in death one does not make room for this or that particular person, but for everyone.

However, in so far as humanism is actually and concretely man himself with his power freely to order the area of communal existence in his image and likeness, death, understood in this way and freely accepted, is also an act which relativises man's own concrete humanism; it liberates other men's future, which one constricts as long as one regards the whole sphere of history as occupied by oneself. If, therefore, the only genuine concrete humanism is the one which realises itself by keeping itself open to the open, unpreoccupied future of all men, death, the willingness to die, constitutes one of its internal factors. But if, as a future which man has to call into concrete existence, this open, unpreoccupied future only subsists in that absolute future which we call God, death and the will for this absolute future belong together. The man who dies willingly, i.e. letting perish what in experience he has possessed as his own (hence too his own humanism), and letting it perish without in the end protesting or denying its most inner and absolute validity, and without wishing to prescribe the way in which death is compatible with the absolute meaningfulness of the person; such a man simultaneously affirms God as the unprescribable absolute future, not created by him, and the right of other people to their own future. In other words he loves God and men in a radical act of accepting death. In this way the act of death becomes the radical act of the Christian vis-à-vis all humanism whatsoever: he relativises his own humanism and thus gives place to that of other men in a love which is selfless. So with regard to humanism too Christianity is in the right as the religion which faces the mystery of death.

In all this there are naturally many aspects of death which have not been made clear. But that is not our task at present.[29] Matters for further treatment would be the special quality of death as a result of human guilt,[30] death as the radical act of self-realisation on the part of a person in a state of radical suffering,[31] death as mystery,[32] death as participation in the death of Christ,[33] etc. Our only concern here has been to make it clear [200] that, as the acceptance of the death of Christ and as the prognosis of one's own death, Christianity at the same time both calls in question each particular humanism by anticipating God's absolute future in faith and love, and also, precisely because of this, opens the way for the successively new humanisms of the future.

VI

Whereas until now Christianity as such has appeared above all to criticise the current humanism in favour of a future one, it must be emphasised more than ever that, although it [29] cf. the author's Zur Theologie des Todes; also K. Rahner, 'On Christian dying', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 285-293.

[30] cf. note 27.
[31] cf. Zur Theologie des Todes, Part I; 'The passion and asceticism', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore, 1967), pp. 58-85.
[32] Zur Theologie des Todes, pp. 26 ff., 36 ff.
[33] Ibid., pp. 61 ff., 66 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation has no clear, definite and concrete humanism of its own, Christianity does not give the Christian an excuse for being indifferent to a concrete humanism of the future. Naturally it was not until the most recent times that it became clear that the Christian has a duty towards a concrete future; then it was discovered that man – mankind – actually had the physical possibility of actively planning, shaping and directing the future – not merely individually, but collectively – by self-manipulation[34] and actively modelling his environment.[35] And at that moment the material unity of mankind from the point of view of its origin and absolute destiny (of which Christianity has always been aware) became a material unity within a concrete future which is to be actively created.[36]

Consequently mankind has both the ability and the duty actively to create this kind of forward-looking humanism. And the Christian qua Christian must make use of this permanently secular[37] opportunity. It is not possible at this point to define precisely how Christianity sees the relationship between a secular future which not only can be, but must be, created, and the absolute future which is God in himself.[38] But if we consider the Christian doctrine of the unity of the love of God and the love of one's neighbour,[39] which applies to the area of concrete human existence and not merely to the sphere of private intercommunication; [201] if we bear it in mind that the real – not merely theoretical – act of opening oneself to God's absolute future can only be done by concretely anticipating the concrete future which is to be produced;[40] if we are clear that the emancipation of the secular world is not a process to which Christianity must of necessity become reconciled, but is itself an act of this very Christianity[41] arising from its understanding of God and the Incarnation of the Logos itself; then we are obliged to say that the creation of a humane future is not something optional for the Christian, but is the means by which he prepares himself, in actuality and not merely in theory, for God's absolute future.[42] If salvation itself – however much it must be accepted freely in a personal way – is a historically occurrent and a collective reality, i.e. a unifying thing and not highly individualistic, the actual mediation of this salvation cannot be solely a matter of the individual's inner life, but must itself be a historical and social quantity, service to one's 'neighbour', in whom all men are present.

Naturally the Christian knows that the love of his neighbour, of the other person, is only meaningful provided that this other person (and hence he himself too) has meaning and absolute significance. One cannot justify giving service to an empty and futile existence just because it is someone else's and not one's own. Therefore one can and must quite soberly take oneself seriously, in really loving the other person by service to him. But that does not alter the fact that it is only by loving other people that one enters into a right relationship with oneself. And if, in fact, it remains an eternally new question as to what it is that gives this other person a justified claim to be loved and recognised as important; if we cannot answer

---

[34] cf. note 20.
[35] cf. J. B. Metz, 'Die Zukunft des Glaubens in einer hominisierten Welt', J. B. Metz/J. Splett (ed.), Weltverständnis im Glauben (Mainz, 1965), pp. 45-62.
[36] Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 191 ff., 237 ff., 259 ff.
[37] For an analysis of the process of secularisation cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 222 ff., 234 ff., 267 ff.; II/2, pp. 35 ff., 208 ff., 239 ff. (literature), cf. also the essay 'Theological reflections on the phenomenon of secularisation', Theological Investigations X.
[38] Some remarks in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 33 f.; 'The experiment with man', in this volume, pp. 219 ff.; Theological Investigations VI, pp. 59-68.
[39] cf. Theological Investigations VI, pp. 231-249.
[40] On the necessity of this truth which only reveals itself in action cf. also the more recent studies by J. B. Metz, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz, 1968).
[41] cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 234 ff.; II/2, pp. 239-267.
[42] K. Rahner attempts to show that this perspective must be a part of the future Christian's piety: 'Christian living formerly and today', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 3-24.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the question by referring to a creative love in the lover which makes the loved person worthy (for in this case the other person would be an invention of one's own); we must say that, for the Christian this embarrassment only constitutes the necessary spur to go on to grasp the mystery of God as the other person's true reality, rendering him worthy of love and revealing this love itself as incomprehensible. Thus it remains true that the other person's concrete future is the means towards the absolute future, which is one's own and everyone else's. The Kingdom of God only comes to those who build the coming earthly kingdom.

[202] In doing this they use the continually new materials put at their disposal in succeeding ages which thus cause the plan itself to be changed continually. And the Christian knows no better than other men just what this concrete provision (created by man so that he may be ready for what cannot be created) looks like, what form it ought to take and how it is to be produced.[43] In this matter he is on the same level as everyone else.[44] He is obliged both to enter into a dialogue with his fellow-builders of a common future, and also to involve himself in a struggle, for the concrete future, since it is not theoretically deducible, can only be decided and implemented as a result of a 'struggle' and even violence.[45, 46] In so far as for the Christian the provision of a concrete future is always situated within the incomprehensible absolute future, the Christian is precisely the one who knows least,[47] since he can only penetrate to the bottom of himself when he comes directly before his true foundation, the unfathomable God. All else remains preliminary. Hence, however, its absolute importance.

VII

In all this have we been talking about Christian humanism or the secular humanism of the Christian qua Christian? I do not know. But perhaps it will be permissible, all the same, to put a few questions to our non-Christian contemporaries who exist in such large numbers. Today the Christian lives among them, and in the future Christians will live everywhere as a diaspora.[48]

Must Christian and non-Christian humanists be enemies? I do not [203] think so, provided that both sides realise that their obligations are to the future more than to the past. Must they be enemies because the concrete future which one wants to build is perhaps contrary to the plan of the other? But Christianity as such demands no particular concrete future and it is to be hoped that the non-Christian does not imagine he already has the future tucked away in his pocket like a complete five-year plan. This being the case, why should not they both plan together for the future which is unknown to both of them? Why not try together to come to a clearer awareness of those hoped-for aspects of the future which have as yet been anticipated only dimly – justice, freedom, dignity, unity and diversity in society? Does the Christian treat this future any less seriously than the non-Christian in seeing it as the means to God's

[43] cf. 'Grenzen der Amtskirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI, pp. 499-520.
[44] On the necessity of this dialogue cf. the author's essay referred to in note 11 above.
[45] On this correct concept of power cf. Theological Investigations IV, pp. 391-409; on the essential concept of the 'area of freedom' cf. K. Rahner: M. Horkheimer, K. Rahner, C. F. von Weizsäcker, Über die Freiheit (Stuttgart,[2] 1965), pp. 35-44; also the remarks in K. Rahner, H. Maier, U. Mann, M. Schmaus, Religionsfreiheit (Munich, 1966), pp. 7-23. Cf. also the study on the subject of peace in this volume.
[46] What results from this is not a question of absolute non-violence but the limitation and the most humane form of violence. From this standpoint a more profound concept of 'peace' can be found, and a legitimate area can be discovered for a meaningful 'pacifism'. Cf. the studies in note 45.
[47] cf. J. B. Metz, Gott vor uns. Statt eines theologischen Arguments: E. Bloch zu Ehren (Frankfurt, 1965), pp. 227-241.
[48] cf. 'The Christian in his world', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), pp. 88-99.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

absolute future? Or does not this very fact make the future as a matter of the highest seriousness and at the same time render it imperative to keep the future open to its further history? No doubt the Christian's secular humanism, in keeping itself open to God's absolute future, implies certain formal structures in this concrete, intramundane future too. But it also implies the provision of an area of freedom for the exercising of religious, and hence also of non-religious, decision,[49] since openness to the absolute future requires freedom for its realisation. Thus the non-Christian must be allowed an area of freedom to interpret himself in a non-religious way. But why should not the non-Christian grant the same area of freedom to the Christian? In assuming that there is common ground for a dialogue between non-Christians and Christians,[50] we do not wish to say that there are no hard and fast differences and that all struggles and all historical decisions which involve the use of force could be avoided. Such a thing would be impossible even if the future were built solely by Christians.[51] For the collective, historical action which constitutes a particular future, even in the most moderate case, is not the result of pure theory but a practice which cannot be adequately deduced from theory. This practice always implies power and force as well, i.e. an alteration of the other person's historical situation even prior to his insight into it and free agreement to it.

[204] However, if both sides could see this very issue in that clear-headed manner which is so foreign to the liberalistic approach; if they could admit it and mutually abide by it, it would be the most promising way of governing the form and scope of this abiding struggle so that everyone would always possess some tangible area of freedom with tolerable boundaries, and each side, having the courage to limit itself, would be positively concerned to guarantee the same measure of freedom for the other side. Not only because it is useful to have this guarantee when the other side has the upper hand, but because one's own principles demand it: because justice can only exist when the person in power used moderation; because one can only be a 'humane' human being by renouncing the desire to be absolute and by enduring the world's and man's pluralism however much one desires unity; because man's true victory is only won when the vanquished person remains as tomorrow's potential adversary, for otherwise the victor either discovers a new adversary among his own ranks or becomes stifled in that sterile, deathly particularism which no-one can shake off.

[49] cf. E. W. Böckenförde, 'Religionsfreiheit als Aufgabe der Christen': J. B. Metz/J. Splett, Weltverständnis im Glauben (cf. note 35), pp. 298-314; in addition cf. note 45.
[50] At this point we must leave the question open as to how this dialogue is to be explained theologically in detail, since it is dangerous to see common ground merely in certain abstract propositions of so-called natural law.
[51] cf. the essay referred to in note 19 above.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[205]

13

THE EXPERIMENT WITH MAN

Theological observations on man's self-manipulation

Our topic here is man's self-manipulation today and tomorrow in so far as the question is also of theological relevance. It can legitimately be assumed that it is relevant because this self-manipulation is concerned with, or at least affects, man in his totality, and theology has to do with man's ultimate, total understanding of himself as a whole human being. I am aware that the frightening breadth and complexity of this theme are too much for me to deal with, especially as I have only a limited space at my disposal. Consequently I do not know whether, in the end, I shall have said anything really meaningful. But the main reason for my apprehension is this: in the first instance man's self-manipulation is a question for biology, sociology, medicine, pharmacology, psychology, technology and political science; for one can only raise the theological question when one knows what can be done – and how it can be done – in the field of self-manipulation. And for this knowledge one must turn to the specialists in these particular disciplines. So it seems at least. For one can only inquire whether (and according to which of the many possibilities) man ought to manipulate himself provided that there is room left for such a question and that everything has not already been decided. Then, and only then, may the theologian too put in a word. And in doing so he must be quite sure that he has really comprehended and mastered the foregoing question and answer. Whether this is possible at all, however, is much more questionable than was thought, for instance, by those who drew up the so-called 'Scheme 13' of the Council. And it is no real consolation to have the impression that the representatives of these same disciplines are themselves insufficiently acquainted with the questions and results of their respective fields of study, and thus produce plans and utopias for human manipulation which are inadequate in the first place, in that they refer to man as a unity but do not really know him in his totality. In any case the theologian is in a grievous position. He is obliged to join in the discussion because it cannot [206] be assumed that man's salvation is in principle independent of this self-manipulation, and the theologian's concern must be with the furtherance of man's salvation; and yet it is scarcely possible for him to speak at all.

Not only because, for him, man is turned into a question which he – precisely as theologian – must keep open to the infinite mystery, and thus he can never say in advance what concrete possibilities man himself, in the course of his history, will include in his formal theological outline of himself but simply because the theologian – or rather let us say more cautiously, because I cannot flatter myself that I understand much of the perspectives, methods and results of those sciences which have taken the question of man, both in theory and in practice, to be a question of experiment with man himself. And yet it is precisely here that the theologian is supposed to make his contribution. Of course here we have struck a further problem, and one which we cannot deal with at all at this juncture, namely, the problem of the pluralism of sciences. Although they are concerned with one and the same human being, these sciences have grown to immeasurable proportions and can no longer be assimilated by any one individual. They constitute a pluralism which leaves the concrete human being more at a loss then ever, the more 'one knows' about man. It is a pluralism which will be overcome neither by modern computers, nor by scientific and specialist team projects, nor by an anonymous political organisation 'drawing all the threads of the sciences together'. So at least for the moment the theologian has no alternative but to try to say something, at quite a distance and in quite an abstract way, with reference to man's self-manipulation. And it must be, or will endeavour to be, something just plainly theological; the theologian will ask the theorists and practitioners of self-manipulation whether they may not find it of service in their own problems. Hence it is only a question of rapprochement, not a confrontation between the science and practice of self-manipulation on the one hand and theology on the other. So much by way of preliminary remarks.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I

1. The new reality and the future of man's self-manipulation which has already begun. Before turning our attention to actual theological propositions we must attempt in a few sentences to say what is meant by self-manipulation, that possibility of human activity which, however indirectly, is the subject of these observations.

Self-manipulation means that today man is changing himself. On the [207] one hand, of course, there have always been quite small examples of the kind of active self-manipulation to which we refer. We shall have occasion to examine the theological and anthropological relevance of this simple fact. Man has purposely drunk wine to combat his melancholy; consciously used coffee as a stimulant; undertaken primitive attempts at human breeding; endeavoured to change his bodily form by means of various techniques, beginning with shaving; conceived the practice of education in terms of artificially superimposing knowledge instead of cultivating insight; attempted – even if in a clumsy way – to implement an institutionally controlled indoctrination, etc. And on the other hand this self-manipulation of man is still in its infancy, is still in many ways only a project, feeling its way, playing with vaguely apprehended possibilities; it is a scholars' utopia, created – with the scholar's characteristic ideological ruthlessness – by extrapolating whole systems for bringing happiness to mankind from mere initial items of knowledge. Most of it is still a dream or nightmare of the future and in reality no-one can say for certain whether it is even practicable, let alone whether it is desirable or morally justifiable. In any case, however, the situation is radically different from what it was. Man plans his own self, in much he is still groping his way, seeking the goals of his self-manipulation and only perceiving the possibility of realising them in the remote distance. But at the same time he has the feeling and actually experiences that the rate of his successes is increasing and that today's utopias can become tomorrow's commonplaces. Man is discovering that he is 'operable'.

This radically new period is approaching. It is approaching in all its dimensions. In spite of the many fluid boundaries which conceal the newness of this phenomenon from a naïve observer, it can be distinguished in many ways from the unreflected preliminary instances of self-manipulation which have occurred so far in human history. For it is multi-dimensional, its concern is with man as he is empirically experienced, not according to his spiritual and transcendental being as a free subject (later we shall have to deal in greater detail with what is meant here). It wishes to be consciously and methodically controlled according to genuine plans over a long period of time. Its concern is not with this or that part of man but with man as a totality; it wishes as a result of the new insights of all the anthropological sciences to penetrate to man's ultimate fabric in order to remodel it. It is not concerned with this or that man but with man, with mankind; it does not wish to conjure up a utopia of supermen within a profanised eschatology, but coolly to sketch, design and calculate a new, different man and then to produce him technologically in [208] accordance with this plan. The concrete dimensions of this human production, the workshops of the factory of new human beings, merging into one another, are well known:

In the first place – to begin with that which is most external – there is the workshop of the hominisation of man's environment. Man no longer merely lives in an environment and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cultivates it superficially, but actually creates it, looking at the given stuff of nature only as material for the environment which he intends to produce according to his own design. He is beginning to inhabit a world which he has shaped artificially; he manufactures synthetic products, erects 'machines for living' instead of houses; he makes use of atomic energy, which has been inaccessible until now and is not naturally available. Perhaps he will even extend his living space beyond the Earth, and no longer eat of the fruits of the earth but invent his own food. In all this man is already indirectly changing himself to a greater extent than he realises. In itself the active hominisation of the world is already a self-manipulation of man. He makes the Earth, and hence his own self, subject to him.

There is the workshop of biology, biochemistry and genetics. It is only just being constructed now, but at great speed; and already the biologists, overstepping the bounds of their theoretical science, are designing patterns for the biological self-manipulation of man; in the new laws on eugenics we can see them already becoming reality. We cannot describe these plans and possibilities in detail here: sterilisation laws for eugenic reasons to prevent the selection of negative hereditary factors; control of the birth-rate and the prevention of further population explosions by biochemical means; increasing the I.Q. level and the breeding of super-intelligences on a biological basis; the possibility of carrying out this breeding as a result of knowledge of DNA (deoxyribonucleic acid), thus penetrating to the innermost secret of heredity; knowledge of genetic codes; the setting up of insemination banks, making desirable stock available.

There is the workshop of medicine, pharmacology and, above all, psycho-pharmacology. Here man, clumsily botched together by nature, can be improved in an artificial environment and adjusted to the machines he himself has built. Here artificial kidneys and aortas are built, and transistors to regulate the heart-beat more effectively. Here men's spiritual, mental and moral problems are not made bearable and meaningful by appealing to his moral freedom, but his moral tensions are removed right from the start by drugs, morality is replaced wholly or largely by psycho-medical and psycho-pharmacological manipulation – which does the job [209] much better – in so far as such action is still necessary for a man who has already been skilfully manipulated genetically.

Then there is the psychological workshop. But a psychology of the future, of course. Not like the churches of old, which – seen from a secular point of view – were psychological workshops where men were formed as free beings, after much wearying work of a piecemeal and dilettante kind, by an appeal to individual conscience. But a psychological workshop of the future, engaging in 'brainwashing' on a grand scale, fully acquainted with the use of the mass media, producing happiness and a feeling of well-being throughout the whole of man's body by means of electric brain-stimulation, and instilling into everyone an exemplary, socially desirable attitude by the modern psychological indoctrination which has no need of insight and freedom, so that the result is a frictionless society without any conflicts.

Then there is the sociological workshop. Here mankind's growth is calculated in advance, plans and laws are made to stabilise the earth's population at the desired level, exploiting fully the biological, genetic and medical possibilities available today or tomorrow. Here social medicine is organised; ways are found to match needs with resources, and to occupy man in his leisure time.

And finally we come to the innermost part of the factory: the political workshop. Here we find the World Government, in the hands of specially bred super-intelligences. Here the projects of the various workshops are co-ordinated, ultimate goals are established to which all the methods of treating man are to be orientated.

So far this factory for the new man does not exist. But it is as though buildings are being constructed simultaneously all over a great site, and one has the impression that these

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

separate constructions will eventually grow into a single complex – into a hominised world. This is the one immense factory where 'operable' man dwells in order to invent himself.

2. Theological comment. What ought one to say as a theologian to all these states of affairs, possibilities, utopias, and dangers involved in man's self-manipulation? First of all two whole areas of discussion must be excluded for the purposes of this essay, although in themselves they are very important, namely questions of a specialist and technical nature, and the problems of moral theology.

(a) In the first place there are the specialist questions which must be answered by the relevant disciplines concerned with self-manipulation and which remain, for the time being, unanswered. For instance no-one really knows yet what the population explosion means as an issue affecting [210] mankind. And yet this question is almost everywhere regarded as the point of departure for serious discussion of the utopia of man's self-manipulation. It is quite possible (no-one can deny it) that the growth of mankind may be governed by biological and psychological self-regulating systems, thus being kept to a tolerable level. Such self-regulating systems would obviate the need for manipulation in this area on the one hand, and on the other they would automatically be working towards a morality (for which man is subjectively responsible before God), so that the moral theologians would not need to be disturbed about the question either. It may well be that in spite of the amazing and rapid progress of biochemistry and genetics, a really practicable controlled human breeding, such as would alter man in depth and on a world-wide scale, is simply technically impossible. Nor does it look as though in the year 2000 or soon afterwards there will be a really effective World Government such as the prophets of man's producibility on a global scale require. So many questions are raised by the results of the relevant disciplines, so many problems arising concerning the long-term and secondary effects of the various procedures made possible by progress, that really practical and realisable planning is still largely impossible. These and similar questions must be excluded here, although they are to a large extent the pre-conditions for a theological approach, because they exceed the theologian's competence.

(b) The second question which must be passed over here is the moral theological question, although it is of great concern as a question of theology. I.e. the direct question as to what is permissible or even morally obligatory with respect to these possibilities and methods of self-manipulation in its various dimensions, and what is not permitted and why. At this point, of course, a thousand questions raise their heads: from the moral evaluation of a kidney transplant, the contraceptive pill, to the state control of fertility, the attempts to manipulate technically man's hereditary material, and all the other problems of social sexual morality which arise from these possibilities. So here we shall pass over the practical moral casuistry of man's self-manipulation, even if in what follows we cannot avoid referring to the hermeneutical framework for the treatment of such problems.

II

1. Christian cool-headedness in the face of man's future. Man is fundamentally 'operable' and legitimately so. If this proposition, which we shall elucidate directly, is assumed, the first thing which the theologian must [211] say to himself, to Christians and to the Church is that one is not to take fright at this self-manipulation of man. Of course possibilities of self-manipulation are becoming apparent today which are immoral and unworthy of man, and which may indicate a 'Fall' on the part of society. And we shall refer to the Christian's and the Church's duty to have the courage to oppose with utter resoluteness those kinds of self-manipulation which are the most recent forms of barbarity, slavery, the totalitarian annihilation of personality and formation of a monochrome society.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But it would only be symptomatic of a cowardly and comfortable conservatism hiding behind misunderstood Christian ideals and maxims if at the outset one were to simply condemn the approaching age of self-manipulation as such; to break out into lyrical laments on the theme of degrading barbarity, the cold, technological rationalism, the destruction of what is 'natural', the rationalisation of love, the heathenist lack of understanding in the face of illness, suffering, death, poverty, the levelled-down mass society, the end of history in a faceless fellahin society without a history, etc. Although we are unable to produce a concrete picture of the life of society and mankind in the year 2000, although we must take radical catastrophes and threats to man's existence into account, against which a Christian will have to fight with the greatest determination, tomorrow's world will be different from that of today. And in this coming world man will be the one who, both as an individual and as a society, plans, controls and manipulates himself to a degree which was previously both undreamed-of and impracticable. He must do so; he can do no other if he wishes to exist on the Earth side by side with many thousand millions of other human beings. He must want to be 'operable' man, even though the extent and the right way of carrying out this self-manipulation are still largely obscure, and although it is apparent that the Anglo-Saxon and Communist prophets of this future self-manipulation are themselves able to give only very vague details of this future. For whether one proclaims, with Huxley, that man's goal and future is pure 'fulfilment and self-expression', or says, with Elisabeth Mann Borghese, that at least everyone will have time to devote himself to what is true, good and beautiful; or whether one exalts the classless society where abilities, achievements and needs all finally coincide and where a common peace reigns in equality, freedom from illness, self-alienation and oppression – all these aims are highly abstract, imprecise and uninspiring too.

But it is true: the future of man's self-manipulation has begun. And the Christian has no reason to enter this future as a hell on Earth nor as an earthly Kingdom of God. Jubilation or lamentation would both run [212] counter to the Christian's cool-headedness. For the Christian, both he himself and his world always remain (as long as history lasts) a world of creation, of sin, of the promise of judgment and blessing, in a unity which he himself can never dissolve.

2. Self-determination as the nature and task of man's freedom as understood by Christianity. According to Christian anthropology man really is the being who manipulates himself. Naturally, on account of the genuine historicity of his being and of his apprehension of truth, this fact has entered even into the Christian's awareness of faith in a quite new and penetrating way. But this fact, to which he is called at this present time and which confronts him as something new, can be recognised and accepted by him all the same as his very own, as the truth of old which has always been his and which gives itself to him anew in this form – if he accepts it.

According to a Christian understanding, man, as the being who is free in relation to God, is in a most radical way empowered to do what he wills with himself, freely able to align himself towards his own ultimate goal. He is able so to determine and dispose of himself that two absolutely different final destinations become possible: man in absolute salvation and man in the absolute loss of salvation. For what happens to a man in death and judgment (to use the language of the Catechism) is not an external gratuitous action upon him, a reaction to his previous dealings, but the manifestation of the naked reality of his own ultimate goal, with which he has identified himself. It is certainly the case that this absolutely inescapable transcendental self-determination occurs in dialogue with or against God; certainly its precondition is what we know as free creation and free grace; it is assuredly a freedom which knows itself to be continually exposed to the intractable nature of its situation, and thus knows that in all its activity it is also unavoidably passive. But this does not alter the fact – which is a commonplace to the Christian – that freedom is the power to determine oneself to an absolutely irreversible final state, that what a man will be for all eternity is what he has made himself. Man is the one whose freedom is laid upon him as a burden; this freedom is creative and what it creates is man himself in his final state, so that the beginning of this history of man's divinely appointed freedom – man's 'essence' as we say – is not an intangible something, essentially permanent and complete, but the commission and power which enable him to be free to determine himself to his ultimate final state.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In a correctly developed ontology of the subject and his dealings, as opposed to the 'thing' and its 'activity' (which unfortunately is taken for [213] the most part as a model for the 'activity' of the genuine subject), it could be made plainer that in an anthropology based on a really Christian philosophy, a man's free action – which, in affecting the world, determines himself too – must not be imagined as an external epiphenomenon sustained on the surface of a substantial essence which itself remains untouched, but becomes part of the innermost determination of this essence itself. In contradistinction to 'things' which are always complete and which are moved from one mode of completion to another and thus are at the same time always in a final state and yet never ultimate, man begins his existence as the being who is radically open and incomplete. When his essence is complete it is as he himself has freely created it.

3. Self-manipulation as a new manifestation in our time of man's essential freedom. What is new in this issue is therefore not that man is faber sui ipsius, but that this fundamental constitution of man is manifested historically today in a totally new way. Today for the first time man's possibility of transcendental self-manipulation irreversibly takes on a clear and historically categorical form. I.e. until now man's genuine, radical self-manipulation (which is a constant factor, creating eternity) was operative almost exclusively in the field of contemplative metaphysical knowledge, knowledge in faith and moral action in reference to God. Therefore as soon as it arose, it disappeared, so to speak, into the mystery of God. This was all the more the case since the categorical and tangible aspect of this contemplation and moral practice (which was naturally always present) is constantly equivocal: it can be either genuine free action or the mere product of intramundane material causality. As mere equivocal objectifications they are therefore incapable of furnishing man automatically with a clear view of his own free self-manipulation. Now, however, man's transcendental self-manipulation has been clearly manifested, even if from the theological point of view it remains ultimately ambivalent.

No longer does man create himself merely as a moral and theoretical being under God, but as an earthly, corporeal and historical being. Passive biological evolution is being extended, at least to an initial degree, by an active evolution of civilisation. But the latter is not only external and supplementary: it is actually continuing its own biological evolution. This self-manipulation is not only carried out unconsciously, as was the case almost exclusively in the past, but deliberately planned, programmed and controlled. Man no longer makes himself merely with reference to eternity but with reference to history itself as such.

In this way, however, what he has always been now comes to light. [214] What he has always been at the root of his transcendental spiritual and intellectual essence as a free being now extends its influence to his psyche and his physical and social existence, and is made manifest expressly in these dimensions. To a certain degree his ultimate essence has broken through to the outer regions of his existence. To a larger, more comprehensive, radical and tangible extent man has become what, according to the Christian understanding, he is: the free being who has been handed over to himself.

Here we have not space to show how this modern man not only corresponds to Christianity's fundamental understanding of man but also how the historical breakthrough from theory to practice, from self-awareness to self-actualisation was essentially a product of Christianity, however much many Christians opposed this emancipating movement of history. For this possibility, which has arisen from modern rationality, science and technology, has grown historically because according to Christianity the world and nature are not something intangible, numinous and brooding in which man humbly experiences himself as hidden, but something finite, non-numinous and created; as a real partner of the God of the 'other world' man can and must stand over against this world as its lord.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

4. The question of the normative essence, the 'nature' of man. It will be immediately apparent from what has been said that, as a result of this material and categorial self-manipulation – which has now become possible and which in the future will embrace a wide range of possibilities – theology is faced anew with the question of man's essence. For according to Christian theology man in his freedom can act contrary to his nature in an absurd and self-contradictory way. Ontologically and existentially this latter possibility is not of the same order, nor is it radically possible to the same extent, as action which is consonant with man's nature (a fact which must never be forgotten), but it is possible: the ambivalence of moral freedom in its potential for good or ill is reproduced in the categorial self-manipulation of man, even though it is not reproduced univocally and homogeneously (which needs to be considered in much greater depth) but only reflects this radical ambivalence in a partial and inconclusive manner. Consequently in the dimension of categorial self-manipulation the good is never as 'good' and the evil is never as radically evil as in the dimension of fundamental transcendental freedom.

But since a Catholic and Christian anthropology, on account of the whole man's unity and vocation to salvation, can never accept an absolute [215] separation of the ethics of man's inner disposition from the ethics of his external actions and practical norms, the question arises as to which 'nature' of man must be the guide for man's categorial self-manipulation, lest he be put in a situation of radical, destructive self-contradiction. Although this question could never have been simply nonexistent, it was never put before men and Christians so clearly and urgently and in such a pointed manner prior to this historical age of self-manipulation.

This question arises from an apparent dilemma: if the 'essence' of man is taken in a purely transcendental and theological sense to be the personal spirit which, in freedom and radical self-possession, is confronted with the absolute mystery of God (as the One Who communicates Himself in love), and if this essence were nothing else, it seems initially at least as though – in the biological, physical, social and institutional dimensions – man's categorial self-manipulation would be unable to come into really serious conflict with his nature, or at most only in peripheral areas. For all practical considerations categorial self-manipulation would be thus irrelevant to the ethical and religious field. However, if one regards the nature of man as being everything which is on the one hand empirically observable and on the other hand not shown to be 'nonessential' as a result of the biological, psychological and other changes which happen to man apart from his reflex self-manipulation, man's categorial self-manipulation would have no morally legitimate object. At most it could gently reinforce the unmanipulated changes of 'nature'; it could not set itself any aims concerning the formation of man which had not already been set by 'nature' without man's assistance. But in this case the fundamental legitimacy of this categorial self-manipulation would itself be called in question and, in fact, denied. And that again is not admissible, if we understand it as a manifestation of that transcendental self-manipulation which – be it noted – has several very radically differing possibilities at its disposal, even in the area of what is morally good.

Formulating the dilemma here in such an abstract way was unavoidable. Ultimately, of course, it can only be an apparent dilemma, although it seems to call in question either the nature of man and the knowledge of this nature, or man's categorial self-manipulation, conceived as a fundamental possibility and task. (However, one has only to consider the well-known – too well-known – problem of biochemical birth-control for instance, to see clearly what is meant. We cannot enter into this special issue here, but however it ought to be dealt with in principle, there can be no doubt that in recent decades traditional text-book moral theology has often used a concept of 'nature' ('natural', 'according to nature') which [216] ignores the fact that, although man has an essential nature which he must respect in all his dealings, man himself is a being who forms and moulds his own nature through culture, i.e. in this case through self-manipulation, and he may not simply presuppose his nature as a categorial, fixed quantity.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In any case, as a result of man's categorial self-manipulation, today's theology has been presented with the pressing task of finding out just what this nature of man is which forms the horizon and limitations even of self-manipulation. Difficult and painful changes may be expected in this area. For in questions of concrete morality people have often spoken with reference to a condition of man which, though currently existent, was not of his essence; which, though stable until recently, has now been drawn into the changes involved in man's controlling of himself. Too often it has been said, for instance: this or that is contrary to the nature of private property, of money; contrary to the 'nature' of woman, the nature of the family; contrary to the natural function of a biological organ, etc., whereas in reality it was a question of a variable and relative quantity within man's constant nature.

We cannot devote any more space here to this complex question of the nature of man which lies at the bottom of the metaphysical and moral natural law, how it appears in a historically conditioned concrete form and yet can be recognised for what it is, how the possibility of knowledge of metaphysical essence is compatible with an inescapable historical conditioning of this knowledge, and how the theoretical and operative knowledge of man's essence form a fundamental and yet variable unity. We are only concerned with ascertaining what problems theology is presented with as a result of categorial self-manipulation. But in this connection we may make one further observation: nowadays the moralist often says (and practically speaking he is thoroughly justified in doing so) that a situation has now arisen in which man must learn that he must not and ought not to do everything he is able to do. At the same time the hard-headed sceptic will generally retort that on the whole one cannot expect man to stop doing what he can do, and that since man can do infinitely more than heretofore, what he does will be immeasurably more terrible and destructive. However correct these observations of the moralist and the pessimistic sceptic may be, two things must be added.

In the first place, if the radical ontological difference between good and evil is understood, i.e. if it is comprehended that evil is ultimately the absurdity of desiring what is impossible (because it has neither being nor meaning), then in the last analysis there is nothing which man is really [217] able to do and yet may not do; and conversely, what he really can do, he ought to do without hesitation. The moralist who is really close to life, therefore, would have to show modern man that, wherever he ought not to act, it is ultimately pointless, even today, to do so (i.e. in a categorial and intramundane sense too).

Secondly, because man's creaturely and finite freedom is co-determined by that which it presupposes, which exerts its influence particularly in this very categorial area of freedom (and hence of self-manipulation), biological, psychological and sociological laws can be apprehended and accepted which, without vitiating the freedom of self-manipulation, act to a certain extent like regulating systems and in the long run and on the whole stop this self-manipulation from going off the path into an absurdity contrary to man's essence. As a few crude examples: every lie gradually reduces itself ad absurdum; where there are few children they become all of a sudden interesting and desirable again; the man who is too concerned with his own health becomes ill; when something new, which was fiercely striven for, is attained, it loses its impetus, becomes of necessity old and thus slowly abolishes itself, it is not only lemmings who jump into the sea when they become too numerous.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is by no means an excuse for laissez faire and it gives no guarantee against a catastrophe, but it does constitute a consolation and an exhortation not to be too anxious. Apparently the 'essence' varies around a constant, innermost centre. And the whole essence consists of this centre together with the essential variations and aberrations and the attempts to express this constant essence in a new way. This applies to self-manipulation too. Especially since in this case, wherever the moralist believes he has located 'objective' self-manipulation running counter to man's essence and must combat it, he must be continually aware that it is only 'objectively' so; often and to a large extent – according to his own basic conviction – such instances, on a social and not merely individual scale, do not imply a genuine subjective state of sin before God. Objectively they belong to the same category as those instances where subhuman, 'innocent' nature permits itself to produce monstrous, aberrant things leading into biological and other culs-de-sac. Even aberrant categorial self-manipulation, seeming to spring from a really transcendental freedom vis-à-vis God, can be an ultimately harmless experiment on the part of nature, experimenting and slowly trying to bring forth what the genuine future holds in promise. This may be the case even where it seems as though it is only using man's intelligence and freedom for its own purposes, exercising its own essence and not man's free essence as such.

[218] 5. The seriousness of irreversible historical decisions. Having said all this we must not minimise the importance of the historical process involved in the initiation of man's self-manipulation. We are warned against this by a particular theological topic of Christian anthropology, which has probably never before been taken into account in this context, namely, the dogma of Original Sin. We cannot give a full account here of its actual content, but we merely draw attention to one of its particular principal aspects which is of significance in interpreting theologically the coming large-scale manipulation of mankind. The 'Fall' was actually the first act of self-manipulation by mankind, even if its context was essentially the dimension of religious, transcendental self-determination before God, and even if we leave open the question as to how far it had categorially tangible consequences, delivering man up not only to his own nature alone, which could conceivably be guiltless. But in this case of self-manipulation sui generis there is one thing which is an indubitable element of the dogma: the act had irreversible consequences, it inaugurated a process and mankind cannot get back beyond the beginning of that process. All future human history is ineradicably determined by this situation of guilt so long as history itself lasts. Although redemption embraces this fact of human history and ultimately sets its mark upon it, it does not abolish it.

In turn this implies the principle that even at the stage of self-manipulation mankind continues on its one-way, irreversible historical course. Where a collective self-manipulation on the part of the totality of mankind is concerned, it is at least in principle the case that an about-turn is simply no longer possible, even if the way is kept open to the most diverse future possibilities. For people unconsciously connect the idea of self-manipulation with the notion that it can do anything whatsoever and can continue to do anything; that every false manipulation can be rectified, at least in succeeding generations (and the self-manipulation ideologists are very little concerned for the individual living at any one time; he is only treated as material to be expended for the sake of the more distant future). However, the dogma of Original Sin warns us against this illusion; history will remain a one-way process in the future too; it will continue under the law incurred by its guilty beginning, involving death, futility, contradiction and suffering (however much the forms of the latter may change), such that no self-manipulation on the part of mankind can abolish this law. (Yet the Church and theologians must beware of thinking that they already know precisely what concrete forms this irreversible beginning will assume in the future; they must beware of prophesying [219] that the poor, wars, TB, the class struggles, etc., will be perpetuated in their classical forms for all time.) Furthermore it may be that the projected large-scale manipulation of mankind

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

will have irreversible and irreparable consequences which no further self-manipulation will be able to change. Such conceivable irreversible consequences cannot reverse the definitive victory, through Christ, of God's self-communicating dealings with mankind. But neither does this mean that mankind can experiment upon itself freely without fear of irreparable consequences. So long as mankind exists with its vocation to salvation, history (including the history of man taking himself in his own hands) remains a one-way street. Man's self-manipulation must not be thought of according to the model of a limited laboratory experiment where, for the most part, isolated processes can be performed and reversed at will.

6. Planning the future and the absolute future of man. Christianity is the religion of the absolute future. However, at the same time it stands in a quite definite and unique relation to the categorial self-manipulation of man and mankind. It is very difficult to define the highly differentiated relationship between anticipating the absolute, eschatologically occurring future in faith and theological hope on the one hand, and anticipating the intramundane future by means of planning and active self-manipulation on the other hand. So far this particular chapter of a Christian theology of history and the world has been almost totally neglected; consequently it is impossible here to give an account of it and thus provide a theological context within which man's active self-manipulation can be really theologically understood. At this point we can only make a few modest observations. We say that Christianity is the religion of the absolute future to the extent in the first place that God is not only 'above us' as the ground and horizon of history, but 'in front of us' as our own future, our destination, sustaining history as its future. For Christianity acknowledges the absolute, infinite God who is superior to the world, a radical and infinite mystery, as the God who in free grace communicates himself in his absolute mystery as its innermost principle and ultimate future, who sustains and drives history as his genuinely most intimate concern, not only distinguishing himself from it as its creator.

Secondly we say that man's ultimate design for the future, which God has destined for him and authorised, does not aim at what can be planned and executed out of the multiple possibilities of the plural world, but has already overtaken all such intramundane designs for the future, criticising them and unmasking them in their appearance of absoluteness, and thus (as we shall see) confirming them.

[220] All human planning, every active human self-realisation involving the manipulation of a plurality of factors, is embraced by the fact (which can be neither planned nor manipulated) of the infinite mystery manifesting itself to us as love, which we experience and call God. Man is not only concerned with what he can do in the future; he experiences something which is not 'done' at all, but which is his destiny, the infinity of absolute reality, which is love. According to Christianity's experience of absolute future in Jesus Christ, the arrival of this future occurs essentially in the act of death. It occurs in this way and in no other; life is not thereby devalued, because in order to be able to die one must genuinely have lived life. But one only reaches the absolute future by way of death's zero hour, not because the former is death's gift, not because it could be calculated to be impossible in any other way, but because, beyond all deduction, absolute love was pleased to triumph in its greatest defeat.

If now this absolute future, confessed in hope by Christianity and to which the Christian, in planning his existence, opens himself, is related to the design for the future which is manifested and executed in the self-manipulation of mankind today (and it does not make any difference whether it is in a Western or Eastern form, in an explicit collectivism or one which is in practice so), the following brief remarks at least may be made:

7. Shaping the future as a Christian task. In the first place man's active intramundane self-planning in self-manipulation has fundamentally a positive relationship to man's openness to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the absolute future in faith and hope. However 'secular' man's active self-manipulation is and remains (i.e. not positively deducible from the Christian design for existence as it is expressed in its ecclesial and verbal form), yet it must not be understood as an 'interim activity' (which, when pursued morally, receives a heavenly reward) lasting until the absolute future, the 'Kingdom of God' finally arrives in God's self-communication. But in its irreducible positive and negative duality it constitutes the necessary medium and historical form by which man is to embrace that 'openness' which is both active and passive, forming the precondition for the arrival of the absolute future.

Basically Christianity has always known and proclaimed this in teaching that, inter alia, the love of one's neighbour is the form and medium of the love of God and that this love must really be action and not ideology or the mere inclination of the affections. Only it must be borne in mind that, as a necessary medium for the love of God (and not merely as a secondary by-product of it), this active intercommunication [221] can no longer be realised merely in the private interpersonal sphere involving each man and his 'neighbour'. Even if a person rejects a 'collectivism' in the pejorative sense of the word, he cannot and must not overlook the fact that mankind today must of necessity realise higher levels and forms of social existence (and has actually already begun to do so) if each person is to really and truly affirm every other person's existence. Mankind is beginning to enter upon a post-individualistic phase of its history. This new phase brings with it new changes and dangers to the genuine, unique personality and dignity of the individual. It must not annihilate this individuality, but actually provide it with a greater area of genuine freedom.

This means, however, that loving intercommunication itself takes on a new form; now it can and must be also a servant of the new forms of man's social existence, a servant of humanity. For now 'humanity' no longer exists merely as an idea, as an ideology, but begins to exist as a concrete reality. If 'society' is a reality in a quite new way, if it is slowly and inevitably reconstructing itself on quite new lines, it can be in a totally new way a partner in this task of loving one's fellows, which is the form and medium of that love in hope and faith through which the absolute future 'arrives'. Understood in this way, however, the love of others must will and co-operate in these higher achievements of society and humanity as they are and must be in today's particular form: i.e. mankind's self-manipulation with a view to the future.

Of course, the love of one's neighbour itself cannot provide the material principle from which to conclude the concrete aim and methods of this intramundane self-manipulation of mankind. The aim and methods remain secular, like the bread which in earlier times was given in love to the poor man lest he should starve. Nevertheless, mankind's active self-manipulation today and tomorrow can and must be the concrete, active expression of the love of one's fellows, making possible the 'openness' to God's absolute future, even if it cannot itself bring about this absolute future. As the religion of the absolute future, Christianity is and must be the religion which sends man into the world to act.

8. Death as the permanent door to the absolute future. At the same time, however, Christianity warns self-manipulating man that, in his movement towards the God who is in front of him, he is obliged to pass through death's zero hour. It is strange how little man's death and the death of history is talked about today in the customary future utopias. Death is pushed to one side; what is talked about is a kind of super welfare state with little work, a great deal of automation, the elimination [222] of illness, long life, complete equality of the sexes – their differences having been almost smoothed out; a society in which all internal and external conflicts have been eradicated by genetic and pharmacological manipulation and social training, where the altruistic instincts of insect-like state-builders are formed, where history, steered by a few wise men, has been actually brought to a standstill in a high-level euphoric fellahin existence. One has the impression that it could be a horribly boring

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existence: the ash of unchallenged equality and security, spread homogeneously over the fire of life, could either smother the fire or else have the effect of making it suddenly burst out at some point as a mass madness trying to break out of a deathly equality and security. Death and the readiness to die, which is what keeps life 'alive' in this aeon, and which alone is the door of eternal life, is being pushed to one side.

We have already emphasised the fact that the concrete forms of death, futility, suffering and pain do not authorise a conservative defence of the particular forms of death and conflict which currently set their mark on man's situation. Especially since this kind of pseudo-Christian defence, which was and is all too common, is mostly put forward by those who have to suffer least in this regard. There is naturally little point in the rich man extolling the blessings of poverty and the person in power in society praising the value of humility. It remains true, however, that self-manipulation and all its concrete and utopian aims are constantly subject to the law of death – which can be neither disposed of nor manipulated. And this experience of death (in this comprehensive sense) arises from the experience of self-manipulation itself. For every plan, every pre-set and pre-calculated system gives rise to new elements which were not planned and not scheduled, because it is constructed of pre-existing elements which can never be adequately penetrated and categorised. By definition, an absolute and absolutely transparent system, functioning without friction, could only be constructed by another one standing outside it; even a machine capable of learning and adapting itself can only do this within a finite area, so long as it is not identical with the universe.

And so long as man is a being of absolute transcendence, he observes all this in terror; he can only 'alter' it by anticipating it in a formal and empty manner in the world of theory. In actual practice he cannot alter it, however much of a concretely practicable nature may still lie ahead of him as an intramundane future which can be manipulated. He sees his limitation; namely, those things which cannot be manipulated, and death, his death, rising up out of the very midst of the things which can be manipulated. And he will always be asking whether this unfathomable [223] thing which surrounds him is the void of absolute absurdity or the infinitude of the mystery of love, the absolute future which is reached through death, so that only by accepting it can man really discover and 'invent' himself. (This is always possible, even where categorial self-manipulation is in its infancy, and it remains the highest priority even where the latter has made the kind of progress which is inconceivable at present.)

This death is not only the zero hour through which the individual must pass on his way to the absolute future, but also the zero hour for mankind as a whole. If we like, we can demythologise the end of all history as proclaimed by Christianity. No stars need fall from heaven: it can be the end as a result of genocide; it can be a social end (as a result of atom bombs, for instance); a physical end in a world catastrophe; it could be (who can know for sure? – the Christian must take even absurdity into account) that mankind might actually regress biologically to the level of a technically intelligent and self-domesticated aboriginal herd or an insect-state without the pain of transcendence, history and the dialogue with God. I.e. it might extinguish itself by collective suicide, even if it were to continue to exist at the biological level. A Christian theology of history basically need not take fright at such an idea in itself (any more than at the idea of individual suicide or self-induced stultification), for it knows that the history of men always ultimately arrives at God, whether in salvation or judgment, or else it simply ceases to be the history of spiritual persons at all.

Man exists in an immediate relationship with God only by moving towards the future in front of him, but consequently he exists in this way always, at every moment of his individual and collective history. And this immediacy is always mediated by death, which keeps history alive for as long as there are men. For this reason too the celebration of the death of the Lord

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is the solemn anticipation of the arrival of the absolute future, and cannot be replaced by any festive proclamation concerning man's self-manipulation.

III

We must necessarily break off these fragmentary theological observations on man's approaching self-manipulation, well aware that the greater part has been left unsaid. The theologian himself ought really to say much more, quite apart from appropriate self-criticism on the part of the theorists and engineers of the self-manipulation of mankind in their own [224] sphere. For instance the theologian ought to say more clearly why and how the most radical self-manipulation of man takes place either ontologically (and hence ethically) within a fundamental horizon, neither appointed by nor subject to man, or else it eliminates man as a denizen of history.

It ought to be made clearer that, having made this a priori Christian distinction, we do not know, nor can we predict, what concrete possibilities are in store for this self-manipulation. One ought to go on to consider the limitations of the official Church and its proclamation with particular reference to the giving of directions and advice for this self-manipulation, which as such always remains an adventure into the unforeseeable. One ought to complain that (as opposed to the official Church, which as such has no task here) Christians contribute so little courage and creative imagination to an ideology of the future for this self-manipulation, but are generally content to provide conservative admonitions and obstructions.

One ought soberly and courageously to consider, according to a supra-individual morality, what sacrifices could be expected of humanity today on behalf of humanity tomorrow, without being too quick to speak of immoral cruelty, of the violation and exploitation of the dignity of man today for the benefit of man tomorrow. Indeed one could ask whether the Church as such and ecclesially trained Christians have not been set the task (to be accepted in all humility) of playing a particular part in this future course of mankind; namely, a role which implies that their God (the God of history), who is always bigger than His Church, has entrusted a large part of history not to Christians but to others, who, in a more anonymous way, are all the same the executors of that history which is guided by God alone, ultimately opening out into His own eternal life.

These and other theological questions could be discussed in the face of mankind's self-manipulation, which has already begun. They would doubtless all come together in the simple experience that man really does make history (and thus himself) and that in this very activity he is not his own, but belongs to the mystery of love.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[225]

14

THE PROBLEM OF GENETIC MANIPULATION

Whenever a theologian is asked to state his position as regards the genetic manipulation of man he finds himself in a desperate situation. He is to give a moral evaluation of a particular phenomenon, but this evaluation refers to a completely new and previously nonexistent reality. In earlier times, by and large, the theologian himself had direct access to the matter he was to analyse from the moral point of view. Today man, in his scientific rationality, technology and self-manipulation,[1] is creating new realities, a second-order world, which is not immediately open to the individual unless he is actually a specialist in this field, a world with which he is really only acquainted in a rudimentary and second-hand manner. And it is in such matters as these that the theologian – himself a mere uninitiated layman in the field – is asked for guidance about their relation to humanity, morality and religion. How could the theologian avoid being in a desperate plight?

It would be wrong to attempt to smooth over these difficulties by saying that, as far as a moral evaluation of a particular issue is concerned, anyone (i.e. the theologian too) can still easily acquire as much knowledge as is necessary provided that he gets hold of genuinely specialist data. It is at least possible that the very 'detail' of which the theologian is ignorant, or of which he has only a vague notion, might be the decisive factor in his case; it might be the very detail which would alter the whole [226] conclusion.[2] And even if the theologian takes care to keep himself informed, can he be sufficiently sure that he knows all he needs to know in order to be able to engage in discussion? Can he acquire an adequate view of the preconditions, possibilities (or practical impossibilities) and methods of real genetic manipulation of mankind in the immediate or distant future? Is it enough for him to rest assured in the conviction that he has formed his judgment in all conscience as best he can according to the present stage of scientific knowledge,[3] if it is obvious all the time that such a judgment is provisional, alterable by some further item of knowledge in the future? There is small comfort in this, if on occasion, as a result of such a provisional judgment, decisions and

[1] cf. on this concept K. Rahner, 'Experiment Mensch. Theologisches über die Selbstmanipulation des Menschen', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Aufriß einer philosophischen Anthropologie. Festschrift für Max Müller, ed. H. Rombach (Freiburg, 1966) (This is the preceding article in the present volume.) Cf. also note 7 below.

This essay was originally intended for a symposium, which precluded the discussion of specialist issues of science or biology. For this reason there is also no reference to further literature. The literature mentioned in the notes is not intended to summarise theological research in this field up to the present time, but only to refer to the author's fuller remarks elsewhere on issues which could only lightly be touched upon here.

[2] A small example: for a few centuries Catholic moral theology has been convinced that the moment of union of the male and female germ cells is also the moment when an individual human being comes into existence. Will today's moral theologian still have the courage to maintain this presupposition as the basis of many of his moral theological statements, when faced with the knowledge that 50 per cent of all fertilised female cells never succeed in becoming attached to the womb? Will he be able to accept that 50 per cent of all 'human beings' – real human beings with 'immortal' souls and an eternal destiny – will never get beyond this first stage of human existence? In this particular case he can gain further knowledge and await developments; but what is he to do in other cases, where he merely suspects that neither he nor anyone else knows enough, and yet an answer must be given?

[3] For further information see the considerable material in P. Overhage's Experiment Menschheit. Steuerung der menschlichen Evolution (Frankfurt, 1967). The present author was not able to examine this book before writing this essay.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

actions are taken which cannot (unlike the moral theological dictum pronounced in good faith by the naïve theologian) be subsequently reversed.

It remains true, therefore, that whatever is said falls within the proviso incurred by the theologian's predicament. We shall have to leave it to the actual process of investigation itself to reveal whether the theologian can perhaps come to grips with his situation in some other way, thereby arriving at a conclusion which he could resolutely stand by.

First of all, however, we must try to find some footholds in our problem; we must endeavour to find a way in to the issue in question. In the first instance we shall turn naturally to traditional moral theology, traversing its scope in order to gain some estimate of the peculiar character and the relative novelty and difficulty of our theme. The non-theological reader is asked to be patient, therefore, throughout the first sections. The following remarks are necessary in order to introduce the question in a theologically correct manner, to avoid the mistake of considering the problem quite apart from all tradition. In any case, to approach the central problem gradually by experimental means also helps [227] one to lay hold more accurately on the particular ethical theme we have in view.

I

In the face of the question of a 'genetic self-manipulation' of man, moral theology is immediately placed in an exceedingly embarrassing situation. At least Catholic moral theology, as opposed to that of Protestant theology,[4] will not be of the opinion, on the one hand, that the question can be directly answered from Holy Scripture, nor will it thereby assume from the outset that the actual decision in a case such as this must simply be left to the conscience of the individual. But if Catholic moral theology is looking for a fundamental, material solution, without being too quick to avoid the issue by means of 'situation ethics', it will encounter very considerable difficulties which may perhaps oblige us to rethink quite general problems of morality.[5]

It is impossible simply to dismiss the thought of man's 'genetic manipulation' as an unethical project. As far as a Christian understanding of mankind is concerned, man is not simply the product of 'nature', as if nature alone were able and authorised to determine and model man's being. Man is not only the being who is commissioned by God to further God's work of creation, the being who both may and must 'subdue the earth', i.e. his environment. Rather man is characteristically the being who has been handed over to himself, consigned to his own free responsibility.[6] In this sense he must 'manipulate' himself.[7] Freedom is the [228]

[4] We cannot enter into a discussion of the attitude of the Christian churches and theologians. Practically all the Protestant churches (at least in Europe) reject genetic manipulation in the sense of heterologous artificial insemination and the arbitrary control or alteration of hereditary material.

[5] We need hardly say that this is not to set up, or hark back to, the old opposition between 'essential ethics' and 'individual ethics'. Cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur "situationsethik" aus ökumenischer Sicht', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 537-544, 499-536 (with further refs.). See also note 17 below.

[6] cf. K. Rahner, 'Ursprünge der Freiheit': M. Horkheimer, K. Rahner, C. F. v. Weizsäcker, Über die Freiheit (Stuttgart,[2] 1965), pp. 27-49; K. Rahner, pp. 205 ff. above.

[7] The author may be permitted to use the concept of 'manipulation' in this rather wider sense (cf. note 1) although the editor and the other contributors to the original symposium (see the list of sources) have agreed on a narrower and more up-to-date usage. Our wider approach is a necessary preliminary in order to be able to show the deep anthropological implications of such a procedure. In any case, at the level of philosophical/theological reflection this fundamental concept cannot be simply defined technically once and for all without surrendering the universal vantage-point necessary to our observation. Furthermore, the really threatening aspect of "manipulation" can only be brought out by contrasting and distinguishing it from what is true and legitimate in the matter concerned; one must not use the word 'manipulation' only in its pejorative sense, at least at first. And finally, the theologian uses this wider sense because he may be said to have a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

inevitable necessity of self-determination, by which man (though starting out from a 'beginning' which is a prior datum and within a perspective of already pre-empted possibilities) makes himself what and who he wants to be and ultimately will be in the abiding validity and eternity of his free decisions. The fact that in earlier times this planned self-determination ('self-manipulation') took place almost exclusively on the individual, moral-transcendent plane of convictions and of conscience may perhaps initially obscure our view of the nature of man in this respect, but it does nothing to change the fact of this transcendental necessity: to the extent that man is 'handed over' to himself, he is 'self-manipulating' (within the limits set by his 'nature' and 'history'). Today this fundamental essence of his has now also broken through into history and society: today he is able to manipulate himself in tangible, bodily and societal terms, and – a radical difference here from earlier times – he can plan this manipulation rationally and steer it by means of technology.

Genetic manipulation is only one particular instance of this more general phenomenon. Consequently the formal, abstract concept of (genetic) self-manipulation does not automatically imply a morally repugnant act: man does not simply perform actions external to himself, merely suffering his own self passively: man is such that he actually 'performs' himself. Since the latter is in accordance with his nature, this kind of 'self-manipulation' is legitimate too, if it is true that a moral action is one which is in accordance with the subject's nature. The fact that today man is able to do this in ways which were previously not accessible to him does not change the abstract, formal concept of self-manipulation. This applies, for example, in the case of genetic self-manipulation if we take a preliminary 'abstract' look at it. For here, as in other methods of psychological, physiological and social self-manipulation, [229] we must distinguish clearly between the process in its material content as such (i.e. the changing of hereditary material), and the conscious controlling of it, which does not automatically involve an artificial, arbitrary alteration which uses man himself as a means. For the moment we shall deal only with outlining the formal and abstract issues of the problem. The moral quality of control as such is determined by the moral quality of the process itself: if a thing is permissible, it may be expressly desired and consciously implemented.

Now a particular kind of 'change' of hereditary material is morally permissible. For it actually occurs legitimately, within certain limits, whenever a person chooses a marriage-partner, and whenever two human beings consummate their marital union sexually. Of course this kind of self-manipulation does not penetrate deeply into the human material as do psychological and pain-killing drugs and all cosmetic techniques in their different ways. But there are examples which show that, considered in the abstract, in this field of quite ordinary 'genetic manipulation' no moral objection can be raised on account of the conscious controlling of the process in itself. For example, no-one would think of raising a moral protest if a married couple were to opt for a particular coitus which they knew beforehand (supposing that they could) would produce a boy, rather than for another one, equally possible, but which would lead to the birth of a girl. But such a case would constitute materially and formally a 'genetic manipulation' according to our terms so far (which cannot reputation for entertaining a frozen, static concept of the 'nature' of man. If for once he begins in reverse, by proceeding from man's self-determination as his 'essence', it may emerge more convincingly and clearly from the process of investigation just what is meant by 'nature'. The use of the concept 'manipulation' in this essay is not to be separated from the actual context in which it occurs, so that the reader will only reach a full understanding of the concept if he himself follows the various diverse approaches to the issue which will be presented here. If he does this it will be clear that the author's intention is not to blunt the critical cutting edge of the contemporary usage of 'manipulation', but to approach these very problems from within a necessarily wider and more productive perspective.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

embrace the concrete phenomenon of modern genetic manipulation in all its aspects). Thus the abstract concept of genetic manipulation is not subject to any moral reservations.

Clearly this does not take us very far, for it is plain that not everything that can be done is morally justifiable. In our case the moral quality of a concrete genetic manipulation depends on several factors:

1. It depends on the concrete subject of the manipulation: a married couple is something quite different from the state, for instance, or any other active subject taking such measures.

2. It depends on the concrete, premeditated result on the whole human being: to intend to produce a human being who would never be morally responsible for himself would be immoral, even if such a human being might be very 'useful' for the particular purposes of other men.

3. It depends on the concrete method employed in genetic manipulation: initially we cannot be certain that each technologically successful development can be fitted into the whole of human reality without being [230] contrary to the latter's nature. But unless this is safeguarded, any such development is thoroughly immoral.

All three aspects of the moral evaluation of concrete genetic manipulation can be reduced to a common principle: its concrete reality must be adjudged according to whether it is appropriate to or contrary to the nature of man.

At this point we encounter the real difficulties of the question. Is there such a thing as an unchangeable 'nature' of man against which we can measure the appropriateness or inappropriateness of a particular genetic manipulation? With all our knowledge of man's immense malleability in the biological, psychological, cultural and social spheres, do we still have the courage to talk about the 'nature' of man? Do we know precisely where the limits of man's nature are to be found? We are even more at a loss if it is true that man is not only placed in a process of natural historical development, but also can and must change himself if he is to come to full stature and find true selfhood. Even if there is such a thing as this 'nature', can we recognise it, if by 'nature' we mean, not the tangible, concrete constitution of man as he is at any one time, but what is thought to be perennially valid and hence normative throughout all historical change? If there is such a 'nature' of man, if it is somehow present to man's understanding of himself, whether propositionally or not, do we come across it in any other way than in a particular historical form, where we are unable to distinguish clearly and unequivocally between the nature 'in itself' and its concrete, variable form? Is it not the case that saying 'No' in the name of morality and humanity has often been merely the mistaken and ultimately ineffectual refusal on the part of historical man to change himself and experience a new form of his reality, a new form of his 'nature'? May not the reverse be true, in a way: can there be a moral judgment based not simply on the 'eternal nature' of man as a primary 'law of nature', but one which draws its imperative from the particular form of man's nature which is committed to him at any one time as his historical destiny, such that he cannot act with impunity contrary to it, even if he has the power to do so? How can we recognise the boundary between the foolish 'No' of man when he will not let himself be changed, and this 'No', through which man holds fast to a particular form which, though historically limited, is the currently imperative form of his historical nature? If man is essentially an inhabitant of 'civilisation' and never merely a factor of nature, is it not possible to think that now this 'civilisation' is shaping his very self and no longer only his environment? This too could be considered as 'genetic manipulation'.

[231] At first sight it would appear that, in order to form an opinion of the moral quality of a particular instance of genetic manipulation, one would need to have a clear answer to all these questions, as well as the courage to give a definitive answer. At this juncture it will be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation obvious, however, that we can neither assume such an answer as given nor set out to provide one.[8]

II

Before trying to find a way of solving the problem under discussion without having to go into all the fundamental ethical questions which we have just raised, we must clarify certain fundamental problematical issues as they affect our particular question. Whatever the situation may be as regards the current judgments of modern men and specialists, man has a knowledge and understanding of his own nature, and this can exercise a normative function in his moral evaluations. But the question remains as to how far, if at all, this knowledge of the nature of man can take us in our particular inquiry. This dual statement must be expanded somewhat.

Man is essentially the subject: he is a person, aware of himself as a free being, and related, in this freedom, to the absolute mystery which we call 'God'. He experiences this a posteriori in his 'passive' subjectivity, in the flesh of history, in language and in the objective account of himself which he finds in 'civilisation'. Man's nature is constructed with a built-in transcendental necessity: man must inevitably affirm his own nature even in an action which seeks freely to deny it. Here we need not go into the question whether, further than trying to eliminate his nature as an individual – suicide being the most radical case – mankind as a whole could throw off its nature by implementing a process of 'civilisation in reverse', cultivating a species of intelligent animals which would live only unto themselves without being answerable for themselves. Such an action would be the most radical conceivable genetic manipulation. But qua action even this would be still the action of beings who would be denying explicitly what implicitly they cannot but affirm. The action itself like individual suicide, would do nothing to deny the transcendental necessity of man's nature. For because of his subjectivity, i.e. his a priori limitless transcendentality, he cannot be mistaken for merely the highest 'stage' of animal development. Hence it is clear that what we call 'immorality' is when this transcendental nature is violated by man's self-determining action. Yet this does not imply straightway that what is moral simply coincides with what is appropriate to this transcendental nature.

[232] We are left with a difficult question. Can we deduce a rule for distinguishing between morally justifiable and immoral genetic manipulation from this concept of morality as being in harmony with a transcendentally discoverable necessary nature? We can still see that genetic manipulation would be immoral if it tried to destroy or threaten man's nature as a free, subjective self-awareness in the flesh of history.[9] But the spokesmen of genetic manipulation would repudiate such a suggestion, even if one finds it hard to shake off the suspicion that the ideal they have in mind is of a gregarious animal who is, from the social, hygienic, economic and political points of view, at once the most co-operative and diligent and the easiest to manipulate.

However, does this definition of morality in terms of primary natural law help us any further in distinguishing critically between the various possible means and ends of genetic manipulation? Surely transcendental deduction cannot show a particular biological constitution of man to be so necessary that it had to be protected against genetic manipulation? For instance, no metaphysically-minded anthropologist would take it upon [8] cf. further observations above, pp. 214-17.

[9] At this point it is immaterial whether this kind of genetic manipulation is actually feasible without involving the liquidation of man's vital, personal sphere.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself to prove that a particular brain capacity or the appendix etc. were necessary accompaniments of man's ontological, morally imperative 'nature'. This being the case, how can one know that a genetic manipulation which removes man's development from the biosphere where it was previously a phylogenetic development steered only by 'nature', and places it under the conscious control of 'civilisation' (e.g. by seeking to increase considerably the quantity of brain cells, or to adapt man biologically to his technological environment, etc.) is contrary to this 'transcendental' nature of man and therefore immoral? At this point the theologian who proceeds by means of ontological categories finds himself in severe difficulties, for there is little, indeed almost nothing, in man's biological constitution which he can recognise as necessary to his nature: on the contrary it is plain to him that a great amount, e.g. a particular colour or amount of hair, racial characteristics, etc., certainly does not belong to his nature.

The relationship of man's ultimate and really irreducible 'nature' to his concrete biological constitution is a highly complex matter from the theological point of view too. The man who only does research on the problem of the physical appearance of the first men will have to be very careful when it comes to making inferences directly to the metaphysical 'nature' of such beings merely from this external picture. And the converse [233] is true: the fact that 'man' came into being as such by a conscious awakening and in responsible freedom does not tell us anything of the 'phenotypical' appearance of such a real man.[10] All the same (and not least since it constitutes authoritative Church teaching) the doctrine of the unity of body and spirit (soul) compels us to maintain a very intimate connection between man's transcendental nature and his biological constitution.

Then how can man reject particular, calculated changes in his biological make-up as immoral? Would not such a judgment be perilously similar to those aesthetic judgments which arise as a result of familiarity and unfamiliarity, fashion, and the inherited ideas and prejudices of a particular historical period? For at this point one ought conceivably to scrutinise more closely the connection between the biological side of man and his psychic side (subjectivity and personality) in order to be able to judge the immorality of this or that genetic manipulation. For example one might say that a genetic manipulation was wrong if it destroyed or damaged considerably the vital substratum needed for genuine human intercommunication.

Or one could take a critical look at the 'aims' governing a particular genetic manipulation, in an attempt to uncover whether they conflict with man's nature as a personal being. One would have to ask the planners how they envisage carrying out such a manipulation in concrete terms, and go on to decide what would be implied by the particular method, whether the method – measured by the standard of man's personal subjectivity – is compatible with the subject's area of freedom (which must be guaranteed), his 'dignity', his 'privacy' etc.

The question remains, however, as to whether this kind of individual casuistics really succeeds in taking us any further towards formulating clear judgments. Just when would a biological alteration seriously damage a man's 'nature' as a person? What kind of manipulation ought one to accept under certain circumstances, especially when one considers that, after all, most human beings are only modestly equipped for their achievement of personality? Which of the aims of biological manipulation are assuredly contrary to man's nature, when one remembers how very limited a function the individual has to play in any case in the life of humanity as a whole? For it must be admitted – unless we deceive ourselves in a naïve individualism – that the individual is largely 'exploited' [234] as such by [10] Further details in K. Rahner and P. Overhage, Das Problem der Hominisation (Freiburg,[3] 1965); P. Overhage, Um das Erscheinungsbild der ersten Menschen. Mit einer Einführung von Karl Rahner (Freiburg, 1959), pp. 11-30.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

society and humanity as a whole. If one appeals to the 'dignity' of the personal subject[11] against a particular method of genetic manipulation, if one appeals to his right to an area of freedom and privacy – and all these things arise, it is true, from man's transcendental nature – it must be recognised that they also constitute factors which are and have always been in competition with other necessary requirements of man – the claims of society, the rights of other men, and inevitable material and biological compulsions.[12] The more familiar factor, whose claims seem obvious as a result of custom, always inclines people to oppose the rights of a new and different factor.[13]

In consequence it seems that, from both the theoretical and practical points of view, we cannot get very far in the matter of morally evaluating the concrete forms of genetic manipulation, either as currently practised or as a future possibility, if we proceed by the methods of deductive, analytic and casuistic moral theology: the abstract concept of genetic manipulation cannot be shown to involve immorality per se. The critical evaluation of conceivable concrete forms of genetic manipulation rapidly disintegrates into a casuistics if it proceeds by using the abstract metaphysical nature of man as its term of reference. And in a casuistics of this sort it is to a large extent simply a case of one opinion against another. It is only the most extreme forms of genetic manipulation which exhibit clear-cut immorality, in trying unequivocally to liquidate or undermine man's nature, and of course it is not so much these instances which give rise to disagreement.

III

Is there another way of approaching the whole question? First of all some preliminary observations are necessary.

[235] So far we have been able to manage with a very formal, abstract concept of genetic manipulation. But if now we are to go beyond a discussion of the moral problems involved in this concept and try to make a moral judgment, we shall have to be more precise about the particular genetic manipulation we mean. Up to now the concept 'genetic manipulation' has been necessarily ambiguous because of the concrete plans and utopias of the 'man-makers'. This creates new difficulties. For it is not easy to say what the spokesmen of genetic manipulation have in mind for the future. As a result of this any description of genetic manipulation for the purposes of moral theology will be inevitably somewhat arbitrary.

In the first place the following must be borne in mind: we are not concerned, at least not directly, with defining and delimiting a phenomenon in criminal law. Not everything that is immoral must also be the object of legal proceedings on the part of society as organised into a state. So here the question is not whether the state, for instance, should suppress private experiments on human genetic material in private laboratories. This does not mean that, even if we were to exclude this question or answer it in the negative, our whole issue refers only to the sphere of private morals. For there are many places where private and public life cross,

---

[11] cf. K. Rahner, 'The dignity and freedom of Man', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore, 1963), pp. 235-263. For the frequently used concept of the 'area of freedom' cf. M. Horkheimer, K. Rahner, C. F. v. Weizsäcker, Über die Freiheit (Stuttgart,[2] 1965), pp. 26-49, esp. 34-44; 'Vorbemerkungen zum Problem der religiösen Freiheit', K. Rahner, H. Maier, U. Mann, M. Schmaus, Religionsfreiheit (Munich, 1966), pp. 7-23.

[12] cf. K. Rahner, 'Theology of Power', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore, 1966), pp. 391-409; also 'The peace of God and the peace of the world', Theological Investigations X.

[13] For example, think of the passionate protests which were once made against compulsory state vaccination in the name of the 'freedom of personality'. How many measures which are now accepted as normal in more highly developed human society were once rejected as immoral in the name of the free subject? And yet they are possible, even positively moral measures.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

many cases where society as a state influences the life of the individual, and, without having anything to do with criminal law and direct compulsory measures on the part of the state, they are yet dependent upon the latter; just as phenomena which are treated as, among other things, criminal social influences, are also subject to moral judgment. Thus the question could be raised, for instance, whether or not the state ought to make money available for experiments in state research establishments which have genetic manipulation in view, or whether it ought to permit or encourage aligned instruction and the implementation of genetic manipulation in places of public education, and so on.

But we are not to deal directly with these questions at this point. We are not concerned with either private or state eugenic measures in the usual sense (i.e. encouraging or suppressing particular desirable or undesirable marriage unions, marriage bans, private or state-organised birth-control, sterilising those who have undesirable hereditary characteristics etc.). We omit these questions simply because they do not constitute our present subject-matter. That is not to say that they are at the outset morally irrelevant, or that there is no danger at all of the state making immoral encroachments on the individual's sphere of freedom.

If we exclude these questions, the issues remaining to be discussed from the point of view of a moral evaluation of genetic manipulation are:

[236] 1. Biological experimentation with human genetic material;

2. Heterologous artificial insemination (A.I.D.).

As far as biological experiments with human genetic material are concerned, Catholic moral theology would have to distinguish between the moral evaluation of, on the one hand, obtaining the material in the first place, and on the other, the actual experiment itself. Since it is not certain, presupposing a distinction of this sort, that obtaining material for experiment is necessarily morally problematical, in practice the question of biological experimentation is reduced to the issue of the moral quality of the experiment itself as such. And in this case one would have to distinguish, in accordance with the perspectives and distinctions customary in Catholic moral theology, between experiments with unfertilised germ cells on the one hand (i.e. on separate male and female cells), and experiments involving test-tube fertilisations and further stages on the other.

The reason for this distinction is clear. Catholic theology presupposes that at the moment of union of the male and female cells a human being comes into existence as an individual person with his own rights. If this is the case, such a person is no more an inconsequential passive object for experiments than the prisoners of Nazi concentration camps were. The end does not justify the means. It would be to exploit a present human being for the sake of a future human being. A one-hour-old human being has as much right to the integrity of his person as a human being of nine months or sixty years.

Nowadays, however, the above-mentioned presupposition is no longer held with certainty, but is exposed to positive doubt. We cannot give reasons for this statement here: it must be assumed for the moment. Of course it does not follow from the fact of such an uncertainty that experiments with fertilised embryonic material are equivalent to morally indifferent experiments with mere 'things'. But it would be conceivable that, given a serious positive doubt about the human quality of the experimental material, the reasons in favour of experimenting might carry more weight, considered rationally, than the uncertain rights of a human being whose very existence is in doubt. This is not adduced to decide the issue one way or another, but only to show why this question too must be excluded from our consideration.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We are thus left only with heterologous artificial insemination as the concrete instance of genetic manipulation.[14] Homologous (inter-marital) [237] artificial insemination may be left on one side since, whatever moral judgment one may come to, it is a quite different moral problem from the heterologous case since the father and mother are married and the child thus produced is the child of this particular couple. Heterologous insemination is, however, a highly complex issue. First of all its immediate concrete implications are clear. But when one looks at the aims of genetic manipulation it means far more: the obtaining of male sperm, its storage and checking, the age factor, etc., and ultimately the establishment of and the whole organisation of a 'sperm bank' as a public institution in society, documentation of the qualitative characteristics of the sperm, legal questions of the identity or anonymity of the donor, the extra-marital use of this material, the necessity of the consent of the male marriage-partner, the question of determining 'fatherhood' in such a case, and of course the resultant question of providing instruction and propaganda for heterologous insemination. Furthermore, the spokesmen of this insemination are concerned so to propagate it and to actually establish it as the general practice of a whole population as to achieve considerable results for humanity, such as long life, intelligence, hygienic stability among wide population groups, etc.

Finally, at the outer limit of our actual problem there arises the question as to whether, above and beyond the heterologous insemination controlled with eugenic aims in view such as is currently possible, it would be either possible or desirable to develop a fertilised embryo outside a human womb and successfully bring it to the state of a complete human being, and whether experiments should be initiated with this aim in view. This issue can, however, be subsumed and discussed here under the general heading of artificial heterologous insemination, which, understood in the way we have outlined, will be considered from now on as the object of moral evaluation.

Before proceeding to try to answer the actual question itself (as a question which concerns man's free and responsible action), we must make some observations on the following approach to a moral judgment on genetic manipulation. Epistemologically this particular approach is considerably different from that of the remarks we have been making so far.

[238]

IV

In the case of those realities which have many layers and which cannot be adequately reached by analysis, there exists a moral mode of knowing. This moral knowledge itself has a structure which is both universal and not exhaustively analysable in conscious reflection. In a certain way it exercises a critical function in an area where 'is' and 'ought' mutually determine each other, but where what is 'objectively' right only becomes transparent to the person who has already embraced the correct attitude to it.

In other words, to adopt a term from the contemporary theology of faith, there is also a moral instinct of faith,[15] i.e. a universal knowledge of right and wrong belief. This 'instinctive' judgment cannot and need not, however, be adequately subject to analytic reflection. In the more concrete questions of morality this faith-instinct is clearly [14] cf. on the issue of heterologous artificial insemination the moral theological handbooks: B. Häring, Das Gesetz Christi III (Freiberg,[7] 1963), p. 367; J. Miller, LThK II (Freiburg,[2] 1958), pp. 104-105 (refs.); H. Thielicke, Theologische Ethik III (Tübingen, 1964), pp. 768-788 (refs.). On the legal problems cf. D. Giesen, 'Die künstliche Insemination als ethisches Problem' = Schriften zum deutschen und europäischen Zivil-, Handels- und Prozeßrecht 18 (Bielefeld, 1963).

[15] For a view of the history of this idea and the problems and implications involved in it from the standpoint of dogmatics cf. M. Seckler, Instinkt und Glaubenswille nach Thomas von Aquin (Mainz, 1961).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indispensable because such complex realities are involved which cannot successfully be subjected to analytic reflection – and yet they must be evaluated morally all the same. Wherever the judgment of this moral faith-instinct attempts to express itself in words regarding a particular issue, it naturally and inevitably works with the categories of rational analysis, 'reasons', conceptual arguments etc., and thus conceals its own character. But at bottom it knows that its judgments are not the resultant and formal logical sum of the rational considerations which it is able to 'objectivise'. Traditional moral theology has no name for the activity of this moral faith-instinct, although the instinct plays its part in the former. For instance, a merely 'rational' scrutiny of moral theological 'proofs' will often reveal – initially to one's great surprise – that, looked at purely 'logically', they already presuppose what they claim to be 'proving', or else they have recourse to Holy Scripture or the Church's magisterium as a final court of appeal, in spite of the fact that they were supposed to be dealing with questions of natural law, requiring an inner justification. What is really behind these 'proofs'? Under certain circumstances they are not as bad as they seem. They are ultimately an expression of the universal faith-instinct, which is by no means identical with its objectivisation in analytic terms.

Of course there are dangers in citing this kind of knowledge sui generis: it can be used merely to avoid producing what is sometimes [239] actually possible, namely, a more precise rational, analytic justification; it can be used as an argument where it does not, in fact, exist, where there is merely false 'evidence' rooted in historically conditioned prejudices, whether those of tradition, society or class ideology. Consequently it is fundamentally legitimate to be critical of this approach, especially when one thinks how much mischief and crime was perpetrated during the Nazi period in the name of 'the healthy instinct of the people'. But such criticism must neither dispute nor disregard the reality and rights of this universal instinct in reason and faith, irrespective of what it is to be called and how it is to be described and analysed from the point of view of formal epistemology.

Furthermore, this mode of knowing is active in human life wherever someone is 'committed' to a particular attitude: it is even active where the rationalistic sceptic gives expression to his scepticism vis-à-vis all so-called 'taboos', as he calls those things he wishes to reject. Denying the existence and legitimacy of such a mode of knowing cannot get rid of it: it can only obstruct the process of critical reflection upon opinions, opinions which are themselves – explicitly or implicitly – dependent on the results of this mode of knowing. One can only proceed with caution with regard to something if one has not, at the outset, denied its existence. Nor does this mode of knowing mean to curtail or even replace rationality, for it possesses this very rationality as one of its own elements. But it is necessary because what is moral, the concrete action to be performed, corresponds automatically to the unity of experienced and conceptual reality. It cannot wait while conceptual analysis – an essentially endless process – makes its conclusions; it demands that one should enter into the darkness of reality (which is never completely transparent) and have the courage to take the step from theory to practice. This action is never the mere application of concepts to an empty world of matter, enjoying no reality but what the abstract concepts give it. This kind of universal moral instinct of faith and reason can calmly take 'risks' provided that it is self-critically aware that its judgments contain unreflected elements which are, as such, contingent, subject to change; and that consequently a different judgment may be shown to be correct at a later time. All the same, a particular contingent judgment of this kind can still be the only correct one in its situation. The making of it requires a universal knowledge of the current situation; this knowledge is correctly grasped in the 'instinctive' judgment which recognises what is currently and properly called for, and this results in an 'appropriate' judgment.

Since it is made 'in general' and 'in principle', the judgment made by [240] a universal moral faith-instinct is not simply identical with what traditional moral theology calls a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'prudential' judgment,[16] nor with what I have described as an individual existential moral decision,[17] which cannot be adequately reduced to general concepts and their application to particular 'cases' and thus requires a 'logic of existential decisions'. The fact that there are these other phenomena in the moral field shows too, however, that what we have called the 'universal moral faith-instinct' must be present in the sphere of theoretical moral reasoning as well. For this fundamentally synthetic knowledge, formed by the unity of a prudential judgment and a unique moral existential situation, must clearly also be the case where the situation is 'per se' morally 'general' in nature, since this too is inaccessible to adequate, exhaustive reflection and analysis. Taking due account of this connection between the modes of knowledge, it is also justifiable to refer to the following moral phenomena as a demonstration of the mode of knowledge we have been discussing: the choice of a career or a marriage-partner is (or ought to be) a decision of solemn moral significance. Everyone admits – including the Church – that in considering the moral correctness of this kind of decision one may be aware of a large number of points of view and reasons for and against a particular decision; but in addition to all these factors the whole process of reflection includes a synthesising element, which cannot itself be reflected upon in isolation and yet must be present, so that, from among all the conflicting reasons for and against, one may observe the plain inner security which witnesses to a moral decision.

Here we cannot describe how this actually happens. It is certainly true that, in the examples we have quoted, the decisions involved are essentially individual in character (not least with regard to their objects). But we have already remarked that this same synthesising function of knowledge, by which we are able, so to speak, to see the wood in spite of all the trees, is also necessary where what is involved is only a general moral reality. And this latter is more complicated than the simple text-book model employed in the usual kind of moral theology.

The terrible consequences of ignoring the universal moral instinct of faith and reason, or of not having the courage to rely on it, can be seen [241] only too clearly, it seems to me, in a particular example of the most recent past. I refer to the simulated crisis of conscience concerning the production of a cheap Napalm bomb for the war in Vietnam, which Günter Wallraff fabricated and set before several prominent German moral theologians for their decision. We shall not relate the whole story in detail here. It is well known. In short it shows clearly that whenever a moral theologian merely dissects such a particular 'case' into a thousand aspects and individual problems and has the courage only to make abstract deductions from more general principles, merely engaging in 'casuistics'; whenever he fails to react simply and plainly from the instinct of faith to the single totality of the 'case', he arrives at 'solutions' which are simply blind to concrete reality; in plain language, they are false. Such 'solutions' do not exhibit the uncompromising simplicity of decisions which are truly Christian and human, and only reveal their own impotence. In order to see the helplessness of moral theology when it proceeds solely by analysis and deduction, one need only refer to the whole complex of problems involved in the moral evaluation, according to Catholic and Protestant moral theology, of making and using biochemical weapons. Even the Council was not able unequivocally to overcome this kind of mentality, which paralyses any action which could be said to be clearly Christian.

Of course, from the lofty standpoint of his subtle reasonings the 'speculative' moral theologian will object that this is to underestimate the complexity of the problem, that to [16] For the more recent problems cf. F. Furger, Gewissen und Klugheit in der katholischen Moraltheologie der Letzten Jahrzehnte (Luzern-Stuttgart, 1965).

[17] K. Rahner, Das Dynamische in der Kirche (Freiburg,[3] 1965); 'On the question of a formal Existential Ethics', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 217-234; Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln, 1965), pp. 499-536.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

adopt the method we have postulated is to make things too easy. But vis-à-vis this kind of moral theology which never finds a solution the following remarks must be made:

1. In moral questions a clear, decisive judgment cannot let itself be dependent on being accepted by everyone.[18]

2. Does not the moral theologian see that the uncertainty which is uniquely a concomitant of his rational-analytic method gives rise, in actual fact, to a practical judgment (which, to remain consistent, he must immediately pronounce to be an uncertain one); namely, the judgment implied by the activity of those men who are prepared to manufacture and produce the weapons referred to?

[242] 3. Cannot the moral theologian see that his method cannot be the only valid one if it leaves men in the lurch in such deeply decisive life-issues? He ought perhaps to consider that what has thus become apparent is simply the insufficiency of his method, which is by no means an argument against the existence of another 'method'. This insufficiency itself proves nothing: whatever had to remain an open and controversial question in the past was simply not a matter of fundamental vital importance; and what was of fundamental importance was already held by the instinct of faith as a fait accompli, and was also self-evident in society's public understanding before the theologian began his speculative and analytic operations. As a result he could not have noticed that he was unwittingly working according to a method which he had not subjected to reflection, and that consequently he was achieving sufficiently certain results with a method which he imagined to be a merely conceptual and analytic one.[19]

4. A further factor must be considered. Nowadays, when disputed moral questions are discussed, one hears the argument – even among Catholic moral theologians – that 'it is quite conceivable' that, for instance, in a few decades almost everyone will have no objection to a particular course of action, and that it will be regarded as morally permissible or morally irrelevant. These moral theologians then conclude that therefore one cannot raise any fundamental objection to it in the name of humanitarian or Christian ethics (not even for reasons of 'pastoral' prudence).

We cannot give a detailed discussion of this phenomenon. But the following seems relevant in this particular connection: it is quite possible for certain moral states of affairs to become incapable of realisation as a result of historical development; they may then cease to be recognised as such, and an infringement of them will no longer be regarded as 'subjectively' immoral. Since moral knowledge and moral reality are closely interrelated it may happen that this particular moral 'object' no longer exists to make its demands felt, not merely that there is no 'knowledge' of it.[20] But all this is no argument for seeing the history of this disappearance of the moral 'object' (and the knowledge of it) from moral consciousness as itself morally justifiable, nor that such a state of affairs should be accepted or encouraged, especially at a time when the pernicious nature [243] of such a historical development can still be recognised and combated. To recognise the possibility of a partial moral blindness in the future, or even to foresee it, is no reason for bringing it about or passively permitting it to occur. It may well be that, in the providence of God, such a development in a particular culture or historical setting can have positive results (like polygamy had at one time). But the [18] How can a Christian who believes in all sober intellectual honesty that he is justified in submitting himself to the absolute claims of faith, suddenly find it within him to hold such a view in a question which involves the very life and death of mankind, simply because his judgment is not shared by everyone? On the theological problem concerned here cf. K. Rahner, 'Intellectual honesty and Christian faith', Theological Investigations VII (London and New York, 1971), 47-71.

[19] I presuppose here the analyses of the contemporary situation of the Church in a secularised, pluralistic and atheistic world which I have given in the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1-2 (Freiburg, 1966).

[20] cf. initially K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 152-163.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fact that good can arise out of evil by no means justifies the evil, and can only be a consolation for the person who looks on helplessly in the face of such a development. So we must be very careful and reticent about citing future moral sensibilities. We are to question the moral character not only of the actual result, but also of the historical process itself.

Here we must break off. This is not the place to elucidate further this fundamental question of method. We could not, however, simply presuppose or by-pass the question as if it were already settled, because all the answers which we are suggesting here can only be appreciated and understood from within this method. And above all, this means that all the 'reasons' which are intended to form the basis for rejecting genetic manipulation are to be understood, at the very outset, as only so many references to the moral faith-instinct (and as so many appeals to it, to have the courage to take a clear decision). For in my view the moral faith-instinct is aware of its right and obligation to reject genetic manipulation, even without going through (or being able to go through) an adequate process of reflection.

V

These more methodological remarks have already shown indirectly that the 'definition' of man cannot deal exclusively with the element of man's self-determination, however essential and decisive this particular constitutional element must remain when we talk about him. Man's finite nature implies that, however much he may conceivably (and even legitimately) submit his own self to planning, he is no less a being whose essence has been predetermined. He must accept this particular existentiale as well as the task of self-determination. We must now relate this fundamental anthropological and ethical insight to the concrete problem under discussion, and then draw the appropriate and necessary conclusions.

1. Man must freely accept his nature as being predetermined. For he has not called himself into existence. He has been projected into a particular world, and although this world is presented to him for his free acceptance or rejection, he has not chosen it himself. It is rather that the world [244] confronts him as something which has been determined from another quarter, before he embarks on his own history as a free being. Consequently the world can never be 'worked over' to such an extent that man is eventually dealing only with material he has chosen and created. Even if it were exhaustively calculated and planned in advance by the parents, the very stuff which is the precondition of the test-tube baby's freedom is (as far as the baby itself is concerned – and this 'self' is what is decisive) something already decided by someone else, something alien, like the genes one receives according to natural conception at the present time. It is part of the test-tube child's freedom to ask why he is obliged to shape his whole lifelong history out of the particular material which his parents have so wisely and thoughtfully selected for him by means of technology and planning. The question still remains as to whether, having had one's 'good fortune' planned and predetermined, one really considers oneself to be 'fortunate'. Accepting this necessarily alien determination of one's own being is and remains, therefore, a fundamental task of man in his free moral existence. All this can be understood, by 'transcendental deduction', as a necessarily given factor of man's nature. Wherever the amor fati – fatum in the sense of what is uniquely committed to the individual – is no longer achieved, and wherever this fatum is no longer accepted confidently in patience and humility as the gift of an incomprehensible love, man is subject to total neurosis, to a basic fear concerning his destiny which weighs more heavily on him than all the things which, as a result of this fear, he tries to escape from. Man's fundamental guilt is the consequence of his freely refusing to accept this gift.

2. However, although this existentiale and what it implies (the task of free decision) exercises its sovereign influence in the ultimate ground of man's being, it must also take on a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

corresponding 'categorial', tangible form in time and space, lest, banished from man's existence, it should be forgotten and ultimately freely denied by him.

Now man is in a certain respect most free when he is not dealing with a 'thing' but calling into being another, freely responsible person. If he is not to conceal or fall short of his nature, man must be presented clearly with the dialectically opposite position of his freedom as a man. And in concrete terms that means that the freedom to determine another person must remain a clear-cut and radical destiny, which one has not chosen but accepted. Procreation in particular must not become an act of neurotic anxiety in the face of fate. The other person must remain the one who is both made and accepted; both an elevating influence, because he has been [245] chosen, and a burden to be accepted and carried. If man, when confronted with his child, saw only what he had himself planned, he would not be looking at his own nature, nor would he experience his true self which is both free and the object of external determination. Genetic manipulation is the embodiment of the fear of oneself, the fear of accepting one's self as the unknown quantity it is.

Someone might say that even genetic manipulation cannot really get rid of every indeterminate element in procreation and that therefore genetic manipulation does not run counter to what we have said. (In any case, surely certain 'eugenic precautions' are not really reprehensible?) In this case we must answer with another question: What, in actual fact, is the driving force behind genetic manipulation? What sort of person is driven to it? And the answer would be, in the first place, the hate of one's destiny; and secondly, it is the man who, at his innermost level, is in despair because he cannot dispose of existence. In genetic manipulation such a man clearly and unequivocally oversteps the boundary between legitimate eugenic precautions and the realm tyrannised by the desperate fear of destiny. Even in those cases where no precise boundary can be set, one can see that a particular action undoubtedly exceeds it. This is plain in the case in hand, since the concrete genetic manipulation is governed by the desire to banish the fatum from existence, at a particular point. To the extent that this intention does not quite succeed, it is contrary to the original desire, for this desire hates destiny and can only love – as the product of its own free action – what it has calculated and planned. It no longer desires to say 'I have gotten a man from the Lord' – from God, who cannot be manipulated and who must be concretely present in man's existence. The essence of this rather more theological conclusion can be seen just as clearly in the dimensions of concrete anthropology: Does man in the concrete – who is not a mere abstract concept – really wish, in accepting genetic manipulation, to accept what cannot be predetermined? Has he actually the courage to take a decision, the results of which are unforeseeable? Does he really want to enter into a future of open possibilities, full of both threatening and promising surprises? And if his will fails at this point, will he ever find it again in any other area of his existence? Or is he like a man who only wants to perform a particular function of his nature when it is too late for him to do otherwise, and who will thus not be really able to carry it out even then? These are the decisive questions.

3. Man has his own sphere of intimacy. Historically and sociologically its concrete form can vary considerably. But whether it is technologically [246] possible to abolish it is not the point, for this sphere of intimacy should exist, and ought to be resolutely safeguarded. It forms the innermost region of freedom which man needs in order to be really self-determining. At whatever point anyone else is able and is permitted arbitrarily to invade another person's private area of free decision, freedom itself ceases to exist.

Man is right to designate the ultimate achievement of sexual union as belonging to this area of intimacy. For human sexuality, as a free activity, both is and ought to be more than a merely biological function; namely, an activity of the whole human being: the appearance

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and realisation of personal love.[21] Now this personal love which is consummated sexually has within it an essential inner relation to the child, for the child is an embodiment of the abiding unity of the marriage-partners which is expressed in marital union. Genetic manipulation, however, does two things: it fundamentally separates the marital union from the procreation of a new person as this permanent embodiment of the unity of married love; and it transfers procreation, isolated and torn from its human matrix, to an area outside man's sphere of intimacy. It is this sphere of intimacy which is the proper context for sexual union, which itself implies the fundamental readiness of the marriage-partners to let their unity take the form of a child.

The fact that it is technologically possible to effect the changes involved in genetic manipulation while at the same time producing a new human being is no argument against the essential connectedness of the factors we have just referred to (the sphere of intimacy – the union of marital love – the child as the permanent form of this union). For the child produced by such a method is, in this sense, the child of the mother and of the donor. The latter refuses, however, to acknowledge his fatherhood in an act of personal love: he remains anonymous or at least does not wish to be the donor in respect of this particular mother; precisely through his anonymity he robs the child of the right and ability to fulfil the obligation of his existence, namely to accept himself as the child of these particular parents. Genetic manipulation of this sort is no more 'human', merely because it produces a human being, than a case of rape. The fact that a biological chain of cause-and-effect is not broken, even when the moral/human unity and the whole of really human meaningfulness receives a mortal blow (for the 'biological' side is intended to be an expression of this total meaningfulness), does nothing, in itself, to justify its own occurrence.

[247] 4. What we have just said is directed against the desire (which is at least implicit in genetic manipulation) to plan man totally; it runs counter to the nature of man in the sense we have outlined. Consequently saying 'No' to this desire is not dependent on the question of its feasibility, and it is both possible and permissible to ask the further question, whether this desire could be totally realised, and what would be the moral implication of a failure in the execution of these plans.[22]

Initially we should have to answer the first part of the question in the negative. It can confidently be said that it would be impossible, from the technological point of view, to implement a genetic manipulation involving all future human beings, because, however much apparatus and 'automation' one had at one's disposal, the fact that one would have to deal with each human being as an individual[23] would imply such a vast quantity of active 'manipulators' that it would take up, per absurdum, the whole of mankind's attention and energy. But what would be the moral significance of the impossibility of producing the whole of future mankind by genetic manipulation?

In the first place it does not mean – as we shall show more clearly a posteriori – that a partial genetic manipulation is morally admissible, i.e. on the grounds that in any case 'not much' will happen. The practical impossibility of overstepping a particular quantitative limit is by no means a reason for morally justifying any action within that limit. If everyone told lies, for instance, the telling of lies would have no effect, because no-one would believe a liar any more. But that does not make a limited dose of lies a morally justifiable thing. Furthermore, if a partial genetic manipulation became normal practice, consciously recognised by society, it would create two new 'races' in mankind: the technologically

[21] cf. the Pastoral Constitution of the Second Vatican Council, Gaudium et spes, Nos. 47-52.
[22] We need not go into the first part of the question in so far as the concrete details are concerned; that belongs to the field of natural science.
[23] Here we can pass over the question as to whether it is possible or impossible to synthesise the hereditary material itself in large quantities.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

manipulated, super-bred test-tube men who inevitably would have a special status in society, and the 'ordinary', unselected, mass-produced humans, procreated in the old way. But what new social tensions would arise from this, and at a time when racial discrimination and racial conflicts are laboriously being dismantled so that a gigantic, tightly-packed humanity can exist peacefully! Or is one to believe that this group of test-tube men, whose intelligence quotients would be clearly considerably higher from birth, would not aspire to such a unique position in society, and that the remaining herd of humanity (without 'pedigree') [248] would obey them? But would the rest of mankind, remaining at least as intelligent, revolutionary and violent as we are, readily accept the leadership of pedigree test-tube men? All this would probably not happen provided that the number of genetically manipulated men were very small, and that for that very reason they could not lay claim to be the exclusive leaders of society. But in such a case the spokesmen of manipulation would not have achieved the very results they want, namely, to create mankind's elite of leaders, able to claim the right of leadership on account of their genetic qualifications. However, it must be declared immoral to plan to produce such conflict-laden material with its unforeseeable consequences. It constitutes a threat to man and to mankind.

5. Nowadays we are trying to extend and secure the individual's area of freedom. It is one of mankind's moral commissions. To pursue the practical possibility of genetically manipulating man is to threaten and encroach upon this free area. For it offers incalculable opportunities of man's manipulation – reaching to the very roots of his existence – by organised society, i.e. the state. This in turn subjects the state to the strong temptation of itself manipulating the genetic manipulation. And unless one adopts the radically false view (which is untenable from both the philosophical and the Christian standpoints) that what the state wants is automatically good and just, it must be acknowledged that, over and above the essential inner perversity of genetic manipulation, this gives the state the power of further immoral action in using it for its own purposes, to create men who suit its own predilections.

Let no-one say that every new and legitimate possibility always involves the temptation for man to misuse it, and that it is not thereby immoral, but must just be protected against abuse. The danger of misusing a newly created possibility may be taken into account if this new possibility is in itself justifiable and seems to be inevitable and required by man. But is this the case in genetic manipulation? What compelling aims does it have in view? That men should be able to grow a little older? But is that really desirable with the present size of world population, etc.? In any case, is this the right way – it is not the only way – to set about it? Or is the main aim that man should be genetically more intelligent and cultured? But is it true that higher intelligence is clearly correlated with a more highly developed humane sensitivity? Is the kind of intelligence which can be 'bred' in this way the kind we need today, i.e. the intelligence of wisdom, moral responsibility and selflessness? (For the other kind, the 'technical' kind of intelligence can be adequately increased by means of computers and cybernetics.) What is the point of genetic [249] manipulation if not to extend the state's area of control and thus to diminish, instead of to increase, man's sphere of freedom? It would be wiser not to put weapons into the hands of one's aggressors.

6. In future man must develop a critical attitude towards the fascination exercised by every new possibility. Here, in general terms, we have a new moral commission.

Essentially it has always been possible to see that not everything which can be done, ought to be done.[24] The possibilities available to man in earlier days were, however, very stable, and as a result they had been tested countless times. The possibilities for evil (and they were [24] Of course, in a real and most profound sense one cannot 'do' something which is really immoral, for evil, measured against the whole of reality (including man in all his dimensions and God as well), is always impotent and ineffectual. Cf. also B. Welte, Über das Böse (Freiburg, 1959).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

relatively simple and clear-cut) were recognised promptly as such, since they were of a common and general nature, e.g. that 'cheats never prosper', tyranny is eventually self-destructive, excessive indulgence destroys the ability to enjoy, etc. The situation was simple: one knew what one ought not to do because one had already experienced the fact that such things were not really lasting possibilities in the long run, although one could 'get away with it' for a time. But the past did teach a sound doctrine: one should not do everything one is able to do; there are times when the attraction of the possible must be resisted.

Nowadays the situation is different. New and practical possibilities are set before us in relatively rapid succession, and they have vast and far-reaching effects. It is a strange factor of the dialectic of the accelerating movement of our history that these new possibilities can be discovered more quickly than their ultimate effects can be ascertained by practical tests. This is why it is so vital for humanity to develop a resistance to the fascination of novel possibilities. Of course there are 'feedback' effects in the field of social morality too, and they put a brake on the lure of novelty: the latest attraction in the form of the mini-skirt becomes monotonous when everyone is wearing it; and if almost everyone adopts the policy of limiting the size of the family because of the demands it makes, a large family will suddenly become an 'attractive' possibility and even gain a new social prestige. But there is no guarantee that such feedback effects can be relied upon in social morality in every case. The irreparable catastrophe can already have taken place before any feedback has had time to take effect. In certain cases to create immunity from moral diseases requires more time than the disease itself allows.

[250] Nowadays there are things with which one cannot have a preliminary run through, in order to gain experience for the next occasion and become wiser through trial and error. Or should one first of all arrange a 'trial run' for a total atomic war, for instance, before deciding to avoid a second one? Today we must be aware that a thing may have irreversible consequences.[25] This is a fundamental conviction of Christianity's theology of history; in spite of the multifarious possible recombinations Christianity sees the course of history as being ultimately a one-way street.[26] At all events, if the new humanity of the future is to survive, it must cultivate a sober and critical resistance to the fascination of novel possibilities.

Genetic manipulation seems to be, initially, a case in point. Are there any reasons against such a view? There could only be objections if there were considerable reasons in favour of genetic manipulation from other quarters. Like what, for instance? That we must bring the decline of intelligence and bodily health under control? But has anyone proved such a decline to be a fact? Or if it is partially the case, has it been shown that it could not be brought under control in another way? No such proofs are forthcoming.

7. There is another side to the fascination of novelty. The suggestion is that new possibilities will become actualities all the same; that nothing can resist them and that to offer any resistance is to be backing a loser; that one is being old-fashioned and stick-in-the-mud by not joining forces with the heralds of the 'new age'. On the contrary, it is one of the fundamental duties of a genuinely moral and Christian man to endeavour to do precisely this: to be absolutely faithful to a thing in a situation where it seems hopelessly doomed to failure. The biological end of an individual is not the only death of which one must not be afraid. There are other kinds of apparent death which one must not fear. History is not made by those who try to foresee what is 'inevitable' so that they can jump on the cart of fate in good time, but by those who are prepared to take the ultimate risk of defeat. No-one can say that genetic [25] cf. the previous article in this volume, pp. 205-224.

[26] For the significance of the dogma of Original Sin in this connection cf. note 25 above; also a study at present in preparation on the subject of Evolution und Erbsünde (Freiburg, 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

manipulation inevitably will come. The only person who 'knows' such a thing is the man who secretly wishes it to be so.

Is that kind of man a trustworthy prophet? Why should not mankind as a whole have to learn the lessons every individual has to learn in his [251] own life if he is to survive, namely, the lessons of sacrifice and renunciation?[27] After all we have said, the issue of sacrifice and renunciation is in this sense a 'rational' one and not the unreal fantasy of masochistic minds perversely obstructing their own progress. It is by no means certain that mankind will always be able to remain at the juvenile stage where it can only do the sort of 'mischief' which does not matter very much. That is surely another most valuable insight of our time. So then, if mankind as a whole must seek to learn the renunciation characteristic of maturity, it cannot be said that a rejection of genetic manipulation has 'no prospects' from the very beginning.

In conclusion let us recapitulate in order to understand the whole in the proper light. We do not claim that these observations against genetic manipulation are complete; rather they constitute an appeal to, and the inadequate objectifying of, a humane and Christian 'instinct' which can be discovered in the moral field. A moral awareness of this kind (which both is and does more than we have mentioned here) forms the context in which man has the courage to make decisions; thus a decision is also more than its rationale, because the act is always more than its theoretical foundation. This 'instinct' justifiably has the courage to say Stat pro ratione voluntas because such a confession need not necessarily be overcautious about making a decision. On the contrary it can claim to be the first really to make room for the possibility of genuine criticism and to bring to light the justification, implications and limitations of a real theoretical foundation. All theoretical reasoning always says (among other things), 'We do not want to manipulate man genetically'; but this will is meaningful in spite of the fact that it neither claims nor is obliged to be exhaustively analysable by theoretical reason; measured against the opposite will, this will is more deeply meaningful and more genuinely human. It must accept the risks involved in history and the unpredictable, [252] in order to find out whether it is stronger than its converse, and whether it can endow its theoretical meaningfulness with the particular radiance which is the exclusive characteristic of performed reality. Modern man is faced with making this decision.

