(iv) In so far as the layman is a member of the Church both in the dimension of inward grace and her outward (quasi-sacramental) visibleness, he also shares necessarily in the Church's mission and responsibility. He not merely enjoys the use and advantages of her activity and is not merely subject to her direction or a passive object of her missionary mandate; but by the very nature of being a member of the Mystical Body of Christ he is also an active cooperator in the fulfilment of her mission and mandate, in so far as these can, and must be, predicated of the Church as a whole and in so far as the fact of a determined mission and a definite mandate does not itself constitute the essential difference between certain members of the Church and [327] others who are called lay people. We cannot say exactly what this cooperation means in a positive and negative sense, until we deal with the lay apostolate itself. The important factor at this point is merely the most general conclusion which follows immediately from the positive content of the fact of being-a-layman-in-the-Church: the layman participates in the mission and task of the Church (which does not by any means signify that he participates in the mission of the hierarchy or the clergy, etc.).

(v) Up till now we have spoken of the layman in so far as the meaning of this concept results from the permanently established nature of the Church and of Christianity. It remains now to be seen that being-a-layman-in-the-Church can also be given content by positive ordinance and legal disposition on the part of the Church (i.e. iure humano). A layman can be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a godparent, can fulfil certain functions in ecclesiastical associations, can have the right of patronage, can, by right, assist in the administration of Church property, etc. All these are functions which belong to him de iure humano, and they signify services in the Church which do not destroy his nature as a layman, since they do not deprive him of his proper station in the world.

Human law could, of course, assign certain ecclesiastical tasks, rights, duties and powers to laymen by which the latter would cease to belong to the lay state, in accordance with what has been said above, as for instance by ordination to the priesthood. It will, however, always be possible to state in such cases – and it must already be stated at this point – that the Church can give an assignment of such dimensions, which results in a change of the layman's specific situation, only with the free consent of the individual concerned. It is true that by virtue of her pastoral office the Church can impose certain tasks and duties (together with any rights which may be involved) on the layman, even by a unilateral decision, but this possibility is not unlimited. It may not be absolutely determined in its extent, and may vary to a certain degree, according to the conditions of culture, the circumstances of the times, etc.; but it has undoubtedly an intrinsic limit beyond which the Church authorities may not go by a *uni*lateral act. This already follows clearly, for example, from CIC can. 971 and can. 214 § 1, which declare a forced ordination to be immoral and without any of its purely canonical effects on the ordained. It is certainly not a question here merely of an ordinance by positive law, but it is ultimately a matter of natural law which applies not only to third parties but also [328] to the Church herself. Thus, if the Church on her part were to confide such tasks and duties to a layman in the service of her mission by a unilateral decision and as a permanent measure, so that it would have to be said that such a person had essentially been deprived of his intra-mundane state without his voluntary act (whether with or without ordination), then such a commitment of a layman by the Church would be immoral and without effect. It at once follows from this that the Church cannot charge a layman, of her own initiative, with collaboration in the tasks of the hierarchy to any extent she cares to choose. It is also impossible to determine the limits of this possibility simply and solely by reference to the needs of the Church's apostolate. For there are needs and obligations which must be borne collectively, without it being possible to come to a binding conclusion from this as to the obligation of any particular individual; it must surely be supposed that God, in his providence, will also provide for these needs in the measure really willed by him, without imposing an express moral obligation on the individual qua individual. The human race, for example, 'must' be propagated. But in the nature of things, nothing at all really follows from this as to the individual's duty to marry. Similarly, the Church 'must' have priests. But this premise, as such, and on its own, in no way implies the consequence for the individual that he must become a priest. The Church also, cannot impose this obligation on him of her own initiative, however urgent her needs and great her lack of priests may be. The same would consequently apply also to similar duties which might be imposed on a layman because allegedly the Church would otherwise be unable to fulfil her responsibilities. If such obligations (e.g. of always handing over half of his income) were to imply an essential change in his lay station in the world, the Church cannot iure humano impose them on him by a unilateral decision. The 'imposition on the layman' of the tasks of the Church by positive Canon Law has its intrinsic limits. Nothing, of course, is as yet decided thereby about any possibly existing moral obligation on the part of the layman to do more than he has done hitherto, whether by reason of the general principles of love of neighbour or as a result of a special divine vocation. We have merely contested the Church's moral right to impose and enforce such an obligation. The Church obviously, always has the right and indeed the duty to give general indications, to exhort, to describe a critical state of affairs and thus to canvass among, and appeal to, the ranks of the laity to provide those who will [329] assist her

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

hierarchy in the fulfilment of its obligations; she may appeal to them to do this by entering into the clerical or religious state or by taking upon themselves some other measure of Church work which, because it essentially modifies their very state in the world, cannot be imposed on them as a duty by the Church as such and by her unilateral ordinance; nor, therefore, can the Church deduce from general principles and in the form of a definitive and authoritative ecclesiastical decision that this measure of work is a duty hic et nunc and in this particular case. For the latter would objectively, and in practice, amount to the same as the former, which has already been proved to be beyond the competence of the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

A further point, connected with the present question, to which attention must also be drawn right away, is that current Canon Law does not give a great deal of legal determination to the tasks, rights, and duties of laymen which according to the divine law of the Church can basically be theirs without their ceasing to be laymen, and to the tasks and duties which they can morally be expected to fulfil and which can actually be imposed on them by human Canon Law. I venture to suggest that as long as this state of affairs persists, we will never have the kind of lay Catholic Action desired by us. Real responsibility and duty will only be accepted and borne where the law grants a certain realm of freedom (even though merely iure humano) for autonomous fulfilment of such duties and responsibilities. The laymen engaged in Catholic Action should not in every individual case be merely the executor of someone else's will (even though this be the will of a priest or a bishop), without any autonomy of his own which, even though always granted by the hierarchy alone, is also respected by the hierarchy in the individual case. In other words, there should be a more exactly established right of lay people in Catholic Action which protects the layman even vis-à-vis the hierarchy. As long as this is not the case, we will wait in vain for a Catholic Action, a direct cooperation with the clergy and the hierarchy, in which others take part besides young idealists and 'pious old busybodies' or those in whose case the suggested difficulty has been overcome by the fact that there happens to exist a relationship of personal friendship and trust between them and the Church authorities concerned. It cannot be expected that such a right of the layman will in the first instance be promulgated by Rome as applicable everywhere in the world. Conditions throughout the world are too varied for this. Could it not, however, originate [330] carefully, but also courageously, in individual dioceses and countries? Only once he knows what he is actually permitted to do in the Church iure humano, will the layman assume duties seriously.

5. Everything mentioned so far has been intended merely as a positive and negative clarification of what is meant by 'layman', in preparation for the treatment of the lay apostolate. The following are the salient points to be kept in mind. The lay state in the proper sense ceases whenever there is real and habitual participation in the powers of the hierarchy in such a way that the exercise of these powers characterizes the life of such a person, i.e. determines his station (in life). It is theologically indifferent in this connection whether in the actual practice of the Church these powers are given by ordination or are (or can be) bestowed without it. This is merely the reverse side of the fact that the layman has his place-and-station-in-the-world which is his permanent 'domicile' as a Christian, and one which is characteristic of him as a Christian, as well as providing the material, and setting the limit for his Christian existence, in so far as the latter is distinguished from that of the cleric.

II. THE APOSTOLATE IN GENERAL

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

1. By virtue of divine right and institution by Christ, there are hierarchical and non-hierarchical functions in the Church, those who have hierarchical functions and the people. The hierarchical ministry is exercised in the Church and for the Church; as far as its purpose and meaning are concerned, it has been designed entirely with a view to the Church and as a function of service to the Church which is the communion of all believers. Yet, as regards its existence and the extent of its powers, it does not come from the Church, but from Christ; it represents, in the Church, Christ's position as Lord in relation to the people of the Church. The same holds good both for the hierarchical ministry in itself and for those empowered to exercise hierarchical functions. No matter how much the whole Church (including the laity) has cooperated in finding suitable candidates for the hierarchical ministry, it is through those who possess hierarchical powers, and through them alone, that the hierarchical ministry and its powers are [331] transmitted, in the name of Christ and not in the name of the Church in so far as she is distinguishable from the members of the hierarchy.

2. The hierarchical ministry has, therefore, powers in which the layman cannot participate in any way, unless he becomes himself (in the manner just described) a holder of hierarchical functions and thus ceases to be a layman. The teaching and discipline of the Church show that she is conscious of her absolute power of being able to divide the fullness of her hierarchical ministry according to its individual functions and to make divisions even within a single function, and thus to make others share in this ministry in different degrees. But this in no way alters the fact that everyone who shares in her official ministry ceases to be a layman in the theological sense. Now the hierarchical office, considered in its aspect of full power, gives a most specific commission and a most definite mission. For this mission, with its own purposes, is the highest characteristic of that office. Particular persons have this office with these powers, because a definite purpose is to be achieved by possessing this office with these powers. This mission is the apostolate peculiar to the hierarchical ministry in the Church. It follows then that there is an apostolate in the Church which can be exercised only by hierarchical functions and their powers. It is impossible, and would be absolutely self-contradictory, for the laity to participate in this apostolate; to insist nevertheless on speaking of it, would be unenlightened and airy-fairy talk, merely appearing to be pious. To put it in another way: participation in the hierarchical apostolate, in the strict and precise sense of 'participation', can only mean the reception of part of the hierarchical office and hence also of the apostolate and mission included in this office – in other words, ceasing to be a layman. If the term 'participation' is not to be used in this sense, but rather in a vague sense, then it can mean two things: (a) the 'participator' is a 'subsidiary worker' of some sort in the actual carrying out of the hierarchical apostolate (in modern terms, the bishop's chauffeur, for instance, the girl employed in the office dealing with Church funds, the housekeeper in a parish house). It is obvious that such a meaning does not realize the content and dignity of the proper lay apostolate. Or (b) it means that the apostolate of the hierarchy and the lay apostolate meet in the same object, i.e. the [332] particular people served by both (even though they have quite different starting-points and are achieved in essentially different ways), and that both of them have the same ultimate goal in view with regard to the same people, viz. their salvation. This is of course true and does happen. This fact alone does not, however, make the lay apostolate a proper 'participation' in the hierarchical apostolate. For it is logically incorrect to regard something as a participation in something else merely because both of them agree in certain of their characteristics. And the fact that the lay apostolate falls in a certain sense and to a certain extent under the supervision and direction of the hierarchy and its apostolate does not alter the case. After all, this fact does not 'constitute' the lay apostolate in the first instance. For the real lay apostolate is already constituted – as will be explained more in detail – by baptism (and confirmation), by membership in the Church and by the motive force communicated to the member by the infused habit of supernatural love. If in a particular case an apostolate must first be constituted by an individual mandate given by the ecclesiastical hierarchy, it can only be because the hierarchy is drawing upon an auxiliary force for the actual accomplishment of her own permanent task, or because it gives proper participation in her mission and powers. There is no conceivable reason or necessity for giving an individual mandate apart from these two cases. In both it is no longer a question of any real lay apostolate, since the first represents less and the second more than it. In short, there is an untransferable apostolate of the hierarchy which must not be confused with the lay apostolate. We call the former apostolate – in an attempt at clear terminology – the 'official apostolic mission'. Hence we may say that the official apostolic mission is not a lay apostolate. Where the layman arrogates such a mission to himself, or really receives it, he ceases to be a lay person, if it is given to him even though without ordination as constituting a permanent state. This statement, of course, merely provides us with a first formal distinction which in content and objectively does not yet tell us anything very enlightening about the reality signified. For the question arises as to what element of transmitted power is contained in the concrete in this official apostolic mission. For if there, nevertheless, is an apostolate of the laity (which no one seriously denies), then it is reasonable to suppose right away that both apostolates have certain generic traits and constituent elements in common. The important thing, therefore, is to ascertain which constituent elements are reserved and proper to [333] the official apostolic mission as against the apostolate of the laity, and how we may in contrast to this characterize the apostolate of the layman as such.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Now, the official apostolic mission (or better, the 'office' of apostolic mission, since it is not merely a question of a mission given by an official order but of a mission constituting an office and one which is to be exercised as an office) might be characterized by simply enumerating those apostolic actions and powers which undoubtedly identify someone who does and can do these things, as a non-lay person, i.e. as someone belonging in some (perhaps humble) degree to the hierarchy of God's people of the Church; thus, sacramental absolution, transubstantiation, power to confirm, to anoint the sick and to ordain, the power to teach independently and authoritatively as invested in bishops and the Pope, the right to make Church laws in the real sense etc. Yet this method is insufficient. For it does not give the basic notion and structure of the non-lay apostolate common to all these functions. Nor is it capable of shedding any light on the question where it is most needed, viz. on the border-line cases in which the hierarchical apostolate seems to become very lay and the lay apostolate very clerical, and where we are not quite certain, therefore, whether these are unavoidable 'transitions' or dangerous 'encroachments'. To get a clear view of that basic structure,[1] we must remind the reader once more of what we said above. There is in the Church, considered as the holy union of the redeemed in a visible society juridically ordered by Christ himself, a power of directing, a pastoral office, which extends in its functions into the various dimensions belonging to the nature of the Church which is the visible presence of the truth, of sanctification and of the will of Christ. This office has been transmitted by Christ to certain men, to the exclusion of the many others who are also members of the Church, and these men pass it on in the same exclusiveness by apostolic succession. It is an office constituted by the mission and power to christianize individuals and peoples, and then to maintain their Christianity permanently, and to direct the community of Christian existence, as such, as a

[1] Cf. for what follows: K. Rahner, 'Priesterliche Existenz', Zeitschrift für Aszetik und Mystik XVII (1942), pp. 155-171.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

community of truth, [334] of the new and eternal worship, and of sanctity. As is already clear from Scripture, the bearers of this office are already clearly stamped by Christ in two respects: they are those, from the viewpoint of their origin, who have been taken out of their original place-in-the-world; they must give up their jobs; they leave their nets, their kinsfolk and family, they live by the altar; they take their mission as their calling, even regarded from an empirical, intramundane point of view. Their mission, having become vocational and proper to their state, may, and indeed must, realize itself as the characteristic form of their earthly life: in their dress, their poverty, their non-stability etc. It is quite irrelevant to this how far all these factors can assert themselves in detail, in the life of the individual bearer of the office. They may take the most varied forms and have (as they have had) different degrees of intensity and clearness. Nor does it mean that the clergy will always be de facto a sociological 'state' and 'calling' in a profane, civil sense, as it actually is and has been for the last fifteen hundred years in the West. It is sufficient if we see that there is a fundamental 'form' which is given, together with the office and mission, and which takes hold of the office-bearer; this 'form' removes him basically from his original place-and-state-in-the-world, and is intended to integrate his whole life into his mission, so that he carries it out, not only in his life, but through his life, through the distinct characteristic of his life and the way he uses it. This official apostolic mission claims the whole existence of man, in such a way that it shifts him from his original station in life. From the viewpoint of its destination, this official apostolic mission sends a man away; it sends the messenger into spaces and dimensions of human existence which are not his proper place, before 'kings' and the 'Gentiles'; his message must be delivered even 'out of season'. Although such an apostolate demands committal of the messenger's whole existence, it at the same time surpasses fundamentally the person of the messenger: he does not bear witness to 'his' Christian-ness (although using it as an instrument), but bears witness to Christ alone; he is not the religious genius who overflows, but the messenger who delivers a message. He bears witness to Christ, not where he would stand by virtue of his own worldly existence, or where in the world this existence takes place of its very nature – but always and everywhere; in other words, particularly where of himself he 'has no business', where he has been sent 'from above' and not where he has been placed by his own human existence. He must always, therefore, [335] put up with the unavoidable fact of being mistaken for an indelicate fanatic who interferes in other people's 'private business' and of thus arousing anti-clerical feelings. His new station can be justified only by faith. It is generally understood, of course, that everybody has the inclination and the right to make known and to communicate his opinions. The content of a profession of Christian belief, made and conceived in this way and limited to such a situation, would perhaps surprise and seem offensive to an unbeliever, but not the actual happening of such a profession. The apostolate of one officially sent, however, does more; it does not merely communicate, and is not merely an apostolate, as it were, arising from the already given human fact of 'rubbing shoulders' with the people concerned, an apostolate 'on the spot'; it is aggressive, the apostolate of the 'itinerant preacher', of the 'traveller' going from door to door, concerned with the 'places where we still have to go' (in a spatial and especially spiritual sense). No wonder that such an apostolate at its summit, i.e. in the priesthood, demands the grace of a sacrament of its own.

Let us recapitulate. An official apostolic mission exists wherever there is any degree of habitual exercise of hierarchical powers (of the potestas ordinis or iurisdictionis); this is the case when that exercise provides the basis for a new existence; in other words, when it suppresses the apostle's original station in the world – his human, pre-Christian existential situation (at least in part) – and founds a new state and calling, with a new place in the world for the apostle and his own life, allocated to him by his very mission.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

4. Hence we may say conversely, and at first negatively: wherever such an official apostolic sending-out is not given and there is nevertheless a genuine apostolate, i.e. a justified influence on others for their salvation, we are dealing with the apostolate of the layman, an apostolate which is still to be determined in its positive nature.

5. This definition of the hierarchical apostolate and the negative distinction of the lay apostolate included in it, can be applied only with care in practice and leaves still much to be desired as regards its clarity in border-line cases. Yet it is not without significance even in the practical sphere. As we have already pointed out, no one without free [336] consent on his own part can be obliged by the Church to accept a share in an hierarchical apostolate. We are now in a position to add, that if one were to bring pressure to bear on a lay person to make him accept an apostolate characterized, as we have seen, by a being-sent-out and a being-removed-from his original place-in-the-world, and to accept it as a duty imposed on him on account of the 'requirements' of the Church, one would do something which one has no right to do. This fact is already no longer mere theory. It might be asked from this point of view whether, for instance, the apostolate of the Legion of Mary with its (in itself wonderful) aggressiveness and intensity (which already turns it almost into a vocation), can still be called that kind of lay apostolate which belongs to the duties of every Christian flowing from baptism and charity. Or does such an apostolate already verge very closely on the hierarchical apostolate? Is it the on-the-spot apostolate of neighbourhood (like the lay apostolate) or is it an apostolate constituted by a sending-out, away from one's own original place-in-the-world (like the apostolate of the hierarchy)? And conversely, our reflections show that many forms of apostolate which we are inclined to regard as lay apostolate, turn out to be an apostolate of hierarchical mission. It is, for instance, impossible to regard the life and work of Maria Theresa Ledochowska (1863-1922), the foundress and directress of the Sodality of St Peter Claver and one of the chief supporters of our modern missionary movement, as still a lay apostolate. Is a 'layman', whose profession it is to administer Church finances and who does so with a sense of his responsibility in the religious sphere, a 'lay apostle'? What is the position of a 'lay' teacher whose main employment is teaching in a junior clerical seminary? Such and similar questions are not merely questions of an idle categorization which does not change anything in reality. These are questions which may be basic for deciding about the obligatory nature of an apostolate, as well as basic for the ideal and spiritual foundation of such an apostolate, the formation required for it and the aptitudes for such a calling. It must first of all become clear that 'someone properly entrusted with an hierarchical apostolate by official mission' and 'someone ordained with a vow of celibacy' are not identical notions. It will then be possible to dispel the instinctive feeling which often has very bad effects in practice in the way the clergy treat 'laymen' employed in the service of the Church, viz. the opinion that such non-ordained laymen, by the mere fact of their not [337] being ordained, cannot also be charged with a hierarchical apostolate in a legally well-defined sphere of activity within which and for which they are truly responsible, but must inevitably be merely subordinate employees and handy men who by law itself must always take second place to any 'ecclesiastic'. Furthermore, there could then take place a gradual reawakening of the sense of the 'sanctity' of all official functions which in fact belong to this hierarchical apostolate; it might then become a living question once more whether this sanctity might not also be made visible again in every case, as in the early Church, by ordination transmitting such an official function. When the question of married deacons came up recently at a sacerdotal congress in Berlin, it was not a proposal to slacken clerical celibacy. Basically it is rather a question of reconstituting the diaconate itself as an hierarchical ministry with its own

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sphere of responsibilities and apostolic labours (which it no longer has in fact), and of handing over these apostolic responsibilities by ordination. Once we come to look upon this office as a permanent state in its own right and not merely as a 'step towards the priesthood', there would be no reason for thinking that it must necessarily be fulfilled by celibates, and yet it would be a grade in the hierarchical apostolate and not of the 'lay apostolate'. If there were such grades of hierarchical apostolate – transmitted with or without ordination but clearly, officially constituted as ministries and without celibacy, with their own dignity and rank, and with their own sphere of activity – it would perhaps be much easier to avoid demanding too much of the layman proper and his apostolate. A tree grows and thrives only when it has been planted in its natural habitat. There are many tasks in the realm of the Church's apostolate as a whole which cannot be fulfilled on the plane of the lay apostolate; it would be necessary rather to create a new theological, psychological and legal sphere for them, on the level of the hierarchical apostolate.

From what has been said, it can also be seen that the transition from one of these apostolates to the other is quite fluid in practical life. This is not surprising when we remember that it is not easy to distinguish, even merely in general, between the calling, the goal towards which the calling tends and the beneficial side-effects produced by it, or between the main occupation and that pursued 'on the side', between the temporary and the permanent, between a specific and an accidental change of situation. Thus it can also happen that in a particular situation the lay apostolate may be much more intensive and comprehensive [338] in its final effect than an hierarchical apostolate. It may be that the hierarchical apostolate gives very much the impression in the concrete of being occupied merely with the administration of what is already established, and of being preoccupied with keeping the established machinery running, whereas the lay apostolate (especially in the case of charismatic impulses) gives the impression of aggressive conquest, discovery and original missionary spirit. Yet none of this can alter the essential fact that the hierarchical apostolate is the apostolic mission constituting the office in virtue of which the apostle is sent out; the lay apostolate – when it remains true to what distinguishes it from the hierarchical apostolate – is, as will be shown more clearly still in what follows, the apostolate of man in his original place-in-the-world.

6. One of the consequences of what we have seen must be emphasized once more, both in general and in particular. The organizational staff of Catholic Action, composed of men who more or less give their whole time to this work, is not part of the lay apostolate, but a concrete form of organization of the hierarchical apostolate for the purpose of stimulating the apostolate of laymen. This is not the same thing. The hierarchical apostolate does not become a lay apostolate merely because non-ordained and married leaders form part of this organ of the hierarchy. This fact alters nothing regarding the hierarchical character of this administrative authority. It is merely a consequence of the realization that there is a shortage of priests and that people who come from the lay state in their more mature years and married, are fitted for certain tasks of the hierarchical apostolate; this situation will continue, particularly as long as the ordained clergy remain, sociologically speaking, a sort of caste in this country (i.e. the author's) and hence find it still rather difficult to establish contact with certain circles and strata of society. And since it is in the nature of 'Catholic Action' to be an organization for setting the action of Catholic laymen in motion, it follows also that the exact proportion of priests and laymen directing this organization is purely a question of using the most suitable means to the end and not a question of principle. Neither the priests nor the non-priests engaged in this work are 'laymen'. In consequence, it is also difficult to see why the non-priests in 'Catholic Action' must necessarily be inferior in rank to the priests (de iure or de facto). It would be quite a good thing if there were men today who [339] could play the same role in the Church as, in days gone by, did Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Didymus the Blind, Catherine of Sienna, Karl Löwenstein and M. Th. Ledochowska, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

III. THE LAY APOSTOLATE

1. It should be clear already from the foregoing that the real lay apostolate is what we nowadays like to call 'action of Catholics' in contrast to 'Catholic Action'. Bearing in mind what has been said above about the notion of 'layman', and just now about the hierarchical apostolate of the official apostolic mission, the nature of the lay apostolate might be circumscribed as follows: it is the kind of concern for the salvation of others incumbent on every baptized Christian by the duty of love of neighbour and through the force of this love in the place in the world which belongs to him, without participating in the hierarchical ministry and its apostolate. It is not the apostolate constituted by the official and vocational sending-out, but the apostolate of love in the situation-in-the-world in which the layman finds himself and which belongs to the nature of a layman. Every Christian has been given the right and duty by baptism and confirmation, without any further commission, to bear witness to his Faith and even to concern himself with the salvation of his neighbour. It is quite possible, that by doing this, he may in actual fact do more for the spread of the Faith, and instruction in the Faith and moral formation, than the hierarchical apostolate of the Church (as happened, for instance, in the early Church or during less formalistic ages than ours). Yet when he acts as an apostle, he bears witness to his faith and by it naturally to Christ himself). This is true when he defends himself against attacks on his Christian existence. It is also true when, and in so far as, his existence in the world (i.e. his family life, friendships, life with neighbours and in civil society, and his occupation) makes such active witness to his own faith necessary, obligatory and unavoidable, since the Christian layman must obviously 'declare' himself in all these situations for what he really is, viz. a Christian. The apostolate of the layman is, therefore, directly founded on his own Christian being, and is not determined in its extent and manner by a proper mission from above, but from below, i.e. by his situation in the world. His Christian influence is conducted through his worldly 'connections', and is not specially constituted by an additional mission and [340] mandate. He does not go out (in a spatial or spiritual sense), but works 'on the spot'. He is a missionary by the living example of his Christianity. Naturally, this life considered as a productive example includes also the Word, testimony and exhortation given by one man to another, encouragement and warning. Yet all this is legitimized and supported by the fact that the Christian lives from the start in the same spatial and spiritual sphere of human existence as does the one towards whom he is an apostle.

2. Such a lay apostolate is obligatory for the Christian. It flows from his Christian being and from the duty and strength of that supernatural love of neighbour which commands and enables the Christian not merely to regard others as his neighbours in the worldly sphere but also in the realm of salvation. Although such love of neighbour embraces all men, in the sense that it does not exclude anyone a priori and in principle from its proximity, it has a certain gradation by its very nature as a realistically-Christian and not abstractly-idealistic virtue: it begins nearest home, with the family, etc.; it favours those belonging to the household of the faith; in brief, its radiating power is permitted to remain rooted in its 'domicile', it is not sent-forth. This is not only its limitation but also its strength: it is an apostolate in the concreteness of the familiar milieu, heart to heart, in the reality of earthly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

life, in the concreteness of everyday happenings and not in abstract theory, by real living example and not in doctrinal, general norms, in demonstration of the power of grace within the prosaic context of everyday life.

3. Such an apostolate is therefore exercised essentially by the example given by the layman fulfilling his Christian role (proper to the layman as such) as a member of the Church, which consists in using the world qua world as the material for Christian existence, and redeeming and sanctifying it. In other words, science, art, medicine, politics, economics, work, marriage, etc. – in short, all the dimensions of human existence – although they all have a relative legality of their own, are an open challenge in the concrete order of salvation and damnation which can be answered in the concrete only by the Christian in the grace of God. If the Christian living in the world answers this challenge [341] by a life of patience, interior freedom, sincerity, perseverance, earnestness, etc. in these different spheres, then and in this way does he effectively exercise his lay apostolate.

4. If the lay apostolate as such is thus primarily the fulfilment of Christian existence in a place in the world with responsibility for one's neighbour and his salvation, and in so far as that fulfilment has a salvific significance for the other, then it follows that the lay apostolate must be exercised in all the situations which constitute the layman's place-in-the-world. First of all in marriage, as a father or mother, and in public life; these two dimensions of Christian existence are sanctified by the sacraments of matrimony and confirmation respectively. In addition there are the tasks and opportunities provided by the layman's neighbourhood, community of work and of country, citizenship, participation in the community of minds in science and art. In all these dimensions and tasks of human, and at the same time Christian, existence, the lay apostolate – it should be underlined once more – does not essentially consist in direct recruitment and propaganda, or in persuading, converting, warning and exhorting, etc., as is characteristic of an apostolic mission, but in the dynamic and effective example given to others by the layman's Christian living in these dimensions. This naturally does not mean that the Christian must be silent, is not allowed to speak of his Christ-life and must carry discretion to scrupulous extremes. No, a Christian may and ought to speak a Christian word wherever man normally does, may or ought to give expression to the inner motivations of his heart and life, i.e. wherever he gives a fraternal word of advice or instruction and, if necessary, a word pertaining to his responsibilities as a father or mother, teacher, master, or as one more mature. But the Christian has no apostolic duty beyond this. We need not be afraid that this represents too great a restriction of the realm of the lay apostolate. This realm, even understood in this way, is still infinitely wide. The lay apostle is not restrained by this as far as the goal and object of his apostolate are concerned, but only as regards a certain way of achieving them for which he is not suited. Any priest who has experienced the suffering caused by the 'inopportuneness' of his aggressive apostolate, will understand what we mean. If lay people would cultivate this apparently 'limited' field of their apostolate to the full, then the world would be Christian within half a [342] century. This theory naturally does not mean either that the Christian layman may be apostolic only in the 'private' sphere of his life. Since every Christian is a human being, and thus has his original place-in-the-world and hence is unavoidably involved in public life (even though with varying intensity), he has an apostolic task to fulfil even in his public life. But he must fulfil it in such a way that he occupies the very place in public life which he has as man (as citizen, scientist, artist, etc.) and also as what he really is, viz. a Christian. He is not, however, required to seek and gain a new place for himself in public life for the express purpose of carrying out the missionary task imposed on him. Not that he may not do this also, should he so desire. But if he does, then it is his own free and praiseworthy decision and not his apostolic duty necessarily imposed on him as a baptized Christian; also, whatever he does in this way, is not really a lay apostolate in the strict theological sense, but part of the hierarchical apostolate accepted with express or tacit approval of the hierarchy. This can happen 'per modum actus' (something like 'managing a business without a mandate') or 'per modum habitus', i.e. as a vocation and principal function, and then the person concerned is not indeed 'ordained' but no longer a layman either.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. It is of the highest importance to understand the above clearly, for only then do we have a clear idea of the goal towards which any apostolic formation of the layman must be directed. Once this is clear, it immediately becomes clear also that any education for the lay apostolate is senseless from the very start without education for a holy interior Christian life. Drilling, with a view of training an aggressive militant of the 'Salvation Army' type, is not a Catholic schooling for the lay apostolate, but could at best be training of subordinate functionaries for the hierarchical apostolate. A functionary of hierarchical apostolate (ordained or not) can more easily forgo personal fullness of Christian life than a lay apostle. For the former has something which is effective without personal sanctity, viz. sacramental or juridical powers. A layman, on the other hand, must be apostolic precisely by his Christian life; his Christian life itself must be the testimony which wins souls for Christianity; actions and words enter into this merely in so far as they themselves form part of man's own action in his human existence. In other words, formation of lay [343] apostles is formation of the action of Catholics, not formation for Catholic Action; and education for the action of Catholics is formation for that true and full Christianity which is necessarily dynamic. Religious associations of lay people under the direction of the Church ought to reflect well on this. There naturally is also 'education for Catholic Action'; but objectively this is a recruitment of lay people for participation in the hierarchical apostolate of the clergy by which, if this participation becomes a vocation and alters his station in the world, the layman ceases to be a layman. We naturally do not mean to dispute that a layman may also participate in the hierarchical apostolate of the Church to a small extent only or per modum actus without ceasing thereby to be a layman. But then it will be in a way analogous to the case of the layman who on a particular occasion replaces the subdeacon at High Mass: what he does in this case is not the business of the layman in principle and habitually, although he does perform this function here and now and may even, in case of necessity, be invited and summoned to perform it. Catholic Action is, therefore, in no way forbidden by what has been said to recruit lay people to help the parish priest, notify him about the sick and the dying, etc. Such activities are not only good and useful; they are not merely an apostolate which deserves great credit and is often exercised in an admirable manner; but it may even from a human point of view be a recommendable complement in the life of a Christian layman who in effect is not 'fulfilled' by his worldly profession (and the opportunities for the lay apostolate offered by it), which is very often the case especially nowadays.

6. The layman's tasks and hence also, if you wish, his apostolate naturally include also all those factors which result from his relation towards the Church and 'within' the Church. He pays his Church dues and thus supports also the hierarchical apostolate. He takes part in divine service and thus shares in the 'edification'[2] which all members give to each other in

[2] Cf. H. Schlier, Die Verkündigung im Gottesdienst der Kirche (Cologne 1953).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spirit by divine service, for even these lay people are not merely passive recipients of a grace of truth, love and strength communicated by the clergy alone. He is a godparent, member of Church Committees, etc.

[344] 7. The layman can possess charisms in the narrower sense, which are continually bestowed on his Church by the Holy Ghost. But we have already spoken about the most essential aspects of this, so that we do not need to say any more here about this possibility of the lay apostolate.

8. A further consequence of what has been said is to be found in a clear distinction of two kinds of 'ecclesiastical' (in the widest sense) organizations of the laity, their formation, the sources of their authority and of the influence exerted on them by the hierarchy of the Church.

a. Firstly, there are Church organizations in the proper and strict sense of the word. These are organizations created by the ecclesiastical hierarchy itself for the accomplishment of its own apostolic tasks. The Church's hierarchy creates such organizations by recruiting laymen on a voluntary basis who put themselves at her disposal for the accomplishment of these tasks; this they do either by opening themselves to the sanctifying action of the Church in a more than generally obligatory measure, or by being prepared to cooperate themselves in the apostolic mission of the hierarchy, or in both of these ways.

In the case of strictly ecclesiastical organizations existing for the purpose of cooperation by laymen in the task proper to the hierarchy, it can be a question either of cooperation by such non-ordained persons as their principal function (so that, as has already been underlined several times, they then cease to be laymen in the theological sense), or it may be a question of their putting their time and energy at the disposal of the hierarchy, but only to a limited extent (so that they then do not cease to be laymen) It depends on this distinction whether it makes sense to speak of a lay organization or not Cooperation which constitutes one's principal function, a vocation and a state, may involve an express or actual participation in the very powers of the hierarchy or not. If the former, then it would objectively be a case of a body of Church-officers who are lay merely in appearance; if the latter, then it would be a case of a body of subaltern Church employees. All properly speaking ecclesiastical organizations, being organizations concerned with the object (personal sanctification) or the subjects (those engaged in the apostolate) of the truly hierarchical activity of the Church, take their origin de iure and by nature from a direct [345] initiative of the hierarchy. They are founded by the Church. They also essentially depend in their activity on the hierarchy and its direct and positive, directing and commanding influence. In consequence, they necessarily are de iure under spiritual direction with authoritative powers. They do what the hierarchical Church tells them to do; and conversely, whatever they do is a manifestation of the Church as such, part of the life of the Church as such, i.e. not merely Christian Church life in the world, but the Church herself. Such ecclesiastical organizations in the strict sense are, for instance, the Third Orders, the Marian congregations, fraternities (in the strict, specifically religious sense), associations for the support of the Missions, etc. No matter how much they direct their members to the lay apostolate, they themselves do not constitute a lay aspostolate as such but are particular forms of organizations of the hierarchical apostolate enabling the latter to exercise its functions towards the laity (by forming a personal and apostolic Christianity in these lay people) or to be supported by laymen in the fulfilment of some particular task of the hierarchical apostolate as such.

b. Secondly, there are organizations of the laity as such by means of which the laity seek to further their Christian life as laymen. We are thinking here of student associations, federations of youth groups, unions of university men, etc. Such organizations are characterized, on the one hand, by the fact that their primary and immediate objective aim is not the religious[3] as such, but has a profane, civic, mundane, cultural, human content (or whatever name we wish to give to the difference from what is formally and strictly religious as such). On the other hand, such Catholic, 'temporal' lay organizations are characterized by the fact that they recognize the 'temporal' as a sphere for Christian action, a task which is of basic relevance for eternal salvation, is subject to God's commandments and is a commission given them by God in such a way that it cannot be determined in its ultimate concreteness and precise details simply by the hierarchy alone, and merely with the help of the general principles confided to [346] the teaching and safekeeping of the hierarchy.[4] Hence the layman has in this sector of the 'temporal' been given a Christian task in which he possesses real independence, and leads these organizations himself. The priest can only be an 'assistant', 'adviser' and, if necessary, a pastor in this field. In other words, the priest can only use these groups as the sociological basis for the fulfilment of his own task.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is understandable that in practice the transition between properly ecclesiastical organizations and Catholic-Christian temporal organizations can be rather fluid. It may even happen that one and the same organization, regarded sociologically and theologically, realizes both the first and the second type of organization, because it objectively seeks two completely different ends simultaneously. And yet it is basically necessary to recognize this distinction with all its consequences.

9. Let us try to clarify the preceding statements by indicating their consequences for 'Catholic Action'. Thus:

a. Catholic Action is the organization intended to form and school Christians for their apostolic task in the world, in marriage, at their work, in the public life of community and of the State, in the realm of culture. The object of this schooling is the laity, the subject is the clergy and those laymen who assist them in this their task (cf. (c)).

b. Catholic Action is an organization for the purpose of safeguarding the rights of the Church in public life, a task which is practically indispensable in the age of mass-democracy.

c. Catholic Action is an organization of lay people (not simply: of the whole laity), constituted for the purpose of assisting the clergy in its apostolic task, in the measure possible to the layman without his ceasing to be a layman. It can be part of this task of the layman to see to it that the first two aims of Catholic Action just mentioned are really fulfilled, by forming an 'elite of militants' or a 'pool of leaders'.

In so far as the first two purposes are concerned, Catholic Action seeks by the very nature of these aims to form and school as many Catholics as possible. With regard to its third purpose, Catholic Action is neither simply an obligation incumbent on every good Christian, nor a task for which we can hope in practice to win every Christian, [347] much less be obliged to do so. The first task mentioned above is undoubtedly also the task of every particular Christian organization (congregations, Christian vocational associations, etc.). It follows, therefore, that Catholic Action can in part play only a subsidiary role with regard to this task (i.e. try to reach and school those for their Christian ministry in the world who for some reason or other would otherwise not belong to any other Christian organization), and

[3] For it will have to be said that a religious fellowship, whose immediate and main purpose is a religious one (such as prayer, divine service, religious formation, practice of the Evangelical Counsels, etc.), can be nothing other among Catholics than an ecclesiastical organization in the sense of a). For such a fellowship can be justified only as a function of the whole Church, and that also in her visible, hierarchic dimension.
[4] Cf. above, the essays on a formal existential ethics and on the parochial principle.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

for the rest be merely a 'blanket-organization' coordinating these other organizations for this same (first) purpose shared by them all. In practice, Catholic Action will also have to be such a coordinating blanket-organization, joining the many other organizations together, it order to achieve its second purpose, even if only to avoid any unnecessary bureaucracy and so to attain as many Catholics for its second purpose as possible. Only in this way will it be possible for it, for example, to effect a 'plebiscite', a mass petition, a school-strike, etc. From the point of view of the first two purposes, therefore, Catholic Action cannot in any sense renounce being a blanket-organization. This naturally does not in any way prejudge the question as to the possible and desirable constitution of this blanket-organization in relation to particular associations, congregations, etc. By 'blanket-organization' we mean here merely that Catholic Action embraces groups which are autonomous in themselves and which are not merely dependent functions of an organization (called 'Catholic Action') instituted from above, nor merely its subaltern ramifications. Such a conception would mean a violation of the historical rights of these groups (which existed before Catholic Action understood as an organization), a violation of the principle of subsidiary functions (which is valid even in the Church), and a violation of the right to free association. Such an ecclesiastical 'State Socialism' would inevitably choke the life of the Church eventually, no matter how clear and ordered its forms might seem at first.

And so we must come to the conclusion that Catholic Action as such cannot be the organization of the apostolate of the laity as such, and that Catholic Action and action of Catholics do not coincide. They do not coincide because it is absolutely impossible that what is called Catholic Action[5] in the concrete should penetrate to the place [348] where the apostolate of the laity is exercised, viz. in the family, by one's occupation and in one's work in the concrete. Catholic Action can form and educate for this Christian life in temporal situations (which imposes an apostolic and missionary task and responsibility), but, because certain aspects of this life cannot be organized at all, e.g. the task of the father in his family, it cannot itself take charge of this life. Other sectors can be organized, e.g. the Christian organization of an actual industrial concern, where several laymen can coordinate the carrying out of their proper lay and yet Christian task by common deliberations, mutual aid, etc. But such organizations arise then in the nature of things from below, from the temporal situation; they are organizations dependent on the inalienable decision of the lay people themselves, for which as such the Church therefore cannot take over responsibility, as she does with regard to what is called Catholic Action. It follows that such organizations of the proper lay apostolate cannot really form part of Catholic Action in the proper sense, in so far as the latter is more than a blanket-organization which as such does not interfere in the 'private business' of its member organizations and which therefore is also not responsible for it.

IV. THE IMPORTANCE OF THE LAY APOSTOLATE AND FINAL SUMMARIZING REMARKS

1. We do not need to add much to what has already been said here about the importance of the lay apostolate, as understood by us. We will therefore content ourselves with making two remarks, one positive and the other negative.

[5] In so far as it is not a 'blanket-organization' and in so far as we can apply to it what must be attributed to the groups organized by it. If such a group is really an apostolate of laymen (as, for instance, a students' union, a vocational organization, a Catholic workers' union), i.e. action of Catholics, then it is of course possible from this point of view to ascribe the proper apostolate of the laity to Catholic Action – if these groups belong to Catholic Action.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a. The mission of the Church has encountered a special difficulty in the post-medieval period and particularly today when, the modern age having passed away, a new age is dawning. This difficulty consists in the fact that the non-religious spheres of man's existence have today become much more closely knit, full, complicated and capable of [349] absorbing man's interest than in past ages. We need only ask ourselves quite simply about the situation in general: what could interest and absorb man spiritually in the past, over and above the satisfaction of the most immediate requirements of life? The answer must be: on the whole, only religious questions of human existence. For besides this there was nothing. Anything else was (like art and science) itself a moment of the religious question. When we pose the same question for the man of today, we must answer: apart from the religious, there are innumerable other factors calling for his interest and attention. These new realizations of human existence (such as the profane sciences, art, technology, politics, a highly complicated economy, etc.) must themselves be mastered by man in new ways; they demand an original response from Christian experience, a response of such a kind as to prevent the religious and Christian element in these new realizations being covered over and being crushed by the weight of the nonreligious. Only the layman can do this, in the last analysis, not the priest. A priest, in virtue of his very vocation, cannot have the same full and original relationship to these dimensions of human existence as the layman; such a relationship is an indispensable condition for making the best possible use of these opportunities given to man. The layman, and he alone, as we have tried to bring out, is given the mandate and is enabled to do this precisely by the lay apostolate. Thus the new (contemporary) situation has brought out a completely new significance of the lay apostolate which it did not possess before in this respect. For in a completely new historical sense, the 'world' has, really only now, begun to exist, i.e. the world which man himself has brought forth out of Nature; ultimately, this world can be christianized only by the one who has fashioned it, viz. the layman. The task of the priest does not become any less urgent, irreplaceable and holy on this account. The priesthood holds the sacred reality and administers the sources of all that the layman has to introduce into his world. It has the ever recurring task of forming men into Christians who must in turn fulfil their Christian mission in the world. The priest and the Religious are meant at all times to be a tangible sign in the world, by their celibacy and the other Evangelical Counsels, of the fact that the Christian is in the world but not of the world, that all fidelity to earth and man signifies eternal life only once it becomes suffused and transformed by the grace which comes from beyond the world. Layman and priest are not in competition as regards their [350] apostolic, missionary task. Each has his own place which no one else can fill. Yet in as far as every man lives in his own world and no longer merely in the world created by God alone, the lay apostolate has taken on a new and irreplaceable significance.

b. Everything which is not lay apostolate in this sense (hence all Catholic Action), can and will nevertheless have a great importance of its own. But we must realise that everything else is important only in so far as it serves to stimulate, educate, coordinate, etc. the action of Catholic laymen. Catholic Action, taken as a whole, will in practice only be effective on and through the action of Catholics. It follows from this that every organization, and all organizational machinery, which is superfluous viewed in this light, is really superfluous, indeed harmful, because it ties up the energies of priests and laymen in the wrong place. In brief, the nature and extent of the significance of Catholic Action depends on the significance of the action of Catholics.

2. If we may be permitted finally to refer once more to a few important points which have been discussed in the course of these reflections and which may not always have been self-evident for everyone in the past, we would recall the following:

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a. Serious thought should be given – slowly but courageously – to the question of whether and how the law regarding laymen could be further developed (at least in the form of diocesan, particular laws). First of all, with regard to laymen who are engaged full-time in the governing bodies of Catholic Action. I have not been inspired in this by anyone else and am perhaps just constructing theories in my study. But it seems to me that in the long run we will have people of real greatness and initiative, men with ideas on these bodies, only when they are given a sector of activities, with its corresponding rights, for which they are themselves responsible and within which they enjoy real autonomy. If this be undesirable, then we should revert to the old methods which admitted only priests, together with housekeepers and sacristans (and possibly also auxiliaries taken from the ranks of the Religious), in the hierarchical apostolate. When we speak in this respect of a development of the law regarding lay people, we do not refer in the meantime (and perhaps not for a long time yet) to the drafting of laws with a multitude of paragraphs but, to begin with, only to the following: if someone is entrusted with a task, he should also be allowed to fulfil it. [351] It should be clear who is really competent for what. Higher authority should not intervene as soon as it disagrees in some vague way. In the normal case the responsibility and role of higher authority consists in putting the right man in the right place and then leaving him free to act. Any other attitude would be symptomatic of the Church being influenced by the totalitarian spirit of the age. Once relations between priests, bishops and laymen within the hierarchical apostolate are governed by the right outlook and attitude, and once this attitude takes ever deeper roots, it will perhaps be possible gradually to give a more precise legal formulation to everything involved in this; in this way we might then clarify the situation even where human limitations would otherwise prevent us from hitting on the right solution by mere improvisations. This applies also, mutatis mutandis, to the law concerning those laymen whose participation in the hierarchical apostolate by Catholic Action is not their principal function or their calling, but who are merely laymen. Their proper and essential apostolate in the world, in the place where they find themselves, does not permit of juridical formulation. Nevertheless, they have, or may have, certain tasks in and towards the Church which are not impossible even for a layman as such, since the tasks referred to are not their official function and calling, and do not change their situation in the world. We all want the layman to take a greater interest in many of the Church's concerns. He will do so once he sees that he is not merely expected to take an interest and share responsibility when it happens to suit the clergy, and that he does not need to become paralysed in mute and respectful passivity whenever the clergy happens to find this more convenient. What we have just said about the basis of such a law, regarding those who direct Catholic Action, naturally applies with even greater force in this case. Consider one example alone: responsible and conscientious laymen who are editors of magazines, should not have to ask themselves, as apprehensively as is sometimes the case, whether the opinions expressed in their periodicals are agreeable to those in high places or not. It would be good if one or other of the leading articles in Wort und Wahrheit in the last few years had been taken seriously, calmly and soberly instead of being merely treated as that kind of journalism which is used for the sheer sake of assuming an air of importance and of attracting attention.

b. Let us not impose an apostolate on the layman to which he is not suited existentially and to which in general he is not called. To assume [352] such responsibilities may appear heroic and fruitful – for a time; after that such undertakings are swallowed up. Better to take the longer but more effective road: let us form laymen so that they may be Christians in the place where they are or should be – in the world. It is there that they must bear witness to Christ by their life. If they do this, then they are lay apostles.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

TRANSLATORS' NOTE

I wish to express my profound gratitude and sincere appreciation to Fr A. Monaghan for his great care in reading the manuscript and his many valuable suggestions. His continued help has been invaluable to me.

My sincere gratitude is also due to Mr W. Conway for his help in reading the proofs.

Karl-H. Kruger
St Andrew's College,
Drygrange

I wish to add my expression of profound gratitude and appreciation to Fr Raymund Mitchell, O.F.M., M.A., for his great assistance in reading the whole of the manuscript of that part of the work (Chapters 15-25) for whose translation I was responsible, and in making many most valuable suggestions. Likewise I wish to thank Fr Benjamin Sage, O.F.M., who read several of the chapters in manuscript and offered his own valuable suggestions.

I am also very grateful to Mrs Ellis, Royal Hospital School, Holbrook, and to Mrs N. A. M. Sniechowska and Miss J. F. Gregory, Ipswich, for coming to my assistance in the typing of the manuscript.

Boniface Kruger, O.F.M.
St Mary's Friary,
East Bergholt

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

AUTHOR'S PREFACE

As already announced in the Preface to the first volume of these Theological Investigations, the essays on the theology of the spiritual life were to follow in a separate volume. This we now present as the third volume of Theological Investigations. The author is very conscious of the fact that these essays are of very unequal value both as regards the subjects themselves and in the thoroughness of their treatment. Concerning the justification of the series as a whole, we would refer the reader to what has already been stated as reason for or in excuse of these volumes in our Preface to the first volume. All that remains, therefore, is to indicate the original sources of the pieces collected together in this volume. The list follows the sequence of this book. 'Reflections on the problem of the gradual ascent to Christian perfection', ZAM 19 (1944), 65-78; 'Thoughts on the theology of Christmas', Wort und Wahrheit 10 (1955), 887-893; 'The eternal significance of the humanity of Jesus for our relationship with God', GuL 26 (1953), 279-288; 'Reflections on the theology of Renunciation', Orientierung 17 (1953) 252-255 (= Tijdschrift voor geestelijk Leven 9 [1953] 480-497); 'The Passion and Asceticism', GuL 22 (1954), 15-36; 'Reflections on the experience of Grace', GuL 27 (1954) 460-462; 'The Church of the Saints', Stimmen der Zeit 157 (1955/56), 81-91; 'Some thoughts on "a good intention", GuL 28 (1955), 281-298; 'The dogma of the Immaculate Conception in our spiritual life', GuL 27 100-108; 'The comfort of time', Stimmen der Zeit 157 (1955/56), 241-255; 'The Eucharist and suffering', ZAM 11 (1936), 224-236; 'The renewal of priestly ordination', GuL 25 (1952), 231-234; 'The meaning of frequent confession of devotion', ZAM 9 (1934), 323-336; 'Problems concerning Confession', GuL 27 (1954) 435-446; 'The apostolate of prayer', Stimmen der Zeit 152 (1953), 161-170; 'A spiritual dialogue at evening: on sleep, prayer, and other subjects', Wort und Wahrheit 2 (1947), 449-462; 'Priestly existence', ZAM 17 (1942), 155-171; 'The consecration of the layman to the care of souls', ZAM 11(1936), 21-34; 'The Ignatian mysticism of joy in the world', ZAM 12 (1937), 121-137; 'Priest and Poet', foreword to La hora [x] sin tiempo (poems by Jorge Blajot S. J.); '"Behold this heart": preliminaries to a theology of devotion to the Sacred Heart', GuL 26 (1953), 32-38; 'Some theses for a theology of devotion to the Sacred Heart', in J. Stierli, Cor Salvatoris, 2 imp. (Freiburg 1956), 166-199; 'The Christian among unbelieving relations', GuL 27 (1954), 171-184; 'On conversions to the Church', Hochland 46 (1953), 119-126; 'Science as a "confession"?', Wort und Wahrheit 9 (1954), 809-819.

Innsbruck, March 1956

Karl Rahner, S.J.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[3]

1

REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEM OF THE GRADUAL ASCENT TO CHRISTIAN PERFECTION

Throughout ascetic and mystic literature there are to be found 'divisions' of the way of the spiritual life, all of which amounts to an attempt to describe and distinguish from each other the stages through which man must pass on the way to Christian perfection. Thus, when about to speak here of the 'gradual ascent to Christian perfection', it might be expected that this would necessarily involve us in a description (in their material content) of the individual stages of this way to Christian perfection and that it would consequently be necessary for us to indicate in detail the norm according to which – by gradual ascent through these stages – the Christian eventually can be said to arrive at that point which represents the goal of his supernatural moral and religious life, i.e. the attainment of perfection in becoming more and more like Christ, and thus arriving at the reflection of the perfection of the Father in heaven, according to the command given us in the Sermon on the Mount. Yet, in actual fact, our reflections will be confined to the 'problematic nature' of this gradual ascent. We are not going to put forward some old or even a new division of the stages of the spiritual road; we intend merely to ask how and where such a division can be found, given that it wants to be able to claim that it corresponds sufficiently to the actual course of the spiritual life so that, conversely, it can also be normative for such a course.

First of all, then, it has to be asked whether there is in fact such a thing as a 'way' to Christian perfection. Is there really a gradual ascent to perfection? Or, to put it even more precisely, can one attain holiness as it were bit by bit by a continued, methodically planned effort, in such a way that at the end of this 'road' one really 'possesses' it – analogously to the way in which one gradually becomes rich by continued work and [4] ever new material gains – till eventually there remains at most the task of making sure that one does not lose this wealth again? This is no doubt more or less explicitly and consciously the kind of dominant conception normally had when one speaks in the usual sense of the way to Christian holiness. Of course, we do not mean to question even theoretically that there is a grain of truth in such a conception, that somehow it also sees and means something quite correct. Yet, as will become clear in the course of our reflections on this matter from the most varying viewpoints, this conception is not as self-evident and free of problems as would allow us to use it without difficulty and danger as the basic conceptual framework for the real question (not treated here), viz. the question as to how and in what ways the Christian becomes holy. The critique of this basic framework – which thus becomes the real subject of our reflections – may perhaps prove to be more than just a superfluous subtlety but rather a way of coming to closer grips, in one respect or another, with the question of what exactly Christian perfection consists in and what are the real 'steps' and 'ways' by which it is to be attained.

Is there in any sense a 'way', a stage-by-stage step-like ascent to holiness? This, and this alone, is the simple and yet difficult question we have posed ourselves here. It has already been said that we do not really mean to dispute or question the statement that there is growth in Christian piety or that there is an increase, a slow and gradual attainment of Christian perfection. Yet it will do no harm to make sure for ourselves from the positive sources of theology of the correctness of this statement in some sense or other, since a glance at these sources may serve to lead us into the whole problematic nature of this statement.

Scripture undoubtedly knows of a conversion, a metanoia (Mt. 3:2: Mk 1:15; Lk 5:32, etc.), the decision to follow Christ, the yes to his call to become his disciple, the basic will to fulfil the conditions laid down by Christ for the one who asks how one can become perfect, the pistis or whatever other name may be given in the New Testament to that decisive experience of return and of being born again. Yet in all this the New Testament patently presupposes that this decisive act of conversion is not something absolutely final, that the life which follows this act is not simply a merely uniform and unchanging activation of this basic attitude adopted once and for all, but that this attitude also grows and matures, advances and increases. For the New Testament recognizes that there are nepoi (1 Co 3:1; Eph 4:14; Heb 5:12,13) who at first cannot [5] stomach anything but milk and cannot yet stand solid food, and – in contrast to these immature beginners – the teleioi (1 Co 2:6; 14:20; Ph 3:15; Col 4:12; Heb 5:14), who are in the fullest sense pneumatikoi (1 Co 2:13,15; 3:1; 14:37; Ga 6:1) and who also possess gnosis. St Paul speaks of a growth in knowledge and in Christian life in general (2 Co 10:15, Eph 4:15; Col 1:10, 1 P 2:2; 2 P 3:18), of an 'attaining of the measure of the age of the fullness of Christ' (Eph 4:13); he is aware of a striving for gifts of grace which are not of the same importance and perfection, of ways of the Christian life of varying perfection (1 Co 12-14). Ideas like building, with materials of varying value, on the foundations of faith, the concept of differences in merit, of the distinction between works of absolute duty and acts of voluntary charity, etc., all presuppose equally that the life of the man endowed with pneuma is capable of growth and progress.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we now take a closer look at these hints given by Scripture, two things will no doubt strike us in particular. Firstly, these scriptural indications remain characteristic of the whole history of the doctrine of the different steps in the spiritual life, although they are really anything but self-evident: for one thing, this doctrine of growth and progress does not in any way go beyond generalities even in the New Testament. Looked at as a whole, nothing more is really stated than the fact that there is such a growth and maturing process, and the command that the Christian must become more perfect in this way. There is a complete absence of any more exact definition of the stages of this ascent; no attempt whatsoever is made to give any real description of the characteristic properties of the individual stages or to arrange them one after the other in any determined order of sequence. Secondly, what also strikes us particularly is the fact that in St Paul this ascent, if we may put it this way, is orientated – even though not exclusively, yet at least predominantly – towards a 'gnostic' goal: the perfect man differs from the less perfect by his greater sophia and gnosis. This is noticeable both in the first Epistle to the Corinthians and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. True, with all its 'gnosis' colouring, the schema of spiritual ascent presented there undoubtedly does not envisage something merely rational and intellectualistic; the higher knowledge is a gift effected by the Holy Spirit. It is equally important to observe in this connection that it is precisely in the first Epistle to the Corinthians that love appears as ultimately the decisive factor and the only valid criterion for the ascent of the Christian in the mind of St [6] Paul. It is equally important to notice that the 'gnosis' colouring of the schema of ascent is imposed on the Apostle by the actual current of thought in this congregation for whom gnosis was the sought-after goal, independently of the mind of St Paul, so that this orientation of the way of perfection towards a more or less mystic gnosis must not be simply taken as the most central point for St Paul himself. Yet it nevertheless remains true to say that the directly tangible elements in St Paul point very strongly towards conceiving the way of ascent to perfection as an ascent to ever greater knowledge and experience of the secrets of God.

As already mentioned above, these two characteristics of what can be explicitly grasped in the New Testament concerning our question has also to a greater or lesser extent remained characteristic in the history of ascetics and mysticism. It naturally cannot be the intention of a short essay like ours to give a detailed account of the history of this theory concerning the divisions and steps of the spiritual life. We will merely draw attention to a few unconnected facts as an illustration of the sort of thing already observed in the Scriptures and this as a preparation for the objective problems which we will discover in the theory of the steps of the spiritual life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the history of this doctrine, too, there is to be found the same twofold characteristic: either the steps of the spiritual life are orientated towards and aimed at a mystical ideal of knowledge, or this doctrine never really gets beyond certain very formal divisions. The first time such a doctrine of the way of the Christian life was attempted in the patristic writings, viz. by Clement of Alexandria,[1] the goal of this ascent is the gnostic (once more in direct contrast to the ideals of the heretical gnosticism of the second and third centuries, an antitype meant to combat these ideals and to overcome them, and one which for this very reason has taken over the ultimate viewpoints of the whole conception from the opponents against whom it has to fight). The gnostic is the perfect man. This gnostic to whom Clement ascribes something bordering on a kind of omniscience, which can be conceived only with great difficulty as in any way reconcilable with the obscurity of faith, is distinguished in an almost extreme way from the simple believer. Virtue appears here almost as a mere presupposition and radiation of gnosis, and gnosis is the desired end to such an extent that the gnostic would prefer gnosis to salvation if, [7] per absurdum, he had to choose between the two. The 'way of works' (which later on came to be called the vita activa) is the necessary presupposition for the 'way of gnosis' (which later on came to be called the vita contemplativa), and really nothing more. In Origen[2] and even more clearly, unequivocally and rigidly in the Origenism of Evagrius Ponticus,[3] we then encounter the completion of this basic scheme of Christian life aimed at gnosis, a scheme which leans heavily on the ancient divisions of science and the first signs of which were already present in Clement: the spiritual life runs its course in two great stages, viz. practice and gnosis. The life of virtue as found in practical life is seen more or less clearly as a preparation for and as a 'gateway' to mystical contemplation. It is really conceived merely as the psychological training ground for gnosis (a training naturally based anthropologically on a metaphysics and theology), as a schooling for apatheia, as the process of divesting oneself of all passion, as a simplification and concentration of man until he comes to the point where he can contemplate God almost in an experience of identification of the Nous (freed from images and modes) with the divine Proto-monad which is the substantial Gnosis itself. Even love in this conception is at most the climax of the praktiké (almost reduced to another word for apatheia) but not really the summit of the whole spiritual life.

There is no need to go into the details of the division of the gnostic part of the way. Even the often subtle division of the praktiké is ultimately merely a division according to a more or less logical scheme of virtues, without giving the impression that this division provides a real reflection of a psychologically genetic sequence in the development of the spiritual man. In as far as it is possible to discover any theory of the steps of the spiritual life in the writings of Gregory of Nyssa,[4] it is again merely [8] a question really of the steps of the mystical ascent:

---

[1] Cf. VilIer-Rahner, Aszese und Mystik in der Väterzeit (Freiburg 1939), pp. 63-71, 75 sqq. Also on this: W. Völker.

[2] Cf. Viller-Rahner, op. cit., pp. 76 sqq.

[3] Cf. Viller-Rahner, op. cit., pp. 99 sqq. Beyond this and very much deeper and more accurate: H. U. v. Balthasar, 'Metaphysik und Mystik des Evagrius Ponticus', Zeitschrift fur Aszese und Mystik XIV (1939), pp. 31-47; and by the same author: 'Die Hiera des Evagrius', ZKT LXIII (1939), pp. 86106; 181-206. Here, pp. 95 sqq., the ancient schemata of the sciences, which are at the root of these divisions.

[4] Cf. Viller-Rahner, op. cit., pp. 136-145. The literature mentioned here should be compared with: A. Lieske, 'Zur Theologie der Christus-Mystik Gregors von Nyssa', Scholastik XIV (1939), pp. 485-514; H. U. v. Balthasar, 'La philosophie religieuse de S. Grégoire de Nysse', RSR XXIX (1939), pp. 513-549, and by the same author: Gregor von Nyssa, Der versiegelte Quell. Auslegung des Hohen Liedes (Salzburg 1939); and Présence et Pensée, Etude sur la philosophie religieuse de Grégoire de Nysse (Paris 1943). Furthermore: H. C.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the vision of God in the mirror of the clear soul, direct experience of God in the obscurity of boundless yearning. When after that there appears for the first time a scheme in the Pseudo-Denis[5] which competes with the scheme of Evagrius, the anonymous universal master of Graeco-Byzantine mysticism, the three ways which he teaches are the via purgativa, illuminativa and unitiva (catharsis, photismos, teleiosis-henosis; the term 'way' is not yet used by him). Yet even here – in spite of the essential difference between the mysticism of Evagrius and the Areopagite – the spiritual life in its growth is orientated just as clearly as before towards mystical gnosis. Any stages of the spiritual life which can really be distinguished in the concrete are found here also at most in so far as it is a question of growth in the mystical experience of God. The neo-platonic St Augustine[6] may be very far from a scholastic systematization such as is found in Evagrius and in the Areopagite: yet when he describes man's ascent to perfection, then he too uses as his basic scheme the neo-platonic ascent of the spirit proceeding from the manifold variety of the world to the luminous and yet unutterable transcendence of God. Or – foreshadowing another scheme which was then more fully developed during the Middle Ages – he looks at love, tries to describe its course of development, and then (in so far as there is any real systematization) he does not really get any further than making a purely formal division: initial, progressing, great and then perfect love, or love born, nourished, strengthened, and finally perfected. The treatment given by Gregory the Great,[7] the disciple of the even greater Augustine, is not much different.

During the Middle Ages,[8] a different division came into vogue, a division which no longer had this mystical orientation: incipientes, proficientes, perfecti (St Thomas, II-II, q.24 a.9; q.183 a.4). From the thirteenth century onwards, this threefold division of steps came then to be treated as running parallel to the threefold division of the Areopagite scheme. This is already clear in St Bonaventure.[9] This procedure can either mean that the perfecti are understood to be the mystics (viz. when the Areopagite [9] scheme predominates) or – when the other scheme predominates – that even the via unitiva is no longer taken in a truly mystical sense but becomes more an expression used to designate a high degree of union with God through grace and love. In 1687, Innocent XI safeguarded the Areopagite division against the Quietist Molinos (Denz. 1246). Since then frequent attempts have been made to deduce from this that the identification of these two divisions was thereby given ecclesiastical sanction. Yet as is stressed by Hertling,[10] for instance, no positive teaching can be drawn from this purely negative rebuttal of a vulgar attack by Quietism against the three ways of the Areopagite scheme ('. . . absurdum maximum, quod dictum fuerit in mystica . . .'). The Church's intention in this was merely to protect traditional ascetics against the temerarious attacks of the Quietists, without wishing thereby to teach positively that, for instance, the 'beginner' must necessarily be in the purgative way. Thus, as Hertling states explicitly, it is possible to maintain without fear of ecclesiastical censure that the parallelism between these two divisions is artificial in so far as it does not always correspond to experience.

We have traditionally, therefore, two different and separate divisions or stages. Of these, one is problematical because it takes it in varying degrees too much for granted that the goal of the spiritual life consists in a mystic state of union with God and because it moreover

---

Puech, 'La ténèbre mystique chez Gregoire de Nysse', Etudes Carmélitaines XXIII 11(1938), pp. 49-52.
[5] Cf. Viller-Rahner, op. cit., pp. 234 sq.
[6] Cf. Viller-Rahner, op. cit., pp. 255 sqq.
[7] Cf. Viller-Rahner, op. cit., pp. 270 sqq.
[8] Cf. for what follows: O. Zimmermann, Lehrbuch der Aszetik (Freiburg 1929), pp. 66 sqq.
[9] Cf. Zimmermann, loc. cit., p. 67, who refers to St Bonaventure, De triplici via. Differently Hertling, Lehrbuch der aszetischen Theologie (Innsbruck 1930), p. 148.
[10] L. v. Herding, Theologiae asceticae cursus brevior (Rome 1939), pp. 100 and 208. In his Lehrbuch de aszetischen Theologie, pp. 146 sqq., Herding had still defended a somewhat different opinion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

considers this mystical state to be predominantly (at least fundamentally) a higher knowledge. The other division is no less problematical, for it really means precious little due to the fact of its being so formal and hence empty.

Of course, this is not meant to say that the division into 'beginners', 'those who have progressed' and 'the perfect' remains in this empty, formal state in ascetic literature. On the contrary, great efforts have been made to give these formal concepts a material content. We will have to say more about this in a moment when we come to the objectively problematical nature of our question.

The Spanish mysticism of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries – especially in St Teresa of Jesus and St John of the Cross – provides us with extraordinarily subtle and psychologically acute divisions, of great importance for mystical theology. Yet these divisions are really relevant only for the stages within the mystic way; they are a series of steps [10] within infused contemplation. The 'beginner', as he appears in St John of the Cross, is the person who psychologically and in the sphere of grace stands at the threshold of infused contemplation. This division, therefore, does not concern us directly in the present context.

It is, of course, obvious and requires only to be mentioned in passing that other divisions have also been given in the history of ascetics. Thus, there is often mention (among others, in St Bonaventure) of a threefold (or fourfold) supernatural habitus: the infused virtues, the infused gifts of the Holy Ghost, the beatitudes also conceived as a habitus (and the fruits of the Holy Ghost). Following on this, the different activations of these three different and higher or lower groups of 'habits' gave rise to a particular arrangement of the steps of the spiritual life.[11] Yet such divisions were far too much the product of a formal-logical systematization of separate traditional data to be able to count on surviving for any length of time.

Hence, these rather primitive indications concerning the history of the doctrine about the steps of the spiritual life really leave us with the following simple facts. There is first of all the fact that in some sense or other, and in some form or other, there must be something like a way to Christian perfection, a way which is formed by or divisible into different stages; for unless this be presupposed, the continual and always renewed attempt to define these stages in greater detail – as found in the whole history of the Christian religion – becomes absolutely incomprehensible and absurd. The other provisional conclusion is the fact that these concrete attempts to give a more exact description of these ways have not turned out to be particularly convincing. This will become even clearer when we now turn directly to the objective problems involved.

We again start with the almost instinctive, unreflected conviction that the Christian ought to become holy, that he in some way or other becomes this slowly, that he can become ever more perfect, that he is capable of growing in holiness and love of God, and that he moves himself towards a definite goal in his religion and moral life, a goal which is not a simple question of a goal not attained or not yet attained, but a goal towards which he really moves by approaching nearer and nearer to it. Yet as soon as we ask what this means more exactly, then our difficulties really [11] start. One could, of course, make the question simpler for oneself to begin with by trying to give more precision to this doctrine in the light of dogmatic teaching on the increase of sanctifying grace. The supernatural holiness of a man, one might say, is measured by the degree of sanctifying grace possessed by him. This grace can increase. It grows, in fact, by every supernaturally good work done in the state of grace and by every fruitful reception of a sacrament. One could furthermore draw the nowadays more

[11] A relic of this is still contained even today in the usual doctrine of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which conceives them as habitus to particularly perfect or even mystic acts.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or less common – although not dogmatically defined – teaching according to which even the sinner who returns to the state of grace is thereby also given back that degree of sanctifying grace which he possessed before his loss of grace.[12] In addition, one could also take into consideration the equally common view in contemporary dogmatic theology, according to which the measure of sanctifying grace cannot really be diminished by venial sins, etc. One could then draw the conclusion from these presuppositions that the stage-by-stage process of becoming holy and perfect is nothing other than the continual increase in sanctifying grace which occurs inevitably (if we may put it this way) in the life of every Christian and which in reality is only differentiated in each individual Christian according to the 'tempo' and intensity of this growth.

Yet, even abstracting from the really shattering problems inherent in such a quantitative, impersonal conception of grace, such an explanation of growth in perfection would not really be to the point for what is meant here, even though obviously there is also the question as to what relationship there is between this growth in 'ontic' sanctity and the growth in 'moral' sanctity referred to here. The reason for the fact that what is meant by our question is not covered by the conception just outlined, is that, in the matter occupying us here, it is obviously a question of moral sanctity and perfection in the realm of what can be personally experienced. According to what was said above about grace, there ought to be a very significant increase in grace in the course of a long Christian life. Yet we will not say of every aged Christian on his death-bed that he has become holy or that he has really covered[13] a great part of the way with which we are dealing here, and this in the realm of what we can experience, i.e. in a [12] 'pheno-typical' manner. Again, all this shows an at least apparent discrepancy between ontic and moral holiness at the end of a long life. This discrepancy is a real problem, for ultimately one surely cannot suppose such a discrepancy to be real, even on the supposition that man must still 'morally' catch up on his holiness in Purgatory (a holiness which endows him with his measure of grace) before he can enter into the enjoyment of the degree of beatitude given with this determined ontic holiness.

Let us illustrate this question once more as plastically as possible: an ideal seminarian or novice who makes the highest demands on himself develops in the course of his life into a very imperfect, embittered and loveless old parish priest or Religious, very much concerned with money matters and material enjoyment. He seems, therefore, to have become considerably 'less perfect'. We will suppose, however, that lie has not lost sanctifying grace; this grace, therefore, must inevitably have greatly increased during the course of his life. From the point of view of grace, therefore, he seems to have become more holy. How are these two conclusions to be reconciled? It is not our intention to go into the solution of this question to any great length. But the solution is no doubt to be found in the fact that in a more personalistic and hence more correct conception of grace, the degree of increase of grace in our example must not be overrated, in spite of the many 'good works' and the frequency of the reception of the sacraments which must be assumed in such a life. On the other hand, a more careful examination will show that there is moral progress even in such a life. For even such an 'imperfect' old parish priest or Religious – by successfully passing the test of the situations of his life (a test not yet imposed on the young seminarian or novice), and passing it without losing grace – has reached a moral maturity which the young man, in spite of his idealism, did not and could not yet possess, even though this moral maturity is not as great as it might have been in such a life in the nature of things and which, therefore, appears as imperfection when measured by the standard of what the old man ought to be. But let us

[12] Cf. further on in the present volume the essay entitled 'The comfort of time', pp. 141-157.
[13] Under quite a different aspect, this question is taken up once more in the essay: 'The comfort of time,' cf. pp. 141-157.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

leave this particular problem for the moment and start at another point.

One might try – and this is the usual approach in modern ascetic literature – to identify the different stages of the spiritual life with the grades of moral significance, dignity and perfection of the individual classes of moral acts. One starts from the assuredly not incorrect assumption that the particular classes of moral acts are of different value, 'meritoriousness' [13] and thus also of different 'perfection'. Avoidance of mortal sin as such will be achieved by acts (at least so one might think) which morally speaking are of little value, which (put in another way) realize a lesser degree of love of God than the acts and attitudes by which and out of which man also avoids venial sins as far as possible. The latter acts could again be thought to be surpassed in their turn by acts and attitudes by which man does what is only counselled: the free, more perfect acts – in short, works of supererogation. Presupposing all this, such and similar divisions of acts are then allocated in one way or another among the three aforementioned formal steps. Thus it might be conceived, for instance, that those in the grade of beginners (frequently identified with the 'purgative way') fight against (mortal or even already venial) sin by penance and mortification, and try to eradicate the roots of such sin which are concupiscence and pride; those in the grade of the more advanced try also to fight against venial sins, even the semi-voluntary ones, and seek to avoid imperfections; those in the grade of the perfect habitually carry out the counsels, always choose the more perfect and for love of Christ prefer the Cross, his renunciation and disgrace. According to this scheme, acts of prayer are then also frequently graded and divided among the three ways. Thus, discursive meditation is attributed to the first grade, affective prayer to the second, and the prayer of simplicity, acquired contemplation or in certain circumstances even infused contemplation to the third (viz. wherever mysticism proper is seen as a normal stage of development of the spiritual life).

It might seem that with this conception, which we have given merely in very rough outline and in a simplified form, the formal steps have now been given their proper content found lacking above. Yet, even conceding that the step-by-step way of the spiritual life sometimes or perhaps even often unfolds itself in the way indicated in this theory, it will nevertheless be basically undeniable that the identification of the stages of development of the spiritual life with the different objective values of the classes of moral acts is something artificial. To recognize the truth of this, it is necessary to reflect on the following: the stages of the spiritual life make sense (and the sense they are actually intended to make) only if it is presupposed that these steps in the development of the spiritual life are actually separate from one another, really follow one after the other, and that those phases which in this theory come before another, can also not be skipped over in practice . . . similarly to the way in which the [14] steps of the biological development of a living being follow one another in proper sequence, each clearly having its proper place in the total curve of life, and each later stage essentially presupposing the previous one. The phases of the spiritual life and the grades of perfection of the classes of moral acts are not the same. If this is kept in mind, then it will be seen to be artificial to apportion definite classes of moral acts according to their objective values to these stages of subjective development. For it is impossible to see, either in theory or in practice, why precisely the higher kind of acts should not be possible on the lower step of the spiritual life, and why an (actually or merely supposedly) lower type of act should no longer have basically that same decisive significance on a higher step of the spiritual life which it had on a lower step. Expressed in concrete terms, we would ask: why, for example, should not the 'beginner' in certain circumstances already accomplish the most heroic acts of pure love of God or perform the most outstanding works of supererogation? If he does this, is he still a beginner? If the answer is 'no', has he then simply jumped the grade of 'beginner', contrary to the laws of organic development, by a sudden heroic leap? If the answer is 'yes', why is he then still truly a beginner, when he does in fact practise heroic virtue – supposedly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the characteristic of the grade of the 'perfect'?

This becomes a very real problem, for instance, in the case of 'juvenile saints', which term is not meant to refer to the sentimental figures of a pseudo-hagiography of most recent times, but to young people whose really heroic virtue has been acknowledged by the Church. Have such saints soared up more or less from the very start, and by a heroic flight, to the heights of heroic virtue, without really having first passed through the way of development signified by the steps of the spiritual life, and – presupposing the correctness of the view criticized here – have they thus soared up to the summit of this gradual way? Or have they nevertheless passed through this way of development in a more summary fashion which consequently is historically unverifiable or at least extremely difficult to grasp, so that this gradual passage has to be conceived as something more or less independent of the biological and personal graph of life? Or are they, in spite of their really heroic virtue, still beginners in the proper sense of the doctrine of the steps of the spiritual life, so that 'perfection' in the sense of this properly understood doctrine of the steps of the spiritual life cannot be identified with heroic virtue, as is in fact done by the view we are criticizing?

[15] In order to make some progress in solving these deep problems, we will – to begin with – introduce and to some extent explain a concept which seems to be important here, viz. the concept of 'situation'. If there are steps in the spiritual life, each of them really distinct from the other and having its own peculiar structure – and if each of them may either be missed altogether, or may be passed either badly, well or even heroically – then these steps must differ from each other by something which is prior to the moral quality with which they are lived . . . and this precisely is what we would call 'situation'. Life, it seems to us, is made up of a series of situations (in the main, dependent on one another up to a certain point), a series of tasks, each of which is different from the other with its own particular place in the course of life as a whole, each of them bringing with them a certain characteristic and ideal recipe as to how they ought to be mastered, and each of them being mastered in this or that way or not being fulfilled at all.

The factors which in each particular case determine the individual situations of life would seem to be the following: firstly, the vital situation together with everything belonging to it (a man's biological constitution, his particular biological phase of development: youth, maturity, senescence, illness and death); secondly, the external circumstances not completely under the control of the free decision of man, circumstances formed by the biological and historical environment of man (among which we may also include here God's sovereign intervention by grace, etc.); thirdly, earlier situations preceding the present one which are obviously also constitutive of the present situation, since in the case of each event every situation is somehow – and especially in the realm of the spiritual, personal reality – co-determined by what went before. In our case, this is not merely valid with regard to the manner in which the test of the preceding situation had been passed in the moral sense, but also with regard to the simple fact that the person has already lived previously in this or that determined situation. Someone, for instance, who has already experienced a great love, an extreme danger of death, etc., is a different person in any succeeding situation; by this very fact, the concrete situation too has itself become different from what it would have been if these preceding situations had not occurred, even prescinding from the way in which the person has passed through these preceding situations. Since, therefore, the preceding situations certainly always codetermine the next situation, the way in which this situation is to be [16] encountered – what is demanded of the person in this situation – is also co-determined by them. Thus, for instance (to go on immediately to the practical conclusion) someone who starts the spiritual life as a 'beginner' in old age, i.e. someone who decides to meet his situations in as perfect a way as possible, begins at quite a different point; his beginning is quite a different one from what it would be if he were to begin to be a 'beginner'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the spiritual life in his youth. He will at once and at the very beginning have to survive a situation at which the youthful beginner arrives only very much later on in his life.

If it were now to be possible – while taking into consideration the just-mentioned situational elements – to grasp and describe one or several typical ways in which these series of situations run their course in man's life, and if it were now possible to attribute the corresponding moral duties to each of the phases of such a series of situations, then we would have found the sequence or sequences of steps of the spiritual life for which we are looking. The simplest thing in all this – although even this has not yet been achieved sufficiently in ascetic literature – would be a differential psychology of the different age groups. Yet even this would have to be more than a merely biologically orientated differential psychology and would have to do more than just inquire into the reflex of the biological curve of life in the psychical life of man; it would have to be orientated also in a spiritual, personal direction, i.e. it would have to inquire whether there is not also a line of development through the different age-periods which, from a spiritual and personal point of view, is genuinely dependent on the difference of each person's experiences.

This differential psychology of age groups would be only one of the elements required for the construction of a typical line (or lines) of development necessary as a neutral substratum for the step-by-step development of the spiritual life. This element would be the easiest to determine because, compared with other elements, it is the most constant and uniform. The other elements (the typical course of external circumstances, the modification of every situation by what has gone before) are subject to much greater variations, even supposing that it is possible to work out types in their case. Thus it is obvious that it would be a very complicated and difficult task to work out a detailed account of such a typical course, a task which naturally cannot be accomplished here.

In order to provide a further clarification, we will look at the problems we have so far indicated from yet another point of view. The usual, [17] commonly accepted conception of the step-by-step development of the spiritual life presupposes that, in passing through this development, man grows in perfection, acquires an ever-increasing treasure of perfection and sanctity, and becomes 'more virtuous'. This conception is often expressed in such a way as to state that a person acquires many virtuous habits: the so-called 'acquired virtues'. This in its turn is explained as meaning that the person acquires a permanent inclination and facility in the further exercise of the particular acts of a virtue by frequent repetition of these acts. In such a conception, therefore, the process of becoming perfect consists in acquiring such virtuous habits. This seems also to explain how one can acquire perfection as a permanent possession: as a possession which one 'has' and which is always at one's disposal. Yet as soon as one asks oneself about how exactly the acquisition of such virtuous habits takes place and what is meant by it, the whole question becomes once more problematical.

There is indeed something like an inclination to and facility for certain ways of acting which has been acquired by the repetition of the corresponding acts. But such a facility and inclination must obviously be explained, at least to begin with, by the psychological laws of association, both in what concerns the intentional objectivity and the emotional reaction to this in such acts. To put it crudely and in general terms: the frequency of performance of a certain act leaves certain traces in the brain; the acquisition of such a habit, at least to begin with, is essentially auto-conditioning. This being presupposed, we should next pose the question, therefore, as to whether such firm associational complexes and trained reactions (no matter how useful they may be) cannot equally well be in themselves extremely harmful, to the extent in which they allow the originally genuine moral acts – which were truly a spontaneous and spiritual reaction to the moral value as such – to become a sub-personal instinctive reaction which no longer attains the proper moral nucleus of the object. The well-known picture of the old ascetic who has become 'hardened' in virtue, can properly be brought forward as an illustration here: the picture of a person who engages in countless moral ways of acting by force of habit, without seeming to realize these moral values in the truly spiritual and personal or genuine and original way which was originally intended in such behaviours.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Even in view of this question alone it again becomes to a certain extent a problem to know whether the possession of such acquired virtues is [18] really possession of something already genuinely and originally moral in itself. This is not of course meant to dispute the fact that it is useful and indeed necessary to acquire such 'virtues'. Yet surely their primary meaning is that this self-training, which allows moral acts to become instinctive reactions, takes pressure off the spiritual personal life of man, so that he becomes free to occupy himself with other, more important moral tasks and efforts; it does not mean, however, that these 'acquired virtues' by themselves give man a greater perfection in the moral field as such. Regarded from this point of view, therefore, the acquiring of 'acquired virtues' would not really mean the acquiring of perfection itself but rather the acquiring of the possibility of greater perfection. It would still remain to be seen, therefore, whether a person actually makes full use of this possibility or whether he considers himself to be dispensed from such a utilization on account of these acquired virtues themselves.

The possession of such an acquired virtue as the goal of the gradual approach to sanctity is of a problematic nature from yet another point of view. If this acquired virtue consists at least to begin with (i.e. understood empirically) in such associational traces, then it can also be influenced, increased and decreased by causes lying outside the sphere of properly moral decisions. Something, for example, which is acquired in the form of a habit in this direction by repeated moral conduct in the sexual sphere can in certain circumstances be attained also – as far as its empirically tangible effect is concerned – by bromides. Or, acquired virtues – as far as their empirical effect is-concerned (and this after all is the thing under discussion when it is a question of the facility and inclination for certain ways of acting) – are lost again by a marasmus senilis.

It can, of course, be objected (and to a certain extent, rightly) that behind this acquired virtue of the empirical ego – a virtue influenced by non-moral causes – there lies the acquired virtue of the intelligible ego which can be acquired only by moral behaviour and can be destroyed only by moral activity, and not by non-moral and non-personal causes. This may very well be correct.[14] There may indeed be such metempirical [19] virtues which belong to the realm of the spontaneity and intangibility of the noumenal ego. Yet they do not really help us in our question here. For, after all, the usual conception of the step-by-step development of the spiritual life presupposes that there is a kind of growth and enrichment in the realm of the empirical ego and its experiences. This is, however, rather obviously dependent on the indicated non-moral causes and circumstances (to which of course belong also heredity, the basic vital and psychical constitution, the 'complexio' of old people, and everything which influences these things in the course of one's life). This, however, gives rise to the question: can whatever is dependent on non-moral causes be itself called moral, moral perfection, etc.? And if the gradual development of the spiritual life is to lead to the height and richness in really possessed perfection and sanctity, then can this step-by-step ascent be explained as a way to these 'acquired virtues' in the empirical sense of the word? Hence, if we are unsuccessful in explaining in this way the growth in the spiritual life (which [14] It should be noted in passing that this whole problem was also seen by the medieval metaphysical psychology of the scholastics, when it was asked what the species intelligibilis is over and above the species sensibilis which is also necessary for the act of intellectual knowledge, and whether it continues to exist by itself and can remain significant for the intellectual life of man even when the species sensibilis is destroyed (at least by death). The same problem is envisaged in the question about the existence, extent and significance of a memoria intellectiva side by side with the memoria sensitiva.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is presupposed for the construction of a gradual ascent), must we then drop the idea of a growth in holiness as something inconceivable? Must we fall back again on the doctrine of the growth in grace in man, or must we construct the concept of a gradual development in the spiritual life exclusively on the typical chain of situations referred to above, to the exclusion of the concept of an ever-increasing possession of holiness, or is there still a third way out?

The question thus posed could also be formulated as follows: can a moral act increase in intensity? Is this possible in the sense that the greater intensity of an act depends on the fact of there having been certain preceding acts, without this in its turn having to be interpreted according to the conception of 'acquired virtues', a conception which we have just rejected as being insufficient? If we formulate the question in this way, we do not fall back into that interpretation of the gradual spiritual ascent already dropped as unworkable earlier on, which assigns the various classes of acts of objectively lower or higher levels to the different stages of the spiritual life, We are immediately a long way from the conception which sees things as if, for example, the beginner just manages to avoid mortal sin, whereas the perfect man fulfils the non-commanded Counsels, etc. We ask rather (to remain as close to our example as possible and to express it in this concrete form), whether the [20] perfect man performs the same moral act differently from the way the beginner performs it, really meaning by this not merely the same act in respect of the externally tangible performance but the same act also with regard to its formal moral object towards which a position is adopted. Thus, we are asking, for instance, whether the beginner's act of pure, selfless love of God is different from that of the perfect man? We are not thinking here of a specific difference determined by those factors which distinguish the 'beginner' and the 'perfect' in accordance with the interpretation of the acquired virtues discussed above. If we may answer the thus understood question in the affirmative, then one could go on to ask about a law of stages according to which the increase in intensity of such acts takes place. Once this law has been discovered and has been combined with the previously postulated, typical scheme of sequence of situations, then this combination would at last give us the looked-for scheme of the way to perfection, which describes the difference of the single stages of the spiritual life in the chain of situations and which explains by the law of the increase of intensity how this spiritual way leads to ever greater heights.

The first question is, therefore, the following: can one and the same moral act – an act which is really the same in its objective intentional structure which is orientated towards a moral object as such – be of a different intensity subjectively? On the whole and going on their everyday experience, everyone would naturally answer this question in the affirmative. Yet it is of decisive importance to see how this difference in intensity is explained more in detail. For, wherever it is seen or experienced more or less explicitly as a difference in the ease with which the course of associations takes place – in what in the usual terminology of ascetics is called 'sensible' consolations or something similar – such a difference of degree would come to the same thing as the difference which we have just rejected as insufficient for explaining the possibility of growth. In actual fact we must distinguish between two quite different kinds of intensity in an act: an act or an experience can, for instance, be experienced as something very absorbing, something which occupies the whole of our consciousness, and yet at the same time it may be experienced as something very much on the surface compared with the central core of the person. Violent toothache is indeed experienced as a quite peripheral act which does not affect the core of the person, and yet it may greatly absorb the attention on this peripheral level. Hence we must distinguish [21] two quite different dimensions of intensity in the case of a human act: one of these is the measure of the greater or lesser personal depth of an act, while the other measures the intensity and density of the act on a particular personal level. The first of these dimensions – the dimension of the existential depth of an act – must not, of course, be mixed up with the objective dignity of a certain class of acts. An act of selfless love of God is always of the highest objective dignity. But it is quite a different question when we come to determine the existential depth in which the act is actually performed in a concrete case. It is also obvious (without our wishing to enter into this here) that there are very important and complicated connections between the two dimensions mentioned in the first place, however carefully they must be distinguished from each other. We also cannot enter into a discussion of the fact that there is a stratification of experiences even in the pre-personal sphere of man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This beginning which we have perhaps made by pointing out this distinction, also already marks the point at which we must stop. There would now arise the question as to how this existential depth of an act can grow; whether, and how, man slowly gains the chance in the course of his natural and moral life to increase the radical existential depth of his actions; whether and how he manages to bring himself into play in one act and this with the whole reality of his spiritual and personal being, whether he manages to fulfil his own being right down to its deepest depths in one free decision, and what are the causes and conditions making it possible for him to do this. Only when this question has been clarified, would it be possible to describe the typical course of growth in a person's capacity to commit himself existentially. Only then would we be in a position to combine the typical chain of the situations of human life with this typical course of growth in man's capacity to commit himself existentially. Only then could we bring out the (certainly real) interdependence of these two series and thus arrive at the desired goal, viz. the understanding of the typical course of the spiritual life in its continual development into different and higher forms.

Nevertheless, our discussions have helped us to reach a jumping-off point and one which encourages us to take another look at our subject from a completely different point of view. There is evidently a development of man's capacity for an ever more total self-commitment by ever deeper personal acts. The impossibility of being able to commit oneself totally at every moment – the impossibility of a totally making-of-oneself [22] in every moment what one wants to be – is, however, nothing more than what is called concupiscence in the strictly theological sense of the world[15] (in contrast to the usual moral interpretation of this term). Hence, growth in this possibility is nothing other than growth in overcoming concupiscence. Thus our reflections lead us once more to the sporadic attempts[16] made in the history of Christian spirituality – attempts which have, however, never really been carried to a proper conclusion – to build up the step-by-step development of the spiritual life in a strictly theological manner. Such attempts are at work wherever the goal of spiritual development is seen to consist in a 'return to paradise' or in the attaining of a condition similar to that of the angels, and what has been said at least points to the kernel of truth in such a conception.

A further conceivable construction from theological materials in the narrower sense would be that of becoming more and more like Christ, of coming to act in accordance with the inner laws of his life. But such a conception leads immediately to the question as to what is the inner structure of Christ's life and what is, if we may put it that way, the developmental formula of that life. Thus, this attempt too faces us with a task which cannot be undertaken here.

Before concluding, we would like to refer explicitly once more to a question which we seem to have treated as of little importance until now. We refer to that conception of the gradual development of the spiritual life which orientates this development towards mystical experience and which, even in its pre-mystical stages, constructs this way in reference to this.

---

[15] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Zum theologischen Begriff der Konkupiszenz', ZKT LXV (1941), pp. 61-80, reprinted and enlarged in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1960), pp. 347-382.

[16] Cf. A. Stolz, Theologie der Mystik (Salzburg) and by the same author: 'Das Mönchsideal der morgendländischen Kirche' in: Ein Leib ein Geist. Einblicke in die Welt des christlichen Ostens (published by the Abbey Gerleve, Münster), pp. 69-83.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have left this conception to one side from the outset, as being an explanation which would lead us away from our real question and task. This procedure was indeed justified. For, seen from an empirical point of view, the spiritual life of the great majority of Christians does not end up in mysticism (at least if we take mysticism in the sense in which it was understood by the classical Spanish mystics) and, in general, the view adopted by the New Testament about the way and goal of the spiritual life (e.g. in the Sermon on the Mount) does not at least give explicit expression to such an orientation towards mysticism. [23] Yet all this was not meant to dispute the fact that even such a mystically orientated construction of the steps of the spiritual life contains a kernel of truth. Let us suppose that the notion of mysticism were to be purified of ideas which originated more from a neo-platonic spirituality than from a Christian one and which still find strong echoes in the concept of mysticism even today. Suppose furthermore that the immense intensification of the existential depth of acts of which man is capable, were to be sufficiently recognized, an intensification which is directed towards something which one could in fact call mystical experience. Suppose finally that all the lessons of psychical training contained in the usual mystical doctrine were then utilized in this direction. Under these presuppositions the greater part of what is contained in the mystically orientated theory of steps could no doubt be taken up and introduced at the right place into that doctrine of the gradual spiritual way which we have had in mind here without being able to work it Out completely.

Finally, it should be pointed out very briefly that what we have called the law of the existential deepening of acts corresponds to what the general history of religion calls the mystical factor in religion, and that what we have called the chain of situations comes to the same thing ultimately as what in the general history of religion is called the historico-eschatological factor. Thus, the defects which we have discovered in the theories of the gradual course of the spiritual life current up until now could also be formulated in the sense that in this gradual course the historico-eschatological element has been forgotten more or less completely, and that the mystical factor (the only governing factor in these theories) has been conceived in a too intellectualistic manner. In the ultimate analysis both these defects are connected.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[24]

2

THOUGHTS ON THE THEOLOGY OF CHRISTMAS

Christmas! One says the word almost a trifle despondently. Is it really possible to explain to someone today what is meant by it, to tell him what it means to celebrate Christmas? We are not thinking here of those who feel they cannot believe the Christian content of the doctrine to which this fact relates. We mean to ask rather whether we ourselves can celebrate Christmas, which surely means more than to believe this truth and then . . . leave it at that. Perhaps it would be better to rephrase the question and ask: how does one celebrate Christmas?

What is clear is that we do not really celebrate Christmas by giving presents, by putting up a Christmas tree, by making our home as cosy as possible or by other touching customs carried on in a mildly sceptical frame of mind. But what more is there? If, as Christians, we simply 'think' about the doctrine of the Incarnation of the eternal Word (even with good will and a desire to believe), then it is obviously not yet a Christian Christmas for us. Yet what more are we to do? Pray and attend Midnight Mass? But why should this make Christmas a properly celebrated Christmas when, after all, this 'celebration' takes place – at least, it is to be hoped – even at other times, daily or every Sunday?

It is, of course, impossible to give a 'recipe' telling us exactly how a Christian Christmas should be celebrated. Ultimately, everyone must find this out for himself or, better still, must pray for it to be granted to him as an undeserved grace. But perhaps . . . no, it cannot be done. Yet we can try; we will make an attempt to stammer out something like a recipe for it or at least to give a few pointers towards such a prescription.

Have the courage to be alone. Only once you have really managed to do this, and have achieved it in a Christian way, can you hope to give the present of a heart filled with the Christmas spirit – in other words, a gentle, patient, courageously collected, softly tender heart – to those [25] whom you are striving to love. (Even here it is necessary to choose one's words carefully.) This present is indeed something you should place under the Christmas tree, otherwise all other presents will simply be an unnecessary expense which could be incurred at any time of the year. And so for once try to endure your own company for a while. Perhaps you can find a room where you can be alone. Or you may know a lonely walk or a quiet church. Don't speak, then, not even with yourself nor with the others with whom we dispute and quarrel even when they are not there. Wait. Listen. You must not keep quiet in this way simply in order to be able to speak about it later on. You must enter into this silence in such a way as to be resolved never to leave it again, in so far as you really make the appeal to this silence and into this silent infinity your last word standing on its own account and not existing for the sake of anything else, something which no one else need hear apart from the one to whom it is really addressed. So: stop, be silent, wait. Do not cast furtive glances towards some strange mystical experience. Nothing but the dispassionate clarity of truth should appear in this silence, nothing but what is pure and silent. Do not express yourself. After all, you are to accept yourself (this after all is already almost more than merely a prelude to the soft song of the angels): you are not to empty yourself in self-accusation, nor to escape from yourself by too unconcerned a rejoicing, nor to enjoy your own self in a smug, small-minded way (for then you would have perceived nothing, neither of the celestial heights nor of the abysmal depths of your own existence). You must allow yourself to approach silently nearer and nearer to yourself: the past, the present and the future, in this moment of silence . . . all the waters of your life which flow away and run out and which are

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

collected in the one basin of a heart aware of itself. Perhaps you will then begin to feel quite horrified by what you see. Perhaps the bitter waters of disgust, of hollowness, emptiness and boredom will rise out of the depths to the surface of your heart. Perhaps you will realize then – if you admit it honestly – how distant all those are from you with whom you are in daily contact and with whom you would ordinarily say you are united in love. Perhaps you find nothing in yourself then but weakness, wretchedness and other things from which you would rather escape into the business of everyday life, a daily life which in such an experience appears to you as the only attainable bliss (and where it then goes under the name of work, duty, reasonableness, a sensible outlook without any illusions and similar names). Perhaps you will not be aware of anything but an uneasy feeling [26] of emptiness and deadness. Endure yourself! You will discover how everything proclaimed in such a silence is as if encompassed by a nameless remoteness, as if suffused by something which appears like emptiness. It is not something one could chase away. It looks at us through everything, it embraces everything; frightened, one may try to force oneself to overlook it, yet one cannot remove it. It would still appear as the all-embracing, distant and yet all-pervading emptiness, even if we were to stuff the heart as full as possible with tangible things, with 'realities', even if we were to try to block out all the horizons with such 'realities' (in distinction to the mysterious spectre which we have in mind), so that they might somehow and everywhere catch the attention when we regard this emptiness. It is like a silence whose stillness cries out, like the strange feeling one has of being looked at without knowing from where (and yet by eyes which, almost as if blind, cannot be explained). It is something which is always already present in one's mind: as soon as one thinks of today, the thought of tomorrow already sneaks in; as soon as one looks at something, one already compares it, by contrast, with something still to be sought; as soon as one makes a decision, what is decided is already encompassed by the knowledge that it could also be different; as soon as one puts the beaker to one's lips, one already looks to the bottom and through it into the abysmal depths beyond. 'It' is the reason why we are nowhere completely at home, why we cannot be given over completely to anything we grasp, why our look and grasp find nowhere an absolute end where they would truly have arrived with no further need to look out through it and stretch out towards the undetermined. One cannot simply leave this 'it' be, as a mere side-effect, and because the mysterious and the nameless are best left alone. For without 'it', there would also be no space of the heart in which we can meet familiar things; without 'it', nothing could be put in its right place, freedom could not say yes and no; without 'it', there would be no true past, and no room for the future in the planning mind. Everything would break up into the gloomy narrowness of the animal moment and of a dead self-forgetfulness; everything would not encounter everything else in a different place in the vast expanse which, unlocked and hence overlooked, spreads out as something unspeakable. 'Your eye alone – monstrously it looks at me, infinity'. One must look at the invisible and let the silent speak in stillness. Do that, but be careful. Do not call it God. Do not try to derive enjoyment from it, as if it were a part of yourself. It is a mute pointer in the direction of God, something which [27] in its namelessness and boundlessness gives us a hint that God is more than just another thing, added to those with which we normally have to deal. It points to Him. Through it, He allows us to become aware of his presence, if we are quiet and do not take fright and run away from the mysterious being which lives and acts in this silence (even if our flight were to be to the Christmas tree or our dash towards sounder religious ideas, ideas which can . . . kill religion).

But, all this is merely the beginning, the preparation for your celebration of Christmas. If you manage thus to stay alone with yourself and to let the silence speak to you of the true God, then this loudly calling silence will become strangely ambiguous. This infinity, which silently surrounds you – does it repulse you and drive you back into your limited daily life? Does it bid you yourself to go away out of the silence in which it rules? Does it fall upon you with the merciless loneliness of death so as to make you run away from it into the more familiar sectors of your life, until it catches up with you in destroying you, in swallowing you up in death? Does it come to mean for you only a vast and distant sphere, within which those things with which you have always been familiar take on for the first time for you a clear and at the same time small appearance? Is it merely the judgement which, working from afar, arranges your little world and, by revealing its finiteness, judges it? Or is it that which waits until you are open to its very self as something approaching, coming, the promised beatitude? Can it approach you itself without your passing away, tenderly stealing into your heart without bursting it? Is it salvation or judgement? What would happen if it crashed down from its distant heavens on the little field of your life: would your sinfulness be dashed to pieces or would it be redeemed into freedom? Does the one whom this 'it' announces in trembling remain proclaimed as the eternally distant One or is he announced as the One who is coming? If you merely ask your heart alone, your lonely heart which looks into the distance, then it cannot give you any clear answer. The fear of death and the promise of infinity approaching in blessing are bound too closely together and are too similar to allow us to give our own interpretation of the infinity which encompasses us from a distance and is yet close at hand. It is not as if this infinity did not say anything. If it said nothing, then we would find it quite impossible to celebrate Christmas from our heart. It certainly tells us something, and even something quite exact: the message of Christmas told from within. For this message does not ring out merely (and not [28] even primarily) in the powerless words falling from our pulpits (almost like birds frozen to death and falling from the winter skies); this message is told us by God, at that point of the heart to which we should return; it is told us by the light of the Christmas grace which enlightens everyone who comes into the world. The message of the birth of the Lord would remain external, would be spoken only to the ear and in ideas, but would not enter into and be celebrated in the heart. The experience from within and the message from without come to meet each other, and where the one understands itself in the other there the celebration of Christmas takes place, since faith comes by hearing and by the grace which rises in the innermost centre of the heart. For this reason, it is the same also in the celebration of Christmas.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The message of faith which comes in the hearing of the word opens the eyes of inner experience so that this experience may have the confidence to understand itself correctly and to accept the sweet comfort of its uncanny mystery as the real meaning of this experience: God is really close to you – there where you are – when you have really found your way (and not just in concepts) into the openness to infinity possessed by the real man. Once this has happened, God's descent into the flesh will explain to you the secret, blessed meaning of the transcendency of his Spirit that is to be found in the event of Christmas. God's remoteness is the incomprehensibility of his all-pervading nearness, says the message of Christmas. He is tenderly present. He is near. He touches your heart softly with his love. He says: fear not. He is imprisoned within. We think he is not there, since there has not yet been a moment in our life when we have not already found him in the gentle sweetness of his nameless love as soon as we began looking for him. He is there like the pure light which, spread over everything, hides itself by making everything else visible in the silent lowliness of its being. Christmas tells you in the experience of solitude to: trust the nearness, it is not emptiness; let go and then you will find; give up and then you will be rich. For in your interior experience you are no longer dependent on the hard tangible phenomena which, by asserting themselves in themselves, achieve a rigid individualization and which can be fastened on precisely because they can be encompassed; you, however, possess much more than any such phenomena, for the infinite has become nearness. This is how you must interpret your interior experience; you must experience it in this way as the most solemn feast and celebration of the divine descent of eternity into time – of the infinite into the finite – [29] and of God's marriage with his

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

creature. This feast takes place within you, even within your very self (theologians dryly call it 'grace'). It takes place within you when you are silent, when you wait and when in faith, hope and charity, you interpret correctly (i.e. in the light of Christmas) what you experience.

The experience of the heart (in spirit and in grace, and not by one's own power!) gives us the really true understanding of the Christmas message of faith.[1] Yet for this you must first of all take some trouble to understand the message of Christmas even in a conceptual way before you try to understand it better in the silent experience of your heart.

God has become man. Alas, we say this with such ease, without giving the matter much thought, and (even when we have drummed into ourselves the exact orthodox formulae) we will so easily and not even infrequently understand something Monophysite or Nestorian by it (and this not only those of us who are sceptical or have been 'demythologized'). We will only too easily conceive the man who has 'become' God (in this statement, 'God' is the subject and not the predicative term) as a kind of disguise, a livery of the 'good God' – so that basically God is after all merely the bare God, and one does not know whether he is really present where we are (and not merely his 'signal') – and then interpret this simple but false conception either in a Monophysite or in a Nestorian sense. It is not easy to give even a merely verbal indication of this suspended, incomprehensible truth (which precisely in this way is the firm reality). God is man: this does not mean that he has ceased to be God in the unconfined fullness of his divine majesty. God is man: this does not mean that the 'human' in him is something which does not really concern him at all, something which is externally manipulated by him as a mere tool, something which, because it remains 'unmixed' and thus has been merely 'assumed' (beside him, even though by him) or added, does not really express anything about him and merely brings us, not him, into evidence. God is man, this really tells us something about God himself. Because the human itself, affirmed by the fact that he pledges himself to us, is really and truly affirmed of him himself (although differently from his divinity), [30] this human nature is thus his very own reality in which he himself and not merely a human nature different from him comes out to meet us, so that, when one grasps this humanity, one has in very truth understood and grasped something of God himself. God's human nature must not be identified in dead conformity with God's divinity, nor must it be merely deposited beside God, like something dead which always simply falls back into itself something joined verbally to him by an empty 'and'. When God manifests his humanity, then (since it is not something abstract) it always meets us in such a way that he himself is there, since this full and genuine humanity always is itself precisely because it is his and because it is human in absolute purity and perfection and is precisely his. Because we merely place the divinity and humanity side by side in the incarnate Word of the Father (almost merely speak of them side by side and one after the other), because we merely place their unity and distinction side by side as two expressions, instead of understanding that they both arise from one and the same common ground, although this common ground appears to us only in the twofold expression behind which it hides itself as a mystery . . . because of this, we are continually in danger of missing the exact point at which the blessed secret of Christmas finds in our self-transcending existence the place to incorporate itself into our life and history as our salvation.

It would be good, therefore, if we would call upon the experience of our heart so that we might surmise blissfully what is meant by the Incarnation of the Eternal Word. It would be good if this took place in that stillness in which alone one is present to oneself in self-knowledge. Although this can never replace faith in what Jesus tells us about himself, yet we

[1] For the better understanding and orthodox interpretation of what follows, we would refer the reader to: B. Welte, 'Homoousios hemin' (in: Das Konzil von Chalkedon, ed. by A. Grillmeier and H. Bacht, Vol. III, Würzburg 1954, pp. 51-80) and (in the same collective work): K. Rahner, 'Chalkedon – Ende oder Anfang?' (pp. 3-49), reproduced in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1960), pp. 149-200.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can contribute to this experience as something added to those concepts in which, since he did so in human words, Jesus has communicated the secret of Christmas – his secret – to us by sharing what is our secret, the secret of being man.

What are the facts? God is present to the one who is silent, who lets everything recede into his finite limitation and who looks towards its horizon in order to look beyond it despite the fact that there is not 'anything' to be seen there. But God is present first of all, and perhaps only, in a nearness of distance. He is present at a distance which would seem to be about to consume and destroy us when it comes near to us; at a distance which keeps us and all other things bound within the bounds of our finite being, our fallibility and possibility of guilt. And yet man is precisely [31] in this way open, one who does not possess within himself what he essentially needs in order to be himself. A stone could be expressed far more exhaustively than man by what it has and is within itself. Man can be expressed only by talking about something else: about God, who he is not. It is impossible to engage in anthropology without having first engaged in theology, since man is pure reference to God. Thus he himself is a mystery, always referred beyond himself into the mystery of God. This is his being; he is defined by the indefinable which he is not, but without which he is not even (nor realizes) what he is. If this absolute reference is closed to the sub-human, precisely because the latter is not spiritual, it follows that this reference is exactly the state man gets into when he does not want to bother about anything but himself: he wants to look at himself, and for this he cannot help looking into the mystery which he is not. Now, suppose that this reference and self-transcendence were to succeed absolutely, without the human thereby being cancelled out but rather being fulfilled, since after all it is this self-transcendence; suppose that this taking in of the infinite as the indefinable in man were to take place fully, not from a man who of himself would always be radically incapable of it (since, precisely in his transcendence, he always falls back again into his separating subsistence) but proceeding from God, i.e. if God's infinity were to come absolutely close by God's own initiative; suppose that man accepts it in such a way that what is accepted is thereby also preserved and yet is the presence and the gradual tangibility of what God knows of himself in his divine infinity and of what he says of himself in that unbounded freedom; suppose that this tangibility thus present were to be found where it can be alone, viz. in someone who, coming from the lowest unsubstantial, evolving fringe of created reality, is already always the absolute, though empty, openness of the world for the infinity of God, i.e. in man; suppose that we were to let this presentiment under the stillness of the heart lose itself into the boundless (where after all, in accordance with its nature, it wants to lose itself); then we would at least have a dim feeling for the direction from which comes the statement of the Christmas gospel: the Word, who was with God and who was God, was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we saw his glory.

We could and perhaps should say still more. When we speak in this connection of the assumption of a human nature by the Word of God, then (although perhaps we should not) we have already *pre*supposed man [32] and human nature as a possibility. We have conceived creation as a self-evident fact and God's becoming a creature as a subsequent event not at all self-evident but resting on that self-evident fact. What is quite correct in this attitude is the fact that God could also be the Creator without identifying himself with creation in the unity of a subject by his becoming man. It is correct that we are already living in the known creation when we get to know the mystery of the Incarnation. Yet it is possible to pose a question here: does not the possibility of a creation rest after all – at least in itself even though not immediately known to us – on the possibility of God's becoming a creature; does not the possibility of something being 'thrown' into the world rest on the possibility of a divine self-projection into finite reality (God, who in himself is always the absolutely full and complete Infinite Being, having no need of such a self-projection to be exercised), of a self-projection which is free but which expresses in freedom precisely what God is (always is):

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

viz. prodigal love? If this is so, however (which cannot be explained in greater detail here), then it must be said more precisely that the world, as it actually is, exists because God is the prodigal who in fact squanders himself and that when he does this, then he is in the other into which he divests himself, in what we call a man – the absolute openness for God – and finally because God cannot divest himself in any other way than by creating what is capable of receiving him. When God 'lets himself go outside of himself', then there appears man – who for this very reason is pure openness for God – out of the very fringe of nothingness (i.e. of the material). When God expresses himself out of himself into the emptiness of the non-divine, when he engages in 'theology' outside of himself, then 'what comes out' is nothing else but anthropology engaged in by him in the Incarnation understood as his own self-expression; and for this theology, anthropology is not a pre-established vocabulary but one which springs from it. However true it is that this happens only by the fact that God creates this grammar of his self-expression out of nothing, this grammar – since it itself springs from this theology as such – can really also express God and not merely something else. And this something else in which God expresses himself is the human understood as the living, the 'self-moving', the freely God-related in the movement of the creature. For if creation in the real order of things occurs originally as a moment of that divine divestment into something alien which he must project for himself in advance so that he might have something into which he can really give himself away – and if creation is [33] nevertheless the calling forth of the real by God, who can make something more than any mere puppets which could no doubt assert themselves among themselves but not before God – then what is nearest to God, i.e. God in the flesh, must be the most powerful and the most alive, the most original centre of what is alive and of what is master of itself in the world, precisely because (and not, although) it is God himself. If we think as it were in the prolongation of our own spiritual existence which we realize in silence, we may get some idea of what it means that God has become man, and we may thus get a better understanding of the message of the faith. If such an existence were transferred absolutely to the infinite being; if it were taken over completely, while we always attempt in principle to come nearer to this goal without ever reaching it; if it were precisely by this fact the free and accomplished human reality: then it would be – what Jesus is; in this way we could be confident in our infinite movement that the Infinite is near to us in loving communication.

Perhaps we have been overmuch occupied with theology, and have given too little guidance for meditation, although we had intended to do the latter rather than the former. But let us return into the silence which, in the faith in the correctly understood Christmas message, is an existential experience of the infinite man (who can only thus experience himself as a creature!) and which tells us something which is the way it is precisely because God himself has become man. Even though we cannot, by mere reflection on ourselves, distinguish by ourselves the Christian determination of this existential experience from its natural being, since we can nowhere escape from the realm of grace and Christ and there experience a pure nature, yet we may and indeed must nevertheless say: we would also experience ourselves differently internally, if God had not been born as a man. If we accept the silent immensity – that immensity which surrounds us as something distant and yet at the same time near and overpowering – as a protecting nearness and a tender love which does not make any reservations; if we have the courage to understand ourselves in this way, which is possible only in grace and in faith (whether one knows it or not), then we have had the Christmas experience of grace in faith. This experience is very simple; yet it is the peace promised to men of good will who are pleasing to God.

If one comes from there and if this experience rises up out of the inner centre of the heart and finds its way into the manifold variety of external reality (since after all it understands itself also only because it has accepted [34] its own meaning in this way) then this experience

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

must encounter in a historically tangible way the one towards whom it reaches out – illuminating and itself illuminated by him – Jesus, in whom the whole fullness of the Godhead is bodily present to us in the humility of our own nature. And it is present there in its historical reality, in his Word, in the permanence of his presence in that Church which in Holy Communion celebrates what he instituted by having him truly present in flesh and blood among those who partake in the celebration. Hence, any interior celebration of Christmas which attains the complete fulfilment of its own true nature, can only end there where – in the congregation of the Lord which possesses him and represents him for the world – the believer is given the body in which the Word became flesh and dwells among us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[35]

3

THE ETERNAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE HUMANITY OF JESUS FOR OUR RELATIONSHIP WITH GOD

I

When we reflect on the Sacred Heart devotion in theology, we try to determine the significance of the heart in general, and of the Sacred Heart in particular; we talk about how this Heart is the original source of all our Lord's saving actions, and perhaps consider the reasons why this heart considered in the totality of the person of Christ is worthy of a special, specifically articulated adoration and what this can mean for us. We overlook in this case, in our opinion, a question which is difficult and obscure not merely with regard to its answer, but also in the sense that it requires great effort to formulate and clarify it. This is the question (which will have to be explicitly clarified) as to whether the adoration we actually give does in fact reach what we call the heart of Jesus? To understand what is meant by this, it will be necessary to delve a little further into this matter.

A man has to deal with many things and persons, and has to deal with them in many different ways. He experiences the home and the country in which he lives, he experiences persons with whom he associates. He has also to do with God. It can perhaps be said that everything he has to deal with is in fact divided into two groups and ultimately only into two groups. In fact, we have even two different names for them: the world and God. The world, understood as the world around us, takes in everything which presents itself directly to us, everything which in its own being enters into the realm of our experience, quite of its own accord and in itself. God, on the other hand, is the one 'on the other side'; he is precisely the one who is known as the distant one, who is present through his not being given, who is present through his incomprehensibility and his silence. He has indeed addressed the Christian in His revelation; he has [36] made himself noticeable among us here below, even to the extent of the tangible flesh of his co-essential Son. Yet all these signs are always also precisely a challenge, ut per visibilia ad invisibilium amorem rapiamur (so that visible things may transport us to the love of the invisible). He does indeed sanctify and redeem the world – the world itself – yet in such a way that he bursts it open and invests us with the dynamic power (called supernatural love) to leap out in adoration into the darkness of his own light.

To come now to our first question: into which of these basic divisions belong the Saints, the angels, the glorified humanity of Christ, and his heart? Objectively speaking, they all belong to the world, in so far as this is understood as the sum total of what is created and in so far as we know anything about them by faith, experience or in any other way. But 'knowing about something' and 'really having dealings with something', 'really relating to something', accepting the existence of something by theoretical reason and existentially, i.e. associating lovingly with something, giving oneself to it, are two different things. In the second sense, these persons about whom we are asking where they belong, belong rather to God. They are found in our experience where God is; they come up precisely in our religious attitude, after all, and nowhere else. From the point of view of our experience, therefore, they do not belong to the world around us, but – since otherwise there would be no place for them at all – belong to God.

But here the difficulty begins and there arises the second question: can they belong to God? This is not as if we were questioning their existence. We are asking whether we attain them when we look for them in the direction in which we move religiously towards God. This again is not meant in the objectivist sense of asking whether they know anything about us, about those of our acts which are directed towards them, our prayers, etc. All this we presuppose as self-evident. What is meant, however, is whether we reach them by our acts, whether we not only know them theoretically but can also come to a realization of their existence in our association with them. Or is it perhaps so, that when we look for them in that realm beyond our experience where God is and where he must be if he is to be God at all, they as it were grow hazy from us and seem to be just sounds and names, seem as it were to dissolve (only for us, of course) within this all-devouring, nameless and uncharted darkness we call God?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let no one say that this is just an artificial subtlety tortuously formulated; [37] after all – it might be objected – we do know that these persons and realities exist, that we can relate to them intentionally, and that this has a meaning and usefulness. Furthermore (so the objection might go on) the simple fact of the matter is precisely that we not only can do this, but also do actually do it: and you cannot argue with facts. Yet this is precisely the question: do we really do what we think we do? Or are the names of the Saints, of the Angels, of the humanity of Christ, just so many changing labels for us by which we – quoad nos – always mean only one and the same thing, which is conjured up by them, viz. God?

Let us not put this question as a theoretical principle for all times, but as a question facing us today! In this form it is not so easy to answer. The man of previous ages may indeed have had a very obvious capacity for thinking out such types of numinous powers and persons outside God, to such an extent that he was continually in danger of sliding into a theoretical or at least practical polytheism. But do we? Is it not precisely the reverse in our case? In our case, is not everything, which we conserve from the objective teaching of faith in this regard, reducible to different names always meaning the same thing, viz. God, the one and only being which has remained beyond our sensible experience of the world, and which is still left to us even after the disappearance of all other numinous realities? We should not be too quick to put our trust in the façade and traditional accoutrements of our piety. We should instead ask ourselves a few simple questions: who among us has ever really and genuinely realized in the Confiteor that he is confessing his sinfulness to Blessed Michael the Archangel, and that this really is not just a rhetorical amplification of a confession to God? Have we not really lost sight of our own deceased relatives? We pray for them perhaps, because this is the done thing and because we would otherwise have a bad conscience about it. But apart from that, if we are honest, they have ceased to exist for us. Yet ontologically and existentially this would not be possible if we really had that relationship to the saints which we think we have: for this rests fundamentally on that general relationship to those who have passed beyond. Let us take a look at an average theological treatise on the Last Things, on eternal happiness. Does such a treatise mention even a single word about the Lord become man? Is not rather everything swallowed up by the visio beatifica, the beatific vision, the direct relationship to the very essence of God which is indeed determined historically by a past event – namely the event of Christ – but which is not now mediated by [38] Jesus Christ? Does not this observation on the usual present-day theology (distinguishing itself in this from the old theology) show also that as far as our real capacity of realization is concerned, the whole world (in the objective sense) is inexistent and is as it were swallowed up as far as we are concerned (not in itself) by the blazing abyss of God, even when we do not admit it to ourselves and retain the opposite terminology, though almost in the same way in which we talk about Eros with his arrows? Who among the younger generation still really prays today to the Saints . . . to his name-saint, to his guardian angel? One perhaps still honours a Saint (this is something quite different), a Saint whom one knows about historically, in his historical reality, just as the pagans honour their historically great men. But is the now living Saint a realized, i.e. not merely theoretically accepted, reality for us side by side with and apart from God, a reality which has its own independent actuality, on whose good will something depends, with which one tries to establish personal contact, and which one tries to draw into one's really experienced world? Or does one merely use the word 'Angel' at one time, and Mary or the Sacred Heart or St Joseph at another time, and yet realizes in all this always the same thing, viz. the incomprehensibility and inappellable sovereignty of God to which one surrenders oneself completely, in fear and trembling and in love at the same time? Does not this and only this appear to us as the religious act, while everything else appears merely as a colourful reflection of the unchangingly One, as a prismatic refraction of the one white light of God, which in itself has no existence of its own? Why otherwise do we find it difficult today to believe in the legions of devils, and why do we prefer to speak abstractly about the 'diabolical', just as our pagan contemporaries – whom, behind a verbal façade, we often resemble much more than we should imagine – like to speak of the 'saintly' or 'the divine'? Why do we discover with surprise that one can observe a capacity for realizing numinous powers, gods and angels, in Hölderlin or Rilke, a capacity which we experience as stronger than our own? We know, for example, that the angels in Rilke are basically merely a literary ornament in comparison with the Christian belief in angels such as it should be. Yet we feel at the same time that these angels in Rilke are nevertheless stronger than in our faith as we actually exercise it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Perhaps we understand now what is meant by our initial question about the Sacred Heart. This heart – if it is not turned into just another, more colourful word for God and for the incomprehensibility of his unbounded [39] love – is a human heart. It must not be extolled merely in the actions which at one time flowed from it. It must not be merely the object of a backward-looking adoration which refers to the historical Lord during his life on earth. This heart, which exists now, which no longer belongs to the world around us, which seems to be lost in the far distance of God. . . this heart is to be honoured, adored and loved. It is to be realized in our piety; it must not be merely a name, a part of the colourful reflection which accompanies the never-changing basic act directed towards God and towards him alone. Is it so self-evident that we will be successful in this? Again: the fact that this heart does actually exist, that we know about it and that we are capable of the theoretical discernment of its being worthy of adoration, that we think we adore it and want to adore it . . . all this is not yet an absolutely certain, affirmative answer to this question. All one needs do is to merely listen more closely some time to certain formulations occurring in the case of such a well-meaning and well-intentioned Sacred Heart devotion which, however, is actually a monotheistic adoration of God simply labelled with these words; one would then notice that such a question cannot be so easily answered in the affirmative. One could in such formulations simply replace the word 'heart' by 'Christ', and 'Christ' again by 'God', without anything being changed in the meaning or the essential intentionality of the prayer – a sign, that what is said is not realized in a seriously religious way.

The question we have posed, of course, changes at once into a practical question: if it is not a matter of course that the religious act attains the Sacred Heart itself, in distinction to God, how then can this be achieved? After all, we know from the outset that this represents a real task and that the attempt to make it successful is justified. For there must be a 'latria' of the humanity of Christ and a veneration of the Saints and Angels.

II

In answering the above question, we have to put the most difficult part of it into parentheses from the start, viz. the question about the subjective side of the problem, about overcoming the shrinking of the existential potency of realizing genuinely numinous powers and realities which are nevertheless distinct from God. One might say: because we are no longer in danger

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of becoming polytheists, we are now in danger of no longer being able to honour created holiness and hence are also in danger of [40] allowing God to pale into an abstract postulate of the theoretical or practical reason, which is possibly still draped in Christian terms. But as we have said, we cannot treat here of the problem as to how this basically human, and in a sense pre-Christian, adventistic potency of attaining a realization of a genuinely and truly pluralistic religious 'beyond' with angels, saints, Holy Souls, and devils, can be awakened, nurtured and developed, and this precisely as a human capacity and as a natural potency. Such an existential 'midwifery' is a task which would overtax both our powers and the time at our disposal.

All we can do here is to try to contribute a little to the answer of our question, as far as the objective facts are concerned. Our contribution consists of two reflections: a universal and basic one on the relationship between created (numinous) realities and God in general, and the same sort of reflection on the humanity of Christ and his human heart in particular.

Our existential insensitivity and the weakness of our power of realization regarding non-divine realities which fall, or ought to fall, into the sphere of religious acts, is at least partially due to a false, basically unchristian, pantheistic or theophanistic conception of God. The true God is not the one who kills so that he himself can live. He is not 'the truly real' which like a vampire draws to himself and so to speak sucks out the proper reality of things different from himself; he is not the esse omnium. The nearer one comes to him, the more real one becomes; the more he grows in and before one, the more independent one becomes oneself. Things created by him are not maya, the veil, which dissolves like mist before the sun the more one recognizes the Absolute, i.e. the more religious one becomes. We do indeed feel this way, and it would be important to answer the question as to why we feel like this. But this basic existential condition, no matter how deep and even humble it may seem to be, is itself again a pride due to original sin and something profoundly unchristian. One loves 'the Absolute', but not God who is the creator of heaven and earth. Basically one hates created reality, since it is not the absolute in itself; one calls it the relative, the contingent, that which – in relation to God – is determinable in a merely negative sense, the mere limitation of being which in itself is infinite, which alone matters: and one forgets that precisely this conditioned reality is what is loved unconditionally by the Unconditioned, that it therefore has a validity which makes it more than something merely provisional – something which [41] dissolves in the face of God – and that this created unconditioned reality forbids us (in spite of all philosophy which, even in our case, is not yet sufficiently baptized) to evaluate it in a purely negative sense even in relation to God.

No one can say that these are themselves merely ontological expressions which are of no importance for the religious act. No, precisely when we come face to face with the Absolute by a religious act in the course of our existential realization – and if we do this in a Christian and not in a platonic sense (and in this context, even every form of Aristotelianism and every Western philosophy right up to German Idealism is still far too platonic) – then (and hence in the very heart of the religious act) we come face to face with that absolutely serious love of what has been created by that Love: the valid, eternal, living reality, that which truly is, precisely because – and not even though – it exists through this Love. We arrive at that which has a significance of its own, that which cannot be passed over, which is not simply already to be found eminenter in God (for otherwise he would not have loved it effectively and in a truly, creatively free way). When we come thus in a religious way to this God of the truly serious and unconditional love of created reality, however, then we must love him as he is, then we must not maliciously try to turn him in our religious act into someone he precisely is not, viz. into a God without a world. Instead, we must love everything loved by him with his love, and so must love it in that precise way – not as something provisional, as the cloud which, breaking up its contours, dissolves in the presence of the infinity opening up before us

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

– but precisely as something valid in the sight of God, as something eternally justified and hence as something divinely and religiously significant before God.

A pluralistic world of the numinous finds its meaning and its justification in the sight of the God of Christianity. The effort of holding on to this truth is the effort of overcoming our unchristian outlook and of solving the sinful dilemma into which original sin throws us: God or the world. A polytheistic, or polytheistically tinged, enslaving veneration of the powers and forces of this world is merely the other side of the same guilty dilemma: the numinous nature of the world without the one, living God. But the opposite springs from the same cleavage: the God-lessness of the world. We today are in danger of honouring God (or at least of trying to honour him) and of letting the world itself be God-less. The Christian attitude, however, would be to honour the world as something [42] willed and loved by God, and to do this in a properly balanced way, since this love given to the world is itself of varying degrees; hence, it would be Christian to pay a truly religious veneration where the world has already found the finality of its eternal validity before God in the morning and evening summits of its spiritual history, i.e. in the angels and the saints. It should, therefore, be a task of theology to think much more deeply, and in a much more vital manner than it has done up till now, about why, how and in what dependence of the basic religious acts on God, what it calls dulia (veneration), in contrast to latria (adoration), is in truth a genuinely religious act, and how, as such an act, it can and must be exercised more independently and not merely as an act which simply resolves itself into the act of latria. Signs of the great difficulty of such a Christianization of the basic religious act directed towards God are to be seen even within the theory of Christian mysticism. This theory has always been tempted (even in St John of the Cross) to let everything in the mystic act disappear in the face of God, so that over and over again subsequent corrections of such a basic start on a pantheistic basis were found to be necessary to enable the mystic to hold on to the fact that he may and can still occupy himself with the humanity of Christ.

It can be seen, at any rate, that the question of whether one can still take other realities beside the reality of God seriously and realize them in a religious act is a question of the first order and importance in Christian thought. That it does not take on this importance in ordinary piety is no argument against this statement. Ordinary piety, for which God is after all from the very start one reality beside many others, naturally does not experience any difficulty in regarding St Anthony as a most noteworthy, important and effective figure, side by side with the Holy Ghost. But then, in this case, this does detract from God and from our true relationship to him who does not tolerate any strange gods before him (not even those in whose case one carefully avoids using the name of God). But when God becomes more and more truly God for us – the consuming fire, the simply incomparable, the one who in his grace has become near after being most radically distant – then only a mature Christian relationship to God would be still capable of recognizing and realizing in this burning flame and blinding light that this makes the rest of reality loved by him even more real, even more true and valid, and that in this boundless sea of fire of infinite degree everything is not destroyed but that in it everything finds its real life, not only in itself but also for us. Yet because [43] such maturity is also a beatifying task of our religious development in God's true grace, which always works differently from what we ourselves might imagine, it is our duty to make an effort to attain it.

Leaving creatures is the first and, for us sinners, always new phase of finding God. Yet it is merely the first stage. Service towards creatures, the mission away from God back into the world, may be the second phase. Yet there is still a third: to find the very creature itself, in its dependence and autonomy, in God, in the midst of the jealously burning inexorableness of His being-all-in-all; to find the creature even in the very midst of this – the small in the great, the circumscribed in the boundless, the creature (the very creature itself) in the Creator – this is only the third and highest phase of our relationship to God. For there we who have gone out from the world to God, return with him in his entrance into the world, and are nearest to him there where he is furthest away from himself in his true love of the world; there and in this we are nearest to him because, if God is love, one comes closest to it where, having given itself as love to the world, it is furthest away from itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is the framework within which must be seen the special question of the honouring of Christ's humanity in general and of his human heart in particular. For, the fact that God himself is man is both the unique summit and the ultimate basis of God's relationship to his creation, in which he and his creation grow in direct (and not in converse) proportion. This positive nature of creation, not merely measured in relation to nothingness but also in relation to God, reaches its qualitatively unique climax, therefore, in Christ. For, according to the testimony of the faith, this created human nature is the indispensable and permanent gateway through which everything created must pass if it is to find the perfection of its eternal validity before God. He is the gate and the door, the Alpha and Omega, the all-embracing in whom, as the one who has become man, creation finds its stability. He who sees him, sees the Father, and whoever does not see him – God become man – also does not see God. We may speak about the impersonal Absolute without the non-absolute flesh of the Son, but the personal Absolute can be truly found only in him, in whom dwells the fullness of the Godhead in the earthly vessel of his humanity. Without him every absolute of which we speak or which we imagine we attain by mystical flight is in the last analysis merely the never attained, objective correlative of that empty and hollow, dark and despairingly self-consuming infinity which we are ourselves: the infinity of dissatisfied [44] finiteness, but not the blessed infinity of truly limitless fullness. This, however, can be found only where Jesus of Nazareth is, this finite concrete being, this contingent being, who remains in all eternity.

The decisive factor for the basic question of our whole reflection is, however, the following: Jesus, the Man, not merely was at one time of decisive importance for our salvation, i.e. for the real finding of the absolute God, by his historical and now past acts of the Cross, etc., but – as the one who became man and has remained a creature – he is now and for all eternity the permanent openness of our finite being to the living God of infinite, eternal life; he is, therefore, even in his humanity the created reality for us which stands in the act of our religion in such a way that, without this act towards his humanity and through it (implicitly or explicitly), the basic religious act towards God could never reach its goal. One always sees the Father only through Jesus. Just as *im*mediately as this, for the directness of the vision of God is not a denial of the mediatorship of Christ as man. One will have to say that, on the one hand, this truth of the objective and subjective mediatorship of Christ as man is hardly likely to be ever in danger of being theoretically denied by anyone who is a Christian but that, on the other hand, it has not yet by a long way been thought through and conceptually worked out as much as it ought to be. We reflect in most cases merely on the historical and moral mediatorship of the Son of Man during his life on earth. Consequently the humanity of Christ becomes unimportant in our average religious consciousness of faith. We still know somewhere or other in our conceptual knowledge of faith that there is this humanity and that it is blessed and glorified and in possession of the visio beatifica. One will perhaps give a pious thought to the consideration (not, of course, in dogmatic theology) that 'besides' the visio beatifca (in which every other knowledge and beatitude is given supereminently, so that one does not really see what else could still be of interest) one might still be able to derive an 'accidental' joy from the humanity of Christ in heaven. Yet where is the clear knowledge, expressed in ontological terms, of the fact that it remains eternally true to say that no one knows the Father except the Son and those to whom he wishes to reveal it: he who sees him, sees the Father? Where is the clear consciousness that, here and now and always, my salvation, my grace, my knowledge of God, rests on the Word in our flesh? The fact that it is very difficult to formulate, prove and explain all this exactly and sufficiently clearly in metaphysical terms is no reason for [45] quietly passing over these things. It is easier to show with some semblance of truth that this is impossible. Yet, after all, this is the same for all truths of faith. Theologians are not immune from the danger of denying or silently suppressing truths of faith by means of rationalistic philosophical strategems, even when these truths are completely obvious in the Church's unreflected consciousness of faith without being already explicitly stated in 'Denzinger'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Attempts to bring this truth into a clear light have already been made and should be further extended and deepened. The doctrine of the eternal liturgy and intercession of Christ in heaven is part of this. One should ask oneself whether, looked at from this 'existential point of view', the doctrine of the physical, instrumental causality exercised by the humanity of Christ for all grace, does not recognize a truth – although perhaps in a questionable way and one which has not yet attained its own particular presuppositions – a truth which must absolutely be preserved. Every theologian should allow himself to be asked: have you a theology in which the Word – by the fact that he is man and in so far as he is this – is the necessary and permanent mediator of all salvation, not merely at some time in the past but now and for all eternity? Does your theology really see him in this way, so that by being this God-Man he also is so bound up by his humanity with the religious act that this act goes (consciously or unconsciously) through this humanity to God, and so that this humanity is essentially and always the mediating object of the one act of latria which has God for its goal? It should be pointed out that this Christ-question concerning our basic religious acts does not signify merely that one can 'also' adore the One who has become man, and this 'even' in his human nature. Happily, this truth is to be found in every dogmatic theology. Yet unfortunately it does not say in every dogmatic theology that if the religious act really wants to reach God, it always and in every case has and must have exactly this 'incarnational' structure which must also have its subjective parallel to the basic objective condition: viz. that in the Incarnate Word, God has communicated himself to the world, so that this Word remains eternally the Christ. This incarnational structure of the religious act in general does not mean, of course, that this must always be something explicitly conscious or that, given the confined area of our earthly consciousness, it would be possible, beneficial and necessary to strive for such an explicit consciousness of passing through the Incarnate Word always and in every act.

[46] No one will expect us to work out this merely postulated theology in the present context. It is enough to have at least indicated that there can and ought to be such a theology. If this is so, however, then the question with which we began our reflections here can at least be answered a little further. If the 'Heart of Jesus' means the original centre of the human reality of the Son of God, then there must be a basic religious act which is mediated by and goes through this centre to God. Then 'the Heart' can and must not be merely a name and an empty word in this act, a word whose real content realized in a religious way would be the indefinable, nameless reality of God alone. This 'Heart' really means the human heart. This is what is really meant by it, to this our acts are really related, and it is really present 'for us' and not merely in itself. It is this heart in its finiteness, in the definable clarity of its love by which it is distinguished – though inseparably – from the mystery of divine love, which in itself can harbour in the abyss of its origin both grace and judgement, mercy and anger, and which becomes clearly love for us only once (and because) it has incarnated itself in the heart of Jesus, in the flesh of our flesh and in the finiteness of our existence. This is the heart which is meant: this heart itself, taken both as object and as goal, or better, as mediating centre, as the centre of mediation, through which all our movement must pass if it is really to arrive at God. Ut apertum cor . . . piis esset requies et poenitentibus pateret salutis refugium . . . (so that the opened heart . . . might be a resting place for the pious and be open to the penitent as a refuge of salvation . . .). Such words are not just vague pious phrases and sentimentalities; they form an absolutely exact statement which academic theology has not yet been able to surpass. The heart is not only the original centre of our Lord's human being, but even within this it is the centre of mediation, without which there can be no approach to God. It is this in such a way that human words become extremely inadequate here – one can never leave this entrance behind as a thing of the past. Rather, one arrives continually by continually passing through this mediating centre of Christ's humanity. This is analogous to the fact that we ourselves never cease being creatures even when we become partakers of the Godhead. One can be a Christian without ever having heard anything in human words about the Sacred Heart of Jesus. But one cannot be a Christian without continually passing, by a movement of the spirit supported by the Holy Ghost, through the humanity of Christ and, in that humanity, through its unifying centre which we call the heart.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[47]

4

REFLECTIONS ON THE THEOLOGY OF RENUNCIATION

The theology of 'renunciation' (of detachment, of 'giving up'), with which we are here concerned, belongs in the framework of a theology of the Evangelical Counsels, i.e. if we understand 'renunciation' here as something common to all three Evangelical Counsels. Hence, by 'renunciation' we do not mean here just any kind of giving-up of some good, i.e. not just 'self-control' in general (for instance with regard to some subordinate tendency), such as must be demanded by any ethics. By 'renunciation' we understand here that particular radical renunciation which is expressed in the Evangelical Counsels understood as permanent forms of life. Of course, only the reflections which are now to follow can show us that this includes not merely a gradually increased renunciation (as demanded basically by any ethics) but something more than that.

Until we have determined the theological essence of this renunciation more exactly, it will be impossible to say whether the common element which is undoubtedly present in the Counsels (since they all 'renounce' something, whether it be riches, marriage or free self-determination), determines the essence of the Evangelical Counsels. A more detailed proof of what is simply stated here is not possible in as narrow a context as ours. Hence, all we can really do is simply to draw up certain 'theses', in the hope that they will be fairly evident even without our giving more detailed reasons for them.

I

1. Christian perfection consists simply and solely in the perfection of the love which is given us in Christ by the Spirit of God who is communicated to us in justification and sanctification. This love embraces God and [48] spiritual creatures in their union in the Kingdom of God. In this way it takes on a theological and – by its origin (i.e. Christ in the Church) and in its goal (i.e. the union of all redeemed in God) – an ecclesiological[1] character. In its nature of *super*natural love, this love takes hold of man and his world – a world caught up in itself (even though 'before' God) –and bursts them wide open, opening them out into the life of God himself, a life which has already arrived even though it is still hidden in faith. Supernatural love has consequently an eschatologically transcendent (supramundane) character. This character of love can be called transcendent in so far as this love is directed towards God, God as he is in himself as our supernatural goal and hence as transcending the world (and transcending also God understood merely as the cause of the world). This character of love is eschatological in so far as this love (although always already in the world intuitu meritorum Christi) is in the world only because and in so far as there will be the eschatological event of Christ in this world at the end of time. Hence, love has this character in an essentially sharper and more explicit sense (only) since the time when Christ appeared, as compared with the time before Christ, for only since Christ became man (died and rose from the dead) has the opening out of the world into God himself been explicitly revealed in words and only since then has it become a fact of salvation history in an irrevocable and

[1] Ecclesiological also in the sense that, in accordance with the visibly (sacramental)-invisible (mysterious) character of the Church, this love must have a historically visible, tangible character in the Church arising out of the nature of this love.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

historically tangible manner. As a response to God's redeeming love for the world in all its dimensions, this love itself is redeeming, conserving and saving, and so cannot have merely the character of a 'flight into God' but rather must be cosmic (mundane) in the sense indicated. Hence, even a human existence which is related to something meaningful in this world, if it is formed and elevated by divine love (I. 2) can become the exercise of that divine love itself, i.e. can become a part of the fullness of love. It is clear, of course, that – precisely because they are meaningful also in this world – such actions do not have an absolutely unequivocal function as intramundane indications and representations of love as an eschatological fact. Such actions are more likely to hide this character than proclaim it.

2. This love is both one particular exercise of human existence among others (a virtue among other virtues) and also the total exercise of human [49] existence in God's grace. In this second respect, all other virtuous exercises of whatever kind are 'means' of love. This is to say that they spring from it, are informed by it, signify its expression and constitute the outward form in which it shows itself as in its 'signs' and in its embodiment. The other virtues are the concretization of love in the (permanent) plurality of the manifold dimensions of human existence, so that love – differentiated and yet remaining itself – really appears in them and yet is not merely their sum, and hence can realize itself in them in different and changing ways without thereby necessarily having to lose anything of its own fullness and perfection. Everyone is called to love in Christ Jesus. With regard to the concrete realization in the medium of the manifold dimensions of human existence – dimensions which in their plurality enforce and permit a different formation of human life – everyone has 'his' own call, his 'calling'. This personal 'calling' cannot be adequately derived from general principles but rests on a proper, special calling.[2]

II

1. Renunciation in the 'supernatural order' (which has an essentially historical index; which, in other words, changes in the course of salvation history even with regard to its eschatological finality in Christ), as understood and practised by Christianity, cannot be adequately explained (and in its properly Christian nature cannot be explained at all) from the standpoint of a purely natural ethics. It is not in its profoundest nature a datum or demand of the 'lex naturalis'. In other words, it cannot in its proper essence be derived as an exigency of or a training in the harmony of human nature. It cannot be explained as a 'tactical offensive measure' against concupiscence[3] (in as far as the latter appears – even according to the principles of a natural ethics – as the danger of offending against the natural moral law and as a moral point of emphasis). It may even be doubted whether in this respect – as measured by the 'normal' person – renunciation is the 'better' means for attaining the harmony of the natural desires under the command of the spirit. Hence it is no accident, and not merely indicative of human sinfulness and hard-heartedness, that renunciation (e.g. in celibacy) did not exist before Christ, but is clearly [50] deduced in the New Testament from the saving situation present only once Christ had appeared, and that, as imitation of Christ, it presupposes that the Lord whom we are to follow has appeared.

2. Since even renunciation is a virtuous attitude directed towards Christian perfection – an attitude which receives its ultimate characterization from love – the ultimate sense of renunciation must be determined from the side of love.

3. Christian renunciation in its real essence sacrifices positive values and goods of this

[2] Cf. Karl Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 257-234.
[3] Cf. on this the following essay in this volume, pp. 58 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

world. Indeed, these values (as will be seen even more clearly) are not merely pragmatic and vital ones with the nature of means to an end (bonum utile) but are also values which (in spite of their relativity and subordination under higher values) have a meaning in themselves (bonum honestum). For such values include the marital union and the freedom of development of human existence by being able to decide for oneself about the material presuppositions and autonomy of one's existence (i.e. riches and independence). In a purely natural order there would therefore be no other values for the sake of which they could be sacrificed. In such an order it could at most happen that the individual would be prevented by circumstances from actually attaining such a good (circumstances which include also the necessity of reaching a good which may in the concrete and in individual cases prevent the simultaneous attainment of some other good). This does not prove, however, that in such an order it would be permissible to actively sacrifice goods of such a high value without being exposed to the force of special circumstances. Every resentful devaluation of such goods which would try to devaluate these goods from an intramundane point of view as 'of little value', as 'dangerous' (for a natural ethics), or as 'common', is therefore objectively false, suspect in its secret motives in the light of depth psychology (as cowardice and incompetence in the business of living) and endangers the true sense and genuine exercise of Christian renunciation.

4. Christian love, in its cosmic form (I. 1), can also be exercised in the positive affirmation and realization of intramundane values (such as marriage, freedom, riches). There is, therefore, a Christian perfection in this world distinct from the practice of the Evangelical Counsels. When it is said that even the layman ought to have the 'spirit' of the Evangelical Counsels, then this merely means in fact that he ought to have the spirit of perfect love. In so far as the realizations of the Evangelical Counsels have their own nature (I. 2) (although love may inform them and make [51] them into an expression of its own nature), the layman does not have this 'spirit' and moreover should not have it. This does not yet touch the question as to whether every Christian life, in so far as it is approaching ever closer to death and hence to the experience of the contingency and questionability of all intramundane values, does not and must not necessarily open itself both in spirit and in fact to the Evangelical Counsels, if it wants to be perfect. Even less is it disputed that every Christian life must also include the exercise of Christian renunciation (in the sense with which we are concerned here) even though it is not included in it as an explicit form of life adopted by the Church, as is the case in the Evangelical Counsels. With these reservations, there can only be different shifts of emphasis between the different possibilities of the Christian life, although these shifts will be such (e.g. marriage, on the one hand, and ecclesiastically ratified abstention from marriage, on the other) that they will really represent particular, fixed forms of life.

III

1. When positive intramundane values of human existence are sacrificed (II. 4), then the only possible reason for this renunciation can be the choice of a particular expression of love (I. 2) which realizes this love precisely in the expression of this renunciation because and in so far as this love is supernaturally eschatological and as such is at the same time ecclesiastical (ecclesiological); and because this characteristic of the tangibility of the Church finds its expression precisely in the renunciation of a positive intramundane value and in no other way. This means:

(a) When we ask: how can man give expression to his love of God in the dimensions of the other virtues, precisely in as far as this love is eschatological – i.e. the love of that God who, in spite of his having come on earth, is still in the distance of faith and yet the love of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that God of whose life the Church must partake precisely in as much as this life does not objectify itself in the world and its values – then the only answer can be that this is possible through the giving up of a positive intramundane value (to the extent in which such renunciation is precisely not a technical means to laying hold of some other intramundane value). For such renunciation is either senseless or it is the realized and combined expression of faith, hope and charity which reaches out towards God precisely in so far as he is in himself, and without any mediation of the world, the goal of [52] man in the supernatural order. It would be senseless if the giving up of a value were to take place for its own sake, for this is ontologically and ultimately impossible as well as being ethically perverse (i.e. considered as an attempt). Hence, a positive value can be sacrificed only for the sake of a higher value. It is presupposed, of course, that the renunciation of the one value and the attainment of the other are somehow objectively related. It is important to bear in mind, however, that this relation can be of many different kinds; we will speak of this later. If, however, unlike the case of sacrifices with an intramundane meaning and rational basis, this higher value cannot be experienced in its own intrinsic reality but must be believed and hoped for (in so far as it is already present in itself), then this renunciation of one value in favour of the other takes on a characteristic proper to Christian renunciation and to it alone: the giving up of a value which can be experienced in favour of a value possessed only by faith and hope, and this as a realizing expression of the love of God, in so far as this love is eschatological and not so much in so far as it is also cosmic.

Hence the question is simply: in what exactly consists the objective connection between renunciation of the intramundane value as such and the exercise of love (or respectively of the asserted function of the realization of love which is said to consist in renunciation)? Expressed differently and more simply: why, to what extent and in what way is renunciation a ‘means’ of love? To answer this question it is neither sufficient to appeal to the difficulty of renunciation nor yet to appeal (at this point of our reflections) to the example of Christ. The former is insufficient because the very point to be clarified is why precisely it should be meaningful for the objectively correct exercise of love to take something ‘difficult’ upon itself. For there are undoubtedly difficult things which, in spite of their greater ‘difficulty’, are not suitable to serve as material and tests of love. If one were to say simply that the meaning of what is ‘difficult’ lies in our case in the fact that one tries to overcome ‘dangers’ to love as it were by a frontal attack, then it must be said in reply that these ‘dangers to love’ must refer to the offences against the natural moral law (which has an intramundane significance), in so far as these offences are not only immoral in themselves but are also inevitably irreconcilable with divine love. But then this information results in the representation of the Evangelical Counsels as already capable of proof from the lex naturalis. Furthermore, is it really true that the Evangelical Counsels avoid these [53] ‘dangers’? It is of course true to a certain extent, but it is an equally simple fact that they create new dangers to morality. Hence, does their whole basis really consist in the fact of weighing up the increase and lessening of the dangers to natural morality one against the other and then of calculating from this in summa (with what enlightening reason?) a decrease of danger and hence an advantage in favour of the Evangelical Counsels? This does not dispute the fact that the Evangelical Counsels are ‘difficult’, that consequently they can be a ‘heroic’ product of love and hence can also be chosen as such a product. Yet such a possibility presupposes already (without first proving it) that the renunciation involved in the Evangelical Counsels makes sense and can be taken into account as a realization of love. The renunciation of one’s life, e.g. through suicide, would also be ‘difficult’ and hence would be most advantageous for the realization of love when motivated by this love – if it were permitted. Why, therefore, is the renunciation practised in the Evangelical Counsels intrinsically justified? It is not yet possible at this point to appeal to the example of Christ since by doing this we would simply be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

postponing the question: why did Christ choose poverty, celibacy and obedience? Which elements in these things make them suitable to serve as concrete realizations of his love for the Father?

The property suited to make renunciation the expression of love as an eschatological virtue is precisely its property of renunciation as such, in so far as it fulfils a representative function for believing love which reaches out in hope. This statement requires a more detailed explanation. God, as he is in himself and being as such the (supernatural) end of man, is to be loved in faith and hope. Hence, man's existential centre no longer lies in the realm of the tangible and the empirical. Only by supernatural grace is such an attitude ontologically and existentially possible. Hence, this transcendence beyond the natural realm cannot be accomplished by every act 'from below' or every act concerned with his essential natural and empirical elements. Every naturally good act, elevated by grace and informed by love, can de facto be a part of the realization of this divine love. But this love does not yet 'appear' in its transcendence in the naturally good act, even when this act has in fact been elevated and informed. This transcendence does not become visible in this act, and it is impossible to recognize it from this act. This act, precisely because it is morally good in the natural order, carries (in so far as it is something positive) its intramundane meaning, its justification and intelligibility in itself. For [54] this very reason it is silent with regard to a higher order and about any meaning and goal transcending the 'human dimensions'. Such a positive representation of love in its eschatological and transcendent function is absolutely impossible in the moral realm (i.e. in the realm where there is no question either of the revealing word of God or of the sacramental signs instituted by this word). To dispute this statement would come to the same thing as saying that the morally good act in the natural order has of itself a positive ordination to grace and divine love. Is then such a representation utterly impossible? No, it is possible in renunciation. For, precisely in its negative characteristics, renunciation is a profession of action in the tangible order, a profession of man's shifting the centre of his existence out of the world, since the renunciation of the highest positive values of this world is either meaningless and perverse within this world or must be regarded as the believing gesture of that love which reaches out beyond the world and its goods (even those of a personal nature).

The fact that one may understand renunciation as an expression of such a shift of existence can of course be explained only by a positive (general and individual) call by God, and this in view of the fact that even positive acts can be sanctified and hence renunciation cannot in any sense be called the sole possible form of realization of transcending love (even though it is its only form of appearance). God must give his special and express permission for this going beyond the world.

Seen in this light, the connection of this renunciation with death in general and our Lord's death in particular becomes quite clear. The basic readiness for God's higher provisions which may possibly make demands on us beyond ourselves and our nature, thus leading us into hidden and incalculable regions, finds in death the objective climax of the situation of obedience (of man, of our Lord). In death, man is really asked in the most fundamental manner whether he will allow himself to be disposed beyond himself into what is hidden and incalculable, and he thereby renounces himself. Christian renunciation is therefore a training ground for death in Christ understood as the highest deed of that radical state of submitting oneself to a higher will.

(b) If we were now to ask why God wills that this sign of the transcending eschatological love should be present through a renunciation which can no longer be justified by intramundane standards and hence that God permits and calls to such renunciation, then we come to the [55] ecclesiological aspect of this renunciation. The Church is the quasi-sacramental, visible sign of the eschatological presence of God's salvation in the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Accordingly, God wills that she should tangibly manifest the eschatological transcendence of love which constitutes her inner life. This, however, happens sacramentally (above all) in the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist, in which man baptized into the death of Christ proclaims this death until He comes again; and happens existentially in Christian renunciation. In so far as the latter is explicitly accepted as part of the overall picture in which the Church appears, it is called 'the Evangelical Counsels', understood as an explicit and permanent form of life in and of the Church. The Evangelical Counsels are therefore an inalienable and essential element of the appearance of the Church, in so far as she must represent tangibly and cause to appear what she lives interiorly: the divine love which transcends the world eschatologically. And conversely, attachment to the Church is essential to the Evangelical Counsels, since they exist precisely as the appearance of that principle which is proper to the Church and thus is shared by the individual. It follows from this among other things, however, that the concrete way of living the Evangelical Counsels must be fashioned in such a manner that they can also really and clearly exercise this sign-function in the particular concrete historical surroundings in which they are lived. The bourgeois, 'cotton-wool' way in which they are often 'discreetly' lived today in the Religious Orders, veils their meaning: which is to confess that the Church is not of this world and leads a life which, measured by all the perspectives of this world, is a scandal and folly. In so far as the love of God is lived 'in the world', it is the cosmic character of love which becomes effective (cf. I. 1). The deeds of man which have meaning for the world can appear as an expression and sign of love as something cosmic, however, only if they are done by men in the Church in loving union with those in whose renunciation love appears as something transcendent and eschatological. For of itself the intramundane meaningfulness of these works veils itself precisely by the fact that it is done out of love. Only in so far as those who exercise it participate in the visibility of the Church as a whole by their loving unity in and with the Church in which, through their renunciation, the transcendentally eschatological love becomes visible, are their works too made credible as acts of this love. And conversely, renunciation, too, is truly Christian only if it does not make out that it can by its own power conquer God in himself, and only if it shows itself [56] as an of itself merely empty (indeed, of itself and by nature alone, forbidden) gesture of the depleted heart which – in spite of all emptiness – is filled by God, out of pure grace, with God and his love, and indeed is truly emptied out only in this deed of God, so that the gesture of receptivity is already the effect of 'having received'. Renunciation, however, can take this form only if it does not profess itself to be the 'only right' way to God; in other words, only if it lives united in humble love with the 'worldly' people in the Church. The representative function both of the transcendent and of the cosmic character of love is possible only in the unity of the one Church in mutual, humble love.

2. One might also express what is meant here more briefly by saying that the res of perfection is always and everywhere and only the love of God and of one's neighbour in God. The quasi-sacramental sign (quasi-sacramentum) of this res, taken as something transcendingly eschatological in the Church, is renunciation (as a permanent form of life). The sign of the same res taken as something cosmic is the love-informed 'worldly' life of Christians in the Church. Both have their quasi-sacramental sign-function only in mutual relation to each other in the unity of the Church whose one life should appear in both states. Such a quasi-sacramental visibility of the life and spirit of the Church is demanded because the Church is to be the visible manifestation of Christ and of his spirit not only on the plane of worship strictly as such but also in the dimension of moral existence.

3. It can also be seen from this what is really meant by saying that the Evangelical renunciation is the better way to perfection and that it is what is 'better' and 'happier' (Denz. 980). For if, on the one hand, one were to say merely that the Evangelical Counsels are 'in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

themselves' the better means to the perfection of love and thereby conceives this means in immediate relation to love which after all is an action (indeed the highest action) and attitude of a person and his subjective holiness – and then, on the other hand, nevertheless adds immediately that the 'better means' for each particular individual could also be the opposite of the Evangelical Counsels – then it can no longer be really understood what is meant by an 'in itself better means'. A 'means' to an end is always something relative. The phrase 'in itself better', when referring to a means, can therefore only mean 'better' for man as he is or ought to be in the nature of things. This, however, would once more imply that the man for whom this means might not be the 'better' one in the concrete, is not [57] really man as he is or ought to be 'in the nature of things'. This is not something, however, which one would want to say of a man who does not choose the Evangelical Counsels, even though he is really striving for perfection. It follows from this, however, that the 'fact of being better' as applied to the Evangelical Counsels must be related to an object which is not directly love in so far as it signifies the subjective perfection of the individual. What this object is can easily be gathered from what has been said above, viz. the necessity for love to appear in the tangibility of the world, in so far as this love is an eschatologically transcendent and ecclesiological love. As a means of representing this love tangibly in the world and of giving it in this respect an ecclesiastical visibility, evangelical renunciation is better, and indeed in a certain sense (i.e. in so far as it is a question of a permanent representation in a state of life) the only 'means'. From this point of view (but only in this way) can it then be absolutely admitted that anyone accomplishing this representation (if he is not to lie) has existentially a new duty to an old love – imposed as a duty on all and thus 'in itself' an additional stimulus to this love lacking to someone else – and that therefore evangelical renunciation is in a certain respect also 'subjectively' the 'better' means to the perfection of love.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[58]

5

THE PASSION AND ASCETICISM

Thoughts on the philosophico-theological basis of Christian asceticism

The purpose of the following reflections is to inquire into the nature and meaning of Christian asceticism. Those who despise and combat Christianity, regard asceticism – not without reason – as one of the characteristics of the Christian attitude to the world. They protest passionately against what is Christian because they see in this ascetic attitude a contempt for the world, unfaithfulness to and flight from earthly tasks, because they see in the ascetic life the disguised resentment of those who are incompetent in the business of living, of those who despise the world because they are too weak and cowardly to hold fast to it and to master it courageously in all its greatness and difficulty. Thus, if we want to know whether this protest is legitimate or not, then we must face up to the question as to what exactly is the nature of this Christian asceticism.

One thing can and must be said right from the outset – for even though it alone does not suffice for the answering of our question, it nevertheless must already be recognized as a fact by both sides, if the whole controversy is not to become sterile right from the start on account of hopeless misunderstandings – and this is that the Christian religion, in the first article of its Creed, professes a God who in loving omnipotence has created every genuine reality between heaven and earth, a God who wills and loves this earth because he has created the visible just as much as the invisible and who has said that everything is good. One should not act as if Christianity just barely acknowledges by this something which is obvious to every ‘normal and upright man’. The real man, through his experience of life, sees only too well that this earth is a vale of tears, and so it is only too necessary to keep on preaching to him most emphatically that this his impression cannot provide him with any comprehensive and [59] final formula about this earth and his life. The Christian Church, in the course of its long history, has too often had to combat gnostic, manichean and catharist pessimism about the world for it to be likely to lose the suspicion that the preachers of ‘world-devotion’ can only afford to sing their hymns to the good earth and to the courage for the life beyond because basically Christianity itself has by the great power of the Cross bound the demons of pessimism, of despair and weariness, even in the life of those who – in the name of the world – persecute Christianity. The Christian faith professes that man has an earthly task and that his fulfilment of this task has a fundamental significance even for his eternal salvation. No matter how decisive his attitude to the God of grace and of life hereafter may be for man’s final salvation – and however much everything earthly must be incorporated into this decisive task of man – this does not mean that the earthly is merely an intrinsically indifferent material as the setting and in the attainment of an ‘other-worldly’ goal. Even for the Christian, humanity, culture, the State, world history, etc., are not merely intrinsically indifferent opportunities which he uses to work out his eternal salvation: they are also valuable in themselves and willed by God, and must not be likened to the work of that Desert Father who made baskets during the day only to undo them again in the evening. All this must be clear and firmly accepted from the very start of our reflections. For it follows right away from this that Christian asceticism can never be a renunciation which is bound up with and supported by a false and cowardly minimization of the good it renounces.

If we are to be in a position to ask about the meaning of Christian asceticism, this asceticism must first of all be shown in its true colours. For not everything and anything going under the name of asceticism can in a true sense be called Christian. We will accomplish this our first task by attempting to describe the essential – or, more carefully expressed – a few essential types of asceticism which according to the evidence of the history of religion always keep reappearing. The problems associated with these types of asceticism will serve to show us slowly and step by step the properties of Christian asceticism and will help to prepare us for the discovery of the starting point of an explanation of their essential nature.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I

We believe that, prescinding for the moment from specifically Christian [60] asceticism, it is possible to distinguish three types of asceticism which we will call moral, ritual and mystical asceticism. This is not meant to imply either that it is possible to capture adequately in these three categories all the manifestations of those attitudes and actions of man which one might call ascetic, or that these three types should be clearly distinguished from each other, or that – because we distinguish them from Christian asceticism – they must therefore be already necessarily and always positively unchristian and ought therefore not to be found in a genuinely Christian attitude of man. This rudimentary attempt to distinguish the types of ascetical behaviour is for us simply preliminary practice for the real question and should be evaluated only under these presuppositions.

1. Moral asceticism

By this heading is meant that asceticism whose nature, in the normal, current apologetics of Christian asceticism, is commonly presupposed to be that of Christian asceticism. What is meant by it can be seen, for example, from the description of asceticism given by Ries in LTK I, pp. 748-749:

> Asceticism is the fight against all within us which comes from sin or leads to it; it is the holding down of all dangerous urges of nature within us, of everything sensual and self-seeking, so that the spiritual man may develop all the more freely. It consists furthermore in a certain amount of voluntary renunciation of what is permitted, in accordance with the principle that attack is the best form of defence, which is applicable in the realm of human propensities . . . Anything which stirs in our lower nature as an after-effect of original sin, anything which is diseased, corruptive and demonic in man, must be subjugated if the noble spiritual dispositions are not to suffocate under the pressure of the sense-life gaining the upper hand. The suppressive spell of the sensual must be broken, if the soul is to rise and develop the, full richness of the life of the spirit in faithful cooperation with divine grace.

It will undoubtedly have to be admitted that this is a true description of the average – I would almost say: bourgeois-Christian – conception of asceticism. And this conception makes it possible to make out a relatively [61] easy and harmless defence of asceticism as practised in the Christian religion. For who would wish to dispute the fact that the ‘spiritual man’ and the full richness of the ‘spiritual life’ are threatened and under pressure in us by what is cowardly, comfortable and ordinary, against which every man ought to fight by strict discipline and self-mastery, and by the exercise of courage and strictness against himself. It is possible to prescind in this description of asceticism given by Ries (which is merely the expression of the commonly accepted conception of asceticism) from the supernatural

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

elevation of this phenomenon by grace, since the latter after all does not seem to modify it essentially on the level of what can be consciously experienced (especially since Ries evidently sees 'grace' here merely as an aid to moral activity, and more in particular as a helpful means of human moral activity – as gratia medicinalis – and not as the divinization of man by grace, i.e. as gratia elevans). We may furthermore prescind from the fact that it is taken rather too much for granted that the combative element in the spirit and the element to be combated in the sensual as the effect of original sin – seen somewhat primitively and more platonically than from a Christian point of view – lies in the 'impulses of our lower nature' (as if the 'noble spiritual dispositions' were not equally 'fleshly' in the Pauline sense). Prescinding from these two factors, then, it will be seen that what is essential in this description of asceticism is the fact that it is regarded as a pure means for a moral self-discipline with a view to attaining an undisturbed harmony between the different forces in man, i.e. as a means to the attainment of that 'mesotes' which for Greek philosophy and for the average Christian humanism represents the essence of virtue.

Asceticism is in this view a means to virtue. Virtue, however, is conceived here from the point of view of the natural moral law which is based on the nature of man and which demands a harmonizing and a correct mutual ordering of man's powers. Asceticism in this sense is properly speaking a self-control, a training in self-discipline and moderation orientated towards a humanistically conceived development of the positive human being; asceticism in this sense demands, therefore, merely the renunciation of the morally unpermitted which would disturb the harmonious development of the essential dispositions of man willed by God and indicated in the nature of man. In so far as, over and above this, such an asceticism also renounces something permitted, this 'more' is seen exclusively as an educative practice, as a 'training', designed to enable [62] man to achieve the right balance of an evenly distributed humanity. In such an asceticism there is, therefore, no real sacrifice of any value which would represent something valuable also in the overall harmonious composition of the human reality of values. Abnegation in asceticism really always aims in this kind of asceticism, as described by Ries, at something which even empirically – precisely from the empirically obvious and comprehensible natural law, and thus measured by the whole nature of man – appears as something which is not a value. Such a 'positive' asceticism which is measured by the life of man as a whole – a life to be preserved in its integrity by the natural moral law even against those threats to right order in man which accompany man – this asceticism which renounces a lower value in favour of a higher but equally immediately tangible and possessed value . . . this is what we want to call moral (we could also call it humanistic) asceticism.

The question now arises as to whether this represents for us the properly Christian asceticism. This must be disputed. It is, indeed, self-evident that this moral asceticism is also of great importance for the Christian – whose duties after all also include the natural moral law – and that it is important for him even for the attainment of his eternal salvation. Even in view of the weakness and frailty of man which only a naïve optimism could overlook, such a moral asceticism is never a duty whose fulfilment Christian preaching could pass over as something self-evident. The Christian faith confesses that in the long run even this moral asceticism can be achieved in all its fullness by man only if God's helping and healing grace comes to his aid. Yet nevertheless this moral asceticism is obviously not yet the real central point of that asceticism which has actually been cultivated by the Christian religion. For – to start with the empirical sphere – one would obviously be subject to painful helplessness and to false interpretation if one were to try to interpret and justify, on the basis of this moral asceticism, the 'feats' and 'excesses' to be found in the history of Christianity. Any renunciation, mortification and penance to be found in the lives of the Saints can no longer be explained in its radicalism and terrifying extent simply as an attempt to preserve and develop

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'the noble spiritual dispositions against the pressure of an otherwise overpowering sensuality'. One must either regard such things as pious follies and private exaggerations, or trace them back to influences of a general spiritual history which really have nothing to do with the nature of Christianity, or – because these explanations do not do justice [63] to Christian asceticism – one must concede from the outset that what is in fact lived as Christian asceticism cannot be reduced to the common denominator of moral asceticism, but demands a different interpretation of its meaning.