Of course, in saying this we have raised yet another problem. Right from the beginning, rejecting man's genetic manipulation is not a merely theoretical declaration but a deliberate act. Consequently this theoretical discussion cannot be supported conclusively by the general, formal authority of the Christian churches alone. And so, as in many other cases in moral theology, we are faced today with a new, additional question of great importance: How, in concrete terms, can such a rejection (of genetic manipulation) be established in modern [27] On this issue cf. the author's short contribution on the necessity of renunciation in Festschrift für Wilhelm Bitter, ed. G. Zacharias (Stuttgart, 1968) – given in this volume pp. 253 ff. From this standpoint one would have to go on to scrutinise the internal factors governing this intramundane 'design for the future', and its relation to the 'absolute future' and to the overcoming of death, etc. Cf. K. Rahner in the previous article, pp. 205-224; also his 'Ideology and Christianity; Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 43-58, 59-68; 'Christian Humanism', in this volume, pp. 187-204.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

society as society's own maxim, its own inner attitude and 'instinct', in the face of society's 'pluralism'? However, this particular problem of moral and pastoral theology is part of a wider issue[28] which cannot be pursued further within the limits of the present discussion.

[28] Some pointers are given in K. Rahner, 'Reflections on Dialogue within a pluralistic society', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 31-42.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[253]

15

SELF-REALISATION AND TAKING UP ONE'S CROSS

Perhaps it is possible to say something of 'psychological' importance even without psychology. Something said in a very abstract way can be concrete because it reveals more clearly what is universally valid but is easily obscured by things of secondary importance. Today one sometimes has the impression that people very often become unhappy because they want to be happy at any price. They are suffering from frustration anxiety: they think they might miss something, that something might escape them before they have to go; and at the same time they know that very soon they must go and that there is not much time left in which anything can happen to bring happiness. That is why they think that the most important thing is to take care not to let anything slip past them. But in reality this fear of not having consumed everything spread out on the table of life means that nothing is enjoyed: everything is merely 'crammed' in, the digestion is spoilt. In the last analysis everything has escaped one after all, and nothing is really experienced because one wanted to experience everything.

It is easy to see that this is not the way. Everyone knows that really. For one only needs to bear this in mind – and here we use abstract terms, so that we can see better; the possibilities available to free action are always greater than what can be realised; one can never be everywhere at the same time; to embrace one possibility is always to renounce another, unless one had an unlimited life-span. For man always looks beyond what he has realised, and what he sees is not only the promise of new things to come, but also the renunciation of much, indeed, of everything except that minute portion which can be realised; there is much which will not come again, because it would only have been possible in the place now occupied by what has in fact been realised. Narrow reality is death to infinite possibility; the latter dies unborn in the womb of reality. All this, as we have said, is easy to see. The consequence is clear too, namely that the ability calmly to let things go past is one of the great arts of life which are necessary to make our existence free and bearable.

[254] But in reality this ancient wisdom of the necessity of 'proportion' does not banish our frustration anxiety. For something in us asks, Why should we calmly let what is possible go by, and only hang on to so little? Perhaps we have got hold of the wrong thing and have let the right thing, the thing which can unbind us and hence redeem us, pass by. How is one to know? One cannot seriously test every possibility as such; one can only test the things one has really examined; consequently one never knows, in being modest and restrained, whether one has put one's money on the wrong card or not. So instead, 'everything' – everything as far as possible, that is – must be tried, even if one knows that it is not really possible. Frustration anxiety continues to gnaw away; it knows it is senseless, but that does not kill it. The wisdom of keeping proportion becomes perverted into a cunning method of the part of frustration anxiety, scheming to extract as much as possible all the same from the empty wealth of possibilities. So in the end this itself becomes ineffective. All that remains is the desperate conviction that this is no good either. One is not alone in having frustration anxiety, one's own frustration anxiety has one too. It is not the force which keeps life moving, but it steers it, steers it into the void.

Are we then left with the only alternative of renouncing the thirst for existence, renouncing the will, 'seeing through' any initiation of action as the beginning of meaninglessness? But is it possible? Does it make sense? Is not this too another 'art of living' in disguise, is it not again merely another form of the blind impulse of life, trying in this way to reach its goal, in this case at least the happiness of silencing its own wishes? And does it really follow automatically or is it the absurd attempt, by saying a particular Yes, to utter a total No, and thus secretly to arrive back at a total Yes? For the activity of the will to live is itself still an act, and consequently it affirms what it wants to surrender. Can one really 'let go' of oneself right from the very root of one's being, in order to attain to the ability calmly to let go of the individual possibilities, except by being 'taken' from oneself? But by whom?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If death is life, i.e. if to relinquish the particular is actually not to lose but to gain everything, frustration anxiety is defeated Not as if the void were in itself actually the 'fulness' – we do not really seriously believe that cheap dialectical trick of words. The 'fulness' is not to be pieced together from the sum total of particular finite possibilities, but lies ahead of us as the one, whole, 'absolute' future, which in Christian terms we are accustomed to call 'God' He is ready to give himself to us if we succeed in 'letting go' It is true that we do not immediately come to possess this [255] fulness as soon as the absolute future (which contains the as yet unappropriated fulness and desires to give itself to us) enables us to let go. Whenever this marvel really takes place, and we simply let go, calmly in harmony with it, frustration anxiety is conquered at its very roots. Little reality is taken up as the promise of an infinite future, not as something which means the latter's death. We cannot 'ascertain' that all this happens to us in actual fact; we can only do it as the final act, an act which does not take pleasure in itself nor affirm itself consciously, an act which is given to us as our own particular act.

'God', 'grace', 'justification', 'freedom', 'faith', 'gift', 'task' (and all the other fundamental Christian concepts) are realities in this event of calm renunciation, and they are secretly understood as such. Everything implied by these words – the abandoning of oneself in the hope of finding the inconceivable fulness – takes place in the ultimately inaccessible depths of one's freedom when this freedom calmly 'lets go', i.e. lets the particular die, believing in hope that in this way (and ultimately only in this way) the whole, the fulness, 'God' will be received. This is not done only in order to receive the whole, for the particular too may and must be willed in a spirit of calmness.

In Christian terms this kind of renunciation in letting things die in faith and hope is called taking up one's cross. As an act of free acceptance it takes a step in the direction of death's inevitability and is thus a preliminary exercise in the acceptance of that particular death which is our unavoidable lot. Scripture calls this 'denying oneself and taking up one's cross'.

Where human qualities are fully developed, even if this cannot be subjected adequately to concrete reflection, the acceptance (of the cross) does not only occur in freedom's uttermost depths (together with its permanently ambiguous objectifications in the history of the individual); it does not merely 'occur', it also knows about itself, though in hope, not in the manner of reflection. Since man is an intercommunicative being and is only able to see himself clearly in another person, this acceptance knows about itself by perceiving another person – the Other Person – taking up his cross as the event of life. In him it can be seen that there is such an acceptance. As Christians we believe that we see Jesus of Nazareth as this Other Person taking up his cross. And in doing so we do not believe that he is only a sort of 'productive example' for us which really might just as well not be there. We believe rather that God lays the cross upon us and, within it, his own fulness, because he wills Jesus of Nazareth and has accepted and worked in him as his own life in time and history.

[256] The true 'productive example' is the one which really empowers and enables us. For this reason Jesus of Nazareth is the 'source of salvation', the Redeemer. We Christians acknowledge him as the Crucified; we confess him as the 'Risen' one, since, in the unity of the experience of the Spirit, who sets us free to take up the cross, and of the testimony of his disciples, we believe that in this death the arrival of God's life itself has taken place in the whole of man's reality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The person who, in a hope which no longer seeks to reassure itself, relinquishes himself in the depths of the mystery of existence, in which death and life can no longer be distinguished because they can only be grasped together, actually believes in the Crucified and Risen one, even if he is not aware of it (in conceptual terms). But to know of him explicitly is good and brings the promise of salvation. It is an assurance that one will be given one's own cross to take up as one's own, ultimate act of freedom.

Taking up one's cross has many forms. In what follows we shall dwell particularly on two of them. The first is to accept being disappointed – being 'undeceived' – by life. At the very latest this happens in death, provided that one does not actually try to deceive oneself about it – which never quite comes off. In this connection it must not be forgotten that dying already takes place in life, for life is itself prolixitas mortis, as Gregory the Great says. The second form, perhaps the most radical case of disappointment – of being 'undeceived' – occurs when one loves although this love does not, or no longer, 'pays off', nor tries to take pleasure in itself as a heroic selflessness. The attempt to produce this kind of pleasure – which is at bottom impossible – is the aim of all those glorifications of life to be found in sentimental novels à la Reader's Digest, where everything ends happily without any genuine dying. Is it not true that many exponents of psychotherapy use this same treatment? Cannot one avoid facing the fact that life is a dying if one arranges things cleverly?

There are probably only two ways of living: being driven by frustration anxiety, and the acceptance of the cross, which, whether acknowledged as such openly or not, is the Cross of Christ. Strangely enough, each of these ways of life can mimic the other. Probably it must be so; otherwise we could 'judge' ourselves. What the psychologist gets direct hold of is never one or other of these ways of living in itself, but at best its objectification, which is always equivocal. What seems to be a neurotic, even culpably incurred frustration anxiety, can be that very dying by which, in a hidden acceptance, the cross of life is taken up in suffering. [257] What presents a 'healthy' and 'balanced' appearance can be the result of a frustration anxiety which is driving the person to avoid taking up his cross.

Basically one need not be afraid that the acceptance of one's cross necessarily leads to passivity and resignation in the face of the concrete tasks of life. The man who does not fear death, or rather, who accepts the abiding fear of death, can enjoy the particular good things of life which come to him because they are a genuine promise of the absolute future. He is able to risk his whole self. He is free to love without sparing himself. He does not need to overtax this life's happiness and thus spoil it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[258-262]

VOLUME 9

LIST OF SOURCES

THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL'S CHALLENGE TO THEOLOGY
A contribution to a projected symposium volume entitled 'The Future of the Church', edited by Mgr Otto Mauer (Verlag Herder and Vienna). Delivered as a lecture at the International Theological Congress of the University of Notre Dame (USA) on 23 March 1966. Also repeated to American students of theology at Munich on 14 February 1966 and, in altered form, in the Kongresshalle, Berlin, on 6 June 1966 at the invitation of the Lessing-Hochschule (Urania). First published in the American volume, K. Rahner, The Church after the Council (New York, 1966, Herder and Herder).

THEOLOGY AND ANTHROPOLOGY
A lecture delivered at the Theological Symposium of St Xavier's College, Chicago (USA) on 31 March 1966. First published in Künftige Aufgaben der Theologie, edited by P. Burke (Munich, 1967), pp. 31-60 also as a contribution to Wahrheit und Verkündigung. M. Schmaus zum 70. Geburtstag, edited by L. Scheffczyk, W. Dettloff, R. Heinzmann (Paderborn, 1967), Vol. II, pp. 1389-1407.

PHILOSOPHY AND PHILOSOPHISING IN THEOLOGY
A lecture given at the Conference of the Study Group of German-speaking Dogmatic Theologians in Munich from 3 to 5 January 1967. It was repeated at a conference of the Katholiscke Akademie in Bayern on 9 April 1967 at Munich. The lecture was subsequently expanded, and excerpts from it were delivered on 17 May 1967 at a meeting of the Munich Circle of Friends of the Evangelische Akademie Tutzing in a conference entitled 'Faith – Theology – Science' (a joint lecture with platform discussion of connected questions in collaboration with Professor Dr U. Mann of Saarbrücken); at the invitation of the Faculty of Protestant Theology of the University on 20 June 1967 at Göttingen; as a lecture in English given in October 1967 in the course of a lecture tour of various universities and colleges in the United States. The study is likewise designed as a contribution to a symposium volume, Die Zukunft der Phiosophie, edited by J. B. Metz and H. R. Schlette (Olten-Freiburg, 1968, Walter-Verlag).

THE HISTORICITY OF THEOLOGY
Delivered at Barcelona on 11 March 1966 as a lecture, on the occasion of the founding of the Spanish branch of the Paulus Society. In expanded form it again provided the basis of a lecture at a research discussion from 25 to 29 September 1967 at the Centre for International Research at the University of Salzburg (Director, Professor Dr Thomas Michels O.S.B.). First published in Integritas. Geistliche Wandlung und menschliche Wirklichkeit, edited by D. Stolte and R. Wisser, and dedicated to K. Holzamer (Tübingen, 1967), pp. 75-95.

THEOLOGY AND THE CHURCH'S TEACHING AUTHORITY AFTER THE COUNCIL
Delivered in English in October 1967, m the course of a lecture tour of various universities in the United States. First published in Stimmen der Zeit 178 (1966), pp. 404-420.

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY WITHIN THE TOTALITY OF THEOLOGICAL DISCIPLINES

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A paper read at Arnoldshain on 5-6 April 1967 at a study group conference of the Ch. Kaiser Verlag (Munich), concerning the nature and function of practical theology. (Other contributors, Professor Dr E. Jüngel and Professor Dr M. Seitz.) The Kaiser Verlag is preparing a volume in which the other papers will also be published, together with a discussion.

THE NEED FOR A 'SHORT FORMULA' OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH
An initial projection of the 'short formula' itself was published in the periodical, Geist und Leben 38 (1965), pp. 374-379, under the title 'Kurzer Inbegriff des christlichen Glaubens für "Ungläubiger"'. A version which was expanded so as to include several further aspects later appeared under the title given above in the periodical Concilium 3 (1967), pp. 203-207.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF GOD IN CATHOLIC DOGMATICS
Lecture given at the University of Marburg on 16 July 1965 at the invitation of the Institute of Hermeneutics of the Theological Faculty of the University of Marburg (Professor Dr Ernst Fuchs). On the following day a fuller exchange of views concerning the contents of the lecture took place with Professor Dr Ernst Fuchs and Professor Dr Gerhard Ebeling. An invitation lecture at the College of Philosophy and Theology at Regensburg on 10 December 1965. First published in Catholica 20 (1966), pp. 1-18.

ATHEISM AND IMPLICIT CHRISTIANITY
Used as the basis of a lecture given in the course of a tour of several universities in the USA in October 1967. An initial brief version of this study was published in Concilium 3 (1967), pp. 171-180, under the title 'The Teaching of the Second Vatican Council on Atheism'. The Study as it appears in the present volume, in a considerably expanded form, was prepared for the major work, designed to appear in several volumes and in several different languages, entitled L'Ateismo Contemporaneo (Società Editrice Internazionale, Turin, 1967; German version published by Verlag Hueber, Munich, 1968).

'I BELIEVE IN JESUS CHRIST'
This essay was originally composed as a broadcast talk in the series In Defence of Thought (Interpretation of the Creed), and was transmitted by the South German Radio in the spring of 1967. First published in the edited series of broadcast talks entitled Das Glaubensbekenntnis. Aspekte für ein neues Verständnis, edited by G. Rein (Stuttgart, 1967), pp. 20-23.

ONE MEDIATOR AND MANY MEDIATIONS
Lecture delivered at Mainz on 24 June 1966 at the invitation of the Institute of European History (Professor Dr Joseph Lortz), and at Munster on 17 February 1967 at the invitation of the Institute of Ecumenical Theology of the University of Munster (Professor Dr E. Iserloh). An expanded version of the study appeared as a published paper of the Institute of European History at Mainz, Lecture No. 47 (Wiesbaden, 1967). The version printed in this volume has again been revised, chiefly in respect of the notes.

CHRISTIAN HUMANISM
A lecture given at the Conference on 'Christian Humanity and Marxist Humanism' held at Herrenchiemsee on 29 April 1966 under the auspices of the Paulus Society. The manuscript was used in altered form as the basis of a lecture delivered on 15 November 1966 at the University Week at Düsseldorf also at an Evening of the Society of Catholic Students at the University of Cologne on 5 December 1966, and at the invitation of the Reuchlin Society at Pforzheim on 15 December 1966. An initial version, including the most important points,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

appeared in Orientierung 30 (1966), No. 10 (of 31 May), pp. 116-121. The study also appeared in revised form and with added notes in the symposium volume, Menschliche Existenz und moderne Welt. Ein internationales Symposion zum Selbstverständnis des heutigen Menschen, edited by R. Schwarz (Berlin, 1967), Vol. I, pp. 137-148.

THE EXPERIMENT WITH MAN

This lecture was initially delivered at The Hague on 25 September 1965 at the invitation of the Dutch Society of St Adelbert. It was repeated at Munich on 3 November 1965, in the National Training College at Duisburg on 4 January 7965, in the Institute for Child Study of the University of Würzburg (Professor Dr J. Ströder) on 4 February 1966, in the Institute of Anatomy and Histological Embryology of the University of Innsbruck (Professor Dr G. Sauser) on 14 February 1966, at the Catholic Students' Union of the University of Munster on 18 February 1966, as an invitation lecture to the Faculty of Catholic Theology of the University of Vienna on 14 March 1966, at the Society of Training Colleges at Graz on 15 March 1966, at a conference of the Study Group of Medical Journalists at the Akademie Tutzing on 19 May 1966, and on the occasion of 'University Week' at Warendorf, Westphalia, on 8 December 1967. At the invitation of the Associazione Culturale Italiana the author delivered the same lecture in Italian at Turin, Genoa, Milan, Rome, and Naples (15 to 20 April 1966). In addition an English version was delivered at several American Universities and Colleges of Education in the course of a lecture tour through the United States in October 1967. First published under the title of 'Theologische opmerkingen over de zelfmanipulatie van de mens', Adelbert 13 (1965), No. 11 (November), pp. 197-208; first published in German as 'Experiment Mensch. Theologisches zur Selbstmanipulation des Menschen', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Aufriß einer philosophischen Anthropologie. Festschrift für Max Müller, edited by Heinrich Rombach (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 45-69.

THE PROBLEM OF GENETIC MANIPULATION

An article intended as a contribution to a symposium volume projected by Professor Dr F. Wagner as editor, and entitled Die Zukunft des Menschen. Zum Problem der genetischen Manipulation (Verlag C. H. Beck, Munich, 1968).

SELF-REALISATION AND TAKING UP ONE'S CROSS

A contribution to Dialog über den Menschen, Festschrift für Dr. W. Bitter zum 75. Geburtstag, edited by G. Zacharias (Verlag E. Klett, Stuttgart, 1968).

In the list of sources given above no mention has been made of a number of excerpts or special papers which were printed in German. Broadcast talks are mentioned only when the article concerned was specially written for these. Nor has there been any special mention of the numerous translations which have been made. Only the work in which they were initially published is mentioned, whether this was in German or in a foreign language.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Ecclesiology

[3]

1

THE NEW IMAGE OF THE CHURCH

On an accurate view of the findings of the Second Vatican Council one finds that in all of its sixteen constitutions, decrees and explanations it has been concerned with the Church. Thus in the ecclesiastical constitution Lumen gentium and in the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity it has been concerned with the Church's basic understanding of herself. In the Constitution on Divine Revelation and in the Explanation on Christian Education it has been concerned with the teaching office of the Church. In the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy it has been concerned with the function of the Church as conferring salvation through the sacraments. In the Decree on the Pastoral Office of the Bishops it has been concerned with the government of the Church. In the Decrees on the official functions of priests, the life and formation of priests, the religious orders and the apostolate of the laity it has been concerned with the various ranks in the Church's hierarchy. In the Decree on Oecumenism and in the Decree on the Oriental Churches the Council has stated its position with regard to the relationship of the Catholic Church to the other Christian Churches and communities, while in the Explanation Regarding Non-Christian Religions it has defined the Church's relationship to these. In the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World and in the Decree on Mass Media of Communication the Council has defined the Church's attitude towards the secular cultures of the modern world, and in the Explanation concerning Religious Freedom it has stated her position with regard to a society that is pluralistic in character.[1]

[4]

I

This Council, then, was a Council of the Church about the Church, a Council in which all the themes discussed were ecclesiological ones; which concentrated upon ecclesiology as no previous Council had ever done. For even the First Vatican Council, with its definition of the primatial power of the pope, treated of other themes apart from this question and quite different from it, as for example the question of God and his relationship to the world. When we say that the Second Vatican Council is the Council of ecclesiology this is, of course, neither to deny nor to overlook the fact that within the general ambience of this subject-matter a whole range of different truths come to be expressed, truths which, indeed, when

[1] In this article the author attempts to sum up the more important ecclesiological findings of the Council insofar as these have theological and pastoral implications which are important for a wide circle of interested parties. It must be admitted that this attempt is subject to numerous limitations. For this reason the author may be permitted to refer to the fuller studies on conciliar theology which he has published in Theological Investigations VI, as well as in the present volume. In addition to these see below p. 7 n. 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

their place in the total 'hierarchy of truths' is adverted to, are of more decisive importance in themselves than they are precisely in their bearing on the question of the Church. But still, this does not in the least alter the fact that in this Council the Church was not only the author but the subject too of the conciliar statements, that this Council was the Council in which the Church reflected upon her own understanding of herself.

This conclusion may at first sound harmless enough. Yet it is startling enough in itself to bring us up short; startling enough to raise in our minds the disconcerting question of whether in that case the Church of today, faced as she is with a future that is vast and unknown, and that presses in upon her (upon us) so urgently and so menacingly, has nothing more important to say than how she understands her own nature – she who, nevertheless, exists not for herself but for God, for her Lord, for mankind and for their future. Of course we might reply to this question that in speaking of herself and her own nature the Church is, in fact, speaking also of all these more fundamental realities and truths. Admittedly it is also possible to say that the 'Church' was chosen as the central theme because of the fortuitous circumstance that this subject had been embarked upon in the First Vatican Council and then interrupted when that Council was prematurely broken off; and also because, as things are today, everywhere and in all the Churches and all the systems of theology belonging to them ecclesiology has come to be one of the most immediately relevant subjects of discussion, if not actually the primary subject. But in fact the first reply simply opens the way to the further question of why the Church should choose to discuss these themes, more important as they are in themselves, merely indirectly in the context of ecclesiology, when all the time it is so necessary to speak in quite new terms of God, of [5] Christ his anointed one, of man and of his future. As for the second rejoinder, this still leaves the question unanswered of whether a Council is ipso facto taking the right course in its choice of subject-matter merely because this subject-matter happens to be precisely that with which contemporary theology is engaged. It could perfectly well be the case that by concentrating its interest so much on ecclesiological questions theology itself has created a tendency to neglect the more difficult and more urgent questions. This is a startling question, and one which cannot be answered adequately merely by pointing out that ecclesiology has in fact an objective importance in its own right. Nevertheless in the last analysis only two observations can be made in reply to this question. First, man is subject to the conditions of history, and this means that the topics with which he finds himself engaged are decided for him rather than by him. And this also applies to the Church. The very inevitability with which this theme of ecclesiology became, so to say, spontaneously and without much conscious reflection, the theme of the Council shows the extent to which man and Church, for all the responsibility they have to reflect and decide upon such matters, continue to be those who are guided and controlled by factors outside themselves. This is something that is both alarming and consoling at the same time. Alarming because it raises the question of who or what is really guiding the course of events in all this. Consoling because we sinners – yes and even the devil himself – continue to be those who are guided by God. Secondly, every recognition of truth – including those which the Church arrives at – comes about not because the subject has voluntarily raised the question for himself, but because of the pressure of factors outside his control and arising from the particular place allotted to him in history. And because of this such realisations of truth always remain open to further modifications in the future. The history of the Church's faith is still in process of development, and every statement of faith posited in the here and now, and truly posited at that, can be modified and transformed by factors belonging to a future that is still unknown. Thus such a statement may be changed once more into a question, the question namely of whether and in what way it can, while still retaining its essential identity, acquire a quite different form in different historical situations, and when viewed in different perspectives. With regard to a whole number of theological statements, therefore, the question is how will

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

they be initially constructed and how will they be applied in practice. Certainly even a genuine truth can fail to be realised at the time appropriate to it, its kairos. Obviously this applies primarily to the process by which truths come to be [6] recognised as such in the life of the individual. But we may presume that it is not so certain that this could not also take place in the history of the Church's developing realisation of truth. How otherwise could the Catholic Church, prior to a definition, and abstracting from her solicitude for the truth, raise the distinct question of whether the time is 'opportune' for defining the truth concerned and quite manifestly consider that to recognise a proposition as true is not ipso facto to decide that it is opportune to define it. So long, therefore, as history endures there remains also a truth that is still unexpressed in the present. The only proviso here is that there is a truth of this kind, such that it is not conducive to fulfilling the needs of the present hour. It is a truth which can be made relevant and actual through the grace of God which is conferred upon us, and in this grace we patiently carry this truth with us into the future until it finds that particular moment of grace in which it becomes our salvation. When this moment comes then it provides a justification for that earlier moment in which the truth concerned was plucked – perhaps too early, perhaps too late, perhaps too hastily or too violently – from the tree of knowledge. This is not to assert, or even imply, that the ecclesiological subject-matter treated of in the Council is of this kind. How could anyone be in a position even today positively to assert such a thing? Nevertheless it is helpful to pose this question right at the outset and thereby to make it serve as an exhortation to prudence and discretion.

If we are to speak of the new image of the Church which has emerged since the Second Vatican Council, then we must regard all this not indeed as a necessary presupposition to our discussion, but as a proviso which it is prudent to bear in mind. Statements made about the Church at the Council have been so many and so varied, some old, some new, some important, some secondary, some belonging to the field of dogma, others merely at the level of canon law or pastoral theology, that it is a priori impossible to sum it all up in a single brief survey in which every statement is accorded its due value. In the light of this, as well as in the light of the somewhat startling question which we have just posed, it is therefore justified – indeed it is actually demanded of us – to search for certain new traits in the image of the Church which the Church herself holds up before her in order to become that which she is. 'New' here does not mean, in any primary sense, that which has not yet been said, for it is difficult to point to any element in the ecclesiology of the Council which could be called 'new' in precisely this sense. A very clear illustration of the point being made here is provided, for instance, by the theme of the synodal collegiality of the episcopate (the theme, therefore which, on a superficial [7] view, was perhaps the most disputed in the whole Council). On close examination this theme turns out simply to have filled out with content a statement which was initially made at the First Vatican Council in the relationes of the defenders of the primacy of the pope, Bishop V. Gasser and Bishop F. M. Zinelli in particular. Not only was the statement in question not contested by these, it was actually formulated by them in so many words as a manifest truth.[2] In fact a further point is also quite clear. Where a Council gives up a doctrine previously upheld in the Church but not hitherto defined, rejecting it as false or inadequate, we can certainly not speak of a development from implicit to explicit truth. And of course instances of this are conceivable. But we hold fast to the principle that the Church does not attain any fresh revelations, but rather retains a vital hold on, and interprets the one Christian and apostolic revelation. And if we hold fast to this, then it follows that any new statement that is positive necessarily must – at least implicitly –

[2] For details of this cf. the author's commentary on the third chapter of the Constitution on the Church. Das Zweite Vatikaniscke Konzil. Konstitutionen, Dekrete und Erklärungen I (Freiburg, 1966), pp. 221-224.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have been present in the awareness of faith of earlier ages. It cannot therefore be the task of the theologians merely to praise the novelty of a truth that has come to be recognised in the Council or in theology, as though something absolutely new had been discovered. It follows that 'new' as used here is a single term covering two distinct factors, and the reality it signifies is just as important as a new discovery on some theoretical plane. The two factors are the new vitality which the truth in question has acquired in the life and activity of the Church, and the special effectiveness which the truth will presumably acquire for the Church in the future.

II

The first trait in the new image of the Church which must be brought out relates to the Church insofar as she is present in the concrete in the local communities and regional Churches. It is a strange text to which we have to refer at this point. It is to be found in No. 26 of the third chapter of the Constitution on the Church, and there gives the impression of being an interpolation in a context which is elsewhere concerned with the function of the bishop in conferring sacramental consecration. In this context the following statement is made without any convincing connection with the rest of the passage being apparent: 'The Church of Christ is truly [8] present (vere adest) in all lawfully instituted local communities of the faithful who, united with their pastors, are actually called "Churches" in the New Testament itself. They are' (so the passage continues) 'a new people called by God each according to his own locality in the Holy Ghost and in the fulness of "utter conviction" (plerophoria, cf. 1 Thess 1:5); through the preaching of the gospel of Christ the faithful have been "gathered" into the local communities.' Brotherhood is instituted through the Eucharist. 'In these communities, however poor and small they may be, and even though they may live in the diaspora, Christ is present, Christ through whose power the one holy Catholic and apostolic Church is united.' Thus the text itself.

It is true. The Constitution on the Church viewed as a whole regards the Church primarily as the universal Church, the Church that is worldwide, as the union of all believers in the community governed by pope and bishops. Certainly this is not to deny the fact that the very nature of this universal Church is such that there is more to be said about it than merely the definition of its social and juridical composition (somewhat in the sense of Bellarmine's ecclesiology), and in fact something more actually is said about the Church from this aspect, above all in the first and second chapters of the Constitution. The universal Church is spoken of as a unity which is based upon the mystery of the triune God. Reference is made to the holy people of God, to the Body of Christ in which all share in the priesthood of Christ, in which each individual has his own charism and his own mission, and each one is called to bear witness to the grace of God. But even so, in explicitly defining the structures and composition of the Church, the Constitution precisely does not take the local and parish communities as its starting-point in formulating its conception of her. Of course it is no part of our task at this point to enter into the reasons which caused this particular basic conception to be adopted, whether these were conditioned by history, by the particular circumstances of the time, or by theological considerations. Doubtless there are reasons which make this basic conception both justified and necessary. But while recognising this, one point must be emphasised from the outset. When the Church gives expression to her teaching, even in the context of a Council, what is binding upon the faithful is initially and primarily that which is actually stated. The viewpoints and attitudes in the light of which the statements were made have a lesser binding force. The basic conception of the Church which is derived from the idea of the Church as a whole is, therefore, a legitimate one, and certainly not one to be discarded. But manifestly it does not represent the only possible view. For in [9]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this conciliar constitution the alternative viewpoint, in which the Church is regarded primarily as it exists in the local community and this is taken as the starting-point, is also present in the passage we have quoted above, even if it is only present there in the opening clause.[3]

Here too it cannot be our task to present the history of this insertion. It is noticeable, as we have said, that it has been interpolated at a relatively late stage into a passage the broad outlines of which had already been established. In other words it was inserted into an already ordered presentation in which the viewpoint spontaneously and unreflectingly adopted was characteristic of the whole trend of Catholic scholastic theology and canon law in the post-Tridentine age. This meant that it was, as it were, taken for granted that the authors of this passage should look initially to the Church in her universality, and even the New Testament passages relating to the Church were a priori interpreted in this sense. With regard to the genesis of this inserted passage we must confine ourselves to the following observation: the interpolation certainly has connections (though probably these are not the sole motives which prompted it) with certain desires which were put forward in the aula of the Council, for instance by Metropolitan E. Zoghby and the auxiliary bishop of Fulda, E. Schick. Probably it was not only considerations of the factors of dogmatic or biblical theology involved that prompted these desires or imparted to them their underlying tendency. Rather they correspond to the immediate and practical needs of the concrete situation. There was a desire to see the Church as she exists in the concrete in everyday life, as present where she actually celebrates the death of the Lord, breaks the bread of the word of God, prays, loves and bears the cross of human existence, where she acquires a reality that is truly palpable and unambiguous, and is something more than an abstract ideology or a dogmatic thesis or the overall pattern of organisation in a society. There was a fear that this Church would still not be represented clearly enough even though now reference was made no longer merely to the pope, but to the bishops as well. These interventions were, in principle, welcomed and favourably received. Moreover the interpolated passage never became the subject of any serious debate or opposition either in the theological commission or in the plenary session of the Council. But at the same time it was impossible, if only from the technical point of view and from the point of view of giving the decree as a whole the best possible chances of [10] success, to reconstruct the whole of it in the light of this different viewpoint. And it was precisely because of this that, as G. Philips (the secretary of the theological commission) subsequently confirmed to me once more, a place had to be found for this passage wherever the matter could best be accommodated. The question of whether the happiest place for the insertion was in fact devised can be set aside. The essential point is that the passage is there and that it says what had to be said.

The highest truth which can, in the last analysis, be applied to the Church as a whole is in fact asserted of the local community itself, namely that in it Christ himself, his gospel, his love and the unity of believers are present. The Constitution recognises and explicitly states that the local and parish community, so far from being a mere minor administrative subdivision in a major religious organisation called the Church, is actually the concrete reality of the Church, the presence of Christ in which she achieves her highest fulness, and that too in the word, in the Eucharistic meal and (even in evangelical theology this point may perhaps not always be expressed with all the clarity that could be desired) in the love which unites the hearers and those who celebrate the Eucharist. Of course it could not be expected that in this passage something further should also have been said, namely how these three entities are united among themselves so as to form the concrete actuality of the Church as [3] On this cf. the author's observations in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg 1964), pp. 179-189, II/1 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 166 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

presence of Christ. But at all events what does clearly emerge in this passage is that the concept of the Church as the 'perfect society' is quite inadequate to provide a basic model for a theological understanding of the Church. The Church is more than a perfect society not merely because in and behind the social constitution of the Church as a whole the Spirit, divine truth and love are present and are constantly renewing their vital impact. Even if we confine ourselves to the actual nature of society in itself, even at this level the Church cannot be confined to the idea of the 'perfect society' inasmuch as it is precisely the Church (in contrast to every kind of secular society) that is truly present and achieves her fulness at the level of the word of preaching and of the sacrament, that is, still at the level of the social and sacramental life of the Church in itself. In other words the whole is truly present and achieves its fulness in the part. Now in view of the fact that in this connection the constitution goes back to the linguistic usage found in the Acts of the Apostles and Paul, namely when it states that the community, e.g. at Ephesus is 'the' Church and not merely a Church (the plural 'Churches' carries no weight in view of the statement 'Haec Christi Ecclesia vere adest in omnibus . . . congregationibus localibus') we are authorised, and indeed [11] called upon to explore further this ecclesiology of the local Church, and to accord it a vital place in our lives.

Certainly the work that still needs to be done in this field is immeasurable. But we should consider the future that presses in upon the Church, a future in which the premium set upon the characteristics present in the local Church, her poverty, smallness and 'diaspora' mode of existence, will perhaps be higher even than it is in the present. And especially in view of this future we can freely and calmly develop the lines indicated here by saying that life in the Church in the new form which it will acquire in the future will first, and by anticipation, be experienced here in the local Church. For the Church will make its impact as a present reality there where the presence of Christ is made real and experienced in the authorised preaching of his gospel and in the commemoration of his death in the Eucharist. Here that religious and theological 'experience' of the Church which is the most basic and most direct of all will have its place. Here the Christian of tomorrow will come to realise the true nature of the Church. Of course such a community, which feels itself to be the concrete realisation of the Church as achieved through word and sacrament, will be conscious of being united to all other communities which likewise are this same Church, will according to the will of Christ give concrete expression to this union, this state of being united in the Spirit with these other communities, even at the level of communal and social life as such, and, moreover, will be conscious of having a duty to do this.[4] It will understand by its faith that it only preserves the truth of the word and its own reality, in which Christ is rendered present, in the hierarchically constituted union of the communities of Christ. It will therefore acknowledge and live by everything which is stated in this constitution on the Church with regard to the universal Church as such, though admittedly acknowledging and living by it according to its place in the hierarchy of those truths in which, as the Decree on Oecumenism lays down,[5] the individual doctrines of faith are connected with the true basis of faith in different ways. But the factor which will first and last be of decisive importance will precisely be the real fact that, and the experience of the real fact that, Christ the crucified and risen one becomes present together with his word, the word that deepens into the unfathomable mystery of God; and because he is made present in this sense the Church [12] constantly renews herself as a vital force in the midst of the lowliness, poverty and desolation of the community which believes in him in the vast wilderness of this human life. All further knowledge of the Church

[4] 1t is self-evident that in a new way the early Church's conception of communio can thereby be made a living force in the practice of the Church. For bibliography cf. the studies referred to on p. 8a n. 2.
[5] Cf. this important passage in no. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

will draw its life, and will only be able to draw its life, from this basis and this centre. The Christian of the new age will experience what happens to him in his community no longer – as formerly – as something that takes place in the Church, but rather as the impact of the Church herself considered as a vital force.

III

If we regard this fresh trait in the image of the Church in its significance for the future historical situation, then we shall also suddenly find ourselves in a position to 'place', theologically and existentially speaking, a second 'new' statement in the ecclesiology of the Council. This statement, if taken in any other way, commonly threatens to degenerate somewhat into an ecclesiology which seems primarily to be concerned with the constitutional structure of the Church. The Church is called the sacramentum of salvation for the world, that which gives it its union with God and within itself (cf. Nos. 1, 9, 48). In order to see why the understanding of the Church expressed in this key word sacramentum is of immeasurable importance for today and tomorrow we must first consider a certain dialectical tension between two statements in this conciliar ecclesiology which seem to be irreconcilably opposed. On the one hand it is laid down that every man who acts in good faith according to his own conscience attains to the salvation of God in Christ whether he is a Catholic or not. He may belong to another Christian creed, live according to the tenets of a non-Christian religion, or even, through no fault of his own, not yet have arrived at any explicit acknowledgment of God (cf. No. 16). On the other hand it is also laid down that the Church of Christ which finds realisation (subsistit) in the Roman Catholic Church, is necessary for salvation (No. 14), is prescribed for all men and all men for her. In addition to the dialectical difficulties entailed in these two statements we have also to bear in mind a further point. In the Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church, in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, in the Decrees on Oecumenism and on the Eastern Churches, in the Explanations on Religious Freedom and on the Relationship of the Church to the non-Christian Religions the Council certainly does not expect that in some way and in some future age invisible to us the Church will [13] effectively become the Church of all men in the sense of including them all in a visible society. She is conscious rather of continuing to be the Church in the diaspora, the Church that exists in a pluralistic society. Indeed, according to all estimates of what the future holds for her, she will become this to a still greater extent than in the present. Now it is precisely in the light of this, and by taking this as our starting-point in interpreting the two dialectically opposed statements referred to above that we can elucidate for ourselves, in terms both of theological theory and of actual living, the situation in which the contemporary and future Christian's awareness of the Church must remain a living force, and against the background of which it must be understood.

This Christian must know the Church as the sole source of blessedness. Within the world he knows he cannot discern any one Church which, as a visible society actually belonging to human history, either is now, or is destined to become in some future age still invisible to us, the Church of all men. Yet for all this he cannot, indeed he must not, entertain that half explicit half submerged idea of the Christians of earlier ages that at least broadly speaking those are members of the Church who have been summoned out of a massa damnata of the rest of the human race, and called to salvation. Similarly he must not adopt that position of ecclesiological relativism which is secretly upheld by so many Catholic Christians, and in which it is felt that in the last analysis the Church is not so very important. After all it is only one – even if one that is particularly strongly to be recommended – among many religious

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

groupings, so that it is open to the individual freely, and according to his own taste, to choose that particular one which precisely best answers his needs.

In the situation we have been considering the Christian is not helped merely by considering baptism, soundness of faith and conformity to the Church's constitutional laws as the 'orthodox' way of salvation, while in contrast to this innumerable individuals outside the Church achieve salvation in an 'unorthodox' way and one that is 'against' the general rule. For such a Christian sees at the same time that simply in terms of numbers this 'exception' is in fact the norm. If Christianity is Christ, the absolute deed wrought by God upon humanity, in which God bestows himself, then Christianity, and therefore the Church, cannot renounce the claim to be of her nature absolute and to have a mission that is universal. However, neither the Church nor the individual Christian can regard this interpretation of the Church (considering it as something more than a mere ideological hypothesis) as something that will only achieve reality in a remote future which is invisible to us. They must be in [14] a position to recognise that the Church, considered precisely as a real and effective bringer of salvation (and not merely as a well-meaning and experienced partner in a dialogue) has a relationship with the non-Christian world which is actual and positive.

It is at this point that the doctrine of the Church as the basic sacrament for the salvation of the world may be invoked, since it serves to reconcile the two dialectically opposed statements which we took as our starting-point and to provide a common ground between them. If we take in all due seriousness this statement that the Church is the basic sacrament of salvation for the world we shall realise that what it is intended to say is this: the Church is the concrete historical manifestation, in the dimension of a history that has acquired an eschatological significance, and in the social dimension, of precisely that salvation which is achieved through the grace of God throughout the entire length and breadth of humanity. The relationship between the Church and this salvation of the world is the same as the relationship between the sacramental word and grace in the process of salvation which takes place in the life of the individual. In this process of salvation in the life of the individual these two entities are intrinsically connected but not identical with one another. Inasmuch as this process is subject to the conditions of time either of the two entities involved can precede the other. Grace can already be present when the sacrament has not yet been conferred. A sacrament, even when validly conferred, can still have to wait for its fulfilment through the grace which is signified by it. In the same way the Church is the authentic manifestation of grace in history, a manifestation which offers itself as salvation universally and to all, a manifestation which is indeed intended to be presented and borne witness to as a visible historical entity with a sacramental significance, and as something that can be described and pointed to in the explicit preaching of the gospel. But at the same time the reality of the Church is not only present where it has already fully achieved this status of being explicitly and visibly a social entity, the nature of which can be reflected upon and described, in other words where it is fully ecclesiastical in character and so itself as a part of the Church achieving its own unique impact as a concrete historical phenomenon. But for this very reason the converse is also true. The manifestation of grace which achieves this objective reality in the Church is a manifestation and a sign of that grace wherever it may take effect. In other words the Church as manifestation of grace is a sacramental sign of the grace that is offered to the world and history as a whole. From the Christian point of view the world, mankind and human history can certainly not be understood merely as the sum total of [15] all those individuals who are each working out their own personal salvations, or of the private lives of such individuals in so far as salvation is being worked out in them. If this were the case then there would have been no need for the incarnation of the Logos in the unity of the human race. All that would have been necessary would have been a purely spiritual message of God directed to the depths of the individual's own private conscience, in other words the kind of salvation history

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that is susceptible of a purely existentialist interpretation. But against this the message of salvation addressed by God to mankind considered as a unity in this sense has the character of an archsacrament or basic sacrament. It embraces the individual and his personal history but is in itself Christ or the abiding continuity of his existence in history which is the Church. This message of grace to the world, which has this quality of being a 'basic sacrament' does indeed take effect in the lives of individuals. Indeed it is intended to be brought to reality at the individual and sacramental level in the explicit word of preaching and in the form of the concrete sacrament. In the same way, in fact, this message of grace to the world, with its fundamentally sacramental character, is constituted by the common life of those who have received baptism and celebrate the Christian Eucharist. But this message, does not achieve its effective force only in those contexts in which it is given concrete realisation in the explicit word of preaching and in the sacraments, in so far as these are addressed to or conferred upon the individual. Grace can always take effect in the world even apart from the individual instances of the preaching of the word and the conferring of the sacraments, but wherever it does take effect this grace is already visibly being signified as an element in saving history as realised in this world in virtue of the fact that the Church herself has this force of being a basic sacrament.

So far we have only been able to indicate our basic position. But taking this as our standpoint we can achieve an understanding of a new 'experience' of the Church, precisely the experience that the Church is still the basic sacrament of salvation for the world in just those contexts in which the world is not the Church. The Christian of today and tomorrow will experience his Christianity as ecclesiastical by thinking of it not primarily and essentially as one of many interpretations of the significance of the world which compete with one another in the world's marketplace, not as a sum total of theories which are put forward at the same level as statements about the realities of this present world, so that the attitude underlying the Christian theories appears to represent a negation of these other speculations about the meaning of human existence. The Catholic [16] must think of and experience the Church as the 'vanguard', the sacramental sign, the manifestation in history of a grace of salvation which takes effect far beyond the confines of the 'visible' Church as sociologically definable. The sacramental sign of a Christianity that is anonymous, that is 'outside' the Church in the sense that it has not yet realised its true nature, but at the same time 'within' the Church even though it has not achieved its 'ultimate self-realisation'. This is not because otherwise there would simply be no Christianity at all outside the visible Church, but because the Christianity that does exist there has not come to its full maturity as an objective entity, and therefore has not yet realised its own nature in the explicit awareness and reflexive objectivity of the creed as actually formulated, of the sacraments as supplying objective reality, and of the visible Church herself as providing an organised structure definable in sociological terms, all of which is, in fact, achieved in the Church herself.

The Christian will regard the non-Christians (in order to simplify the problem we shall set aside the question of non-Catholic Christians) not as having no part in Christianity or as standing altogether outside salvation because they are not Christians, but rather as anonymous Christians who do not realise what they truly are in virtue of grace in the depths of their own consciences; what they are, namely, in virtue of something that they achieve at a level which is perhaps wholly unadduced, but is none the less real; something which the Christian too achieves in that he goes beyond this and recognises what he is doing as a matter of objective reality in the reflexive processes of his own conscious thought. All this must be so if it is not the case that God, with a view to bestowing eternal salvation on men, suddenly permits their good will to count in place of the reality itself. For basically speaking this view would render invalid the doctrine of the necessity of the Church and grace as mediating salvation and not merely as something which men are commanded by God to embrace. Here,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

there can be no doubt. The awareness of the professed Christian, his faith as able to be formulated in propositions, as 'in conformity with the creed', is something that empowers him and actually obliges him as a matter of duty, to incorporate himself as a member in the visible society of the Church. And this faith of his is a part of Christianity in its fulness, and is a grace which once more facilitates and renders more secure precisely that which is already present in the depths of human existence and human awareness, so that it is this that he is actually acknowledging by his faith. There can be no doubt that the Catholic rightly feels and values his explicit membership of the Church as an unmerited grace, as a [17] blessing, as a promise of salvation. But it must be admitted that in doing this he is also aware of a fear that plumbs the very depths of his being. For the greater the grace the greater the danger, and more will be demanded of him who has received more. Again he never knows whether he is in fact measuring up to what is demanded of him in particular, as distinct from others. He knows – this too can be accorded its due importance – the words of Christ which tell us that many will come from the east and from the west, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast into the exterior darkness (Mt 8:11 ff.). Again the Constitution Lumen gentium invokes a saying of Augustine[6] (No. 14) to draw a distinction between 'heartfelt' (corde) and merely 'corporal' (corpore) membership of the Church. The Catholic Christian knows that he belongs to the Church corpore. But what he does not know for certain is that he is actually living in it by faith and love. This is something which he can only hope for and which he must hope for. But because the Christian hopes for salvation for others also, because he is sufficiently aware of modern theological developments to recognise that he can hope for this (even if he cannot know it for certain), because it is easier for him today than it was formerly to conceive in theological terms of how it is possible to be a 'Christian' (here this is intended to signify a man living in the grace of God and of his Christ even when he does not know the name of Christ or feels compelled to reject him) – because of all this, therefore he can only regard himself and the professed Christians, the Church, as the vanguard of those who are journeying towards the salvation of God and his eternity through the roads of history.[7] For him the Church is, in a certain sense, the uniformed section of the army of God. It represents that point at which the intrinsic nature of the life of God made Man as projected into the world is also made manifest at the historical and social level (or better, is made manifest most clearly, since to the eye enlightened by faith the grace of God is not totally devoid of all embodiment even outside the Church). The Christian knows that the light of morning on the mountains is the beginning of the day that lights up the valleys. It is not a day that is confined to the higher levels, and so condemns the darkness below.

We may recall the Christian teaching that there is no absolute principle [18] of evil, that evil is that which is not, that the one unique God is good, and that he wills what is good for the Church as well, that that which is real is also the good, so that it follows that a true realist must think well of reality. The Christian knows that it would be blasphemous to suppose that in the last analysis it is easier to do evil than good, or that on a 'sober' and realistic view of reality it is the evil that is in possession there and not the good, or that ultimately speaking evil will survive when good has disappeared. The Christian knows that it is not the humility of the creature but rather its pride that prompts such ideas, or that makes it suppose that it is able, at least by embracing the evil, to emancipate itself from God, for this is simply a stupid lie. The Christian knows that in fact it is precisely the achievement of his own existence that [6] For a detailed exegesis of this section of the Constitution on the Church cf. K. Rahner, 'The Sinful Church in the Decrees of Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 270-294, especially pp. 282-283.

[7] For the purposes of this study the author has permitted himself in what follows to take over word for word certain observations which he has already published in an earlier volume: 'Dogmatic Notes on Ecclesiological Piety', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 336-365.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is demanded of him; to believe in the light when he is in the darkness, to believe in blessedness when he is in pain, to believe in God as the absolute in the midst of the relativity to which he is subject. He knows that revelation in its progressive unfolding lays bare our sins to us only in order that we may believe in the forgiveness of God. (Guilt alone and taken by itself is something that we could already have experienced in our pain, our death and our powerlessness to escape). When Paul regards the unbelief of the Jews as only temporary (Rom 9-11) we may ask how this is to be interpreted at least in a theology which, while it wants to do Paul full justice, can no longer think simply in 'collectivist' terms. This statement should not lead us to credit Paul with the opinion that it was only later generations of Jews who would be believers, while the earlier ones remained totally without faith in any sense. Only one who is 'collectivist' to the point of being unchristian can suggest this kind of uncompromising solution to the question. In Paul's own thought an idea which he held firm to, and which constituted the inner kernel of his own personal conviction, was that the grace of God would emerge victorious over 'unbelief'. He himself may or may not have regarded the process by which this was to be accomplished as already having explicitly and definitively attained its full development. But in any case it makes no difference to the point at issue how far he did actually hold this view. The faith of the people of Israel, which became manifest as a phenomenon only in their later history (admittedly even this is still not apprehensible to us in any assured sense as a predestination of the individual to salvation), must be a sign of the fact that in earlier ages too God had already had compassion on this people in a manner which we can neither discern nor comprehend (once more nothing definite is implied in this with regard to the salvation of the individual as such). For why otherwise should we take as the [19] defining characteristic of Israel as a whole the faith of her later stages of development and not the unbelief of her earlier period? How otherwise could it be preferable to say: 'Israel as such will be overtaken by God's grace' rather than: 'This people has rejected God'?

In the light of this the Christian is fearless and untroubled in the view he takes of the world – that world which is filled with a thousand opinions and philosophies of life. He does not need anxiously to scrutinise the statistical data to see whether, not only in theory but in actual fact as well, the Church is the greatest organisation based on a philosophy of life, or whether her rate of growth is in proportion to that of the world population. Certainly he will regard the world with missionary zeal. And this is a point which is also included in the Constitution on the Church and the Decree on the Missions. These are especially concerned to ensure that the quite astonishingly optimistic note they strike with regard to the salvation of the world shall not obscure the need for the Church's missionary activities or weaken the missionary zeal of Christians. In this connection one question may be left open as not to be treated of here, that namely of whether we have already arrived at the clearest possible 'synthesis' between this optimism with regard to salvation and the inalienable duty of Christians to be missionaries of the gospel. In any case the Christian will bear witness to the name of Christ. He will be resolved to impart his grace to others, for he possesses a grace of which those others are deprived – are still deprived, precisely the grace namely of belonging to the Church corpore and not merely corde. Only when they have this grace will they actually be contributing to that basic sacramental sign that is the Church. Moreover it is this grace that summons the entire world to make space in human living in its dimensions of freedom and of physical concretion too for that divine life which has all along been at work at the very roots of human nature as the offering of God to communicate himself to man regardless of whether this offering is accepted or refused. It is this grace too which not only impells history forward to that blessedness in which its ultimate consummation is to consist, but is also intended to be incarnate in history itself in full measure and in manifest form. But the Christian is aware of a further point. His zeal has the greatest chance of success when his enthusiasm for his missionary vocation is tempered by calmness and patience. He knows that he must imitate the patience of God (which, according to Paul, is positively salvific rather than condemning in its meaning). He knows that God has willed this world to be as it is because otherwise it would not be at all, and that even that which is 'merely' permitted is simply permitted precisely as an element in something [20] that is willed (and not merely permitted) by God. He knows further that this which is willed by God can and must be hoped for not merely as the revelation of God's justice but also as the revelation of his infinite kindness to man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Christian knows that God does not begin the work of his grace only at that stage at which man takes it up in the name of God. For this reason, when he is faced with one who, so far as his 'philosophy of life' is concerned, has no intention of being a brother, the Christian nevertheless goes to meet him boldly and hopefully as a brother. He sees in him one who does not know what he truly is, one to whom it has not yet been made plain what he nevertheless may be presumed already to be achieving in the depths of his own human living. (So true is this that we have an absolute duty to assume this in hope, and it would be a failure in charity to hold anything less about the non-Christian, for should I as a Christian simply and absolutely take it for granted that the non-Christian with whom I am in contact is devoid of God's grace?). In his fellow the Christian sees Christianity in its 'anonymous' or unacknowledged form at work in a thousand ways. He knows that man is always more and always achieves more in his human living than he himself can express. Ultimately speaking the reality of our existence as humans always goes beyond the interpretations we ourselves place upon it in theory. Now if the Christian recognises all this then he cannot consider it rash or out of place to assume that even though the non-Christian interprets himself quite otherwise, still by God's grace some kind of 'unacknowledged Christianity' is already present in him or even is actually, though all unconsciously, being put into practice. If the Christian interprets his own self (rightly understood) as simul justus et peccator[8] or as, arising from this, simul fidelis et infidelis,[9] even though he intends to be a fidelis and only this, then it is no impertinence either if he interprets the non-Christian as one who is perhaps simul fidelis even though he intends to be only an infidelis. If the Christian sees that the non-Christian is kind, charitable and true to his own conscience he will no longer be able to say nowadays 'All those are "natural" virtues,' for in fact, ultimately speaking, these only exist in abstracto. He will no longer say: This is certainly just the 'outward brilliance which the vices of the pagans display', as Augustine does. On the contrary he will think, 'There the grace of Christ is at work even [21] in one who has not yet explicitly called upon it but who, at the same time, has already hungered after it in the unexpressed and unacknowledged longings of his heart. There is one in whom the unspeakable groanings of the Spirit have already called in supplication upon the silent but all-pervasive mystery of existence which we Christians know as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ!' Supposing that the Christian sees the 'heathen' dying willingly. Supposing that he notices how the other willingly submits, as though no other course were open to him (Oh yes, another course is open to him, for he can summon up the ultimate resources of his entire existence and use them to assume a last and absolute attitude of protest and absolute cynicism and doubt) to a death in which he falls into the bottomless abyss which has never been plumbed to the full (because in order to include God it must be infinite). Supposing that the Christian himself recognises in this basic willingness of the non-Christian, which is no longer an articulate attitude at all, that this abyss into which the non-Christian is falling is the abyss of a meaningful mystery and not of a despairing void. If the Christian sees all this then he sees also in one who is dying in this way him who is nailed to [8] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 218-230.

[9] On this cf. J. B. Metz, 'Unbelief as a Theological Problem', Concilium 6/1 (1965), pp. 32-42.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the saving cross of human existence at the right hand of Christ. And he sees that precisely this real situation in the concrete, in which this dying man finds himself, wordlessly utters the plea 'Lord remember me when you come into your kingdom'. Why should it not be so? The sheer transcendence of human nature need not always be used as a mere means with a view to asserting one's right to earthly existence. It can be accepted and endured, and then it can also be elevated by grace in such a way that, liberated from its downward tendency towards the finite, it becomes the dynamic impulse that urges us upwards towards the God of eternal life, inasmuch as he, in the ultimate reality of his own nature, considered as that which has been communicated and is to be communicated further, is the ultimate goal and destiny towards which man is supernaturally directed. This orientation towards God implanted in the spiritual transcendence of man by grace goes beyond his nature and liberates him from his earthly bent. Moreover it is sound Thomistic doctrine that it also alters the final goal, the 'formal object' of what the spirit can achieve. And because of this, even though it may not actually set any new object before man's vision it is in actual reality a 'revelation', and that too not a 'natural' revelation but one that is grace-given. Moreover in the sense that as revelation it is 'uttered' by God to man on the level of his freedom and personhood it can already be considered 'verbal' and, in so far as it is accepted at this level, as faith.

[22] We are dealing, therefore, with the submission of a man in obedience and love to the infinitude of his own transcendence as to something which is beyond his control. Man submits himself to this transcendent dimension in his own being not in the measure that it can be grasped by us, but rather in the measure that we are grasped and contained by it as something beyond our control. Now if this is so, why should not this attitude of obedient and loving submission on the part of the individual be so transformed, even in the present by the ordinations of God's will to bestow supernatural salvation on men, as to become something more than merely the spiritual transcendence which is in this sense natural to man? Why should not God bring it about by his own act that this spiritual transcendence de facto becomes in us that interior tendency which draws us into the life of God? And supposing the individual accepts this tendency implanted in him in the sense that he willingly submits to the control of that which he cannot comprehend in its incomprehensibility, why should not this be enough? (Is it really necessary to insist that of course all the demands of natural and supernatural ethics are to be thought of as implicitly contained in this, though admittedly only in such a way that their authentic orientation to God can be achieved 'subjectively' speaking in the concrete life of the individual even in those cases in which the most far-reaching errors at the material level with regard to particular moral norms are to be found?[10] This is something which is shown in the experience of Christians as well as that of heathens).

Now on this showing, when the Christian preaches Christianity to the 'non-Christian' he will take as his starting-point not so much the basic attitude of wanting to make the other something which he simply has not been hitherto. Rather he will attempt to bring him to himself. Of course this cannot mean that Christianity is, as the modernists hold, simply the explicitation of the religious needs of man's nature. Rather it is because God in his grace, and because of his will to save all men universally, has already long before offered the reality of Christianity in its truest and deepest essence to the individual, and because it is perfectly possible, and even probable, that the individual has already freely accepted this reality without consciously adverting to it. These, then, are the factors which will influence the Christian of today and tomorrow in his view and experience of the Church. He will think of it not as making itself felt only infrequently and with difficulty, not as one of the numerous 'sects' into which mankind is divided, not as one of many elements in the pluralism [23] of society or the pluralism in the intellectual life of mankind. Instead of this the Christian will [10] On this cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 152 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

think of the Church rather as the visible and apprehensible form of that which already has a unifying force at the interior level, as the historical expression of that which is universal to all men and, in a true sense, evident to all (for all that it has been freely instituted by God, for it is precisely God and not any particular finite being which has instituted it!). The Church appears to the Christian as the sheer rendering present in visible form of the nature of man as subject to God's designs (that is, the nature of man as it exists in 'historical fact', and to which a supernatural calling has been vouchsafed). In short the Church appears to the Christian as the fundamental sacrament of a grace which, precisely because it is offered to all, presses forward to express its sacramental significance in history even where the individual sacrament (of baptism) has not yet been conferred. But precisely on this view of the Church this grace is never simply identical with that which constitutes its effective sign. Rather, in virtue of the particular concrete sign which it institutes in the present, and through which it is itself made present (both aspects must be expressed) it assures us that its power extends everywhere. We can say in all calmness: through the sign of the particular sacrament as it is conferred the grace of God assures us that its power extends everywhere, even to those areas where the specific sacramental sign has not yet been applied as such in the concrete to those specific individuals in whom we hope that the grace of God will powerfully take effect. For these individual sacramental signs taken together (and in unison with other factors contributing to the Church's make-up) precisely constitute the Church, since she is, in fact, the community of those who have been baptised and who celebrate the Eucharist. But in virtue of the fact that she is the sacramentum of salvation for the world, she is also the promise of grace to it. It must be remembered that the history of mankind is one and single, so that there is an intrinsic unity between everything that it contains from Abel to the last living human being, and each individual has a connection with all the rest, not merely those living at the same time or in the same place as himself, but with all human beings right through the ages. Now if this is accorded its due significance then the Church is to be thought of as the leaven working through the lump of dough that is the whole of humanity. And its influence is not confined to that particular part of the 'dough' where it can actually be seen taking effect and so which has itself been turned into an active element in the process of fermentation. On the contrary the leaven that is the Church is at work everywhere and for all. Its influence is extended to every age and is present precisely in [24] those parts of the flour which, so far as we can see, have not yet been turned into leavened dough. To the kind of Christian whom we have in mind, therefore, and who belongs to the new image of the Church, the Church herself will appear as a promise extended to the world outside the Church. And this is true not only on the condition that, or to the extent that, this world has already itself come to belong to the Church. The promise is not only an assurance that this world will increasingly come to belong to the Church, but is the real hope that it will be possible for the world to be redeemed through the Church even in those areas of it where its inclusion in the Church has not acquired the status of a palpable fact of history.

IV

It is only in the light of this that we can clearly recognise the ultimate basis for that collegiate and synodal principle in the Church which figured so prominently in the discussions and teaching of the Council. This principle is the love of those who are united in Christ and so equal. And this is also the basis for all the hierarchical differences that exist in the Church. Of course that unity of love in the Spirit, that state of brotherhood which is a gift of God, was, in itself, always the centre and goal of the message of the gospel and the ministry of the Church. For she has always known and preached that the love of God and the love of neighbour fall

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

under one and the same commandment, and constitute the one grace which justifies. And yet this truth, so obvious and yet so far beyond our comprehension, which constitutes the mystery of our existence, exercises in a manner that is quite new a determining influence upon the image of the Church and the Church's life of worship for the future.

We may regard the usual talk about the contemporary society of the masses as false, one-sided or premature. Nevertheless this term does point to a danger, the danger namely that precisely because of the ever-widening social interconnections in which the individual is inescapably involved, because of the constantly increasing influence of social forms and systems which arise, because of the increasing insignificance accorded to human life and because of the fact that in his function in society the individual is increasingly involved in specialisation, the individual himself no longer finds any concrete 'thou', any room for intimate relationships with his fellows. The only relations open to him are such as bring him a sense of abandonment and loneliness. He has a sense of being a tiny and anonymous cog with a function to perform in a [25] huge social machine, a cog which can be replaced at any time. Of course independently of the Church and outside the Church's sphere of influence counter forces are already at work against this danger, and new kinds of informal groups are arising in society which make it possible for man to draw near to man and so protect himself against this state of desolation. Certainly the family will only truly come into its own when it acquires that significance which is at once most ancient and most new, of being the sphere of a love that is personal and proper to the individuals within it. But precisely for this reason the Church too, as she exists at the local level, can acquire a quite new importance as the community of those who, gathered about the altar of Christ, are united by love among themselves. This will be achieved precisely in so far as the local Church of the future no longer appears primarily as the operator of administrative techniques on behalf of a vast institutional organisation designed to cater authoritatively for the spiritual wellbeing of the individual. The Church at the level of the local community will be the community of those who freely believe, of those who have taken their own personal decision. For these baptism is the expression and manifestation of the grace of a faith that is actually put into practice, or at least of acceptance into a family and community of believers in which the faith of the rising generation can really mature as something which they have committed themselves to of their own personal initiative. In such a community that brotherhood will be able to flourish which has its basis in Christ. This future community of the faithful must certainly not be sectarian in character, the sort of community, that is to say, which sullenly and fearfully takes shelter in the shadowy places of history and society like a little group of social inadequates. If such a community experiences its own significance as a sacrament of salvation for the world it can never fail to recognise its task of bearing witness, its function of being the salt of the earth and the leaven of the world, or its mission extending into all spheres of human life. But it can really experience itself as a community united by ties of brotherhood in Christ.

Measured by the physical, indeed the ideological strength of the future world powers or of the future world power in the singular, the universal Church will also find that it has less power than ever within its own sphere of human history, if we take power to signify the possibility of exercising a decisive influence over the individual in other areas of life apart from those of truth and love. While, therefore, we must obviously recognise the spiritual authority of the pastors and officials of the Church, these will be thought of in the future precisely not as vested with power [26] in the social dimension, the sort of power, namely which would be really and effectively present independently of and prior to the faith, loyalty and trust of the members of the Church. The authority that goes with an official position in the Church stems from the mission of Christ himself. And this means that its real significance springs uniquely from that love that binds together those who are united among themselves as equal, as having been sanctified, and as sharing in community with one another the living

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

experience of the love of Christ. Under these circumstances laity and pastors can become accustomed to meet and exchange ideas as members of a family, and it is this that is spoken of in the Constitution on the Church (No. 37). This is the love which unites the brethren who are one in their belief in the one Lord who sets them free for the incomprehensible and blessed infinitude of God. It is the deepest and most essential factor in their lives as Christians, and it will, much more clearly and much more directly than formerly, subsume, permeate and assimilate to itself all those institutional factors which necessarily must endure. In this community the unity between love of God and love of neighbour will be experienced in a quite new way. God will not be reduced to the level of the human by a process of demythologising. But because the fact of God becoming man is so central to Christianity, God will be found in man and man himself will be discovered anew as the mystery which projects out and beyond itself into the mystery of God. Thus man will find his true nature only in that which he himself is not, yet in such a way that when it is accepted in a spirit of love, it allows him to experience what is truly meant by God. Admittedly at first we have only weak and indistinct ideas of how such a community, formed by the new spirit of love of God and love of neighbour, will appear in the concrete; how a Church formed by love in this way will express her communal worship, seeing that she is neither a clan constituted by the local community with religious trimmings added to it, nor yet a cosy sectarian nest where the socially frustrated can take shelter, nor (and this is the mistake most often made today) an extremely select department-store of holiness in which the individual obtains moral strengthening for the wellbeing of his individual soul, and in doing this merely makes allowance for the fact that many are simultaneously claiming the services of this department-store, so that in fact, in this extremely individualistic interpretation of its purpose the Church's function as serving the community is made subordinate to its function as catering for the individual. The community of the new Church must be a community of love, and love is extremely practical. But it is better for us to admit to ourselves in all honesty that as yet we [27] hardly know what outward shape a community living by practical love in this way can assume. We are only capable of obtaining something when we do not believe that we already possess it, and this applies here also.

V

What has been said so far is admittedly far from expressing everything that can be discovered, at least in principle, in the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council with regard to the new elements which will appear in the image of the Church. Indeed we have not yet said even half of what is to be said on this subject. This is particularly true because that which most of all pertains to the origins always remains the newest as well. This element in the Church, which is at once most ancient and most new, is that which she utters and imparts. But what she utters is, in the last analysis, not herself. She is the message that speaks of another and makes this other present and effective for us.

On this showing ecclesiology is related to the other departments of dogmatic theology as grammar, the techniques of poetry and semantics are related to poetry itself. The Church understands her own nature best when she is actually fulfilling her function, and this means when she is actually speaking of God and his grace, of Jesus Christ, his Cross and Resurrection and eternal life, and when, in the very act of uttering this message, she allows herself to be moved by the grace of God. We can also say that she realises her own nature as an 'institution' of salvation only when she understands herself as the fruit of salvation and acts as such. There is no doubt that in the Constitution on the Church this turning-point has been reached and passed. Certainly this document does speak explicitly – why indeed should it not? – of the Church as an institution, of its officials and its authority in various departments, of its hierarchical structure, of its teaching and pastoral offices, of the different degrees in which its members participate in its mission, of its authorities and their powers – in short of the Church as an institution of salvation and as a means of salvation. But all this is, nevertheless, subsumed and made subordinate to a more basic understanding of the Church, in which the Church is viewed as the people of God gathered together by God's grace, and the Church is interpreted as the outcome of God's grace, as the fruit of salvation. It is possible for the Church to be seen as the Body of Christ, as the people of God; for her to be understood as 'the people of God on their journey'. It is possible to recognise that she herself is still seeking to find her goal through history. It is possible for the Church to [28] recognise her own nature as a reality which still bears in itself the form of this present aeon (No. 48), yet which is eager to raise herself above this level to the point at which the kingdom of God is 'all in all', and no longer merely a Church. It is possible for us to regard all those vested with hierarchical authority in her as being such only in virtue of the fact that the Church herself is already in existence, and to recognise that this view of them is at least as important as that in which they are regarded as those who form the Church. Now if we can view the Church in this light, then certainly we have achieved something more than a one-sided view of the Church as an authoritative institution of salvation. Then the Church appears not primarily as she who acts upon us, but rather as she whom we all are in virtue of the fact that the grace of God has moved and inspired us and bound us together into a unity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Many further fresh traits in the image of the Church could be pointed to. Here however let us confine ourselves to mentioning a few of the minor ones. To a greater extent than in the ecclesiology of the official Church of earlier times the Church now appears as the sinful Church, the Church of sinners, so that she must constantly be turning back in repentance to her Lord. Even if it cannot be said that this presentation of the Church has been given all the importance due to it as a theme of ecclesiology, still it is a vital factor in the new image of the Church. The Church appears as a communion of faith, hope and love (Nos. 8, 64, 65), as a Church of the Trinity (No. 4). She is not merely the Church of hierarchical authorities and of the sacraments, but the Church of the free charismata as well (No. 12), the Church of martyrdom (No. 42). Moreover we are ready to recognise whole-heartedly that martyrdom is present in non-Catholic Christendom as well. The Church feels herself to be the Church of the poor and oppressed (Nos. 8, 41). Far more clearly than formerly, she has overcome the misconception which was tacitly present in the theology of the Fathers and the Middle Ages. This was the feeling that the difference between the clergy and the laity, or between the state of being ordained and that of not being ordained ipso facto and of itself implied a difference in the nearness to God which the individual could attain to, a difference, therefore, in the degree of his love of God and love of neighbour, and so of his holiness. The Church is conscious of being the Church in the eschatological phase of saving history, in which, to the eye of faith, the drama of the dialogue between God and man has already irrevocably been decided by God in favour of man's salvation (No. 48). But precisely by viewing herself in this light the Church is conscious of being one who bears in herself the form of the present age and of [29] herself as still belonging to that order of creation which waits longingly for the revelation of the glory of the children of God. Thus she is not the permanent institution which mediates the future kingdom of God and the eternal life that goes with it to the individuals who receive salvation, in order that she may remain herself here below. Rather she is the pilgrim who is herself journeying through history to that eternity in which she will cease any longer to be an institution of salvation with an authoritative and sacramental system of this kind (No. 48).

We have only been able to bring out a few of the traits which are present in the new image of the Church. In this we do not mean to imply that other traits, familiar to us from earlier times, are no longer in force in this image, or that they no longer have any importance. It is also obvious that the application of these new traits in the image of the Church in the concrete realities of her actual existence still requires a long process of education until these traits can be made manifest in real and living form in the worship of the Church's individual members and in the practice of the Church herself. But the Church has already made a beginning in entering upon her new life of worship of this kind. Now the point of vital importance will be to ensure that the letter of this conciliar ecclesiology is really made spirit and life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[30]

2

CHURCH, CHURCHES AND RELIGIONS

For modern Christians and for those of a religious bent the question of the relationship between the Church, the Churches and the various religions provides a thought-provoking subject for discussion. The society in which the Catholic Christian of today lives is a complex and heterogeneous one. He lives in the closest proximity to, and has the closest personal connections with, non-Catholic Christians. The sphere in which his life is passed is no longer a country which, in its social, cultural and even civic aspects, is homogeneously 'Catholic'. Indeed, where formerly the individual nations were independent of one another in their lines of historical development, nowadays these lines are tending to become fused into a single great world history. And the result of this is that the non-Christian religions and philosophies of life such as Islam, Hinduism and Buddhism, no longer constitute an area of foreign folklore which has no bearing upon the course of life modern man maps out for himself and raises no radical problems for him. Instead of this these non-Christian religions have come to be regarded as the philosophies of life of men who have become neighbours to modern man, men in whom he cannot fail to recognise just as high a degree of intelligence as that with which he credits himself. Moreover he is compelled to accept it as axiomatic, if he wants to be just and fair, that they in their turn have a certain knowledge of Christianity and an honourable resolve to strive for the truth. Now in this situation it is borne in upon him – and far more deeply borne in than in the case of a Catholic of earlier times – that these Christians who belong to other creeds, and these adherents of non-Christian religions, are, on the whole, quite undisturbed in their interior thoughts and dispositions by Catholic Christianity; that in spite of it they continue whole-heartedly to give their allegiance to their own particular Christian confession or non-Christian religion.

Now we might conceive of a position in which the Catholic arrived at the judgment that all these creeds and religions are equally justified from the outset as expressions of a single basic attitude of 'faith'; that [31] they all serve to bring men into a relationship with God that is salvific; that they differ from one another only in points that are more or less inessential; and that, just as in human society and culture in general the individual can choose to adopt any mode of life he likes, so too here it is open to him to select whichever one of these creeds or religions suits him best. If this were a possible position for a Catholic, then of course the fact that there is so much diversity in religion would not in itself cause him a moment's disquiet. But this is precisely a judgment which the Catholic Christian cannot make. An intrinsic element in his Christian and Catholic beliefs is the conviction of faith that now at any rate Christianity is the unique and absolute religion founded by God through Christ and prescribed by him for all men; that it is the way of salvation which God, of his salvific will, has created for all and made radically binding for all to follow. We cannot adopt that attitude of religious relativism which regards all religions as on the whole equally justifiable, and the confusion and disorder among them as relatively unimportant; or that attitude which considers that the variations and points of convergence between the different religions are, taken all in all, only concerned with inessentials. Such an attitude would, if pressed to its logical conclusions, represent the total overthrow of the Christian and Catholic faith. And this is no less true even though there may be no small number of Catholics who implicitly feel that they can combine a religious relativism of this kind in their concrete attitudes with an active practice of the 'Catholic' religion which may even, in some cases, be very enthusiastic. The really convinced Catholic, therefore, finds himself confronted with the question of how,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

without this religious relativism, he can reconcile his faith in the absolute nature of his Catholic Christianity and of his Church, and in the universally binding force which they have for all, with the fact that even after two thousand years of Christianity and the Church the greater part of mankind is neither Christian nor Catholic. For in facing up to this question he cannot deny that this greater part of mankind has both intelligence and sincerity of conscience. A further fact which he has to take into consideration is that he is bound by the terms of his own Catholic belief to hold fast to the fact that God truly and effectively wills all men to be saved. He cannot hold the opinion that God himself denies the possibility and the grace of salvation to a wide section of mankind. And yet it is only in Jesus Christ that this salvation is conferred, and through Christianity and the one Church that it must be mediated to all men.

To the extent that it is possible at all within the limits of this study, this question must be answered. The answer that is given must be based [32] upon the orthodox teaching of the Catholic faith. What we are looking for, therefore, is an answer which we cannot, in any sense, attempt to find a basis for in the history or philosophy of religion, or from some position in which we remain uncommitted to the creed of a specific religion. On the contrary, we are seeking for an answer which the Catholic Christian must give on the basis of his own Christianity and according to the principles proper to this. Obviously in giving such an answer we cannot enter into any extensive development of the dogmatic principles on which it will be based. These can only be stated in bare outline. Obviously too a generalised answer of this kind, based as it is on a pre-existing system, must necessarily make use of ideas which cannot themselves claim to have dogmatic force but are only intended to be reconcilable with the dogmatic positions.

For the Catholic theologians of today, in contrast to those of former times, one not inconsiderable factor has made it easier to find an answer to this question. It is that the Second Vatican Council has had something quite fundamental to say upon this question. The relevant pronouncements are to be found in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, in the Decree on Oecumenism, in the Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church, and in the Explanation Concerning Non-Christian Religions. The relevant pronouncements, even though there is a genuine continuity between them and the earlier traditions of Catholic teaching, are nevertheless both fresh and courageous. Moreover, while they are certainly brief they are also fairly unambiguous.[1] The striking point in all this was above all the fact that although these pronouncements represented a very notable advance in the question with which we are concerned, this advance was achieved almost as though the necessity for it were self-evident, and the pronouncements were adopted without debate or opposition of any kind. It is neither necessary nor possible to expound the relevant passages at this point, or to provide a theological interpretation of them. Here we must confine ourselves to emphasising right at the outset that in the theological considerations which follow the author is conscious of finding support and justification in this explanation of the Council.

I

We must begin by stating the fundamental principle on the basis of which our question must be answered.

[33] 1. With regard to this fundamental principle we must begin by referring to a conviction which is an intrinsic element in the content of the Catholic faith. It is the

[1] For a more detailed investigation of this point cf. K. Rahner, ‘Atheism and Implicit Christianity’ in volume IX, (London & Baltimore, 1972), pp. 145-164.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conviction that in spite of original sin and also the personal sinfulness of men God truly and sincerely wills all men to be saved, and that in virtue of willing the universal salvation of all in this sense he offers every man, whatever the circumstances of life in which he finds himself, a genuine possibility of attaining to his own salvation. This general offering of salvation attaches itself (at least if we set aside the question of the final destiny of children who die unbaptised) to salvation in the grace of Christ as its definitive mode, and it is this that Christian salvation properly means. It achieves its final consummation in a sharing through the life of God, and this in turn implies the enjoyment of the immediate vision of God and, as the concomitant of this, a love of God that is ultimate and eternal. It also implies that state which we refer to in the creed as the 'resurrection of the flesh'. Catholic theologians of earlier times often put forward the hypothesis that under certain circumstances men who had arrived at the use of their intelligence and free will could enjoy a merely 'natural' beatitude without sharing in the divine nature and the divine life in the beatific vision. They developed this hypothesis in order to find a way out of the difficulty of seeing how supernatural salvation could ever be attained by those individuals who, at least to all appearances, could not and did not attain to belief in the gospel as an act of supernatural grace. But today at least, in the light of the Second Vatican Council, it should be clear that this way out of the difficulty is no longer open to Catholic theologians. On this question we have to hold firm to the fact that the salvation which God offers to every man as genuinely possible for him is the Christian salvation that comes to him through supernatural grace and consists in a sharing in the life of God. The possibility of attaining to this salvation is such that it can only remain unrealised if it is frustrated by the real, grave and personal guilt of the subject to whom it is offered.

This will of God to save all men in Christ and through his grace can be characterised more precisely and more concisely as God's will to bestow himself on the creature who is endowed with spiritual faculties. What is intended to be conveyed by this may be stated as follows:

The salvation which God, of his will to save all men, offers and effectively bestows upon the individual is present now in its first principles and as a seed which is still undeveloped. (At this stage it is called 'justifying and sanctifying grace'). In the future this will be brought to its fulness in the form of eternal life (this is called the 'vision of God'). It can only [34] fail to be brought to this fulness if man of his own free will sinfully rejects it. Now salvation in this sense is not a created gift of God, a mere creaturely state of sanctification and blessedness, but rather, in the deepest sense, God himself. For it is himself in his innermost and most mysterious life, and so in his divine glory that God gives man to have as his own. This self-bestowal of God in that form in which it is offered is both that which God offers and imparts to man as a gift of salvation for his own final perfection, and at the same time it is something more. It is the possibility which he imparts to the creature as endowed with spiritual faculties to receive what is offered with a freedom that is raised and intensified to a supernatural level; to receive it, therefore, in such a way that in the very act of accepting it man continues to recognise that which is actually offered him as salvation as divine. In other words he does not, in some sense, draw it down to the level or into the dimension of the purely finite and natural perfection of man and so deprive it of its true status. God himself is the salvation and at the same time the power to receive the salvation in such a way that this salvation really is God himself, and God remains not only the ultimate Cause but the real content as well of this salvation. This self-bestowal of God as the salvation of man and as the possibility of accepting this salvation in full freedom is something that, without derogating from the sharing in the divine life that it effects in the ultimate depths of man's nature, applies to the whole man in all the levels of his being, in that which unites all these levels and in the manner in which they mutually condition one another.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Thus the self-bestowal of God upon the creature as endowed with spiritual faculties implies two things:

(A) The divine self-bestowal (at least as offered and bestowed upon the free creature as that which makes it possible for it to act for its own salvation) penetrates to the ultimate roots of man's being, to the innermost depths of his spiritual nature, and takes effect upon him from there, radically re-orientating this nature of his towards the immediate presence of God. It imparts to this nature an inward dynamism and an ultimate tendency towards God himself that is a grace. It elevates the uncircumscribed transcendentality of the person as spiritual in such a way that this becomes something more than the condition proper to human nature as spiritual, personal and free. It becomes a transcendentality that reaches up to the immediacy of God himself. This divine finality and dynamic impulse present in the person as spiritual is indeed and in the most absolute sense a grace, because it owes nothing to the 'natural' nature of man. But this does not mean that it is to be conceived of as something [35] which only exists here and there in some individuals but not in others. This 'supernatural existential' or mode of being (as we may call this finality and dynamic impulse which makes us tend towards the immediate presence of God) is indeed the outcome of grace. But it is inserted into man's nature through the salvific will of God to become an abiding element in his spiritual mode of being, and as something that is a living force in man always and everywhere, whether accepted or rejected by man's own free will. It radically influences the ultimate development of his existence as spiritual.[2] Admittedly this does not mean, and need not mean, that man must always have a conscious awareness of this 'supernatural existential' in his life, or that he must be able to create this awareness within him simply by a process of psychological introspection.

Just as in other contexts too man can never achieve, merely by reflecting upon himself, any adequate view of the full depths and heights of his own existence as a spiritual being endowed with transcendence and freedom, and can never objectify this to himself, so too it is with this supernatural existential of which he is aware, yet which he cannot on that account know in the sense of objectifying it to himself. It is a mode of being, or 'existential', which is constituted by the salvific will of God for all men, to become an abiding element in their spiritual existence and to belong inescapably to human nature as such. It is the ultimate, most vital and most interior reality and power of man's existence, even though in the average and everyday activities of his life he never consciously reflects upon the fact that he is living by it, and even though the way in which he experiences this grace is not one in which it becomes the object of his conscious awareness.[3] For he experiences it in virtue of the fact that constantly, and in all the exercise of his knowledge and freedom, he experiences himself as one who is orientated towards that which lies beyond all definable realities, namely towards the silent mystery of God. In order to have a single key phrase in which to sum all this up in brief we may call this self-bestowal of God, considered as the abiding existential of every human life, the transcendental self-bestowal of God.

(B) Now even at the natural level every spiritual mode of transcendentality that belongs to man is activated when man as a physical and social entity engages himself in the concrete realities of his life as [36] conditioned by space and time, as belonging to history, and as involving communication with other beings on the same plane of existence. In other words this transcendentality of man as spiritual does not remain a separate department of human life over and above the historical context in which he is involved, and in which he brings his existence to its fulness. And this also applies to the process by which man develops to the full

[2] On the concept of the 'supernatural existential' cf. F. K. Mayr and K. Rahner, 'Existential', Sacramentum Mundi 2 (Freiburg and London 1968), pp. 304-307.
[3] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Experience of Grace', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore 1967), pp. 86-90; also the same author's Alltägliche Dinge (5th ed. Einsiedeln 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the supernaturally elevated transcendentality bestowed upon him, the 'supernatural existential'. This is not something that takes place apart from this historical mode of being, but rather something that is achieved in and through his existence as engaged in human living in the concrete.

The 'supernatural existential' in man has a history of its own which unfolds throughout the whole length and breadth of man's life as a historical being. It is in this life that it is imparted to man in his freedom, and it is in this life that it is made manifest. This manifestation does not necessarily or in all cases need to be explicitly and thematically religious. It is ipso facto present, albeit unconsciously and, in a certain sense, 'anonymously', everywhere where the transcendentality of the spirit and moral freedom are exercised, because the transcendental self-bestowal of God through the 'supernatural existential' is precisely one of the factors exercising a decisive influence upon this spiritual nature of man.

Thus the presence of the abiding 'supernatural existential' in man has the effect of making saving history coexistent with human history in general in its spiritual dimension, even though in many cases man himself does not consciously advert to this or formulate to himself what is taking place in this spiritual dimension.[4] To this extent we can and must say that either saving history or its opposite, the history of perdition, is taking place wherever man of his own free decision either voluntarily undertakes his own mode of existence or alternatively protests against it. And this is precisely because this 'supernatural existential', considered as God's act of self-bestowal which he offers to men, is in all cases grafted into the very roots of human existence.

Indeed we may go so far as to say that 'revelation history' is always and everywhere taking place because of God's act of supernatural self-bestowal considered as that which raises and re-orientates the transcendental dimension of the human spirit by the power of grace. The reason for this is that even though man himself may not have recognised this supernatural self-bestowal or reflected upon it in his conscious thought, nevertheless it still constitutes an element in his transcendental awareness.

[37] Certainly the reason that 'revelation history' is always and everywhere taking place is not simply that the spiritual level of man's being, with the still undeveloped resources and possibilities which it has of itself, ipso facto constitutes an authentic revelation in this sense. Rather it is that God himself, by the very fact of his own gracious act of self-bestowal, constantly communicates himself to man as the divine ultimate to which truth points, and as the very scope of love. And this transcendental self-bestowal of God is communicated (even if not as a definable idea) in and through the spiritual dimension of man's life.

What we have been speaking of is the progressive and purposive unfolding of salvation and revelation ('salvation' and 'revelation history') which derives from the presence in man of the 'supernatural existential'. Now it is possible for man himself to explicitate this in his conscious thought and to make it a religious theme for investigation. And this process of making the 'salvation' and 'revelation history' of the 'supernatural existential' an explicit object and theme for man's religious thought can be positively guided, or even demanded by God as part of his plan to save man. Over and above this it is possible for this process of explicitation to be of such a kind that man is supplied with relatively sure criteria enabling him to judge the rightness or otherwise of the development of his ideas in objectifying and interpreting this 'salvation history' and 'revelation history' taking place within his own nature. He can assure himself by these criteria that the gradual and progressive process of objectifying and reflexively interpreting this 'history' that takes place within him is correct, legitimate, and not a false interpretation or a distortion due to human error and human [4] For a fuller exposition of this cf. K. Rahner, 'History of the World and Salvation History', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 97-114.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sinfulness. Now if, and to the extent that, we actually achieve all this we can move on to a further stage. Within the broader context of the 'salvation' and 'perdition' history which is universally present everywhere and all the time in mankind, and within the universal 'salvation' and 'revelation history' which is taking place throughout humanity, we attain to something more, something that we can call the explicit and official history of salvation and revelation, something which we are habitually accustomed to call simply 'salvation history' (Heilsgeschichte), something that is apprehensible to us as Christians in the salvation history and revelation history of the Old and New Testaments.

This explicit and official salvation history is still dependent upon the 'supernatural existential' present in all men and taking effect throughout humanity. It is dependent too upon the process of objectifying this which, unalloyed by human error, is attested by God himself. And this [38] salvation history is brought to its climax and goal in Jesus Christ. In him, as the God-man in person, there takes place God's self-bestowal upon man and upon his history in its most sublime, most absolute and most irrevocable form. At the same time in this same Jesus Christ there takes place the most total and perfect acceptance of this self-bestowal of God, as well as the most sublime effects issuing from this acceptance. Thus in this God-man the self-bestowal of God upon the world, and the acceptance of this by the world (in other words the 'supernatural existential' and the reception of this into human nature) are present in history definitively, irrevocably and in a mode in which they can be apprehended in the concrete.

The 'supernatural existential', therefore, present in all humanity tends dynamically towards its irrevocable climax in Jesus Christ. It has this innate tendency of its very nature, but also in virtue of the fact that the dimension of transcendentality in man is realised in a progressive and purposive unfolding, a history. To the extent that this is true, and to the extent that every movement towards a goal derives its direction and force from the goal itself, it can be said that the whole of 'salvation' and 'revelation history' both as universally present in all men and in its explicit and official form is dependent upon Jesus Christ and derives its direction and its forward movement from him. To this extent and in this sense too the whole of this history is the history of the God-man. It follows that this latter is itself already present even in those men who have not attained to any explicit, conscious or objective knowledge of Jesus Christ.

Taking this as our first principle, therefore, we are now in a position to indicate, at least briefly, where the answer is to be found to the question which we have posed for ourselves.

II

First let us take that assertion of the Christian and Catholic faith which lays down that Christianity is the universal, absolute, and God-given religion, and that the one Catholic Church is, of her very nature, a sharer in this absolute quality of Christianity. Let us attempt to answer the question of what this means and how it is justified. When we attribute this absolute character to Christianity we do not intend to assert that the salvation history and revelation history of God is identical with that particular area in the religious history of mankind which is confined to the Old and the New Testaments or to those who have had an explicit faith in Jesus Christ. When we say that Christianity has this absolute [39] character we are saying something quite different from this. First and foremost that the whole salvation history and revelation history of mankind is coexistent with the history of mankind as personal and spiritual and with all that is morally good in this. And inasmuch as it is coexistent in this sense with the history of the human spirit the whole of it is sustained in being by that transcendental self-bestowal of God which is grace-given and which finds its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

supreme and irreversible manifestation in history, and at the same time its free acceptance on the part of humanity, in the God-man Jesus Christ.

The God-man, then, is the supreme and climactic point in God's bestowing of himself upon mankind, such that he supplies meaning to the whole of this divine self-bestowal right from its inception. Right from its very inception God's plan and God's execution of this plan in the implementation of his will to save all men has proceeded from the God-man as its starting-point and to him as its goal. And because of this the whole of salvation and revelation history is Christian right from its inception even before there has been any conscious recognition of this in it, and even before that point in history is attained at which its Christian significance has been objectively formulated and made explicit, namely in the creed, in the Christian act of worship, and in the form of a visible Church.

Conversely, to postulate a salvation and revelation history of this kind is in no sense to deny the absolute character of Christ himself, of Christianity as an explicit faith, or of the Church as the visible expression of the abiding presence of Christ. For this history is in fact itself being impelled towards Christ, even though only in a hidden manner, by this forward movement, this historical unfolding of the grace that is offered to all and in all ages. That which is made effective (at least as something offered by God) always and everywhere throughout the history of mankind achieves its supreme expression as a comprehensible historical fact which can no longer be suppressed or denied in Jesus Christ and his Church. In Christ and in his Church man's transcendence is not merely present in the depths of his conscience in virtue of the 'supernatural existential'. Also, and more than this, this transcendence of his is actually opened up to the immediate presence and action of God in virtue of what has taken place in history and what has been explicitly uttered. Christianity and the Church can see their own significance as the effective presence of God's salvation in the absolute and of his grace, in history and as apprehensible to man. They can achieve this understanding of their own significance precisely because it does not entail any denial of the fact [40] that salvation history both in the collective sense and as applied to the life of the individual, is present everywhere. On the contrary, Christianity and the Church understand this as the prior history that leads up to themselves and as the effect of that selfsame grace which has achieved its definitive and unsurpassable historical manifestation in themselves. Moreover the fact that it has arrived at this definitive mode does not mean that the grace referred to has been withdrawn from the universal history of mankind, or that it has ceased to be the inner dynamism latent in the very heart of this and making God present in it.

This divine dynamism, then, latent in the entire history of the human spirit, transforms it into saving history and revelation history. And in doing this it impels this whole spiritual and religious history towards that point at which it becomes explicitly apprehensible as the history and manifestation of Christ and of his Church. And even though this point may lie in a future that is remote and invisible, it is in fact ultimately identical with the end of history and the return of Christ in glory. This is the first point. The second point is that Christianity and the Church themselves have only arrived at their definitive fulness and historical maturity when the whole of salvation history and revelation history has visibly and explicitly been transformed into the history of Christianity and of the Church and has become a definable element in the Christianity that is explicitly embodied in the Church. So far we have been treating of two basic principles, and in the light of the synthesis which we have achieved between them it now becomes intelligible to us that even Christianity and the Church themselves are constantly in process of seeking the final perfection of their own nature. And because of this they are in a position to recognise in those tendencies within the spiritual and religious history of mankind which are religiously positive even though not yet explicitly Christian, that which Christianity and the Church must absorb and transform into themselves in order to become fully that which they already are: the manifestation in history of the grace of God now at its eschatological stage in history and in a state of purity which is divinely attested and assured.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

III

In the light of the basic principle indicated above we can also acquire fresh insights in our deepening awareness of our Catholic faith with regard to the interpretation we should put upon non-Catholic Christians and Christian Churches outside our own. The Catholic Church cannot [41] think of herself as one among many historical manifestations in which one and the same God-man Jesus Christ is made present, which are offered by God to man for him to choose whichever he likes. On the contrary she must necessarily think of herself as the one and total presence in history of the one God-man in his truth and grace, and as such as having a fundamental relationship to all men. She is conscious of herself as making abidingly present that which derives authoritatively and juridically, even from the aspect of historical succession, from that Church which Jesus Christ gathered about himself as the community of those who believe in him; conscious of herself as the Church which has remained faithful to her own origins in her sacramental system, in her moral principles and in the authority legitimately bequeathed to her by Christ himself. All this Christ has made an intrinsic element in his Church, although admittedly the manner in which she has preserved all this involves a process of historical unfolding and legitimate development. For this reason the Catholic Church cannot simply think of herself as one among many Christian Churches and communities on an equal footing with her. The unity which Christ indubitably willed his Church to exhibit is meant to be visibly and unambiguously present even in the dimension of history and social life. And the Church cannot accept that this unity is something which must be achieved only in the future and through a process of unification between the Christian Churches, so that until this point is reached it simply would not exist. But though he must hold this the Catholic Christian need not on that account regard the other Christian Churches and communities simply as entities which should not be there at all or as constituting a mere contradiction of the Church of Christ.

We must begin by stating a principle which should be fully and sincerely accepted as axiomatic, and which we have a duty in Christian love to accept in this sense. It is that absolutely speaking all Christians, together with the ecclesiastically organised communities to which they belong, have a will to be one and belong to the one true Church of Christ. Now to will this is a grace of God that is absolutely basic to salvation. As such it is undoubtedly more fundamental and more absolute than that will which causes non-Catholic Christians and their Churches to remain separated from the Catholic Church, from her teaching and from her authority, and to believe that they must maintain this separation in force. They believe this because in spite of that more basic will to unity which is present in their consciences, they still cannot see that the Catholic Church is the Church of Christ to which they too, absolutely speaking, owe their allegiance. It is not possible at this point to enter into the question [42] of why, in spite of God's universal will to save all men, and in spite of this basic will on the part of all Christians to adhere to the true Church of Christ and maintain its unity, God himself in his saving providence tolerates this failure to recognise the one Church of Christ. Indeed, this saving providence of God recognises (though no doubt only indirectly and by implication) that this failure has a positive meaning for these Christians and for the Church herself in the sense that even though this state of disunity should not be, still a deeper significance can be drawn from it.

In any case, when we reflect upon this more basic underlying will to adhere to the true Church of Christ and its unity we can see that even when it has not yet found its proper

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

object, which is precisely this Church as it exists as a fully concrete and visible entity, still it has already found something. For an ultimate unity, effective at the invisible and spiritual level, already exists between all Christians. And in fact this unity is already such that, precisely because it is sustained and brought about by the Spirit of God, it is greater than the unity of the Church considered merely as a society, such as, for instance exists or might exist between Catholics. It is perfectly possible for these to belong to one and the same Catholic Church so far as their external lives and social relationships are concerned, and still, through their own fault, not to possess the Holy Spirit of grace and justification, and so to be united to one another only by social and ecclesiastical ties of a purely external kind. Furthermore on the Catholic understanding of faith it is immediately apparent that all those Christians outside the Catholic Church who have not committed any serious fault against the claims of their own religious or moral consciences, do in fact possess the Holy Spirit of justification and grace. They have already arrived at a participation in the divine nature, the 'supernatural existential' which they have voluntarily accepted. In other words that interior dynamism which assimilates them to God, and is in this sense the seed of eternal life thrusting upwards towards the immediate presence of God, is already present at the innermost core of their being. All these, therefore, are in possession of precisely that to which everything in the Church is ordered; for her official life, her sacraments and the exercise of her authority are on the one hand simply the instrument and means for achieving this end and on the other that which enables her to manifest the reality concerned as a concrete phenomenon in history. All Christians both within and without the Catholic Church, therefore, simply in virtue of being faithful to their own consciences, are united among themselves in the Spirit of the Church, in the life of God that is [43] extended to them. It is this life of God as extended to man, therefore, that everything in the Church is intended to point to as its appropriate manifestation. It is meant to be a sacramental sign in history of this life, without actually being identified with it.

The unity of men in the Spirit of God can, therefore, be present, and to a large extent actually is present, even where the manifestation in history and the imparting of this truly divine unity has not yet been achieved at least in its fulness, where this unity has not yet fully imposed itself in the dimension of the social life of Christians, their forms of worship and their adherence to one and the same explicit creed. An analogy may be invoked here from the sacramental teaching of the Catholic Church, according to which there are cases in which the reception of the sacrament as a formal act of worship is actually anticipated, and the grace of the sacrament concerned is already present before the sacrament is received. This grace does indeed demand its appropriate sacramental manifestation, but under certain circumstances no longer achieves such manifestation in the human and temporal life of the individuals concerned. In the case of Christians outside the Church the same relationship prevails. Let us consider this ultimate unity in the Spirit, to which, in the last analysis, all attain as the beginning of eternal life, as it exists among those Christians who are separated by their beliefs from the Church. Among them it does not exist as a mere unity, totally deprived of any kind of historical manifestation. It is only that the historical manifestation appropriate to it is rendered more remote. For everywhere where the word of God in scripture is acknowledged, where, in the deepest and truest sense (even though, it may be, with certain omissions or wrong interpretations) the living God, the grace of Christ the Lord and the Redeemer and the forgiveness of sins is preached, where this preaching is effective for salvation because it takes place in the name of Christ, where baptism in the Trinity is validly and effectively conferred and where, in some cases other sacraments too of Christ are likewise administered, there the Spirit of justification and unity among Christians ipso facto creates for itself a unity in the dimension of the social and ecclesiastical life of Christians, of their creed and of their formal worship, a unity which, even if it is not total, is still real. In all these areas of human life, therefore, this Spirit of unity is already beginning to clothe itself in visible 'Church' form, even when it has not yet achieved the full manifestation of its unity and the full unity which it is meant to have as a concrete historical phenomenon. Christians, even while they remain still separated from one another in terms of their express beliefs, are already in the here and now [44] more united in the dimension of grace and in the dimension of the Church than they are divided according to outward appearances. That which already unites them in the here and now is more than that which still holds them apart.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A further point which the Catholic Christian must take into consideration is this. The non-Catholic Christian will, through grace, make experience of the Spirit which performs its atoning and sanctifying work in him through the imparting of those Christian elements which belong to the visible realities of human life as these are communicated to him in his own Church. Moreover these Christian realities which his own Church supplies also have in real fact as they apply to him the significance of true and positive media of salvation. According to the Catholic understanding of the Church the communication of salvation as found here consists formally not indeed in that which actually causes his Church to be separated from the Catholic Church but rather in those positive Christian elements which can exist even outside the Catholic Church and which are brought about by God's salvific will. On the basis of this experience of grace which is de facto communicated to him through his own Church the non-Catholic Christian arrives at the judgment (even though he may not formulate it precisely in these terms) that so long as he can, and indeed must hold firm to this Church in which grace and justification are communicated to him he cannot recognise in any clear, positive or unambiguous sense in his own conscience that this Christian communication of his justification and experience of grace is also to be found pure and unalloyed in the Catholic Church. Nor can he judge that over and above this in the Catholic Church they actually achieve their authentic fulness and are made fully apprehensible as elements in concrete human living in the way that Christ willed them to be, and that must be brought about by grace in order that they can be manifested with all the fulness appropriate to them. Even on Catholic principles the non-Catholic Christian who encounters the grace of God in, and indeed through his Church, must presume that until he encounters precisely this Christianity which he has experienced in the Catholic Church, and in a form that is equally pure and more fully and unambiguously apprehensible as a concrete historical phenomenon to the point where it genuinely convinces his own conscience – until he arrives at this position he has an absolute duty to hold fast to the Christianity which he has inherited. The Catholic Christian must, without prejudice to his belief in the necessity of his Church for salvation, recognise the position of the non-Catholic Christian who has arrived at this kind of decision as [45] a result of the concrete circumstances of his life. For such a one, even without any fault on his part, the possibility of recognising the true significance of the Catholic Church to a point where it overcomes his earlier presumption is not necessarily given in all cases or inevitably, and may never be given throughout his entire life.

In the light of this it becomes apparent that non-Catholic Churches and religious confraternities too have a positive function to perform, not only for their own adherents but also in relation to the Catholic Church. For it is perfectly possible for the one Spirit of God to manifest its presence in objective historical occurrences in the other Christian confessions and communions, that same Spirit which works, sanctifies and creates unity in the Catholic Church and outside her as well. These objective manifestations do not have to be present in the Catholic Church with the same frequency, with an equal historical impact, or with the same clarity and power to convince the conscience. At the same time the Catholic Christian, on the basis of his own understanding of the Church, cannot concede that the Catholic Church has in principle set its face against, or still persistently sets its face against all cases of such genuine objective manifestations of the Spirit, which themselves serve in turn to impart the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Spirit to others. To this extent the Catholic Church has something to learn from such genuine objective manifestations of the Holy Spirit in the non-Catholic Churches. They are, of their nature, a call and an incentive to watchfulness which the Spirit of God offers her because she herself, through the narrow-mindedness and sinfulness of her members, has not yet arrived at the full effectiveness of the part she has to play in human history or the full development of her own nature.

IV

Finally let us return to our basic principle in order to achieve from this standpoint a theological evaluation of the non-Christian religions. Since these, even when compared to one another, vary enormously in respect of the degree of religious feeling, purity etc. that they have achieved, what we have in principle to say at this point can obviously only validly be applied to the particular religions in this category in very different ways and with more or less strong reservations.[5]

Bearing this proviso in mind it can be said that if we begin by viewing [46] the non-Christian religions before the coming of Christ then certainly we can recognise the possibility that 'in themselves' and in principle they were positively willed by God as legitimate ways of salvation. For certainly the explicit and official salvation history of the Old Testament and the explicit and official means of salvation recorded there were not prescribed for all men. On the other hand, however, it follows from God's will to save all men that every individual must have had some positive means of salvation available to him, giving him at least the possibility of possessing true supernatural salvation. Yet the nature of man as a historical and social being was such that a way of salvation of this kind could not be followed in the concrete altogether in emancipation from the social and historical context of human life. Man will not work out his salvation simply by acts of religion which are purely interior. He can only do so through the sort of religion which must, of its very nature, find concrete expression in the social and institutional life of the community.

When we reflect upon what we have already said at an earlier stage with regard to the 'supernatural existential' present in every man in all ages, and with regard to the fact that the supernatural history of salvation and revelation are coexistent with the history of the human spirit, then it will become immediately comprehensible that the religions which de facto do exist outside Christianity and the Old Testament are not merely the outcome of human speculation, human wickedness or a self-willed decision on man's part to devise a religion for himself instead of accepting it from God. Instead of this the 'supernatural existential', the dynamic impulse present in man by the power of grace and impelling him towards the triune God, is at work in all these religions and plays a decisive part in determining the forms in which these religions are objectively expressed.

Of course this does not mean that these religions are thereby rendered 'pure' or unadulterated as objective expressions and manifestations of this transcendental self-bestowal of God. They continue to be through and through a mixture of disparate elements which defies all analysis: apart from the manifestation of grace there is the religious instinct naturally present in man, and also his sinfulness, corrupting and destroying the religious element in his make-up. But through them all the grace of God is nevertheless constantly at work, and even in the most primitive, corrupt or grotesque forms this grace still offers to man the ultimate possibility of activating in some way or other (however submerged or distorted it

[5] On the considerations which follow cf. the more detailed arguments in K. Rahner, 'Christianity and the non-Christian Religions', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 115-134.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

may be) that orientation towards the mystery of God which [47] is implanted in him by grace. A factor which should not be overlooked in all this is that in one way or another, and however difficult it may be to perceive, the religions that man actually encounters in the concrete have a general upwards tendency from what is lower in human life to what is higher, and so certainly do set before man the possibility, and even the necessity, of freely deciding in his conscience to move towards what is higher. In a certain measure, therefore, this impulse in his life already by anticipation implicitly directs him towards the mystery of the inconceivable fulness of God.

V

It can and must be said that these non-Christian religions are in principle, and in themselves, overtaken and rendered obsolete by the coming of Christ and by his death and resurrection. This is because in fact all of them, even in those elements of truth and goodness which they possess, were only provisional manifestations, destined to be replaced, of that divine self-bestowal which is present in the innermost depths of the history of mankind and its religion, sustaining it, actively influencing the forms which it assumes, and finally coming to its full and definitive manifestation in Jesus Christ. But in saying that all these non-Christian religions have been radically abrogated we have still not made clear our position with regard to the actual point in concrete history at which these religions ceased to be a legitimate way of salvation for certain human groups.[6] If we regard the history of salvation and revelation in the first place as being in some sense a collective entity, then it can surely be said that this concrete 'moment' in time (naturally it may extend over a fairly long period) is arrived at at that point at which Christianity in its explicit and ecclesiastical form became an effective reality, making its impact and asserting its claims in history in the relevant cultural sphere to which the non-Christian religion concerned belonged. This means that the historical expansion of Christianity, which even today has not yet simply been concluded, coincides with a progressive abrogation of the legitimacy of these religions.[7]

[48] But so long as these religions to a large extent determine the particular circumstances affecting the salvation of the individual, this reply concerning salvation history in its collective dimension is still not enough to answer all the questions that arise at the individual level. Let us therefore concentrate for a moment upon the individual. For him the non-Christian religion which he has inherited from past history, and which has been handed down to him in his own sphere of life, is only abrogated as the authentic way of salvation for him at that point at which the message of Christ so penetrates into his own conscience as an individual that it is only through a grave fault of his own that he can any longer reject it as the way of salvation offered by God and as the fulfilment that goes beyond anything that his former religion had to offer.

In no case can we define with absolute certainty the precise point at which such a moment effectively occurs in the concrete life of the individual. For if a given individual rejects the Christianity brought to him through the preaching of the Church, even then we are still never in any position to decide whether this rejection as it exists in the concrete signifies a grave fault or an act of faithfulness to his own conscience. If in such a case Christianity is accepted,

---

[6] On these questions cf. also J. Heislbetz, Theologische Gründe der nichtchristlichen Religionen (Freiburg 1967), pp. 200-218. For a more detailed explanation reference may be made to other sections of this work (cf. also the bibliography supplied in it).

[7] For a correct concept of what 'mission' means cf. K. Rahner, 'Grundprinzipien zur heutigen Mission in der Kirche', Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 46-80, esp. pp. 52 ff., 56 ff., 69 ff., 71 ff., 76 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

then we can hope in all thankfulness that this acceptance was not merely the result of human influence, but rather due to the working of the grace of God and its effective manifestation, which really does unite this individual to God. But we have no absolute certainty whatever upon this point. Thus we can never say with ultimate certainty whether a non-Christian who has rejected Christianity, and who, in spite of a certain encounter with Christianity, does not become a Christian, is still following the provisional paths mapped out for his own salvation which are leading him to an encounter with God, or whether he has now entered upon the way of perdition. In any case even today, and after the coming of Christ, it is still perfectly conceivable that a non-Christian religion still exercises a positively saving function for the individual. Indeed the Second Vatican Council explicitly states that God does not refuse salvation to a man who, through no fault of his own, has still not attained to any explicit acknowledgment of God, who, in other words, so far as the level of his conscious awareness is concerned, must be called an 'atheist'.[8]

The paths by which mankind, and within mankind the individual, make pilgrimage towards God are long and devious. But only the gravest [49] sinfulness on the part of man himself – and about this we can make no final judgment – can turn them into ways that are really false, and which lead to perdition. And so long as this is not the case all these ways have a single secret orientation which is common to them all, however much they may seem to diverge from one another. Every way by which a man travels from genuine motives of conscience is a way leading to the infinitude of God. These ways are of various lengths, and not every one, not every age in history, and not every people either, progress at the same rate or arrive at the same point in their journey when these are compared one with another. But everyone who genuinely embarks upon such a way does arrive. But not only do all of these ways lead into the eternal life of God, all of them also lead first to a cross-roads and then to their finishing point, and at each of these points Christ and his presence in the Church are to be found. In union with the Church, his mystical body, he is the beginning and the end of all the ways of God. Whether a man reaches this final point in the way of God while still within history, or only attains to it when the way of his own history comes to its close – that is something which God himself arranges of his own free decision, and is a mystery hidden in him.

But whoever has already found Christ and his Church visibly present in the history of his own personal life cannot discover any reason for separating himself from Christ from the fact that so many men, through no fault of their own, have not yet found Christ and his Church. For Christ is the one source of salvation for all men. He is sought, all unknowingly, even by those men of good will who have not yet learned to call upon him by the name he bears on earth.

[8] For an analysis of what this statement means and implies cf. a study of the author which has already been referred to, namely 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity', in volume IX, pp. 145-164.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[50]

3

ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE POPE AND THE COLLEGE OF BISHOPS

The Second Vatican Council has certainly made pronouncements of decisive importance in its teaching on the connection between the papacy and the episcopate, and its teaching on this point has now been ratified as the official teaching of the Church. But while recognising this, it must also be said that, for reasons which are very various, the actual pronouncements of the Council itself failed to supply solutions to many of the questions which were already being discussed among theologians even prior to the Council. Among these was the question of how we should define the precise relationship between the pope as the supreme pastor of the Church and the united episcopate who, as a college, are invested with the same supreme power in the Church as the pope himself possesses. Long before the Council I myself attempted to supply an answer to this question.[1] But as a result of the Council and the theological developments arising from it the problem with which we are here concerned has come to occupy a different place in our discussions, one in which it has a greater bearing on our concrete lives but which is, at the same time, more polemical. And in view of this it is necessary for us to undertake an expansion and development of the solution which we then put forward only provisionally.[2] As for the discussion which has emerged in the meanwhile, with regard to how far the thesis I proposed can be reconciled with the theology of the Council, I can for the most part only make any contribution to this to the extent that the further developments [51] offered here prove fruitful for our understanding of the actual matter itself.[3]

I

In the Dogmatic Constitution Lumen gentium concerning the relationship between the papacy and the episcopacy the Council itself does not make any exhaustive pronouncement in the sense indicated because it leaves specific questions open to further discussion among theologians. It lays down that in accordance with the defined doctrine of the First Vatican Council the pope possesses 'plena et suprema potestas' in the Church, and that he can exercise this plenary power even without any collegiate act in the true sense on the part of the united bishops. In this he is not bound by any juridical guidance which these bishops have to offer. It states further that the united episcopate as such, i.e. considered as a collegiate entity,

[1] On this cf. K. Rahner (with J. Ratzinger), The Episcopacy and the Primacy, Quaestiones Disputatae 4 (Freiburg/Edinburgh/London 1962), pp. 11-36. cf. also idem, Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 317, 357 ff. 361.

[2] The following article was written with nothing further in view than the special occasion proper to itself, and before any positions hostile to it had yet been explicitly defined (cf. n. 3). For this reason I think it best at this initial stage to let this study, which is wholly confined to the actual subject-matter, and therefore non-polemical, to stand upon its own merits without further modification.

[3] The opposition which my thesis has aroused is curious in one respect, namely that I myself am never cited as the defender of the thesis which is under attack. In so far, therefore, as I am being referred to at all, I must begin by defending myself against the interpretation that has been placed upon the thesis I have put forward. A full 'answer' in this sense would, however, assume such proportions that the apparatus of footnotes that it would entail would exceed the limits permissible in the present article. For this reason I must pass over the discussion which has arisen – chiefly with W. Bertrams and Kl. Mörsdorf. My assistant and student Karl Lehmann will take up the question in a special article (cf. Philosophie und Theologie 1968, the third number).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is likewise the bearer of the same full and supreme power in the Church, though of course only to the extent that it is not simply the sum total of all the individual bishops, but a corpus, ordo, collegium that is constituted with and under the pope as its indispensable head and to the extent that it is only capable of a 'collegiate act' with the free agreement of the pope himself. This remains true even though in concrete fact and in the actual circumstances of history this may take place in very different ways.

In defining the relationship between the pope and the universal episcopate the Council does not go beyond this formulation. This means that the statement in question contains nothing else than what had all along been held clearly and explicitly as a matter of faith by the Church both before and after the First Vatican Council. For what is said here about the united episcopate and its relationship to the pope and the plenary power he enjoys as primate is precisely the same as what has all along been said about the relationship between an Oecumenical Council [52] and the pope, vested as he is with this plenary power as primate. In this it is in fact obvious that it is not merely as a result of being summoned to assemble at a particular point that the Council acquires this plena et suprema potestas in the Church. Rather the united episcopate must already possess this power in order that they can hold a Council. If the bishops were in possession of such power neither as individuals nor as a body, then the mere act of coming together in a particular place could never bring it about that they suddenly acquired this power. This could never be the case even if we were willing to assume that they could only actually exercise this power (whatever their reasons for doing so) when they were actually assembled together in a particular place. If it were sought to suggest that the bishops as locally assembled only acquire this power belonging to an Oecumenical Council precisely as a result of being called together by the pope, then (and this is a point that we shall have to return to in greater detail at a later stage) we should have to say that the prior supposition on which this theory is based was false, because a power that is transmitted within the Church herself (as opposed to one that is imparted by Christ) cannot, by definition, be the supreme power, since the power of him who imparts it must in fact be higher than itself.

In the light of this it becomes self-evident that the teaching of the Second Vatican Council with regard to the united episcopate as the upholder of supreme and plenary power in the Church and with regard to the relationship between this united episcopate and the pope is simply a repetition of the classic doctrine concerning the power of a Council (and in fact with regard to that of the united episcopate) which has always been in force, and which was explicitly put forward at the First Vatican Council by Gasser, Zinelli etc. But precisely because of this it is also clear that those questions about the relationship between pope and Council (= united episcopate) which have been matters of theological controversy up to now were not touched upon, and therefore that they still remain matters of controversy today. The only increase in clarity that has been achieved is that the hitherto disputed question regarding the relationship between pope and Council is now presented in a better and more realistic form as the question of the precise relationship between the pope and the united episcopate.

Scholastic theology is accustomed to give precision to the form in which the question with which we are here concerned is presented by asking whether there are two 'incompletely distinct subjects' vested with full and supreme power in the Church or only one. Those who choose the second of these two alternatives as their answer to this question [53] obviously presuppose that the one subject involved can only be the pope. Those who choose the first alternative as their answer equally obviously imply thereby that there cannot be two 'completely distinct subjects' vested with one and the same supreme power in the Church. For the purposes of the considerations offered here let it be explicitly acknowledged and taken as read that the two presuppositions here involved are valid, even though in themselves they are not sufficient to answer the question. For (and this is relevant to the first presupposition) let us suppose that the pope is not vested with this power in virtue of his own personal office, but instead of this that he derives this power of his (even though verbally acknowledged as supreme and plenary) from the united episcopate (= Council). For, in the scholastic controversy referred to, the power of the Council is commonly held to be derived from the pope in just this way. But on this hypothesis it is no longer possible to see in what sense this power could be the supreme power, and how it could ever be exercised by the pope even seorsim, apart from the Council and the united episcopate. There is something more to be said also which touches upon the second presupposition. If it were possible to conceive of two distinct subjects existing in the Church both vested with the supreme power, then it would cease to be comprehensible how the unity of the Church would not be, in essence, radically broken. Furthermore this would be tantamount to denying the truth that the united episcopate exists as a college only with and under the pope. In view of all this, therefore, let us take as read the validity of both the two presuppositions involved in the two answers given by the scholastics to the question which has been put. Even so, however, with regard to these presuppositions we still have a few further remarks to make, which are not unimportant for the further considerations which we have to offer.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

With regard to that theory of the scholastics which maintains the absolute unity of the subject vested with supreme power in the Church the first presupposition is not so obvious as it appears. For in fact this position presupposes that there can be one subject such that it can be vested with supreme and plenary authority in the Church, although this power belonging to it is derived from another source (still within the Church), likewise vested with authority. For what is being asserted on this view is in fact that the Council is vested with such authority in virtue of being given a share of, or allowed to participate in the supreme plenary power of the pope. But if this does not involve any intrinsic contradiction then it would in fact be just as valid to hold the opinion that the pope was vested with plenary and supreme power in the Church even though he [54] possessed this power as a result of having ‘derived it’ from the united episcopate or Council either by participation or by having it conferred upon him, or in some other way. Precisely according to the principles presupposed by this first scholastic opinion therefore the statement that the pope is the possessor of this supreme power in the Church could not, taken by itself, enable us to draw the conclusion with compelling force that he does not possess this power through having derived it from the united episcopate. This consideration is enough of itself to show what a dangerous presupposition precisely for the papacy itself underlies the opinion that the supreme power of the united episcopate or Council can be derived from the power of the pope.

With regard to the second principle mentioned above as presupposed in the doctrine of the two incompletely distinct subjects, this does, in fact, indisputably have some foundation in virtue of the incontestable truth that the pope himself is supreme and indispensable precisely as member and head of the college of bishops. But the other ground on which it is based, which is likewise not unimportant – is indeed in reality more fundamental – nevertheless does entail certain problems. The argument here is as follows:

The unity of a society is such as of its essence to exclude the possibility of two completely distinct bearers of supreme power over it. Purely from the juridical point of view this may in fact be wholly enlightening. But it is possible to hold the view that in the Church precisely as such this difficulty with regard to the unity of the society is removed through the power of the Spirit within her. In other words that the unity of the Church is sufficiently guaranteed by the Spirit in spite of power in her being vested in two completely distinct subjects. In support of this view it could be pointed out that precisely according to the Second Vatican Council it is the Spirit which preserves the ‘organic structure’ of the Church in spite of the heterogeneous character of this structure, and that this in turn is neither caused nor guaranteed by any formal juridical norm.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The least that can be concluded from this consideration is that when it is a question of how two different functions can exist side by side in the Church without mutually cancelling each other out or themselves in turn needing to be reconciled through the human application of some common juridical principle, caution is needed. We need not always, or from every aspect, demand a principle unequivocally applicable at the juridical level, in virtue of which we can test the Church's unity juridically. At the same time this is not intended to imply that the attempt we are about to [55] make will lead to a 'spiritualisation' of relationships which necessarily are juridical, or that its primary aims lie in the sphere of Church politics. Against such objections we shall be thinking out, in what follows, the problem of juridical law involved in the relationship concerning which this question has to be raised. The only points which will concern us, therefore, in discussing opposed positions will be the actual arguments put forward and their power to throw light upon the problem.

II

With regard to this question an attempt will here be made to justify the following thesis:

The bearer of the highest and supreme power in the Church is the united episcopate with and under the pope as its head. This single bearer can exercise its plenary power either in a 'collegiate act' in the true sense, or through an act of its head, the pope, who even in this case acts precisely as head of the college, without having to be commissioned for this by the rest of the bishops (the mere fact that they are such does not in itself constitute them as a college) by means of a juridical act on the part of these other bishops. Thus there is only one subject endowed with supreme power in the Church: the college of bishops assembled under the pope as its head. But there are two modes in which this supreme college may act: a 'collegiate act' properly so-called, and the act of the pope as head of the college.

The first point to be made with regard to this thesis is that in no sense does it derogate from the significance and dignity of the primacy of the pope. In fact the Council explicitly declares that the pope is in possession of his plenary powers not as a private person but as head of the entire Church. In this statement, then, the position of the pope is not underestimated by the fact that his office and the significance attached to this in general can be understood only in relation to the Church, though this certainly does not mean that it is given to him by the Church. Now if this is the case then we cannot in any way be derogating from the dignity and uniqueness of his office either by saying that he possesses this plenary power precisely as head of the college of bishops. In no sense is there any implication in this thesis of the idea that his office and the plenitude of power which goes with it is handed over to him by the college of bishops. It is given to him by Christ. But it is given to him together with all that is included in it inasmuch as he is the appointed head of this college, which [56] apart from him would not exist at all. For this college is constituted as such in virtue of the unity it achieves through the presidency of the pope (Peter), and by being one with him. Without the pope it itself is nothing, and he is the pope in virtue of the fact that, and to the extent that he is its head together with all the rights which precisely belong to this headship. In virtue of these rights he can also act seorsim, i.e. by a separate act of his own as distinct from a collegiate one. But even so he is still acting precisely as head of the college. Of course the fulness of his power cannot be derived from any abstract concept of what 'head of a college' means. The pope is head of the college in precisely that manner which has been worked out in concrete fact as the faith of the Church through a progressive development of dogma, and which has been defined in the First Vatican Council. But the plenary power vested in him in this sense is precisely that of one who holds the prerogatives pertaining to the college of bishops as it actually exists in the concrete, so that however he acts he is still acting precisely as head of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this college. This does not mean, however, that he has to be specially commissioned for the purpose by the rest of the bishops. When, therefore, we say that the pope holds his office as visible head of the Church, and only in union with her, this does not derogate from the importance and uniqueness of his primacy as bishop of Rome. Rather it is only in this way that we can arrive at an understanding of its true nature. And if this is the case, then we cannot be in any sense belittling the primacy either by saying that the pope holds his official position precisely as head of the college of bishops. A further point constantly to be borne in mind is that the Church of which he is head is a socially structured entity, and the papacy is not the sole factor in determining what this structure shall be. On the contrary the episcopate too is numbered among those elements in it which are juris divini. If, therefore, the pope is pope precisely because he is head of the Church and only in virtue of this, then it follows that he is head of a Church which is also episcopal in its constitution, and is this too juris divini, as a matter of divine right. It is, therefore, quite impossible for the pope to be head of the Church without at the same time and in virtue of this also being head of the united episcopate. If, therefore, the bishop of Rome enjoys his plenary powers precisely as head of the Church, then it necessarily follows that he also enjoys them in virtue of being head of the united episcopate. It is true of both these facts that the one implies the other in the same sense, and with equal validity: the fact that the office of the pope relates to the universal Church implies that it relates in the same sense to the united episcopate and vice versa.

[57] That this interpretation cannot simply be false from the outset is also shown by the following fact: the pre-Conciliar version of the Constitution on the Church, even though it was composed primarily by Roman theologians, had stated unreservedly that the pope is endowed with infallibility precisely as head of the Church and of the college of bishops (No. 30 in this schema): 'Tamquam universalis ecclesiae pastor et doctor, et collegii episcoporum caput'. It is true that in the final and definitive text of Lumen gentium (Nos. 22, 25) this passage was omitted, or rather the term 'collegii episcoporum caput' was transferred to another place in such a way that the two phrases were no longer explicitly presented as interchangeable. But the reason for this alteration was not that the statement contained in the pre-conciliar text is false, but rather that it was felt that this question should be left open.

Even from what has been said up to this point it will be clear that the teaching of the First and Second Vatican Councils does not exclude the thesis we have put forward at least in any positive sense. This also applies to the term seorsim in the Nota Praevia Explicativa. Having regard to the total context in which it is used this term 'by himself' only serves to rule out any necessity for a 'collegiate act' on the part of the united episcopate. What is sought to be conveyed by it is that even when the pope makes use of the supreme power vested in him 'by himself', he is acting validly and in a manner which is binding upon the Church. He is not bound in this to seek any special agreement on the part of the rest of the bishops in such a way that this agreement would be prior to the act of the pope himself and its binding force, and that it would only have full validity in this sense in virtue of this prior agreement. A further and separate question is what the nature of such an act is considered ontologically. Is it ipso facto and of its very nature the act of the head of the united episcopate, or rather the act of an individual who is indeed also (qui) the head of the college, but precisely in this act is not acting as (qua) such a head? On this point the term seorsim as used in the Declaration remains indeterminate. The opinion that this question was not affected by the Nota Praevia is also shared by e.g. Y. Congar, O. Semmelroth, A. Grillmeier, who were members of the theological commission of the Council.

A further objection to our thesis which is raised is that the pope holds supreme power in the Church 'alone' and 'in person'. To this it must simply be said that this term 'alone' has exactly the same force as that of seorsim, so that this difficulty is to be met with the same answer as that given above. Even if it is true that 'the pope in person' possesses this plenary

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

power, still we cannot see what consequences can be drawn from [58] this which run counter to our thesis. In this context the phrase 'in person' can only mean 'as a concrete physical individual', since in fact 'in person' cannot mean 'as a private person'. When it is said that the pope 'alone' receives this supreme power from Christ, the word 'alone' here can only mean that he is given this power actually as a physical individual. But it cannot mean that the united episcopate does not have this power, since it does in fact undoubtedly possess it. 'Alone' and 'in person', therefore, mean simply that he possesses his power as a physical individual in the concrete, and that as such he is also the 'bearer' (certainly not merely the 'exerciser') of this power.

But in all this nothing whatever has been said in reply to a further question which might be asked: How can we find more precise terms in which to define what is distinctive in the position of the pope, if we are asked in what official (as opposed to private) capacity he 'alone' and 'in person' is the bearer of supreme power in the Church? If it is suggested that according to our version the pope exercises this power not 'in person' but 'in the name of the college of bishops', this latter being the unique bearer of this power, then we must reply that to formulate our position in these terms is most misleading. For this phrase 'in the name of the college' insinuates that in order to exercise his power the pope would need to be commissioned for the purpose by the rest of the bishops. But of course this is not the case, and is in no sense asserted by the terms of our thesis either. On the contrary what this states is: The act of the pope, which he exercises in virtue of the commission given to him directly by Christ, is ipso facto and in itself an act of the college (not a collegiate act), because this power conferred upon him 'in person' and on 'him alone' by Christ of itself makes him the 'mandatory' of the college. If it is stated that the pope possesses his primatial power not only independently of the individual bishops but also independently of 'all of them together' (DS 3060) this is, of course, correct. But it proves nothing against our thesis. The mere fact that this phrase Simul omnes of the First Vatican Council is, as applied to the united episcopate, precisely not equivalent to the term 'college' is in itself enough to establish this point. For the pope himself belongs to the college as such as a constitutive member of it and indeed the supreme member of the college itself. If, therefore, he were to hold this primatial power of his independently of the actual college as such, and not merely independently of the sum total of all the rest of the bishops, then he would hold it independently of himself also – a position which is meaningless. In the strictest and most precise sense the pope has a supreme power not as a figure over against the college or above it, for [59] this college is in fact itself indisputably vested with this same supreme power. The position is, rather, that the pope exercises this same power as an individual also, and this is precisely why in his possession of this power he is set apart from every other individual bishop and also from the sum total of all the bishops (though these are not identical with the college of bishops as such).

III

The positive grounds for upholding this thesis will appear per modum exclusionis primarily as the outcome of a critical examination of the other and opposed theories with regard to the relationship between the united episcopate and the primate. Let us begin by stating the first of two complementary principles which apply here. Every attempt to derive the plenitude of power belonging to the united episcopate and therefore to the Council from a primatial power that is attributed to the pope will meet with difficulties, both on the theoretical plane and on that of historical fact, which are insurmountable. It should be noticed that on such a theory this primatial power of the pope would be as such a different entity from the plenary power transmitted by him to the united episcopate. A power which is derivable from another power,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

quite different from it but still within the framework of the Church, cannot, simply by definition and in the very nature of the concept, be the supreme power. In virtue of being derived it is necessarily subordinate to that power from which it originates. A power vested in the united episcopate which is conceived of as at the same time a permanent sharing in the primatial power cannot be supreme.

To this principle a second must now be added. The supreme and plenary power of the united episcopate belongs to it juris divini. Since the Second Vatican Council there can be no doubt upon this point, and in fact in the First Vatican Council no doubts were cast upon it. Now in the light of this we are justified in asking whether a power which is held juris divini can be a power in which the subject is merely allowed to participate. If this participation were based upon an act of will on the part of him who confers a share of his power and might equally well withdraw it, then the power which is participated in in this sense is certainly not juris divini. If, on the other hand, it is suggested that the pope must allow this power of his to be shared by the united episcopate jure divino, then such a statement can still only signify, in effect, that the will of God [60] and of Christ, by which the Church is constituted, intends there to be a united episcopate which has the same power as the pope, and in his sight this united episcopate is such that it has this power only as united with and under the pope.

On any showing this is correct, but it says no more than what must be said and maintained in all theories that are advanced upon this question. But in that case participation in the power of the pope is nothing more, in effect, than having this power. It is no longer a question of 'participation', but instead, according to the will of God, two different subjects actually exist, both of them vested with the same power (in all logic therefore they must be as subjects 'incompletely distinct'), which they receive from God. But the first of these subjects is not one which itself concedes a share in its own power, since ex hypothesi it is quite incapable of withholding this participation from the other. In any case we no longer see how it can be the case that according to this theory anything more could be involved than a strange play on words being used to express the fact that God imparts this effective plenitude of power to the united episcopate and in doing so always intends it to belong to the united episcopate only in so far as this constitutes a college, and as united with the pope.

A further point, and one which even J. Salaverri concedes, is that the view we are contesting here is, even from the historical standpoint, more than improbable. The idea that the Council (considered as the united episcopate) possesses supreme and infallible power in doctrinal matters in the Church was already held as an explicit doctrine in the Church when the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope in matters of faith was still far from having been recognised with the same clarity in the Church's conscious faith. Now if this doctrinal power vested in the Council was derived from that of the pope, the converse would have had to be true. In that case the papal authority, since it provided the basis for that of the Council, would actually have had to be recognised first. Certainly at the material and factual level that which is derived, that which is sustained in being by some factor beyond itself, can come to be recognised even before that which provides it with its basis and origin. But when we are discussing juridical powers the same cannot apply. In such cases the order in which the realities signified come to be, and the order in which they come to be recognised must be parallel to one another because the actual object of enquiry is itself a conceptual reality which cannot have any significant existence at all without being recognised. This also appears from the fact that the Second Vatican Council makes no attempt to derive the plenary power of the college of bishops from the plenary [61] power of its head. It attributes this plenary power to the fact that the episcopate is descended from the apostolic college, and recognises that this same power was imparted to this apostolic college as such and in itself, and not to Peter as an individual. In the grounds it puts forward for its decision, therefore, it follows the same course as had been followed in the actual history of dogma itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now let us consider the alternative point of view. One of the commoner interpretations is the doctrine that the full and supreme authority in the Church is vested in two incompletely distinct subjects. This thesis is justified in a certain sense to the extent that it makes no attempt to derive the authority of the united episcopate from that of the pope. It can be taken merely as a description of this state of affairs, saying namely that viewed simply from the point of view of the direct practical experience of the exercise of this authority the supreme power of decision in the Church is vested in two subjects which are incompletely distinct as physical entities. And if this is all that is being said, then there is nothing in this thesis to be objected to. But if what is being maintained in it – at least implicitly – is that this description of the difference between the two subjects in the actual exercise of their authority is also the ultimate that can be said at the juridical and theological level, such that there is no further and deeper truth to be attained to beyond this, then this thesis is false. In fact it expresses nothing more with regard to the more essential and more fundamental relationship of the two 'incompletely distinct subjects' of supreme power in the Church, and manifestly presupposes that nothing more can be said either, and that this actual concrete state of affairs must be accepted as a positive datum, and that we must remain at the merely positive level of juridical institution.

Against this, however, we must first put the following objection. The concept of 'two incompletely distinct subjects' is, even from the purely formal point of view (and abstracting from the concrete case with which we are concerned), obscure and imprecise in the extreme. We might legitimately ask: 'What do the terms "distinct" or "incomplete" properly mean?' Are there really 'two' subjects, because this is, in fact, what is being maintained, or is it in the last analysis only a single subject, seeing that in fact we cannot regard them as distinct from one another in any 'complete' or effective sense at all? If it is true that ultimately speaking it is quite impossible for two subjects to be vested with supreme power in one and the same single society precisely considered as single, then what in that case can it mean still to assert that in this case there are 'two subjects'? Are we not being too hasty in concluding from the fact that [62] the two parties actually endowed with this power are incompletely distinct as physical entities, that these same parties must equally be regarded as distinct precisely inasmuch as they are endowed with this power? But how can we conclude this, seeing that this power is one and single not merely in a specific but in a numerical sense, as pertaining to a society that is numerically one and the same? Of course the 'misfortune' of two such subjects being irreconcilably opposed to one another and so taking decisive action in completely opposite directions is prevented by the fact that they are, after all, only 'incompletely' distinct. But does not this precisely mean that there are not really two subjects at all? To the extent that (notwithstanding the assertion to the contrary) they are not really 'two', no problem exists. But to the extent that, in spite of whatever unity we may concede to exist between them, they must be 'two', we must at least still pose the question of what kind of relationship they can bear to one another, such that the unity between them (which must, in fact, be implicitly conceded after all) really and effectively exists and is also recognisable as such.

Surely the fact that the pope actually belongs to the college of bishops carries, in the main, only enough weight to supply an answer to this question with regard to the juridical machinery involved, and not sufficient to provide an answer with regard to the question of the true and precise 'essence' of this unity belonging to 'both' subjects. We may invoke a dictum of St Thomas to the effect that unity does not, in the last analysis, follow from duality. On the contrary, the notion of 'two' only becomes comprehensible to us from the notion of 'one'. Now it must be recognised that the duality with which we are here concerned cannot be derived from the unity (as the exponents of the first view contend). Since the power that is in question is not regarded as belonging of its very nature and right from the outset to the head of the college, this could only mean that the pope allows his power to be 'participated in' by the college. And this is excluded. Again, the unity of power cannot be achieved by combining two originally separate powers (non enim plura secundum se uniuntur). In the light of this the real question we have to deal with here becomes evident. It is the question of a more basic, more original unity which must be prior to the 'duality' of the two subjects as they now exist. The saying about 'two incompletely distinct subjects' represents a practical rule of thumb and the initial description of a fact as it outwardly appears, namely that two different ways of acting are used in the exercise of the supreme power, even though in itself and considered formally this can only be one and single. This saying, therefore, is correct [63] at its face value and considered purely as an empirical description or designation of the phenomenon. But if it is pressed any further than this it becomes not an answer but rather a question in itself, the question of what kind of unity belongs in essence to this subject which is vested with that power in the Church which is in itself necessarily one.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The positive answer to this question can only be given on the basis of the doctrine that there can of necessity only be one subject vested with the supreme power. Recognising this and taking it as our basis we can then go on to ask how we can arrive at a conception of this subject in which we accord it its due place as one of the facts a posteriori recognised as such in the teaching of the Second Vatican Council, and which we now have to deal with on the basis of this teaching. This one subject must be conceived of in such a way that it includes, from the outset and of its own nature, both the entities the unity between which we are discussing here. This means: Whether we say 'pope' or 'college of bishops' our conceptions of both these entities must be such that each implies the other. Whether therefore we say 'the united episcopate with the pope as the head of the college and also capable of acting alone and of his own initiative', or alternatively 'the pope who in his official acts acts in every case (even though he has two different ways of acting open to him) in such a way that through him the college is acting (though this does not necessarily mean in an act that is collegiate in the strict sense)' – whichever of these two statements we choose, the meaning remains the same. In such a statement we must always be referring to that one subject which as one is vested with, and exercises the one supreme power in the Church. The fact that in the thesis formulated above we have given preference to the first way of putting the matter does not imply any rejection of the second one. Our only reason for preferring the first formulation here is that it gives clearer and more direct expression to the subject considered in its concrete reality, and more clearly excludes the idea that in this thesis of ours we are treating of the pope as permitting the college to share in his power. This would mean that his power has priority over that of the united episcopate and has as its bearer the pope himself independently of his status as head of the college.

In order to understand this thesis a point that has constantly to be borne in mind is that in general and in principle it does not of itself imply any denial of the fact that the act of a 'moral' (collective) or 'collegiate' person is actually performed in the concrete by a single person in the physical sense. Nor does it imply that for this act to be validly performed the other 'persons in the physical sense' belonging to this collective body [64] or 'moral person' must necessarily and in all cases actually themselves commission the first individual to perform it by a separate and distinct act of their own, physically prior to the official one of the whole body. We can think of an extremely wide variety of ways in which a person in the sense of a physical individual can be appointed to represent a collegiate body or 'person' in the juridical sense. In our case this is quite certainly made effective by God (Christ) and not by the sum total of the members of the college of bishops, at least inasmuch as the pope is the head of this college 'jure divino'. The only question still remaining, therefore, can be at most that of whether this appointment by God himself also implies the capacity so to act in the name of the college that this act is in fact not a 'collegiate act' at all, but still an act of the college. In other words the pope acts as head of the college whenever he makes use of his primatial power. In any case a commissioning of precisely this kind (such that it includes this more precisely defined authority) to represent and act for a college, deriving as it does from a third party, namely God, cannot be rejected by this college. Now in this conception there is no intrinsic logical contradiction. Admittedly all this presupposes that he who confers an authority of precisely this kind can also ensure in the giving of it and for the exercising of it that the acts arising from it are de facto in conformity with the will of the entire college rightly understood. And this in turn does not exclude the principle that precisely this rightly understood will of the college is recognised from the decisions of him who is its head precisely in this sense.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The harmony we are presupposing here is present in the Church through the power of the Spirit within her. In fact Lumen gentium (No. 25) emphasises this connection between pope and Church when it says that in his decisions the pope is not bound by the (prior) agreement of the Church (for the juridical validity of his act), but still that he and his decisions cannot fail to have this agreement 'propter actionem ejusdem Spiritus Sancti'. The same can also be said with regard to the relationship between the decision of the pope and the will of the college.

The fact that the appointment vested in the pope takes this form is of course to be deduced from the actual sources of revelation in the concrete. It is to be deduced from these first on the grounds that since the Church is one, only one single subject vested with supreme power can be conceived of within her, second because the primatial power of the pope and the supreme power in the college of bishops are established from these sources.

Additional support for the thesis is also to be drawn from the following consideration. The act of founding the Church is initially posited in the [65] act of founding the college of the 'Twelve', and it is precisely from this college that a member of the college is appointed by Christ as its head. Now if we observe this order of events, which is also depicted by the Council (certainly we must bear in mind in this the indisputable fact that the college is in each case the bearer of supreme power in the Church), then it seems most consistent with the facts to say that Peter obtains his primatial authority precisely as head of this college. If we then go on to recognise that Peter can exercise his own personal power without any collegiate act on the part of the Twelve, still this further recognition does not invalidate the earlier realisation, namely that the authority belonging to him is that of the head of the apostolic college as such. On the contrary all that this adds is that this supreme power of his is now more precisely specified and concretised, so that it is seen to be one specific mode in which this head of the 'Twelve' can act. We can then go on to apply the same consideration to the relationship between pope and episcopate.

Of course what we primarily achieve by this is simply an understanding of our thesis at the formal level, a recognition of its formal meaning and of the fact that it involves no intrinsic contradiction.

IV

Perhaps a consideration of the content of this thesis that is theological in the true sense will enable us to advance a little further. The subject vested with supreme authority to lead and govern in the Church must reflect the distinctive quality of the Church herself. The first way in which this is made apparent is for visible expression to be given to the unity that exists in the multiplicity and to the multiplicity that exists in the unity. This is made especially effective if the Church considered as the 'sacrament' of love in the world, so penetrates into the world from the innermost resources of her own nature that she unifies that which is diverse in it, while at the same time according due recognition to this diversity. In order to point out a second way in which it is made apparent, attention must be drawn to a further constitutional factor: the unity and diversity involved in the very concept of 'Church'. This is constituted by the multiplicity of those who are using the freedom bestowed irrevocably upon each of them to work out their own salvation, and at the same time by the 'covenant unity' or comm-unity in which the individual, without any diminishment of his own uniqueness even in the actual achievement of his own personal salvation, finds salvation mediated to him.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[66] Now if the supreme holder of the power to lead and govern in the Church is to reproduce and represent this quality of the Church in his own person, then as an individual his status must be both collegiate and personal at the same time. Naturally we cannot, by taking this as our starting-point, deduce the de facto constitution of the Church from it as a matter of logical argument. But confronted with it as an existing reality we can understand it. A point which we must always bear in mind here is that the pope, without prejudice to his unique position as visible 'representative' of Christ upon earth, is still a member of the Church, and precisely identified with the Church. In other words we should not expect him merely to reflect the relationship of Christ to his Church as distinct from himself. Thus it cannot be inconsistent with the nature of the primacy belonging to the pope if he is head of the Church precisely inasmuch as he is head of the college of bishops. In other words a specific element in the nature of the Church is constituted by the very fact that he has this function of being head of the college. Whereas in Christ himself the personal and the 'official' (functional) aspects completely coincide, in a member of the Church (as redeemed) this is not altogether the case. It is not, therefore, the case with the pope either. The personal factor is present and plays a part in his official function. For instance he acts of his own initiative in the sense that he does not need any special authorisation each time he decides to do so. But his personal action is still an act of the bearer of the office as such. ('Non enim ut persona privata sententiam profert'), and, by the very fact of being a person holding office in this sense, he is a member of the Church and head of the college of bishops as such. Now precisely because he has this position the pope represents in his own individual person both the unity of the Church and her diversity, a unity and diversity constituted by the fact that she is made up of a collection of many Churches.

If therefore we accept the position of 'head of the college of bishops' as belonging integrally to the primatial power of the pope as such, and as an intrinsic element in it, then it straightway becomes clear why this power is 'unrestricted' and in this sense 'full'. We can only designate a power as 'restricted' if it is limited by some other arbiter external to itself, and not in respect of that kind of 'limitation' which is inherent in the very nature of the power itself. Now in many respects the authority of the pope is certainly 'limited' even at the juridical level. For instance (setting aside its limitation with regard to the teaching authority which is bound by revelation etc.) it is 'limited' by the existence juris divini of the college of bishops, which the pope can neither abrogate nor, taking it in [67] its entirety, inactivate. Now if this 'limitation' were not a limitation arising from the nature of the papal primacy as such, then we could not call his power 'full' in the true sense at all. But if this 'limitation' arises from the intrinsic nature of this authority in itself, inasmuch as the pope possesses this power proper to himself precisely as head of the college of bishops, then we can understand that it is not thereby 'restricted' in the true sense by any other juridical arbiter such as might restrict this power ab externo.

In terms of its content there is a further standpoint from which we can regard this thesis of ours. One of the special concerns of many of the theologians at the Council was to point out the unity which exists between all the official powers belonging to bishops, and also the fact that they all have their primary and basic roots in the sacrament of episcopal consecration. The Council then went on to ratify this point in an extremely significant manner. In the formulations of the mediaeval canonists the 'potestas ordinis' and the 'potestas jurisdictionis' have for the most part simply been juxtaposed without any connection between them being adverted to. Now, however, the real unity between these two powers has been made clear by the findings of the Council, and this raises many further questions for ecclesiology and canon law. Once the unity between these two powers is conceded and presupposed, the existence of the college of bishops as such, or membership of this college, cannot fail to have an important bearing on the further question of the manner in which the 'potestas ordinis' is vested in the individual bishop. We must not be led astray on this point by the fact that in the validly consecrated bishop this 'potestas ordinis' is present permanently and irrevocably. For in fact this irrevocability, to the extent that it really is present, means simply that in the individual bishop membership of the college too cannot be totally lost so as to leave no trace whatever (even if the 'communio hierarchiaca cum Collegii Capite et membris' is removed, so that full unity with the college no longer exists). But it does not mean that the 'potestas ordinis' has nothing to do with membership of the college of bishops, and therefore nothing to do with the college itself or with its head either. Even the 'potestas ordinis' is an element in the one and full power which is originally present in the college of bishops as united with and under its head the pope, the power, therefore, in which the individual bishop obtains a share in virtue of his episcopal consecration. On the basis of this it may validly be concluded that the pope is the visible principle of the unity belonging to the college of bishops in relation to the 'potestas ordinis' too, and not merely in relation to the 'potestas jurisdictionis'. Furthermore it is [68] precisely when our thesis is accepted as a principle that the pope stands revealed as the supreme and definitive bearer of the 'potestas ordinis'. It is not the case, therefore, that he needs to be able to perform more individual sacramental acts than any other bishop, or to perform them with greater intensity. Rather he represents the unity of sacramental power in the Church. If we accept that the 'potestas ordinis' is rooted in the united college of bishops in this way, we can then understand that even in the actual conferring of the sacraments too 'collegiate acts' are possible (if, indeed, not actually necessary). This is the case, for instance, in concelebration which must, in fact, be understood not as a synchronisation of many Masses, but as one single sacrifice even in the dimension of the sacramental sign. The reconciliation as practised in the early Church likewise had this force. In this the bishop, in union with the assembled priests or presbyterium, used the laying on of hands to confer the pax of reconciliation with the Church, and thereby the Spirit. Thereby forgiveness of sins in God's sight was likewise conferred by this rite. Now this can be understood as a 'collegiate act' in the full sense, even though, it is true, one that was performed not by the united episcopate but rather by the college that was accustomed to act in such a setting, and which was made up of the bishop and his presbyterium. The same is true of the anointing of the sick at Easter, in so far as this was conferred by several priests.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If, therefore, we unreservedly accept that a 'collegiate act' is in principle possible even in the conferring of a sacrament, then we can go on from this to say: the sacramental sign as established in the Church is constituted hierarchically, and it is in conformity with the nature of the Church herself that the act in which this sign is made effective (and which is always an act of the Church herself and of her college) can in every case be of two kinds: it can either be a 'collegiate' act in the true sense, or it can be the act of an individual. But in this latter case the individual performing the act is actually sharing in the sacramental power of the Church, and so performing this sacramental act in the name of the Church.

We can see, therefore, that the relationship between the pope and the college of bishops corresponds in certain respects to the position of one who has been vested with sacramental power, even though initially this relationship was considered only from the aspect of the 'potestas jurisdictionis'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[69]

V

We may now turn to the question of what differences the thesis we have expounded would make in practice. Certainly the importance of this question should not be exaggerated. The common ground between the different interpretations is too great for these differences to be very far-reaching. For in any case it is true that in the exercise of supreme power in the Church the pope can act seorsim, while it is equally true that a collegiate act on the part of the college of bishops is possible. But both of these constitute an exercise of one and the same supreme power in the Church. Nor is it legitimate to say that if we take a general view of the whole question, and accept the other interpretations as our starting-point, we shall come to the conclusion that something different takes place, or has taken place in the Church than if we accept the thesis presented here as our principle of interpretation.

But even with these reservations it does not seem that the thesis with which we are here concerned is totally without practical consequences of any kind. The concrete way in which various possible practical consequences which do follow from our thesis are to be drawn remains – from the juridical aspect – reserved to the discretio of the pope, and it must not be maintained even that a given way of applying the truth upheld here is possible only if our thesis is presupposed. To give a concrete example, it is to be enacted by positive law that the universal episcopate shall be given, even apart from its role in Councils, a share in the supreme government of the Church, as for instance in the convening of a Council, setting up the synod of bishops, arranging for the universal episcopate to be consulted by the pope, making it possible for the regional conferences of bishops to develop special ecclesiastical laws of their own, giving the universal episcopate a share in the work of the Roman Congregations by letting them have representatives on these, etc. But any such concrete way of exercising supreme power can be, both in its inception and in the practice of it (this may vary according to the particular circumstances prevailing at any given time), clearer to understand, less circumscribed and less strained if it is regarded as an application of the theory we are upholding here. For on this theory we do not need constantly to be striking a precarious balance between two bearers of supreme power in the Church, both of whom, even if they are ‘incompletely distinct’, still have to be accorded their due effectiveness. Our theory envisages rather the exercise of power by the one single and supreme bearer of all power in the Church. And on this theory the only question remaining is how to [70] establish more precisely the form this exercise of it should take in the concrete in order to be most effective.

That axiom is true which lays down that an authority which is never exercised is no authority at all. If there are two bearers of supreme power in the Church (even if these are ‘incompletely distinct’), then the question constantly arises afresh of how, while maintaining both the two exercises of power as two quantitatively distinct activities, we can strike a balance between them in such a way that neither simply absorbs the other into itself and so, in reality (even if not ‘in so many words’) abolishes it. If there is only one supreme subject vested with supreme authority in the Church, (even though with two ways of exercising this authority which, though distinct, are interrelated in such a way that they can be interchanged or made to flow into one another), then two principles follow from this: first, the pope cannot feel that the active collaboration of the college of bishops (which may take the most diverse possible forms) is ipso facto a diminishment of his own authority. Second, the episcopate cannot feel that by recognising to the full the pope’s authority in cases in which he acts seorsim, they are accepting a limitation imposed from outside their own body of the full scope of their own personal authority, for this activity of the pope is, of its very nature, an act of the college itself, even if it is not a 'collegiate act' in the strict sense. Of course it must be conceded as an ever present possibility that with regard to the 'independent' exercise of authority on the part of the pope in particular concrete instances individual bishops may still retain their own attitudes. They may wish that in such cases the episcopate might be allowed to share more manifestly, more actively and in a more directly practical way in the decision involved. Here, therefore, we have reached that point beyond which we cannot go in defining juridically the respect due to the episcopate in the taking of such decisions. This is likewise the point which may be taken as a starting-point in defining the scope of the para-canonical importance and effectiveness of the episcopate, which must not be undervalued. And we shall undervalue it if we blindly and rigidly confine ourselves to the question of whether the effective part to be played by the episcopate is sufficiently assured in juridical and legal terms. At this point too scope is opened up for the movement of the Spirit of God, which acts fortiter, suaviterque so as to ensure that in the exercise of this supreme power by the one supreme bearer vested with it harmony is preserved, at least in the long run, between the different ways in which it is employed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[71]

4

THE PRESENCE OF THE LORD IN THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY AT WORSHIP

1. 'Presence' in General

In this brief study[1] we shall be discussing the presence of the Lord in the Christian community at worship. The approach we shall be adopting is a systematic and synthetic one, and we shall take as our basis the work that has already been done on the theological sources. For this purpose due allowance must be made from the outset for the inevitable and insurmountable imperfections inherent in the concepts we need to use in such a study, as also for the fact that of their nature these concepts approximate only deficiently and analogously to the realities involved. Thus a point that strikes one immediately is that the idea of 'presence' admits of, and indeed demands an interpretation in terms of space and time. But this word 'presence' is capable of being extended further into all dimensions of human existence, and of being applied to man as a whole at his various levels as a being endowed with a body, with intellect, with free choice and decision, with a social life in common with his fellows, and with a place in history. Such a word, therefore, does not admit of any strict or precise definition, any more than does man himself. Every attempt at describing or defining what 'presence' means ends up by appealing to that basic and primary experience in which, the moment we make it, we recognise what 'presence' is, and yet which at the same time we are incapable of expressing. Such an experience, which is itself shifting and variable as it occurs in the unfolding of human history whether at the individual or the collective level, gives us an awareness of the way in [72] which 'presence' is achieved, and this in turn varies in intensity according to the particular level in human living which is involved. 'Presence' always implies a relationship between two entities or, more precisely, between three: the relationship namely between the two which are present to each other, and the relationship which both bear to the 'medium' or 'common ground' between them. It is this medium as such that provides the sphere in space and time which makes it possible for the two to be present to each other. This means that the very nature of what 'present' means is determined by these two (or three) entities, their distinctive qualities and the very different ways in which they may be related to one another. 'Presence', therefore, can assume very different forms and manifest very different properties. On this basis we can, perhaps, formulate here at the very outset the following propositions:

(a) 'Presence' cannot, in the first instance, be either regarded as, or deduced from the co-existence of two physical bodies which modify one another at the physical level. Presence, rather, is a concept that is originally and basically anthropological, one which belongs a priori – even though in different ways and different degrees – to those factors which determine the condition of man as a whole.

(b) In the context of human living, therefore, presence in its fullest and deepest sense is that which affects and causes that which we call 'presence' from all aspects and at all levels of man's being, and which removes that contrary state of 'absence' in which one entity exists and yet, so far as another is concerned, is as though it did not exist.

---

[1] For a bibliography on this question cf. the references in this volume, 'On the Presence of Christ in the Communities of the Diaspora', pp. 84-102. In addition to the documents of the Council mentioned there cf. especially the particularly important No. 9 (Diversi modi praesentiae Christi) in the 'Instructio de cultu mysterii Eucharistici' of the Congregation of Rites dated 25th May 1967 (the official Latin text is to be found in Typis polyglottis Vaticanis 1967, p. 13).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(c) The presence of two beings in space and time (that of men to one another or that of man to another being which is capable of being, in some sense, present to man and for him in space and time) certainly is significant and important for human life. But nevertheless, in the last analysis it can be accounted merely that which is presupposed, that which has the force of an 'ontological symbol' (is a Realsymbol) of the specifically human mode of presence, in which men are present to each other (and to others).

(d) Hence when we speak of a 'presence' through love, in the Spirit, in knowledge etc., what we are treating of is not some kind of metaphorical transference of the concept of presence, but rather the original and basic meaning of the word. For the initial datum of human experience is not the co-existence of two bodies in space and time but rather man himself as endowed with a consciousness of his own being, as set in charge of himself and made answerable for his own free decisions, as given responsibility for himself and at the same time achieving the fulness [73] of his own existence in personal intercommunication with others. Now all original and basic concepts, which genuinely cannot be defined in other terms, have their origins in this experience.

(e) Nevertheless we must not regard the concept of 'presence' as one for which there is absolutely no substitute. This is true even at that level at which the concept of physical presence is involved. The term has hardly any part to play in modern physics because here, properly speaking, the investigator is concerned only with the existence, location, mutual interdependence in function, or ascertainability of physical particles. But it is true in a far deeper sense of that more basic concept of 'presence' which is anthropological, for this can be expressed in terms of that by which this presence is constituted (in terms of its actual content), and in relation to this the 'presence' itself is, as it were, only subsequent and secondary. Even in the case of the 'eucharistic presence' this still applies for the very reason that that by which it is constituted, namely 'transubstantiation', is not to be thought of as the introduction of the reality of Christ into a specific locality in the sense implied in the 'adductionist' theory.

After these preliminary remarks let us pass on immediately to a synthetic and systematic exposition of that kind of 'presence' in which the Lord is made present to us and we to him in the Christian cult.

2. On the Presence of Christ in the Cult

(a) What we are considering here is the presence to each other of Christ and the Church in her cultic activities. Now the 'medium' of this presence is the Holy Spirit of Christ. This statement must now be expounded in more precise detail.

(aa) It is necessary to have such a 'medium'. Usually we do not pay sufficient attention to this 'medium' and the necessity for it to obtain any clear idea of its significance. For we interpret every mode of 'presence' according to the conceptual model of a physical and local presence, a presence in space and time (the reason for this is that conversio ad phantasma which is indispensable in every act of intellectual cognition). Now certainly in this kind of presence the 'medium' is necessary too. But the very fact that it is always there (both objectively and subjectively) all along means that it is not adverted to. But let us suppose that something is present not as a constant and unvarying fact of existence but still in the realm of immediate possibility or, to put it another way, that there has to be a transition from a state of absence to one of presence or to a more intensive kind of presence. In such a case as this a medium of the kind we [74] are speaking of is postulated as prior to the presence itself and as a necessary condition for it which is distinct from itself. This medium, then, is something that makes that which is to be 'rendered present' actually present, and that is, at the same time,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

different from it; something which, as one, makes two entities which are to be rendered present to one another actually present and at the same time maintains the distinction between them. It provides the unifying sphere or common ground for a mutual presence between them to be achieved. Now if it is pointed out that an entity which makes itself present to something else itself provides this medium or common ground necessary for mutual presence to be achieved, then in general and in principle we would have to concede the truth of this objection. But a point that should not be forgotten – especially in our present case – is that it is wholly conceivable that at least one of the two entities being made present to each other cannot, of its own resources, establish this access to the other, and the medium or common ground which makes this presence possible. Instead of this it has to be 'admitted' to this presence which is to be made actual. Now this means nothing else than the setting up of a medium of presence such as we have been speaking of, which is to be distinguished from the actual presence itself as the means and necessary condition for it to be achieved.

(bb) In the particular case we are considering this medium (the dimension of the presence, its ambience) is the Spirit of Christ. It cannot be our task at this point to show how this statement is to be deduced from the positive sources of revelation. Here we shall be attempting to make comprehensible what this statement is intended to convey. Of course this previously existing medium of the presence of Christ in the cult can, already in itself, be thought of as a 'presence' of the Spirit of Christ which has been bestowed upon the Church, which 'indwells' her as a gift of God in the hearts of those who have been justified. From this point of view no distinction is to be drawn between the presence of Christ and that of his Spirit. Christ is present in the Church through his pneuma. His presence actually is pneuma hagion. But precisely as such this presence of the Spirit in the Church is the 'medium' which is the necessary prior condition for that further presence which is achieved precisely between Christ and the Church in the enactment of the cult. There are two reasons for this. First in the cult and through it there takes place a special presence of Christ over and above the 'habitual' presence of the Spirit and so of Christ in the Church. This special cultic presence of Christ is such that it does not exist with this degree of 'actuality' apart from the cult. The second reason is that the Spirit of Christ as 'habitually' [75] present in the Church and her members can be, and in fact is, the ontological presupposition for the actual presence of Christ in the cult. For it is only in the pneuma of Christ that the Church can teach, pray, believe, hope, love and confer the sacraments. Now it is in these activities that the cult of the Church is achieved, and it is through this cult that Christ and the faithful are rendered mutually present to one another in the most actual and sublime form possible. But in what does this 'medium' consist, if we may so express it, in its ultimate essence? It is constituted by the fact that only the divine Spirit as 'uncreated grace' can cause a human act (and in the first instance the cult too belongs to this category) to become an act of such a kind that in it God is attained to in adoration and 'possessed' as he is 'in himself'. It becomes such an act through this grace working in it as an intrinsic principle. In other words the interior subjective principle of the cult must be the Holy Spirit of God himself in order that this cult really can enter into the holy of holies of the divine life itself, and in order that this cult may consist not merely in the adoration of a God who is infinitely remote and 'other' to ourselves, but may rather become that commercium which is, in a certain sense, interior to God himself, for it is through this that we share in the trinitarian life of God which goes back to the source without origin, the eternal Father.

(b) In this dimension of the Spirit a mutual presence of Christ and of the faithful to one another at the highest level of actuality is constituted through the cult of the local Church. The local Christian community which accomplishes the cult of God in Christ and through his Spirit is not merely one segment of the universal Church, analogous, for instance, to one particular political constituency in a state. Rather it is the Church as present at one specific

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

place, so that through the local community in that place the Church realises to the utmost possible extent the perfection of her own nature, her 'actualisation', and experiences through the cult the presence of Christ in the Church in its most sublime form. Certainly we can speak of many ways in which Christ is 'present' in the Church. We can say that Christ is present in the Church through an exercise of the Church's teaching authority, e.g. in Councils. And he can be said to be present in all other acts which are acts of the one universal Church who extends her boundaries throughout the 'length and breadth of the earth'. But it should be noticed that when we are thinking of the cult of the Church considered as a whole we are thinking of it inasmuch as it includes the eucharistic sacrifice as the supreme mode in which the work of redemption is made present. And in virtue of this the cult is capable of being, in the subject taking part in it, the most sublime way of making [76] real his faith, his hope and his love. And it is to this that the whole activity of the official Church is orientated as means to end. Now to the extent that all this is true we are justified in saying that there can be no act through which Christ is made more closely and forcefully present than the cult of the Church, and it is through this presence that the Church herself is constituted ('gathered together', as the Council puts it) as 'actualising' her own nature and bringing it to its fulness. This cult, in which the supreme 'actualisation' of the presence of Christ in the Church, and thereby the supreme 'actualisation' of the Church herself, is achieved, is different from the cult of the people of God in the Old Testament in that it takes place in every local community of worshippers. In this respect too an essential and formal difference appears between the Church and any other societas perfecta. From this in turn it follows that the concept of the 'perfect society' is totally inadequate as a characterisation of the Church even at the 'visible' and empirical level to which her cult too belongs. No secular society can achieve the supreme 'actualisation' of its nature in one individual segment or element in its total makeup. On the contrary this degree of 'actualisation' is only achieved through the cumulative process of all its elements and their activities being added together till, in a certain sense, the sum total of them all is finally arrived at. Yet in the light of the supreme 'actualisation' which is achieved with such intensity at the altar the whole Church is 'there' in the local community at worship, because in this local community which, according to all outward appearances and in the dimension of the merely juridical and 'social' is only a small segment of the Church, the most actual and the most intimate presence of Christ is achieved, that presence which actually constitutes the Church in his Spirit.

(c) The presence of Christ in the cult must be understood as single and active. No doubt this presence of Christ in the cult of the local community contains within itself very different elements. Yet it must be understood as prior to all these elements, and as unique. For Christ is also one in his relationship to men as sanctifying them, and man himself is also one in the midst of all the many dimensions in which he exists. The different elements in this single and unique presence must be comprehended as the intrinsic constitution of this presence precisely as single. They derive their meaning and their significance precisely from this one presence, and achieve it in this. Or (from many points of view this way of putting it is more exact) these elements must be understood as different degrees in the 'actualisation' and intensity of this one unique presence through which God and man become united for the glory of God and the [77] salvation of man. This also applies to the presence of Christ in the Eucharist in which Christ is made substantially present under the forms of bread and wine through 'transubstantiation'. For it is not merely that this presence too, which is achieved in the dimension of the effective sign, is measured by the union which the faithful achieve with Christ in his pneuma. It is not only that this presence is always orientated to the actual consumption of the sacrament, so that Christ is adored precisely under the forms of bread and wine, these having the force of an anamnesis pointing back to his death and resurrection and making manifest the meal of eternal life. It is not only that this presence of Christ in the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Eucharist is a real and bodily presence of a nature that is absolute and unique, and which cannot be understood on the analogy of a natural presence and co-existence of two bodies in the same sphere, to which both are related and by which they are limited. We must recognise, rather, that there is something beyond this and more important than this: the act by which this eucharistic presence of Christ is made effective in 'transubstantiation' is only rightly understood in the entire context to which it belongs, which is that of the cult taken as a whole. For the 'form' of this sacrament (which goes with the 'species' of bread and wine as an integral element in the sacramental sign of this presence) consists of the words of consecration which persist and endure (as valid) in the dimension of human living and human historicity (even when acoustically speaking they have ceased). Only as united with these words are the 'species' the sign of Christ's presence. Now these words of consecration can only exist, can only be uttered and understood (and without being understood they would not be human words at all) in the context of the Christian cult taken as a whole. Even the 'substantial' presence of Christ in the Eucharist belongs to the dimension of the 'sign' and so to the one cult taken in its entirety, even though it constitutes the supreme and ultimate reality which can be achieved in this cult.

This single presence of Christ in the cult must be understood as actively taking effect. What we mean by this is that right from the outset this presence of Christ in the cult must be understood not as the mere co-existence of two entities in the same place, something which is, in the last analysis, already achieved by the very fact of God's omnipresence taken by itself, and something which, taken by itself, has no significance for the glory of God and the salvation of man. This saving presence of Christ in the cult is constituted rather by the following factors:

1. The self-bestowal of God in his Spirit, through which God gives himself immediately as he is in and of himself as the 'subject' and [78] co-principle of that life in man which is a sharing in the life of God himself, and that too . . .

2. Through all the 'media' and mediating acts by which this divine self-bestowal is communicated, and which show forth this divine self-bestowal in sign and symbol at the historical and social, and therefore the cultic level. For it is through these signs that these media and acts of mediation take effect, and so make present this divine self-bestowal. We shall shortly be returning to these mediating acts to treat of them in rather more detail.

(d) This single presence of Christ in the cult considered as an active sanctifying force is constituted by the following elements:

(aa) By the word of the gospel: a true presence of Christ is already ipso facto achieved wherever the word of the gospel is preached in power and heard in a spirit of faith. This is explicitly stated in Lumen gentium (No. 26). In fact the kerygma of the New Covenant is no mere handing on of a piece of human knowledge from one individual to another such that only the human concepts of the reality they stand for are present and not the reality itself. On the contrary the kerygma is the event in which the reality itself that is being proclaimed is imparted to him who hears of it in a spirit of faith through the words and concepts that are expressed. Christ (as he who was crucified and rose again on our behalf) imparts himself to us as the eschatological union between God and man as achieved in the Spirit and through faith, in an act of divine self-bestowal, and thereby makes himself present in preacher and hearer alike. All elements of human conceptuality in the preaching of the word of God are, so to say, only the 'flesh' through which the divine reality makes itself present by manifesting itself in effective signs, and so takes effect upon us in a (free and supernatural) act of self-bestowal. The word of preaching as delivered with authority and heard in faith and in the Spirit is a word that has an effective and exhibitive force, one which, through a process of anamnesis, renders saving history effectively present, and already in the here and now effectively promises to man a future of salvation that is absolute (Verbum efficax

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

rememorativum et prognosticum). This effective and exhibitive force in the word that is preached (and the presence of Christ constituted by this) has, it is true, specifically different degrees of intensity. But this effective and exhibitive force in the word of preaching belongs to the very nature of that preaching which is the event of grace and so the presence of Christ. The supreme degree of this special kind of effective force is attained in that word which is the actual 'form' of the sacrament or the sacramental sign in itself.

[79] (bb) Through the sacrament: Every sacrament can, and indeed must, be understood as that kind of exhibitive and effective word in which Christ, through the mouth of the Church, utters himself as the eschatological 'sacrament' of salvation to a specific man in a situation which is significant for his life as a whole and in a form in which it can be apprehended at the level of concrete human living. From this standpoint it is clear that every sacrament signifies and effects a presence of Christ. We can, if we like, call this presence 'dynamic' and 'non-substantial' (to distinguish it from the presence in the Eucharist). But this presence is not that of God alone as he exists in himself, but rather the presence of the incarnate Word as such. This is what is expressed in the doctrine of the 'instrumental efficacity' of the humanity of Christ in the sacraments and the imparting of grace, whatever further explanations we may choose to offer of this instrumentality. A further point for consideration is the following: the fact that an authorised human intermediary is involved in the dispensing of the sacraments is indeed an integral element in the constitution of the sign of the presence of Christ. Indeed the dispenser of the sacraments takes the place of Christ himself in the dimension of the sign that effects what it signifies. But since he does not himself, in any proper sense, bring about the sacramental grace, the actual res sacramenti as its effective source, he does not, in any sense take the place of the presence of Christ himself. In other words the human dispenser of the sacraments does not take the place of an absent Christ, but rather represents Christ as present in the dimension of the 'effective' sign, even though it is Christ himself who, of his own power, brings about the grace in his pneuma. Finally if we want to emphasise the 'substantial' presence of Christ in the Eucharist as distinct from a 'merely dynamic' presence in the other sacraments then, in doing this, we must not overlook the fact that this 'substantial presence' – accurately understood – belongs to the dimension of the sign, to the sacrament as such. It does not yet belong to the sacramental grace, to the res sacramenti itself, and does not bring about salvation in man of itself (edunt boni, edunt mali) unless this 'substantial presence' is complemented by that effectiveness of the Spirit of Christ through which alone man is really united to God, and in which the presence of Christ attains its supreme point and its goal. This presence of Christ as achieved in the sacrament (in the dimension of the 'sign' and of the 'reality' signified) has not only the character of a gift of God to man, but also that of a cultic act to the extent that through the act of Christ the High Priest, which is in a certain sense 'made incarnate' in the action of the Church, man is consecrated more and more radically to the adoration [80] of God through the cult, and to the extent that the reception of sacramental grace on the part of the recipient of the sacrament also and necessarily signifies the acceptance and exercising of this commission which man is given in the grace to take part in the cultic worship of God.

(cc) Through the Eucharist: We have already referred in brief to the connection which exists between the Eucharist and the proclamation of the effective word of God in preaching and in the sacraments. Taking this as our starting-point it already follows that the Eucharist constitutes the supreme event in which that presence of Christ in the midst of his people which is the Church is achieved. This supreme mode in which Christ is made present in the Church is not to be deduced solely or exclusively from the dogma of 'transubstantiation' as this dogma is understood by scholastic theologians. In the Eucharist the word of the gospel is present totally and in a supremely effective form. It is that word through which the proclamation 'showing forth' the death and resurrection of the Lord, the work of redemption

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which was achieved once and for all, is presented by the Church in visible cult and in the Holy Spirit (as a unity) to the Father, while at the same time the Body and Blood of Christ are brought to the believers. The special quality of this presence, which precisely belongs in a special and unique manner to the Eucharist, in many respects goes beyond those elements in the one presence of Christ which we have already mentioned, even though it is perfectly possible to understand it specifically as the supreme instance of the presence of Christ as we have considered it up to this point. In the Eucharist the presence of Christ achieves, through the sacramental word that 'shows it forth', the supreme and specifically distinct 'actualisation' of what it essentially is. In this two modes of presence are achieved: the death and resurrection of Christ are made present and actual sacramentally ('in the "mystery"') and at the same time the Body and Blood of Christ are made present substantially. These two modes of a presence that is ultimately and most deeply one are achieved in such a way that this presence is related not only to the entry of Christ into the individual saving history of a particular person but also to the Church herself as such. This is made manifest in visible form in the community at worship, and in the celebration of the Eucharist it achieves its supreme fulness and 'actuality' both in the dimension of the 'sign' and at the same time in the dimension of the reality itself that is signified. This is because in the Eucharist the union of Christ the head with his body, the Church, is at its most intense, being in fact made visible in the sacrament and made effective in the grace that it conveys. Here then Christ is made present on the one hand in his [81] relationship to the Father and the task he has received from him, and on the other in his relationship to the Church and the functions he performs for her.

(dd) Through hope and love: These are achieved through the grace of the Spirit and 'incarnated' in the cult. For the word of the gospel always has the character of an eschatological proclamation of the glory that is to come. Furthermore every sacrament is a 'prognostic' sign, and the Eucharist is the proclamation of the coming of the Lord in glory and an anticipation of the glory that is to come. And for these reasons every event in which the Lord is made present through the cult has the character of that sign and that actual event in which the Christian hopes of the people of God for a future that is absolute are born and made manifest in concrete form in the sacramental life of the Church. The same is to be said of the love of members of the Church for one another. For every word of God is the effective manifestation of the love of God as addressed to man, in which, by a true act of self-bestowal, he gives himself to man. For this very reason this effective manifestation of God's love brings about a genuine union between men. It follows that this applies above all to the sacramental word because every opus operatum unites man more interiorly and more deeply to the 'Mystical Body' of Christ. This is true in supreme measure of the Eucharist, which is the exhibitive 'symbol' of that Body, 'the head of which is Christ, and to which God has willed to unite us as the members of this Body by the closest ties of faith, hope and love' (N 875). Since the Eucharist is always to be interpreted in its 'context' (if we may so express it), in which its nature as effective sign is realised, it follows that as the sign of love it subsumes within itself everything which is necessarily included in the eucharistic cult, or is demanded as most properly due to it or as most needful for its proper celebration: the attendance of many at a specific place so as to form a local community of worshippers, the hearing of the word of God in common, praying in common, making profession in common, of faith and hope, caring in common for the needy and suffering members of the Church (through almsgiving, practical charity etc.). All this is the sign and the effect at the same time of the presence of Christ in the midst of his people, his effective presence in the hope and love of the believers.

(e) After this fourth section we must reiterate once more what has already been said under (c). These diverse elements in the presence of Christ must not be regarded as so many different ‘presences’. They constitute one single presence of Christ which, from the one deed of Christ performed upon the members united to him by faith, develops various modalities [82] from within itself, yet all the same retains that original and basic unity which is prior to this process of development. This one presence of Christ is the ‘actualisation’ in both ‘visible’ and ‘existential’ form at the same time of that unity, and so that presence too, in which the faithful remain constantly united and so present to each other also, with Christ and among themselves. For this reason this presence, considered both as ‘made visible’ in the cult and in its ‘existential’ effects in grace, can assume increasingly different forms and degrees of actualisation and intensity. It can be present simply in the sermon and in the common prayer of the believers, in the conferring of the sacraments, in the celebration of the Eucharist. These different elements in the one single presence of Christ are interconnected among themselves, proceed from one another, and are mutually demanded by one another as the fulness of this unity. This is because it is a unity in which the opus operatum and the opus operantis, the deed wrought by God upon man, and the response of man in grace, the interior grace and its manifestation in all dimensions of human life both social and historical, are mutually interconnected and are given concrete effect by man in ever new forms. This one presence of Christ is, in a certain sense, both ‘visible’, i.e. precisely ‘sacramental’ as the historical and social level, and at the same time effective and exhibitive. It signifies the further projection and actualisation of a quite unique unity which is latent in saving history from the beginning of the world as presence and promise: God himself imparts himself to the world through his Spirit in that he ‘descends’ into the depths of the cosmos and of history and so, as it were, even upon Christ himself. But precisely through this invisible movement he not only remains the ultimate consummation of the whole of saving history, but brings this unity in Christ, the incarnate Word of God, to a unique and definitive climax, the climax of eschatological victory realised at a specific and concrete point in history, and so constituting an unsurpassable perfection. A presence of this kind is always constituted by two elements: by the sign as that which is objectively symbolic, and by the reality signified itself. The sign itself has certain variations of its own. It extends from the simple word of preaching to the Eucharist (considered as sign). The same applies to the reality signified to the extent that the inner unity with Christ in the Spirit is capable of unlimited intensification. And from these two aspects we can deduce and understand every variation in the one presence of Christ. But if, and to the extent that the sign, considered as an element in the presence of Christ, has a cultic quality, i.e. a communal and explicitly religious character, being ex professo orientated towards the worship of God (this [83] is not, of course, always and necessarily the case), this presence of Christ can justifiably be called ‘cultic’.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(f) In describing and laying special emphasis upon the cultic presence of Christ in this way we must not forget that this effective presence of Christ is not restricted to a cultic presence. For an individual may, in the ‘medium’ of the Holy Spirit, fulfil and make actual in the human activities of his life, the grace that has been imparted to him. He may, in a certain sense, give this grace a visible embodiment in history in his Christian activities, and whenever the individual does this there takes place a true, even though perhaps a so-to-say ‘anonymous’ presence of Christ in the world and its history even if this presence is then not cultic at all. For in that case this presence, even though it is in some sense represented by a ‘sign’, is, nevertheless, devoid of the specifically cultic qualities which would otherwise have belonged to it. From this it can be concluded that the Church is the abiding and ultimate sacrament of the world’s salvation not only in virtue of the explicit preaching of the gospel, the conferring of the sacraments and the Eucharist, but also in virtue of every deed and suffering on the part of her members. For through these deeds and sufferings considered as a gift of grace this presence itself achieves a certain visible embodiment at the historical and social level. But wherever and however the Church is this ultimate sacrament of salvation for the world, there Christ is present in his Spirit, and there he makes this presence of his apprehensible also, even though, it may be, in a mode that is ‘anonymous’ or unacknowledged. It is because of this that the Lord himself says that he is present, though unrecognised, wherever one man shows compassion from his heart to another.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[84]

5

ON THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE DIASPORA COMMUNITY ACCORDING TO THE TEACHING OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

The subject which we have set ourselves to examine in this brief study[1] is apparent from the title itself. Moreover it is obvious from the outset that what has to be said about the presence of Christ precisely in a diaspora community applies either wholly or to a very large extent to every authentic Christian community which gathers about the altar of Christ and is the Church of Christ in its particular locality. At no stage, therefore, can there be any question here of attempting to find some reasons for attributing a special theological glory to the diaspora and the communities belonging to it, or of representing the diaspora as something that is altogether right and fitting. Under certain circumstances the diaspora can be frankly recognised and accepted by Christians as a 'necessity'[2] of saving history (and not merely as a sociological fact), but even [85] so it continues to represent a harsh fate for those who belong to it, and every local Church must, in order to fulfil its missionary vocation, have the will to grow and develop, and so to lessen the 'diaspora' conditions in which it finds itself.

I

After these preliminary remarks we must pass on immediately to the theme expressed in the title. But in doing so attention must be drawn to an unusual passage in the Constitution on the Church. We are referring to No. 26 in the third chapter of this dogmatic constitution of the Council.[3] The actual subject of this No. 26 is the function of the bishop as consecrating and sanctifying. But in this general context one passage has been included which refers to the individual community of worshippers in general, and not precisely to the local Church as subject to a bishop. However obvious this may appear to everyone who reads it attentively and with due attention to detail, it is a point that must still be explicitly emphasised here. For although the individual local community of worshippers is described in general terms, nevertheless certain specific characteristics of it are explicitly mentioned here which have a special relevance to our present theme. Thus it is said that communities of this kind are often small and poor, and not infrequently live in the diaspora. Certainly, therefore, we have here a passage which has a direct and explicit bearing on the subject we are treating of.

---

[1] Here the author is taking up afresh one of the topics which he has already treated of in an earlier article, 'Das neue Bild der Kirche', Geist und Leben 39 (1966), pp. 4-24, cf. in the present volume 'The New Image of the Church', pp. 3-43. At the same time reference must be made to a brief commentary of the author's, Das II. Vatikanische Konzil. Konstitutionen, Dekrete und Erklärungen. Lateinisch und Deutsch. Kommentare, Teil I (Freiburg 1966), pp. 242-244, where he attempts to interpret the text chiefly being considered here. In the study which follows the author cannot undertake to collect together all that the Council had to say about a 'diaspora' community. The presence of Christ in the community is the sole subject of the present considerations. Any comprehensive study would have to investigate other conciliar texts also: e.g. the Constitution on the Liturgy No. 42, the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, No. 17, the whole of the Decree on the Missions, which in fact describes the constitution which new Churches have initially to adopt, and how they are to be implanted in the midst of non-Christian peoples – in other words in a situation which is, for all material purposes, similar to that of the 'diaspora' communities. On this cf. also 'The Presence of the Lord in the Christian Community at Worship' in the present volume, pp.71-83.

[2] On this concept cf. K. Rahner, Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck, 4th ed. 1966), pp. 224 ff.

[3] For an understanding of the observations which follow the reader should have directly before his eyes the conciliar texts which are referred to from time to time.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The passage we are treating of has been interpolated into the text at a relatively late stage. For in a passage concerned with the consecrating and sanctifying function of the bishop (and which falls between the description of his teaching function[4] on the one hand and his pastoral function[5] on the other) there is no compelling reason for including a description of the local community and its conditions. Even though this may not be the sole reason for including this passage, its insertion is certainly connected with certain wishes which were put forward in the aula of the Council, e.g. by Metropolitan E. Zoghby and E. Schick, the auxiliary bishop of Fulda. It was not only considerations of dogmatic and biblical theology that supplied the initial inspiration and the basic orientation of these wishes. Rather they were prompted by directly practical and pastoral considerations [86] deriving from the concrete situation. There was an impression that the theology of the Church as presented in the Constitution as a whole was too theoretical and so too far removed from the concrete realities of everyday life, and that this would be the case so long as it treated of the universal Church, the pope and the bishops without going on to treat of the individual Christian's concrete experience of the Church as affecting his own personal life from day to day. There was a desire that the Constitution should contain some message about the Church as she exists in the concrete circumstances of everyday life, in other words in the actual situation in which the death of the Lord is effectively celebrated, in which the bread of the word of God is broken, in which we pray, love, and bear the Cross of our everyday lives in the concrete, for it is in this situation that the Church as a reality really is unambiguously and palpably something more than an abstract ideology, a dogmatic thesis or a large-scale social organisation. Interventions of this kind and expressions of this kind of desire were in principle readily accepted and welcomed. Moreover the insertion of the passage we are treating of here provoked no serious dispute or opposition either in the Theological Commission or in the plenary sessions of the Council. It was felt that something should be said about the local community of worshippers in the concrete, and so the passage was inserted at that point at which the ideas which it was intended to express could most easily be fitted in. Admittedly whether this meant that the best place for these ideas was in fact found is another question.[6] But then this question is not so very important. The passage is there. That is the main point.

Even abstracting from its precise content and from its special application to the diaspora community, this passage is of the highest importance. When traditional scholastic theologians intend to speak of the 'Church' they always think immediately of the universal Church, of the unity, under the pope and bishops, of the Christian communities scattered throughout the entire world. And they never pause to reflect that 'Church' [87] could have any other meaning than this. Admittedly it may be that the usual kind of scholastic theology does contain some brief mention, in a subsection on biblical theology, of the fact that in the New Testament the individual local communities too were called 'Church'. But in any ecclesiology of this type the local community as such is hardly treated of. In such ecclesiologies, and also in the average awareness of Catholics, it appears merely as a sort of administrative subsection of the Church, this being a social organisation on a cosmic scale. And even since the Church has come to be regarded (chiefly through the influence of Pius

[4] cf. the Constitution on the Church No. 25.
[5] cf. ibid. No. 27.
[6] A further conclusion arising from the observations which follow is that it would in fact be perfectly possible to take as our starting-point the individual communities, regarding these as the Church of Christ. We could adopt this approach even if our intention was to present an ecclesiology in the true sense of the term. So too it would have been perfectly possible in the Constitution on the Church itself to speak – at least in the first and second chapters – of the individual communities, even if the Constitution as a whole was intended, in its basic structure, to have the universal Church in view. In fact, however, this approach has not been adopted. Even the 'Church' which is presided over by an individual bishop is always regarded as a 'subsection' of the Church (No. 23 ff.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

XII's encyclical, Mystici Corporis) as the mystical body of Christ filled with the Spirit of Christ, something which is far more than merely a societas perfecta, still even as such, the Church has continued to be the universal Church which is world-wide, while the communities living in particular place and worshipping at a particular altar are precisely communities, parishes (and other 'segments' of a similar kind within this one universal Church). The fact that the New Testament applies the designation used for the whole to these 'segments' in themselves is something that does not trouble or disturb these ideas very much. Scholastic ecclesiology has failed to draw any clear conclusions from this linguistic usage, even though for its particular theory it must appear strange, and even though, at least in the sphere of biblical theology, we can at least raise the question of which of the two usages is the more original in the New Testament, that which applies the term 'Church' to the local community in the concrete, or that which applies it to the Church as a whole. And even when the Council itself set out to expound its teaching on the Church it was unreflectingly taken for granted that the subject under discussion was precisely the Church (and only this), in other words the totality of those who believe in Christ throughout the entire world, as existing in that state of organised unity which Catholic believers hold to be indispensable for this totality according to the will of Christ. It was far from obvious at the outset that the Council would finally come to apply the term 'Church' to the individual local communities of worshippers too. Nevertheless that is what has happened, and it is a fact of the highest importance. For in the case of a dogmatic statement the most important point is precisely not whether it takes a long or short time to arrive at it, or in what particular contexts or associations of ideas it (initially) makes its appearance. Nor can we pause here to explain a further point, namely what significance this recognition might have as providing a basis for working out an ecclesiology in oecumenical dialogue with Protestant theology (even though as it occurs in the Council document it is not presented precisely as a basic starting-point [88] of this kind). Perhaps we are still far from being in a position to recognise this importance to the full.

In the passage we are considering one sentence in particular is crucial: 'Haec Christi ecclesia adest in omnibus . . . congregationibus localibus'. The Church, the one Church of Christ, is present in its entirety in every local community.[7] In this local community the Church is made actually present in the particular place in question. Every local community is, each according to its particular locality, the new people called by God in the Holy Spirit, and in that plerophoria[8] of which Paul speaks in 1 Thess 1:5. What is asserted here is that the [7] The problem here is how, according to the New Testament, the universal Church and the local community are related to one another, seeing that the same word 'Church' can be used to designate both. There is no need to gloss over the fact that the words 'adest in' (a more cautious phrase than a simple est would have been) represent an evasion of, rather than a solution to this problem. At the same time the Council could not reasonably have been expected to supply any ultimate or definitive solution to this problem, especially in the present context. In fact the New Testament itself does not offer us any further enlightenment on this point in so many words, when it produces such formulae as 'the Church of God in Corinth' etc. Presumably the question we are considering here represents a problem that is entailed by the innermost nature of the Church as a Mystery, and therefore one that ultimately is too great for any explanation purely in terms of human reason. In any case it certainly cannot be considered any part of our intention in the present modest study either, to supply any detailed or exhaustive answer to this question. A point which we return to again and again here is that the unity of the Church and of each individual community is constituted by the fact that Christ is one and his Spirit is one. And surely this is sufficient for our present purposes to indicate the general direction in which the answer to this question is to be found; the question, namely, of how and why one and the same Church is present in each local community, and that not merely in the sense that she causes the local community to represent or 'stand for' her, but in the sense that in each particular community she achieves the ultimate and supreme realisation of her own nature.

[8] Properly speaking the Latin word used in the conciliar document represents a reference to 1 Thess 1:5, and it is hardly possible to supply a really correct rendering of it because the Latin word itself in its turn renders the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church of Christ (‘Haec Christi ecclesia’) is present in the local community, so that the local community is not ‘a’ Church but ‘the’ Church. And this assertion is not weakened by the fact that the passage speaks of Churches in the plural, influenced in this by the linguistic usage of the bible as found in Paul. Certainly it should not be denied that this usage in which the plural ‘Churches’ is employed is also legitimate, and rightly serves to underline the fact that the local community constitutes the Church only in virtue of the fact that it is precisely [89] united by the common bond of faith, love and law with all the other communities of Christ. Nor should it be doubted that the Council too is justified in speaking of Churches in the plural. But conversely this must not be allowed to obscure the further truth, which is brought out no less forcefully in our passage (without any further attempt being made to produce a theological harmony between two statements which seem to be opposed), namely that the one Church is made present in the local community of worshippers. In other words what we have in this local community of worshippers is not merely one section of the Church, one of its juridical or cultic administrative subsections. For this is precisely the difference between the Church and any earthly society, namely that in the part the whole achieves the supreme fulness of itself, and at the same time its clearest manifestation. It is in this sense that the Church of Christ (to express the matter once again in the paradoxical terms employed by the Council) ‘is there’ in the local community.[9]

II

Now the passage we are considering goes on to say that in any such local community gathered about their altar in which the Church is ‘there’ ‘Christ is present’. He is present through that which constitutes this community as such.

Two of the factors in this constitution of the local community are its union with its own bishop and pastor and its union with the universal Church. But when we look into our particular passage more closely we notice in addition to these three further factors[10] which are essential. The first is the preaching of the gospel of Christ (which takes place ‘in assembly’. In other words the gospel is not merely preached in the community as gathered together but is itself the basis for this state of ‘being gathered together’). The second is the mystery of the eucharistic meal, which is likewise designated explicitly as the basic cause for this brotherly unity [90] and so as actually constitutive of the community. The third is the love[11] and the unity of the community which develops precisely from this. This love itself appears, once more, as constituting a sign (‘symbol’) of the one and universal church in which salvation is mediated as present in the local community. The further question of precisely how these three elements in the constitution of the local community of worshippers are united among themselves is one on which our passage has nothing more to tell us. At most we can find an indication of where the answer to this lies to the extent that it is said that this community is original Greek concept only very imperfectly. On the concept of plerophoria cf. especially G. Delling, T.W.N.T. VI (Stuttgart 1959), p. 309.

---

[9] When it is stated in the Constitution on the Church (No. 28) that the priests make ‘the universal Church visible in their particular locality’, this is probably a weaker version of the same basic thought.

[10] Having recognised as distinct these three elements in the constitution of the local community, we may justifiably set them apart from the other two elements in it: that it is, of its nature, subject to the authority of a bishop, and that it is in union (even in the juridical and sacral sphere) with the universal Church. The reason is that what is being treated of here is precisely that which constitutes the local Church as such, and as distinct from the universal Church.

[11] We may be permitted to point out that even in Protestant ecclesiology this aspect has probably not been worked out sufficiently clearly. For in this the Church is regarded as existing wherever the gospel is legitimately preached and the sacraments are rightly administered.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the new people called by God[12] in the Holy Spirit. For it is in fact, in a very real sense, quite evident that it is precisely the pneuma Christi which draws these three basic elements, which are constitutive of the community, into a unity. For all preaching of the word of God only becomes the word precisely of God (and not merely a word about God) when it is uttered and heard in the Spirit, when the Spirit of God itself in its own reality becomes the source of the utterance (with authority) and of the hearing (in faith). The fact that the celebration of the Eucharist must take place in the Spirit and that it communicates the Spirit to men is also evident in scripture (cf. Jn 6:63), and it is likewise evident that the Spirit is only there where love is, and love can only be achieved in the Spirit.[13]

From the whole tenor of the passage one point becomes clear. It may be stated as follows: Christ is present through this community as constituted precisely in this way. And this presence of his is the object for [91] which the community exists. The passage is, in fact, developed in three stages.

1. It is stated that the local community is the presence of the Church as actual.

2. We are told why and how (precisely through the three constitutive elements already mentioned) the local community is the Church as present.

3. As a conclusion of the first two statements it is explained that Christ is present in these local communities.

The question of why the community as constituted in this way is the presence of Christ[14] is one that is not explicitly entered into or reflected upon. But even so we gather from what is said that since the Church (as a whole and as a local community) has Christ, she constitutes his presence. She does this in the two dimensions[15] which, according to the Constitution on the Church taken as a whole, belong to the Church and are essential for her existence: she is the hierarchically organised people of God, his Body, and she is this even in the dimension of history and society. At the same time she lives by his Spirit, which is given to her as the Church of eschatological salvation through the compassion of God which he will never [12] Here too it is to be observed that the passage does not say (as a superficial interpretation of scholastic theology might lead one to expect) that the individual community is a part of the new people of God, but that every community is the new 'people of God, each in its own locality'. This is something which is quite different.

---

[13] Even in the 'Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests' it is stated, in No. 4, that the people of God is assembled (and 'primarily' at that!) into a unity through the word of God. In No. 5 of the same decree it is explicitly stated that the Eucharist is the flesh of Christ as living and lifegiving 'in the Holy Spirit'. Here in No. 4 the unity of sacrament and word is also indicated inasmuch as it is stated that the sacraments are sacraments of faith which are born of the word and nourished by the word. There is nothing, therefore, to prevent us from regarding the sacraments themselves as the most radical instance of the exhibitive word of God effecting what it utters, a word, therefore, that does not merely speak of something which is simply independent of what is said, but rather causes the reality itself that is proclaimed in the kerygma to take place in the here and now. This makes plainer the unity that exists between the first two constitutive elements in the local community.

[14] We have no intention here of discussing or disputing the question of whether it is better to say: 'the community is the presence of Christ' or 'Christ is present in the community' (as, on an accurate reading, our passage expresses it). Obviously the Church is not Christ. And in neither of the two possible formulations is this asserted. The simpler and less awkward formulation is certainly that of the Council itself. But on the other hand a further point must not be overlooked. The presence of Christ in the community takes place in the word that is heard and believed, in the effective reception of the Body of Christ, in the practical love of the members of the community for one another, in brief in the Spirit of Christ as really communicated and as received in faith and love. This Spirit not merely offers itself, but also brings about the acceptance of itself through its own power. Its presence, therefore, is itself in act and at the same time the sanctification wrought by the Spirit upon man as he brings to its fulness the freedom which has been bestowed upon him. On this basis we can also state freely that the community is the presence of Christ, provided only that we do not absolutely identify this presence (that through which Christ communicates himself to man as Saviour, and so becomes present 'for him') with Christ himself.

[15] On these two dimensions in the Church, which as distinct yet undivided are essential elements in her very nature, cf. e.g. the Constitution on the Church No. 8.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

withdraw from her, and it is given to her as a pledge of final and irrevocable victory. The Spirit is also conferred upon her as truth and love.[16] Of her very nature, therefore, the Church is the presence of Christ [92] in both dimensions (that of history and that of the Spirit which opens up to her, and assures her of, that dimension of transcendence in which she can attain to the immediate presence of God). She is the presence of Christ in each of these two dimensions, and in the modes appropriate to each respectively, so that both dimensions together constitute the single presence of Christ. In that in the word of Christ, his sacrament (including the 'real presence' under the sacramental forms of the Eucharist), visible love and unity are achieved, Christ is 'there' in the dimension of history. In that this presence is the historical communication of his Spirit, it is in virtue of this precisely that it achieves its goal, namely the immediate union of man with God in his justifying and forgiving grace, which, in the last analysis (as 'uncreated grace') is God himself in the immediacy of his act of self-bestowal. Both modes are one and at the same time distinct, just as the sacrament and that which is sacramentally signified (sacramentum and res sacramenti) are one and distinct. This unity between the sacrament and the reality it signifies is something that can no longer be destroyed in the Church as a whole (however much it may be lost in the case of the individual recipient of the sacraments: 'unfruitful sacrament'). This is because the Church is holy and endures through the grace of God as eschatologically victorious. And because this is so we can also make the following statement about the Church as a whole (and thereby, surely, about the individual communities as a whole too, at any rate in a presumptive sense[17]): it abidingly constitutes this unity of the presence of Christ in sign and in the Spirit. Because that which constitutes it also constitutes the presence of Christ we can say (and this is something that explicitly applies only here) not only 'in her Christ is present', but also 'she is the [93] presence of Christ', even though perhaps it would be better to avoid speaking of the Church as 'Christ living on'.[18]

III

A further question has now to be asked: for whom is Christ present in this way? Obviously the presence we are speaking of here is not simply a local presence such as we might conceive of in terms of the conceptual model of two bodies placed close to one another in the same area. This presence, rather, is one that causes us to be saved, a presence 'for us'. In answering this question we must certainly begin by pointing out that Christ is present in the community for the community itself, and to bring salvation to its own members. The Church

[16] cf. the Constitution on the Church No. 39, No. 48. cf. also K. Rahner, 'The Sinful Church in the Decrees of Vatican II'; 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 295-312.

[17] A question which will, in fact probably have to be left open is whether, in spite of being juridically authenticated, in spite of the true preaching of the gospel and the valid administration of the sacraments in it, an individual community can be as a whole sinful and unbelieving (and only this). The conciliar document takes as its starting-point the 'normal case' of a community in which the word of God really is heard in a spirit of faith and the sacraments are 'fruitfully' received. But since for the individual community as it exists in the concrete we can only 'presume' this to be the case (in exactly the same way as with the individual Christian as such) it also becomes clear that even on a Catholic understanding of the Church it includes an 'invisible' element, and that we must allow for this if we are not to understand the Church merely as a societas perfecta in a sense that is false. But it must be remembered that the Church as a whole is conceived of as indefectibiliter sancta (No. 39), and that as a whole she makes manifest to the faithful, even as a fact of history, the act of abiding in the truth and love of Christ (cf. D 1794). Because of this there are objective grounds for the presumption referred to above.

[18] On this mode of parlance cf. the commentary and bibliography provided by A. Grillmeier on pp. 168-174 of the volume of commentary on the Council referred to on p. 84 n. 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is, in fact, always the fruit of salvation and the mediatrix of salvation at the same time. The fact that as mediatrix of salvation she makes Christ present means that she herself receives Christ as her own salvation, and that at the same time she mediates him to others.[19] In fact the only way in which the word can be rightly preached is for the preacher himself to have heard it in a spirit of faith.[20] In the Eucharist the Church is always she who receives, as well as she who dispenses, the Body of the Lord. In the relationship of love unity is always maintained within her in such a way that love is both given [94] and received at the same time, and that the one attitude cannot be present without the other.

But ultimately speaking it would run counter to the basic tenor of the constitution on the Church taken as a whole if we were to confine our answer to the mere statement that in the community which is the Church Christ is present for, and bringing salvation to, the Church herself and her members. For in fact the principle that the Church is the 'sacrament' of salvation for the world[21] is numbered among the basic tenets of conciliar ecclesiology. But this means nothing else than that in the last analysis instead of the Church making Christ present only to herself as her salvation, she makes him present to the world as the salvation of it. Now in order to understand this and appreciate it at its true worth we must advance beyond the stage of merely noticing in passing the explanation put forward relatively frequently and with numerous minor variations by the Council to the effect that the Church is the basic sacrament of salvation and, furthermore, of the salvation of the world. Over and above this we must realise a further conviction which is either expressed or implied[22] in the pronouncements of the Council, and that too in a manner which is notably clearer and more forceful than has been the case in tradition hitherto. This is the conviction that men can be and are justified without belonging fully to the 'visible body' of the Church (it should be [19] We must achieve a clearer view than is obtained in the usual presentations of ecclesiology of the unity which exists between the imparting of salvation and its reception. The Church herself would cease to be the authoritative and indefectible mediatrix of truth and salvation if she ceased, or ever could cease, to be she who abides through faith in the truth, and she who is the holy one (in the love of her members for one another). She has authority and is indeed indefectible in mediating salvation precisely because she has herself already received salvation through God in an act which is eschatological and so irrevocable, and has thereby been constituted as the work of God's compassion in Christ.

[20] Obedience in faith is, of course, something that is legitimately demanded of each individual preacher in his preaching. But whether we apply what we are saying to a preacher of this kind, or whether even an unbelieving preacher can assert this word in the Church and for her, makes no difference to the point we are making. The statement is correct, at any rate as applied to preaching and the preacher in the Church as a whole, and it is true even of a preacher who in his own personal life is an unbeliever that he can only preach legitimately when he speaks in the name of the Church. And in the Church the word is not only preached but believed too. Preaching proceeds from faith as its basis.

[21] cf. the Constitution on the Church No. 1, No. 9, No. 48, No. 59; the Decree on the Missions No. 1, No. 5; the Constitution on the Liturgy, No. 5, No. 26; The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the World of Today, No. 43. It is not possible here to enter into the precise nuances of this doctrine as presented in the various documents. On this doctrine of the Church as the 'basic sacrament' cf. the study of the author cited on p. 84 n. 1 of this article, on 'The New Image of the Church', now included in this volume, pp. 2-43. On the material and historical aspects of this subject cf. P. Smulders' important study, 'Die Kirche als Sacrament des Heils', De Ecclesia. Beiträge zur Konstitution 'Über die Kirche' des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils, G. Baraúna ed., German edition prepared by O. Semmelroth, J. G. Gerhartz, H. Vorgrimler, Vol. I (Freiburg/Frankfurt 1966), pp. 289-312 (with copious bibliography). cf. also ibid., the studies of J. L. Witte and Abbot B. C. Butler. cf. the brief summary in the article 'Ursakrament' (O. Semmelroth), L.T.K. X (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1965), pp. 568-569; the concept occurs in three distinct passages in the Constitution on the Church: No. 1, No. 9, No. 48. cf. in addition the comprehensive expositions of A. Grillmeier in the commentary referred to on p. 84 n. 1 of the present volume. cf. in the commentary pp. 156 ff., esp. 157 n. 4, 177 ff. also the remarks of O. Semmelroth, pp. 315-317. Also O. Semmelroth, Die Kirche als Ursakrament (Frankfurt, 3rd ed. 1963); K. Rahner, Kirche und Sakramente (Freiburg 1960). cf. also the bibliography below pp. 201/210.

[22] cf. e.g. The Constitution on the Church Nos. 15-16; the Decree on Oecumenism, No. 3; the Decree on the Missions, Nos. 1, 4, 7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

noticed [95] in parenthesis that in holding this the Council does not call in question the unique role of and necessity for the Church as mediating salvation on any true understanding of this role). Once we recognise this we can see that to call the Church the sacrament of salvation for the world means something far more than merely that she is the sign to all men of the grace of God as offered to them (as though this grace could become fruitful in salvation only when the individual concerned actually belonged to the visible body of the Church). Also, and more than this, she is the sign of the grace of God as actually having achieved its victory in the world, a grace, therefore, which can and does extend its justifying effects even to those areas in which the individual justified does not already fully belong to the Church in the visible dimension of history and society, thereby himself contributing to the constitution of the Church as the basic sacrament of salvation for the world. It remains true that grace can take effect in the sense indicated even though both inside and outside the Church we cannot arrive at any assured judgment as to whether a particular individual is justified or not. Thus we can say that the Church, and therefore the individual community that is the Church, makes Christ present to the world in that, through her whole existence as an historical entity (in preaching, sacraments and visibly active love) she constitutes a reality in human history that is one and the same for all, the unique sphere of existence in which the personal saving history of each individual is achieved. The Church also makes a further factor present in this way. It is through her that this same Christ, actually present in the world that is not the Church, has inserted himself into the innermost centre of the lives of men, to become, as justifying and sanctifying through his Spirit, the centre and source of their saving history. Even with regard to the presence of Christ through the Church for the world, therefore, we must pay due heed to the fact that the Church, and the presence of Christ as constituted by her, has a twofold dimension.

IV

Now evidently what we have already said so far with regard to the presence of Christ in the local community of worshippers which is the Church applies also to the ‘diaspora’ communities that are small. This point is explicitly emphasised in our passage. In fact it says ‘even though they are often poor and small and live in the diaspora’. Evidently the intention that lies behind this formula is to express solicitude for such small and poor ‘diaspora’ communities. They too constitute the presence of Christ in the [96] world even if, because of their smallness in terms of numbers, social prestige and power, they cannot impart that effulgence to the presence of Christ which is so often invoked by the practitioners of an unenlightened apologetics in order to prove the presence of Christ in the world and to make it appear splendid. But we can without embarrassment pass over the actual text of the conciliar document and sum it up by saying that such ‘diaspora’ communities, precisely as such, are a sign of the presence of Christ. We have only to read 1 Cor 1:26-31 to realise this. The insignificance of the community in terms of numbers and social standing is, in Paul’s view, not merely something that ‘regrettably’ has to be put up with until the Church finally emerges in her full splendour and her victorious power. On the contrary it is something which God himself has ‘chosen’ in order that he, and not man, may be made manifest in his own autonomous power, and may bear witness to himself. God has precisely chosen circumstances of insignificance because he wants to attest the fact that his love has been rejected. The Christ who is to be present here is Christ crucified (cf. 1 Cor 1:22), who is a scandal to the Jews and folly to the Gentiles. In the Eucharist it is the death of the Lord that is to be proclaimed, for it is only through this that life is brought to the world. Of their very nature, therefore, truth love and light, to the extent that they really are of God and given by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God as salvation, have a mysterious affinity with the mystery of the Cross and so too with the folly and scandal involved in it. Given that a community has the function of making Christ present through the word of preaching, through the sacraments and through love, how could it, in any true sense, fulfil this function by appearing in the world with power, with earthly wisdom or with social prestige? Is it not almost a necessity of the very nature of such a community to approximate to the form of the 'diaspora' community? To be 'small', 'poor' and few in numbers, and so to be living in the midst of those who have not already been touched by the grace of God at the actual level of the conscious awareness of truth and adherence to the Church as a society? Again the Council itself has repeatedly pointed to a connection between the Church and poverty (which, in the last analysis, can only be a real factor in a 'diaspora' community), even though it did not attribute to this connection the full scope and force which was desired, chiefly by the French and South American bishops.[23] We must avoid thinking of the presence of Christ through the Church in terms of an abstract ideology, [97] and think instead of the preaching of the gospel in the concrete, that gospel which will, as a necessity of saving history, meet with contradiction. Furthermore we must achieve a right understanding of the celebration of the Eucharist, seeing it not as a celebration of a sort of cosmic liturgy of the beauty and the unveiled doxa of God, but rather as an act in which the terrible death of the Lord in darkness and ruin is made present and takes possession of us. We must not misinterpret love as an idealistic philanthropy which is intended to conceal the brutality of human living from itself instead of helping to bear the pain of it. And if we do all this, then and only then (in spite of the reservations expressed at the beginning) we shall understand that the 'diaspora' community is capable of being, most clearly of all, the presence of Christ as the crucified one.

This will come as no surprise to anyone who reflects that in the last analysis the 'diaspora' situation is far from being extraordinary or exceptional for the Church as such from the point of view either of her own intrinsic nature or of the future which is destined to befall her. From the point of view of the Church's own nature it is not extraordinary, for in fact the Church is not the kingdom of God made manifest in glory, but rather the sign of this, the promise of this and the community which hopes against all hope as it waits for this kingdom to come. As a sign in this sense of a reality that is hoped for the Church can never for one moment expect that at some point in earthly time the world and the Church will simply become co-extensive so as to form a single homogeneous society which is both Christian and world-wide at the same time. But that contradiction to herself, her truth and her love which is an element intrinsic to her own life cannot be restricted in its manifestations to the interior and private dimension of the individual's own conscience, but must also, and of necessity, assume a social form. Today the Church is gradually entering upon a future in which she becomes a world Church in the true sense, and in which she is everywhere. This is because the individual histories of the many nations hitherto covering separate areas of human living have become united into a single overall world history. Nevertheless the Church must still remain the sign that will be contradicted because Christ, whom it is her role to make present, is himself destined to be contradicted. Now these two facts can only both be true simultaneously in that the Church as she exists everywhere is actually a 'diaspora' Church, however varied the 'diaspora' conditions may be and may continue to be, to which the Church is subject among particular peoples and in particular areas of human history.[24]

[98] Certainly it is true that even in the future the Church must not become either sociologically or still less theologically a 'sect', or ever wish to become so in any sense. By [23] cf. e.g. the Constitution on the Church, No. 8, No. 45 ff.; the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests, No. 17; the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the World of Today, No. 42; the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops, No. 13.

[24] On this cf. K. Rahner, Sendung and Gnade, pp. 24-47.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'sect' here we mean a group of individuals who are inadequate to meet the demands of life, and who do not have the courage to take an active part in shaping a developing world. Because of this they make a virtue of their necessity that is both false and cowardly. But while recognising the danger and temptation of misunderstanding the Church's true nature in this sense (by glorifying a ghetto-like way of life as lived in the nooks and crannies of history), still this does not prohibit the Church from recognising the fate which is in fact hers, that namely of living, whether exteriorly or interiorly in a 'diaspora' situation, as a disposition of God which, so far from running counter to her true nature, precisely causes it to be made manifest. If the Church understands her 'diaspora' situation as something proper to her own nature as being a sign of salvation to the world, then she can combine in the right sense the attitudes both of humility and pride: pride ('boasting') in her election to be a sign of the salvation of the world, and humility because she is chosen precisely and only as a sign of that salvation, which can also be attained to by those who do not (yet) belong to the Church in terms of visible membership of her as a social and historical entity. In other words what we are speaking of is the difference between the Church as sign of salvation to the world and the salvation which is present in the Church for herself and for the world. Now anyone who pays due heed to this difference and recognises it as essential and abiding has thereby understood also the theological nature of the 'diaspora' situation. He no longer needs merely to endure it as a sociological situation and a purely external fate to which the Church is subject.

V

The local community of worshippers is, in virtue of the word, the sacrament and the love that is manifested in her, the supreme 'actualisation' of the very meaning of 'Church' as such. It will still be a long time before the average Catholic Christian appreciates this, and before he understands that that which first and last provides the focal point and the initial impulse for his belief in the Church and his love for the Church is to be found not where the Church appears as a large-scale organisation endowed with great power, but where the centre of that worship is located which is constituted by the word, the sacrament and brotherly love. The amount that still remains to be done in order to arouse men to an awareness of this [99] significance in the Church is immeasurable. Poverty, smallness and a 'diaspora' situation are singled out in the conciliar document as the characteristics of many local communities. But we ought to realise that these are destined to apply to the Church as a whole, especially in view of the future that is pressing in upon her, even more than we do at present. And realising this we should calmly and freely allow the full implications of the basic principle expressed in our passage to be unfolded. Thus we shall say that the new awareness of the Church which will come to prevail in the future is actually anticipated in this passage which we are considering.[25] The Christian of tomorrow will only encounter the Church as such, will only experience her as 'actual' and present where the presence of Christ is experienced and made real in the authorised preaching of his gospel, in the anamnesis of his death, and in that love which unites men in Christ.