Furthermore, moral asceticism, if it had to be looked upon as the adequate explanation of Christian asceticism, would also fail to do justice to that revealed and mysterious nature of Christian asceticism which must obviously attach to it by the fact that it is a central element of Christian being and life. For it is perfectly possible to justify moral asceticism in the eyes of the 'world' and independently of Christian belief. One could say, of course, that outside the Christian sphere, man is always in danger of underestimating the threats to his moral existence, those threats which in Christian teaching are said to be the consequences of original sin. According to Catholic teaching, the effect of original sin, in so far as it means a weakness and an endangering of man with regard to the natural moral law, does not constitute the nature of original sin (since the latter does not consist in 'concupiscence' but in the loss of man's supernatural union with God and of man's holiness). On the other hand, the fact (even though not the reason) of man's threatened condition on the natural moral plane is an object of human experience even independently of the faith. Thus, on both these counts, the moral asceticism demanded by this threatened condition of man, derives no specifically Christian character of mystery, comprehensible only by faith, from original sin understood as a mystery of faith; yet it would have to have this character of mystery if it wished to lay claim to constituting the specifically Christian element in Christian asceticism.

Of course, it will be possible to say that in Christian asceticism as such there takes effect a knowledge of the danger which man faces of losing himself on this earth and of regarding the world and the earthly task of man as something ultimate and final. Yet this 'dangerous condition' of man which may cause him to be deaf to the call of the living God to man, calling him to become united with him beyond any inner-human (even though found and guaranteed in the name of God) fulfilment, must not be confused with the threatened condition of what is humanly moral. In the latter, it is a question of danger to a value accessible to the empirical moral knowledge of man, a value which can be taken possession of in its own self. In the former, there is question of a value heard only in faith and possessed in hope. Whether and to what extent the threatened condition of [64] the other-worldly calling – which calls man beyond anything purely human in this world, even beyond the humanly moral – does in fact form the basis for a specifically Christian asceticism, may sometimes be still rather an obscure question. Nevertheless, it would seem to be quite clear from the empirical and theological point of view that the nature of specifically Christian asceticism cannot be exhausted simply in moral asceticism, and that its nature must be conceived from quite a different point of view than that concerned with the carrying out of man's objective, ordered structures, even in his free moral actions. Yet, at least, these conditions have already given us some indications of where we must start in our quest for the nature of Christian asceticism, viz. with the besieged condition of man, his calling to a life in divinizing grace or – we might also say – with the threatened condition of man's existential beliefs. Before going on from this point, we still have to look at the other two types of asceticism which are to be found in the history of religion and which, on the one hand, do not simply coincide with moral asceticism, and which also, on the other hand, must not be simply identified with Christian asceticism, even though they very often come into contact with it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. Ritual Asceticism

For lack of a better word, we intend to use the phrase 'ritual asceticism' to describe a group of ascetical phenomena which (at least very often) are connected with worship and man's preparation for it, and which in some sense or other make man sacral, withdrawn from the profane, and in communication with God; in brief, they make him in some sense or other 'taboo', without it being possible to identify this property of being taboo – a property acquired, protected or manifested by asceticism – in an immediately tangible manner with a (in our current sense) moral quality of someone who is taboo. Under this heading must be included first of all the ritual sacrifice itself which is to be found in the lower natural religions and right up to the highly developed ritual and moral religions. For by this sacrificial cult, man always renounces some value or other which he had possessed and which he offers up on the altar or consecrates to the temple: food and domestic utensils, possessions and valuables, child sacrifices, human sacrifices, even going as far as suicide. Under this heading belong also ascetic prescriptions which are required for qualifying man to enter into contact with the Godhead in the ritual sacrifice: fasting, [65] sexual abstinence, avoidance of ritual impurity, etc. Ritual asceticism includes also all other prescriptions for man's conduct which have an ascetic effect and which are meant to make or keep him taboo, 'levitically pure', etc.

First of all, this particular kind of 'asceticism' obviously means that some sort of renunciation, abstinence, or sacrifice should take man out of the profane sphere and bring him into contact with the transcendent, 'quite different' power (God, Mana, Orenda, Tondi). It would seem to follow directly from this that the profane, the world, and the directly pleasurable merging with it is experienced in contrast to the sacral and the numinous, and that one thinks to approach more closely to the divine by such an 'asceticism' in the widest sense. The further interpretation of this type of asceticism is extremely difficult, and all we can really do in the framework of a short essay is to state a few conjectures.

To begin with, it is of course already questionable whether all those phenomena we try to include under this heading of ritual asceticism can really be reduced to one common denominator, or whether they must not rather be interpreted quite differently in each particular case. It remains furthermore questionable whether these practices and prescriptions are in any sense to be regarded as asceticism, i.e. whether the abnegation which they bring with them – at least in actual fact – really lies in the proper direction of the direct intention of these practices, or whether this abnegation represents merely an in itself non-essential by-product of an act which intends something quite other than elevating man into the sphere of the sacral and the numinous by abnegation precisely as such. This question is of course closely connected with the other question concerning the meaning of the ritual sacrifice itself: the sense of man's 'ascetic' action connected with the sacrifice ought surely to be modified, depending on whether one conceives the sacrifice – in the sense of an 'oblation-theory' – as an offering which consecrates and thus preserves the gift, or whether one conceives it – in the sense of a 'destruction-theory' – as a destructive offering. Thus, although most factors of this ritual asceticism will remain problematical, it will nevertheless be possible to conjecture that at least man tries, by worship and ritual asceticism, to enter into contact with the Godhead. The meaning of ritual asceticism will have to be sought in quite a different direction, depending on whether this attempt is intended to be interpreted as a mere gesture of the believing readiness of man to be given this contact with the Godhead as a quite [66] gratuitous grace from above, or whether it is to be interpreted as an act of man himself who on his own initiative attains contact with the Godhead by this ascetic sublimation of his own nature. In the first of these interpretations, we would have that in which we have to look for the nature of Christian asceticism or at least a kind of prototype of it, whereas in the second interpretation we would have a variety of that mystical asceticism of which we must now

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation speak, i.e. the asceticism of a ritual mysticism.

3. Mystical Asceticism

Ascetic practices, like sexual continence, fasting, mortification of the flesh, certain breathing exercises, abstinence, vegetarianism, the wearing of penitential garb, prayer techniques, inner self-denial, keep on reappearing in the history of religion as a preparation and means for religious enthusiasm or mysticism in any sense whatsoever. This is what happens wherever monasticism appears: in Hinduism, Buddhism, Chinese Taoism (which has developed a form of monasticism at least by infection from Buddhism). Yet even beyond this, there is asceticism even in early Islam and in the later Islamic Sufism, and even in explicitly dualistic religions as seen in certain varieties of gnosticism and in manicheism. Asceticism is to be found also in the history of Greek religions, with the Orphics and the Pythagoreans, and in general also in all Greek mystery religions, all of which to a greater or lesser extent demand a laborious and to some extent extremely rigorous way of personal asceticism before a person can be initiated into the mysteries. Under this heading belong also at least such phenomena in the realm of asceticism and mysticism within the Christian sphere as hesychasm, in which an ascetic technique extorts a mystical experience.

However varied the forms, techniques and the intensity of asceticism may be in these different forms of religion, and however little it may be possible to assert that every single form of asceticism practised in them must be reduced to the common denominator of mystical asceticism, it is at least often possible to see clearly in such forms that asceticism in these cases is a preparation of the subject for a mysterious experience of the divine. Asceticism is here not merely some sort of moral perfecting of man by which man renders himself ethically so pleasing to God that God gives himself to man as a grace in a mystical experience; here, explicitly or implicitly, the connection between asceticism and mysticism is established [67] directly. Here, asceticism already establishes the possibility of mysticism by the very psychological condition called forth by it (viz. dematerialization, concentration, simplification of the spiritual life, exclusion of the multiplicity of thoughts, giving up one's own will, etc.). The emptiness, the night, the freedom, the being dead to the world, to oneself and to one's own will, etc., are merely the reverse side of the being filled with the divine, of the rise of the unbounded light of the Godhead in the soul, of the rebirth to new life, etc. Asceticism is thus in this form the liberation of the divine in man, of the divine which in the last analysis, in spite of the so often expressedly gratuitous nature of every mystical experience, does nevertheless belong to the inner being of man. Of course, this mystical asceticism itself takes on a great variety of forms, depending on how the mystical experience is conceived. If, for instance, mysticism is the experience of the pure spirit, then asceticism becomes, of course, the extinction of the pathos of corporeality, as for example in Evagrian mysticism; if God, as the goal of the mystical experience, is conceived not merely as the being who absolutely transcends not merely the finite corporeal world but also the human spirit, then asceticism becomes love's ecstatic reaching out beyond anything finite into God's night, as for example in the Areopagite mysticism.

It requires no further explanation to realize that such a mystical asceticism, whenever it really corresponds to the interpretation just briefly outlined, contradicts the Christian message of the truly divine life given by a completely gratuitous grace out of God's sovereignly free love. But quite apart from this, it ultimately contradicts also the empirical situation of man seen from below. For this mystical asceticism, looked at more precisely, is a pretended mystical death consisting in man's losing himself in the God of mysticism, so that in this way man's real death may be overcome and dissolved. A closer analysis of the different forms of mysticism to be found in the concrete history of religions could in fact show that this mystic death has actually been understood as an autonomous overcoming of true death and as a dissolution of the situation of the human Passion: the autonomous ego in man, by autonomously giving up its finiteness, limitation and sensible nature by an ascetical act of renunciation, tries to liberate this ego (conceived as something divine) from the mere appearance of the finite which signifies suffering and death. Thus mystical asceticism becomes the claim to an autonomous overcoming of true death and the intentional dissolution of the Passion. It will be up to [68] the analysis of the nature of Christian asceticism to show more exactly how – in view of the existential seriousness of man's real death – this attempt at an asceticism of the autonomous divinization and liberation of what is really always already divine and not really threatened by the real death-situation of man, is uncovered as the pride of man wanting to be God, an attempt which is doomed to failure.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This being presupposed, it follows with regard to mystical asceticism that either such asceticism presents itself as an ascetical effort with the false pretention of overcoming death, or such a mystical asceticism is merely an existentially harmless phenomenon of psychological training for some kind of mystical experiences which together with this training are threatened and as it were put into parenthesis by the existentially more radical event of the real death of man which puts the whole man into question. Under both these suppositions, Christian asceticism in its basic nature cannot possibly be mystical asceticism especially since, being a participation in the Passion and death of Christ, it must undoubtedly be regarded from the point of view of the real passion and death of man.

II

We have tried in the first part of our reflections to overcome the danger of unthinkingly regarding any and every actually occurring asceticism as Christian asceticism. It would probably be possible now to determine the inner nature of Christian asceticism by starting from the negative definition given of it above. Yet we prefer to adopt a different method here; we are going to try to approach the nature of Christian asceticism by way of a related but broader concept, i.e. by way of the concept of Passion and death. The basic possibility, even though not necessity, of such a method can be admitted from the outset. For the inner connection between these notions can be easily understood both from a metaphysical and a theological point of view. Asceticism, understood as renunciation, abnegation, sacrifice of material, biological and similar values, merely achieves what Passion (in the widest sense) and death also demand of man. If, moreover, Christian asceticism wants to be the taking-up of the Cross of Christ, a partaking in the death-destiny of the Lord, and the existential outcome of being submerged into the death of Christ as effected sacramentally in baptism, etc., then it must be presupposed from the outset that Christian asceticism has a connection with the Passion and death of Christ and [69] hence with Passion and death in general. Hence, if we try to clarify the nature of Christian asceticism by starting with the notion of Passion, then the course of our reflections will take the following form: (1) we will reflect, by an existentially still neutral reflection, on the metaphysical nature of Passion and thus work out the inner unity of Passion and asceticism, and hence also the nature of asceticism, from a general and still formal point of view; (2) we will reflect on the Christian meaning of Passion (death) and thus arrive at an understanding of the specific nature of Christian asceticism, and (3) we will point out certain conclusions to be drawn from the insights reached.

1. The nature of 'Passion'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We begin with a brief reflection on the nature of Passion. This, of course, does not, to begin with, refer to the Passion of Christ but to the inner characteristic of every human life in so far as it is characterized by what we normally call pain, suffering, anxiety, fear, death, etc. The reason why we are trying to understand this characteristic under the particular watchword of 'Passion' will become clear in a moment. If we wish to grasp the nature of the Passion as a strictly human reality, then we must not start from the categories of what is vital, pleasant, joyful, etc. It is, of course, true that in the concrete, suffering also always takes place in these spheres: there is a gradual deterioration of health, of the well-being of life, and a gradual decrease of joyful inclinations, a physical destruction; even psychic feelings of disinterest still belong into this sphere. Yet all these would be simply events taking place within a natural sphere – natural as opposed to personal – they would be events which, for instance, even an animal experiences. All this, however, becomes the 'Passion' only once it is experienced by a person. Any diminution of a natural condition of existence or activity only becomes 'Passion' when the nature thus diminished in being or acting belongs to a person. Where the person is, there is freedom; this means, however, that there is self-control over the person's own reality and that the person shapes his own being and life as a result of internal decisions. Every finite person, of course, has imposed on it the law of the direction in which these decisions should be taken, so that we must in this sense distinguish in each finite person between its nature (understood as that which is pre-established for free personal control and something which serves as the norm of this decision) and the person (understood as what this being in freedom makes of itself and as how it [70] wants to understand itself). This dualism of nature and person, of 'nature and existence' which is essentially insurmountable, cannot itself alone be the ontological ground of 'Passion' in the proper sense. For otherwise the finiteness of the person and the Passion would be identical, and we would be in the midst of a tragic anthropological metaphysics for which finiteness would always already be a falling away from what should be, a guilt, an atonement and something tragic. But this metaphysical dualism of nature and person becomes the ontological presupposition of possible Passion once this nature itself is open to an alien, external intervention. Hence, wherever nature (as distinct from person) can experience something external to it – something which comes towards it – there is also the possibility that this happening may run counter to the general inner meaning of this nature, that it may threaten, diminish or even destroy it. If this happens, then the finite person experiences not merely a possible opposition to the general inner direction of its nature – between 'essence' and 'existence' (which signifies the possibility of guilt and not the possibility of suffering) – but experiences a possible opposition between what is imposed on its nature from outside and the inner teleology of this nature, in so far as this is taken over and asserted by the person and by freedom. Mere nature cannot suffer, since it is always only a mere, as it were, uninterrupted part of the total reality and thus cannot experience the intervention of this total reality in itself as something surprising or as directed against itself. A purely finite person as such, however, cannot suffer either, since as such it does not yet need to have an external destiny which preexists its free decision, so that at most there may be suffering only in an analogous sense in its case, as a result of its guilty decision. Hence, suffering can only be found where a person, on the one hand, as it were pulls its nature together and sets if off against what is outside it and yet, on the other hand, experiences intervention from without in this nature comprehended in this personal way.

The metaphysical state of the possibility of an experience from without is called sensibility. Strictly speaking, therefore, passion is possible only in a person whose nature is sensible, i.e. a nature which from the outset provides what is alien and external to it with the conditions for possible influence. Put differently, only where there is 'pathos' is it possible to find 'passion' as an autonomous phenomenon independently of guilt. This is a fact, therefore, which is immediately indicated as basically necessary by the twofold meaning of the Greek word 'pathos'. Suffering, as an independent [71] phenomenon different from guilt, is therefore possible only where, on account of a nature capable of suffering, the person can experience an external fate running counter to the meaning-structure of its nature, either because this pposition concerns the pure nature, or because fate contradicts this nature in so far as it has already been existentially formed in a quite definite way by a personal decision.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What attitude, we may now ask, can a person adopt towards this fate which involves suffering coming from outside? We have said that there can be a Passion only where there is a person; in other words, that Passion is not possible in something which is purely 'nature'. Does this mean, then, that there also could be no Passion in the pure nature of man; in other words, does it mean that where the person accepts its nature – a nature subject to suffering – without contradiction, suffering is uncovered as a mere appearance, as error and illusion? One could conceive this uncovering of the illusion of suffering in two ways: either it might be achieved through an absolutely stoical withdrawal of the person from its nature – in such a way that the person leaves its nature to its fate in absolute indifference and apathy and thus is no longer affected by its fate and treats suffering as a merely biological happening – or it could be brought about by the person losing itself completely in the nature, eradicating the spirit as an enemy of the soul, of life and of nature, thus turning suffering into an equally valid phase in the nature's ups and downs between life and death, itself regarded as an equally valid polar opposition.

These attempts at overcoming suffering prove themselves unsuccessful in practice. For the finite person itself is at the same time always also a nature. There is no point in the concrete existence of man – call it spirit, scintilla animae, ego, autonomous subject, or anything else you like – which is not itself affected by the fate of the nature in the person. The finite person itself, precisely as a person, is affected by the fate of its nature, since the possibilities of personal existence always rest essentially on the possibilities of the nature and hence are themselves affected by the Passion undergone by this nature. This excludes, therefore, any possibility of finally and definitively overcoming suffering by referring the Passion back to mere nature and by making the person something absolutely autonomous and intangible. The person itself is and remains as such open to the world and hence to the Passion.

Hence there is essentially Passion as a personal phenomenon. This, however, represents the basic problem of the Passion, a problem which [72] from this metaphysical and existential point of view (one might also say from this 'purely natural' point of view in contrast to revelation and supernature) leads to an ultimate questionableness which in its content can no longer be solved by man 'from below'. For 'person' means existence, i.e. self-assertion, finality, eternity. 'Passion,' on the other hand, means ultimately death, and this death must really be regarded in this as a personal Passion and not merely as a biological event concerning only the 'body'. For death as the climax of the Passion is an event which concerns the whole existence of man and which puts this existence as a whole in question, an event which makes it completely impossible for man to dispose personally over himself and which, therefore, represents the highest point of man's subjection to the Passion. Thus there arises the great question as to how the one being of man can combine at the same time an absolute, active power over himself and the absolutely subject condition of man in death.[1]

[1] The phenomenon of death, understood as 'dying' (and not as 'being dead'), must not be passed over by merely looking at life before or after death. The question is rather how death, death itself, can be survived – death which completely robs the person of its mastery over self – when that which is to survive is itself struck by the total powerlessness which is death. It would be wrong, therefore, to try to avoid this basic, humanly insoluble problem by appealing to the 'immortality of the soul'. Not that the 'immortality of the soul', understood as the substantial continuance of a spiritual being, is to be doubted or denied. Yet by acknowledging this truth, nothing is gained in practice beyond the actual posing of this insoluble question. For, metaphysically speaking, nothing

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Every Passion is a moment in man's subjection to death, and this death, which is part of the necessary requirements for man as a person, puts the person as a whole in question. Hence, every Passion is an existentially exercised process by which man is brought face to face with his basic questionableness which he himself alone cannot solve but one with which he is presented by death.

Man can, of course (to use a 'Heideggerian' phrase) try to run away from the 'ontological structure of his being' ('Eigentlichkeit seines Wesens'), from this 'being made for death' which concerns the whole man. He can try to cover up this his death-situation by talk, by keeping himself busy, by immersing himself in the daily routine, by taking flight into the anonymity of 'everyone'; he can therefore also take the sting out of every [73] Passion – by trying as much as possible to avoid it, by taking flight into amusements, into harmlessness, into bourgeois optimism, by the soporific of a hope for improvement (of an individual or social kind) – and lie can cover up its character of the relentless approach of death and of a 'prolixitas mortis'. But when man makes a personal, existential decision with regard to this death-reality of his human existence, then this decision can only consist in a 'yes' to this reality. For only by saying yes to it, can a free person turn a necessary fate externally imposed on him into a free act of the person itself. A 'no' would preserve the free power of the person over itself only if by this 'no' he were to succeed in excluding the imposed fate from himself as a person; in other words, only if by this 'no' he could turn death into a purely biological event which takes place within the a-personal nature without affecting the person himself precisely as a person. Total, free self-determination (and that means a person) and an imposed total fate (and that means the death of the finite, suffering nature of a person) can become one only by the person's turning its total fate into a personal deed by freely saying yes to it.

Thus, man practises asceticism in the proper sense whenever he looks his death-situation 'straight in the eye' by saying yes to it, whenever he personally says yes (for whatever reason) to this subjection to death and realizes this yes existentially – by voluntarily anticipating this dying which is realized bit by bit in the whole life – and whenever, over and above this, man makes sure of his existential seriousness and of the inner veracity of his preparedness for death by eagerly appropriating an increase of Passion as a moment of death, over and above what fate forcibly demands of him (it being presupposed that he is allowed this impatience with his 'eschaton'). Asceticism, therefore, is nothing other than the personal, free grasping-of-his-own-accord of his necessary being-unto-death. What has been said, shows therefore the inner connection between Passion and asceticism. Passion and asceticism ultimately are nothing other than the two sides of the nature of one and the same phenomenon. Passion regards this phenomenon from the point of view of its fateful character and necessity – a character and necessity rooted in a nature subject to suffering – and asceticism regards the same phenomenon but from the point of view of the spontaneousness and freedom rooted in the person. Passion expresses the necessity of death in man taken as nature, whereas asceticism expresses the freedom of death in man taken as person.

[74]

2. The Christian meaning of Passion and death

Up to this point, asceticism has appeared to us as a personal, free anticipation of death seen as the necessary fate of man, so as to pass personally and successfully through it in a point-like, else or more is said by this than that the person is more than just a nature. But how this person with his nature threatened by and subject to death can actually assert himself in death itself, this precisely is something which it is impossible to decide from below, from man's position.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

suspended identity of 'must and want'. But the formal definition of asceticism thus reached by regarding it from the point of view of Passion and death is not objectively speaking an answer but a question, viz. the question as to how, and as what, death is to be answered in the affirmative. Only when this question has been cleared up do we really know how, and with what attitude, asceticism accepts this death fate actively and personally, and freely and of its own initiative makes it a law of human life. Thus, when we inquire here into the Christian meaning of asceticism, we are in fact asking about the Christian meaning of death.

We are asking about the Christian meaning of death because – and this is absolutely decisive for our reflections – it is impossible to ask about any meaning of death outside of revelation and expect to be able to give a clear, materially and practically significant answer. Death puts man's whole existence into question without being able to answer this question. In this way we arrive at the following existential situation: man must say yes to death; he thereby surrenders his whole being into the uncertainty of death. Hence, such an act can only be one of three things: it can be either an act of despair in the ultimate futility of being, or the act of embracing the whole of man's being, by which man is prepared to hear a possible answer to the question of death from elsewhere, the act of renouncing his whole being to obedience, letting the 'totally Other' do with him what He wills, or thirdly the act of faith in the answer to the question of death (an answer which has actually been given by God), an act of faith in the transmutation of man's radical situation regarding death, a transmutation brought about by the God of eternal life, brought about from above and quite beyond the reach and demand of man but granted by grace.

The first of these acts is the act of basic and radical unbelief which will not allow God to be greater than the intramundane possibilities of man; the second of these possibilities – looked at from the theological point of view – is the existential actualization of the 'potentia obedientialis', i.e. the capacity of receiving grace and revelation. For such an actualization obviously consists in a total renunciation of all the intramundane possibilities of man in which the nature of man as a whole is obediently put [75] at the disposal of God's sovereign, incalculable freedom and providence. This, however, takes place in an existentially radical manner in death understood as the freely realized deprivation of power of the whole man, surrendering him to an absolute uncertainty which ultimately is nothing other than an 'always-being-greater' of the incomprehensible God, in his transcending of all intramundane possibilities. The third possibility indicated above is that of the man who has actually heard that revelation of which we will have more to say in a moment. The second and third possibilities are related to each other as the existential exercise of the potentia as such and the existential exercise of the grace-elevated act of this potentia. The relationship between these two possibilities is therefore particularly close, and consequently we can prescind here from the-in-itself-important question as to whether in the concrete there ever is or can be an existential affirmation of the 'potentia obedientialis' purely as such.

Even Christian death remains essentially a Passion, i.e. a threat to the total situation of man which puts it into question, without the dying person being aware of the eschatologically gratuitous saving of his whole being as a reality directly tangible to his experience. This eternal life is believed in and hoped for, and it lies in the situation of faith and hope and of the 'not-yet-possessed' most of all where the whole human being to be saved escapes the personal mastery and possession by man most radically, viz. in death. Thus death – which can be both the situation of despair and the situation of man's resigning himself into the hands of the incomprehensible God – becomes also the existentially most radical situation of faith and hope. Dying – at least when it is accomplished in a personal way and by a yes given to the Christian revelation of life – is the most complete and definitive act of hoping faith, and this is the real meaning of Christian death. This alone should really lead us on to an immediate derivation of the meaning of Christian asceticism, for we have already indicated that asceticism is nothing other than a personal anticipation of the death-situation of man. Christian asceticism is therefore nothing other than an existential faith exercised in a Passion which can no longer be given any complete and positive this-worldly meaning. Yet, so as to make this clearer still, we will try to reach the essential structure of Christian asceticism from yet another, somewhat different angle.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In Christianity, i.e. in Jesus Christ, the living personal God has addressed man. Through this, a frightening fact has entered the life of [76] man, a fact which makes every attempt to achieve an internally closed, intramundane harmony of human existence in God impossible; this attempt obviously could not come to final fruition within this world even if there had been no revelation. Certainly, it is possible to come to know God even through his creation, i.e. from the world. But this knowledge has a peculiar, double character: on the one hand, we recognize God as the ground of the world, as the guarantor of its continued existence, as the ultimate background of everything encountered by us in the form of man and the world. We recognize God in all this, to the extent in which he can appear for us in the mirror of the world, so that it looks almost as if the world were the meaning of God, at least of that God who can show himself to us in the world (and to the extent in which he can thus show himself), in other words: that God whom alone we encounter as philosophers. On the other hand, we recognize him in this God-seeking of metaphysics as the free, personal God who is infinite himself, and hence as the God beyond every world and finite existence, so that the world does not really express what he is and can be in himself as a personal and free God. The world does not reveal to us the meaning of God. Thus, there is obvious already the essential failure of human metaphysics: it faces a free, self-contained person, i.e. the God who is enclosed in silence within himself – the theos sigon, as Origen called him somewhere. What this infinite God is in himself – and how this free, personal God perhaps and possibly wants to deal with us – this obscure question which however is decisive for our existence cannot be illuminated by the natural light of reason. Whether he wants to meet us, directly and personally, or whether he wants to be silent, what he will say to us if he wants to speak, all this is essentially a mystery for any metaphysics and for any effort of man's eros seeking for knowledge and rising from the world as its starting point. Hence, in the nature of things, all metaphysics should really end in an eternally vigilant readiness to listen out into the unknown in order to discover whether the distant, silent He wants perhaps to speak, in readiness to accept a perhaps possible possibility of a revelation. The existentially radical exercise of this readiness – which after all is not a matter of pure theory by an action of concrete life – would be precisely the personal acceptance of death, since in death every intramundane fulfilment comes to naught and thus in death there remains merely the despairing folding up of human finiteness into itself or the preparedness to accept the ultimate concrete meaning of life from above, from God.

[77] But will man be able to bear this ecstasis of his being, this waiting to see whether God wants perhaps to come? Will he not succumb rather to the eternal temptation of taking the world as the final revelation of God and thus of making God the meaning of the world in such a way that the world becomes the meaning of God? Has there ever been a philosophy outside Christian history which has not succumbed to this temptation, beginning with the Greeks and right up to Hegel? Was not God ultimately always the 'anima mundi' for all these philosophies, the God who can live and work only in the world itself as its inner transfiguration, as its secret spark of the Absolute? Is not this eternal 'Fall' in the history of philosophy – and not merely in the realm of knowledge – the expression of what over and over again takes place existentially in the life of the unredeemed man, viz. to let God be merely what the world is, to fashion God in the image of man, to understand piety as a devout feeling about the world, to measure man's possibilities not according to God's possibilities but according to what man himself can of himself realize of these possibilities? Every form of idolatry is nothing but the concrete expression of man's existential attitude which builds on the decision not to let God be anything more than the original unity of the forces governing this world and the destinies of men. Even the philosophy of the Spirit, as expounded by Hegel, still adores an idol, viz. the absolute Spirit which becomes conscious of itself in man and in his natural development. The tragic-heroic philosophy of a Heidegger too has its idol: if man of himself alone exists only for death, then death must be the absolutely ultimate reality for this philosophy of a last resentment; since for this philosophy man's God must not be more than man himself, it adores death as its God and the highest reality for it is also the most empty; being and nothingness are the same.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But God is more than man, more than the world and its forces, and as this 'more-than-the-world' he has broken into the existence of man and has burst the world (that which theology calls Nature) wide open. He has revealed himself in Jesus Christ. This revelation has taken place in the twofold unity of the communication of supernatural being and of the word. The ultimate meaning of this revelation is the revelation of the δο&χα θεοῦ, of the majesty of God, by the fact of calling man out of the world into the life of God, who lives his personal life in impenetrable light as someone who is above all the world, as the triune God. In this way, God confronts man directly with a demand and a call which throws [78] man out of the course prescribed for him by nature, a course which would have spent itself within the horizons of the world.

Thus man's task and destiny becomes transcendent, with a transcendency which is always experienced somehow as a contradiction of nature and of the world, both of which are essentially possessed by the temptation to round themselves off within themselves, the temptation to perfect themselves – before God, indeed, as the ultimate ground and background – yet essentially within themselves; this is a temptation which cannot be overcome as long as man does not existentially and without falsification take upon himself that event which puts into question the intramundane rounding-out of the meaning of human existence as a whole, viz. death. 'Nature' (in the theological sense), i.e. everything finite which does not arise from and within the direct encounter with the free God who reveals himself by speaking to us, always has a tendency – prescinding from its death-situation (which of course is a quality of the total human existence) – to rest in itself and to maintain and perfect the closed equilibrium of its immanent system. Should God revealing himself confront such a nature, this immediately opens up the possibility of his giving orders to man, orders which are no longer simply identical with the voice of nature or 'lex naturae'. Should God call man by this command of his revealing word to a supernatural, supramundane life, as has actually happened in the revelation made by Christ, then such a command always and necessarily breaks open the rounded, self-contained state in which the world would like to rest (because it retreats from death). Death is a degradation in which the world – even the good world, and even in so far as it is God's will and law – becomes something temporary, a second-rate thing, and subject to a standard which is no longer interior or proper to it. The act of existential readiness to this bursting open and degrading of the world must, therefore, come from below, from man, and this precisely at the point where the total condition of human reality is put into question by man himself, viz. in death. Hence, if the act by which man 'puts himself at the disposition of God' is called 'faith' – in so far as it accepts the new and welcomes God's life – then the same act – in so far as it makes everything intramundane radically relative and in so far as it means giving up one's own being to the life of God – is called death, which again must not be understood, of course, as merely a single event at the end of human life but as a situation which basically rules the whole life of man.

[79] This Christian situation of man's faith and death, however, opens up the possibility of sacrificing the world, of renouncing and fleeing it, of giving up its goods and values, a possibility which can essentially surpass anything which would make sense if these goods

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and values were thought of in the natural order, as the highest fulfilment of the task of his existence demanded of man. Hence, the sacrificing of the world which goes beyond what would make sense in a this-worldly, even though theocentric ethics, is the only conceivable confession man can make, as it were from below, by which he professes himself to the God of revelation who calls him beyond the world. For by this profession, man can confess existentially that God has shifted the centre of man's existence out of the world. Man is thereby able to confess that by a 'fuga saeculi', he releases his intramundane existence in its immanent sense. He can confess, in other words, that man does not thereby run away from the situation of death – which in any case always terminates his intramundane existence – that he does not thereby misinterpret this situation and also does not try to conquer it within the framework of this world. Rather, he lets death remain the destroying Passion while freely taking it upon himself and achieving that fluid identity of 'must and want' in the God-given belief that the affirmation of life accomplished even in this freedom for death finds is fulfilment from above by free grace in the very life of God. All Christian asceticism presupposes the fighting self-control demanded by pure ethics, i.e. 'moral' asceticism (which does not necessarily mean that it must always and in every case 'accomplish' more than 'moral' asceticism, and also does not mean that the act of moral asceticism can never in the concrete have the nature of Christian asceticism). Thus Christian asceticism is nothing else but the anticipating grasp of Christian death understood as the most radical act of faith; it is, in the words of the prayer of the primitive Christianity of the Didache, a 'letting-the-world-go-by' so that grace may come. Thus Christianity is essentially a 'fuga saeculi' because it is a profession of the personal God of grace freely revealing himself in Christ, of that grace which is not the fulfilment of the inner urge of the world towards its completion, even though it does bring about this perfecting of the world eschatologically by surpassing it. All concrete Christian asceticism is merely a realistic realization of such an essentially Christian flight from the world. Hence, even St Paul already equates baptism and faith with the idea of dying and sees every experience of suffering as a 'daily dying', a 'stigma Christi', a bearing within oneself of the 'nekrosis Christi'.

[80] Thus Christian asceticism is more than moral asceticism; and in a certain sense it is less than mystical asceticism, presupposing that we understand by mystical asceticism the attempt to force God by this asceticism to come into the world, an attempt, as it were, by man himself to force the divine to come alight in man. For Christian asceticism is the act of faith in the free God, a faith given from above. Mystical asceticism believes that, in a sense, the emptying out of the ground of the soul and its liberation from the world necessarily also brings with it the influx of the Absolute into this ground. Christian asceticism can be just as radical in its material contents as mystical asceticism, precisely because it is measured by death (and as a result it also has entered in the history of Christianity into the strangest amalgamations with mystical asceticism); it knows, therefore, that God's grace is free even if man ever managed to divest himself completely of himself into death. It is simply an act of faith in the free grace of God. Hence Christian asceticism is also – it itself – an act of faith in the God who is greater than asceticism, and hence it is also an act of faith in the fact that the free God can bless – and allow to become a step forward in coming before his countenance – even those human acts which do not already and of themselves bear this intrinsic meaning, like the dying involved in the flight from the world which makes sense only if it is a dying by which we enter into the life of God. Provided that man has once subjected himself to the demand of the self-revealing God in the ascesis of faith, God can graciously accept even man's service to the world (which, after all, is God's creation) as leading to Him who is beyond the world, so that man encounters the absolute God not only in his radical opposition to the world, not merely in the situation of death as such, but also in the world. Once man has placed himself below the Cross and has died with Christ, once he has entered into the obscurity of faith and into the ecstasy of the love of the distant God, then – in the specialized terminology of theology – every intrinsically good act (and therefore even an act which is already meaningful within this world) can be elevated supernaturally by grace in such a way that it reaches in its goal and meaning beyond its intramundane significance, beyond the 'ordo legis naturae', into the life of God himself. This fact diverts the Christian flight-from-the-world of that hybris which would otherwise necessarily belong to it as the exclusive way to God: in his flight from the world to God by asceticism, the Christian must confess that it is also possible to reach the same transcendent God even through [81] the world, the God for whose sake – and in order to find him – the Christian has let go of the world. Anyone who is a virgin for God's sake must confess that matrimony is a sacrament; anyone living the vita contemplativa of withdrawal from the world, does so in a Christian way only if he realizes that God has also blessed the vita activa of the intramundane task and has elevated it to the divine life. Hence, in a Christian view, there is no absolutely clear, as it were quantitatively measurable relationship between asceticism which flees from the world and ascetic affirmation of the soul. The Christian will always have to exercise both of them in his life, in order to confess in both ways that God is greater than our heart, that an empty heart does not force him to come down and that a heart filled with splendour of God's creation does not by that alone already possess the true God. The concrete measure of asceticism and world-affirmation in each individual life will have to be determined anew in each case by what is called the guidance of the Spirit, vocation and destiny. In these factors God measures out to each person the Passion which he is to live together with his asceticism in a free, personal yes, so as to profess eternal life in faith through this death.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have until now deliberately avoided taking the death of Christ himself as the starting point of our metaphysico-theological reflections. The reason for this has been that the 'death of Christ, understood as the death of the Son of God, i.e. of him who – in a true sense and in spite of his humanity which is capable of suffering – does already stand also beyond the natural and sinful world . . . that this death shows a characteristic which cannot apply completely and in the same sense to the dying and ascesis of the Christian. Yet objectively speaking, our reflections have reached the statement made by the Scriptures, that the Christian death, the Christian flight from the world and asceticism are the imitation of the Crucified and a participation in the destiny of death of the one whose whole structure of life is passed on to us by baptism and faith. For man's supernatural endowment with grace, from which we started in our last reflections, simply does not take place in just any, as it were indifferently objective decree of God in the form of a norm or law, but in the person of Christ in whom God, as the God of the supernatural life, enters into the world. Hence, everything which follows from God's will to give supernatural grace is a concrete consequence and effect of the person of Christ, the God-man. Christian asceticism, understood as an existential yes to the God of the supernatural life, is therefore a yes to [82] Jesus Christ and in particular, of course, a yes to that mode of appearance of grace in the world which unveiled itself directly for the first time in the fate of Jesus, leading him to the Cross and to death. To this extent this also states that Christian asceticism is a filling-up of the Passion of Christ, in so far as it is an act of faith in that event which was finally achieved in the Cross for the reconciliation of the world with God.

3. Conclusions

All that remains now is to add a few supplementary remarks and conclusions to the understanding of the meaning of Christian asceticism we have gained by what has been said.

(a) One most significant consequence, even for life in the concrete, follows immediately

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from the purely formal relationship between Passion and asceticism already discovered under I. above, viz. the (possible) voluntary nature of fateful suffering and the fateful nature of voluntary asceticism. This is meant first of all to explain that the Passion is to begin with and primarily a fate, an alien fate imposed from without, which falls upon man unasked, and that it always retains this character, even when the person accepts this fate in complete assent. For otherwise there would be no genuine Passion. Hence, the coincidence of 'necessity and voluntariness' must always be achieved anew, for it remains contingent and in an, as it were, suspended actuality. Consequently, this mysterious, paradoxical identity of 'necessity and voluntariness' in the Passion, an identity which is already asceticism, does not extinguish the necessity – and the fateful character – of the Passion. Even the ascetically, personally accepted Passion remains a hard and necessary Passion. Yet, as has already been said, it must be personally assented to and voluntary, and only where it is this can it be personally undergone. But then it is also already and immediately an act of asceticism, even when nothing more is renounced than what is demanded by fate. Yet from the inner relationship between Passion and asceticism there follows also the imposed character of voluntary asceticism. To begin with, asceticism is certainly a free action of the person himself, either because it freely assents to the imposed destiny, or because it even goes beyond this imposed measure of Passion by voluntary 'penance' and by 'self-imposed' asceticism. But this second kind of what alone in the ordinary sense is voluntary asceticism does nevertheless participate in the fateful and imposed nature of the Passion. For ultimately it is after all a free assent to the Passion and, even in its highest [83] conceivable existential measure, it can never attain the 'necessary' to such an extent that the latter would be truly effaced. For even where asceticism is a voluntary penance over and above the Passion which is imposed, it basically remains a training in the Passion, as it were a training in the existential seriousness and true affirmation of the Passion required of us. For, despite its voluntary 'surplus', the 'extra' of voluntary penance and renunciation – the voluntary withdrawal from the world – never attains the greater 'extra' of the necessary Passion. The unattainable and alone total renunciation and flight from the world is imposed on man as his lot and is called death. Hence, even voluntary asceticism must never lose the character of something imposed, of having to obey, of letting oneself be governed by a higher power, and of being called. This oneness of imposed suffering freely accepted and of free asceticism borne as one's lot shows itself also in the concrete religious experience in which these factors continually manifest themselves in a strict, temporal rhythm: suffering imposed by fate becomes the occasion for converting this suffering into free asceticism, and this free asceticism in its turn is, as it were, overcome again by the still greater need for renewed Passion.

(b) It also follows from what has been said that voluntary Christian asceticism requires a 'vocation' in some sense or other. For, in so far as this asceticism freely anticipates death and sacrifices certain values as an expression of faith in the life granted by God's grace from above – values which would be necessary for constituting a purely intramundane perfection (marriage, wealth, etc.) – it does something for which man requires authorization from God. For, no matter how obvious it may be a priori that such an ascetic sacrifice can be an expression of faith in the life of grace, this does not yet prove that such an expression is willed by God and can expect to be accepted by Him. The fact that asceticism is allowed (in so far as this asceticism goes beyond 'moral' asceticism) can therefore be known only from revelation; the 'counsel' to such an asceticism can be given only through revelation and can never be based simply on a natural ethics. The New Testament alone 'permits' this asceticism and 'calls' basically and for the first time to asceticism in the proper sense. The validity and correctness of its determined forms is, therefore, also basically subject to the decision of the Church. Even from this point of view alone, asceticism as a permanent form of life, as realized in the Religious Orders, is not a purely private matter but one for the Church to decide, and this not merely with regard to its forms of social organization [84] as such but also with regard to the asceticism itself as it is lived by the individual in these Orders. Hence, the life of consecrated virginity was already given official status in the ancient Church, even before this life became organized in the community of Orders. How this general vocation based on revelation becomes the special and concrete vocation of the individual is beyond the framework of our present reflections.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(c) In so far as God authorizes such a 'gesture' of faith in eternal life in a meaningful way only (everything considered) at that moment of the history of salvation in which salvation from above (i.e. grace) has entered into its eschatological stage of the parousia, Christian asceticism itself has an eschatological character: because with Christ the end of the ages has already begun and grace is already 'present' in a way in which it was not 'present' before Christ, man may now let go of intramundane values in order to lay hold of this grace by faith, values to which he would have had to hold on in those ages during which eternal life had not yet appeared among us.

(d) We have already pointed out the peculiar, 'partial nature' of Christian asceticism (if we may use that expression for what is meant here): Christian asceticism must never put itself forward as the exclusive way to the God of grace. The 'fuga saeculi' is always mixed up with the love of the world which itself is conscious of being confirmed and eternally valid by the grace which transforms it. This 'partial nature' of Christian asceticism is not – as in the case of mystical asceticism (especially that in the dualistic systems) an unavoidable but reluctant concession to the force of external circumstances which make it impossible 'to live by asceticism alone'. Rather, this 'partial nature' of Christian asceticism is the outcome of the inner nature of things: Christian asceticism does not want to be 'one hundred per cent'. Hence there is no Christian form of life (not even the Religious life) which may be absolutely and exclusively based on the 'fuga saeculi' of 'people living in the beyond'. For the Christian point of view, there is simply a 'more or less' according to the gifts of the individual and not a clear-cut 'either-or' between flight from the world and love of the world, both of which must be blessed by God if they are to be recognized by him as good – and both of which are blessed only if they give mutual recognition to each other. Hence, there also is no 'recipe' for the Christian life in practice, a single recipe for telling with absolute and eternal validity what must be the special gift of each individual: to leave the world so as to find God in faith and thus to receive [85] the abandoned world back again at some future date as a gift from God, or to love the world, loving its life and assenting in believing patience to its death and finding God in both, as a gift from God.

This impossibility of giving a theoretical definition applies not only to the 'law of life' of the individual Christian, but also to the 'gift' granted by the Spirit to the individual ages of the world and to the Church. Even in the latter case it is ultimately impossible to deduce laws; all that is possible even here is to perceive vocational imperatives. As to discovering what might be the imperative of our particular hour today, this cannot be the task of these merely theoretical reflections. But could not the Christian simply counter the wild protest that Christianity does not love the earth, with a benign smile and ask why those who protest do not reckon with the possibility that Christianity may perhaps be trying to love this world afresh with a powerful and intimate love of which those who protest are not even capable; after all, a person who can give his love freely is a person who loves most intimately and most loyally, and only he can give freely who is not obliged to give. Only the Christian, however, is in such a position vis-à-vis the world. In his asceticism he becomes free, not in order to wall up his heart but to give it away, to God and to the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[86]

6

REFLECTIONS ON THE EXPERIENCE OF GRACE

Have we ever actually experienced grace? We do not mean by this some pious feeling, a sort of festive religious uplift, or any soft comfort, but precisely the experiencing of grace, i.e. of that visitation by the Holy Spirit of the triune God which has become a reality in Christ through his becoming man and through his sacrifice on the Cross. Is it possible at all to experience grace in this life? Would not an affirmative answer to this question mean the destruction of faith, of that semi-obscure cloud which envelops us as long as we are pilgrims on this earth? The mystics do indeed tell us – and they would testify to the truth of their assertion by laying down their lives – that they have already experienced God and hence also grace. But this empirical knowledge of God in mystic experience is an obscure and mysterious matter about which one cannot speak if one has not experienced it, and about which one will not speak if one has. Our question, therefore, cannot be answered simply a priori. But perhaps there are steps in the experience of grace, the lowest of which is accessible even to us?

Let us ask ourselves to begin with: have we ever experienced the spiritual in man? (What is meant here by spirit is itself a difficult question which cannot be answered simply and in a few words.) We will perhaps answer: of course, I have experienced this and in fact experience it every day. I think, I study, I make decisions, I act, I enter into relationships with others, I live in a community which is based not only on biological but also on spiritual factors, I love, I am happy, I enjoy poetry, I possess cultural, scientific, artistic values, etc. In short, I know what spirit is. Yet it is not quite as simple as that. Everything we have stated is perfectly true. But in all these things the ‘spirit’ is (or can be) merely, as it were, the ingredient which is used for making this earthly life human, beautiful and in some way meaningful. Yet it does not follow that we have thereby [87] already experienced the spirit in its proper transcendence. This does not mean, of course, that spirit as such is to be found only where one speaks and philosophizes about the transcendence of the spirit. Quite the contrary: that would merely be a derived and secondary experience of that spirit which does not govern the life of man merely as one of its inner moments. Where then lies the real experience? At this point we would like to say from the very start: let us try to discover it for ourselves in our experience; and to aid this, one can merely tentatively and cautiously point out certain things.

Have we ever kept quiet, even though we wanted to defend ourselves when we had been unfairly treated? Have we ever forgiven someone even though we got no thanks for it and our silent forgiveness was taken for granted? Have we ever obeyed, not because we had to and because otherwise things would have become unpleasant for us, but simply on account of that mysterious, silent, incomprehensible being we call God and his will? Have we ever sacrificed something without receiving any thanks or recognition for it, and even without a feeling of inner satisfaction? Have we ever been absolutely lonely? Have we ever decided on some course of action purely by the innermost judgement of our conscience, deep down where one can no longer tell or explain it to anyone, where one is quite alone and knows that one is taking a decision which no one else can take in one’s place and for which one will have to answer for all eternity? Have we ever tried to love God when we are no longer being borne on the crest of the wave of enthusiastic feeling, when it is no longer possible to mistake our self, and its vital urges, for God? Have we ever tried to love Him when we thought we were dying of this love and when it seemed like death and absolute negation? Have we ever tried to love God when we seemed to be calling out into emptiness and our cry seemed to fall on deaf ears, when it looked as if we were taking a terrifying jump into the bottomless abyss, when everything seemed to become incomprehensible and apparently senseless? Have we ever fulfilled a duty when it seemed that it could be done only with a consuming sense of really betraying and obliterating oneself, when it could apparently be done only by doing something terribly stupid for which no one would thank us? Have we ever been good to someone who did not show the slightest sign of gratitude or comprehension and when we also were not rewarded by the feeling of having been 'selfless', decent, etc.?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let us search for ourselves in such experiences in our life; let us look [88] for our own experiences in which things like this have happened to us individually. If we find such experiences, then we have experienced the spirit in the way meant here. For the experience meant here is the experience of eternity; it is the experience that the spirit is more than merely a part of this temporal world; the experience that man's meaning is not exhausted by the meaning and fortune of this world; the experience of the adventure and confidence of taking the plunge, an experience which no longer has any reason which can be demonstrated or which is taken from the success of this world.

Taking this as our starting point, we might realize the secret passion which lives in the real man of the spirit and in the saints. They want to savour this experience. In their secret fear of becoming bogged down in the world, they always want to make sure again that they are beginning to live in the spirit. They have got the taste of the spirit. While ordinary men regard such experiences merely as disagreeable although not quite unavoidable interruptions of their normal life – in which the spirit is merely the seasoning and garnish of a different life, but not the real life itself – the man of the spirit and saint have got the taste of the pure spirit. The spirit is, as it were, drunk by them pure; it is not enjoyed simply as the seasoning of earthly existence. This also explains their strange life, their poverty, their desire for humiliation, their yearning for death, their readiness to suffer, their secret longing for martyrdom. It is not as if they were not also weak. Not as if they too did not always have to return to the ordinariness of everyday living. Not as if they did not know that grace can also sanctify everyday and reasonable activities and can transform them into a step towards God. Not as if they did not know that we are no angels here, nor are we meant to be. But they know that man as spirit – precisely in real existence and not merely in theory – should really live on the border between God and the world, time and eternity, and they always try again to make sure that they are really doing this, that the spirit in them is not merely the medium of the human kind of life.

To proceed: once we experience the spirit in this way, we (at least, we as Christians who live in faith) have also already in fact experienced the supernatural. We have done so perhaps in a very anonymous and inexpressible manner. Probably we have experienced it in such a way even that we were unable to turn round – and did not dare to do so – to look the supernatural straight in the face. But we know – when we let ourselves [89] go in this experience of the spirit, when the tangible and assignable, the relishable element disappears, when everything takes on the taste of death and destruction, or when everything disappears as if in an inexpressible, as it were white, colourless and intangible beatitude – then in actual fact it is not merely the spirit but the Holy Spirit who is at work in us. Then is the hour of his grace. Then the seemingly uncanny, bottomless depth of our existence as experienced by us is the bottomless depth of God communicating himself to us, the dawning of his approaching infinity which no longer has any set paths, which is tasted like a nothing because it is infinity. When we have let ourselves go and no longer belong to ourselves, when we have denied ourselves and no longer have the disposing of ourselves, when everything (including ourselves) has moved away from us as if into an infinite distance, then we begin to live in the world of God himself, the world of the God of grace and of eternal life. This may still appear strange to us at the beginning, and we will always be tempted again to take fright and flee back into what is familiar and near to us: in fact, we will often have to and will often be allowed to do this. But we should gradually try to get ourselves used to the taste of the pure wine of the spirit, which is filled with the Holy Spirit. We should do this at least to the extent of not refusing the chalice when His directing providence offers it to us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The chalice of the Holy Spirit is identical in this life with the chalice of Christ. This chalice is drunk only by those who have slowly learned in little ways to taste the fullness in emptiness, the ascent in the fall, life in death, the finding in renunciation. Anyone who learns this, experiences the spirit – the pure spirit – and in this experience he is also given the experience of the Holy Spirit of grace. For this liberation of the spirit is attained on the whole and in the long run only by the grace of Christ in faith. Where he liberates this spirit, however, he liberates it by supernatural grace which introduces the spirit into the life of God himself.

Let each one of us look for the experience of grace in the contemplation of our life, but not so that we can say: there it is; I have it. One cannot 'find' it so as to claim it triumphantly as one's own possession. One can only look for it by forgetting oneself; one can only find it by seeking God and by giving oneself to him in a love which forgets self, and without still returning to oneself. But one should now and then ask oneself where one has something like this destructive and, at the same time, vivifying experience, so that one might estimate how much of the road [90] still remains to be Covered and how far we are still from the experience of the Holy Ghost in our so-called spiritual life. Grandis nobis restat via. Venite et gustate quam suavis sit Dominus. We still have a long way to go. Come and taste how sweet is the Lord.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[91]

7

THE CHURCH OF THE SAINTS

It is a strange thing, but if one takes a glance at an average modern dogmatic theology one will find it necessary to look in a great many different places for the doctrine on the Saints of the holy Church and of their veneration. Fundamental theology speaks a little in passing about the holy Church, of holiness as one of the marks of the true Church, and in connection with this perhaps speaks also of the Saints. In some other part of dogmatic theology, in connection with the question of papal definitions, we will find a treatment of the question as to whether the Church is also infallible in her canonization of Saints. This then leads to the further question as to how the Church can be infallible in such an act, since after all (it is objected) it cannot really be contained in the revelation closed with Christ and his Apostles that this or that person is a Saint, i.e. belongs to the number of the eternally saved. One frequently solves this problem by making use of the principle that besides 'divine' faith in the testimony of the true God himself, a testimony which the Church merely proclaims, there is also an 'ecclesiastical faith' directly based on the authority of the Church. But why – to be precise – the infallible teaching authority of the Church can be referred also to this particular object (and, for instance, not merely to the 'facta dogmatica') is something which usually does not become very clear.[1] Somewhere else – usually in connection with the doctrine of the adoration due to Christ and the honouring of the Blessed Virgin and Mother of God – there will be a brief treatment of the veneration of the Saints. That the treatment of this question should be assigned to this particular place is ultimately due to the fact that most textbooks still lack any well-defined dogmatic tract on the Church in the right place within the whole framework of dogmatic theology, or that where there is such a tract its proper [92] object is merely taken to consist in most cases in the teaching and ruling authority of the hierarchical Church. A doctrine of 'the finally redeemed, holy members of the holy Church' thus finds no proper place in such a treatment.[2] In whatever place something explicit is said about the Saints, viz. after the doctrine of the adoration due to Christ, it is almost exclusively the teaching of the Council of Trent which is defended – presented as a polemical contrast to the teaching of the Reformers – viz. that it is good and profitable to honour the Saints and to ask for their intercession (Denz. 984). What the Saints are for us and for the Church, why they play a role in our Christian existence even beyond their intercession, all this is left rather unexpressed somewhere on the periphery of our consciousness of faith. The heading of this section of dogmatic theology is 'De cultu sanctorum'; in other words, the question treated of is our veneration of the Saints and not the question of the Saints themselves. The latter is at most treated of indirectly, in so far as one speaks of them as the blessed in heaven, but not in their significance for the Church at the time when they were still pilgrims with us on this earth and gradually becoming Saints. It is easily seen, then, that this sort of treatment in our usual dogmatic theology cannot really give us any integrated idea about what the Saints really

[1] Cf. e.g. Lercher-Schlagenhaufen, Institutiones theol. dogm. I (Innsbruck 1939), n. 511. This is not the place to attempt to answer this question.

[2] In the systematic index to Denzinger, for instance, what is said about the 'cultus sanctorum' (about the cultus, therefore, and not about the sancti), is put under the first commandment of the Decalogue. Yet there are already the beginnings of better arrangements; e.g. in L. Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Cork 1960), there is at least a dogmatic tract on the Church and in this (pp. 318 sq.) there is a paragraph on the veneration and invocation of the Saints. But even here the ecclesiological function of the Saints during their lifetime is somehow overlooked.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mean to us. The greater part of this realization is not transferred from the exercise of the Christian and ecclesiastical life to the reflections of theology. Yet if theology has also a duty towards the Christian life, then this lack in theology is harmful to life.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE CHURCH OF THE SAINTS

Perhaps the best way to find the right starting point for a very small sketch of a theology of the Church of the Saints is to ask ourselves why the Church has the power to canonize a person, i.e. is able after his death to declare with the infallibility of her teaching and pastoral authority that this person belongs to the number of those who are finally saved. This after all is not self-evident. Are we not told that we must not judge [93] anyone before the Last Day? It cannot be said that canonization is really authorized by miracles. For, while these miracles have a merely relative degree of certainty, the Church's declaration of sanctity is absolute, and so the miracles are not really suitable to act as the sole basis of such a judgement. Moreover, in certain circumstances the Church will do without the miracles in such a canonization process (CIC 2116 §2). It may be said, of course, that the Church has received her infallible authority for such a definition from her founder. But then the question arises: what is our source for such a statement? It may be quite logical to conclude: the Church honours the Saints, she is supposed to honour them and tells her faithful to venerate them, and hence she must be preserved from making mistakes in this clear veneration. Yet what is the source of our knowledge of the basis for this conclusion, viz. that the Church is meant to venerate the Saints and this not just in the way in which people rightly honour the great figures of their history and preserve their memory for future generations (taking the question aside from any absolute judgement about the metahistorical validity of this veneration)? When the Church declares someone to be a Saint, this is much more a necessary part[3] of the Church's realization of her own being, something which is really a part of her in her religious, Christian reality; this canonization process is moreover such that the Church's knowledge about the validity of her individual veneration has the quality of faith. The first of these characteristics is connected with the second. How could the Church be infallible in such questions if she could quite easily renounce the veneration of the Saints? She must obviously be able to judge infallibly because she simply must not avoid passing a judgement; this means, however, that the veneration of the Saints necessarily belongs to her life. But why is this so?

IN PRAISE OF GRACE

The only way to advance in this question is by the following reflection: the Church professes herself to be the holy Church. This profession is not left to her own choice. She cannot refrain from making this profession, as [94] it were out of modesty or in view of the sinfulness of her members. It is her duty, because she must profess God's grace. But when she does this, she must not merely praise God's salvific will by grace which is 'in itself' equipped to forgive and to sanctify. She must praise the grace which has had powerful effects, which has conquered, which has become real and manifest to us. Hence she must say: God really has redeemed, he really has poured out his Spirit, he really has done mighty things for sinners, he [3] Whether this or that individual is venerated by the Church or an individual Christian as a Saint may be a matter of free choice (apart from absolutely central figures of salvation history such as Mary, John the Baptist, the Apostles). But this cannot be extended to the veneration of the Saints in general and as a whole, if only because of Lk 1:48; Ac 7:54-60; Heb 11/12; Rv 21:14.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation has let his light shine in the darkness. His light shines, it is visible, and there is a tangible assembly of those whom he has called out of the kingdom of darkness and whom he has brought into the kingdom of the Son of his love. Because the Church must praise God's grace, she must also profess herself to be the holy Church. This profession humbles her; for she always testifies anew by this against what she is of herself: the flock of the poor, the stubborn, the sinful, of those who of themselves are very obviously lost. Yet she may not on this account omit this profession. She must sing: 'You have loved us, O Lord, and redeemed us by your blood; you have made us to be a kingdom and made us priests to God your father' (Rv 1:5-6). She must not declare this merely as a possibility provided by God; she is no Pelagian for whom man's choice from mere, God-given possibilities would have to be the last word, and so she must testify to this as an event which has actually taken place. She must not behave as if it were in the last analysis still questionable or at least still a completely incomprehensible and hidden fact that God with his word of mercy has had the last word in the dialogue between himself and the creature, as if one could merely 'presume' that God has poured out his Spirit without giving any evidence at all of his mighty wind and his tongues of fire.

ESCHATOLOGICAL TESTIMONY OF FAITH

This hymn of praise to the grace of God in the profession made by the holy Church, a profession belonging to the innermost core of the Christian Credo, must now be clarified in its theological traits, and this from several points of view. This profession made by the holy Church is a profession of the visible Church. It is, of course, a profession of faith. Certainly, what is professed is actually seen, and acknowledged as seen, by the grace of God and in the light of faith (without thereby questioning the apologetic, faith-testifying function of the holiness of the Church as [95] a mark of the true Church of Christ). But this holiness of the Church is not by this fact something which is present merely as something absolutely beyond experience, as something merely believed to be present in a completely hidden way in the Church and contrary to all history and experience, merely believed to lie under the sole outward impression of the Church's hopelessly sinful state and failure, and yet believed by a despairingly paradoxical 'nevertheless'. This holiness makes the Church a signum elevatum in nationes (Denz. 1794); one meets her if one looks for her and wants to see her with a humble and open mind; she shines out, she proclaims herself in a real way, one can meet her. God's deed in giving his grace to man is witnessed in her works which are such that we can praise the Father on account of them (Mt 5:16); it is witnessed in its fruits which are love, joy, peace, patience, tenderness, goodness, faith, modesty, continence (Ga 5:22 sq.).

This manifested, 'proclaimed' holiness of the Church is not merely a pure 'facticity' which can be observed subsequently here and there and contrary to all expectations. It can be seen to be rather something which is ordained by God in his decrees. It is indeed always an act of man's free love and of the free obedience of his faith. But precisely this act is determined and given gratuitously by God; precisely this act is borne and guaranteed by the greater power of the grace of God, God who of himself no more allows the Church as a whole to break out of his love than out of his truth, not because man could not do so but because God grants the grace to the Church really to do freely what he wants of her; not merely her word and her objective preparations for salvation (preaching and the sacraments), but also her 'existential' being is intended to proclaim the final victory of grace, since in Christ on the Cross God has the last word in the dialogue between himself and the human race, and this word is the effective word of mercy. Hence the Church must in all ages proclaim – even though in a sense ashamedly, yet quite clearly – that she is the holy Church. She knows what she thus

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

affirms of herself, not merely by her past experience of herself by God's mighty deed which has been promised to her by God's word before she had any – otherwise very problematical – experience, and which goes beyond and anticipates this experience. The proclamation of her own holiness is an eschatological statement of faith and not merely a kind judgement of history which condescends not to overlook the good which 'after all also exists' over and above everything ugly.

[96] Yet precisely in this way, this statement must be a concrete one. If the Church were simply to say that she is the holy one and mean by this simply that this has to be said in general – as it were, at random and without indicating anything absolutely definite, but simply because it is not very likely that God's word and grace should nowhere gain a real and final victory – then she would really have proclaimed grace and its holy law merely as a possibility and as a challenge, but not grace as the victorious power and the law as fulfilled by grace. In this case, she would after all be preaching a merely abstract 'idealism'; she herself would be an ideal and a postulate but not the God-given fulfilment which has already surpassed everything merely morally demanded, everything which merely ought to be. She would after all be merely the law and not the pneuma which is poured out. She herself would be on the side of the law which is the goad of sin; she would be merely on the side of those to be redeemed and not the tangible expression of the grace of redemption. If this were so, then the more the Church would speak about holiness – the clearer and more forcibly she would proclaim the mere demand for holiness – the more she would be the Old Testament synagogue of the law. Yet she is after all distinguished from the latter precisely by the fact that she does not proclaim the law as a demand (although she must do this also, since we, her listeners, are always in transition from the servitude of the flesh to the freedom of the Holy Spirit); rather, she proclaims the fulfilment of the law which has been accomplished in us by the grace of God. Hence, she must be able to state her holiness in the concrete. She must have a 'cloud of witnesses' whom she can indicate by name. She cannot merely maintain that there is a history of salvation (without it being known exactly where it takes place with real, final success), but she must really relate that very eschatological history of salvation which she is herself. The prize of her actual Saints belongs to her innermost being and is not merely something which she 'also' achieves 'on the side', something which has been inspired by a purely human need for hero worship.

The mission to praise the grace of God as something which has come and conquered contains the obligation of the Church to call herself the one who is holy throughout the ages, and to make this statement about herself in a concrete way as seen in the prize of the Saints given by name. The Church must, therefore, begin with Mary, the Protomartyr, and the Apostles; but she cannot stop there. She must [97] retain the power which was active in the primitive Church when she 'canonized' Our Lady, the Protomartyr and the Apostles, otherwise she would simply have been the holy Church at one time without being it still; she could no longer actually praise the grace of God, which has really been granted to her as something which saves and sanctifies.

THE SAINTS: CREATORS OF NEW CHRISTIAN MODES OF LIFE

Having reached this point, it can now be seen more clearly what is the exact function of the Saints in the Church. They are of vital importance for her constitution, not merely as successful products of the Church in her role as an institutional establishment of salvation, products who – brought to maturity by instruction and education, direction and means of grace – are, as it were, handed over as the completed end-result to the 'triumphant' Church. They belong, precisely as Saints here on earth, to the very essence of the Church; if she

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

lacked her Saints, she herself would not be what she must be. The Church is not merely a saving institution and thus the teacher of truth and administrator of the means of grace, directed – as if to mere objects – towards those who do not administer this institution in an official capacity. If the Church were holy merely in her objective institutions, then she would be the Synagogue and there would be the danger (and, in the long run, the insurmountable danger) that the unholy sinners might turn the holy institutions into a weapon against God himself and that they might destroy these institutions together with the 'synagogue'. These baptized, sanctified men – who believe and love – are the Church (a platitude which, alas, is still not really understood and lived by the people of the Church today). This Church, understood as the people of God to which belong all those who are baptized and who have the true faith – this Church understood as the Body of Christ whose members are not confined to the office-bearers – must be holy, must represent in a historically tangible manner the victory of God's grace. It is certainly true that this happens already through all the 'saints' in the biblical sense, i.e. through all those who have been justified by faith, love and baptism, and who thus live a truly Christian life, since all 'saints' who have been called by God, who have come into his holy nearness and who have been claimed by Him as his property, form the assembled congregation of Christ, the holy Church. Those [98] whom we in present-day usage call Saints have in fact no special advantage in this respect over all those 'saints' in the biblical sense, i.e. in regard to formation of the holy Church as the historical witness of the holy and sanctifying God and his grace which has already and finally begun its reign. We can indeed say that these Saints in the modern, liturgical and canonical sense tower over all the other 'saints' – in other words, over us ordinary Christians – by their 'heroic' virtue, but that this virtue is something extraordinary and that therefore these Saints have an extraordinary task to perform as representatives of the holy Church. This is quite correct, but it is surely not enough. For where the Christian reality is present by the power of grace (which signifies an absolutely new beginning), everything which follows from this and grows out of it cannot signify anything more than a difference in degree as compared with the absolutely new being in relation to the one who has not been justified. The heroic nature of the virtues of the (canonized) Saints cannot alone explain their special task in the Church. But they undoubtedly have such a special task. For why otherwise can the Church exercise in their regard alone that authority and power of decision by which she reaches into the ultimate secrets of conscience and into the very depths of eternity, an authority and power of decision which she cannot exercise in regard to everyone who has passed over, signed by faith and who now rests in the sleep of peace? This surely cannot be explained simply by the fact that such a procedure would be too awkward and that it really does not benefit Christian existence – which must work out its salvation in 'fear and trembling' – if every Christian who has died a good death were to be 'canonized'. No doubt it is also not explained by saying simply that the Church would ultimately no longer be the believing, merely hoping Church who is still a pilgrim, if it were known with certainty of all those who have belonged to her right up to death that they have finally attained salvation. For it is, of course, true that – even if the general separation were to take place merely at the boundary of death, and thus in a way clearly recognizable for all others here on earth – then the Church would no longer be both the Church of Saints and sinners, the threshing floor covered with chaff and wheat, the net filled with good and bad fishes, and this in such a way that the division between the two is known by God and his angels alone. All this is true but does not itself explain why only a few ('heroic') Saints among the 'saints' in the biblical sense can and may be canonized. These must have a more particular task [99] than merely being 'especially excellent' cases from among the ordinary (average) 'saints'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But in what does the specific importance of (canonized or canonizable[4]) Saints for the constitution of the holy Church consist? To make any headway here, it will be necessary to note the following: we must not conceive the holiness of the Church and of the Saints merely as the complete fulfilment of an always equal and static, supernaturally moral debit which floats as an unchangeable ideal over the history of the Church and which is realized ever anew by new generations of the Church under her direction. The Church has a genuine history, a unique history of salvation and hence also of holiness. Even though the 'essence' of Christian holiness remains always the same, it does not simply always 'happen' in the 'same way' in each Saint. The differences between Saints (which no one would deny) are not merely sublime accidents of a merely temporal kind, which are of no consequence for the holiness itself which they realize. No, precisely these unique accidents of history, the 'individual factor', the 'physiognomic element' of the Saints enters into eternity with them, into that eternity which is not something purely abstract but the genuine and permanent, individual product of history. Otherwise there would be a 'cultus sanctitatis' in the Church but no 'cultus sanctorum', and one would have to recommend moral theology books for reading and not the lives of the Saints. Just as there is a real development of dogmas, i.e. a history of the appropriation of truth, so there is also a history of holiness, i.e. the always unique, unrepeatable history of the appropriation of God's grace and of the partaking of God's holiness. Hence, the true nature of Christian holiness cannot be clearly and solely deciphered from a Christian theology of essences or, even less, from a 'natural law' (with a supernatural goal), no matter how necessary and indispensable such philosophical and theological ethics may be. The nature of Christian holiness appears from the life of Christ and of his Saints; and what appears there cannot be translated absolutely into a general theory but must be experienced in the encounter with the historical which takes place from one individual case to the other. The history of Christian holiness (of what, in other words, is the business of every Christian, since everyone is sanctified and called to holiness) is in its totality a unique history and not the eternal return of the same. Hence [100] this history has its always new, unique phases; hence it must always be discovered anew (even though always in the imitation of Christ who remains the inexhaustible model), and this by all Christians. Herein lies the special task which the canonized Saints have to fulfil for the Church. They are the initiators and the creative models of the holiness which happens to be right for, and is the task of, their particular age. They create a new style; they prove that a certain form of life and activity is a really genuine possibility; they show experimentally that one can be a Christian even in 'this' way; they make such a type of person believable as a Christian type. Their significance begins therefore not merely after they are dead. Their death is rather the seal put on their task of being creative models, a task which they had in the Church during their lifetime,[5] and their living-on means that the example they have given remains in the Church as a permanent form.[6] Anyone who really understands what is meant by the history of the [4] The following exposition is not meant to imply that everyone who has exercised the special task to which we refer will also be actually canonized.

[5] To repeat: a model is not merely the plastic representation ('case') of an abstract ideal, which already justifies itself in its abstractness, or of a general norm. The concrete picture is not a concept which has been illustrated for the ignorant, while the intelligent can live without pictures and models by the theoretical norms. The concrete model renders what is represented present for the first time to the others as something genuinely possible. The fact that the model itself is present is the undeniable miracle of the Spirit in the Church (similarly as in the other dimensions of the uniquely creative).

[6] We have here a similar case to that of the intercession and the communication of grace to us by the Blessed in heaven: it too does not signify any new (historical) initiative on the part of the Blessed, an initiative – that is – which would be independent of and externally added to their real, historical life, but objectively simply the permanent validity of their life for the one world in the eyes of God, a validity which God has conceived as an element of the one world of the spirit, of the ethical and of faith, at the same time as he willed this one world, in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spirit and by the fact that the history of the Church (and of her holiness) is a unique and connected history will not object against what has been said that in this case the 'old' Saints are no longer topical. For the history of the spiritual means precisely that something becomes real in order to remain, not in order to disappear again, so that this permanence does not militate against the real becoming of what precisely was not always there already, and the becoming is the event of what is eternally valid and not of what is swallowed up again. The creative, first appearance of a historical form (and thus also, for instance, of holiness) just does not mean that the past of a spiritual history becomes thereby simply outmoded. (Plato has not ceased to be important for us [101] simply because we can no longer philosophize with him as if there had never been a Kant.) At most, the only truth in this objection would be the fact that even the creative models of our holiness have still a further history in the Church after their death, through the always new historical realizations of the holy in the Church. (Thus, for instance, even a dutiful son of St Francis can today no longer prescind 'romantically' from the fact that since the time of St Francis there has been an Ignatius; and even the sons of St Ignatius are not the guardians of 'final truth', for 'final truth' is not to be found in the history of holiness, i.e. in the historical validity of the life of Christ, since He too lives on even to the end of history.)

THE ADVENTURE OF THE SAINTS

When the Church canonizes, she says: this life which has been lived is genuine and full Christianity, although – no, because – the way in which such a Saint has lived is not at all self-evident: in the desert and quite 'unecclesiastically'; as an intellectually daring scholar; in humdrum conditions and within pitiful horizons; as a perfectly normal Central European, as a very 'egocentric' beggar (almost like any typical down-and-out); and in a thousand other ways which one never recognizes as Christian possibilities until afterwards, until after they have been lived in a holy way. For the most part, such things are recorded afterwards in the 'lives of the Saints' as at best merely proofs of the virtue of the Saints. For the rest, however, they are rendered harmless, or are deftly touched up, as if it were immediately evident that one can be a Christian, and even a saintly one, in such conditions. Yet in reality the way the Saint lived his life was an adventure, and an adventure whose 'rule' it was impossible to discover simply in any theoretical moral rule or in the rule of a Religious Order (alone), even though the Saint himself, in his humility and simple fidelity to the inner inspirations of the Holy Spirit, often was unaware how 'original' (in the truest sense of the word) and how unique he was (at least in this or that aspect of his Christian existence). How many Christians today realize clearly that Francis of Assisi managed to achieve what the Waldensians had in mind and what in their case was rejected (and quite rightly, since it was distorted) as unecclesiastical idealism? The clashes of St Ignatius with the Spanish Inquisition and his later fights for the characteristic ideal of his Order (even Pius V was still [102] trying to impose the communal choral Office on the Jesuits), the persecution – to the point of his ignominious and bitter confinement to the monastery – which a St John of the Cross had to endure, the inquisitorial process together with monastic confinement inflicted on Mary Ward, the very real danger of being put on the Index which threatened the holy Doctor of the Church, Robert Bellarmine (at the hands of Sixtus V, because he did not seem 'papal' enough) . . . such and many similar facts show that the style of Christian existence lived by the Saints and sanctioned by their holiness was not by any means self-evident to their contemporaries. Only someone who from the outset has tacitly lowered Christianity, with its exorbitant demands, to which each thing depends on the whole, precisely as it is.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the level of the standards of the 'decent citizen' who is 'practising' can think that it is really quite obvious how a Christian should love and that consequently there is no need for the successful risk – a risk canonized by the Church precisely because it was successful – as the ones taken by the Saints who are our examples. Only someone who underestimates the ever new character of situations of history can imagine that he can be satisfied with Christ and imitation of him, arguing that all the Saints in their lives can express only a very small aspect of the one Word become flesh. 'Be imitators of me as I am of Christ' (1 Co11:1), say the Saints together with St Paul. The Church, by canonization, confirms their word, not so much or even principally in order to honour the Saints but because she thus finds her own task, her own nature, in so far as it has to be realized precisely here and now and then continuously maintained as thus realized.

It is possible – this is only to be expected – to object that the possibility of holiness seen as a continuing imitation of Christ – a possibility demanded 'merely' in a particular situation – can be found by 'me' just as well, since the Saints after all also found it for themselves. Yet someone who says this, would first of all have to deny the possibility of creative example even in Christ himself. Furthermore, such an objector would turn each person into an isolated individual. Everyone must, of course, realize his own holiness; even as a Christian, everyone must find 'himself' and not someone else (even if this finding consists in the loss of his soul which, however, is his own). To this extent, of course, the same thing as what we have just said of the Saints happens in every 'ordinary' person. But for this very reason, everyone in a genuine community of the Holy Spirit is dependent on the others and finds himself only by seeing himself in others. The Saints, however, are as it were the 'official', appointed [103] ways of the Church's discovery of herself which have become publicly historical and which have been consciously adopted by the Church. To the same extent in which there is a public and official sphere of and in the Church and, side by side with this, also a sphere which remains private – and in as far as neither of these spheres may resolve itself into the other – we also have a canonized sanctity, seen as a self-realization of the Church, and the 'unknown' saints. Since this distinction (and not really the holiness in this or that person) is a specific one, i.e. an essential one, we have the right to say that the canonized Saints have a specific task. It is neither their holiness nor necessarily its measure (compared with ours) which is essentially new and different, but rather the explicit, conscious self-discovery in the official, public sphere, achieved by the Church through the canonization of these Saints. This does not necessarily mean that this happens in the case of every 'saint'. The greatest part of holiness must take place in silence, in being taken for granted and in forgetting about self, so that even the right hand of the Church does not know what the left hand is doing. Yet, since the Church must nevertheless know that she remains in all ages the holy one who thereby praises the grace of God, she must also know explicitly about some saints, which means quite possibly (who can say?) that she does not know anything at all about many of her greatest glories.

THE CHARISMATIC ORDER

In his encyclical 'Mystici Corporis', Pius XII has shown that Christ is permanently the Head and ruler of the Church, not merely by the fact of having given the Church her ordinary magisterium and the pastors who govern the Church by his commission and in his name. He also rules directly by Himself. He does this, in turn, not merely by enlightening and strengthening the ecclesiastical rulers, but 'especially in difficult times, he raises up in the bosom of Mother Church men and women of outstanding sanctity to give example to other Christians and so promote the increase of his Mystical Body'. There is, therefore, a driving force for the further development of life in the Church which does not originate from the official element but directly from Christ himself, a law of life which goes out from 'Christ in a mysterious way in his own person' and embraces the saints who hold no office and through them affects the others and the official element. Hence, there is (as Pius XII shows) a double [104] structure in the 'organic construction of the Body of the Church': that of the grace of the hierarchy and that of the 'charismatics', just as in a biological organism there is not merely one structure but several, which condition each other in a mysterious way. The official element lives also by the charisms of the saints, although it remains true that the saint remains subject to the official element (understood as doctrine and government). The government must have not only an object but also a dynamism which can be directed. Naturally, the holder of an office and the charismatic can also be united in the one person. There have been such particularly fortunate cases. But it need not be so and it has not always been so. Anthony the Hermit, Benedict, Francis of Assisi, Catherine of Siena, Margaret Mary Alacoque, Theresa of the Child Jesus and many others have all been of irreplaceable importance for the history of the Church and for the Church herself in their function of direct receptors of the impulses of the Spirit. As Catholics, we are – quite rightly – accustomed to think anti-Donatistically, i.e. to distinguish the office with its rights and the sacrament with its efficacy, from the personal holiness of the office-holder and of the minister of the sacrament. This is necessary for the individual events in the Church. The Church is not the community of Christians who are already recognized as predestined for salvation and who can be isolated as such. She is therefore the Church of sinners, of those who are in via, the Church of hope, of the secret of election kept concealed by God, and of the impossibility of anticipating the Judgement here on earth. Since, however, she must be the city set on a hill and the assembled flock of Christ – in other words, the visible Church – the validity of the office cannot be dependent in the individual case on the inner holiness of the office-holder. This truth in its turn, however, must not be allowed to cancel out the other truth, viz. that the Church is meant to be and to appear as the community of eschatological salvation and of victorious grace. Hence, at the decisive points of the history of salvation, i.e. for example and above all in Mary, the historical salvific function and holiness have fused inseparably into one. For this reason, the Church which is overpowered by God's grace whose coming is no longer left to human choice, must always have her Saints and always be, and profess herself to be, the Church of the Saints.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[105]

8

SOME THOUGHTS ON ‘A GOOD INTENTION’

Writing today about ‘a good intention’ or, as it is also called, ‘a perfect intention’, it will not be possible to expect an immediate spark of interest, not even from Christians for whom the spiritual life still means something. One will necessarily give the impression of treating of something which only those can afford who ‘have nothing better to do’; one will have to be prepared to meet the objection that the man of today, in the hustle and difficulty of his life, cannot burden himself with such pious technicalities which only involve additional nervous strain. We will speak of other, more important misgivings in the course of our reflections.

I

1. The Twofold Unity of Intention and Action

Let us state first of all what is meant by ‘a good intention’. We are always doing something as long as we live. This means in most cases some external action: walking, reading, talking, shovelling coal, and many other such things. We do, of course, also have thoughts, inner feelings, ‘experiences’ and attitudes. But one thing cannot be denied: our life consists for the most part of actions which are performed ad extra, of activities in which man is occupied with something other than himself, actions by which he intervenes, and effects something, in the external world of things and fellow human beings. Without these activities man could not fulfil his life at all. He cannot live in pure inwardness. He cannot make himself a pure spirit. Even the internal is still achieved in the material of his external actions and of things and achievements to which these actions refer. Not only would this be impossible, even if he wanted to withdraw himself into his interiority, but he would soon notice that his inner experience would become thin and unreal, and that he would not be achieving [106] what he wants, viz. the intensification and deepening of his ‘interior life’. Hence he must have actions ad extra, and this is just as much part of his life – and more precisely, of his spiritual life – as the inner processes.

There are in fact no purely internal processes in a properly metaphysical sense. For everyday purposes it is possible to distinguish between internal and external acts. The former are those which others cannot see; one might almost define the matter thus and deduce from this that we are here concerned with a purely practical distinction. For what cannot be seen? Which of our internal conditions and decisions does not necessarily form itself into our corporeality? What element in them objectifies itself in no way at all? The answer is: none at all. Everything, even innermost human matters, are still corporeal, dependent on the material and thus on something already directed towards the external world, something objectified, something open to the grasp from outside (including even the truth drug and the methods of the bolshevists who successfully put the ‘right ideas’ into one’s mind by means of chemicals); everything in our innermost being is directed towards the outside and finds its resonance in the world of things. Yet the distinction between external and internal human acts is of great importance, not indeed in the sense of a division of two strictly separate classes but in the sense of a preponderance of the internal or the external, even though all human acts are both internal and external.