It is here that the Christian of tomorrow will recognise what the Church is. He will understand the achievement of the Christian community in its fulness here not as something which takes place in the Church, but rather as the achievement of the Church herself. Of [25] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Konziliare Lehre der Kirche und künftige Wirklichkeit christlichen Lebens', Schriften zur Theologie VI, pp. 479-498; on the situation of the diaspora cf. K. Rahner, 'The Christian in his World', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore, 1971), pp. 88 ff. For a comprehensive analysis of the situation of the Church in the present cf. now especially the author's Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1-2 (Freiburg 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

course he will be aware that this Church, in order to be able to achieve its own 'actualisation' in this sense, has a structure of its own prior to achieving the fulness of its own nature here. But at the same time he will, from the outset, regard this concrete reality and composition of the Church as a whole which is prior to the achievement of her own full 'actualisation', precisely as a condition which enables that to be enacted which comes to its fulness in the form of a community gathered about the altar. Of course a community of this kind, conscious as it is of itself as an event taking place in the Church through the word of preaching, the sacraments and the love of the brethren, will be conscious of being united with all other communities which likewise constitute this same single Church of Christ. The individual community will give expression to that unity with all other communities through the one Spirit which is according to Christ's will even at the level of concrete social living as such, and will also be conscious that it has a duty to do this. It will experience in faith that it only maintains the truth of the word which takes place in it, and its power to [100] make Christ present, in the unity of the communities of Christ as hierarchically organised. This of itself will ensure that it recognises and lives by everything which the Constitution on the Church has to say about the universal Church as such. It will think of the totality of the communities in turn as the Church, and precisely not as a secondary amalgam of communities originally existing in isolation from one another as though it was this combination alone that constituted the 'Church'. The community will recognise that even in the Church considered as the union of the individual communities truth and love must be achieved, and therefore too that for this purpose this 'universal' Church must have its organs at the level of social organisation and living, namely those appointed in her to exercise the teaching and pastoral office. For these do not only provide a final summing up of what is recognised and achieved in the faith and love of the individual communities as such. They are something more than the mere mouthpieces of these individual communities.

But a community of this kind will recognise all this as belonging to a Catholic understanding of the Church, and will be content to live by it, realising that though the truth of Christ is ultimately one, it is presented in the form of a structured hierarchy of truths. It will recognise and accept what is laid down in the Decree on Oecumenism,[26] namely that though this truth which is the authentic foundation and basis of faith is one, the individual doctrines of faith and their application to the concrete realities of human living are related in very different ways to this one true foundation, so that it is only from the basis of this that we can believe in these doctrines and live by these applications of them in the concrete. Now this basis (and this is something that concerns precisely the Christians living in the diaspora of today and tomorrow) is not the Church considered as a macrocosmic religious organisation with an extension that is world-wide (not even when we take due cognizance of its God-given authority and the fact that it orientates us towards the ultimate goal of our religion). Rather this authentic foundation of faith and love in relation to the Church will be the reality and the concrete experience that Christ the crucified and risen Lord is made present together with his word (including in this its sacramental and exhibitive force, its 'translation' into acts of love, and the witness it bears in this form), with its power to admit us into the unfathomable mystery of God. It is in the objective reality and the experience of this that the Church is made 'actual' ever anew in the midst of the insignificance, poverty and desolation of the community which believes in him in the vast wilderness of this human life. All other factors [101] in our awareness of the Church will draw their life from, and will only be able to live by this as their fundamental source and centre. The Christian of the future will experience that which befalls him in his community no longer – as formerly – as something that takes place in the Church, but rather as the 'actualisation' of the Church. Now this basic source and [26] cf. the Decree on Oecumenism, No. 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

centre of the reality that is the Church and of faith in the Church can be, and actually will be experienced by non-Catholic Christians too (even though these may not give it its due by recognising it as a fully objective entity and as a social phenomenon expressible in 'this-worldly' categories). And because of this it becomes possible for the Catholic Church to enter into dialogue with the other Christian Churches and communities. There is a basis for this dialogue which God himself has provided in Christ, and which he brings to 'actualisation'. And only from this basis will such a dialogue hold out a real prospect of proving fruitful – fruitful in the efforts which are made on all sides to bear an authentic[27] witness to the presence of Christ in a Christian community. Even in the diaspora.

[27] In order to avoid a still greater increase in the footnotes to this article the author has decided not to repeat once again the relevant references to the findings of biblical theology and the witnesses of theological tradition. For these the reader may be referred to the wide-ranging and well-planned study of B. Neunheuser O.S.B., 'Gesamtkirche und Einzelkirche', De Ecclesia I (cf. above p. 138 a n. 21), pp. 547-573 (including a copious bibliography on the subject in all its aspects). Two approaches are possible, one in which the importance of the local community is stressed, the other in which we take as our starting-point a more universal conception of the Church. Now it is possible to regard these as two types of the 'theology of collegiality' as this has been developed e.g. by J. Ratzinger, cf. 'Die Bischöfliche Kollegialität' in De Ecciesia II, G. Baraúna ed., (Freiburg 1966), pp. 44-70, esp. pp. 56 ff. J. Ratzinger interprets my statement in Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), p. 335 as an extremely radical version of a theological conception that has only appeared in recent times. Moreover he finds that my own interpretation as set forth in 'The Episcopate and the Primacy', Studies in Modern Theology (Freiburg/London 1965), pp. 303-322, is in 'opposition' to his, and that even in developing the idea of collegiality it seeks to follow an exactly opposite path to that of the theology of the Fathers. But against this, my various statements on this subject (including those belonging to the present volume) show that I myself would prefer to regard these two types as 'conceptual models' which complement one another, although admittedly from many points of view, and precisely at the present time a certain priority may be attributed to the local Church. Admittedly too, difficulties do arise from the fact that for many reasons the structural forms assumed by the Church can no longer be based upon a territorial principle, while in view of the ever-increasing unification of the world an awareness of the Church as universal appears just as important. While the theological initiative of recent times may have led to an ecclesiology that is one-sided, and even

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

produced certain effects in practice which are harmful, still there is also a necessary trait in this development which can be interpreted in a positive sense. For example in the article referred to by Ratzinger I was concerned amongst other things with explaining in ecclesiological terms the significance of the diocese, and so here I took as my starting-point factors which I do not adduce in my other studies. In the light of what has just been said, namely the broader vision in which both elements have to be taken into account, I can whole-heartedly agree with the observations of J. Ratzinger with regard to the importance of the local Church. On the local Church cf. also H. Küng, Die Kirche (Freiburg I967), pp. 105 f., 272 ff. etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[103]

6

DIALOGUE IN THE CHURCH

The Second Vatican Council has had the effect of causing the question of dialogue between Christians to be raised as a subject for discussion and also actually put into practice. Everyone is speaking of dialogue, and of a dialogue between everyone and his neighbour. But in this there has already been a certain failure to arrive at any very clear idea of what the general term ‘dialogue’ really means, especially when it is intended to apply it to discussions which are properly speaking ideological and religious in character, and as these are conducted not merely between individuals but between social groups and institutions.

I

When the dialogue is to be conducted by that Church whose members are Catholics as well as Christians, and when it is concerned with the Christian faith and the principles deriving from this, then the basic difficulty consists in the fact that in this case it is not some favourite opinion that is being put forward. On the contrary, in such a case the subject of the dialogue is a teaching which is held with a total commitment of faith to have been revealed by God, and which is adhered to immutably by the Church and by the Christian believer. We can discuss among ourselves and exchange opinions and views. We can peaceably exchange ideas even when our minds are already made up concerning political, economic, cultural and artistic questions. And in all this we can, indeed we should, maintain an attitude of tolerance, recognising a priori that man in himself does not necessarily have to be right in all circumstances, that in the course of discussion he can alter his own personal opinion and allow himself to be taught a better one. In short in all these areas we can conduct an open dialogue. Nor does this need to turn into a mere disjointed discussion which is endlessly prolonged, and in which we never expect to arrive at any unity between us. Indeed an open dialogue of this kind is embarked upon with the aim of learning something and not merely [104] teaching, with an attitude of being prepared, in certain circumstances, to revise our own opinions, to modify them in their details or even to alter them, to achieve new insights and to accord due value to factors which we have hitherto failed to perceive. The ultimate meaning of dialogue is such as to preclude treating of subjects of a purely factual nature. Rather it is a communication of ourselves which is aimed at mutual and loving acceptance. And to this extent an open dialogue still has a certain meaning even in those cases in which it does not imply that kind of unity which consists in mutually holding the same opinion, but rather in accepting the other person in his uniqueness and otherness, the difference of ‘viewpoint’ being only a very secondary expression of this.

But can an open dialogue of this kind also be conducted by Catholic Christians in matters belonging specifically to their faith, and with regard to a teaching that has been revealed by God, seeing that such a Christian holds firm with a total commitment of faith to this teaching in all that concerns the manner of its promulgation and its content as revelation? For in such a case is not the purpose of a discussion already decided from the outset: the victory of one’s own personal convictions even over one’s partner in the discussion, or else a breaking off of the discussion in which both parties go their separate ways ‘unconverted’ and with the convictions which they already held before the discussion took place? In questions of faith, then, is it impossible to have any open dialogue, and is a kind of ‘missionary’ controversy

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with the avowed intention of converting the other to one's point of view all that is possible – at least from the Catholic party's view of what discussion must mean? Is the only conceivable form of discussion which can exist, so far as we are concerned, one which is analogous to that which a Christian or a sincere humanist might hold with a Nazi who sought to defend the murder of the Jews, seeing that in this field a Christian cannot hold any open dialogue but is confined to avowing his faith and attacking or rejecting, however politely, contrary points of view, or else to sternly refusing to enter into any discussion at all?

The problem of why, and in what sense, the Church can, and indeed must conduct an open dialogue in such questions in spite of this cannot really be treated of in extenso here.[1] Yet we must draw attention to this question at this point because in the nature of the case it still recurs in the case of dialogue within the Church as we shall shortly be seeing. On the more general question we must confine ourselves here to saying this much: even in questions of faith, and in spite of the absolute character of divine [105] revelation, the absolute nature of the Church's own assent of faith and her ultimately missionary purpose, the Church can conduct an open dialogue with all men and groups of men because in such a dialogue, without prejudice to the divine truth, the Church can and must be she who learns as well, she who is capable of being led into still deeper levels of her own truth and her understanding of that truth. In such a dialogue she can be purified from misunderstandings and distorted interpretations such as may have attached themselves to her understanding of her faith, and she can herself become more believing. It may be that it is only through such a dialogue that she can attain to that particular concrete historical form of the abiding truth which is to be the basis for her activity in hope and love, and which has to be worked out by herself in the particular circumstances of the present if she is to proclaim the gospel of God in Christ effectively to her own age.[2]

After these preliminary observations we must straightway raise the question of the necessity, the nature and the concrete form of this open dialogue which is to take place within the Church. When we speak of dialogue and the necessity for dialogue here we do not mean the sort of dialogue which is carried on everywhere and at all times, or which must be carried on (unless it is silenced by the atrophying of the human in man) because the very nature of man is such as to demand discussion and intercommunication with his fellows. When we speak of dialogue and the necessity for it here, then, we mean dialogue to the extent that it arises from a specific contemporary situation and is rendered necessary by this. From the very outset we are confining ourselves, therefore, to an aspect which, in itself, is wholly secondary. From this it is clear that even the dialogue within the Church can only be considered from this secondary viewpoint. The fundamental situation of dialogue between Christians as friends, as loving one another, as neighbours and members of the same community of worshippers – in other words the most important element in the dialogue between Christians – will be left out of consideration here. Here we shall primarily be concerned to discuss, on a broad basis, the question of an open theological dialogue within the Church, while the question of a dialogue within the Church in the spheres of pastoral

[1] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on Dialogue Within a Pluralistic Society', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 31-42.

[2] For a fuller treatment of the subject of a right understanding of how insight into the faith can be developed even in the case of defined dogma cf. K. Rahner and K. Lehmann, Mysterium Salutis I, J. Feiner, M. Löhrer edd. (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 693 ff., 698 ff., 731 ff., 756 ff., 780 ff.; K. Rahner, 'Zur Geschichtlichkeit der Theologie', Integritas, D. Stolte and R. Wisser edd., Festschrift für K. Holzamer (Tübingen 1966), pp. 75-95, now published in Vol. IX of this series, pp. 64-82.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[106] theology and on social, educational and political matters must remain in the background.[3]

II

An open dialogue of the kind that can be conducted within the Church is possible and necessary. First: if the Church of today is to conduct a dialogue with the world, then it must not be overlooked that this 'world' is not simply 'outside', but is rather present in the Church herself. This means that the first, and perhaps the decisive dialogue with the world is that which takes place precisely within the Church.

In fact the 'world' which is to be the Church's partner in the dialogue that is necessary today is, in the first instance, not only present where non-Christian groups have already emerged as social organisations with a firm ideological basis of their own. No such social organisation needs to be achieved for the world to be constituted as a partner to a dialogue with the Church. Prior to the formation of any such ideological groups different from the Church herself the necessity for a dialogue between the Church and the 'world'[4] arises from the almost incalculable pluralism of ideas which constitutes the situation in which modern man lives, and which on the one hand is prior to the formation of the ideologies and their upholders, and on the other cannot fail to have a bearing upon the faith of the Church. By the term 'intellectual pluralism'[5] as understood here we mean the sum total of the experiences, insights, impulses and human possibilities in all spheres of human living which are distinguished by the following characteristics:

1. As a sum total it is so immense and complex that it has reached a stage at which it is quite impossible for any one individual even to survey it all, let alone to organise it and reduce it to a single integrated system.[6]

2. It derives from the most diverse sources of knowledge and experience, for which no integrating factors can be found even if we go back [107] to their origins. Their complexity is such that no a priori theory of science can be found which is adequate to comprehend them, reduce them to a system or relate them one to another.

3. There is no one representative of this total complex such as might exercise authoritative control over all its elements (not even the Church).

4. All departments of this amorphous complex are – even though in various ways and different degrees – significant for the tenets of the Christian faith. All these elements are factors in modern man's picture of the world, and in his interpretation of himself, which in turn constitute the situation in which he lives out his Christian faith. They raise questions for this, and call it in question at the same time.

The world constituted by this intellectual pluralism also exists in the Church. For her members themselves live in the situation constituted by this intellectual pluralism, and for that very reason an interior dialogue is necessary in the Church. The situation of a world that is intellectually homogeneous and easy to comprehend is coming to an end within the Church as well. Since the French revolution and the restoration of the Church from the nineteenth

[3] In view of the fact that other works are available for consultation on these more concrete questions, the author has felt able to confine himself to the problems which are more basic.
[4] On the basic necessity for a dialogue between the Church and the world cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1-2 (Freiburg 1966), II/1: pp. 102 ff., 265 ff.; II/2: pp. 163 ff., 168 ff., 203-267.
[5] On the concept of 'Pluralism' cf. ibid. II/1: pp. 210 ff., 248 ff., 261 ff.
[6] For a fuller treatment with examples cf. the author's 'A Small Question Regarding the Contemporary Pluralism in the Intellectual Situation of Catholics and the Church', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 21-30.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

century onwards a remarkable intellectual homogeneity (which has been still further strengthened by the definition of the First Vatican Council) has prevailed in the Catholic Church even though it has not been without certain ghetto-like traits. This has lasted for a whole century. It is the age of neo-scholasticism in theology and philosophy, the age of the theory of a natural law worked out in material detail, of a uniform and centralised form of ecclesiastical government in which the universal Church was ruled from Rome, the age of a Latin liturgy which was common to all, of a canon law which was common to all and by comparison with which all laws for particular Churches hardly entered into consideration, an age in which it was attempted to establish in the Church a way of life for Christians and Church members covering all areas and as far as possible self-sufficient, and to do this through social organisations in the Church, through schools, Christian literature etc. It was the age in which the Church was extremely consistent, relatively speaking, in preserving a negative attitude to much which modern man held dear, an age in which, relatively speaking, an attitude of mistrust was to a large extent general towards democracy, towards many social, political and economic tendencies of the future, towards the emancipation of women, woman's franchise, modern exegesis, the history of religions, the free and unrestricted study of the history of dogma and much else besides.

There was no need then for much dialogue to be carried on within the [108] Church, because all were already 'of one speech', and for this reason attention was directed outwards in an apologetic and defensive attitude. Of course even then the way was gradually being paved for change, above all after the pontificate of Pius X and the First World War under Benedict XV, when integralism as a force in ecclesiastical politics disappeared, the shock of the antimodernist controversy was overcome, and a return from this in some respects integralist attitude was demanded to a certain extent even by the pope himself (manifested in a more favourable attitude towards modern exegesis, in the demand for Catholic action, in the Lateran Treaties, in the fact that liturgical and oecumencial movements were first tolerated and then positively demanded etc.). But from the twenty years prior to the death of Pius XII this gradual process of change was, so far as the average awareness in the Church was concerned, still to a large extent concealed by something which might be called a certain 'Pianic monolithism'.[7]

Now since John XXIII and the Second Vatican Council it has become evident not merely to a few individual Catholics with deeper insight, but to the awareness of the average member of the Church and to the community in general that that intellectual pluralism which we have attempted to describe above has actually infiltrated into the Church herself and exists there.

It is plainly evident that in the Church's theology and philosophy questions are discussed no longer merely in neo-scholastic terms. Instead the problems and the terminology of modern philosophy have become a factor within the Church herself. It is evident too that Protestant theology is no longer merely the opponent against whom we have to struggle, but is the partner too with whom we share a common ground in face of the questions of the present-day intellectual situation, and from whom we can learn. We notice suddenly that Catholic exegesis too is readier to adopt the methods of rational and historical criticism in its approach to scripture, and thereby raises quite unaccustomed questions for dogmatic theology, so that theologians are far from being unanimous in the answers they give to these. We discover that there are innumerable questions of profound importance upon which we Catholics are far from being united among ourselves. These relate to our attitude in the fields of anthropology, culture, art, foreign and domestic politics and education. We are no longer pledged and committed to one and the same party. Churches are built and works of religious art produced which strike some as a religious revelation while others see them as an outrage.

[7] On this concept cf. the author's remarks in Vol. IX of this series, p. 86.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We are no longer united [109] on the question of what properly constitutes, or should constitute 'Christian' literature and poetry today. What seems to one to be necessary and in keeping with the times as an interpretation of dogma seems to another to be bordering on heresy. What one considers to be the obvious way of life for a Christian of today appears to another as too cold or as a cowardly betrayal of every Christian ideal. All at once we discover that Christian principles, though everywhere assented to, are no longer so easy and unambiguous as was formerly believed to apply in the form of concrete imperatives which are likewise accepted by all. In short (we have mentioned only a few minor examples) the world of intellectual pluralism is present within the Church herself. And because of this a dialogue within the Church is inevitable and necessary even if it makes things far more difficult and toilsome for us than formerly, especially since this dialogue is in many respects more difficult than a dialogue with the world outside the Church. This is because however lovingly we may try to behave in a family dispute it still has a special sharpness and bitterness of its own. It is also because this dialogue within the Church is conducted among complex and heterogeneous schools of thought within a single body governed by the same Christian faith and by the one social organisation of the Church. Thus these 'limits' offer less possibility of avoiding the dispute than in the case of the dialogue carried on outside the Church.

In a Church which includes complex and heterogeneous schools of thought such a dialogue within its own ambience is necessary even when it is quite impossible to hope, and indeed not even a legitimate goal to strive for, that through this dialogue every kind of pluralism in the Church will be overcome and complete unity will once more be restored. For the Christians belonging to the Church must help one another to cope in a Christian way with the complexity of intellectual forces which today are present in an unintegrated manner in every individual. Christians must help one another to overcome the dangers for the purity and strength (both factors are involved here!) of their faith, which are entailed by this complexity and pluralism even though, or precisely because, their decision in terms of their own faith and Christian philosophy of life still has to be applied to it so that in a certain sense it is still 'neutral' ground. The Christians must have a common confession of faith. Even though this is not simply to be identified with the theology, the reflexive interpretation of their one faith and creed, because theology can certainly be extremely 'pluralistic' in character, still such close connections exist between faith and theology that these two entities can never be completely separated one from another. Theological reflection, therefore, has a real importance, [110] representing either a help to or a danger for faith itself. For this reason, since Christians, in spite of their unity of faith, are pluralistic in theology, they must discuss their theologies at least in order to assure themselves sufficiently that in spite of the differences between their theologies the unity of their creed is maintained, a fact which today is far more difficult to establish than was formerly thought to be the case.

The Christians in the Church have connections with one another which are not merely theoretical. They must themselves act as Christians. They must take an active part in the single process by which the one Church achieves the fullness of her nature in the most varied dimensions and in the interior and exterior relationships in which the Church is involved. Now in view of the pluralism of ideas already present in the minds of the participators, a preliminary dialogue is required in order for there to be any action in common at all. In this dialogue we must do our utmost to unite ourselves for this common action. Dialogue is necessary in the Church because of the situation of a pluralism of ideas within the Church.

In order to achieve a still clearer view of this necessity it must be pointed out that neither the teaching authorities nor the pastoral authorities of the Church can, by their own act, supply any substitute for this dialogue.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In earlier times, which were more intellectually homogeneous, it might have appeared so. But in itself it was not so even then. For side by side with the authorities, their decisions as affecting doctrine and behaviour in the Church, there was always the inalienable initiative of the individuals, who are never merely carriers out of commands from above. There were always free charismata in the Church, which took effect, and necessarily had to take effect without any prior authorisation on the part of the authorities in the Church. And, though for different reasons, both factors are present and have to be present in increasing measure in the Church of today. But in those earlier times it could at least appear that in spite of the dialogue in council which of course always preceded official decisions in some form, the enactments of the teaching and pastoral authorities could be arrived at, and at least to a large extent actually were arrived at, without any preliminary dialogue. This is understandable. The situation in terms of ideas within which such decisions had to be arrived at was a relatively homogeneous one. Even such contradictions as there were were presented in a form that (at least to all appearances) was comprehensible as a clear 'yes' or 'no'. The actual content of the decision was presented in a form that was intelligible and easily applicable to the straightforward everyday experience of prudent mature men.

[111] Today all that has changed. The subject on which the authorities have to take their decision no longer confronts them in the form of a simple 'yes' or 'no' so that one of the two is accepted as the authentic and authoritative teaching, and the other is anathematised. A whole range of possible prototypes on which to act presents itself, so that it is hardly possible any longer to gain a comprehensive view of them all or to relate them to one another in a comprehensible way. Neither that which constitutes a normal course of study in our formative years, nor our individual experience of life are any longer adequate to keep us sufficiently 'well informed'. Today in practice and in the concrete the authorities themselves presuppose a preliminary dialogue as necessary for their decisions, the sort of dialogue that informs them, gives them an initial understanding of the various systems of theology involved, systematically assembles and digests the relevant experiences and facts, and shows clearly for what they are in themselves those tendencies in the Church which are perfectly legitimate. All that which can be summed up under the term 'dialogue' is today included among those suitable human means[8] the application of which the Church has regarded as necessary for the decisions even of her teaching authority, in spite of the assistance she receives from the Holy Spirit. And these means are, of course, a fortiori indispensable for a realistic exercise of the pastoral authority of the Church.

Dialogue cannot be a substitute for the decisions of the teaching and pastoral authorities in the Church. The reason why it cannot be such a substitute is not merely that the officially constituted authority is necessary and still has a function of its own, but also that a dialogue in the strict sense, at the theoretical level, cannot of itself and in the last analysis overcome the cleavage that exists between the universal and the concrete, between ideas and existence, between possibility and actuality. But conversely, in the situation in which we stand today, whatever may formerly have been the case, the authorities themselves in their decisions presuppose that dialogue is a realistic means of arriving at a right decision in the sphere of their official authority. And the exercise of this authority by itself cannot be any substitute for the dialogue.

This is not to assert that the dialogue within the Church serves only as a preparation for the decisions of the authorities in the Church. There is no lack of topics which can be the subject of a dialogue within the Church, yet which are far from falling within the immediate [8] cf. Lumen gentium, the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Church, No. 25.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

competence of the [112] teaching and pastoral authority.[9] What forms should Christian literature assume today? How should we judge the contemporary political parties in the concrete by Christian criteria? What type of school is to be preferred? Does the secondary school (Gymnasium) with a special emphasis on the humanities still have to be our ideal today? What should we think about the most recent tendencies in art? How should we judge of the Weimar Republic? etc. These and a thousand similar questions certainly do not fall directly within the competence of the official authorities of the Church, yet they are still most certainly not on this account questions which belong merely to the general sphere of cultural and intellectual life which Christians and non-Christians have in common. Rather they are questions which have to be thought out in a dialogue among Christians as such as well.

We must say this even if we hold the opinion that in such questions the Christian ought first and foremost freely to participate in the general secular dialogue in which all share. But the Christians should speak about such matters among themselves also, because they have to help one another to arrive at a better understanding of all these realities in the light of the criteria supplied by the gospel. Also because not infrequently through such a dialogue they can arrive at a common understanding and a common course of action, which can then also become the course of action of the Church considered as the people of God, even when it is not the act of the Church's official authorities. In such questions it will often turn out that we hold different opinions and that in spite of the dialogue we continue to hold them. The following pronouncement of the Council is relevant here:[10] 'Often enough the Christian view of things will itself suggest some specific solution in certain circumstances. Yet it happens rather frequently, and legitimately so, that with equal sincerity some of the faithful will disagree with others on a given matter. Even against the intentions of their proponents, however, solutions proposed on one side or another may easily be confused by many people with the gospel message. Hence it is necessary for people to remember that no one is allowed in the aforementioned situations to appropriate the Church's authority for his opinion. They should always try to enlighten one another through honest discussion, preserving mutual charity and caring above all for the common good.'

[113] Even this kind of dialogue in the Church, which seems to continue endlessly without result, has a fruitfulness of its own. Given good will on all sides, it educates us in intellectual modesty and prudence. It informs us, enriches our minds, and gives added precision to our ideas even though, for the most part, we continue to differ in our opinions and attitudes. Often it can be the case that a dialogue of this kind is the means by which we establish which group in the Church is to make its views and attitudes prevail in spite of opposition from others, and to cause the Church to conform her concrete decisions and actions to them, thereby rendering powerless and ineffective the contrary opinion. This too is now one of those factors in life which has to be accepted in patience.

When we come to the question of who is to carry on this dialogue within the Church we can think of the most varied groups or individuals, and in every conceivable kind of combination: individuals simply among themselves, formal and informal bodies within the Church, official functionaries, laymen, specialist theologians, the authorised spokesmen of organisations, those who come forward to speak of their own initiative and freely, but who may possibly have a 'charismatic' message to contribute, yes and even such non-Catholics or non-Christians as may be drawn into the dialogue within the Church because they have some 'specialist' contribution to make to this dialogue which is important, and indeed which may [9] For a fuller treatment of the problems involved here cf. K. Rahner, 'Grenzen der Amtskirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI, (Einsiedeln 1965) pp. 499-520.

[10] Pastoral Constitution Gaudium et spes of the Second Vatican Council, No. 43.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perhaps be indispensable as supplying information or something else that is necessary for the dialogue to take place.

III

Today a certain organisation of the dialogue has become inevitable. This does not mean that it has to be deprived of the elements of freedom, spontaneity and improvisation which are essential to it if it is not to degenerate into the sort of bureaucratic discussion and advice which takes place before official decisions are arrived at. On the contrary the institution itself is intended precisely to create the prior conditions in which the individual can freely come forward to make his contribution, in which the necessity for dialogue is neither overlooked nor forgotten in particular concrete cases, and in which the dialogue is never deliberately omitted on the grounds that it is uncomfortable.

Institutions of this kind, which make dialogue possible in the concrete, are already in existence to some extent. But they need to be tested for their effectiveness, and where necessary improved, in order that the dialogue really is made possible. The point of supreme importance for these [114] institutions which are already in existence is that their leaders really shall open themselves to dialogue, neither stifling it nor manipulating it, that they shall respectfully and patiently allow other opinions to be expressed, that they shall themselves seek out partners to the dialogue who are genuine and bold and who have something to say, and that they shall not produce pro forma 'representatives' as a substitute for these. They must also bring into their deliberations laymen in the true sense, who have some special competence in professional matters, and encourage these to speak freely. They must choose these rather than those laymen who turn their status as laymen into an ecclesiastical hobbyhorse, or act as though they had official authority in the Church. In all these ways they must avoid any excess of ecclesiastical authoritarianism, and thereby create the outward conditions for a dialogue in which the participators really can speak openly.

All these institutions which are already in existence must be tested again and again to see whether they are effective in this sense in creating the conditions for dialogue, beginning from the conference of bishops and the diocesan synods, the diocesan officials and cathedral chapters, the boards of management, the social organisations, the Central Committee of German Catholics, and going on to the deanery conferences, councils of laymen, parish councils, advisory committees for radio, Catholic schools and so on. Institutions and the letter of the law can never be any substitute for the Spirit.[11] But if the Spirit is not to be dissipated, then it must be present in the institutions as well, and there must be a demand for it in these.[12] The Spirit, namely, of the love of God and Jesus Christ, the Spirit of fraternal charity, of mutual respect, of patience, of listening to one another, the Spirit which renounces all overbearingness, whether clerical or lay, the Spirit of self-criticism and modesty, the Spirit which makes us bold enough to preserve continuity with our historical heritage, and at the [11] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Do not Stifle the Spirit', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore, 1971), pp. 72 ff.

[12] On the point that the Spirit of itself demands the institution cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 305 ff. Charismata can also be at work in the holders of office in the Church, cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur theologischen Problematik einer "Pastoralkonstitution"', Volk Gottes. Festschrift für Josef Höfer, R. Baumer and H. Dolch edd., (Freiburg 1967) pp. 683-703, now published in the present volume, pp. 293 ff. cf. also K. Rahner, Vom Sinn des kirchlichen Amtes (Freiburg 1966), pp. 33 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

same time daring enough to make new experiments even when these have not yet proved themselves.[13]

[115] But in addition to those institutions which are already in existence it may be presumed that some others too will be needed in order that the dialogue within the Church may be made a concrete reality. Perhaps I may be permitted to focus the discussion on two in particular.

Specialist theologians are, of course, constantly engaged in dialogue with one another, with varying degrees of enthusiasm and varying degrees of success through their books, articles, discussions at conferences and in private conversation. But I believe that what is missing and yet is urgently needed is a genuine panel of specialist theologians properly organised and appointed to supply information and theological advice to the German bishops so as to enable them to exercise their episcopal office of teaching in a way that is realistic and in keeping with the times. Something, therefore is urgently necessary. Today less than ever is the episcopate in any position to hand over its official responsibilities in matters of doctrine to Rome and its Congregations. The bishops must themselves fulfil these responsibilities, a fact which, indeed, becomes clear in the Letter of Cardinal Ottaviani to the World Episcopate.[14] This task of teaching which belongs to the bishops must today assume a form which is, in certain respects, quite new. It can no longer consist merely in the approving of catechisms, pastoral letters, measures of a political kind in the sphere of teaching, as for instance the approving or rejecting of those recommended for professorships and the censoring of books. At the same time, however, the bishops are no longer in a position today to rely for the maintenance of this teaching function of theirs merely upon a theological formation which individuals among them may have received in the past, on taking counsel among themselves or on a chance and subjective selection of theological advisers. The situation in theology is far too difficult, too complex and too obscure today to rely merely upon these aids.[15] For the official pronouncements and enactments which the bishops necessarily have to take – and they will inevitably be faced with the necessity for these – a more fundamental theological preparation is needed today. The very fact that they need to be informed about the [116] various theological movements, schools of thought and different approaches to the problems involved etc. is in itself enough to make this necessary. Now for this a panel of specialist theologians is necessary which is assembled on an objective and representative basis, and is both able and willing to achieve a genuine and open dialogue. This is still necessary however true it may be that such a panel neither can nor should ever take the place of the bishops in the political decisions they have to take (if we may so express it) in the realm of doctrine as an exercise of their official function of teaching. Yet a panel of this sort, suitably composed to carry on a dialogue at the level of specialist theology, simply does not exist. Of course the bishops do seek information and advice, and even under certain circumstances and for specific questions convoke minor commissions of theologians. The Conference of German Bishops already includes an episcopal commission for the teaching of the faith. But how far a sufficient number and the right choice of periti have already been incorporated into this to advise and assist in preparing its decisions is more than I can say. But even supposing some such body does already exist I may still be permitted to doubt whether this commission of theologians is already constituted in such a way in terms of numbers, a right representation of all relevant theological disciplines, learned authorities etc., that it can fully and effectively

[13] With regard to the attitude of boldness towards novelty cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 274-276, Im Heute glauben (Einsiedeln 3rd ed. I965), pp. 24 ff., 32 ff., and also the study mentioned in n. 11 above.

[14] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirchliches Lehramt und Theologie nach dem Konzil', Stimmen der Zeit 178 (1966), pp. 404-420, esp. 411 f., cf. Vol. IX of this series, pp. 83-100.

[15] On the theological situation immediately confronting us today cf. ibid.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

meet the demands which have to be made upon it. A further point is that such a panel should in no sense constitute a 'secret cabinet council'. On the contrary its composition must be known, and the names of the theologians included on it must be such as to ensure public confidence in its enactments, even though all that is envisaged here is an advisory body set up to undertake a 'study' of the questions concerned.

Certainly many panels and institutions do exist in Germany in which a dialogue about cultural and political questions is possible: the societies concerned with these questions, the Catholic schools, the central committee of German Catholics, the 'Catholic days', the relevant journals etc. Nevertheless I may be permitted to doubt whether these possibilities are sufficient for the preliminary theological work which is required for the support of the German bishops and for assisting them in their resolutions. On the one hand all these boards and panels have in fact no institutional connection with the commissions of the Conference of German Bishops for such questions, while on the other I doubt whether these episcopal commissions in themselves have available to them the group of specialists (i.e. in terms of number, competence, proportional representation etc.) working together in dialogue which they need. Perhaps I am merely ill-informed, but I ask myself whether, for instance, the problem of the [117] Church schools or the urgent question of the need for a change in the mixed marriage laws in Germany have been reviewed or debated in the work of any such board, which is equipped to do the preparatory work for the decisions to be taken in the Conference of Bishops, or whether even today the bishops are still paternalistic in their way of working, choosing their advisers in a rather chance and arbitrary manner. Today, in view of the difficulty and complexity of the questions and the necessity for upholding the rightness of the decisions taken in a manner that is convincing in public as well, this procedure is simply inadmissible. We must also bear in mind that the de facto existence of opinions on certain specific questions has an importance of its own, greater or less according to the weight carried by the upholders of such opinions and the degree of force with which they hold them. And these opinions themselves can, and perhaps should, represent a stage in the process by which the bishops form their opinions and arrive at their decisions, at least in those questions which cannot be decided upon unambiguously or exclusively in terms of dogma.

IV

We must now attempt to say something more upon the nature and the limits of the dialogue within the Church concerning theological questions in the stricter sense, that is to say problems of biblical, dogmatic and moral theology. This dialogue is necessary today. The reason for this necessity is to be found, as has been stated above, in the very nature of the case. Even in the sphere of theology in the true sense the situation of intellectual pluralism prevails. The multiplicity of the sources and methods of theology make it impossible any longer for any one individual to master them all. Theology must necessarily engage in a dialogue with the rest of the intellectual forces of the time. But these themselves are in turn so complex that the dialogue creates a difficult situation within the realm of theology. In practice there is no longer any uniform theological terminology, nor is it any longer so easy to devise any such if theology is to be placed at the service of preaching the one gospel to this world of today, so heterogeneous and pluralistic as it is in terms of ideas. There is no longer any one theologian who has a comprehensive mastery of the methodologies, sources, problems and conclusions of any single department of theology. On any given subject each one must constantly be increasing his knowledge, and this means that the 'subject' on which he should, as far as possible, know everything that there is to be known, becomes more [118] and more circumscribed. Teamwork and dialogue are necessary in theology too.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now theology does not exist as an end in itself, but is designed rather to serve the Church, her preaching and then her teaching office as well. Moreover theology derives its norms from this. It follows that the dialogue among theologians must be desired and demanded by the Church, and the theologians themselves must be constantly aware that their ultimate task is to serve the Church. This dialogue must not be regarded as a substitute for the task of the Church as the official teacher, and must not be intended to supplant the authority of the Church in her official function.[16] This dialogue must not transform the Church into a debating society. A theological dialogue within the Church achieves its true nature only if certain specific prior conditions are fulfilled: the participators must all submit themselves to the authority of holy scripture; they must really pay heed to its message even when they themselves are interpreting and translating this message. Officially defined doctrine must remain unambiguously the guiding principle and not be argued away as a mere 'interpretament' devoid of binding force. This remains true even in those cases in which the dogma (in a broader sense) needs to be explained and interpreted, where it is not simply too absolute to admit of revision, but still has to be sincerely accepted as an authentic pronouncement of the official teaching in accordance with the degree of binding force involved in each particular case, for there is a certain variation in this binding force. The personal and subjective work of theologians, which is necessary, inevitable and even justified in itself must constantly proceed from the Church's teaching and be directed to this, and must constantly and sincerely be thought out afresh in the light of it even when this may be disturbing or painful. It must be contained within the greater awareness of faith of the Church herself as this exists in the present, and also as it finds authoritative expression and concrete force in the officially promulgated teaching of the Church. Everything else may be profound, stimulating and important for the history of human thought, but it would still have no place in a theological dialogue within the Church.

Since it cannot be considered as contrary to the nature of a dialogue within the Church if, on some particular question, it is not endlessly prolonged, but in a certain sense brought to an end by a pronouncement of the Church's teaching authority, this may open the way to, or even make necessary, a further dialogue. But the new dialogue is only a theological [119] dialogue within the Church if it unequivocally and obediently takes as its starting-point and binding norm the new pronouncement of the teaching authority according to the degree of binding force intended by that teaching authority in each particular case.

It may be that bishops do not, from the point of view of specialist and scientific theologians, understand much of a theological question. It is right that in such a case they are morally bound to seek the information they need directly or indirectly from the scientific knowledge of the specialists when they wish to, or have to, arrive at a decision on the question concerned. But viewed from a strictly theological point of view this does not in the least alter the fact that as bishops they, and not the theologians, are the true 'judges' in questions of faith and morals when a pronouncement needs to be made for the sake of the unity of the creed in the Church and the purity of her faith. Even humanly speaking it is well that this is the case. Experts and specialists must give advice, but leave the decision to others who are in a position to achieve a comprehensive and unrestricted view of the realities involved as a whole.

In itself all this is a truism of Catholic faith and practice. But it seems that the time has come to emphasise that this truth which seems to be a truism is not, after all, so clearly self-evident. Even among us in Germany it is no longer sufficiently respected in oral and written [16] For an attempt at a thoroughgoing theological explanation in this connection cf. K. Rahner, Vom Sinn des kirchlichen Amtes (Freiburg 1966).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dialogue, nor is the episcopal imprimatur any longer a sure guarantee today that this truism will really be observed.[17]

That is one side of the picture. But on the other side it has to be said that the authority of the official teachers cannot be any substitute for a theological dialogue. For today this is to be numbered among those means which are necessary, and, for the teaching authority of the Church, even morally prescribed, through which this teaching authority has to ensure that its own decisions are properly prepared and brought to maturity. This still does not imply in any sense a pre-judging of the precise question of what form this necessary theological dialogue is to take in the concrete, or how it may have to be consciously and deliberately organised or even institutionalised. To establish this in more precise terms is certainly in part a matter for the teaching authority itself. The task of establishing and judging how this duty which it has is to be fulfilled is, in the last analysis, still a matter for the teaching authority of the Church. This again does not prevent us from holding the opinion, which is based on historical fact, that right down to the most recent times the teaching authority of the Church has not always, or in all the ways [120] that could be desired or that are necessary, created the conditions which make theological dialogue possible and meet the demand for it prior to the taking of official decisions.

In cases where it is ultimate decisions of faith which are in question and which have to be defined, even though in such a case the Spirit preserves the teaching authority from any actual error of faith, this still does not mean that any evasions of responsibility at the human level are made legitimate as such. But when such decisions on doctrine are taken, which, though authoritative are still capable of being revised, evasions of responsibility of this kind can have the effect of rendering the decision itself deficient, inadequate, or in need of reform. From this such evasions can lead further to difficult situations and to a state in which any genuine willingness to obey the authority of the Church in matters of doctrine de facto disappears.[18] I believe that many of Pius XII's doctrinal pronouncements would have turned out differently in form and even in content if they had been preceded by an adequate, open and free theological dialogue on the questions involved. Nor in fact can there be any doubt that Paul VI has recognised more fully the importance of promoting theological dialogue as a preparation for official decisions on doctrine (or else for the decision not to take any decision, which can also be an important act of the teaching authority of the Church) than was the case in the preceding decades, and this remains true even though, on a superficial view, he has made his own position more difficult by doing this.[19]

We can only hope that the bishops will follow his example in this precisely because they have authority to teach as well. They too have to recognise this, and it is less permissible today even than it was a few years ago, to abrogate their responsibilities in this in favour of the papal authority alone. But when such decisions on doctrine are taken, which though authoritative are still capable of being revised, there is a further question to be asked. How is unity to be established in the particular concrete instance between the two factors in the process by which truth is [121] arrived at or deepened? These factors are: the dialogue of the theologians on the one hand and the authority of the official teachers on the other. And again

[17] On this cf. K. Rahner, Stimmen der Zeit 178 (1966), pp. 414 f., cf. here pp. 124 f.

[18] A theology of today that is credible and is conscious of its responsibilities will have to be increasingly aware of the fact that it is part of a developing history, though in this it will not lose its character as binding in any essential. On this cf. the bibliography on p. 105/n.2.

[19] The most important example is the commission for the study of the increase in population, the family and the regulation of births. It is also well-known that in deciding his general line of approach in other theological questions the pope avails himself of the advice of various consultative bodies (cf. the symposium (admittedly not of official status) working in an advisory capacity at Nemi near Rome in July 1966 on the subject of original sin and evolution).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we may ask how long the debate should be prolonged and when and how it should be, in some sense, brought to a close by an official doctrinal pronouncement; when the doctrinal authorities should have the courage to keep silence and when they should be bold enough to come to a decision. All these are questions the concrete answers to which cannot be deduced from the general principles governing the relationship between the two entities involved. In these questions those concerned have constantly to return afresh for the taking of their decisions to the concrete instance. And the decision itself can never be arrived at at the theoretical level but only in practice. But from every side an attitude is demanded of courage, humility and the will to act in love according to the truth.

The dialogue or debate, therefore, when viewed in the context of the whole process by which the Church realises her faith to the full, has, of its nature, on the one hand an indispensable contribution of its own to make, but on the other its limits too. For it always remains subsumed under this more general process. And the knowledge of both these factors at once makes it a duty for the Church to engage in dialogue, and gives her the courage to do so with patience, attentiveness and a readiness to give a serious hearing to outside opinions. At the same time it serves to guard the dialogue from degenerating into mere empty talk in which only the opinionated who have no respect for the views of others receive a hearing. The dialogue must constantly be conducted in the awareness that it is taking place in the holy Church which is made up of sinners; that it is intended to conduce to salvation; that those participating in it will have to answer for the part they play in it before the judgment of God.[20] Once this is recognised it should be entered upon in the Church with all boldness. For it is much needed today.

[20] If a dialogue is to be really serious and sincere, then a vivid awareness has to be maintained throughout it of the constant danger of degenerating into ambiguity and mere talk. In a changed situation in the history of human thought the biblical exhortation once more becomes urgently relevant, that man will have to give a reckoning for every idle word.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[123]

PART TWO

Sacraments

[125]

7

PENANCE AS AN ADDITIONAL ACT OF RECONCILIATION WITH THE CHURCH

The Second Vatican Council has laid down in two passages that in the sacrament of penance an additional reconciliation of the sinner takes place with the Church herself.[1] The Church, therefore, is not only the bearer of the effective word in which God pronounces his forgiveness and grace upon the repentant sinner. Also, and by the same act, she confers upon the individual that pax with her own self which was damaged or broken by his sins.

I

This declaration of the Council is an astonishing enactment. Almost fifty years ago the Spanish Carmelite B. F. Xiberta[2] initiated afresh the debate concerning the doctrine of the reconciliation of sinners with the Church[3] (and not only with God through the Church) in the sacrament of penance. Probably this was the first time the matter had been discussed since the Council of Trent. But when Xiberta sought to justify this doctrine he met only with rejection. J. Stufler,[4] the well-known expert on the history of the sacrament of penance, likewise rejected this theory after Xiberta's book had appeared. A. d'Alès[5] did the same. As late as 1957 it was summarily and unequivocally rejected by P. Galtier,[6] who certainly enjoys a great reputation as a historian and for his systematic expositions of the sacrament of penance. In E. Doronzo's[7] comprehensive theology of the sacrament [126] of penance, published in monograph form, Xiberta's theory is still accorded a relatively brief treatment (in comparison with the scope of the work as a whole), and . . . rejected. The great monograph on the history of the sacrament of penance by J. Grotz,[8] which has been published very recently, proceeds from the a priori view that originally reconciliation with the Church would not have constituted any essential element in the sacrament of penance itself, but would first have become established in the course of the second century, and then only in specific cases as something that was conferred prior to the sacramental act proper. He attempts to confirm this theory a posteriori by an immense display of historical learning. Even if we hold the opinion

[1] cf. Lumen gentium, No. 11; Presbyterorum ordinis, No. 5.
[2] B. F. Xiberta, Clavis Ecclesiae: De Ordine Absolutionis Sacramentalis ad Reconciliationem cum Ecclesia (Rome 1922).
[3] Here the reconciliation of the sinner with the Church is taken to be the res et sacramentum, while the forgiveness of sins in the sight of God is the res sacramenti corresponding to this.
[4] J. Stufler, Z.K.T. 47 (1923), pp. 453 ff.
[5] A. d'Alès, R.S.R. 12 (1922), pp. 372 f.
[6] P. Galtier, De Paenitentia (Rome, 3rd ed. 1957), p. 341.
[7] E. Doronzo, De Paenitentia II (Milwaukee 1951), pp. 131-153.
[8] J. Grotz, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in der vornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg I955).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that in this large-scale and learned work the historical evidence adduced has failed to establish the author's thesis,[9] still the very existence of such a work from 1955 onwards shows precisely how strongly the idea of sacramental penance as a reconciliation with the Church had become foreign to the thought of theologians. The majority of treatises on this sacrament, extending right down to the most recent times, pass over this thesis of Xiberta's in silence, so that I myself was surely justified in speaking of a 'forgotten truth'.[10] In any case it has played no part in the average theology of the schools.[11] Even in the most [127] recent work on the question, that of McAuliffe,[12] while its author does not absolutely reject Xiberta's thesis, he still cannot bring himself to agree with it.

Thus it is, after all, an astonishing fact that the Council, with a marked lack of reserve, gives expression to this doctrine as a manifest truth. The fact that the Council felt no difficulty in doing this will appear in the course of this study, the purpose of which is to show that what the Council is asserting here belongs to the most ancient stock of tradition, in which evidence for the doctrine can be traced from scripture right through the theology of the Fathers and the Middle Ages as something essential and manifest.

Of course it is not the case that Xiberta met only with contradiction or an icy silence. We may take the case of B. Poschmann. While this author did not fully develop the thesis as a subject in its own right,[13] it still remains true that his historical studies on the history of penance in the early Church are influenced by the conviction that the practice of penance in the early Church and the institution of penance in patristic times are, in the last analysis, an insoluble mystery unless we constantly keep before our eyes a clear recognition of the fact that in the early Church the conferring of the pax cum Ecclesia was an essential element in the penitential practice of that Church considered precisely as a sacrament, and not merely as an associated practice prescribed by Church law. In addition to him individual theologians have claimed a hearing again and again who (either explicitly or implicitly) agree with Xiberta. Not only in the study mentioned above, but in my duplicated treatise (still unpublished) of almost 500 pages on the sacrament of penance I myself have already presented the doctrine of the additional reconciliation of the sinner with the Church as a key to the understanding of the entire history of penance in the early Church. Of the theologians [9] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Die Busslehre im Hirten des Hermas', Z.K.T. 77 (1955), pp. 385-431; S. Hübner, 'Kirchenbusse und Exkommunikation bei Cyprian', Z.K.T. 84 (1962), 49-84; 171-215 (with bibliography).

---

[10] K. Rahner, 'Forgotten Truths Concerning the Sacrament of Penance' Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 135-174; cf. also idem, L.T.K. II, 2nd ed., col. 836; idem, Kirche und Sakramente (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1963), pp. 83 ff. The author may be permitted to refer to his earlier studies in the history of the sacrament of penance (cf. above, n. 9, pp. 138 f., 141). They have been collected in an Italian translation, La penitenza della Chiesa = Biblioteca di cultura religiosa, Seconda Serie no. 60 (Rome 1964, 2nd ed. 1968), 872 pp. A German edition of these historical researches is planned as Schriften zur Theologie IX. At the same time reference may be made to the author's comprehensive treatment of the subject De paenitentia: Tractatus historico-dogmaticus (Innsbruck, 4th ed. 1960, duplicated), XXIII-785 ff., which has still to be revised and published. For the evidence in concrete detail, therefore, the author must refer to his detailed investigations and the bibliography he draws upon there. On the matter itself cf. also the important investigations of G. d'Ercole, Consortium Disciplinae. Le sanzioni nell' ordinamento canonico preconstantiano I (Rome 1955); idem, Penitenza canonico-sacramentale dalle orogini alla pace constantiniana (Rome 1963).

[11] A typical example is to be found on p. 462 of S. Gonzalez's Sacrae Theologiae Summa IV (Madrid 3rd ed., 1956), no. 93, n. 4. Here Xiberta's thesis is rejected as 'contra communem theologorum sententiam'.

[12] C. McAuliffe, 'Penance and Reconciliation with the Church', Theological Studies 26 (1965), pp. 1-39. We are indebted to this painstaking study for references to the more recent writings on the question with which we are here concerned. But McAuliffe's study has not yet taken the pronouncements of Vatican II into account.

[13] cf. B. Poschmann, Paenitentia Secunda (Bonn, 1940), e.g. p. 11; 'Busse und Letzte Ölung' = Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte IV, 3 (Freiburg 1951); Apart from his other important and well-known works on the history of the sacrament of penance the following study by B. Poschmann is particularly important: 'Die innere Struktur des Busssakramentes', M.T.Z. 1 (1950), pp. 12-30. Poschmann shows a certain lack of terminological precision in his exposition of the teaching of the pre-Nicene Fathers. On this cf. K. Rahner, Z.T.K. 64 (1940), p. 162.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

who agreed with Xiberta prior to the Council [128] the following may be mentioned: de la Taille,[14] Cabrol,[15] de Lubac,[16] Mersch,[17] Schmaus,[18] Leeming,[19] Riga,[20] Dumont,[21] Schillebeeckx,[22] Courtney,[23] Palmer,[24] Anciaux,[25] Oggioni,[26] Marie-Benoit,[27] McAuley,[28] Cantwell,[29] Ratzinger,[30] Congar,[31] Vorgrimler,[32] Semmelroth,[33] Beumer,[34] Piolanti,[35] Alszeghy,[36] Leclercq,[37] Rondet.[37a]

[129]

II

Now certainly it was natural for the Council to give expression to this truth, so ancient and yet so new, of the reconciliation of sinners to the Church in the sacrament of penance, because it was so extremely relevant in the actual context in which this was asserted. In chapter 2 of the Dogmatic Constitution Lumen gentium the intention was to speak of the 'priestly' functions of the people of God. These priestly functions are made actual in the sacraments and through the virtuous life which Christians lead. Whereas in earlier versions of the text not all the sacraments were treated of in this connection, the authors arrived, at a very early stage in their work of drawing up the text, at a decision to mention all the sacraments at [14] M. de la Taille, Mysterium fidei (3rd ed. Paris, 1931), p. 581; cf. idem, 'Conspectus bibliographicus', Gregorianum 4 (1923), pp. 591-599; further evidence in C. Dumont, N.R.T. 81 (1959), pp. 578-579.

[15] F. Cabrol, Six Sacraments (London 1930), p.160.
[16] H. de Lubac, Catholicisme (4th ed., Paris 1947), pp. 61 f.
[17] E. Mersch, La théologie du corps mystique (2nd ed., Paris 1946), p. 304.
[18] M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV/1 (Munich, 5th ed. 1957), pp. 591 f.; idem, 'Reich Gottes und Busssakrament', Münchener Theol. Zeitschrift 1 (1950), pp. 20-36.
[19] B. Leeming, Principles of Sacramental Theology (New York, 1956), pp. 361-366.
[20] P. Riga, Sin and Penance (Milwaukee 1962), pp. 111-113.
[21] C. Dumont, 'La réconciliation avec l'église et la nécessité de l'aveu sacramental', N.R.T. 81 (1959), pp. 577-597, esp. 578 ff., 583 ff.
[22] E. Schillebeeckx, De Christusontmoeting als sacrament van de Godsontmoeting (Anvers, Bilthoven 1957), p. 152; German ed., Christus, Sakrament der Gottbegegnung (Mainz 1960), p. 179.
[23] F. Courtney, 'The Sacrament of Penance', Clergy Review 40 (1955), p. 519.
[24] P. Palmer, 'The Theology of the Res et Sacramentum with Particular Emphasis on its Application to Penance', Proceedings of the Fourteenth Annual Convention of the Catholic Theological Society of America (Jonkers, N.Y. 1959), pp. 131-141; idem, Sacraments of Healing and of Vocation (Englewood Cliffs, N.Y., 1963), pp. 34-36.
[25] P. Anciaux, 'La dimension ecclésiale de la pénitence chrétienne', Collectanea Mechliniensia 46 (1961), p. 477; idem, Le sacrament de la pénitence (Louvain 1960), German edition, Das Sakrament der Busse (Mainz 1961), pp. 154-158, cf. also, pp. 44 f., 52 f., 72 f., 74, 76, 79, 111 f., 124, 136, 164 f., 168 f., 173 f., 179, 187 f.
[26] G. Oggioni, Storia e teologia della penitenza: Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica II (Mailand 1957), p. 920.
[27] P. Marie-Benoit, 'Note sur le jugement exercé au sacrement de pénitence', Études Franciscaines 12 (1962), p. 145.
[28] G. McAuley, 'The Ecclesiastical Nature of the Sacrament of Penance', Worship 36 (1962), pp. 212-213.
[29] L. Cantwell, 'Pax Ecclesiae', Clergy Review 48 (1963), p. 617.
[30] J. Ratzinger, 'The Pastoral Implications of Episcopal Collegiality', Concilium I/1 (1965), pp. 20-34.
[31] Y. Congar, 'Über die Mutterschaft der Kirche', T.Q. 145 (1965), pp. 68-100, esp. 93-94.
[32] H. Vorgrimler, 'Der ekklesiastische (deprekative) Aspekt des Bussverfahrens', Anima 14 (1959), pp. 307-314. idem, 'Busssakrament', Handbuch theologische Grundbegriffe I (Munich 1962), pp. 204-217.
[33] O. Semmelroth, Die Kirche als Ursakrament (Frankfurt 1953), pp. 64 ff.
[34] J. Beumer, 'Die persönliche Sünde in sozialtheologischer Sicht', Theologie und Glaube 43 (1953), pp. 81-100.
[35] A. Piolanti, 'Socialità del sacramento della penitenza', Studi Cattolici 2 (1958), pp. 27-33.
[36] Z. Alszeghy, 'Carità ecclesiale nella penitenza christiana', Gregorianum 44 (1963), pp. 5-31.
[37] J. Leclercq, La liturgie et les paradoxes chrétiens (Paris 1963), pp. 87-104.
[37a] H. Rondet, 'Bemerkungen zu einer Theologie der Sünde', G.u.L. 28 (1955), 28-44; 106-116; 194-208.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this point.[38] In this connection,[39] therefore, not only the effect of all these sacraments as sanctifying man as an individual had to be brought out, but also the ecclesiastical aspect which they possess, the part they play in building the body of Christ. Now when it was sought to apply this to the sacrament of penance it was quite impossible to do this in any other way than that which was actually adopted, namely by saying: 'Reconciliantur cum Ecclesia quam peccando vulneraverant'.[40]

At the same time it still remains astonishing that they were bold enough to express this doctrine so uncompromisingly, even though, to all appearances, they were unable to invoke any consensus unanimis in contemporary theology. It was even more astonishing that the statement was not the occasion of any debate in the aula of the Council, and that, as far as my own personal recollection goes, even in the theological commission it never became a point for discussion. Instead it was accepted even here without any opposition. Admittedly this fact, which is far from being [130] simple or obvious, is in part to be explained once more by a special circumstance: the authors of the text deliberately avoided from the outset[41] any attempt at complicating this statement of reconciliation with the Church by the further question of the precise relationship between the 'venia offensionis Deo illatae' on God's part, and the 'reconciliatio cum Ecclesia'. The two effects are simply set side by side with the connecting word simul.

Thus the Council leaves open the questions of how the forgiveness of guilt in God's eyes (or, to express it more precisely, the forgiveness of guilt and the conferring of grace) on the one hand, and the additional reconciliation with the Church on the other are related one to another, whether these two factors are intrinsically connected by their very nature, which of the two effects (supposing this to be the case) can be thought of as the cause of the other (additional reconciliation with the Church because guilt has been forgiven, or conversely the forgiveness of guilt because reconciliation with the Church has been achieved), whether, therefore, reconciliation with the Church should be thought of as the res et sacramentum of the forgiveness of guilt (considered as the res sacramenti).This last-named theory is probably held by almost all modern theologians who explicitly teach that reconciliation with the Church is an effect of the sacrament of penance. Now while the Council does not enter into this theory, neither does it in any sense exclude it in enumerating these effects. Yet even allowing for its reserve on this point, the text of the Council is noteworthy in the highest degree: it teaches that all sins have an ecclesiological aspect, all 'wound' the Church. It teaches that in every exercise of the sacrament of penance a reconciliation with the Church takes place as well.[42] We may also be struck by the fact that in this statement no references are offered to any theological sources. In the passage it is left to the theologians themselves to think out precisely what distinctions are to be drawn in this ecclesiological aspect of sin according to whether it is grave or venial sin that is in question, how the damage done to the relationship between the sinner and the Church is to be defined in detail according to each particular case. They have also to think out, when it still remains an obvious fact that not every grave sin signifies a total cutting off of the sinner from the Church, how this [131] precise reconciliation is to be distinguished from the removal of an excommunication (and [38] This decision was first adopted in the schema of 3.7.1964.

[39] cf. No. 11 of the Constitution Lumen gentium.
[40] The text in the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests (No. 5) is simply an echo of this passage in Lumen gentium.
[41] cf. the Relatio to the Schema of 3.7.1964 (p. 45).
[42] The terms in which this is expressed are so general and so completely devoid of any restriction that it would simply be contradicting their objective meaning if we sought to interpret the text as applying, for instance, only to the (first) confession of grave sins.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the widely differing degrees of this) in the sense of contemporary canon law, and how the statement of the Council retains its truth even in the case of a mere 'repetitional confession'.

But all these further questions must not be answered by the theologians in such a way that their answer either contradicts or obscures the basic statement of the Council. The task of answering them is, incidentally, not so difficult as perhaps it might appear at first sight (and as, for instance, B. McAuliffe appears to imagine), for in such instances of the use of the sacrament we can meet with formally speaking the same difficulties as here, even when we confine our attention to the forgiveness of sins as such. Mortal and venial sins (the latter considered as praeter legem),[43] are, it is true, guilty in the sight of God. But even allowing for this the concept of 'sin' can only be applied analogously to the two types, and yet sacramental forgiveness is available for both. Why, therefore, should not venial sins too be a 'wounding' of the holy Church, seeing that she is holy not merely in an institutional, but in an 'existential' sense as well,[44] so that mortal and venial sins on the part of one of her members contradict her own nature and so 'wound' her, even though in ways which are essentially very different in the two cases? It is significant that the same guilt in God's sight can receive sacramental forgiveness several times over (in a repetitional confession). But if this is true, then it applies also to the guilt which consists in an offence against the Church. Finally – a point that must constantly and emphatically be borne in mind – if we can conceive of the Church not merely as an external juridical organisation but as a holy people of God, as a covenant of grace, as the Body of Christ vivified by the Spirit, then every sin on the part of a member of the Church contradicts the interior nature of the Church, and not merely those sins to which the Church attaches an excommunication properly so-called. This also finds expression in the fact that every mortal sin, taken in itself and before it is sacramentally cleansed, debars the sinner from the Eucharist, the central mystery of the Church, so that in every case it has an ecclesiological aspect (we do not propose here to go into the further problems connected with the question of whether this state of being debarred from the Eucharist prior to the sacramental cleansing of mortal sin is juris divini or juris mere ecclesiastici). Even taken by themselves these simple considerations are sufficient to [132] explain why the Council should have been able, without hesitation, to say what it has said.

The foregoing observations may suffice here so far as the immediate exegesis of the conciliar statements is concerned. Here we must refrain from entering into the second part of the statement with which we are concerned ('quae [Ecclesia] eorum conversioni caritate, exemplo, precibus adlaborat'), even though this second part of the statement too is quite unusually significant since it makes clear that in the concrete application of the sacrament of penance (which always includes the repentance, the conversio of the sinner as an essential element in it) the Church collaborates not merely through the priestly absolution but through much else in addition to this. In other words the whole Church (exemplum, caritas, preces) participates in this exercise.[45] One final point which still remains to be noticed is that the text ('veniam offensionis Deo illatae ab Eius misericordia obtinent') formally and explicitly excludes that heretical misinterpretation which is pointed out by the Congregation for the [43] We are presupposing that the reader is already familiar with the teaching of St Thomas on this point.

[44] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church of Sinners', 'The Sinful Church in the Decrees of Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 270-294.
[45] cf. K. Rahner, 'Forgotten Truths Concerning the Sacrament of Penance', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 135-174. This statement of the Council could be taken as a starting-point for achieving a new, positive and entirely orthodox understanding of that which is treated of in the History of Dogma under the headings of 'The Confession of Religious' and 'The Confession of Layfolk' (cf. L.T.K. VI, 2nd ed., cols. 741-742; VII, 538-539). An understanding of this kind would also be of great significance from the point of view of oecumenism. On this cf. W. Kaspar, 'Confession outside the Confessional?', Concilium 4/3 (1967), pp. 17-22.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Doctrine of the Faith in its Letter to the Bishops of the World, the heresy, namely, that in the sacrament of penance it is only reconciliation with the Church that is being treated of.[46]

III

There is something further which we would add to this statement of the Council and the brief exegesis of this provided in this article. This is something which, in a certain sense, could have been given a place in the conciliar document itself in the form of a 'note'. It consists of a few brief proofs from theological tradition supporting this statement to the extent that this is possible in a brief article. It may be asked, what is being treated of in these witnesses? Is it the simple fact that in the sacrament of penance a [133] reconciliation with the Church is achieved as well, or do they go beyond this, thinking of this reconciliation with the Church as the res et sacramentum of the reconciliation with God (here it is the reality itself rather than the term res et sacrarnentum that is in question)? Though the question is legitimate, for the purposes of our present treatment we may be permitted to set on one side the distinction involved in this question. It is true that to some extent special emphasis will be laid explicitly on the second of the two theories summarised above, but this is justified on the grounds that this second theory necessarily includes the first. Here, it must be admitted, we have no intention of going into the more detailed arguments for holding that the pax cum ecclesia is to be thought of as the res et sacramentum of forgiveness in the eyes of God, this in turn being considered as res sacramenti. For such a line of argument would have first to show (and this is precisely what cannot be shown here) in general that in all the sacraments the res et sacramentum has an ecclesiological character, i.e. that it implies that the recipient of the sacraments has a specific relationship precisely with the Church. One further proviso may be mentioned. In what follows we shall often have occasion to speak of 'excommunication' (in quotation marks!) or release from 'excommunication' through penance. What we mean by this is not excommunication in the sense implied in contemporary canon law, but rather that state in which we no longer fully belong to the Church (or alternatively the conferring of a state of belonging to it which is in every respect full and complete) which is incurred by every mortal sin (and for which no other concise term exists). When Lumen gentium describes what full incorporation into the Church means, one of the elements in this apart from baptism, public confession of the faith and adherence to the laws of the community, is also the interior possession of grace (Spiritum Christi habentes[47]). Thus sinners remain in the bosom of the Church only corpore and not corde.[48] According to the teaching of the Council, therefore, there can be no doubt of the fact that even simple mortal sin, which allows the sinner to remain a member of the Church, as the Council of Constance defines, alters the relationship of the member involved to the Church.[49] This alteration[50] we [134] shall here call [46] cf. A.A.S. 58 (1966), 659-661 (Letter of 24.7.1966). On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirchliches Lehramt und Theologie nach dem Konzil', StdZ 178 (1966), pp. 404-420, also Vol. IX of this series, pp. 83-100.

[47] cf. No. 14 of the Constitution Lumen gentium.
[48] ibid.
[49] On this text the conciliar commission has explicitly declared: 'peccatores Ecclesiae non plene incorporantur'. cf. the studies mentioned on p. 131 n. 44, especially 'The Sinful Church …', pp. 291 f.
[50] Of course this 'alteration' in the relationship between the sinner and the Church has in turn two aspects or elements: the alteration which follows ipso facto from the nature of the sin as such, and the alteration in so far as this is constituted by the Church's reaction to this particular sin. For our present purposes it makes no difference whether this reaction on the part of the Church is necessary (iure divino, if we may so express it) or following from standards freely imposed by the Church herself, whether (to use a canonist's expression in a somewhat transferred sense) it takes place lata sententia or ferenda sententia. In any case the fact that by grave sin the sinner is debarred from the Eucharist and bound in duty to confess his sin shows that the Church always reacts

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(for want of a better word) 'excommunication' (in quotation marks!), and the sacramental removal of this 'excommunication' we shall call penance from 'excommunication'. Actually this is still conferred today in every sacramental absolution, because it is still true today that this also confers the right to receive the Eucharist, and even today to be excluded from this is the clearest expression of this state of 'excommunication'.

First we shall give a sort of survey of the 'history of dogma' of reconciliation with the Church, and then we shall go on to refer to a small selection of a few individual passages.

IV

This doctrine is already contained in scripture. We cannot embark upon a learned exegesis at this point. We must confine ourselves, rather, to this brief observation: if we were to undertake this our first task would be to [135] point out the 'ecclesial' aspect of sin which is clearly to be found in the Old and New Testaments.[51] The ethical system of the Old Testament is in fact explicitly a 'covenant ethic'. And this is equally true of the new 'people of God' in the New Testament. Nor can we here enter into any precise detail in the question of the relationship of dependence which exists between Mt 16:19 and 18:18 on the one hand and Jn 20:23 on the other. But in any case it is certain that the 'binding and loosing'[52] which is conferred as the authority of Jesus himself upon his community, and so upon the duly appointed functionaries of this, represents the counterpart in the synoptics to Jn 20. It is also certain that throughout the whole of tradition (also) it has been taken to refer to the same power to forgive sins[53] which, according to DS 1703, is expressed in Jn 20. This power of binding and loosing, which must not be thought of simply as an alternative way of expressing the power of the keys attributed to Peter, is to be interpreted against the background of Jewish theology at the time of Jesus. In the light of a more precise exegesis based on this it turns out in this way to grave sin. In every case of this kind the Church always exercises her 'binding' power even when she does not pronounce a sentence of excommunication in the sense meant in canon law. Of course a difficulty does arise here with regard to venial sins, which cannot be the subject of the Church's 'binding' power. But even with regard to these we can still say: venial sins as such (so long as we fail to rise above them), and in every instance of them, blur the relationship which man bears to the Church precisely as holy, a certain 'wounding' of the Church through man's own personal act (i.e. through the first element mentioned above). The fact that the Church cannot react to this as she does to a grave sin lies in the very nature of the case. If we find a difficulty in this, then it remains only because we are neglecting the ecclesiological side of venial sin. In order to make clear the character of absolution as a judicial act of the Church (cf. DS 1671, 1679) scholastic theology often emphasises that the reason why the plenary power of the Church in penance (which differs in this from baptism) is a judicial power, is that it consists in a power to decide in two opposite directions (potestas bifaria), a power of binding and loosing. However this argument can be applied without further qualification only to mortal sin, and has nothing to do with the question of an ecclesiological aspect of sin and absolution. Thus it appears that in any case the whole nature of the sacrament of penance is such that it is designed in the first instance for the forgiveness of grave sin and only secondarily for the forgiveness of venial sin. If we recognise this then the difficulty indicated above cannot be insuperable, and is to be solved in the same manner as with regard to the theological aspect of venial sin.

---

[51] cf. L.T.K. IX, 2nd ed., cols. 1170-1177 (with bibliography). In addition to the literature mentioned there cf. R. Knierim, Die Hauptbegriffe für Sünde im Alten Testament (Gütersloh, 1965) (with bibliography).

[52] It is impossible here to refer to all the literature in the field of biblical theology dealing with the question of what is properly meant by 'binding and loosing' in the bible. Here it must suffice to refer to H. Vorgrimler, 'Matthieu 16:18 s. et le sacrement de pénitence', L'homme devant Dieu. Mélanges offerts au Pére Henri de Lubac I (Paris 1964), pp. 51-61. Here an accurate record is provided of the recent literature on the question in biblical theology, cf. also H. Vorgrimler, 'Das "Binden und Lösen" in der Exegese nach dem Tridentinum bis zu Beginn des 20. Jahrhunderts', Z.K.T. 85 (1963), pp. 460-477.

[53] cf. DS 1679.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that the state of being bound by sin signifies subjection to demonic powers.[54] Thus, applying this to the act of the Church, 'to bind' ('on earth') signifies 'consigning the individual concerned to the power of Satan' (1 Cor 5:5; 1 Tim 1:20), and so exclusion from the community of the saved, while 'to loose' ('on earth') signifies the dissolving of this state of demonic bondage and so being restored to the community of the saved, the covenant people with its power to ransom. The Church, therefore, has the power of the 'ban' and of the removal of this, and precisely in this sense has the power to forgive sins ('in heaven').

Without this idea of the ecclesiological aspect of the power of the Church in relation to the sinner, the penitential discipline and practice of the Christians of the early Church remain ultimately incomprehensible. Here we cannot fully develop the arguments justifying this point. But one [136] thing is certain. Sacramental penance as practised in the early Church was penance from excommunication. This was not the sort of excommunication that signifies a special punishment attached to a few particularly grave sins. This excommunication pointed rather to the fact that every grave sin (grave enough to remove the grace of baptism. This is the only kind of sin envisaged in the penitential practice of the early Church) also removes the fulness (something, therefore, that is concomitantly conditioned by interior grace) of the baptised individual's organic membership of the body of the Church through which the Spirit is conferred upon her members. This remains true even though he may still belong to the Church corpore as the present-day Constitution on the Church declares with Augustine. Such a state of 'being excommunicated' through sin itself was made visible at the level of social life by the 'ban' imposed by the Church, and the sinner was excluded from the celebration of the Eucharist. He was relegated (in normal cases) to a special class of penitents, and the performance of his penance was supervised by the Church. During the period of penance the penitent was supported by the prayer of the Church in the form of blessings, exorcisms, exhortations (a process which the Constitution on the Church regards as also continuing in the sacrament of penance as practised today when this is viewed precisely as a whole, for it states that the Church collaborates in working for the conversion of the sinner through love, example and prayer). After a specified period of belonging to the class of penitents, and when he had given proof of his repentance and conversion, he was once more reconciled with the Church, i.e. fully received back into her through the laying on of hands by the bishop, and thereby also once more obtained the Spirit which vivifies the Church, in other words grace and so the forgiveness of sins. The pax of the Church, the reconciliatio with her, was a sacramental sign of reconciliation with God.[55] This basic pattern of the penitential discipline of the early Christians clearly remained present in the mind of the Church down to the early Middle Ages. Throughout its troubled history the only question was whether this pax with the Church should be restored to every sinner, however grave his sin might be (the question of whether this was basically [137] possible was, in general, no problem), how long the period of penance should last, whether in specific cases (e.g. in sickness) sacramental reconciliation with the Church and God should be conceded even before the time of penance had been fulfilled, and (towards the end of the patristic age) whether such a reconciliation with the Church should be granted several times over (after falling again into sin).

Then in the early Middle Ages the practice arose of repeatedly conferring reconciliation, and the external form of this was simplified (it was conferred by priests instead of the bishop, the reconciliation and the penance to be performed were given together at the outset of the

[54] cf. DS 1520.

[55] We can and must, of course, distinguish between two elements here: the sacramental conferring of the pax through the Church (in the person of the bishop together with the presbyterium) and the pax itself that was conferred. The former belongs to the sacramental sign (sacramentum), the latter is an effect of the sacramental sign (res et sacramentum). Thus in the case of baptism too we have in fact to distinguish between the rite by which the subject is received and the state of belonging to the Church achieved through this reception.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

period so that the performance of the penance followed afterwards etc.). As a result of this the ancient sacrament of penance assumed that liturgical and canonical form which is still familiar to us of today. But for all this the people of that time were still far from losing their awareness of the truth that the absolution in the sacrament of penance is also a reconciliation with the Church. It is true that in the main period of the Middle Ages the precise connection between the forgiveness of sins in God's sight and reconciliation with the Church was no longer so clearly recognised as in the early Church. But it was clear to all the great theologians of the Middle Ages, and was also explicitly asserted by them, that the absolution also constitutes a reconciliation with the Church. Even Luther[56] still recognised this. In the later Middle Ages this idea receded into the background. The teaching of the Council of Trent on the sacrament of penance was directed against the reformers, and here this ecclesiological aspect is not mentioned (though it is in the teaching on the Eucharist), but of course it is not denied either, and in recent times, with the religious individualism which characterises them, this aspect is to be numbered among the 'forgotten truths' concerning the sacrament of penance until, as has already been described, it once more appears and is given a place in the official teaching of the Church on this sacrament of hers in the Second Vatican Council.

V

A few individual references must now be added. For as early a writer as the Pastor Hermae penance, which permits the sinner to regain the seal of baptism which he has lost, constitutes his reincorporation into the 'tower' [138] of the Church.[57] In Tertullian the two entities of reconciliation with the Church and forgiveness of sins in God's sight are set side by side more or less without connection, so that the exact way in which they belong to one another is not altogether clear. But in his theology of penance both aspects are plainly present. That the two are not simply identical is shown, for instance, from the fact that even though for Tertullian the Church has to refuse her pax to the sinner, he nevertheless finds it possible to hold out to him a prospect of eschatological forgiveness as the hands of God. On the other hand the judgment of the Church anticipates the judgment of God as a praejudicium (Apol. 29). There is a further point. In his polemic against the Catholics Tertullian, as a Montanist, does assert that it is possible (although it only appears that this is probable, or indeed has any prospect of success) for one who has committed mortal sin to be redeemed by God. At the same time he maintains that such a one forfeits any share in the pax of the Church. Now he can only hold both these positions simultaneously if both elements are not absolutely identical entities even for the Catholics. Nevertheless supposing that they do have some objective connection between them, then the only conceivable way in which this can be the case is that the peace of the Church is the cause of reconciliation with God. For only so are the two entities distinct from one another (as cause and effect). The peace of the Church must, in effect, be prior (as prae-judicium), and yet both entities are (for the Catholics) indissolubly connected. (Indeed they emphasise that penance would have no meaning if the peace of the Church were not imparted in it.[58])

The matter becomes clear in Cyprian.[59] Wholly in accordance with our exegesis of Mt 16:18, for him ligare signifies ecclesiam cludere while solvere means the imparting of the [56] cf. E. Fischer, Geschichte der evangelischen Beichte I (Leipzig, 2nd ed. 1902), p. 132; further texts in L. Klein, Evangelisch-lutherische Beichte. Lehre und Praxis (Paderborn 1961), pp. 66 f. (Bibliography).

[57] cf. The references on p. 126 n. 9, and n 59 below to relevant works, esp. K. Rahner op. cit., p. 410 ff.
[58] cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie der Busse bei Tertullian', Abhandlungen über Theologie und Kirche (Festschrift für K. Adam), M. Reding ed. (Düsseldorf, 1952), pp. 139-167.
[59] cf. K. Rahner, 'Die Busslehre des hl. Cyprian', Z.K.T. 74 (1952), pp. 257-276; 381-438. cf. also p. 448, n. 9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pax et communicatio.[60] But the connection between the pax of the Church and the effects of reconciliation in heaven is expressed with all the clarity that could be desired when he says: 'Pignus vitae in data pace percipiunt'[61] or 'pace accepta accipere Spiritum Patris'.[62] For Cyprian, therefore, we obtain the hope of salvation and the Holy Spirit in virtue of the fact that we obtain the peace of the Church. The second formulation, therefore, is particularly remarkable because it [139] is the only passage in Cyprian in which the imparting of the Spirit is explicitly connected with the usual reconciliation of the sinner. And precisely here the words are 'pace accepta'.[63] We can go no further at this point in showing how closely this idea is connected with Cyprian's whole theology of the Church (exactly as with Tertullian). But in any case for Cyprian the peace of the Church is not a further effect of the forgiveness of sins and the imparting of the Spirit, but rather precedes this as their cause.

For Origen the relevant passages are so widely scattered and the theology of penance in Origen is so complex that reference must be made to special studies on the subject (especially those of Poschmann, Rahner and Teichtweier).[64] For Origen the essence of mortal sin, as distinct from other sins, consists precisely in the fact that man loses his place in the Church as the medium of salvation and so is excluded from the sphere in which a certain redemptive influence of creaturely powers can be brought to bear upon the sinner. For this reason he must be 'excommunicated' in order to make explicit the fact that the sinner is delivered over to the fire of God's judgment and the interitus carnis by the Satanic powers (though even this has a mysterious salvific meaning). Conversely, therefore, 'return to the Church' and 'redemption' are entities which are necessarily interconnected.[65] Again in Origen's view of ecclesiastical penance, even from the purely terminological point of view, 'return to the Church' occupies the foreground.[66]

'Loosing' signifies that the subject is once more acknowledged as fully a member of the Church. The sacramental quality in the removal of the 'excommunication' therefore, must be maintained precisely for him if we are to be in a position to maintain the sacramentality of ecclesiastical [140] penance in Origen at all. But we can only do this if we maintain (a point which is then very clear) that for Origen this reinstatement as a member of the Church is precisely the mode and the cause of reconciliation with God and the reattainment of the Spirit. This can and must be established as the theological and spiritual meaning of the reconciliation of the sinner with the Church. But this means that for Origen that effect in heaven follows from this that takes place on earth.[67]

Augustine's presentation of the matter is perfectly clear. 'Ecclesiae caritas quae per Spiritum Sanctum diffunditur in cordibus nostris, participem suorum peccata dimittit, eorum

---

[60] cf. Cyprian, epist 57, 1.
[61] Epist 55, 13.
[62] Epist 57, 4.
[63] A survey of the relevant passages in Cyprian shows (against the view upheld by J. Grotz) that pax and communio as conceived of by Cyprian cannot be thought of as two separable entities in such a way that it would have been possible for a communio to take place (at the beginning of the carrying out of the penance) which nevertheless did not constitute a pax (this would of its nature be imparted by God through the Church at the end of the period of penance). The very fact that Cyprian speaks indiscriminately of pax et communio and communio et pax is of itself enough to rule this out, for it would be impossible to discover any objective reason inherent in the context for this interchange in the order in which the two terms are used.
[64] B. Poschmann, Paenitentia Secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 425-480; K. Rahner, 'La doctrine d'Origène sur la Pénitence', R.S.R. 37 (1950), pp. 47-94; 252-286; 422-456. cf. also G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes = Studien zur Geschichte der kath. Moraltheologie VII (Regensburg, 1958) esp. pp. 294 f., 334 f., 336 f., 343 f.
[65] In Ps 36:2; P.G. 12, 1353.
[66] cf. K. Rahner, R.S.R. 37 (1950), pp. 255 ff., 422 ff., cf. also 436 ff.
[67] K. Rahner, R.S.R. 37 (1950), 436-452.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

autem, qui non sunt eius participes tenet'.[68] 'Sovitur qui cum columba (the Church) fecerit pacem, et ligatur qui cum columba non habet pacem sive aperte foris sit sive intus esse videatur'.[69] 'Civitas Dei recipiendo efficit innocentes'.[70] 'Pax Ecclesiae dimittit peccata et ab Ecclesiae pace alienatio tenet peccata'.[71] These formulations are such as to give expression to the thesis we are upholding with unequivocal clarity, and all that they still need is to be translated into scholastic terminology. A further factor in Augustine's treatment makes this all the clearer. For him the reconciliation granted by the bishop only imparts the Spirit in virtue of the fact that by it the sinner is received into that Church of the saints which then (in a certain sense independently of the act of the official Church) acts of herself and precisely as this Church of the saints and as the possessor of the Holy Spirit in order to impart to the newly incorporated member a share in her own Spirit. Obviously this patristic conception is not contradicted by the fact that the connection between the forgiveness of sins and the act of the Church is asserted without the connecting factor of the pax cum Ecclesia being explicitly mentioned. The worthlessness of this as a counter-argument against our thesis appears when we compare it with the case of baptism and with the proposition that through baptism sins are washed away. In no sense can we deduce from this proposition any denial of the fact that the character in baptism is the res et sacramentum, and neither can we interpret the absence of any mention of the pax cum ecclesia as a counter argument to the patristic conception described above. Nor is there any need to deny the fact that here and there it may be that reconciliation with the Church is viewed rather as a consequence than as a cause of the imparting of the Spirit [141] through the forgiveness of sins. Precisely in terms of the ecclesiastical theology worked out by the early Church these two entities are so closely interconnected that it is not in the least surprising to find something of this kind.[72]

In spite of the changes in the exterior form of the sacrament of penance in the early Middle Ages, as a result of which the penance of 'excommunication' no longer found such clear expression, an awareness of penance as reconciliation with the Church remained alive right down to the high Middle Ages inclusive.

At this time a system of theology applicable to all the sacraments in general was being developed, which gave rise to such questions as those of matter and form and the interrelationship of sacramentum, res et sacramentum, and res sacramenti, and it is quite true that the explanation of this pax cum ecclesia as the res et sacramentum of penance did not emerge in the first moment that this systematic theology of the sacraments in general came to be applied to penance in particular. Since interest was primarily focussed upon the subjective aspect of penance, this (and not the act of the priest himself as representing the Church), was conceived of right down to the time of Thomas as the proper cause of the forgiveness. And so long as this was the case it was quite impossible to arrive at the formulation that the pax cum ecclesia was the res et sacramentum which still has to effect the res sacramenti. Given the general principles of the theology of the eleventh and twelfth centuries down to Thomas, it was quite impossible to arrive at any other conclusion with regard to the res et sacramentum of the sacrament of penance than that this res et sacramentum was the paenitentia interior, and that it was through this that the res sacramenti, the forgiveness of sins was effected. For in fact, right down to the time of Thomas this paenitentia interior was, from the human side of penance, the sole effective cause of the forgiveness of sins as such. Then in the thirteenth century a turning point of decisive importance was reached, and it came to be acknowledged

[68] In Joan. tract. 121, 4; P.L. 35, 1958.
[69] De bapt. contra Donatistas III, 18, 23; P.L. 43, 151.
[70] Contra Cresconium Donatistam II, 13, 16; P.L. 43, 476.
[71] De bapt. contra Donatistas III 18, 23; P.L. 43, 150.
[72] As an instance of such a case we may compare, e.g., the teaching of the Didascalia Apostolorum. cf. K. Rahner, Z.K.T. 72 (1950), pp. 272 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explicitly that in this sacrament taken as a whole the act of the Church played a decisive part as an effective cause of the actual forgiveness of sins. By this time, however, two distinct factors had come to have a radical bearing upon the state of the question. On the one hand the theological axiom with regard to the paenitentia interior as the res et sacramentum had become a formula deeply embedded in tradition, while on the other the idea of penance as reconciliation with the Church as well had been thrust into the background (even if it had not [142] altogether disappeared). In the light of this we cannot be surprised that the traditional formulation was adhered to even though now (in contrast to the eleventh and twelfth centuries), in the light of the new theology and in fact only in the light of this, a different conception, namely the ancient one which had formerly been held, had once more become possible. To that extent, therefore, we cannot rely upon the whole of the teaching of the early scholastics, or the main stream of scholasticism down to the time of Thomas inclusive. Nevertheless we can invoke the teaching even of this period (down to Thomas inclusive) in support of our thesis at least to the extent that – in spite of a certain weakening which has already been explained – a living awareness did survive everywhere of the fact that in the sacrament of penance a reconciliation with the Church as well as with God takes place. It will be relevant to demonstrate this, therefore, with the help of at least a few examples and references.[73]

For our present purposes we must pass over the literature on penance of the Middle Ages prior to the Carolingian reform. But in saying this we must immediately point out that the doctrine of penance as a reconciliation with the Church is manifestly present in the eleventh and twelfth centuries as well. It is not possible here to give a comprehensive presentation of the theology of sin in respect of its effects upon the relationship between the individual and the Church. In many respects the quest for such a theology was still incomplete, and scholars were still striving for a balanced formulation in which to express it. Moreover we would have to enter into such further questions as the relationship between the Church and the Mystical Body of Christ and the distinction between belonging to the Church merito and belonging to it numero, as well as the question of whether the individual belongs to the Church through faith alone or only through faith and love combined. But in any case we can surely say without hesitation that in this period there is a general and manifest recognition of the fact that sin is an offence against the Church as well, an act of Ecclesiam [143] offendere,[74] an injuria Ecclesiae illata,[75] and that in accordance with this it essentially alters the relationship of the sinner to the Church in such a way that he no longer belongs to it at any rate merito, no longer belongs as a member to the Body of Christ (or else only belongs to it as a dead member) etc. (Here a certain distinction is presupposed between the Church and the Body of Christ.) In accordance with this one of the reasons assigned (not the only one) for the necessity of the sacrament of penance is that the sinner must also make satisfaction to the Church, ut satisfaciat Ecclesiae, a favourite Augustinian formula in which to express this,[76] precisely because, in a certain sense he has separated himself from the church[77] and has [73] Reference may be made to the following literature on the subject: A. Landgraf, 'Stünde und Trennung von der Kirche in der Frühscholastik', Scholastik 5 (1930), pp. 210-247; P. Anciaux, La théologie du sacrement de pénitence au XIIe siècle (Louvain 1949); also Z. Alszeghy, Gregorianum 31 (1950), pp. 275-283. A recent work which deserves quite special mention is also L. Hödl, Die Geschichte der scholastischen Literatur and Theologie der Schlüsselgewalt, Pt I (Munster 1960); cf. also von K. Fröhlich, Formen der Auslegung von Mt 16:13-18 im lateinischen Mittelalter (Diss. theol. Basel, 1960). Anciaux's work contains references to numerous sources, and these are briefly indicated in the following footnotes by giving simply the name Anciaux followed by the relevant page references; the numbers set above the rest of the type represent the footnotes in Anciaux.

[74] cf. Anciaux, pp. 211; 214.
[75] idem, p. 506.
[76] idem, pp. 52^2; 195^2; 435; 445; 518, etc.
[77] idem, 52^2; 53^1; 174^3; 245^1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

departed from her,[78] becoming an Ecclesiae debitor.[79] In accordance with this view the power of 'binding' and 'loosing' which takes effect in the sacrament is also regarded not merely as the authority to impose penance or a censure (the power of excommunication in the juridical sense), but also as a power (which takes effect in the actual sacrament) of exclusion and readmission to the Church.[80] But this in itself is tantamount to declaring that the act defined as sanum in Ecclesiam recipi[81], recipere in gremium Ecclesiae,[82] efficere membrum Christi[83] is regarded as an essential effect of priestly absolution in the sacrament of penance and, moreover, precisely in virtue of the fact that per sacerdotis absolutionem there takes place an Ecclesiae Christi consociari,[84] a per reconciliationem in Ecclesia inducere.[85] This means, of course, that the function of admitting the sinner to the sacraments of the Church is also ascribed to this absolution,[86] as well as the function of admitting the sinner to the suffrages of the Church, by which his own personal penance is supplemented. (This is a factor which some authors actually declare to be absolutely necessary for the blotting out of sins.) It may be that the full significance of this pax cum Ecclesia in terms of grace was no longer clearly perceived by all; that the 'separation' from the Church gradually came to be regarded more as an effect of excommunication in the sense proper to canon law; that the statement that the reconciliatio with the Church is the res et sacramentum of reconciliation with God was impossible at this period for the very reason that it was absolutely denied that any act on the Church's part could have an effect on the actual forgiveness of guilt considered in itself [144] (in other words for a reason which objectively speaking and from the point of view of dogmatic theology is certainly false). But while all this may be true, the one and decisive factor still remains in force for this period. It still explicitly recognised and asserted that in the sacrament of penance an additional reconciliation with the Church herself is achieved.

This truth was still not forgotten even at the height of the scholastic movement. Thus for instance we still find Bonaventure asserting[87]: 'Confessio ad hoc directo instituta est, ut homo reconciliatur Ecclesiae et ostendatur reconciliatus a Deo'.[88] For Bonaventure this reconciliation with the Church is, together with the remission of temporal punishment for sin, the proper effect which the Church can bring about as an act of efficient causality by her power of the keys. By contrast it is not possible for her to effect the same remission in respect of the guilt incurred in God's sight. For in respect of this the keys can only exercise a dispositive causality. For Bonaventure too, therefore, this reconciliation with the Church is actually expressed in the indicative part of the form of absolution, while the part expressed in prayer form refers to the guilt incurred in the eyes of God himself (though even here there is a genuine sacramental causality).[89] Now on this basis, and since Bonaventure cannot ascribe any directly efficient causality to the absolution in effecting the blotting out of the actual guilt itself, it would have seemed natural to regard the reconciliation with the Church as that

[78] idem, 211[3]; 214.
[79] idem, 218[4].
[80] idem, pp. 277[5]; 290[2]; 320[2]; 321[1, 2, 4]; 344[4]; 371[2]; 496; 499; 503; 504; 516.
[81] idem, p. 170[3].
[82] idem, 525; 537.
[83] idem, pp. 443[4]; 536.
[84] Richard of St Victor: P.L. 196, 1172.
[85] Anciaux, p. 453[1].
[86] idem, pp. I72[3]; 492; 499; 516; 443; 536.
[87] Studies which are of supreme importance for our understanding of Bonaventure (and which serve to correct B. Poschmann's interpretation of him) are: V. Heynck, 'Zur Busslehre des hl. Bonaventura', Franziskanische Studien 36 (1954), pp. 1-81; idem, 'Der richterliche Charakter des Busssakraments nach Johannes Duns Scotus', Franziskanische Studien 37(1965), pp. 339-414, esp. 364 ff. cf. also below p. 170, n. 11.
[88] Bonaventure, IV Sent. dist. 17 q. 3, a.2 fundam. 2.
[89] Bonaventure, IV Sent. dist. 18 p. 1 a. 2 q. 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

disposition for the forgiveness of guilt which he seeks. But for Bonaventure the various effects of the sacrament of penance are already interrelated in such a way that such an idea is foreign to him, the more so since he has to take into account the doctrine which (even though still relatively recent) is for him already in a certain measure traditional, the doctrine, namely that it is the paenitentia interior which is the object of the power of the keys (in its deprecatory form). For all this, however, due heed must still be paid to an observation of Heynck's to the effect that the confessio reconciliativa (for Bonaventure) is confession. And it is with this that the full effectiveness of the sacrament of penance is bound up, namely the lessening of the punishment due to sin and reconciliation with the Church. It is this that Bonaventure is usually thinking of when he speaks of reconciliatio.

[145] A work which was composed under the influence of Bonaventure, and which was widely diffused in the Middle Ages, is the 'Compendium theologicae veritatis' of Hugo Ripelin, the Dominican of Strasbourg. This author, like Bonaventure, teaches that the deprecatory element in the form of absolution bears upon the actual guilt, while the indicative brings about the reconciliation of the sinner with the Church.[90]

The doctrine of reconciliation with the Church still retains its force for Thomas. Because he is lacking in charity, the sinner belongs to the Body of Christ as a member only potentialiter and imperfecte, not actualiter.[91] He is no longer in the Church in an absolute and unqualified sense, no longer in her merito but only numero.[92] It is true that Thomas differs from Augustine in that for him the 'Church's sanctification', which is applied to the sinner and so brings about his reconciliation with the Church,[93] consists not so much in the fulness of the Spirit possessed by the Church herself as in the sanctification which she actively imparts through her sacramental power. It is also true that Thomas' conception of the actual process by which this is brought about is one in which the grace that is mediated by sacramental power justifies the individual and thereby reconciles him with the Church. But while all this may be true, the point that is of such decisive importance for us still retains its force for Thomas too. He recognises a reconciliation with the Church as an effect of the sacrament of penance.[94] Now if one adds to this that, for instance, for Thomas it is the character in baptism which is the 'immediata causa disponens ad gratiam,'[95] and if we maintain that the character has an essentially ecclesiological aspect, then it must, in effect, be consistent with the thought of Thomas too to hold that the reconciliatio cum Ecclesia is analogous to the character in baptism in that it too has the force of an immediata causa disponens ad gratiam, i.e. like the character in baptism is to be regarded as res et sacramentum for [146] the reconciliation with God through grace. This is all the more true since in fact the material content of the Thomistic doctrine that the paenitentia interior is an effect of the sacrament must be regarded as unassailable. A further point is that in order rightly to interpret the doctrine of the paenitentia interior as the res et sacramentum of penance we must not forget that according to precisely this self-same doctrine the votum sacramenti is included in this interior penance. In other words it includes an orientation towards the Church and her power of the keys. Thus on any showing we can say that in any true penance the will to be reconciled with the Church is implicitly included. If, therefore, it is true that through the sacrament the paenitentia

[90] cf. L. Ott, 'Opusculum des hl. Thomas von Aquin de forma absolutionis in dogmengeschichtlicher Betrachtung', Festschrift für Eduard Eichmann, M. Grabmann, K. Hofmann edd. (Paderborn 1940), pp. 121 f.
[91] Thomas Aquinas, Sum. Theol. III q. 8 a. 3 and 2, in which Thomas seems to identify 'Church' with 'Body of Christ' for this world and for the age after Christ. cf. also III q. 8 a. 4c.
[92] cf. Thomas Aquinas, IV Sent. dist. 16 q. 1 a. 2 q. 5 dubium. And corresponding to this, 'Per sacramentum homo non solum Deo sed etiam Ecclesiae oportet quod reconcilietur', IV Sent. dist. 17 q. 3 a. 3 q. 2 ad 3.
[93] ibid.
[94] For an elucidation of the text cited cf. on the one hand A. M. Landgraf, Z.K.T. 51 (1927), 91 and on the other B. Poschrnann, Die Busse = Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte IV/3 (Freiburg 1951), p. 93, n. 16.
[95] cf. Thomas Aquinas, IV Sent. dist. 4 q. 3 a. 2 sol. 3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

interior is intensified (or caused) then this also applies to the will to be reconciled with the Church (and this will is not in fact to be considered as a mere resolve to receive the sacrament as though it were involved in this in indivisibili, but is itself a grace-given act which can grow and pervade the depths of man's spirit and achieve supernatural power). Now if the sacramentum has (consistently with the ancient doctrine) this effect upon the will of causing it to seek reconciliation with the Church, then the sacrament must actually impart this reconciliation. But in any case on this showing the paenitentia interior has a twofold aspect. It relates to reconciliation with God and reconciliation with the Church. On the basis of these considerations too no grounds can be found for saying that our thesis is far removed from the mediaeval conception of the res et sacramentum of penance. We might say (departing in this from the actual words but not from the real meaning of Thomas) that the sacrament reconciles the sinner with the Church while he, with his disposition of paenitentia interior considered as a will to achieve reconciliation with the Church, precisely comes to meet this same Church. In virtue of this the sinner has the right to that infusio gratiae which makes it possible for him to achieve that paenitentia interior through which he is in a position so to appropriate the grace imparted to him in the actual conditions of his own personal life that it becomes his own in a manner that sanctifies and justifies him and that he is thereby liberated from his personal sins. Even abstracting from the earlier tradition, which explicitly demands this, it seems advisable to order the various elements logically precisely in this way because, of its very nature, this reconciliation with the Church must be still more immediate to the act of the Church in the sequence of effects than the paenitentia interior which, of itself, belongs rather to the sphere of the unique personal life of the individual than to the sacramental sphere in the narrower sense. Res et sacramentum, however, must have an immediate connection with the sacramental dimension, with the visibility of the [147] Church as such. Thus we should point to the pax cum Ecclesia rather than to the paenitentia interior as the res et sacramentum of penance.[96]

VI

From this point onwards the whole complex of ideas which we have followed through history seems gradually and slowly to become blurred and indistinct. It is not actually denied, but it is more or less forgotten. The 'private form' of penance cannot be the sole cause of this, though certainly it has been a contributing factor. But it cannot be solely held responsible for it. For absolutely speaking even in the present-day form of baptism the individual can still feel and experience very vividly that he is coming to the holy Church of Christ when he goes to the priest, that it is before her that he is accusing himself (however 'private' the accusation may be to all outward appearance), that the sin he is confessing is one through which, whether it be mortal or venial, he has sinned against the Body of Christ as well and has contributed his share in bringing it about that the Church is not fully that which she should be: the witness of God's sanctifying compassion in the darkness of the sinful world, the visible presence of the love of God in human history. The sinner can always experience even today that through his confession and the acceptance of this confession by the Church he now stands visibly[97] before the Church as he who he really is through his own fault: as a sinner who, in a certain sense, ceases to hide behind the sacred value attached to him as a member of [96] On the genesis and the theological significance of the concepts of paenitentia interior and paenitentia externa cf. esp. L. Hödl, Die Geschichte der scholastischen Literatur and die Theologie der Schlüsselgewalt I (Munster 1960). Summary with detailed references, pp. 376-391.

[97] We might almost say 'sacramental'. In the early Middle Ages the terms sacramentum excommunicationis and sacramentum of confession of sin were freely used: Anciaux, pp. 312; 146.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this holy Church and so deceitfully to conceal his own sinfulness. Even today, therefore, the sinner can still experience the word of forgiveness in the sacrament precisely as the word of this Church, which forgives him his sin against the Church, which in that she forgives him helps to bear his guilt because in this forgiveness (as Origen taught) she truly takes upon herself the guilt of this her member and helps to bear it. She does this in the knowledge that Christ forgives her because he loves and sanctifies her even though in her children she shows herself again and again to be the Church of sinners. In making his confession, therefore, [148] the sinner can experience even in the present-day form of the sacrament that he is freed from his sins in the eyes of God precisely in virtue of the fact that he finds the peace of the Church, enters once more (or enters more deeply) into the sole medium of grace and of the Spirit, the holy Church. He can experience that to be 'loosed' upon earth really is to be 'loosed' in heaven. The outer form of the sacrament (which had inevitably to become what it is in view of the size of the Church and her pastoral functions) cannot, therefore, be the sole cause of the ecclesiological aspect of confession having been thrust into the background. There must have been other causes apart from this, and it would be a valuable exercise to investigate the precise history of these. Yet surely they are not difficult to divine. The Church is seen more and more merely as the external juridical organization which is indeed endowed with divine right, and to belong to which is indeed the commandment of God. But she is no longer regarded as being in herself that sacrament filled with the Spirit which brings about salvation and grace provided only that we do not close ourselves against her Spirit through our own fault. The more, therefore, theology had to guard against the theories of Wycliffe, Hus and the Reformers, the more vitally necessary it became to emphasise that the juridical and visible constitution of the Church as well is of divine right. The more necessary it became to work out the precise nature of that membership of the Church which is still to be attributed even to the sinner, the more difficult it became to bring out the other side or to give it conscious expression. A further factor is the individualism of modern times, the origin of which can already be found in the late Middle Ages. Salvation and grace become more and more something which is worked out between God and the individual alone and taken in isolation. And in accordance with this view, when the Church does act as mediatrix in this, she acts at God's 'behest' in such a way that we no longer advert to the fact that the fulfilment of this behest also signifies her own authentic life and that it actually draws the individual more and more into this life of the Church herself.[98]

It cannot be said, therefore, that the fact that this doctrine was obscured constitutes an argument against its correctness. It was never properly speaking denied or replaced by any other doctrine which was better. Because the general conception of the Church as means of grace receded into the background of man's conscious thought the ecclesiological aspect of the sacrament of penance could no longer remain clear to him [149] either. Yet it belongs so essentially to the dogmatic tradition taken as a whole, and even to the teaching of scripture

[98] On this development we may compare e.g. the article by J. Ramsauer on the development of the concept of the Church in the post-Tridentine catechisms, 'Die Kirche in den Katechismen', Z.K.T. 73 (1951), pp. 129-169; 313-346.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

itself that theology has the duty explicitly to advert to it once more.[99] In the Council this has been achieved.

[99] cf. also most recently L. Bertsch, Busse und Beichte (Frankfurt 1967) and in this the article by O. Semmelroth, 'Strukturen und Perspektiven im Busssakrament', pp. 68-88, esp. pp. 69 ff. on the ecclesiological character. On the theme of this article cf. pp. 76 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[150]

8

A BRIEF THEOLOGICAL STUDY ON INDULGENCE

The zeal to gain indulgences has certainly declined among Catholics. The non-Catholic regards anything like an 'indulgence' as quite alien to him. How could one express the matter in such a way that the other understood something about it? Admittedly it is only with great difficulty that something which springs from so complex a background of ideas can be explained to one who is unfamiliar even with those ideas which it presupposes. But at the same time, supposing that we did try to answer his question, and to answer it in such a way as not to presuppose too much in the way of specialist terminology and further theological knowledge – how, in that case would our answer sound? Tasks of this kind are difficult. It is a pity that they so rarely attempted. All of us, priests and laymen, should be better versed in such techniques. If we practised them we would come across many questions upon which we ourselves had never sufficiently reflected before in our precisely worked-out dogmatic theology, in which the difficulties are too often smoothed over by convention and familiarity. And here and there we would even find an answer which opened up to us ourselves the way to a deeper understanding of the very question which we had hitherto imagined we understood inside and out.

With this end in view, and taking these considerations as our starting-point, let us attempt to say something about indulgence, even though in doing so we incur the danger of merely exposing ourselves to all kinds of criticism, i.e. of failing to satisfy any of our hearers, whether it be those who understand nothing about indulgence (because even after reading about it they find it incomprehensible) or those who already have clear ideas about the subject (because these find that now the question has become more obscure instead of more intelligible). From time to time – this is something that every reader will notice – something will be said which is addressed not to those 'hearers' for whom this study is properly intended, but rather to the theologians who ask themselves whether what [151] is said here agrees with the traditional doctrine on the question as this has been preserved. Such incidental remarks, therefore, should not be used as arguments purporting to show that the attempt we have undertaken is unsuccessful. Whether it really succeeds – that is a quite different question. Those who, having reached the end of this study, feel that it has failed, can always improve upon it by themselves making similar or different attempts, and can make them available in order that we can use them fruitfully to increase our knowledge. This is the sense in which we would wish this brief theological treatise on indulgence to be understood.[1]

I

Man is a complex being with many levels in his makeup. The decisions he takes and the acts he initiates from the source and centre of his personal freedom, from the innermost 'kernel' of his personhood, take shape in dimensions of his being which are not simply identical with the centre of personhood in his being considered as the source and origin of everything else in

[1] The author has published several studies on the theology of indulgence. On the particular position he is adopting in this attempt, as compared with these other studies, cf., in particular, apart from the list of sources, the essay which immediately follows this one entitled 'On the Official Teaching of the Church Today on the Subject of Indulgence', pp. 166-198. Here an extensive bibliography will be found of works by the author himself as well as by others.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

his makeup. He acquires attitudes and habits. He gives his character its distinctive mould and he 'objectifies' the acts in which he exercises his freedom, imposing them upon his 'environment'. The initial 'environment' which receives the impress of the act arising from his original decision, and in which it is objectified, consists of his own self in the external levels of his makeup. Here this objectified act is, so to say, frozen into permanent form and preserved. Hence when the innermost centre of the kernel of man's personhood is transformed by the grace of God – whereas previously, by a sinful decision, it was turned against God and his holy will – in other words when man 'converts' himself to God at the innermost and deepest level of his being, even then it does not always and ipso facto follow that all is once more well with him. It can be the case that all is immediately made well. It can be the case that this conversion is so powerful that it immediately transforms the whole man. But it can also be the case that this interior transformation of man is present in a certain sense like a glowing kernel at the centre of his personhood, yet that it does not simply and at one blow do away with all the ingrained attitudes, [152] encrustations and after-effects of the earlier course of life led by the individual concerned. Even the history of salvation really is a history, i.e. a process which requires time, and in which everything does not take place all at once. Only one who thinks in purely abstract and formal categories, one who imagines that time as a factor plays no part in conditioning our personal history of salvation, as though God achieved his effects upon us all at once in the sort of dimension beyond time which the Gnostics imagined – only such a one can contest the truth of what we have said. We must not therefore suppose that all that is needful has already been achieved simply when we repent, whether within the sacrament of penance or apart from it, and in doing so genuinely do obtain the gift of conversion (attained to by an act of unmerited grace coming from God himself), and so are in the state of having once more found how to orientate ourselves to God in faith and love. This grace of conversion is, in fact, intended to draw the whole nature of man into its sphere of influence, extending this to the physical side of his nature, to the unconscious movements of his nervous system, to the submerged impulses in it, in order that all may be healed and sanctified. Now this does not take place ipso facto in every case of conversion, not even when this is genuine, and when we can say: there is a man who has sincerely converted himself to God, one who, in the midst of his freedom, yet liberated by the grace of God, has 'radically changed the course of his life' and based his whole existence upon the grace of God. Even in such a case the possibility always still remains that 'I' am in many respects the old 'I', the one who is still unconverted or at any rate not wholly changed. In that state 'I' can still always be myself with my own egoism, which I utterly fail to notice, and with which, in many respects, I still continue to have an understanding; the 'I' that retains the hardness of heart, pharisaism and cowardice of me, and all the other attitudes and attributes which were made real in the sin of which I was formerly guilty (and which I now repent). The result of this is that I utterly fail to notice all this, or to achieve that state in which I really separate myself from it all. Such a transformation of the whole man in all his immeasurable complexity can, therefore, still mean that a long and painful course lies before him. What anguish, what incalculable spiritual developments, what deadly pains still remain to be endured in a process of spiritual transformation, until all is made different! Yet at the same time how indispensable all this is! Without this how could one be 'made perfect'?

These, then, are real factors arising from our sins, and they are present in our personal human lives as these take shape in history. Springing as [153] they do from sin, they live on after it and constitute a just judgment upon it. We Christians call them 'the temporal punishments due to sin'. They are 'temporal' because they must be endured in a process of development over a period of time, and can only be overcome in this. They are punishments because they are the consequences of sin and a judgment upon it both at the same time. For when man, taking his own freedom as person as the centre and source of his action, misuses

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the (rest of) his personal makeup, violating and damaging it, then in this distortion of his own nature he experiences the contradiction and the opposition of this nature, its forms and its tendencies which were created by God and are therefore ineradicable, and which are prior to this decision which man takes of his freedom. There is contradiction between that in him which is free and that which, from the point of view of God, he is intended to be and which, moreover, he inalienably is; a contradiction which arises from the condition of man following upon his sinful act. Now this contradiction is necessarily productive of pain. It is the painful protest of the reality which God has fashioned against the false decision of man. Indeed it is quite impossible to define suffering in any other way. Thus in a certain sense sin gives birth to its own punishment. To the extent that this constitutes the refusal of creaturely reality to adapt itself to the way which we, as free beings, map out for ourselves, or to reproduce itself in the material constituted by our own human natures and the world in which we live (a refusal, therefore, which is precisely not that of God himself denying himself to the sinner) – to that extent we call this painful reaction against man's sins from the side of his own nature and of the other elements that go to make up his environment 'temporal punishments due to sin'. This is different from God's refusal of himself, which can likewise be either temporal or eternal according to whether man has finally turned away from God in an exercise of his freedom which has been rendered definitive and absolute by death itself, or whether it has not yet reached this stage.

Of course, even though such a punishment for sin is in itself 'temporal', we must consider how it is affected in cases where man's perversion has reached a fixed and final stage – in other words in which the original contradiction of the order of created reality within and without man has been renewed again and again, and even where it is immovably adhered to. In such a case this contradiction, which is itself temporary, i.e. able to be reversed, is transformed into an eternal punishment. It should not be thought that this implies any denial of the fact that these temporal punishments are decreed by God. The world (both within and without man) [154] with which man comes into contradiction through his own guilt as objectified in his own acts, is a concrete world which in its concretion was created not by man and his freedom but by God. Who has not already experienced the fact that a sin alters in its effects according to the particular situation in which it is made actual? The sin as actually carried out always consists of a synthesis which man himself cannot calculate beforehand of two distinct elements: the original decision which he takes in his freedom, and in which he freely exposes himself to this element of the incalculable and the actual material in which the sinful act is made actual. It is only as realised in this material that the sinful act is brought to the 'fulness' of its nature. In the dimension of concrete reality this situation in which our sin is committed is determined not by us but by God. And there can be no mistaking the fact that in this concrete situation it is God's free disposition that determines what kind of punishment this sin is to incur. This means that this punishment for sin, considered as the reaction of 'extra-personal' reality (both within and without man) to sin is also a punishment imposed 'from without', even though it was provoked precisely by the sin of man himself. Once we have grasped this fact we can also understand what is meant by the teaching of the Council of Trent (cf. DS 1543, 1689, 1712, 1715) to the effect that for the baptised Christian who has sinned again after baptism the fact that his sin has been forgiven, whether within the sacrament of penance or outside it, still does not mean ipso facto that the temporal punishments due to sin are always and necessarily forgiven. Relying upon the tradition of penance which has come down to her from the time of the Fathers, the Church teaches that when one whose sins have already been blotted out by baptism, and who has thereby become a member of the holy Church, sins again, God is not prepared to bestow upon him, or to offer him straightway, in the very act in which the sacrament takes effect, all those graces which he needs in the concrete in order to accomplish the process of transformation and integration.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Yet it is only through this process that the debt of 'temporal punishments due to sin' can be paid to the full and so wiped out. God, then, is not prepared simply to bestow all the graces necessary for this in a single blessed moment in which the whole human life of the sinner is transfigured, and in which the process of transformation is a completely painless one. This is something that we notice all too vividly in our own personal experience. Viewed from this aspect it is much more difficult to explain how the baptism of an adult can constitute a remission of this kind of all the temporal punishments due to sin, as tradition teaches. This, however, is not the real question which we have to investigate at this point, although we can say that this teaching [155] applies only to those cases in which all 'venial' (as well as mortal) sins really are repented of. And, as is shown by the findings of the individual's own concrete experience precisely of the after-effects of his former sins and because of these, this kind of repentance is not so easy. We should therefore reflect upon these truths, and recognise clearly the fact that probably all that is meant by the statement in question is that with regard to the grace of God in baptism all is indeed conferred all at once which is necessary for such a total overcoming of sin. Though probably the question remains open whether the individual really uses the opportunity offered to him in this. But in the sacrament of penance taken in isolation this opportunity is not offered to him in the same way at all. If, therefore, we recognise these facts, we shall not say that the statement in question would in any sense invalidate the explanations we have given so far.

The dissolving of the after-effects of former sin, with the sufferings they cause, the total integration of the whole person, including those extra-personal levels in his makeup, can take place in various ways in the 'fresh' radical decision on man's part to orientate himself towards God. It depends on other factors besides the 'good will' of man himself. His new act and the measure of its success are also conditioned by the situation, by the circumstances, the 'material' in which and upon which it has to be made actual. Now this situation and this 'material' are contingent factors. They are subject to change and can themselves become new and different. They depend, in the last analysis, on the dispositions of God, however we may think that these are applied in the individual case. Now according to the way in which, either through natural causes which are subject to his providence or through his own personal and gracious interventions, God forms this material which is in turn presupposed to the acts and decisions of man, and which influences these at the interior level, this process of dissolving and transforming the after-effects of sin becomes quicker or slower and takes place with more or less suffering and pain.

Certainly everyone has already experienced in the concrete what has here been stated in very abstract terms. Who, for instance, has not already noticed that the degree of his repentance in a given case, its power to remain constant, depends not only upon the 'good will' which 'commands' him to such repentance, but also upon the situation, upon the sudden light of knowledge which is not under man's own control, upon an inward disposition such as no 'despotic' control which man may exercise over himself by the use of his own intelligence and free will, is capable of giving. Every Christian knows that 'tears of repentance' are not simply something that man can count upon in the same way that he can take as his [156] basis for the working out of his salvation the grace that is extended to him from above. Who has not already suffered from his own impotence really to turn himself into a different man? Who has not noticed after a 'good confession' that he has still, in many respects, remained the old man, that all the secret roots and impulses of his sin, the very sin that he has repented of and confessed, are still constantly present in him, and, moreover, not merely those which simply belong to man's lot, the circumstances in which he finds himself placed etc. from his birth onwards, but also those which effectively owe their existence to his own fault? God, therefore, can remit the 'temporal punishments due to sin' which we have incurred by giving us the best possible chance, the opportunity to rid ourselves as totally and swiftly as possible

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of the burden of our past which is at once the consequence of, and punishment for our sins. From this point of view we can, in many cases, interpret the disposition and course of a human life under God's hand as something that is almost visibly unfolding before our eyes. Throughout the life in question God is gradually breaking down false attitudes which we have sinfully built up within us. Those who were formerly overbearing, stupid and selfish through their sins he makes mild, wise and unassuming. It is true that under certain circumstances a supreme hour may arrive, such as that of martyrdom or some other ultimate decision, in which that which has still not been attained to after a long period of ascetical striving systematically practised can be brought to its full ripeness and purity in a man (of course in such a case it still remains true that perhaps the chance of such an hour of destiny may be missed if this ascetical striving, the faithfulness which is achieved in the pettiness and monotony of everyday life, has not gone before).

There too we are not masters of our own course. We cannot discover such paths of life or such hours of destiny simply by ourselves. They have to be bestowed upon us. We know that (since flesh and blood do not inherit the kingdom of God) in the case of every man whom God admits at all to a share in his eternal kingdom in the glory of his own holiness, he will so guide him either before or after his death that he arrives at the full ripening of his own nature precisely as that particular individual. But the actual process by which this is achieved can precisely be either swifter or slower, easier or more painful. How it takes place is under God's control. In effect, then, there is – as in the very nature of the case we are supposing there must be – a 'remission' by God, in the sense just indicated, of the temporal punishments due to sin. But we do not have to think of this as though some sentence of punishment had been imposed in a merely external and juridical sense, with no intrinsic connection (apart [157] from the sin committed by the subject in the past) with his moral state. We do not have to think of the remission by God as granted simply in the way that a civic amnesty is granted (for this bestows 'grace and favour' upon the reformed and irreformable in equal measure). If this were the case then we would have to think of the temporal punishments due to sin as constituting a merely external and vindictive type of punishment such as leaves the individual who undergoes it wholly unchanged and the same man that he was before. Such a remission would only deprive the individual of the possibility of truly perfecting himself in suffering throughout all the dimensions of his being.

We have spoken above of a radical decision on man's part – we call it the love that is based on faith and hope – which has the power to justify. We have also spoken of a progressive process of integration. Now these two factors are mutually interrelated in such a way that each contributes to the other. The radical decision involves, of its very nature, the will to achieve this integration. The subject wills to achieve, in this radical decision of his, that love in which God and his neighbour are loved 'with his whole heart and with all his powers'. And conversely it is also true to say that this love is itself made perfect in virtue of the fact that it integrates within itself all the dimensions of man's being. The process of integration constitutes the mode in which this love grows and develops until it reaches the due fulness which is proper to it. In the light of this we can understand why the exponents of classic theology should regard it as immediately obvious that once it has reached this state of fulness the love of God and our neighbour also blots out all the 'temporal punishments due to sin'. This blotting out is not a 'reward' (which in the last analysis would be arbitrarily bestowed) for having achieved this fulness of love. On this interpretation how could even the theologians know that the attainment of such fulness in love had this effect? The blotting out of sin is rather the connatural consequence of this love, so that we might actually define it in the following terms: perfect love is that which has orientated 'all the powers', i.e. all the manifold levels of reality in the complexity of man's makeup purely to God, so that these, without themselves being suppressed or deprived of their true natures, become the 'material',

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the 'expression' and the 'manifestation' precisely of this love. If we have managed to understand what is meant, objectively speaking, by the term 'temporal punishments due to sin', then it is also clear that such perfect love blots out all these punishments, indeed that, ultimately speaking, this in the only way in which they can be blotted out. This in itself is enough to enable us to understand that an indulgence, whatever further precisions [158] still remain to be added in defining its precise nature, must be an aid towards this perfect love which blots out all these punishments due to sin, and not a 'means' which excuses us from following this one essential way of compensating for our own past and the 'after-effects' (reliquiae peccatorum) which it has left behind.

It cannot be objected against this interpretation of the temporal punishments due to sin that it is inapplicable to the remission of them which we can obtain in the after-life. For this interpretation in no sense presupposes that after death man intensifies the depths of the radical decision which he took with the aid of supernatural grace in the concrete condition of his earthly life (in other words that he increases his 'degree of sanctifying grace'). Such a view would admittedly be irreconcilable with the doctrine that with regard to the possibility of an increase in supernatural grace and merit death constitutes the boundary beyond which we cannot go. All that this interpretation does presuppose is that this definitive decision for God, which remains unchanged in respect of its degree of intensity also, must (under certain circumstances) still continue to take effect even after death by permeating and shaping all those levels in the human person which are less immediate to his actual personhood. There is no doctrine of the Church which is controverted by this assumption. Even at the biological level growth and final maturity are not simply one and the same thing.

II

Now manifestly we can entreat God that he may, as far as possible, grant us favourable circumstances in his guidance of our lives, such as will as quickly and as beneficently as possible shape this process by which our whole sin-damaged being is transformed once the basic decision of conversion and repentance has been taken. Who has not actually uttered this prayer if he is a Christian (even if he has never hitherto regarded that which he prayed for from this point of view)? Who has not already entertained the idea: 'If I could only die one death, the "true death" in which my entire being with all that it has become throughout my entire life was made over to God in faith and love in an act of radical self-surrender down to the last fibre of my being, so that nothing was held back, nothing denied, but death was the total act of a totally committed faith!' No theologian will deny that through so intense a degree of love for God we would be liberated from all 'temporal punishments due to sin' as well if this grace was bestowed in its entirety upon the individual. Nor can anyone deny [159] that one instance at least of a blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin does exist, that namely which we regard not as an instance but as the definitive instance of this process.

We can, therefore, ask God to grant us the greatest and most favourable chance possible of achieving the maturity of the Christian man as a whole. Such a prayer need not for one moment spring from egoistical promptings or from the impulse to escape from these punishments as 'cheaply and painlessly' as possible. Nor need it involve any denial of the truth that for Christian living too there is a genuine attitude of 'standing by one's past' and 'bearing the consequences', so that to flee from this would be cowardly, unchristian and ultimately speaking futile. Time is, in fact, not only God's gift, through which the most important factor, namely salvation, must be achieved; it is also the restriction which ensures that that which must be achieved shall be achieved only gradually. Otherwise we could never in fact pray for the coming of the Lord by saying: 'Come soon.' The attainment of maturity

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can take place in various ways: in circumstances of anguish, toil and frustration or in the midst of a tempest which we nevertheless feel as blessed; in an attitude of freedom and enthusiasm in which we experience as the blessing bestowed by a powerful love that which seems to another the anguish of a weary process of 'dying'. Thus we can ask God that he may bestow upon us the possibility of a swift and happy maturing process.[2] But we cannot ask him to allow us to share in God's own holiness and beatitude when we are only half ready and immature. Surely we can in all reason ask God to work out the destiny of those who are to be made perfect by him soon and by the more joyful way. And what we can reasonably ask for ourselves that too we can ask – one might almost say still more readily and more selflessly – for others.[3]

This is a prayer to which the Church can lend her support. As a source of truth and a means of grace she has never merely been the external controlling organisation. She is the one Body of Christ in which all the members live for one another, suffer for one another and are brought to [160] perfection for one another. When God regards an individual he always sees him in his place in the whole, as one with Christ the head and as one with all the brethren of this one Christ. No-one lives to himself alone, no-one dies to himself alone. Each one is beloved by God by the very fact that God regards his Christ and his Cross – beloved as part of a single reality which God creates in the midst of mankind, destined as they are to be brought to perfection. Through her prayers, therefore, the Church can give her support to this entreaty for the 'remission of the temporal punishments due to sin'. And when she does this then she does it as that which she is, as the one great union of those who have been sanctified and redeemed, as the Bride of the Lamb, as Head and Body, the one Christ. When God hears her then he regards that which she is as she prays. She is the Church of the saints, the Church of the one Christ. He grants her a hearing for her prayer in virtue of that which he has bestowed upon her prior to any prayer, namely in virtue of the grace of Christ which has been made powerful and victorious in the Church. Indeed the Lord himself says with regard to the hearing of the prayers of the disciples: 'The Father loves you because you have loved me and have believed that I have come from the Father' (Jn 16:27). This is what is meant when we speak of an indulgence as coming from the 'treasury of the Church'.

The 'treasury of the Church' is God's own will to save – ultimately speaking, therefore, God himself – to the extent that this is present in the world with the force of an irrevocable victory in that Christ (as head) who has been decreed by God from all eternity, precisely as 'the firstborn among many brethren', in other words in union with his 'Body' which is the Church. Rightly conceived of, therefore, the significance of this idea of the 'treasury of the Church' is precisely not that some part of its contents is paid out as from some public fund which can be doled out in limited quantities and by instalments, something which otherwise the individual would have had to pay out of his own resources. And the fact that this is not the case means that the question of whether the treasury of the Church could ever be exhausted, seeing that so much is spent and paid out 'from' it, is utterly ruled out from the outset and therefore does not need to be solved by any subtle explanations. For the same reason it is also clear that God is not compelled to grant such a prayer for the remission of the temporal punishments due to sin precisely on the grounds that he can no longer demand that

[2] This point is in itself enough to show that a position adopted by the two doctors of the Church Bonaventure and Albert is incorrect. They supposed, namely, that the more perfect should not concern themselves with trying to obtain remissions of temporal punishments due to sin through indulgences, but that they should rather strive to wipe away these punishments by their own personal penitential practices.

[3] Hence it is that such highly esteemed theologians as Thomas Aquinas, Cajetan, Soto, Suarez etc. uphold the view that an individual can 'apply' the 'satisfactions' he has performed but which he does not need himself to another precisely as the Church does in the granting of indulgences; in other words he can, in a certain sense lend his own indulgences, as it were, to others.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which he has already received (namely out of the treasury of the Church). He looks to the working of his own grace. This is the reason why he guides one to his perfection by this way and another by that. It is done according to his own free and incalculable measure, and in [161] an order proper to him and decreed by him. But because in and through this sovereign power of divine grace there is a truly effective prayer – indeed, according to Christ's words an infallibly effective prayer – and because this prayer can be that of the entire Church, above all because it can and should be applied to the swift and happy attainment of the perfection of the whole man – for these reasons the Church can give her support as intercessor to the prayer of the individual for the remission of the 'temporal punishments due to his sins'. Where she does this in God's grace, where she does it well – for she must always perform such things through her members – where the individual is worthy of having his prayer heard through God's grace, there God hearkens too to the prayer of the Church of his own Son. It hardly needs to be specially emphasised once more that this takes place through the grace of God, who supplies the seed and the final flowering of this prayer and this worthiness according to the unfathomable decrees of his own good pleasure which is in no sense conditioned by any act on man's part.

With these provisos we can say that God gives the individual that which the Church implores on his behalf for his salvation. Thus the Church has always prayed for the sinner, who even as a penitent still bears the burden of his guilt. In the penitential practice of the early Church her intercession during and at the end of the period of penance belongs to the indispensable elements of ecclesiastical penance. She does not merely reconcile the sinner in that, by restoring him to harmony with herself, she imparts to him once more her own Holy Spirit which is the remission of sins; more than this, she actually prays with the repentant sinner for the forgiveness of the whole of his guilt with all its further effects. In view of the fact that it is, in fact, a repentant sinner that is being treated of, this applies in practice primarily (if we adopt the theological distinction and terminology current today) to the remission of the temporal punishments due to sin, to the total overcoming of the guilt. Even today this prayer is constantly being made. It is true that except for a small remnant it has vanished from the penitential liturgy used in the sacrament of penance itself because for practical reasons the accusation, considered as the initiating act of the penitential process, and sacramental forgiveness by the Church have been brought together in a single process, and the result of this is that the period of penance, the full overcoming of sin with all its consequences within man, is left almost exclusively to the Christian penitent who receives the sacrament. Yet for this reason the Church still continues constantly to be she who prays for the blotting out of the sins of her members and the punishment due to these sins, in the prayer of the [162] Our Father, in the sacrifice of Mass, in the penances performed by her saints and of all upon whom the guilt of the age weighs as the Cross of Christ and who bear this Cross in faith and love, in the explicit prayers of intercession which are constantly being made in the most varied forms on behalf of sinners. It is to be hoped that in the projected renewal of the liturgical forms of penance these aspects will be brought out still more clearly.

From such a prayer as this no-one can be excluded from the outset unless he has himself renounced his share in it by separating himself from the Church so that he can no longer be named in the liturgical intercessions in the manner in which the children of the Church have the privilege of being named (cf. 1 Jn 5:16). But in a special way we can include anyone in this prayer of the Church, and God's help can be extended to him in particular by means of an explicit and solemn intercession. Those who believe in the meaning of prayer, and who know what is meant by the Church, can be seized with awe at the following idea: the holy community of the redeemed, the Bride of Christ, stands at the throne of grace on my behalf! From her heart which is unceasingly and inalienably filled with the wordless sighings of the Spirit of God, prayer rises up on my behalf! It is she who says to me 'May Almighty God

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have mercy upon you, forgive you your sins . . . ' It is she who promises this prayer to me, and she does this not merely in general terms or implicitly, but explicitly and as pledged by an act of her supreme authority to pray on my behalf.

III

Such prayer remits, 'bestows' not simply in an authoritative remission of the punishments due to sin as though it were a simple 'amnesty' of a punishment to be imposed in purely external terms that was in question, as though this punishment served only as a manifestation of the majesty of the law. In fact, as the Council of Trent explicitly declares, the Church does not ascribe to herself any power precisely of this kind, of granting an 'amnesty' from a punishment imposed in the sacrament of penance in a purely external ('vindictive') sense, even though precisely in this she is still exercising her power of binding and loosing as defined in Mt 16 and 18 (DS 1667 ff.). Even less, therefore, can she intend to use any such power outside the sacrament, especially since in fact the theologians commonly derive her power to grant indulgences from the same power of binding and loosing as spoken of in the gospels. But the holy Church which – as Tertullian has already said in a similar context – is always hearkened to, [163] can assure the sinner in a special and explicit act, of a prayer of intercession such that it draws down a remission of the punishments due to sin. Now provided that we understand this special prayer in the right way and in the way in which we have attempted to interpret it, we can say: This is precisely what takes place in what we call an indulgence.

In earlier times the Church combined an assurance of prayer of this kind with the remission of a specific ecclesiastical penance which she had, of her own power, previously imposed upon the penitent in the sacrament of penance. But in a certain sense she replaced the effects of the performance of this penance by the penitent with her own intercession. And because of these facts she still gives expression, even today, to the intensity and urgency of this assurance of prayer in the form of sentences of the old canonical penances which in earlier times she remitted for the penitent in such a case. Because the Church prays, because she prays for salvation (and not for earthly things) – on these grounds she knows that she is 'always heard'. But because from the side of him for whom the prayer is offered the effectiveness of this prayer is always dependent upon his prior subjective dispositions (which themselves in turn fall under the powerful and also incalculable dispositions of the grace of God) – because of this we never know in the particular case when and how this prayer attains its goal. In the light of this we already see that the remission has not, and cannot have, the function of either diminishing or replacing the personal penance of the individual concerned. Of its nature the remission can only be aimed at securing that through the help of God that may really take place swiftly and easily which penance itself is also designed to achieve: the total cleansing and total maturing of the individual throughout his entire being, in which his initial endowment with grace is the heart and centre of the whole process. This remission, therefore, can only achieve its due effect where the individual genuinely has the dispositions necessary for penance. For without this there can be no question even of true repentance. Now if this is not the case even a forgiveness of the actual sins themselves is not possible, and therefore neither is it possible to obtain a pardon or remission of the temporal punishments due to sin.

We are presupposing that the process by which the individual is brought to full maturity, a process which is not merely psychological but in a true sense religious also, is not always and necessarily simply completed with death. This is not so even in the case of those individuals who, under the grace of God, have made their orientation towards God definitive and final in their lives and through their deaths. Even from the purely empirical point of view we cannot have the impression that a final and complete [164] integration, in which the individual's basic decision pervades the whole of his being at all of its levels, coincides in every case with his death. Certainly according to Christian doctrine death is the end of that period in which an eternal destiny is worked out. What comes 'afterwards' is not a prolongation of the period or its continuation in an endless series of new ages, but rather the definitive fixing and the eternal validity of what has come to be in time. But unless we wish to regard man as simply 'coming to an end', so that we can then go on to say that he undergoes a 'resurrection' of the flesh, thereby becoming something absolutely new (which, however, would be tantamount to a radical denial of his continuing identity and of eternity as the fruit of time), then, precisely upon a Christian conception of the history man as an individual, we must recognise the existence of a further period of time between death and the final consummation of all things, during which the acts performed in freedom during man's time on earth are brought to their maturity. For this history of man precisely as human only attains its ultimate end and consummation in the resurrection of the flesh, in the transfiguration of all that is real in man taken as a whole, and not merely in a sort of Platonist history of the individual spirit. We cannot picture to ourselves what takes place in it, but this is no reason for denying such a possibility. Every attempt at describing this possibility serves in its result to show how impossible it is to deny that the possibility itself does exist. But even while renouncing any such attempt we can still say this much: supposing that the history of the individual as such is not simply terminated with death; supposing that with death considered as the outcome of a specific and determinate stage in this history belonging to the dimension of space and time man enters still more into an open relationship to the totality of the world (though he does not become 'liberated from the body' in the sense of a negative and empty separation from the cosmos); supposing all this is true, then he experiences the contradiction between the divinely ordained nature of his own being or that of the world on the one hand, and that which he still is through the still surviving effects of his own acts, in which his guilt has been objectified. He experiences these as the painful and punitive consequences of his sin. Now the painful process by which this contradiction is overcome is his purgatory. But just as in this life, so too even after death this process can be slower or quicker, more or less painful or happy, according to the particular circumstances and the prior conditions which determine this in each individual case. That the 'poor souls' may be granted a swifter and more happy maturing process – that is what we pray for when we pray for them, and that is the object of that [165] intercessory prayer of the Church which is promised to us in an indulgence which we gain 'for the holy souls'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

An indulgence, then, implies that the Church agrees to offer her official intercession on behalf of the repentant sinner. And it is expressed in the form of a remission of some (hypothetically imposed) canonical penance (when it is a case of indulgences for the living). The necessary prior condition for this to be achieved is that the individual gaining the indulgence must perform some good work which is specifically prescribed. In earlier times, in which the indulgence properly so-called emerged, this good work constituted primarily some part of the canonical penance which had been imposed or else some other penance, generally easier, which had to be performed in place of the original one. Today the conditions laid down by the Church for gaining an indulgence consist only of some very small task, almost symbolical in its effect. This should not lead us to the point of no longer taking indulgences seriously, as though they were 'cheap' and to be had in great quantities. Many indulgences are offered. Whether many are also 'gained' in reality is another question. An indulgence is only gained in the definitive sense when the intercessory prayer of the Church achieves its goal. But in the last analysis this can only take place in a heart that is disposed to penance, in an individual who, working from a basis of faith and grace, strives through his actions and sufferings to ensure that he may become more and more a new creature fashioned after the image of Christ in all the dimensions of his being. It is in order that this may be achieved that the holy Church assures the Christian, by granting him an indulgence, of her help and intercession.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation [166]

9

ON THE OFFICIAL TEACHING OF THE CHURCH TODAY ON THE SUBJECT OF INDULGENCES

Although the theology and practice of indulgences was certainly most energetically discussed at the Second Vatican Council, no actual decision was arrived at. In the meantime a pronouncement has been issued by the pope, as a result of which a more practicable way has been devised of explaining the nature of indulgence, although admittedly certain basic theological problems still remain, which even this is incapable of overcoming. In connection with this new ordering of the question, we have set ourselves, in the investigation which follows, a relatively limited goal. The central and primary theme of these observations is the fact that the interpretation of the Church's teaching on indulgence as put forward by B. Poschmann[1] and the author[2] is perfectly [167] reconcilable with the Apostolic Constitution Indulgentiarum Doctrina[3] of 1 January 1967. The task of demonstrating this fact, however, will probably bring to light certain further problems in the Church's current teaching on indulgence and its theological interpretation, and these too are of central importance. Because of this broader horizons will spontaneously open up, and our investigations will carry us far beyond this particular theme. It hardly needs to be said that in the 450th anniversary, the

[1] Of B. Poschmann's works, cf. especially: Der Ablass im Lichte der Bussgeschichte = Theophaneia 4 (Bonn 1948); also the reviews of this by H. Weisweiler, Scholastik 24 (1949), pp. 591-594, K. Adam, T.Q. 129 (1949), pp. 242-245, P. Galtier, Gregorianum 31 (1950), pp. 258-274, and K. Rahner (cf. n. 2); B. Poschmann, 'Busse und Letzte Ölung' – H.D.G. IV, 3 (Freiburg 1951), pp. 112-123; idem, 'Die innere Struktur des Busssakraments', M.T.Z. 1 (1950), pp. 12-30.

[2] cf. K. Rahner's review of B. Poschmann's Der Ablass im Lichte der Bussgeschichte in Z.K.T. 71 (1949), pp. 481-490; idem, 'Remarks on the Theology of Indulgences', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 175-201 (= a slightly revised version of the review of Poschmann's work); idem, 'Über den Ablass' St.D.Z. 156 (1955), pp. 343-355, also in this volume, pp. 150-165; idem, 'Ablass', L.T.K. I (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1957), 46-53; idem, 'Sündenstrafen', L.T.K. IX (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1964), 1185-1187; K. Rahner, H. Vorgrimler edd. 'Indulgence', Concise Theological Dictionary (Freiburg/London 1965), p. 277; K. Rahner, 'Indulgences', Sacramentum Mundi, III (Freiburg/London 1969), pp. 123-129. In the meantime other theologians have probably become adherents of the interpretation put forward by Poschmann and myself, cf. M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV/1 (Munich, 5th ed., 1957) para. 272, esp. 609; G. Muschalek, 'Der Ablass in der heutigen Praxis und Lehre der katholischen Kirche', Gespräch über den Ablass = Arbeiten zur kirchlichen Wiedervereinigung, Kirchengeschichtliche Reihe 2 (Graz 1965), pp. 13-37; B. Häring, Das Gesetz Christi I (Freiburg, 7th ed. 1963), p. 518; L. Ott, Grundriss der katholischen Dogmatik (Freiburg, 7th ed., 1963), pp. 525 ff.; P. Anciaux, Das Sakrament der Busse (Mainz 1961), pp. 175 to 192; E. Schillebeeckx, 'Der Sinn der katholischen Ablasspraxis', Lutherische Rundschau 17 (1967), pp. 328-355; probably O. Semmelroth too is taking a similar approach in his commentary on the Constitution on Indulgence (see below p. 170, n. 11). In all the material statements he has made on the subject of indulgence in his own published works during the course of the last twenty years or so the author has at no time adopted any approaches which are basically different from the present one. At the same time, however, notable variations can be perceived between the individual works in his conception of the temporal punishments due to sin, his interpretation in the concrete of the special intercession of the Church and the part played by love as the basic unifying force in his understanding (which is at basis both anthropological and theological) of the process by which the whole man is matured. It is in the context of these basic factors that the true theological nature of indulgence is to be sought. For this reason the author may also be permitted to adduce numerous references in this study in order to bring out in precise and concrete terms the fact that his theory of indulgence is in harmony with the current official teaching of the Church on the subject.

[3] cf. A.A.S. 59 (1967), pp. 5-24; in addition a separate edition of the Constitution has also appeared: Constitutionis Apostolicae Indulgentiarum Doctrina. Breve Cornmentarium, auctore E. Mura, R.S.V. (Vatican City 1967). This edition, published in both Latin and Italian with a commentary, was not available to me at the time this article was written.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

jubilee year of the Reformation, we shall also implicitly be bearing in mind the views of other Churches on the subject of indulgence, even though the more directly controversial problems entailed in this theology will not explicitly be presented.

I

1. We are presupposing that the reader is already familiar with the interpretation of the Church's teaching on indulgence up to the present as presented by us in connection with B. Poschmann's view. Here we shall not be repeating this. The reader will only be able to understand what we have to say here, therefore, if what has already been said about this theory of indulgence is familiar to, and still fresh in his mind. For our present [168] purposes we shall call this theory the 'new theory' because it has already been called so by others.[4] But we do not intend by this to assert that it is new in its material content. On the contrary, as B. Poschmann has shown from the aspect of the history of dogma, it is a revival of a teaching which, historically speaking, belongs to the origins of the theory and practice of indulgence viewed as a whole. The revival of this ancient teaching has been made possible only by purging the teaching on indulgence which has been usual since the Middle Ages of an exaggeratedly legalistic element which has been found repellent. The only reason we ourselves have for calling this teaching 'new' is so that we may have a brief formula for it ready to hand. Nor are we concerned in the study which follows to take up any particular position with regard to the judgments passed upon this interpretation by other theologians. This would lead us too far afield. The question which concerns us, therefore, is not how, for instance, R. Masi's[5] judgment on the 'new theory of indulgences' is itself in turn to be judged.[6] Here let us merely notice in passing that even Masi concedes that the 'new theory' does not contradict any of the defined doctrines of the Church, and does not even, in any obvious sense (nettamente), run counter to the teaching of the ordinary magisterium. One further point may be noticed, namely that (from the opposite point of view) certain [169] circles among Protestant theologians[7] have found it possible to regard our interpretation as a

[4] Thus cf. R. Masi, 'La dottrina tradizionale delle indulgenze', Osservatore Romano, 19 February 1966; idem, 'Nuove idee sulla dottrina delle indulgenze', Osservatore Romano, 26 February 1966. cf. also C. Journet, Teologia della indulgenze (Ancora, Rome 1966). These studies had, of course already been published prior to the promulgation of the Apostolic Constitution, and accordingly efforts were not spared in them to bring their influence to bear upon the new official pronouncement. In the investigation which follows we shall be concerning ourselves only indirectly to show that these efforts to present the theory of indulgence put forward by Poschmann and myself as irreconcilable with the official teaching of the Church did not in fact have any real influence upon the official pronouncement.

[5] cf. Especially the last article by R. Masi, 'Nuove idee sulla dottrina delle indulgenze', Osservatore Romano, 26 February 1966, p. 6.

[6] We are also compelled to refrain from entering into the discussion on the differences in the presentation of the nature of indulgence put forward at the Second Vatican Council. If we were entering into this question we would have to point particularly to the interventions of the Cardinal Patriarch Maximos IV Saigh and of Cardinals Alfrink, König and Döpfner. On this cf. L. A. Dorn, W. Seibel, Tagebuch des Konzils. Die Arbeit der vierten Session (Nurenberg 1966), pp. 233 f., 237 f., 248 ff., 260, 264 etc. The most important passages are now to be found in the work edited by J. Ch. Hampe, Autorität und Freiheit. Gegenwart des Konzils und Zukunft der Kirche im ökumenischen Disput Vol I (Munich 1967), pp. 436-449, 440-442 (Intervention by Cardinal-Patriarch Maximos), 442-449 (Vota of Cardinals Döpfner and König).

[7] cf. K. G. Steck, 'Ablass', R.G.G. I (Tübingen, 3rd ed. 1957), pp. 64-67 (cf. the conclusion: 'How they (Poschmann and K. Rahner) will succeed in getting their views accepted remains to be seen'). The present investigation seeks to show that the earlier efforts were not altogether useless, and also that even apart from our direct contribution they have left at least some traces in the official documents.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

preliminary foothold for a more positive understanding of the Catholic doctrine of indulgence.[8]

2. This study is not presented as a commentary on the Apostolic Constitution viewed as a whole. The question under consideration here, rather, is simply whether the teaching of this Constitution[9] on indulgence amounts to a rejection, whether expressed or implied, of the teaching on indulgence put forward by B. Poschmann and myself, or alternatively whether, having regard to the actual text of it (for this alone is what [170] concerns us) this is not in fact the case. If we had to try to give a commentary on, and evaluation of this Apostolic Constitution taken as a whole, very many points would have to be discussed which cannot be treated of here, or which can only be touched upon very briefly, even though they may deserve the greatest attention from theologians: the question of the nature of the development of dogma in general, for certain noteworthy observations on this question do occur, such as are hardly to be found in any official documents of the Church prior to this one; points concerning the nature of indulgence, the necessity of adapting it or subordinating it to or under the Christian's task of working out his salvation viewed as a whole, in which love is first and last the determining factor; concerning the more ultimate 'roots of revelation' from which first the practice of indulgence[10] and then the theory of it gradually (paulatim decursu

[8] cf. especially H. Bornkamm, 'Thesen und Thesenanschlag Luthers', Geschehen und Bedeutung (Berlin 1967), pp. 60-63. This article includes, on pp. 65-70 certain observations on the Constitution on Indulgence of Pope Paul VI of 1 January 1967.

[9] Of course the question of the theological standing of the Constitution would have to be discussed in general and in specific detail. Here, however, we shall not be treating of this in any explicit sense. The Constitution certainly contains no infallible doctrinal decision but is, nevertheless, an authentic presentation of the official teaching of the ordinary magisterium, so that its particular pronouncements still carry a certain degree of binding force. In estimating the standing of these pronouncements the stated purpose of the Constitution should not be overlooked. In it the Sacrarum Indulgentiarum recognitio promulgatur – the title of the Constitution – in other words it constitutes the new prescription for practical purposes for defining the nature of indulgence in the concrete. For this purpose, therefore, the preliminary doctrinal part serves merely as an extended introduction. But however this may be, we are taking the teaching of the Constitution as established and (though we do not intend to determine its precise theological standing any more closely here) as 'binding'. Admittedly we do hold the opinion that even a 'binding' doctrinal pronouncement on the part of the Church's teaching authority can and must have its meaning illumined and have its full implications brought out. What is binding in our understanding of the Constitution is the actual text of the A.A.S. We shall not, therefore, be taking into account the brief anonymous commentary which was appended to the text of the Constitution in No. 7 of the Osservatore Romano of the 9th and 10th of January 1967. We do not regard this commentary as having much authority, and feel that it has little to do with the real intentions underlying the Constitution. Why, for instance, is Mt 16:18 f. quoted once more as a proof of indulgence, when it is manifest that the Constitution itself deliberately avoids this? Why does the commentary speak of a 'potere di giurisdizione' when the Constitution says nothing of this? Why does it speak of a 'porzione del tesoro', when this is not really in conformity with the approach of the Constitution itself? Why is the commentary silent on the subject of the sancta et justa libertas when the Constitution makes full allowance for this in the use of indulgences by Christians? cf. also H. Bornkamm, Thesen and Thesenanschlag Luthers (Berlin 1967), p. 65, n. 220.

[10] A further point that is discussed more freely than hitherto in this official document of the Church is the historical abuses in the practice of indulgence. At the same time, however, it must be recognised that at least from the pre-Nominalist period onwards a critical attitude had all along been adopted in the theory of indulgence. (See below p. 198, n. 58.) Moreover the Fourth Lateran Council (cf. D.S. 819) and the Council of Trent (cf. D.S. 1835) had already adopted a clearly critical attitude towards abuses (cf. the further inclusion of these quotations in No 8 with notes 41-42). It is explicitly conceded that there have been indulgences which were 'indiscreet and unnecessary', through which the attitude and the practice of repentance were deprived of their pristine force ('enervated'). Besides this it is also explained that because of the 'perverse quest for gain' the word 'indulgence' has been rendered obnoxious (we may contrast this with the formulation of the Tridentine text of D.S. 1835 adduced as a basis for the statement: ab haereticis blasphematur!). In considering these concessions it must be born in mind that such indulgences were still granted precisely by the Church (by whom else?). On the concrete practice of indulgence in the period immediately preceding the Reformation cf. E. Iserloh, Luther zwischen Reform und Reformation. Der Thesenanschlag fand nicht statt = Katholisches Leben

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

saeculorum) developed; concerning the concept of the thesaurus Ecclesiae, any quantitative interpretation of which is explicitly rejected; concerning the division (so strongly adhered to) of indulgences into plenary or perfect and partial (not imperfect!) ones; concerning the 'holy and justified freedom of the children of God', in virtue of which Christians can themselves decide whether they wish to avail themselves of the indulgences that are offered or to follow the Church's recommendation to gain them, etc. All this cannot be treated of here, even though in itself and viewed objectively it could, perhaps, be more important as a subject for investigation.[11]

[171] 3. While, therefore, in the following considerations we shall be arguing that our own theory of indulgence is reconcilable with the teaching the Papal Constitution, this in no sense implies that this theory is actually put forward in the Constitution itself. It is not the purpose of these considerations to assert, far less to prove, any such thing. The reconcilability of which we are speaking here is not based upon the fact that both interpretations coincide with one another on all material points. On the contrary it is based upon the facts on the one hand that no position whatever is taken up in the papal teaching on the question of the 'new' theory of indulgence, and on the other that this 'new' theory does not come into conflict at any point with what the pope has to say about indulgence. Its teaching is the same, even though, it may be, in one point of detail or another it may be presented under different aspects or with different formulations. Moreover in the position we are adopting here that the 'new' theory is reconcilable with the papal doctrine, we are not asserting even implicitly that the papal doctrine is irreconcilable with the traditional scholastic theology of indulgence. The case here is the same as with many other theological questions. What is formulated in the official teaching of the Church is that [172] common ground which either precedes or else arises from the teaching of the various schools, and which can be reconciled with several of the interpretations of these. The official teaching of the Church may be presented from a different perspective and formulated in different terms than those which we ourselves would uphold, and which we consider to be the more accurate. It may even be (and this is particularly noteworthy) that the terms in which it is formulated belong to a more traditional theory than our own. But as every theologian knows from numerous examples drawn from the history of dogma and theology, this in itself is very far from being a condemnation of the particular und Kämpfen im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung 23/4 (Munster, 2nd ed. 1967), 2 pp. 16 ff., 22 ff., 30 ff. (with bibliography).

---

[11] We may draw attention to one further point here, namely that it is also important from the point of view of theology to notice what the Constitution does not say, contrasting in this with the ideas of scholastic theology. Thus for instance nothing is said about the idea that there is such a thing as a penance which can be performed by the Christian even though there is no question of applying its value in terms of 'satisfaction' as a blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin since the individual himself has no need of it, so that so far as he is concerned it is 'extra', and precisely for this reason can be applied to others. The use at one point (cf. Norm 3) of the expression 'in modum suffragii' (in the case of the indulgences applied to the dead) without any further explanation is certainly striking. The expression per modum absolutionis or per modum solutionis, however, are not used. Whereas in scholastic theology it is customary to invoke the support of Mt 16 and 18, this is avoided here, even though the expression 'claves Ecclesiae' at one point (cf. No 8) does occur. This, however, cannot ipso facto be identified with a potestas jurisdictionis. On the development of the theology of the power of the keys cf. L. Hödl, Die Geschichte der scholastischen Literatur und der Theologie der Schüsselgewalt I (Munster 1960); V. Heynck, 'Der richterliche Charakter des Busssakramentes nach Johannes Duns Scotus', Franziskan. Studien 47 (1965), pp. 339-414; idem, 'Die Diskussion über die Notwendigkeit und Begründung der Beichtjurisdiktion bei dem Anonymus O.P. des Cod. Vat. lat. 985', Wahrheit und Verkündigung. Michael Schmaus zum 70. Geburtstag, L. Scheffczyk, W. Dettloff, R. Heinzmann edd. (Paderborn 1967), Vol I, pp. 1049-1071. Up to the present I have not yet heard of any extensive commentaries on the Apostolic Constitution. I should, however, draw attention to the commentary of O. Semmelroth which has appeared in the meantime under the title 'Apostolische Busskonstitution. Bussordnung der deutschen Bischöfe. Apostolische Konstitution über die Neuordnung des Ablasswesens' as number 2 in the series Nachkonziliare Dokumentation published by the Paulinus-Verlag (Treves 1967), cf. esp. pp. 51-71.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological opinion we are upholding. Let it be willingly and explicitly conceded that something of this sort may be the case here, for instance in expressions such as dispensare, clavis Ecclesiae, in the rules for distinguishing between plenary and partial indulgences etc. But no theological argument can be drawn from any such differences to prevent us from placing a different theological interpretation upon a doctrine of the Church which we all hold in common.[12]

II

Critics of the 'new' theory of indulgence have oversimplified and distorted it, regarding the pith and essence of it as consisting in the fact that according to this theory the remission of the temporal punishments due to sin – as distinct from penances imposed by the Church – is achieved not by an official exercise of the Church's (and especially the pope's) jurisdiction but (in so far as it takes place at all) through the 'prayer' of the Church. The traditional doctrine on indulgence, on the other hand, so these critics maintain, upholds this act of the Church's jurisdiction and regards this precisely as constituting the decisive difference between indulgences and other ways of wiping out the temporal punishments due to sin. It is just this difference between the conceptions that the Constitution seems to take cognizance of in No. 8. On this point it seems to decide in favour of the traditional doctrine, and so too to adopt that definition of indulgence which is set forth in No. 8 and in No. 1 of the norms: An indulgence is an auctoritativa applicatio et dispensatio 'thesauri Ecclesiae' for the remission of the temporal punishments due to sins in God's sight, and this authoritative application and act of dispensing (dispensare) is something different from a mere prayer of the Church (non tantum orat). Now the question is [173] whether this explanation involves any real contradiction between the teaching of the Constitution and the 'new' teaching on indulgence. The points which we shall need to take into consideration in order to arrive at an answer to this question fall under several distinct heads.

III

What strikes one first on a careful reading of the Constitution is that in it the granting of indulgences on the part of the Church is not characterised as an act precisely of her jurisdiction. The Church's power of granting indulgences is designated as 'potestas ministrae redemptionis Christi' (No. 8), and as a power 'auctoritative dispensare et applicare' in relation to the treasury of the Church (No. 8 norm 1). Now this is all the more striking in view of the fact that no support is claimed from Mt 16, the classic text for the Church's power of jurisdiction.[13] Certainly it might be said that a potestas which is exercised with 'authority' is, of its very nature, a jurisdictional power. It might be explained that the authors have deliberately avoided qualifying the authority to grant indulgences any more precisely than this because it is necessary to conceive of this power in such a way that we realise that indulgences are possible for the dead also, even though these are no longer subject to the jurisdiction of the Church. But against this we must first reiterate once more that not every potestas auctoritativa is a potestas jurisdictionis (we may recall the potestas ordinis as

[12] The phrase 'resistere potest' of D.S. 3010, for instance, cannot be adduced either against a Thomist conception of efficacious grace, even though the formulation of it was originally 'Molinist'.

[13] On the interpretation of this text cf. the works of L. Hödl (cf. above n. 11), P. Anciaux, La théologie du sacrement de pénitence au XIIe siècle (Louvain 1949), K. Fröhlich, Formen der Auslegung von Mt 16:13-18 im lateinischen Mittelalter (Dissertation, Basle, 1960).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exercised, for instance, in the power of consecrating and dispensing the Eucharist). Those, therefore, who wish to identify the 'potestas auctoritativa' of the Church referred to here with a specifically juridical authority have first to prove their case. For this identification is not expressed in the actual text of the Constitution itself, at any rate explicitly. A further point is that the whole presentation of the nature of indulgence from No. 8 to norm 1 is manifestly intended to describe indulgence as capable of being 'applied' to the dead as well (cf. norm 3). But in such a context how can it be supposed that it is an act of 'jurisdiction' that is intended, especially in those cases in which the indulgence can be gained only for the dead (cp. norm 15)? It cannot refer to the dead person himself (cf. norm 3: 'in modum suffragii'). But in such a case how precisely can it refer to the living who gain the indulgence? If, therefore, this question is to be answered in the affirmative [174] at all, does this not imply that in order to support such an answer constructions have to be placed on the text of the Constitution which are no longer credible. In the case supposed is it the Church herself who performs the suffragium? If so then in this case also the general definition of indulgence must still apply. In other words suffragium must be able to be combined with the exercise of the Church's auctoritativa potestas. If, on the other hand, a negative answer is given to this question, in other words if the living person who gains the indulgence is the one responsible for the suffragium,[14] still, even then, we can say that it is the dead person himself who gains the indulgence precisely as such, and in that case what does the potestas auctoritativa of the Church bring about in this living individual? Is that which, ex hypothesi, is brought about in this individual while still living itself an indulgence?

Thus if we accept the idea of the applicatio et dispensatio of what is contained in the 'treasury of the Church' merely at its face value and merely as an exercise of some potestas auctoritativa, and then seek to interpret this primarily as an act of jurisdiction, we shall lose ourselves in a whole thicket of thorny questions. A further and final point is that the concept of a jurisdictional power in this sense and with so wide a range of possible applications is somewhat obscure when its application is extended beyond the 'visible' society of the Church and used to relate the members of the Church to one another as subordinates or superiors in respect of all the activities of the Church considered precisely as a society. This becomes clear, for instance, in the controversial question of what is implied by saying that the absolution given in the sacrament of penance has a 'judicial' character.[15] If we do think of the authority of the Church [175] in this way we are in constant danger of reducing the terms we use to the level of clichés, the precise meaning of which as we apply them in general and in particular can no longer be verified. Our course should be, rather, to leave open the question of whether the potestas auctoritativa spoken of in the Constitution is to be identified with the [14] In No 8 mention is made of the fact that the believers undertake a 'transferre indulgentias in suffragium defunctorum'. In norm 3 it is not so clear who precisely is the subject who 'applies' the indulgence to the dead (cf. also norm 15).

[15] cf. also K. Mörsdorf, 'Der hoheitliche Charakter der sakramentalen Lossprechung', T.T.Z. 57 (1948), pp. 335-348; idem, 'Der Rechtscharakter der iurisdictio fori interni', M.T.Z. 8 (1967), pp. 161-173; on the problem cf. also E. López-Doriga, 'Die Natur der Jurisdiktion im Busssakrament', Z.K.T. 82 (1960), pp. 385-427. cf. the bibliography already given on p. 170, n. 11. When, for instance, Mörsdorf sees the power of jurisdiction (L.T.K. V, 2nd ed., 1220) as consisting in the enacting of laws, pronouncing of judgment and government (this is his account of the Church's supreme authority), how is it then possible to apply any such concept so as to throw light upon the potestas auctoritativa with regard to the remission of the temporal punishments due to sin in God's sight – especially as, for one thing, the effect of a jurisdictional act in the true sense, as directed towards a subordinate, is independent of his assent, whereas the blotting out of a punishment due to sin in God's sight is possible only with the voluntary collaboration of the recipient of the indulgence? To the extent that a potestas jurisdictionis is made effective in the sacraments, its effects bear upon the communal life of the Church, not upon the relationship of the individual to God. The concept of the potestas auctoritativa as applied to indulgence must therefore be developed independently of any speculations about the Church's power of jurisdiction. On this problem cf. the observations of E. Schillebeeckx, op. cit., pp. 336 f., 342 f., 345 f., etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

jurisdictional authority, and to avoid losing ourselves in a process of conceptual acrobatics which is rich in verbiage but ultimately devoid of content. And if we take this course with regard to the meaning of the term potestas auctoritativa we shall straightway be in a position to deduce from the text of the Constitution simply the following two facts:

1. What the Constitution emphasises again and again is the 'dispositions' of the recipient of the indulgence. But once we have accepted the importance of these we come to what is proper to the Church herself, and to the part she has to play in the granting of indulgences. She has an 'ability' (potestas from posse!) which is real, valid and effective in God's sight with regard to the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sins, and the Church achieves this by having recourse to the 'treasury of the Church'.

2. This 'ability' and this recourse consist not merely in 'prayer':[16] 'Non tantum orat sed . . . auctoritative dispensat'.

So far as the first definition of this potestas is concerned the 'new' theory of indulgence certainly does not come into conflict with this in any respect. For the exponents of this theory have expressly emphasised that the Church's act is not confined merely to the remission of the canonical penances which have been imposed, but relates to the temporal punishments due to sins in God's sight. They have further emphasised that this activity is infallibly effective[17] – that is so far as the Church's part is concerned and leaving aside the 'dispositions' of the recipient of the indulgence – and indeed that in reality even according to the 'new' theory of indulgence this activity can be brought under the general concept of the opus operatum, provided this is rightly understood. In other words it certainly is [176] a potestas auctoritativa.[18] Thus we see that the only question at issue can be whether the 'new' theory of indulgence does come into conflict really (and not merely in the sense that it seems merely from the form of words to contradict the Constitution) with the second determination of what is meant by the potestas auctoritativa, in which it is said not to consist merely in 'prayer alone'. This is a point on which we must now speak further.

IV

This brings us to an initial point of very real importance, even if it is not the ultimate and decisive one with which this entire investigation is concerned. The exponents of the 'new'

[16] The anonymous commentator speaks of a 'semplice preghiera deprecativa'.

[17] cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 185 f., 199 f.; idem, 'Ablass', L.T.K. I, 51-52; idem, 'Über den Ablass', St.D.Z. 156 (1955), pp. 351-353 etc., in this volume, pp. 150 f.

[18] For a more precise interpretation of such an act of subsuming cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 192 f., 200 f. with n. 2; also 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence' in this volume pp. 150 f., 163. The actual concept of opus operatum was used less or not at all in the earlier studies. The primary reason for this was that we were making every effort to exclude the misunderstandings which could so easily arise, and which would give the impression that indulgence took effect in an automatic and magical way (see L.T.K. I, 51; Theological Investigations II, pp. 175 ff., etc.). What is at issue here was expressed perfectly adequately from the very nature of the case: 'Always sure of being heard', 'an infallibly effective prayer' etc. cf., for instance, Theological Investigations II, p. 178: '… And a "prayer" of an authoritative kind need not necessarily lack the efficacy of an opus operatum' (thus already in the article as originally published in Z.K.T. 71 (1949), p. 485). For the rest I have already drawn attention, in my review of B. Poschmann's book in 1949 (Theological Investigations II, p. 199), to the fact that Poschmann's theory of indulgence needs to be developed and set on a broader basis precisely with regard to the 'precise nature of an 'authoritative prayer of the Church as distinct from a private intercession'. For a fuller treatment of this cf. the later study of K. Rahner, 'Some Theses on "Prayer in the Name of the Church"', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 419-438; and particularly ad rem, pp. 428 ff., idem, Kirche und Sakramente (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1963), pp. 22-30; idem, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 109-133; cf. also p. 179, n. 26.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theory of indulgence will certainly be of opinion that when the Constitution rejects the idea that the essence of indulgence consists merely in 'prayer alone' on the Church's part this does not imply a rejection of the 'new' teaching on indulgence in itself. Is this in fact correct? The answer to this question needs to be worked out very carefully.

1. First we may permit ourselves a few preliminary remarks with regard to method and approach. In theological controversies there is always a strong possibility that any conflicts that may arise are merely apparent, merely verbal ones. At first two statements are set against one another as affirmation and denial because they use the selfsame words to [177] assent to, or alternatively to reject, the proposition involved. Both parties (or at least one of them) presuppose that the meaning of these words is self-evident. They have this in mind when they use them and so do not pause to enter any more closely into, or to analyse their meaning. Each of the two parties, therefore, regards his own unreflecting understanding of the terms involved as 'obvious', and in doing so perhaps invokes the support of an alleged 'common parlance'. He regards this particular interpretation of the term, therefore, as already granted by the other party. In spite of this, however, the actual situation is that both parties are understanding the term in two different senses, and the contradiction is only apparent, or at any rate not established beyond doubt to be real.[19] The present-day situation in theology is in fact such that the differences between the different departments of it, the problems they raise and the aspects from which the objective theological factors involved can be viewed, are immense. As a result a situation has arisen almost perforce in which one can find little common ground between theologians with regard to the objective meaning of the terminology they use. So that even when they use the same words we can never be too hasty in assuming that they are using them in the same sense, nor yet shall we find it easy to establish whether this is in fact the case or not. The reason is that every explanation of what particular sense is intended is itself in turned expressed in words which, once more, remain undefined and perhaps are still not in all cases 'clear'.[20]

[178] 2. The Constitution speaks of an activity defined as 'tantum orare', and sets this idea in opposition to that of a potestas auctoritativa. But it is not very easy to establish from this opposition exactly what is meant by the idea of 'prayer alone'. For it has already been shown that potestas auctoritativa is itself an idea that includes several different dimensions. Now it is not less true that 'prayer' alone taken in itself is a concept with several different levels of meaning, so that it is not straightway or ipso facto clear from the use of it in the Constitution that every conceivable level of meaning is intended to be excluded in defining the nature of indulgence. Even if we do not think of the private prayer of the individual Christian, since in fact in this context it is the prayer of the Church that is being referred to, still even this

[19] The present-day controversy with regard to the concept of 'transsubstantiation' and 'transsignification', their significance and the extent to which they are or are not identical with one another is probably a good example of the methodological difficulties which arise in contemporary theology and which we have in mind here. On this cf. O. Semmelroth, 'Eucharistische Wandlung' G.u.L. 40 (1967), pp. 93-106; E. Schillebeeckx, Die eucharistische Gegenwart (Düsseldorf 1967); J. Ratzinger, 'Das Problem der Transsubstantiation und die Frage nach dem Sinn der Eucharistie', T.Q. 147 (1967), pp. 129-158; W. Beinert, 'Die Enzyklika "Mysterium fidei" und neuere Auffassungen über die Eucharistie', T.Q. 147 (1967), pp. 159-176; I. van Hout, 'Fragen zur Eucharistielehre in den Niederlanden', Catholica 20 (1966), pp. 179-199; P. Schoonberg, 'Transsubstantiation: How Far is this Doctrine Historically Determined?', Concilium 4/3 (1967), pp. 41-47.

[20] cf. for instance the problems entailed in the use of the concept of 'person'. On this K. Rahner, Mysterium salutis II (Einsiedeln 1967), pp. 342 ff., 349 ff., 353 ff., 364 ff., 385 ff. I have attempted to point out that this situation has the most radical implications for contemporary theology and for the Church's official teachers. I have done this in a major study which appeared in 1968 (Häresien in der Kirche heute?, Quaestiones Disputatae, Herder, Freiburg 1968). cf. also K. Rahner, 'Philosophy and Philosophising in Theology', Theological Investigations IX (London and Baltimore, 1972), pp. 46-63.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concept of the prayer of the Church contains many different levels of meaning.[21] It can be the prayer of a monk reciting the prayers of the office and praying in choir 'in the name of the Church'.[22] It can be an official prayer or collect, for instance for fine weather, recited by a priest. It can be the sort of prayer through which a blessing or some other sacramental benefit is conferred. It can be the form of prayer which as such constitutes the ritual of the anointing of the sick as opus operatum, and precisely as such it is an act of the supreme, that is of the actual sacramental 'power' of the Church acting from her 'authority'[23] (potestas ordinis). In any case the 'prayer of the Church' is an extraordinarily variable entity. It varies in respect of those in the concrete whom it is intended to support, in the way in which particular members of the Church are commissioned to perform it in the name of the Church and as the prayer of the Church, in the 'object' prayed for,[24] in the way in [179] which it takes effect and in the degree to which its effect can be said to be 'assured'. So variable is it, indeed, that one particular 'species' of this prayer can be conceived of – indeed actually exists – which (so far as the part played by the Church is concerned) is perfectly reconcilable with the element of infallible effectiveness and even with the concept of the opus operatum.[25]

Is it then the case that the terms of the Constitution are such as to assert that of all the conceivable 'varieties' of the Church's prayer not a single one enters in any sense whatever into the nature of indulgence, or are only some varieties excluded in this sense? To this question the Constitution itself supplies no answer. Yet it is legitimate to raise this question because there is a prayer which involves no real opposition to a potestas auctoritativa, but actually itself constitutes such a potestas and in a particular case can actually make the nature of this in the concrete more comprehensible than when the concept of potestas auctoritativa is used merely by itself. For if we take this latter course the idea which seems to be implied by it is legalistic in a sense which in reality is not intended for one moment, or at any rate is not positively inculcated as part of the Church's official teaching. To this legitimate question, therefore, to which no explicit answer can be found in the Constitution, we can, without strain, supply the following answer: the only kind of 'prayer of the Church' which is excluded as inadequate to define the nature of indulgence is that which is not conceived of as an act of her authoritative power.

3. Now the 'new' theory of indulgence has all along had this particular 'species' of the 'prayer of the Church' in mind when it has sought to define the nature of indulgence as a prayer of the Church for the remission of the temporal punishments due to sin in God's sight. Materially speaking, therefore, it does not run counter to the teaching of the Constitution. The exponents of this theory have never had in mind 'just any kind of' prayer of the Church.[26]

---

[21] cf. K. Rahner, 'Some Theses on "Prayer in the Name of the Church"', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore, 1966) pp. 419-438.

[22] On this cf. the Constitution on the Liturgy of the Second Vatican Council, Nos. 84, 85, 90, 98, 99.

[23] On this cf. D.S. 1695 and the well-known theological considerations on the anointing of the sick.

[24] This aspect too is of great importance. Where the object of the prayer is certainly salvific (this is generally not the case, but remains in doubt) it is far easier to conceive that the 'prayer' (as, for instance in the anointing of the sick) is identical with an act of the Church's potestas auctoritativa, as for instance in the case of a prayer (even of the Church) for fine weather, physical health etc. In the light of this alone it becomes clear that we must distinguish between the 'prayer' of the Church in indulgence and the prayer of the Church in the sacramentals. The commentator on the Constitution totally fails to perceive the real problem, therefore, when he suggests that the 'new' theory of indulgence is affected by the fact that a 'semplice preghiera deprecativa' is ruled out in it. On this cf. p. 175-176, n. 17 and above all 18, p. 179, n. 25, and n. 26, where attention is drawn to earlier arguments put forward by the author. cf. also K. Rahner, 'Ablass', L T.K. I, 51, 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence', in this volume, pp. 150-165.

[25] Apart from the evidence adduced in n. 18 cf. also Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 185, 199; Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 433-435.

[26] In view of the evidence already cited or referred to this is indisputable. cf. also L.T.K. I, 51: 'The essence of indulgence, therefore, consists in the special prayer of the Church…' (italics by the author). Furthermore

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

They intended to refer to a prayer in which the [180] Church, exploiting her nature to the full as Ministra Redemptionis (cf. the Constitution on Indulgence No. 8 norm 1) and as Ecclesia ut unum Corpus Christo Capiti iuncta (cf. No. 6) stands as intercessor on behalf of her member. They intended to refer to a prayer of a quite specific kind, one which of its very nature can be infallibly sure of being heard. It is this for four reasons: because of the indefectible and assured holiness of the praying Church[27] (though these attributes are certainly not present in the individual man), because of the task entailed by this very nature which she has to act as intercessor on behalf of her members,[28] because of the gift for which she is praying, which is certainly salvific in a positive sense[29] (this is something which we cannot know in the case of many other gifts which are prayed for), and because the pope, so far as his contribution is concerned, has given his authorisation to this prayer in the highest possible sense. It was emphasised by the exponents of this new theory – albeit in a different context – that such a prayer can actually be identical with the exercise of a supreme authoritative and sacramental power and also that in the case of indulgence it is capable of having the force of an opus operatum.[30]

A prayer precisely of this kind transcends the situation in which we have to opt between two alternatives, 'mere prayer' on the one hand and the act of a potestas auctoritativa on the other. And for this reason it is not excluded by the teaching of the Constitution. At most, therefore, it could be said that the Constitution rejects a particular interpretation of the 'new' theory which, however, even apart from its being rejected here, oversimplifies and falsifies the theory itself, and goes against its true meaning to an intolerable extent (indulgence = any kind of prayer of the Church). Already at this stage in our considerations, therefore, we can boldly put [181] forward the proposition that the Constitution and the 'new' theory cannot be proved to be irreconcilable.

4. This becomes still clearer when we explicitly remind ourselves of precisely why the 'new' theory seeks to interpret indulgence as a prayer of the Church (made with authoritative power and 'in itself' infallibly effective). Two principle reasons are assigned for this.

(a) If the indulgence precisely as such is conceived of as a prayer of the Church, but precisely as prayer, then the danger of misinterpreting the nature of indulgence is essentially diminished. It is all too easy to represent the effectiveness of indulgence in terms which are extremely mechanical and automatic. Often the role of the personal penance of the recipient of indulgence is reduced to a minimum and regarded merely as an external prior condition for its reception rather than as an intrinsic element and as a concrete measure of the objective way in which the gaining of the indulgence takes effect in its recipient. It cannot be contested that there have been, and that there still are, theologians who conceive of indulgence in these terms. It has still to be shown that their theories, so far from being demanded by the everything depends upon the actual manner in the concrete in which such a 'prayer' is understood and proves to be effective in the case of indulgence also. For a more precise statement of the theological nature of this prayer cf. especially apart from the references already adduced, K. Rahner, 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence', this volume, pp. 150-165.

---

[27] On this cf. the proof passages adduced on pp. 175-176, 178-179 and in nn. 17, 18 and 24-26. For further illumination on the theology of the subject cf. above all K. Rahner, 'The Church of the Saints', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore 1967), pp. 91-104; 'Church of Sinners', 'The Sinful Church in the Decrees of Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI, pp. 270-294.

[28] cf. K. Rahner, 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence' in this volume, pp. 150-165; idem, Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 419 ff., idem, 'Why and how Can We Venerate the Saints?', Theological Investigations VIII (London and Baltimore, 1972), pp. 3-23, idem, 'One Mediator and Many Mediations', Theological Investigations IX, pp. 169-184.

[29] cf. above p. 178, n. 24 with references.

[30] E. Schillebeeckx regards the essence of indulgence as consisting also in an 'assurance of the intercession of the whole Church given by the authorities of the Church' (p. 352), though admittedly he does not explain any further the specific character of this prayer.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Constitution, are actually ruled out by it, if we understand it rightly and work out all its implications to the full. The misinterpretation in question is excluded right from the outset, however, if indulgence is understood as a prayer of the Church (of a quite specific kind), because however infallible a prayer made on behalf of another may be in itself, in its objective effectiveness in the concrete instance it depends upon the dispositions of that other. Furthermore these dispositions must also correspond to what the 'object' of the prayer is which the petitioner seeks to attain to in the specific case. There is a possibility here, therefore, of misunderstanding the act of the 'authoritative power' of the Church in a sense which is extremely dangerous for the practice of indulgence, the possibility, namely, of holding that this authoritative act is absolutely incapable of failing to achieve the ultimate effect which it is intended to achieve, provided only that on the part of him for whom it is intended a few conditions are fulfilled which are easy to fulfil and also easy to ascertain. Now in terms of our objective statement of the case and of our religious teaching, this danger is not sufficiently guarded against when we speak only of the potestas auctoritativa of the Church. Once this is realised we can speak easily and in terms which can be understood of the immediate, and not merely of the ultimate object of this prayer: of the grace which the Christian receives to perform his penance in a spirit of love[31] in order [182] thereby to attain to the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sins.

(b) Once we have recognised that the 'prayer of the Church', understood in the right sense, enters into the very nature of indulgence, this should have the effect of unequivocally ruling out one quite specific conception of what a 'jurisdictional act' means as applied to indulgence, a conception which, if it is not actually directly and explicitly ruled out by the Constitution, certainly forms no part of its teaching. The conception we have in mind is this:[32] that the indulgence takes effect simply and only in virtue of the fact that a specific part of the 'treasury of the Church' is assigned to an individual (per modum solutionis: the Church 'pays' what the sinner would have to pay), and this acts as a substitute for the reatus poenae temporalis which has been imposed by the justice of God in its purely vindictive aspect. This part of the treasury of the Church is simply bestowed upon the sinful individual provided only that he has no actual attachment to sin as reatus culpae, without him himself having to change anything else. Now precisely this conception of indulgence as being essentially jurisdictional is excluded from the outset once we admit the element of 'prayer'. For this prayer – authoritative, uttered in 'power' and in itself infallibly effective – is a petition on behalf of the repentant sinner for that grace which is necessary in order that he may more swiftly, more 'surely' and more happily overcome the 'reliquiae peccatorum' which are something more than a mere external debt of punishment conceived of in purely legalistic terms.[33]

At this point we arrive at questions which carry us beyond the problem of a 'terminological' discrepancy between the Constitution and the 'new' theory of indulgence and of how this apparent contradiction is to be overcome, and which bring us directly to a question which is central to the matter itself. Just as the purpose of interpreting indulgence as prayer of the Church is, properly speaking, twofold, so too here we are concerned with the problem of how precisely we should interpret the dispositions necessary for the effective reception of indulgence, and also with the question of how the blotting out of the 'temporal [31] This exercise of penance under the power of grace is the immediate 'object', analogous in a certain sense to the poenitentia interior which constituted the res et sacramentum for Thomas, and brought about by the potestas ordinis of this sacrament. The blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sins, therefore, is the ultimate 'object', analogous to the res sacramenti in the sacrament of penance.

[32] It is found, for instance in L. Billot, cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 185, 191 ff., 199-200 with n. 14.

[33] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence', in this volume, pp. 150-165.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

punishments due to sins' is more [183] precisely to be conceived of. This latter question in turn entails a consideration of what precisely these temporal punishments themselves consist in. Naturally these two questions are closely interconnected. But they must be treated of one after the other even though this procedure must inevitably be a laborious one.

V

1. The Constitution lays special emphasis upon the fact that in order for the indulgence to become objectively effective the recipient of it must have the right dispositions. And it treats of these dispositions in an extremely penetrating way, and far more fully than in previous official pronouncements of the Church on the subject of indulgence. In order to gain the indulgence the believer must be 'apte dispositus' and (cf. No. 8, norm 1) 'debitis dispositionibus praeditus'[34] (cf. No. 10). A 'sincera metanoia et coniunctio cum Deo' is demanded as a necessary prior condition (cf. No. 11). It is stated that for the most part the dispositions for a plenary indulgence can only be attained in a 'congruum temporis spatium' (cf. No. 12) – certainly an insight which has hardly been given any emphasis in earlier teaching on indulgence. In norm 5 it is demanded as a condition for gaining a particular indulgence that the believer shall be 'corde saltem contritus', though here it still surely remains an open question whether this is intended to refer merely to a necessary disposition or to an attitude which is already adequate from all points of view.[35] In norm 7 it is required that 'omnis affectus erga quodcumque peccatum etiam veniale' shall be [184] excluded in order to gain a plenary indulgence. Certainly this is understood as a demand arising ex natura rei. Nevertheless one question still remains obscure, namely how – at any rate with the majority of Christians, for after all these are regarded as capable of gaining a plenary indulgence, this condition can be fulfilled in practical terms, even though it is stated in No. 3 that all men engaged in their earthly pilgrimage commit at any rate minor sins, and commit them every day.[36]

We must avoid adopting a line of thought which is impossible from the psychological point of view, and have due regard to man's real existential situation as it exists in ontological fact.[37] This means that we must recognise that man cannot suddenly, swiftly and at will change his attitude (this is something which, once more, would run counter to the ideas of the Constitution itself) from a sinful inclination on the one hand, or a total conversion on the [34] The explanation of these dispositions put forward here in No. 10, namely love for God, abhorrence of sin, veneration for the communion of saints, is certainly of basic importance both in itself and as a prior condition for the gaining of indulgence. But it still leaves the question open of whether the conditions mentioned here are enough. We shall be able to answer this question in the negative, for in norm 7, to which we are just coming, it is made clear that more is demanded for a 'plena dispositio' of this kind. On the whole question cf. K. Rahner, 'Disposition', Sacramentum Mundi II (Freiburg/London 1968), pp. 92-94.

[35] Ultimately we can answer this question in the negative. Even the justified who, as such, is corde contritus can undoubtedly entertain such an 'inclination' ('affectus erga peccatum' norm 7), so that as a result the possibility is excluded, so far as he is concerned, of any blotting out precisely of the reatus poenae temporalis with which he is still burdened in the concrete. On this cf. K. Rahner, 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence', p. 158 f. of this volume; idem, 'Sündenstrafen', L.T.K. IX (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1964), 1185-1187; idem, 'Ablass', L.T.K. I, 52 f. On the historical background cf. now E. Schillebeeckx, op. cit., esp. pp. 333-349 (Bibliography).

[36] In this we rely primarily upon D.S. 228 and Lumen gentium No. 40, where the most important passages for a Catholic understanding of the doctrine of Simul justus et peccator are to be found. On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 218-230; ibid., p. 279 (with bibliography).

[37] On this cf. K. Rahner, art. cit., pp. 225 f. etc. The whole range of problems involved is discussed in H. Reiners, Grundintention und sittliches Tun (Freiburg 1966) (with extensive bibliography, pp. 204-212 of the same work).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other to the opposite attitude, from any affectus erga quodcumque peccatum etiam veniale to a total conversion or vice versa. We must recognise that the achievement of any such radical conversion cannot be conceived of otherwise than as a gradually maturing process (this is also important for any genuine understanding of what is meant by the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin). And if we do recognise this then we shall recognise also that, to say the least, such arduous and elevated dispositions are required in order to gain a plenary indulgence that they can surely be fulfilled only in a very few cases by the individual who is, and who continues to be, a sinner.[38]

[185] Now when we consider these statements in the Constitution with regard to the necessary dispositions for an indulgence to become effective, surely we can lay down the following conclusions:

(a) The necessity for such dispositions is emphatically insisted upon.

(b) It becomes clear, at least from norm 7, that a temporal punishment due to any given sin cannot be blotted out so long as any kind of affectus towards it still survives. Finally we shall have to conclude from No. 3 that in actual fact this is generally the case in the life of the individual Christian.

(c) In the Constitution the question of how the relationship between these necessary dispositions and the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin is to be conceived of in more precise terms is left completely open. As we shall have to show at a later stage, very different ideas can be arrived at as to what the precise nature of this relationship is. No particular position is adopted upon this question in the Constitution itself. And this means that it cannot be invoked against any particular interpretation of what this relationship consists of such as, for example, is assumed in the 'new' theory of indulgence. What is really meant by this in concrete detail can only be made completely clear in the sixth section of these considerations.

2. The questions of how we are to think of the 'dispositions' in the 'new' theory of indulgence, and how, on the basis of this, we are to conceive in more concrete terms of the relationship which they bear to the effectiveness of indulgence have still to be answered. But we shall be in a better position to develop these questions and to make them comprehensible in connection with the next topic which is to be treated of in the following section. For this question of the dispositions, and of the precise relationship they bear to the manner in which the indulgence is made effective, is most closely connected with the question of the actual temporal punishments due to sins, and how we are to conceive of these in more precise terms. But for this latter question (and the different opinions which theologians hold upon it) we shall have to refer to earlier presentations and to go into these fairly thoroughly. At the same time it is equally essential and unavoidable to repeat certain points here too, and to compare them with the teaching of the Constitution. This in itself is enough to serve as some indication of the subject which we have to treat of in the section which follows.

[186]

[38] In passing it may be noticed that norm 7 presupposes that if a plenary indulgence is not obtained by reason of some deficiency in the totality of the dispositions required, a partialis indulgentia will be gained. But in that case, according to norm 5 and No. 12 the extent of this would have to be conceived of in such a way that through the intercession of the Church as taking effect in the indulgence 'as much' of the temporal punishments due to sin would be blotted away 'as' the actual work of gaining the indulgence itself was capable of wiping away. But surely this must imply some limitation of the effectiveness of such a 'plenary' indulgence which has failed to attain its goal, which presumably represents a departure, to some extent, from the usual idea of this effectiveness as previously taught. Hitherto it was probably assumed that such an indulgence blotted out at least all the temporal punishments due to those sins which really were repented of. Did the theologians responsible for this Constitution really think out this question? In any case we see here also how arduous the dispositions are which are demanded as appropriate for the indulgence to become effective.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

VI

1. How does the Constitution conceive of the 'temporal punishments due to sins' and, arising from this – a point which is obvious – of the manner in which they are blotted out? The first point that strikes us as manifest is that in the Constitution there is no question of distinguishing precisely between the different terms which occur in this context. The term which is, of course, used most often is poena temporalis pro peccatis (cf. norm 1 and frequently), but side by side with this other terms too are used such as poena, this term being employed in a more basic sense than the German Strafe (punishment),[39] and implying everything that is hard to bear in the way of toil, pain, death etc. (cf. No. 2, No. 11); 'reliquiae peccatorum' (No. 3[40]; 7; 8); 'peccatorum sequelae poenales' (No. 3).

In our present context this variation in the use of terms is not unimportant. It is in itself sufficient to show that the Constitution appears to regard the 'painful' (poena) consequences of sin ('reliquiae peccatorum') as something that is interior, connatural and arising from the very nature of sin itself rather than as a punishment which has come to be attached to sin merely ab externo and merely imposed by the 'vindictive justice' of God, which would mean that it was also capable of being remitted by a mere external act on God's part. This point will become still clearer when we consider the arguments adduced by the Constitution for the existence of such poenae temporales pro peccatis debitae. They are presented not merely as imposed by the vindictive justice of God (this being conceived of according to the image of a judge imposing penalties in the context of social and civic life) as something that is supplementary, external to the sin itself and independent of those consequences which flow from the very nature of its guilt. Instead in the Constitution these poenae temporales are considered as the consequences of the sin itself, though naturally they also serve to manifest the holiness and sublimity of God, and in that sense also [187] have, or are capable of having, a vindictive character.[41] Even when a radical conversion has taken place in the sinner the temporal punishment due to sins can, and for the most part actually does, remain at first as a connatural consequence which, considered as the residue of the actual sins themselves (reliquiae peccatorum), is still not ipso facto removed even by the sinner's conversion. It is laid down (cf. No. 2; No. 3) that every sin causes a disturbance of the ordo universalis and constitutes an injury to the immeasurable benefits received by the individual and by the [39] We would have to consider in greater detail the fact that the German term Strafe (punishment) and the Latin term poena are very far from being completely equivalent concepts, and from this point of view alone difficulties arise from the aspects of psychology and religious pedagogy. 'Painful consequences of sin' would be a more accurate translation of poena temporalis pro peccatis. In this we would need never for one moment to overlook the fact that these 'painful consequences of sin' are an expression and an effect of the justice and holiness of God, and that they can and must be experienced and interpreted precisely in this sense in faith. cf. also p. 183, n. 35.

[40] In this passage it is not made clear whether the 'vel' between 'poenae' and 'reliquiae' is to be taken in an explicative or a disjunctive sense.

[41] Because these consequences of sin arise from the painful experience of running counter to the abiding nature of man and of the world in the concrete, these being created by God and being maintained by him in their nature as hostile to the decision of the sinner, it can and must also be said that according to this conception the poenae are 'a divina sanctitate et justitia inflictae' (No. 2). It is easy to recognise that these two aspects and statements are not mutually contradictory from the fact that in the same context these poenae are given concrete expression as dolores, miseriae, aerumnae hujus vitae, mors, factors which are undoubtedly themselves connatural consequences of our own or another's guilt. One further point may be noticed here, namely that the concept of punishment as a connatural consequence of sin does not exclude the concept of an 'external' punishment, but rather includes it: human acts (even the most 'interior') are always brought to their fulness by being objectified in the 'world' (to which the physical side of the nature of the spiritual person also belongs). For this reason too all human activity necessarily experiences the 'repercussion' of this world with its concrete structures so that of its very nature such activity is always constituted as an indissoluble unity of action 'from within' (expression) and at the same time passion 'from without' (impression), actio and passio.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human community as a whole.[42] These consequences of sin which achieve objective reality in the 'world', and which are painful to the sinner, are the concrete manifestations of the 'poenae temporales pro peccatis debitae', and they are not ipso facto, necessarily or in all cases removed by the conversion of the sinner however radical this may be. For this reason these poenae temporales can also survive even after this radical conversion on the part of the individual, a point which the Constitution emphasises as a dogma of the Church, agreeing in this above all with the Council of Trent.

Now if we think out the full implications of these indications in the Constitution, if we realise that the poenae temporales are realised in the [188] concrete first and foremost in the dolores, miseriae, aerumnae hujus vitae and in death (cf. No. 2), then the conclusion which follows logically and inescapably from this is that the blotting out of these temporal punishments due to sins cannot be conceived of according to the conceptual model of an amnesty from a merely externally imposed punishment, a sentence which has so far not been carried out, and imposed by a justice which is, in its turn, external, vindictive and coercive. These injuries and distortions of the ordo universalis cannot be removed by a mere 'amnesty'. They must themselves be removed, though this can take place either more slowly and with greater difficulty or more swiftly and easily (cf. the 'citius' of No. 5 and No. 10, the 'facilius' of No. 9) according to the possibilities that are offered and the efforts made by the individual. This is the basis from which we must, in all logic, form our concept of how indulgences are made effective, and which still remains to be explored in its own right.

The idea of the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sins (whether with or without indulgences) sketched out above is based on what the Constitution itself has to tell us about the nature of these temporal punishments. It can now be seen to be wholly in line with the indications supplied by the Constitution. Certainly one point must be conceded with regard to the presentation in the Constitution itself. After a long theological development in No. 8 it arrives at the formal concept of indulgence as an 'auctoritativa dispensatio' of the 'thesaurus Ecclesiae' 'ad poenae temporales remissionem'. It then proceeds to use this formal concept in its further developments without reflecting any further upon its own previous indications with regard to the nature of the punishments due to sins and how these punishments are blotted out. In other words it is not explicitly brought out what precisely are the middle terms, demanded by the very nature of these indications themselves, which link the authoritative interposition of the treasury of the Church by the Church herself (cf. norm 1, 'Ope Ecclesiae . . . quae . . . thesaurum . . . dispensat et applicat') on the one hand with the actual blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin on the other, seeing that these latter must bring about a positive restoration of the ordo universalis in its full integrity. But the fact that this is not explicitly brought out does not prevent us from paying due heed to the indications supplied by the Constitution prior to the theological development in No. 8 with regard to the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin. We must not forget that these also have an application when it comes to the blotting out of such punitive consequences of sin precisely through indulgences. The purpose of these temporal punishments is defined as 'ad purificandas animas' (No. 2), so that it still has to be concluded [189] that the soul would remain 'unpurified' if these punishments were simply remitted by nothing more than the 'granting' of an amnesty in the purely legalistic sense. It is laid down that according to the witness of the Fathers the aim of the prayer of the Church is [42] Once we recognise that the gracious self-bestowing of God upon the world and its history, and at the same time the personal and physical nature of man are also to be reckoned as part of the ordo universalis, we can say in all freedom (even though the Constitution itself does not take this into account) that any violation of God's law and any personal offence offered to God, who wills to bestow himself in Christ through grace (these are aspects of sin which are emphasised in the Constitution), are, in a true sense, identical with, and ipso facto involved in this damage and distortion done to the ordo universalis.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that the penitent shall be 'washed and purified' (cf. No. 6). Even the faithful in purgatory are described as members of the 'Ecclesia (se ?) purgans';[43] in other words a punishment in the purely vindictive sense is not conceived of even in the case of purgatory. For such a punishment would simply have to be endured without having any saving or enriching effect upon the soul itself. It is laid down that the souls in purgatory 'purificantur' (No. 3). In accordance with this in No. 11 every kind of blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sins (in other words through indulgences also) is qualified as 'sanctificatio et purificatio'. A further point of importance is that the other 'means' of blotting out the temporal punishments due to sins mentioned in the Constitution cannot be reconciled, without the help of arbitrary and artificial devices, with any idea that this blotting out is a purely legalistic amnesty for a mere vindictive punishment imposed ab externo but still not carried out. These 'means' consist in an ever closer union with God and Christ (as head and body) in the unity of love,[44] though admittedly this can be achieved in the most divers ways (the celebration of the Eucharist, the sacrament of penance, the scaramentals, works of devotion, penance and charity: No. 11). Even the temporal [190] punishments due to sins, therefore, are blotted out – whether through indulgence or without it – through that 'purification and sanctification' which takes place through the increase of that love which unites us with God in Christ and the Church. This is to be understood not as a mere 'sentiment' or attitude of mind, but as a power which gradually permeates the whole reality of man in his concupiscent and hitherto sinful nature, and orientates him to God.[45]

In the light of this conception of how the punishments due to sin are blotted out we can look backwards, as it were, and obtain a clearer view of the real nature of these punishments due to sin. This is a point which by this time has already repeatedly been made in contexts in which we reject a purely legalistic conception. On the other hand when we direct our gaze forwards it becomes clear precisely how we are to think of the blotting out of the punishments due to sin, including that which is achieved through indulgences. Indulgence too must be one of the ways in which the Church can contribute to bringing it about that an ever deepening love, and one which more and more integrates all within itself, is increased in the individual. It is a love which 'sanctifies and purifies', and in this way overcomes the 'temporal punishments due to sins' considered as the connatural consequences of the sins themselves. When, therefore, we think out the full implications of the indications supplied by the Constitution with regard to the punishments due to sin and the various ways in which these are blotted out, it becomes clear that in fact there is both a distinction (analogous to the [43] cf. No. 10. The expression is somewhat strange, unusual and lacking in clarity, but this is inevitable in view of the reality with which we are here concerned. It would be better if we could speak of the Ecclesia purganda or the Ecclesia se purgans.

[44] cf. No. 11. In this connection it must, of course, be realised (even though in the treatment of indulgence in the actual Constitution itself there is no clear consideration of this point) that this love consists not merely in that initial and basic orientation to God which must necessarily be present in every true repentance (corde contritus Norm 5), and which removes the reatus culpae as such. More than this, this love must be understood as a love which in increasing measure subsumes the individual, with all the complex realities of his makeup, within itself and in this way blots out the reliquiae peccatorum. This precise point is plainly stated when it is explained in No. 11 that all the means of blotting out the punishments due to sins have this in common ('hoc unum commune'), 'quod sanctificationem et purificationem eo validius operantur quanto aliquis arctius Christo capiti et Ecclesiae corpori per caritatem conjungitur'. This is also the basic pattern of the blotting out of the punishments due to sin through indulgence, and this not merely because what is being spoken of here is all the subsidia of the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin, but also because it is explicitly stated that the blotting out which takes place though indulgence too is subsumed under (inseritur) the ordo caritatis (No. 11). On this cf. K. Rahner, 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence', pp. 158 ff.; idem, 'Indulgences', Sacramentum Mundi III (Freiburg/London, 1969), pp. 123-129.

[45] For further investigation into this cf. especially K. Rahner, 'The Commandment of Love in Relation to the Other Commandments', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 439-459.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

distinction between sacramentum validum and sacramentum fructuosum or that between sacramentum and res sacramenti) and at the same time a middle term between the action of the Church in granting the indulgence and the effective blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin in the recipient of the indulgence. This middle term is the increasing of love.[46] The act of the potestas auctoritativa of the Church in the indulgence, [191] therefore, is to be defined in such a way that it can contribute to this increase in love, and in such a way that it becomes comprehensible why and how it can do this. It is true that in its definition of indulgence (cf. No. 8, norm 1, norm 2, norm 5) the Constitution passes over this 'middle term'. But this is not surprising, and certainly cannot be adduced as a counter-argument against the existence and necessity of this middle term. The fact of the omission may perhaps be attributed to the further fact that it was never sought in the Constitution to take up any explicit position on a controversial question of theology. Alternatively it may have been the intention of the Constitution to formulate the meaning of indulgence precisely in the terms which have up to the present been traditional of a theology which fails to perceive, or even which denies, this middle term. But this does not mean that the Constitution itself identifies itself with any such denial. The omission of this is just as unremarkable as, for instance, in the case of a definition of a sacrament which passes over the significance of its character as sacramentum et res, and regards the sacramental sign and the ultimate sacramental effect as connected directly with one another without any middle term.

2. From this we can now see that the agreement, or at least the lack of contradiction between the Constitution and the 'new' theory of indulgence clearly goes far beyond what we have already established at an earlier stage, chiefly in section IV. The true pith and essence, the really central significance of the 'new' theory does not come to light so long as we reflect merely upon the key term 'prayer'. We shall only come to understand what is the really central point in the whole theory if we take as our starting-point not a juridical concept of the temporal punishments due to sins (after the model of the vindictive punishments imposed by the civil powers ab externo) but a genuinely theological, and so too a genuinely anthropological concept of what these punishments consist in. This also makes it clear how every blotting out of these punishments, and so too that achieved in indulgences considered as a means, really is subsumed (inseritur No. 11) under the ordo caritatis. We have already said enough on this point here and elsewhere, so that what has just been said does not need any further development or justification.

Once we have realised that indulgence has its due place in this sense in the ordo and the increase of that love which blots out sins and also the punishments due to sins, an apparent contradiction in the Constitution [192] itself is also removed. At one point (cf. No. 9) the Constitution states that through indulgence a closer union with God is attained to 'facilius', in other words that the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sins takes place more easily through indulgence than apart from it. This is reminiscent of an idea which often occurs with wide variations in the common conception of indulgence, and which has undoubtedly played a major role in the practice of indulgence hitherto. In earlier conceptions of what indulgence means this 'easier' (and 'cheaper') way of being freed from the [46] It is also clear that what is formally the same effect cannot have several formally distinct causes. But if (a point which no-one will contest) the increase in love is one way of removing the 'peccatorum sequelae poenales' (No. 3), then it necessarily follows that according to a right understanding of the nature of love on the one hand and the basic and self-evident metaphysical axiom mentioned above on the other, that this way must be the way of diminishing the temporal punishments due to sin. All other 'rationes seu viae' (No. 8), all 'subsidia' (No. 11) of this process of blotting out, can be, understood merely as forms and expressions, or as various means by which this growth in love is achieved or made manifest. This applies to indulgence also. But the theologian must not confine himself merely to describing the material differences between these subsidia. He must also work out the formal identity of their cause.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

punishments due to sin is presented plainly and without any further preamble: the debt of punishment is conceived of as a reality which can exist side by side with any and every interior attitude or condition on the part of the individual who is in a state of grace ('dispositions'), including that particular disposition which is demanded as an external prior condition for the effective gaining of the indulgence. The indulgence itself is conceived to remove this debt of punishment (through something else being substituted for it from the treasury of the Church per modum solutionis without anything further being demanded beyond the 'dispositions' (the conditions for gaining the indulgence taken as a whole) already mentioned, even though these of themselves do nothing to remove the debt of punishment. In all this the individual concerned does not have to grow and mature in love amid the pains involved in this process of maturing. All this is implied in the common theory of indulgence. But if it is really the case, then admittedly the blotting out of the temporal punishments due to sin is indeed 'easier'. In fact it is even 'cheaper' than when it takes place in conditions of pain through the individual's own penance, in which love matures until it gradually subsumes the whole sinful and concupiscent being of the individual within itself and so 'purifies' him from the punishments due to sin.

Now against this Paul IV lays down in his Letter, Sacrosancta portiunculae:[47] 'Non est igitur indulgentia facilior via…', but at basis the assistance offered by the mystical Body of Christ to the sinner in his weakness in order that he may really achieve that radical metanoia which still [193] always remains difficult. Indulgence, therefore, is not a substitute for the difficulties involved in the exercise of love, and it is not in this sense that it is the 'easier' way of blotting out the temporal punishments due to sin. Rather the indulgence is the assistance of the Church which supports the works of love, always difficult as these are, and precisely in this sense renders them 'easier'. The indulgence does not make it easier for the individual in the sense that it is a substitute for that metanoia which can actually in itself constitute a blotting out of the punishments due to sin, or in the sense that it takes the place of this metanoia. On the contrary it makes it easier for the individual precisely by demanding this same metanoia of him. The indulgence is not a substitute for the acts of love and penance in the concrete circumstances of the individual's life, but rather the assistance which he needs in order to perform these, and therefore it achieves its true purpose to the extent that these concrete exercises are brought to their fulfilment by the power of grace and through the free will of the individual concerned. If, therefore, on the basis of certain pronouncements of Paul VI, we have rightly interpreted the term facilius as used in the Constitution, then the apparent contradiction in it is resolved. But it does become apparent that even this explanation of Paul VI's only achieves its full force when it is taken in full earnest and accorded its due value on the basis of the 'new' theory of indulgence. According to the common theory of indulgence it can be said that through indulgence we can devitare the necessaria peccatorum paenitentia, at least in part, those penances, namely, which, were it not for the indulgence, we would have to perform in order to blot out the punishments due to sin. But even this point is contested by Paul VI. The 'new' theory states that indulgence is the assistance offered by the Church in order that the sinner may perform, and may fulfil more resolutely and more radically those necessary penances without which there can never be any blotting out of the temporal [47] cf. A.A.S. 58 (1966), p. 632. In note 39 the Apostolic Constitution actually quotes this text: 'Iis vero christifidelibus, qui paenitentia ducti hanc "metanoian" adipisci nituntur, eo quod post peccatum eam sanctitatem affectant, qua primum baptismate inducti sunt in Christo, obviam it Ecclesia, quae etiam largiendo indulgentias, materno quasi complexu et adiumento debiles infirmosque sustinet filios. Non est igitur indulgentia facilior via, qua necessariam peccatorum paenitentiam devitare possumus, sed est potius fulcimen, quod singuli fideles, infirmitatis suae cum humilitate nequaquam inscii, inveniunt in mystico Christi corpore, quod totum "eorum conversioni caritate, exemplo, precibus adlaborat" (Const. dogm. de Ecclesia Lumen gentium c. 2 n. 11)'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

punishments due to sins. According to the common theory of indulgence indulgences and penance are – at least in part – two alternative means of blotting out the punishments due to sin set side by side for the individual to choose whichever he likes. So that the believer acts prudently when he avails himself of the first means, namely indulgence, because this way is simpler and 'easier'. According to the 'new' theory of indulgence indulgence is one 'means', namely the assistance of the Church, by which we can achieve the other 'means' (namely penance), this second being always, everywhere and without exception indispensable.

In the light of this a further difficulty can now be resolved which seems to tell against the 'new' theory (and also against the pronouncements of [194] the Pope quoted above). This is one and the same problem as that which is also to be met with again and again in the theology of the sacraments when we seek to bring 'sacramental' devotion and the 'existential' devotion which we achieve in the concrete individual circumstances of our lives into a genuine relationship one with the other – in other words when we reject the false conception of the opus operatum as a more comfortable substitute for the opus operantis and instead conceive of the opus operatum as the sacramentally effective sign of the grace of God precisely in order that the opus operantis may effectively be fulfilled in the concrete circumstances of the individual's life.[48] Certainly, on any true understanding of the 'new' theory we can make the following assertion: That state of soul in which, as the ultimate effect of indulgence, a specific 'measure' of the temporal punishments due to sin are blotted out (for the sake of clarity this 'material' or 'quantitative' way of speaking of indulgence cannot be avoided), has this same effect of blotting out even when no indulgence is gained, provided only that it is really present or is really achieved.[49] If we did not have to say this, then indulgence and sacrament would precisely be a substitute for the exercise of the free will in faith and love, and at basis we would be putting forward an impersonal, in fact a magical conception of sacrament and indulgence. We would no longer be in a position to say with Paul VI: 'Non est igitur indulgentia facilior via qua necessariam peccatorum paenitentiam devitare possumus'. But this does not mean that indulgence and sacrament are rendered superfluous. They are, in a special way of their own, God's offering of grace ('a grace which is offered') made manifest in the act of the Church to make the act of belief more possible and to intensify it in the concrete circumstances of the individual's life, that act of belief in which man responds to, and so achieves, salvation (as 'a grace that has been accepted').

VII

This harmony or (at least) this lack of contradiction between the two conceptions of indulgence must be still further illumined by another point in the teaching of the Constitution, its teaching namely concerning the 'treasury of the Church'. In No. 5 the Constitution reacts sharply [195] against a material or unquantitative idea of the treasury of the Church: 'Non est quasi summa bonorum ad instar materialium divitiarum quae per saecula cumulantur'.

To say this is neither so obvious or so superfluous as it might appear to a man of our own times. In the earlier theology of indulgence the question was explicitly raised – and solved again and again – of why this 'treasury of the Church' was not exhausted, especially as it was thought to be made up of the 'superfluous' penitential practices of holy Christians who did not need the benefit of these exercises for themselves, so that they were applied as

[48] cf. the references to more detailed expositions cited above, p 176, n. 18 and p. 179, no. 25.
[49] It is also important to recognise this in order to arrive at a right theological interpretation of what is meant by the new definition of a partial indulgence in No. 12 and in norm 5. However we cannot enter any further into this point here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indulgences on behalf of others in the manner of an individual payment made from a large general fund.[50]

The treasury of the Church is the one total Christ ('est ipse Christus Redemptor', No. 5) as head and members, upon whom, from whom and in whom God is gracious to the individual sinner. The doctrine of the treasury of the Church is, as is clear from the Constitution (No. 5), materially speaking identical with the 'perantiquum dogma' of the 'communio sanctorum'.[51] Now this interpretation of the 'treasury of the Church', if its [196] implications are freely thought out to the full, is very far from that interpretation of the meaning of indulgence which strives to overthrow the 'new' theory of indulgence. The 'treasury of the Church' is, in fact, not divided into small 'portions' (as the anonymous commentator in the Osservatore Romano still formulates it) in indulgences, and so distributed to the recipients of these. This point has already been emphasised, for instance, by P. Galtier, who certainly cannot be suspected of being a seeker out of novel movements in theology.[52] And in fact no-one can conceive of the matter in these terms either, who is really prepared to accept the full implications of the description of the 'treasury of the Church' in the Constitution. For this treasury is not anything which is susceptible of being divided into 'portions' and so distributed. It is applied to each in its entirety, for it is ipse Christus. This application, therefore, in which Christ applies himself through the medium of the potestas of the Church to the sinner, can only be subject to a finite limitation in the achieving of its ultimate effect because of the finite limitations of the recipient himself, because of his 'dispositions' with which he responds to this application and voluntarily attains to what is intended precisely under its influence.[53]

---

[50] On the treasury of the Church cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirchenschatz', L.T.K. VI (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1961), p. 257 (with bibliography); idem, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 182, 184 f., 193, 199 f.; Theological Investigations V, p. 428 f.; L.T.K. I, 52; Sacramentum Mundi III, pp. 123-129; 'A Brief Theological Study on Indulgence', pp. 223-229; cf. the study by O. Semmelroth mentioned on p. 170, n. 11, 'Theologie des Ablasses', II. 'Der Kirchenschatz.' On the historical background cf. E. Schillebeeckx, 'Der Sinn der katholischen Ablasspraxis', especially p. 343 with n. 58, 349. On the interventions at the Council on the subject of the concept of the treasury of the Church cf. the documents already cited above p. 168, n. 6. In this certain considerations put forward by Protestant theologians on the concept of the treasury of the Church are also particularly valuable, e.g. B. M. Lackmann, 'Überlegungen zur Lehre vom "Schatz der Kirche"', Arbeiten zur kirchlichen Wiedervereinigung (Graz 1965), pp. 75-157; P. E. Persson, 'Der wahre Schatz der Kirche', Lutherische Rundschau 17 (1967), pp. 315-327.

[51] It is striking that in the description of the 'treasury of the Church' the Constitution does not particularly draw upon or emphasise the value of the salvific deed of this Christ (made up of head and members) in terms of 'satisfaction' and precisely for the blotting out of the punishments due to sin as such. The treasury of the Church is simply Christ's deed of salvation (including the salvific works of all the justified to the extent that this has a salvific significance for all others). On this view of the treasury of the Church it would perhaps have been better to avoid the word 'dispensare' (No. 8, norm 1) and perhaps to use the term 'applicare' (norm 1) alone. 'Dispensare' does have too strong a connotation of a sharing out of this 'treasury' portion by portion. And this is precisely not intended. But can one dispensare that which is 'Christus ipse'? At this point the problem of the theological terminology in the doctrine of indulgence becomes extremely acute. The Constitution passes over (and in the context with which it is concerned justifiably so) that question which is of such urgent importance for theologians and historians of dogma and theology, namely of why and how the concept of the 'treasury of the Church' has been arrived at and formulated, seeing that in the last analysis the reasons for it in the history of the theology of indulgence are quite secondary ones. Moreover at basis this term is very far from being necessary in order to express the reality it is used to signify, and constantly incurs the danger of those very misinterpretations which the Constitution guards against and actually has to guard against. cf. also p. 195, n. 50.

[52] cf. P. Galtier, De paenitentia (Rome, 2nd ed. 1950), pp. 517-546.