Hence, man objectifies himself and his inner outlook, his original free decision and attitude ‘ad extra’, into what moral theology calls ‘external-acts’. Indeed, he only achieves the internal exercise – at least in a really deep and genuine manner – when this exercise objectifies itself outwardly. The external activity is not always merely a subsequent announcement and a secondary consequence of this internal decision, but just as frequently (indeed in the last analysis, always, to some extent) it is that in which alone the internal act can be achieved and posited. Just as the body is not merely a later vestment and tool of the soul, but is that in which the soul itself can first of all achieve its own being, so it is also with man's activities: the external activity is also the condition of the internal, and not merely vice versa.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. The Ambiguity of the External Action

In spite of what has been said, the external action is not identical with the internal act. One could say: the original freedom and the achieved freedom [107] have need of each other but they are not the same. The external action may be present even when the internal act is weak. Although it possesses corporeality which reveals the internal act, the external action nevertheless does not have an absolutely clear relationship to that internal act: the same thing in the realm of the external action may have a number of quite different origins, good or bad, existentially central or peripheral.[1] It is the same here as in the relationship between body and soul: the soul expresses itself in the body and at the same time veils itself in it; the face is the mirror of the soul and yet does not volunteer its secret. The external action may have arisen out of a certain attitude and may persist in itself (in its corporeal effects, in the lines of association, in the complexes, etc., which were created by this corporeality) or in the effect which it has had in the actual 'external world', while the inner intention which had given rise to it has long since changed. The inner frame of mind may really have intended something quite different from what was expressed in the external action. In addition, there is the fact that the reach of the plastic power of spiritual freedom into the corporeal reality (which itself reaches deep down into the so-called 'inner' reality) is rather limited and finite, so that for this reason alone one cannot clearly interpret from external reality what is, and is possessed, within. All this must be taken into account when one wants to know what is really meant by a 'good intention'.

If the external and internal acts are not simply the same, then it follows from this that nothing definite about the value of a man and his actions can be decided by the correctness of his external actions. Moral values must spring from the heart, from one's original freedom; only there is the source from which they can come. Only where, out of the very centre of its heart, the free spirit – borne by divine grace – makes a decision having its source in God and leading to God, does there come into being the action which can remain eternally. Hence, seen from this point of view, everything depends on the 'intention'; in the words of the majority of moral theologians: the external action has no morality of its own. The external action is also no clear criterion for this inner intention, in the sense of being able to see clearly from it what genuine or false motives are really present within. God sees the heart. Man always sees merely the [108] façade, no matter how thoroughly he practises depth-psychology or similar disciplines on himself or on others. For, whatever can be discovered objectively by these means is still not that original, consciously and objectively intangible centre of spiritual freedom[2] from which alone moral good and evil can proceed.

---

[1] Cf. on this our few reflections in the essay: 'Guilt and its remission: the borderland between theology and psychotherapy' (in Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 265 sqq.).

[2] Although nothing can be subjectively culpable unless man has clearly recognized it as such and willed it really freely (which again can be done only knowingly), and although psychology and the scholastic theory of knowledge emphasize that one cannot have any greater subjective and objective certitude about anything than

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[109] 3. The Ultimate Source of the Moral Act

Yet it is true to say that the internal and external acts are not related to each other simply as cause and effect external to the cause. They are related as . . . soul and body, the soul being the form intrinsic to the body and intrinsically animating it, and the body being that in which the soul first achieves its own being. Hence the internal intention cannot do without the external act. But it follows from both statements just made that the internal intention cannot simply rely on being right simply because the external act is right, for this act is an ambiguous consequence of the internal act; however, the internal intention cannot declare itself to be disinterested in the external act (since God after all regards only the 'heart'), for it itself attains its own proper being only in the searching investigation of the external act. True Christian morality is therefore a balance between the internal intention of the heart and the external act, a balance which always goes from one to the other without resting or taking root in either one of them. It does not rest in 'interiority', for this can be extremely thin and empty and deceptive if it does not continually 'inform' itself anew and powerfully into very real deeds. It does not rest in external deeds either – as if ultimately and after all only such sturdy, honest and solid things mattered and not just 'feelings' and 'moods' – for all 'good works', no matter how good and right and beneficial they may be to one's neighbour, can also be empty of what alone endows them with true saving value, viz. the believing, hoping love of the heart. This love they cannot carry on their own; this love cannot completely enter into them, for it reaches out beyond every concrete act to the infinity of God in himself.

---

about these immediate data of one's own consciousness, the Church and her theology, in accordance with the teaching of the Council of Trent, nevertheless holds fast to the truth that man cannot have any real and absolute certitude about the state of his own conscience and his state of grace. In the ultimate analysis, however, this uncertainty can be conditioned only by man's freedom and by his personal decision (about all other factors concerning the possession of grace it is quite possible to reach a reductively metaphysical certitude – of experience or of faith). Hence there is no other way, in our opinion, of solving the dilemma beginning to appear here between clear knowledge of the immediate data of consciousness, on the one hand, and the uncertainty of the same data (as conditions of the state of grace), on the other hand, than by distinguishing between a sphere of the reflex and reflexible data of consciousness and a sphere of the unreflected and to some extent also basically unreflectable realities of consciousness incapable of being objectified. In the latter we would include the proper and ultimate quality of a free decision with which man is so 'identical' that it cannot leave any room for him to give it adequate objectification, without it following from this that he in no way – or even in no certain way – knows about this quality. This is impossible because the free is precisely the conscious and because 'unconscious' factors cannot be considered when dealing with a free action as such. This is not the place to discuss what other 'objects' belong to this deeper sphere (a sphere which has hardly anything to do with the depth-consciousness of today's depth-psychology). The two spheres mentioned naturally are not separated from one another by a wall; they are ('spheres' is an image) real but 'really different' elements of the one consciousness which must not be imagined as the surface like a cinema screen, as if what is not objectively visible on it could not be in consciousness at all. Since there is an inner connection between these two 'spheres', there is a concomitant or subsequent possibility of reflecting on the free action, and hence also naturally the possibility and duty of a reflexly-considered morality which conforms to principles and is accountable to itself and to others. But this reflection and consideration does not completely catch up with what the individual does in the concrete. But in this sphere (and, in our opinion, only in this sphere) the individual does not really know absolutely exactly what he really does, although he must know it if he is to be responsible for his actions, and although he is in no way responsible for what he does not know at all. Hence, he must at the same time 'know' and 'not know'. But so that this may not simply be a cheap paradox, we must distinguish between these two spheres and must allot the knowing and not-knowing to them. We have spoken of this here since otherwise some of the things we will have to say in a moment would not be completely comprehensible.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II GOOD INTENTION

1. Task and Goal

From what we have seen so far, a 'good intention' could be called: the practising effort to establish more and more perfectly the necessary unity between internal and external action, a unity always remaining a task to be achieved anew. This unity must be established in such a way as to make the external act always more concrete and perfect in this unity, by making it spring in ever-increasing purity and directness from the correct internal attitude and holding it, as it were, in its origin. On the [110] other hand, the internal attitude (in the sense of free act) must in this way become more and more genuine and true, by testing itself more and more in the material of tangible and hard reality and by embodying itself more and more into this reality in which alone it can be properly achieved.

Of course, an intention is 'good' and 'perfect' only when it is directed towards that good which avails unto salvation. Up till now we have merely spoken in general about the twofold unity between internal and external activity in general. What we have said up till now could basically also apply or be applied to morally bad internal and external activity. A good intention is one which extends into the external act in the sense of animating it and which realizes itself in it if it is directed to the good or the perfect. The question now is, when is this the case?

2. Christian Motivation

For the Christian, this question takes the following form: what are the presuppositions for the supernatural meritoriousness of an act? Do these include also a motive for acting which is taken from the realm of faith? Theologians generally answer in the affirmative, i.e. they are almost unanimously of the opinion today that a motive for acting which is taken from a merely natural morality would not make the act arising from it an act of Christian existence – an act 'done in the Holy Spirit', a supernaturally meritorious act – even if the person concerned were to perform this act as a Christian and as someone justified, in short: as someone who is in the state of grace. And this answer is quite right: grace, or the state of justification, is something which should pass into act and bear fruit. This fruit, however, according to the defined teaching of the Church based on the Scriptures, can only be found where God's Spirit is at work, where the Spirit 'urges', 'attracts', where He prays with us in his inexpressible groanings, where he pleads for the saints, where his unction teaches us, where he enlightens and inspires. Now, no matter how one may conceive the internal influence of God's Pneuma – and especially if one thinks of it as not purely unconscious but as enlightening from within and as a conscious inspiration – this internal influence of God's Pneuma cannot be thought of as simply independent of the word which is the message of Christ and which comes by hearing. If this word were in any way basically unimportant for salvation, and if internal grace and the consequent internal, supernatural elevation of our act were simply sufficient, then it would be difficult to see why there should be any [111] external, historically transmitted, preached message of salvation at all, a message which is entrusted to a visible Church and its authoritative magisterium. In that case, Christianity would be in the last analysis a mysticism of interiority and not also (equally essentially) a history, Church, word (which is different from 'experience' and interior states) and sacrament. In short, it must be maintained that an internal intention can be a good intention only when it gives saving significance to man's actions, when it is an intention which is an answer to the word of the historically communicated message accepted in faith. (We need not worry in this connection about how there can nevertheless be a possibility of salvation for those who seem to have at no time during their life come into contact with God's historically communicated word of revelation, and thus are quite unable to make its content the object of their outlook, attitude and intention. This question belongs to a different frame of reference.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Actual and Virtual Intention

Those theologians who normally are more moderate than the ascetics and teachers of ascetic theology certainly emphasize that the motive of faith which must animate a man's view and intention if his act is to be a work of grace does not necessarily need to be as explicit and reflex as one might be inclined to think from the statement just made. As is well known, moral theologians distinguish between actual and virtual intention. The former is an intention by which one acts out of an explicitly and clearly, objectively comprehended motive, and in fact a motive which is explicitly conscious at the moment of doing the action for which this motive is to constitute the motivation. Someone, for instance, who feeling insulted by some injurious word were to pounce on the speaker – and this at the very moment of hearing this word – so as to avenge himself by a box on the ear, would be acting (i.e. in giving the box on the ear) from an actual motive of revengefulness. For at the moment of his action, this motive is explicitly and clearly present in his consciousness as the object of his knowledge and of his volition, and out of this motive thus present there springs the action concerned, viz. the box on the ear. A virtual motive is one which at the moment of the action concerned is not present explicitly and as an object of consciousness and yet has a truly causal influence on the action, even though it is comprehended only globally and is 'present' only on the periphery of consciousness or in some [112] similar manner. A mother, out of love for her child, washes its nappies. While she is washing them, she thinks perhaps only of nappies, or perhaps of preparing the meal which is to be ready in a couple of hours; she does not really think of her child. And yet, the love for her child, her concern for it, flows into this action; for she would not be doing it at all if she did not love her child. Our mental life is an uninterrupted stream of thoughts and impulses whose intentional objects may be present in the most varied degrees, whose individual elements condition each other, and which are dependent on previous objects, incorporate and then prolong previous elements by apparently allowing them to pass into the subconscious. Since the mother – we may say – has at one time had an actual loving intention towards her child, she is now washing the nappies, and this action is still the result and embodiment of that intention which she no longer has in any (very) actual sense; she has a virtual intention and viewpoint, and the action springing from this in its turn allows the renewed growth of that intention and viewpoint out of which it itself arose, and at a given opportunity brings the latter to the surface again as an actual intention.

This conceptual distinction does not solve every problem by a long way. It itself contains more problems than might be suspected at first sight. Nevertheless, we can understand what moral theology says fairly clearly: to make an action supernaturally meritorious, it is sufficient if behind the external action there is virtually a motive of faith, in the sense of an intention causing the action. In practice this means, therefore, that whenever a Christian does his duty in the external activity of his life, that which he does even in this realm is really Christian activity, provided it can honestly be said that he would not act 'in this way' if he were not internally adjusted to the truth offered him by the Christian explanation of existence, i.e. if this attitude did not determine his actions. This is valid even when, at the moment of performing the acts about which we are asking, he does not 'think of the good God' and so does not expressly envisage a motive of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

III. THE PROBLEM OF GOOD INTENTIONS

1. The Simultaneous Occurrence of Different Motives

What has been said up until now appears to be perfectly comprehensible and also very comforting. But reality is not quite as simple as that. In [113] real life, we are not at all under the influence of 'chemically pure' motives, but for the most part are under the simultaneous influence of a great number of very different – and even morally very different – and contradictory motives. This is possible because, as we have already said, one can realize the same end for different intentions, and this not only one after the other but in such a way that one's action is at the same time the product of mutually contradictory impulses. It will certainly be possible to say in the metaphysical sense (without explaining this more in detail here) that when these different motives move the same individual simultaneously, then they cannot all start at the same point in the person; they cannot all then be the simultaneous expression of one and the same real core of the person: one motive will have its 'seat' more on the periphery and others more in the centre. Yet precisely because man is a many-layered being, precisely because he is not the abstractly formalized person one may so easily conceive him to be in moral theology, precisely because he is constructed as it were in layers starting at an interior core and becoming more and more external, and because (even free) activations can spring from many different layers (since formal freedom is not simply something situated 'in' the core of the person but also extends in a certain diffuse way over the whole person) . . . precisely because of all this, it is possible to do one and the same thing and yet have several, in themselves contradictory, motives and intentions for it. For instance, one can preach for the sake of the salvation of souls and at the same time do it out of conceit. One does not in this case preach only out of love of God and happen to be 'at the same time' – as it were, incidentally – conceited. No, what really happens is that the conceit is not merely 'kindled' by some action already perfectly determined out of pure love for souls even before this conceit, but that the conceit really co-determines and causes this sermon. Naturally, as has been said, this must not be understood as if both – the act of love of God and the conceit – could simultaneously produce the one act in such a way that both would arise equally centrally in the concrete. Otherwise it would be possible in certain circumstances to be simultaneously someone in mortal sin and someone who loves God and is justified.

2. The 'Unknown' Nature of Many Motives

This truth (which incidentally is easily understandable when we remember the existential plurality of the human being and, at the same time, the [114] interlacement of this same being in a single point, viz. in the 'heart' in the biblical sense) must again not mislead us into thinking that if one has a motive for one's action (for, and not merely in), then one certainly does not have any other motive for the same action – or into thinking that if one has an actual motive of which one is quite conscious, then one certainly has no other motive which could influence one at least virtually. All one has to do is to observe oneself a little more closely. It is after all precisely this which largely constitutes the obscurity of the moral situation of man. We act not only out of motives we know reflexly. There will certainly be, as it were, subterranean impulses for which we are not responsible, even though they very clearly help to colour our behaviour. Who has not observed someone else in love where he is not aware of the fact of his love determining his actions, done expressly out of quite different motives, yet this is so clear that even an external observer can notice it. But there are certainly cases where unconscious or subconscious, merely globally present and only virtually effective motives[3] – motives which are completely different from, and even contradictory to, the motive consciously 'put before oneself' – fall fully under the responsibility of man, either directly or indirectly, immediately or 'in causa'. We cannot here explain and prove this last statement more exactly. No, one who has a real metaphysical understanding of the fact that the real freedom is situated originally in the core of the person, that it is 'identical'[4] [115] with the person and hence can never be brought completely to a reflexly present objectivity – no one who has ever noticed or heard anything about repression of guilt, who has experienced to what extent real decisions can happen apparently quite unconsciously and yet not for that reason without responsibility – will deny that even motives which, on the one hand, influence an action ad extra most essentially and yet, on the other hand, are present only on the periphery of consciousness or in a virtually effective way, may very well be the exercise or consequence of a free decision and hence be part of our moral responsibility. If this is true, however, then it is also true that our many-sided and heterogeneous moral intentions and motivation (our viewpoint) must be purified, and that this purification is our moral duty since we cannot regard ourselves from the outset as always and in general free from responsibility for these merely peripherally conscious, merely virtual motives and intentions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. The Necessity of Purifying Motives

At this point there arises the moral obligation of a good intention. For if what has been said is correct, then we can and must say: it is not enough to have a good motive in your external action and behaviour – a motive drawn from faith and one which you have freely and explicitly chosen for yourself – and you must not think in this matter that such a motive is 'virtually' present sufficiently in you by the very fact that after all you want to be a Christian and basically honour the thought of having to and wanting to lead a Christian life. Rather you must reckon with the fact that, even in such a basic attitude, the actual motives of your actions do not spring from this basic attitude alone but also from other attitudes which are not merely morally indifferent but of a morally poor quality. Hence you have the duty to concern yourself with the purifying of your motives. How a Christian fulfils this duty is quite another question and one which does not yet occupy us at this moment. Hence it still remains a perfectly open question as to whether the fulfilment of this duty does not to some extent go materially beyond what belongs to the duties of a Christian in the unanimous opinion of everyone, even independently of this, duty just mentioned. Nevertheless, it is important to begin with to see the duty itself: man who is supposed to live also reflexly (to a certain extent

[3] At this point we do not yet distinguish between motive and urge, a distinction we will introduce to some extent later on when it becomes necessary for our reflections.

[4] 'Identical' naturally is not meant in the sense of a formal Ontology and Logic, in which such a notion is 'in indivisibili' (or at least seems to be for many: real differentiation is not after all basically a notion which is realized everywhere in the same way, so that the disparity of what is thus differentiated would always remain the same; something analogous must therefore also apply to the notion of the identical). We envisage here rather a fact which is also theologically important: freedom must have its seat so deeply at that point in the originally one nature of man which is the source and centre of man's capacities, that it is really meaningful and thinkable that, for example, the whole man may be implicated on account of a decision of this 'individual capacity' of the free will – and this even to the extent of total and final damnation – without being able to say: how can 'I' help it, why must 'I' suffer for the fact that my will was evil? In other words, the scholastic principle that actiones sunt suppositorum must not be read merely as an axiom of a formal Ontology but must be understood analogously so that it will be seen to follow from it that the ontological relation between a subject, on the one hand, and its capacities and acts, on the other, is a fluid one and that it attains its (finite) climax in the direction of an identity (which is really attained only in God) in the spiritual person and its freedom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and degree, since he is capable of this reflection), must count with the fact that not only his explicit and objective motivations determine the [116] moral quality of his actions but also other motives for which he is morally responsible, and thus even as a reflexly knowing person who elevates his motivation into the sphere of conscious, objective presence. He has furthermore the duty to care in advance for his life and even for his spiritual and moral life. He cannot understand his life, even mentally, as a merely external sequence of acts, each one of which stands quite independently within itself. For he will later on act as the one he now is and now becomes through his present free actions. This, however, is conditioned by the whole sum of motivations influencing the present act. Thus, every present moment already predisposes the future to a certain extent. Since man is and can be someone who reflects, and since he already uses up a part of his future at the present moment, man has a duty to purify his motives. For he cannot simply and in every respect disregard the semi- and peripherally-conscious motives which impel him subterraneously, simply because they are only such. They do after all help to condition the present and the future of his spiritual existence both of which it is his duty to care for, and they are not completely inaccessible to the exercise of his influence. But anyone who has the duty to care for something has also (in so far as it is subject to his influence) a duty to care for anything which co-determines the object of his immediate care.

The foregoing has simply served to express and prove in the abstract and somewhat awkwardly something which is quite self-evident, and yet it represents an important insight. The one man – and hence also the spiritual and freely responsible man – lives not only in the zone of the explicit and objective and, as it were, 'officially' given motives. He draws his life out of soil and roots whose quality he comes to recognize only slowly and never adequately. He cannot say that all this does not concern him, as if the 'this' and the 'he' were two distinct things and the 'he' can be held responsible only for 'himself', provided this 'himself' is strictly identical with this 'he'. One needs only to bring these abstractions down to the concrete a little in order to see their practical and yet not quite self-evident meaning. Who has not at some time been tempted to think (and the history of philosophy and of the spirit confirms this temptation): there is 'in' me a passionate nature, a concupiscence; but this as such is not 'me', for according to Catholic teaching it is precisely the area where one has not yet freely (i.e. through this 'me') agreed to it: it is still pre-moral and cannot qualify man as yet in a properly moral [117] sense. Hence 'I let it carry on', 'I let it be' and wait until it eventually quietens down by quite simply withdrawing 'myself' from it into the spiritual inviolability of my personal freedom; I simply do not have any positive responsibility for its shaping and formation. Such an opinion, if carried to its logical conclusion, would ontologically and ethically split up the one person; it would turn the relative plurality in man – a plurality which remains subordinate to and incorporated into the basic unity of his essential nature which, as the one nature, develops into the various body-soul dimensions – into an absolute plurality of things which influence each other only from without. That this whole set of problems has not yet been completely worked out in moral theology, can be seen for example from the very practical controversy still going on in moral theology about why, for what reason and to what extent a person is obliged to offer positive resistance to the disordered sensual impulses.[5]

To repeat: whether all this can be done quite easily in practice, whether too much reflection can be harmful, all these are different questions which are not yet answered in the negative by what has been said. What we have just said in principle about the duty of purifying one's motives and hence of practising good intentions, or – more precisely – of improving one's [5] Cf. e.g. A. Vermeersch, Theologia moralis I[3] (Rome 1933), n. 68.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

real intentions, will become clearer and better understood once we unfold the practical applications involved in all this.

IV. GOOD INTENTIONS IN PRACTICE

1. Choice of Motives

(a) False attempts: There can be good intentions which are such only in appearance. Not because the object of these motives is not good, but because these motives do not really affect the action concerned but are entertained in the mind merely 'on the occasion of' the action without being grasped freely by the will, and thus do not co-determine the action. When I go in good spirits to lunch (I have looked forward for some time to that veal cutlet, letting myself sink blissfully, as it were, into the animal desire aroused by the lovely smell already filling the whole house), and I think then, while my mouth is watering as I sit with the veal in front of me: 'all to the greater honour of God', then . . . well, what is really [118] happening then? First of all, let it be recognized as absolutely praiseworthy that one does not forget God altogether in such a situation. Let it be recognized that such a 'good intention' can quite easily be a sign that this person, in his basic attitude and general make-up, is more than just someone concerned exclusively with animal pleasures. Yet, as the example presupposes, one will not be able to say that this pious thought really forms this act of eating. It is a pious thought 'on the occasion of' an action but not a motive or good intention of the act itself.

We do not wish to discuss here whether such an actual, very supernatural motivation directly related to such an, object is in any case meaningful and to be recommended. All that this example was meant to illustrate is that there are also merely apparently good intentions, even when they are apparently perfectly actual. The same is true, of course – only more so – of more virtual good intentions and motives which we would like to declare to be at the root of our daily actions so as to give them a higher moral value. It is quite correct that a basic Christian outlook can virtually influence the daily work of a person; it can condition it and thus give it a really Christian, religious significance even when one does not explicitly 'think of God' and even without 'making' a good intention. This does not mean, however, that this is always so, or that it is always the case to any great extent whenever a Christian lives 'in the state of grace' and does not explicitly intend something evil. It may very well be that the actual deeds of such a Christian are determined only, or almost only, by impulses which, if not sinful, are at least so very earthly and superficial that the life of this person is to a great extent dead from a spiritual point of view. It is also no use quoting the axiom against this that every free action of an individual in the concrete is either morally good or morally evil, and that there are no indifferent actions. For this axiom tells us nothing about the Christian, supernatural quality of every free act. In fact, if one really wanted to bring complete clarity into this question, one would have to think about whether it would not be necessary to suppose there to be, even on the side of a man's morally good acts, that non-gradual but essential difference which according to the common teaching exists between venial and mortal sins. One would then have to ask: if there are 'venial' and 'grave' acts even in the sphere of moral good regarded from an existential point of view (acts which, as has been said, are distinguished not merely by a gradually greater or lesser meritoriousness), then which good act can be qualified as 'grave', and in [119] what way does this distinction depend also on how and to what extent a supernatural motive (in other words, a good intention) really is an effective factor in the constitution of the act concerned? But all these are questions we cannot treat of here. A careful interpretation of the statement about the possibility of an act lacking supernatural motives even in the case of a 'good Christian' – even when he does not sin properly speaking – would have to reflect more deeply than happens in the normal moral theology on the inner unity of the spiritual and personal life of man in which – much more than appears in the usual morality of acts – everything is interwoven and where everything supports and is supported by everything else. One would have to see things as they are in the unity of the life of the spirit, where the past is always 'preserved' and always actuated anew in the present of the spiritual person. Yet in so far as an action can have a different plurality of motives which are not merely the totality of the person's past life plus his now freely adopted basic outlook in the depth of his central freedom, it can quite easily happen that something determines an action as its motive only apparently.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

From this it also becomes immediately clear that the practice of good intention or the purification of motives cannot, after the manner of a psychotechnical training of attention, consist in thinking as frequently as possible of a supernatural 'motive' when doing some external action. Quite apart from the fact that such a procedure (similar to an indiscreet 'living in the presence of God') can have most harmful psychological effects on one's nerves, this accompanying thought is in any case far from being a motive or good intention. It may in certain circumstances be the beginning of the real thing. It may be that, when I 'remind myself of the presence of God' and actually 'offer up' to him everything I am going to do, these thoughts and these explicitly formulated (even though, to begin with, only conceived) attitudes may really influence and help to form the actual action. But it need not be thus. If they have no mutual connection springing from the nature of things, then in spite of all possible psychotechnical efforts in practising good intentions, this motive will remain simply unconnected and alongside the action, like a mere thought-ballast. It may still be true that even something like this is good and meritorious as an expression and realization of an honest, pious striving and that as such it will be rewarded by God; but it is not a good intention. It may also happen that such a merely conceptual effort even actually prevents the action being done in an objectively good way out [120] of its motives and prevents the motives which really influence it from being purified. If a nun thinks a thousand times a day, on the side and in the form of ejaculations: 'all for the greater honour of God', even then it is not yet guaranteed that her actual deeds are done for the greater honour of God: indeed, such a practice can be an obstacle to this.

Since even serious and sober spiritual writers like Otto Zimmermann,[6] for instance, speak about it, we would like to mention and question one other practice with regard to good intention. Zimmermann calls it the 'practice of signs or of coming to an arrangement'. What is meant by this is the awakening of an actual good intention, which says for example: every beat of my heart will be an act of love, etc. In this category can also be included formulae like: I want to love you (God) with the heart of Our Lady.[7] No one will want to deprive people who love high-flown language of the joy they find in such and similar formulations. Yet one will also have to say that the mere fact of telling God that every heartbeat, day and night, is to be a song of praise in his honour, does not make the heartbeat become any more of a song of praise than it has always been already. Such a declaration may be an expression of a grateful, loving attitude towards God, a declaration worthy of all praise. But it cannot bring about what it declares. It is not, therefore, a good intention in the sense in which we are speaking, viz. as having the job of internally forming an external action through and through and of itself growing by such an external action. Zimmermann says to begin with: 'The heartbeat certainly does not itself by this practice become a moral and meritorious action.' This is perfectly true. Yet when he then continues: '. . . but it nevertheless becomes consecrated to God and sanctified by this practice', then one does not see how the two parts

[6] Lehrbuch der Aszetik[2] (Freiburg 1932), p. 597.
[7] Cf. on this our criticism of certain statements in J. Suenens in ZKT LXXV (1953).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of this sentence can go together or how the second part is true. What in fact sanctifies the heartbeat, if quite certainly the offering of it changes nothing in the least about it either physically or morally? Or when Suenens[8] says: 'The soul united with Mary has only to unite itself in her with this sanctifying will (of God). It needs to know no more. Each breath with Mary is a spiritual longing. It is a ceaseless communion under the thousand different forms of present duty to be done. What peace, what security, what surrender'; then one must say: all this is very nice and may indeed be quite true, if one is [121] already united with Mary by that 'union' which would have to be presupposed in order to allow these statements their validity. Even then one might ask whether every breath is an elevation of the soul. Be that as it may, it cannot be presupposed that the normal Christian has that union which would have to be presupposed, and even less that it can be produced by any – even honestly meant – offering or actual 'union' (which at best can only desire but not bring about this union with Mary). Desiring all these things and declaring that one would like them, does not make them come about. The practice of good intention can get along without such rhetoric.

(b) Objective motivation: From what has been said, it will be seen to be more advisable to cultivate those motives which are internally connected with the task to be carried out here and now. If one does not do this, then there is at least a great danger that the good intention 'awakened' in one's individual works will simply remain a well-meant but merely associated thought which does not exercise any formative influence on the action itself. This cannot be recommended even when such a motive appears to be very 'lofty'. Certainly the moral dignity of a motive is co-determined by its formal object, i.e. by what is intentionally and properly meant and willed, loved and sought. For a love is always worth as much as what is loved. But such a thing must not simply be thought but must be loved. And this loved object is a determining factor in such an act to the extent in which it is truly 'realized' interiorly. If, therefore, I think while doing some work such as sweeping out my room: I am doing this for the greater honour of the most Blessed Trinity, then this act will in actual fact be no better on this account in most cases than if I sweep the room because I want to do this small action out of a truly human desire to help (which is also a Christian virtue commanded by the gospels). For normally, neither this pious thought influences the work itself, nor (ordinarily and with us average Christians) is this thought about the glory of the Holy Trinity really genuinely 'realized' (however difficult it may be to say what exactly is meant by such a 'realization').

Hence, the work itself does not become better by such purely externally applied motives. Nor will the genuine, willed and loving grasp of the motive itself be really successful in the majority of cases by a merely conceptual grasp. Thus it will be better to develop the good intention out of the work itself and out of its inner meaning, even though – regarded purely objectively – the thus realized motives are not as sublime in the [122] scale of values as other motives. Only in cases where a high and non-objective motive is already very much alive – where it is not merely great and significant in itself but also is existentially grasped and takes hold of one in a really genuine and strong way for some other reasons with which we do not need to deal here – even such a 'thought' can, of course, be used as a motivation for actions which directly have nothing very much (although something) to do with this motive. Thus, to return to our previous example: anyone who is really filled in a highly personal way with a strong desire to intercede and atone for the souls in Purgatory – anyone who is really filled with this desire and does not merely say this to himself in self-deception – can also let the sweeping of the room, which is disagreeable to him, become something proper and Christian through an effective motive, actually offering it up for the holy souls. But these are exceptional cases, and ascetic theology should treat such things as exceptional cases.

The internal motive should be cultivated, therefore; one should allow oneself to be

[8] Theology of the apostolate of the Legion of Mary (Cork 1960), p. 37.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

educated to the right intention by the thing itself that is to be done. Not that one could let oneself drift along completely passively in this matter. One should really make an effort and train oneself to pay attention to the real Christian meaning of what one is doing and must do. One should learn to go out to meet one's daily work with such inner calm and composure – through previous silence, prayer and serious reflection – that one really knows what one is doing (from a Christian point of view), so that one learns to guard against allowing the meaning of one's actions to become falsified interiorly (through conceit, pride, obstinacy, etc.). If we let things themselves give us our motives in this way, then we will avoid that dullness and monotony of the interior spirit which is sometimes to be found in the pious. Such a monomania can be the sign of, and the inevitable price to be paid for, a certain type of holy geniality which has the right to be one-sided. Grignon de Montfort, for instance, is an example of this; he desires that everything be done and lived in as actual a regard to Mary as possible. Theoretically one can also say, of course, that such a motive does not of itself exclude our seeking even those motives which are inherent in the particular property of our individual acts and achievements. But, given the narrowness of human consciousness, this is true only theoretically. In practice, such a method would lead, in the case of most people, to an inner impoverishment of their religious life. Subsequently, when the first enthusiasm for [123] such sublime but somewhat monomaniacally grasped external motives has died down, there would remain less than if one had exposed oneself trustingly to the multiplicity and variety of motivations offered by life and its variety itself, and had tried to discover these motivations and to realize them interiorly. Ascetic instruction and guidance should pay careful attention to this.

There is not much sense in directing nuns, for instance, to 'offer up' their daily work for the foreign missions, if one neglects at the same time to lead them to a deeper, inner understanding of the special work of their calling which alone will enable that work to be really and permanently perfected. The same holds good for the proper appeal for the 'apostolate of prayer'; here too it will be necessary to watch these things, since even here there is the danger of missing out motivations arising out of the concrete nature of one's own task, in favour of motives which may indeed be very sublime (the growth of God's kingdom) but which in certain circumstances – since they are not very deeply rooted in the real day-to-day business of man – do not affect this daily business in any very formative way and are themselves in danger of dying again very quickly. This is not meant to dispute the fact that people who have a very dismal, dull and unpleasant daily routine, a routine which provides little opportunity for powerful motivation, can be uplifted and strengthened by motives and purposes of some other kind, even when these are, relatively speaking, far-fetched and of a (subjectively) somewhat airy ideality.

2. The Purification of Motives

(a) Distinction between motive and impulse: Anyone who cultivates good intentions, who watches his personal motivation, will soon discover that this always remains full of problems. He never knows quite exactly what 'spirits' are influencing him. He will find that there is always a great variety of these. He will try, therefore, to 'purify' his motives and intentions. But this is more easily said than done. It is not easy for two reasons in particular: frequently it is absolutely impossible simply to cut out and shut off undesired motivations, and it is not at all desirable and recommendable to eliminate a motivation (even though it is not intrinsically morally reprehensible) simply because it is not the highest possible. The purification of motives does not even seem at first sight to be always possible

Let us suppose, for example, that someone has a strong urge to acquire [124] knowledge,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

prescinding here from the fact of whether it is in itself morally good or not. Suppose that this person has become a priest in order to work selflessly for the salvation of men, but that he has been entrusted by his ecclesiastical superiors with the job of working in the field of scientific theology. He now feels himself inflamed and at the same time hindered by his thirst for knowledge in this his obligatory scientific work (for he wants to be a scholar for the love of men's salvation). It does not help him to tell him quite simply: the one does not exclude the other. Again, it does not help him to tell him: hitch the horse of your scientific enthusiasm to the cart of your pastoral intentions. For this man is asking himself precisely: what really is the horse, the cart, the means and the goal for me? His problem is not solved by the simple fact that, in his better moments, he gives the, as it were, 'official' explanation before the tribunal of his interior conscience, viz. that he is studying in order to save souls and that he is using his scientific interests merely as a gratefully accepted aid. For the question is whether what he desires on some level of his being is really true, since he cannot tell himself with absolute certainty whether this pious wish is merely a useful but somehow peripheral impulse whose proper direction is determined from quite a different side, or whether his zeal for souls is merely a façade hiding the kind of knowledge which only puffs one up. This no one can say for certain. What is more, the roles played by these individual factors in the total motivation of a person can change quickly or again slowly, and means and purpose can interchange places. Now: it is quite impossible for our theology professor to shut off this perfectly human urge for knowledge. He cannot do it even if he wanted to. If he were to succeed in this, he would be like a rider who does not mount the horse because he is afraid that it might carry him where he does not want to go.

It has been said, therefore, that anyone who wants to do what is right and obligatory merely for supernatural motives will do and achieve very little. Inclination and love for something – and also that motivation which is inherent in things themselves, and this even in the pre-moral sphere (such as in hunger and thirst, fear, the urge to imitate, the impulses belonging to the realm of the corporeal and the sexual, etc.) – are in general necessary also for the higher achievements of the moral order. For they exist because God has willed them, and this is why they make sense. Since, moreover, they are elements of the one whole man, these things also have a purpose for the whole and hence also for the 'higher' man. [125] Hence, just because it is false to say that the higher is simply a suspicious sublimation of the lower – just because it is false to say that the spiritual and moral achievements of man are merely more complicated variations of one's primitive desire – it is not necessary to deny that even the highest achievements and motivations have, and may have, their substructure. There is no harm in admitting that one may possibly pray better, in certain cases, after a cup of tea than without it.

If, therefore, such motives are not in any sense to be excluded, and if very often they cannot be excluded, what then is the position regarding the necessary purification of motives and the proper, practising cultivation of good and perfect intentions? One might say, of course, that urge and motivation must be kept apart. A motive is not an urge: the former is what is morally proposed in a free manner, the latter belongs to the morally still indifferent stratum of psycho-physical vitality. One might then say on the basis of this distinction that the morality of an action can be determined only according to the motives. If what is consciously and freely envisaged is in a certain measure striven for and attained by the force of the impulse, then this nevertheless does not destroy the motive and the moral quality of the action. This may be very true in theory, but it does not help us much in practice. One can eat, 'simply because one enjoys it' (and this without thereby overeating and making oneself sick). The question remains, therefore, as to what is the real motive in my particular case. We have already seen that the real motives (motives even in the terminology just suggested) need not necessarily be reflex and objects of consciousness.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(b) Education through life: It can be seen that this purification can basically be undertaken only indirectly. Indeed, one might say that it is undertaken in us: it is a chance which life – or, better, divine grace and providence – must and does offer us if we are vigilant and faithful. For we cannot simply cut out motives and impulses just as we wish. We can do this to a certain extent; by directing our attention, we are able to alter the real state of the motives and impulses. What can be done in this respect should be done. But even where this is not possible, or where it does not lead to any clear-cut and complete success, we can still do something. We can try to strengthen our true and desired motives by prayer and contemplation, by reflecting on them and by giving ourselves up to them, by the repeated practice of directing our attention to them. But this teaches us – to begin with – only to be vigilant and careful, to be [126] prepared to act as far as possible out of these thus cultivated and more deeply rooted motives, even when other impulses fail, impulses which are either, morally speaking, indifferent or even dangerous, or at any rate not those really meant (i.e. from the core of the spiritual person). For precisely this is to be expected in many if not all cases; and this is the chance which we have said we must expect and that life would offer to us so that our motives may be purified and our intentions perfected.

This chance has something dangerous and bitter about it: suddenly we notice that certain impulses cease; 'healthy' ambition, the instinctive joy we feel in being with people, a joy which arises out of loving sympathy, the 'urge of knowledge' and a thousand other possible impulses which we ourselves cannot and should not cut off. The more someone has always taken the trouble to do justice objectively to the demands made on him by the objective structure of his external actions – the more, in other words, he has an inner motivation in the sense given above and not merely the motivation which happens to have been applied to a task from without – the oftener he will notice that to a greater or lesser extent there are situations in which (to put it crudely) he 'does not feel like it', but when it is nevertheless objectively demanded that the thing should be done even without feeling like it, i.e. more strictly, with purified motives. Life itself has then purified the complex of motives and urges, presupposing of course that one does not now fail to do what one has always done up until now. Of course, in such a case one would then also have to ask oneself seriously whether the 'official' motives were in fact the real motives before, and not merely a façade behind which lay hidden pre-moral or even immoral but basically freely accepted urges. We do not need to worry that such urges may be shut off by ourselves. For the moral attitudes and achievements demanded of us are structured in accordance with the objective moral motives, and the impulses springing from an ontologically and ethically lower stratum of man do not and cannot in the long run suffice of themselves for these higher achievements, no matter how useful they may be as the 'initial fuse' and however much they remain always necessary to some extent as the underlying basis for as long as we live in the body (after all, one can completely undermine even the most heroic virtue, as far as its external appearance or the external achievement is concerned, by 'injections' and similar means). Life itself and the reality involved regulate all this. Someone may notice, for instance, that he – as managing director – is always very kind to his charming lady-secretary, [127] and he may suspect that there is a certain latent sexual urge behind this in itself praiseworthy attitude (since he finds it much more difficult to be kind to others; even a St Dominic seems to have noticed this). It is not necessary for such a person to make a special effort to fight against this accompanying feeling (provided only that it does not induce him to do things which are against the law of God). In any case, how would he go about this? Such an attempt would either lead merely to the opposite attitude or would make it more difficult for him to be polite (if it were to succeed). But it is difficult enough for us to deal with the burdensome things in life. Life in its wisdom goes on by itself, so that our managing director will not be polite for very long merely for this somewhat suspicious reason. Meanwhile he should have learned to be polite

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in spite of it all.

(c) Orientation towards things instead of unmasking of self. If one works thus in the formation of outlook and in the cultivation of good intentions from the inner nature of the objective achievement, if one tries to cultivate the true and really intended motives so that they will be strong enough when they have to suffice on their own on some occasion, if life is given a chance to educate us by keeping ourselves open to this education by using the methods just mentioned, then it would seem to be superfluous and harmful for a normal person to devote great efforts to an exaggerated reflection and 'depth psychology' with regard to the world of his motives. It is true that we only know a very little about what is in us. We would be greatly shocked if we knew by what problematic urges our so praiseworthy actions are often supported. But of what use would it be if we did know all this? Hidden behind this psychoanalytical, distrustful self-analysis and unmasking of self, there would again be urges which we would not yet have uncovered, which would themselves have to be traced (so that we might know where we stand) and which would again be just as problematical as the ones already unmasked. No, this is not the way. In the long run, the only thing to result from such an unmasking of self (as carried on in many of our modern novels) would be a moral cynicism which thinks that it can see through everything as being hollow and base sensuality. One imagines oneself to be honest and forgets to make distinctions. One loses one's insight into the fact that the real moral motives of a spiritual, personal kind do not cease to be independent and significant – indeed, to be the deciding factor for the moral judgement of one's action – simply by our showing that they are not the only thing [128] in our actions and that they very often (or to a certain extent, always) require other urges and powers in order to assert themselves. It is better to try to purify and refine one's motives by looking away from oneself to things and by letting oneself be occupied by life, others and their needs. Then one can always say to oneself (when someone, worried by such distrust of himself asks whether he is in the state of grace): if I do my duty, if the external manifestation of my actions corresponds for a fairly long period to the objective exigencies of life, if my neighbour can be fairly satisfied with me, if – in short – my (external) actions are just, if I try at least in all this not to be a pharisee but to know and realize in my life that we are unprofitable servants even after having done everything demanded of us, if there remains an honest bit of dissatisfaction with myself and I am (really) prepared to let others tell me things . . . then I need not worry myself sick about the ultimate motives of my actions. Life is not arranged in such a devilishly malevolent fashion that the most nasty motives hide themselves for a long time behind an always good and – even to the attentive observer – faultless façade. This is not to say that everything will then be completely certain and above every genuinely Christian suspicion about oneself, and that then we do not need to pray any more: Lord, be merciful to me, a poor sinner. But we will then have done what we can reasonably be expected to do; to do more would really be less and would be an attempt to gain more independent certainty vis-à-vis God (even if it be merely the certainty of having unmasked oneself completely and unconditionally, whereby one merely robs God of the glory of being stronger and greater in us by his grace than even our own heart). In other words, there is an indivisible (although not mathematically determinable) yet real limit to the formation of motives and to anxiety about good intentions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[129]

9

THE DOGMA OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION IN OUR SPIRITUAL LIFE

Catholic Christians celebrated the year 1953-54, in accordance with the intention of their supreme pastor, as a Marian year which was to be dedicated in a special way to the remembrance of the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception (8th December 1854).

What are the 'religious values' of this dogma: this is what one would have asked thirty years ago, in the spirit of that period and according to the formulation of a well-known book of that time. We today have not perhaps so much courage as to attempt to measure God's truth by whether it seems valuable to us; we are inclined rather to suspect our own yardsticks. Nevertheless: even when one removes everything that is most questionable from this way of posing the question, it still remains true to say that a dogma is not only true but is also addressed to us. It is addressed to us, however, not merely because it is true but also because this truth is for our salvation. Of course, it is for our salvation also precisely because it is true. But it would be heretical gnosticism, or the false assertion that truth and salvation, faith and love are simply the same, to maintain that this truth is told us merely because it is true. We can – indeed we must – ask ourselves, therefore, what a revealed truth means for us over and above the fact directly proclaimed by it.

The simplest answer to this question, but an answer whose simplicity is at the same time our greatest difficulty, consists in saying that by knowledge of this truth we know 'more' about Mary so that we might love her more. This is quite a simple thing and for that reason very difficult for us who are so complicated. One must grasp or, more precisely, realize the fact that Mary exists, that she must be loved – in God, for his sake and for the sake of our salvation – that this love (of God and of everyone [130] whom he has created, redeemed and granted eternal life) is the most comprehensive and the only simply self-evident thing in the world (since it embraces everything incomprehensible). Anyone who has understood and realized this will no longer find any 'problem' in the 'significance' of the Immaculate Conception. For who would not be overjoyed at the privileges of a person whom he loves? Who will after that still look further for proof of the significance 'for himself' of recognizing such a privilege?

The lover finds joy in the loved one. One would be lost without this basic notion by which one gets away from oneself without returning again to oneself. Damnation consists in being able only to love oneself and hence in having to make do with oneself. But from a Christian point of view, there is true love of God only if this love wills everyone to be just as God has willed them, God who is all in all only when everything has found its final existence in his presence, and not in the sense of everything being consumed by him and by his absoluteness. We should have the courage to admit: if you as a Catholic Christian believe in this dogma and yet ask almost indifferently what this fact really has to do with you, then you merely prove to yourself that you are still a long way from being that Christian who loves God and his Saints out of self-forgetful joy for them, without being bothered about himself. In our concern about our own spiritual poverty and religious misery, we have to admit that the fact that the times from the twelfth century until the definition of this dogma had such a natural, almost fanatical devotion to the 'Immaculata' was a good sign for these times. (This, of course, is not meant to imply that someone belongs to the good old times simply by the fact of aping the gestures and accents of that time in a stereotyped and dishonest way.) Only by an act of personal love of Mary in the Holy Ghost does the praise of her holiness, purity and fullness of grace become more than the extolling of abstract ideals simply labelled with her name. There is little use – and it simply arouses the obstinacy of those who are suspicious of any high-flown language and think of it as mere 'talk' – if one praises the supernatural privileges of the Blessed Virgin without being aware of the fact that such words can become fruitful only to the extent in which love grows at the same time, a growth which requires other inspirations besides the mere praise of the ideal privileges of the person to be loved. Thus, at the beginning and end of all praise of Mary and of all Marian theology, all one can really do is to ask one's hearer very quietly and simply to [131] pray for the grace to be able to love Mary. Precisely because previous generations already loved Mary, they could think quite unaffectedly and enthusiastically that all that is required in order to lead others to the love of Mary was to praise the ideal of the one who was pure, full of grace and immaculate from the very first moment of her existence. We should admit our poverty. One cannot miss out this step even in present-day circumstances. This step is the reason why it may not be so easy for us today to be 'full' of the truth expressed by this dogma.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is the first but fortunately not the only answer to our question. Certain facts and structures of the one order of salvation which is also ours become particularly visible in the mystery of the Blessed Virgin. This is what we must talk about here, since one can say more about what is less important than about what is the most important point.

This dogma first of all and directly expresses the fact that a human being who is not a mediator but someone redeemed was without sin. All of us – including Mary – are redeemed. Hence, even her existence is constructed in 'counterpoint' to sin. In other words, there is no mere human being for whom sin, its kingdom and possibility are from the very start non-existent in such a way that his existence has no relationship to sin, either from God or from his own freedom, negatively or affirmatively. Even Mary is no exception to this. The beginning of her existence is redeemed, is gratuitously preserved from the power of original sin. This, considering her alone, would have to have been her sin also, since she too – born as she was here below – was a member of the human race enchained by this sin. Her temporal existence had to achieve itself – in spite of all freedom from concupiscence – as a committal to God in faith, in view of the possibility of the refusal of oneself in disbelief. Yet, however essentially the common factor of this possibility of guilt conjoins her to us, it remains true nevertheless that she was not subject to sin and that she did not sin.

Is this not a blessed truth? Of course, even here it must be possible to put ourselves on that common plane which belongs to the nature of love and of the proper achievement of human existence in order to experience the blessedness of this truth. Only someone who can be affected by the fact that somewhere someone has been good in a selfless way or has been cruelly tortured to death – someone or other whose existence does not attain the comfortable state of our life – only someone who can feel himself honoured or dishonoured in someone else (because he loves and not [132] because he lives in an egoism which relates even the most distant event to himself), only he can be startled deep down about the fact that there is at least one human being who began her existence in the light of God, someone who was able to bear this love without growing tired of it and without inflaming in this love the incomprehensible but always possible, and for us therefore incomprehensibly understandable paroxysm of rebellion against this love. There was someone for once who endured being out of the ordinary and for whom God never became ordinary. There was someone who could receive God's grace in overflowing fullness without keeping it. For once, the ordinariness of an average life was not the sign of its inner hollowness, but the simplicity in which appears the dignity of a regal person, and the unobtrusiveness which characterizes God's attitude to those whom he really loves and does not merely use as levers in his earthly history. In this one case everything was good from the pure beginning to the unending end: good, because it had a pure origin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Two questions arise at this point, however, questions which one should allow to be posed since they are apt for giving us a truly faithful understanding of the Immaculate Conception which will not degenerate into a rhetorically cheap enthusiasm.

First of all: is the difference caused by the Immaculate Conception between us sinners and Mary, really as great as has been made out? The Protestant polemic against this dogma characterized the controversy on this question, fought out between Thomists and Scotists in those days when the doctrine was still controversial, as a 'controversy about a few moments', since it is surely quite indifferent whether Mary was already preserved from original sin in the first moment of her existence or whether she was 'sanctified' very shortly afterwards. Of course, one can and would want to answer this to begin with by saying that it is not the length of time which matters but the question of whether Mary ever fell under the power of original sin and the dominion of the devil, and of whether the origin of her existence was in guilt or in grace. Yet this answer alone does not seem to be sufficient. For it is possible to counter with the further question as to whether our origin is merely in darkness. Is it not true even for us, even though not of ourselves, that everything – even disobedience and sin – is bound up in the mercy of God? Are we not also in the realm of Christ's redemption even from the first moment of our existence? Is not guilt – and in particular original sin – merely permitted, [133] in so far as it belongs to us, because God's mercy wanted it and knew that his yes and not our no should and would be the last word, the word which gives the ultimate meaning to every other word in the dialogue between God and man? Are we not speaking too apodictically of original sin when we speak of it as if there were no redemption, no reality of redemption which in spite of its historicity is always already given beforehand and does not merely represent a subsequent repair of a damage which has arisen quite independently in every respect of this restoration? Should we not speak more 'dialectically' of this original sin, in such a way that it 'would be' most dangerous and inescapable, if the mercy of God in Christ were not most real? Are we not, even in original sin, the loved sinners, those whom God seeks out, those who are predestined as heirs? Is not the one statement: 'When as yet we were sinners, Christ died for us' (Rm 5:8), a statement about us ('for us') even in its second part, an expression which applies to us from the beginning just as much as the statement (Rm 5:19): by the disobedience of the one man the many were constituted sinners? Hence, are we not always and from the beginning redeemed sinners? Thus, is it not ultimately only a question of whether we freely and believingly accept this redemption as a grace and thereby admit that of ourselves we are nothing but sinners? Can Mary do anything else?

At this point, orthodox theology and the Christian instructed in the Catechism will interject: you are obscuring distinctions, and even profound differences. Certainly, redemption is offered to us and is meant for us from the beginning. But it was really given to us only in baptism. Mary, on the other hand, really possessed it from the very beginning. In our life, redemption must first become an event in the sacraments and in faith, at a fixed historical moment within our life, a life which unfolds itself in time, and within an existence which 'in itself' has a different origin, even though this origin was also enfolded 'in God' by his mercy. In Mary's case, even her created origin was already redeemed and sanctified. Even this very fact has its effect in her life and brings about a difference between that life and ours. We remain justified men and sinners at the same time, in so far as we carry the burden of concupiscence and hence are never quite undividedly in freedom what we should be, viz. those who love out of the undivided power of the heart. We are those who sin daily, even though we do not cease to be in God's grace. Mary, on the other hand, is the undivided, the sinless, the Saint. Thus there is a [134] profound difference between us sinners and her, the Saint. Hence we ought to be seized by a pleasant shock that it once was different from what it usually is, that our melancholy experience which 'knows what is in man', is not after all the whole story.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point, however, there arises the second question: is this melancholy experience of the miserable nature of man, of his gloomy sensuality, his empty superficiality and despairing sinfulness before God, really a Christian experience which finds relief only by the fact that at least in one case it has been different? Is not this experience precisely that human experience which is disavowed by God's word of grace? Not by being declared an error (as if, contrary to all appearances, man were after all basically good) but by the fact that God introduces his other, divinely true word into the truth of man (and man even thus only ventures to profess himself for some truth)? Put more simply: does the radiant truth of the Immaculate Conception mean to say that otherwise, apart from Mary's case, there is everywhere merely a dull mixture of light and darkness, of original sin and the subsequent, laborious but merely semi-overcoming of all damnation? Is Mary the undivided, because we are eternally the divided? Is she the accomplished work, the harmoniously achieved work, while we here below are always only the half-achieved and those who have been painstakingly saved just on the brink? Or does the Christian understanding of existence lie precisely in the fact that the bottomless perdition, which exists, is completely overcome by the immeasurable mercy of God? Is the forgiven guilt only half blotted out? Will those who find eternal mercy have still to think basically in sad resignation of their guilt, as if they had after all lost the greatest part of the possible fruits of their life?

Our guilt is inescapable, wretched and as such something radically evil and meaningless, something merely terrifying, petrifying and killing, and nothing in the world must lead the creature to think wrongly that guilt, on our part and of itself belongs to the secret meaning of creation, to the inevitable way in which good comes about. Seen in this light, it is frightful and terrible to have to admit: we are sinners, there is guilt in our life. But what about forgiven guilt? The guilt which God has utilized? Can or may one – after forgiveness and in view of this forgiveness – still say: it would have been better if there had been no guilt? Anyone who dares to answer with an unhesitating yes to this question could either merely mean by this that in itself sin . . . is sin and nothing else, the [135] mean, the senseless, that which in itself is also completely fruitless; or (if his yes were absolute) he would be premature and would endanger (it seems to us) the almighty radicalness of divine forgiveness which not only forgives and 'writes off' what 'can no longer be changed' but which can truly redeem the past. But (it will be objected) this overlooks the fact that God is free in the measure and degree of his communicated goodness, that he must not necessarily do the 'best', that the creature must accept in adoration, obedience, and only thus in beatitude, what is actually given to him, even though more could have been given, and that therefore a forgiveness of guilt remains grace and blessedness even if the preservation from guilt might have been a greater and more blessed grace. Hence it should not surprise us that this happily accepted forgiveness of committed guilt must always 'objectively' be accompanied by that sorrow which greets the one whom one would have and could have become if only one had not burdened oneself with guilt. Is this true? Is this truth really the whole truth? Is it the truth of that reality which exists when God – God and not man – has forgiven? Or is it merely the truth about a reality which would have been if there were no question of a divine redemption of guilt, or if God had forgiven differently from the way in which he has in fact forgiven according to his word, viz. abundantly and with the whole force of the personal love which belongs to God? Putting the question more pointedly: must one still be 'really' sad about the way in which happiness is dependent on the adorable providence of God (and on the creature's pleasure in it), on a God who in general wanted only those 'who just managed to be saved', i.e. 'just' in comparison to what would have been if we had not freely wanted to be sinners? If this is so, are Rm 5:20; 8:32; 11:32; Lk 15:22; I5:7 still completely true? May one weaken these statements of Scripture by reckoning the increase of grace proclaimed by these texts to be merely relative to a grace which might have been under some assumption or other

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

but not under the one in which we and everything else would have been exactly as we are, with the one exception of sin?

If we are allowed this sacred optimism, if we are at least not forbidden by faith or some other reason to say: the forgiven guilt is really a felix culpa, a blessed guilt, however much we must guard against the threat of guilt, since otherwise we would make ourselves unworthy of obtaining forgiveness of committed guilt – if, therefore, the forgiveness of sin by God effects that we really are what we would have been or become [136] without sin – then the blessedness of being preserved from sin, which we acknowledge in veneration and astonishment to be the inconceivable privilege of her who was immaculately conceived, cannot consist merely in the fact that she is the pure and the perfect, while we are sinners whom God has just managed to save but only with a great deal of trouble. The Immaculata is not simply the ideal which we should have reached and which we salute from afar as something eternally unattained. The fact that we have started later than Mary and – differently from her – have often stumbled on the way, does not simply mean that we only half arrive, even we find the way home at all. It is obviously true that we – although this is often understood in the wrong sense – will have less holiness than the Blessed Virgin. But that is a different question altogether. What concerns us here in our question is whether no one of us ever quite reaches his own measure, the actualization of his potentialities, because of the fact that he has been a sinner, and this even in spite of the forgiveness of sin; what concerns us here is whether Mary is the only perfect one in this sense because she alone was conceived without the stain of original sin and because she alone among all purely human beings who perfect themselves in freedom was sinless. If it is permissible to answer no to this particular question, then devotion to the Immaculate Conception cannot consist simply in bitter-sweet joy over the fact that at least in one case God has achieved his work in the ideal manner.

If, however, this means in its turn that God has two very different ways to the same happy perfection, viz. the preservation from guilt and the forgiveness of guilt, then the question arises anew as to why God has willed the Immaculate Conception and what it means for us and for our piety. Of course, one might answer to begin with that if guilt is guilt, then the guiltless way to perfection is from God's point of view the objectively valid one, and hence a beginning in grace and continuance in sinlessness are the normal thing. The question posed would, therefore, become a question of why God has – in spite of this – permitted sin in us and why this is not fitting for Mary. Obviously, this is not the place to discuss the obscure mystery of why God allows guilt to exist. The fact too that Mary was preserved from personal guilt, since she is the Mother of Christ, does not for the moment require any further explanation. In such a case it is not just a matter of looking at the final result of existence, but it is a question of whether personal, committed and not yet forgiven guilt would be compatible with her dignity and position in salvation [137] history. The question with regard to Mary's beginning, i.e. the Immaculate Conception in the strict sense, is more difficult. Yet one can say: her predestination to grace and salvation – a predestination already given together with the predetermination of Christ (differently from us) – involves the fact that in her case the difference in time between the beginning of existence and the beginning of grace, such as it is to be found in our case, is quite senseless. For there is this difference in our case, not because we are to begin with purely children of wrath, but because it was meant to appear historically and in the temporal sphere that of ourselves we are only this and are children of divine love by God's grace alone, and that in our case it is not yet clearly and visibly decided for Christ's sake alone (as in Mary's case) what exactly we are.[1]

But this 'objective' answer to the question as to why there are two ways to one and the

[1] Cf. on this K. Rahner, Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1961), pp. 207 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

same blessed perfection, does not really meet the exact point in question here. When we ask about the 'what for' of these two ways, we are asking about what it has to do with us, with our piety and devotion, that apart from our way of becoming perfect (in our measure), blessed, guiltless and holy, there is also another way, viz. that of the Immaculate Conception. We have already seen that it is not sufficient to reply to this that the purpose is that we might have the comforting thought that everything would be all right some day. For we hope that even for us sinners everything will be all right. Something has obviously to be added to our answer. Is it not simply this: the fact that there is our way to beatifying perfection, is meant to show us and make clear to us that our salvation is God's grace, always and in every case grace alone (and hence not our good work performed by our own power); that there is her way, is meant to show and to make clear to us that our salvation (always and in every case) is only God's grace (and hence not also our guilt as something which remains a permanent component of it).

God's teachings are realities, God's theories are facts. In living contact with them (provided by word and statement, but even more by grace and genuine, spiritual co-existence which is more than mere conceptual 'knowledge'), we are taught by God. Hence, if HE wants to tell us: this perfection is me and not you, then he permits that our perfection springs from an origin – viz. from guilt – which makes it impossible to mistake what we are of ourselves for being and perfection. If, however, He [138] wants to tell us: your, yes even your perfection is light and not darkness, the pure and not the tragically torn-asunder, the whole and not what has just managed to get saved, then he creates the one who is immaculately conceived and immaculately perfected . . . by his grace alone.

One can know what man is only by looking at both the dead beginning and the living reality, the one in original sin and the Immaculate one, and only if one can look at both just as this difference is really separated in time: here in a man who, although embraced by the eternity of God's mercy, begins as a real sinner; there in a person who, although coming in time from Adam as someone requiring redemption, begins as someone really full of grace and thus standing from all eternity before God. Must we not look at Mary in order to understand that the pure light is the first and last even for the creature, so that we do not think in the end that in us – or even in God – something primitively evil, something dark and abysmal belongs to the very heart of the essence? Does not everyone who genuinely accomplishes this – who genuinely accomplishes the rapture of faith in the sound creature by God's full grace – look, perhaps without knowing it, at Mary in whom God has realized that which is the goal of the creature's movement of existence? Did not Mary – participating in our lot as sinners, in nescience, in pain, in standing at the foot of the Cross – look at us, so as to understand and realize that even her beginning in being and in light is grace and not some necessity of essence without which we could not conceive her? Are not we sinners also perhaps necessary for her in that incomprehensible necessity in which sin, which should not be, 'must' be? Is it blasphemous to think this, if it is true that she is the Immaculate through the Cross of her Son, the Cross which has been elevated by our guilt? This does not mean that we could be proud of this greatest of all the crimes of this earth. That would simply be blasphemy. But she who loves the Cross looks lovingly on those who have crucified her Son. Because she loves them, she sees in them what her appearance really says of God: that for no one, and hence not even for her, is there salvation apart from God. If she knows this in her first morning gaze into the heights, as she shines in the purity of her rising, then this is no reason for her not to recognize it also in her evening view into those depths of blindness and of guilt from which she is preserved and from which we are saved by the one grace.

Are there really 'substantial' ideals, i.e. those which, on the one hand, are not fabricated in the superficiality of an empty business and pretence [139] but which are genuinely accomplished, believed, yearned for, loved out of the very heart of existence, and which, on the other hand, exist only as mere 'ideals', as ghostly thoughts? A Christian may have the courage to give a flat no to this question. In that case he may, however, maintain boldly: if the belief in such a truth is lived out and suffered in the depth of the abyss of human existence (there where man is himself and God's Spirit is with him), then this act of existence relates not only to God, to the transcendent and all-supporting presupposition, the grace and last goal of this act; it relates to this real ideal even when man does not know anything of its pure realization and thinks that this ideal has 'existence' only in the yearnings of his enraptured heart and in the bitterness of his tears. If this be true, however, then it follows that if someone, in spite of the experience of his own sinfulness and of his origin in darkness, really believes from the depth of his spirit-filled existence that perfection is not divided but is a clear yes and clear light, and hopes that this perfection becomes his as a grace, then – whether he knows it or not – he has said yes to the created and redeeming beginning in pure grace, that beginning which is for all of us God's real pledge of what is thus believed and hoped for, and then he has – without knowing it – loved the Immaculate Virgin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We, however, know this secret by name, a secret which is also that of our existence. If we really know Mary as the Immaculate Virgin, then we have not only loved and honoured someone whom one can 'also' love and honour, but then we have loved the created, unambiguous realization of what is essential for the exercise of Christian piety, viz. the yes to what is necessary for the radical overcoming of the condition out of which we came into what already determined the existence of the Blessed Virgin from the beginning right down to the last depth: God's grace. Anyone who knows anything about the history of the spirit and of Christian theology (and therefore has some idea of the dangers at the root of piety) must admit that it is always a terrible temptation for man to regard and affirm guilt and grace, light and darkness, as polar and inseparably mutually conditioning opposites of the one human existence, a temptation too, to regard anyone as 'naive' who has not understood this 'secret of evil'. Whoever lovingly honours the immaculately conceived Virgin is safe from this danger of piety. He belongs to the children of the kingdom of heaven, whose holy, matutinal naïvety understands that God's one blessed yes is earlier and later than every (after all, merely creaturely) no of man: earlier already in the world in Mary, the [140] Immaculate, and later but victorious in us. How could a Christian piety obstinately confine itself to a merely abstract realization of the fundamental truth about the undialectical pre-eminence of grace over guilt, when God has shown this truth concretely in Mary, the Immaculate?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[141]

10

THE COMFORT OF TIME

Another year has passed. It makes you feel uneasy just to think about it. We seem to be so poor: the past is past and the future has not yet come. Does our life therefore merely consist in being that infinitely tiny point where what is not yet becomes what no longer is? In our imagination, which still preserves what has passed away and already anticipates what has not yet arrived, we seem to make this point much wider and call it our life, the present, which we are supposed to enjoy because the past is no longer ours and the future is not yet ours.

May one try to say a comforting word about this our temporality from the point of view of Christian dogmatic thought? This attempt to be made here is not meant to appeal to and proclaim the ultimate truths of the Christian faith, viz. the fact that we are travelling towards the eternity of God, that we profess 'eternal life', that we hold fast in faith to the validity of the spiritual person and the resurrection of the body as the comfort of the eternity of our life. Our subject here will be merely a small, particular question arising out of the exalted fundamental truths of our Christian faith, a question indeed about which theologians are not by any means agreed and one which in any case appears only in more detailed dogmatic works and even there only very much in passing. There is no harm, however, in stopping once in a while to think about this special, debated question. For if we do not look at it, then the doctrine of eternal life and of the immortality of the soul is very much in danger of implicitly but logically turning the life 'beyond' into a continuation of the life that precedes it, a continuation in which everything which has happened on this earth can happen once more, something for which we simply make a change of horses in death, so that the journey may continue; yet, from a truly Christian point of view, life does not continue but rather the eternity of unique time breaks in on us, that eternity where there is only 'harvest' and no [142] longer any 'sowing', where the eternity of time is revealed. The reason for this is that eternity is not an unforeseeable space which continues our time here on earth so that it may never come to an end, but is exactly what could and did become only in time by the fact that time passes away and by the fact that one stretch of time does not pass away into another but that time itself passes away.[1]

Our special problem is this: Catholic theologians pose the question about the 'reviviscence of merit', i.e. they ask themselves whether merits which had been won by someone in God's love while in the 'state of grace', who then lost this 'claim' to a reward in heaven by mortal sin, revive again when that person returns once more to the state of grace. Almost all aspects of this question seem at first sight offensive and provocative (or monotonous, depending on one's point of view). After all, even in our own circles one no longer likes to speak about merit (outside of dogmatic textbooks). Do our leading spirits write very much nowadays about mortal sin, about the loss of sanctifying grace, about the impossibility of gaining supernatural merit for oneself in this 'state' of sin and deprivation of grace? And yet: if what is meant by such words is true and if one understands what they are meant to tell us, then these subjects are surely not quite as unimportant as one might be led to think. But only when these subjects had been discussed and what is meant was really understood would it be

[1] In writing this essay, it must of course be admitted from the very start that it will not be possible here to develop those categories and general, existential and ontological insights which are a presupposition of the questions and reflections presented here and which would be necessary if the statements we will make were to be really 'proved'. But the kind reader will perhaps notice even without all this in what direction these reflections are 'going' and will sort out many a tacit presupposition for himself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possible to ask quite clearly whether as a matter of fact the merit which one has gained at one time while in the state of grace but thereafter has lost through grave sin understood as the loss of sanctifying grace, 'revives' again when one returns once more to the state of grace through penance and the sacrament. How strangely foreign this subject seems to be to the practical thinking of the world. 'What has it got to do with a comforting view of temporality? Does it not give the impression that one conceives man's moral life, indeed man's life of grace, in its enormous decisions before God, almost in the categories of a banker, with his balance of accounts, his well or badly invested stocks, his 'frozen' and again 'unfrozen' assets? Well, let us see.

[143] 'Merit' in the theological sense of the word means a property belonging to something given to us by God's grace and not a despotic claim on God acquired by man of his own powers. Merit means that God by his grace – a grace which redeems our freedom for the divine act of love – grants to us that what we do in time is intrinsically analogous to what is in eternal life, viz. a community with God in a true, inner participation in the divine nature which is really given to us, however much it always depends on God's free pleasure and on the immeasurable miracle of his mercy which can never be administered or calculated by man. Merit means eternity in time, the arrival in us of God's grace and of eternal life; it means that man has really been given grace and is holy through God's great mercy, and this in the whole breadth and depth of his being, and hence also in his freedom, in what exists because it is done with responsibility. Certainly, this liberated act of freedom endowed with grace is God's gift: it is a gift because he gave us the possibility, because he elevated the possibilities of a spiritual person to the possibility of acts of eternal life, a gift he himself grants so that (through him) we might really do in freedom what we can and should do (and both of these through him). Hence 'merit' does not praise us but him; hence, the dogma that man can gain supernatural merit if he is justified by God's grace and does in faith what God has commanded does not glorify man before God and vis-à-vis God, but rather extols God who not only deals with man as someone who passively receives but who effects the greatest act of man in man. All 'meritorious actions' are manifestations of the one, divinely effected gift of grace given to man; they let appear what is actually in man.

But by the appearance of 'what is thus', 'what thus appears' becomes more and more. Man can increase in supernatural merit. This means nothing other than that man is more and more, ever more deeply, ever more existentially seized by God's life and that this life claims him more and more in all the dimensions of his existence; this life becomes ever more deeply rooted in him, it integrates this possibility of his existence into a single, ever more complete and all-embracing act of man's whole belonging to God which is effected by the Spirit. Man who thus acquires 'merit' does not regard his own 'merits', he does not count them, for he is occupied with the very thing itself which is given in them, viz. with his neighbour whom he loves, with the task which he fulfils, with God for whom he longs. Since he is a creature, he testifies even by his anxious solicitude [144] about himself to the fact that only one is God. For only this God does not need to worry about himself. The creature, moreover, honours him even more when it works out its salvation in fear and trembling, when it thinks of itself (when it also thinks about itself so as always to forget itself again once it has gone out from this point; even in these things of the interior man we have here no abiding city), than when it acts as if it had already completely forgotten itself over God, as if it were no longer indebted for the point of departure from which it must proceed, since God and not merely the creature's self-seeking made it start there, viz. from itself. If someone acts properly, then he may think of his merit, but he must not forget that ultimately (which does not mean: only) one must love God and therein necessarily forget oneself if one wants to 'gather merit'. For the Christian will say with St Theresa of Lisieux (and hence this is not heretical but good Catholic thought): 'I do not want to gather merit for heaven . . . in the evening of this life I will appear

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

before You with empty hands. For I do not ask you, O Lord, in any way to count my good works. Rather, I will clothe myself with your justice and receive from your love the eternal possession of yourself.' For only if one prays like this does one gather merit, and ultimately in no other way. For ultimately one can gather merit only in that love (this is what we mean when we speak of the 'state of grace') in which one does not want to gather merit but simply loves God himself and not oneself.

It thus becomes obvious that 'merit' is not merely and not even primarily a juridical concept but that it tells us something about the life and the free person of man as it has become through its life. If there is permanent merit, then this means that the life of man does not dry up in the emptiness of the past; man does not live his present merely in order to swallow up the possibilities of his future into something which has been. Merit is not merely a title of which God takes note. We ourselves are the book of life in what we have become; God's judgement is the unveiling of what we are, although it is indeed an unveiling which only God himself can undertake. If there is a Christian hope of eternal life, then this must include the fact that man lives differently in time than sub-human realities. The latter are driven through time; they become something new by losing just as much of the old as they gain of the new. Man as a person before God does not lose but saves his future by taking it up into the 'past' which is the permanent outcome of the present. The older we become, the surer we are that we truly are. It is perfectly true that one thing cannot be taken [145] away from us (and this is not only true in the paradise of remembrance), viz. what we were and hence are. It is becoming and not what has become which passes away. What perishes is not the secret extract of life but the process of its preparation. When this process, which we normally call our life, has come to an end, then the perfect has arrived and this is ourselves as we have become in freedom. It belongs, of course, to the order of original sin in human existence that this collected extract of our life is not simply available to our reflection and self-enjoyment. We experience ourselves always as the poor from whom the past vanishes, who forget, whose personality (laboriously acquired in life) is cruelly torn down again by physical processes which have little respect for the dignity of the thus (empirically) constructed personality. But this changes nothing – for the one who knows that spirit is more than the possibility of experiencing this spirit corporeally – about the fact that the history of the personal spirit is more and takes a different course than the 'history' of the material in which only exactly as much is taken over from the future into the present as is given up by the present to the decaying past. The person on this sinful earth achieves himself always (and always more and always more quickly) into a state where he is no longer master of himself. But this means precisely that what cannot be master of itself, viz. the achieved life, has not been able to take flight into the unreal nothing but retains final validity.

So long as this eternal element in us is still in the process of becoming, it remains an open question as to what it will be: either something freely given over to God in his grace or something refused to God and thus condemned to its own closed finiteness. This decision can take place at any moment in time, it can even change (as long as we still have room for freedom in the finite). But then such a decision (once it has really been taken) is on every occasion concerned with disposing the whole person, no matter how much the material of the life in which it is exercised may change. Such a decision does not only determine the disposition of the whole person (since it determines its eternal destiny as a whole and not merely a part of our existence, merely 'implicating' everything else); it also acts as the result of the always present totality of the person and thus out of the latter's previous life, because only the whole person can master the whole. It risks the life which has gone before; it works with the gains of its previous life. It may do this in a more or less intensive manner, i.e. it may win a greater or lesser amount of the personal reality which is still [146] possibility into the 'essence' of life preserved in the (apparent) past, but it cannot act other than as the act of the one (as such) who had lived this life up till now in 'this' particular way. In doing this, it may prefix a sign to this whole previous life which is diametrically opposed to the sign it had up till then; but even in this case it prefixes this sign exactly to what has been up till then. The intensity, the existential depth, the freely acquired personal characteristic, all of which have developed in one's life up till then, all enter as intrinsic elements into the new act of decision and put their stamp on it. In every moment of the free, personal achievement of existence, the past becomes an inner, essential principle of the present and its acts.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point, we are going to interrupt the course of our reflection for a moment. When theologians treat of the problem of the reviviscence of merit, their views diverge (on closer examination) into two directions depending on their view of whether merit revives according to the present intensity of the existential conversion which lets this merit revive again, or whether they revive simply according to the past degree of merit, so that (in this latter view) the new conversion would be merely the external presupposition for the possibility of making claim to previous merit before God. In the second case, the possibility of a full reviviscence of merit is not a particularly great problem (although, of course, the fact itself must still be proved, since it is presupposed that this depends ultimately on the free decree of God). But this conception is based on a very external, juridical concept of 'merit', a concept which we have really already refused to accept as in any way sufficient. Moreover, this view cannot really explain on what it bases its knowledge that such a reviviscence is not merely a juridical possibility in God's providence but is a fact (as this view maintains it is). For no one can say that the positive sources of revelation really prove this thesis directly and in a way which would exclude all possibility of doubt. But what intrinsic, objective proof could support this view, if there is no intrinsic connection between the depth of the conversion and the reviviscence of previous merit and if therefore no presence of the past in the present act of conversion demands the reviviscence of merit? In the first case, theologians seem more or less to deny a reviviscence of merit, or (since no one likes to deny this explicitly) seem to explain reviviscence in such a way that objectively speaking there is very little left of it; they seem to say that reviviscence means that eternal beatitude, which is measured by the depth of conversion and the merit [147] consequent on it, is 'also' the reward for previous merits. At any rate, theologians seem to be tacitly agreed in both these views – in spite of their difference of opinion on the possibility, fact, nature and degree of the reviviscence of merit – that if this 'reviviscence' is measured according to the existential depth and radicality (or the opposite) of conversion, then this can be maintained only in a very much weakened sense; for in such a case, the same degree of grace and subsequent glory would have been given even in accordance with this disposition alone, even if there had been no earlier merit. Thus, both parties presuppose that the earlier life in its permanent results which have entered into the actual reality of the person, is not an inner moment in the conversion and of its intensity.

But precisely this seems to us to be disputable. Even and especially where someone freely undertakes conversion, he does not act out of the abstract impenetrableness of a formal freedom but out of what he is, out of what he is permanently because 'this' is what he has been in the past. The conversion is the result of one's inner life. This is to be taken not in the sense that the conversion has to come because 'this' is how one was earlier on, but in the sense that this conversion, if it comes freely, will be 'such' as it is also because one was 'like this' earlier on. Thus, the past enters without fail into the present conversion, determines its characteristic depth and everything else of this nature. If this is correct, then it follows precisely from the (apparently more careful) position of those theologians who are not prepared to admit a priori a full reviviscence of previous merit but who – and, in principle, rightly so – want to tie this reviviscence to the depth of conversion, that a full reviviscence of this earlier merit can be supposed: the present 'disposition' necessarily contains the whole previous life (at least this), because one cannot turn the clock back; one's past is conserved in the present of the person out of which arises every act by which a person really decides about himself as a whole in freedom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Hence we can say: your whole life remains always preserved for you; everything you have done and suffered is gathered together in your being. You may have forgotten it, yet it is still there. It may appear to you as a pale dream even when you do remember what you once were, did and thought. All this you still are. All this has perhaps been transformed (it is to be hoped) and incorporated into a better, more comprehensive framework, has been integrated more into a great love (indeed, the great love) and silent loyalty towards your God which was, remained and grew [148] throughout everything life did with you; but everything has remained in this way, nothing has simply ceased, everything which happened – as long as we are pilgrims of maturing freedom – can still be retrieved and transformed into the one action of the heart in what you do today: the good of your past life, by taking up once more in its proper nature what remained and what through sin became the power of evil; the evil, by taking the good – without which the empty evil cannot exist – out of this obstructing negation (the formal evil, as the schoolmen say, by declaring this formal evil to be pure negativity) and by opening it up to that breadth of freedom which really belongs to every genuine reality such as was concealed even in your evil actions, by opening it up to that breadth of freedom which belongs to the pure goodness of God. Thus you do not need to be anxious about your past life: neither on account of some good in it which has evaporated nor about something evil (if it has been redeemed); both are still there and really well there in your proper reality, i.e. in what is genuinely and personally real. Repentance is not escape but transformation. It is escape only from the fact that the guilty deed was not more, did not want to be more, than it was: hence, escape from what was death in it, not flight from the life which was also hidden in it. Life gathers more and more; it scatters only those who are unfaithful to the infinite God and his love, or – more correctly – it gathers even them, but not into the intimacy of God's love but into the dark, burning narrowness of the loss of all in one.

God has made the world and man better than we normally think. We can do everything wrong; but ultimately we cannot do wrong in many different ways. Reality is constructed in such a way that as a whole it finds salvation if it finds it at all. Ultimately, the successful final decision is also the comprehensive one. The river of life may take many a roundabout route; but when it arrives, it has lost none of its water (after all, where could the water have disappeared to, when the 'past' of the spirit ultimately is not what has happened but what has become and been preserved?); together with everything else, it flows into the sea of finality. It is also ensured that this blessed truth does not change into a cheap optimism of the superficial and the frivolous: no one knows whether in his case the whole perfection is also the beatifying perfection. Anyone who thinks he can make things easy for himself in life, since after all one has nothing to lose, must remember that he can lose everything in the way explained and that the radical nature of damnation is equal to that of beatitude, precisely [149] because the whole life is preserved by the fact that it brings itself out of an empty future into a past which, before God, is a valid present. The proverb 'All's well that ends well' expresses a much more profound truth than is normally intended by it. But we just do not know that everything will end well. We have to work out our salvation in fear and trembling, for we can only lose it completely or win it completely.

This does not, of course, obscure the truth of faith that everyone finds his own particular beatitude and – judged by the works which precisely he has done during this life – finds his measure of blessed completion which differs in greatness for each individual. For in this perfection everyone catches up with himself, with the talents (both natural and supernatural) God has given him, and is perfected according to God's plan who gives to each one as He wills. But it is precisely because we are what we are meant to be by God's will – because the measure of real possibilities possessed by each individual is ordained by God's sovereign providence – that we will be perfected and perfectly happy when we have caught up with these our possibilities; and when we have been perfected, then we have caught them up completely and not merely in part.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Since God gives us our merit by his grace, he can give it to each one of us differently and it remains different (compared with other individuals) even when God grants us by his grace that our merits correspond to the possibilities they have proper to each one of us. Hence, what has been said, does not deny the truth that everyone is rewarded according to his works. It simply says that these works in their very diversity – if this exists at all – correspond finally to the inner possibilities God has granted to each one in a different way.

What has been said so far has been concerned primarily and explicitly with the fact that those possibilities of our own, proper and individual existence which have been realized by us, cannot be lost to us even though we may have gone through a period of guilt, presupposing merely that we definitively rest this realized existence in God's love. But we think that we can say something even more explicit and far-reaching on the subject of the comfort of time than we have done so far. This is that if we save our existence into God's grace, then we save it completely. This is meant not only in the sense that nothing of what has once been realized is lost, but also in the sense that finally nothing of what has been offered to us as a possibility by God – of the possibility we ourselves have been – [150] remains unrealized. Thus we mean that if we are saved, then the person we have become is the full realization of the one we were able to be; there is nothing left over. In the end, the law according to which we began – if it is fulfilled at all – is fulfilled completely. Existence and idea coincide. Naturally certain possibilities remain unfulfilled in life. If one has decided for one thing in this life which is different from something else in a mutually exclusive way, and if this difference is also to enter into the permanent finality of life (if this life is not to be merely a good or bad piece of stage acting with a subsequent reward à la 'Everyman'), then one cannot have this other life even in eternity. To this extent, everything finite pays the price of its perfection by its 'renunciation' of something 'possible'. But such a 'renunciation' is without regrets; it is merely the price of perfection, without which it itself could not even exist. This is quite different from saying, however, that guilt which did not need to be, which as such can never be a necessary means to perfection, gives rise to a final loss of a genuine possibility. In this case, this existence would terminate in final sorrow because something would have been lost which really could have been, and not merely a 'possibility' which dies easily and with pleasure because it makes room for some other, genuine and accomplished possibility.

One might now immediately make the following objection to this thesis that in an eternity given as a gift of God's grace and believed in its promise, concrete being and existence really coincide, and that even in this sense all sin will really have been completely forgiven: the simplest Christian experience and appreciation of human life shows that one can at any moment fall short of one's own possibilities and leave unrealized in the individual acts of one's life what could be realized at this moment in the sphere of moral maturing. Hence – it might be objected – even the total result of a life which reaches its final stage with death might culpably fall short of what could have been achieved during it.