[53] This statement does not exclude the fact that – on the analogy of intercessory prayer made by an individual, which appeals to the infinite kindness and compassion of God – the intercession of the Church too also has, of its very nature, different degrees. In other words even prior to the question of whether the finite dispositions of the recipient are sufficient for the application of Christ to take effect the prayer of the Church itself is also finite and has different degrees. In the light of this, and taking a basic view of the matter, the distinction between plenary and partial indulgences (which is in itself possible) should not be rejected out of hand. The question must remain open here of whether this distinction is as important in terms of the concrete reality of Christian

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[197] In No. 11 the Constitution emphasises that Christians have a 'sancta et iusta libertas filiorum Dei' either to gain indulgences or not to appropriate them for themselves. It emphasises that there is much else in the life of Christians considered as the working out of salvation which, by comparison with indulgences, is 'better' and 'more effective' because it is necessary. But, saving the teaching of the Church, this is not to make the actual objective existence of indulgences in the Church simply dependent upon the freedom of the children of God. Thus the all important point is rightly to explain the nature of indulgence, to assign it its proper place in Christian living as a whole, and to incorporate it into the ordo caritatis. Only in this way do the possibility and the hope remain that the Christians of today and tomorrow will maintain a living and personal attitude towards indulgence, or will acquire this anew, an attitude which can also be translated into practical works. We may properly doubt whether the usual scholastic theology of indulgence is suitable to achieve this.

The Apostolic Constitution makes us free to enter upon ways of achieving a better understanding of indulgence. Indeed it itself opens up such ways. Thus indirectly it supplies a fresh stimulus to oecumenical dialogue, and this too – in spite of all the obstacles that remain – should not be too lightly esteemed. When, for instance, the Constitution explains that Christ the Redeemer is the 'thesaurus Ecclesiae', then it is taking over almost word for word elements in the early Lutheran theology of indulgence,[54] even though, when we come to interpret this definition more closely, we have to recognise once more that more profound differences make their appearance. On the basis of an approfondisseiment of the Catholic theology of indulgence it is possible to achieve a more balanced understanding of the theological position at least of the younger Luther.[55]

[198] But more than this, this approfondissement will have the effect of causing a discernible change in the situation as a whole, from one of endemic controversy to one of genuine dialogue.[56] In spite of numerous incontestable reservations[57] and points of detail in the papal Constitution which may seem inadmissible, it should not be forgotten that certain genuine and original principles of the Reformation have found official acceptance in a formal living as the conceptual difference seems at first sight to be. It has already been pointed out above that according to the Constitution itself it will not be easy really to gain a 'plenary' indulgence. The majority of 'plenary indulgences' are in fact probably only gained as 'partial' ones (cf. norm 7, second paragraph). In the case of the partial indulgence, if the conditions necessary for gaining it really exclude 'omnis effectus erga quodcumque peccatum etiam veniale' (norm 7, first paragraph), and accord this withdrawal its real and radical force, then in practice this indulgence is really 'more perfect' because then that love is made real in it which in any case blots out all the punishments due to sin. A similar problem also arises in the case of the offering of Mass with regard to a limitation of the effectiveness of the Church's act. On this cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 436-438; but especially K. Rahner and A. Häusling, Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1966), pp. 51 ff., 56 ff., 75 ff., 80 ff. (Opus operatum and Disposition), 91 ff.

---

[54] In this context it is altogether noteworthy that Martin Luther, in his theses on indulgence (58th Thesis, 72nd Thesis with explanation) can repeatedly explain that 'Christ' himself is 'the sole treasury of the Church', 'that he himself is the true treasure'. For references and further details cf. P. E. Persson, 'Der wahre Schatz der Kirche' (cf. n. 50), pp. 318 f.

[55] cf. also E. Iserloh, Luther zwischen Reform und Reformation (Munster, 2nd ed. 1967), pp. 30 ff., 41 ff., 56 ff. cf. also the judgment of Iserloh's (Luther zwischen Reform and Reformation, p. 40) on the theory of indulgence maintained by the younger Luther; H. Bornkamm, Thesen und Thesenanschlag Luthers (Berlin, 1967) pp. 48-60.

[56] cf. the words of H. Bornkamm on the contemporary situation in theology: 'They are still always the same questions to which Luther had already pointed. And it is most impressive to listen today to his objections against the doctrine of indulgence of that time coming from the mouths of Catholic cardinals and theologians. In a whole series of key points a clear agreement has been manifested with Luther's criticism in the ninety-five theses' (op. cit., p. 61).

[57] Thus for instance we would still have to enter particularly into the problems of how indulgence is to be measured. On this cf. the position adopted by U. Semmelroth, Zur Theologie des Ablasses, Section V (cf. p. 170, n. 11), pp. 69 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

document of the Church.[58] Not the least of the points with regard to this document which will be of concern to the theologians of the different Churches is that they must not let the good will for a critical reappraisal shown here fail, or the considerable potential of this beginning, modest certainly, yet encouraging too as it is, to be wasted.

[58] It should not be forgotten that, especially in the early and the main periods of the Middle Ages the differences in the practice and the teaching of indulgence were often startling in the extreme. On this cf. L. Hödl, Die Geschichte der scholastischen Literatur und der Theologie der Schlüsselgewalt I (Munster 1960). The same findings appear in E. Schillebeeckx's article, 'Der Sinn der katholischen Ablasspraxis', especially pp. 336 ff., 339, 346, 348 f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[199]

10

MARRIAGE AS A SACRAMENT

In the current scene both within and without the Catholic Church marriage constitutes one of the most popular topics of discussion. Admittedly in this, even in the case of discussions within the Catholic Church, it is only rarely that the discussion centres upon marriage as a sacrament. Here, however, it is precisely this question of dogmatic theology, however 'theoretical' and out of touch with current thought it may seem to be, that is to be treated of. This question and no other besides. For in fact that which has been forgotten, neglected and thrust into the background is still very far indeed from being less important than that which fills the columns of the newspapers and the Church's periodical literature, or even which has been made the subject of a papal commission. Perhaps it is not altogether useless from the 'practical' point of view too to enquire into what is, precisely on a Christian understanding, the heart and centre of marriage. What does it mean to say that married love is sanctified by God's grace? How does that which every marriage is in any case and of its very nature acquire new and deeper roots in virtue precisely of what takes place at the sacramental level? What part does marriage as understood in this sense play in the life of the Church at the level of theology and faith? Is it not necessary to view the institution of marriage once more in its theological and spiritual origins, seeing that at the deepest level it is on this basis alone that the concrete problems of life can be endured and solved? In the article which follows an attempt will be made to take a first step in this direction.

A valid marriage between two baptized Christians is a sacrament, one of the seven sacraments of the Church of Christ. In what follows we shall be exploring, to some extent, this straightforward statement which has been defined as part of the faith of the Catholic Church.[1] For in fact it [200] cannot be said that we have really understood this statement merely on the grounds that we 'know' about it in the sense that it strikes us as well-known and familiar, and to this extent is firmly rooted in the contents of our catechism, whether in its printed or unprinted form. The aim we have set ourselves is not directly or properly speaking to establish that this statement is contained in the 'sources' of revelation.[2] Nor shall we be defending it as a matter of theological controversy against the theology of the Reformation.[3] Here we shall only be attempting simply and straightforwardly to understand precisely what this statement really means and says. It is inevitable in the very nature of the case that in this we will have to concern ourselves with questions which are both extremely difficult and extremely obscure.

I

[1] cf. D.S. 1001, 1801. For a more detailed treatment on this (with bibliography) P. Adnès, Le Mariage = Le Mystère chrétien. Théologie sacramentaire (Tournai 1963), pp. 100-104; H. Rondet, 'Introduction à l'Étude de la théologie du mariage' = Théologie, Pastorale et Spiritualité. Recherches et Synthèses 6 (Paris 1960), pp. 97 ff., 175 ff.; H. Volk, Das Sakrament der Ehe (Munster 1952); M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV/1 (Munich, 6th ed., 1964), pp. 767-828; E. Schillebeeckx, Le Mariage I (Paris 1967).

[2] cf. also the manuals of dogmatic theology, e.g. in P. Adnès, Le Mariage, op. cit., pp. 135 ff.; M. Schmaus, op. cit., pp. 781 ff.; cf. also J. Michl and H. Volk, 'Ehe', L.T.K. III (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1959), 677-684; W. Molinski, 'Marriage', Sacramentum Mundi.

[3] This is set forth in P. Adnès, op. cit., pp. 95 ff. (with bibliography); cf. also P. Althaus, Die Ethik Martin Luthers (Gütersloh 1965), pp. 88 ff.; O. Lähteenmäki, Sexus und Ehe bei Luther = Schriften der Luther-Agricola-Gesellschaft (Turku, 1955).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must begin by enquiring briefly into the nature of the sacrament in general. In doing so we are conscious of the fact that we are embarking upon a way which is, from the aspect of the history of dogma, as also from that of the methodology employed in this field, a dangerous one. For the general concept of 'sacrament' is – historically speaking and from the point of view of the subject matter itself – a subsequent abstraction which has emerged at a relatively late stage from those seven sacred realities which take place in the life of the Church, but which, when we compare them with one another, turn out to be of very different kinds. An ill-thought out application of this concept which has subsequently been abstracted from them, therefore, in which it is taken as an overall model which is capable only of secondary variations, can make it extremely difficult for us to perceive the real nature of the individual sacrament. However our only purpose in beginning with a consideration of sacrament in general is thereby to acquire an initial orientation. The significance [201] of it is that in a certain sense it makes sure that in our treatment of marriage as such certain definite aspects of it will not be able to escape our notice from the outset.[4]

The first point to be recognised about a sacrament is that it is essentially something that takes place in the Church, i.e. not merely something which the Church brings about, as it were, externally in the life of specific individuals, but an event in which the Church realizes her own nature and thereby 'actualizes' herself. A sacrament is something that takes place at that manifest level which belongs to the nature of the Church, not a 'private treatment' in which the Church merely collaborates in some way. This event has the force of a cultic manifestation, an objective symbol, a physical embodiment. It belongs palpably to the historical dimension of space and time, as well as to that of God's self-bestowal in grace upon man.[5] At the same time it also belongs to the nature of the Church which in Christ is the arch-sacrament, eschatologically victorious and indefectible, of precisely this same self-bestowal of God.[6] And finally it is also the free act by which this gracious self-bestowal of God is accepted by him who allows the sacrament to take effect in him, and by his act plays his own part in constituting it as such. In accordance with this we have to distinguish in the sacrament between the sign and that which is signified, between the manifestation and that which is manifested and which has a message to proclaim in hidden form in the manifestation. In the order of the physical person endowed with freedom as he exists in space and time, and in the order of the incarnation, both elements have a connatural relationship to one another, yet are not identical with one [202] another.[7] The sacramental sign proceeds from the will of God truly to save men, and from the nature of the Church as the arch-sacrament of the grace of God, eschatologically victorious and indefectible. And as rooted in these this sign always has an 'exhibitive' force as the effective and unconditional offering of [4] For more precise details on the emergence of the general concept of 'sacrament' see G. van Roo, De Sacramentis in Genere (Rome 1957), pp. 1-61; J. Finkenzeller, 'Sakrament' III, L.T.K. IX (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1964), 220-225 (with bibliography). On the problem of the sacramentality of marriage in particular cf. P. Adnès, op. cit., pp. 43 ff., 71 ff. (the Fathers), 89 ff. (the Middle Ages), 104 ff. (Post-Tridentine), 132 ff., 134 ff. (Systematic theology); H. Rondet, op. cit., pp. 79 ff. (Middle Ages), 97 ff. (Trent), 145 ff., 153 ff. (Systematic theology); H. Volk, op. cit., pp. 7-18; M. Schmaus, op. cit., pp. 787 ff.

[5] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 253-286. My reason for referring to my own works in the course of this article is to give the reader the opportunity to achieve a better understanding of unusual and difficult lines of thought in the context of the general theological system which I have worked out.

[6] On this K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg 1964), pp. 118 f., 121 ff., 132 ff. See also below, p.202, n. 7, 210, n. 20, p. 211, n. 21, n. 22 cf. in addition E. Schillebeeckx, Christus Sakrament der Gottbegegnung (Mainz 1960), pp. 17-95.

[7] Apart from the treatments mentioned in nn. 5, 6 with references, cf. on this also K. Rahner, 'The Church and the Sacraments', Studies in Modern Theology (Freiburg/ London 1965), pp. 206-215; idem, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I, pp. 323 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

salvation by Christ and the Church. In this sense, then, the sacramental sign is opus operatum.[8] But since grace is only the event of salvation as brought about when it is accepted in freedom, and since this free acceptance can precisely be withheld by man, the sacramental manifestation of grace remains radically indeterminate precisely from the human aspect. It can remain an 'empty' manifestation. It can be an invalid or ineffective sacrament, or alternatively it can have the force of really being that 'exhibitive' word which carries what it expresses within itself, the word in which and through which that which it signifies takes place in very truth. Certainly this is far from being an exhaustive description of the nature of the sacrament in general.[9] But nevertheless certain aspects of it have been indicated to which we have to pay due heed in any consideration of marriage as a sacrament.

Marriage is a sign. It possesses this character prior to any theological consideration and prior to its bearing upon the relationship between Christ and the Church, because in itself it has a physical and social dimension of reality. Here we have the incarnation, as it were, the real symbol, the manifestation, the 'space-time' dimension, the expression of the most interior and most personal union in love of two individuals at the very roots of their being as orientated in freedom to God. Already here, then, we can perceive that difference and that unity in the elements which go to make up this sacrament inasmuch as this too is the sign at the physical and social level of a personal faith and love manifested in the appropriation of the grace of God as addressed to the individual in the sacrament. Considered purely in itself marriage already constitutes such a unity, in which the two elements remain distinct, of personal love, on the one hand, and its sign at the physical and social level on the other.[10] [203] This sign, therefore, is both the 'other factor' in which and through which the personal love expresses itself, declares itself and makes itself manifest, and also, under certain circumstances, the mere sign which remains 'empty', deprived of its true basis, in which case it precisely does not carry with it what it signifies. Obviously this applies to marriage considered both as the sealing of a covenant and as the 'concluding of a contract' (as the canonists put it), and it also applies to married life as such. In both respects we can speak of the unity and the difference which exist between the sign and the reality signified.

II

For the present we shall still be remaining in this dimension of marriage in itself, without explicitly adverting to the precise sacramental significance of this sign. The question for us is, therefore, in view of what has been said, precisely what is made manifest in marriage in the dimension of the physical, of space and time, and of social living? Up to this point we have concluded that it is the most intimate and personal unity in love between two individuals (of different sexes). We must now see a little more deeply into what this statement signifies. Admittedly this could be achieved in various ways and at various levels. For instance that personal love which forges the most intimate possible unity between two human individuals would have to be considered in its own distinctive nature. Every word of this definition is capable of yielding the deepest insight into the meaning of marriage. Here three further specific aspects are particularly to be brought out: how this love relates to God, the process

[8] cf. K. Rahner, 'Personal and Sacramental Piety', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 109-133; idem, Kirche und Sakramente, pp. 22 ff.
[9] cf. G. van Roo, op. cit., pp. 62 ff., 82 ff., K. Rahner, 'Sakrament' IV, L.T.K. IX (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1964), 225-230.
[10] This is precisely what we mean when we use the term 'real symbol', cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theology of the Symbol', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 221-252.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

by which this personal love acquires fresh roots through that which we call grace, personal love as uniting us with the whole community of men.

1. We would have to begin by saying something about how this personal and unifying love relates to God. To do this we would have to give an account of the entire theological problem of the unity which exists between love of God and love of neighbour, of the relationship which we bear to God, and of our intercommunication among ourselves. And of course this is not possible here.[11] Love of God and love of [204] neighbour mutually condition one another, even if at first we do not explicitly reflect upon the fresh roots which both acquire through grace. Love of neighbour is not merely a moral task and a duty which is demanded by love of God. More than this, it is the means without which love of God, a right knowledge of God and of our true and total commitment to him, is quite impossible. The transcendental reference which man bears to God can only be realised to the full, can only be experienced for what it truly is and as such freely entered into, in the experience which we have through love of our neighbour. For the 'world' in and through which, according to Christian philosophy and theology, God can be 'recognized' is precisely in its ultimate depths, not merely our material environment, but first and last the world of personal interrelationships. Only one who has encountered this world as a matter of concrete experience, has accepted it in love and freely committed himself to it, can make real to himself and freely accept that transcendental orientation of the spirit in terms of knowledge and freedom, the ultimate basis and absolute goal of which is that Mystery upholding all and upheld by none which we call 'God'. It is this that makes it possible to realise what it is to be so orientated. In this context it is a question of secondary importance (in the light of what is ultimate) how far we succeed in arriving at a free and loving commitment to the world of personal interrelationships such that this involves, at least as something included in it, an experience of our own transcendence, and in this of God also. The question, in other words, of how we succeed in objectifying in conceptual and thematic terms, and setting out in propositional form, that orientation to God which we realise and accept as something that is included in our personal relationships. Even the atheist who truly loves makes experience in his love (provided only that it is what it must be) of God, whether or not he can express this to himself in his conscious thoughts or words.[12] Even in his case the absolute quality of personal love for the 'thou' of his fellow man utters a silent 'yes' to God. It has that quality of self-surrender which is achieved, and necessarily must be achieved, in love, and which can only take place provided that its basic origin and its ultimate goal consist in that which we call God. Or, to put the matter in another way, a love of this kind between human beings is based in its ultimate and connatural depths precisely upon this orientation to God. These ultimate and connatural depths of love consist in its power to attain to the other at the very deepest [205] and most ultimate levels of his personhood and his uniqueness. Thus there is a hope of the two beings as they actually exist arriving at what is ultimate and definitive in the existence of them both, and in a love of this kind this hope is positively affirmed. This too has its basis in the ultimate orientation to God as also has the basic faithfulness which such love involves.

2. Now this personal love, which creates the state of marriage as the mode in which to manifest itself, is in fact[13] in the present order of salvation sustained by the grace of God

[11] cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the Unity of the Love of Neighbour and the Love of God', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 231-249; idem, Der eine Mittler und die Vielfalt der Vermittlungen = Institut für Europäische Geschichte, Mainz. Vorträge Nr. 47 (Wiesbaden 1967), also Vol. IX of this series, pp. 169-184.

[12] For more exact details on this cf. the author's recent work, 'Atheismus und implizites Christentum', Handbuch des Atheismus, J. Girardi ed. (Munich 1967), also Vol. IX of this series, pp. 145-164.

[13] The character of this grace as unmerited is not destroyed by the fact that this de facto situation is inescapable. Nor can this be presented as a 'demand' arising from human nature as such at the purely natural level. On this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which always imbues this love with its salvific power, exalts it and opens it to the immediacy of God himself. Now this can take place even before this love encounters the message of the gospel proclaimed and made known as such in explicit words.

We cannot here set out the special reasons for holding this. Instead we shall assume it as an application of a more general theological principle.[14] This can be formulated in the following terms: in the present order of salvation a moral act that is truly positive (‘actus honestus’) is in fact also a salvific act (‘actus salutaris’) in the proper sense in virtue of the grace which always exalts it and which is offered always to every man by the universal salvific will of God. This more general principle is, it is true, not universally accepted in Catholic theology. Nevertheless in different forms it has already been maintained in it for a long time, for instance by Vasquez and Ripalda,[15] and materially speaking should certainly be accorded recognition as a prolongation of what the Second Vatican Council teaches with regard to the possibility of salvation for the non-Christian and the inculpable atheist.[16] Doubts have been cast upon, or opposition offered to this principle hitherto by theologians only because they were incapable of rightly appreciating how it is possible, outside the sphere of the explicit preaching of the gospel, for that true faith to exist which is necessary for salvation, and also for a salvific act in the true [206] sense to be posited. But if, for reasons which cannot be treated of here and now,[17] we accept the fact that revelation, and therefore faith too, can also be granted to him who has not been touched in any direct sense by the historical message of the Old or New Testaments, then neither the general principle already mentioned nor its particular application to the special question we are considering here continue to constitute any insuperable difficulty. In other words we can say: in the order of salvation as it de facto exists there are no merely ‘natural’ moral acts on man’s part. These acts are de facto, when they are posited at all, also upheld by grace and supernaturally orientated to God in his direct act of self-bestowal, and indeed are already in themselves acts which have been made possible by this self-bestowal even though this has not become objectified or explicitated in terms of man’s own conscious awareness.

The situation as set forth above applies primarily to the love between human beings where this is made real in the form of a personal and selfless union between two individuals. But this means: genuine love is de facto always that theological virtue of caritas which is sustained by God himself through his grace. In this virtue love is extended to both God and man both in a mutual interrelationship and according to their respective conditions in such a way that in this relationship the lover achieves his salvation in the event of justification. In this salvation of his he wills salvation for the other also, and in both God is attained to immediately as this salvation in person. The human love of which we are speaking here, therefore, ‘intends’ God not merely as a transcendental (not explicitly objectified) origin and goal in his infinite remoteness, but rather attains to God in that absolute proximity in which he imparts his own self – and not in the form of any merely creaturely gift – as the innermost mystery and life of man. In virtue of the fact that it is caritas, therefore, this love is also the event of the loving self-bestowal of God upon us which alone empowers us to love God and man. Caritas, therefore, is the event of the love of God for us and of our love for God taken

---

cf. the author’s article, ‘Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace’, Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 2nd ed. 1965), pp. 297-317; ‘Nature and Grace’, Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 165-188, cf. also p. 219 n. 37.

[14] On this cf. K. Rahner, Zur Theologie des Todes = Quaestiones Disputatae 2 (Freiburg[5] 1965), pp. 79 ff., 85 ff.

[15] On this cf. Patres Societatis Jesu in Hispania professores, Sacrae Theologiae Summa III (Matriti, 3rd ed., 1956), pp. 516-512 (bibliography).

[16] More precise details are provided in the study referred to on p. 204, n. 12.

[17] Apart from the article referred to on p. 204, n. 12 cf. K. Rahner (with J. Ratzinger), Revelation and Tradition = Quaestiones Disputatae (London 1965), pp. 9-25; idem, Zur Theologie des Todes, pp. 80 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as a unity. Unfortunately here we must forego the attempt to translate this statement, which has been made in very abstract terms and on the basis of theological data, as it were into phenomenological terms and to express it as an existential and ontological fact. In this way, and on the basis of the experience of this radical love in itself, we could show that these theological implications of the nature of [207] love are actually present in it, or at least we could demonstrate the possibility of this.

3. But this love signifies at the same time a unity with mankind as a whole also. This needs to be shown from various aspects. We are accustomed to attribute to married love the character of a special intimacy and exclusiveness in relation to others outside the married partnership itself. We actually go so far as to regard these qualities as constituting what is special in married love as opposed to other forms of love such as love of neighbour in general, comradeship, friendship etc.

Now we do not for a moment intend to deny that married love has this character. Certainly it is consonant with the nature of married love. Nevertheless we ought to ask ourselves precisely whence the character of this somewhat startling exclusiveness derives. Is it based upon the ultimate nature of this personal love or are there also less basic reasons for it which have to do, rather, with the concrete physical forms and manifestations of this love as these are limited by space and time? Or can it even be that still further determining factors in this exclusiveness are the cultural, social and sociological factors of human living? In other words are some of the factors which go to determine this exclusiveness susceptible of alteration?[18]

But in any case it must be of service to point this out, if only because of the fact that it would be false if we sought to understand married love from the outset as an act of withdrawing behind closed doors where the two partners are isolated from the rest, for this would be, at basis, an egoistical state. Marriage is not the act in which two individuals come together to form a ‘we’, a relationship in which they set themselves apart from the ‘all’ and close themselves against this. Rather it is the act in which a ‘we’ is constituted which opens itself lovingly precisely to all. This aspect of the basic essence of such love ‘appears’ already in the very fact that those united by married love themselves already come from a community. In their love they do not abandon this – indeed they must not abandon it. And their love becomes fruitful in the child that they produce, which for its part in turn must not become enclosed within the ‘we’ relationship, but must be set free to enter into the wider community of the [208] ‘all’. Married love, therefore, is, even in respect of its concrete physical forms, a source of, and an initiation into a wider community, and must therefore itself also intend this right from the outset.

This idea needs to be still further deepened. Married love cannot be so intimate and exclusive that it ceases to be love at all. Now of its very nature it is love only when it does not exclude, but rather opens itself to and includes, when it really commits itself ever anew to that which is strange in the other even before it has explored and seen into it; when it trusts itself without condition to accept that which is really ‘other’ in the beloved as its own (which, in fact, must also constantly be taking place in the intimate partnership of the marriage itself). In the specific love for the concrete individual man must precisely experience what ‘love’ is in general. He must experience that this is possible really as love and not as flattery, behind which, contrary to all appearances, only egoism and self-assertion lie concealed, in order that he may be able to trust himself in his relationship with the other. But then when he has achieved this his love must not be smothered by both the married partners becoming egoistical to all others. They must not seek to use their mutual love so as to justify a position

[18] From this point of view we would have to concern ourselves with certain aspects of the ‘crisis’ in marriage as this is defined principally by sociologists. It is only by ridding our minds of certain specific patterns of marriage which have arisen in the course of social history that the true essence of Christian marriage can be established in its pristine force.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in which they precisely do not love others. They must maintain an openness to all, however much their finite powers and possibilities may in fact impose limitations upon them in this.

Married love too is a readiness, an exercise, a promise and a task, to love man in himself – something which is more than merely 'respecting' him, merely giving him 'his due' instead of being ready again and again to trust him with one's self, to commit one's self to him 'with one's whole heart and with all one's resources'. We are always in debt to all, often, perhaps to those most remote from us even more than to those who are closest. Marriage is the concrete state in which we begin to pay this endless debt, not a dispensation from this endless task which can only be fulfilled by God's help.

A further aspect must now be added to what has just been said. That grace which, as we have seen, sustains married love and renders it open to God in his radical immediacy is the grace of a covenant, which constitutes the innermost dynamism of the world and of the history of mankind in its unity. It is a grace which establishes the one dominion of God over all. So individual a grace, which, in its ultimate depths, is God himself, is directed to the individual in his uniqueness, and this is true however much it may also be the case that, while never ceasing to be this, it is at the same time an 'universal concrete', a unifying grace through which the individual is intended precisely as belonging to the unity of mankind, as having a place [209] in the people of God.[19] This is not surprising. For the true uniqueness of the existence of each particular individual consists, if it is genuinely to be brought to its fulness and not to lead to an egoistical self-gratification of one's own 'personality', in the unique singleness with which one actually loves all. If grace is in this sense the event in which God becomes, for the particular individual, his God, it is also, and precisely in virtue of this, the event in which grace not only breaks out of the bonds of egoism in a 'moral' sense and, so to say, at the external level of man's life, but does so in such away that thereby man is set free to transcend the possibilities of his own nature and to attain to that infinitude of the freedom of God in which all are comprehended in love from the very roots of their existence, and in God can actually be loved in this way even by the creature.

Married love, therefore, is – in spite of, and in its intimacy or exclusiveness – of its very nature and on the basis of the grace of God which sustains it, a state in which we achieve union with mankind, impelled as it is by the selfsame grace. It follows, then, that right from its very origins married love, if its true nature is really attained to, also constitutes a relationship with God, an event of grace, a loving concord with that basic movement in which, through grace, mankind considered as the people of God arrives at the unity of the kingdom of God.

Marriage, as we have said at the outset (I), is the physical manifestation, the sign, the real symbol and the embodiment of this married love, which achieves reality through this manifestation of itself. Marriage – this is what we now have to conclude – is the sign of that love which is designed in God's sight to be the event of grace and a love that is open to all. Yet even this insight is still only at the provisional stage in its development. The actual structure of 'sign' in itself has now to be examined more precisely, and that in its sacramental character. To accomplish this we shall first compare the sacramental structure of the Church and of marriage in general.

III

[19] Attention has once more plainly been drawn to this aspect in the Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium (Chap. I-II).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What has just been said about marriage considered as a 'real symbol' of the love which has thus been specified can now also be asserted of the Church. Of course in drawing this parallel we have to maintain the force of the distinction which exists between the individual (or a few individuals) [210] and the community made up of all. But this distinction as applied to mankind is not ipso facto the same as that between a unity merely in the numerical sense and a numerical multitude. The mutual relationship which exists between the individual and mankind as a whole is different from this. In every individual man everything is present (homo quodammodo omnia), and the whole achieves a unique manifestation of itself in each particular individual. The community of mankind for its part is not the agglomeration of the many – all too many, but the unity in love of those, each of whom is unique in his own right, a love which sets each free for his own, which assembles all this and so once more unifies it. In the light of this it is not surprising that we can make the same assertion about the Church and about the individual, the more so seeing that even from the point of view of the individual it is a genuine community that is in question.

Allowing, therefore, for the general differences in the relationship which the individual bears to the community and that which the community of all taken together bears to the individual, we shall put forward the following proposition: the same 'sign' function which is found in marriage is also present in the Church. For the Church is, in Christ, the arch-sacrament, the basic sacrament: in him the love of God for mankind in his act of self-bestowal achieves its historical manifestation through grace in the loving unity of mankind.[20] In this parallelism which exists between the 'sign' function in marriage and in the Church respectively, one further particularly noteworthy element, as well as a difference which will be of importance in our later considerations, must be brought out. The special aspect in this parallelism is the following one. We have said that in marriage a difference exists between the sign and that which is signified, between the marriage as it exists at the physical and social level and married love. This difference can be so far-reaching that in the individual case the two entities – even though this is against the mutual relationship which is connatural to them – can actually be torn apart. The same is also true of the Church. Here too the sign ('Church as basic sacrament') and the reality signified are not simply identical. For what the Church points to is not herself. Rather as sign, i.e. as a socially organised community constituted by a common creed, a common cult and common works of charity, she is precisely the sign of that humanity, consecrated and united by grace (in interior faith and justification), the grace-given unity of which [211] extends far beyond the social organism of the Church.[21] On the other hand a further and more essential distinction is to be found within this common difference: the 'sign' function in the case of a particular marriage can sinfully be degraded into a lie when that which it is intended to manifest and to render present is not present in itself, namely the love that is grace-given and unifying. In the Church as a whole the intrinsic connection between sign and reality signified can no longer radically be destroyed in virtue of the eschatological victory of grace in Christ. Nevertheless the basic parallelism between marriage and the Church continues to exist. The following proposition applies just as much to the Church as it does to marriage: she is the sign, at the palpable level of historical and social human life, of the fact that that love is being made effective and victorious throughout the whole of humanity which is the love of God for us and of us for God, the love which comprehends and unifies all so long as no-one sinfully denies it.

---

[20] On this cf. J. Alfaro, 'Cristo, Sacramento de Dios Padre. La Iglesia, Sacramento de Christo Glorificado', Gregorianum 48 (1967), pp. 5-27; P. Smulders, 'Die Kirche als Sakrament des Heils', De Ecclesia I, G. Baraúna ed. (Freiburg 1966), pp. 289-312; idem, 'Sacramenten en Kerk', Bijdragen 17 (1956), pp. 391-418.

[21] On this cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoral Theologie I, pp. 121 ff., 132 ff.; idem, 'The New Image of the Church', pp. 3-43, esp. pp. 12-25 in this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We cannot develop any further the doctrine of the Church as the basic sacrament of salvation (and therefore of that love which is salvation) at this point.[22] Here we must be satisfied with what has already been said, since what we are concerned with is the parallelism between marriage and the Church. When we compare the Church with marriage we are thinking of the Church simply as she is, the Church who is what she is simply in virtue of the mutual love between her and Christ. But while Christ is in this sense included, at the same time it is not merely a summary description when we say simply 'Church'. For she is also the basic sacrament of grace and of the love which unites us all precisely in virtue of the fact that in her a social unity of truth, hope and love is brought about among men in themselves. This aspect belongs just as much to her character as basic sacrament as her unity with Christ which she expresses in creed and cult, and which thereby constitutes the manifestation of her unity with Christ in the pneuma.

Indeed we can actually make bold to proceed a stage further: the unity of the Church which she presents as the model and basis for the unity of marriage – in the dimensions of the sign and of the reality signified alike – is, nevertheless, so far as that precise aspect is concerned which we are considering here, de facto constituted through the love of men in the Church and the manifestation of this at the level of social and communal [212] life. But this love is not something that belongs to another dimension altogether, but rather precisely that same love which unites married spouses - including all that deeper theological dimension which belongs to it. But in that case we can also say: the love that unites married spouses contributes to the unity of the Church herself because it is one of the ways in which the unifying love of the Church is made actual. It is just as much formative of the Church as sustained by the Church. The term 'Church-house', signifying the sort of local Church which is constituted by a family unit, is more than a mere pious image.[23]

This correspondence and parallelism between Church and marriage, therefore, is not merely an external similarity between two entities each of which exists on its own and independently of the other. On the contrary the conformity between the two is due to the fact that both have a common root. For marriage as such is, taken as a whole, the manifestation which is creative of that precise love which, as the love of God and for God in the divine act of self-bestowal, is constitutive of the union of mankind with one another and with God, and constitutive too of the basic sacrament of this which is the Church. In this we must not overlook the fact that the Church and humanity as made manifest, sanctified and unified in her are in no sense mythical entities but precisely those concrete individuals in themselves who love God and love in God, and give their intrinsic unity a manifest expression in the dimension of history in the unifying society that is the Church.[24]

Now let us see what happens when, on the basis of this fundamental conformity marriage takes place precisely in the sphere of the Church. It becomes precisely that which we are seeking to express when we explain that it is a 'sacrament'. In the light of the principle we have laid down this statement acquires the force not merely of a principle which we already know and understand. Rather this principle only truly becomes intelligible to us in the truths which it itself is intended to express, so that it is no mere abstract concept of sacrament which is applied to the institution of marriage ab externo. We must now attempt to clarify this point.

[213]

---

[22] On this cf. the studies quoted on pp. 201, n.6 and 7 and p. 210, nn. 20, 21. In addition, K. Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments, pp. 193-201.

[23] On this cf. the Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium, No. 11. This passage deserves greater attention, and not merely in the context with which we are here concerned.

[24] On the concrete problem thereby entailed cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 289 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

IV

Two baptised individuals voluntarily bind themselves in marriage. In this something takes place in the Church too. Here we do not need to adopt the approach of canon law, or to ask what precise conditions are required by the divine or human law upheld by the Church and from the nature of the case in order that such a bond of marriage (let us not call it a 'contract'!) may take place precisely in the Church and in the context of her life as a 'visible society'. But at basis all this is already given in virtue of the fact that it is two baptised individuals that are involved, and a marriage between them, something which always has a social relevance. Because married love has the character of a pointer and a sign, marriage itself is never a mere 'worldly affair'. For this love itself is no worldly affair, but rather the event of grace and love which unites God and men. When a marriage of this kind, therefore, takes place in the Church, it is an element in the process by which the Church fulfils her own nature as such, one which is brought into being by two baptised Christians who, through their baptism, have been empowered to play an active part in this self-realisation.[25] As baptised, therefore, they act in a manner which is precisely proper to the Church herself. They make manifest the sign of love in which that love is visibly expressed which unites God and men.

Now when the Church achieves the fulness of her own nature in this way precisely at this essential level, making it effective in the concrete and decisive living situation of a human individual, there we have a sacrament.[26] In that case there is no need for this purpose of any explicit words of institution uttered by Jesus (we could never establish as a matter of historical fact that he ever uttered such words, nor is it even probable that he did so), such as for instance are to be found in the case of the Eucharist.[27] The 'word of institution' in this case consists in two factors: on the one hand in the fact that the religious relevance of marriage is acknowledged and that it is recognised that this too is something that is achieved through the word and the deed of Jesus himself.[28] It also consists [214] in the fact that marriage has been instituted by the Church as an eschatological sign of salvation for the kingdom of God (considered as the absolute proximity of God to man) until the end of time.[29] On the other hand marriage itself and of itself carries with it its own profoundly significant theological dimension.

Those theologians who invoked the support of Eph 5 for the sacramental nature of marriage were unable to perceive this point clearly. And because of this there has always been a certain embarrassment about this theology which, ultimately speaking, proves to be utterly unnecessary. For the saying from Gen 2:24 which is quoted in Eph 5 appeared to raise marriage in general – not merely that between Christians – to a sign of the unity between Christ and the Church, and it was believed that this could not be conceded without difficulty. In reality this is perfectly possible if we think out exactly the full implications of what we have said with regard to the character of marriage as a sign referring to married love and the special theological dimensions belonging to this. In Christian theology, in fact, we certainly do not have to maintain that a sacramental marriage is related to a non-sacramental marriage

---

[25] On this cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I, pp. 146 ff., 151 ff.; idem, The Church and the Sacraments, pp. 269-272, 289-294.
[26] cf. K. Rahner, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I, pp. 323-332; idem, The Church and the Sacraments, pp. 202 ff.
[27] On these problems cf. K. Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments, pp. 258-264, and M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV/1, pp. 75 ff.; E. Schillebeeckx, op. cit., pp. 117 ff.
[28] On this cf. the brief survey by J. Michl, 'Ehe', L.T.K. III (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1959), 677-680 (bibliography); P. Adnès, op. cit., pp. 7-42; M. Schmaus, op. cit. pp. 781 ff.; J. Dupont, Mariage et divorce (Bruges 1959); P. Grelot, Le couple humain dans l'Ecriture (Paris, 2nd ed., 1964); cf. also pp. 210, nn. 34 and 35.
[29] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Church and the Parousia of Christ', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore, 1969), pp. 295-312.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as a sacrament to a purely secular human activity. On the contrary both are related to one another as the opus operatum to an opus operantis, and this latter too is wholly an event of grace.[30] The order in which the one stands to the other here is similar, for instance, to that relationship which a sacramental forgiveness of sins bears to a non-sacramental one achieved merely through repentance. For this too takes place as the outcome of grace and in grace.[31] Marriage does not become an event of grace only at that stage at which it acquires the status of a 'sacrament'. On the contrary the event of grace in marriage becomes a sacramental event of grace as opus operatum in those cases in which it takes [215] place between two baptised individuals in the Church. The case here is exactly as with the faith which justifies of itself even prior to baptism, and which then becomes opus operatum in baptism.[32] Up to the present, if I am not mistaken, there has been a strange naiveté among theologians in their approach to marriage in that that distinction and that unity which is familiar to every theologian in the case of faith – baptism, penance - sacrament of penance has not consciously been worked out and applied here. In the two former cases the grace-given event of justification is initiated not merely at the moment when the sacrament as such is conferred, but already prior to this at the stage of faith and repentance. On the other hand in the dimension of historical manifestation as such this sign only acquires the character of an unconditional pledge of grace from God, in other words that of an opus operatum and so of a 'sacrament', when it takes place in the Church and takes its place in the concrete in the context in which such a pledge acquires its historical manifestation. This is the Church herself considered as basic sacrament. When a marriage takes place between baptised people in the Church it constitutes an element in the Church's role as basic sacrament, so that the parties actively share in and contribute to the Church's role as basic sacrament, for both give manifest expression to the unifying love of the grace of God, and a marriage of this kind between them achieves this precisely as an element in the social unity of the Church herself. Now because of this the marriage as an event of grace gives rise to a 'sacramental' event of grace in which this sign actively contributes to the irrevocable manifestation of God's pledge of grace to mankind, that pledge which is constantly in force and of which God himself never repents. And this manifestation is nothing else than the Church herself.

On the basis of this conception of the 'institution' of this sacrament we can now proceed more freely to evaluate the findings of dogmatic tradition with regard to the doctrine of marriage as a sacrament. We do not need to force the evidence here so as either to postulate or to construct for ourselves any explicit doctrine hypothetically supposed to have existed right from the outset, in which marriage would always have been considered as a 'sacrament' and as such subsumed under a general concept of sacrament. The less we make use of any such idea – so long as we still understand and experience the 'sacramental' nature of a sign of salvation in the Church – the better it will be. When, therefore, we find this also confirmed by the [216] dogmatic tradition we should regard this as neither surprising nor shocking.[33]

---

[30] On this cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 114-133; idem, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I, pp. 330 ff.; idem, The Church and the Sacraments, pp. 206-215 (supplement with A. Häussling); Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer = Quaestiones Disputatae 31 (Freiburg^2 1960), pp. 208-253.

[31] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'The Meaning of Frequent Confession of Devotion', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore 1967), pp. 177-189; idem, 'Die Priesterbeichte', Knechte Christi. Meditationen zum Priestertum (Freiburg 1967), pp. 208-253.

[32] Apart from the studies already mentioned in n. 30 cf. K. Rahner, 'The Word and the Eucharist', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 253-286; idem, The Church and the Sacraments, pp. 269-272.

[33] On the dogmatic tradition of the sacramentality of marriage cf. especially P. Adnès, Le Mariage, pp. 43 ff., 71 ff., 76-110; H. Rondet, 'Introduction à l'étude de la théologie du mariage', op. cit., pp. 11-135; E. Schillebeeckx, Le Mariage I (Paris 1967). The principle we are stating here could also be taken as the starting-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation point for a new oecumenical approach. Many Protestant theologians maintain that marriage is not indeed a 'sacrament' but is, nevertheless, a sanctum. (Thus, for instance E. Brunner.) In view of this, and setting aside all polemical attacks against an alleged Romish 'sacramentalism' – which, however is based upon a wrong interpretation – the question has still to be raised whether a serious discussion, or even a mutual enlightenment is not possible on this point, to the extent that from the Catholic side we understand how rightly to interpret the sacramentality of marriage. In any case we should not simply apply to it a general and abstract concept of 'sacrament'. This procedure is adopted, for instance, by M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV/1, pp. 803 f., 806 f., and probably also by K. Mörsdorf, Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts II (Paderborn, 10th ed., 1960), pp. 238-249; cf. also Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift 9 (1958), pp. 241-256, esp. 248 f. These authors believe that they have to evaluate the function of the presiding priest in dogmatic terms, and so to treat of marriage in a way which is exactly parallel to the treatment appropriate to the other sacraments. K. Mörsdorf enters quite explicitly into the question with which we are concerned in his article 'Der ritus sacer in der ordentlichen Rechtsform der Eheschliessung', Liturgie. Gestalt und Folgzug. Festschrift für J. Pascher, W. Dürig ed. (Munich 1963), pp. 252-266, esp. 265 f. Mörsdorf sees an intrinsic connection between the marriage liturgy and the juridical form of marriage, with the result that he posits the closest possible relationship between the solicitude to ensure the juridical validity of marriage, and the activity of the Church in her function as mediator of salvation. Mörsdorf regards the more recent history of the Church's practice in the case of mixed marriages (especially as a result of the decree Ne temere of 1907) as the expression of the Church more and more realising her own power with regard to the forms by which marriage is validly celebrated. In this, according to Mörsdorf's own interpretation, the fathers of the Tridentine Council were not yet able to attain to this realisation. The active assistance of the priest in the liturgical sense is raised to the function of the priest as an active contributor (pensona agens), so that the 'collaboration of the priest presiding over the marriage is an essential element in the performance of the sacramental sign' (op. cit., p. 266). Mörsdorf is followed in his views by his pupil, G. May, Die kanonische Formpflicht beim Anschluss von Mischehen (Paderborn 1963), p. 42. At this point we shall not undertake any investigation of the historical aspects of this problem, even though these continue to be of decisive importance (the function of the marriage customs and rituals in the early and main periods of the Middle Ages, the interpretation of the decree Tametsi etc.). Nor can we examine the ways in which Mörsdorf and May use the concepts of 'passive' and 'active' 'assistance'. Nor do we propose to challenge these authors on the question of whether, and to what extent, the Church has the right to decide (in part) the external signs or form of the sacraments. A more important point is the fact that there are phenomena or factors in the Church's theology and practice of marriage which it is hard to reconcile with this thesis: marriages of baptised non-Catholics are indeed not bound by the canonical form, but are rather valid and sacramental as matrimonia rata even without the priest playing any part in them. The marriages between persons of different confessions prior to 1918 in Germany were valid and sacramental even without any Catholic ceremony taking place. Finally reference may be made to canon 1098 (the possibility of concluding a marriage without any collaboration by the priest). When, therefore, Mörsdorf seeks to regard the active intervention of the priest as an 'essential element' in the sacramental act, then this term 'essential' cannot be taken in a strict sense. For with regard to a requirement that is essential in the true sense in the context of the sacraments, the Church has no power of dispensation. But if the priest has no constitutive function in the concluding of a sacramental marriage in the strict sense, then it is not immediately clean what is meant here by 'essential element', 'persona agens', 'active contributor' etc., on whether this in fact demands any theological interpretation. In any case from the standpoint of a sacramental theology such an interpretation is quite unnecessary. With regard to those cases in which the priest plays no active part, or at any rate not an 'essential' one, it is not asserted that the Church has no mediating function at all, as is proved from the example of valid baptism by laymen. Even in historical terms it must be maintained that the introduction of the form made obligatory by the Council of Trent derives primarily from the Church's anxiety for the welfare of the Christian community (clandestine marriages), but in no sense has this anything directly to do with the progressive development of the Church's authority. On this cf. C.T. IX, 639 f., 682-685, 761-764, 668f. Precisely with regard to the problems which are raised today on the subject of mixed marriages, the acceptance of this theological interpretation of the essence of marriage would in practice raise a fresh difficulty which, from the point of view of dogmatics, is quite unnecessary. On this problem cf. also L. Hofmann, 'Formpflicht oder Formfreiheit der Mischehenschliessung', Catholica 18 (1964), pp. 241-257, esp. 245 f.; F. Böckle, 'Das Problem der Mischehe', Lutherische Monatshefte 5 (1966), p. 342 with n. 6; P. J. Kessler, Die Entwicklung der Formvorschriften für die kanonische Eheschliessung (Diss. iur. Bonn, 1934, Borna-Leipzig 1934); H. Portmann, Wesen und Unauflösigkeit der Ehe in der kirchlichen Wissenschaft und Gesetzgebung des 11. und 12. Jahrhunderts (Emsdetten/Westfalen 1938); R. Lettmann, Die Diskussion über die klandestinen Ehen und die Einführung einer zur Gültigkeit verpflichtenden Eheschliessungsform auf dem Konzil von Trient = Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie 31 (Munster 1967), pp. 166 ff. (Conclusion). Unfortunately even with regard to the historical aspects Lettmann does not adopt any position with regard to Mörsdorf's works (for his only remarks on this cf. p. 19, n. 21), and attaches himself without any discussion of other attempts at a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[218]

V

What has been said, however, still needs clarification to some extent in terms of what is familiar to us from the catechism as a formal statement of what constitutes marriage as a sacrament. It is customarily said that marriage is an image of the unity of Christ and the Church, and that it is a sacrament in virtue of this. On an initial reading of Eph 5:22-33[34] we may, perhaps, receive the impression that the vital common basis for the similarity between the relationship which Christ bears to the Church on the one hand and that involved in marriage on the other consists in the fact that the husband represents Christ while the wife represents the Church. In that case the unity of marriage as such would itself be a relatively secondary reflection of the unity between Christ and the Church, which in turn would be based on a reflection in which the married partners were regarded as separate from one another precisely in respect of the different roles they play. But surely we would still have to say that even for Paul himself this way of viewing the matter is secondary, conditioned perhaps by the parenetic context and more or less conditioned too by the sociological factors prevailing at the time. On this showing, then, it would not simply be the text quoted as a whole which would constitute a statement of central theological importance, but rather the particular passage of 5:29-33 that would have primary importance in it, for these particular verses bear upon the unity of love as such, as constituted in one flesh and body. The relationship of leadership and subordination as expressed in the love of solicitude and help on the one hand, and in obedience, submissiveness and 'fear' on the other, is not the objective factor that is decisive in this parallel.[35] If for our present purposes we can take this as [219] established, then all that needs to be clarified here is where, in more precise terms, Christ is to be fitted in in the basic conception put forward in this study. First in the case of Paul it is clear that he regards the order of creation depicted in Gen 2 as belonging to the order of grace and redemption,[36] so that right from the outset that order of creation, and so too of the theological interpretation to the theses of Wilhelm Bertram, which are primarily influenced by factors of social philosophy. In reply to the more recent hypothesis of K. Mörsdorf I can only offer the present outline of a theology of marriage in general and in numerous points of detail as an alternative suggestion. This could then constitute a starting-point for a further attempt to solve the dogmatic problems entailed in the question of mixed marriages. Even on the interpretation of the form made obligatory by the Council of Trent the last word has not yet been said from the point of view of the history of canon law, a fact which is brought out strikingly in the inaugural address of P. J. M. Huizing, the official canonist for the diocese of Nijmegen, De Trentse Huwelijksvorm (Hilversum/Antwerp 1966).

---

[34] For the exegesis of this cf. especially H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser (Düsseldorf, 2nd ed. 1958), pp. 252-280.

[35] In view of the number of studies a detailed exegetical cannot be undertaken here. On this cf. N. A. Dahl et al., Kurze Auslegung des Epheserbriefes (Göttingen 1965), pp. 68-72; F. Foulkes, The Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians (Michigan 1963), pp. 154-163; H. C. G. Moule, Ephesian Studies (Michigan, 2nd ed., 1955), pp. 281-296; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Ephesians (London 1961), pp. 114-120; J. N. Sanders, 'The Theology of the Church', Studies in Ephesians, F. L. Cross ed. (London 1956), pp. 64-75, esp. pp. 71 ff.; H. Schlier and V. Warnach, Die Kirche im Epheserbrief (Munster 1949), pp. 25 ff.; H. Conzelmann, Die kleineren Briefe des Apostels Paulus = N.T.D. 8 (Göttingen, 9th ed., 1962), pp. 86-88; F. Mussner, Christus, das All und die Kirche. Studien zur Theologie des Epheserbriefes = Trierer theolog. Studien 5 (Trier 1955), pp. 147-153; E. Kähler, Die Frau in den paulinischen Briefen (Zürich 1960), pp. 88 ff.; J. J. von Allmen, Maris et femmes d'après Saint Paul = Cahiers théologiques (Nauchâtel/Paris 1951), pp. 28 ff.; P. Grelot, Le couple humain dans l'Écriture (Paris, 2nd ed., 1964); P. Adnès, Le Mariage, pp. 39 ff.; H. Greeven, 'Zu den Aussagen des N.T. über die Ehe', Zeitschrift für evangelische Ethik 1 (1957), pp. 109-125, esp. 121 ff.; P. Colli, La pericopa paolina ad Eph. V 32 nella interpretazione dei SS Padri e del Concilio di Trento (Parma 1951). cf. also n. 36.

[36] On this cf. H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser, pp. 262 f., 276 ff. Most recently, especially R. Batey, 'The μι/α σα&ρχ Union of Christ and the Church', N.T.S. 13 (1967), pp. 270-281; N. A. Dahl, 'Christ,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

marriage of Adam, had the significance of pointing forwards to this order of grace. In our terms this is implicitly asserted – albeit on quite different theological principles – when we emphasise that every moral attitude on man's part (and this includes also what is presupposed to such an attitude) is everywhere and in all cases sustained and subsumed by the bestowal of grace by God upon the creature. 'Covenant' is the more sublime and more ultimate factor which, by comparison with the creation considered as the positing of a creature still not determined in a specific direction, has in turn the character of unmerited grace.[37] But precisely because of this 'covenant' is the goal and the all-embracing factor which sustains and subsumes creation as the positing of the condition which makes covenant possible, since it provides the potential covenant partner. This means that objectively speaking everything that takes place in terms of human morality has a hidden relationship to Christ, in whose being and work precisely this imparting of grace finds its eschatological culmination and manifestation. Because he is the goal of it all he provides the basis for the whole dynamism of human history as imparted to it through grace, impelling it towards the immediacy of God.

We are speaking, then, of a unity in love between two human individuals. They are united in a love which consists not merely in the fact that both are aiming at a single common goal in this earthly dimension. This unity, rather, refers to the persons themselves in so far as their orientation to the last end has an eternal validity. And where the unity of love in this [220] sense is achieved, there we have the operation and manifestation of that grace which constitutes the unity of men in the truest and most proper sense. But the converse is also true. Precisely this same grace, considered as establishing a unity between God and man, is manifested in the unity between Christ and the Church, and that too in a manifestation which has an absolute and eschatological force, and which as goal provides the basis for all other graces and their function as establishing unity in the world. For this reason there exists not merely an external similarity between the unity in love of two human individuals on the one hand and the unity between Christ and the Church on the other, but also a relationship between the two unities such that they condition one another: the former exists precisely because the latter exists. Their mutual relationship of similarity is not subsequent to the two but is a genuine relationship of participation due to the fact that the unity between Christ and the Church is the ultimate cause and origin of the unity of marriage.

In the light of this we can also understand that the more precise quality of the relationship between Christ as the directing and controlling head on the one hand, and the Church as the obedient and submissive bride on the other is not simply projected in precisely the selfsame sense into the unity of those united in love through marriage. The unity between Christ and the Church is the basis for the unity between husband and wife prior to the question of whether, and to what extent this unity which is brought about also carries with it all the special attributes of the unity which brings it about. To the extent that the unity of Christ and the Church itself has its source in God's gracious will to bestow himself, both this unity and the unity of marriage have their basis in the selfsame grace of God, which unites mankind to God and men among themselves. To the extent that the goals of this one single will to bestow grace are related to one another as 'cause' and 'effect', since precisely in the will by which God intended Christ and the Church everything else is willed, this one particular effect of this grace-giving will (namely married unity) is also brought about by the other effect (the unity of Christ and the Church).

Creation and the Church', The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology (Festschrift for C. H. Dodd), W. D. Davies and D. Daube edd. (Cambridge 1965), pp. 422-443, esp. 437.

[37] On this, in addition to the articles mentioned on p. 524, n. 13, cf. esp. K. Rahner, 'Erlösungswirklichkeit in der Schöpfungswirklichkeit', Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck, 4th ed., 1966), pp. 51-87, esp. 52-75 = Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 203-228.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

By reason of this mutual interrelationship of the two unities, the unity of marriage achieves its full manifestation precisely in the unity of Christ and the Church. And because of this much that would otherwise perhaps have remained obscure and unrecognised in the unity of married love can be deduced from the unity of Christ and the Church. And this remains true in spite of the caution which is necessary in adopting this approach. Thus with regard to the relationship of leadership and subordination between husband and wife in marriage Paul had already, and rightly, [221] perceived that the basis of this was the unity of Christ with the Church, even though it may be true that the relationship which he was seeking to justify in part belonged to that period alone, and to that extent cannot have been a moral demand in the same sense at all periods. But if we were to take the same principle as our starting-point we could recognise other and similar parallels too: the character of the Cross with which both are imprinted; the irrevocability of the covenant; the provisional nature of both measured by the final and eternal consummation for which the Church[38] and marriage[39] are still waiting. However we cannot delay any longer in this article in explaining and rounding off this point.

Marriage, therefore, reaches upwards into the mystery of God in a sense which is far more radical even than we could have guessed merely from the nature of human love as unconditioned. Certainly all still remains hidden under the veil of faith and hope, and all this may still not be lifted from the lowly circumstances of our everyday lives. There is no question that such a truth does not take place either at a level which is utterly beyond man, his freedom, and his interior assent. There is no doubt, therefore, that those united in married love experience this reality in the same measure as they open their hearts to it in faith and love. Surely it has become clear that such a theology of marriage cannot be understood in that sense in which we introvertedly make it our own 'private affair'. On the contrary genuine Christian marriage has at all times the force of a real representation of the unifying love of God in Christ for mankind. In marriage the Church is made present. It is really the smallest community, the smallest, but at the same time the true community of the redeemed and the sanctified, the unity among whom can still be built up on the same basis on which the unity of the Church is founded, in other words the smallest, but at the same time the genuine individual Church. If we were able to recognise[40] and to live out such a truth in its full significance then we could return somewhat more consoled and more bravely, in a spirit of truly Christian freedom, to our 'married problems', so urgent as they are, yet almost talked to death.

[38] cf. the Constitution on the Church Lumen gentium, No. 48.
[39] cf. ibid., No. 35.
[40] On this cf. K. Rahner, Glaubend und liebend (Munich 1957); idem, 'Vom Gottgeheimnis der Ehe', Geist und Leben 31 (1958), pp. 107-109 = K. Rahner, Glaube der die Erde liebt (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1967), pp. 125-128.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[222]

11

THE TEACHING OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL ON THE DIACONATE

The subject which I have been asked to examine here is concerned with the teaching of the Second Vatican Council on the diaconate and the restoration of this.[1] So far as I know, in the various documents of this Council three texts in particular treat of this subject. The most important of these is, of course, article 29 of the 3rd chapter of the Constitution Lumen gentium. In addition to this two further texts have to be taken into consideration, namely a passage which falls under No 16 of the Scheme on the Missionary Activity of the Church, a Scheme on which there is still some little work to be done. Here the restoration of the diaconate is treated of from the point of view of the necessity of such a restoration in the missions. A further brief reference to this restoration is to be found in Article 17 of the Decree on the Oriental Catholic Churches, which has already been promulgated. Here it is stated that where the institution of the diaconate as a permanent state has ceased to be the practice it should be introduced once more.

First let us concentrate upon the principal of these passages, that which occurs in Lumen gentium. It is not possible for me here to set forth the history leading up to this passage. Here I would only recall the fact that this question is numbered among the five so-called 'test questions' which were laid before the Council on the 3 October 1963. The fifth question asked whether the fathers were agreed on the point that mention should be made in the Constitution on the Church of the diaconate and the necessity for its restoration. To this general question, which was intended merely to provide a general direction for a further working out of this decree, an affirmative answer was given, 1,588 of the fathers voting in favour of it with 525 against. It was, therefore, a notable majority. The work of the theological commission went forward along the lines indicated by this [223] vote, with the result that that text was produced which – apart from a few small alterations – we now read in the Constitution.

In a vote taken on the 28th September 1964 the radical necessity for, and possibility of a restoration of the diaconate as a permanent state in the Church was accepted by an overwhelming majority. On the 29th September following the precise points of detail involved were laid before the fathers of the Council. These agreed by a comfortable two-thirds majority that even married men of mature age could be admitted to the order of deacon. On the same day, in the aula of the Council, the fathers rejected, by a majority the extent of which is not known, but which was substantial, the idea that younger men too could be admitted to the diaconate without any obligation to remain celibate. This must be sufficient here with regard to the history of the text. For the time appropriate to a brief lecture does not admit of entering any further into the manner in which these documents emerged and acquired their existing form.

Let us turn our attention to the actual texts themselves. In this we shall, normally speaking, be referring to the Constitution Lumen gentium. But where it is a question of entering into the reasons which the Second Vatican Council had for believing that the diaconate should be restored we must also refer to the Scheme on the Church's Activity in the Missions which was prepared, because in my opinion the reasons are set forth more clearly and more

[1] For the concrete occasion in view of which this lecture was composed cf. the list of sources attached to the end of this volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation profoundly there than in the Constitution on the Church itself. I shall be saying a few words more on this point at a later stage.

I

The first point to be made with regard to the teaching of the Second Vatican Council on the diaconate is concerned with the question of the essence of this as a permanent official state and as a sacrament in the Church. In this teaching it is laid down first that the hierarchy of orders in the Church does in fact include, or at least could include, a state which, though subordinate, does constitute a genuine and permanent degree of the sacrament of order. In spite of this, according to the teaching and practice of the Western, as opposed to the Eastern Church, the diaconate has come to be regarded ever since the Middle Ages (apart from a few isolated cases which we cannot enter into here) merely as a necessary stage in the process of being raised to the priesthood. Now in the teaching of the Council, which is in conformity with the earliest and most universal teaching, it is expressly laid down that there is, or at least there could be, [224] a degree in the hierarchy of orders, genuine, permanent and sacramental, which is something more than a mere stage on the way to priestly ordination. It is one which could be, and, under certain circumstances actually ought to be, recognised as a state and a degree in the hierarchy of orders, albeit a lower one, which has a genuine and essential function of its own distinct from that of the order of priest. From this point of view, therefore, the nature of the diaconate is such that it belongs in very truth to the hierarchy of order in the Church herself. It is not a lay state, but belongs to the three official states or degrees in the hierarchy of order itself, so that in all truth and reality deacons belong to the officially instituted and sacred orders which Christ founded in his Church. When, therefore, we distinguish between laymen on the one hand and the hierarchy of the Church on the other, we should certainly not assign the deacons to the lay state, nor should the diaconate itself be understood as in some sense designating the status of outstanding lay functionaries in the Church. On the contrary, the diaconate is, in very truth, a degree, albeit a subordinate one, in the hierarchy of order itself. Now with regard to the tasks which are, in practice, attached to this order of deacon, the passage with which we are concerned distinguishes between these various tasks of the diaconate in almost the same way as in its presentation of the official functions of bishops and priests. A new division has been introduced here according to which three general official functions are envisaged: the function of teaching, the function of sanctifying and the function of leading. It is true that with regard to the third function certain more precise distinctions and provisos have been introduced. But it is still quite evident that in the Constitution on the Church these three general official functions which apply to every official state in the hierarchy of the Church are attributed to the office of deacon also.

This appears from what is said here about the function of preaching the word. It is stated that the deacon’s part in this is to read the sacred scriptures to the faithful and to instruct and exhort the people. In other words the function of preaching the gospel is attributed to the deacon too, though of course in union and cooperation with the Church under the direction of the bishop and, in some respects, of the priest too. Thus with regard to the first function, which is attributed to all those who have been officially ordained in the Church, this applies to the deacon too. In the passage under consideration here the function of sanctifying is likewise attributed to the deacon clearly enough. In fact it is stated that it is his task solemnly to confer baptism, to have custody of and to distribute the Eucharist, to assist at and to bless marriages in the Church’s name, to [225] carry the Viaticum to the dying, to preside in the liturgy and prayers of the faithful, to dispense the sacraments and to conduct the rites of burial. Again with regard to the function of guiding and leading, we can find something in our text which has reference to the deacon. For in it the task of directing and administering is explicitly adduced. Now it is true that this task of the deacon belongs to the service of the Church and not, strictly speaking, to the guiding of her, this being, in a certain sense, confined to the bishops alone. Nevertheless the deacon does, in a certain sense, share in this task, and it actually belongs to the very nature of the diaconate itself to the extent that explicit mention is made of the task of administration. Of course this is expressed only very briefly and in a few words. On the other hand the task of charitable activity receives just as brief a mention even though this does undoubtedly belong, according to the very earliest traditions of the Church and with a firm basis in holy scripture, to the office of deacon.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Nevertheless we are compelled to say in all honesty that the text itself does not supply much information on this question. Perhaps, on the other hand, the Scheme on the Missions, Ad Gentes Divinitus Missa can help us, for these official functions of the deacon are likewise mentioned here. The function of preaching the word is expressly mentioned. It is said that in the missions deacons have the duty of preaching the word of God as catechists. The function of sanctifying receives slighter mention in that particular Scheme. But to compensate for this it is expressed all the more clearly that the activity of deacons can, in a certain respect, be understood as a function of providing official guidance and leadership, or at least a sharing in this. This is what is meant when it is said that it is the task of the deacons in the missions to act in the name of the parish priest or the bishop in giving guidance to the widespread communities. Again the official function of performing works of charity is expressly mentioned here. It is said that it is the deacon's responsibility actively to engage himself in works expressive of love in the form of social and charitable activities. In this Scheme, therefore, this aspect is developed on a broader basis than in De Ecclesia itself.

Now with regard to the essence of this order of deacon, the essential point, and one which finds expression in all the texts we have mentioned, is the sacramentality of the diaconate. On this point the documents leave no room for doubt. What is in question here is a sacrament, a genuinely sacramental consecration, a sacramental grace which is imparted through the laying on of hands.

[226]

II

The topic which is being treated of in the main text, and also in the texts on the Eastern Churches and on the missions, is the restoration of the diaconate. In article 29 of the Constitution Lumen gentium two sections are devoted to this. The first concerns the theology of the diaconate, the second speaks explicitly of the restoration of the diaconate on which we shall now have something more to say.

This restoration is characterised in the Scheme on the Missions as useful and to be recommended, and in the Decree on the Catholic Eastern Churches it is urgently advocated. The reasons which the texts adduce for this deserve to be considered first. The presentation of these reasons appear, as I have already indicated at the beginning of this article, to have brought about a salutary development between the Constitution Lumen gentium and the Scheme Ad Gentes Divinitus Missa. In the Constitution on the Church it is stated that the tasks of the deacon as enumerated here are certainly supremely necessary for the life of the Church, and that even though, in the current administration of the Latin Church, there are many areas in which these tasks can only be performed with difficulty, still in the future the diaconate can be restored as a special order in the Church's hierarchy existing as such in its own right. The reason adduced in the Constitution, therefore, is to be sought primarily in the difficulties of the concrete situation. It is said that there can be no question that these tasks are necessary: baptising, preaching, the works of charity etc. And it is further stated that the restoration of the deacon is necessary because, owing to the lack of priests today, it has become extremely difficult to fulfil these tasks. The Scheme on the Missions has not yet achieved final completion. But the reasons put forward here, while they do not run counter to this text in the Constitution on the Church, still differ from it nevertheless in certain notable respects. For this Scheme treats of those individuals who already, in effect, are actually performing the official functions of the deacon by acting as catechists and so preaching the word of God, by acting in the name of the parish priest or the bishop to guide and administer the scattered Christian communities, or by performing the works of charity in social or philanthropic activities. Such individuals, the Scheme states, should be fortified by the laying on of hands as handed down from the apostles so that they may be able more effectively to perform their diaconal functions through the grace of the sacrament. Here, therefore, it is not any actual difficulty, for instance the lack of priests etc. which is adduced, rather it is asserted that the official functions appropriate to [227] deacons already in practice exist in the Church. Now it is assumed as self-evident and actually asserted that since these individuals are actually performing these official functions which already in practice exist in the Church they should, as a matter of necessity or at least of suitability, be further fortified with that sacramental grace which, according to the doctrine of the Church, is truly designed precisely for these official functions. In other words it is simply stated: 'The official functions already exist. We know from revelation that the diaconate also has a sacramental status. Why, therefore, should those individuals who already exercise these official functions of the deacon be deprived of that grace which does de facto exist in the Church as a sacramental grace?' The Scheme on the work of the missions, therefore, abstracts from the question of whether or not the external circumstances and difficulties, the lack of priests etc., are so great that fresh resources are necessary to come to the help of the Church's priests and hierarchically ordained ministers in their work. It is simply stated that these official functions are actually in existence in practice and in effect, and that those who perform them should do so in that specifically sacramental power with which Christ has de facto endowed his Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now with regard to the restoration of the diaconate itself, the authority appropriate to this is mentioned in both texts. It is said that the conferences of bishops instituted in various forms and over different areas can undertake this restoration. Similarly in the Scheme on the Missions it is said that the appropriate conferences of bishops who have regarded the restoration of the diaconate as beneficial must be the ones to put it into practice. We must, therefore, lay down clearly and unequivocally that according to both texts the proper authority to act in this matter is not the pope but the conferences of bishops. It is to these conferences in themselves, here taken as the bodies from which such action must appropriately proceed, that power is ascribed to decide in this question as to whether it is opportune to bring about such a restoration in the different areas. Of course this must take place, as is also explicitly laid down, in full agreement with the pope or with his assent. Nevertheless it is the bishops who have to take the initiative in this matter, and who therefore have the responsibility of examining and judging as to whether it is opportune to bring about such a restoration in the different territories. It would be mistaken, therefore, for the bishops to suppose that the initiative has to come from the Holy See. On the contrary, the task with which we are here concerned is not directly that of the actual restoration itself, but rather of investigating and judging whether restoration is opportune. And this task is assigned, by the passages from Lumen gentium dealing with the missions, to the bishops. Now [228] once such an authorisation has been given there can be no doubt that, for all the difficulties, a manifest duty exists to act upon it also. I do not say that there is a duty to bring about a renewal of the diaconate, but rather a duty to take all possible pains to examine and to judge whether or not this is opportune in a given area.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the light of this it also becomes clear what is being laid down in these passages with regard to the manner in which the restoration should take place. With regard to the territorial spheres it is immediately evident that these passages do not presuppose that the restoration must necessarily take place everywhere in the world at the same time. There can be no doubt that a given conference of bishops can arrive at the judgment that in their particular area such a restoration of the diaconate is necessary and would be extremely beneficial, whereas another conference of bishops may arrive at the opposite judgment so far as its area is concerned. We have seen that the authorised bodies who have the power to bring about this restoration are the various conferences of bishops. And to this extent it is obvious that it need not necessarily be expedient for a uniform restoration to take place simultaneously throughout the entire Catholic Church. But no conference of bishops can say, 'Since our colleagues in another country are not restoring the diaconate we too can peaceably abide by the practice which has been customary up to the present.' Right from the outset and of set purpose, the text itself provides for the possibility of the restoration of the diaconate being confined to a particular region. But since this is within the power not of the individual bishops but of the bishops' conferences and territorial assemblies of bishops, there is no doubt that in a given country or in a greater area a certain uniformity is necessarily required. I do not believe that an individual bishop can set himself up in opposition to such a restoration against the majority decision of his colleagues who belong to the same conference of bishops. Otherwise it would not in fact have been stated that it is for the conference of bishops to judge of the expediency of this restoration. The idea that this question is within the competence of an individual bishop to decide is certainly contrary to the spirit and the letter of the passages concerned.

After prolonged discussions the decree decides that in any such restoration the diaconate can be conferred upon more mature men as well, and even when they are married. On the other hand it is explicitly laid down that younger men too, when they are suitable, can be raised to the order of deacon, though in this case they are bound to celibacy. In view of this it is evident that the text with which we are concerned itself envisages various classes of deacons. Naturally this now opens the way to further [229] and more far-reaching discussions, the subject-matter of which no doubt presents difficulties of its own. Nevertheless we must accept the text as it stands, and recognise that in any such restoration at least two classes are envisaged: younger deacons who are bound to celibacy, and others who are of more mature age and married, upon whom this sacramental ordination can likewise be conferred. Surely no-one will deny that the diaconate as conferred upon these more mature men will, in practice and in the concrete, have a greater significance and more influence from the pastoral point of view in the life of the Church than the other case which is likewise envisaged in the text concerned.

III

We must now briefly enter into certain further questions which are still left open by the texts themselves. First, the question surely arises of who these men of more mature age are. What actual age is envisaged here? The actual terms of the text are extremely general and somewhat vague, and probably this is deliberate, because in this field, after all, there is need for a little further experience in deciding how old married men should be in order to be ordained deacons. Next a further question arises as to what conferences of bishops or regional assemblies of bishops of various kinds the texts intend to refer to. Here too the answer is not easy. The conferences of bishops are so different from one another in respect of the number of their members, their status, the extent of the regions they represent, that in this respect

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

many questions can suggest themselves. On the other hand even this difficulty could, without great effort, be removed because even after they have come to their judgment as to whether a restoration of the diaconate is opportune, it is only with the agreement and assent of the pope himself that this restoration actually takes place.

The text says nothing about the kind of formation which the future deacons should undergo. Here too there is much that still needs to be considered and examined in greater detail. Nevertheless I believe that in view of the fact that the Scheme on the Missions envisages men who are already performing the tasks appropriate to deacons, we should regard this in itself as an indication of what kind of formation is required. Those individuals ought to be put forward for ordination who have already de facto acquired sufficient formation and experience in the Church's work, and who are already performing the official functions of deacons. On this view not so very many difficulties will arise in our considerations of what sort of formation deacons should undergo as might otherwise be [230] expected. De facto such individuals already exist. De facto, therefore, they are already, to a large extent, formed and prepared for their diaconal functions and experienced in them. The form and manner of formation, therefore, which has hitherto been considered sufficient for the formation of such individuals will also to a large extent be no less adequate for the formation of the future deacons. Otherwise those who already perform the official functions of deacons would, in fact, have been unable to perform them at all.

A further question which has been left open in the texts with which we are concerned is that of the diaconate as a 'lower' degree of order. One statement which has a certain relevance here is that passage in the Constitution on the Church which states that deacons would be ordained not as a preliminary to the priesthood but for a ministry of their own. Nevertheless, with regard to this 'lower degree' several theological questions still remain unanswered. It is stated that the deacon exercises his ministry in union with the bishop and his priests. But what, in more precise terms is the relationship which the deacon bears to the bishop or to the priest or to both together? How can we define more precisely the reasons for representing the order of deacon as a 'lower' degree of order? Much in the way of theological exploration and examination is still needed in order to establish this. Of course it is true that the deacon does not have those functions which, according to the official teaching of the Church, and especially that of the Council of Trent, belong only to the priest, as for instance the administration of the sacrament of penance and the consecration at the Eucharistic Mystery. And to this extent there is a palpable and easily comprehensible difference between the diaconate and the priesthood. From this basis, therefore, we can easily go on to say that the status of the deacon is lower as compared with that of the priest. Nevertheless this does not necessarily or ipso facto imply that the diaconate is simply a 'lower' degree from every point of view. When we think of the ministry on behalf of the poor, and of many other tasks which belong primarily to the deacon, it is no longer easy to perceive how the diaconate could be designated in this connection as a lower degree. Moreover, a point which we should particularly notice is that the Constitution Lumen gentium carefully avoids saying that the episcopate (munus episcopali) is a 'higher' degree, above that of the priesthood. On the contrary, it regards the episcopate as constituting, of its essence, the plenitude of an order that is, though hierarchically structured, integrally one, and that exists in the Church in virtue of a divine institution. Now if we make this way of regarding the matter our own, then we can consider the diaconate too as [231] constituting in its own right an authentic and special mode of participation in this one integral order in the Church. From this it follows that on the one hand we both can and must say that the diaconate is a lower or more restricted mode of participation in this order than the priesthood. But at the same time we do not necessarily have to say that this is the case in every respect. My belief is that the bishop has the most solemn duty of making the love of Christ present in the world in relation to all who toil and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

suffer, who are poor and weak, who have to bear persecution etc. Now if this task belongs, in a quite primary sense, to the bishop himself, the deacon has no less vital a share in it than any priest. I have decided to mention this one point alone in order to show that the text with which we are concerned still leaves many questions open, both for further theological investigation and also so far as the Church's practice is concerned.

In conclusion perhaps it will be appropriate to return once more to something which has already been said in order to enlarge upon it a little further. When we look more closely into the texts relating to deacons in the Constitution on the Church and the Decree on the Missions, we find that it is not permissible, theologically speaking, to say that the tasks there ascribed to the future deacons can also be performed by laymen, or perhaps by those who, at some point in the future are to be equipped with the lower orders. In my opinion any such conception would be, from all points of view, quite untheological. In the sacrament of order a threefold division exists both in the sacrament itself and in the official functions that go with it, and no-one can deny that from apostolic times onwards the Church has been aware of, has recognised, and has actually exercised her God-given right to impose this division. Now if, and to the extent that, this is true – and it cannot be denied by anyone without danger of heresy – then in my opinion a further point manifestly follows, and one that is clearly stated in the Decree on the Missions. It is that when certain individuals in the Church are in fact fulfilling certain specific functions, then the Church herself must supplement this by conferring on them that grace which our Lord specially instituted precisely for these functions, and which he gave his Church authority to confer in sacramental form. This is the fundamental point for consideration in this whole question of the restoration of the diaconate. It is not some arbitrary question of what functions can or cannot be exercised by whom. It is not some kind of romantic revival which is in question here, of a reality which did in fact exist in the early Church. Rather what we are asking here is whether in our Church of the present day the office of deacon is de facto being performed. If, and to the extent that we have to answer this question in the [232] affirmative, or if and to the extent that we have to say that it is absolutely necessary for there to be such an office, given the circumstances of the present day, then this office is to be set up. And if an individual is already suitable for this office, then it seems to me to be necessary on theological grounds that that grace should be conferred upon him which does exist in the Church precisely for the official functions which he is de facto performing. Moreover it appears that all other considerations are, from the outset, excluded from this genuinely theological one. We are not in the least concerned with the question of whether absolutely speaking it is possible for laymen too to give Holy Communion to others. No-one will deny that this is possible. But the question that is being asked here is whether the Church really needs individuals who will have the duty of doing this and much else besides as part of their official and permanent functions, and as part of the normal life of the Church. If such individuals are needed, if such a permanent office, together with its functions, can be provided for in the Church, or if, indeed, it actually already exists, then the matter is already decided. The Church already has, in her possession, that sacramental grace which is designed for this office, which is already present and being exercised in her. And this sacramental grace must be conferred on those individuals. Theologically speaking, no other factors enter into the question. This may suffice by way of introduction. Since other theologians will be exploring the nature of the case from the theological point of view, I have been able to confine myself to certain aspects which have, of their very nature, been raised by the relevant conciliar documents.[2]

[2] For a fuller treatment of this cf. the conference report entitled 'Le diacre dans l'église et le monde d'aujourd'hui', P. Winniger and Y. Congar edd. = Unam Sanctam 59 (Paris 1966). The concrete occasion for which this lecture was composed was such that it was not possible to enter into the new prescriptions for the diaconate set forth in the Motu Proprio 'Sacrorum Diaconatus Ordinem' (cf. the Osservatore Romano of 28

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

June 1967, p. 1). For a more detailed interpretation of this document I may draw attention to the edition with commentary which is to be brought out by Herbert Vorgrimler and published by the Paulinus-Verlag, Trier (= Nachkonziliare Dokumentation No. 9). On the situation in Germany cf. K. Rahner, H. Vorgrimler, J. Kramer, 'Zur Erneuerung des Diakonats in Deutschland', Stimmen der Zeit 180, (1967), pp. 145-153. For further information on the current movements attention may be drawn to a series of documents entitled Diakonia, and produced by the Internationale Diakonatskreis at Freiburg im Breisgau (Directors: Mgr. Georg Hüssler and Hannes Kramer).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[233]

PART THREE

Eschatology

[235]

12

A FRAGMENTARY ASPECT OF A THEOLOGICAL EVALUATION OF THE CONCEPT OF THE FUTURE

In the attempts which contemporary theologians are making to describe how the future provides scope for the preaching of the Christian message one factor which is somewhat lacking is any concrete evaluation of the 'future' as a phenomenon. Perhaps a theologian should allow his hearers to feel more of the perplexity and embarrassment into which he falls as soon as this word is mentioned. For what is it, this future? I suppose that faced with this question we should immediately emphasise that the future does not consist (or at least that it does not consist exclusively) of that which is foreseen in the concrete and which will actually be in existence by tomorrow, since our concrete plans for it are already laid and the means for accomplishing it are already to hand, so that all that we still need in order to bring it to reality is a little more time. Properly speaking, all this already belongs to our present. One of the characteristics of futurity is that it is mysterious, that for the most part we are unaware of it – indeed that we actually suppress the awareness of it in ourselves. And the concrete future which has already been determined by us as depicted above, only partakes of the nature of true futurity to the extent that it is threatened by uncertainties: the question of whether our plans may not yet be thwarted by some alien factor or another, whether we shall not be prevented from experiencing tomorrow in the same way as we experience today by the factor of our death – for instance through heart-failure. Hence evolutionary ideas cannot be taken as a starting-point either for our understanding of the future. For in that case it would in fact precisely be something which we already possessed in our designs and within our abilities, namely that so-called 'natural order' which simply represents a further actualisation of possibilities which we already possess and of which, in principle, we are already aware, even though we need a little more time in order to bring them to reality: just a little more patience, it is already coming! On this view there is a certain pride in our attitude, for we think [236] that our relationship to the future is such that it is already present to us so long as the 'reality' turns out as we have foreseen in our designs and estimates, whether of a theoretical or practical kind. On this showing the future reality is, properly speaking, formed and determined so as to fit in with the plan as it exists in the present. It serves only to confirm the presence of the all-penetrating spirit and the rightness of its calculations. The only interest it still possesses is that it serves as a proof of the fact that we have not made any mistakes in our estimates or in our plans. I cannot avoid the impression that in the attitudes of enthusiasm with which both Western theorists and Marxists view the future there is a constant temptation to confuse the real future with this 'tomorrow which is already here today', and which is based on evolutionary or technical theory or on a combination of both; a temptation, therefore, to call this combination of plans plus time in the sense of being a pure formal and empty interval the 'future', and thereby distorting the true relationship which man bears to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the real future, and suppressing the real meaning of future altogether. I have nothing against planning; nothing against that enthusiasm with which we greet the fact that ultimately speaking man is no longer merely subject to the play of external forces over which he has no control, but is himself the manipulator; that man imposes his own existence no longer merely at the theoretical level but at the practical level as well, and that he possesses a futurology; that man already knows what he wants his future to be, and how he intends to ensure that it shall be this; that man can no longer be surprised; that he can calculate correctly and foresee; that he imposes his own will as formed by him today upon tomorrow and, on the basis of what actually is, knows what this same reality is destined to become tomorrow. It is remarkable that all this is already an accomplished fact; that man, with his cunning and yet tormented by the factor of blind chance, has actually managed to catch the approaching event as his prey in the meshes of his own will; managed already in the present to build those paths by which his children are destined to travel – though admittedly here there is one point precisely that still remains vexing, namely that it is our children and not we ourselves who are to travel by these ways. Nevertheless at the same time we have become extremely well informed on our own account. Yet still even this is precisely not the future.

But in that case what is the future? Precisely that mysterious element in that which we are accustomed to call the future, and which, nevertheless, we have deprived of its true nature and turned into a part of the present by anticipating it through our plans and the abilities we have acquired, though we certainly recognise the rights which belong to him who is far-seeing and [237] able. The future is that to which we ourselves cannot reach out, but which rather comes to us of itself – when it decides to – and with which we have to deal, strangely, precisely on these terms. The future is that which does not evolve, that which is not planned, that which is not under our control. It is all this, and it is this precisely in its incomprehensibility and its infinitude. The future is that which silently lies in wait, and which, when it springs out upon us, rips up the nets of all our plans, the false 'future' which we ourselves have constructed, so as to make that which we have planned or foreseen a present fact. The true future is that which is uncontrollable, that which is, and which remains in control calmly and silently, incalculably and yet patiently giving us the time we need because it itself needs none, for it never comes too late. It is that which cannot be controlled or calculated, which again and again wells up and breaks through the most precise calculations of the future, makes room for them and yet at the same time always makes them provisional and doubtful of accomplishment. It is that which cannot be calculated or controlled, and which has the effect (this is something of which we are convinced, however strange it may be) that in this human history to which we are subject we are never finished with working out the so-called future, and trying to draw it down into the present. It is that which cannot be controlled or calculated, and that in which we cannot intervene. It does not depend for its life on any power of ours, but rather has power of itself. It can of itself make its own impact in that which we experience – but precisely as future. In relation to it we are able to be that which we have to be in order for it to impose itself. But precisely in virtue of this very necessity it confines us to those limitations in virtue of which we ourselves are precisely not it, but of our very nature always have before us the element of the uncontrollable in it as the alien factor in our lives.

We cannot escape from the necessity of having to deal with the future precisely because it is not subject to our control. It can be suppressed and forgotten as the spectre which makes fools of us, which the sensible man looks down upon; as our shadow which we cast before us (admittedly it may be asked why that which is sheer nothingness does not swallow up this shadow too and thereby free us from it). But even so this future is there: as the silent expanse, empty so far as we are concerned, within which alone we can trace out our narrow courses of life. It is there as the mystery which we must always take into our calculations in raising

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

those questions which we answer to ourselves. It is there as that which empowers us freely to exercise the power given to us, for this power of ours can only achieve that which we have determined within the sphere of that which [238] we ourselves have precisely not achieved. For we would not be able to begin to achieve it at all unless it was already open to be achieved by us. When we have made some moment of pleasure for ourselves we can command it to stay with us, and it makes no difference whether it punishes us for this by remaining and 'freezing', or whether it strikes us dead by departing from us. We are always guilty when we command it to remain. For of its nature it exists in order to die, in order that by its coming and its departure from us the future, with its incomprehensibility and uncontrollability, may be there and may manifest itself and conceal itself at the same time in all the instabilities of this present as constituted by that which we have decided for ourselves.

We have constantly to come to terms with the true future, even when we are embittered enough, ill-disposed enough, cynical enough or culpably naive enough to seek to achieve a state in which we are untroubled by it. Its silence becomes so loud that we believe we are deafened when death begins to impinge upon our awareness and our senses, when the glory of our past achievements is suddenly transformed before our eyes into the boundary beyond which we cannot pass, yet without our being able to forget that glory, and when that which we grasp at so greedily escapes from us once more by turning out to be that which is not, after all, what we seek in the depths of our being. Now there is a certain attitude of trust which we may discover within ourselves – discover it not merely because it is there (whether accepted or denied) but because it is manifested in us as part and parcel of our conscious presentation of ourselves. This attitude of which I am speaking is one in which we trust that this incomprehensible and ineffable future is not merely that which was and which remains the eternal that pre-exists us, and which serves to show us the limitations to which we are subject, but is rather intended to be and to become the future precisely as arriving for us without ceasing thereby to be in itself the nameless mystery. Now supposing that we did in fact have this attitude of trust, what in that case would properly speaking be taking place in this life? What would be taking place in this event in which the attitude of trust and the future itself considered as arriving for us neither could nor should any longer be distinguished from one another, but where there would be a self-commitment in trust (or trust would be ventured upon) as the still-unfolding event of this future precisely in its aspect of arriving, and in this sense as a hope in the future?

Apparently nothing. The world would continue to go on just as it would in any case. We would make plans and ourselves construct the future which would be the present of today and perhaps of tomorrow – [239] but always as lost in the infinitude of the true future. But yet at the same time everything would be different. But before we raise the question of the reasons for this difference this 'would be' must be corrected. Perhaps it is different, not merely 'would be' different. For in fact, to put it at its lowest, it might be the case that we actually have this attitude of trust which consists in hope in the true sense; that we are actually making it real and effective, and that all that we still lack is the courage openly to declare that we have it. It would be perfectly possible for a man to be quite incapable of drawing any clear distinction between one who really has this attitude of trust and one who has not. It could even be the case that it is actually achieved, and yet that we can only become consciously aware of the fact that it has been achieved at that stage at which we no longer need to speak about it. The achievement of trust in its fulness in this sense is especially apparent in death, where the individual himself is silent, and where it is not we but the truth that begins to speak. There where this trust is present and where our hope on behalf of ourselves and others also is of this kind, there that which is hoped for actually takes place even when this trust has not yet arrived at the stage of reflecting upon itself and being recognised for what it is. We must no longer ask, therefore, what in fact 'would be the case' if such a hope was attained to.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Rather we already have this attitude of trust and hope, and with this attitude no longer ask what 'would be the case'. We have already long passed the stage of wishing to ask this question. The assumption involved here includes the supposition that with regard to this attitude of trust we are quite incapable of establishing any way of testing or comparing what is and what might be or perhaps is, in the case of a specific individual. Only with this proviso do we ask what would be or is if someone either has, or could have this trust, that the absolute future is that which is actually breaking in upon him.

What does it mean, therefore, for a man to have this trust in the absolute future considered as that which is radically breaking in upon his own life?

First, the world of the future that we construct for ourselves still remains. It would in fact not exist at all if there were no reference to the absolute future, whether this is present as that which is actually coming to meet us or as that which repels us. This absolute future is present as presiding over us in some way or other in that it is made over to us as the 'material' of the future we construct with all its variations between good and bad fortune. The existence of this – as the presence of the future in the temporal sense – is to this extent precious and indispensable. Admittedly from this aspect it must not be interpreted as a future which can be [240] constructed merely in technical terms. It also includes invariably the event of the love which proceeds from the 'thou' to the 'thou', which constitutes, in a manner quite different from the future which can be constructed at the technical level, that which provides a foothold for the future which cannot be controlled. But at the same time this absolute future gives the future which we construct for ourselves its place in the real and effective openness of true human history. There is no future which can be constructed, no plan which would not open outwards and forwards into that which has not been foreseen and which no system can provide for. Every humanism with a predetermined content is relative. It can become other than it is and contains no promise within itself of any abiding permanence. Man is never aware of himself as the being who is open to the mysterious and absolute future in such a way that he could devise any adequate plans for himself. All ideals which he formulates in the concrete remain, when their true nature is not misunderstood, bounded by the 'ideal' of the question which is kept open. The one who exposes himself to the mystery of the absolute future is the one who knows least of all about himself and who defends this awareness of his non-awareness as the ultimate achievement of life and as the ultimate truth which is proper to himself. There are, then, two attitudes to be considered here: first the attitude in which we take with absolute seriousness the future which we can construct, considering this as the medium of the absolute future, and second the factor in this future which can be constructed which makes its contents relative and conditional. It is this latter factor that distinguishes it from the future that is absolute. Now through both of these factors taken together the man who has this trust calmly and quietly faces the vicissitudes of the future which can be constructed with an attitude of ultimate freedom, without falling into any kind of Stoic apathy. He actively engages himself in his lot, taking this as his absolute duty, and endures with composure any corrections which may be imposed upon him by that which is outside his own personal control. For this too is in its turn the onset of the future that is absolute, provided only it is accepted without reserve.

The true future, the ultimate which itself cannot be constructed, takes place quite simply. It comes to meet us. It is intended to be imparted to us as the incomprehensible mystery. We are those who precisely experience the impact of it as a lightning flash in the hope that our darkness may be the blinding effect of its very brilliance; that it is not striking us dead, but rather imparting to us a healing that is eternal. And if anyone supposes that he has no experience whatever of this, he must say that even so he does experience it and is not aware of it, provided only that he accepts his [241] own life unconditionally. But because he is immersed in human history, man can always keep watch to see whether he finds in his history

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

anyone in relation to whom he can entertain this trust for him and so for himself also, in such a way that he attains to that attitude in all its purity in which he submits to the breaking in upon his own life of the absolute future. It is this precisely that is also a promise for us. This would be the starting-point from which we should have to go on to speak in particular of how Christianity is related to the future. But since this has already been done in another context[1] we can break off this fragmentary consideration at this point.

[1] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 59-68.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[242]

13

ON THE THEOLOGY OF HOPE

We have no intention here of giving the impression that in the pages which follow we could, in any sense, present the theology of hope. The title has been chosen with care because only certain aspects of such a theology are intended to be expressed, and the choice of these has been somewhat arbitrary. Hence we cannot set forth, with all the fulness they deserve, the contributions to this subject of scripture itself, of traditional scholastic theology, or of more recent works which have appeared over the last few years,[1] especially those of P. Lain-Entralgo, G. Marcel, E. Bloch, J. Pieper, O. F. Bollnow, J. Moltmann, W. D. Marsch, J. B. Metz, E. Schillebeeckx, H. Schlier, J. E. Fison, A. Brunner, G. Sauter etc.,[2] though in fact all these have made contributions.[3] Moreover, on even a brief survey of the hypotheses which have been put forward from the aspects of philosophy, existential ontology, psychology, depths psychology, moral theology, exegesis and systematic theology, the impossibility is plainly revealed of claiming in any sense to [243] provide a full examination of all this wealth of literature.[4] By way of preliminary an attempt should by all means be made to set forth the various ideas of what the essence of hope consists in, the means of attaining to it, and the actual place it occupies in contemporary theology. Anyone who casts an eye precisely at the more recent hypotheses put forward by J. Moltmann and J. B. Metz, including the controversy which has arisen in this connection (though of course we cannot pass any judgment upon this here), will be in the best position to understand that the only considerations which can be put forward here with regard to the problem as a whole are only of the most fragmentary kind. Here we shall be confining ourselves to the area of those questions which have been raised primarily by scholastic theology. But this should not be taken to imply that we are remaining wholly within the ambience of this theology as initially worked out in those circles, or that we regard this as adequate for a theology of hope for today. But if we begin with the way of setting out the problems that is more familiar to us from scholastic theology, then we have not only the advantage of opening up an approach which is more generally comprehensible, but also the opportunity of uncovering certain essential aspects and dimensions in the nature of hope. It is true that to arrive at a fruitful understanding in contemporary terms these can be adjusted and rearranged in many ways, but it is also true that they conceal within themselves the hidden treasure of prolonged and

---

[1] cf. the bibliography in L.T.K. V (Freiburg, 2nd ed., 1960), 423/424 (P. Engelhardt).

[2] Apart from the more detailed works cited in L.T.K. V, 423 f. cf. P. Lain-Entralgo, L'attente et l'espérance (Paris 1966); J. Pieper, Hoffnung und Geschichte (Munich 1967); J. Moltmann, Theologie der Hoffnung (Munich, 4th ed., 1965); W. D. Marsch, Hoffen worauf? (Hamburg 1963); G. Sauter, Zukunft und Verheissung. Das Problem der Zukunft in der gegenwärtigen theologischen und philosophischen Diskussion (Zürich-Stuttgart 1965); H. Schlier, Über die Hoffnung: Besinnung auf das Neue Testament. Exegetische Aufsätze und Voträge (Freiburg 1964), pp. 135-145; P. Engelhardt, 'Der Mensch und seine Zukunft. Zur Frage nach dem Menschen bei Thomas von Aquin', Die Frage nach dem Menschen. Festschrift für Max Müller, H. Rombach ed. (Freiburg 1966), pp. 352-374; P. Schütz, Charisma Hoffnung (Hamburg 1962); idem, Parusia – Hoffnung und Prophetie (Heidelberg 1960); J. B. Metz, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz 1968).

[3] cf. further from the wide field of connected literature, H. Kimmerle, Die Zukunftsbedeutung der Hoffnung. Auseinandersetzung mit dem Hauptwerk Ernst Blochs (Bonn 1966); E. Roeder von Diersburg, Zur Ontologie und Logik offener Systeme. Ernst Bloch vor dem Gesetz der Tradition (Hamburg 1967).

[4] This also applies particularly to the works on the history of theology, cf. e.g. L.A. Arand, St Augustine, Faith, Hope and Charity (London 1947); M. Lods, L'espérance chrétienne d'Origène à St. Augustin (Paris 1952); R. Schwarz, Fides, spes und caritas beim jungen Luther (Berlin 1962); L. Ballay, Der Hoffnungsbegriff bei Augustinus, = M.T.S. 2, 29 (Munich 1964).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mature experience, and this may, perhaps, be able to make a contribution which is not inessential by deepening and filling out the hypotheses put forward in contemporary theology, or even serving as a kind of corrective to them.

I

Primarily, therefore, we are taking as axiomatic what is laid down in the classic theology of the scholastics: the existence of three theological virtues in man which are 'divine', which go to make up the concrete content of his justification to the extent that this can be conceived of as the power to produce acts which are directly salvific in faith, hope and love. Scholastic theology is also concerned with the specific quality of these 'divine' virtues to the extent that the theological virtues of their nature [244] signify God himself as he who, in an act of grace which is unmerited, which raises man to a supernatural level and 'divinises' him, directly constitutes himself, in the glory which is proper to his own interior nature, as the salvation and the ultimate goal of the creature endowed with spiritual faculties. Yet a further tenet of scholastic theology is the existence of hope as the second of these three virtues, one which follows upon faith and constitutes a prior condition for love. Again scholastic theology is concerned to define the nature of hope on the one hand inasmuch as it is a quality proper to the will and the exercise of its freedom, causing it to reach out in a spirit of trust in God for God himself as the absolute good and therefore as salvation, and to the extent that on the other hand this good appears as something still to be attained, something difficult of attainment, i.e. not immediately or evidently attainable, yet which is, nevertheless, made possible for us to attain through God's promise and in the light of his omnipotence and his kindness in forgiving us. Again scholastic theology draws a sharp dividing line between presumption on the one hand and despair on the other, and a further point is that all particular and individual goods which are still unattained and which are difficult of attainment, but are nevertheless genuine and possible, are subsumed under the subject-matter of the theological virtue of hope, in so far as these are included in God's purposes, a 'means' of attaining to salvation. In scholastic theology the christological aspect of hope is also dealt with inasmuch as Christ, the risen Lord, constitutes the concrete realisation in history, and the eschatological consummation of the divine promise which is the basis for hope and which makes it possible. It defines the connection between hope and certain related attitudes or individual aspects such as 'expectancy', 'perseverance', 'patience', 'trust', 'assurance of salvation', 'self-interested love', 'selfless love'. And a further point which is defined in scholastic theology is the relationship of theological hope to hope in general considered as a basic 'existential' or essential factor in human living as such. It is concerned with the nature of hope to the extent that this is not merely an individual 'virtue' practised in isolation by one who is pursuing his own private salvation, but rather something that provides a basic framework for the attitude of the people of God as such on their pilgrimage, and one in which each individual does not merely hope for himself alone, but each hopes for all. All this – and certainly in itself it already constitutes a major and difficult task to investigate – must be regarded as given and presupposed.

[245]

II

A first attempt to penetrate somewhat more deeply into the nature of hope must now be made, and in order to do this we shall take as our starting-point the classic principle of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic theology that hope is a special theological virtue which must be assigned a place together with and between faith and love.

At first this statement seems to be readily understandable. A theological virtue is an attitude freely adopted by the subject endowed with intellect and will, yet supported by God's self-bestowal in grace. It is an attitude which is related not, as with the moral virtues, to a particular finite moral value which can be defined in 'this-worldly' categories, but bears upon God himself as he is 'in and for himself', and as such becomes, in a direct sense through this act of self-bestowal in grace, our absolute good. In this way, therefore, God becomes radically and effectively 'God for us'. But hope bears precisely upon God in this sense, God who has promised himself to us in this dimension of his nature and who constitutes our absolute future.[5] This seems to be enough to enable us to understand the fact that hope is one of the three theological virtues and why it should be so. In fact, however, not everything is ipso facto clear, especially if we are to understand that hope is not merely a preliminary and provisional form of faith and love, not merely faith and love 'on the way' and before they have attained their goal, not merely, therefore, a form conditioned by that situation in human existence in which we are still making pilgrimage and therefore in danger. On the contrary hope is to be thought of as a unique theological virtue in its own right, and one which cannot be reduced to the other two. This, however, is not clear immediately or without further explanation.

In order to recognise the obscurity here we must consider the following factors. In the doctrine of the Trinity[6] we know of two 'processions', in other words two modes of mediation through which God as ungenerated (the Father) utters himself and possesses himself in love, so that three modes of subsistence in the one God are constituted, the 'procession' as Word and also as 'breathing forth love'. In conformity with this, in any Christian interpretation of man, we must hold fast, in spite of many [246] contrary tendencies of recent times, to the fact that there are two basic modes of human (transcendental) self-realisation: awareness of, and reflection upon the self through knowledge and through free love, corresponding to the two basic transcendentals Verum and bonum, in which the one (unum) being (ens) imposes itself. These two basic transcendentals, then, are such that we cannot at will add any others to them on the same plane. Thus it appears that from what we know both of God and of man it is natural to expect two basic attitudes to be involved in man's right realisation of his own nature, two basic virtues which correspond to this original transcendental duality inherent in man. This is all the more true in view of the fact that a 'divine' or theological virtue is sustained precisely by God's self-bestowal, and the response of the creature who has personal status and is endowed with spiritual faculties to this divine self-bestowal is precisely made possible and effective by the divine self-bestowal itself. Now there are only two such modes or – better – aspects in this one divine self-bestowal: the first aspect is constituted by the Logos and the second by the divine Pneuma. It is precisely through these two aspects that God as ungenerated, God the 'Father' (not, therefore, an abstract divinity!), who is incomprehensible and never loses his incomprehensibility even through his act of divine self-bestowal, imparts himself. Because of this we cannot imagine that the Trinity in the modes of subsistence in the one God implies ipso facto that there is also a trinity in the response by which we accept this self-bestowal of the Father in Logos and in Pneuma. The fact that there is only one act of self-bestowal in which the 'Father' imparts himself in Logos and Pneuma implies that in the response, i.e. the 'theological' virtue, of man

[5] cf. K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia…', Theological Investigations VI, pp. 59-68, idem, 'A Fragmentary Aspect of a Theological Evaluation of the Concept of the Future', in this volume, pp. 235-241.
[6] On this cf. K. Rahner, Mysterium Salutis II, J. Feiner, M. Löhrer edd. (Einsiedeln 1967), pp. 317-410.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which is itself upheld by this divine self-bestowal, only a single act is conceivable with two modalities: faith and love, to correspond to the Word and the Love of the Father.

It also seems to be in conformity with this that in the theology of the bible the twofold combination of faith and love is earlier than our threefold combination of faith, hope and love, even though in not a few passages in the New Testament itself ε0λπι/φ has been inserted between πι/στιφ and α)γα&πη. Thus hope is intended to figure primarily as a mere formal aspect of faith and love taken together, the power and the mode in which man, while still in peril, lovingly yearns for God as the absolute essence of truth as apprehended by his faith, and as the absolute essence of all that is good as the goal of his love, reaching out for him under these aspects as a salvation that is still to be attained in the future, but is, nevertheless, promised. Hence it is that hope does not figure so very clearly as a distinct attitude in its own right with an independent status of its own and [247] a nature of its own somewhere between faith and love. Nor can we evade the question arising from this merely by pointing out first that hope is appropriate to the nature of this present life considered as a pilgrimage, as provisional, as lived in statu viatoris, seeing that later it is to be left behind, abrogated, once we 'possess' God, and second that this is also proper to faith, which ceases and gives way to the vision which is 'face to face'. For in one passage in which he is dealing with all three of the theological virtues which he mentions in 1 Cor 13 Paul ascribes to them a definitive permanence, a με&νειν that is absolute. Thus he does not recognise any total abrogation of πι/στιφ or ε0λπι/φ. On the other hand, however, and e converso: If we follow the traditional interpretation, and regard hope as coming to an end with 'possession', just as faith comes to an end with 'vision', then this 'possession' of God would still be constituted precisely by a vision and a love which unites, and hope would once more appear as the mere mode in which man for the time being, and in his statu viatoris strives for this possession of God as truth and love. Hope as such would be abrogated in a far more radical manner than faith, which is raised to the level of vision. In comparison with faith or vision and with love, whether as still in process of development or in its definitive form, we would constantly be in a position where we could not yet ascribe this status to hope as of the same origin as these other virtues and as 'enduring' like them as that in which the basic fulness of human life is achieved in the attainment of God. Thus at this stage it seems as though we can only construct a triad of divine virtues by postulating an interrelationship of initially disparate concepts which is relatively superficial, and only in such a triad can hope be considered one of the three theological virtues. Now despite all appearances to the contrary this problem is not a question of subtle, and ultimately superfluous playing with concepts. On the contrary, the process of finding the answer to it will bring us perforce to a deeper understanding of the nature of hope, and thereby of man and even of God himself. This is why we have dwelt upon this problem in all its acuteness. But what is the solution to it?

III

It would certainly be false for us to seek to find a solution to the problem by contesting the statements which have been made, as for instance by holding that ultimately speaking what is being postulated is a third basic power to which hope would correspond as its appropriate virtue. In fact we do not need to conceive of the triad of the theological virtues as such [248] that it necessarily presents us with three virtues together, unified by a strict principle of distinction which is common to them all in the same sense and at the same level, so that they have precisely the same relationship among themselves. We do not necessarily need to argue against the correctness of regarding these three virtues as constituting a triad. We do not need to adopt this approach even though 'hope' is regarded as the midterm and the common factor

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between the two other virtues. Admittedly in saying this we are assuming that it is not regarded merely as a transient modality of the two other virtues and of the 'powers' corresponding to these, but rather as that property which endures in them, and which draws both equally together into one. We must not regard hope merely as standing 'between' the two other virtues. Rather we must think of it as constituting the original and unifying medium between them. If we can show this then we are justified in speaking of a triad, but at the same time we do not have to conclude from its existence that hope must be related to faith and love in precisely the same way as these two are related to each other. Nor is it, ultimately speaking, of decisive importance whether the basic modality of the relationship to God as understood here is that which is called 'hope' in the common parlance of everyday, or whether rather there is something which lies concealed behind this term, but which, nevertheless, this term is used to point to because there is no better one for it.