Yet there would seem to be a great deal to be said against this opinion; will the person I am really sorrowfully salute from afar and for all eternity the one I might have become? Has this sorrow disappeared from the beatitude of the perfect, just for the simple reason that he knows that he himself has been freely responsible for this eternal truncation and that God has therefore permitted it in his eternal salvific will, because he finds his joy more in God's will than in anything else? Will anyone dare to answer this question in the affirmative and believe that he has even then [151] conceived the beatitude of perfection in a happy enough way? Is it certain that what applies to the individual act and to the individual moment of life must also

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

apply to the final totality of life? Is the whole of life merely the sum of its parts? Should one not have to say that one is still in time as long as unused possibilities are still available to us? For if eternity is not the unlimited continuation of time but the finality of what has freely come to be in time, then possible time would not yet be finished as long as there remain in a man open possibilities waiting for the perfection of eternity, or else these possibilities would have to be thought of as simply falling away empty in death (but how could this be thought, if these possibilities are really the person in the concrete, in so far as he himself is set as a task to his freedom which may either accept or deny it?). Certainly, a factual realization of existence always includes also an 'external' possibility, since man considered as a free being depending on a body must achieve himself in his freedom in a material which is given to him as something different from himself, i.e. as the world which surrounds him. But precisely this fact shows once more that it is always the same thing which happens even with different materials, viz. the taking up of a position towards oneself in the face of the absolute being and the absolute person whom we call God. Hence this same thing can take place completely and perfectly with regard to the most diverse material bases. If one were to deny this, then one could no longer (theologically speaking) admit properly that one can become perfect in different ways; the doctrine of the one Christian perfection of the one and always identical love of God in the different 'ways' and 'callings' (within and without the Evangelical Counsels, in the world, etc.) could no longer logically be held. It is undoubtedly true that even the concrete factors of life and of the different individual situations of life enter into eternity (the unique concreteness of our life is not – as in Hoffmannsthal's 'Everyman', or in the case of the reed-baskets of the Desert Fathers which they made and then undid again in the evening – merely the practice material which is thrown away again at the end and which is used over and over again for the same exercise). But this recognition surely does not exclude the other, viz. that with different materials of existence one cannot indeed make oneself exactly the same man in eternity but can achieve oneself as a perfect man who has completely caught up with himself. Apparently very little material is required for such total self-achievement. What we may sorrowfully be tempted to complain about as a poverty of opportunities for certain people (in the [152] case of those who died young, etc.), will have to be regarded rather as the normal opportunity, which has to be contrasted with the superabundance of different possibilities for others (those who live a long time and consequently with a great many existential opportunities), of which, however, they were not really able to use a greater number as genuine possibilities really and intimately belonging to them than those who apparently were offered only pitiful opportunities. We do not mean to raise the question here as to what happens to the innumerable human beings who have died at the embryonic stage, as to whether one can conceive in their case of a beatitude which is not also the result of their free action (in which case it would be quite false to say that what is granted to the one who has never acted himself is more grace than something he has done freely himself). In any case, reference to this obscure question seems to indicate that one must not overrate the significance of the difference in external situation for the proper achievement of man's existence. For otherwise it would be a strange arrangement of life by God, if in most cases of this free spiritual creature – which after all is called to realize its being freely – this realization did not come to its proper fulfilment. It is not necessary here to attempt to prove philosophically that there can be no spiritual creatures who, without any fault of their own, do not reach their proper perfection. It suffices if we approach the matter in this theological reflection from the angle of Christian hope. But we may then ask: is it true that because we are finite, the beatifying agreement with this finiteness (which undoubtedly belongs to the perfect happiness of the creature) is also already (without destroying perfect happiness) an agreement with the final lack of realization of my real possibilities, which after all are something quite different from those abstract possibilities which are merely the expression of my finite nature assigned to me by God himself? After all, the fact that no one fails to find perfect happiness simply because someone else has his own – greater – perfect happiness, is not yet an obvious explanation of the fact that one would not fail to achieve perfect happiness if one's own measure were to remain eternally unfulfilled. May we in a sense 'postulate' that God leads everyone in such a way that each one finds his complete perfection if he finds perfect happiness at all? On the other hand, seen correctly, this optimism is no licence for irresponsible optimism. For there is a Purgatory (to put it quite simply in Christian terms) and there is the danger of being lost for ever. Hence, no one escapes the necessity (now or later) of really having to catch up with himself by hard effort, so that [153] eternal life may really be the full result of time. If we remember that ultimately good and evil are distinguished not as 'more' and 'less' but as 'yes' and 'no' – even though the formally evil is a deficit in an existent – then it is not really so difficult to ensure that every life in the long run grows into the whole fullness of reality which is implanted in it. Thus, there only remains the question as to whether it fulfils itself in an absolute yes or absolute no to God. Hence, only these two possibilities and not merely shadowy forms of life are possible where the end has arrived in its complete finality. One may catch up with oneself more slowly or more quickly, more actively or more passively; but to remain for ever 'behind oneself' is a merely abstract possibility which does not seem to belong to the world and history of the personal spirit, a world and a history created by the God of beatifying perfection. Anyone who thinks differently seems to us to be thinking too much in terms of the experiences of the material world. In the world of the quantitative there certainly is more and less, and in it there cannot be anything which could not just as well be more, since in this world (as long as it keeps its proper form) perfection is impossible. But where there is spirit and freedom, there is final completion. This, however, is the perfect final completion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let it not be said, however, that Purgatory merely exists for the payment of the debt of punishment due to sin and that it does not really 'improve' man, since beyond the grave he can no longer grow in grace. Purgatory can be conceived absolutely as the integration of all the manifold dimensions of man into the one basic decision of man (which no longer changes after death). It would have to be proved, however, and should not simply be presupposed as an indubitable fact, that – because the individual act in the life of man can remain below the level of its possibility – this basic decision itself does not always find the measure proper to it even in the totality of life. If (it might just be mentioned) one allows the Thomistic theory its inner logical dynamism, then one will arrive at a view like the one we have in mind. For the basic decisions about the relationship towards God (and thus also about its measure) are not really built up of those factors which are present in the case of venial sin and of the corresponding existentially morally good, 'slight' acts. It is in the latter rather than in the former basic decisions as such (in so far as these are the result of a whole life) that the 'more or less' is at home. If it were to be objected against this that according to Our Lord's words, the love of God itself (and not just its other actualizing and concretizing [154] attitudes), and hence obviously the basic decision of life, happens more or less 'with all one's power and one's whole heart', then one would have to answer that this is undoubtedly true for the individual acts of such a basic decision, of such an 'option fondamentale', which take place in the individual moments of life but the question is precisely whether in the case of a successfully achieved life (if it really is this), this basic decision must not necessarily have arrived at the very point which is demanded of it, viz. that God is really loved with one's whole heart. Or is God, even in eternity, satisfied with a love which is not 'of the whole heart'? If this is not so, then has one loved differently with one's whole heart than if one really used up the possibilities of such a love granted to us by God and his grace? Thus – when one loves in this way with one's whole heart – is one not then exactly in the position one should be in, viz. in the accomplishment of one's own existence, in completed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation perfection?

Before we bring our reflections about the comfort of time to a close, there remains one further question which must still be examined more explicitly than we have done so far: what is the real position of the evil acts in our life and of the 'works' which, although not evil and culpable in themselves, nevertheless happened during a period of our life which was dominated by a basic decision against God and which we qualify as a 'state of sin'? It is an obvious fact that every mortal sin as such, regarded in itself, tries to integrate the whole of life into a no to God and hence is in itself the most terrible thing a man can do. It is also clear that as a consequence, every such action certainly does not come up to the possibilities of spiritual, personal (supernatural) self-actualization which the person could have achieved had he not sinned. A Christian also cannot dispute the truth that there is no sin which may be done as something 'necessary' because it is thought that this is the only way one can become the sort of person one should and must be according to the inner law with which one set out. However much 'experience' may seem to contradict it, there is nothing in the world which could be so indispensable for one's own self-actualization that it could justify and give meaning to opposition to the holy will of God. Everything which signifies a fulfilment for man can be found on the way to God, even though this way may seem to lead only into the desolate and empty wastes of the kind of renunciation which makes man miserable. It is indeed true that the ultimate and the decisive arrives only when one sacrifices it. But is sin, as a concrete action, only sin and only empty meaninglessness simply because it is sin [155] and should not have been committed and because its goal could also have been reached in a different way? No Christian philosopher or theologian who does not want to become a Manichean can answer this question in the affirmative, even though moralists and preachers like to act as if they really wanted to give this answer. Sin can exist only because it is more and something better than sin, for otherwise it would be pure nothingness presenting no danger and amounting to precisely nothing. Even sin, therefore, is always a real piece of existential realization, of real self-fulfilment, a part of the way towards the real goal (however much the imagination baulks at this). One should indeed say that the deeper and the more radical sin is, the more the sinner involves and achieves his own person in this, and the more he must realize (even though in a radically false direction) the possibility of his existence. The wretchedness and profound shamelessness of sin lives on this real presence within it of the greatness of fulfilled human possibilities. The bravery, the prodigality of the heart, the courage to venture, and whatever else has to be carried out in sin so that it may even exist – and anything which must be realized to a greater extent, the greater the sin – all this could and should indeed have become reality even without guilt (although perhaps in another form and expressed differently). Yet this in its turn does not alter the fact that it has become a reality in the guilt. And so it remains. And so it really enters as a factor of the person's action into a new, good action, into the return to God and into justification. Hence one can certainly speak of a 'reviviscence' of the sinful past and not merely of a 'reviviscence' of meritorious actions which were once done in the state of grace and then were deadened by sin. Hence it is not as if the time of sin remained simply as an item appearing for all eternity on the deficit side. It is true, of course, that this time as such and regarded in itself will always be less than if it had been lived in faithfulness and love towards God. But we have already said that life as a whole cannot end thus if it ends at all completed. The end must be the full-filling in which even the loss of this sinful time is made up, in which this time, or what is positively good in it, is redeemed by the grace of God and elevated into God's life, and thus is integrated together with everything else into the blessed fulfilment which is without blemish. Seen in the totality of perfected life (when this beautifying fulfilment takes place), even the sinful time is not killed but redeemed and saved, and included in the mercy of God who does not save by merely obliterating but by setting free and by 'preserving in an elevated form'. The

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

same, only more so, [156] applies of course to those acts of one's sinful life which in themselves are not bad actions but do not – to begin with – signify any exercise of the supernatural life, because they were not done in the grace of God: to the extent in which even the realizations of personal human history were expressions of the spiritual man, they too enter into that subsequent total supernatural fulfilment in which the whole man is completely brought home to God.

The comforting aspect of time! We do not lose anything but are always gaining. It is true that ultimately this is known only to the believer. But is it any the less true for this, and any the less the comfort of time? Life gathers itself together more and more, the more apparently the past lies behind us. The more it seems like that, the more we have in front of us. And when we arrive, we find our whole life and all its real possibilities, and the meaning of all the possibilities which had been given to us. There is not only a resurrection of the body but also a resurrection of time in eternity. This is not the remaining of an abstract subject, which continues to enjoy life, because it had at some time in the distant past behaved itself properly, but it is a changed and transfigured time. In it we are not, indeed, peasant or pope, poor or rich, but then one has not simply 'been' all this just to become something different now. One sees oneself completely now and is not merely someone receiving a pension for past services rendered, someone who now follows a different occupation. For in everything one has done in the past, one really did only one thing after all (even though it became part of a synthesis together with the many other things one did, a synthesis which characterizes it even in its fulfilment), viz. one tried to attain oneself completely, together with everything one had by nature and grace, and to make a complete transfer of this one total reality in believing love into the incomprehensible mystery of God. And this attempt has now completely succeeded. In all we experienced of it in our life, it always seemed to be successful only in part and bit by bit. We seemed always to land back again in ourselves, in our empty poverty, our total weakness and the miserable dilettantism of our love of God. What we seemed to have only succeeded with in a piecemeal fashion, even that seemed to be consumed again without trace in that demolition of our corporeal, earthly existence which we call our life proceeding towards death. But all this is only the darkness in which – as the common milieu of guilt and redemption, as the sphere of faith and despair – man must allow his life and himself to be hidden. Yet in it he is completely preserved. Eternity [157] does not, properly speaking, come after time but rather is the fulfilment of time. Our eternity ripens out of time as the fruit in which, when it has fully grown, everything we were and became in this time is conserved.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[159]

PART TWO

The Sacraments

[161]

11

THE EUCHARIST AND SUFFERING

The subject of this essay may at first sight seem somewhat recherché, and yet really it is not. For there are in fact essential relationships between the fact that the baptized receives bread from heaven as the food of life and the other fact that he is called to share in the sufferings of Christ, and so it may be worth the trouble to investigate these relations a little.

There are three properties of the Blessed Eucharist which entail leading its recipient into the dark valleys of Christ's suffering: it is a sacrifice, it brings grace, and it binds its recipient ever more closely to the Mystical Body of Christ which is the Church. These three allow the sufferings of Christ to flow over in a mysterious manner to the one who receives this Christ.

I

The Holy Eucharist is a sacrifice; in it we receive the body and blood of Jesus Christ given and poured out for us. It is perfectly true, of course, that the Holy Eucharist is the wonderful presence of the glorified Christ who is beyond all suffering, and who can never die now (Rm 6:9) but sits in majesty at the right hand of the Father. Yet the Holy Eucharist is also a true, visible sacrifice whose purpose is to render present the bloody sacrifice offered once and for all on the Cross and to preserve the memory of this sacrifice until the end of time (Council of Trent, sess. 22, c. 1). The Council of Trent sees this relationship of the sacrifice of the Mass to the sacrifice of the Cross to lie above all in the fact that there is in both the same High Priest and the same sacrificial victim (sess. 22, c. 2).

It is the same High Priest who offers the unbloody sacrifice in the Mass and who offered himself on the Cross, and in both cases it is the same sacrificial outlook which gives the sacrifice its propitiatory value. Indeed, it [162] is one and the same unique inner act of sacrifice which makes the external happening on the Cross and in the Mass morally valuable, which propitiates God and brings man salvation and blessing.[1] For every moral action of Jesus had propitiating value before God's justice, in so far as it was already interiorly incorporated into the totality of a life of sacrifice whose climax was the voluntary sacrificial death on the Cross, and in so far as it formed a single, great totality with the death on the Cross. Thus every action, every piece of work, every attitude of Jesus drew life from his readiness for the Cross, was a part of the way up to the sacrificial altar of Calvary and thus was also pleasing to the Father. For this reason, this will to sacrifice was also included – suffused and united with the will to the Cross – when Jesus offered the first eucharistic sacrifice at the Last Supper and coupled with his command of the continuous renewal of this sacrifice by the Apostles and their successors also the interior will to sacrifice which sanctified all these visible sacrifices offered in his name in the course of time. This was all

[1] Cf. on this, K. Rahner, Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951); id., 'Die vielen Messen als die vielen Opfer Christi', ZKT LXXVII (1955), pp. 94-101.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the more the case because this sacrifice was to be the renewal and effectual application of the sacrifice offered on the Cross, because it is thus connected of its whole nature with the sacrifice on the Cross and because the grace and holiness distributed by it to man is precisely the grace and holiness merited on the Cross, i.e. merited by the sacrificial will of Jesus who was obedient even unto death. It is also, therefore, this sacrificial mind – which was in Jesus and which made his suffering on the Cross a world-redeeming action – which makes the unbloody sacrifice on our altars a sacrifice pleasing to God, reconciling heaven and earth and transmitting the grace of God's mercy to all those who assist in offering it with a devout heart.

Let us, however, take a closer look at the sacrificial disposition of Jesus himself. It is the will for the Cross, the obedience unto death, the voluntary sacrifice of his life by the one who has power to give his life or to keep it, by the one who gave it because this was his Father's will. It was therefore a will for sorrow, for the chalice of bitterness, for destruction, because God was to be glorified precisely by such a voluntary acceptance of suffering. We can just get an inkling as to why precisely such suffering and dying was the form of glorifying God surpassing all other possibilities and the one by which the only begotten Son of God [163] revealed his Father. Suffering and dying are the destruction of what is human; they are a task of one's own fulfilment, one's own pleasure and honour. But from man's point of view, such a task of self-affirmation shows – more than anything else – that all salvation comes from God, that it is not by elevating his own self and by perfecting his own being that man can find the God who without man's merit forgives the sinner and who calls man out of the sphere of his natural desire of perfecting self to the infinity of His own divine life. The new life itself is God's grace, is His gift. No amount of suffering, death, dark night and denial of the unruly will to live could have forced God to come down to man. But such active renunciation of one's own happiness as is contained in surrender to pain and sorrow is still the clearest practical confession of the fact that man, conscious of his own powerlessness in the face of the God of forgiveness and elevating grace, expects his salvation from above and not from himself and hence can and will sacrifice his ego and its values, those values which are powerless to procure his salvation. Such a will to sacrifice animated Jesus as he offered himself to God in order to win for us forgiveness and grace, and this one and the same will to sacrifice also makes Christ a victim pleasing to God when he offers himself ritually to God on our altars as the eternal High Priest: the will to die so that the Father may be honoured, and so that it may be made known that He is all in all, and man is nothing before him.

Furthermore, Christ is not only the same sacrificing priest in the Eucharist, with the same sacrificial intentions as on the Cross, but the Eucharist is also the same sacrificial offering as the one offered by the eternal High Priest in his bloody sacrifice. The sacrificial offering is Jesus Christ himself. The manner of offering indeed is different: on the Cross, the sacrificial offering was offered to God by the shedding of blood, here it is offered in an unbloody manner by the transubstantiation of the human gifts of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of the Redeemer. Yet the Mass also refers this unbloody manner of offering back to the bloody sacrifice on the Cross. For Christ offers himself to the Father in the eucharistic sacrifice under two species: of these, by virtue of the words of consecration themselves, one contains the body and the other his blood – precisely so as to point to his bloody sacrifice in which his body was given for many and his blood was poured out for the forgiveness of sin. Thus the sacrificial offering of holy Mass is not merely in fact the same Christ who was sacrificed on the Cross, but he is a sacrificial offering here [164] which even in the manner of its offering still continues to announce the death of the Lord until he comes.

The sacrificial intention and sacrificial offering of the sacrifice of the Mass are thus submerged in the mystery of the Cross; they announce this mystery and speak of the death of the Son of God for our salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But this mystery of the Cross which mysteriously suffuses the celebration of the Mass is thus brought home to us not merely spatially and temporally but, far more than that, it takes hold of us who celebrate this mystery, it draws us into itself and subjects us to its unfathomable laws. For when (and this is true of all of us) we lend Christ, the eternal High Priest, our hands and voice so that he may offer the sacrifice of the New Covenant to the Father through us, then we cannot be his holy 'liturgists' other than by entering into the sacrificial outlook of Christ which alone gives value and dignity to this sacred action. When we sacrifice with Christ, then his inner mind, his resignation and readiness to suffer, his will for the cross and sorrow and death must take hold of us too, so that we do not merely take part in the external happening but also in his interior intentions, full of terror and sweetness at the same time, in the mystery of the Cross which animates this sacrifice. Furthermore: we are not merely Christ's co-celebrants who must enter into his desire for sacrifice. We also receive the sacrificed body and the blood of the sacrifice poured out for us, the sacrificial gifts themselves. If, however, this body and blood in their sacramental manner of existence still announce the death of the Lord, is it not inevitable then that this sacrament – if it effectively takes hold of us by its own power – should make us subject to the mystery it announces, which is the death of Christ? And if this food changes us into itself will we not then also have to learn to bear the signs which proclaim the death of Christ Our Lord, as do this bread and the chalice of salvation which we receive? It is impossible that the mystery of the suffering of Christ should not spread through the life of someone who partakes of the sacrifice and the sacrificial meal in which is renewed the memory of the suffering of Christ.

II

But let us pursue this relationship between the Holy Eucharist and the mystery of suffering in the life of the Christian still further. The Holy Eucharist is the sacrament of the daily growth of grace, the sacrament of [165] the daily increase of that love which is poured out for us by the Holy Spirit; it is the sacrament which is meant to preserve, awaken and develop in us that divine life which was poured into us by water and the Holy Spirit in the bath of rebirth. Hence, if the Holy Eucharist is meant to be the increase of the life received in baptism, then it is clear that its manner of effecting this must be adapted to the vital laws of this divine life of grace and that it must develop this life in those directions in which this life had already been moving in germ.

These ontological and vital laws of the supernatural life of grace, however, include also the fact that this life is necessarily, one would almost say by an inner finality, also a participation in the suffering of Christ.

By baptism, we are drawn into the life-circle of Christ. For we live from that moment onwards by his grace, we are implanted into him as the vine branch into the vine, we live in him and out of him. Thus we belong to no one else more than to the one risen from the dead (Rm 7:4); we belong to Christ, as he belongs to God (1 Co 1:9). Consequently, we must also become conformed to the image of the Son of the Father (Rm 8:29), we must put on Christ more and more, as we have already done basically in baptism (Ga 3:27). Christ must more and more be formed in us (Ga 4:19).

This inner correspondence of Christ's life and the life of someone united with Christ is so great that St Paul also conceives the great decisive events of Christ's life as direct events in the life of the Christian or concludes from an event of Christ's life to some corresponding event in the life of the Christian. Thus, we have died with Christ, have awoken with him, have risen together with him, are transplanted with him into heaven (Ep 2:6; Col 2:12; 3:1). If Christ is risen, then according to St Paul it follows necessarily from this that we too rise from the dead (1 Co 15:13 sqq.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What is valid in these general terms of the parallel between Christ's life and the life of the Christian is valid also, and, above all, of the event which stands at the centre of the earthly life of Jesus, viz. the Cross. Just as it was so very much the characteristic sign of the life of Jesus that one really knows Christ only as the Crucified (1 Co 2:2), so the life of those who are united with Christ by grace must be marked by the Cross. Conversely, all the suffering of the Christian cannot be regarded by him as natural misfortune or as the general lot of all human beings, but must be regarded simply as the consequence and expression of his Christian existence [166] and of his union with Christ by grace, and as a necessary stage he must go through before being glorified with Christ. Already in baptism, in the foundation of our Christian existence, we are seized by this mysterious law of the life of grace: in baptism we are buried into the death of Christ (Rm 6:3), we have grown together with him in the likeness of his death (Rm 6:5). Of course, in this 6th chapter of Romans it is also and perhaps primarily a question of the dying to sin, of a spiritual dying of the old, sinful man in us (cf. Rm 6:6; Ga 2:19; 5:24; Col 3:3) to make way for the resurrection of the new man created according to God in holiness and justice (cf. Ep 4:24; Col 3:10); but just as in Jesus himself sin was overcome and the new life of grace was founded precisely by his bodily suffering and death, so for the Christian, too, suffering and death are in the proper sense manifestations and means by which the growth and perfecting of the new life in Christ are achieved, and – since baptism – we are always submerged anew into the death of Christ. For if for St Paul all earthly, bodily dying (and hence all sorrow) is also an expression of the fact that man was subject to sin (Rm 5:12 sqq.; 8:10), then in those who are in Christ Jesus (and to the extent in which they are) and in whom as such there is no longer anything worthy of damnation (cf. Rm 8:1 and Council of Trent, sess. 5, c. 5), suffering and death no longer have the character of punishment in the proper sense but rather are a participation in the fate of Jesus and an effect of that living union with him which began in baptism. We are children of God filled with his Spirit; we are his heirs and co-heirs with Christ. Only we must still suffer with him, as St Paul says (Rm 8:17), so that we may be glorified with him. Thus according to St Paul we are given a part in the sufferings of Christ (2 Co 1:5); thus St Paul wants to participate in His sufferings and become like Him in death (Ph 3:11); thus the scars of his persecutions are for him the marks of the wounds of Christ (Ga 6:17); Christ is to be glorified in his body through life and through death (Ph 1:20). And because the life of Jesus is to be revealed in all men at some time, what St Paul says of himself must be true of all Christians: we always bear about in our bodies the dying of Jesus, so that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our bodily frame. For we, the living, are constantly being handed over to the power of death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our mortal flesh (2 Co 4:10 sqq.). Just as Jesus was crucified in weakness, so we also are weak 'in him' (2 Co 13:4). Thus it is a grace not merely to believe in Christ but [167] also to suffer for him (Ph 1:29; 1 P 2:19, 20); thus it is a true calling to undergo suffering, following the example of Christ (1 P 2:20, 21), it is a partaking in his suffering and his disgrace (1 P 4:13; Heb 13:3), it is a result of the law that all those who wish to live piously in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution (2 Tm 3:10). For if the author of our salvation attained perfection through suffering (Heb 2:11; 5:8), can we who have put on this Jesus in baptism (Ga 3:28) think to come differently to perfection? It seems to have been part of a primitive Christian song – this 'true saying' transmitted to us by St Paul and which sounds like an anthem (2 Tm 2:11, 12):

If we have died with him,
we shall also live with him;
if we patiently endure with him,
we shall also reign with him.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is true, therefore, that as St Paul says in one place, we are 'appointed unto' suffering (1 Th 3:3); that because we have grown into Christ by grace, we also grow together with his suffering and death; that he must also be formed in us (Ga 4:19) as the crucified; that suffering and death are essential characteristics of Christian existence as such, necessary consequences and living manifestations of our being in Christ by grace.

The Holy Eucharist, however, as we have already said, is the sacrament of the constant growth and maturing of this life of grace; it is the sacrament which is meant to ensure that we live more and more 'in Him' and become ever more like Him. Must not the Holy Eucharist then draw us ever more deeply also into the mystery of the Cross of Christ? If the power of Christ's life with its vital laws brims over daily from the Sacrament of the Altar into our souls as if in ever new waves, is it not then a new submersion from day to day in the death of Christ? If grace and the Cross are so intimately connected because in Christ, the source of all grace, the Cross stamped itself on everything, then the daily increase of grace in Holy Communion can only unite us ever more deeply and fully with the Cross of Christ. Thus it is true in this also that – because it is no longer we who live but Christ in us – we are also crucified with Christ (cf. Ga 2:19). And if we receive the Holy Eucharist as a pledge of future resurrection and glory (cf. Council of Trent, sess. 13, c. 2), then it can also be truly said of its reception that if we have died with Him, we will also live with Him. The Eucharist, moreover, renews the memory of the [168] sufferings of Christ even by letting Christ's sufferings flow over to us together with grace.

III

But there is still a third factor which establishes a mysterious inner relationship between the Holy Eucharist and the Cross in the life of the Christian. The Holy Eucharist is also the sacrament of the Mystical Body of Christ which is the Church. It is of course true that baptism already joins man to the Body of Christ, for we are all . . . baptized by the Spirit into one body (1 Co 12:13), says the Apostle; by the word of life in the bath of water, Christ has already formed the Church in all her glory, holiness and spotlessness (cf. Ep 5:26, 27). Nevertheless, the Holy Eucharist too is in a special way a sacrament of this Body of Christ. For, as the Apostle says, we are all one body, since there is only one bread and we all partake of this bread (1 Co 10:17). The sacraments after all cause the graces they signify as visible signs. But both the union of the many grains of wheat in the one bread and the communal eating from the one sacrificial table of Christ are signs of the unity and unitedness of the table companions of Christ among each other. Thus, according to the teaching of the Council of Trent, Christ intended the Holy Eucharist to be a sign of that one body whose head he is himself and to which he wanted us to be most closely conjoined as his members in faith, hope and charity (Trent, sess. 13, c. 2). Hence the Holy Eucharist must also increasingly cause such a unity of Christians in the one Body of Christ. It is not just by chance, moreover, that the oldest known Communion prayers of the primitive Church in the Didache implore precisely this unity of the Church, just as even today the ordo of the Mass still prays before the communio for the peace and unity of the Church. For if Holy Communion causes the fullness of the Spirit to increase in everyone, then it also binds together the members who by the one Spirit have become ever more closely conjoined into one Body. But the Holy Eucharist will not cause merely this kind of unity of the Mystical Body. For, such a unity of an organically arranged body is only possible if all the members obey the same laws of life and if each of them in their own place contribute to the building up of the whole body. The law of life of the Mystical Body of Christ demands, however, that this Body should be the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fullness, i.e. the fulfilment and completion, the revelation of Christ himself in and through the whole of humanity, in which is to be effected through all peoples and [169] through all times that overflowing wealth of grace which lay hidden in Jesus Christ, the head of redeemed humanity. This spirit of grace works in all the redeemed to the building up of the Body of Christ until it reaches the full maturity of the manhood of Christ (Ep 4:13), until it is fully built up in love (Ep 4:16). But the things in which the Church is the fulfilment and completion of Christ include also his sufferings. For according to the Apostle's teaching, the sufferings of Christ too still lack something which it has been left to the Body of Christ, the Church, to fill up (Col 1:24). And rightly so, for if according to the teaching of the Apostle all the members suffer with it if one member suffers anything (1 Co 12:26), then how should the members be without suffering, when the head suffers or has suffered? Thus, just as Christ the Head could enter into his glory only through suffering (Lk 24:26), so his members too continue these sufferings unto glory, and he suffers in them until the end of time; his Cross is still mysteriously present where a member of Christ is crucified. Since they are, however, sufferings of the members of one body, these sufferings are not merely a blessing and grace for the individual person who suffers – since they are the effect of his personal measure of grace – but they also benefit and bless the whole Mystical Body of Christ, since they are also the effect of the law of life governing the whole Body. Hence it is true what the Apostle says: I rejoice now in the sufferings I bear for your sake; and what is lacking of the sufferings of Christ I fill up in my flesh for his body, which is the Church (Col 1:24). Thus it becomes possible to have a Communion of Saints in suffering for one another, so that one can say to the other: thus death is at work in us, but life in you (2 Co 4:12). By these sufferings we help to make the Body of Christ, the whole redeemed humanity, ever more like its head who is Christ the Crucified.

We have already seen how we are subjected to the laws of life of the Mystical Body of Christ by the Holy Eucharist, how by it we are drawn ever more deeply into the mysterious growth process of this Mystical Body. If, therefore, it also belongs primarily to these laws of growth that this Body must come to perfection by suffering, then the Holy Eucharist must also for this reason be a sacrament of suffering in Christ, of dying-with-him, and the Holy Eucharist will work ever more profoundly in us so that we, too, may make up in our flesh what is still lacking in the sufferings of Christ. Thus, the sacrament of unity and the bond of love (as St Augustine calls the Eucharist) is also the sacrament of the union [170] in suffering and the bond which unites all crucified members in the one work: to glorify God in Christ Jesus through the Cross throughout all the ages until the end of time.

It is, therefore, a holy reality of faith that the Holy Eucharist makes us partake in the sufferings of Christ, since it is the renewal of the sacrifice of Calvary, since it communicates Christ's grace and since it is the sacrament of the unity of the Body of Christ.

At this point, we may possibly take fright at the thought of this connection between the sacrament of the blessed oneness of friends with Jesus and suffering, we may fear this declaration of readiness to suffer which is contained in every Holy Communion, we may feel something of the fear of Gethsemane in the face of that intrusion by the dying Jesus into the life of everyone who receives him.

We must not blind ourselves to the seriousness of this thought. But if we thus recognize the connection between the Eucharist and suffering, this does not mean that a person is mathematically hit by more sufferings the more frequently he receives Holy Communion. No, the measure of suffering appointed to us is God's disposing; it happens in accordance with the wise and inscrutable decrees of the one Spirit of God who distributes even these gifts of grace to the individual members of the Body of Christ, as he wills (cf. 1 Co 12:11). And this Spirit gives also the strength to bear each cross; together with the weakness of Christ, his strength also comes to dwell in us, and our weakness is given to us only so that God's

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

strength may be perfected in us (2 Co 12:9 sq.). For when we are weak, then we are strong (loc. cit.).

We must not regard the relationships between the Eucharist and suffering so much as a mere measure of suffering. Something much more is meant by this: the Holy Eucharist should bring it about that the suffering and the Cross apportioned to us in God's wisdom and goodness become more and more attuned to the suffering of Christ, become more and more the suffering of Christ himself and are borne more and more in such a way that they are truly the continuation of the suffering life of Jesus. In this respect it will be a sacred comfort to us if we are always able to say to ourselves that what we are suffering is simply a participation in the life of the one whom we receive daily as victim and grace and as the bond of love. It is absolutely true to say that if we have died with him, we will also live with him (2 Tm 2:11). We share everything with him – both death and life – because we live in him through his Sacrament.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[171]

12

THE RENEWAL OF PRIESTLY ORDINATION[1]

'I admonish thee to stir up the grace of God which is in thee by the laying on of my hands,' says the Apostle to his disciple Timothy (2 Tm 1:6).

I

'Renewal of ordination' may appear in its externals like a 'new invention', but in actual fact it is something deeply rooted in the faith. It is not merely based on the word of St Paul to Timothy. If this text were the only dogmatic basis for this idea and practice, it might appear to have weak foundations. For one might think then that St Paul was recommending nothing more to his disciple here than simply a new zeal in the exercise of his sacramentally given office. To understand the dogmatic meaning of the renewal of ordination (and thereby also the full meaning of the Pauline text), we must enlarge our inquiry.

Every sacrament as such is, from a fundamental point of view, merely the visible sacramental manifestation of a process of encounter between God and man by grace, a process which can take place even without the visible factor of that sign by which it becomes tangible merely spatiotemporally in the social order of the Church (even though the very thing which thus appears is itself called into reality by this visible manifestation in the sacrament). What happens between God and man by grace in the sacrament can and should also happen outside the sacrament in the intimacy of the heart, where God's self-communicating goodness and man's believing and humble receptivity meet each other; indeed, the [172] sacramental happening only has a grace-full effect in man, who is capable of deciding for himself when there really is this inner, personal meeting of God and man, which is indicated by the sacramental sign. Since this is so, there really is, for example, a 'spiritual Communion' in which Christians, without receiving the body of the Lord sacramentally, 'receive in desire the heavenly bread put before them and experience profit and benefit from it' (Denz. 881, Council of Trent). If, however, this can be said already of the sacraments in general and even of that sacrament which one can of its very nature receive every day sacramentally, then this must apply all the more to those sacraments which of their nature can be received only once, i.e. those sacraments which endow their recipient with an indelible spiritual character and which, therefore, cannot be repeated (Denz. 852, Council of Trent). Baptism, Confirmation and Priestly Ordination give man once and for all a very definite, permanent assimilation to Christ and a social connection with him as the head of the Church, and hence assign him his place in the social organism of the Church; hence they cannot be repeated in the visible sacramental (social) order of the Church. But this social, visible subordination to Christ as the head and the organic incorporation of man at a certain place and in a determined sphere of tasks in the Church takes place in sacraments and hence in grace-giving processes (and must happen in this way since the relationship to Christ and to his holy Church is the proto-sacrament, the sign of grace). Hence what happens in these sacraments is not merely a happening in the realm of the divine-human and of the visible

[1] What is said here of the sacrament of Holy Orders is valid also in a derived sense of the other two sacraments which can be received only once and which endow the soul with an inextinguishable character, i.e. Baptism and Confirmation. They too are capable of daily renewal.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church but at the same time is also a properly grace-full happening; it is the wonderful event of divine love by which God freely communicates his own being and three-personal life into the innermost being of man which opens itself out in a believing and loving yes, and this in such a way that this communication should and can be fruitful also precisely in the direction and sphere of life to which man was introduced by the sacramental process. This communication of grace, however, of its very nature is not a process happening only once but rather can be accepted in an ever more stepped-up, deepened, personal and intimate way. It can also be lost. It, therefore, does not possess that uniqueness and unrepeatable character which belong to the sacramental happening in these three sacraments which are sacraments of the incorporation into the visible Church. This communication can therefore be exercised and experienced anew in a 'spiritual', non-sacramental reception of the 'profit and benefit' of the particular sacrament.

[173] Where this happens in the case of the three sacraments referred to, it happens by virtue of the indelible character imprinted by these three sacraments.

The 'renewal' of these sacraments is therefore not a question of 'acting as if', it is not merely a pious, sentimental remembrance of the past, it is not an individual capricious attempt to do something similar in its subjective, merely human interiority to what one has also oneself done at one time 'at' the reception of a sacrament. It is rather a question of a true encounter with God by grace and of that same action of God in the inner man which was also the decisive factor in the sacramental happening and which can really happen even outside the sacrament. It is a question of one's own yes to this merciful deed of God's love in us, a yes which is said out of that real, spiritual and final character of our being which has been given to us in these sacraments and hence is a present reality in us. We can really celebrate our ordination day today and every day, not indeed 'in sacramento', not in the sign, but in the truly present reality of what is signified, of the inextinguishable priestly character and the Holy Spirit of the priesthood given together with it and arising out of it. The hand of the bishop does not rest on us again every time, but what these hands have imprinted in us, neither time nor eternity can extinguish in us, and the Holy Spirit is always prepared to come over us in just as great a fullness – indeed, an even much greater fullness – as on that day when we were told: Accipe Spiritum Sanctum; receive the Holy Ghost. We can celebrate our ordination day today just as much as then. In some cases, we may be able to do so even better today than then. For the God who himself is eternally young and who renews the inner (the spiritual) man from day to day in the daily dying of the old, merely natural (bodily and mental) man (cf. 2 Co 4:16), is eternally near to us in his unashamed love. If we have grown in knowledge and in love since that day when there happened to us in sign and in the reality of this sign what should happen to us anew today – even though not sacramentally (in sacramento) yet none the less really – in the intimacy of the heart seized by the sacramental grace, then there is also no obstacle on our part to the ever renewed granting of an ordination day, a day quieter and more restrained and yet more intimate and wonderful than the day of sacramental ordination in the springtime of our life. The renewal of ordination is not indeed an opus operatum, but it is truly an opus operantis Dei et hominis ex opere operato.

[174]

II

Such a renewal of ordination is God's work in us. This day of renewal is not merely a day of our good will, our resolutions, ours 'in spite of everything'. God's grace takes place in us just as on the first day, as long as we have faith and love. On the day when God called us and when he tore us out of the world to be his property and when he sent us out, as those set apart for him (cf. Heb 7:26), right into the midst of the world, our whole life was already present to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the regard of his all-knowing love and of his loving knowledge. He already knew then about all of us, about what we have experienced and suffered only gradually since the day of our priestly ordination: the puzzle of our own being which is only completely unveiled to us once we have arrived at the end; our tasks, our work, the conditions of our age, our needs, our temptations, and even our darkest hours when we sinned. He has not made us priests, like someone who knows the beginning without having any idea of the end. He knew everything, and yet he placed everything precisely the way it is under the law of his priesthood. He has freely given us his Holy Spirit to help with everything, so that each one of us should become the very one whom God conceived and loved.

This Spirit which was 'poured out' in us on the day of our ordination is now also in us in the hour of the renewal of ordination. He wants to give himself even more intimately, wants to fill all the hidden chambers of our heart and the whole extent of our life even more intimately: the Spirit of the Father and the Son; the Spirit of rebirth and the divine sonship of men; the Spirit who is Lord also of this age; the Spirit who transforms the world into a great sacrifice of praise to the Father, just as we by his power change bread and wine into the body and blood of the one victim; the Spirit who convicts the world of sin, justice and judgement; the Spirit of witness to Christ; the Spirit of strength and comfort; the Spirit who pours out the love of God into our hearts and is the pledge and first-fruit of eternal life; the Spirit who alone still awakens new life out of sin and darkness and includes even sin in his mercifulness, and who transforms human perplexity into the calm wisdom of God; the Spirit whose gifts are love, joy, peace, patience, mildness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and continence; the Spirit of freedom and of courageous confidence; the Spirit who always changes everything and leads it into death because he is the infinity of life and thus can never rest in the frozen form [175] of a finite life which is not going to advance any further; the Spirit who in all this change and decay remains eternally and restfully the same; the Spirit who is victorious in weakness; the Spirit of the priesthood of Jesus Christ who transforms the helpless words of our preaching into the word and act of God, who lets the forgiveness on earth become reconciliation in heaven, who turns our gestures of blessing into Christ's sacraments, who, by consecrating the quiet half hour in the morning of our days, transforms it into the reconciling act of the Lord. This Spirit was the spirit of our ordination day, this Spirit is the spirit of our renewal of ordination. If he comes down into our life, then everything we are, do and suffer can be consecrated into a priestly life. For everything was seen and loved in advance on the day we became priests; hence, nothing can withstand this blessing and transforming action of God's love, if only we give it room, if only we say: do thou ordain us anew today.

III

Such a renewal of ordination is the yes of our good will. If God's grace ordains anew – if his charism, which is the Spirit of God himself, wants to become a new living fire in us – then our, alas, otherwise so problematic 'good will' may also find the courage for a new yes. Then, and for this reason, this day may also be a day of new 'resolutions', since all of them need only be a believing yes to God's action in our life. Such personal new beginnings are therefore no romantic dream which, in a festive hour, forgets what we have experienced, how we have failed, what we have suffered and what we have become since our priestly ordination; they are no flight into illusion. No, we summon up the whole of our past life into this hour and add the unknown, dark future to it, and yet say our yes which gathers together everything past and to come in order to give it to God, so that He may make it a priestly life. No matter what has already happened in our life: deep down, everything is still open and can still be fashioned into a priestly existence.

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Are we concerned about the fruitlessness of our often so laborious efforts? In our yes, it becomes participation in the Gethsemane-anguish of the High Priest who redeemed the world. Are we perturbed by the grey sameness of our everyday life? In our yes, it becomes a part of the ordinary life of the one who was found like a man in everything. Do we experience a loneliness, which can make our eagerness for earthly fulfilment [176] so very hard and unbearable? In our yes, this emptiness of our heart becomes the wide vacuum filled by God's love. Our sins? In our concrete yes, which allows God to be greater than our sins, we learn the greatness of our office or reconciliation and compassion with sinners. Our lack of courage? Our yes turns it into a weakness which is simply the hiddenness of the sole victory of God. The inescapable darkness of the future? Our yes turns its burden into a proof of faith, for faith is truest when we believe in the love of the Father even in correction (cf. Heb 12:7-13). The particular duty within the sacerdotal sphere which is not 'in our line'? Our yes to this duty bursts wide open that 'diabolical circle' (as a modern psychologist has called it) in which we keep circling around ourselves in a self-seeking way, and renders us truly free for the first time. We can daily repeat with the Apostle (2 Co 3:4 sqq.):

> Such is the assurance we have through Christ towards God. Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything, as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God. He also it is who has made us fit ministers of the new covenant . . . Having therefore such hope, we show great boldness . . . Discharging therefore this ministry in accordance with the mercy shown us, we do not lose heart. On the contrary, we renounce those practices which shame conceals, we avoid unscrupulous conduct, we do not corrupt the word of God; but making known the truth, we commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. And if our gospel also is veiled, it is veiled only to those who are perishing . . . we preach not ourselves, but Jesus Christ as Lord, and ourselves merely as your servants in Jesus . . . but we carry this treasure in vessels of clay, to show that the abundance of the power is God's and not ours. In all things we suffer tribulation, but we are not distressed; we are sore pressed, but we do not despair; we endure persecution, but we are not forsaken; we are cast down, but we do not perish; always exposed to death in the midst of life for Jesus' sake, so that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our mortal flesh.

Our ordination to the priesthood has established one final fact in our life. Whatever we do, we never escape this law of our life. Everything we do is unavoidably and inexorably either a yes or a no to this action of God in our life. Today, let us with all the power of the heart at our disposal give a pure, believing, loving, unconditional yes to this priesthood, a yes to everything it entails and imposes on us. This yes – even one already caused by God – is the condition and sign that God accomplishes his work in us, that he makes us anew today what we already are: priests of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[177]

13

THE MEANING OF FREQUENT CONFESSION OF DEVOTION

How is it possible to give intrinsic reasons for making frequent 'confessions of devotion'? This is the question with which this essay will be concerned.

There is no question here, therefore, of proving that it is possible to have venial sins forgiven by sacramental absolution, and this even on their own and independently of the sacramental forgiving of mortal sins. This possibility can be presupposed here. On the other hand, the mere possibility of confessing merely venial sins does not yet explain why more frequent, e.g. weekly, confession of devotion fits, in an internally meaningful and harmonious manner, into the total organic structure of the spiritual life. For every vital function, besides its mere possibility, has also to be incorporated into and subordinated to the meaning of life as a whole. Thus it cannot be determined from the mere possibility of confession of merely venial sins alone whether frequent sacramental confession of venial sins can be harmoniously fitted into the correctly balanced construction of the practices of the spiritual life. The history of the confession of devotion shows that a truly spiritual life does not always and in all circumstances necessarily demand such a habit of confession, for the confession of devotion was unknown for several centuries. It will become even clearer that this question cannot simply be answered by the affirmation of the possibility of confession of devotion, when we come to discuss some of the actual attempts which have been made to prove it in this way.

One thing should be noted from the very outset: no eventual difficulty about the justification of frequent confession of devotion can arise from the assumption that the spiritual life – at least at a certain stage of its development – excludes frequent concern with one's own sinfulness. On [178] the contrary, the more genuine and the deeper one's spiritual life is, the more (and the more directly) it will grow out of the ultimate, basic fact of our being, and the more exclusively the religious activity of the person will centre round the truly decisive conditions of our life. But these conditions undoubtedly include the fact that we are sinners and that, precisely as a sinner, man is called by Christian redemption before the countenance of the triune God. If our life is adoration of the triune God, then surely it is always adoration of the God who has been revealed in the countenance of Christ, who was crucified for our sins. Christianity knows of no other God besides the God of the one who died for our sins. If our spiritual life is the working-out of our salvation in fear and trembling, then we can never forget that we are only saved in hope and that we still have to fight against the devil, the world and the flesh. If our spiritual life is God's grace and his works in us, then it is always a grace which was granted to the children of wrath without any merit on their part. If the life of a Christian is joy in the Holy Spirit, it is the joy of the redeemed who knows how to praise the mercy of the Lord all the better the more keenly he realizes his own unworthiness which has been visited by God's mercy. Hence the spiritual life does not merely pass through one particular period when man is filled with a sense of the seriousness of God's judgements on sin, but over and over again this life rises out of the dark depths of one's own powerlessness into the eternal light of merciful grace and we still pray before the Consecration and before Communion: 'ab aeterna damnatione nos eripi . . . jubeas', 'et a te numquam separari permittas'. Thus it is not the frequent concern with one's sinfulness which puts frequent confession of devotion into question. Yet this alone does not yet answer our question. The recognition that one is a sinner is not, after all, dependent on sacramental confession. A St Augustine was able to pray his Miserere on his death-bed without going to confession.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point, one might ask oneself in general whether the attempt to discover the inner meaning of frequent confessions of devotion can have any success at all or whether the frequent confession should not rather be rejected as a false development of the spiritual life. Here and there, such a view has in fact been expressed during the last few centuries. Yet we must hold on to the possibility of justifying frequent confession of devotion, and this for reasons which are quite independent of whether a particular attempt at such an explanation of its meaning can be seen to be successful or not. These reasons lie in the approval and encouragement [179] given to confessions of devotion by the Church. This encouragement given to it by the Church carries theologically speaking such great weight, however, that confession of devotion cannot possibly be a false development in the history of the spiritual life. It will be sufficient here to refer the reader to the practice of the religious Orders and communities based on rules approved by the Church and to the prescriptions of Canon Law.[1] In addition, there is the explicit rejection of the 39th proposition of the Synod of Pistoia by Pius V: he rejected the disapproval of frequent confession of devotion expressed by this Synod, as presumptuous, pernicious and contrary to the practice of pious and holy people approved by the Council of Trent. Such a general, long-standing, obligatory exercise of positive actions in the whole Church cannot possibly be regarded as a false ascetic development. Such good and useful developments of the spiritual life in the Church are not refuted by proving what no one denies, viz. that for a long time they did not exist in the Church. The Body of Christ has to grow. The Spirit of God is always with the Church and the development of her spirituality; he was also – just as much or as little – with the spirituality usually referred to as ascetical, post-Tridentine or some other name, and which one is so fond of 'improving' by appealing to the good old days of the Church's piety. The individual believer always finds the Spirit of God most surely in the Church of his own day. Thus it cannot be a malformation of the spiritual life if the Christian, docile to the spirit of his Church, sees in frequent confessions of devotion a practice which fits harmoniously into the spiritual life in its ideal overall structure.

But which among the ultimate structural laws of the spiritual life can allow us to trace frequent confession back till it is seen as a normal manifestation of that life? This is the question which is not yet solved by what we have said. It naturally cannot be a question of something which would make this frequent confession absolutely necessary. For confession of devotion cannot be proved to be absolutely necessary for the maintenance or development of the spiritual life.[2] All that is required is a reason which [180] would make meaningful as a particular and special practice of the spiritual life.

The defence of frequent confessions of devotion has always drawn attention to particular characteristics of this kind of confession which might well lead one to suspect them to be suitable for that explanation of its meaning which we are looking for. These characteristics are above all spiritual direction, remission of sins and the increase of grace. These factors are certainly connected with confession of devotion. Yet it may be doubted whether they alone sufficiently explain confession of devotion as an independent function of the spiritual life.

To take spiritual direction first; it cannot be denied that a good deal of thorough spiritual direction adapted to the individual personality may be connected with a good confession of devotion, and this especially if one observes the special indications given by ascetic theology for the furtherance of spiritual direction (as, e.g., the declaration of the basic fault, of a

[1] CIC c. 595 § 1, n. 3: weekly confession for Religious, c. 1367, n. 2: the same rule for seminarians in episcopal seminaries; c. 125, n. 1: frequent confession demanded of all clerics; c. 931 regards confession twice a month as nothing extraordinary even for the ordinary faithful. In addition, cf. Pius XII's Encyclicals Mystici Corporis and Mediator Dei.

[2] Not even in the sense in which one tries to prove Holy Communion to be 'necessary in itself' for the preservation of the supernatural life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

particular resolution and its carrying out). Some people may perhaps prefer such a form of spiritual direction arising quite naturally from the secret nature of this sacrament and the objectivity associated with it. Thus, under this aspect, one certainly need not regret the fact that the sacrament of Penance and spiritual direction have never been separated from one another in Western spirituality[3] in the way in which this was to some extent the case in the ascetic practice of the ancient Greek monks where the pneumatic, spiritual direction and the sacramental institution of confession had little to do with each other. By combining the two, spiritual direction will always preserve a certain sacramental consecration while the sacramental remission of sins will be preserved from becoming externalized. Indeed, once the inner meaningfulness of frequent confession of devotion is presupposed, there is nothing to stop the further supposition that the prescription of confession of devotion is one way among others in which the Church tries to accomplish the direction of consciences and of souls which seems necessary to her for certain categories of her children. In this sense, the advantages for spiritual direction may well be the extrinsic reason for the demand of frequent confession of devotion, but they are not by this fact alone the intrinsic reason for this demand. For one thing, a sufficient direction of consciences given exclusively in confession [181] will be rather difficult to achieve in many cases; in other words, some form of spiritual direction and advising will be necessary or, at least useful, outside the sacrament. But then it is difficult to see why it does not take place altogether outside confession. If confession of devotion is regarded too much from the side of spiritual direction alone, there will always be the danger of misunderstanding Penance in its sacramental character; there will always be a danger then of overrating its medicinal, psychological usefulness for the spiritual life, the danger that the priestly minister of a sacrament will be turned too much into a highly sensitive psychologist. Finally, and this is decisive, the usefulness or necessity for the spiritual life of advising consciences simply gives rise to spiritual direction as a useful or necessary function of the spiritual life but not to a sacramental happening.

With regard to the remission of sins as such,[4] the following reason makes it unfeasible to regard the remission of sins as the real reason which gives frequent confession of devotion its meaning: the venial sins of someone living in the state of grace are already remitted by imperfect contrition. Thus confession of devotion is always and in every case the sacramental remission of the guilt of venial sin already forgiven before by contrition; for without any contrition at all, forgiveness is impossible in the sacrament. Since, moreover, there is no duty to make such a confession, it is difficult to see how it can be based solely on an effect which is always and in every case already present even without it. Even if, following some theologians, one wanted to suppose without any very clear reason[5] that only imperfect contrition with a certain degree of intensity or arising from higher motives remits venial sins by itself and without the sacrament, this does not help us very much in our question. after all presupposes an earnest striving [182] for growth in the spiritual life and a certain degree of love of God, so that it will not be difficult in this case to awaken this higher imperfect contrition, provided there is some honest turning away from the venially sinful inclination.

[3] The efforts made by the new Canon Law to leave the job of spiritual direction as far as possible in the hands of the confessor in non-priestly religious communities also point in the same direction. Cf. CIC c. 530, § 1/2.

[4] I.e., if one prescinds from the fact that the remission of sins takes place precisely in a sacramental manner, and this by a sacrament which as such is directed in the primary and most characteristic intention of its meaning to the remission of sins. If, however, one includes these factors and asks oneself about the exact properties of a remission of sin precisely by a sacrament which has the direct purpose of doing this, then this investigation will lead one in the direction in which we are here looking for the solution to our question.

[5] Plus minus non mutat speciem is valid even in this case. Every truly perfect contrition effects a loosening of man from that sinful attachment which finds its expression in the particular venial sin repented of every such contrition is informed by the habitual love which lives as a presupposition in such a person. It is difficult to see why such a contrition should not remit venial sins.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus, even presupposing this view, it never comes to a first remission of venial sins in practice and so our question remains unsolved. Furthermore, it is not only explicit contrition which remits venial sin but every practical supernatural activity of the justified does so, to the extent in which and in so far as it is of its nature opposed to the venial sin concerned and thus implicitly contains contrition for this sin. Hence, even our 'daily' sins can be remitted by many different means (Council of Trent, 14, 5). Moreover, the Holy Eucharist is 'the antidote which liberates us from our daily faults' (Council of Trent, 13.2). Thus it is the reception of the Holy Eucharist which, according to the teaching of the Church, seems to be the sacramental practice which causes the remission of venial sins in our life of grace.[6] Thus if we regard only the remission of venial sins as such, the overcoming of such merely retarding but not destructive interferences with the supernatural life of love would seem to be the task of the Holy Eucharist – a sacrament of the living, the sacrament of the life of grace which conserves itself and grows – rather than the task of Penance, which first and foremost is a sacrament of the dead, the sacrament of the reawakening of the lost life of grace. Hence the remission of venial sins as such does not suffice by itself to make confession of devotion comprehensible as a special function in the total life of grace.

Something similar is true of the increase of grace.[7] Even this important task of the spiritual life can be achieved in many different ways, and sacramentally especially by the Holy Eucharist; for, strengthening, increase and complete fulfilment of the life of grace, increase of habitual charity and awakening of actual charity are all among the first and most characteristic effects of the Holy Eucharist. It is true, of course, that every sacrament [183] – and therefore also the confession of devotion – increases grace. But since it has this effect in common with other activations of the spiritual life, this is not sufficient to assign confession of devotion its proper place, the place which justifies its position in relation to these other spiritual practices.

If the properties of the confession of devotion we have discussed so far have thus been proved to be insufficient for solving the question we have posed, this is in no way meant to imply that these properties do not in fact exist or that they may not serve as purposes or motivations of the one who confesses. All these effects are given together with confession of devotion; they are all significant and more decisive for our actions than that characteristic which we are now trying to prove to be what is specific to the confession of devotion. For, two different activations of the life of grace can agree in an objectively very significant (generic) effect (thus, e.g., one sick person may be restored to the life of grace by the Anointing of the Sick, while another may be restored by absolution: two sacraments with the same effect which is also objectively the most significant one) and yet must nevertheless be distinguished in the inner structure of their meaning by a specific difference, if we are to make them comprehensible as two different activations. In our question, it is ultimately not a matter of the specific difference of confession as such but of the essential characteristic of frequent confession of devotion as a special function among other activations (not merely of a sacramental kind) of the life of grace. It is quite true that this characteristic will necessarily have to follow from the nature of confession as a sacramental act of forgiving sins, directly ordained to the remission of sins, for this is precisely the characteristic by which the confession of devotion distinguishes itself from those other acts which can be presumed to be [6] This can no doubt be said even if one does not assume that Holy Communion – presupposing the penitential attitude – remits venial sins directly and of itself, and not merely by stimulating personal, sin-remitting acts. For when the Council of Trent mentions the remission of venial sins as an explicit effect of the Holy Eucharist, it surely must be a question of an effect which belongs to it not merely in the way in which ultimately every sacrament forgives venial sins. On the other hand, one will have to keep firmly in mind that the remission of venial sins is not the primary and most characteristic intention of the meaning of the Holy Eucharist.

[7] Both as far as sanctifying grace and the right to helping grace are concerned.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

just as capable of taking over the function of remission of sins in the spiritual life as the confession of devotion. This specific property of confession, as distinct from other sin-remitting acts of the spiritual man, must therefore be the basis of the meaning which justifies the confession of devotion and its frequent use in the spiritual life.

But in what precisely does this special significance of the sacrament and of sacramental penance consist?

All sacraments presuppose in their growth a subjective, personal cooperation with grace. This personal activity of man – since it is supported by grace – already takes man away from himself into divine spheres; it [184] is in itself already divine life or at least has already a positive orientation towards this supernatural life. Already as such a supernatural activity and happening, the life of grace is primarily God's free, creative act, his work the act of his love, more than ours. To this extent, every supernatural work is already unique, independent, 'historical', and not merely an individual case of a clear general rule.[8] But in the sacraments, this historical character becomes still clearer.

The supernatural life of redeemed humanity becomes visible in historical uniqueness, in the here and now of the Church on this earth, just as it also entered historically into humanity by revelation. Thus, the supernatural life – which, at least in itself, seems to lie quite apart from the human, historical reality – appears supported by what is visible and human, brought down into the earthly point of time, dependent on worldly things. And this spiritual life could not come otherwise; or at least only in this manner of appearing is its proper being accentuated.[9] For this the supernatural character of our life from God means that this life is a freely creative, unique act of God, that it cannot be calculated by man and cannot be explained as a fulfilment or even an echo of merely human yearnings. On the contrary, by calling man to such a life, God has asked him to move out of the earthly spheres of his being and directs him beyond the paths prescribed for man by his own being. Such a vocation is therefore never simply given by the fact of man himself taken together with his inherent laws. Hence, such a calling does not come simply by the fact that there is a man; it is not simply the eternal universally binding, universally self-evident law of truth and goodness, but rather is a positive determination, a divine and incomprehensible 'free decision', i.e. the choice of God's freedom. If this is so, however, then such a revelation – if it takes place at all – can come only suddenly, here or there, at this or that point of history, so that there is not the same distance to the free God of supernature from every point of the being and history of man, both of the individual and of humanity as a whole. For He is a God who is merciful where and when He wills. To mention just one example of this [185] 'scandal' that the eternal salvation of man should be dependent on 'accidental truths of history': the cross which stood on the place of execution in Jerusalem in the year 33 according to our Western reckoning of time is the focal point of world history, and the bishop of Rome in Italy is the head of all those who will be saved. The pure 'Spirit', in contrast to history, is universal, is always equally near and equally distant, can be approached by anyone, can be reached equally quickly from every point of man's historical existence, floats as the realm of truth and goodness over history, giving meaning and value to everything historically individual and accidental. In Christian revelation, however, since there is question of what is gratuitous and supernatural, God and his salvation itself enter into history, become themselves historical, seize – not from above but from within – the fortuitousness of the historical here and now, blessing and judging man,

[8] For instance, grace can be 'forfeited' but not a natural 'truth'. A person's supernatural life, with its decisions, is always a dialogue with a free God whose decisions cannot be calculated or directed by man. Thus man's supernatural life does not simply become history by man's answer, but is already history in God's call.

[9] The first Vatican Council too derives the necessity of revelation from the supernatural nature of man's elevation by grace (sess. III, cap. 2). Revelation, however, understood as God's speaking to man, is necessarily a historical happening.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

so that the ultimate decision of man is not concerned with 'truth' or 'goodness' in the realm of the pure Spirit, but with Jesus of Nazareth. In the same way, and for the same reason for which revelation has come historically, redeemed humanity, the kingdom of God, and the Church too are visible and historical. And just as the Church herself is visible, so also are the manifestations of her life, her vital powers, by which she herself – the Body of Christ – lays hold of the individual in the power of Christ and draws him more and more deeply into the circle of her life. And just as in the Church, so the historical and visible nature of the sacramental events in which the stream of supernatural life is carried by the passing uniqueness of words and gestures – is also meant to reveal again and again that the grace of the new life is not owed but rather is unmerited, the free proof of God's goodness, that it proceeds from God and is not effected by man, that it is supernature and grace. This first property of our elevation by grace to the life-circle of God cannot be stressed better than by the fact that God's grace comes in a historically visible manner, that it encounters man in sacraments.[10]

What is true in this sense of the sacraments in general is true also of the sacrament of Penance in particular. God's forgiving grace comes to man by the decision of someone else, viz. the effective juridical verdict of the Church in her priestly representative. It is not the good, contrite man who causes the remission of sins, but God's free mercy. Although this is [186] true of every remission of sin, even of that caused by merely subjective although grace-elevated[11] contrition, this is nevertheless revealed more clearly in Confession since there remission comes visibly and historically, and this in such a way that Confession causes both remission and grace, which are different from and independent of the grace and remission merited by contrition. Furthermore, Confession by its innermost meaning is primarily and directly concerned with this remission of sins and hence the sacramentality of Confession emphasizes above all the gratuitous and supernatural nature of this very remission of sins. To this extent it is also distinguished from those other sacramental actions which are in fact connected with a sin-remitting effect, in particular the Blessed Sacrament. These other sacraments are primarily directed to something else; they are not primarily penance and remission of sins.[12] Hence they do not reveal this character of the supernatural, free act of God as expressed in the remission of sin as such.

Since the recipient of a sacrament should enter into the objective nature and sense of the sacrament, and indeed does so,[13] the 'meaning-content' of such a sacramental and in fact directly intended remission of sins will also make itself felt in the personal experience of the recipient and consequently also in the habitual spiritual outlook of the recipient. Every confession in its turning to the historically visible is a protest against every hidden rationalism of a humanitarian spiritual piety; it is an acknowledgement that ultimately our sins are remitted by God's act alone and that ultimately he, the free God of grace, can be found only in his historical revelation, in his visible Church and his visible sacraments.[14]

---

[10] Not as if every grace – even the non-sacramental grace of the opus operands – were not thus the work of God and the expression of his free goodness. But this is more obvious in the visibleness of a sacrament, which causes grace of itself.

[11] This elevation, to which we cannot of ourselves contribute anything and which nevertheless is decisive, shows that even the 'merit' of contrition which causes forgiveness is itself again a gift from God.

[12] Since even the subjective outlook of the recipient must after all adapt itself more or less to this structure of meaning of the sacrament, what has been said applies also to the reception of a sacrament considered from the point of view of a spiritual experience.

[13] The absolute minimum of this 'entering into' is included in the intention and disposition of the recipient necessary for validity and dignity, without which the sacrament does not come into being even objectively.

[14] Without some sort of affirmation of such an element, there is no possibility of justification. For even when justification takes place without a sacrament, it always presupposes faith. The faith, however, means embracing a proper revelation (and not just a natural knowledge of God), i.e. a word by which God addresses man in a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus, every [187] confession is an open acknowledgement of the fact that only in this way does man ultimately find a merciful, forgiving and justifying God. That such an attitude is of decisive importance for the formation of a Catholic spiritual life requires no further explanation. It follows from this that frequent confession of devotion is most useful for the development of such a spiritual life.

Two further facts are organically associated with this. All contrition which is accompanied by the confidence that it will find forgiveness is also always a radical, humble placing of the sinful man in the hand of the God of inscrutable judgements, before whose staggering holiness and justice man, who is weak and unprepared, is never sure of having found grace (cf. Council of Trent, 4, c. 9; c. 13-14). 'I do not judge myself. I have indeed nothing on my conscience, yet I am not thereby justified. He who judges me is the Lord' (1 Co 3:4 sq.). But even this handing over of himself by man to the judgement of the holy God is expressed and reveals itself most clearly when even God's forgiveness – since it is different from man's contrition – becomes audible: and in this way it is revealed that more is necessary than just contrition. Even then there still remains a basic uncertainty about this earthly judgement of God passed on man, so that the hope of forgiveness still remains associated with that fear which alone renders love and confidence in the Infinite and Incomprehensible reverential and genuine. But the earthly judgement of God shows at any rate that God's answer must be added to man's contrition, so that He may have the last word and man may bow humbly before His judgement.

Furthermore: we have already looked at the sacraments as visible expressions of the life of the visible Church into which, considered as the Mystical Body of Christ, the individual believer is incorporated.[15] Now, even though the merely venial sinner remains in this Body as a living member, yet every venial sin is in a true sense 'a spot and wrinkle' on the Bride of Christ. It is an obstruction to the love of God and as such it is also an obstacle to the free and radiant development in this member of the Church of that love which is poured out by the divine Spirit. 'If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it' (1 Co 12:26). Thus even venial sin is a spiritual injury, an injustice to the whole Body of Christ. This Body, however, is visible; it is a historical magnitude. Hence, if the [188] injustice done to it is to be repaired, then this could not happen more meaningfully and impressively than by acknowledging the sin before the priest, who is the representative of the community of Christ-believers, by having it forgiven by him and atoning for it by the penance imposed, in order to make reparation for the injury done to the Body of Christ. To this extent, confession of devotion is not merely a continued practice of the love of God but also a unique form of sacramental love of neighbour and a visible turning to the visible Body of Christ which is the Church.

Let no one say that this theory is too complicated to be meaningful for the spiritual life. Everyone, even the simplest believer, understands that it is something particularly salutary for him to encounter God's act of reconciliation visibly and audibly, when the visible redemptive act of the Cross reaches visibly and tangibly into the hours of his own life and into his ordinary life week by week, and when Christ's word of mercy – 'your sins are forgiven you' – remains eternally present not merely in its transcendent significance but almost in its earthly sound. For, just as this word spoken by Jesus is not simply an instructive statement of an eternally valid state of affairs quite independent of this word, but is the form in which – at the very moment it was spoken – the free act of divine forgiveness of sin took place, so also the words of absolution spoken by the priest do not simply 'declare' a philosophical truth about an always indulgent God, but they actually effect this not at all self-evident forgiveness historical manner. Furthermore, even grace has also an inner orientation to the visible Church.

---

[15] Cf. for the following: K. Rahner, 'Forgotten Truths concerning the Sacrament of Penance': Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 135-174.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in the here and now in which they are spoken, so that this forgiveness remains eternally dependent on whether it really took place here and now in the words of the priest. The ordinary believer will not only understand this on account of the peculiarly tranquillizing and comforting nature of a grace which comes in this sacramental way, but also (the former is simply a consequence of this) because in this he always activates a basic characteristic of the Christian life, viz. the historical nature of God's desire to meet man. If the simple Christian seems to be less conscious of this, this is merely due to the fact that he almost automatically lives by the basic laws of the Christian faith and it is no 'scandal' to him that God's Son should have died for the salvation of the world two thousand years ago in Jerusalem and not at some other time or in some other place, or that God is closest to him when some priest – who, alas, has perhaps even the moment before shown little knowledge of psychology and little understanding for complicated souls – pronounces his Ego te absolvo.

[189] Though it may thus become clear that frequent sacramental confession, besides its objective and other effects, is also a training in a most basic Christian attitude towards God (and this towards the forgiving God), this does not of course make it possible to deduce a priori from its nature a mathematical rule as to its frequency. Any more exact determination of frequency is a matter for experience and positive law. There is no reason for doubting that the actual practice of the Church does as a general rule in fact hit the right measure. In individual cases it is recommendable to exercise a certain broadmindedness and latitude in applying such general rules regarding the frequency of confession to the individual circumstances and special needs of the penitent. For it must never be forgotten that there is no obligation of divine law to make a confession of devotion. No doubt there is also a frequency of confession which can no longer be justified for intrinsic reasons. In this matter, the principle 'the more the better' no longer holds. A sacramental judgement by God on the sinner of its very nature cannot be as frequent as, for example, the daily nourishment of the soul.

This clarification of frequent confessions of devotion does not of course say anything against the differences in attitude which this practice can have in different ways in the spiritual life of the individual, nor is it meant to deny that confession may be conducted and conceived in different ways according as to how the one Spirit of God may teach the different schools regarding the spiritual life.

That we might meet the reconciling God as often as possible in the way in which the God of 'un-owed' grace reveals himself most clearly: this is the meaning of frequent confession of devotion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[190]

14

PROBLEMS CONCERNING CONFESSION [1]

If people want to hear something about 'problems concerning confession', it is obviously presupposed that there are such problems. I take this presupposition of the organizers of this Congress seriously. A problem is not a didactic question whose answer one knows already from Denzinger and any textbook of moral theology. A problem is . . . a problem, i.e. a question for which one has no clear solution, no liberating and exhaustive answer. It is a question which even annoys certain listeners when merely put and expressed honestly, because they tacitly presuppose that basically everything is quite clear already and that anyone who has a Denzinger no longer walks in umbris et imaginibus, or that at least the theory is always perfectly clear even though the practical carrying out of clear principles sometimes comes up against the malice and stupidity of men. We certainly do not mean to align ourselves with those who prefer to fish around in the murky waters of questions and problems rather than in the clarity of answers, to those who are too lazy to listen to a clear answer and make it their own, or who think a priori that a hard answer is no answer at all. Yet it must not be maintained that one should pose a question only if the answers can be given immediately afterwards. For even a question not answered, if it is a genuine and honest question, is better than the dull stupidity of someone for whom everything is always quite clear.

So, we want to concern ourselves with problems. We presuppose in this that the clear answers of dogmatic, moral and pastoral theology – which exist and are more important than all our problems – are known and applied, including even those moral principles whose permanent [191] existence and validity must be defended especially today in the confessional. Anyone who wants to find out about these, should open any textbook or any of the many writings which rightly state, defend and give the pastoral applications of the traditional confessional moral theology, especially on sexual questions.[2]

I. CHANGES IN THE INSTITUTION OF CONFESSION

Presupposing, affirming and naturally accepting all this, we now want to turn to a series of problems. The best way to do this is to start from the fact that the institution of Confession, with all its substantial stability, has undergone many changes which have been so far-reaching that, if it were not a fact, most dogmatic theologians would a priori declare these changes to be impossible because they seem to go counter to the substance of the sacrament. But St Joseph did not build the first confessional. There were many centuries when there was no confession of devotion. A St Augustine never went to confession. There were centuries when the saintly bishops of Gaul preached that one should do penance but go to confession only on one's death-bed. There were Councils which warned against administering this sacrament to a young person in danger of death, since he might recover and might then find the life-long penitential obligations far too difficult. There were centuries during which

[1] The following essay was a lecture given at a small congress of pastoral theology. It has no ambitions to give the reader anything new on the scientific level. It intends to say things, however, which should be talked about repeatedly if they are to be taken notice of in everyday practice.

[2] Cf. among about the most recent work, Joseph Miller, S. J., De usu et abusu matrimonii, published in manuscript form by the Austrian Episcopal Conference (Innsbruck, Rauch).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesiastical reconciliation could be received only once. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and right into the thirteenth century, all theologians taught that this sacrament does not remit guilt before God but has other more secondary effects. Even St Thomas still took it for granted and even regarded it as a duty of the penitent that he should come to this sacrament already justified by contrition, just as St Albert the Great and St Bonaventure thought it to be imperfect if someone tried to gain indulgences instead of doing penance. It was not until the thirteenth century that there appeared the indicative formula of absolution and that a beautiful penitential liturgy was permitted to shrink to bare absolution. The existential religious accent of the whole of penance shifted in century-long stages from the practice of doing hard penances to interior contrition, to the ashamed confession, to the priestly absolution. During twelve or rather thirteen centuries the Church managed [192] without the explicit distinction (which seems of such capital importance to us) between perfect and imperfect contrition. Before the time of St Thomas, theologians declared the duty of annual confession (laid down by the 4th Lateran Council) to be obligatory even for someone who has no mortal sins to confess. St Thomas and later theologians, looking more deeply into the theology of all this, maintained the opposite; the normal practice keeps quiet about this declaration, so that even those of the faithful who are in the state of grace go to confession during the Easter period, often not so much out of insight into the inner meaningfulness of their action but more out of habit, compulsion and fear.[3] Whereas during the Patristic period, the sacrament of Penance could be received only once during the whole of one's life (and even then only in case of necessity), there were yet Provincial Synods during the Carolingian period which obliged everyone to go to confession three times a year. For St Bonaventure, the Misereatur was still the real formula of the absolution from guilt, and the Ego te absolvo referred simply to the remission of the punishment due to sin; with St Thomas, the Ego te absolvo is the sole, decisive formula for the remission of guilt. Right up to the high Middle Ages it was the predominant view that in case of necessity one must confess even to a layman (St Ignatius of Loyola still held this view).

All these facts are simply meant to prove one thing: this sacrament is alive. What is alive undergoes its changes even though its innermost essential form remains the same. It would be silly to try to conclude eo ipso from these changes that we might or should bring back an earlier outward form and arrangement in theory and in practice. The historically-minded person more and not less than anyone else knows the falsehood of the statement that just because something existed at one time, it can also exist again. But if the Church's institution of Penance is alive, it will also change again in the future, without losing its proper nature. These futures changes may take place more silently and be less noticeable in the external, institutional aspect of Penance than previous changes. But if they did not happen, then Christ's institution would have become fossilized and dead.

[193] Is it possible to guess in what direction such a development will take place? Are there reasons for such a prognosis, reasons arising both from what should be and from the observable tendencies of the past? Such questions are not merely a matter of idle curiosity, which fancies it can see through a brick wall. We certainly have neither the power nor the right to change any existing thing, either in theory or in practice, regarding the institution of Confession. For this we lack de iure the authorization and de facto we are too few for consciously, as it were via facti, advancing any development. But, on the other hand, there is

[3] This is not meant to dispute the fact (quite the contrary) that this custom is a good one in the pastoral sense, and it is to be hoped that it will always be kept. One needs only to imagine what would happen if it no longer existed: we would in practice return to the conditions of public ecclesiastical penance as practised in Christian antiquity and this would bring with it all the pastoral disadvantages which were tied up with this form of the sacrament of Penance. Cf. K. Rahner, 'Die Busslehre des hl. Cyprian von Karthago', ZKT LXXIV (1952), pp. 425 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

still a relatively great deal of scope for a very different way of handling this sacrament within the framework of the present-day teaching and practice regarding the sacrament of Penance and, on the other hand, it can be a good thing in the pastoral sense to make use of the thus offered possibilities within this framework in that direction in which the development is tending. For the history of this sacrament shows precisely that one can retard a necessary development to the detriment of souls, by traditionalistic slowness, by following in the mere routine of what has always been, as happened in the fifth and sixth centuries until at last the Irish-Anglo-Saxon simplicity in the new handling of repeatable private confession forced a change whose blessing we still feel today. At the present time, too, there seem to be such developmental tendencies, tendencies which are not quite conscious of themselves as yet or which, in some cases, threaten to go beyond the right mark. Where these tendencies are not clarified, they become dangerous. Where they remain unnoticed or are even denied or suppressed, they may paralyse or poison the desire for this sacrament. The question about the direction in which one may possibly conceive of a future development of this sacrament and suppose it to happen, provides us with the opportunity of describing the present-day problems of confession and, even if not to give an answer to them, at least to indicate the direction in which a solution maybe found. These problems of confession, it must be explicitly emphasized, are always simultaneously also problems of the right education for the proper reception of this sacrament, as well as problems about its administration and reception itself.

We would like to state the following thesis: the theory and practice of this sacrament will in future tend towards a theologically fuller and also more personal accomplishment of this sacrament. What this means and what consequences may be surmised from it, is what we must now show.

[194]

II. LEGALISTIC AND MAGICAL TENDENCIES IN THE PRACTICE OF CONFESSION

The ordinary man and hence the piety of the people (which can have good or bad effects even on the highest levels of theology) think and act (to a greater or lesser extent) legalistically, magically and according to taboos. These things are interrelated: they are all based on the fact that simple and childlike thinking does not make a clear enough distinction between the basic personal, moral exercise and its external objectification, while at the same time it regards God as one particular being among others, from whom one can save and shelter oneself. We do not mean to make an exact analysis here of the nature of such attitudes. Simply to give some practical idea or approximation of what is meant, we will mention a few examples at random, examples which are related sometimes more to the one, sometimes more to the other of the attitudes mentioned. We give these examples without comment.

According to a well-known moral theology textbook, it is necessary, with regard to the commandment of keeping the Sabbath Day holy, to distinguish as to whether one is writing notes or simply drawing lines for notes. According to this same textbook, one derives more benefit from three Masses attended simultaneously than from one Mass. There have been Saints who filled the chalice they were going to consecrate as full as possible, since they thought this would give more grace. The fear about interrupting the unbroken series of Gregorian Masses is not to be viewed very much differently from the fear of breaking the chain of chain-letters. Even today, casuistry gets so easily tied up in knots with regard to the Eucharistic fast (e.g. about when food is still a liquid), so that it becomes rather difficult to see the wood for the trees. For hundreds of years, nocturnal pollution was regarded eo ipso as an ‘impure action’. Everyone is familiar with the kind of casuistry connected with this in itself purely physiological process, beginning with the Fathers and right up to the Missale Romanum of today. How many taboo-like undercurrents are not present in the medieval

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

casuistry regarding the lawfulness or unlawfulness (even to the point of mortal sin) of receiving the sacraments after having had marital intercourse the night before. In 1277, Bishop Stephen of Paris condemned the proposition: Quod delectatio in actibus venereis non impediat actum seu usum intellectus. St Bernardine of Siena (1443) says in one of his sermons that it is a piggish irreverence and a mortal sin if husband [195] and wife do not abstain from marital intercourse for several days before receiving Holy Communion. Even the Catechismus Romanus still properly prescribes a three-day abstention. During the Middle Ages, a woman who had died in childbirth was often buried in a special corner of the cemetery and without the usual honours. John Beleth permitted such a woman's burial in consecrated ground only if the child had first been cut out of the womb.

Even today there are still legalistic and magical attitudes and taboos which have arisen from such views and precepts, but they are getting fewer. Man has become more rationalistic even towards himself he is becoming more technological and profane; he is learning to differentiate more sharply between personal freedom and psycho-physiological mechanisms, between the genuine thing and what is simply 'put on' by training. Whenever such a person meets one of these attitudes we have spoken of, he protests; they appear laughable to him and as something unbecoming when it is a question of the real dignity of religious matters, or – even worse – he confuses the religious with such things and then rejects both.

Now, there is no doubt about the fact that even today such things still play a part in the popular practice of Confession. They still continue to have an effect; they are inculcated during youth and later on meet with protests and refusals, and so endanger the institution of confession in general. Who has not innumerable times experienced confessions which are simply rattled off which go simply through the catalogue of sins mechanically? Every priest has experienced confessions where underneath a personally perhaps quite innocent but terribly legalistic and magical attitude, the only thing that seems to matter is the sacramental event as such; confessions in which, if necessary, sins are invented so that there may be something to confess; confessions in which objective sins are treated in exactly the same way as subjective sins; confessions where the person believes that one should confess, for instance, having missed Mass even though one had been ill in bed and could not go to Mass; confessions where the person believes he is making a good confession, even though he is out to pull the wool over the confessor's eyes or to confess when there is as much noise in the church as possible. Everyone has experienced children's confessions and confessions during Missions which go with such speed that one really has to speak of a confession-factory and where – in the words of a Protestant, very well disposed towards the Catholic practice of confession – it really looks like a nail-punching machine with [196] nails flying out of it left and right at regular intervals. Have we confessors not often had the feeling already that one should, if possible, reduce the liturgy of confession even further to the absolutely necessary minimum, so that it might go even faster? Have we ourselves not too often confessed sins for which one can only manage to say one is sorry by some formalistic pettifoggery, 'sins' for which one cannot possibly be sorry because they are not sins, since in their case there cannot seriously be any question of a personal, free decision? Who has not at some time instructed penitents about the fact that something is not a sin at all, and then has nevertheless been given the impression that this does not make the penitent feel relieved but that he would rather confess the same thing again? How often do not people confess something 'just in case', so that God will not have anything 'on us', and as if one had to or could insure oneself against him, as though God could debit one with something when we ourselves did not recognize any clear duty?

If one analyses these and similar cases of legalistic, magical instincts in confession, one will find the following:

1. Confession is reduced to the absolution from sins given by the priest, together with the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

necessary presuppositions to the extent in which these are an absolute conditio sine qua non for the happening of the sought-after effect.

2. Confession is treated far too much as an objectively mechanical process (often by appealing to the fact that it is an opus operatum), the main thing in it being that there is the actual absolution.

The basic legalistic, magical instincts of man take effect in both these factors.