It is common practice in scholastic theology to replace the vision of this quality of hope which is so obscurely pointed to by the conceptual model according to which hope is dissolved by 'possession', by the 'attainment of the goal'. This conceptual model is drawn from everyday experience, and from the experience of 'hope' at the profane level. Initially, for instance, we 'hope' for a position in life which we have not yet attained to. But once this has been achieved, once we 'have' it, then we no longer need to 'hope', but at most hope to retain that which we have achieved, though in that case we experience or interpret this attitude as something quite different from 'hope'. But what is to be said of precisely that basic act in which (it is called theological hope) we reach out towards God? Can we interpret this basic act too as a mere provisional attitude which will be dissolved once we have attained to that state of 'possession' which itself in turn is constituted by 'vision' and unifying 'love'? In that case hope will be abolished as something that belongs to the past, because now there is nothing more that has to be 'hoped for', but rather everything is already in our possession, and we do not even have to fear that we may lose what has been attained to, in other words we do not even have to hope that this will continue permanently. But is this line of thought correct?

[249] In fact, however, it is questionable in the extreme – in other words basically inadequate – to take as our guide the conceptual model of 'possession' in order to understand the definitive consummation of man's life, and on this basis to conceive of hope as that which is merely provisional. This conceptual model in fact distorts the special quality of man's final consummation as consisting in vision and love, and thereby too that basic modality belonging to this final consummation which is both expressed and concealed at the same time in the term 'hope'. This basic modality only constitutes the authentic nature of that theological hope in so far as it is present in the life of the pilgrim here below – and here admittedly it has a certain provisional quality. The act of attaining to God as truth in the 'vision' of God in fact allows for the transcendence of this God as the incomprehensible. The event in which this takes place, inasmuch as it is made possible by the divine self-bestowal, is not the act in which the absolute mystery which is God is finally overcome and solved, but rather the act in which this truly unfathomable mystery in all its finality and its overpowering acuteness is no longer able to be suppressed, but must be sustained and endured as it is in itself without any possibility of escape into that which can be comprehended and so controlled and subordinated to the subject and his own nature as it exists prior to any elevation by grace. The act of attaining to love as love is the response to, and acceptance of, a love which, totally independent of any element in ourselves, is rather freedom in its most radically incalculable form. The intelligibility of this love is not to be found in any prior quality in ourselves which makes us 'worthy to be loved' (even though the love itself does confer this). On the contrary, it always depends totally and eternally on this freedom of God which is based on nothing else than itself alone. In this radical sense the love we are speaking of is, and remains eternally,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'grace'.[7] The 'possession' of God – if in spite of what has been said we may still use this term – is that radical transcendence of self and surrender of self which is entailed in the act of reaching out for truth into the unfathomable mystery, and it is also the radical self-surrender and self-transcendence of that love which cannot charm love from the beloved through any act of self-surrender on its part, but lives totally by the love of that which is beloved as based on nothing else than itself. It is pure act of reception and as such sustains the mutual interplay or commercium of the love involved, but is not itself upheld by this commercium.

[250] These qualities inherent in the response to and acceptance of God as truth and as love have an interior unity and a common source in the one radical attitude which draws us 'out of ourselves' into that which is utterly beyond our control. This 'letting of one's self go' is certainly the essence of man, rightly understood in the concrete as already bearing 'grace' within itself. Once he has discovered this nature of his and freely assented to it, man has attained to freedom in the true sense, which consists in realising himself and fulfilling the meaning of his life. And precisely this fulfilment of his nature is that 'outwards from the self' attitude of the finite subject reaching out into the incomprehensibility and incircumscribability of God as truth and as love. In the word 'hope' this one unifying 'outwards from the self' attitude into God as the absolutely uncontrollable finds expression. Hope, therefore, represents this unifying medium between faith or vision and love (still on the way and also, even when it has achieved its 'goal'). Hence "hope" does not, in this most ultimate sense, express a modality of faith and love so long as these are at the provisional stage. On the contrary, it is a process of constantly eliminating the provisional in order to make room for the radical and pure uncontrollability of God. It is the continuous process of destroying that which appears, in order that the absolute and ultimate truth may be the intelligible as comprehended, and love may be that which is brought about by our love. We would like to be those who set up God for ourselves through that which we ourselves do, acting (morally) as free and intelligent beings, and thereby having him as ours to dispose of as we will. But hope is the name of an attitude in which we dare to commit ourselves to that which is radically beyond all human control in both of man's basic dimensions, that, therefore, which is attained to precisely at that point at which the controllable is definitively transcended, i.e. in the ultimate consummation of eternal life. Taken in this sense hope is that which 'endures'. And this means that it also shares in this character of 'enduring' which is involved in the definitive finality of the relationship to absolute truth. Hence Paul can say that faith itself 'endures', even when vision has been attained to. A further point also becomes clear in the light of this, namely that the love of eternity can only rightly be understood if it is thought of as carrying the quality of 'hope', so that we can just as truly speak of a fides and caritas spe formata as of a fides and spes caritate formata. Hope implies the one basic character which is the common factor in the mutual interplay of truth and love: the enduring attitude of 'outwards from self' into the uncontrollability of God. Conversely we can say: where hope is achieved as the radical self-submission to the absolute uncontrollable, there alone do we truly understand [251] what, or still better who God is. He is that which of its very existence empowers us to make this radical self-commitment to the absolute uncontrollable in the act of knowledge and love. One might almost say our radical self-commitment to the 'absurdity' of truth and love, because both derive their true essence – quite otherwise to what we would have thought at first sight – from the incomprehensibility and uncontrollability of truth and love in themselves.

This means that radically speaking hope is not the modality of the historical process by which we pass through time to that state which is definitive and eternal, but rather the basic [7] On the question as a whole cf. also K. Rahner, Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), 'The "Commandment" of Love in Relation to the Other Commandments', pp. 439-459.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

modality of the very attitude to the eternal which precisely as such sets the true advance towards eternity 'in train'. In the light of this both presumption and despair are, at basis, the refusal of the subject to allow himself to be grasped by the uncontrollability and to be drawn out of himself by it. Clearly all that has been said with regard to the ultimate nature of hope does not imply any denial of the fact that it itself, in the status viatoris it bears certain properties which can no longer be ascribed to it in the eternal life in which it achieves its consummation. But these properties – the striving for the finite within that process in which the encounter with the provisional is still taking place – conceal more than they unveil the innermost essence of hope. For this encounter, even when we rise above it in our hope for the future, always gives rise to the impression that that which is definitive and final too will one day be possessed in the same way as now we comprehend, dominate and so dispose of the provisional and temporary benefits available to us.

IV

We must now adopt a second approach, and attempt thereby to penetrate still more deeply into the absolute essence of hope. In this we must once more take as our starting-point certain familiar theological data. In this way it will be sought to clarify still further the unique and original nature of hope which, perhaps, even after our first approach, still continues to be understood as a modality of faith and love in such a way that it is not sufficiently made clear how faith and love too themselves only appear rightly in their true nature when they are conceived of in the light of the original and independent status of hope.

In the average Catholic theology hope appears almost as an inevitable consequence of faith. Faith is the assent and apprehension not merely of the theoretical statements in which divine revelation is formulated, but also of God's promises which are proclaimed in this revelation, the [252] promises of grace, of forgiveness and of eternal life. Once these promises are apprehended and are present by faith itself, then – so the average theology of hope appears unreflectingly to suppose – everything is clear and simple. These promises which are present and apprehended by faith itself considered as fides historica et dogmatica apparently set hope in train of themselves. Hope as a reaction on the part of the free will appears to be the simple consequence of the assensus intellectualis of faith considered as the act by which revelation is initially accepted, but it is this only provided that this freedom is not used to block the way in an incomprehensible and nonsensical refusal of these promises as theoretically apprehended, to which faith has already given its assent and which it offers to the free will as a subject on which to exercise its power.

This conception of hope, unreflecting for the most part but nonetheless real, is of course only the reflection of a more general theoretical intellectualism, according to which the 'will' is almost reduced to the status of the executive power for attaining to that good which is the verum of the intellect as ipso facto attained to, and which, therefore, in its original essence as the final consummation of knowledge as such, also signifies its beatitude. In saying this we have no intention of entering into the questions raised in the traditional controversy between Thomism and Scotism, or of supporting an option in favour of will, freedom and love as against 'intellect', if from both points of view the matter is conceived of as a choice between two 'powers'. Both historically speaking and of their real natures, the factors involved are not so simple. On the contrary, what has just been said is intended to be understood as an indication of a prior and more radical unity of knowledge and will, which the word 'hope' is precisely intended to represent in its status as a prior medium or common factor between faith and love, and therefore between knowledge and will.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But let us notice in greater detail the misunderstanding indicated above, in which hope is interpreted as a simple consequence of faith. On the one hand what does faith offer in the way of promise if it is understood in the traditional sense of assensus intellectualis as put forward by the Council of Trent and the First Vatican Council? And what promise is it, on the other hand, that becomes the object of hope as such? We can and must answer this question in the following terms: in both cases it is far from being precisely the same promise, however much the second too, though not in isolation, may be based upon the first and depend upon it. From this a fresh insight can be obtained into the special quality and radical uniqueness of hope. Faith – viewed more in its 'theoretical' nature (including in this the dogmatic and historical specifications) – can only [253] proclaim the 'metaphysical' kindness and holiness of God, the universal and fundamental meaningfulness of existence, God's universal will to save all men as 'prior' to man's response and conditioned by it, the existence of 'sufficient grace' for all and the existence of 'efficacious grace' for 'those in whom its presence cannot be recognised', so that we can never know precisely to whom this efficacious grace is de facto to be attributed. Faith in this sense, therefore, can only express a universal 'promise'. This faith as such cannot tell me that God has conferred this efficacious grace precisely on me in particular and is thus bringing about my salvation in the concrete.

Now if it were sought to object to this point that it is only through some inexcusable fault that a given individual can forfeit salvation in general and so his salvation, which is set before him as something that is possible and actually offered to him precisely through this faith and the universal promise of freedom which it contains, then we must rejoin that, without prejudice to the fact of the inexcusable fault on the individual's part, the distinction between 'sufficient' and 'efficacious' grace is prior to this as established by God himself, so that the presence or otherwise of this efficacious grace does not simply depend upon his fault. Faith in its theoretical aspects, therefore, cannot overcome this difference which is established by the freedom of choice of God's grace, and so not subject to any influence of ours. It cannot remove this difference according to which there is a distinction between the universal promise and the concrete and particular promise which intends and brings about the salvation of me as a concrete individual through this 'efficacious' grace. Certainly grace as formulated in dogmatic terms only realises its authentic nature and attains its true purpose when it is subsumed and transcended, when the theoretical promise which is proper to it is transformed into the specific and particular promise in which it is applied to the individual. But this takes place precisely in virtue of the fact that faith is transformed into hope. The free subject recognises that in spite of his freedom, and precisely in it he himself is subject to God's control, even though it still remains true that this cannot diminish his personal responsibility before God. Wherever and whenever he exercises his freedom to receive the salvation that is offered to him, this acceptance is itself in turn the effect of the grace of God which as such is unmerited and 'effective', not merely 'sufficient'. The will of God is 'prior' to the decision of man in his freedom. And this will of God is as such distinct from God himself and not merely from man, so that it is beyond our powers to discern even so far as theoretical faith is concerned. Does this will of God, even at that level at which it is prior to my free [254] decision, de facto represent the ultimate and definitive meaning of existence for me in particular in such a way as to exclude all other possible meanings? This is a question which no-one can answer by turning the fundamental statement of theoretical faith with regard to the general promise of God's will to save all men into an absolute statement. But although such a statement is not possible theoretically speaking, and though we cannot achieve any positive knowledge of the meaning of existence or of our salvation in the concrete, nevertheless we must find another way of making this assertion to ourselves, because a positive decision of this kind is necessary for the subject himself who takes the initiative: I must hope.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Hope, then, is an act in which we base ourselves in the concrete upon that which cannot be pointed to in any adequate sense at the theoretical level, that which ultimately speaking is absolutely beyond our power to control, namely upon God who, in himself, can be the God of grace or the God of anger, but who in this case is apprehended as the God of grace and under no other aspect. And it is apparent from what has been said that hope in this sense is a basic modality of human existence. Hope, therefore, is not merely a function which follows manifestly from knowledge, including in this the factor of theoretical faith. Certainly it can be demonstrated 'in theory' and 'in principle' that there must be hope. But this does not make hope a secondary function of the insight provided by theoretical faith. For the concrete hope of each individual in particular for his salvation is, in a certain sense, authorised even prior to any theoretical judgment precisely by this theoretical insight and by his knowledge of the general promise. But while this is true, still this hope cannot be constituted by these factors alone. They cannot provide the actual basis for this concrete hope. This can only be the 'efficacious' will of God to save as applied to the concrete individual case, and it proceeds from God alone and remains hidden in him. This 'basis' is not something that faith provides for hope, but rather something that is grasped solely by hope as such. As providing the basis for hope the will of God to save in the concrete is only present and attained to in hope itself and as such. It is the hope that is not derived from something other than itself, i.e. from faith, unless indeed we are to understand faith – with Luther – as being itself fides fiducialis and as such already including hope within itself. But this would be to obliterate the sound and permanent distinction between theoretical and practical awareness.

Hope, therefore, appears as that act in which the uncontrollable is made present as that which sanctifies, blesses and constitutes salvation without losing its character as radically beyond our powers to control, precisely [255] because this salvific future is hoped for but not manipulated or controlled. However true it may be that hope has its basis in the special, but uncontrollable promise of God, it still can and must be said without any cheap attempts at paradox, that it is only hope itself that provides its own basis and in this sense creates that basis. For this special and particular promise takes place only for the individual who hopes as such, and only in hope itself as such. Hope alone is the locus of God as he who cannot be controlled or manipulated, and so of God as such.

This does not mean that the function of hope as the medium of the theological virtues is removed. The perichoresis, the mutual interaction between the three theological virtues by which they condition one another and permeate one another (cf. above Sections II-III), is not disrupted. But what we have said does, perhaps make plainer that in hope which is irreducibly unique and underived: we only know who God is and who man is when we hope, i.e. when we take as our basis that which is incalculable and uncontrollable as the blessed which as such, and only in this guise, makes itself present to us in hope. The expression 'the incalculable and uncontrollable as the blessed' here is to be taken as the expression of a closer identification, although one that presents it more as having the nature of an event. For he who commits himself to the absolutely incalculable and uncontrollable is committing himself to the blessed one and to salvation. Presumption and despair both entail the same basic refusal to commit oneself and so to abandon oneself to the incalculable and the uncontrollable.

This does not mean that the status of Christ as the fundamental promise of hope is done away with in favour of a hope which, by its sheer radical quality, is based upon itself. For precisely this radical quality inherent in the 'outwards from self' movement into the absolute incalculability and uncontrollability of God as our absolute future, is based upon that grace of God which finds its unique historical manifestation in Christ precisely as crucified, and thereby as surrendering himself in the most radical sense to the disposing hand of God. It is in this historical manifestation that the grace we are considering here definitively establishes

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

itself in the world. But precisely this takes place in the death of Christ as the most radical act of hope ('into thy hands I deliver up my life').

Whatever divisions there may be in human powers, in theory and practice, in knowledge and in free love, they are all subsumed alike in respect of what is common to all and what is peculiar to each of these elements, under the single factor of their common creaturehood and their orientation to God who, in his act of self-bestowal, makes himself the [256] absolute future of man. And to this extent the act of hope stands revealed as the acceptance of this orientation towards the incalculability and uncontrollability of God. This act comprehends and unifies all these divisions even though, in order to be realised in the concrete, it has itself to be distinguished into faith and love. For, even allowing for this, this orientation must come from God and find its consummation in attaining to him.

V

In order to allay the suspicion that up to now we have been speaking of hope too much in terms of individual salvation, our considerations must now be supplemented by a third line of approach. Certainly it is not possible to include a full treatment of all that contemporary theology and existential ontology has to say with regard to the cosmic and social dimensions of hope, with regard to hope as exercised by the people of God on pilgrimage as such and in the course of its journey, with regard to the exodus which this people is constantly undertaking afresh, quitting all situations which have become 'frozen' and static in all dimensions of human existence.

Let us concentrate simply upon a single small passage in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium (cf. C. IV, No. 35) which has for the most part gone unnoticed. There it is stated with regard to the laity that they should not conceal their eschatological hope in the innermost depths of their hearts (in interioritate animi), but should rather give it concrete expression ('exprimant') in the complexities and in the framework (per structuras) of secular life (vitae saecularis). This admonition is found in the context of the prophetic function of the laity in the Church and in the world. Surely it would be to misunderstand it if we sought to interpret it merely as a moralising conclusion of a secondary kind, following from the nature of that hope which the 'sons' of the 'promise' (ibid.) could ultimately speaking have lived by even without 'informing' the secular framework of the world with their hope in this way.[8] Contrary to this view, the admonition contains a statement about an element which is essential to hope itself. The process by which this becomes an achieved reality involves a permanent transformation of the framework of secular life. Abstracting for the moment from the fact that 'revolution' is an extremely indeterminate and ambiguous concept, we might go so far as to say that the significance of this admonition is that Christian hope is at [257] basis a continually revolutionary attitude on the part of Christians in the world. If we interpret the significance of Christianity aright, and if Christians themselves have a right understanding of the real significance of their own commitment, then the position is the diametrical opposite of what is generally thought both within and without the Christian body. The hope that is directed towards the absolute future of God, towards that eschatological salvation which is God himself as absolute, is not entertained in order to justify an attitude of conservatism which, from motives of anxiety, prefers a certain present to an unknown future and so petrifies everything. It is not the 'opium of the people' which soothes them in their present circumstances even though these are painful. Rather it is that [8] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theological Problems Entailed in the Idea of the "New Earth"', in the present volume, pp. 260-272.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which commands them, and at the same time empowers them, to have trust enough constantly to undertake anew an exodus out of the present into the future (even within the dimension of this world).

In reality man as physical and as belonging to the historical dimension actually fulfills the ultimately transcendental structures of his own nature not in the abstract 'interiority' of a mere attitude of mind, but in intercourse with the world, the world made up of his own environment and of his fellow men. 'Practice' in the real sense, and as opposed to, and radically different from, theory, is, moreover, not confined solely to the mere execution of what has been planned and so is merely theoretical, but rather consists of an opening of the sphere of action in general and an attitude in which we dare to enter upon that which has not been planned, so that it is only in practice itself that any genuine possibility is given of what we have been bold enough to commit ourselves to. Planning may be necessary and justified in the manipulation of our environment (by technical measures), of the society we live in (by social measures), and of man himself. But all this does not derogate from the element of the unplanned which presses in upon us, and does not reduce it to a mere remnant of the contents of our lives which we have 'not yet' worked out. On the contrary such planning increases the element of that which is unplanned and has the effect of causing it to stand out still more sharply as the outcome of practice itself. Man himself, in the very process of breaking down the factor of the incalculable already present beforehand in his life, actually builds up those incalculable factors which are produced by himself.[9] Now the effect of these two elements is that in the very act of venturing upon the future which is unforeseen and incalculable in 'this worldly terms' in his practical life as understood here, man realises, and necessarily must [258] realise, his eschatological hope as a commitment 'outwards from self' to that which is incalculable and uncontrollable in an absolute sense. The Christian must, therefore, impress the form of his hope upon the framework of the world he lives in. Of course this does not mean for one moment that certain specific and firm structures of the secular world he lives in could ever be such that they could constitute the enduring objective realisation of his eschatological hope (in the sense of being established as this once and for all). On the contrary, every structure of secular life, whether present or still to come in the future, is called in question by hope as that in which we grasp at the incalculable and uncontrollable, and in this process of being called in question, the act of hope is made real in historical and social terms. Admittedly this is not the only way in which this is achieved. The Christian also accepts in the 'form of the world' as it passes over him those factors for which he himself is not responsible, and which he merely has to endure. He accepts these as part of the individual lot of his own personal life in death and in the renunciations which prepare for this, and it is no less true that he makes his hope real and living in this process too. A wildly revolutionary attitude, taken by itself can be one of two things: either it implies that an absolute value is accorded to the form which the world is about to assume in the immediate future, in which case it is the opposite of hope, namely a form of presumption which only recognises that which can be controlled and manipulated, or which treats that which is not subject to our control or calculations as though it were so. Alternatively this attitude signifies despair, a state in which nothing more is hoped for, and therefore everything is absolutely negated because there is nothing final or definitive, or because nothing of this kind exists at all. But to subject the structures of this world too to constant reappraisal and criticism is one of the concrete forms of Christian hope which, as the courage of self-commitment to the incalculable and uncontrollable, must never hold fast to anything in this worldly life in such a way that it is as though without it man would be cast headlong into an absolute void. Hope [9] On the problems involved here cf. K. Rahner, 'The Experiment with Man: Theological Observations on Man's Self-Manipulation' in volume IX.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

commands man in the very moment in which, far more clearly than hitherto, he actually becomes the fashioner of his world, not only to let go of that which is taken away from him, but more than this actively to renounce that which, in the light of the limitless future which hope opens up to him, he recognises as provisional, and which, because of this, he can also understand to be dispensable already in this present time.

It is strange that we Christians, who have to achieve the radical commitment of hope in which we venture upon that which is incalculable and uncontrollable in the absolute future, have incurred the suspicion both in [259] the minds of others and in our own that so far as we are concerned the will to guard and preserve is the basic virtue of life. In reality, however, the sole 'tradition' which Christianity precisely as the people of God on pilgrimage has acquired on the way is the command to hope in the absolute promise and – in order that thereby this task may not remain at the level merely of a facile ideology of ideas – to set out ever anew from the social structures which have become petrified, old and empty. Precisely in what this hope is to be brought to its fulness in the concrete in an exodus which is constantly renewed in this way, precisely what the Christian is to hold firm to (for this too is in fact possible) – because his hope also divests the future, even within the temporal dimension, of any false appearance of being the absolute future – this is something which 'theoretic' faith cannot answer as a simple deduction following from its own tenets. This concrete imperative is not merely the result of applying the theory of faith in practice. It would be just as wrong to hold this as to say that faith as such, and by itself transforms the general promise into that special and particular one which is only realised in the original and underivable act of hope. But this hope summons the Christian and Christianity to venture upon this imperative, underivable in each case, in which they have constantly to decide anew between whether they are to defend the present which they already possess, or to embark upon the exodus into the unforeseeable future. This is something which hope can do, for hope itself has in fact already all along achieved something which is even greater. In it man has surrendered himself to that which is absolutely and eternally uncontrollable and incalculable by any powers of his. In the power of this greater hope he also possesses the lesser hope, namely the courage to transform the 'framework of secular life', as the Council puts it, and the converse too is no less true. In this lesser hope the greater one is made real.

There remain, therefore, faith, hope and love – these three. But the greatest of these is love. So says Paul. But we could also translate this: 'Faith, hope and love constitute that which is definitive and final.' Perhaps it has been shown that hope is not simply the attitude of one who is weak and at the same time hungering for a fulfilment that has yet to be achieved, but rather the courage to commit oneself in thought and deed to the incomprehensible and the uncontrollable which permeates our existence, and, as the future to which it is open, sustains it. Perhaps it has also been shown that such courage has the power to dare more than what can be arrived at merely by planning and calculations. Perhaps it has been shown that in the final and definitive consummation hope still prevails and endures, because this definitive consummation is God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[260]

14

THE THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN THE IDEA OF THE 'NEW EARTH'

The basic imperative which permeates the whole of the 'Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the World of Today' of the Second Vatican Council is the demand that the individuals in the Church shall collaborate in those forms of contemporary human existence which are more worthy of human beings at all of its levels. And in fact – this is the decisive point – this is achieved on the basis of their ultimate Christian interpretation of existence, because their status as men is not something over and above their status as Christians, but rather they act as men precisely because they are Christians. The task which they have in common with all men of good will (even atheists are not excluded from this) is therefore one that they must accomplish on the basis of their specifically Christian faith, their eschatological hope and their love for God and men, that love which has been bestowed upon them by God himself. The Constitution interprets this point (at least so it appears in many passages which we shall be considering in greater detail at a later stage) not in the sense that this basic Christian attitude represents merely a certain motivation for fulfilling this task, an ideological 'motive force' or merely a new supplementary, but only formal, duty, presented by the Church in such a way that the material content of this task remains unaffected by this motivation and by these new duties. For in that case the content itself would be determined on the basis of a knowledge purely belonging to this world, purely at the level of philosophy and natural law, and existing purely at the concrete and practical level. On this showing the most that revelation would have to do would be to guard this knowledge from any error, and there would be a certain moral necessity in this in the sense implied in the First Vatican Council. What is said rather is, for instance – and even at this stage we are already coming to grips with more precise indications – that Christians must impress the framework of [261] secular life with the stamp of their eschatological hope. Surely this means that the specifically Christian determination of the worldwide task which has actively to be engaged in consists not merely in the fact that the Christian must so fashion the world according to principles of merely natural law that in it Christianity is afforded sufficient room for developing the specifically religious and 'supraworldly' mission which is proper to itself, for in fact this would also be possible even on the basis of tolerance and freedom for an 'ideological' pluralism in society.

But in that case how can this task of creating a world more worthy of men be the common task of all men of good will? How, furthermore, can any 'understanding' be aimed at between all men, if the Christians and members of the Church have basically speaking, after all, a conception of this task which is precisely Christian in its material content. Of course the precise nature of what Christianity has to undertake at this level of material content in the task of renewing the world remains at this stage wholly indeterminate and unclear. Can it be then, alternatively, that the conciliar Constitution is taking back what has been said with regard to this task when it emphasises the 'secularity' of the world, the autonomy of the intellectual and cultural areas of human life, and when, still more clearly than in the social encyclicals of the popes from Leo XIII to Pius XII, it lays down that the Church cannot offer any readymade 'blueprints' for the concrete formation of the world and history, explaining rather that to apply such 'blueprints' and imperatives in the concrete is the common task of all men who are conscious of their human responsibilities? Does a certain veiled inconsistency appear at this point in the Constitution, which has still not clearly been resolved? Or is it simply the case that in concrete practice there are still so many tasks to be performed in common, so many preparatory stages to be gone through for Christians and non-Christians together in order to achieve a 'better world' even though there is a material difference between Christians and non-Christians in their interpretations and deeds even at the purely secular level, the way they interpret their goal and their (relatively speaking) completed task? Can we, therefore, allow this difference to go unreconciled for the present, to await our attention as cura posterior?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The difficulty, which must first itself be made clearer, consists not so much in the mere fact that a task to be performed in common with non-Christians as such has been postulated, for it would in fact be quite possible to hold that even with these there may perhaps be some common ground in that even in the case of non-Christians the ultimate motive force behind their acts and decisions as a part of human history is still, [262] even in their case, precisely grace, even though they do not recognise it. It could further be said that in every pluralistic society (and this is recognised by all as the situation in which we have to act in common) the common ground has to be established from different currents in human history coming together in a freely achieved harmony. It must not, therefore, be considered in any way surprising that Christians invest this situation of open dialogue and collaboration with their own conception of the future.

II

The difficulty lies, rather, in the nature of the case itself. Have we, or can we have at all, precisely as Christians a peculiarly Christian ideology of the future applicable to the secular world? To the extent that the question bears not upon general principles whether of 'natural law' or of 'Christianity itself' (though such principles do exist), but rather on a programme in the concrete, upon certain unambiguously concrete imperatives (for today and tomorrow, even though they always remain open to the more distant future) it is certainly clear that the official Church cannot include any such absolute programme in the concrete in her preaching.[1] This is no part of her commission. She is not capable of it, nor does she claim the right to perform any such function. But this is not merely ipso facto to decide the question that has been raised in the negative. For it is still at least conceivable[2] that the Church, as the concrete people of God, does in fact find and choose such a programme in the concrete in a concrete, and in a certain sense 'political' decision even though this is precisely not a mere 'deduction' from the principles of natural law and of Christianity itself. In this connection the question can here remain open of what any such act on the Church's part signifies for the individual Christian in her, i.e. whether as an individual he is ipso facto committed to being 'for' it. A further question which must remain open is how in the concrete any such historical and 'political' decision on the part of the Church considered as the people of God is arrived at, and how she succeeds in putting it into effect in forming the will of secular society as a whole, whether this takes [263] the form of a state, an association of nations etc., or alternatively how she strives in vain to do this. It would also be possible to imagine that the official Church, having arrived almost instinctively at such a decision in principle, and having formulated it to herself almost unreflectingly, might then go on to articulate it more plainly in its application to a concrete earthly future for mankind, and to proclaim it in the form of a 'proposal for guidance', something which is clearly to be distinguished from doctrine and

[1] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Grenzen der Amtskirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 499-520.
[2] On the distinction which follows cf. the Pastoral Constitution On the Church in the World of Today, Nos. 43, 74, 75, 76. In the pages which follow the title of this Conciliar Document will not be included in references to it. Instead the relevant numbers will be given, e.g. No. 43 etc. Other conciliar decrees will be cited by their respective titles.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

commandment. Now if we regard some such measure as possible in principle,[3] i.e. if we recognise an intermediate position which is neither that of the Church in her role as authoritative and as speaking with an official voice, nor yet that of Christians merely as individuals who then act merely as individual members of secular society albeit under Christian 'inspiration', then this in itself would provide us with the material for working out a specifically Christian programme for the future of this present world of this kind, and for arriving at a decision about the present world in this way irrespective of how far de facto the Church succeeded in carrying through her ideas.

Is there a future of this kind for the material world, such that it can be mapped out from the point of view of Christianity itself? When the Pastoral Constitution lays down[4] that the future and the world it brings must be 'more humane', 'more just' and 'more peaceable' than the present, that it must be permeated by a justice and love which make possible the free unfolding of each individual man, which cause the unity of mankind as a family of brothers to develop, which wage war more effectively upon the destructive spirit of egoism and other kinds of sinfulness etc., when it further goes on to apply these basic principles in detail to the concrete realities in the form of demands for a just policy, upholding the status of the family and so guarding the dignity of man, working out an economic system that is just, working for peace etc., then certainly this does set the goal which Christianity, i.e. the Christian faith and the command of God, demands. But still, in all this there is nothing specifically Christian in what is here proclaimed as the content of the future which is to be striven for. Again the same is also true of the statement that the future shaping of society must be permeated by a Christian spirit. Nor is it any [264] clearer that anything more has been added when emphasis is laid upon the fact that love of God and love of neighbour are one, or when the importance of revelation is extolled as contributing to the effective recognition of man's dignity. Indeed it would be possible to think not only that the emphasis on the fact that all Christians have this earthly task in common with all men of good will (e.g. No. 21 etc.) is rather an indication that the answer to our question is negative, but also that this is made even more probable by the fact that a distinction is drawn between man's 'total' (otherworldly) vocation and his earthly task (No. 11). This is shown from such statements as that the 'building up of the world' 'contributes to the total vocation of man' (No. 35), that the growth of the kingdom of God on the one hand, and earthly progress on the other, are distinguished as two different entities (Nos. 36, 38, 39, 42, 43), and also from the fact that emphasis is laid upon the relative autonomy of the order of creation (Nos. 34, 36, 39, 41, 59, 67). But even though the connections are also emphasised a distinction is drawn between responsibility for the world order and the duty of striving to attain to our homeland in heaven. Emphasis is also laid upon the fact that the two orders of knowledge are distinct (No. 59) etc.

III

But we must now consider the other side. What does it mean to say that there is a unity of mankind such that on the one hand it is based on Christ (No. 32) and must grow until the time of consummation is reached (No. 32), while on the other hand it still seems not simply to be in all respects identical with the Church as such seeing that in fact the whole of mankind

[3] For a more developed treatment of this cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur theologischen Problematik einer Pastoralkonstitution' in Volk Gottes. Zum Kirchenverständnis der katholischen, evangelischen und anglikanischen Theologie, R. Bäumer and H. Dolch edd. (Festgabe für J. Höfer) (Freiburg 1967), pp. 683-703, in the present volume, pp. 293-317.

[4] On the following points cf. the Pastoral Constitution Nos. 11, 15, 21, 23, 24, 26, 37, 38, 40, 41, 43, 55, 57, 58, 61, 63, 76.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

must be brought into the unity of the family of God?[5] What does it mean to say that the kerygma of the gospel is, to a certain extent, already latent in the human situation even before it is brought to light, for instance through art and theology (No. 62)? What is the significance of emphasising that humanity strives for a future in which mankind itself will become an offering pleasing to God (No. 38), in which it is also mentioned that the earthly service of mankind makes ready the 'material of the celestial realm' (No. 38)? At several points in the deliberations of the Council [265] mention is made of the 'new earth' and the 'new heaven'. This 'new earth' is, in fact, certainly presented as the eschatological gift of God himself and is, therefore, not simply the outcome of the progressus terrenus (No. 39). But at the same time it is also not simply something which replaces what has gone before, in that it merely suppresses and does away with this, but rather a transformation of the world as it has existed hitherto (transformatio mundi, No. 38; universi transformandi, No. 39). But this world which is so to be transformed still appears to be not simply that which God himself has fashioned (in other words the substantial continuance of this simply as such). For it is said (No. 39) that not only love endures but also the work (opus) of this, and that we will also 'rediscover' the industriae nostrae fructus, in other words, surely, the fruits of human activity itself (since these are, in fact, thought of as 'purified'). Surely what is being thought of, therefore, as the world which has to be transformed, is that which man himself has shaped in 'projecting further the work of creation' (Nos. 34, 57). For this 'further projection of the creation' of God is often mentioned even when it is regarded as the carrying out precisely of the will of God as Creator, and so as distinct in a certain respect from the supernatural will of God to save. The divine love is also the law of the transformatio mundi (No. 38), and an intrinsic element in this is a fraternitas universalis which manifestly consists in something more than simply the Church as such (ibid.). The eschatological hope has itself to impose its own stamp upon the framework of the vita saecularis (Lumen gentium No. 35). While, therefore, the renovatio mundi is already an irrevocably established fact and is already to be anticipated in a real manner even in hoc saeculo (Lumen gentium No. 48), still this presence by anticipation of the eschatological renovatio mundi is surely given not merely in the Church in her kerygma and cult exclusively, but also precisely in the framework of the vita saecularis. Only so can mankind as it exists in the present give some idea in basic outline of what the future world is to be (No. 39). The indications supplied by the Constitution must certainly not be pressed too far in our interpretation. Certainly in the Constitution there is no clear attempt to work out how the 'formation of the future at the secular level and in a purely earthly and transient sense by the Christian spirit' on the one hand, and the 'Christian formation of the future brought about by man himself and having a final and definitive significance' on the other are alternatives. Nor is it really made clear precisely how we should react to these alternatives. But for all this the Constitution does lead us, albeit itself hesitating and feeling its way, to the point where we have to face up to these questions.

[266]

IV

Perhaps as a result of what has been said the real problem now becomes clear with which we are here concerned: is the world which man himself fashions only the 'material' in which he has morally to prove himself, and which in itself remains indifferent? And when the final [5] cf. Nos. 40, 43; Lumen gentium No. 28. What is being referred to here, however, is surely not that controversial question, the process of incorporating the whole of humanity into the Church and so this particular sense of the phrase unitas familiae Dei, especially in view of the fact that the 'growing body of the new family of mankind' is not to be thought of merely as a quantitative entity and is not identical with the Church, and yet does represent an adumbratio of the world to come (cf. No. 39).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consummation of the kingdom of God comes, will the world simply be done away with? The problem expressed in this question has in fact become more acute of itself in view of the fact that this world is no longer merely the 'situation' brought about by God himself in which man has to act in a morally right way. A further and more pressing reason is that it is a world which has reached a second stage in realising its potential: man himself takes it upon himself as a task with which he has been commissioned to fashion it and so to complete, in a process of historical evolution, the creative work of God himself. Can we nevertheless compare the world as understood here with the rush-baskets which the ancient monks of the Scythian desert wove by day and unravelled once more in the evening in order that they might fill up without sinning the interval of waiting for the eternity of this future which still lay wholly before them? Or does this second world, itself pass, albeit inconceivably 'transformed', into the eschaton properly so called? Does the 'new earth' come down from heaven (even though, as it were, on the 'neutral ground' which God once fashioned and which is constituted by the fact that the body remains substantially one and the same even after it is glorified, and by the material world only in so far as it is entailed by this)? Or alternatively will this world be constructed here in time by man himself? Are we to read the relevant phrase as 'new earth' or 'renewed earth' (admittedly taking this as applying to the final consummation of God who is eternally new)?

Formerly the question could not be put in so plain a manner. For precisely this world did not exist before. Man lived in a world of 'nature', which he simply had to accept as something already given. In so far as he himself produced anything it was only small and frail, from the body which died to the relatively minor products which were the material outcome of the exercise of his skills. All this seemed merely to be the fuel for the future conflagration of the world, which could only leave ashes behind it. It was from the outset impossible for man to think that the real eschatological outcome of history would consist, properly speaking, in anything else than the moral element in the immortal 'soul' which is to be taken with us into the 'life beyond'. Certainly a 'resurrection of the body' was expected. Man could even picture to himself how the marks of the wounds [267] in Christ's glorified body lasted on as signs of the victory he had won in his personal history. In some way, therefore, the question we have raised here was already present on the very periphery of man's awareness then – but no more than this. As the Pastoral Constitution shows, no clear working out of it as a question has been achieved even today. Nevertheless it is no mere scholastic subtlety, as for instance when the hair-splitters break their heads over the question of whether those who have risen again can still eat. For the question is – albeit in a particularly refined form as presented here – the question of the more precise relationship between the hope of Christian eschatology and the present-day ideology of the future or of the future Utopia (in a neutral sense of the term). Are we ourselves those who achieve the final consummation when we respond to the creative task which God lays upon us even in this world in a spirit of justice, love and obedience, and so become the completers of his creation? What we are speaking of here is a final consummation to be wrought out in the substance of man and of matter merely as these have been fashioned by God himself.[6] Are we then to become the completers of God's creation in this sense in such a way that this final consummation is to be constituted by a morality of human history which, in its ultimate basis, remains at the meta-empirical level?[7] Or alternatively, is human history at the material and physical level itself to become a part of this definitive consummation, albeit through a process of death and radical transformation?

[6] From the Christian point of view this applies sensu positivo to every case and is something of which Christianity has always been clearly aware.

[7] The ultimately ethical quality of history as it exists in the sight of God is something that cannot in fact be deduced from history itself by our judgment with any unequivocal certainty.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This question has, after all, an important bearing on the relationship of Marxism and Christianity, for the Christian interpretation of human history and for much else besides in the Christian interpretation of existence. As Christians we have in fact to fight not against a naive form of Marxism which simply uses the individual as the material for a future society and history. This would be to postulate a Marxist act of faith in which man believed either that he himself could build the 'kingdom of God' simply of his own resources, or alternatively viewed the future as being, after all, simply the mirage of history forever unobtainable, forever leading on into infinitude, and never to be possessed by anyone as a rounded whole. We Christians have to allow Marxism to put the question to us (though in doing so we always have to maintain the proviso that by [268] the mere fact of taking something in the world too seriously it would be possible precisely to corrupt it) of how in any real sense we Christians take with due seriousness the world which we have been commanded to achieve. Does this world, so far as we are concerned, constitute merely the material, ultimately speaking indifferent, upon which we exercise our own virtues? Is this of itself taking it seriously enough? On this showing is not the world itself a matter of indifference, since in fact it would be possible to exercise these same virtues in a world that was held fast in the grip of reactionary forces? In such a world we might practise above all the virtue of patience with a world that was mean, agonising and unjust. If we Christians were to answer this question we could not simply concentrate on those aspects of the world which make it a situation of testing and proving for those who seek the kingdom of heaven. We would have to recognise that we have to prove these heavenly virtues of ours which alone 'endure' precisely in the 'material' which is presented to us in the here and now by the world itself in its course. And if this world were to change, then we would have to face up to the further question of why this should be so, seeing that, in spite of the change, it would be the same virtues which alone endure that would have to be perfected even though the 'material' in which they were exercised and the 'objective' outcome which they achieved would merely recede into the past and absolutely cease to exist. In putting this question we have no intention of pressing it to lengths that are artificial. For in any case it remains true that concrete human history, with all its physical aspects, is the dimension in which the final consummation and the absolute future are made real. All that the Council has said remains in any case valid with regard to the responsibility which Christians have for the world, and with regard to the falsity of any artificial opposition between the integral vocation of the Christian (including, therefore, the 'other worldly' aspects of this also) on the one hand, and his task in the world on the other. But for all this perhaps it can be understood that the question we have raised is not unimportant either in view of the current intellectual climate in which Christianity has to make its message comprehensible.

V

But can this question be answered at all, and how is it to be answered?

First the following is clearly true: the kingdom of God, the final consummation which brings history to an end and 'raises' it is that which is coming of itself. It is not merely the mirage towards which history constantly [269] reaches out, or its final goal, utterly different in kind from history itself. If it were this then it would only have the function of maintaining history in movement. This definitive finality will not exist simply as a final and definitive stage and the final outcome of the history planned and accomplished by man himself. Rather it will the deed of God which, admittedly, is to be thought of here, as elsewhere also in the history of nature and of the world, as the self-transcendence of history (divine, free and something which is totally beyond all our calculations if we take as our starting-point the movement which we ourselves initiate). History and its consummated finality are always different and distinguished from one another by that which is experienced in the personal history of the individual as death, and which signifies a radical 'transformation'. This transformation applies just as much to universal history as death does to the history of the individual. 'We do not know the time for the consummation of the earth and of humanity. Nor do we know how all things will be transformed' (No. 39). Therefore the statement that history will endure not only in the meta-empirical morality realised in it but also in its historical outcome cannot simply be set aside as mistaken in view of that other statement about the radical transformation of history into that which is unknown and into an openness to the absolute future which is God himself. The actual conception of history as it will exist in its enduring finality is impossible. Any attempt at depicting it (and in a real sense we are actually warned against this in Mt 22:30) would be pseudo-Christian apocalyptic and no true Christian eschatology. The very attempt to depict to ourselves a glorified body as it exists in itself leads into contradiction. How much more this would be true if we sought to make the same attempt with regard to the body of humanity which it gradually forms for itself in its one and continuous history! On the other hand it cannot be objected from the opposite point of view either, against what has been said, that it is not merely the final and definitive stage of human history precisely as such that can have the opportunity of acquiring an eschatological validity and lastingness, since on this showing nothing that belongs to any concrete reality of history whatsoever would be assumed into this final and definitive stage. For the same objection could be raised with regard to the physical aspects of the personal history of the individual. No one stage in a man's life can be the definitive model for the definitive and final state of the body, and nevertheless the Christian tradition thinks of this final and definitive stage as such that it brings what it has become in the concrete throughout its entire concrete history to a state of glorification.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

So far as we are concerned in the here and now there is a basic dialectical [270] tension between the two statements, on the one hand that human history will finally endure, and on the other that it will be radically transformed. This tension maintains us in an openness to the future while still according a radical importance to the present. Both statements are hermeneutic principles and at the same time statements of fact. Bearing these points in mind as provisos we can positively say: history itself constructs its own final and definitive state. That which endures is the work of love as expressed in the concrete in human history. It remains itself as something achieved by man, and not merely a moral distillation of this, something which history leaves behind it as though it were the 'grapes' from which the wine had been pressed. History itself passes into the definitive consummation of God, and not merely man who has once influenced the course of history and then, after he has played his 'part' (as in Hugo von Hofmannstahl's 'Everyman') leaves this behind him as something which has become inessential.

Why should we say this? Because the Logos of God has himself wrought upon and endured history. If our thesis were altogether false, then he would have had totally to lay aside his 'role'. But he remains for all eternity the God-man. And his humanity is not merely that which has received the reward of glory, but rather remains above all his own, something which, if this thesis is not accepted, would strictly speaking have become superfluous. The opposed thesis would lead, ultimately speaking, to an intolerable division between 'soul' and 'body' and between the noumenal and the phenomenal. 'History' in the true and proper sense, and as worked out by the exercise of personal freedom, demands of its very nature to be brought to a definitive consummation and does not receive any such consummation merely as a reward. Consummation is not something that is located 'beyond' history, as it were, seeing that it is in history that that takes place for which we are responsible even though it may not appear on the surface of any reality that we know and cannot be judged by us. And the correctness of our thesis is made even more probable by the positive answer which we must surely give to the question of whether the moral element (without prejudice to the fact that it is something that must be performed as a work of freedom) does not, after all, precisely consist in that which takes place in history as concrete, and the question of whether it does not achieve its meaning in history and from history. This means, therefore, that history itself must have a final and definitive significance if the moral is to have any such significance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[271]

VI

The outcome of what we have said is that a history that is constructed by man himself as event and as the end product of his activities has a final and definitive significance. And if this is true, then it also becomes apparent what is the basis and the necessary presupposition for this, namely that precisely this 'world in its worldliness', which as such retains all its secularity, nevertheless, still in itself and as such, at basis exhibits a secret Christianity. The task of completing the creation and the fulfilling of it appear as an intrinsic element in the one total redemptive and divinising will of God for a world in which his self-bestowal is achieved, and this task and the fulfilling of it derive from this totality their ultimate meaning and a concrete form. In virtue of this, task and fulfilment alike, precisely in the specific worldliness, are orientated towards their consummation. Admittedly in all this nothing has yet been said of that precisely in which in the concrete this Christianity of the task of achieving the 'this-worldly' future consists. It should not be supposed that because the answer to this question is extremely difficult that there is precisely no such thing as this Christian element. Moreover, as has already been said, the actions in human history of non-Christians too, which are designed to shape the future, fall under the impulse of grace. And because of this it is by no means the case that in seeking a more precise answer to this question we must necessarily fall into the dilemma of simply having to choose between the two following alternatives: either of having to point out some Christian element in this future such that it can be attributed exclusively to those who are 'explicit' Christians, or to recognise what is being striven for as merely 'human'. Therefore (and over and above this) the situation can be such that the Christian 'meaning' and the ultimate Christian roots of a reality which is in process of being brought about in history (whether in the social, political or some other sphere) only reveal themselves for what they are when they are already present and so able to be reflected upon and interpreted as an explicit subject for investigation. This appears, for instance, in the case of the growing unity of mankind so often referred to in the Pastoral Constitution, which is at the same time the necessary prior condition for a world Church that is relevant to the contemporary situation. The same could perhaps apply to the openness of the future which is becoming clearer, and the plans for this, the dialectical interplay in which the element of planning and the factor of the unplanned and unforeseeable develop side by side, a development which is explicitly and formally anticipated as such. It may be that in this dialectical interplay, the [272] elements in which cannot be separated from one another by any power of ours, the absolute future of God appears as a silent presence. This Christian mould imprinted upon the 'this-worldly' future towards which mankind is being impelled does not, therefore, depend, in the last analysis on whether or not Christians as a body have certain special demands of their own to raise in the concrete affecting communal, political, social and other aspects of human living, which could not otherwise be raised by anyone else. But the point that is sought to be made clear in this thesis is that in the deepest sense the Christian has not two tasks which are held together merely by a 'moral' bond, namely precisely the fact that he has a duty to perform both. In other words they are united by

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something more than the fact that the Christian's task for this world has an abstract moral significance for all eternity.[8]

[8] In order to throw further light upon the questions treated of here the author may refer to the following studies in which he discusses the problems involved: 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 59-68; 'The Experiment with Man. Theological Observations on Man's Self-Manipulation', 'Christian Humanism', Theological Investigations IX (London and Baltimore 1972), pp. 187-224.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[273]

15

IMMANENT AND TRANSCENDENT CONSUMMATION OF THE WORLD

The very nature of the subject of this brief study is such as to entail noteworthy difficulties of methodology. The approach to the actual reality to be considered, and as pointed to by the title 'Immanent and Transcendent Consummation of the World', is made difficult by unsolved problems in the philosophical and theological fields. Obviously it is not possible here to examine with sufficient clarity the conceptual areas defined by the terms 'immanence', 'transcendence' and 'consummation', important though this is in itself from the point of view of the history both of the concepts concerned and of the previous discussion of the problem. We cannot introduce our study by providing any systematic discussion of the actual terms in themselves. The origin and original meaning of these concepts are in fact insufficiently explained even at the level of historical fact. For this reason it may be permitted to contribute a study which unashamedly refuses to observe with too much exactitude the difference between philosophy and theology, but which, on the contrary, freely employs the methods and basic principles of both disciplines. The attentive and understanding reader will therefore constantly be aware of what the background is to certain of the ideas presented here.

I

The word 'consummation' can be applied:
1. to a particular material event as such of a purely physical or biological kind.
2. to the sum total of all such particular events, in other words to the material world considered as a whole.
3. to the spiritual and personal history of an individual.
4. to all such spiritual and personal histories considered as constituting a unity, and accepting as axiomatic that in spite of the particular subjects [274] of these each being individual spirits in their own right, this unity and totality of all their individual histories is something more than a final amalgam in which they are all summed up.
5. to the real unity (here presupposed) of the material world together with the history of the spirit at both the individual and the collective levels, in other words to the real unity and totality of the temporal creation, of the 'world' in the widest sense.

It is obvious that the concept of consummation assumes a different meaning according to which of the five entities mentioned above it is applied to. This of itself implies that when we ask whether we should speak of an immanent or transcendent consummation, or of an immanent and transcendent consummation the question itself likewise assumes a different meaning in each particular case, that the shifts in meaning of the question correspond to the shifts in meaning in the actual use of the term 'consummation'.

Before we can even begin to raise the question of the relationship between immanent and transcendent consummation at all, we have to ask whether the concept of 'consummation' has any meaning when it is applied to the two first-named entities, in other words to the material world merely as such and taken by itself, and to a particular physical or biological event within it to the extent that this can rightly and meaningfully be regarded in isolation from the development of the physical world as a whole to which it belongs. In connection with this we shall formulate the following thesis:

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The concept of consummation is totally inapplicable in any meaningful sense to the world as signified here, or to an event taking place in it as such and in isolation; the physical world as such is in itself radically incapable of 'consummation'. It has, if we may so formulate it, no will to achieve its own consummation, but rather tends to continue as that which is abidingly unconsummated. For 'consummation' is (if the word is to have any meaning at all) applied to a temporal event regardless of whether the temporality entailed in it is simply experienced by us ourselves or whether some other kind of temporality can be conceived of, e.g. that of the angels.

As applied therefore to such a temporal event and to that which takes place in it the concept of consummation implies:

1. that this event has an end, still regardless of whether the cause of this is inherent in the event itself or brought about by some cause which is different from it.
2. that this event not only has an end, not only 'ceases', but in time [275] produces a result, something definitive which is different from the event itself, independently of how this abiding result in its validity and 'lastingness' is to be conceived of more precisely as compared with 'time'.
3. that this result which has been produced in time is that for which the event considered precisely in its temporal development as event took place, that which it 'sought' and in which the event itself finds its meaning and its justification.

In this connection the question may for the moment be left undecided of whether such a 'consummation' considered as the final product of a temporal event, e.g. in the free personal history of an individual spirit, is only present when this personal history achieves its final consummation – we call it 'salvation' – in a manner that is positively moral and religious, or whether alternatively it is still justified and meaningful to use the concept of 'consummation' even when such a history of the free individual 'consummates itself' negatively in final perdition. In any case this concept of 'consummation' which, as the very term implies, has been presented as the opposite of a mere end, cannot have any meaningful application to a mere material event as such. The material event 'runs out'. It remains radically and constantly open to a further future so long as it is not thought of simply as having been terminated. Whether it is conceived of as having entropeia or not it does not of itself produce a result different from it. Of itself in any case it does not exhibit any 'will' to achieve a final and consummated state, for in its temporal development it does not show any qualitative difference between elements such that one element as compared with another appears to be preferable. Even when we think of and accept such a total and undifferentiated process of development as a state of being directed uniformly, so that it is irreversible, still any given later stage in it is basically of the same quality as the earlier ones, and open to a further stage, or else to that stage at which this movement is brought to a halt, in which case we cannot attribute any higher value to this final stage than to the event itself as such. Now if we regard the material event as having, of its very nature, an intrinsic reference from the outset to the spirit – however we may conceive of this unity of spirit and matter[1] – then certainly we can think of a 'consummation' of the material world. But in that case there has already been a shift in the question itself, so that it is now concerned with the problem of the consummation of the 'personal' [276] history, although it is true that a special problem arises in turn precisely in this.

The thesis formulated above also applies to the special case of biological life as such. Certainly here we can speak in some sense of a 'consummation', namely when the due and [1] For a more developed treatment of this point cf. K. Rahner, 'The Unity of Spirit and Matter in the Christian Understanding of Faith', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 153-177; K. Rahner (with P. Overhage), Das Problem der Hominisation (Freiburg [3]1963), pp. 44 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

proper temporal development of some biological entity in its course of life is not distorted or destroyed by external causes, and so has attained to the full unfolding that is due to it. But even in this case this 'consummation' is nothing else than this due process of temporal development as such and in itself, and it is not a result different from the actual outcome of the temporal process which has run its course. But this is precisely what 'consummation' means. Nor does it make any difference to this when and to what extent such a due process of temporal development initiates a new process of temporal development of exactly the same kind through generation etc., or even itself prolongs its existence indefinitely without being subject to temporal change, as in the case of the 'immortal' primitive organisms. The case here is the same as with other kinds of physical event.

'Consummation', therefore, is a concept which can meaningfully be applied only in that kind of history which is worked out in personal freedom, though admittedly in this it acquires a special property, because this history worked out in personal freedom fastens onto the material event as an intrinsic or extrinsic element of itself, and so from this among other factors (and not solely from this) can be and is the single history of a person in the individual or the collective sense as endowed with spiritual faculties.

It is not possible here to enlarge upon the nature of the personal spirit, its freedom and, arising from this, the special kind of historicity and history that belongs to it, and so to arrive at a satisfactory concept of its consummation based on full and precise arguments. This would be possible only by adopting an approach of this kind, of an ontology of the free and personal spirit and the historicity that belongs to it. Here it must be sufficient for us by way of preliminary simply to formulate the following thesis in itself: the nature of the personal spirit as acting in freedom and as having a personal history implies that there takes place a free and definitive final state of the spirit worked out in time which we call its 'consummation', and which carries within itself those three elements which we have set forth above as constitutive for the concept of consummation.

Here once more a question arises which we have already touched upon, namely whether the concept of 'consummation' can or cannot be applied also to the negative or wrongly worked out definitive state of freedom [277] considered as the self-determination of the personal being to perdition. The question involves something more than a mere terminological difficulty. In any genuine ontology of freedom the good or bad exercises of freedom are not ontologically equal as possible uses of it. It is true that in God's sight freedom can achieve its final outcome as a consummation of the self in final and definitive evil. But still the nature of being, of good and therefore of freedom too, is such that this is not a possibility open to the free being which is ontologically on the same level. Such an outcome of the history of the free person as intrinsically involved in the definitive state he has reached is, on the contrary, to be understood as the final and definitive state of non-consummation. There is the same dialectic of being and non-being in this as in the evil actions in the concrete of the personal agent in general.

I

This in itself is enough to establish the fact that we have to begin with the problem of the relationship between, or alternatively the mutual exclusion of, immanent and transcendent 'consummation', and indeed of the very meaning of these two concepts as applied to the consummation of the spiritual person in freedom. Only on the basis of this (if indeed at all) can this problem be applied to the world, its course and the human history it contains.

If we take the terms 'immanent' and 'transcendent' consummation primarily in the sense which is suggested by the very nature of the terms themselves, we shall say that an immanent

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consummation is that which arises from the 'immanent' essential composition of the being which is in process of achieving its consummation, i.e. from the resources proper to it and through the intrinsic tendency of what is taking place towards a future goal. Immanent consummation, therefore, is considered precisely as the final outcome which has been worked out in time purely from within the event itself: the definitive finality of the freely posited event in itself. We have attempted to describe the concept of consummation above in these or similar terms. By contrast with this, transcendent consummation would in that case be a consummation which comes ab externo, being conferred upon the agent independently of the action he himself posits. And this means that it would be that which is given rather than the final and definitive state arrived at by the being itself in its process of reaching maturity. On this showing, therefore, a consummation of this kind would precisely not, properly speaking, be something that could be [278] discerned simply from the process itself and nothing more; it would be something, therefore, that went beyond it, 'transcended it' in this sense. We would have to think of such a consummation, on this showing, as something already existing in its own right prior to the actual process by which it was arrived at, something towards which this was impelled (if indeed the temporal process has any active part to play at all), something which it only attains to but does not, properly speaking, bring about. It would, therefore, be that which is 'transcendent' in this sense also.

Now let us apply the two concepts of immanent and transcendent consummation as interpreted above to that particular case to which they originally belong, namely to the definitive finality of the free person working out his own destiny in time. When we do this, then immediately the whole range of problems involved becomes apparent. These problems themselves in turn are due to the most divers causes.

The nature of the person endowed with spiritual faculties, including in this his freedom and so his human history too, in other words his 'immanence' is, precisely, transcendence. For transcendence establishes a reference to the absolute being, to that which cannot be constructed, cannot be developed into something beyond itself. Transcendence imparts an orientation to the beginning, which is not simply left behind as that which has never been achieved and never been conceived of. It imparts an orientation towards the 'absolute future'.[2] This, as constituting for every specific outcome of human action, a boundless horizon which lays open vistas which are unimaginably remote, always includes every kind of consummation which can be conceived of in 'this-worldly' categories. Ultimately speaking it is orientated towards the absolute mystery, incalculable, uncontrollable and inconceivable, which permeates every material project for achieving a consummation, and calls it in question.

This of itself is enough to make it questionable whether we should postulate any contrast between 'immanent' and 'transcendent' consummation. The following formulation could just as well be adopted: the immanent consummation of a history worked out in freedom by a being endowed with spiritual faculties is its transcendent consummation because the immanence is the transcendence; or: a spiritual being, acting of its knowledge and freedom, has of its very nature no immanent consummation because the immanent transcendentality rises up to that which is truly transcendent, [279] and this (however we understand it) must precisely not be conceived of as the goal of a relationship of transcendentality in the sense of the German idealism. On the same basis it would be possible to formulate it as follows: The transcendent consummation of a personal freedom is the only true immanent consummation. If spirit really does constitute, in the sense indicated, a transcendence opening up to the

[2] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 59-68. On the phenomenological aspects of the concept cf. K. Rahner, 'A Fragmentary Aspect of a Theological Evaluation of the Concept of the Future', in this volume, pp. 235-241.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mystery, to the absolute being, to the incalculable and uncontrollable future, and if it is precisely this that constitutes its very essence, then the terms 'immanent' and 'transcendent' consummation are deprived of any unambiguously definable distinction. The reason why such a distinction appears to be possible is merely the fact that the free personal being is conceived of after the pattern of a being to which a quite specific function has been assigned, a being thought of purely at the biological level, or a machine which develops its 'goal' from within itself by an 'evolutionary' process. In this sense, therefore, it can have a certain determinate immanent consummation, to which another can be thought of as being added, this time a consummation of the transcendent type, coming from without. Though in that case it still remains somewhat obscure how the nature of this can be conceived of in such a way that it really 'comes' and really is itself a consummation of the being already consummated. But this conceptual model is precisely false. The very definition of man is his indefinability, i.e. precisely his transcendence as absolute openness to being in the absolute. This transcendence of his, therefore, is such that it is radically incapable of being limited to any given future whatsoever, such as might be determined for it in 'this-worldly' categories, or to any given mode of consummation determined for it in this sense. For the limits of such a consummation would already be predetermined, and would be immanent in it from the very nature that was proper to it.

III

What has been stated up to now in very formal terms with regard to the problems involved in the contrast between immanent and transcendent consummation will be made plainer, and at the same time given added precision, if we introduce certain data of the theological anthropology of Christianity into our question.

If we sought to do this in very precise terms then undoubtedly questions would have to be touched upon which are matters of controversy between the Christian confessions, and to some extent even within the circle of Catholic theologians. These relate primarily to the relationship between nature and grace, and ultimately speaking to the relationship [280] between God and man considered in his sheer creaturehood. For instance in the classic Protestant doctrine of justification the justification of man is only 'juridical'. It consists in the gracious will with which God regards the sinner, but ultimately speaking leaves him in his sinful condition. Now certainly another conception is involved in this with regard to the possibility of an 'immanent' consummation than in the Catholic doctrine of justification, in which grace pervades the essence of man from his very roots with divine influence, and thereby gives him the possibility of acting positively for his own salvation, and so implants in him a free and active tendency towards his own consummation. In other words in this Catholic doctrine the tendency towards consummation is much 'more immanent' than according to the Protestant conception. Similar differences might be developed if we were to present in more precise terms the different conceptions with regard to the exact relationship between nature and grace which Catholic theologians have put forward, and the logical outcome of which is that they make the consummation of man appear either 'more immanent' or 'more transcendent' according to the particular position of the theologian involved. But we cannot enter, in any explicit sense into all these questions here. We shall simply be taking as our starting-point a specific conception of grace which we regard as tenable within the framework of Catholic theology, and which appears to us correct.[3] From this we shall go on

[3] For a more developed treatment and justification of this cf. K. Rahner, 'Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 1961), pp. 297-317; idem, 'Nature and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to ask what conclusions may be drawn in the light of this for the problem of 'immanent' and 'transcendent' consummation. God is not only the Creator of a world different from himself. Of his own initiative, and in that act of immediate self-bestowal which we call grace, he has made himself an intrinsic principle of this world in that creature belonging to it which is endowed with spiritual faculties and which is one element in this one world. This grace can be conceived of in such a way that the power which God has to create out of nothing is seen to be one element in the more sublime and more comprehensive power of God as he who is able to bestow himself in a free exercise [281] of love. It can also be conceived of in such a way that we see that God has de facto willed the creation (even though he might have willed it even without his act of self-bestowal) precisely because he willed, as an act of free love, to surrender himself, to empty himself, himself to come out of himself. 'Nature', therefore, is in the real order willed from the outset for the sake of 'grace', and 'creation' for the sake of the covenant of personal love. In this self-bestowal as an act of free love God remains on the one hand he who is absolutely free and in no sense in need of his creatures, and he who is infinitely raised above all his creatures considered as the subjects to whom such a free and possible self-bestowal is extended. He creates the world and the creature endowed with spiritual faculties precisely as the subjects to which such free and possible self-bestowal is addressed in uncreated grace, but in this self-bestowal God, while remaining the absolute transcendent, nevertheless becomes the innermost principle, the innermost basis, and in the truest sense the goal of 'spiritual' creation. God is not only causa efficiens but also causa quasi formalis of that which the creature is in the truest and most concrete sense. The nature of the spiritual creature consists in the fact that that which is 'innermost' to it, that whence, to which and through which it is, is precisely not an element of this essence and this nature which belongs to it. Rather its nature is based upon the fact that that which is supra-essential, that which transcends it, is that which gives it its support, its meaning, its future and its most basic impulse, though admittedly it does so in such a way that the nature of this spiritual creature, that which belongs to it as such, is not thereby taken away from it but rather obtains from this its ultimate validity and consistency and achieves growth and development because of it. The closeness of God's self-bestowal and the unique personality of the creature grow in equal, and not in converse measure. This self-bestowal of God, in which God bestows himself precisely as the absolute transcendent, is the most immanent factor in the creature. The fact that it is given its own nature to possess, the 'immanence of essence' in this sense, is the prior condition, and at the same time the consequence, of the still more radical immanence of the transcendence of God in the spiritual creature, this creature being considered as that which has been endowed with grace through the uncreated grace of God. The conceptual models which are constructed on the basis of the difference between 'inner and outer' break down at this point. The orientation towards the self-bestowal of God as most radically different from the creature is the innermost element of all in it, and it is precisely this that makes the immanence of that which is most external of all to it possible.

[282]

IV

Grace', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 165-188; idem, Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 208-239 (bibliography pp. 203-207). In addition to these works of more recent date by the following authors should, of course, also be mentioned: B. Stoeckle, H. Bouillard, I. Willig, M. Seckler. J. Ratzinger etc. But the work which we should particularly notice is H. de Lubac, Augustinisme et Théologie Moderne = Théologie 63 (Paris 1965); idem, Le Mystère du Surnaturel = Théologie 64 (Paris 1965).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What has been said must now be applied still more explicitly to the concept of 'consummation'. In the movement of the creature endowed with spiritual faculties towards its consummation God is not only the ultimate asymptotic point of reference, not only the goal of this movement in all his immediacy. Rather God himself has, through his grace – and not merely through an impulse formed by him as something different from himself – become its ultimate and innermost principle. The point which we must not lose sight of in this is the unity which exists between uncreated grace considered as causa quasiformalis and created grace as the necessary prior condition and at the same time the consequence of the uncreated grace.[4] God in his absolute immediacy is, in the concrete order of reality, not only the consummation, the goal (beatitudo objectiva) of the spiritual creature, but the principle in the movement which is most proper and necessary to it, the sole really connatural principle by which it is impelled towards the consummation of this goal. The truly ultimate movement towards consummation, towards the goal, is achieved 'in the goal itself'. In the deepest sense, therefore, the present is sustained by the future itself. Our perfection (as prelude) is the 'consummation of that consummation' which already exists and, in spite of being future, is already making its impact (quoad nos). All this does not remove the openness of this true future in which our consummation consists. In fact it is God the absolutely incomprehensible who constitutes this future and maintains the movement towards it. He is this future because he is that love that is absolutely free, which has no law outside itself by which it could be measured or judged. Even if we can say that because of it we are what we must be in order that it can be what it is, namely that love which is prodigal of itself, even so precisely this love, in virtue of the necessity which it has in itself, imposes upon us those limits which ensure that we ourselves are precisely not it, but of our very nature constantly have before us that element in it which we have never possessed or prevailed over, and which is foreign to us, so that we receive it as free and unmerited love. The 'immanent' and 'transcendent' consummation of the spiritual creature is the same. It is one consummation in which the one aspect demands the other.

[283] Two further points are to be noticed. The first is that Thomas, no matter how much he makes plain that the one goal (the visio beata) is also the principle of the movement towards it in its aspect as 'supra-natural' and 'unmerited', and so transcending the nature of the creature, in fact does not recognise the concept of a finis naturalis for the creature endowed with spiritual faculties. The second point is that any such concept of a 'natural' and, in this sense, merely 'immanent' consummation is de facto devoid of any ultimate meaning. We have only to rid ourselves of the prejudiced view that at least some kind of 'consummation' which merits this name must be 'due' to the creature, in order to see this point. The very term consummation (German Vollendung) precisely implies full completion (German 'Voll-endung'). But when the potentia oboedientialis for grace and for the visio is identical with the nature of the spiritual creature, then this nature precisely achieves its true and full consummation only when it has discovered the state of absolute proximity to God through grace and in the visio.[5] If this nature is precisely the nature of openness to the free love of God, such that it could not be blessed at all if it were not for the freedom and unmeritedness of this love, then there is no need to construct any consummation or any finis for such a creature such that it would be merited by him. Only the quality of unmeritedness in love can really bring this creature to its consummation.

[4] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 1961), pp. 319-346; I. Willig, Geschaffene und ungeschaffene Gnade = Münsterliche Beiträge zur Theologie 27 (Munster 1964).

[5] In this connection one conciliar text has a not inessential bearing. It lays great emphasis on the point that 'in truth there is only one ultimate vocation of man, the divine' (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the World of Today', No. 22).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If this quality of being unmerited inherent in the one and unique consummation implies that it could also be 'refused', then we may ask straightforwardly with Rom 9:14-18; 11:33-36; 'Why not?' It must be pointed out that even in respect of predestination to salvation and of the efficacious grace that comes from God, Catholic theology teaches that these are unmerited in the same way, even though it is impossible to conceive of even a 'natural consummation' without these factors. It is true that we can construct a positive finality and completion of the decision taken in freedom at the 'natural' level as a reality which is conceivable in itself and as providing a basic conceptual framework. And within this we can imagine the supernatural elevation of man being refused. We can do this in order to clarify the unmerited nature of the love with which God bestows himself upon us. But in that case we should not call this positive and final moral state 'consummation'. It is from this that the idea of a merely immanent consummation can also be developed in the [284] sense that this, taken by itself, might be the definitive state which man arrived at solely through the resources of his own nature.

In what we have said so far we have had in mind the individual being which exists at the spiritual level. But this can also be applied to mankind as such. For mankind is not the final summing up, at the conceptual level, of all the particular persons endowed with spiritual faculties and of their personal histories as free individuals. On the contrary, in respect of its origin, its existence and its determination mankind constitutes a unity, a fact which is clearly brought out in the theological concepts of 'people of God', 'covenant', 'communion of saints', 'kingdom of God', and in the doctrines of 'original sin', 'redemption' etc. Even though the precise nature of this unity cannot be set forth here,[6] still we can say this much: even the course of the one history of mankind as in this sense constituting a unity, as it moves towards its consummation in the kingdom of God, transcends that alternative which seeks to assign history to either an 'immanent' or a 'transcendent' consummation. On the basis of the self-bestowal of God this opposition is radically overcome. But this self-bestowal in turn is intended for the individual nature endowed with freedom, and at the same time for the community of all such natures. And because of this all that has so far been said concerning consummation as 'immanent' and at the same time 'transcendent' applies also to the consummation of mankind as such.

V

The primary question which now remains to be asked is what the implications are of all that has been explained if our investigation of the concept of 'consummation' is extended to the question of the consummation of the world as a whole (i.e. including the basic element of the material in it). We have in fact already said that the concept of 'consummation' cannot meaningfully be applied to the material world purely as such. For this as such and taken in isolation is radically incapable of being consummated. But the problem is not solved merely by saying this. For the world is a unity of spirit and matter, and in this unity matter is an essential element. The answer given above, namely that the material world is radically incapable of being consummated, therefore, presupposes an abstraction, [285] and it is not in terms of this that we can come to grips with the real problem.

Any effective attempt at answering the question now to be treated of must depend on how we conceive, in more precise terms, of two further factors: first of the relationship between [6] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'One Mediator and Many Mediations' in volume IX pp. 169-184; in addition see 'Evolution and Original Sin', Quaestiones Disputatae (Freiburg 1968), for the problem of the unity of mankind; cf. his earlier observations in Theological Investigations I, pp. 274 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spirit and matter in general, and then of the metaphysical nature of the development of the material world. Here too only a few theses can be formulated here.

It is justifiable to postulate a real unity and mutual interrelationship between spirit and matter as these exist in creatures.[7] The physical world is not merely the outward stage upon which the history of the spirit, to which matter is basically alien, is played out, such that it tends as its outcome to quit this stage as swiftly as possible in order really to achieve full and complete spirituality in a world beyond that of matter. In a metaphysical interpretation matter is considered rather as that other factor which is necessary, in which and upon which alone a finite and creaturely spirituality can be precisely that which it is of its nature, and can bring this to its fulness. And this is constituted by the attributes of self-awareness, transcendence and freedom. Without that materiality which is the expression and medium of the self-fulfilment of the finite spirit, spiritual creaturehood at the finite level is totally inconceivable.

We do not need to allow ourselves to be held back from this basic conception by any neo-Platonist or dualistic interpretations of the Christian teaching on angels, or by the interpretation of human death as the 'dividing' of the spiritual soul from matter. Quite apart from metaphysical considerations, this basic conception is made more probable by the Christian dogmas of the substantial unity of spirit and matter in man, by the doctrine of the divine Logos becoming flesh (without this undergoing any angelic transformation), by the fact that man's personal history as spiritual being is identical with his material and biological life (it does not pre-exist this, nor is the soul 'sojourning' in an alien setting, nor does it have any further and separate history of its own after death). Again it is made more probable by the 'simultaneous' creation of spirit and matter, by the 'resurrection of the flesh', and by the consummation of the world in the new heaven and in the new earth.[8] We can only avoid attributing to [286] all these dogmas an overtone of anthropomorphism and mythology if we take a priori as our starting-point the essential mutual interrelationship of spirit and matter in the creature.

It is precisely in the light of these factors that the essential difference between spirit and matter becomes clear, without us having constantly to trouble ourselves (and that in vain) to point to a creaturely spirit in its concrete existence and as a complete entity in its own right such that it would no longer also be 'material' at the same time. Spirituality and materiality are essentially different precisely in that they constitute the metaphysical principles of the one single spiritual-material being. Nor is this conception invalidated by the consideration that there was matter and material development 'before' spirit entered 'into' the world. This objection could in fact be met first by pointing out that according to Christian doctrine God 'simul ab initio temporis utramque de nihilo condidit creaturam, spiritualem et corporalem, angelicam videlicet et mundanam' (DS 800, the IVth Lateran Council of 1215); in other words the material world has always been the counterpart of the 'principalities and powers' with their personal and spiritual mode of being, and these have had to fulfil their natures, once they have been created, in and through the material world, albeit not in a corporal mode such as that of man himself. But even abstracting from this: in the case of a being which is essentially subject to time, the essential unity of the metaphysical principles which constitute its being do not need to be denied on the pretext that the 'potential' principle has some kind of temporal priority over the other, provided only that it is totally ordered to achieve its [7] In addition to the studies referred to on p. 275, n. 1 cf. also K. Rahner, 'The Secret of Life', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 141-152.

[8] The question of the theological significance of the making of plans for the future at the 'this worldly' level, and therefore too the question of the significance of the 'new earth', are rendered more difficult in view of modern man's planning for and control over the earth. On the question as a whole cf. my brief study of the problems involved, 'The Theological Problems Entailed in the Idea of the "New Earth"', in this volume, pp. 260-272.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

proper fulfilment in being actualised through the other principle. Now in our case this can be assumed unhesitatingly in spite of the essential difference between spirituality and materiality. For we can make the following statement without any difficulty: the dynamic tendency and development of the material world is ordered to the spirit, and that too in a development which – provided the term is rightly understood – we can even designate as 'immanent'.

For the concept of an 'immanent development' rightly understood implies the idea of a 'self-transcendence' and a 'projection beyond the self'.[9] It does not imply for one moment that in such an 'immanent [287] development' all that takes place in every case is merely that an essence which remains the same is made to run its course, or that we have to think of the development as, in a certain sense, a machine-like process whereby a structure is set in motion and made to repeat its appropriate action again and again. There is this also, but 'development' (and precisely as such it is an immanent development) in its true nature consists in 'self-transcendence', in a projection into that which is new, that which essentially goes beyond what has hitherto been achieved. The idea of becoming, taken in its full significance, is radically thrown into relief by another mental picture. Such self-transcendence implies an ultimate common bond between the point of departure and the final outcome of a development. Otherwise it would merely be a question of one factor simply being replaced by another and totally different one. In that case there could be no question of one and the same object undergoing a process of becoming and development.

Now there really is in fact an ultimate common bond of this kind between spirit and matter, for matter too is an element in the creation (which participates in God) wrought by God who is absolute and simple spirit. And God cannot make anything which is opposed to him and to his nature as absolutely disparate from it and alien to it. Matter exhibits its 'spirituality' in that it appears as an intrinsic co-principle in a spiritual and personal being, and shares in the destiny of this being. Unless the roots of being are to be considered as nothingness, the concept of a self-transcendence also implies at the same time that this process of rising beyond the self is made possible and sustained by the absolute being of God. But this power of bringing about transcendence, which belongs to God as Creator, does not have the effect of adding the higher principle to the lower ab externo, but rather precisely gives to that lower the capability of rising beyond itself. The new element is then that which is really and essentially higher (in a real 'qualitative change'), and yet at the same time the outcome and goal towards which the 'lower' is orientated. This creative impulse implanted by God is in this case too the 'supraessential' factor in a (material) being, in other words that which transcends it and precisely as such that which is most immanent in it, through which it itself alone is a being in process of becoming, and therefore one that rises beyond itself.

VI

Taking these considerations as our premises, we can now come directly to grips with the question of the 'immanent' or alternatively 'transcendent' [288] consummation as this applies to the material world as well. What has been said earlier remains in force here. The material world as such, so long as it remains confined to itself, has no consummation, just as a prelude as such cannot have any finale. But it is perfectly possible to accept that the material world, by reason of its essential orientation to the spirit, is sustained from the outset by that creative impetus, implanted by God, by which it tends towards the spirit as the goal of the self-

[9] On this concept cf. the bibliography provided on p. 275, n. 1 and p. 285, n. 7, esp. Das Problem der Hominisation, pp. 55-78, 84-90.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

transcendence of the material element. This impetus can be conceived of from the outset as the impetus of the divine self-bestowal which of itself implies, as a necessary factor, the impetus to create a material and spiritual world as the subject to which this self-bestowal is addressed. A further thought which may arise from this is that this impetus of the divine self-bestowal upon the material and spiritual world implies the manifestation in terms of material history of the absoluteness and victorious power of this self-bestowal upon a material and spiritual world precisely as this is subject to the process of history, and from this we can recognise that there is present in this creative impetus, as its goal and climax, that which we are accustomed to call in Christian terms the incarnation of the divine Logos.[10] In this impetus of the divine self-bestowal upon the material world in order that it may achieve its self-transcendence in the spirit a point that we must always bear in mind is that this self-transcendence of the material world in spirit and freedom takes place in history, in a contest, therefore, in which sin is also possible and which can lead to a radical refusal of God. This self-transcendence is achieved in such a way that it leads to an absolutely open future, for this is what human history in the true sense involves. It is precisely the self-transcendence of the material world that is being treated of here. And precisely because of this two further factors should be borne in mind. First the history of the personal spirit in freedom, in redemption and divinisation, must not be thought of simply and exclusively according to the pattern of mechanical or evolutionary processes in material events as such. Second, it is, after all, the real history in which the material world itself arrives at its goal and the fulness of its consummation.

Finally the following point must be noticed, as it were as a supplement to what has been said above. On metaphysical grounds (matter as the complement to the creaturely spirit as such), and also on theological grounds, matter (the 'materiality' of the spirit which always and in all cases constitutes an 'environment' for the spirit) must be thought of not as a condition for the spirit, or as something necessary for it to be brought [289] to its fulness such that once its consummation has been achieved it is simply cast aside as a means which has become superfluous or as a transitory stage through which it has passed. It endures as an intrinsic element of the spirit and of its history even in its consummation.[11] This is not to dispute the fact that we are totally incapable of forming any conception whatever of the mode of existence of matter in the consummation of the free history of the spirit (cf. 1 Cor 15:35-56). But surely we can hardly form any better idea of the consummation of the creaturely spirit. In as much as the material world as such is carried beyond itself in an act of self-transcendence it achieves in the consummation of this its own consummation. This, therefore, likewise transcends the dilemma which, formulated in these terms, is insoluble, of 'immanent' and 'transcendent' consummation. Its movement towards its consummation is, right from the outset, sustained by divine power, which consists in the love which bestows itself absolutely in freedom. In that this is and remains that which transcends all that is finite, it is the most immanent element in every creature.

It is no mere pious lyricism when Dante regards even the sun and the other planets as being moved by that love which is God himself as he who bestows himself. The innermost principle of this self-movement of the sun and the other planets towards their consummation which lies concealed in the incomprehensibility of God as the absolute future is God himself. He is the 'transcendent' consummation, and therefore can and will, precisely as God, himself

[10] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Christology within an Evolutionary View of the World', Theological Investigations V (London and Baltimore 1966), pp. 157-192.
[11] For a more detailed development of this statement cf. provisionally Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 151 f., 154 f., 161 f.; cf. also 'Der Einzelne in der Kirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 499-544; cf. also Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 203-216.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be the ‘immanent’ consummation and the ‘immanent’ principle of the movement towards this single real and uniquely fulfilling consummation that is the fulness of finality: God – all in all.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[291]

PART FOUR

Church and World

[293]

16

ON THE THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN A 'PASTORAL CONSTITUTION'

The distinctive characteristics of the Pastoral Constitution on the 'Church in the World of Today' are already apparent even from the very title, as well as from the preface. These in themselves are enough to show that what is in question here is a conciliar declaration of a kind that is absolutely new and unique at least in intention. Earlier conciliar decrees were either expressions of the official teaching of the Church, and therefore doctrinal in character, declarations, in other words, which embodied some revealed truth which had a permanent validity, or else they were regulations and prescriptions of the Church's law. And while it is true that these latter were consciously promulgated as subject to temporal conditions and therefore capable of alteration, and only in so far as they corresponded to the concrete circumstances of a particular epoch, nevertheless they still constituted something quite different from what this Pastoral Constitution of the Second Vatican Council is intended to be. At the same time it is not easy to say what a Pastoral Constitution really is. In fact the terms of the title itself are still not enough to make this clear. The preface too describes this idea primarily in negative terms: it states that while it is true that in the first part the Constitution is primarily doctrinal in character and so is to be interpreted according to the hermeneutic principles applicable to the doctrinal statements of the Church in general, still in the second part it is primarily intended to correspond to the concrete conditions of the age and therefore, so far as these declarations are concerned, actually undergoes the same risk of being changed which applies to the conditions which it is intended to define and to assist in overcoming. Even this, however, is properly speaking only a negative expression of the fact that the Constitution, in virtue of being bound up with the particular epoch, its attachment to this being at least partly conscious and intended, precisely does not have that 'supratemporal' validity and universal binding force which belongs, albeit in varying degrees, to a declaration of the Church's official teachings.

[294]

I

But over and above this, what does the term 'Pastoral Constitution' signify positively? The word 'Constitution' (as distinct from 'decree' or 'declaration') certainly implies first that the Council intended to attribute a very high degree of importance to this document, and therefore gave it the same designation as those on the liturgy, on the Church and on divine revelation. But what does this special importance of this document consist in?

The word 'Pastoral' does not, initially speaking, throw very much light upon this question. For when we say that 'pastoral' signifies 'that which belongs to care of the flock', 'that which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

arises from the exercise of the office of shepherd', 'pursuing aims directly concerned with the cure of souls', 'intended to promote the eternal salvation of mankind', then certainly 'pastoral' does acquire a meaning which corresponds to the term itself, and also one which is in harmony with this Constitution. But on this approach we have still not gained very much insight into the special quality of this document, because if this is all that we can say of the meaning of the term, then all the Constitutions, Decrees and Declarations of the Council can and must be called 'pastoral' in some sense or other. For all of them are expressions of the Church in her one and unique function: to promote the salvation of man, to be the mediatrix of salvation.

Now it might be said that the term 'pastoral' is intended to designate this Constitution as an act of the 'shepherd' function in the Church as distinct from an act of the purely doctrinal function as such. But even this, taken by itself, does not advance us very much further in our understanding of the meaning we are seeking for. It is in fact immediately clear that the Church's specifically juridical activity in promulgating laws is in itself also an act of her 'shepherd' function, and of the supreme power of the Church. Yet it is certainly not this that is being treated of in the Pastoral Constitution. This document is manifestly not concerned with lawgiving, obligatory prescriptions, or the promulgation of fresh directives. In view of this, therefore, it still needs to be made clearer what further function can be covered by the concept of the Church's pastoral office (as distinct from her teaching office). We can put this question in a still more developed form if, instead of the Council's distinction between three distinct functions belonging to Christ and the Church (munus sanctificandi, munus docendi, munus regendi) we take into consideration the more basic classical distinction between the potestas ordinis and the potestas jurisdictionis.[1]

[295] Manifestly the pastoral office must be seen as falling under the concept of the potestas jurisdictionis. Yet this concept covers so many factors which are irrelevant to the meaning which we are seeking for that it becomes still more obscure what really can be meant by speaking of a constitution as the act of the pastoral office of the Church (for the Church's teaching function and her authority to make laws are also assigned to the potestas jurisdictionis).

But supposing we say that this document is manifestly concerned to throw light upon the concrete contemporary situation in which the world, the Church and the individual Christians live and have to accomplish their tasks, and, over and above this, with the instructions, recommendations, admonitions, warnings and encouragements which the Church of herself addresses to Christians and to all mankind in order that they may all shape their lives aright in this situation which they have to endure; and supposing that such instructions on the one hand do not have the character of a mere 'doctrine' (with eternal validity) or of binding laws in the strict sense of the term, while on the other hand instructions and explanations of the situation of this kind do nevertheless belong to the tasks, powers and duties of the pastoral office, then certainly we have succeeded in describing a meaning contained in the term 'pastoral' which is surely intended here. But at the same time we have brought to light a fresh question, and one to which we must now give our attention.

II

[1] On this cf. the Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium, and the author's commentary, especially on Chapter III, Nos. 18, 21 etc. of this, Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Konstitutionen, Dekrete und Erklärungen. Kommentare, Vol I (Freiburg-im-Breisgau 1966), pp. 211-221; cf. also ibid., p. 221, n. 2, the studies quoted by K. Mörsdorf.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Certainly the first point to be recognised about such 'instructions' (we are using this term to cover all the aims latent in a specifically pastoral constitution as set forth above) is that in principle it has a doctrinal basis. For what could be the starting-point for such instructions, from which they could derive their standards and the authority which they do ultimately claim to have, if not the message of the gospel, the doctrine of the faith which the Church upholds and proclaims in virtue of her teaching authority? Manifestly instructions contained in a pastoral constitution also have to be supported by those principles de rebus fidei et morum which are proclaimed and authoritatively interpreted by the official teaching of the Church. This fact is, indeed, explicitly brought out in the preface to the [296] Constitution, when emphasis is laid upon the fact that this Constitution too is not devoid of a doctrinal character. Now it is manifest that there is no intention in this Constitution of drawing any absolutely binding conclusions from these principles, such as would then themselves ultimately have the force of sheer doctrinal norms in their own right.[2] And in view of this fact it is manifest that a fresh question now arises: why is it only or primarily 'instructions' that are derived from these principles,[3] why do these principles not give rise simply to 'norms', each with its own distinctive message, certainly with an application to the concrete situation, but at the same time with an unambiguously binding force, such that these norms can be presented as belonging integrally to the official teaching of the Church?

Now one answer to this question might be: 'Because the concrete situation to which these principles have been applied is such as to make it impossible any longer for instructions bound up with a particular epoch and a particular set of circumstances to have this force.' But such an answer, which manifestly approximates to the argument presented in the preface, still merely gives rise to yet another question. For a specific situation can indeed be contingent and transient, and yet nevertheless, as a result of applying universal principles to it, it can give rise to a distinctive norm which has absolute binding force in its own right for the circumstances here and now prevailing. And under certain circumstances this norm can be promulgated by the Church as part of her authoritative teaching: as a distinctive principle which has an immediate and strictly binding application to the here and now, which, in other words, is something more than a mere instruction. Why, therefore, is the Constitution characterised as pastoral, seeing that this implies that at least part of it consists in a presentation of mere instructions? In view of this, what is such an instruction in more precise terms, seeing that it must be clearly distinguished from a distinctive norm carrying binding force, and yet at the same time is intended to be something more than simply a non-binding expression of opinion with regard to a concrete situation, or a reaction, likewise non-binding, to the situation – a statement, therefore, such as a Council [297] manifestly could and should omit? What sort of awareness of the situation does the Church have, that it leads her to try to respond to it with an instruction precisely of this kind, or – to consider it more precisely – that from the knowledge thus acquired she deduces not a distinctive principle but precisely an instruction? Clearly there are questions here which draw our attention to the special quality of a pastoral constitution.

In all these questions the only way in which we can really make progress is to take as our starting-point a thesis which has a basically existential and ontological force. This thesis

[2] Such have in fact actually been put forward, for instance in many of the encyclicals of the past hundred years even though they were intended to be wholly doctrinal, and not 'merely' pastoral in character. In the present context it makes no difference to the point at issue whether these encyclicals always succeeded in their purpose or not.

[3] Here we may for the moment set aside the fact that in several, or even in many cases something more than 'instructions' does nevertheless de facto appear as a result of the document concerned having this character. Here we are concerned simply with the question of what gives such a pronouncement its specifically pastoral force.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

could perhaps be formulated as follows: While recognising to the full the validity of the universal, we must say that any free decision, as a concrete individual act, and therefore as an act of the person endowed with spiritual faculties in the concrete, is never merely one instance among many sharing a common nature. And for this reason it can never, in the last analysis, be fully deduced from universal principles. Even if we abstract from the well-known general problems of the ontology of the individual, still this thesis must apply at least to the concrete free decision of the person endowed with spiritual faculties.[4] This thesis can be upheld at least in its application to this free decision, and its practical value appears precisely in its application to the questions we have raised here, and its power to throw light upon these (this in turn serves to confirm the basic correctness of it).

The individual decision in the concrete, therefore, is, in respect of its reality and its moral necessity or non-necessity, not capable of being totally reduced to the universal as expressed in a principle. But in saying this we must overlook the fact that even the 'most concrete' of individual principles still always is, and continues to be, a universal principle. The concrete decision is always at the same time the realisation of the universal. For this reason it certainly falls under universal principles, however, we may interpret the universal and its relation to the concrete individual in more precise ontological terms. On this showing any radical 'situation ethics' is false. Like the gospel itself the Church can define even a material ethics as binding. But the free individual decision, in its nature as a unique act in the concrete, is something more than merely a particular instance of this universal, even though this 'something more' is not directly comprehended as such by any exercise of the abstract [298] intelligence reflecting upon and objectifying it, and always having to refer back to universal concepts. On the contrary, the most we can do is to describe it ideographically by means of a thousand approximations. On the other hand in itself it is experienced as such through the concrete act of the individual subject, who carries out and consciously possesses within himself this decision without reflecting upon its nature from the ultimate standpoint of himself as subject endowed with the spiritual faculties inherent in human nature. At the same time it must be remembered that any such individual decision, in common with all intellectual acts on the part of a physical person, has an intrinsic structure of its own. This is because there is a unity, and at the same time an inalienable duality, between subject and object. In other words even in the most basic act there is already an element of objectivation which is the outcome of the universal and the reflexive elements,[5] and for this very reason, even though the individual decision cannot be resolved into the universal, still it is to a certain extent able to be reflected upon, albeit always merely at the asymptotic level. In terms of human intercommunication this decision is also as such able to be summoned up by an imperative[6] in the form of counsel, concrete example to be imitated etc.

III

We have now arrived at a point at which we can give a possible and reasonable explanation of what is meant by 'instruction'. Instruction is the counsel to take a concrete decision which, while it is intended to give reality to a universal nature and to a universal principle in a

[4] For a concrete exposition of the problems involved here the author may refer to the following studies of his own: Das Dynamische in der Kirche (Freiburg-im-Breisgau [3]1965); 'On the Question of a Formal Existential Ethics', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 217-234; Section entitled 'Der Einzelne in der Kirche', Theological Investigations VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 499-544.
[5] For an understanding of how freedom and the spiritual are to be objectified cf. the author's observations in Über die Freiheit, M. Horkheimer, K. Rahner, C. F. v. Weizsäcker edd. (Stuttgart [2]1965), pp. 35 ff.
[6] On this cf. K. Rahner, Das Dynamische in der Kirche…, pp. 14 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

specific situation (because of the value and binding force of this universal), is nevertheless incapable of being derived from this universal in any full or compelling sense, either in respect of its content or in respect of its binding force, but remains, both in its uniqueness and its factuality, that which belongs to history, and something which, in the last analysis, can be completely understood only in its actual realisation. Now if what we have said is rightly understood, then it is immediately evident that instruction too, by the very fact of being the act of the instructor, is a decision. For even as the act of the instructor it cannot be deduced solely from the universal (considered as its genus and its principle). It cannot be so deduced even when, both in the instruction [299] itself and in the decision corresponding to it the situation in which it is taken is actually included in the consideration. For one thing the situation, at least as constituted in part by free decisions taken at an earlier stage in the unfolding process of human living, is itself incapable of being fully or exhaustively thought out in all its aspects. A further point is that every analysis of a situation on the part of a concrete individual subject must be something more than merely material for the speculative intellect to theorise about in an absolutely neutral manner. In all cases and inevitably it must also be the spontaneous act of the practical intellect. In other words it must ipso facto itself be a decision. Even if we neglect these aspects which belong to any analysis of a situation (this is something which for the most part we are right in doing in the practical activities of everyday life), still even then the fact remains unaltered that in a specific situation – at least in principle, even though perhaps not in practice in every individual case – there are several possibilities for taking a decision, and moreover for taking it in such a way that several further decisions still remain open as, from the aspect of the universal norms, morally permissible. This remains true even though for the most part the range of what is morally permissible as a result of combining universal norms with a concrete situation will be extremely limited. Instruction, counsel, recommendation etc., therefore, constitute a free decision taken in the developing process of human living with the aim of using the intercommunication which exists between one human subject and another in order to make that other choose one specific decision among several possible ones (possible, that is to say, even in the sense of being permitted by the general norms of morality). In this process of causing him to choose one particular decision, therefore, what is aimed at is neither to impart to a given course of action the force of a duty by the application of universal norms, nor yet to impose any compulsion. For any ‘response’ of this sort does, of course, still leave the decisive question open: whence does instruction derive its unique character as having the force of a demand, since this force is manifestly attributed to it (albeit in a different way than in the case of a universal norm, which is binding as a matter of moral duty)? For evidently the instruction is not intended to sink to the level of a mere expression of opinion or of the sort of wish on behalf of the other which imposes no obligation on him whatever.

In order to obtain a deeper insight with regard to the nature of the instruction and the concrete decision taken in the unfolding course of human life, the first point for consideration is that even the individual decision as such can have a certain binding force although, or even to the [300] extent that, this force is not something that can be deduced from the relevant moral norm with its universal application. From the theological point of view this binding force is, to the extent that it is a genuinely moral element that is in question here, to be interpreted on the basis of the summons uttered by God in the concrete to the individual, and directing him to take a specific decision. This summons is precisely not identical with the binding force of universal norms considered as divine commandments. In the individual case this summons is always conveyed through the medium of the concrete situation in which a moral decision has to be arrived at. However, this situation, objectifiable though it is to human thought, is not of itself ipso facto sufficient to supply all that is necessary for such a decision to be arrived at in all its fulness. Whether the course we decide upon among several

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

morally permissible ones always has a binding force of this kind as a result of God's specific summons to us in the individual case, or whether it has this only in many cases, is a question which, for our present purposes, we may leave on one side. But what is certain is that this character of moral obligation can be attached to a specific position in the concrete as one of these morally permissible courses. Now when an instruction, while continuing to have this force, is presented as an act of the instructor in the awareness of being authorised and endowed with moral obligation in virtue of such a divine summons (of course this need not necessarily be explicitly defined precisely in these terms) what is constituted thereby is that which can be called, in the stricter and more proper sense, a theological instruction. Even an instruction of this kind is directed to the standards freely adopted by the other in taking his own individual decision. This is true not merely because the authenticity and compelling power of the instruction as such can never be established by appealing to principles which can be objectively defined and in this sense recognised, not merely because the individual instance of the divine summons conveyed by the instructor to the other cannot comprehensively be grasped in those modes of objectifiable knowledge which are open to us in other cases, for because what is implied in this divine summons is a quite unique mode of knowledge and testing on the part of the 'addressee' or 'recipient'.[7] On the contrary, instruction as understood here also appeals (though without thereby losing its character as demand) to the free and open decision of the other to the extent that we cannot a priori exclude, or pronounce meaningless, that case in which someone, prompted to a [301] decision by the summons of God, gives an instruction, without the binding force of the divine summons to the individual also applying immediately and ipso facto to (any) one specific addressee in the concrete, to whom the instructor directs his instruction. For the instruction can, e.g., perfectly well have meaning and validity in the Church as such, can be designed to be put into practice in a spirit of obedience by specific individuals, without the instructor himself knowing precisely who this instruction is ultimately addressed to in the intention of the divine summons which the instructor himself responds to in obedience. The result is that the instructor must, properly speaking, direct his instruction to individuals who are 'anonymous'.

IV

It will now be relevant to apply what has been said about the nature of instruction in general to the action of the Church. The Church is not merely the upholder and interpreter of the truth of revelation, or the dispenser of the sacraments. As subject she is constituted as a society, and as such she is also the upholder of her own concrete resolutions and actions, which, of course, have to be realised by physical subjects in the concrete. Moreover, over and above the function of proclaiming the truth of faith and dispensing the sacraments, the Church has also, as is made clear by the very fact that she has a pastoral function, a task of guiding and an authority to guide the Christian actions of her individual members, who have to respond to this authoritative guidance by their own individual decisions and actions in the concrete. So far as the question goes with which we are here concerned, it makes no difference, ultimately speaking, in this second case, what the nature of this authoritative guidance consists in more precisely, as applied to the individual members of the Church. In other words it makes no difference whether the Church has any such power to guide only to the extent that the individual Christian must contribute to a common life of the Church as such (something [7] In traditional language this mode of knowledge and examination is called the 'discernment of spirits'. On this cf. K. Rahner, op. cit., pp. 100 ff. (bibliography in n. 35).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which undoubtedly belongs necessarily to the nature of the Church), or whether the Church's authority to guide can extend beyond this and beyond the preaching of faith and dispensing of the sacraments so as also to bear upon the Christian life of the individual Christian in his 'private dimension' as such. In any case a power to guide does exist in the Church, and this power bears upon the concrete decisions and actions of the individual Christian. Now it cannot be contested that under certain circumstances the Church's power to guide in this sense can apply to the action of a [302] Christian in the concrete to some extent with an imperative force, in other words as claiming to be morally binding in the same sense as a commandment or prescription (this is true at least of the individual Christian's 'exterior' activities, and we may leave aside the question of whether the Church as such can directly command an 'interior act'). But what is certain is that general commandments or prescriptions of this kind are not the only way in which the Church's power to guide can take effect. The very fact that many factors have to exist, and many things have to be done in the Church (and, moreover, in directions and ways which, while they are quite specific, are nevertheless open to change) for the carrying out of which the Church can appeal to specific individuals without necessarily exercising her power of command over them. The Caritas movement in the Church, her work in the missions, ecclesiastical education, ecclesiastical learning, and much else besides, are factors which must be present. They are tasks which are obligatory upon the Church, and yet she is not able to impose these duties of her own volition as binding upon certain specific individual Christians. The realisation of her own fulness is something that is necessary and a duty for the Church, something, moreover, in which there is always an element of contingency, since it belongs to the dimension of concrete history, and since de facto it can be achieved only through the free decision and the free act of individual Christians. And yet the Church cannot, of herself, make this a duty in the strict sense for specific individuals as a matter of law or concrete commandment which they can be compelled to carry out.[8]

Now there is no doubt that it is to this area that the 'instruction' (counsel, exhortation to perform something which is incapable of being the subject of an order etc.) belongs. If it were not that the Church had the power and the authority to issue such instructions, it would be quite inconceivable how she could apply her pastoral function in the concrete. Laws and commandments taken by themselves would never achieve what has to be achieved and done in the Church.

V

We have already said above that the very fact that the instruction is an [303] act of the instructor ipso facto implies that a decision is involved which cannot wholly be deduced from general laws and norms applicable to the class of action involved. Now there is no doubt that this also applies to the Church. When she causes an exhortation to be issued in the sense of an 'instruction' as understood here, when she emphasises some special point in these recommendations, exhortations, desires etc., when she recommends one course of action with special urgency today and another tomorrow, then in such instructions she herself makes decisions which cannot be compellingly deduced solely and exclusively from her understanding of the faith de rebus fidei et morum. Moreover these decisions (at least in very many cases) do not derive unambiguously and in the concrete from this understanding of the [8] Here it is apparent that we can only conceive of the nature of the Church if we include within our purview the controlling force of the Church's Spirit who by his grace causes the individual to decide of his own freedom to obey this impulse which moves him in his freedom and so to do that which the Church cannot command and yet which must be done because it is necessary to the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith which she has, even when we take into consideration as one of the relevant factors the situation of the Church herself of the world and of the individual, in which such instructions are issued. For even for the Church the basic principle applies that even in a concrete situation several morally justifiable decisions can be arrived at in so far as these are measured merely by the general principles of whether they are morally permissible. Now in the case of such instructions how does the Church come to recognise which specific ones she should promulgate and which others she can or should leave undefined even though, from the moral and Christian point of view, they are possible?

It has already been said above that a moral decision in the concrete becomes recognisable as something that ought to be done not solely or exclusively because of the normative power of the general material and formal principles to which it is related, in other words that the concrete decision, precisely as concrete and individual, can come to be recognised as something that ought to be done in virtue of a divine summons. This also applies to the instructions of the Church to the extent that they constitute concrete decisions of the Church who instructs. The Church cannot issue any instructions she likes, only restricting herself in this to the extent of ensuring that any instruction she does issue does not come into conflict with her general principles. Nor is the individual obligation involved in a concrete instruction removed in virtue of the fact that he to whom it is addressed can, without violating any general moral norms, act upon the instruction or not as he wills. For even the instruction as such constitutes an alteration in the sphere of freedom open to the other[9] to whom it is directed, and therefore entails certain moral demands. Hence in [304] effect the question must be raised of whence, in that case, the Church knows how her concrete instruction has to be issued, what brings her to recognise that individual summons of God which imparts to a decision (in this case the instruction) its specific character as something that ought to be promulgated in the particular circumstances. Now certainly it can be said that the Church (in her official representatives) gives, and should give, such an instruction 'according to the highest dictates of her one conscience'. In other words in such an instruction she should command what seems, in the light of the concrete situation, most probably to be the 'better' course, what is most calculated to serve the interests and aims of the Church and of the realization of Christian living in a concrete situation. A further point wholeheartedly to be conceded is that in her practice the Church must act in this way, just as an individual man also, in a concrete situation, follows the 'dictates of his conscience' in selecting one of various possibilities even when his theoretic intelligence is incapable of recognising any one of these possibilities as absolutely and certainly the only one which can be entertained.

VI

Manifestly, however, this alone is not enough to explain how the Church recognises that any one specific instruction is such as to express something that ought to be done in a particular set of circumstances, and thereby becomes aware that she herself is authorised and empowered to issue this particular and specific instruction. For simply in virtue of the fact of issuing instructions alone, decisions are arrived at which are, all things considered, of such great importance for the Church herself, for the individual Christians and for the world, that it is hardly possible to conceive, merely on the basis of our understanding of the Church, that the manner in which they are arrived at is no different from the manner in which those [9] cf. the study referred to in n. 5, pp. 41 ff., and the author's brief study on what is needed for a right understanding of religious freedom in the small volume entitled Religionsfreiheit, M. Schmaus and E. Gössmann edd. (Munich 1966), pp. 7-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

resolves are arrived at by which an individual man, acting upon 'the highest dictates of his conscience' makes experiments in his life because nothing more is possible for him. But then one point which the Christian is aware of with regard to the Church is this: the Church is constantly being guided by the Holy Spirit.

We must develop this statement. It is certain that this Spirit is bestowed upon her primarily in order that she may not depart from the truth of Christ in any definitive doctrine, and in order that in her that hope and that love may always remain alive and may also be manifested in history in [305] adequate ways (cf. D 1794), without which the Church would not be what she must be, and, moreover, must always remain, through the eschatologically victorious grace of Christ.[10] Certainly the fact that she has the assistance of the Holy Spirit does not exclude the fact that there are sins in the Church, and, moreover, even in the official representatives of the Church as such, and therefore, that there are wrong decisions, wrong developments, denials of the Church as such. The Church is not only a Church of sinners but also a sinful Church, an Ecclesia semper reformanda.[11] But the fact that the Church abides in the truth of Christ, in his hope and love, is in fact not simply a static condition established once and for all, but must always be made actual afresh through specific individual acts and decisions in history on the part of those officials and human individuals in the Church who are commissioned to uphold her official functions in the concrete. This essential state of the Church abiding in the truth, hope and love of Christ, therefore, is necessarily achieved through the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and there is no other way whatever in which it can be achieved, because the institutional Church is totally incapable of guaranteeing that she will abide in them in this way. But from this it follows that this assistance of the Spirit extends precisely to the whole range of those decisions, acts, omissions and mutual influences in all their variations, in which the abiding of the Church in Christ is realised in the concrete.