III. NEW TENDENCIES IN THE CURRENT PRACTICE OF CONFESSION

If our pastoral care is not to bring the institution of confession gradually into disrepute with the man of tomorrow – as being a legalistic, magical tool – then we must, as far as lies in our power, counteract these not infrequent misunderstandings, and take up the right attitude in our practice. We must see to it that this sacrament will be affirmed and accomplished in a theologically fuller and more personal way.[4]

[197] In practice, such a theologically fuller and more personal understanding of confession means the following:

1. The sacrament is an opus operatum. This precisely does not mean, however, that it achieves its effect by magic or automatically. The efficacy (‘in actu secundo’) of the sacrament is measured and limited by the dispositions of the penitent. This, however, includes also the fact that – where this disposition for the sacrament and through the sacrament, regarded quite soberly and honestly, does not grow – a more frequent reception of the sacrament has, practically speaking, only an insignificant effect, even when (from the point of view of a moral minimalism) the sacrament is not received sacrilegiously. Obviously, no useful purpose is served by, nor is there any sense in, reducing the frequency of confession. If we did nothing more than reduce this frequency, we would not gain anything by it and would simply be causing harm. We do not want to sanction spiritual sloth. For in reality, we do not take our daily examination of conscience nearly serious enough and do not try hard enough to overcome our weaknesses and sinful inclinations. But conversely it is also true that a mechanical (even though not sacrilegious) frequency, which is not combined with a personal growth of the inner man, is of no use either. The recommended frequency of the reception of the sacrament, must, therefore, be determined by the concrete possibilities at the disposal of the person who is seriously trying to achieve the sacrament in a really genuine personal manner. It is no attack on the opus operatum to say: even from the sacramental point of view, one good confession is better than three routine confessions. For the opus operatum is no patent, easy way of getting grace. It may quite well happen that a person requires a certain, even though relatively little bit of new life, new practical knowledge and experience to provide his personal efforts with material for existential realization. Let us not forget that, especially in the case of confessions of devotion, no sin is forgiven in the concrete by such a confession unless it is already blotted out ex opere operantis. Sins for which we are not really sorry are not remitted by the sacrament. This is a platitude which we priests and penitents forget only too easily in practice.

[198] We should rid ourselves of the tacit prejudice that the sacraments have been instituted by God so that we might make it easier for ourselves personally and subjectively and have less to pay. This is a prejudice which arises from the fact that modern theology (in [4] Since we cannot here enter further and more deeply into the theological foundations of what is meant by this, we may be permitted to refer the reader to three of my own works: ‘Sackramentale und personale Frömmigkeit’, GuL XXV (1952), pp. 412-429; ‘Vergessene Wahrheiten über das Buszsakrament’, GuL XXVI (1953), pp. 339-364; Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951). The first two essays appear also in: Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 109-174.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

contrast to the great theology of the Middle Ages) has onesidedly emphasized the doctrine that attrition, i.e. imperfect contrition, is sufficient for justification in confession but not outside of it. We do not dispute this thesis. Yet it is no justification for the above prejudice. Anyone who manages to have attritio will have no difficulty about having contritio (that is perfect contrition); the only difficulty about contritio is attritio, i.e. the real turning away from sin. In other words, the fact of receiving the sacrament in no way dispenses us from true repentance, especially since it does not dispense us from love – i.e. from the ultimate form which converts attritio into contritio. The sacrament has, of course, its own power. But, either we bring to it that contrition necessary for the remission of sins, or the sacrament can prove its power of remitting sins only by the fact that it offers us ourselves the capacity (freely to be accepted or rejected) of truly turning to God by repentance.

It would perhaps be a good thing if the word 'repentance' were to be avoided for the next fifty years; for today, repentance has come to be understood only too easily as a regret, a cheap desire that it might have been otherwise, just as one regretfully wishes things to be different which one cannot change in any way. If only, instead of saying: you must repent, one were to say: you must change your life, you must work hard and honestly on yourself and deny yourself so as to change your outlook, your attitudes and impulses; do not regret your actions but strongly and actively – if you honestly have the courage for this – disavow that outlook and those attitudes of yours which give rise to these actions of which you ostensibly repent; let us see actions which show that the hidden root-reason of your actions has changed. How can you actually deceive yourself into thinking that you have repented of that unkindness, if you simply . . . 'repent', say a Hail Mary as a penance and otherwise leave everything as it was, instead of doing something really good to the one you have offended? Do you really distinguish annoyance about the formal discrepancy between your actions and your official maxims (which is simply hurt pride), and the loving turning-towards genuine, understanding preference of what is better even though it hurts your egoism? Or why do you act as if you repented, when you do not really want to change [199] yourself and perhaps cannot even do so, at least not now and not in that point for which you supposedly are sorry?

Thus, we again and again investigate in our practice, from the point of view of the inner unity of our sacramental and personal action, as to what is the really appropriate frequency of receiving the sacrament. If young people are simply trained mechanically to make as frequent confessions as possible, and if they then make their confession in the manner normally or at least very often done, then they will stop going to confession when they grow up. And really they are quite right: done in this way, such confessions are basically simply pious legalism or magic. One might go on from there to ask what improvements could be made even technically with regard to school and similar mass confessions by having more confessors, possibly by having such confessions less frequently, spread over several days, etc. One might ask whether a communal preparation for confession or something similar might not help the genuine, personal accomplishment of this sacrament. As long as many of our young people go to confession under arrangements where it takes the least amount of time, this is a sign that there is still too much legalism and sacramental magic even today.

2. The sacrament should be experienced in a theologically fuller fashion. It is not just absolution in God's name. It is one of Christ's mysteries; in it takes place the judgement on us which on the Cross was passed on the sins of the world; in it takes place by anticipation the judgement of the future; it is a dialogue between God and man; it is liturgy; it is a profession of guilt committed against the holy community of the redeemed; the Church too, therefore, gives her freedom and reconciliation; she prays for me and solemnly gives me by this sacrament that renewed right to her grace and her intercession which she – the Church of sinners who are sanctified – offers daily to God in the sacrifice and in the prayers of all her saints. There ought to be in the healthy Christian a feeling for the fact that he is excluded from the sacred mysteries of the Body and Blood of Christ and that he is admitted again, by the Church's lifting of the ban, into this her inner circle of salvation, that he is reconciled again with the altar, as one used to say. The sinner ought to sense that he professes to the holy Church, the Prow-sacrament of Christ – and not to a psychiatrist or an examining magistrate, an ecclesiastical police magistrate – because by this one orders one's relationship to the original source of grace; he ought to have a sense of responsibility towards this Church, of which [200] he is a representative: compromisingly by sinning, celebrating her liturgy himself as the liturgy of the Church of sinners, by confessing; one ought to feel something of the fact that only a baptized person can celebrate this sacrament. The sinner ought to have a feeling for the fact that he, as a baptized person whose sins have been forgiven after baptism, lives by this forgiveness off the whole Body of Christ, and by the prayers and penance of all the saints, and that our prayer after absolution, Passio Domini nostri Jesu Christi, merita beatae Mariae Virginis et omnium Sanctorum,[5] simply expresses what has happened in the absolution, viz. that our repentance lives by the love of the whole Church.[6]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If repentance, as a part of the 'matter' of the sacrament of Penance, bears an inner orientation towards the absolution seen as an act of the Church done in the name of Christ, then we must not recommend and encourage prayers of repentance which even a Deist could say. Repentance must address itself to Christ, it must be the prayer of the baptized, of a member of the Church, of someone who experiences in himself the saving judgement of the Cross and who knows that salvation can only come from there. The content of the prayer of repentance ought to make it clear to the one who prays that his sins are remitted, not by his repentance as such but by God's grace, that the repentant sinner does not have to be forgiven (just because he has become better) but that God changes the heart and fills it with his Spirit. If this consciousness were absolutely alive, then it would also be much more obvious to the sinner that he, as a baptized person, must accept this deed, which God does in him, by the word of the Church. It is a great pity that, from an external point of view, the whole liturgy of the sacrament of Penance has shrunk to a few hastily whispered words. One need not be a liturgical romantic to regret this. For it is extremely important that man should personally accomplish out of the depth of his being what takes place sacramentally. For this, however, a genuine exercise of the liturgical elements of this sacrament is most helpful. Let us at least do the little which remains of this liturgy genuinely. Let us teach people that the sacrament is more than the juridical act of absolution. Where modern man does not see the specifically Christian and ecclesiological [201] nature of this sacrament, he will sooner or later get the idea that he can settle the question of his sins with God alone, if this is the sole meaning of the sacrament.

3. The confession of sin,[7] as a part of the sacramental sign, is orientated towards the words of absolution pronounced by the priest. It is necessary and essential, because in the really normal human case, the words of absolution must not fall into emptiness and into the indetermined, but ought to be knowing words, words in which the priest as a freely acting human person (which he is even when he acts at the behest of his Master) must know what he is doing, to whom and for what reason he speaks the word of free forgiveness. In this lies the real and decisive meaning and necessity of a confession of sins. It follows from this, however, that the priest is not an examining magistrate who has to discover a guilt of which the penitent is not aware or which he is suspected to be keeping quiet. Furthermore,

[5] 'May the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ, the merits of the blessed Virgin Mary, and of all the Saints, whatever good you have done and whatever evil you have suffered, gain for you a remission of your sins, an increase of grace, and the reward of eternal life.'
[6] Cf. P. Charles, 'Doctrine et pastorale du sacrament de pénitence', NRT LXXV (1953), pp. 449-470; for the above, esp. pp. 455 sqq.
[7] Cf. P. Charles, loc. cit., pp. 460-466. We give here a condensed summary of P. Charles' exposition.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

confession is not in itself, i.e. of its nature, a self-humiliation or an exercise of putting oneself to shame; it is not really a part of the penance. We must, therefore, take careful note of what P. Charles rightly tries to bring home to us: today (with the exception perhaps of school children, boarders and certain 'Easter confession merchants') only those still come to this sacrament who freely decide to do so. The penitent in certain cases may not know exactly how he is to express himself, the authority and greater knowledge of the confessor make him feel tongue-tied. Hence, if the confessor treats him like a suspected criminal, if he asks him questions whose justification the penitent does not understand, if he makes the penitent repeat what he has just said, then the priest does not act like the one he after all is, viz. the judge whose highest duty is to pardon, but instead he acts like a subordinate examining magistrate and thus falsifies the nature of this court of mercy. It may not be said against this that the priest must ask as precise questions as possible in order to be able to evaluate the guilt of the penitent. For it must not be forgotten that the confession of the penitent is not an object for examination. It is the matter and hence an intrinsically constitutive element of the sacramental sign and must be treated as such. We must never forget what Catholic tradition, to the great annoyance of the Jansenists, has always stressed: malitia non apprehensa non contrahitur (a non-apprehended evil is not attributable to us). Personal guilt, to the extent in which it must be confessed because it goes [202] beyond the general (original) sinfulness of every man, can only be committed knowingly. When a penitent has said what he regards as his guilt, he has sufficiently confessed his guilt. Further instruction – if it has hope of success – can be advisable or even obligatory only in the case where the confession reveals a grave error which could endanger the salvation of the penitent. How often (but, thank God, this does not happen too often) have not penitents stayed away from the confessional for a long time or even for a whole life-time, because they have been frightened away at one time by a lack of tact, by curious questioning, by an attitude of suspicious distrust or by a kind of spying attitude. That they should as a result, have stayed away is false; but false, too, was the behaviour of the inquisitorial confessor.

4. There is still one further question which belongs to this theological deepening and to the destruction of the magical outlook of our practice of confession. Seen superficially, this concerns the question of the imposition of a penance.[8] But in reality it goes much deeper than that. We have become accustomed to distinguish between the reatus culpae (the burden of guilt) and the reatus poenae (the burden of punishment). This is a correct but also dangerous distinction. For we then regard the burden of punishment as a purely juridical matter, after the manner of civil jurisprudence; we are then inclined to regard it as a punishment imposed merely externally by God, and one which can be remitted just as externally by absolution, for example. In this conception, the punishment is [203] settled up either now, by absolution, or later on in Purgatory. At any rate, in such a view one has really nothing to do here and now

[8] On this point, we find a not insignificant difference between the view exposed here and the view given by P. Charles in the aforementioned essay (pp. 466-469). Charles pleads for the correctness of the usual practice of the imposition of penance. We gladly admit that the practical conclusion following from his reflections is perfectly justified for the confession of devotion and in general for frequent confessions. The same cannot be said, however, for the imposition of a penance in Confession in itself and in general. His theoretical reflections, moreover, seem to be extremely questionable. It surely cannot be said that, because the imposition of a penance in the sacrament has an inner orientation towards absolution, it is merely an act of docility, subjection and adaptation to the Church and hence can just as well be achieved through a little prayer as through a real doing of penance. If the statement that God forgives us our sins and there is no business transaction with God in the sacrament were to prove anything against imposing heavy penances, then it would also make every imposition of penance, as understood by the Church, seem ridiculous. His appeal to the practice of the Church, finally, proves perhaps the concession we made above, a concession which arises Out of the nature of things. But it by no means proves that such a practice is always and in every respect correct. For in that case, what does the earlier, different practice of the 'Church' prove?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with this burden of punishment. And the burden of guilt is taken away by absolution.

The average Catholic of today does not deny Purgatory; God forbid that he should. But to maintain that the average Catholic of our great cities still believes in it existentially would be just naïve optimism. It would be very interesting to know how many of us have ever honestly feared Purgatory. You will protest vehemently. But I do not believe such protests of most of our younger people today. How would it be, however, if we were to conceive the burden of punishment from a less external, juridical point of view? If we were to say: this reatus poenae is myself in reality, myself with my egoism, with my hardheartedness, my blasé attitude, my pharisaical outlook, my cowardice, with everything which is so very much identical with myself that I do not even notice how little I manage to get away from it and that everyone else but myself notices it. What torment, what unforeseeable spiritual development I will have to pass through before this is, or may be, changed, what deadly pains of spiritual development will have to be undergone before we reach something approximating to that perfection, that total integration of our whole being – with all its dimensions, urges and layers – into the one love of God, and that achievement of possession of the innermost centre of our being through free love of God, just as we conceive all this in the case of a mystic. What experiences would have to be made, what mystical journeys of the soul, compared to which the imagination of a Dante looks like a childish game. These are the facts. We, however, think that if someone lives a decent and Christian life, then he is juridically on the right side. He may indeed still get a few years in Purgatory. But even this is not all that awful in the last analysis, even if absolution does not preserve him immediately from it. At any rate, nothing much can happen. And then I, just as I am, will be in heaven.

The reality is different. This ego, with which I identify myself with such self-satisfaction, will never get to heaven. It is flesh and blood and these do not inherit the kingdom of heaven. Between the two, there is a dying and a transformation which is both God's deed in us and also our own deed for ourselves, the transformation and new creation of a man who is flesh and a sinner but must become pneuma and justice. And this God cannot and will not give us for nothing, this is not given us 'free' by [204] absolution. This also cannot be granted by absolution except in such a way that, through the official intercession of the Church, I am offered the grace by God to achieve this purifying and maturing process of the soul more quickly and in a more beatifying way (for, alas, how much is still left in me even after all the dross has been burnt away). But even then I am not spared the process. It must be achieved, together with its birth pangs and the deadly tormenting pains, either here or on the (so-called) other side which we call Purgatory, although without there being any longer any possible increase in my basic existential, supernatural attitude and depth, so that all there can be then is a maturing of what had already grown here below.

Seen in this light, the reatus culpae and poenae are brought much closer together. The forgiveness of sin is only the beginning (even though the-most decisive one) of this transforming process of man and leads finally to his complete deliverance from sin. And even this beginning takes place in that conversion whose continuation and completion cannot be spared to man – not even by absolution – and which we – from a juridical point of view – call the remission of the temporal punishment due to sin. We calmly put off this conversion, which we must exercise ever anew in God's grace, until the time of Purgatory. We do this as if there will be time enough then for such 'extras'. In reality, however, this conversion is the only thing by whose seriousness and progress we can hope to gauge whether the beginning of this conversion – namely repentance – was even present, while we think all the time that repentance is very easy, presupposing merely that the urge to do the same again has been removed from us by such extrinsic factors as age or other circumstances of life, which suppression of urges or occasions we then call 'good resolutions'.

It is only when we look at things in this way that we can come to see the real meaning of a re-evaluation of the practice of imposing a penance.[9] Where a genuine conversion (a change of outlook or attitude) is needed, it is not merely a question of getting rid of some state of affairs which (in our present-day practice of penances) gives a slightly infantile impression and merely gives rise to the feeling that confession is an institution which lets one off extremely lightly. The reason for this practice is an externalized [205] conception of the burden of punishment. If only one understood what is really objectively involved in it, one would not leave remission to Purgatory or only to absolution; one would have doubts about repentance when the will to do penance is absent. We are all aware, of course, that this cannot be changed quite so easily from one day to the next. Yet one ought at least to recognize this state of affairs and to realize that anyone who sees no problem in all this, has a formalistic juridical conception of sin or thinks of the sacrament as something magical and mechanical. Such ideas, inculcated in the men and especially the youth of today (not by any explicit theory but by the far more dangerous implications of common practice), will later on have a destructive effect on belief in this sacrament.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. If we carry out Confession with all our strength and in a more personal, more serious and more interior fashion, then we need not be afraid of the present-day competition of psychotherapy. If we act merely as machines for giving absolution, if we do not take man seriously and do not allow him to have his say, if we do not force him to take himself and God seriously or help him to find himself and to identify himself in a personal way, then these people will find that they are taken more seriously by the psychotherapist and they will go to him. We do not want to be psychotherapists in the confessional. This is not our job and would merely be silly charlatanism. We must simply be priests, but that wholly. We lend historical tangibility to God's effectively forgiving word in a personal happening; we are not applying magical machinery. We should even know when to regard a penitent as a patient for a psychotherapist and send him to one. But we possess one word which no psychotherapist can say: the word of God, which forgives sin. The psychotherapist says a word which is meant to cure illness; we say a word which forgives sin in God's sight. Even if we cannot remove the illness – heavy burden though it is in many cases – we can, however, take away the death in illness, the despair in it and the guilt. Yet, even though this is a deed of God, it nevertheless passes through the free faith of the patient sinner, through his penance. Only if we do not forget this and do not deny it in practice, does the psychotherapist not become our personal rival; only then does he remain the one who from time to time can give us welcome assistance, but for the rest has his own proper field.

6. The fight to remove the idea from people's minds that confession is the necessary preparation for the Eucharist and that the Eucharist is the reward for confession is not yet finally and everywhere won. The only [206] truth in this association is that the Eucharist is barred to someone who is conscious of a really subjectively grave guilt and who has not yet had it remitted even in the sight of the Church. This coupling, which unfortunately is always created anew by the conditions for indulgences, is serious because it either lessens the frequency of Communion or gives rise to a frequency of confession which can no longer be managed in a personal way and which leads to mechanical confessions. If the word 'rare' is understood correctly, i.e. relatively to the frequency of Communion, then it could be said absolutely that there should be rare but real confession and frequent Communion. In spiritual matters it is absolutely true that the cult of numbers is false and less can be more.

We suspect that many among you have been waiting patiently for us to come to the confessional problem which seems to you to be the real problem today: the treatment of those [9] We are not speaking here of the weekly confession, for in this case the frequency proves in general precisely that the penitent concerned has the desire to work energetically – as far as in him lies – on his progressive sanctification. Hence in these cases one can be satisfied with the usual practice.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sinners who not only are conscious of their guilt in the sphere of sexual morality and in the face of the objective norms of the gospel and of the Church, but who also hold that they themselves are fundamentally incapable of living according to these norms and hence do not think they can work up the necessary purpose of amendment required for absolution. But these questions would require a whole exposition to themselves, which we are unable to offer here. Perhaps it is good to be silent about these things for once. For otherwise the impression will gradually be given that these are the only confessional problems today. This, however, would be a false view.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[207]

PART THREE

The Daily Life of the Christian

[209]

15

THE APOSTOLATE OF PRAYER

Do we Christians really believe in the power of prayer? Believe, that is, in its power on this earth and not merely in some distant heavenly dwelling-place of God? Is our thinking still sufficiently 'anthropomorphic' to make us dare to believe that we can by our bawling and weeping move the heart of God to intervene in this world? Or has our thinking become so abstract, so spiritless, that we will allow to prayer no other value than that of a 'tranquilizer', or recognize it as no more than an affirmation of our hope for a success beyond this life?

Yes, the prayer of petition is quite a problem. Its practice is now almost exclusively confined to ordinary people. It is found only where a 'primitive religiosity' holds sway, which – in the opinion of the more sophisticated – has not quite grasped the fact that we cannot ask anything of God, since he is in the ultimate analysis an inexorable Fate. These others, the clever ones, who do not form part of this folk with rosaries, pilgrimages, processions, and so on, become 'primitive' only when they have their backs to the wall. Then they will pray (species A); or, if they cannot bring themselves to do it even then (species B), they give way (quite rightly and quite logically) to despair. Should they unexpectedly get away with it (their life, their money, their health, and so on), then they will again give up praying (species A), or give themselves over to Existentialistic nihilism (species B). It is therefore from a Christian point of view quite right and just that, in the judgements of history, the 'sophisticated', the 'intellectuals', should have more prospect of making bitter acquaintance with the (allegedly) inexorable march of events than the little people who do not think it entirely superfluous and unintellectual to pray for their daily bread and other such earthly needs.

But seriously: do we or do we not believe in the flesh of the eternal Word of God? If so, then the true God must be capable of very human [210] feelings, and the earth with all that happens on it cannot be quite so unimportant to him. It is true that events here below may not always proceed very smoothly and peaceably (after all, that God did die on the Cross), but what goes on among us cannot be utterly unimportant. And if it is true that God is the Lord of the world, and that he has taught us the 'Our Father' with its petition for our daily bread and deliverance from evil, we must clearly assume that the prayer of petition addressed to this anthropomorphic and mighty God is a real power in this world. And here we can safely leave to one side all that the theologians have elaborated about the compatibility of the prayer of petition with the sovereignty of God, his absolute freedom and his changelessness. Even if one did not think or suspect that the theologians in these speculations were thinking a little too much in terms of the time 'Before Christ' and were not quite aware of the fact – naturally only in this particular speculation – that the Word of God became flesh, and that therefore he through whom everything comes into being has become very approachable and easily moved, this in any case is true and certain: there is a prayer of petition which speaks to God and is not a mere exorcism of one's own heart, but boldly and explicitly ventures to ask him for bread, peace, restraint of his enemies, health, the spread of his Kingdom on earth, and a host of such earthly and highly problematic things. That such prayer combines a great measure of 'self-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

will' (for one presents to Him one's own desires) with a supreme degree of submissiveness (for one prays to Him whom one cannot compel, persuade or charm, but only beg), that here there is a mingling and an incomprehensible fusion of the greatest boldness with the deepest humility, of life with death, this makes the prayer of petition in one respect not the lowest but the highest, the most divinely human form of prayer. Why else is the Lord's Prayer not a hymn but a sevenfold petition? There should be more stubborn and humble, more insistent and urgent supplication among Christians; supplication even for those things which appear to us, shortsighted though we be, of importance, even for that realization of God's Kingdom, such as we are necessarily led to imagine it. For, the prayer of petition, robust and straightforward, is a power in the world and in its history, in heaven and on earth.

Ultimately even the unbeliever would have to concede this, although theoretically he will deny it. For in practice he admits it. Let us imagine, for example, that a tyrant knew that all his subjects without exception intended to fall on their knees and beg God to free them from his tyranny, [211] and that they had solemnly assured the tyrant they would do nothing more to this end than pray. Would he for all that allow them to do it? He would try to prevent it. It is true he does not believe in the power of the Being to whom the prayer is addressed, but he believes in the power of the prayer, although this prayer itself only has power if there is faith in the power of the Being addressed.

On this point one could introduce a kind of transcendental deduction of the truth of prayer. That prayer exists is a fact. It is an unavoidable fact. It is efficacious. It is only efficacious where there is faith in the power of the Being to whom it is addressed and not merely in the power of prayer. Can there be a phenomenon which rests in principle (and not just in individual cases) on an illusion, while at the same time it is real and efficacious? No, for such a proposition negates itself, because (among other reasons) it could also be applied to the affirmation of this proposition itself. For every proposition presupposes that the attainment of a truth in a phenomenon of knowledge is not from the beginning an illusion. Everyone who admits this, and everyone must admit it, cannot justify either logically or existentially the fundamental and universal denial of that which is the condition of the efficacy of prayer, namely faith in the power (and therefore in the reality) of the Being to whom the prayer is directed.

And now, let us imagine for a moment that Christians were convinced of the need for prayer, no longer in a general and notional way, but in a really concrete and practical way, so that their conviction took on flesh and blood, as It were, and issued in action. Let us imagine they were convinced that this prayer must be at once very heavenly and very earthly, that is, it must understand the needs of earth in a very heavenly way, precisely in so far as in them the Kingdom of God is to be realized: and it must be understood, the Kingdom of God in a very earthly way, in so far as it means here and now the Church in our time, conversion, moral discipline, reverence for the name of God and of Christ in public life, active Christianity, and so on. Let us suppose for a moment that the Christians of today, those interested in their religion, in particular the more educated among them, were not merely to talk about the Mystical Body of Christ and discuss its theology but were to live this truth; that is to say, suppose it were actually to be borne in upon them with fear and trembling that we have to bear one another's burdens and that all of us are accountable before the judgement seat of God for the eternal destiny of one another. Let us multiply these delightful hypotheses and these blessed [212] dreams (one more or less hardly matters): suppose everyone were convinced, because he is very humble and therefore very realistic, that such attitudes cannot be allowed to remain only a distant ideal, permitting us to enjoy a spiritual pleasure at our best moments when we delight to feast upon our own sublime thoughts, but that they have to be put into practice, that they must be taken up anew each day, and that we have to allow ourselves to be reminded by others that we have need of certain gestures, certain usages,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

certain actions, in which these attitudes are already preformed and embodied; for they cannot be expected to well up out of the depths of the heart every day with power so fresh as to eliminate the need for such pre-formed and pre-established practices. Further, suppose everyone were convinced that prayer has to penetrate the whole of life, that we must pray at all times, that is to say that our will interceding with God in Christ for the welfare of all has to be a formative power in our daily life, that the prayer of the member of Christ interceding for the whole Church has to be transformed into a penitential life, into patience, love, fasting, alms-giving and into a courageous and joyful renunciation, which is able calmly to pass by many an 'enjoyment' and pleasure of life. Further still: suppose everyone were convinced that those who wield ecclesiastical authority are not just the supervisors of an immense apparatus, of an ecclesiastical bureaucratic administration, but the fathers of our souls, whose words direct us in a manner at once paternal and fraternal even in matters beyond obligation.

If all this were to become true, and it would be wonderful if it were to become true, what would happen? Many things, naturally. But here we have only to follow out the consequences in a particular direction. And these look like this: Christians would pray for the whole Church, that God might give her peace, might unite her and preserve her, might protect her against all the powers and forces of darkness, might make it possible for her children to glorify God in a peace such as the world cannot give. They would pray for the Pope, the bishops and priests (oh, they have such need of it), for all seekers after truth, for the whole of separated and divided Christendom, for Jews and Gentiles, for the poor and the sick, for refugees and prisoners. They would pray every day. They would understand their whole lives as being related to the bearing of others' burdens and to the care of those souls for whose actions and ultimate destiny they will one day have to render account. They would, in every pain of body and distress of heart and mind, declare like the Apostle with serene courage: [213] 'I help to pay off the debt which the afflictions of Christ leave still to be paid, for the sake of his body, the Church' (Col 1:24). They would no longer be content to pray in a merely general way for the Kingdom of God and its coming. Their heart would be as large as the world, and would yet be mindful of the most minute details affecting humanity and the Church in the drama of salvation between light and darkness: the refugees in Korea, the priests of God in the prisons and camps behind the Iron Curtain, the importance of the cinema for the education and the corruption of the masses, the frequented and the deserted paths of Christian charitable relief the silent despair of the lonely, who have lost God and man, and thousand upon thousand of other such things. They would gladly suffer themselves to be reminded by others of this or that intention. They would take up with a heart filled with self-forgetting love 'intentions' proposed for their prayers like the 'Oremus, dilectissimi nobis, pro . . .' of the priest in the Bidding Prayers of the Good Friday Liturgy.

Such prayer would generate a power sufficient to transform their lives: their piety would become less egoistic and introverted. They would no longer be resentful if they themselves have to drink of that chalice of bitterness out of which all must drink the redemption of their being. They would then spontaneously begin also to do their part for God and his Kingdom; by witnessing to their faith, by helping their neighbour (one must first have sought him with the heart, that is in prayer, and then one's feet will also find him) and those far distant (in the missions) and so on. They would gradually begin to feel something of that exquisite impulse of love to consume itself in service and obedience for others, until it has entirely spent and emptied itself. And perhaps they would go on from this to acquire some understanding of the heart of the Lord, of the mystery of that love which wells up out of the impenetrable depths – out of what is called the heart – of him who is the Word of God in the flesh: inexhaustible, judging and redeeming, pouring itself out in fruitless generosity and so drawing everything gloriously to itself. They would then (still more slowly, almost timidly and humbly) dare to hope that something of the love of this heart, which moves the sun and the other stars

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

throughout the universe, might seize and transform the meditations and aspirations of their own heart, which, alas, is of itself only inclined to evil; they would perhaps at the dawn of each day with recollected heart dedicate themselves, their life and the newly-given day to this love (or at least attempt to do so; [214] for the thing is of course not accomplished with the mere formula of such a dedication).

Would it not be good if there were many more such Christians to continue this apostolate of intercession, who at every hour of the eternal Good Friday of this world (since the Son of God is crucified continually in all his members, and together with him both those who say 'remember me . . .' and those who fail to utter this word) hear to some degree the rousing call 'Oremus', bend the knee and pray for all the estates of the Church and all her needs, and who, when they hear the 'Levate', go forth into life with a heart which has been filled with prayer of this kind?

Such an 'exercise' (particularly in its concrete form) would not by any means be the sole and exclusive method of procuring a happy spiritual life. For there are many paths into the Kingdom of Heaven. And in the house of the Father there are many mansions. But – and this is equally certain, although often forgotten – there is only as much true Christianity as there is dwelling in the heart love for God and for men in Christ Jesus and in the Church. And prayer is still more important than the Sacraments. For many a soul has been saved without Sacraments, but never without prayer. And the grace of God can never be merited, neither in its beginning nor in its end. But if it gratuitously precedes our action, then the first reaction it arouses is that movement of the heart which can be described most simply and accurately as 'prayer'.

But if prayer is that act in which man gives himself wholly to God, and if man is a being who can only exist by reaching out towards a You (or be condemned to be shut in himself), and if the invisible God becomes a You only where and in so far as one loves the You whom one sees, then prayer can only be true prayer where it is open and ready to embrace the other within that movement in which the whole person gives himself to God, that is where it is a prayer inspired by care for souls. (It is therefore quite all right if people learn to pray through each other: the mother through care for her child, and so on. And many a person has prayed, thank God, without knowing it, because his heart trembled with the anxiety of true love for another and he sent into the silent infinitude of God a general SOS which was only apparently undirected.)

Such prayer, then, which enfolds all others with oneself in the one community of sin and salvation, is a proceeding which is absolutely essential to Christianity. Consciously to see this happening and deliberately and expressly to foster it must therefore signify the accomplishment of an [215] 'essential Christianity'. And this is sufficient to understand the dignity of such apostolic prayer, without going so far as to assert that every practice of Christianity must begin at this point (to arrive at it is certainly indispensable).

Would it not be good if there were such Christians? Ought there not to be such Christians? Can we not expect there to be such Christians because – by the mysterious grace of God – in spite of every human indolence and stubborn resistance there are still Christians and ultimately Christians must be such Christians? There are such. That is a comfort. There exists such a mission (that is what 'Apostleship' means) to a prayer of ceaseless supplication for the Church and it is accepted and carried out. But this mission can be accepted by a greater number and carried out in a more faithful way. And this is what the 'Apostleship of Prayer' wants to help to bring about.

This is not the place to describe at great length the establishment of the 'Apostleship of Prayer'; its foundation in the year 1844; its development, its statutes and papal recommendations; its history, which even in Germany is not without honour, beginning with a prophetic paper by the great Görres in his old age as early as 1844; its present extent; its literature and periodicals ('Messengers') which, seventy-two in number in forty-five languages, have (it is still worth mentioning) a total annual printing throughout the world of about three million copies. These are things which must be said elsewhere.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But let us be honest. This is where the difficulties and secret resistance begin, because elevated pious theory is suddenly brought down to the practical; difficulties on two sides: for in this world even a 'good' thing always gives sufficient objective cause, both culpable and inculpable, to be regarded as a bad thing. Even the best things on this earth can only repeat the cry: 'Blessed is he who does not take scandal in me!' And we for our part should not be so arrogantly convinced of the rightness of our sensibilities that we ascribe without further ado every opposition which our feelings manifest against such pious practices of Church life to a movement of the Holy Spirit.

The educated man of today experiences an odd feeling when he hears of a 'pious union of the faithful' or, even worse, if he is urged to join it, if he finds it suggested to him that he ought to consider it important for his spiritual life to figure in a list of members (in a book or card-index). Will such people gladly take to doing, by praying in the prescribed form: 'All [216] for Thee, most Sacred Heart of Jesus', what they certainly can accomplish in its essential meaning in their own way? Will they really come into living contact with the great reality intended when it is proposed to them that they should pray: 'Divine Heart of Jesus, through the Immaculate Heart of Mary, I offer Thee all the holy Masses . . .'? Will such a person not begin to reflect and to ask what it can possibly mean, to offer all holy Masses through the heart of Mary to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, moreover to offer them 'with the intention with which this Heart offers them to the heavenly Father on our altars'? Will he not declare then, that all this is incomprehensible to him and appears far too complicated and distorted, and that he would much rather carry on taking his part in the celebration of the Eucharist by offering through the Son and in the Son that sacrifice of praise and of reparation in which he is again made sacramentally present by the Church, who gave himself to the Father on the Cross through his death? Will he not take fright when he hears of 'promoters', 'sections', 'Children's Eucharistic Crusades', 'Leagues of the Sacred Heart' and similar things? Will his timid and slowly-growing devotion and reverence for the Blessed Virgin and Mother of God not be subject to too great a strain, when it is called upon 'to take refuge in the Immaculate Maternal Heart of the Blessed Virgin'?

One can experience these and similar hesitations even in reading the official documents of the Apostleship of Prayer with all due respect. There is no sense in denying this. But they are not ultimately decisive. And therefore it is sufficient to have mentioned them. For they can all be sidestepped without attempting to discuss them in detail by answering the simple question: what does the Apostleship of Prayer as an organization (and not merely as a Christian disposition and way of life) in fact demand of anyone joining it? Initially and precisely only two things: the one very external and the other very central. The external: one has to be inscribed in the register of members. Naturally this is not the decisive element, for ultimately what is important is the prayer and those who pray, not their statistics. (Nevertheless, the statistics of the Apostleship of Prayer in the whole world comprise the names of thirty-five million persons.) And no-one should allow himself to be registered who is not honestly trying to make a reality in his life of the spirit and activity of the Apostleship of Prayer. Otherwise all lists are useless. But can the act of registration have any meaning at all? Certainly, for it is an act of witness. It is the embodiment of an inner yes, which is at the same time expression and strength of [217] this Yes. Love and reverence can glimpse in such a list much more than the concern of a bureaucratic administration which by a dreadful chemistry contrives everywhere to transform even the promptings of the spirit and the movements of the heart into regulations, lists and statistics. It can be regarded as a small part of that humble form of the servant, in which the grace of God and its working in the interior of man are made

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

manifest externally and without which interior Christianity is only half-grown.

And then the interior thing: that one should begin the day by fixing one's heart and mind in that disposition which considers one's own life even in its most profane daily routine to be dedicated in Christ to the glory of God and to one's neighbour with whom we are joined for our common salvation in the Body of Christ which is the Church. (Whoever has tried this will know that it must be done verbally – which does not mean by means of a fixed formula – if the spirit is not to evaporate very soon.) How this fixing of one's intention in prayer is carried out in the individual case is not prescribed in any binding way in the Apostleship of Prayer. But whoever makes a habit of this daily re-orientation, whoever admits to himself with clear-headed courage that honest intention and changing moods do not coincide, that those free acts of the heart which must spring from the inmost kernel of one's being must yet be achieved and cultivated in daily faithful effort and repeatedly wrested from the soil, will gratefully and humbly allow himself to be reminded by others of his vocation to the responsibility of prayer; he will allow the Church to call out to him unceasingly the cue for new prayer, for example by means of the so-called 'monthly intentions' approved by the Pope for the Apostleship of Prayer. This is after all only a continuation of what is written of the first Pope and the Church of his time: 'The Church sent up prayers without ceasing for him to God' (Ac 12:5).

Whoever strives to form his spiritual life in this way and guide it in this direction, will also know that such a dedication of his day and of his life, if it is truly to be a work of grace and not of our own mood, has its beginning and its end in the sacrifice of the Son for the salvation of the world. He will take part in the offering of this one sacrifice by the Church as commissioned by Christ, as often as he has the opportunity, and he will receive the body of the Lord through which we are all one body, we who eat of this bread (1 Co 10:17). And as soon as he has discovered that the rosary can be the mystical prayer of daily life, as simple as it is sublime, and when his spiritual life has become wide and strong enough to [218] realize spiritually what is dogmatically evident, namely that the blessed Virgin has objectively for the individual a meaning corresponding to her unique role in the history of salvation, then he will gladly pray daily – as and when he has the opportunity – a part of the rosary as a small contribution to carrying out his vocation of prayer for the salvation of the whole world. (Naturally the development may be in the opposite direction: through the action, namely the praying of the rosary, one acquires the spirit which should animate this action.) If he takes the trouble thus to take part as often as possible in the celebration of the sacrifice of our altar, if he honours the blessed Virgin, then not only has he done the most necessary part (the daily attitude of prayer, the 'offering up'), but he has done everything which the Apostleship of Prayer demands of him immediately as a 'work'. For everything else is left by the Apostleship of Prayer to the still growth in grace of the soul itself. It is sufficient for it that one has made a beginning which is tangible, which can be planned, which can be 'resolved', which can be repeatedly renewed. But this kind of plan carried out with daily faithfulness is one of those little things which are seemingly nothing, but on which everything depends and from which the greatest consequences can flow.

The Apostleship of Prayer has of its essence a 'strong' and a 'weak' side. It is in its spirit and goal so essential and necessarily already bound up with every really Christian life that it might for that very reason appear superfluous as a separate organization. But this is precisely its justification. It aims at being a help, in itself very simple, to the practice of the essential attitudes of a genuine Christianity. Such help is always necessary. For we, are always Christians in the community of Christ. And therefore even the most personal and internal things have a social character from which they receive their support and encouragement. Such help is particularly necessary today. For man is today more than ever the product of his environment – even in religious matters. And when was prayer for the Church and the Kingdom of God ever more necessary than now, when, in the one history of the world which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

no longer permits any individual peoples to live out their own history independently, each one really and in the most evident way bears the burdens of others and each one can be affected by the salvation and the damnation of all?

If the one Holy Spirit is to move us all, and there is one body because we have been baptized by this Spirit into one body (1 Co 12:13) and if we must therefore – because we are members of the one body of Christ – [219] with one mind bear each other's anxieties, then everyone ought to pray for everyone else. Apostolic prayer is a Christian duty. That is why the Apostle says: 'Be watchful in prayer for all the Saints' (Ep 6:18). 'Only, brethren, I entreat you by our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love of the Holy Spirit, to give me the help of your prayers to God on my behalf' (Rm 15:30). So the 'Church Militant' can continually admonish her children, as St Paul did: 'Pray for us too; that God may grant an opening for our preaching the mystery of Christ' (Col 4:3); 'Dear brothers, pray for us' (1 Th 5:25)' . . . that the word of the Lord may run its course triumphantly' (2 Th 3:1).

Faced with the immeasurable vastness of the undertaking and the desperate minuteness (even incapacity) of human possibilities, the pastors of the Church must continually admonish the faithful in like manner. They, and indeed all those who possess the royal priesthood of all the faithful, should have ever before their eyes the example of St Paul's apostolic prayer (cf. e.g. Rm 1:10; 2 Co 13:7, 9; Ep 1:16 sqq.; 3:14 sqq.; Ph 1:9; Col 1:9-12; 1 Th 3:10-13; 2 Th 1:11; Heb 13:12 sq.). If the Church is beginning only now for the first time in the unified history of the world to become even in evident appearance the one World Church; if by that fact she is faced with quite new tasks and is forced (slowly, but for the short span of man's life very fast) to adapt herself to quite new and unaccustomed circumstances and duties and this in a situation beset by direst dangers both from within and without, then prayer has become for the Church, for the coming of the Kingdom, doubly necessary.

At a time when the first Christian community was forced to cry out: 'What a tumult among the nations, what useless murmuring among peoples. They arise, the kings of the earth, princes plot against the Lord and his Anointed', she had the courage to pray: 'See, Lord, how they threaten! Grant then to your servants to preach your word with all openness.' And in case it might be thought she did not have the courage to utter a prayer of a very 'this-worldly' character, she continued: 'Stretch out your hand, that in the name of Jesus, your holy servant, healings, signs and wonders may be performed' (Ac 4:25-31). 'Signs and wonders' could happen today too, if we would but realize and fulfil the 'Apostolate of Prayer' for the whole Church of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[220]

16

A SPIRITUAL DIALOGUE AT EVENING: ON SLEEP, PRAYER, AND OTHER SUBJECTS

P. (Priest): Why, it's you! Good evening! How nice of you to show your face once more and come to visit this old hermit here. Why is it so seldom that you put in an appearance?

D. (Doctor): Well, it isn't as long as all that since I was last here. But you are quite right. Once in a while I enjoy escaping the madding crowd and yet being not alone. That is what has impelled me to come here tonight. Here there is company, and yet one can pass a tranquil evening. No need to fear being swamped by a flood of words.

P.: Take care! that is by no means so certain today. I read in the breviary today in a lesson from Job: 'Conceptum sermonem tenere quis poterit'. And such a conceptus sermo is rumbling in me a little. For as I was gradually making up my mind to go to bed – you never know, do you, if you can in fact go to sleep – I pulled out as my bedside reading my beloved Prudentius and imbibed his 'Hymnus ante somnum'. So he is to blame for a rather disordered meditation about sleep.

D.: Well, if you wanted to go to bed, my visit is inopportune indeed. No one should be deprived of the night, the best part of the day!

P.: No, no! I didn't mean it that way. It is true I was putting out tentative feelers towards coming to a decision to go to bed, but now you are equally welcome. – Please, take your usual seat. I may even manage to dole out to you a cigar, although they are so expensive and I am by nature mean. But I can apply to you on this occasion the mischievous exclamation of an old priest whom my father was visiting as a boy with his mother, as he loved to tell me: 'Help yourselves to food and drink! It isn't every day that you come here – thanks be to God!'

D.: And now I must turn the tables on you and say: talk away and let the conceptus sermo about sleep loose upon the world; it is not every day [221] that I sit here listening to you – thank God! I am quite eager to know what a theologian thinks about sleep. Up to now (one can of course blaspheme to one's heart's content in your presence, because you yourself do it with such relish) I always thought that theologians spread sleep chiefly by their speaking and writing. And now a theologian wants to spread himself on sleep. That is bound to be interesting, because I am sure that you have not been meditating on the physiology of sleep in mammals or the causes of sleeplessness.

P.: No, indeed not. Such things I leave without envy to you doctors and psychologists, and I take a certain malicious delight in watching you running around with water cures and chemical soporifics, desperately trying to cure the people of today from insomnia. You don't get very far, do you? And even the occasional apparent success is probably far from the reality of things.

D.:You are painting us blacker than we deserve. Today's doctors are never such out-and-out materialists as all that. That it is the whole man and not merely his body which is ill when he is unable to sleep, that this is rather a symptom of a deep-seated anxiety in him, that it means he is somehow unable to leave himself alone, and that all this is very significant for an understanding of the whole structure of his personality, that therefore this illness must be combated by psychotherapy or depth psychology, all this is known today even by us poor medical men, however much you theologians may despise us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

P.: That's all very well. It's true you have made progress and you must be sincerely congratulated for it. But just tell me: is this sleeplessness an illness from which a man has to be freed, or an illness precisely by means of which man as a whole (or however you want to express it) becomes healthy? Whenever one suffers from sleeplessness one naturally longs for sleep, but at the same time (and here the matter becomes a bit mysterious) one is also afraid of falling asleep. There is something dreadful about giving oneself up to sleep. And now of course the casters-out of this illness will spring to one's side and say: yes, that's right; but it is exactly this fear of yours that must be cast out – by the use of luminal or a lullaby or more recently of the incantations of modern magicians of the soul.

D.:Naturally anxiety must not be 'cast out' but resolved, if one is to get to sleep.

P.: But ought we then to sleep?
[222]
D.: But of course, otherwise we should become ill.

P.: Permit me to ask a somewhat sudden question (no suitable transitional thought occurs to me): did Adam in paradise also sleep? After all, he did not have to die (and sleep is often called the brother of death). And could it not be the case, for example (what is most improbable is often most true), that the longing to avoid death which remains to us from Adam as a sublime atavism expresses itself also as a resistance to sleep?

D.:Excuse me interrupting you. But I'm afraid you are beginning to indulge in Existentialist philosophy. A proper theologian like you really ought not to do such a thing. This is what makes contemporary theologians get on my nerves. I think I have a good idea where this is going to lead. The 'spirit' of man discovers it to be now beneath his dignity to drop off and (such a snoozing king on his throne is indeed a painful picture) abdicate, for His Majesty Spirit finds it necessary constantly to be on the alert and to rule the serfs over which he is placed (over the body, the senses, and the instincts); man becomes again a person who is in a position to dispose bf himself freely and continuously. I'm afraid you're going to let loose a bit of Existentialistic philosophy for a change on poor, harmless sleep and discover it to be problematical, because as a self-respecting philosopher one must discover everything to be highly problematical.

P.: You're on quite the wrong track! And yet I made it easy for you to get the drift of it all. You did not understand the hint about Adam. I put the question again: did Adam in paradise also sleep, or is sleep one of the consequences of the Fall? Don't cudgel your brain over this question! I don't in fact know the exact answer myself. But let's consider the matter together.

D.:It is sincerely to be hoped that Adam was allowed to sleep in paradise! It would be dreadful not to be allowed to sleep. There can surely be no more horrible form of death than to be forced to keep awake in such an inhuman way that one chooses as the only possible escape from the hell of wakefulness flight into the sleep of . . . death. Is it not the case that the brightness of the day's consciousness is delightful only because a gentle twilight can always carry it over softly into the gentle, tired stillness of sleep! Don't we renounce in sleep the clear sharpness of the light of day, the privilege of being autonomous persons who are thereby imprisoned within the confines of the consciously given, in order quietly to yield ourselves again to a life which is not ours but which in compensation [223] is wise and limitless, because it moves and acts in yon dark kingdom where every individual is ever caught up in the movement of the All? Is not anxiety then an indication that a man has no trust, that he fears this great reality before which he ought to relax and yield himself up, in the sure knowledge that existence is good and not a dangerous monster waiting to gobble us up if we don't look out?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

P.: That was prettily put. Yes, this 'kingdom' into which we quietly slip in sleep may be described poetically in that way. A kingdom of still spaces, a region where everything has a hidden root, a dark ground out of which rises the sap of life, an earth out of which sprouts all the blossom of a true spirit, a kingdom of a thousand names: kingdom of the earth, kingdom of the soul (the soul, whose adversary is supposed to be the spirit, whereas in truth the latter is its fruit – and more than this), kingdom of gentle night, kingdom of a night more deeply conscious than day . . . No, please, don't be so poetical. I don't care much for that. We can understand each other as well without it.

D.:Very well, what is there to say about Adam's sleep?

P.: Precisely the question I am asking is this: was Adam able to move into this kingdom only by means of sleep? Or was this precisely one of the blessed gifts of paradise, that he could possess the shades fully while yet remaining completely awake, that he could with his eyes open descend to those roots of his being for him not obscure but incandescent, which continually suck new life from the blood-stream, the body and the earth, where individual life touches upon the life of all things? If this were the proper occasion, I should now embark upon a theological lecture about the extent of the freedom from concupiscence in the state of original justice, about that pure and bright interpenetration of nature and person, of spirit and besouled body. And we should conclude at the end that Adam did not sleep in a stupefied state as we do, but opened the innermost chamber of his spirit in some other way to the silent entry of those fairies which bring the nocturnal blessings of the kingdom of a thousand names to the spirit. But you would become impatient during this lecture and be annoyed at the recounting of the blessings of sleep in the state of paradise, of sleep with a waking heart, as we might call it, thinking of the mystical interpretation so familiar to tradition of the remarkable expression in the Canticle of Canticles: 'ego dormio, cor meum vigilat', 'I sleep, yet my heart is awake!'
[224]
D.: Not impatient, no. I like listening to you theologians demonstrating by reference to Adam and the story of his origins what man would really be like if he had not been so unhuman as to want to be a mere man. But finally at the end of it all I would make this rejoinder to the theology of sleep in paradise: That's all very well; but the fact remains that today we car enter only with eyes closed (or even only in dreams) into this mysterious kingdom (which still appears to me generously blanketed in fog). And for this reason we simply have to sleep. Full stop.

P.: Now it's my turn to say: that's all very well, but are you quite sure that this land into which we move through sleep more than in our wakeful state – we are after all not completely excluded from it even then – is so exclusively a kingdom of quiet peacefulness and of benevolent powers? After all, the kingdom of a thousand names has in Scripture quite

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other names than those we gave it previously. Scripture calls it 'body, body of sin, body of death, body of flesh, body of baseness, creature subject to futility and the slavery of corruption'. This sounds a bit less poetical than before; but no doubt more realistic. And – go on, be shocked at my antiquated theology if you will – what if this kingdom is inhabited also by demons? Is that to be completely excluded? If death and sleep have something to do with one another – I agree that this 'if' is a trifle vague – then there could exist a being who has power over sleep, as there exists a being who has mastery over death, as we read somewhere in Hebrews. Perhaps this mysterious kingdom is peopled not only by fairies (it would have been better before to call them honestly 'angels') but also by demons, so that sleep too in its own way is a dwelling in 'darkness and the shadow of death'. Then the silly fear in the face of going to sleep with which we began would perhaps not be so silly after all? Lodged in the furthest corner to which soporifics and counting-up-to-a-hundred do not descend, would lurk the terror of losing consciousness before the adversarius vester diabolus, quaerens quem devoret . . . You are of course familiar with the prayer which we say from the breviary before going to sleep: Sobrii estote et vigilate, quia adversarius vester diabolus tamquam leo rugiens circuit, quaerens quem devoret. Normally we willingly let ourselves be overcome by sleep, don't we? But by the devil – that's another matter. But can it not be that these two are not necessarily and absolutely completely distinct and separate? I ask again: is it of this that one is terrified, without knowing it, when one has a sense of fear before going to sleep?

To formulate it again in a different way, you must admit this fact which [225] disturbs me about sleep: when we sleep, our spirit, our responsible personality, does not simply put up the shutters and say 'closing-time', after which nothing further can happen which is of any interest to it. No, rather it sinks down into that in us which belongs to us and yet lies before or beneath that sphere of reality around us over which we exercise immediately and 'despotically' responsible control. I have to express myself in this roundabout way, because we cannot call this infra-personal sphere, in the usual superficial sense, either simply 'body' or 'soul', for in the first case we still think even today of a physico-chemically constructed machine, and in the other – well, what exactly is 'soul' as distinct from the personal spirit? Certainly not something with which the body is not already connected. And other names which in these days are applied to this sphere are still too loaded with the interpretation which the inventors of these names have put upon it.

But let's not worry now about correct nomenclature. In any case, something happens to the spirit during sleep there below, more than in the waking state, and uncontrollably. For note well: when we wake up again, we are refreshed or perhaps not refreshed by our sleep, but in any case we are different. We are perhaps in a happier or more serious mood, or we have become much more indifferent about certain matters of yesterday, or we are charged with quite different motives; the whole atmosphere of our dispositions, which are unreflective and yet decisively intervene in our actions, is different from yesterday; thoughts occur to us which would not have occurred to us yesterday. After all, people often say that they first want to 'sleep on' some particular question. In saying this, they have observed what I am now talking about. I am only surprised that people so naturally assume that one always judges and acts better and more correctly if one has first 'slept on it'. Surely it is often the reverse: often one sleeps away the highest inspirations, if one first sleeps on them before acting in accordance with them and definitively making them one's own. In brief: the wellspring of our personal waking thinking and acting, to which we can never penetrate completely, is altered during sleep, and this in an uncontrollable way.

This is surely not something to be taken for granted and not quite without danger. We allow ourselves in sleep to be hypnotized to some extent by a 'something' which is wholly unknown to us, and to be given by it post-hypnotic commands for the day. I know of course (to carry the image a little further) that the hypnotizer cannot do with his victim [226] just

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whatever he wants. And so it is quite certain that if we go to sleep saints, we will not wake up criminals. But is it not possible that practically everything in our lives depends on almost imperceptible alterations in the presuppositions of our actions, imperceptible alterations of mood, of involuntary sequences of thought, and so on, that is on something which we cannot possibly even in our clearest moments of consciousness fully check and verify?

And I ask again, is this Something, to which we surrender ourselves in sleep, necessarily and in every respect trustworthy? Can one with complete confidence let oneself be 'hypnotized' by it in sleep and accept suggestive commands from it (if one may use such analogous expressions for once)?

D.:It is self-evident surely that one can and ought to do that, simply because no-one can deny that one must. Or do you suggest that one ought to attempt to do without sleep altogether? Would such a fearful sealing-off of the subconscious, even if it were possible, not be a worse disaster? And of course it is not possible. But that deprives the whole question of any object. In any case, during the day we are equally subject to impressions and influences which lie outside our control, which do not present written requests for permission to make an impression on us, which, because they alter us, that is, alter the given field and matter of our personal activity, make us also as persons continuously and without our consent other than we were.

P.: But that is not quite the same. During the day one accepts them with spirit awake. One can check them, resist them, transform them, interpret them ('pick them up') in one way rather than another, one can react, swiftly and adroitly. One can bring to bear on them what one is and wants to be, either to promote or to repel, but consciously and deliberately. One does first give them, if one must allow them entry, some previous code sign, if one is really awake – some people of course sleep with their eyes open – and only then do they obtain entry into us, provided that we have learnt to 'arise from sleep' in the sense meant by St Paul. But in sleep one is transformed before one opens one's eyes to the fact. Changes come about then, which after a long sleep present themselves as self-evident. One has already moved so far way from one's previous condition that it no longer presents itself as any problem to be precisely as one is. Have you yourself never experienced how during the night moods, [227] attitudes, states which we struggled to acquire and build up in full knowledge and painful effort during the previous day are washed away by the Something into which we so innocently allow ourselves to sink? One could say (allowing two parables of the Gospel to intermingle): during the night the devil comes and tears up the seed out of our 'heart' and when we wake up the weeds that he has sown are already quite sturdy and dominate the scene as though it could not be otherwise, and all the while we sleepers thought we could leave the good seed to grow by itself.

Let me add something about the dangerous Something we have been talking about which has just occurred to me. I know you will mutter all the more that theologians have always had the devil on the brain. But perhaps you too will discover that the experiences and opinions of the old theologians are worthy even today of a little bit of consideration. The old masters of matters ascetical and mystical – therefore the psychotherapeutic experts of olden days – as also the theologians of the Middle Ages said that devils have no possibility of exercising any direct influence on what is purely spiritual as such in us, but – surely something extraordinary for 'pure spirits' – the sphere of their immediate influence over us lies in the 'sensitive' part – we would say today in the subconscious life which is rooted in the corporeal.

By the way, we should see in such an affirmation not merely a somewhat degrading limitation of the influence of these spirits upon us (which applies by the way also to the good angels), but also an indication of the fact that they have, as 'basic elements of the world' as St

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Paul perhaps calls them (but certainly this would require an investigation all to itself) a relationship to this material world arising out of their nature, different from and yet similar to ours to the world, even considered as a whole, through our body.

If we were to think out more accurately these relationships of spirits to the world, we should understand better that this pancosmic relation to the world of such spiritual personal beings must not be thought of only as a sporadic, exterior action which proceeds from the free arbitrary choice of these spiritual persons, but as a happening which in its roots and foundations is prior to the concrete modification of it due to the freedom of spirits, and is consequently to be found (even though not patient of empirical verification by us) even where 'everything is proceeding normally'.

But I'm getting lost – and losing the thread of my discourse a little. [228] I only wanted to say this: if 'spirits' are from the start 'world-powers' and are by nature endowed with a relationship to the material cosmos as a whole, then the saying of the old experts in metempirical (and yet very tangible) realities that spirits can influence immediately 'only' the material side of man was the expression of a positive fact after all.

If the material cosmos is in a certain sense an expression, 'embodiment' (with all due caution and reserving the rights of a more accurate determination of the concept) of the natural essence of spirits, then the spiritual and personal character of these spirits must surely contribute in some way to determining this sphere. So it would not be in a merely poetical way that the fourteen little angels mentioned in the traditional children's song would stand around the bed, apart from the fact that they are angels and devils of very large format. Besides, if the most modern philosophy of nature is gradually rediscovering a problem of 'suffering' in the dysteleologies of infrahuman nature, this could perhaps be pointing in the same direction that I am thinking of: because the spirits are real principles in the world by their essence, their personal and therefore free nature must express itself somehow in the concrete state of the material world, even though it is in principle impossible for us men to demonstrate this experimentally, because a material thing can be given to us, even in the most refined experiment, only within this world, and can therefore never be examined in isolation from this influence.

D.:Excuse me, but I think we have gradually progressed a long way from sleep. And I fear (and I say this rather maliciously) that you will break your axle if you make a turn sufficiently sharp to bring you back to the subject of sleep from the point to which we have now wandered.

P.: It isn't as bad as all that. We will be back at sleep in a moment, if you don't go to sleep before that – something that I could not really take amiss. All that I actually wanted to say in that long speech is this: from what we have said (still, I admit, very vaguely) it follows that there is danger in sleep. For it is into that kingdom where the evil spirits have their abode that man allows himself to sink – in sleep.

D.:That's all very well. But I should like to make a few observations on all this. If I am to follow you to these theological heights, I must know a bit more precisely just how one is to conceive this alleged influence of the spirits. For otherwise one cannot really form a correct picture as to whether and how these demonic powers working upon the depths of the [229] unconscious can become dangerous. One could also object to your theory that you must logically allow good spirits as well to enter and depart freely in this subterranean realm of the human being. And if you do not reject this as sounding too banal, I would almost say that these good spirits ought to be able to keep the demons in hand, so that in fact one need not take very much interest in this conflict of spirits there below. Particularly since we already have our hands full with the 'discernment of spirits' during the day, where it really is necessary. For during the day there is no way of escaping the need to adopt an attitude towards one or the other kind of 'spirit', the good and the bad, but fortunately one is relieved of this obligation precisely when one gives oneself to innocent sleep. But leaving all this aside, my first and last objection remains: we are obliged (even on moral grounds) to sleep. Therefore it would be the wisest course to let the perilousness of sleep which you have so profoundly demonstrated rest very lightly on one's mind. Or do you not agree that the ascetic virtuosi of night-watching in the style of the St Anthony of Grünewald are more plagued by the devil than we who sleep and are afterwards fully rested?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

P.: Stop, stop! No need to fear that my theological ontology of sleep (to give a simple opinion a solemn title) will provide the basis for an ethic of night vigils. Though as a matter of fact it would not be out of place to ask why this practice which was so much taken for granted in early Christianity (as in every religion worthy of the name) has today so much fallen out of use. But I think rather that one could deduce quite another maxim from this theory.

D.:And what would that be?

P.: That before sleep one should pray, one ought to pray really well.

D.: An unexpected consequence. Up to now I thought: if we were trained as children to 'say our night prayers well', the reason must be (if I have ever considered the matter at all) that underlying such a praiseworthy practice (which as a matter of fact – between ourselves – I have never completely given up) is the basic assumption that a common or garden Christian like ourselves, if he does not pray at night, does not pray during a normal working day at all. But he ought to pray. Ergo, at least in the morning and in the evening, when one can suitably cast a backward glance over the past day. But now you come along and make [230] out that night prayers are a kind of theological night hygiene of the spirit. That is a new and surprising idea for me.

P.: But no. I am talking about real prayer. Prayer to God, the true and personal God, prayer in the spirit and in absolute truth, not a little exercise in a self-imposed training programme before sleep or anything of that kind. For the whole power of prayer probably lies in faith. And, though the psychotherapists of today because of their in many cases scarcely surmounted relativism often forget or conceal this fact, faith is in the ultimate analysis only genuine when every 'as if' attitude is rejected, and that which I do is no longer merely an expression of my so-called 'conviction' (alongside of which other convictions may exist with equal right), not merely a psychological trick which is psychologically useful to me, but an unconditional commitment of the whole man to – well, precisely to that one truth which is genuine reality. Certainly I think that then, and only then, when such prayer is in reality prayer, does it fulfil also that other function which you have described somewhat profanely as a theologically motivated spiritual hygiene of sleep. And once this presupposition is verified, we can then inquire what prayer should be like, in order to be effectively at night a blessing upon sleep, an exorcism of its dangers.

D.: In what sense do you mean this?

P.: I mean it this way: this night prayer must naturally have all the qualities, all the psychological and theological presuppositions and structures which are proper to all prayer in general. And these need not concern us therefore at the moment. Although naturally they are important for night prayer like every other: as a surrender of the person to God, as an act of trust in the outgoing goodness of God, as a willing submission of all the experiences of the day to the 'order of eternity', and so on. But over and above this, in accordance with our considerations up to the present, prayer at night should evidently be not only – let us say – a daily prayer said in the evening, but in addition should be of such a nature as to be adapted, more than any other prayer, to the peculiar character of that 'kingdom' into which man in sleep finds his way, so that he 'arms' himself against the dangers of this region of life in sleep, in a sense exorcises and blesses it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

D: I don't think that we have established the peculiar character of this kingdom sufficiently clearly to enable us to determine exactly in what armour (which we are to be furnished with precisely through prayer) we [231] should commit ourselves to this danger-zone. For ultimately all you have established is that we are in this kingdom more exposed to the infiltrations and suggestions of demonic powers than in the consciousness of full daylight. What particular maxim on the subject of night prayer are we supposed to be able to deduce from this?

P.: To begin with, I must make one point before going any further. If, as you so rightly say, we are to determine what night prayer should really be like on the basis of the particular character of this kingdom, then we must not think exclusively about how subject to demonic influence this sub-spiritual layer of man's soul is. Because we must think after all of this demonic influence as itself subject to the structural laws of this layer in man. Now, and with this we are approaching more closely to an answer to our question, that which is characteristic of this zone (or whatever you want to call it) is the image. We have dreams during sleep, to begin with the illustration of this statement which lies most readily to hand. A C. G. Jung will try to discover the archetypes, the primordial and guiding images of this layer. This layer as psychic (and therefore somehow intentional) must have its objective correlative, and as psychosomatic, because rooted in the flesh, must have a concrete correlative, in a word, an 'image', an incarnate idea. That is why this kingdom is the kingdom of images, but a divided kingdom of images, for it is the common region of impressions originating in the good and evil powers of the spirit; it is the kingdom in which the eternal Logos became flesh and in which the Prince of this World strives to celebrate the 'epiphany' of his dominion. What 'moves' the soul in sleep – the soul become defenceless and open – even where there is no dream evidently to hand, are these 'images' which are formed there and so supply its guiding images to the personal consciousness throughout the day as well. Whatever may be the truth about the 'collective unconscious', in which the experience of humanity is supposed to be consolidated and preserved in the form of archetypes, of which the great images in myths and popular tales are supposed to be merely the echo in full consciousness, however wrong it may be to regard the true life of the spirit as a secondary function of these subterranean powers, of this subliminal soul, and however mistaken it would also be to elevate this kingdom of the deep into the ultimate reality and truth, since it is in itself deeply divided and has need of release from above – it remains true that the spirit of man draws its life also from this kingdom. And above all in sleep. And this because it is formed by these images.
[232]
D.: And evening prayer?

P.: If a man brings with him into his sleep good, genuine, holy images, if his power of imagination is already formed by means of the true archetypes of reality, archetypes blessed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and redeemed, pure and radiant in the flesh in which the Logos of God was himself formed; if a man sinks into sleep like this, not formless (for the Christian has no need to become mystically formless in order to seize hold of God, since God has himself eternally assumed the form, the schema of man), nor in the chaotic distortion in which his daylight consciousness mirrors the lacerated reality of the world; then doubtless there will come to meet and greet him out of the kingdom of sleep in secret sympathy these images, which in reality he is bringing with him; then there is in him already a hidden principle of selection to determine what is to be allowed to pass from the depths of the soul into the soul which is left open. Those images which a believing man forms in himself when fully conscious call up out of the depths of his natural soul their own likeness. For indeed these Christian archetypes are really concealed in the depths of our 'natural soul' because we are redeemed not only from above but also from below by him who descended into the depths, and because there is in reality no such thing as a 'purely' natural soul, a soul in a state of purely natural innocence, because it is either saved or damned, or to speak even more correctly – after all it exists prior to the personal choice between the alternatives of salvation and damnation – it is both at the same time, the radical source from which both can well up, the might of darkness and the light of the morning-star which, according to Scripture, rises in . . . the heart.

The 'schemata of the power of imagination' (to speak in Kantian terms for once) don't consist merely in those harmless things which a rationalistic, unexistential psychology or metaphysic of the sensitive soul tells us about. They are not empty forms of space and time. Rather, they have a historical physiognomy which is in the last analysis Christian or demonic. Which of the two sets of images – which constitute reality – will in effect become efficacious in us depends too upon which the personal spirit in his waking state has chosen as his.

That is why our night prayer – and by that I don't mean any kind of prayer which happens to be said at night, but that attitude of prayer in which we in fact go to sleep – ought to be a quiet, untroubled, relaxed and recollected gathering together of those great images in which the supreme reality, that of God, has come near to us and impressed itself on this [233] visible world: the Son of Man, the Sign of the Cross, the Blessed Virgin, to name but a few which lie most readily to hand. Here it is not a question of a frivolous play of phantasy. Has not our phantasy too been consecrated down to the deepest roots of man since the eternal Word became flesh? And should the image, which faith creates out of this fact and in which it is concentrated and embodied, not be a kind of quasi-sacramental sign which sanctifies and blesses, guards and enlightens? In recommending this kind of 'imaginative' prayer, I naturally include under the heading of 'image' everything which belongs to the realm of sensibility, and not only what is ordered to the sense of sight, and therefore words, sounds, signs, gestures, in short everything in which the celestial spirit can be embodied, the nether depths of our being sanctified and the spirit of earth banished. The correct, calm and recollected signing of oneself with the sign of the Cross, the simple gesture of prayer, the words of prayer, if they are filled with simple greatness and concentrated reality, all these belong to that imaginativeness which – in my opinion – ought to be the characteristic precisely of night prayer, if it is to become an exorcism and consecration of that kingdom into whose power man surrenders himself in sleep.

D.: Yes, but does not all imagination, including that of the primordial images, ultimately remain in the realm of the 'as-if', of the unreal? And is not therefore the imaginative making-present of religious reality precisely a representation of a religious reality which is merely thought and not truly present? We must admit that it is difficult for the man of today not to treat his thought about something, and even more his imaginative representation of something, as that which is most unreal and unsubstantial.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

P.: It is precisely this which is so wrong, so dangerously wrong. That a thought, a mood, an inner love, an act of reverent adoration is more real, more enduring, of greater consequence, of greater validity than the explosion of a bomb or a pound of butter; that if such a reality appears to be 'unreal', ineffective in the realm of so-called tangible 'reality', it is only because the latter (not the former) is so very unreal that the true reality of the spiritual does not get a chance to make itself felt; it is this that the blind and deluded man of today must re-learn, before it is too late, before the organs designed to bring true reality to him have atrophied beyond redemption.

And as for representation by the imagination: the word 'imagination' [234] has today been hopelessly phenomenalized and relativized. What is imagined is today taken to mean what is 'mere imagination'. But what if the imagined reality is really there? Is there, because it exists, because it transcends time and space (and therefore cannot be ascertained by means of the apparatus employed in the investigation of the unreal, by what we call physics and chemistry)? And if we now imagine this existing reality, so that it is there for us as well, there for our heart and the last impulse of our nerves, imagine it because long before we created an image of it this reality caught hold of us and made us very really into its own image and likeness – is this then 'mere imagination', or is this process not rather a re-presentation of what is truly present, a mode by which the real is admitted into the sphere of consciousness, for there the presence of the utterly real gently pressing upwards from the depths usually desires to make itself known only if we grant it in simple and ready humility a sensible form? Grant it, not because it has need of it, but because otherwise it would disdain to force itself upon us, free beings, who are called to love?

D.: There occurred to me, while you were so eloquently defending the value and worth of the religious imagination, a certain parallel to the correspondence which you postulate in the religious realm between the images created by the imagination and the images impressed in a sense a priori on the deeper soul. When in everyday life we have fallen asleep with a 'problem' and in the morning have wakened with an inspired idea as to its solution, when, that is, something has continued to ruminate subterraneously on the question, then the question taken with us into sleep must also have worked selectively on the mass of our memorized information, which in relation to the particular question in view is in itself chaotic, and must have activated the relevant and therefore useful material and rejected the opposite. The good idea does need for its constitution new and well-adapted material over and above that given in the problem itself. It would therefore seem to be beyond dispute that there is in sleep the possibility of a selection within the mass of material in thought and image which arises from the depths of the soul. Therefore if there are such primordial religious images impressed a priori, then your theory is certainly acceptable.

P.: Yes, but of course I do not mean that there are finished, well-defined and in a sense already fixed and classified primordial images lying [235] about in the deeper soul as in a photograph-album. But I do think (as I have already said) that the 'schemata of the power of the imagination' have an a priori physiognomy already determined even from the religious and supernatural point of view, and which externalizes and expresses itself – at first, I am quite willing to admit, under the stimulus and with the material of experience – in what we may then call primordial religious images. But this is a question which we will not be able to solve tonight to the satisfaction of both of us.

D.: That is true. But there is another question I should still like to pose: you appealed at the beginning to the tradition of the so-called medieval psychotherapists in order to make more plausible your theology of the demonic depths of the sensitive subconscious. Now, is there

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

also a tradition which emphasizes the importance of the imaginative in the grace before sleep – that is really what we ought to call the kind of night prayer which you have postulated?

P.: Well, there you have got me. That is a question one would naturally have to investigate. But my good Prudentius is still lying open. You must read sometime the Hymnus ante somnum – or get it translated for you. There he speaks of the two kinds of images which move the soul during sleep, there he speaks of how one ought to sign forehead and heart with the sign of the Cross. The Hymn boldly concludes with the words – just a moment:

Christum tamen sub ipso meditabimur sopore.

That is, translated:

On Christ is our thought directed
Even in the midst of sleep.

The Ambrosian verse of the hymn at Compline will also be well-known to you:

Procul recedant somnia et noctium phantasmata.
Far from us may evil dreams
And night's phantoms withdraw.

And to mention something else which has just occurred to me: in the Exercises of St Ignatius one of the essential parts of his schemes of meditation is the activation of the 'vista imaginativa', which represents the [236] object of the meditation to the person in a great image. And this image is to be taken with one right into sleep so that it springs before the mind immediately in the morning. And it is surely not by chance that Ignatius places precisely in the evening the specifically imaginative way among his various methods of meditations, 'the application of the senses', where the so-called 'prelude' of the other ways of meditating becomes a complete form of meditation in itself.

But, as I have said, these are matters which ought to be further investigated: and for that there is no more time tonight, for it is getting late. And I have deprived you of what you came looking for, a quiet hour spent alone with another, in which there is little talk. Mea culpa. Next time you must do the talking.

D.: Not at all, this evening's conversation has been most instructive for me. How does the verse from Prudentius go? It could serve as the quintessence of our conversation, which I will have to think over again, if your theory is to become quite clear to me.

P.: Christum tamen sub ipso
meditabimur sopore.

And another quotation must go with it:

Ego dormio, cor meum vigilat.

Ah, yes, the heart! That truly never sleeps. And out of the heart, says Jesus, everything comes. Even and especially when one is asleep.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

D.: That is doubtless true. Good night, Father!

P.: Good night, my good friend. And . . . don't forget your night prayers tonight! You can say them before you have reflected and – let us hope – improved upon my theory.

D.: Good night again! Until we meet again!

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[237]

PART FOUR

The States of Life in the Church

[239]

17

PRIESTLY EXISTENCE

I. PRELIMINARY NOTE

Existence in the title of this paper is to be taken in the modern sense: the concrete being of the individual human person, each as such for itself, in so far as the man by his moral acts definitively disposes of it as a whole. Therefore 'Priestly Existence' poses the question whether the Catholic priesthood essentially influences in any way the existential condition of a man possessing it.

We say 'essentially influences', because of course every 'vocation' ('Beruf'), in so far as it belongs to the concrete situation of an individual's life, at times makes certain demands which in the concrete can be fulfilled only by means of a morally qualified way of acting (this vocation demands loyalty, that punctuality, another tact, discretion, etc.), and therefore it has a positive existential significance of some sort, and a critical failure, even though 'only' in one's profession, can be of decisive importance by reacting on a man's whole existence. But an ordinary 'vocation' ('Beruf') in the civic sense of today (business man, teacher etc.) which rests on the division of labour in social life, because of this very fact does not affect the whole of existence, which is always something essentially indivisible; therefore, in the greater or lesser degree in which it is a definitely separate compartment of the total behaviour of a man, it does not merit consideration as an essential influence on human existence. In a sense it does not penetrate deeply enough into the 'core' of man's existence to give this as a whole a definite character which could be essentially distinguished from that of another profession.

On the other hand, there are 'vocations' (even if perhaps not such in the civic and social sense) which have an essential significance for existence and its characterization. And it follows from this, that when we ask whether this is applicable also to the priesthood, our question is not from [240] the beginning entirely meaningless. The ascetic (monk), for example, who makes of his Christian existential activity (his 'striving after holiness') immediately as such his vocation, or the married man who possesses his personality as a whole and not merely in one of its individual functions exclusively in the loving union with another person, both these have 'vocations' which involve an essential specification of existence. Our question therefore is whether the priesthood of the Catholic Church performs a function in the life of the priest which is in this sense essential – although always contained within the framework of universal human and Christian existence, or whether the priesthood of an individual priest seen from his point of view is a mere 'employment' ('Amt'), a separate particular function of his life, analogous to the particular civic professions.

At the same time it is to be noted that 'priesthood' will be understood in its dogmatic essence, as universally binding upon the whole Church as it was willed by Christ himself. It is important to emphasize this, because the Western Church admits to the priesthood only those who live a perpetually celibate life. If we suppose that this requisite perpetual celibacy is in its intrinsic significance the same as that of the ascetic (monk) and therefore even in the case of the 'secular priest' only the concrete expression of an ascetical attitude demanded of all, then the Western Church today in reality ordains to the priesthood, to express it in old ecclesiastical language, only the 'ascetics' living in the bosom of their communities, that is to say, those who have already adopted a quite definite existential condition. But since this conjunction of the condition of ascetic with that of priest, even though internally meaningful, is not absolutely necessary, as a glance at the married clergy of the Eastern Church shows, then in considering the concrete example of the Western priest we must carefully distinguish what he is as priest, which derives from the dogmatically necessary essence of the priesthood, and what he is as 'ascetic'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The concrete essence of the priesthood to be determined from dogma is – at least at first sight – something highly complex; indeed, it appears to be constituted of elements that in their inner nature do not belong to one another at all. The priest of today is equipped with cultic powers (as sacrificing priest and mediator of sacramental grace) and is at the same time an emissary: apostle, teacher, authorized leader of the community. At first sight these two powers do not seem to be necessarily connected with one another.

[241] Already in the Old Testament the offices of priest and prophet were in most cases exercised by different persons or groups of persons, in fact these offices often stood to one another in their historical representatives in a relationship of hostility. In the New Testament the original separation of the two powers is still to be seen in this, that on the one hand the descriptive titles of the priestly offices derive from a completely non-cultic linguistic source (ministers, chiefs, elders, overseers) and on the other hand cultic names are attributed only to Christ and to the faithful in general (in their universal priesthood), and in the cult itself only the community as a whole appears expressly as its subject. Consequently, it ought at least not to be over-hastily assumed that the priesthood as it exists is an intrinsically simple, 'elementary' object. Yet until the elements of the priesthood as actually given are grasped in all their inner relationships and necessary connections it is quite impossible to decide whether they are to be taken into account in establishing the foundation of priestly existence, and, if so, which of them and in what way.

Yet even a casual glance at the Catholic idea of the bishop teaches us that the idea of an authoritative mission cannot be eliminated a priori as being of no consequence for the question of the existence of the priest, perhaps because the concept of the priest connotes only cultic powers and even today priests without apostolic duties (without a 'missio canonica') are possible, e.g. priests who are monks. For according to the Catholic conception from the beginning – we need think only of the theology of episcopacy in Ignatius of Antioch – the bishop unites in himself both powers to such an extent and is still today as 'successor of the apostles' and as 'high priest' so much the bearer of both powers in one, that an orientation of our question deriving exclusively from the cultic element (a temptation of Oriental Theology both in theory and in practice) would be in immediate danger of distorting completely the essence of the priesthood and therewith of priestly existence.

The same would of course be true of the opposite ('Protestant') method, in which the 'pastor' is conceived only as 'preacher' within the universal priesthood of the people. In this case the danger would still be present even if this proclamation of the word were understood as authorized by Scripture or by a merely juridically conceived apostolic succession and for this reason as authoritative and demanding obedience. Thus before the question about the existential meaning of the priesthood [242] can be asked, we must elaborate the question of the proper nature of the priesthood.

II. THE ESSENTIAL STRUCTURE OF THE PRIESTHOOD

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

1. The Concepts of Priest and Prophet in General

From the standpoint of the philosophy of religion and, at least to a certain extent, from that of the history of religion, there are two concepts that must be kept carefully distinct: priest and prophet.

Priestly activity is – considering it first from the point of view of pre-Christian religious philosophy – the visible, cultic expression (in sacrifice and prayer) of the inner religious attitude of man; it is accordingly in itself the making visible of a relationship to God established by man (although of course depending upon the universal relationship of creature to Creator originated by God). From this it follows that the priesthood belongs to the normal, enduring institutions of human life, that sacrifice (that is, priestly activity) could originally be carried out by every accepted authority in human society (patriarch, head of a family, chief of a tribe or clan, prince) and the priesthood, being organized on a social and even caste basis, could be bequeathed in a fixed order and handed down without diminution.

The office of prophet is the (real or supposed) locus of a self-revelation made by God, that is to say of a new relationship between God and man, which is established by God himself. While the priest is the making visible of man's word to God, the prophet is the making visible of God's word to man. In accordance with the incalculability of the free revelation of God which appears in history like a point – precisely because it does not spring from a necessity inherent in the essence of the world and consequently is not co-extensive with it – the prophetic office is not capable of being organized, cannot, unless magical corruptions have degraded it to the level of the soothsayer, be bequeathed or tied to particular classes. In contrast to the priesthood, which in virtue of its essence follows natural institutions, a woman can also be bearer of the prophetic spirit. While the priesthood can be handed down without diminution of its essence, the 'son of the prophet' is in principle not a prophet, but at the most the guardian and exponent of the word which has already proceeded from God through the prophet.

[243] We are not concerned to deny that in the course of the history of religion much cross-fertilization between priest and prophet has taken place. The clearest case is naturally that where the sacrifice itself is established in its concrete form by a special act of God through divine revelation. Also where magical aberration has reduced the priest to a magician and the prophet to a soothsayer, their offices coincide for all practical purposes. But strictly from the point of view of the philosophy of religion the two concepts should be kept carefully distinct: priesthood is in itself an expression of the attitude, determinable from 'below', which man by his 'nature' has to adopt towards God; the prophetic office is, where it is in fact realized, an expression coming from 'above' of the revealing word of God 'above' nature, and even where it is only supposedly given it is still an expression of man's willingness to listen to any message which might possibly proceed from God to man at a particular point of his history.

2. The Transformation of the Concepts Priest and Prophet in the Context of Christianity

These two concepts, however, now undergo a fundamental change of character as soon as we inquire into the meaning they are given in Christian revealed religion. On the one hand it will be shown that each now intrinsically qualifies and entails the other. This will give rise to that inner complementary relationship of the elements in the Catholic concept of the priesthood which we were unable to discover at the beginning and which is presupposed in the answering of the question which constitutes our real theme. On the other hand, these concepts in fusing with one another in this way in the context of Christian revealed religion will suffer a certain loss of power which gives rise to the question of the relationship of the universal

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

priesthood to the official priesthood. When this question too has been answered, we will be in a position directly to attack our main theme.

(a) The mutual conditioning and essentially complementary relationship of (cultic) priesthood and prophetism in the Catholic priesthood. Christianity is firstly and fundamentally Christ himself. It is therefore in the first place a salvation-reality which is given in the order of human history in the fact that the incarnate Son of the Father became, in virtue of his personal dignity and his membership of the race of Adam, the head and [244] representative of the whole of humanity, and as such performed the act of worship of God and offered the absolute and final sacrifice which fundamentally redeemed mankind. The presence of this fact of salvation (as a unique, free, historical act of God himself) in human history is the foundation of Christianity. But this reality, in which Christianity first exists for us, is:

(i) posited by God himself. The crucial reality through which we reach God is therefore not our prayer and the offering made by us in so far as it is our own accomplishment, but an act of God himself, by means of which alone man is capable of positing an act which pays homage to God and sanctifies himself.

(ii) It is 'sacramental'; and therefore:

(iii) the Word is an essential constitutive part of it.

These last two points we must here explain in greater detail in themselves and in their mutual connection.

Through the incarnation of the Logos the salvific will of God became a genuine reality in the order of human existence. That is why man does not find God in any process of rising beyond this world, whether this be conceived in an idealistic, Gnostic, mystic or any other fashion; he does not find him in an abandonment of the sphere of his 'natural' existence (i.e. of his existence as always given), but only in a turning to Jesus Christ, that is to a reality within the sphere of his own existence and history, to Jesus in whom God himself came to man.

This salvific presence of God in the flesh, i.e. within human history – the perennial stumbling-block of all philosophy and autonomous mysticism – is nevertheless of such a kind that it is not immediately accessible to the grasp of human experience in its own inner self. This is excluded by the strictly supernatural character of the reality of this presence. But if it is not only to exist 'in itself' but also to be given 'for us', to be 'present', (and this is the only way for it to become a reality of salvation), then – apart from the corresponding subjective a priori of which man has need in order to grasp it: the grace of faith, and so on – its proper, inner, total essence must contain an element which makes possible the presence of something transcending human experience without making it necessary for this reality to appear in its own proper self: the sign which makes present for us what exists in itself.[1]

But for us only the word can be considered as constituting such a sign. [245] For all non-human reality – considered in isolation and apart from this supervening word which forms and interprets it – is out of the question as a sign indicative of the presence of a strictly supernatural reality, because such a non-human reality could function as a sign of this kind only in its positive being. But this would mean, in effect, that the natural being of a thing could have a univocal reference to a supernatural reality, and this is excluded from the beginning by the very supernatural character of that which is to be shown. Such a reference can be effected therefore only by means of the word. For only in the word is there the possibility of negation pointing to another reality. Only the supervening of such a negation can transmute a positive mundane thing into the sign of a supernatural reality. We conclude,

[1] Cf. for what follows: K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich 1941), pp. 189 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

therefore, that among the intrinsic constitutive elements of the presence of a fact of salvation within human history – here in the first place the saving reality of Christ himself – must be numbered the word as sign.

This means in the first place that the Christian salvation-reality is essentially sacramental. For we may justly call sacramental all divine, supernatural salvation-reality which takes place in history and is therefore present to us only in sign. And this leads secondly to the conclusion, that the word belongs to the fundamental constitutive elements of sacramental reality, and this in such a way that the 'sacramental' function is inherent in the word when it first makes its appearance in the essence of Christianity. For if Christianity in its foundation and origin is not primarily the communication of truths (as true propositions) but the reality of the incarnate, crucified and risen Son of God, and if this fundamental reality (as salvation-reality for us in the order of our existence) includes the word as an intrinsic element, then this can only mean that in its first Christian application the word is sacramental: a sign in which the saving will of God is made present for us in our history.

The Christian word – or to express it differently: the word, in so far as it is Christian – is not primarily a discussion about something already given in other ways, not a means for reaching understanding between two persons about an object which each of them can attain in his own way, but a making present of the salvation-reality itself. As applied to Christ, this means that his revelation is not originally an imparting of true propositions, which perhaps no one would have thought of otherwise, but the self-revelation of his own being, a self-revelation by means of which he first becomes the Christ for us. Christian preaching (i.e. [246] the Christian word where it is not 'forma sacramenti' in the usual sense) is therefore nothing more than the further exposition of, or preparation for, the strictly sacramental word: it is always founded upon this, indeed it is in the wider sense itself 'sacramental': the sign of the hidden and yet present salvation-reality of Christ, a sign which – in the case of the strictly sacramental word – itself brings about this presence.

From what we have said there follows the strict inner unity of the Christian priesthood, in other words the inner, essential belonging together of the elements of the Catholic priesthood: the inner complementary relationship and mutual conditioning of the concepts of (cultic) priesthood and prophetism.

The priesthood of Christ himself (to direct our attention to that for the moment) comprises both these elements in an interior unity. It is more than prophecy, revelation of the word, a mission to preach, because Christ as God-man is himself the decisive salvation-reality: mediator and therefore priest and victim. But because this salvation-reality is sacramental, that is, given to us only under its sign, it must authenticate itself in the word, it must make itself present to us through the word; it cannot as it were passively await our active grasping of it, but on the contrary must itself seize hold of us; it will thus of itself bring about the inner condition of its own possibility: word, preaching, the demand for obedience, in a word the prophetic apostolate. Prophecy and Apostolate – as a laying-claim to the obedience of the hearer of the message of truth – are an essential part of the priesthood of Christ, because this priesthood is on the one hand not brought into being from below, from man, but is a creative act of God himself, and because it is on the other hand sacramental, that is in need of a presence in the word.

The same is now true of the official priesthood in the Church. It, too, as the fullness of power to make present the salvation-reality of Christ in the sacramental word, is by its nature prophetic and apostolic. But since this cultic and prophetic fullness of power of the official priesthood is merely subservient to the unique priesthood of Christ and consequently appears in a peculiar way as enfeebled, the inner unity of elements in the official priesthood of the Church can be rightly understood only in connection with this 'enfeeblement' of the cultic priesthood and prophetism in the official ministerial priesthood of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(b) The enfeeblement of (cultic) priesthood and prophetism in the official priesthood of the Church. We must note, to begin with, the eschatological [247] uniqueness and finality of the priesthood of Christ. The sacramental salvation-reality of Christ – in the Incarnation and the sacrifice of the Cross – is the one and only truly valid and final saving act of God in the world and therefore the one and only final mediation between God and man. In so far as it is final, that is, in so far as it cannot now be surpassed by any event whether initiated by man or by God, the history of salvation is in principle concluded; the end of time is here, the salvation-reality of Christ is eschatological.

The same is then true of the sacramental word in which this salvation-reality manifests itself: it participates in its eschatological and definitive character. It is impossible for a new word of God to supervene in the present history of humanity so as to surpass the former and render it transitory. God has spoken his last saving word belonging to the confines of present human history, of this aeon, as an element forming part of it, at a particular, determined spatio-temporal point within this history: in Jesus, in him and him alone as absolutely final. If he speaks again, his word is the dissolution of this aeon, or more accurately the revelation of the fact that it is already past.

Before we can utilize this insight to throw light directly upon the nature of the official priesthood, we must consider another point: the relationship of Christ to the Church. Since Christ is the historically sacramental salvific will of God and member of our unique humanity and is both definitively, with him the 'Church' is necessarily already given in principle, because there is always now present an abiding grace (Spirit) and an abiding, visible (historical) medium of this Spirit in the sphere of human history. Every man lives necessarily in an order of existence which includes the reality of Christ.[2] The order of human history to which Christ belongs is already 'Church'; not yet indeed in the sense of a visible society which continues the making-visible in Christ of the salvific will of God and which was authoritatively organized as visible by Christ himself, the society of those who have existentially ('believing') submitted to the demands made by this reality; but certainly in the sense that the historical order of man's existential decision has become, before any visible organization of the Church, through the Incarnation and the [248] Cross, already quite different from one in which Christ did not exist; we must say, therefore, that the visible organization of the Church does not first create this order but is called into being by it and is no more than its necessary expression.

This 'ecclesial' order must not be confused with a 'metahistorical' salvific will of God falsely conceived as intrinsically necessary, 'universal' (therefore abstract) and ideal; for in the first place the true salvific will of God is itself already a free act of God and thus a fact of divine history, and in the second it is through Christ as a human historical reality also a fact of human history. It was nothing less than this that the Fathers had in mind, for example, when they spoke of a marriage between the Logos and humanity constituting the Church by means of the Incarnation; or modern theology when it still says that there can be the grace of Christ (and not merely of God) even outside the Church although there is no salvation outside the 'Church'.

If the 'Church' is then, before being the visible social organization – even though this is its necessary expression – the social accessibility of the historico-sacramental permanent presence of the salvation-reality of Christ, a society founded in its essential features immediately by the mere existence of Christ himself, it follows that those who hold offices

[2] Cf. for what follows: K. Rahner, 'Membership of the Church according to the teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical "Mystici Corporis Christi" ', Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 1-88. Here (particularly in the third part) is explained more precisely what we understand by Church in inverted commas.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

within that visible social organization of the Church do not first create the 'Church', that is the possibility of the universal historical mediation of salvation, but presuppose it. They are therefore never 'mediators' in the sense of being empowered to initiate action as a 'middle person' between God and man, as though previously there had been a chasm which they are now for the first time bridging; they are merely the more concrete visible aspects, analogous to sacramental signs, of a 'medium' ('Church') between God and man already established by Christ – and by him alone! They only approximate again to the original sense of the word 'mediator' in so far as a deliberate and voluntary rejection of this visible manifestation would be equivalent to a refusal of the salvation-reality of Christ. The more accurate determination of the relationship between Christ – 'Church' (faithful 'laypeople') on the one hand and holders of offices in the Church on the other will be most easily grasped if we turn to consider the individual functions of the hierarchic priesthood.

(i) Cultic priesthood. It is the power continually to make sacramentally present the historical salvation-reality of Christ in its twofold meaning of [249] propitiation of God (sacrifice) and grace given to man (sacrament). It is a question merely of a making-present of the salvation-reality of Christ, because it possesses eschatological exclusiveness and finality and so no sacrifice and no grace is possible outside of it. Thus the cultic priesthood of the Church is only a ministerial priesthood for and in the priesthood and victimhood of Christ; it does not institute of itself the sacrificial worship and the sacrificial propitiation of God and does not produce the salvific will of God towards man, but merely makes all this present for us as an ever-new sacramental reality of our own lives. What is brought about in the sacrifice of the official priest is not his own disposition, displayed in the form of liturgical action, of adoring and self-sacrificing surrender to God – something of itself implied in the concept of 'priest' – but the sacramental making-present of the eschatologically final sacrificial disposition and sacrificial act of Jesus himself.[3]

This, however, involves a further weakening of the priestly character in the official priesthood; in so far as Christ himself has from the first offered his sacrifice as head of the human race, the sacrificial act of Christ rendered sacramentally present in the cult of the official priest 'belongs' from the first to the Church as a whole; consequently the official priest makes it present from the first as the sacrifice of the Church, he 'dispenses' to men the grace which belongs from the first not to him but to them. In so far as Christ has offered the sacrifice of the Cross as a sacrifice of humanity as a whole and as a consequence it belongs to everyone who is a member of it and so of Him, the universal priesthood of all the faithful is anterior to the official priesthood and not merely its weak reflection. This does not alter the fact that the right and the power of making this sacrifice sacramentally present is exclusively proper to the official priesthood alone – and this by the immediate will of Christ himself. But the official priest makes it present as the sacrifice of the Church, and consequently as regards the possibility of an existential appropriation of this sacrifice by entering in faith into the sacrificial act of Christ himself who offered his sacrifice immediately for all, the official priesthood has no advantage over the universal priesthood. This conclusion may also be derived from the fact that this existential appropriation has no immediate and indispensable significance for producing the sacramental re-presentation of the sacrifice of Christ.

Yet this exercise of official cultic power must be called priesthood, [250] firstly in so far as (and only in so far as) the concept of 'priesthood' denotes immediately only the power to posit the external cultic action and not the possibility of producing the corresponding inner disposition, so that the priest is really 'offering sacrifice',[4] although his sacrifice is meaningful only as the visible expression of the sacrifice of Christ; secondly, in so far as the

[3] Cf. K. Rahner, Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951).
[4] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Die vielen Messen als die vielen Opfer Christi', ZKT LXXVII (1955) pp. 94-101.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

making sacramentally present of the salvation-mystery of Christ (in sacrifice and sacrament) is not merely the sensible representation of its being always present already in a purely 'spiritual' way, but a liturgico-sacramental action which really makes present the salvation-mystery for us, a 'visible' and 'external' manifestation, in which what is 'invisible', 'internal' in the working of God's grace is itself first brought about. The priesthood of the official priest is accordingly purely a ministerial one both in relation to the active existential priesthood of Christ, and to the passive existential priesthood of the faithful, in so far as it makes a permanent sacramental presence possible to both.

(ii) Prophetism in Christianity. In so far as Christ is the eschatologically final revelation of God to mankind, in Christendom there can no longer be prophecy in the public historical sphere. For there are no longer prophets who are the focal point of a fundamentally novel intervention of God in the external history of mankind,[5] an intervention which would invalidate or radically transform the free action of God in the past. Hence there can exist in Christianity, when the question of an activity related to that of the prophets is raised, only the continuing witness to the revelation of Jesus, which in its turn is no more than the self-manifestation of his own salvation-reality in word. On the other hand, in so far as the enduring message of Jesus is an intrinsic element of the permanent presence of the salvation-reality of Christ in the world, it cannot be reduced to the level of a merely historical human memory of something said long ago: precisely because the revelation of God through the mouth of Jesus possesses an eschatologically definitive character, not only is it impossible for it to give way to a new word of God, it cannot even disappear so as to leave, as it were, an empty space, which, because it would leave itself open to a new revelation of God, would likewise negate the eschatologically definitive character of the message of Jesus.

[251] Consequently the word of Jesus continues to sound as it was spoken, that is to say not as merely human discourse 'about' something, but as the self-attestation of the historico-sacramental salvific will of God in Christ; it continues to sound therefore as the mode in which this salvation-reality is to bring its redemptive influence to bear upon man, and that means as accompanied and carried by the working of the grace of this reality.

This word is therefore pneumatic; in the first place, corresponding to its purpose, at least in him who hears it; it is a word listened to with faith in the Spirit of God, a charismatic, 'sacramental' word. But in him who speaks it, too, it is an operation of spirit, charismatic, at least in so far as it is a word which is meant to produce grace in the hearer. (Whether and under what conditions the uttering of this word redounds and is meant to redound to the salvation of the utterer himself, whether in other words it proceeds from a charism which has an existential significance for the speaker himself, will be discussed below under III, pp. 253 sqq.)

Therefore in so far as the preacher is merely the bearer of the reverberations of the message of Christ exclusively, he is no more than a 'son of the prophet'; but because it is a real continuing of this message itself in its own proper character, he is not merely a rabbinic scholar, not merely a theological expert, but a genuine 'prophet', if we understand by this word – for want of another – a man whose word is not merely a talking about the word of God, but a man in whose word the saving word of God itself makes contact with mankind.

From another point of view yet does 'prophetism' in Christianity reveal itself as peculiarly weakened. Christian faith is not merely a knowledge of certain objects accepted on the authority of God, but a knowledge of that reality in which we ourselves are, in Christ; existentially involved. Even in the knowledge of faith we do not progress beyond the bounds of what is significant for our existence. For the absolute necessity of revelation derives from [5] For a discussion of the question of what is still positively possible in this regard, cf. K. Rahner, Visions and Prophecies (London 1963), especially pp. 18-30.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the existence of a supernatural order of being. The revealed word therefore does not extend our knowledge of any objects no matter how knowable and in some respects worth knowing, but aids us towards a kind of 'self-understanding', that is towards a knowledge concerning the depths of our actual existence created by grace. Because we are ontologically children of God through the Spirit with Christ, the uncreated Son of the Father, therefore we must know about this being of ours and consequently about the mystery of God's [252] Trinity and the mystery of God in Christ. But in these mysteries is included the whole of revelation.

Now this depth of man's being of which he becomes conscious in faith – still prescinding from the question as to whether he is fulfilling it or not – is established by Christ alone even before a single word of our preaching reaches man. Therefore the preaching of the word in point of fact reaches a man who by his ontological status – which is not to say necessarily 'by an effective existential assuming of it upon himself' – already inhabits that order of reality which is announced by the message.[6] Only because the means of grace ('Church') already belong to his existence is he a potential hearer of the Christian message of faith. This latter is accordingly really an awakening, even though an absolutely necessary one, of that Christian self-consciousness which has already been in principle established in us with the 'anointing' which is in us. And so preaching does not bring to man anything new or strange which hitherto lay outside the sphere of his human concepts and symbols.

We do not of course imply in any way at all by what we have said that man could have an express conceptual grasp, such as is absolutely required for an existential disposition of himself, of these supernatural depths of his being even without the humanly accessible word of revelation coming from without and claiming obedience, merely by a reflex 'interpretation' of his religious experience. The intrinsically supernatural existential sphere of man is not authenticated for man's objective reflection expressible in propositions out of its own resources in the experience of man – that would be the Modernistic error which in the last analysis under-values the supernatural depth of this sphere – but its presence is testified to expressibly and univocally only in the spoken word of Revelation.

And yet it remains true that the proclaimed word is the attestation of a reality which, even prior to this word, has always belonged to the total reality and total potentiality of the concrete man as found in the actually existing order, has always belonged to it because Christ and therefore 'Church' is a reality in the concrete existence of every man. And so the prophetic word of the messenger of faith is certainly creative, because it brings about a growth of supernatural reality; but it is not the first intervention of it in the human order, on the contrary it presupposes it, because [253] it is always speech to someone who 'has ears', and must have, for this particular speech.

Let us summarize what we have said up to this point: the official priesthood of the Church is cultic-prophetic with an inner unity and essential complementary character of these two elements, such that the prophetic grows out of the cultic and first brings it to full realization. Thereby it is from the cultic and prophetic point of view true priesthood, because in its cult it does not merely 'symbolize' an absent reality, but really makes present something already made real by Christ, and in its real mission it speaks the real prophetic word of God and does not just proclaim its own opinion about religious matters. And yet both elements have, both towards Christ and towards the Body of Christ, a subservient function which presupposes the reality of Christ and of the Church: the cultic action is subservient both to the priesthood of Christ – in so far as it is simply the sacramental presentation of his eschatologically complete and definitive sacrifice – and to the existential priesthood of the faithful – in so far as by means of this presentation it makes possible the existential co-offering and appropriating of the sacrifice of Christ by the universal priesthood. The prophetic activity is subservient to the [6] Cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1961), pp. 319-346.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation prophet Christ – in so far as it propagates only his message, even though charismatically transmitted – and to the faithful – in so far as the word of Christ can be proclaimed by his messengers only in a realm which has already been enlightened by the prior light of the Logos.

III. PRIESTLY EXISTENCE

We are now in a position directly to tackle the question whether and by what means the office of priest as we have determined it provides a foundation for existence, in other words, whether and how it affects the total existence of man as such in a way to lend it a specific character.

But before we do this, let us briefly reject as impossible one way of solving this question which might occur to someone. One might be tempted, that is, to answer the question we have posed on the basis of dogmatic teaching concerning the character of Orders. But a priori we cannot expect this way to lead to our goal. For either we understand by the permanent, ineradicable character conferred by the Sacrament of Orders the priestly life and priestly powers – leaving aside the moral supernatural power given in addition by the sacrament to exercise this [254] office rightly for the salvation of oneself and others – and then we are merely posing in different words the same question we are asking here, whether and how the priesthood (the 'character') is existentially significant; for we do not have any theological right to connect the character only with the cultic and sacramental fullness of power of the priest to the exclusion of the apostolic powers; and the reason for this is, as we have shown already, that with the cultic fullness of power there is given already in germ a mission to the word – there is in fact as much need for a 'missio canonica' for the actual exercise of the cultic office as for preaching, and both are 'valid' even without it, provided that the spoken word in cult and preaching is 'true'. Or else the character is conceived in a narrower sense as an inner 'indestructible' spiritual mark, but then we are able to say so little about it with theological exactitude and its determinations necessarily remain so restricted to formal generalities, if they are not to fall back into statements about the priesthood, that it will yield nothing useful for the answering of our question.

In the examination of our question, then, we may in the first place indicate some theological reasons which permit us to affirm the fact of an existential significance, even before we have uncovered the reason why and how it is so. The most essential of these theological reasons is simply the fact that the rite of conferring the office of the priesthood is a sacrament. The conferring of the fullness of power of an office and an official authorization on the one hand, and a sacrament as a conferring of grace on the other, are two events which at first sight point in quite different directions. Official power and official authorization connote in their general, formal concept the possibility of a man as a public person exercising a specific activity directed to the community: grace, on the contrary, the disposition of a person in his innermost existential kernel towards God and his own salvation. Therefore the conferring of both these in an inseparable union in the actual sacrament of Orders is explicable only on the assumption that the determinate, concrete content of that official power which is precisely here, in question essentially affects the existential kernel of the person concerned, since if any kind of meaningfulness of a 'calling' were sufficient for existence, than every taking up of any kind of profession would have an equal 'right' to be a sacramental sign of grace.

Now, if it is the case that, on the one hand, there are 'Vocational Sacraments', 'sacraments of a state of life' (Orders and Matrimony) and that, on the other, not every (stable) profession is such a sacrament, and if [255] further these two facts cannot be ascribed to a mere arbitrary

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

disposition of God, then we can render a satisfactory account of them only by saying that taking upon oneself a profession is a sign of sanctifying grace in all those cases, but only in those cases, where a profession determines the sphere of existential life of the Christian in a new and specifically proper way.[7] This is in fact the case with regard to the one 'vocation' – if we leave out of consideration for the moment the priesthood – to which what has been said is applicable, namely marriage. It does not apply, as we said before at the very beginning, to the other 'civic' vocations; they are – from the Christian existential stand-point – only inessential variations of the one Christian being and life which was taken up with Baptism and Confirmation as characterizing sacraments, and not therefore new sacraments. Or – to look at it the opposite way – the vocational sacrament of 'ordinary' Christian life is Baptism-Confirmation.

The only 'vocation' which one might be tempted to regard as being of fundamental existential significance although no special sacramental equipment is assigned to it, is the ascetical life, the monastic state. (In fact it may be observed how there was a tendency from ancient times right up to the Middle Ages to accord a sacramental significance to monastic initiation, or at least to exalt it in terms reminiscent of the theology of baptism.) But one will have to say that the ascetic is only living out on the social level, both ecclesiastic and civil, that 'vocation', that eschatological calling, which was taken up at Baptism and which is lived equally by other Christians, though in a manner remaining more in the background and sociologically not so much in evidence.[8] The monk does not receive [256] in addition to his baptismal vocation a new vocation which would cast his baptismal vocation in a new mould – something which would demand a new sacrament, but lives in a certain sense and to a certain degree the universal baptismal vocation of every Christian, the life of the 'future' aeon, already here and now in a more open way without its being veiled by the demands of the aeon which is now externally present. The fact that the peculiarities of monastic life (e.g. initiation, renunciation of property, monastic dress, etc.) were viewed as parallel to the corresponding elements in Baptism, can therefore equally well be explained in this way. Monastic life is only a development of the baptismal life and therefore in spite of its necessarily existential, but not necessarily new existential, significance not a new sacrament. Hence we can say that the official priesthood as a vocational sacrament must have a necessary, new existential significance, before we know why it should be so, indeed even if the following attempt to demonstrate this reason should prove unsuccessful.

The attempt to demonstrate the existential meaning of the office of the priesthood will have to be carried out by asking which of the elements of the priesthood makes demands upon a man in such a way, and such a new way, that his existential condition is stamped with a specifically new character. It is a priori possible that either or both of the elements which we distinguished above in the priesthood should perform this function. But it should be obvious in the light of what we said above that the essentially complementary character of the two elements of the concrete official priesthood which we there established cannot be forgotten

[7] In itself, the question as to why certain callings are sacraments and why most are not could be approached from the side of the Church. One could say: a state of life is a sacrament only where it has a specifically proper and special role within the public life of the Church. For in this case such a state of life is a particular actualization (a fundamental fulfilment) of the essence and life of the Church herself, which as the basic sacrament, the foundational sign of grace in the world, establishes such a fundamental actualization of her own being as a sacrament. Such considerations are not intended to render superfluous the positive bringing into being of the individual sacraments by a constitutive act of Christ. But the merest glance at the sacrament of matrimony, at the question of how it can be known (even by the Church herself) that matrimony is a sacrament, shows that such fundamental considerations may not be rejected as superfluous speculations in favour of a theological Positivism. However, considerations leading in the direction of the Church are in the context of our present discussion too much of a digression.

[8] Cf. what we have said above (pp. 47 sqq.) in 'Reflections on the Theology of Renunciation'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even though we should come to the conclusion that only one of the two elements is existentially fundamental. In so far as the two elements are intrinsically connected they naturally both share in the existential significance of the priesthood, if such there be at all. Only in so far as the two elements can be distinguished at all is the question possible, to which of them is this significance to be attributed. And only in this sense should the 'one-sidedness' of what follows be understood.

It appears to us, then, that the cultic power of the official priest is not immediately as such existentially basic. In the first place we notice how little the exercise of this power is capable of occupying, even purely as regards time, the whole life of a man. But more important and more decisive as a point of departure for proving our assertion is the simple fact that the efficaciousness of the cultic powers strictly as such is absolutely [257] independent of the human, existential contribution of the bearer of those powers. We are not thereby denying in any way that the cultic act, even though it is in any case performed 'validly' independently of the 'worthiness' of the priest, does demand a corresponding existential attitude on the part of the priest, and this because the cultic act as such is after all brought about only by a free act of the priest ('intentio') and therefore it would be a self-contradiction if the meaning of this action pointed in a direction which did not correspond to that of the existential attitude of him who performed this action. But if the priest enters into the meaning of his cultic activity, then he assumes in fact that existential attitude which is proper to the universal 'existential' priesthood of which we spoke above. In more concrete terms: because he is offering the sacrifice liturgically as an official priest by a freely posited act of his, he must also enter into his official action with his inner personal dispositions; he must offer the sacrifice also as his own offering and must personally appropriate to himself in faith and love the sacrifice of Christ made present therein. But when he does this, he is only positing precisely that act to which every Christian is called. Existentially he cannot appropriate to himself the sacrifice as his own any more than an 'ordinary' Christian, because the sacrifice of Christ is intended for the whole Body of Christ in a way objectively prior to the commission given to the priest to render it present by his official act.[9] Hence the cultic power of the priest as such is a new obligation to bring to development the old 'vocation' given by Baptism and Confirmation; not a new obligation to a new vocation of existential import not previously possessed.

The case is quite otherwise with the apostolic, 'prophetic' element in the priesthood. This involves a calling which lays claim (1) to the whole existence of him who is called and (2) in quite a new way.

1. It lays claim to the whole existence of the person. The work of evangelization, the actively challenging claim upon the obedience of men faced with the salvation-reality and message of Christ is a work which itself imposes no limits in the demands it makes upon the time and life of the apostle, though such a limitation is externally imposed by the practical necessities of life. But what is more important: the preaching of the Gospel demands, on the evidence of the Gospel itself, not merely as a matter of fact, the personal commitment of the apostle (his time, his work, etc.) but assumes this into itself as its inmost element. For the [258] preaching of the Gospel of Christ is not only an exposition of 'objective truths evident in themselves', in which the person should as far as possible be left out of consideration and certainly is of no consequence for the claim of these truths to credence, but depends entirely by reason of its own particular nature on the personal existential commitment of the preacher.

Even leaving aside for the moment the general question whether it is not the case that every existentially significant truth – even where it is not a 'truth of revelation' – cannot be genuinely transmitted from one person to another unless it is possessed by the teacher not merely intellectually as a proposition but as something existentially realized by him, this is at [9] Cf. K. Rahner, Die vielen Messen and das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951), pp. 72 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

any rate valid for the truth of the Gospel. For being hidden in itself it has to be shown as true and as rightfully claiming assent by the proof of the Pneuma and God's power (1 Co 2:4).

We do not intend to set out here the Biblical theology of the Kerygma, i.e. the preaching on the part of the emissary from God which claims assent in faith. But it would doubtless lead us to conclude that the proclaiming of God's message is essentially a speaking in the Holy Spirit and in the power of God, and that all prophesying and teaching is a pneumatic charism; and this not only according to the modern understanding of the ecstatic-charismatic where it bears the character of the extraordinary, but in principle always wherever it serves the edification of the Body of Christ. It would certainly appear further that the customary division between gratia gratum faciens – grace for one's own sanctification – and gratia gratis data – grace for the sanctification of others – a division which presupposes that a power given by the Holy Spirit for the building up of the Body of Christ can be completely without significance for the personal holiness of the person concerned, is in our case oversimplified and does not correspond to the scriptural conception.

What is charismatic in the preacher of the Gospel is for St Paul more than merely external jurisdiction and a juridically valid mission, but also more (because less!) than a wonderful gift for influencing others: it is for example a spirit of action, of love and of discipline (2 Tm 2:6-7). But if the charism of the Holy Spirit which is necessary for the preaching of the Gospel, and in which the preaching proves itself to be true and justified in claiming obedience is a charism sanctifying the preacher himself and therefore determining his existence, then this means nothing else than that the proclamation of the Gospel is essentially dependent upon the [259] evident fact that the grace which is preached is a reality in the preacher himself.

It is certainly true that preaching does not become 'wrong' but remains 'right' even if it is not an existential reality in the preacher. But the words in some way no longer flow at the level to which they are essentially ordered, they become unreal in contradiction to the innermost demand of their being, they become – to express it in modern theological language – like profane speech about Fundamental Theology or about Christian Religious Knowledge instead of a call to faith; words which are fundamentally no longer distinguishable from those of profane science, because while they can appeal to the logical faculty of the hearer, they cannot compel a decision of faith.[10]

The truth and the rightness of a proposition are after all not the same. The true proposition has as such (and not merely as a condition for action) a reference to the existence of the man; in the ultimate analysis this is so because there are no 'propositions in themselves', but they are always in their concrete presence an act of man: one has only to reflect on the fact, for example, that faith as an intellectual virtue has value for salvation. There exists not only an analogy of being, but also an analogy of truth, i.e. right propositions have within the sphere of rightness (by analogy with real existents within the sphere of being) a varying concentration of truth. And just as and because the analogous entitative power of a being is measured by the degree of its inwardness, of being present to itself, therefore of its existentiality, in the same way and for the same reason the concentration of truth in a true proposition is measured by the degree in which it affects the existence of a being.

This being so, there must surely be an analogous gradation in the existential commitment involved in the knowing and proclaiming of such intrinsically variable truths. The higher the [10] It must be noted that in the foregoing we have indicated merely the most basic relationship. In fact the situation is somewhat more complicated: the 'unholy' preacher can still proclaim a 'true' and not merely 'right' word in so far as even he is still speaking in the name and in the domain of the 'holy' Church. But it remains true that the message of the Church would continue to be only 'right' and no longer 'true' if the Church could cease to be 'holy'. And this is also of fundamental importance for the existence of the one who proclaims her truth. Cf. above the article on 'The Church of the Saints', pp. 91 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

object known, the higher is the knowledge, the truth of it, and therefore the more this truth affects and demands existence. Where it is a question of the truth [260] of God as disclosing himself, we reach the supreme degree of the existentiality of truth. Where this truth is not spoken with the corresponding existential commitment – and what alone corresponds to it is an existence which had first to be made 'congenial' in its being to this truth by the communication of the divine Pneuma, so that such a commitment is always action in the Holy Spirit – all that then remains is the dead, humanly conceived body of this truth and what it possesses is 'rightness' in its assertion, but not the truth itself, in the meaning which it itself intends. At the moment when the Church as a whole in all her preachers were to cease to be holy, at that self-same moment she would also cease to be the 'true' herald of the truth. The truth of Christianity would have ceased to be. Hence the proclamation of the revelation of God, by reason of the specific concentration of truth in its content, demands as an intrinsic element the existential commitment of the proclaimer.

Certainly this alone does not yet mean that this existential commitment (the biblical faith) which is demanded of the proclaimer is something which is not to be found in the ordinary Christian. At this point we are maintaining only that, just as the Christian message is heard genuinely – as truth – only if it be not merely, as it were, 'tolerated' as being intellectually 'right' but also believed, in the same way speech too, the proclamation as such, must also be faith. Hence we have shown up to now only the existential significance of the apostolic element, but not yet its new existential significance.

2. This preaching of the Gospel involves a claim upon the preacher in his existence in quite a new way. The official priestly herald of the message of Jesus utters his word as one who alone is authorized to make present cultically the salvation-reality of Christ. And because of this, as well as by the mission which lies upon him from Christ through the apostolic succession, he utters his word not as one addressed by the Word of God; he does not bear witness to his own Christian life as such – even though this is for him and his hearers a conditio sine qua non of a due proclamation – but he speaks the word of Christ itself as such.

It is true that every Christian by his Baptism and his Confirmation is endowed with both the right and duty of bearing witness to his faith, and it may well be that by doing this, as for example in the primitive Church, he is contributing more to the spread of the faith than the official preaching of the faith by the bishops and the priests; but he is bearing witness immediately to his faith (and thereby of course to Christ!), and [261] this both by defending it when his Christianity is attacked, and by actively bearing witness to the faith that is in him on such occasions – but only then! – whenever and in so far as his existence in the word through family, friendship, civic community life, and so on, render this necessary. For the lay Christian must naturally 'give' himself in such situations as he really is, and he is in fact Christian. Therefore the apostolate of the layman is based upon his own Christian life and is determined as it were 'from below', i.e. from his situation in the world. The layman participates mediately in the official priestly apostolate as such, only in so far as he supplies the material means of life to those who 'live from the altar' and preach the message of Christ from it.[11]

By contrast, the official priestly emissary does not bear witness to his own Christian life – even though essentially by means of it – but immediately to Christ, and this not merely on the occasions when his existence in the world of itself demands this or makes it possible, but always and everywhere; he therefore reveals himself an emissary – in contrast to Christ and (in another way) to the layman – precisely wherever he has 'no business', because he has been sent there 'from above', by Christ and not by his own situation in the world. He must, then, always put up with the fact that he will be mistaken for an unstable and impertinent

[11] Cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 319-352.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fanatic interfering in the 'private affairs' of others.

But if it is indeed the case that, on the one hand, such a mission engages the whole existence of a person and, on the other, this mission and this engagement is not already given with the general Christian or human situation of his life, then a wholly new existential significance must be assigned to such a mission. In so far as this new 'engagement' which was not there before but which comes from his mission and his apostolate is a new engagement of his faith – that is to say of something he already possesses as a Christian – it is clear that the Sacrament of Orders is essentially based upon Baptism as the Sacrament of Faith. For the sake of simplicity we leave aside the question whether the charism of preaching is not something still more than merely the power to keep the faith as a preacher in this wholly new situation. This need-to-enter-into-action of faith in the essentially new situation of the emissary is here quite sufficient to demonstrate at least an initial new existential significance of the apostolate.

[262] In so far as this significance ultimately originates in the cultic because of the connection between cult and word (even though it only becomes fully itself in the apostolate), and the cultic power is according to the will of Christ a permanent, imperishable gift, this commission of new, necessary existential significance is a permanent one, that is to say a vocation. According to what we said above a vocation of this kind is a sacrament. And the contrary too is the case: the sacrament and priestly existence, which really as such has its essential individuality, rests immediately upon the character of the priest as an emissary, though to be sure in such a way that this mission in its turn is a moment in the official cultic priesthood.

A confirmation of this manner of supporting the existential character of the priesthood may well be found in the fact that the New Testament always, when it mentions an 'ethics' of the apostle-priest at all, derives this not from the cultic but from the apostolic element in the narrower sense. (Cf. the missionary discourses of the Lord; also Ac 20:18-38; 1 Co 2:1 sqq.; 3:5-15; 4:1-21; 9:10-23; 2 Co 1-7; 10-12; Col 1:23-2:1; 1 Th 2:1-12; the Pastoral Epistles; Heb 13:7, 17; etc.)

All this has of course only laid the foundations for answering the question as to the nature of priestly existence, that is to say, the direction has been established in which the essential characteristics of the priestly mode of existence must be sought.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[263]

18

THE CONSECRATION OF THE LAYMAN TO THE CARE OF SOULS

The word ‘consecration’ always includes in its meaning two aspects: the receiving of a power and the receiving of a commission; a faculty and a calling. And so, being consecrated to the care of souls means at once that one can and that one ought to care for souls. The souls with which the care of souls is concerned are those of others: the relationship of one’s fellow man to God, his salvation and eternal destiny.

A priori, the very concept of such a care of souls embracing these two aspects seems impossible. The analysis of this difficulty will offer us the occasion for making clearer what a consecration to pastoral care must effect in one who ventures to undertake the care of souls. At the same time, we will be able to establish where in fact such a consecration takes place.

I

Human existence, wherever we may meet it, is always found to be existence in the world, is always necessarily being with others, community. But each community will also be different according to the particular spheres into which human life unfolds. It may be an external joining of forces for the acquisition of an external necessity of life: a community of work. Here men are brought together by their common external activity, by a third thing which is as yet extrinsic to man. The community of effort may consist in sharing in the creation of spiritual works of universal validity: science, art, law. These objective spiritual products are indeed as such independent of the arbitrary whim of the individual, and yet they do have a closer relationship to a man’s being, in so far as they can come into real existence only as sustained by the spiritual experience of the individual man, they strive for realization only in him. And so from them, and from [264] the work which they demand, arises the community of spirit. These spiritual products are communicated by means of speech. It is speech which first makes it possible to co-operate in the same spiritual work. Moreover, it brings man the possibility not only of pointing out such objective spiritual realities, such truths existing in themselves, but also of opening himself and revealing himself of giving to the spiritual insight of others the possibility of penetrating with comprehension into one’s own secluded, intimate interior. After all, only in speech (which does not necessarily mean sound) can the personal, spiritual countenance of a spiritual being be grasped, for this is always co-determined by liberty and therefore cannot be deduced from any other source. And so community of spirit can be extended by speech also into the community of those who reveal themselves by speaking.

Since such an unveiling of the inner secluded being of each person in himself avoids profaning the sacred character of the personal mystery only if it be offered and accepted in a love which makes of the two so much one that it is not an indifferent stranger who is allowed to enter into the sanctuary of one’s being, the community of those who reveal themselves to one another by the spoken word refers us of itself to the community of love and must be conceived as its development. Thus we have the third kind of community we must distinguish, the community of love. It is founded upon a kind of mutual sharing of one’s personal being, which is carried by love over into the other and intermingles with his. Here the basis of community is no longer a third term in which men meet one another: in the love of person for person they meet one another in themselves.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But does this mean that in this highest form of human community man can carry his own being over into the inner sanctuary of the other to such an extent that he is able to surround with loving care everything there? Or are there spheres in man which are beyond the reach even of such love? Or, to ask the question this time from the viewpoint of the 'beloved': are there in him spheres whose essential meaning is such as to withdraw them from immediate, intimate sharing by another? Yes: death – to begin with the clearest case – is a matter for each in himself alone with no reference to anything outside him. Everyone must die his own death for himself in supreme loneliness. But if it be true that all life points of itself constantly forward to death, that it is all the time a process of dying, then clearly death is merely a more obvious indication that there is present in the [265] existence of every man a deeper region in which everyone is left to himself, a line of being pointing to himself alone. In death it just becomes unavoidably evident in all its clearness that everyone has to make something of himself, to do and to suffer something by himself alone. What region of being is it, then, which reveals itself in death, which issues in it as its ultimate conclusion, which gives itself its final mark and seal in it?

It must be something in which man has to do simply with himself as such, something which is strictly his own task, which he alone can fulfil and in which no one else can substitute for him. But this is the case only where he himself is, in the strictest sense of the word, the task, where he is at once doer and deed, where doing and what is done are the same and both identical with himself. This is the case with man's liberty, where with the whole force of his nature he gives its ultimate meaning and character to his whole being, where he forms his own existence into what he wants to be. Here he is essentially alone. For the doing and what is done are inalienably his, they are as much his own as he is himself. For his action is the forming of his eternal physiognomy, it is himself in his eternal uniqueness. And hence only he himself can ever perform this act of eternal destiny. Everything that is done to a man, everything that happens to him, remains subject to the ultimate pronouncement of his liberty, in which he is still capable of understanding and accepting his lot (what is done to him, what is allotted to him); so everything that remains on this side of that ultimate personal verdict is not yet what finally counts in man. Only to a being that is not free is its 'lot' really its destiny; for the free being his destiny lies in himself. The choice which God has put into our hands we cannot confide to the care of any other.

But when man with his whole being is called to a free decision about himself, he finds himself without intermediary before his God. For He is the beginning and end of this being, the norm of every decision, and also its ideal and exemplar, even when it is a case of that supremely personal actualization of the individual's being which is outside the uniformly regular and therefore not to be brought within the compass of any humanly accessible rule. Consequently, in such a case God is still always there. He is not alongside one like a second being. He it is in whom we live and move and have our being. Indeed, in Him alone do we possess in the first place that milieu and atmosphere which first renders possible and supports our innermost and most personal decision. This it is which is deepest and ultimate in us, and yet He is deeper than we are at our [266] deepest level. He is beyond what is ultimate in us. And therefore He – and He alone – is not someone who has to wait in trembling expectation upon that word and decision of a man by which he strives to understand and form himself. He is before us, his willing and acting are therefore also before the inmost decision of man. He does not superimpose Himself on an already constituted man; He is already involved in his very constitution by his knowledge and action. He guides the hearts of kings (and in matters of the heart all are sovereigns); He has mercy on whom He wills in order that this person may have mercy on himself.

On examination, the realm of free decision reveals that the impossibility of a direct care of souls is so radical that the attempt does not merely fail in practice, but becomes evidently

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

self-contradictory. If salvation is always the fruit of a personal decision and everything outside this is not yet salvation and destiny, but at the most a lot which one merely suffers, then the attempted obtaining of the salvation of another is necessarily the obtaining of something which is not his salvation at all.

The impossibility which appears here stems both from an absence of capacity and from an absence of calling. Every influence brought to bear upon a man from outside founders powerlessly before that ultimate sanctuary wherein that which is meant to be influenced takes place. Indeed, the stronger such influence is, the more is it in danger of negating itself. It intends to be an influence in favour of liberty. The stronger it becomes, the more does liberty disappear. Yet it becomes efficacious only if the other himself opens the door of his own responsibility, freely corresponds with the 'influence' and freely introduces it into himself. Therefore if the 'influence' really enters into the ultimate decision, then it is always something dependent upon the person 'influenced' himself, something already transformed by him, therefore his own. To exercise an influence of this kind is of course a duty, but this duty is surely ultimately nothing else than the care we take that we 'do our duty', that 'we do what we can'; as for the rest, we say, it is 'his' affair and is a matter of indifference to us. So this care is not precisely care for the soul of the other (the 'rest' which is a matter of indifference to us is precisely this soul), but care to fulfil our duty: care concerning ourselves, self-care, not care of souls.

We appear then not only to be incapable of care of souls, but also not to be called to it. For though there might be such a thing as a calling to 'failure', there can be no vocation to what is self-contradictory. Further, we do not appear to be called to the care of others' souls for the more [267] profound reason that no one knows the living God in the heart of the other; each one of us is called to manifest Him in an utterly unique way in his own being as fashioned by his own decisions, yet as the ideal for this purpose He is known only to each one for himself and then only at the moment of decision.[1] For a decision is always something more than a mere application of universal laws and rules, even though it must be made in accordance with them. This being so, how could one person be called to 'care for' the decision, therefore for the 'soul', of another?

Is there then no such thing as care of souls? Is the soul of the other completely beyond our anxious care? Do we escape all responsibility for it, because we are not capable of nor called to, the care of souls? Do the wonderful words about the care of souls fundamentally only mean that a man must have a care for his own duty, for a duty does not and cannot penetrate to what is inmost in the other?

Indeed, there is a genuine care of souls, an anxiety for the soul of the other which is not merely anxiety for oneself as in duty bound to influence the other. Examining our difficulty will permit us to understand how it is possible.

We have already said that this inner inaccessibility of a man as freely deciding his own fate does not of its nature exist for God. Consequently, if we are to exercise any care for a man, then the shortest way into his inmost sanctuary will be that which leads through the infinitely distant God; any shorter route would in fact not get us there at all. In addition to the fact already mentioned, that God is the basic ground of every human decision, two things are required to make this possible: the man charged with the care of another's soul must first find the way to God, and then the way from God to the other. This is realized in the love which is poured out in us by the Holy Spirit, whom the Father has given us through Jesus Christ. A look at the effect of such love will make it clear that it does in fact travel this double road and that in doing so it does really go 'behind' the decisions of the man cared for.

The love which proceeds from God makes it possible to comprehend the decisions of the

[1] Cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 217-234.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other, in fact it is itself such comprehension.

Love 'knows' more deeply than knowledge itself. Knowledge always strives to get behind the object known, to 'get to the bottom' of it, to resolve it into its causes, its 'principles' or into the evident inner necessity [268] of its being. Where there are no such 'hidden roots', knowledge comes to a stop faced by a stranger, by itself alone it is incapable of receiving the other completely into the being of the knower, to become one with him. And this strangeness, this absence of further roots, this bare, uncomprehended fact is essentially what is first and last. The last is always the God who has freely created me at a particular time, and has freely acted with regard to me in such or such a particular way, and who would therefore remain alien and incomprehensible to me were I to meet him face to face merely by way of knowledge. It is only in and through love that this 'strange' element becomes understandable, capable of being accepted into me in a way leading to ultimate peace. In love one can ask no further questions, because love has its own light. In love all questioning is silenced. Is love unjustified in imposing silence upon all questioning? How could it be? But if on the other hand genuine questioning can be brought to silence only by an answer, then love must carry the answer within itself it must have its own intuition. Love is directed to the beloved precisely in his irreducible uniqueness, it is a giving of itself with its whole being (which is an eternal question) into the beloved You. Its own absolute character overcomes the absolute relativity which makes the appearance of every You so frighteningly foreign. And just as a decision, in spite of its unique and irreducible character, is quite clear to the one making it without its being reduced to something necessary, so it will be clear also through and in love to him alone who loves the person making that decision, because his being and his questioning now repose in the beloved and have no need of asking questions; in the other everything is quite clear and comprehensible. And so love sees clearly why the beloved God has dealt in this or that way with a particular man, with the clearness of an intuition born of loving prayer, which can never be converted into any other form in intuition. And when God acts, in a way which is free and not subject to retrospective explanation and brings it about that a man should make his own decision, then this adoring love understands why the man decides this way; this is an understanding which would not be possible at all directly from man to man, because our being does not permit of being directly transported into that region in the other where decisions are made.

It is of course true that genuine direct love from man to man has also the intention of embracing the beloved in his whole being, with his incalculable individuality, with his decisions, to 'take him as he is'. There alone [269] does true love begin. Otherwise one is loving only one's own ideal, and the other person only as object of, or means to, its realization; ii_1 other words one is loving only oneself. To this extent love already 'understands' the beloved and his decision in an 'evidence of love'. It loves the fact that he 'is as he is', 'it would not have him otherwise'. In such love the torment of the question arising from bare, irreducible factuality is resolved. But in so far as this love is directed immediately to the other person, it is, if it is not to become sinful, idolatrous love, bound to an indispensable condition; it is, therefore, almost against its nature which does not want to be bound by any condition or reservation, made relative. Whenever mistaken or evil decision is possible (and that is possible in the case of every man on this earth), love cannot love the other quite for better or worse, cannot simply love that 'he is just like that', cannot simply accept the other 'as he is'. In the face of sin there is no evidence of love. The contingent fact of free will, the shaft fatal to mere knowledge, certainly goads love to its noblest deeds. But sin as a contingent fact would be its own death if it were to make the attempt at it. It is true that the intention of immediate love too tends to include in its embrace the 'other in his decision'. But because it can neither take away this decision from the beloved, nor in any proper sense 'take care of it', nor assent to it without reservation, it fails in this ultimate attempt to embrace the other's being in his decision, it sinks back powerless in its attempt to love to the last. And because it is never given us to know with ultimate certainty what is the right decision, whether in our regard or that of the other (no one knows whether he or the other is worthy before God of love or hate) this love which desires to penetrate directly into the inmost sanctuary of the other, in order to understand in its love, must necessarily and in every case fail.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is obvious that we are only able to cast ourselves lovingly into God and to attune ourselves to the free movements of his actions towards us because he himself transports us into himself, because he himself has given us the power to love him in the ultimate secret of his reality. This we can really love immediately, presupposing the elevation of our love by God, not merely because he has given us the power to love him as the triune God, but – and this is in the present connection the decisive consideration – because his decision, his freedom is always good. And so in the case of our love for God there is not present that alien reservation which attaches of necessity to every direct love for man. Love for God, for him who acts [270] freely with man, can be unconditional. Thus there really shines in it and for it the light of its evidence. We 'comprehend' God and his action, and in his action in which he concurs with the action of man we comprehend also the action of man, and through it the man himself in his free and unique character.

Further, love can be a participation in God's care for the salvation of the other. It can be this, because it is a love of the other for God's sake.

In general, to love someone 'for the sake of someone else' is no love at all. Love after all strives to embrace the person itself of the beloved, wants to be transported into the beloved, in order that he may be enriched thereby. That it should be 'for the sake of someone else' appears to redirect the love away from the 'beloved', to reduce him to the function of a means or passageway for love in the proper sense towards a third person, to attribute to him a value only in relation to the third person, and therefore precisely not in his supreme uniqueness, as is the case with true love. This 'for the sake of' may mean 'as coming from' or 'as directed towards' a third person. It is clear right away that love 'directed towards' a third person does not sincerely love him whom it traverses on the way to the third person. For true love considers the beloved always as its 'end-goal', not as its means of access (though this does not mean that it ought not always to be subordinated to a higher and more determining love). Whoever loves someone only because this love makes possible his love for someone else (by increasing it, by attesting it, by spreading it, and so on), does not love the first person in the sense of a truly genuine, personal love.

If love for a man for the sake of someone else means to love him with a love coming from someone else, so that the first is the true end-goal of the love and the other only the region, as it were, or the standpoint from which the love proceeds, then it is impossible to understand how one man can be for another something like a 'region of love'. He, though being another, a stranger, would have to make it possible for the ultimate; uniqueness of the beloved to be presented to the love, this uniqueness would have to have in him its reason and ultimate norm, if it is to be in a position to be loved with a love proceeding from him. But this is essentially never the case. Therefore it is true to say that one does not genuinely love a man, if one loves him for the sake of another man.

All this is no longer true if the 'other' is God. Love for a man for the sake of God does not lead out of the beloved man but into him. God is not [271] another 'alongside' man. He is what is most intimate, the essential kernel of the beloved being, he is within even the inmost, the least relative, the ultimate enclosure of man in himself. He sustains it in his unfathomable love and almighty power, to which even the sovereignty of every individual is still subject. From him one can love man, whose inmost inaccessible centre can only be reached from God. Whoever loves such a God, whoever casts his whole being into God, in love and adoration and submission (for if all love is already a humble inclining of oneself, then when directed towards God it becomes adoration and self-abandonment), is by that very fact in the innermost kernel of the loved man. He has penetrated behind the ultimate mystery of that man, because he has reached where God is. He can now truly exercise the care of souls, in union with God who alone can care for souls, for he has become one spirit with him; he can now hold in the anxiously attentive hands of love the very salvation of his brother, and not merely carry out a duty which he owes to himself. For he is united with God, who has power over souls.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And because this pastoral care takes place in an act of love for God, it bears all the characteristic marks of that love. That love is adoration, surrender of one's own will to God, confidence. And so the loving will directed to the salvation of the neighbour is an adoring self-surrender, confidence, prayer. It is the care of a man who in an attitude of humility implores the salvation of his brother, but who also knows himself to be bound by love to him with whom everything is possible, a bond which permits a man to reach out into the most intimate secret of another. It is just because the care of souls is thus essentially prayer, that pastoral love, particularly when it softly enters into that abyss where a man is alone with the God of his heart, remains humble and pure and leaves the other alone with the living God in spite of the loving proximity with him thus discovered. – And so all apostolate is in its deepest essence prayer. Therefore even every form of contemplative life can be pastoral; and all pastoral activity whatever its shape and form remains prayer of love to the God of all hearts.

Now we can understand why only he who loves God can love his brother, can be a pastor: because a direct love for a man cannot penetrate efficaciously and creatively to that point where the man is in reality and properly 'himself'. All direct love does not reach as far as the real self, to the 'soul' in the sense of the capacity to make a personal choice for salvation. For that is the true biblical sense of the word 'soul', and not [272] something like an interior room where thinking and feeling take place as opposed to the external happenings in the world. Therefore a true care of 'souls' is possible only through God.

We are now in a position to say where the consecration to the care of souls is produced. Fundamentally it is Baptism which consecrates us to it. Baptism is the pouring out of love for God and therefore consecration, power, and commission to pastoral care. And every sacramental increase of grace in Penance and Eucharist is a renewed commission to go forth and search out the innermost being of our brothers and lead them to God. Everyone who is baptized is consecrated a pastor.

II

But it is not as though this pastoral love lived only in the hiddenness of an ardent supplication for the salvation of the other. Out of the inmost recesses of a soul into which only God can make his way, it gushes up again actively into those domains which are accessible to all. It also travels upon the ways where men normally encounter each other; it can carry along with it all earthly loves and all earthly communities which it meets back to where it came from and where it properly belongs; it can make of every action among men an act of apostolate.

In this way the first community which we considered at the beginning, the community of labour, can become a pastoral activity. This community arises from mutual help and service in the material concerns of life. The whole of everyday life, which consists to a large extent in working together for the necessities of this earth, can be lifted up and consecrated, and by pastoral love become an apostolate. All the cares of daily life, all 'welfare-work', ought to become 'salvation-work'; it may usefully be directed to making possible a personal saving

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

decision for God. Since all everyday activity is capable at this deeper level of being related to salvation, the love which concerns itself with the corporeal and material welfare of the neighbour can be elevated, consecrated, and transformed by the love which is directed to the salvation of the other. It is for this reason that all activity which can in any sense be called a work of Christian mercy, of charity, is in the profoundest sense pastoral work, care of souls.

In so far as this love which turns into 'charity' all merely human assistance is love of Christ, it is a continuation, a making eternal of the pastoral care of Jesus. Jesus confirmed his care for souls by miracles. And his [273] miracles were not mere philanthropic acts of the Almighty, but 'signs', witnesses to the reality and the activity of God revealing himself, therefore witnesses to his activity which was ultimately aimed at the salvation of souls; witnesses to his all-forgiving love, therefore witnesses of his care for souls. A ministering charity continues these miracles of Jesus, these signs, until at the end of time his invisible creative love has no longer any need for such external confirmation and testimony. An isolated act of charity as such will perhaps not be recognizable as a miraculous act of the spirit of Christ. But that this spirit of the love of Christ has never disappeared in all the centuries of Christian history, in all the periodic changes which normally overtake everything, even a 'spirit', but has on the contrary continued to bring forth new acts of love, this is an eternal miracle, an eternal witness to the pastoral care of Jesus. And whoever performs an act of ministering charity in the spirit of Christ inserts himself into this miracle, he bears witness to the fact that in Christ alone can salvation, can the 'soul' be found. When a Sister of 'Charity' spends a night at a sick-bed, when a mother washes nappies because in this way she is serving her child, a child with an eternal destiny, then this is pastoral love and a testimony to the pastoral love of Christ, and therefore doubly a care of souls.

The second community which we spoke of at the beginning is 'community in spirit'. It consists in each introducing the other into the realm of what is eternally true and good, in helping to make objective spiritual forms achieve a reality in men which they can recognize and love. This help is given principally in discourse, in the word. This community attains its highest form when it becomes a community with the God who unveils his being in his revealing word, when he communicates to us his inaccessible mystery. From what we have said it is clear that such a community in its deepest sense is possible only in love, i.e. when God communicates his secret not to 'strangers', but to his 'child', to someone who has already by grace been essentially admitted into his mystery, so that the word in which he reveals himself once again remains modestly confined within him. If such a community of knowledge concerning the personal mystery of God is only possible as ordered to the community of love, then conversely it is also a 'realization', a development of the community of love with God. It is because He loves us, because we are already one with Him in love, that God tells us who He is. The revealing word is an act of love, it issues from love and is proffered in love, it is a realization of love.

[274] Since the secret of a personality can never be open of itself, can never of itself be accessible to everyone from every side, the possibility of its being revealed will always and inevitably depend upon the revealing word of that personality. The personality of God has been revealed to us in his Word, which is Christ, and which he himself has uttered. This Word must be transmitted to all peoples in all times. To this each one of us, including the layman, is consecrated by the Sacrament of Confirmation. Confirmation confers on us the capacity and the commission to render witness to Christ, and to the triune God who has revealed himself in him. Every Christian – the mother who takes the child on her knee and teaches him his first prayers, the teacher who gives 'Religious Instruction', whoever proclaims his faith by a Sign of the Cross – is the ambassador of God, the bearer of the delightful and awesome secret of him who dwells in inaccessible light, whom none has ever seen. In each case God transforms the discourse proceeding from the mouth of man into his

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

own Word.

Baptism appeared to us as a consecration to the care of souls because as the basic act of God's love it communicates to man his love for God, and man first achieves in this love the possibility of pastorally reaching his fellow man in the deepest roots of his being, in that depth where his being and his freedom are committed into the hands of God. Whenever a man, armed with this power, takes upon himself the care of another, then his care is a sharing in the loving care which God bears for the salvation of that other. But because God, moved precisely by his loving will for man, unveils his own being in the testimony of revelation, the testimony which man renders to revelation is, in virtue of the Spirit of Confirmation, an expression and extension of his pastoral love for his brother, an act of that love he bears towards God and which is his consecration to the care of souls. Having entered into the love of God, man is drawn out of the eternal distance of the God he loves back towards man, following out the direction of the love of God itself; together with God he pronounces the word of love in which God wills to express his love for man as far as the region of knowledge. The enlightening Spirit of Confirmation, the Spirit of Truth, is at its deepest a Spirit of love. And so our witness of faith is an act of love, a care of souls which finds in Baptism its deepest root and which receives in Confirmation the power to transform the community of love in God into a community in the one knowledge of the personal mystery of the Eternal.

And further: every discovery of the truth, in fact every step forward [275] in the realm of the spirit, be it in the way of truth or goodness or beauty, is a step nearer to the living God who is Spirit. For each time there is a further degree of liberation from the earth, from everything that is merely material. It is true that this world of the spirit is, in relation to the God of revelation, still 'world'. But the experience of its light and shade is capable of directing the soul to him who is beyond every world, of disposing it not to miss hearing, amidst the words of the world (even that of the spirit) and its rumours, the Word which may proceed – as it did in fact proceed – from beyond every world. For only he who has in some way heard the last word that the world has to tell him – and that is the word which speaks of the distant God beyond every world – has the ears to hear the first word of God when he approaches, should this God deign to come. And so every preoccupation with the realm of the spirit, every opening of ways into it, means clearing away obstacles in the way of God when he comes in his revelation. For this reason it can be elevated and divinized by the Spirit of light and love of Confirmation. Every occasion when a truth is passed on, every act of teaching, of exhortation and education, every conversation about what is true and good and beautiful, can be pastoral, can be a part of that proclamation of the faith to which the confirmed Christian is committed. And so all community of spirit can be inserted into the most intimate community of pastoral love and receive thereby its greatest profundity and most sacred nobility.

The third community of which we spoke at the beginning is the community of love between human beings. Although this community can take on the most diverse forms, its clearest expression is certainly to be found in the community of marriage, which may therefore be representative here of every community of love: two people give themselves to each other and to their child for ever in the highest community of which the power of human loving is capable, love of the person himself. Yet we have already shown that to such love, which aims at the whole being of the other, the direct path from one into the ultimate depths of the other remains barred. Reduced to its own powers alone, the love which dares all must in this venture sink back in impotence before the 'soul' of the beloved.

In the Sacrament of Matrimony, however, this love becomes capable of the supreme act of love in the love of God. The conjugal will of love in which two baptized persons give themselves to each other in the sight of the Church is a sacramental sign productive of grace,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it engenders sanctifying grace, divine love. But this means that whenever two people by the [276] joyful Yes of their wedding-day pour out their being into each other, at the same time their being is drawn into an ever-greater loving proximity to God. By the grace of God, the way which leads to the beloved becomes a way leading to God, closeness to a human being brings about a growing closeness to God. But the way leading directly to God – this was the ultimate meaning of the first part of our discussion – is in its turn the shortest way, indeed the only way, into the ultimate depths of the beloved person, to that profundity where he is responsible for his salvation, a point to which we must penetrate if we want in our love to co-operate in his supreme good. That marriage is a Sacrament does not therefore merely mean that conjugal love is directed to God; it means rather that only then does it acquire its ultimate human profundity, because it opens up possibilities of love which are essentially inaccessible to a merely human love. Thus the Sacrament of Matrimony constitutes a new consecration to the care of souls because it is an increase of supernatural love for God and for men. In fact there is included in this consecration a special mission of the spouses towards one another. According to the teaching of the Church the Sacrament of Marriage has also as its purpose that the two partners should help one another 'more and more to form and perfect the inner man' in the image of Christ; indeed, if we consider marriage as a perfect community of life, then 'constant striving to lead one another to perfection' constitutes its true meaning. Hence the spouses have a special mission towards one another. Sacramental marriage, as an increase of divine love and a claim upon the graces proper to that state, entails the duty and the power of grace to perform this pastoral mission which are never lost to the married faithful; thus it is a new consecration to a mutual loving care for the perfection of souls in Christo Jesu.

Every Christian is consecrated to the care of souls by the love which embraces both God and man. And this mission has a twofold capacity in its zeal for the salvation of men: the Christian thus consecrated penetrates by his loving care and the power with which he is endowed into the lonely depths where an eternal destiny is fashioned, because in his love he has penetrated the even greater depths of God; and he goes forth into the whole wide world of human life right to the outermost peripheral regions, and even there is still consecrated to care for souls and their eternal salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[277]

19

THE IGNATIAN MYSTICISM OF JOY IN THE WORLD[1]

What is mysticism, and what is joy in the world (Weltfreudigkeit), and how far do these two human attitudes have something in common in the case of Ignatius of Loyola, so that one can speak of an Ignatian mysticism of joy in the world? These are clearly the questions brought to mind by the title of these considerations, and it may almost seem that the question thus posed concerns something not merely obscure but also in itself contradictory.

For what have delight in the world and mysticism in common? Does mysticism not mean God, and does joy in the world not mean world? And what do God and world have to do with one another in Christian mysticism, since for the Christian the world is in a bad way and he has heard the divine voice of free, supernatural revelation calling man out of this world into the life of God beyond the world? Surely for Ignatius, as for every mystic, those words of the first Ignatius are valid: 'Of no use to me are the frontiers of the world or the kingdoms of this present time. It is better for me to die into Christ Jesus, than to reign unto the uttermost ends of the earth.' Is not every mysticism an abandonment of the house of this life and this world and a stepping out into the night of the senses and of the spirit, in order, as all things fall silent and every star in the world is extinguished, in the dissolution of everything created with Christ crucified and abandoned, precisely in that way to become aware of uncreated being? Once more, what have mysticism and joy in the world in common? This is asked not in the sense of a harmless rhetorical question, where the [278] question disappears as soon as it receives an answer and that answer is explained. We are concerned here much more with a question which will be fully answered only when in the answer the question itself is transformed and given its correct meaning. For the question we contemplated above seems to assume at first sight that we know what joy in the world is. In truth, however, only the answer to the question can really tell us what we meant when we asked about the joy in the world in Ignatian mysticism. Certainly, this title will evoke this or that concept in our mind, perhaps something great and important. But how do we know that what we are understanding by it is that joy in the world which is that of the mystic? It is surely evident from the start that not every thinkable form of orientation to the world, acceptance of the world, delight in the world, or whatever one may call an attitude of readiness to enter into the world, into its beauty and its mission, in a loving and effective way – that not every thinkable form of such an approving reference to the world can be that of the mystic. What then is the joy in the world of the mystic, in particular of Ignatius? This much can surely be taken as evident through this simple consideration: our question can not be tackled by presupposing some particular conception of joy in the world which we import into it, and then seeing whether we can discover this joy in the world which is ours also in Ignatius. But whether we will by this means find the inner law of that life and the original spirit of his doctrine seems to be more than questionable. I fear that in the end we would merely have discovered our own spirit and its doubtfulness. This, then, is the only way which is open to us: to investigate the mysticism of Ignatius and to advance from it to an understanding of what at all can be meant by Ignatian and therefore Jesuit joy in the world.

[1] The formulation of this theme was determined by a request for a paper on the subject under this heading. It did not seem necessary to make artificial alterations afterwards in order to conceal this. The thoughts developed in this paper are closely akin to the theses discussed above in 'Reflections on the Theology of Renunciation' and 'The Passion and Asceticism'. This too could not be altered subsequently.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I. THE MYSTICISM OF IGNATIUS

There are some words in which the knowledge, the hope and the love, the ideals of whole generations and centuries are gathered, words which attempt to say at once all that moves mankind, and which, because they attempt to say everything, are in constant danger of signifying everything and therefore nothing. Such words were, for example, in the history of Western man: Logos, Illumination, Spirit, Nation (Volk), and others. And among them also belongs the word 'mysticism'. This too is one of those words in which man seeks to comprise everything that he believes [279] and wants to be. It has a meaning for the composer of the Upanishads and for Lao-Tse, for Plotinus and the devout adherent of the Sufis, for a Gregory of Nyssa, a Paracelsus and a Goethe. But what meaning remains to this word, if it has something to say to all of these?

We are not going to attempt here to enunciate exactly what Christian mysticism is. This would involve expounding too many things which could neither be made comprehensible in a short treatment nor factually demonstrated. One would have to speak of the right method to adopt in one's approach, if one really wanted to discover what Christian mysticism is. One would have to ask whether there is a 'natural' mysticism and how (and even if) it is distinct from Christian mysticism (apart from the fact that those mystical acts whose specific essence is natural would be elevated by grace like other personal acts). One would have to ask whether supernatural mysticism may be found outside Christianity (and in what its supernatural character consists, a question which amounts to the same as the previous one). One would have to discuss the central phenomenon of Christian mysticism, which is today generally taken to be infused contemplation (and is probably distinguished a little too sharply from the other phenomena of ecstasies, visions and so on). One would have to ask whether the experimental contact with grace in infused contemplation (which one likes to regard as the essence of mysticism) is compatible with the theological data concerning the nature of grace, whether, in other words, a true experiencing of grace, in the strict sense of a grasping of the experienced reality in its proper intelligibility and its own being, is reconcilable with the fact that grace is necessarily and invariably also uncreated grace (where it is really entitatively supernatural) and whether such an experience would not be conceptually identical with the Beatific Vision. Theologically, therefore, the question would have to be posed, whether and how there can be any middle term between faith and immediate vision of God, and if not, how then mystical experience should be conceived so that it remains really genuine and yet falls unmistakably into the sphere of faith. It will be understood that we cannot enter here upon these and many other similar questions. Moreover, it is not here really necessary. We do after all possess a vague empirical concept of Christian mysticism: the religious experiences of the Saints, all that they experienced of closeness to God, of higher impulses, of visions, inspirations, of the consciousness of being under the special and personal guidance of the Holy Spirit, of ecstasies, etc., all this is comprised in our [280] understanding of the word mysticism, without our having to stop here to ask what exactly it is that is of ultimate importance in all this, and in what more precisely this proper element consists. In this sense we may now state that Ignatius was really a mystic.

There can be no doubt about that. With this bare statement we must here be satisfied. Not as though we had no historical information about his mysticism: we cannot of course use as a term of comparison our knowledge of the interior life of the great Spanish mystics Theresa and John of the Cross, nevertheless we are very well informed about the mystical grace-life of St Ignatius as well. A careful analysis of his Book of Exercises, of his autobiographical notes, of the fragments of his diary, of the information given by his trusted companions – by a Laynez, Nadal and Polanco – give us indeed a quite clear picture of his mysticism. But we do not want to tell here the story of his pati divina, as he himself called it. Neither its characteristics: his mysticism of Jesus and the Cross, his priestly liturgical mysticism, his mysticism of the Trinity; nor the history of his mystical progress: from the first visionary experiences in Manresa, his primitive Church, as he called this period, through the time in upper Italy whose climax was the vision of La Storta, to the Roman period, the time of his mystical completion, where he lives always in the presence of his God in a manner beyond the visionary, so that Laynez, the great theologian and trusted friend, can say of him: 'visiones omnes tum reatles . . . tum per species et repraesentationes iam transgressus versatur nunc in pure intellectualibus, in unitate Dei'. Whoever knows but a little of the theory of Catholic mysticism will be able to gauge at least from a distance what these simple words of Laynez permit us to surmise of the long ascent of this mystic, until he entered into the simple, illuminated darkness of God: in unitatem Dei.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But we are not concerned to speak of these things here. For we have to treat of his mysticism here only in so far as it renders comprehensible the fact and the nature of that which we commonly call Ignatian joy in the world. When we seek to comprehend his mysticism under this aspect, then it is obviously no longer of importance to isolate that characteristic of mystic piety by which it is distinguished from a 'normal' piety and way of prayer, one which does not possess the characteristic of immediate contact with God in the same way and to the same degree as is met with in the experience of the mystic. Therefore as long as we keep in mind that the characteristic piety of a mystic is given a special depth and power by [281] the specifically mystic element of his piety, we may simply proceed to discuss the character of Ignatian piety, from which the fact and the meaning of its acceptance of the world will become understandable.

When we try to explain Ignatian piety under this aspect, then – so it appears to us – we have to lay down two propositions about it:

1.Ignatian piety is a piety of the Cross, and therein is revealed its inner continuity with the universal stream of Christian piety before it and so its Christian character.

2. Ignatian piety, because it is Christian, is directed to the God beyond the whole world, and it is precisely in the emphasis of this attitude that its peculiar character is to be found, as well as the foundation for the fact and the meaning of its joy in the world. We shall proceed in what follows to discuss these two propositions.

1. Ignatian piety is a piety of the Cross, like all Christian mystic piety before it. One would lay oneself open to the danger of completely misconstruing Ignatian piety, were one to overlook this first fundamental characteristic. We must take note of the fact that Ignatian piety is and intends to be primarily 'monastic' piety; 'monastic' not in a juridical sense, nor monastic in the external arrangement of the community life of his disciples, but 'monastic' in the theologico-metaphysical sense which constitutes the first and last meaning of this word. What we mean to say by that is that Ignatius in his life, in his piety, and in the spirit which he impresses upon his foundation is consciously and clearly taking over and continuing that ultimate direction of life by which the life of the Catholic Orders, the 'monazein', was created and kept alive. Proof of this is the simple fact that he and his disciples take the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. And with them they necessarily take over the attitude of the monachos, of one alone in God far from the world. Ignatius stands in the line of those men who existentially flee into the desert in a violent fuga saeculi, even though it may be the God-forsaken stony desert of a city, in order to seek God far from the world. It is nothing but superficiality if one allows the difference in external mode of life between Jesuit and monk to mask the deep and ultimate common character which dominates the ideal of every Catholic Order.

What, however, is the monk? He is the man who has put on the pattern of Christ; the man in whose ascesis – poverty and virginity are the paradigms of this renunciation – the attempt

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is made, and should be constantly made anew, to allow that dying with Christ, which was in essence and in [282] principle brought about in Baptism, to become a reality throughout a whole life and in its complete significance. For the primitive Church, Christian perfection and martyrdom were practically identical terms, so that the martyr represents the first class of Saints, holy men are officially called even today 'confessors', and the only other official ecclesiastical category for Saints besides these is the 'virgin' – virgin because her being is in fact nothing else than the martyrdom of the invisible silent struggle and dying in herself. It is this spirit of the primitive Church which the monk seeks to carry further, and here the discussion about the empirical Connection between persecution and monasticism can be left aside as irrelevant. Thus the monk is the man who dies into Christ. He takes upon himself the Lord's renunciation, he is clothed in his garment, a fool for Christ's sake, the man for whom the enjoyment of the world has been submerged by poverty, earthly love by virginity, the secret blessedness of self-assertion by the denial of his will in the will of another; the man who still prays in the words of the primitive Christian prayer: ε0λθε/τω ξα&ριφ και∴ παρελθε/τω ο(κο&σμοφ ου[τοφ, 'may grace come and may this world pass away'.[2] The monk flees out of the light of this world into the night of the senses and the spirit, if we may apply these mystical words in this way, in order that grace and the mercy of the eternal God should come to him.

Did Ignatius perhaps intend and choose another life? He wants to follow the poor Jesus, the despised and ridiculed, the crucified. The height to which he wants to lead in the Exercises is the foolishness of the Cross.

> Lovingly let us direct our minds to this fact – for it is this which has great, even decisive weight before our Creator and our Lord – how much does all growth in the spiritual life depend upon our rejecting utterly and not merely half-heartedly all that is an object of the world's love and longing, and upon our accepting, nay, demanding, with the whole power of our soul that which Christ our Lord loved and took upon himself . . . Those, namely, who walk thus in the spirit and the true imitation of Christ have only one love and only one burning desire: to wear the robe and the sign of Christ out of love and reverence for him. If it were possible without offending the divine majesty and without sin on the part of another, they would wish of themselves to bear the suffering of insult and calumny and injustice, the treatment and the consideration which is shown towards fools. All this because they have only one desire: following and being conformed to Jesus [283] Christ, their Creator and Lord, wearing his robe and his mark, which he wore as an example to us for the sake of our salvation, in order that we might imitate and follow him in everything that our strength in his grace allows, him who is the true way leading man to life.[3]

Is such a spirit joy in the world, acceptance of the world? Howsoever this question may be answered ultimately, this much is in any case clear: Ignatius does not admit for himself or his disciples any joy in the world in which the world and God, time and eternity, are from the beginning reconciled in amicable harmony. In the case of Ignatius, then, there can be no question of an acceptance of the world by which man is in the first place and as a matter of course in the world, that is by which he takes his first stand in the world, in its goodness and its tasks, strives for the fulfilment of humanity within this world and then finally – and as late as possible after this – also awaits happiness with God, to guarantee which, over and above his obvious task in the world and a moral life, he has to fulfil a few other conditions of a rather juridical and ceremonial kind.

---

[2] Didache 10.

[3] Constitutiones, Examen generale 4, 44.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

By saying that, have we not come to the opposite of the position we wanted to reach, to the fuga saeculi instead of joy in the world? And more important: what is the ultimate meaning, the metaphysical basis of such a flight from the world?

The answering of this question will be at the same time the way leading us to the fact and meaning of Ignatian joy in the world. The basis of flight from the world constitutes the intrinsic possibility of Ignatian acceptance of the world. And both are based on what we called the second fundamental assertion about Ignatian piety:

2. Ignatian piety is piety towards the God who is beyond the whole world and who freely reveals himself. In this – to repeat once more – is to be found at once the reason for flight from the world and the possibility of an acceptance of the world.

In order to achieve an insight into this characteristic of Ignatian piety, let us begin by grasping it from that angle from which our considerations up to this point have proceeded. And so we ask: what is the ultimate reason for Christian flight from the world, which has achieved expression in monasticism and also in Ignatian piety as a piety of the Cross?

The living personal God has spoken to man in Christianity, that is in Jesus Christ.[4] With that a frightening reality has entered into the life of [284] man, which renders impossible any attempt on the part of a human existence attuned to a world closed in upon itself to enter into God. Certainly it is possible to come to a knowledge of God from his creation, from the world. But this knowledge has a peculiarly double character. On the one hand, we acknowledge God as the ground of the world, as the guarantor of its being, as the ultimate background of everything we meet as man and world in its own reality. Thus we have knowledge of God in so far as he is able to appear to us in the mirror of the world, so that it almost seems as though the world were the raison d'être of God, at least of the God who shows himself and in so far as he can show himself in the world, of the God, that is to say, whom alone we meet as philosophers. On the other hand, in our seeking for God in metaphysics, at the same time as the fact that he appears to us as the ground of the world and the world as the meaning of God, we come to know him as the free, personal, in himself eternal being and thereby as the God beyond the whole world and all finitude, so that the world does not properly express what he is and may be as the personal and free and eternal being. The world does not reveal to us the raison d'être of God. But with that the human metaphysical question of God has already terminated in an essential failure: it is faced with a free Person closed in himself, the God who covers himself in silence, the θεο_φ σιγω~ν, as Origen once called him. And what this infinite God is in himself, and how this free personal God wants perhaps, as is possible, to deal with us, this question which for all its obscurity is yet decisive for our existence cannot be illuminated by the natural light of reason. Whether he wants to meet us immediately and personally, whether he wants to remain silent, what he will say to us if he does want to speak – all this is an essential mystery for all metaphysics, for every impetus of man's passionate desire to know which originates in the world. So in itself all metaphysics would have to conclude in an eternally watchful readiness of man to keep his ear cocked in case this distant, silent He should will to speak, in a readiness for the perhaps possible possibility of a revelation. But will man be able to endure this ecstasy of his being, this remaining on the look-out, to see whether perhaps God will come? Will he not rather succumb to the ever-present temptation of making the world the finally valid revelation of God, of so making God the raison d'être of the world that the world becomes the raison d'être of God? Was [285] there ever a philosophy in all history outside Christianity which did not yield to that temptation, beginning with the Greeks right up to Hegel? For all of this philosophy was God not always ultimately the anima mundi, the God who can live only in [4] Cf. for what follows: K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich 5942), and the articles above: 'Reflections on the Theology of Renunciation' and 'The Passion and Asceticism', pp. 47-85.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the world itself as its inner radiance, as its secret lustre of absoluteness? And is not this original sin in the history of philosophy in the field of knowledge only an expression of that which happens constantly over and over again existentially in the life of man unredeemed: to allow God to be only what the world is, to make God in the image of man, to conceive piety as consideration for the world? All idolatry is nothing else than the concrete expression of that existential stand-point of man based on the belief that God is nothing other than the primeval unity of those powers which hold sway throughout this world and govern its fate. And even the most spiritual of philosophies in a Hegel still worships – so it would seem – an idol: absolute Spirit, finding itself in man and in the development of his being. The God according to our desires, according to our image and likeness, would be a God who had nothing else to do but let men increase and multiply, to bless them when they make the earth subject to them, who would be nothing but what we could know of him by natural means, who would therefore be nothing but the horizon remaining always in the distance, in which is unfolded the finite infinitude of man in accordance with his own proper law; he would be nothing but the divinity of the world. And it is then a matter of no consequence whether this God in our image bears the features of Apollo or of Dionysos.

But God is more than that. And as this more-than-the-world he has broken in upon man's existence and has shattered the world, that which theology calls 'nature'. He has revealed himself in Jesus Christ. This revelation has taken place in the dual unity of a communication of supernatural being and of the word. And the ultimate meaning of this revelation is a calling of man out of this world into the life of God, who leads his personal life as the Being exalted above the whole world, as the tri-personal God, in inaccessible light. God is thereby bringing himself immediately face to face with man with a demand and a call which flings man out of the course pre-established by nature, which he would have followed within the horizons of the world. This gives rise to a transcendence of man's mission and destination, which must necessarily be felt as somehow constantly standing in opposition to nature and the world in which the temptation to round themselves off in themselves is essentially inherent, [286] the temptation to seek completion, before God, it is true, as the ultimate ground and background, but yet essentially in themselves. 'Nature', that is everything finite which does not anise from, and in, immediate encounter with God as free and revealing himself in word, has ever as something rounded and completed in itself in a true sense the tendency to rest in itself, to defend and perfect the closed harmony of its immanent system. If God as revealing himself comes face to face with such a nature, then there arises the most immediate possibility that he might issue commands to mankind which are not at the same time the voice of nature, are not lex naturae. And if God calls man in this command of his revealing word to a supernatural, supramundane life, as has in fact happened in the revelation of Christ, then this command must always necessarily be a breaking-up of the roundedness in which the world seeks to rest in itself, and so it becomes a degradation, by which the world – even the good world, the world in so far as it is the will and law of God – is condemned to a provisional status, a thing of second rank, subject to a criterion which is no longer intrinsic or proper to it.

In this way, however, a sacrifice of the world, a renunciation, a flight from the world, an abandonment of its goods and values becomes possible, which goes essentially further than one that would be thinkable in any meaningful way if these goods and values in a merely natural order constituted the highest fulfilment of the existential task demanded of man. Indeed, such flight from the world is in this case not only meaningful, but also, at least to a certain degree, necessary. The obscurity of Christian faith is the essential and decisive beginning of it. A flight from the world of this kind becomes necessary because the need to take into account the possibility of a free act of revelation on the part of the personal God, which is a fundamental constitutive character of a finite spirit in any hypothesis, is transformed by the actual fact of such a revelation into the duty of living existentially the need of obedience vis-à-vis the God of revelation. But if we leave aside the acceptance without contradiction of the communication of supernatural life which takes place in revelation, the only thinkable response of man coming as it were from below to the God of revelation calling from far beyond the world is a sacrifice of the world to a degree which goes beyond any which is meaningful in an intramundane even though theonomous ethic. For man can only confess existentially that God has moved the centre of his human existence out of the world, if he negates his intramundane existence in its immanent [287] signification by a fuga saeculi. Thus all Christian mortification has from the beginning progressed beyond the struggling self-mastery of pure ethics – of course not by excluding it – it is already, as the primitive Christian Didache prays, allowing the world to pass by in order that grace may enter. Christianity is consequently in essence fuga saeculi, because it is the commitment to the personal God who freely reveals himself in Christ, the God of grace which is not the fulfilment of the immanent craving of the world for its completion, even though it brings this completion of the world about eschatologically in a supereminent way. All adherence to the Cross, which is proper to both monastic and Ignatian piety, is only a realistic putting into practice of such an essentially Christian flight from the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In these considerations we may appear to have digressed considerably from our topic. But it is not so. For we have already prepared ourselves, in this theological metaphysics which explains the first fundamental characteristic of Ignatian piety, the commitment to the Cross, for an appreciation of the significance of its second fundamental characteristic.