A further point is that in the Constitution on the Church of the Second Vatican Council the Church explicitly teaches that what belongs to her intrinsic nature is not merely the institutional factors of universal doctrine, sacraments and law, but the charismatic factor as well. There is no need to provide a detailed exposition at this point of what this means.[12] What we must emphasise here, however, is one of the implications of the statement that even the laymen are the bearers of such charismatic gifts belonging to the Church. In no sense does this truth have to be bound up with the idea that the holders of official positions in the Church are not the bearers of such charismatic gifts, or not recipients of such charismatic [306] influences on the part of the Spirit of God.[13] It is perfectly possible, therefore, to conceive of these officials in the Church as the bearers of charismatic gifts and as receiving the assistance of the Holy Spirit, which is never totally withdrawn from the Church. With regard to such charismatic gifts the Constitution on the Church emphasises that we should not, at any rate not always and not in the normal instances of them, think of them as extremely miraculous or spectacular phenomena. In other words they may be manifested in forms which seem to belong to life at an extremely down-to-earth, everyday and sober level. Now this point which is so much emphasised naturally applies also to the Church's officials and to their acts to the [10] For a fuller treatment of this cf. Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 295-312, especially pp. 301 ff., 305 ff.

[11] For an understanding of this cf. the author's study, 'The Sinful Church in the Decrees of Vatican II', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 270-294.

[12] cf. K. Rahner, Das Dynamische in der Kirche…, pp. 38-73; L.T.K. II (Freiburg ^{2}1958), pp. 1027-1030 (with bibliography); Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg-im-Breisgau 1964), pp. 154-160; Vol II/1 (Freiburg-im-Breisgau 1966), pp. 76 ff. (Bibliography). cf. also below n. 14.

[13] On this cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I, pp. 154 ff.; Theological Investigations VI, pp. 305 f. Even in the concept of the sacrament of order we already find an ultimate unity being pointed to between a power that is official and institutional and a grace which is personal and consecrating, and as such capable of having charismatic effects.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation extent that the charisms play an essential part in determining the nature of these, charisms which are to be thought of as bestowed with the assistance of the Holy Spirit (at least in principle) as extended to the generality of the Church's official functionaries. The fact that we have to think of the effects of the assistance of the Spirit and of his charisms as taking place in unspectacular ways should not obscure the conviction of faith that this influence of the Spirit and of his charisms is present in the Church's officials even though sometimes the concrete image of the Church may seem disappointing and may lead us to wish that this power of the Spirit could be manifested more clearly and in ways which transcend all merely institutional levels.[14]

This provides us with a starting-point from which to answer the question posed above, that namely of what enables the Church to recognise in formulating her instructions (these being considered as decisions on the part of her official functionaries) which of these instructions in the concrete do in fact express what ought to be done, seeing that this cannot be deduced in any adequate sense either from the general principles of the Church or merely from an analysis of the situation, or even from a combination of both of these. We are now in a position to formulate the following principle: The instructions of the Church considered as decisions on the part of her official functionaries are (at least amongst other things, or at least in specific instances) charismatic instructions formulated with the assistance of the Spirit in the Church. It is from this that that unique character [307] of such instructions derives, namely of expressing what ought to be done (this is inherent in the instruction and for those who are the recipients of the instruction). This unique character is such that it belongs neither to a law, a norm or a commandment, nor can the instruction itself be reduced to the level of a mere expression of some opinion which the promulgators happen to favour, or of a wish which imposes no obligation whatever upon those others to whom it is addressed.

VII

On the basis of this point which we have now recognised as correct we can attempt to think out in more precise terms the true nature of a pastoral constitution. But before we do this there remains to be investigated yet another aspect of a charismatic instruction of this kind. Certainly this 'instruction' which we intend to recognise as the distinctive element in a pastoral constitution ultimately constitutes the charismatic decision through which the Spirit guides the life of the Church in the concrete, and leads her to adopt ever fresh modes of self-realisation and ever fresh forms in which to express herself in concrete history, though these can never be worked out solely or totally at the theoretical level. But this does not exclude the simple fact, which is readily observable at all times, that such decisions and instructions emerge in all cases only in the context of a concrete encounter with a specific situation in which the Church finds herself. Inspiration from above is always made real in and through the 'material' which is supplied from below, even though it is equally true that this inspiration can never be established totally and exclusively, as it were, by a process of synthesis from below. Here, however, we are considering how this situation comes to be recognised. And while according all due importance to the factor of the guidance and assistance of the Spirit of God (precisely in this process of recognition as well), we must say that this recognition is a human recognition, with all the necessary prior conditions, developments and systems of thought which belong to a human process of recognition, and [14] On this cf., in addition to those works by the author mentioned in nn. 12 and 22, especially 'Do not Stifle the Spirit', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore 1971), pp. 72-87.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

above all to the recognition of a particular individual factor in history. It must be remembered, however, that the Church has something more to do than merely to preach the enduring truth of the gospel, something more than merely to ensure that the abiding essence of the sacraments shall be realised again and again in innumerable particular concrete instances. Over and above this she must act in and upon history, and the necessity of such concrete action in history also belongs to her own intrinsic nature. Now if all this is true then the necessity and the [308] power of recognizing the situation in which she has so to act and so to realise herself likewise belongs to her own intrinsic nature, or to the full realisation of this.

Now in saying this we are expressing something which is a truism, and yet at the same time astonishing. We say so easily and so unreflectingly that the Church draws her life solely from the revelation of God in Jesus Christ, from the gospel which always remains the same; and that this revelation (for all the possibilities it offers of historical development and explicitation, and for all the necessity that exists for progressively unfolding it) was closed with the death of the apostles and is not susceptible of any further additions. Yet through this very truism which we have just expressed it becomes manifest that it is quite impossible for the Church to draw her life solely from the revelation of God (the progressive unfolding and right interpretation of this). In order to be able to act at all, and in fact to act in a way such that without it she would not be what she must be at all, she needs a knowledge of the situation in which she lives. Certainly this knowledge of the situation can likewise be achieved with the assistance of the Spirit and, as a knowledge belonging to the Church, may bear, in some respects, a charismatic character. In other words it may be something different from knowledge of a historical situation at the merely secular level considered as a secular analysis of the age, of society etc.[15] And a further point which may be conceded as perfectly correct is that the occasion of acquiring such knowledge, in which a theoretical analysis of the situation (despite the fact that it is always incomplete) is concluded and made the basis for decision and action in the concrete, also includes, as it were, that point in this concluding of the analytical stage and in this transition to decision and action to which the working of the Spirit is primarily to be assigned. But all this does nothing to alter the fact that the Church has need of a non-revelatory kind of knowledge, a knowledge which does not belong to the depositum fidei, in order to be herself and to be able to act.

VIII

This fact only seems not to make much difference therefore. It has been able to remain more or less unremarked, and has not given rise to any particular theological reflection, because in earlier ages this knowledge [309] of the situation was an extremely simple and uncomplicated factor which could be presupposed as already present to an adequate extent in everyone endowed with practical wisdom so long as they had a little personal experience of life, and could therefore also willingly be attributed – at least by presumption – to the individual leaders of the Church. But in this respect too the situation has altered. Knowledge of the situation in which the 'world' and the Church have to live, act and make decisions today is so multidimensional, complex and confused that it can no longer be attained to solely through the simple experience of life in the concrete which prudent and mature people achieve. Today it has to be made the subject of the fullest consideration, of a learning which is both manifold [15] The author has carried out an analysis of the present of this kind (partly in collaboration with N. Greinacher) in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 178-276; the basis in scientific theory, pp. 180-188. cf. also 'Theologische Deutung der Position des Christen in der modernen Welt', Sendung and Gnade (Innsbruck [4]1966), pp. 13-47.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and far-reaching in the methods it uses which include several auxiliary sciences (in certain circumstances computers etc. may be employed) in order really to achieve what has to be achieved: to impart to a society, a state, the community of nations and to the Church as well[16] that knowledge of the situation which is the necessary prior condition for any course of action which measures up to the realities involved. This being the state of affairs, the problem of precisely how the Church can acquire knowledge of the situation in which she has to act, since she cannot create this knowledge for herself from revelation, suddenly becomes extremely awe-inspiring. The Church cannot give her decisions, even when these are merely 'instructions' issued to her members, without achieving a confrontation with the situation in which instructions need to be given, and in acquiring knowledge of this in the world of today she is perforce put in a position by men themselves in which she is dependent upon sources of knowledge and methods of gaining it which are artificially controlled,[17] and which she is, in effect, quite incapable of controlling for herself in any adequate way. And yet her own action depends at least in part upon this knowledge, as also do the achievements of the ex professo scholarly element within her ranks, as distinct from the charismatic impulses of her spirit.

The fact that there is a problem here which has been insufficiently worked out in terms of any theory of the Church's knowledge (if we may so express it) appears from a single small fact, in itself insignificant, but [310] in this context rich in implications. At the Council there were certain conservative theologians who expressed their opposition in very strong terms to any attempt on the part of the Council at providing an official analysis of the contemporary situation – just such an analysis, in fact, as was, in the end and in spite of these objections, set down in the expositio introductiva of the Pastoral Constitution. But what these conservative theologians said was: Whence is the Church to know precisely what must be said in this Constitution if after all she cannot draw this knowledge from the sources of knowledge bestowed upon herself? How is she to be in a position to make some binding pronouncement on the subject? How can she avoid the danger in such discussions either of putting forward mere platitudes which can be found better expressed elsewhere or of hazarding assertions which rightly meet with rejection on the part of those who are specialists in analysing the contemporary situation and in estimating what the future will hold? In this latter case the Church cannot even defend herself by putting forward the proposition that in the last analysis she is, in fact, more competent in these matters than the specialists themselves. Such objections are certainly to be taken seriously, and in so far as they are answered at all by the terms of the Pastoral Constitution they are answered only via facti, without any explicit or conscious reflection upon them, somewhat as follows: The Church has dared to attempt such an analysis of the contemporary situation because she absolutely needs such an analysis. Moreover, given that she has to undertake an analysis of this kind, it is only fair that she should also be allowed to state freely to her members and to the world the findings which she has drawn from it.[18]

The question we are treating of here is concerned with a theory of the Church's teaching office as this bears upon the nature of that knowledge which is necessary to the Church, yet which cannot be acquired directly or exclusively from the sources of revelation. Now in the [16] Hence in the sphere of the Church too a livelier awareness is needed of the necessity for planning, for prognostication, and for analyses based on scientific theory. cf. on this Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 214 ff., 258 ff., 274 ff., II/2, pp. 19 ff., 76 ff.

[17] cf. K. Rahner, 'The Experiment with Man', Theological Investigations IX (London and Baltimore 1972), pp. 205-224.

[18] In this connection it is, of course, almost self-evident that inasmuch as this analysis of the present was relegated to the Expositio Introductiva it is not adequate and, furthermore, that it makes no claim to be so; in other words that the Church certainly knows more upon this subject than it expresses in this Constitution.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

last analysis the problem this involves can only be solved if we take into consideration among other factors the charismatic assistance of the Holy Spirit available to the Church in this process of reflecting upon her own situation which is necessary for the conduct of her life and her activities. Moreover, as understood here, this assistance does not exclude the process of reflecting upon the contemporary situation at the human level, which today is extremely complex and involves the use of all those methods which human [311] science has made available. On the contrary it includes this and becomes effective precisely in and through such humanly acquired knowledge. Nor does the assistance of the Spirit as understood here exclude the fact that the Church may fall short in her analysis of the situation through human limitations and human failures, or even through culpable obstinacy and narrow-mindedness, the refusal to recognise her own faults, a lack of charity in recognising the value of those outside her etc. In all these ways the Church may fall short of what can be achieved and what should be striven for in such an analysis. Obviously in acquiring such knowledge the Church too has to recognise certain limitations at the existential and ontological levels to which all men are subject. It is true of all men, when they embark upon an analysis of their situation as a prelude to 'estimating' what the future holds for them, that however advanced their 'futurology' may be, their true and actual future always remains to a large extent unknown, and so not subject to their control. And this applies to the Church also. But this should not for one moment obscure the basic insight of faith by which we recognise that even when the Church undertakes an analysis of the contemporary situation of this sort – something which is vitally necessary to her – she is still acting under the charismatic influence of the Spirit. It is quite unnecessary to regard this influence as consisting primarily, or indeed at all, in the fact that in the course of this analysis the Church discovers factors which have not been, or could not have been discovered equally well by secular and uncommitted bodies undertaking a similar analysis of the contemporary situation. On the contrary, this influence of the Spirit is manifested primarily in the following two facts: first that the Church actually does venture upon an analysis of this sort, not attempting to suppress the factors adverse to herself which she may, under certain circumstances have to recognise in doing so, but rather facing up to them in all openness and humility; second, that the Church is able to select from the incalculable number of individual facts and findings to which such an analysis gives rise those in particular to which the charismatic summons of the Spirit directs her when it is mediated to her in the process of arriving at her own decisions and instructions. What has been said so far is not intended to give the impression that the problem of the theory of the Church's knowledge raised here has now been solved in a satisfactory manner. But if we have to speak of the nature of a Pastoral Constitution issued by a Council, this problem too should at least be touched upon.

We are now in a position to make the following statement:

The essence of a Pastoral Constitution consists in instructions issued by the [312] Church primarily for her own members, and to some extent over and above this for all men who are ready to pay attention to the Church. These instructions are issued in view of the contemporary situation as evaluated under the charismatic influence of the Spirit and in response to the charismatic summons of God.

In this description the terms 'instruction', 'summons' and 'charismatic knowledge' are, of course, to be regarded as involving that content which we have attempted at least to indicate in the preceding sections. Admittedly too, in order that this description may be valid, a further qualifying clause must immediately be added to it as follows: ' . . . if and to the extent that a Pastoral Constitution really is intended to be, and is capable of being, something more than a mere amalgam of principles put forward in a doctrinaire manner, these general principles being developed into particular principles with as precise an application as possible to a specific situation.' Obviously, however, this taken by itself would not entail anything that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

went beyond a doctrinal pronouncement of the Church based solely on her sources of revelation.

IX

The very moment we have arrived at this mode of describing what a Pastoral Constitution of the Church essentially means we find ourselves inevitably and spontaneously brought up short by the question: Is there really any such thing? But the question which will occur to us first and foremost is: Can we really claim precisely this Constitution of the Second Vatican Council as a Constitution in the sense which we have now defined?

With regard to the first question, what has already been said needs only to be supplemented by the following further observation: In the history of the Church there undoubtedly have been, and still are men and women who are charismatically endowed. These have made statements which have subsequently become 'instructions' of the Church of precisely this kind, instructions which are not derivable merely from the principles of revelation alone. Moreover these utterances of theirs have commanded attention and have thereby contributed very notably to the concrete history in which the Church is in process of achieving her own fulness.[19]

[313] A further consideration to be borne in mind in this connection is that when such instructions, deriving as they do from those favoured with charismatic impulses, have emerged in the Church's life, they have invariably been dependent for their success upon a certain acceptance on the part of the Church's official representatives, although this acceptance may perhaps have been at a quite inexplicit and unofficial level. In view of this, and even apart from what has been said above, we can see no compelling grounds for excluding the official Church too as such radically and a priori from the possibility of itself giving utterance to 'instructions' of the same kind in the Church as a whole. Moreover we who recognise the Church (differing in this from the Old Covenant) as an indissoluble eschatological unity of institution and Spirit, must not conceive of the abiding distinction in her between the 'institutional' and 'charismatic' elements in so primitive a manner.[20]

The second question, it must be conceded, is more difficult to answer. Does this Constitution in its actual and existing form really possess the character of a 'pastoral constitution' precisely as we have attempted to define this? The first point we have to make with regard to this question must in all honesty be that it is not easy to supply any assured answer to it. The point of departure for our description of the essential nature of the Constitution is to be found in the preface to it. And it must be conceded that here it is neither as ample in scope nor as well substantiated as we could wish. For it can be asked whether the reference in the Constitution to its own 'pastoral' character, that is to that 'something more' which it contains over and above the assured and abiding doctrinal statements, is such that our explanation of it is wholly compelling or in fact the only possible one. It can legitimately be asked whether after all this preface is not intended to say merely that from the general principles of Christian revelation the Constitution draws particular principles with a narrower application in view of the nature of the present situation as it exists in the concrete and as subject to change. On this latter showing, however, the composers of the Constitution would [19] From this point of view Church history would have to be rewritten precisely in its pastoral aspect as understood here. We may think, for instance, of such definitive breaks with the past as were brought about by the acts of individual Christians such as Catherine of Siena or Joan of Arc, or even of still greater achievements on the part of whole groups such as the work of missionaries in China (Ricci), the experiment of the worker priests etc.

[20] cf. pp. 305, 306, nn. 12 and 13.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have had in mind the implicit proviso that they would not vouch for the correctness of these particular principles in every case or with their ultimate authority, and that obviously a fortiori if the situation itself changed principles different from those actually expressed would then acquire greater relevance and force. A further point that has to be conceded is that, apart perhaps from a few quite minor and timid statements, there is a lack in this Constitution of any radical consideration of the nature of a 'pastoral constitution' and, [314] over and above this, of the nature of the pastoral office, its possibilities and its limitations and also the ways in which it can be exercised (precisely as including the authority to instruct) as distinct from the teaching office, even though, in view of the content of this Constitution a consideration of this kind could properly have, and perhaps even actually should have, provided the subject matter of one of its basic themes. At the same time however, we must still be careful to avoid any denial of the fact that it does have the character of a Pastoral Constitution in the sense which we have worked out here. Here we must confine ourselves merely to pointing out certain further indications of why this should be so.

A point which can be established fairly clearly as a matter of historical fact is that not only in respect of its subject matter, but also in its whole inspiration and attitude this Constitution follows in the footsteps of the great encyclicals of John XXIII.[21] It is true that in these encyclicals too there is a similar lack of any radical consideration of the real significance of what is there being enacted. But even so the specialists, accustomed as they were to the 'doctrinalism' (using this term in no pejorative sense) of Pius XII, were sometimes extremely startled at what they found in these encyclicals. For here statements were made and demands put forward which can no longer be shown to follow compellingly as conclusions drawn from the general principles of Christianity. Even when due attention is paid to the contemporary situation in the concrete, and even if it is sought to find principles with a more particular and more concrete application to this, still even these do not follow solely or with full certainty from the general principles referred to. Now does this mean that John XXIII exceeded his own competence in doctrinal matters; or has he achieved, and moreover quite rightly achieved, something quite different (at least in part and with regard to the ultimate point and significance of his statements) than to explicitate further in doctrinal terms the content of the depositum fidei as such? Has he perhaps achieved precisely that which we have here called 'instruction' in a quite specific sense? In these encyclicals has he perhaps acted as an 'issuer of instructions' in precisely the same way as in the convocation of the Council, seeing that here too he was convinced [315] of the fact that no compelling ground for this decision could be drawn either from the nature of a Council as such or simply from the relevant factors in the contemporary situation and in the Church, but rather that in convoking the Council in this way he was acting under an inspiration from above?

X

Now if we are inclined to reply to these questions in the sense indicated here, then we shall be still more justified in arriving at the same conclusion with regard to the Pastoral Constitution of the Second Vatican Council, and, despite all its undeniable and striking deficiencies, we shall be able to regard it as a Pastoral Constitution in the sense described [21] Admittedly here we can only recognise the need for a historical study of these connections without ourselves carrying it out. Nor do we intend, in the thesis we have stated, to maintain that Paul VI has abandoned this course which his predecessors had embarked upon (this is especially true of his encyclical, Ecclesiam suam). Rather he has supplied different and fresh emphases to what had gone before. But it remains the achievement of John XXIII, with his bold and charismatic directness, to have initiated these difficult undertakings. As always this initiative has to be further developed and guided in different ways.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

here. Of course this does not imply (in fact the introduction itself already makes this clear) that there is no doctrinal element in this Constitution. Actually it is quite obvious that from the purely quantitative viewpoint this doctrinal element far outweighs all other elements. This is in fact inherent in the very nature of the subject matter. An 'instruction' always constitutes a summons to some act. And this act must also realise in the concrete some necessary value the force of which is abiding and immutable. (Here, for example the dignity of man or the values of justice, love, the unity of mankind etc.) And every instruction, even in the secular sphere and whatever the form in which de facto it emerges in history, is issued as pertaining to the proclamation of principles which are constant and immutable in their validity. It is these, and not the nature of the instruction itself that those issuing it have consciously in mind, even though, outwardly speaking, the instruction is something more than a mere application to the present of these permanent and immutable principles. Again in the light of this it is not surprising that even a Pastoral Constitution in our sense can give the impression to its readers almost of being a collection of particular principles drawn from the spheres of moral theology and social politics, and that any explicit reflections upon its real nature are either totally absent or at any rate extremely imprecise. The ultimately concrete element in this which constitutes the true essence of an instruction is in fact wholly incapable of being the subject of speculation. And quite evidently the process of reflecting at the theoretical level upon an essence of this kind in the manner presented here cannot bring any particular concrete actualisation of this essence under our microscope. In other words so far as any one specific 'instruction' is concerned such theoretical speculation can only have a very secondary importance. At the same time the [316] theologians, sociologists, futurologists and other specialists must subject this Constitution to the closest possible scrutiny and, in a certain sense, test its various elements to see where and how the Constitution goes beyond the limits of a purely doctrinal presentation, and achieves the status of what we have called 'instruction' as issued under the charismatic summons of God to the Church. When we say, however, that this is demanded by the very nature of the case, we precisely do not mean that the boundaries between the two can be made absolutely clearcut and unambiguous. We have only to achieve an understanding which is correct in a genuinely ontological sense of the relationship between the universal and the particular, and between the knowledge we can have of the former and of the latter, in order ipso facto to see too that it is quite impossible for human knowledge, radically bound up as it is with history, to draw the boundaries between 'doctrine' and 'instruction' as sharply as this would imply, the more so since every act of human cognition, even at its most theoretical, invariably and of its very nature has itself in turn the essential status of an act and decision on the part of the practical intellect also as realised in the concrete.

This does not mean, however, that it is unnecessary and meaningless to look for such possible boundaries between doctrine and instruction. In those cases in which the theologian believes that he is no longer able to see at the theoretical level how a given statement in the Constitution follows from the sources of revelation alone, he should not straightway start talking about the possibility of error or of the composers exceeding their competence etc. (though admittedly even in a conciliar constitution which is precisely not intended to be a definition this is possible). The theologian should ask himself whether a statement of this kind at the theoretical level, yet not fully supported by arguments, is not precisely an 'instruction' justifiably issued to summon the Christians of today to a specific decision in history. It may be too that the character of 'instruction' is to be ascribed to this 'Pastoral Constitution' in virtue of the selection which it arrives at between those statements and demands which it actually makes and those which – from the theoretical point of view – it could just as well have made but in fact does not. Here too we should not be too hasty in speaking of the finite nature and the limitations of even the Church's pronouncements, or of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the element of chance or even the effects of fashionable mental attitudes, even though it may be admitted as an obvious factor that the fathers of the Council too are not immune to these. But there is something more in the reasons prompting a selection of this kind than can be accounted for purely at the theoretical level. It [317] may be that behind it lies the summons of the Spirit in history, that Spirit whose will it is to have both enacted in the Church of today, demands as well as doctrinal statements. And if this is so, then it is something that despite whatever 'one-sidedness' there may be, the Church both can and should do in all trust,[22] without having to be anxious as to whether in taking this course she is betraying the inexhaustible resources of her own nature. For this always contains something 'more' than merely those elements which are traditional and customary or the obvious lines laid down for the development of her teaching and practice.

[22] On this cf. Handbuch der Pastoralthleologie II/1, the work mentioned in n. 14, p. 626 and also K. Rahner, Im Heute glauben (Einsiedeln [1]1966), pp. 24 ff., 32 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[318]

17

THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEM OF SECULARISATION

I

The aim we shall be setting ourselves in what follows is to conduct a theological consideration of the reality and the idea of that which the term 'secularisation' is intended to convey or that which we have to understand it to signify in order to obtain a correct view of this reality.[1] Now the first point to be established for this is that the concept of 'secularisation', both historically and in terms of its actual meaning, imports primarily and essentially a relationship to the Church considered as a social entity, and not, in the first instance, to God, his salvific grace or the historical realisation of this in the world. In German it is perfectly legitimate to distinguish between Säkularisation (secularisation), Säkularisierung (secularising considered as a process) and Säkularismus (secularism),[2] taking this last term to signify – though it in turn has many different levels and shades of meaning – the phenomenon of the 'world as it has been rendered worldly and profane', the world as self-authenticating without having, either in theory or (above all) in practice, any particular reference to God. In view of the history of the term 'secularisation', however, and also for reasons connected with its actual content, it is more accurate and more in conformity with the facts to take the term 'secularisation' as our starting-point, using this to signify the growing influence of 'world' (as the outcome of human ingenuity) and the process by which it becomes increasingly autonomous and separates itself more and more from the Church considered as a social entity in the world. A point that may be readily conceded from the outset in this connection is [319] that for the purposes of a truly theological consideration (as distinct from one in which considerations of canon law are included) it makes little difference whether such a 'secularisation' has been achieved by compulsory measures taken by the state appropriating the material resources of the Church or by the state abolishing or frustrating the Church's organisations (such as orders, confraternities etc.). The element in this concept which is of decisive importance for us is the fact that the 'world' in this sense separates itself from the 'Church', and that there is an increasing separation between sacerdotium and regnum, an increasing profanisation of the world by comparison with ages in which religion as an institution on the one hand, and the life of society on the other – in other words 'Church' and 'world' – constituted a homogeneous unity.

This 'secularisation' or worldliness in relation to the Church must not simply be identified with an a-theistic profanisation of the world.[3] For one thing there is such a phenomenon as a 'religious attitude'[4] which does not find expression in the sociological group or the Church. But more than this, and even if we view the matter from the point of view of the Church, the world even as secularised still falls under God's universal will to save. It is permeated by his

[1] On the concept cf. H. Lübbe's work, Säkularisation (Freiburg 1965); this includes a section explicitly devoted to the historical development of the concept which is strongly recommended.
[2] On these key words cf. E. Hegel, 'Säkularisation', L.T.K. IX (Freiburg [2]1964), 248 ff.; A. Auer, 'Säkularisierung', L.T.K. IX, 253 ff.
[3] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Science as a "Confession"?', Theological Investigations III (London and Baltimore 1967), pp. 385-400; idem, 'The Man of Today and Religion', Theological Investigations IV (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 3-20; idem, 'Universal Salvific Will', Sacramentum Mundi V (Freiburg/London 1970), pp. 405-409.
[4] cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1 (Freiburg 1966), pp. 228 ff., 253 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grace, and in virtue of this is far from being in any position to be atheistic in any absolute sense, even though it may sometimes interpret its own position in this sense at the level of explicit and conscious reflection. This means that the world is actually playing a positive role in the history of salvation and revelation, whether it consciously realises and accepts this or not. The most radical illustration of this truth is the fact that even one who is in all good faith an atheist properly so called at the level of conscious and explicit thought can still attain to salvation and can therefore still be in possession of grace and faith.[5]

Of course in spite of this distinction between 'secularisation' considered as the removal of the Church's influence and 'secularisation' considered as an attempt at atheistic profanisation, these two realities are closely interconnected. In its scope and the manner in which it is brought about, the process of ridding the world of the Church's influence can acquire a [320] specific form, one which gives it a tendency towards an atheistic profanisation. It can proceed from such a tendency or alternatively give rise to it or demand it.

At this point[6] we would wish deliberately to impose certain restrictions upon ourselves by confining ourselves to the concept of 'secularisation' considered as ridding the world of the Church's influence in so far as this is possible in view of the connection between the two concepts we have mentioned. In doing so we are conscious of the fact that this means that we are passing over the more ultimate aspects of the matter. We shall not, therefore, be speaking directly of the atheistic interpretation of the world in all its manifold forms as the 'world without religion' (Barth, Bonhoeffer), the 'death of God' movement (Altizer, Hamilton, van Buren etc.), the 'non-religious interpretation of biblical concepts' (Bonhoeffer, Ebeling), the 'worldly world' as such (Metz), the 'world as attaining to its majority' to the extent that this in itself already presupposes a certain separation between world and Church etc. Even when we have restricted our aims to this extent it is still possible to treat only of some but not all the specific aspects which are necessarily raised even when the subject-matter is as limited as this. We shall present our considerations in five brief theses, each of which will be followed by its own particular interpretation. As the final section of the whole study we may be permitted to draw certain conclusions from the rest of the theses which will have the effect of removing the restrictions which we shall meanwhile have imposed upon the subject-matter, broadening our viewpoint once more so as to relate our findings to the profanisation of the world in general and to the manner in which the Christian can live in it (cp. Thesis V, Section VI).

In our considerations we shall be taking as read certain aspects upon which much has already been written in recent years, and some of which are vitally relevant to the question of secularism and secularisation. In this study, therefore, we do not have to speak of the biblical and theological concept of 'world', with all the discussion it involves concerning that which is merely 'creaturely', that which must not be invested with 'numinous' quality, that which as created reality is good and is intended to be 'permeated with human influence' and by man as the 'environment' which is orientated to him. Similarly we shall not be returning to the question of the sinfulness of the 'world' considered as 'the present aeon' from which we have to detach ourselves in order to be ready for the 'aeon [321] that is to come' of the 'kingdom of God'. We are presupposing as a point that is already familiar the idea that the dynamism inherent in Christianity itself gives rise to a justifiable process slowly working itself out in history by which the world becomes worldly, even though in the concrete the representatives of Christianity and the Churches have often been so misled in their understanding of the [5] cf. 'Atheism and Implicit Christianity', Theological Investigations IX, pp. 145-164.

[6] cf. The author's studies in Sendung und Gnade (Innsbruck [4]1966), pp. 13-47; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 222 ff., 234 ff., 242 ff., 267 ff., II/2, 35 ff., 40 ff., 42 ff., 208 ff., 228 ff., 269 ff.; cf. also J. B. Metz, ibid., pp. 239-267.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation world, due to their ideas being ossified at particular epochs, that they have actually sought to hold back this process. In saying this, therefore, we are conceding not only the radical difference between 'world' (society, state) and 'Church' which 'in itself' is always valid and which is to be taken in the sense formulated by Leo XIII, but we are also asserting that this difference itself and in its own turn has a history of its own worked out in theory and practice which tends towards a growing clarification of the difference involved and so too to a growing awareness on the part of the two entities in themselves of what they really are and what the mutual relationship between them consists in.[7] We cannot treat of the basic relationship between Christian hope for the 'kingdom of God' which is God himself in his act of self-bestowal upon us as the absolute future and the future towards which the 'this-worldly' hope of man is orientated and which he sets up before him as his aim in his struggle against all alienation from the self.[8]

II

Our first thesis runs as follows:

A phenomenon frequently apparent in the history of the Church is a false integralism. By comparison with this the process of secularisation is, judged by genuinely Christian standards, right and just.

It is true that this statement expresses much that properly speaking belongs to the content of those principles which we have designated above as presupposed to our present considerations. Here, however, we must investigate with particular care the idea and the true nature of 'integralism', because even today the unreflecting attitude and mentality which this implies have not altogether died out in the Church. In view of this we can take an objective evaluation of this concept and of the reality it signifies as [322] a starting-point for arriving at a clearer conception of a kind of 'secularisation' which is, of its nature, legitimate, and also of the wholly practical consequences arising from this. What we are concerned with in the idea of 'integralism' is not that historical phenomenon consisting in the part played in the Church's history in the closing years of Pius X by the anti-modernist group under the leadership of Mgr. U. Benigni. Nor are we thinking of similar movements in the concrete which took place after the Second World War (intégrisme as the counter-tendency to progressisme in France, 'right-wing Catholics' as opposed to 'left-wing Catholics' in Germany etc.). What we shall be concerned with here is simply the essential nature of a reality which can be called 'integralism' (though there are other names for it also) because it signifies a specific interpretation of the relationship of the Church to the world (in the humanities, in science, in society and in politics), an interpretation in which every kind of 'secularisation' is rejected. Integralism in the sense intended here is that attitude, whether at the theoretical or at the practical (though unreflecting) level, according to which human life can be unambiguously mapped out and manipulated in conformity with certain universal principles proclaimed by the Church and watched over by her in the manner in which they are developed and applied.

Integralism in this sense implicitly presupposes that in his acts man simply puts his theory into practice, and that the world and its history, considered as the material field in which these acts of his are posited, is sufficiently predictable, malleable and submissive to his will,

[7] For a bibliography on this topic cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 203-207.
[8] Also K. Rahner, 'Marxist Utopia and the Christian Future of Man', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 59-68; in this volume cf. 'A Fragmentary Aspect of a Theological Evaluation of the Concept of the Future', pp. 235-241; 'On the Theology of Hope', pp. 260-272; 'The Theological Problems Entailed in the Idea of the "New Earth"', pp. 242-259.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to make such a procedure possible. Integralism in this sense, therefore, entails a failure to recognise that the 'practical intellect' has an element of the autonomous in it. Its acts of apprehension can be achieved only within the context of the free decision as actually posited in hope. An integralism of this kind presupposes that the Church is already in possession – at least to a sufficient extent for all important purposes – of these principles which are needful, and thereby denies the existence of any genuine historical development of dogma and theology at least for the sphere of practical action and the principles covering this. Furthermore integralism tacitly implies the opinion that in those cases in which it cannot be shown by just and valid argument that a given course of action is in direct contradiction to the universal principles of the gospel and of 'natural law', it follows ipso facto that this course of action is of itself and of its very nature so 'secular' in character that from the point of view of morality it is simply and absolutely irrelevant, so that ipso facto there cannot be any question of evaluating it as an act leading to salvation or alternatively to perdition. In virtue of [323] the fact that the Church is the proclaimer, and also the interpreter, of these principles as understood precisely in this sense the exponents of integralism regard her wholly and unreservedly as the guide of the world, at least de jure and in view of what she claims herself to be.

Nor is it sufficient in itself to overcome this attitude of integralism to emphasise that point initially made by Leo XIII and still upheld by Pius XII, namely that the Church recognises the relative autonomy of the world, the state and the departments of secular learning, and that in these dimensions of human living she ascribes to herself only a limited authority ratione peccati. For there are[9] two questions with regard to the doctrine of any such potestas indirecta or directiva belonging to the Church in relation to the world which we have to answer rightly in order that integralism may really and effectively be accounted as overthrown:

First: Given that the Church has the right to draw the dividing line between that which is morally permissible and that which is unethical, in other words to apply the criterion of the ratio peccati, does this give her the power to determine in the concrete what the 'world' should do in the here and now? Or alternatively does the establishing of this dividing line leave, at least in principle, the way open to various possibilities so that the world acts autonomously and on its own responsibility in making its choice between them? (Though this does not mean that the content of the decision as taken in the concrete is ipso facto of no 'human' significance, or that morally speaking it is simply irrelevant). The question is to be answered in the second sense, though the reasons for this need not be given in any greater detail at this point,[10] and this is despite the fact that integralism, for all that it verbally upholds the doctrine of the potestas indirecta or directiva of the Church, tacitly answers the question in the first sense and so, for all its outward professions, can still 'indirectly' assert that the Church has, or at least claims to have, a kind of dominion over the world which enables it positively and effectively to shape its course. There is a further point, which we need only mention in passing, with regard to that element in a course of action freely entered upon which, unlike the other elements, cannot be determined in the light of universal [324] principles. It would be wrong and prejudiced to suppose on this account that this element is ipso facto morally irrelevant, or to put it another way, that the only way in which we can recognise the morality of an action as such is by applying universal principles to it, as though [9] 1n this connection we must for the moment abstract from the fact that on this theory the importance attached to the Church's role is in reality too little. This is a point which we shall shortly have to demonstrate.

[10] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'Grenzen der Amtskirche', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 499-520. On the problems entailed in the use of the term 'ecclesiastical' in this connection cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/2, pp. 211-214; on the actual subject itself cf. also in the present volume 'Practical Theology and the Social Work of the Church', pp. 349-370.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

there were no 'logical' way of working out the ethics of human action at the individual level.[11]

Second: the correctness of a further idea tacitly presupposed by integralism has also to be called in question, the idea, namely, that we know what ought to be done once we know (precisely through the Church and her pronouncements ratione peccati) what we ought not to do. The fact that it is possible and justifiable for the Church to prohibit certain courses of action must not be doubted. Yet in reality such a prohibition does not eo ipso or of its very nature supply us with any positive idea in the concrete of what course of action we can and should adopt.

There may be many simple and unremarkable instances in the morality we practise in our everyday lives in which this may be the case. But it is not so as a matter of principle, and still less is it so in the sphere of 'political' ethics as applied to major social and historical events. In spite of the ratio peccati as defined and applied by the Church, the sort of responsibility which the 'world' has to take with regard to these is quite different from that which integralism imagines it to be. In this context the insoluble casus perplexus, from being the subject of the subtleties of moral theology, can become a matter of deadly earnest such that moral theology at the theoretical level, with its abstract concepts and quaestiones disputatae, is of no avail to solve it. In these circumstances once more the world has to be left to itself by the Church. To give an example: no pope and no Council has been able to say in the concrete how we can effectively, and in the actual situation as it exists, escape from the vicious circle of the balance of fear created by the atom bomb, or how we are to face up to the worldwide population explosion. Absolutely speaking we have to respect all principles of abiding validity in arriving at those solutions which we have to find in the here and now. But these abidingly valid principles do not yield any solution in the concrete. Ultimately speaking the question that remains constantly present is concerned with those goals defined by [325] principles laid down by the Church and, in an asymptotic sense (i.e. as never quite attainable), binding 'in themselves' and 'in principle' to be striven for in an historical development (both at the individual and the collective levels). Do these aims ipso facto actually have to be capable of realisation at every moment of history? Or alternatively is it possible for man, under certain circumstances, to fall short of them even consciously, and in doing so to incur 'material' sin indeed but not formal sin, and precisely in that very act to attain to the best possible course in the here and now?[12]

Whatever answer we may arrive at to this question, the raising of it represents the first serious attempt to take into account the historical conditions to which man is subject as a factor essentially affecting the moral demands which are required of him. Whatever answer to it we may arrive at it does appear from the considerations which we have set forth above that the Church is in no position whatever to determine unambiguously the 'human' factor, or even what constitutes moral behaviour in the world, seeing that this can vary according to the circumstances prevailing at any given time. For this reason too the Church is in no position to claim such determining power when she emphasises the binding force of the principles she upholds, principles which, ultimately speaking, always have the force of defining boundaries which must not be overstepped. The Church is never, and never intends for one moment to be, the total and exclusive force determining and administering human conduct and morality

[11] On this cf. K. Rahner, Das Dynamische in der Kirche (Freiburg [3]1965); 'On the Question of a Formal Existential Ethics', Theological Investigations II (London and Baltimore 1963), pp. 217-234; Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 521-544. 'Do not Stifle the Spirit', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore 1971), pp. 72-87; 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"' in this volume, pp. 293-317.

[12] On the principle here being enunciated cf. provisionally Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 152 ff. (with references).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the world. She is not the sum total of this, but rather an element in this sum total made up of many factors, for at basis and of its very nature the sum total of all that determines human morality is essentially 'pluralist' and derives from numerous elements: from the concrete historical situation, which can never be thought out completely in all its aspects; from the principles of the gospel and also of the 'natural law' as rightly understood, and at the same time from the decision taken in a concrete set of circumstances which is unique in each particular case, and yet which, even as such, is still subject to the claims of morality. Man has the task of unifying all these heterogeneous factors and, once more, it is not for the Church, but rather for God alone to say how this is successfully to be achieved in the concrete. Why else, for instance, does the Church avoid making any moral judgment on the Vietnam politics of the USA? If she could make such a judgment ipso facto she would also be under an obligation to do so.

It is not merely that integralism in the Church has never been able to be [326] achieved in practice. It is actually false in principle too. Now all this taken together has the following significance: Of her very nature the Church constantly leaves the world free to be itself in its 'worldliness' and to have its own responsibility (and this not only in the execution of its decisions but in the actual process of arriving at the imperative underlying these also) even though this worldly element as such still precisely does not cease to have a 'moral' relevance and to have a significance for salvation. This worldly element is not merely the secular 'material', in itself indifferent, 'in which' Christian action is to be made real, but also includes (though it is not co-extensive with) Christian activity itself, since not every aspect of this can be controlled by the Church. In this process of 'secularisation' of the world which she herself promotes, the Church supplies the grace of God, the principles of the process and its ultimate boundaries. But the human and Christian conduct desired is something that is achieved by the world itself on its own ground and its own responsibility.[13]

III

The second thesis runs as follows:

The secularisation of the world in the good sense implies that the Church has a quite new task, namely to create a new ecclesiastical integration between the faithful themselves within herself taken as a whole and in the individual communities.

This second statement is intended to draw a conclusion which, though it represents but a short step, is in itself not unimportant in view of a new task which the Church has to perform in her own sphere. The Churches as the sum total of the faithful and the human groups which assemble at particular places of worship are intended to be communities. But they are this not merely in virtue of the juridical structure of the Church in the purely formal sense, together with the confession of a common faith and the celebration of a common liturgy. These are not the sole factors even if this liturgy as realised in the mystery of the Eucharist is aimed at the emergence of the community in sacramental power.[14] In earlier times the Church and the communities of local Churches were able to achieve an [327] integrated community life of this kind even at the sociological level, relatively speaking without any special efforts on their part, in virtue of the fact that the Christian community (together with the specifically [13] For a treatment of the principles governing the relationship of the Church and the world cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirche und Welt', Zehn Jahre Katholische Akademie in Bayern, ed. by the Katholischen Academie in Bayern (Würzburg 1967), pp. 9-27.

[14] On this cf. 'The New Image of the Church' in the present volume, pp. 3-29; 'The Presence of the Lord in the Christian Community at Worship', pp. 71-83, 'On the Presence of Christ in the Diaspora Community according to the Teaching of the Second Vatican Council', pp. 84-102 (with the bibliography attached to each article).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesiastical elements in its formation as a community: a juridical structure, creed and cult) could presuppose as already in existence in the secular sphere a socially integrated group characterised by the following elements: a cultural life which made equal demands upon all, a society which, at the civic level, was homogeneous rather than pluralistic, an ethical system which was immediately and manifestly common to all, and which went beyond abstract moral principles. In other words (to put it briefly) it could presuppose all that which lies at the roots of a stable and homogenous society integrating the individual into itself, defining for him the boundaries beyond which he could not pass, and relieving him of his burden by offering him security.

This situation also had its effects upon the specifically ecclesiastical elements in the ecclesiastical community: the common creed was also a manifest factor at the social level. This meant that those vested with official authority in the Church were relieved of certain burdens. The cult was also experienced as a sacral sublimation of the unity of the secular community. Today it is quite otherwise. Earlier the 'world' introduced ipso facto and of its very nature certain vital basic factors into the 'Church'. Today the society which penetrates into the Church, and which has to form a community there from the outset, is the world as 'secularised' even in the sense that it no longer immediately and of its very nature supplies the necessary substrate for the formation of the Church's community, as was formerly the case. It is pluralistic in the patterns of life in the world which it offers. It is made up of men of whom no one individual any longer has command of the whole of knowledge, of culture, or of the trends towards the future which are present throughout the whole of society. In spite of the fact that there has been a great increase in universal education, that masses of information in various fields are now available, and that the media of communication have multiplied so rapidly, society as a whole has become less possible to evaluate with regard to its condition, more difficult to guide and more incalculable with regard to the future towards which it is tending. In brief: society is less integrated, with all the consequences which this has for the individual and for society itself. Now this gives rise to quite a new task for the Church in working for the fulfilment of her own true vocation. She must herself create what she could formerly presuppose as the social or 'natural' substrate for the formation of her own community.

[328] Admittedly this precisely does not mean that the Church has to transform this world as secularised and pluralist in this sense back into that former state of being a homogeneous society which of its very nature brought its own integration with it into the Church. The Church does not have to do this even to the extent that this present world as secularised and pluralist has to be absorbed ever anew into the Church herself. Indeed if the Church were to attempt such a thing – and the temptation to do so is always present and always great – she would be building herself a ghetto and, in terms of the sociology of religion, the very tendency of her own efforts would be such as soon to turn her into a 'sect'. But even within the boundaries of the Church herself she must herself remain an 'open society'. Indeed she must become this far more than formerly. She cannot practise any kind of 'negative selection' in the sense that unconsciously, but nonetheless really, she seeks to address herself to, to reach and to win over only individuals of a particular social or cultural stamp. She must have a place for conformists and non-conformists, for men of the most diverse political tendencies, for philosophers with the most diverse ideas, for catholiques de droite and de gauche etc. She must cope with this state of pluralism in an anti-integralist way. In fact she must learn to view and to experience this as something positive.

But this in turn precisely does not mean that the Church has no task of integration at the higher level with regard to this abiding intellectual and social pluralism within her. If this task were not recognised and fulfilled, then the Church would be a 'sect' designed for the satisfying of merely individualistic religious needs, and still more would once again become a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mere 'official Church' of clerics;[15] these alone would, in fact, satisfy such religious needs, and the believers could, as an unintegrated multitude, be nothing more than the recipients of the Church's salvific acts despite all ideological protestations to the effect that they are something more than this: to a large extent the really constitutive element of the Church. The Church would not be in a position to fulfil any responsibility to the world or any task for the world precisely as a Church.

But what is this 'integration' of the Church considered as a community, and how is it to be presented, seeing that it cannot be the act by which the pluralist world is rendered homogeneous after the pattern of an integralism interior to the Church herself nor yet a restoration of that earlier degree of integration which the society of the Church enjoyed, nor even a mere [329] ideological superstructure of devotionalism ('We are already the Body of Christ')? It is difficult to find an answer to this question. The following alternative answers might be considered possible:

First, in answer to this question concerning a task for the Church which is still hardly recognised we might point to all the social work for the 'new' integration of society which the Church is performing, should perform and could perform in common with secular society which undertakes the same work with similar aims.[16] It might be said that the Church must undertake precisely this work, even though it seems to be wholly secular in character, primarily in relation to her own baptised members. Thus for example her children, adults, the old etc., who have, each in their own way, to be integrated into the society and to find a place in it and security for themselves.

Second, a plea must be entered in this connection for a genuine process of democratisation in the Church. Rightly understood this term as applied to secular society stands not so much for a 'liberation' from all kinds of compulsion, but is rather the key word for institutions, standards of conduct, models, rules etc. which have to be formulated in order that a society which is pluralist in character and has to survive as such may be a society, and not a radically disintegrated accumulation of individuals and groups, each with their own special interests. In accordance with this, 'democratisation' in the Church does not in the least need to be understood as a battle-cry against the authority of the official hierarchy of the Church, but rather should be taken as the key word standing for the integration of that secular and pluralist society in the Church which today constitutes her enduring substrate, which the formation of the Church has to presuppose.[17]

Third, we might refer to a factor (as something that also has validity in this connection), which will have to be spoken of further in our third thesis, with regard to a quite new function of the Church as a whole in relation to secular society.

However, as we have said, we shall have to devote a fresh section in our considerations to the discussion of this. What we have said up to this point on the subject of the second statement is, of necessity, very abstract, first because the task indicated here, which the secularised state of society makes necessary for the interior life of the Church, has still scarcely been [330] recognised, and second because, for want of space and also of competence in the field, we have not been able to make any practical proposals at the level of 'pastoral theology'.

IV

[15] On this cf. the article already cited on p. 323, n, 10. 'Grenzen der Amtskirche' and in addition to this cf. especially K. Rahner, Vom Sinn des kirchlichen Amtes (Freiburg 1966).
[16] In fuller detail in my study, 'Practical Theology and Social Work in the Church' in this volume, pp. 349-370.
[17] For a concrete treatment of this cf. 'Dialogue in the Church' in this volume, pp., 103-121.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The third thesis may be formulated as follows:

In its situation of pluralism and secularism the Church leaves society to develop along its own lines. Now precisely because she is incapable of shaping the course of society in its concrete decisions in an integralist, doctrinal or juridical sense, the Church herself has a quite new task in relation to this society, a task which might perhaps be characterised as 'prophetic'.

But what this presupposes is that new formation of the people of the Church in terms of ecclesiastical and social organisation which has already been referred to in the second thesis. This statement is obscure and must be clarified.

The process of secularisation on which we sought to cast light from the theological aspect in the first thesis appears initially and at first view to imply that the Church lacks influence in many departments of life in the world. Certainly the Church can set herself to establish certain boundaries ratione peccati. She can lay down certain universal norms. But against any tendency towards an integralism beneath the surface she cannot control the history of the secularised world in the concrete either by means of her – admittedly valid – doctrine or by means of her pastoral commission (considered as potestas jurisdictionis). Are these negative determinations now sufficient fully to determine the true relationship between the Church and the secularised world? Is it the case that the only way in which the Church can achieve any further influence on the formation of the secularised world is simply as a 'grace' and through the individual Christians as such, through the power of grace and the 'mental attitude' of the gospel as inculcated into these Christians?

I believe that no clear answer has been given to this question even in the Second Vatican Council. Such an answer is to be found neither in the Constitution on the Church Lumen gentium, nor in the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, Apostolican actuositatem nor in Gaudium et spes. The reason is that the activity of the Church, in those contexts in which it is not to be identified with the activity of the individual Christians, is still viewed too much as an assistance in doctrinal terms, in other words as a 'communication of principles'. And this despite the fact that that idea which is so often invoked of 'collaboration' on the Church's part with all [331] men of good will and with their social institutions points in a different direction.[18]

Our third statement is intended to provide an answer to the question which we have just presented: the Church as Church can achieve something more than a mere counselling of the world by the preaching of her own principles, something more too than mere 'collaboration' which in practice could only be achieved through the work of the individual Christians in the secular institutions, allowing for certain exceptions of no great importance.

In order to see what is positively intended we must begin by considering the following point. In a democratic and pluralist society which is functioning well each of its informal and formal groups has the purpose and the right to exercise its influence in the general decisions which still inevitably have constantly to be taken by the society as a whole. The groups concerned can use all justifiable means in doing this, beginning with discussion and extending to propaganda and the use of their own power in legitimate ways. But what is constantly presupposed is that such a group has an 'opinion' as to what ought to be done in the here and now with reference to such decisions taken by society as a whole and with a view to the actual taking of them. A concrete 'programme of action' of the kind envisaged is itself an extremely complex entity, and yet in the practical 'will' of the group concerned it constitutes a unity. It contains within its own nature elements of rational and conscious [18] For a fuller treatment of this theme cf. 'The Theological Problems Entailed in the Idea of the New Earth' in this volume, pp. 260-272; 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"' pp. 293-317, and 'Practical Theology and the Social Work of the Church', below, pp. 349-370.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

calculation measured by the reality itself with regard to the particular matter involved, and it is by means of these that an attempt is made to win over the rest through instruction. Such 'rational' elements are present both with regard to the goal to be aimed at and also with regard to the objective means by which it is to be attained. But a 'programme of action' of this kind, belonging to a particular group, always contains a further element over and above that which can be justified on purely rational grounds which have consciously been thought out. This is an element of creative imagination. It is 'creativity' which makes the 'utopian' a possibility. It is a decision taken from the freedom inherent in human living which, from many possible or conceivable courses of action, chooses – perhaps all unreflectingly – one in particular, resolves upon this and seeks to carry it out. It actually creates, and does not merely endure, the process of human history.

[332] All this takes place at that level of practical living which cannot be deduced from mere speculation, which carries its own conviction, and does not, in any full or comprehensive sense, derive this from the sphere of speculative thought.

The Church too can, should and must be a group of this kind within the secular and pluralist society. The pluralist society itself cannot prohibit the Church from having such an aim. For only a society which is absolutely totalitarian in structure can have the intention of allowing social groups to exist only as subdivisions and subordinate functionaries of a society which is set up and controlled in a totalitarian and authoritarian manner from a single central point. A pluralist and 'open' society, which, unlike a 'closed system', does not merely make room, legally speaking, for a single point of control for all its powers, cannot a priori have anything against a community of believers freely and constantly forming itself anew with such an aim, provided only – and this is presupposed – that it keeps the 'rules of the game' belonging to such a society and to the interpositions of its decisions and its 'practice'.[19]

But the Church should have an aim of this kind. Whether she is in any position to achieve this, whether she can be equipped for it, what degree of social unity she has to have and the manner in which she can form such a unity within herself in order to be the 'subject' of such an aim at all – these are questions which at this present and initial stage cannot yet be discussed. Nor shall we yet at this point be raising the question of how far she can in practice be successful in bringing this aim to fruition in the secular society, namely of making her own 'programme of action' either wholly or in part a principle of action for the secular society. We have no intention either of implying that such a programme of action could from the outset and in its first inception only be that of the 'explicit Christians'. God's grace can also inspire others to adopt the same programme. On theological grounds the Church can and must have such a name, such a programme of action if she can manage it. She has a task to perform for the world. She is there not for herself, but is rather the basic sacrament of salvation for the world.[20] She must be the leaven of the world. The worldly [333] activity of Christians and the working out of their salvation are not two areas of her activity which are materially speaking completely distinct, but – at least in part – two aspects of one and the same process by which the lives of Christians are brought to their fulness. Now this fulness is achieved essentially in intercommunication and in social living as realised in the concrete 'space-time' dimension of history. As 'visible' the Church is a concrete historical and social entity which, even if she did not wish it, necessarily influences society as a whole in various ways and, indeed, in ways which proceed not merely from her nature as 'eternal' but also [19] On the process by which the common will is formed in contemporary society cf. K. Rahner, 'Reflections on Dialogue within a Pluralistic Society', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 31-42.

[20] For a treatment of the basic principles involved here cf. K. Rahner, Kirche und Sakramente (Freiburg ^{2}1963), pp. 11-22; 'Konziliare Lehre der Kirche and künftige Wirklichkeit christlichen Lebens', Schriften zur Theologie VI (Einsiedeln 1965), pp. 479-498; 'The New Image of the Church' in this volume, pp. 3-29, esp. pp. 12 ff.; Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie I (Freiburg 1964), pp. 118-142.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from the form she inevitably assumes of her own free will and in the concrete. These are effects for which the Church has to answer. The Church as such has de facto willed to have such an effect – one which goes beyond her doctrine and the activities of the individual Christian – and has exercised an influence of this kind upon the world. And in view of this state of affairs there can be no serious question of the Church in principle having to renounce this influence and to withdraw into the 'sacristy'. The question rather is precisely how the Church is to be able to direct this legitimate influence in relation to the secular world today.

These indications must suffice at this point as a basis for our thesis concerning the legitimacy and the need for the Church to have such an influence upon the world, over and above the statement of her doctrine in principles and the specific activities of the individual Christians. The points that are of more immediate concern to us here are as follows:

First, the attempt to determine to some extent the precise nature of this influence, and this not merely in negative terms as formerly, and

Second, the question of what form the Church herself ought to assume in her concrete structure and in the minds of her members in order that she may in fact be able to exercise such an influence upon secular society.

In order to make some contribution to the answering of the first question it is advisable initially to devote some consideration to the character of many of the encyclicals of John XXIII (Mater et magistra, Pacem in terris), as also of the encyclicals of Paul VI, Populorum progressio and above all the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes of the Second Vatican Council. In what does the special quality of these documents consist? While they rightly and necessarily contain much that is fundamental and of permanent validity in the way of 'doctrine', the true focal point of their significance, that in them which is so striking and which actually 'shocks' those who expect them to remain at the purely theoretical level, consists in their underlying purpose which, following the language of the Second Vatican Council, we can characterise primarily as 'pastoral'. But it would [334] be to undervalue this 'pastoral' element, and to deny its true nature, if we sought to understand by it merely those 'practical' consequences which – at least in view of the world situation as it actually exists – could certainly and compellingly be drawn from the universal principles. The climactic significance of these documents plainly lies in certain 'imperatives', in certain assignments of emphasis, in the unfolding of an historical programme which summons the world to certain decisions. Indeed this is also shown from the fact that the actual analysis of the contemporary situation which in part provides the basis for this 'pastoral' element is neither something given in revelation nor so simply capable of being established that it could present the 'situation' as a 'brute fact' which no-one is in a position to doubt. On the contrary it belongs inseparably to that sphere of practical activity in which knowledge of the situation and the reaction to it in terms of human decision and action constitute a unity and mutually condition one another[21] The demand, for instance, for a 'super-UNO'[22] or the formation of a world fund for aid to the under-developed peoples in Populorum progressio are certainly demands representing lofty aims and ones which, even in material terms are wholly justifiable. But undoubtedly they represent something which cannot compellingly be deduced as a conclusio theologica from revelation for each individual, such that every Christian is obliged to accept this demand. On the contrary, they constitute programmes of action, having the character of a decision, assertions of the practical intellect, precisely as this cannot be deduced from pure intellectus principiorum. They constitute decisions in which the Church does something more [21] On the theological difficulties involved in an analysis of the contemporary situation cf. Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie II/1, pp. 181-187; 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"', in this volume, pp. 293-317; 'Practical Theology within the Totality of Theological Disciplines', Theological Investigations IX, pp. 101-117.

[22] On this cf. Gaudium et spes, No. 84.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

than merely to conceive of putting her principles into practice; something in which she actually wills to realise these principles in the concrete in a specific form and one which cannot be deduced from those principles, and in which the Church exercises an influence upon secular society as a concrete group within that pluralist society in virtue of this will of hers.

The discovery of this imperative directed towards society can, in view of the nature of the Church, only be characterised as 'prophetic' although this does not exclude, but rather includes all the other elements in such a discovery such as are found in other contexts in any decision of social and [335] political relevance. This means that a pastoral 'instruction' is, at that point at which it fully realises its ultimate nature, the prophetic instruction of the Church considered as a decision taken in terms of concrete human living and ultimately not derivable from theory, and in fact directed to the secular world.[23] Of course this applies only to that which the Church can demand of this secular world precisely for its salvation. But this is not in dispute.

But the question which we have now to consider – this is the second of the two questions we have just raised – is whether the Church as actually constituted in the concrete is the sort of subject which, as one of the groups within the secular and pluralist world, can address the world with a programme of this kind with even a little prospect of success. This hope can indeed not be based (merely) upon the fact that the programme of action is in some respect enlightening in itself or that other groups are raising the same cry. The difficulty entailed in this hope and the prospect of the Church having any effective influence on the secular world is twofold: on the one hand we have the official Church, which in this respect cannot, of its very nature as Church, be anything much more (though at the same time it must be this) than the herald of a prophetic impulse which is present elsewhere in the Church, or at most one of the possible points of entry for the Church's own Spirit with its power to influence history. This official Church has, in relation to the world, only as much 'authority' and influence to move it as belongs in a thousand ways to the 'Church' considered as a social group. On the other hand the official Church cannot lay it upon the believers belonging to her in virtue of her formal teaching authority or jurisdictional power to follow this prophetic imperative which the official Church sends forth.[24] The Church as people of God must 'go along with' the official Church in these prophetic imperatives if they are to have any real effect on secular society. Now the truth that stands revealed at this point is that the Church is fundamentally something different from, and, for practical purposes must henceforward become something different from, the institution of truth merely at the level of the speculative reason, supplemented by the necessary consequences [336] that correspond to this in terms of the administration of the sacraments and the apparatus of ecclesiastical government. Rather she must be the institution of the truth of the practical reason, the 'vision' and activity of which also belong to that institution which the revelation of God has created for itself. She is the people of God on pilgrimage, which is intended to, and wills to, imprint its eschatological hope upon the structures of worldly life through the orientation of this pilgrimage in the concrete, which is not fixed and determined ipso facto and from the outset by the maps which revelation at the theoretical level provides. It must and will also achieve harmony with the [23] On the concept of the prophetic 'instruction' cf. 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"', pp. 293-317, esp. 295 ff., 298 ff., 302 ff.

[24] Even within the Church phenomena analogous to this are to be found: e.g. the Church can for instance recommend the gaining of indulgences, but what real meaning would the Council of Trent's dogma on indulgences have if an overwhelming majority of the faithful used their Sancta et justa libertas filiorum Dei (Thus Paul VI in the Apostolic Constitution 'Indulgentiarum Doctrina' of 1.1.1967, No. 11) so as to decide not to gain any indulgences?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

secular world in its course, without being able to determine this course in any doctrinal or even integralist sense.

But how much there still is to be done in the Church in order that this task can be fulfilled with all the effectiveness that is necessary! A 'political theology' of a fundamental kind would have to be developed. That is theology (considered as content) in general and ecclesiology in particular would have to be developed in their significance for social politics and the shaping of history, and thereby the exaggeratedly narrow and individualist view of revelation as pertaining to the salvation of the individual in isolation would have to be overcome. A 'mental attitude' would have to be developed in believers in which they no longer confronted the official Church with the dilemma, either to make pronouncements that are doctrinally binding or else to be 'uninteresting'. Instead believers with this mental attitude would be ready seriously to respond to 'prophetic' impulses, to make their own attitudes worked out in the freedom of human living, to share in the formation not merely of opinions but of resolves too. In the official representatives of the Church a readiness would have to be developed (and that too not merely with regard to specifically religious matters such as e.g. new devotions etc.) to take up prophetic impulses in the Church. For however true it may be that for the most part these become really effective only when they are extended beyond the official representatives of the Church to the Church as a whole, and thereby to the world, still they do not necessarily emerge in this way, but in a few cases they actually appear for the first time precisely in the holders of office in the Church. That process of social integration within the Church would be required of which we have already spoken from a different aspect in the second thesis, and which can be of assistance to the Church in achieving her effect only when it is applied at the social and political levels.

[337]

V

Our fourth thesis runs as follows:

The relationship of the Church to the secular world as it exists today demands, within the framework of 'practical theology' that a special theological discipline shall be worked out and shall have a constitution of its own.

This constitution we shall call, provisionally and for want of any better term, a 'practical ecclesiological cosmology'.

What is meant by this? First a word must be said with regard to 'practical theology', which is commonly – and even in the Second Vatican Council – called 'pastoral theology',[25] since this 'cosmology' of which we speak is to be understood from the outset as a discipline which is part of 'practical theology'.[26] 'Practical theology' is not a mere amalgam of 'practical' maxims which emerge necessarily and of their very nature from dogmatic and moral theology and from canon law. Much less does it consist merely of such guidelines as are of importance for the 'pastoral' work of the priest engaged in the cure of souls. 'Practical theology', so far from being this, is a discipline in its own right because its subject matter and its methods cannot be deduced simply from the 'systematic disciplines' of theology. It enquires in a properly worked out and methodical manner into the ways in which the Church as a whole can achieve her due fulness according to the demands made upon her and the possibilities open to her at any given time in all her dimensions, and not merely in the clerical sphere and through the activities of clerics. It differs, therefore, from other disciplines in which [25] cf. my study, 'Practical Theology within the Totality of Theological Disciplines', Theological Investigations IX, pp. 101-114 (together with the references to further studies there provided).

[26] On this concept of a 'practical cosmology' cf. further the study entitled 'Practical Theology and Social Work in the Church', and especially below, pp. 339 ff., 350 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesiological questions are raised in that these can enquire merely into the abiding nature of the Church's self-realisation, and the essential forms in which this can be achieved as determined by revelation or – as in the case of canon law – into the jus conditum and its history. But they cannot consider in any adequate manner the 'jus condendum'. Now in order to realise what is entailed in this self-achievement of the Church as something to be realised at a particular point in time, and which extends far beyond the mere putting into practice of abiding principles and of the Church's jus humanum, we need to make a theological analysis and an interpretation of the contemporary situation [338] of the Church both in its internal and external aspects. Now this analysis cannot be worked out in terms of any other theological discipline. Moreover what we are faced with here is a quite distinct subject for theological investigation in its own right – it is not 'revealed'! – so that it also entails a distinct theological method, one which cannot merely be that which is applied in secular sociology, history, the study and evaluation of cultures etc. And precisely for this reason 'practical theology' is a theological discipline which is, in a genuine sense, original and unique in character even though it does presuppose all other theological disciplines. This must suffice for our present purposes as a description of the nature of 'practical theology'.

Now within this self-achievement of the Church as she exists at any given time the relationship of the Church to the secular world is something that has to be discovered not merely in its permanent and immutable nature, but also, and no less essentially, as it has to be realised in the circumstances actually prevailing in the here and now. And to this extent this relationship assumes not indeed the only place, but still a place of such significance that it has to be the subject of a special consideration in its own right and one that is worked out by precise and correct methods in practical theology. The general grounds for regarding practical theology as an autonomous discipline in its own right are in themselves sufficient to show that this relationship cannot be treated of in other theological disciplines, for this relationship is changed by the changes which take place in the secular world considered precisely as the situation of the Church. But this situation itself cannot be the subject of the disciplines of systematic theology. Moreover the recognition of this relationship, in view of the complexity of this situation, can precisely not any longer be deduced from the mere pre-scientific experience of individuals. A further point is that this relationship entails, as one of its characteristics, an element of prophetic decision. In other words it is totally incapable of being interpreted as a mere combination of two elements alone, namely a theoretical ecclesiology and a recognition of the situation.

Now this doctrine concerning the relationship of the Church to the world as it exists at any given time, even though it is a part of practical theology, has no name. And hence it comes about that this task for theology for which there is no name is in fact far from being recognised sufficiently clearly or evaluated sufficiently clearly in its urgency or its importance. This task is not identical with the 'social science' of Christianity, for this latter discipline is concerned with the basic forms of secular society (in economics, law, civic constitution etc.) and with what these ought to [339] be according to Christian principles.[27] Nor is this discipline simply a department of dogmatic ecclesiology, for this can at most treat – if only it did so! – of the permanent forms assumed by the relationship of the Church to the world. Nor is this discipline identical with 'political theology' as so urgently demanded today by J. B. Metz,[28] for this is concerned with the social implications and the social relevance which are universally and abidingly immanent in the revelation, the doctrine and the hope of Christendom, and is not concerned with what ought to be the relationship of the Church, in [27] On this cf. W. Weber, 'Kirchliche Soziallehre', Was ist Theologie?, E. Neuhäusler, E. Gössmann edd. (Munich 1966), pp. 244-265 (Bibliography).

[28] On this cf. the summing up of J. B. Metz in his study, Verantwortung der Hoffnung (Mainz 1968).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the actual circumstances prevailing, to the world in its worldliness as it actually exists in the here and now. This discipline which we have postulated really has no name. And for this reason it would almost be true to say that it has hardly any existence yet either in the Church and in theology. We recognise it immediately when we think of Gaudium et spes and in doing so resist the temptation to reduce what is said there to mere 'dogma', 'moral theology' and 'social science', and when, on the contrary, we try to recognise the element of the 'prophetic' in it and then ask ourselves precisely what theological discipline this Pastoral Constitution considered as a whole and in its distinctive character is properly speaking intended to assume. We cannot point to any one because the theological discipline which we have postulated has no name and so has not yet been constituted at all in any explicit sense as a discipline in its own right. For want of a better name we may call this subdivision of the science of practical theology which we have attempted to define 'practical ecclesiological cosmology', but in doing so we hope that the term 'cosmology' as used here will retain the biblical connotation of 'cosmos', and that no-one will confuse this kind of cosmology with the discipline belonging to 'natural philosophy' which bears the same name.

Today the task which awaits a 'cosmology' of this kind is an almost immeasurable one. In our naiveté we constantly suppose that we know the world in which we live; that we are familiar with its forms, its diversity, its ideologies, its hopes and impulses, the co-existence of the various levels of human living within it, which are present in it simultaneously right from the origins. We find no difficulty in believing that we know what manner of men they are to whom the Church addresses herself in her specifically religious mission, but also, over and above this, in the message [340] she has to give with regard to the wellbeing and prosperity of society and its future even within this present world. We do not know these men. Or at most we know only a particular group of them, separated from the rest by our own mental attitudes, conditioned as these are by our membership of the Church and the bourgeois outlook of our own times. We need only to notice the emphasis, the perspectives and the choices of subject-matter which are made in the official pronouncements of the Church, and to ask ourselves precisely which men can pay heed to these pronouncements, to see that in spite of all her good will the Church does not really know, in any adequate sense, man as he exists today.[29]

In this cosmology innumerable aspects of the relationship which the Church is required to bear to the secular world today would have to be considered. The directly religious mission of the Church certainly does not belong to this part of practical theology. Nevertheless this cosmology would have quite sufficient material to consider with regard to the relationship between the Church and the world. Certainly there are many particular subjects belonging to this complex of questions within the theological discussion – all those which are treated of in the second part of Gaudium et spes and which in fact also constantly point by implication to a function which the Church has in relation to the world. But is this enough to include all the particular subjects? Are there not others which, as we can foresee, will become urgent in the immediate future? Are there not many such particular subjects, in relation to which the Church de facto merely adopts a theoretical and detached attitude, a dialectical approach characterised by the phrases 'on the one hand… on the other' without venturing upon any concrete imperative as a prophetic instruction? Or are there not certain subjects to which the Church responds only with an imperative so timid and so hedged about with provisos that it is inevitably ignored? Indeed – for this is how it sometimes seems – are such imperatives actually formulated with the secret hope precisely that they will be ignored? In other words they will be there as an alibi and yet create no offence anywhere.

[29] How otherwise, for instance, would it be possible to speak with so little embarrassment even today, e.g. of the 'fire' of purgatory, as Paul VI still does in his most recent Apostolic Constitution, 'Indulgentiarum Doctrina'?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Certainly a scientific cosmology of the kind we are thinking of cannot of itself formulate such imperatives. But it could pave the way for them and provide the scientifically and critically informed conscience leading to them, and at the same time the encouragement necessary for concrete action. It could serve to keep alive in the Church the awareness that she [341] herself is far from being a mere organisation for satisfying the religious needs of the salvation of the individual merely because she is not, and cannot be, that which controls the world in an integralist sense. Rather she must recognise, in the particular area which we here have in mind, that the secular world is a free partner in an open dialogue. Indeed she must recognise that she herself is a genuine part of this secular world which collaborates as an element within history in the history of the world of which God alone is the autonomous controller. And in this history she herself is not simply the representative of God.

VI

Up to this point we have sought to consider and to concentrate methodically upon that process of 'secularisation' in which the Church and the world become involved in a greater diastasis, one which is conditioned by the relevant epoch, and are thereby compelled to strive afresh to achieve a positive relationship to one another, one which consists neither in 'integralism' nor yet in a mere negative withdrawal and the exercise of a critical function towards the world on the part of the Church. In conclusion, however, we may permit ourselves to extend our theme of investigation somewhat, so as to include in it the distinction between the 'secular world' and the 'grace' of which the Church is only the effective sign without thereby ipso facto being identical with it. This means that we are regarding the 'world' as worldly no longer in virtue of its distinction from and relationship to the Church and vice versa, but as it is in itself. We do not intend, however, to take up once more those questions with regard to the 'worldliness' of the world which we have already established as in principle answered at the beginning. Rather we shall attempt to make a somewhat deeper and more far-reaching theological assessment with regard to this worldly world, which is at once abiding and changing from age to age. This assessment which we shall attempt to make will bring into play certain findings of early theology which seem to have become uninteresting and uninspiring to the scholastic theologians, but which in the context with which we are concerned, once more acquire their original significance and weight.

On this basis we may formulate our fifth thesis as follows:

The situation entailed by the secular world is one of pluralism and 'concupiscence'. Now the process by which man unreflectingly allows himself to become involved in this situation is not ipso facto or 'of itself' sinful. What this situation signifies, rather, at all levels in which man strives to achieve the [342] fulness of his own existence, including those levels characterised by 'gnoseology', is the necessary prior condition and the existential context in which the mode of human living in which the Christian is involved is one of contest and struggle, and one threatened by sin (the sin namely of forgetfulness of God). This situation must be accepted and realistically endured by the Christian as something that is permanent, and in doing this he must not fall into any ideologisation of this world in an integralist sense.

In order to understand what is meant by this statement a few words must first be said with regard to the 'concupiscence' of man in the theological sense of the term.[30] 'Concupiscence', rightly understood, implies an interior pluralism within man at all levels of his being and in [30] On this concept of concupiscence cf. especially K. Rahner, 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia', Theological Investigations I (London and Baltimore 1961), pp. 347-382; 'Justified and Sinner at the Same Time', Theological Investigations VI (London and Baltimore 1969), pp. 218-230; J. B. Metz, 'Konkupiszenz', H.T.G. I (Munich 1962), 843-851.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

all his impulses, and that too a pluralism of such a kind that it can never be totally or radically integrated into the single decision of freedom (either for or against God) by man as a personal and consciously reflecting being endowed with freedom. This inalienable state of 'disintegration' appears at all levels of human self-fulfilment, not merely in moral acts in the narrower sense but also in the dimension of knowledge, which as such is always at the same time a 'practical' activity. It appears at its bitterest and starkest in the 'disintegration' of death and of life considered as a prolixitas mortis. Now it would be to deny this interior 'fleshly' state of disintegration and the impossibility of ever overcoming it[31] if we sought to conceive of it as consisting of 'interior' conditions terminating, so to say, at that point at which the subject of them makes contact with the external world. Man is an open 'system', constantly in communication with the world. Right from the first he is orientated outwards to the world. The world is in him and he in it, and what we call the 'environment' of man is man himself in his state of radical outward orientation in space and time. In this state he is at once himself in possession of himself and yet sharing this otherness of his in his identity with others. The constitution of man as 'concupiscent' and as having an 'interior' life of his own, and at the same time the constitution of the world he lives in, necessarily correspond to one another. Thus it is easier to deduce what 'concupiscence' properly [343] speaking consists in from the world than to do so by a process of 'psychological' introspection into man as he is in himself. This concupiscence has an unfolding process of its own, the process precisely in which man endures and in which he constantly, but only imperfectly, overcomes this state of disintegration to which he is subject. The statements of traditional theology with regard to 'concupiscence', therefore, can with perfect justice be interpreted as statements of theology with regard to the secular world which, considered as the area of human living in space and time and as a prolongation of the physical side of man, display exactly the same basic qualities, subject to change from age to age, as does that 'interior' element of concupiscence which is in man himself: a plurality of the objective factors involved and of the various dimensions at which they exist, their state of disintegration, the abiding impossibility for man, even though asymptotically speaking it is something which man must constantly strive to overcome, of ever achieving a point of unity from which man himself can control all these diverse factors and so overcome this pluralism; the fact that this pluralism as it exists in the concrete, together with the attempts at achieving integration in it by subsuming all the factors involved (under a single idea, a single representative body vested with power etc.) is finite and subject to the vicissitudes of history.

Thus we can see that the statements of theology with regard to concupiscence are ipso facto statements of a theological interpretation of the world. The interpretation of the world by Christians, and thereby of their own relationship to it, can therefore be deduced from the theological statements with regard to the interpretation of concupiscence. We shall therefore concentrate particularly upon the three basic statements of the Council of Trent with regard to 'concupiscence', and interpret them as statements about the secular world.

First: the non-integrated pluralism of the human reality which is called 'concupiscence', and therefore too of the secular world, is not ipso facto and 'of itself' sin, but rather an element in saving history, a stage which is 'open' to further development and which leads to an integration which can only be attained to in the consummation of man and of the 'kingdom of God'. This 'declaration of innocence' is not so immediately obvious or so insignificant as might appear at first sight. In order to see this we do not even need to remind ourselves of the heterodox interpretations of the world such as those of Gnosticism, Manichaeism etc., though [31] Of course this does not exclude, but rather takes into account the point that the control we exercise over our human living in history must always be actively directed towards a state of total integration, even though this is a goal which is only asymptotically attainable in this world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in fact even in Christianity as it actually exists these continue to have an underground existence, albeit not at the level of conscious theory, at least with regard to specific and particular levels of human existence which are subject to [344] change from age to age. There is no need whatever for these denials of the 'innocence' of the 'concupiscence' of the secular world to be set forth dramatically. They are actually lived in the unreflecting modes in which human existence is fulfilled. Cases arise in which one particular milieu and mode of life is from the outset preferred before all others as the truly 'Christian' one, for instance the 'simple and modest way of life', the life which refrains from any 'dangerous' erudition or a 'puritan' life characterised by a mistrust of the factor of sex and of any happiness taken in the 'enjoyment of life'. Cases arise in which certain specific ways of life which are open to man are from the outset regarded as suspicious and not 'suitable' in any true sense for the Christian. 'The soldiers' calling' (in earlier times!), the life of the politician and involvement in politics (as a 'dirty business'), the callings of the actor or artist in general etc. And wherever this is the case there we have the underground influence of the sort of denial we are speaking of, of the innocent and unblameworthy pluralism of the world, even though it is not stated in so many words. Efforts are made to escape from the non-integrated pluralism of the world by excluding from the outset certain dimensions as not 'relevant' to human or Christian life. There is an effort to simplify life, to reduce it to a unity (German ver-ein-fachen) in order not to have to endure and sustain the burden of the non-integrated and 'concupiscent' pluralism. But the only way of achieving a simplification of this kind is to regard that which one has excluded from one's life and so the complexity of the world with all the heterogeneous forces in it, as a world that is rightly to be rejected and pronounced 'guilty'. The Pastoral Constitution Gaudium et spes (No. 25) clearly recognises the difference which exists between the disturbances (perturbationes) involved in the inevitable 'tension' (tensio) of economic, political and social factors on the one hand, and on the other the disturbances which arise from sin. In those cases in which we pronounce the first kind of 'disturbances' and tensions as ipso facto and of themselves 'sinful' we are undertaking a secret manoeuvre to rid ourselves of a burden, because in that case we are in fact simply producing objectivations of our own guilt which add nothing whatever either new or different to this sinful world.

Second: Concupiscence is imposed upon man ad agonem. We can translate as follows: the world as pluralist, secular and non-integrated is no abode of 'peace' in which man can enjoy a world that is integrated and in which the various elements are 'reconciled' and brought into harmony with one another, and one that, provided 'good will' is present, can quickly be set up. Rather it is the sphere in which man's life is one of agon, contest [345] and struggle.[32] Certainly this agon is directed towards a goal, namely the integration of all realities in the final fulness of the love of God as encountered 'face to face'. But this is a goal which can never fully be attained to in this age. Always it lies before us and because of this it constantly leads us into areas of fresh opportunity. But the primary demand which this agon makes upon us is that it shall be readily accepted – viriliter, as the Council of Trent expresses it. Now it is not accepted so long as man's ultimate attitude is one in which he refuses to accept and endure the pluralism of his life as non-integrated and the forces present in this life to which he is constantly exposed from the very outset. For instance he is failing to accept the situation in which he has to live as conditioned by 'gnoseology' and also by concupiscence so long as he sacrifices the open and unresolved conflict between its many heterogeneous 'sources' of experience and knowledge, which cannot be subsumed under one another, in favour of a system in which one particular 'science' – whether it be theology or metaphysics – is made [32] On this concept of peace cf. my study, 'The Peace of God and the Peace of the World' below pp. 371-388 (and also the fuller bibliography supplied there).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simply to dominate over the rest without allowing itself to be called in question by them in any 'open dialogue', or modified in any way in the unfolding processes of human living. This would give it the status of a universal science which sought to extract and to integrate within itself all knowledge from all the schools, so that its practitioners would be afraid to allow that there was anything that they did not know. They would be unwilling to be surprised by anything that they really had not 'heard before', any alien piece of knowledge such that they would have to change their own system in order to admit of it, not having previously provided any place for it in that system. The truth is, however, that even the areopagus of the spirit constitutes an 'open society' in which a constantly shifting balance is maintained between the various forces.

Such an attitude represents a failure to accept the agon present in human life through the medium of the world as pluralist and subject to the forces of concupiscence, and not already reconciled and brought into harmony so long as we believe that we are not empowered to entertain 'interests', joys, initial options and preferences which have not yet fully been subjected to a process of criticism and choice by the standards of explicitly religious and 'supernatural' motives. The agon as it exists in the secular world is not accepted (though it does, of course, remain even while it is denied and suppressed, and precisely as such becomes more dangerous) when, in an attitude of hostility towards the incalculable [346] factors in life because of the 'disintegration' which they introduce into it, we seek, in a spirit of harsh obstinacy to reconstruct it through and through in a 'Christian' sense, as though its confused cacophony had to be brought into harmony here and now by us ourselves in a process of integralism guided now not by the Church but by the Christian himself of his own power and by his own right.

Third: 'Concupiscence' implies an impulse to sin (ad peccatum inclinat DS 1515). This is not the place to consider concupiscence, and so too the world as pluralist and non-integrated, in all its bearings from the point of view of its origin ('original sin') and its consequences (personal sin and the objectivations of this in the world both at the individual and collective levels). We may confine ourselves to drawing attention to one point, because it belongs directly to the subject of the 'world'. We do not need to derive our knowledge of what that sin is which threatens us in the concupiscent world from any other source. This knowledge is already present in the worldly and concupiscent situation itself. Sin is precisely the failure to sustain and the failure to endure this situation in the private or public departments of human life. It causes man anxiety not to have any absolute fixed point at his disposal within the integrated instability of the open system of human life. He does not dare to abandon himself to the uncontrollable factor inherent in that unique unity which is to be found in this totality of the pluralist at its still unintegrated stage. This uncontrollable factor is open in all directions. It leads backwards into the hidden origins, forwards into the unplanned future, upwards into the limitlessness of transcendence, downwards into the darkness and sheer impenetrable factualness of the material. From the basis of this 'mortal fear' (Heb 2:15) one particular element in the non-integrated and pluralist world is, whether in theory or (perhaps also) in practice, accorded an absolute value. In other words man in his self-will and fear elevates it, as it were, to the single and all-dominating point of reference for the integration of the world which, it is claimed, will be autonomously achieved. This is what takes place at the theoretical level in that which constitutes a (bad) 'ideology', and at the practical level in that which in simple terms is called sin. Now to the extent that man's theoretical and practical activities themselves in turn constitute an element in the world, and to the extent that man's original decision taken in freedom necessarily achieves its fulness beyond himself in the physical and social objectivations which this freedom achieves (although this freedom does not absolutely speaking enter into the objectivations concerned and therefore the objectivations of it remain ambiguous), it follows that through any 'integration' precisely of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this [347] kind the world itself is altered. It becomes the 'world of sin', 'this present age' in the biblical sense of the phrase. The objective relationships are affected by the various ways in which sin works itself out.[33]

So long as the integration given by God has not been achieved in the world there are always some ways, albeit essentially different ones, in which man, even though 'free', yields to the pressures of the non-integrated world.[34] Moreover there is a division between the non-sinful pluralism of the forces of concupiscence in the world on the one hand and the disintegration imprinted upon it through sin on the other (for sin as a pseudo-integration is really a strengthening of disintegration). Now if this division is asserted to constitute an unambiguous criterion of 'judgment', then it in turn becomes a way of attempting to achieve an alleged integration through one's own power. For if this were indeed the case then we would know 'what we have to hold firm to' as that which, as reconciled within itself, constituted our own good. But this is not the case. Now because of all these factors the secular world constitutes a unity of many heterogeneous realities which is not for us to shape or control, and which are invisibly involved with one another: the world as made up of manifold created goods; the world as made up of many different, though justifiable human activities; the world as the objectivation of man's guilt in his will autonomously to reduce the world 'to order' in an integralist sense.

The secular and pluralist world is the 'world' as envisaged in scripture. The pluralist world can be precisely this because it is history and not a mere static 'system'. At the same time, however, this secular world is also precisely that world which the Christian expects, acts upon and endures from his own innermost Christian understanding of himself. For in this he does not regard the world as alien by reason of some ideological or integralist attitude, but rather views it as it actually is. Here, then, at the end of these theological considerations on the problem of secularisation, we have returned to a truth which is quite simple and, for Christians, never to be forgotten. In spite, therefore, of the differences which sometimes seem to threaten our lives to their very roots, it is the same 'world' [348] which God loved so much that he took it upon himself and laid down his life for it. If the Christian takes this central point of his faith as the centre of his life too, then he can endure even the secular world and, in the right sense, be of service to it.[35]

---

[33] On this cf. also Gaudium et spes, No. 25.

[34] This takes place in a twofold manner: first through an exercise of basic freedom amounting to pseudo-integralism in that it accords an absolute value to some element in the world ('mortal sin'). The second way bears upon that dynamic impulse towards a genuine integration of the world which is constantly striving towards, and in process of attaining to its goal but asymptotically, never wholly reaching it. In this second way the act of the will delays and holds back this process ('venial sin'). Of course as a matter of concrete practice neither way can, with complete certainty, be distinguished from the other.

[35] This would provide a suitable starting-point for presenting more fully the necessity and the concrete function of the evangelical counsels. cf. K. Rahner, 'Kirche und Welt', Zehn Jahre Katholische Akademie in Bayern (Würzburg 1967), esp. pp. 22-24; 'On the Evangelical Counsels', Theological Investigations VIII (London and Baltimore 1971), pp. 133-167.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[349]

18

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY AND SOCIAL WORK IN THE CHURCH

In order to speak upon this topic as I have been commissioned to,[1] I can only imagine myself, even on the most favourable showing, as being like Balaam's ass who uttered prophetic speech and yet remained an ass. Certainly I am no expert in the social sciences, and no specialist in practical theology either. Still less have I any practical experience in social work, whether in the ecclesiastical or the secular sphere. It may perhaps be true that the dogmatic theologian should have a certain minimal understanding of these matters, seeing that he has to think out, from his central watchtower of theology, the significance of the Christian and the Church, among other things in their relationship to the world and to the circumstances of human living in this present world. But if this is true then the dogmatic theologian of today as he exists in the concrete will in turn have to make a report which is either very deficient or almost wholly negative: the much vaunted 'theology of earthly realities' is, despite the Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World of Today', still barely in its initial stages. I cannot conceal this situation, and therefore what I personally can say will be said with the courage of despair.[2] If I [350] altogether fail or achieve far too little of importance then I can only appeal to the forebearance and forgiveness of my readers, and can only hope that at least the contradictions which my remarks will occasion may perhaps lead to other insights which are better than those offered here. We shall attempt to present our considerations in four key statements and lines of argument.

I

The first is that principle which belongs to 'scientific theory' to the effect that the teaching with regard to the Church's works of charity and social work is an intrinsic element in pastoral theology which should better be called 'practical theology'. 'Pastoral theology' so called can in fact no longer be understood today as teaching and direction relating, for

[1] For the occasion on which this lecture was delivered cf. the detailed list of sources appended at the end of this volume.

[2] For this reason the author is compelled to refer to a wide range of preliminary studies of his own. cf. especially the expositions in Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie, F. X. Arnold, K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L. M. Weber edd., Vols I-II/1-2 (Freiburg 1964-1966) concerning the connections between Church and world, the situation of the Church today etc. For an explicit statement of the principles involved, therefore, reference must be made to this work in particular (and also the comprehensive bibliographies there provided). On the present subject cf. also especially the expositions of R. Völkl, I, pp. 385-412; II/2, pp. 403-423; another approach which the considerations which follow presuppose, but which was undertaken with different aims in view, is offered by K. Rahner and K. Lehmann in II/2, pp. 389-402 (bibliography). cf. also A. Ziegler, Thesen zum Verhältnis von Sozialarbeit und Theologie (Caritas-Verlag, Lucerne, special edition); A. Hunziker, 'Geistige und berufsethische Aspekte der Sozialarbeit', Caritas 45 (1967) (Supplement to Section 3), pp. 102-116. For a brief presentation of changes in social work and work to raise standards of living, and also of the role of the Church today, attention must particularly be drawn to these studies. cf. also K. Rahner, 'On the Theological Problems Entailed in a "Pastoral Constitution"'; 'Christian Humanism'; 'The Presence of the Lord in the Christian Community at Worship'; 'On the Presence of Christ in the Diaspora Community According to the Teaching of the Second Vatican Council'; 'Theological Reflections on the Problem of Secularisation', in the present volume pp. 293-317; 71-83; 84-102; 318-348; and Vol. IX, pp. 187-204. On the range of subject-matter involved in the study which follows cf. also a further study by K. Rahner, 'The Christian in his World', Theological Investigations VII (London and Baltimore 1971), pp. 88-99.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

instance, to the world of the cleric charged with the cure of souls in his particular field. Today, rather, it consists in theological reflection upon the entire process by which the Church as a whole brings her own nature to its fulness in the light both of her own nature and also of the contemporary situation of the world and the Church today thought out from a theological point of view. Now those actively involved in this task of bringing the Church as a whole to its fulness include all degrees in the Church's hierarchy and also the laity, as well as everything which is included in the concept of this self-fulfilment of the Church: not only cult, doctrine and pastoral work in the narrower sense as immediately concerned with the mediation of salvation to the individual, but also, and no less essentially, the charitable work of the Church and the whole of her impact in all its aspects upon that which we call the 'world'. This means that the social work of the Church too belongs to this inasmuch as there is a special way of carrying out this social work, of defining its aims and limits, which pertains precisely to the Church as such. The situation of the Church in [351] the world and in the unfolding process of salvation history is constantly changing, and not everything that an individual Christian does is to be included in this self-fulfilment of hers at any given time, for there is certainly a 'private' sphere of Christian living too. But on the other hand this self-fulfilment is not to be identified with the activity of the officials of the Church either, or even, it may be, of the laity to the extent that they are carrying out some commission for the official Church. The Church (which, however, is not identical with the hierarchy) achieves this self-fulfilment of hers in the most manifold forms of activity and in widely varying degrees. But all these, which characterise her and in which she is involved, belong to this process of self-consummation. Certainly there is such a thing as a 'private' level of Christian living as well, a process, therefore, of intercommunication between individuals which is private, Christian and sustained by the grace of Christ, and which therefore constitutes a love, a charity in the theological sense of the term, in which the Church as such is not involved. At the same time, however, charity and social work are integral elements in the self-fulfilment of the Church as such, and therefore also constitute a subject for practical theology, however difficult it may be in the concrete to discriminate between caritas at the level of the Church and the caritas of the individual in his private Christian life.

This first principle, which we have only been able to explain very briefly above, is no mere theological subtlety, a play with words at the level of scientific theory. First the theological consideration of the Church's charity and social work precisely at the ecclesiastical level has, without prejudice to the fact that the work of charity is the subject of a distinct scientific discipline in its own right, its own essential place in practical theology, and is not a mere floating or arbitrary theory about something which is now actually to be found within the sphere of the Church, in her sanctuary and before her walls. Second, practical theology does not merely draw the more concrete conclusions for the Church's activity which follow from a mere 'essential' ecclesiology, but rather constitutes an original and autonomous science, because it alone can say, on the basis of an analysis of the present worked out in theological terms, what the Church should do at the particular time concerned (not therefore at all times); and also because it actually has to say this with the force of a certain prophetic imperative. Thus it comes about that the science of caritas need not confine itself to describing what constitutes the caritas of the Church at all times and from the very nature of the Church herself. Rather this science has to define what the caritas of the Church must be precisely [352] today, in the particular circumstances prevailing now, rather than always, but in these circumstances, once more, as interpreted in terms of a theological critique. The science of caritas has a critical, almost a prophetic, function with regard to the caritas which the Church de facto performs, and must to some extent employ the creative imagination which springs from hope to project the ever-fresh forms which the caritas and the attitude of the Church towards the world have to assume. It can be concluded from the nature of practical theology

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as rightly understood that the science of caritas is an original theological science, and also a critical and normative one, which must at basis include sociology, futurology and similar sciences as its aids, if it is to recognise what form the caritas of the Church has to assume today. It is not a mere collection of practical counsels deriving from the nature of Christian charity, nor merely an appendix to moral theology.

There is, however, straightaway something further to be said – at least in the form of a question – once we have recognised the necessity for such a change in the form of charitable works on the basis of a scientifically thought our charity of this kind: there is a Pastoral Constitution 'On the Church in the World of Today'. There is a Secretariate providing for the Church and Christians to enter into dialogue and (perhaps) collaboration also with 'unbelievers' (better with non-religious humanism). There is much more besides in terms of thought and action which leads in the same direction. Yet so far as theological consideration goes there is still no name whatever for all phenomena of this kind which are slowly coming to the surface in the form of questions, teachings and action. And yet something is 'there' palpably and unforgettably only when it has a name. Certainly this nameless phenomenon belongs to the sphere of practical theology, but it is not identical with the whole of practical theology since in fact this also has to take into consideration the cure of souls in the narrower sense. Nor is this nameless phenomenon a department of dogmatic ecclesiology for the area which this has to investigate is the enduring relationship to the Church, and not that which arises adventitiously at a particular time. Nor yet can this nameless phenomenon be identified with Christian social sciences, even though it is related to these. For these sciences are concerned with social and economic factors etc. in so far as these, while retaining their own secular status, still fall under the norms of the natural law and the gospel. But what the sciences do not consider is the mutual interrelationship of the Church and the world as such, both in its active and its passive aspects. Nor is the designation 'theology of earthly realities' correct, because in fact what is being treated of here is the relationship of [353] the Church to the world, and that too to the world considered as a social entity, as a work of man and not as the immediate outcome of the creative work of God. J. B. Metz has once more seized upon the term 'political theology', but even this does not signify what is being pointed to here, because 'political theology' includes within its purview the social relevance of faith and the entire reality which it envisages. The Americans call this phenomenon simply 'Church and world', but mean by this a special theological discipline in its own right. We should perhaps provisionally call this phenomenon 'theological and ecclesiological cosmology', if this name cosmology had not already, and, at least in a still provisional sense, been appropriated for a philosophical discipline which admittedly is gradually being eliminated in favour of a transcendental ontology and anthropology on the one hand and a scientific study of nature and history on the other.

Whatever course we adopt in order to fulfil the urgent and important need to find a name for this anonymous reality, one question may be posed: always given that the science of the works of charity is understood as a department of, and an intrinsic element in practical theology, should it not, in these times, be expanded and reorganised on the basis of this 'ecclesiological cosmology'? Would this not be reasonable in view of the following two factors: first, that it is probably inevitable that the work of charity as practised today should be caught up in the process of changing its forms and modes of expression even though its essence endures. Even the charitable works organised on an ecclesiastical basis cannot any longer simply be identified with 'welfare', and the borderline between charity properly so called and the whole range of works performed by the Church for the world in general and in the field of social work in particular is, both in theory and in practice, extremely difficult to establish – if indeed there is any such; second, that theological and ecclesiological cosmology is still seeking for a foothold and a home, still seeking, therefore, for some real possibility of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

being systematically studied. Charity would not be being false to itself if it were to extend its scientific aspects so as to include a 'cosmology' of this kind. It would be combined with that 'hope' which is so very neglected and isolated,[3] and together with it would form a cosmology made up of futurology and ecclesiology of this kind as a part of practical theology, and so construct a framework within which these two theological virtues would find a place proper to themselves in speculative theology alongside that assigned to faith. It is clear, therefore, that the [354] science of caritas and the theology of the social task and work of the Church would thereby achieve a closer and more comprehensible relationship. All this, however, has been put forward merely as a question.

II

Now let us come at last to those factors which the actual terms caritas and 'the social work of the Church' are intended to stand for, in order to approach one stage nearer to our real subject. In accordance with this the second principle runs as follows: the difference between the Church and grace on the one hand, and 'the world as it has become worldly' on the other, which contemporary theologians are beginning to recognise and to understand as a difference imposed by Christianity itself, determines also and in turn a further relationship. The two terms of this relationship are on the one hand grace as caritas and the Church as the historical and social manifestation of this ecclesiastical caritas, and on the other that caritas the forms of which have been secularised (considering this both as an 'attitude of mind' and in the forms in which it is objectified in society).

Let us first consider not caritas and the social work of the Church together with the counterparts to these in the secular and worldly sphere, but rather the factors of grace or Church and world in general and as a whole. 'World' exists not merely as a creation of God, as 'nature' but as a task to be performed, an activity to be entered upon and the objective realisation of these on the part of man himself. It exists as the subject of man's own projects for the future, the world that he has made and has still to make, that to which he himself belongs as one whose course is shaped and directed by himself. World in this sense is to be distinguished not merely from grace and Church in the same way that 'nature' is to be distinguished from grace, for in this latter case nature is that which grace presupposes and to which it is addressed, that in relation to which grace represents the opening up of a new and distinct modality, that which makes it possible for grace to be imparted as the self-bestowal of God. The world is also to be distinguished from grace and Church from age to age. As the history of grace progresses this world is, to an increasing extent, made responsible for itself in its autonomy, its maturity, its secularity and its realisation of its own nature. This 'worldliness' of the world which increases from age to age is, despite the distortions and damage due to sin always present in the process, in the last analysis not a disastrous fate which blindly runs counter to grace and the Church, but the mode in which grace itself enters more and more fully into creation: as a [355] liberation and authentication of the world as it is in itself. In this connection it must be recognised once again that a state of pluralistic – indeed of 'concupiscent' disintegration is proper to this world as it is in itself, and must be accepted and endured by man as such. In other words in the world as such and as it exists in itself there is no controlling power, whether already in existence or capable of being set up, which could, in any adequate sense, integrate it into a comprehensible and controllable system. It would, therefore, be utterly unchristian to seek univocally to inform and to control the world in its reality and its history in terms of its positive content. And faith and the Church make no

[3] On this cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of Hope', in the present volume, pp. 242-259, esp. pp. 256 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

claim of this kind. Rather they seek to accord due responsibility to the world itself, to man as mature and free, to his decision and responsibility in the forms which he imposes upon his world. Now for the moment nothing further need be said with regard to what further positive significance faith, grace and the Church still have as contributing to the liberation of the world in its worldliness. For this question will soon be raised again in the course of our present investigation.

For the present, however, it must be recognised that all communication between men at all levels and in all its dimensions belongs essentially to man. Now in accordance with what has just been said, this has the following significance: intercourse between men has its appropriate place 'also' in the world which is liberated in this way by grace and the Church in its worldliness. Certainly there is also a form of intercourse between men which is constituted by grace as such and only by it. This is precisely caritas in the theological sense, that unity between men which is constituted by the divine self-bestowal. This specific form of communication between men is manifested in the Church in that special and unique form in which it has the basically sacramental significance of being a sign and effective within the dimension of history. It is this that in principle distinguishes the Church from the world.

But in accordance with the relationship between the Church and the world in general, and also as subject to variations from age to age, this grace-given human intercourse which is made manifest in the Church in caritas also releases, as its necessary prior condition, and appropriates to itself, a human intercourse at the worldly level which grows from age to age. The Church renounces any claim personally to exercise control in an 'integralist' sense over this human intercourse at the worldly level, and sends the Christian – and precisely as such – into this context of human intercourse, still at the worldly level, as the appropriate field for him to fulfil in maturity his human and his Christian task. At the same time the Church herself imposes upon him as his lot and his burden that human [356] intercourse at the worldly level which is pluralistic, unintegrated and subject to the forces of concupiscence together with the modes in which it is developed to the full and objectified. Grace and the Church leave the world unimpeded in its autonomous reality and its own responsibility with regard to the future in which it seeks fulfilment and the task which confronts it in the present. And precisely because of this the Church avoids the danger of becoming a mere accomplice of the world ('throne and altar') in its social institutions, often petrified and even affected by sin as these are, and achieves that detachment which she needs in order to fulfil her ministry of providing a critique of the world and of opening it to its own future by 'imprinting' her own eschatological hope upon the structures of 'worldly' life, as the Council itself lays down (Lumen gentium, No. 35).

From this the following conclusions arise: the element of the worldly, social activities while remaining at the worldly level and the worldly forms in which these are institutionalised cannot, either in themselves or in the manner in which they develop from age to age, be regarded by the Christian or the Church as something which should properly speaking and better be achieved merely by the Church and the Christian as such by their own dispositions and explicitly ecclesiastical guidance. In principle no greater value is to be attributed to the specifically Christian or ecclesiastical element in the field of social work than in any other spheres of activity of the world in its worldliness, of culture or of society. Hence too the theology of the Church cannot of itself alone arrive at any theoretical or adequate judgment with regard to the necessity, urgency, concrete forms or lines of development for such work in order that man may attain to a higher and more fruitful level of socialisation, however much Christians too, considered as individuals, may be called upon by their faith and their caritas to collaborate in open dialogue and in competition within the context of human living with all other men as fellow citizens of one and the same world in the unfolding process of this social reality, and however much too the Church may be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justified and authorised in offering to the world in its freedom and responsibility a word of prophetic 'instruction' over and above the abiding principles of the gospel.

III

We pass on to a third principle. The Church (in all the complexity of this concept) has the task of bringing to bear upon the world the work of charity and social welfare. This work cannot a priori and in all cases [357] materially be distinguished from the same work and the institutions catering for this that belong to the world. Any lines of demarcation or any possible overlappings or 'two-way traffic' situations between the ecclesiastical and secular spheres of charitable work can only be laid down for a particular place and time. And, as has been said, there is neither any one a priori plan to regulate all that pertains to this nor yet any autonomous body with authority to draw such lines of demarcation. All that we have is an 'open' system, and at most this can never strike more than a precarious balance between the two.

The Church has the task, and also the right belonging to her of her very nature, to make an impact upon the world through her activities in the fields of charitable and social work. We use the simple terms 'charitable' and 'social' work. While for practical purposes it is perhaps possible to draw a certain distinction between charitable and social work, an essential and unequivocal distinction between the two at the theological level is not possible – is indeed actually ruled out. For caritas in the theological sense consists in that one love which exists between God and man and between men among themselves and signifies the one all-embracing factor and the one whole which encompasses the whole of man and so his salvation. Moreover this love is no mere attitude of mind, but is an action which is made incarnate in all departments of human living (even though perhaps in some cases in forms which appear secular and worldly, and, as it were, concealed). Again it is quite impossible to think of mankind without also thinking of the human intercourse that goes with it and which has to be given objective reality at the social level. Now if all this is true then it follows that all activities directed to a human intercourse which is right, beneficial and also a part of concrete living in society, can be the 'material', the expression and the event in terms of social living in the concrete precisely of this theological caritas, and nothing can be excluded from it a priori. Indeed this caritas, considered as a factor that comprehends the whole of Christian living, always contains within itself the duty and the impulse constantly to seek out fresh forms in which to realise itself as each particular situation demands and suggests. This also means that all social work, provided only that it is contributing in some way to man himself and to his communal living, is an element in those processes by which caritas is brought to its fullness, and that precisely in the circumstances of today it can actually be offered eagerly as something over and above that which is so commonly termed 'charitable' work.

If the very act of feeding the hungry in the simple and biological sense can, and even must be caritas and the work of caritas, then we can say [358] from the outset that we cannot perceive how anything else pertaining to social service and social work can of itself be excluded from the work of caritas. On the contrary, in every age the Christian and the Church must ask themselves afresh what precisely, in view of the circumstances of the time, the seven 'corporal' works of mercy and the seven 'spiritual' works of mercy are to consist in. We should not envisage these according to the old conceptual models of a society and an economy in decline, and so blind ourselves to those forms of activity in which 'caritas' should be embodied today, even though, perhaps, no-one would call them 'charitable'. It can surely not be the task of the theologian to sketch out a systematic table of the sort of levels of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