The God of Ignatian piety is the God of supramundane grace who deals with man freely and personally, and 'historically'.

There can be no doubting the proposition itself. For Ignatian piety God is the Divina Maiestas, the Lord on whose sovereign will everything depends, in face of whom it is not man and his longings and desires that come into consideration, but only what may please His Divine Majesty. Because he is the free being above the whole world, for Ignatius everything depends on how he has dealt with man historically, for only his free action in history can reveal to us what he is in himself and how he wills to be related to men. The meditation on the fall of the angels, on original sin and on the life of Jesus in the Exercises is ultimately based on such a picture of God. If the Exercises are one great inquiry after the most holy will of His Divine Majesty, then this will is not intended inasmuch as it manifests itself in the desires and the longing of one's heart, but it is that free will of God which is sought, by means of which alone God still disposes freely of man's judgement, man's will and man's heart. All the discernment of spirits – that most important part of the Exercises – is ultimately based upon it: in the last analysis it is not a discernment of the impulses of one's own heart on the basis of general moral criteria, but a listening to the word of command from God, the seeking and finding of the free decree of the will of the personal God for man in his concrete [288] situation.[5] And because Ignatius encounters this God in Jesus Christ, he commits himself to the Cross and to the foolishness of Christ. For all this foolishness of the Cross is for him only an expression and putting into practice of the readiness to follow that free God even when he calls us out of the world, out of its inner meaning and its light into his own light, in which it seems to us as though we were entering into the night.

However, it is precisely from this attitude, from such a picture of God and such a response of readiness for the Cross, that there springs that which is in reality Ignatian affirmation of the world and joy in it. And now we are in a position to grasp the fact and essence of it, now that we have brought to mind, at least in its most general outlines, the basic characteristics of Ignatian piety and mysticism.

---

[5] Cf. K. Rahner, 'On the Question of a Formal Existential Ethics', Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 2 17-234.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II. THE JOY IN THE WORLD OF IGNATIUS

In order to penetrate the meaning of this joy in the world, let us begin once more with what we have said about the theological signification of Christian flight from the world in general. The fuga saeculi which belongs essentially to Christian existence appeared to us as the commitment to God, in so far as he is, as the being beyond the world, the inner centre and goal of our Christian existence; as the existential re-accomplishment of the shifting of the centre of our being into the triune God, a shifting already accomplished by the God of grace revealing himself. But this existential commitment can only be itself if it really acknowledges the God of free grace. And this means that it must, at the same time as it asserts the centre of our lives to be beyond the world, also acknowledge that this new centre of our existence is bestowed upon us exclusively by the free grace of God, and therefore not by the sacrificing flight from the world itself.

In this way, however, it becomes evident that Christian flight from the world is to be distinguished not merely from an ethic which is immanent to the world, even though guaranteed by its theonomy, and its demands for renunciation, in so far as it is a flight from the world in opposition to a mere domination of the world and of oneself, the Christian fuga saeculi is distinct also from every extra-Christian denial of the world which may perhaps be found in Orphic, Neo-Platonist, or Buddhist asceticism and mysticism. For all these forms of flight from the world do ultimately [289] regard the renunciation and annihilation which is begun by man, as it were from below, as being the means which of itself and with nothing further compels the awareness of the Absolute. All such annihilation is consequently only a way fundamentally parallel to, though leading in the opposite direction from, the way to an immanent divinization of the world. Renunciation, flight from the world, is for such non-Christian mysticism of annihilation in itself already the conquest of God. But Christianity acknowledges the free grace of God, that is a divine life in man which is first and last dependent upon the free, personal decision of God's love. Accordingly, Christianity is aware of the fact that not simply dying, renunciation, flight from the world of themselves can achieve possession of the Absolute, knows that asceticism of this kind is not the way in which admittance could be forced by man into the inner life of God. The Christian knows that his flight from the world is only an answering gesture, though a necessary one, when faced with the God who freely reveals and opens himself, who gives himself to us out of a voluntary love.

Since, however, the grace of God is in this sense free, the Christian knows, even in loving the foolishness of the Cross above everything, that the free God can bless and allow to become a step forward into his presence even those actions of men which do not of themselves already bear such a significance, as does the dying flight from the world, which is meaningful only where it is a dying into the new life of God. Provided that man has once submitted himself in faith to the claim of God revealing himself, God can accept in grace also his service of the world, which is, after all his creation, as a way to himself who is beyond the world, so that man encounters the absolute God not only in a radical opposition to the world, but also in the world. Once a man has placed himself under the Cross and has died with Christ, once he has entered into the obscurity of faith and the ecstasy of love for the distant God, then, to express it in the technical language of theology, every act which is good in itself, therefore also one which is already meaningful within the world, can be supernaturally elevated by grace in such a way that its aim and its meaning extend beyond the significance it has within the world, beyond the ordo legis naturae and into the life of God itself. This fact removes from Christian flight from the world that hybris which would otherwise be inherent in it as the exclusive way to God: in his flight from the world the Christian must acknowledge that one can also reach through the world this same God who is beyond it, to find whom the Christian abandoned the world to go [290] its own way. Whoever remains a virgin for God's sake must recognize that marriage is a Sacrament; whoever lives the vita contemplativa of flight from the world will only do this in a Christian way if he is vitally aware that God has also blessed the vita activa of work within the world and has raised it to the level of divine life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is only upon these deep foundations that there is built the Ignatian affirmation of the world.

That there is such a thing which can be designated by this title has always been seen, even though it has seldom been grasped in its true essence. Adaptation, the acceptance of the demand upon time, the fostering of culture, love for the sciences, acceptance of the humanism and individualism of the Renaissance, the cheerful brightness of Baroque, the avoidance of the external forms of monasticism, all this and much besides has been regarded – and rightly – as a sign of Jesuit affirmation of the world. But one has really grasped this phenomenon only when one is able to explain it as arising from one spirit: how this one spirit inspired those possessed of it in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries both to build Baroque churches with their joyous exuberance of a shining transfiguration of the world and at the same time to offer themselves for the distant missions in order to die agonizingly for Christ in the boiling fountains of Japan or the bamboo cages of Tonkin.

Ignatius approaches the world from God. Not the other way about. Because he has delivered himself in the lowliness of an adoring self-surrender to the God beyond the whole world and to his will, for this reason and for this reason alone he is prepared to obey his word even when, out of the silent desert of his daring flight into God, he is, as it were, sent back into the world, which he had found the courage to abandon in the foolishness of the Cross.

From this results the double characteristic which is proper to Ignatian joy in the world: the maxims of 'indiferença' and of 'finding God in all things'. The first is the presupposition of the second.

Indiferença: the calm readiness for every command of God, the equanimity which, out of the realization that God is always greater than anything we can experience of him or wherein we can find him, continually detaches itself from every determinate thing which man is tempted to regard as the point in which alone God meets him. Hence the characteristic of Ignatian piety is not so much situated in a material element, in the promotion of a particular thought or a particular practice, is not one of [291] the special ways to God, but it is something formal, an ultimate attitude towards all thoughts, practices, and ways: an ultimate reserve and coolness towards all particular ways, because all possession of God must leave God as greater beyond all possession of him. Out of such an attitude of indiferença there springs of itself the perpetual readiness to hear a new call from God to tasks other than those previously engaged in, continually to decamp from those fields where one wanted to find God and to serve him; there springs the will to be at hand like a servant always ready for new assignments; the courage to accept the duty of changing oneself and of having nowhere a permanent resting-place as in a restless wandering towards the restful God; the courage to regard no way to him as being the way, but rather to seek him on all ways. Moved by such a spirit, even the passionate love of the Cross and of sharing in the ignominy of the death of Christ is still ruled by indiferença: the Cross, yes, if it should please his divine Majesty to call to such a death in life. Indiferença is possible only where the will to a fuga saeculi is alive, and yet this indiferença in its turn disguises that love for the foolishness of the Cross into the daily moderation of a normal style of life marked by good sense. Filled with such indiferença, Ignatius can even forgo manifestations of mystical graces – after all God is beyond even the world of experience of the mystic – he can forgo the mystical gift of tears

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because the physician wanted it – Saint Francis had angrily rejected precisely the same remonstrances of the physician.

In brief: such indiferença becomes a seeking of God in all things. Because God is greater than everything, he can be found if one flees away from the world, but he can come to meet one on the streets in the midst of the world. For this reason Ignatius acknowledges only one law in his restless search for God: to seek him in all things; and this means: to seek him in that spot where at any particular time he wants to be found, and it means, too, to seek him in the world if he wants to show himself in it. In. this seeking-God-in-all-things we have the Ignatian formula for a higher synthesis of that division of piety into a mystical one of light from the world and a prophetic one of divinely commissioned work in the world, which is customary in the history of religion. In that formula these contradictions are in the Hegelian sense 'resolved' ('aufgehohen'). Ignatius is concerned only with the God above the whole world, but he knows that this God, precisely because he is really above the whole world and not merely the dialectical antithesis to the whole world, is also to be found [292] in the world, when his sovereign will bids us enter upon the way of the world.

If we leave aside the somewhat excessively Greek colouring of the concepts, we can find the problem of the dialectic between flight from the world and acceptance of the world repeated in the dialectic between the two medieval Christian concepts of contemplatio and actio, of vita contemplativa and vita activa. Contemplatio is adherence to the God who is the goal of Christian existence, therefore to the God of a supramundane life. Actio is the fulfilment of one's duty within the world, including that of natural morality. This indication of the designation of these concepts allows us to understand the formula of Ignatian acceptance of the world which originated in the first circle of his followers: 'in actione contemplativus'.[6] Ignatius seeks only the God of Jesus Christ, the free, personal Absolute: contemplativus. He knows that he can seek and find him also in the world, if this should please him: in actione. And so he is prepared in indiferença to seek him and him alone, always him alone but also him everywhere, also in the world: in actione contemplativus.

Here we must break off. We were unable even to touch on many questions which would have to be inserted in any closer investigation into what has been said, or which could follow as new questions as a consequence of what we have said. Thus we have not touched, for example, upon the question of the specific formation which the Ignatian basic attitude receives by its dedication to the apostolate in the service of the Church and her mission. We were likewise unable to discuss how this Ignatian outlook, which is after all primarily that of the monk, of the member of a religious Order, would present itself if it were transferred to the level of a properly lay piety.

In the midst of bloody persecutions and banished from the place of his labours, Clement of Alexandria wrote at the beginning of the third century his 'Stromata'. And in such a situation of failure he gives expression in the Seventh Book to the wonderful thought that the perfect Christian must be κο&σμιοφ και∴ υ(περκο&σμιοφ: worldly and superworldly and both at the same time.[7] This phrase may act as an exhortation for our own attitude in these times: we are Christians, that is, we live out of the God beyond the [293] world and we live into him. In him is the centre of our Christian existence. Therefore that existence cannot be shaken, even if it appears as though the sun were indeed to set in the Occident. The Cross of Christ belongs to our Christian existence, and when we actually meet it in our personal life, in the fate of our people, when the hour of darkness appears to have descended, then this is not for us Christians a failure of our true life, but the distress which is necessarily felt by him who does

[6] Cf. E. Coreth, 'In actione contemplativus', ZKT LXXVI (1954) pp. 55-82.

[7] Cf. K. Rahner, 'De termino aliquo in theologia Clementis Alexandrini', Greg. XVIII (1937), pp. 426-431.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not have and does not want to have a permanent abode here, because he is on the way to the God beyond all the fulfilment of this world, because he is a υ(περκο&σμιοφ. And yet according to Clement we should be κο&σμιοι: enter into the world and its work with the strength born of our superiority to the world, sent by him with whom we are united in the one mystical life. Κο&σμιοφ και∴ υ(περκο&σμιοφ.

To such an attitude Ignatian piety and mysticism can lead us. Ignatian affirmation of the world is not a naive optimism, not an installing ourselves in the world as though we had in it the centre of our lives. Ignatian joy in the world springs from the mysticism of conformity with him whom we have joined in the flight from the world contained in the foolishness of the Cross. But once we have found the God of the life beyond, then such an attitude will break out of deep seclusion in God into the world, and work as long as day lasts, immerse itself in the work of the time in the world and yet await with deep longing the Coming of the Lord.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[294]

20

PRIEST AND POET[1]

The highest possibilities are as yet but promises. Otherwise that fulfilment for which we long in faith and hope would already be here. But because the end of all things is, according to the words of Scripture, already come upon us, our highest possibilities are not merely empty postulates and abstract ideals. They have already begun to exist. At least they are as it were making shy and not yet fully successful attempts to introduce themselves. But in the fact that this imperfect exists is contained the sure promise of a proximate fulfilment.

One of these highest possibilities is that one and the same person should be both priest and poet. Can these two vocations become one and the same? In this life of mere beginnings and vain efforts we scarcely dare to hope that the union of priest and poet should perfectly succeed. Certainly someone may be a priest and in addition also be a poet. But this is very far from saying that he is the one in the other and that both are in him the same. However, the fulfilment of the future towards which our pilgrims' way is leading assures us in advance that the perfect priest and the perfect poet are one and the same. Is there any better way of paying tribute to the verses which a priest has written on the priesthood, than by attempting to explain this?

I

To the poet is entrusted the word. Alas, that there should still be no theology of the Word! Why has no one yet set about gathering together, [295] like Ezekiel, the scattered members on the fields of philosophy and theology and spoken over them the word of the Spirit, so that they rise up a living body!

Even in philosophy there should be a discussion of the word. Our word is more than a thought: it is thought become incarnate. If it is true that body and soul exist in a substantial unity, as Scholasticism teaches, then the word is more than a mere externalization in sound, a signalling of a thought which could equally well exist without the accompaniment of this animal noise. As if the thought were a mere conventional signal in the brute spiritlessness of the animal and material world which we – spirits – are constrained to frequent! No, the word is rather the corporeal state in which what we now experience and think first begins to exist by fashioning itself into this its word-body. To be more precise: the word is the embodied thought, not the embodiment of the thought. It is more than the thought and more original than the thought, just as the entire man is more than, and more original than, his body and his soul considered separately. For this reason no language can substitute for another. In the same way one cannot give another body to a spiritual soul; not only would it express itself differently, but it would itself become other or else transform the body into which it was forced into its body. Men speaking different languages can understand one another and one language can be translated into another, just as the most diverse men can live together and even be born from one another. But this does not make languages into a row of external

[1] The following pages were first written as Foreword to the poems on the priesthood which Jorge Blajot, S.J., was to publish under the title La hora sin tiempo. This occasional origin of the article, here reproduced in its original form, may perhaps excuse the fact that the author makes a direct quotation from another essay of his own which is also reprinted below (pp. 321 sqq.) and that he has left this quotation unaltered here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

façades, behind all of which dwells simply one and the same thought. The noche of a John of the Cross and the Nacht of a Novalis or a Nietzsche are not the same; the agape of the hymn in the thirteenth chapter of the First Letter to the Corinthians and the 'love' of European peoples differ not merely in their 'application' . . .

There are words which divide and words which unite: words which can be artificially manufactured and arbitrarily determined and words which have always existed or are newly born as by a miracle; words which unravel the whole in order to explain the part, and words which by a kind of enchantment produce in the person who listens to them what they are expressing; words which illuminate something small, picking out with their light only a part of reality, and words which make us wise by allowing the manifold to harmonize in unity. There are words which delimit and isolate, but there are also words which render a single thing translucent to the infinity of all reality. They are like sea-shells, in which can [296] be heard the sound of the ocean of infinity, no matter how small they are in themselves. They bring light to us, not we to them. They have power over us, because they are gifts of God, not creations of men, even though perhaps they came to us through men. Some words are clear because they are shallow and without mystery; they suffice for the mind; by means of them one acquires mastery over things. Other words are perhaps obscure because they evoke the blinding mystery of things. They pour out of the heart and sound forth in hymns. They open the doors to great works and they decide over eternities. Such words, which spring up out of the heart, which hold us in their power, which enchant us, the glorifying, heaven-sent words, I should like to call primordial words (Urworte). The remainder could be named fabricated, technical, utility words.

It is true of course that we cannot divide words once and for all into these two categories. This division refers much more to the destiny of words, which elevates them and dashes them to the ground, which ennobles them and degrades them, which blesses them and damns them – just as in the case of man. We are not speaking here of worn-out words which are preserved, impaled like dead butterflies, in the showcases of dictionaries. We mean living words in their living being and movement, just as we utter them in propositions, speeches and songs. Words have their history too. And as in the case of the history of man himself, there is only one true Master of this history: God. In fact, he himself became the subject of this history when he spoke such words in the flesh of this earth and when he had them written as his own words.

Innumerable words, according to the use man makes of them, are raised up to the ranks of the one type, the primordial words, or – which is unfortunately mostly the case – slide down to the level of the other types, the utility words. When the poet or the poor man of Assisi exclaims 'water', what is meant is greater, wider and deeper than when the chemist, debasing the word, says 'water' for his H_2O. According to Goethe, water is like the soul of man . . . you cannot substitute H_2O for that. The water which is seen by man, which is praised by the poet, and which is used by the Christian in baptism – this water is not a poetic glorification of the chemist's water, as if he were the true realist. On the contrary, the 'water' of the chemist is much rather a narrowed down, technified derivation of a secondary kind from the water of man. In the word as used by the chemist, a primordial word has been fated to sink down to the level of a technical word of utility, and in its fall it has forfeited more than half its [297] being. In its fate is reflected the lot of humanity through thousands of years.

Let no one think with foolish superficiality that it does not matter whether a word has more or less content; that as long as one clearly knows what content a word and the concept it expresses have, everything is in order and one word is as good as another.

No, the primordial words are precisely the words which cannot be defined. They can only be taken apart by being killed. Or does someone think that everything can be defined? It cannot. All definitions have constant recourse to new words, and this process must come to a stop with the ultimate words, whether these are absolutely the last possible words or merely those which constitute in fact the final point of man's reflexive self-interpretation. And yet these ultimate words possess only that 'simplicity' which conceals within itself all mysteries. These are the primordial words which form the basis of man's spiritual existence! They are given him. He does not arbitrarily construct them, nor can he cut them up into convenient pieces, which is what is meant by 'defining'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is all very obscure, someone will say. Granted, thinking which divides and recomposes the pieces like a mosaic is clearer and more easily grasped. But is it more true, more faithful to reality? Is 'being' clear? But of course, says the shallow mind, that is being which is not nothing. But what is 'is' and what is 'nothing'? Whole books have been written, and from this ocean of words there has been obtained only a little jug of stagnant water.

The primordial words always remain like the brightly lit house which one must leave behind, 'even when it is night'. They are always as though filled with the soft music of infinity. No matter what it is they speak of, they always whisper something about everything. If one tries to pace out their boundary, one always becomes lost in the infinite. They are the children of God, who possess something of the luminous darkness of their Father.

There is a knowledge which stands before the mystery of unity in multiplicity, of essence in appearance, of the whole in the part and the part in the whole. This knowledge makes use of primordial words, which evoke the mystery. It is always indistinct and obscure, like the reality itself which by means of such words of knowledge obtains possession of us and draws us into its unsounded depths. In the primordial words spirit and flesh, the signified and its symbol, concept and word, things and [298] image, are still freshly and originally one – which does not mean, simply the same. 'O Stern und Blume, Geist und Kleid, Lieb', Leid und Zeit und Ewigkeit!' ('O star and flower, spirit and garment, love, sorrow and time and eternity!') exclaims Brentano, the Catholic poet. What does this mean? Can one say what it means? Or is it not precisely an uttering of primordial words, which one must understand without having to explain them by means of 'clearer' and cheaper words? And even if one had explained them with the most scholarly profundity, would one not have to return to these words of the poet, to these primordial words, in order to understand, in order intimately and truly to grasp, what it was that the long commentary 'really' wanted to say? Blossom, night, star and day, root and source, wind and laughter, rose, blood and earth, boy, smoke, word, kiss, lightning, breath, stillness: these and thousands of other words of genuine thinkers and poets are primordial words. They are deeper and truer than the worn-down verbal coins of daily intellectual intercourse, which one often likes to call 'clear ideas' because habit dispenses one from thinking anything at all in their use.

In every primordial word there is signified a piece of reality in which a door is mysteriously opened for us into the unfathomable depths of true reality in general. The transition from the individual to the infinite in infinite movement, which is called by thinkers the transcendence of the spirit, itself belongs to the content of the primordial word. That is why it is more than a mere word: it is the soft music of the infinite movement of the spirit and of love for God, which begins with some small thing of this earth, which is seemingly the only thing meant by this word. Primordial words (as one might explain it to the theologian) have always a literal meaning and an intellectual-spiritual meaning, and without the latter the verbal sense itself is no longer what is really meant. They are words of an endless crossing of borders, therefore words on which in some way our very salvation depends.

> . . . Sind wir vielleicht hier, urn zu sagen: Haus, > Brücke, Brunnen, Tor, Krug, Obstbaum, Fenster,
> Höchstens: Säule, Turm . . . aber zu sagen, versteh's
> o zu sagen so, wie selber die Dinge niemals

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

innig meinten zu sein . . .

(. . . Are we perhaps here, in order to say, house,
Bridge, fountain, gate, urn, fruit tree, window, [299]
At the most: pillar, tower. . . but to say, please understand,
Oh to say, what the things themselves never Intimately thought to be. . .)

(Rilke, Ninth Elegy)

Only someone who understands these lines of the poet has grasped what we mean by primordial words and why they have every right to be, indeed must be, obscure. This does not of course mean that one may drape one's own confused superficiality with primordial words of this kind to pass them off as profound, or that one should speak in an obscure way where one could speak clearly. It means only that the primordial words reflect man in his indissoluble unity of spirit and flesh, transcendence and perception, metaphysics and history. It means that there are primordial words, because all things are interwoven with all reality and therefore every genuine and living word has roots which penetrate endlessly into the depths.

There is one aspect of these primordial words which we must consider more explicitly than we have done so far: the primordial word is in the proper sense the presentation of the thing itself. It is not merely the sign of something whose relationship to the hearer is in no way altered by it; it does not speak merely 'about' a relationship of the object in question to the hearer: it brings the reality it signifies to us, makes it 'present', realizes it and places it before us. Naturally the manner of this presentation will be of the most diverse kinds, depending upon the kind of reality evoked and the power of the evoking word. But whenever a primordial word of this kind is pronounced, something happens: the advent of the thing itself to the listener.

Something happens not merely for the reason that man, as a spiritual person, obtains possession of reality only by knowing it. It is not only the knower who obtains possession of the reality known by means of the word. The reality known itself takes possession of the knower – and lover – through the word. Through the word the object known is transferred into man's sphere of existence, and its entry is a fulfilment of the reality of the object known itself.

Many a person will be tempted to think that being known is for the object a matter of indifference, which is attributed to it only externally. He will take this opinion to be a corollary of his unequivocal objectivism. To be sure he will grant that the world is real because it is known by God [300] and his love: in this one case reality is constituted by the very fact of standing within the sphere of God's light. Leaving aside the fact that even this truth can be considered too superficially, our 'objectivist' will deny that the case of the knowledge of reality by other knowers is in any way similar. It is of course true that the realities of this earth do not cease to exist, if no one apart from God knows them and recognizes them in his knowledge. And yet they are more fully themselves and arrive at the complete fulfilment of their being only when they are known and spoken by men. They themselves acquire, to use the expression of Rilke, an intimacy of being when they are known. Why?

Let us reflect upon this: does not everything have its being in the whole? Does not even Sirius in the gloom of the subspiritual already faintly tremble whenever a child throws its doll out of the cradle? Is not each person completely himself, entirely brought to that fulfilment which he should have and which God has eternally planned for him, only when all persons are made perfect in the Kingdom of God? Must not all individuals wait for their ultimate fulfilment upon the complete fulfilment of all things? Now, in the realm of the spirit is not the completion of the individual precisely the completion of his knowledge and his love? Therefore it is through them that the other is completed. The fact that I am known, recognized and loved, that is my completion. And this completion in knowledge and in love, in being known and being loved, is not merely a completion on the 'plane' of the 'intentional' but a fulfilment of the reality, of the being itself. For reality itself is, in the measure of its being, knowing and being known in unity. All realities sigh for their own unveiling. They want themselves to enter, if not as knowers at least as objects of knowledge, into the light of knowledge and of love. They all have a dynamic drive to fulfil themselves by being known. They, too, want to 'put in their word'. The word is their own fulfilment, in which they arrive at the point where all reality, because it draws its origin from eternal spirit, finds its ultimate home: in light. If these realities are persons, then this fulfilment will be realized in the exchange of the word of love which is mutually bestowed. If they are subspiritual realities, then they attain their salvation in the fact that they are lovingly spoken by all beings who are capable of knowing and loving – not by God alone.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Everything is redeemed by the word. It is the perfection of things. The word is their spiritual body in which they themselves first reach their own fulfilment. Hungering for knowledge and love, things pluck in their [301] spiritual word-body at the hearts of those who can know and love them. Invariably the word is the sacrament by means of which realities communicate themselves to man, in order to achieve their own destiny.

What we have said about the redeeming mission of the word is true in some way of every word. But it is especially true of the primordial words. We do not mean by this, of course, only single words, but all that is said by a man to bring things in a powerful and compact way out of that darkness where they cannot remain, into the light of man.

It is to the poet (Dichter) that the word has been entrusted. He is a man capable of speaking the primordial words in powerful concentration (verdichtet). Everyone pronounces primordial words, as long as he is not sunk completely into spiritual death. Everyone calls things by their names and so continues the action of his father Adam. But the poet has the calling and the gift of speaking such words in powerful concentration. He has the power to speak them in such a way that, by means of his word, things move as though set free into the light of others who hear the words of the poet.

The poet is not a man who in a superfluous, more pleasing form, in 'rhymes', in a sentimental torrent of words, says in a more complicated way what others – philosophers and scientists – have said more clearly, more soberly, and more intelligibly. To be sure, there are 'poets' of this kind too, who are no poets at all, but mere rhymers and versifiers. That is not to say that versifying is a craft to be despised; many a one who has succeeded in being a true poet has also used it extensively in his work. In the same way, there are second-rate philosophers and scientists who speak more extensively of what those, who are poets, philosophers and scientists all in one, originally brought to word for the first time. But that is something which must always be done anew.

On the other hand, wherever a primordial word is really pronounced, wherever a thing appears in word in its positive freshness there a poet is at work. It is a poet working there, even though his word may not be mentioned in the history of literature and even though he may consider himself to be merely a philosopher or theologian.

Poets are men who speak primordial words in powerful concentration. If they utter these words, then they are beautiful. For real beauty is the pure appearance of reality as brought about principally in the word. Principally in the word: we have no desire to say anything here against music. It is too full of mystery. Nevertheless, perhaps lovers of music who [302] are at the same time theologians might give a thought to the fact that God revealed himself in word and not in purely tonal music. But in heaven, they will reply, there reigns the sound of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

songs of praise and not merely the recounting of the glory of God . . . Be that as it may, the other arts can represent in the first place only what is apprehended and circumscribed. They can set out the image and the gestures. In saying this we recognize that it is precisely the infinity of God which the limited and formed, measured and enclosed, proclaims simply by its own good finite character. For this infinity is not simply the negation of the good finitude of the creature; otherwise it would be itself a bad infinite. It would be something endlessly flowing, unstable, vague and empty, the infinity of mere matter; not the radiant, intimate clarity of the absolute fullness of God, which appears to us precisely in the apprehended and formed reality of the creature. But among all the modes of expressing himself that man uses in all the arts, the word alone possesses something which is not shared by any other creation of man: it lives in transcendence. Were it not to sound exclusively negative, and therefore destructive, one could say that negation alone lives in it. The word alone is the gesture which transcends everything that can be represented and imagined, to refer us to infinity. It alone can redeem that which constitutes the ultimate imprisonment of all realities which are not expressed in word: the dumbness of their reference to God. For this reason the primordial word, before all other expressions, is the primordial sacrament of all realities. And the poet is the minister of this sacrament. To him is entrusted this word, in which realities come out of their dark hiding place into the protective light of man to his own blessing and fulfilment.

II

What is a priest? The names applied to the priesthood by the New Testament are concerned mainly with its external structure. The ‘apostle’ is the envoy, ‘bishop’ means supervisor, ‘presbyter’ elder. It is remarkable that Scripture characterizes the content of the priestly office only in this one respect: as ministry of the word (Ac 6:4). Even where the administration of baptism is particularly named as the commission given to the Apostles, it appears as the means to becoming ‘disciples’ of the new teaching of Christ (Mt 28:5 9). And St Paul puts his mission of proclaiming the Good News before the command to baptize (1 Co 1:17). Moreover, [303] baptism itself takes place ‘in the word of truth’ (Ep 5:26), in calling upon the ‘name’ of Christ (Ac 2:38 sqq.), in the ‘name’ of the blessed Trinity (Mt 28:19). May we not then describe the priest as the man to whom the word has been entrusted? Is he not quite simply the minister of the word? But of course we must state more clearly what word is here in question.

The word which is entrusted to the priest as gift and mission is the efficacious word of God himself.

It is the word of God. The priest is not speaking of himself. His way does not lead man, his world and the experience of this world in which man encounters himself, into the light of man’s consciousness of himself (Beisichsein). His word does not redeem, in the sense indicated above, the things of the world from their gloomy and blind darkness by orientating them towards man. The word of the priest is the word of God. It is spoken by God in the infinite katabasis of his self-revelation, and brings the inner and most intimate light of God into the darkness of man. It enlightens the man who comes into the world and admits God himself into man through the faith which it awakens. The word of God is the eternal Logos of God who was made flesh, and therefore could also and in fact did become the word of man. All the words of God previously spoken are only the advance echoes of this word of God in the world. So much therefore is the word possessed of divine nobility, that we can call the Son, the eternal self-comprehension of the Father, nothing else but the Word. It was precisely this person who is the Word, not another person of the most holy Trinity, who became in the flesh the word of God directed to us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If God wills to make himself known to the world in that which he is in his most proper, most free Self, beyond the realm of his creative power, he can do this in only two ways: either he seizes us and the world immediately into the dazzling brilliance of his divine light, by bestowing upon his creatures the direct vision of God, or he comes in word. He cannot come to us in any way other than in the word, without already taking us away from the world to himself. For he wants to give himself to us precisely as that which simply as the Creator of realities outside himself he cannot reveal. That is possible only because there is present something in the world, one thing alone, which belongs to God's own reality: the word, which sets the creature free from its muteness by pointing beyond the whole created order. In it alone lives in a conscious way that transcendence [304] which both negates and liberates. It alone is capable of making God present as the God of mysteries to the man who does not yet see him, in such a way that this presence not only is in us by grace, but is there for us to perceive. Thus the word, as the primordial sacrament of transcendence, is capable of becoming the primordial sacrament of the conscious presence in the world of the God who is superior to the world.

This word has been spoken by God. He has come in grace and in the word. Both belong together: without grace, without the communication of God himself to the creature, the word would be empty: without the word, grace would not be present to us as spiritual and free persons in a conscious way. The word is the bodiliness of his grace. This does not apply only, and in the perspective of our present life not primarily, to the sacramental word in the strictest theological sense. It already applies to the word of faith in general. This word is one of the constitutive elements of the presence of God in the world, which is not yet transfigured, and therefore dwells as yet in faith and not in vision. This word is necessary, if God is to mean more to us than the ultimate ground of extra-divine reality, if God is to be for us the God of grace who communicates to man his own intra-divine glory.

This word, which makes God present in the world as God, and not merely as ultimate cause of the world, is a free word. It is a free act of love. Therefore it cannot be discovered at all times and in all places in the world. It cannot be gained from the world. It is an event. It must be spoken: through Christ and – through those whom he sends. For the presence-to-us of the reality of the divine self-revelation as expressed in this word always remains dependent upon this word being spoken and repeated. If it cannot be spoken by Christ himself until the end of time, then it must be carried on by others. The others cannot take hold of this word by their own power, in the way in which one 'takes up' a theory which one has once heard and propagates on one's own account and at one's own risk. If it were so, how could they know that it has remained the word of God and not been transformed into a human theory, which suffocates the original divine word under a chaotic mass of human interpretation? How could one prevent the message, which is an event in history, from becoming mere theology about it? The word of God must 'run on', but it must be borne by those who are sent. We call the messenger and the herald of the word of God the priest. Therefore what he says is a [305] proclamation, a kerygma, not primarily nor ultimately a doctrine. He is handing on a message. His word, in so far as it is his word, is a signpost pointing to the word spoken by another. He must be submerged and unseen behind the message he delivers. As priest he is not primarily a theologian, but a preacher. And because there is preaching for that reason there is theology: not vice versa. For the same reason it is the preaching Church with her demand for faith which is the norm of theology: it is not the 'science' of theology which is the norm of an haute vulgarisation which could be called preaching.

The word whose proclamation Christ has entrusted to the priest is an efficacious word. It produces an effect. This is not primarily because it influences the salvation of him who hears and believes it. That comes in the second place. No, this word is efficacious because it is not merely discourse about something that would remain equally real and effective if it were not talked about. It can be said of the weather and of the moon that they would exist in any case even if poets did not speak of them and meteorologists did not publish weather reports (although even this is not entirely true). Here the case is quite different. For the salvation of God is love. But all love achieves its own fulfilment only if it is accepted and answered. It can be answered only in freedom. And freedom exists only where there is consciousness of spirit and wakefulness of heart. Because this is so, God's grace itself only reaches its own fulfilment when it is spoken. Then it is really present. It is present in virtue of being proclaimed. The word first translates the love of God into man's sphere of existence as love, to which man can respond. The word is consequently the efficacy of love. It is an efficacious word.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The efficacy of the word of God can naturally have very different grades and degrees. This depends on what kind of word of God is in question, how and by whom it is spoken. But wherever it is really a case of the word of God itself as a delivered message, there we are in the presence of the efficacious word: wherever, that is to say, it is not merely theology in an exclusively human sense which is practised, as a merely human reflection about the word of God. (We leave out of account for the moment the question whether theology does not cease to be theology, if it no longer speaks the word of God itself, aided by supernatural powers of grace and of the light of faith.) But the effective power of the divine word itself, which allowed God in expressing himself to 'pitch his tent' among us (Jn 1:14), is different. He has 'told us all' that he has [306] received from the Father, namely himself with Godhead and manhood, flesh and blood, with his life and death, with his short span of time on earth and the eternity which he acquired. But we have to speak him in many different ways. We cannot with all our words say him completely, although he has confided to us a multitude of words. Of his one glory we can say sometimes more, sometimes less. We have to speak him into the undelimited dimensions of human existence, into all the heights and depths of our life. The one white light from him must be refracted in all the prisms of the world.

There are many efficacious words spoken at the command of Christ. These words are of varying efficacy in themselves and in the men who hear them. When is the most concentrated, the most effective word spoken? When is everything said at once, so that nothing more has to be said, because with this word everything is really there? Which is the word of the priest, of which all others are mere explanations and variations? It is the word which the priest speaks when, quietly, completely absorbed into the person of the incarnate Word of the Father, he says: 'This is my Body . . . this is the chalice of my Blood . . .' Here only the word of God is spoken. Here is pronounced the efficacious word. Words can be spoken about higher realities, about the eternal mystery of the Most Blessed Trinity. But these words themselves are only there 'for us', meaningful and of existential import, because the Son of the Father knows no other divine glory than that into which he has brought his and our human existence; because he has become man; because he has a body which was delivered up, and because he has taken on our blood which he shed for us. The greatest mysteries thus only exist for us because the mystery of the humanity and death of the Lord exists.

The most effective way of speaking about these mysteries, too, is by speaking effectively about the Body and Blood of the Lord. But it is the word of Consecration that speaks of this. It speaks in such a way, that what was spoken of is now present. Everything is then present: heaven and earth, Godhead and manhood, body and blood, soul and spirit, life and death, Church and individual, past and eternal future; everything is gathered together into this word. And everything that is evoked in this word really takes place: mysterium fidei, sacrum convivium, communio. In it God already becomes in reality, even if only under the veil of faith, all in all. Here there is not a discourse 'about' death and life. Death and life are proclaimed until he comes, and in coming bring us what is already [307] here and already

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

celebrated in mystery: the handing over of the Son and with him of the world to the Father.

This efficacious word has been entrusted to the priest. To him has been given the word of God. That makes him a priest. For that reason it can be said that the priest is he to whom has been entrusted the word. Every other word that he speaks, that he reflects upon, that he theologizes over, that he proclaims, for which he demands faith, for which he is prepared to pour out his blood – every other word is only explanation and echo of this one word. In it the priest, his person wholly absorbed into Christ, says only that which Christ has said. And in it Christ has said only one thing: himself as our gift. Though the priest may make known mysteries as distant as the stars, in the depths of the divine being – he can do this because he can show under the forms of this earth him who came to us from those eternal distances as the Son of the Father and brought with him everything that the Father gives him from all eternity and ever continues to give; and he is present under the forms of this earth because over these humble signs there remains constantly poised the word: 'This is my body . . .'

If the priest preaches Jesus, his life and death, then what he says is not mere talk, because by his word he is present among us who lived this life and died this death for our salvation. If he preaches sin, judgement and damnation, he can only do this because he lifts the chalice of the blood which was shed for our sins, and because he preaches the death which was the judgement on our sins and our salvation. If he speaks of the earth, then he cannot forget that he lifts up the fruit of our poor fields and vineyards as a sacrament into the eternity of heaven. If he speaks of man, of his dignity and his depth, he alone can tell the real truth about man – 'Ecce homo!' – and truly show the flesh of sin, which is laid on the altars of God in sacrifice.

It is with true consolation that we are able to maintain: the priest is he to whom the efficacious word of God has been entrusted. One might also say: the priest is he to whom the primordial word of God in the world is entrusted, in such a way that he can speak this word in its absolute concentrated power (Dichte).

III

Is the priest then simply the poet tout court? This cannot be answered with a simple 'yes'. For he is so much more than a poet. We would be [308] saying too little about him were we to call him simply the poet of the word of God. Too little, because he possesses his own proper name which is irreducible and cannot be replaced by any other word. His name is: priest. He may communicate his message with unconcern. Perhaps it is on his lips without having proceeded from his heart. Perhaps his life does not make a reality of what his word is saying. Nevertheless, he remains a priest, herald of the word of God in virtue of a holy mission. But one could not then call him poet any more. For one can be a poet only if the word of the mouth springs up from the centre of the heart. The poet says what he bears within him. He expresses himself in truth. And this expression itself is a part of what he is. On the other hand, one can say the words of God without expressing oneself. Not only the Donatism of the sacramental word in the strict sense, but every Donatism of the kerygma is false. That is a comfort. For now we, the hearers, can never become the slaves of the man preaching to us. It is God's word that is said by the priest. For that reason not every priest is a poet by the mere fact of speaking God's own primordial words. He says what is true; he speaks God's own truth. But this can happen without God's truth having become his own truth, the revelation in word of the very constitution of his own being. With a word of that kind poetic existence is not achieved. One has said less, less of the human, because more has been said, more of the divine.

The word of the priest is therefore never in danger, to the same degree as the words of other men and poets, of sinking from the level of a primordial word to the level of a merely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

technical word of utility, to the shallow talk and chatter of daily life . . . Verbum Domini autem manet in aeternum. Many a time from tinkling cymbal and sounding brass have rung out words which have penetrated like a double-edged sword into the hearts – of others. A proof that God remains God and victorious even in the powerlessness of the human word!

To be sure, this is not to deny, but rather to make quite clear, that the word of God in the mouth of a priest empty of faith or love is a judgement more terrible than all versification and all poetic chatter in the mouth of a poet who is not really one. It is already a lie and a judgement upon a man, if he speaks what is not in him; how much more, if he speaks of God while he is godless. What he says remains the word of God. But to him is applicable: Ex ore tuo te judico, serve nequam. Not only does one eat judgement to oneself, if one receives the body of the Lord unworthily; [309] one speaks judgement to oneself, if one offers to others unworthily the word-body of God in which he has also become incarnate.

To the true poet, according to Goethe, 'a God has given the power to say what he is experiencing', while others remain silent in their agony and in their bliss. The poet experiences the blissful, but also perilous, extremely perilous, pleasure of an aesthetic kind of identity between his being and his consciousness. He attains that coming-to-himself and being-with-himself which St Thomas calls the reditio completa in seipsum, not merely in the abstract concept in which the unpoetic, profane man knows about himself. He experiences it in that concreteness full of images which is in fact a poetic and concentrated expression where everything is given in one; spirit and body, what is far and what is near, what is infinitely profound and what is childishly clear. Oh what a sublime blessedness it is to be so reconciled with oneself, so near to oneself, so close to one's immeasurable remoteness; to be able to understand oneself, by uttering oneself, even while one appears to speak of something quite different!

That is the grace of the poet. The priest does not have it. Even if he speaks out of the innermost centre of his believing, loving heart filled with the Spirit, he is speaking the words of God. They come from an immeasurable remoteness: not that of the man himself, but the remoteness of God. And the God now in question is not he who is the archetype and first cause of the things of the world, the ultimate ground of the world and its mysterious radiance of infinity; it is the God who inexpressibly transcends everything that is or can be thought outside himself; it is the uncharted, terrifying remoteness of the God whose transcendence it is that cannot be expressed by what is created as such. Such are the words spoken by the priest. They do not reconcile him with himself, unless it be in the death of faith and then indeed in an eternal, not a merely aesthetic reconciliation. These words humble the priest. They demand too much of him. They are ever the judgement upon his sinfulness which is never completely done away with as long as we have to speak with human words about this thrice holy God. They pierce his heart like a sword, especially when he puts his heart into these words which his mouth is uttering. They unmask him. Not with that perhaps sublime, perhaps sometimes also masochistic self-unmasking of the poets, who yet attain in it, at bottom, a pleasurable unity with themselves: 'Look, there go I!' The words of the priest produce that unmasking which God alone can [310] bring about. It truly humbles us. It gives us, if we accept it in true self-denial, sober spiritual health.

We could go on at great length. Always and from every point of view it would be clear that the priest is not already a poet because he is a priest. He is always more and mostly less than a poet.

But having said this much, we may and indeed must acknowledge that it would be a realization of that which as yet we glimpse from afar, if a priest were also to be a poet, if a poet were allowed to be a priest, if the life of a priest and that of a poet were to intermingle and be woven one into another. With that we mean of course something more than a symbiosis between priest and poet; a priest could, for example, also be a – philatelist. There

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation are scientists who in the morning celebrate Mass, and men like Richelieu who at midnight 'discharge' their Breviary obligation – for two days at a time. What we mean is that two modes of existence appeal to each other and mutually condition each other. The priesthood releases poetic existence and sets it free to attain its ultimate purpose. At the same time it discovers in the grace of poetic power a charism for its own perfection. Why the marriage of priest and poet would be a meaningful and happy one, we must now attempt to explain still more accurately.

IV

The priest calls upon the poet. It is true that the priest does not proclaim himself and man in a merely human word; he proclaims God and the God-man in the word of God. The priest does not point to his own heart, but to the pierced heart of the Son. He says 'Ecce homo!' and indicates thereby not himself and his own figure, but him who alone can say who man is. But in pronouncing such divine primordial words the priest ought not to be tinkling cymbal or sounding brass (blaring loudspeaker, St Paul would perhaps say today). He should place the light of God, God himself on the altars of men's hearts. But this light burns with the oil of our hearts, until it has consumed them . . .

We Catholics can never be Donatists. But we are sometimes in danger, out of sheer anti-Donatism, out of sheer Objectivism, of forgetting an important Catholic truth: in spite of everything institutional, in spite of every opus operatum, in spite of every objective word, it is the Saints who sustain the Church. To say this does not mean to attempt to overthrow God and his indestructible power and might. For it is he who gives this [311] holiness to the Saints. He has said that his Church will always be the holy Church, the Church of Saints. And this holiness, the glowing heart, selfless dedication, the heroic throwing away of life, the divine impatience, the dark night of mystical suffering, the smiling love for a poor brother – all these glories of the Church are no less important, no less constitutive of her reality than the infallible truth of the divine word and the objective holiness of the sacraments. In fact, all these 'objective' realities are in the last analysis only there for the purpose of bringing into and maintaining in being the subjectivity of happily loving hearts. On the last day, out of all this objective reality, only that will be gathered into the eternal barns of God which entered into living hearts: truth and love, and both of these in the way that they are realized, appropriated, lived. Not love as a demand and a law: love only as happiness. Not the truth in propositions and dogmas, in umbris et imaginibus; the most intimate truth of deified hearts. God has promised to this Church of the latter days not only that error will never overcome it. He has given the same promise to the Church of Jesus Christ also as regards that love which preserves the ultimate truths.

The consequence of the thoughts we have indicated, and which would have to be accurately developed, is this: the priestly word demands of the priest – however much it is God's and not his – that he should speak it through his existence. It would be too little if one were to evaluate this statement in a merely moralizing way as a 'suitable' obligation of the priest. Certainly, one can fix one's attention exclusively upon the abstract essence of a 'truth revealed by God' and of a sacrament as a sign of grace effective ex opere operato. One could then think: the existential realization of what is proclaimed and of what is accomplished in the sacrament could after all be absent in the priest; it constitutes only one obligation, though a clear one, from God; the truth, however, still remains true, and the sacrament is still effective in its recipient. This anti-Donatist reference to the validity of the sacraments and of the truth in the priest who is unworthy as an individual is in itself correct. But it overlooks the fact that the individual, perhaps sinful, priest always speaks and acts in the name of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church. He always has the Church as a whole behind him. He always lives and acts within her sphere of existence. What then: would it also be a matter of indifference for preaching and the sacraments if the Church as a whole were to fail in love and holiness? An Augustine would never have agreed with that.

[312] It can of course be objected that a proposition does not become false because it is stated by someone who does not believe it and who does not realize it in his own existence. But would it in all cases also remain a witness to the truth with a claim to credence, if the real bearer of this truth, who is always much greater than the individual priest, has existentially abandoned it? That is not possible. Moreover, it is not a matter of just any kind of truth here. It is a matter of ultimate, eschatological truth: the truth of an ultimate self-revelation of God. In it God lavishes himself. How can he risk manifesting this truth without damage to his ultimate glory? In the omnipotence of his grace God has pre-destined the freedom of men and of the Church as a whole really to accept his truth, God's love itself, in an equally loving way. (To be theologically exact, one would have to speak of praedestinatio formalis.) No, one can no longer say it is 'in itself' a matter of indifference to the truth of the word, whether it is proclaimed in this way or in that: by one who has himself accepted it, or by another. It is after all the truth of God's love as proffered that this word is proclaiming, and really nothing else!

What follows? The real bearer of the proclamation of the word is the Church. She is always the holy Church. Because of her holiness she is placed in the infallibility of God's grace, which yet leaves human freedom untouched, which indeed first allows it to be itself. The word of the Church, however, is the offer of love; it is the truth of the love of God as free and utterly self-giving. For this reason one is entitled to say that this word must be spoken in love, in a loving existential acceptance. This word can be entrusted to God only to the loving and holy bride of his Christ. But this necessity is not simply transferable to the individual who in the Church and on her behalf, speaks the word which tears open the heart of God like a spear. This remains undoubtedly the case. The individual is not, by the mere fact of being the priestly herald of this word, predestined to the salvation of love. He can pass on the amply filled word, the vessel of divine love, with an empty heart. But here we discover the deeper, inner reason for the duty of the priest to accomplish in faith and love the word of God that he speaks, and to proclaim it in this way. He is not expressing his own existence when he preaches the word of God. But he must express the word of God with his Christian existence. More precisely, the priest ought to do this, because the Church must do it. The priest ought to bear witness to the word of God by showing that he is himself possessed by the Spirit of God, and that the dynamism [313] of this Spirit – as St Paul says – effectively operates in his own life.

The word of God in the mouth of the priest wants therefore, if it is to be spoken rightly, to absorb and subject to itself the life of the priestly individual. It wants to be made manifest in him. But then it calls upon the whole man and lays claim to him with everything that is his. Then the herald of the word 'gesticulates' (a word of Kierkegaard's) with his whole existence. He strives only to communicate God's word like a faithful messenger. But if he really does this, then this will fill and consume his whole humanity which, in so far as it is redeemed, represents all that he preaches. The priest necessarily speaks about man from the standpoint of a man. This is not his first and last, not his proper word. But he must say this word as well, if he is to proclaim the word of God, which became flesh, as it wants to be and must be proclaimed.

But what man is there who can utter himself? Who from a man's standpoint can speak about man in a correct and appropriate way? Who has at his command in concentrated form (verdichtet) the full, primordial words of mankind? Who is capable of calling upon another man in such a way that he is roused in his inmost being, which he often does not know

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself? Who can get through to the centre of a heart that may be lost and sinful – and yet must be reached if it is to attain redemption? Who can tell man his ambiguity in such a way that he perceives it? Who can do this, if not the poet? How too could God's answer be heard to the question which man himself is, if this question itself is only half or not at all experienced and suffered and lifted up to the light of the poetic word? Only a Protestant and a theologian of the most extreme dialectical obscurity could maintain that the divine, grace, redemption, and our new freedom, light and the love of God remain so much in the beyond that one can experience nothing at all of them in this world; that on the contrary all human discourse witnesses to the word and to the reality of God only by its character of absolute paradox.

But grace is here. It is present wherever we are. It can always indeed be seen by the eye of faith and be expressed by the word of the message. But it must also be really said, it cannot be simply shrouded in silence. That is why grace appears unfailingly in the fact that it lays claim to man and his powers, his thinking and loving. That is why too the light of grace shines also by burning the oil of this world. Everything in man should enter into the service of the divine life of grace. Must not he also, who is [314] capable of uttering man and by his utterance of calling up man and his powers and of leading him to himself in knowledge and action, must not the poet render his service to grace and its revelation in the word of God?

In fact, was not the herald of revelation, who touched the heart of man with his message, in the proper sense a poet? We must not maintain that all texts of sacred Scripture are poetry. That would not be true, if the word poetry is to be allowed to retain its usual sense. The word of God in its descent to the level of the human word has entered also those spheres where the laboured, humble, daily word dwells. One could adapt an old adage of the Fathers, and say that it had to assume everything which needed redemption. But daily life also forms a part of man, in which he effaces himself in all humility. The weariness of the small hours, in which man is banished from himself without being fully aware of his pitiable forlornness, is part of him. Therefore the word which he speaks in this his situation also forms a part of man as needing and meriting redemption. And for that reason the word of God has assumed this human word also. For all its truth and dignity, it can enter into the kenosis of the human word, into its baseness and banality. The word of God too can take on the form of a slave and be found as a human word of the street; simple, without pretension, almost worldly wise. In the Old Testament it can speak of the insoluble question and of the suffering of a man who has no answer. It can formulate counsels with the aged shrewdness of a very earthly experience of life. It can speak in the laboriously erudite language of theology.

No, thank God, not every word of Scripture is poetry. Thank God, we say, because we are not all, and not all the time poets. Yet the word of God should be able to find us always and be able to find each one of us. The word of God has no need to confine itself to calling into its kingdom only noble words. One could apply also to Scripture the words of St Paul, and say to human words what St Paul says to the Corinthians who had become Christians: 'Consider your calling, words of men! Not many of you are wise in the worldly sense, not many powerful, not many well born. No, what among you in the world is considered foolish, God has chosen so as to shame wise words; weak words, tired and old words, faded and worn out in everyday use. The words which are nothing, these God has chosen – in order to confound poetry. For no earthly word is to have any ground for boasting before God . . .'

Yet on the other hand what is poor has no special privilege before God [315] either. The words of daily life are not worthy of the Kingdom of God's word merely because they are poor and tired and have, as it were, run far away from their first origin. God has also called what is lofty and good, what is noble and splendid. Everything has been called to its salvation in Christ. The ability of speaking primordial words in poetic form, of saying words as glorious as on the first day, the word of the poet too is called into the glory and light of the divine word. In truth, is the hymn to charity which St Paul sings, not a poem? Must it not be ranked, even from a purely human point of view, with the most splendid words ever spoken by man? Anyone who does not feel the Parable of the Prodigal Son to be wonderful poetry understands nothing about poetry. At the most he can plead in excuse – with justification – that the tears he shed in hearing this read caused him to forget that the words which so touched his heart were also poetry. So humble was the grace of repentance that it made use of human poetry in discreet silence, in order to be effective. Is not the historical account of the first beginnings of the world and of humanity, and of the blessed state of innocence and the origin of sin also sheer poetry? Would this account not have been understood much better if men's hearts had preserved a little more sensitivity for the lofty poetry of it? Can this account not express the historical truth incomparably better than if a newspaper reporter had recounted the first beginnings? Is it necessary, in this connection, to praise the psalms? Is it necessary to call upon passages in the prophetic literature of the Old Testament or upon the high-priestly prayer of the Lord to demonstrate that poetry is found wherever the word of God itself utters its most profound words?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Has it not remained so? Perhaps it has not always been completely fulfilled, because everything on earth, even in the Church, remains partial until what is perfect appears. Yet it has been so. Are the verses of Thomas Aquinas at their most successful merely the putting into verses of something he says more clearly and more accurately in the articles of the Summa? Or do they not say, if not 'more' at least more originally, more pregnantly, and in this sense more truly, what those articles say? Is St Augustine in his 'Confessions', are John of the Cross, Meister Eckhart, Newman in his sermons and verses, Thomas of Celano in his Dies Irae, Angelus Silesius, Dante, Brentano, Annette von Droste in many of her strophes, Luís de Leon and many, many others, poets or are they not? Are they merely poets as well? Have they just put incidentally and retrospectively into verse or some other artificial form of so-called poetry [316] what can equally well – if one is not so poetically sentimental – and even more clearly and accurately be said in 'prose'? Or is their poetic word more original and comprehensive, more alive than that of those theologians who are proud of the fact of not being poets? Yes, is it not time that we asked: what has become of the times when the great theologians also wrote hymns? When they could write like Ignatius of Antioch, compose poems like Methodius of Olympus, be carried away in hymnody like Adam of St Victor, Bonaventure, and Thomas Aquinas? What has become of those times? Has theology become more perfect because theologians have become prosaic?

This remains true: wherever the word of God utters the sublime and pours it into the depths of the human heart, there too a human poetic word is to be found. And the priest calls upon the poet, that the poet's primordial words may become consecrated vessels of the divine word, in which the priest effectively proclaims the word of God.

V

The poet calls upon the priest. The primordial words which the poet speaks are words of longing. They say something in images, intuitive, concrete. But it is the concrete individual which points beyond itself, the near which suggests the distant. The words of the poet are like gates, good and strong, clear and sure. But they are gates into infinity, gates into the incomprehensible. They call upon that which has no name. They stretch out towards what cannot be grasped. They are acts of faith in the spirit and in eternity; acts of hope for a fulfilment which they can never give themselves; acts of love for unknown goods. Art, real art, is always more than just that. If ever art is pursued exclusively for the sake of the aesthetic, it ceases to be art. It sinks down to the level of a poisonous narcotic banishing the fear of existence. But that something more which belongs to it and from which it lives cannot come to art from itself. The openness to infinity which constitutes art does not itself give the infinite, it does not bring and contain the infinite. The poet is driven forward by the transcendence of the spirit. He has already been overpowered secretly and quite unknown to himself by the longing which the grace of the Holy Spirit has implanted in the human heart. So he speaks words of longing even when he speaks of the flowers and of the love of two human hearts. His words of nostalgia are stretched out in longing for an unsurpassable [317] fulfilment, for perfect love, for the definitive transfiguration of all reality. His word therefore calls up another word: the word which makes a response to this his word. It calls up the efficacious word which satisfies that longing; the word of God. Only where the intimate faith in the possibility of such an answer has been suffocated in the hellish agony of desperate disbelief, would the human poetic word also be dead. Only there, but there absolutely: idols are dumb, as Scripture says. And theology, on the other hand, means hymn-like discourse about God. Hence the poetic word calls upon the word of God, that is the poet calls upon the priest.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At first sight it might be thought that poet and priest can make contact by one of them uttering the (poetic) question, and the other the (divine) answer. Question and answer, poet and priest, would thus live from each other. But now, supposing that the priest proclaiming, the theologian in the full sense, himself becomes a poet, in order to communicate perfectly his message from above? Supposing that the poet, happily satisfied by the answer he has perceived to his question, himself tells what he hears? (How could he in any case ask the question since the birth of Christ as though he had never received an answer! Even the post-Christian unbelievers still compose poetry in such a way that one can convince them of having heard the answer.) Supposing that this happens: then – and what a blessed though rare occurrence – the priest becomes a poet and the poet becomes a priest. Such fortune is rare. If it happened often, there would be too much radiant beauty for our hearts. Even the Scriptures, the very words of God, only seldom speak in poetry. But occasionally it may happen. Then it is a grace. It proclaims that everything is redeemed. The primordial words of man, transmuted by the Spirit of God, are allowed to become words of God, because a poet has become a priest.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[319]

PART FIVE

Devotion to the Sacred Heart

[321]

21

‘BEHOLD THIS HEART!’: PRELIMINARIES TO A THEOLOGY OF DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART

During Lent and Passiontide the figure of the suffering Lord determines the course of our liturgical and personal religious life. The mysteries of this season are so abundant and their richness so inexhaustible that the Church seizes upon one or two of those which make the meaning of the Passion especially clear and puts them before us once more during the remainder of the year. Among these is the mystery of the Lord’s heart, torn open and pouring out its life-blood. It is the most profound of all the mysteries of the Passion, in fact the source of them all. It can therefore scarcely be better described than by means of one of those words which form part of the basic assets of human language, and which attempt in a stammering way to make an inexpressible mystery capable of being expressed. Only a lover is able to pronounce the word ‘heart’ with understanding, and only one who is lovingly united to the crucified Lord knows what is meant when the ‘Heart of Jesus’ is spoken of. But even the word ‘heart’ itself opens up to the lover new paths for his love which can never love enough. Let us then for once discuss this word. May it open up for us the way into the Heart of the Lord which pours itself out in streams of blood.

It is intentionally that I speak of the ‘word’ heart, not of the concept. Naturally it is not only the outward sound that is meant: this after all sounds different in the different languages. But the word that we are to concern ourselves with does have this characteristic: that in its content the corporeal, the figurative and concrete side of the word and concept must be emphasized. And since we men always think in conceptual words and not in wordless concepts, and since we must – this side of any image-less and wordless mystical experience – even work out our salvation with them in faithfulness to the written word of God, the incarnate word of [322] the Word of God, we may be permitted to speak here directly of the word, and not of the concept.

There are words which divide and words which unite; words which explain the whole by breaking it up, and words which at once conjure up that whole and produce it in the listening person (not only in his intellect); words which can be artificially created by oneself and given an arbitrary definition, and words which are accepted, which were always given, which enlighten us and not we them, which have power over us, because they are a gift from God and not the products of man. There are words which delimit and isolate, and words which make a single thing transparent to the infinity of all reality; words which are clear, because they are shallow and without mystery; words which are obscure, because they evoke the over-brilliant mystery of the things expressed; words which are sufficient for the head, because they can be used to acquire mastery over things, and words which spring up out of the heart, prostrate in reverence and adoration before the mystery which overpowers us; words which illuminate something small, because they encircle with their light a part of reality, and words which make us wise, because they allow the manifold to harmonize in the one. The words which by their charm forge a unity, make reality first present to us, make us

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

subject to them, spring from our hearts, come to us as a gift and transport us – these I would like to call primordial words (Urworte). The others could be called manufactured, technical utility-words. Naturally, words cannot be divided into these two classes once and for all. The division refers to the destiny of words rather than dividing them a priori into two already separate classes.

There are innumerable words which, according as they are used by man, ascend or more frequently descend from one category to the other. When the poet or St Francis exclaims 'water', he means something greater and more comprehensive than when the chemist, degrading the word, calls his H_2O 'water'. You cannot write H_2O for the water to which the soul of man is likened. Yet the water which is seen by man, praised by the poet and used in baptism by the Christian, is not a poetic glorification of the chemist's 'water', as though he were the true realist; on the contrary, the 'water' of the chemist is a narrowed down, technified and secondary derivative of the water of mankind. In the word as used by the chemist a primordial word has been fated – with a fate which contains that of humanity through millennia – to sink to the level of a technical word of utility, and in its fall it has lost more than half its content.

[323] Heart is such a primordial word. One should not approach it from the start with the enfeebled, limiting understanding of the anatomist, as though he had first to determine its meaning and one could at the most discuss afterwards whether such a meaning could be retrospectively revalued at a 'poetical' or 'metaphorical' or other transferred level. This word did not originate with the experience of the anatomist (not even the primitive one), but in the experience of man. It is a primordial word. It cannot be defined, cannot be composed of better known words, because its meaning is an original unity and totality. For this reason it occurs in all languages and belongs to the primitive patrimony of man's speech. It is one of the words in which from the beginning man has already ascended beyond the superficial experience of daily life (including that of anatomy and of purely physiological sensations of the body), without becoming abstract and losing touch with the corporeal and tangible. It is one of the words in which man, knowing himself, expresses the mystery of his existence without solving that mystery. When a man says that he has a heart, he has told himself one of the crucial secrets of his existence. For when he speaks in this way, he is speaking of himself as the one self-knowing whole, he is evoking the unity of his being which is anterior to the dichotomy between body and soul, action and thought, external and internal; he is evoking what is original in the genuine sense of the word, that in which the manifold of human reality is still freshly one, that in which, as Hedwig Conrad-Martius says, the whole (concrete) being of man, as it is brought forth and unfolded and flows away in soul, body and spirit, is taken and grasped and remains as one, as though knotted and fastened at its midpoint.

This unity of man, original, originating and holding together what it originates, is a personal unity, that is to say, one which knows itself, ventures forth and freely makes its own choice, which answers and – in love – affirms itself or denies itself. It is the point where man borders on the mystery of God, the point where man, whose own origin is from God, as God's partner either leaves himself and gives himself back to God in his original unity, or else blasphemously refusing himself to Him and turning himself downward, plunges into the void of his own damnation. Heart is that being which is freely bestowed and yet historically eventful, which man understands himself and affirms himself to be in the actions of his life, in such a way that he yet remains secluded from himself and others while his name remains known to God alone. Properly speaking, [324] therefore, only man has a heart. For God, as God alone, is the unity which possesses and maintains itself in eternal selfhood without having to go out of itself in order to find itself. The angels, it is true, realize an existence which is pre-determined for them, but in doing so they look upon themselves and consciously lead their acts back to their own origin. But man goes out and away from himself he must realize himself in something other that he has done and suffered, and can only in this way, in this other, looking away from himself become conscious of the wellspring and the unity of his being. And such a well-spring, from which the alien other really flows and which possesses itself only in the other, is called the heart. The animals remain for ever strange to themselves, and their own source knows nothing of itself but only of the strange other with which they make contact in so far as they have already forgotten themselves. For this reason, then, Heart is a primordial word of man's, uttered by man about man to his glory alone. If this word is applied to God and the angels, then one is transferring to a higher order what originally belongs to man alone.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Hence this word is in a supreme sense a primordial word: if man was destined to call everything by its name, if he liberates the strange object he encounters by his light and his love to its conscious being, then in such an encounter he becomes conscious of himself and in meeting himself in the other he comes to know that he has a heart. He meets the other precisely in order to grasp this and do it. And he becomes all that he is and should be only when he asks: 'Whose are you, my heart?'

A man therefore comes to a consciousness of the activating core of his being as one and whole, when he comes to a real understanding of what he is saying with the word 'heart'. Consequently the question cannot be asked whether, when we speak of the heart, we mean a muscle or something spiritual. For if the question is formulated in this way, one has already in the question moved away from that one source of the whole man which is precisely meant by his heart. All one can then do, with great trouble trying subsequently and too late to recover a more original understanding, is to attempt in one's answer to join together again what the falsely formulated question has torn apart. 'Head', for example, is neither the top of the body nor spirit, 'countenance' is neither character nor the bodily face, it is not a subsequent fusing together of these produced by poets, but the original unity in which being and appearance, truth and its manifestation, what is most internal and what is most external, what is [325] expressed and its expression, are still one. The same is true of the other primordial words of a totally human kind. 'Flesh', for example, in the Bible is not the biological body and afterwards perhaps something additional, but the whole man who is body in spirit and spirit in body and both in the one, namely in flesh.

And the same is the case with the word 'heart'. It is a word which, from the beginning and not subsequently, lies across a possible but subsequent distinction between body and soul. Because this distinction is one which in our reflex Western knowledge obstinately insists on intruding, we find ourselves, in this reflex knowledge, constantly faced with the question whether a heart denotes a physiological organ of the body or 'by transference' something spiritual, or with the question how it is possible to combine both meanings, whichever of the two meanings one makes the starting-point for such a combination. But the question is wrongly formulated, both when one thinks primarily of the physiological heart – for man as speaking from the source of his being and uttering primordial words is from the outset not the physiological body alone but simply man – and when one thinks primarily of the spiritual and subsequently symbolizes this by means of the corporeal heart – for the primordial words speak of the spiritual in so far as it is realized only in the flesh, in so far as it has its being only in appearance.

We must always keep this in mind; in the concrete living out of our existence we always experience ourselves as one human being, we never have either spirit or matter by itself. When we have experience of the body, it is an experience of the living body and therefore – we could almost say – of the soul in the condition of a spatio-temporal aggregate (which of course only partially expresses it). And the highest knowledge of the spirit, where it comes face to face with itself, is still corporeal and takes place in image, word, sound, and gesture. That is why in the Apostles' Creed we do not speak of the Beatific Vision but of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Resurrection of the Body, and in saying it we mean the one concrete salvation of the whole man. And that is why we speak of the heart, and not of a centre of the spiritual person. For this one complete man has an interior and an exterior, a source and what springs from it, a centre and a periphery, background and foreground. This dimensionality of the one human being, which is quite disparate from any distinction between body and soul, is experienced by man immediately in living out his existence. The original, background, unifying interior of his one reality (which interior [326] is still as much a union of body and spirit as he himself is as a whole) he calls heart, and thus he knows that he has a heart before he ever caught sight of what the anatomist calls heart, and when with a shudder he saw this 'heart' for the first time, he viewed this 'heart' too as the transparent appearance of the proper heart which he had always experienced, to a certain extent as the sacramental sign of the grace of possessing a heart.

This is all very obscure, someone will say. Certainly, a form of thinking which takes apart and puts together like a mosaic is clearer and more easily grasped. But it is not more true, that is more replete with reality. A form of knowledge which is faced with the mystery of the unity in multiplicity, of being in appearance, of the whole in the part and the part in the whole, and utters primordial words which are designed precisely to evoke this mystery, is difficult to grasp and dark, like the reality itself which gains mastery over us in such words and draws us into its incomprehensible depths. In primordial words of this kind spirit and flesh, meaning and its symbol, concept and word, object and image are still originally one (which does not mean they are simply the same). Blossom, night, star and day, root and source, wind and laughter, rose, blood and earth, boy, smoke, word, kiss, lightning, breath, stillness: these and a thousand other words of the original thinkers and of the poets are primordial words, and they are more profound and more true than the worn-out verbal coins of daily intellectual exchange which one often likes to call 'clear concepts'. In each of such primordial words a piece of reality is connoted, in which a door is mysteriously opened into the unfathomable depths of true reality in general; it is a word in which the transition from the individual to the infinite, in which infinite movement is already part of the content of the word itself. How could such words be unequivocally defined, when they are precisely words of that crossing of borders on which at some stage our very salvation depends?

> . . . Sind wir vielleicht hier, um zu sagen: Haus, > Brücke, Brunnen, Tor, Krug, Obstbaurn, Fenster, > höchstens: Säule, Turm . . . aber zu sagen, versteh's,
> o zu sagen so, wie selber die Dinge niemals
> innig meinten zu sein . . .
> (. . . Are we perhaps here, in order to say: house,
> bridge, fountain, gate, urn, fruit tree, window,
> at the most: pillar, tower . . . but to say please understand, [327]
> Oh to say, what the things themselves never > intimately thought to be...)
>
> (Rilke, Ninth Elegy)

Only someone who understands these lines of the poet, understands what we mean by primordial words and why such words have every right to be obscure. This, it is true, does not mean that it is not possible for someone to disguise his own vague superficiality as deep thoughtfulness by draping it with such primordial words, nor that one ought to speak obscurely where it is possible to speak clearly. It means only that the first human concepts reflect the one man in his indissoluble unity of spirit and flesh. And such a word is 'heart'. In addition to the fact that it is used in the Scriptures and in the Church's declaration of faith, it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation already demands that humble reverence which man must have in the presence of such words, if he does not want to remain caught in arrogant blindness on the surface of reality.

Let us append two observations to this undefined definition of the word 'heart'.

First, 'heart' does not denote simply and immediately love. This inward-corporeal core of the personal being of man, which borders on the source of all mystery, can according to Scripture also be evil and the bottomless pit, into which the evil-doer who shuts himself off from love plunges. The heart can be empty of love, and even what can still be called love can be very peripheral. That the inmost core of personal reality is love and that love is in fact the inmost reality, this is experienced by man only in coming to know the heart of the Lord. 'Behold this heart, which has so loved men': this is not an analytical proposition, derived from the concept of heart, but the shattering consequence of a knowledge of the history of salvation.

Second, the representation of the physiological heart is a symbol of heart, as we have sought to explain the reality which this primordial word denotes, not a reproduction, a representation in the proper, photographic sense. But it is not an arbitrary symbol, not a conventional sign, but a genuine, original symbol, a primordial symbol (Ursymbol). If corporeity as such, forming part of the totality of an embodied person, is not an appendage to this person, not his container, but – in fact – his embodiment, in which all that the person originally is appears in such a way that without it the reality itself which appears would not be truly and completely what it is meant to be, then the corporeal heart is in this sense the [328] inner symbol (that is, a symbol lying within the symbolized object itself) of the heart of the person, a symbol which belongs as much to the reality it indicates as does the body to man, which belongs to it in a way similar to that in which the sacramental sign belongs to sacramental grace: one is never without the other, one is present in the other, is first fully itself in the other, and yet the two are not simply the same. But since a material picture of the 'heart' can reproduce in fact only the physiological heart, and this is a symbol and not a representation of the heart as the inmost core of the whole man (and not merely of his 'soul'), it is right and inevitable that this representation should be stylized, because in this way the symbolic character of the representation and of its immediate object is more evidently proclaimed than if the representation were to go out of its way to be as physiologically exact as possible.

There still remains to be answered one question which also belongs to these preliminaries to a theology of devotion to the Sacred Heart, the question concerning the subjective side (if so it may be called) of this use of the word 'heart'. Here is meant of course the heart together with the observable heart-symbol. To begin with, this question we have indicated may make understandable one objection. If up to now we have attempted to say what is meant by heart, why can this explanation not be made use of in order to avoid this word 'heart' altogether (oh, how worn-out and sentimental will this word appear to many!); and to speak more immediately with the words of this explanation of the reality which is meant? Certainly one can and indeed must speak of this reality also in this descriptive way: one cannot keep on saying simply heart, heart. After all, all discourse about metaphysical realities is carried on in a constant circular interchange of words, in which one luminous darkness must serve to throw light on another. For we speak about being itself with still other words, even though there is no word which lies beyond this one. But then, finite beings with finite speech, we must come to a stop. And then we say what we have already said at the beginning, and such words are then the beginning and the end of all discourse at the same time.

Primordial words of this kind, which stand and must stand at the beginning and equally at the end of all processes of explanation, are then only like a timid hinting at what we already knew and must know at the beginning if we are to be able to explain and communicate at all, because the speaker and the hearer already knew what the speaking and the hearing [329] was about. Such words do not say anything new, but rather the old which is eternally young, which is inexhaustible, and yet none of the explanations ever supersede the primordial words. These words cannot therefore be abstract, rarefied and sketchy words, they must, if they are to be the genuine beginning and the genuine end of all discourse, present the thing in its concrete, bodily, almost sensibly tangible plainness and formation, in image and its corporeal appearance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And for this reason the word 'heart' is in the last analysis irreplaceable and cannot be circumvented by a more abstract form of words. A word of this kind surges up out of the depths of the embodied spirit, accompanied by the beat of one's own heart, by its faltering and its unceasing course, by the experience of a core of corporeity permeated by spirit; such a word is, as it were, realizable at the same time as it is spoken. That is why it wanders through the languages of all peoples, like an archetype from generation to generation, why it constantly surges up in dreams out of the primordial depths of man, from yonder region where everything is as yet together in one. Poets cannot speak otherwise when they become aware of the secrets of man and concentrate in a few magically evocative words the experience of life. 'Oh, holy heart of nations, Oh, Fatherland' (Hölderlin), 'Who has not sat in fear before the curtain of his heart' (Rilke), 'if bursting wide open our own heart were to slay us' (Rilke), 'uncountable existence flows out of my own heart' (Rilke), 'with thousandfold joy of love the sanctified feeling of your everlasting warmth penetrates to my heart, infinite beauty!' (Goethe), 'why do you not rest, you dusky heart' (Nietzsche), 'that my heart, sated with sweet playing, may die the more willingly' (Hölderlin), 'Lord, have mercy on me, that my heart may blossom anew' (Brentano) – in these and thousands of other ways the poets have mused on existence. They too cannot speak otherwise, because these are words which cannot be superseded. These words may be understood in a flat and sentimental way, but they cannot be replaced. They ought to be used sparingly, with discipline and reticence. They ought not to be spoken where something else is meant. But they remain irreplaceable. And such a word is 'heart'.

So long as man has a heart, he will have to speak of it with this precise word 'heart'. That is to say, always. He will always speak of the heart, whenever at once simple and wise he recalls himself from multiplicity to his one source. Always, whenever he gathers the permanent essence of his time into the eternity of his existence, he will say that he has stored it [330] in the storing-place of his heart. Always, when he renounces himself completely and utterly, he will say, 'I give you my heart'. Always, when he plunges down into the dark abyss of his being, it will seem to him that he is caught in the dungeons of his dead and empty heart. Always, he will sing simply, 'Go out my heart and seek for joy!' Always, he will glorify his restoration to grace as an outpouring of the Holy Spirit into his heart. Always, he who is slandered will comfort himself with the fact that God sees his heart. Always, men will hope that 'the morning-star will rise in the heart', always call those blessed who are pure of heart, always experience horror at evil gushing up out of the quarry of the heart, and always be happy that goodness can be preserved in the heart, always love those who are able to forgive from the heart, always be judged by this alone, whether they have loved with their whole heart, because on the scales of God only hearts have any weight.

We have been wandering around in the outer courts of the theology of devotion to the Sacred Heart. But we must know what heart means and what an immeasurable weight the word 'heart' already has in itself, if we wish to speak of the heart of the God-man and in adoration acknowledge his grace. Only then can one begin to say: 'Behold this heart!' Only then can it dawn upon us what it means when we hear the news: the eternal Logos of God has a human heart, he risked the adventure of a human heart, until, pierced by the sin of the world, it had flowed out, until it had suffered to the end on the Cross the uselessness and powerlessness of his love and had become thereby the eternal heart of the world. Since that moment the word ‘heart’ is not only a word which affects man in the core of his being, but a word which can no longer fail to take its place in the eternal praise of God itself and in it in the centre of it – denotes also the heart of a man. Many words will be reduced to silence because what they mean is not worth speaking about. But there are human words which, because they mean human things, can properly be said only in a human way. And if they mean something human which belongs eternally to God himself, then such human words are words of eternity which men can never cease to utter, either here or in eternity. And to these words of earthly beginning and eternal ending belongs the word which God will still say to us men in all eternity: ‘Behold this heart, which has so loved men’.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[331]

22

SOME THESES FOR A THEOLOGY OF DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART

I. PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS

1. On the Theological Method

(a) The question to be asked is not what, proceeding from abstract dogmatic principles, devotion to the Sacred Heart could be in itself particularly with reference to its object; but what in fact it does mean according to the doctrine and practice of the Church.

(b) Since the Sacred Heart devotion in the doctrine and practice of the Church both past and present manifests itself under many aspects and forms, no one has any reason or any right to impose on another a concept and a practice of devotion to the Sacred Heart which is one-sidedly restricted to one or other aspect or one or other form of this devotion.

2. On the General Concept of 'Heart'

(a) The meaning of a word can only be rightly determined if, from the very beginning, attention is paid to the general a priori within which a word is used (that is if the 'frame of reference' is rightly determined). So, for example, the medical man who always intends to understand by 'heart' (even though only 'primarily') the heart-muscle as an organ of circulation, should have his attention drawn to the fact that such an understanding is determined by the physiologist's tacitly assumed and restrictive viewpoint of the body as a material mechanism – an a priori which under certain conditions is quite possible, but is of itself arbitrary and a limitation on the outlook and from the start does not come into consideration in our question.

(b) 'Heart' in its original (and not subsequently derived or metaphorical) meaning is a primordial word (Urwort): it is not susceptible of a proper definition by the logical composition of 'better known' concepts, [332] and it is a word which (in its real sense) is so common to many cultures[1] (Semitic, Graeco-Roman, Western, Mexican, etc.), that in this sense too it may be described as a primordial word, so that it can easily be used in the vocabulary of a world religion. It lies in the language-sphere of total-human words (like, for example, 'countenance' as opposed to 'face', like 'hand' – which blesses, defends, threatens and so on – as opposed to the hand as a corporeal grab-instrument, heart as opposed to heart-muscle, and so on), that is to say, it lies in the sphere of those words which describe realities belonging to man precisely in so far as he is one whole (as a corporeo-spiritual person), which therefore cut across a possible (but after all subsequent) distinction between body and soul. Therefore the question whether 'heart' signifies 'primarily' a physiological part of the body or a spiritual reality is from the beginning a false one, and no matter how it is answered, it leads to unsatisfactory consequences which can then be avoided only by troublesome and forced ad hoc constructions: 'heart', 'head', 'countenance', 'fist', and so on, are precisely words which denote realities underlying the distinction between body and soul or (which is

[1] Cf. e.g. Kittel, TWNT III, pp. 60 sqq. ('Heart' in the O.T., for the Greeks, for the Hellenistic and Rabbinic Jews); A. Guillaumont, 'Les sens des noms du coeur dans l'antiquité', Le Coeur: Études Carmélitaines 1950, pp. 41-81. In the same issue of the Études Carmélitaines there are further articles on the concept of 'heart' in ancient Egypt, India, in Mohammedan devotion, in Mexico, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the same thing) arising from the original, real-ontological unity of both as such. Because man as a whole is in fact also corporeal, 'heart' connotes implicitly also the corporeity of the heart and to this extent also the 'corporeal heart', but it does this neither in recto alone, nor as (external) 'symbol' of something else signified in recto, but as an inner moment in a concept springing from man's unity as a whole.

(c) Heart as a total-human primordial word of this kind denotes the core of the human person which is original and inmost with respect to everything else in the human person, in which the whole concrete 'being of man, as it is brought forth and unfolded and flows away in soul, body and spirit … is taken and grasped (and remains) as one, as though knotted and fastened at its mid-point' (H. Conrad-Martius), at which therefore man is originally and wholly related to other persons and above all also to God, who is interested in the person as a whole and whose action in giving grace or guidance is therefore aimed at this heart-centre of man.

[333] (d) Consequently heart does not immediately connote simply love. For example, that the total-human personal core of the Lord freely willed to be 'love for us' is precisely the incomprehensible experience that we meet in him (and which is therefore rightly symbolized on its own by the wounds of the heart, blood and water, rays, cross, crown of thorns). For a heart can be loveless and love can be peripheral. That the inmost core of reality is love and that love is the inmost reality, this is something that man first experiences in coming to know the heart of the Lord.

(e) Of this heart the representation of the physiological heart is a symbol, not a reproduction, but it is a natural, not an arbitrary (conventional) symbol, because the physiological heart (by reason of the ontologically based symbolical character of the body in general for the body-soul totality of man) is the most evident symbol (to a certain extent psychologically capable of being experienced) for the corporeo-spiritual centre of the whole man. But because the image of the physiological heart (as such) is only symbol (not representation) of the heart as the inmost core of the whole man (not only of his 'soul'!) it can and ought to be stylized: it ought not to go out of its way to be as physiologically exact as possible, and it can be filled out by other symbolical additions (crown of thorns, cross, rays, location in the geometrical centre of man) especially when the love of the heart is to be symbolized. A representation of the Lord with his heart in the most 'natural' way possible (in which one as it were looks into the physiological 'inside' of the Lord) misunderstands the meaning of the symbol and distracts from its symbolical character. Representations of the heart (of Christ) alone are to be rejected on altars and are forbidden there by the Church (because here it is the person of Christ which must be represented as object of worship) but are otherwise thoroughly meaningful and unobjectionable.

(f) Heart as primordial concept, together with the graphic symbolical picture of the heart, has, because of its original, non-conventional character, the function of an 'archetype', in the sense of depth psychology.[2] This in itself is sufficient to show that we cannot forgo this symbol in favour of a more abstract way of speaking (as of the 'core of the person', of the 'interior', of 'love').

[334]

3. On the Phenomenology of the Sacred Heart Devotion

(a) In interpreting historical statements about the devotion to the Sacred Heart, as in all descriptions of religious and spiritual events, the following is to be observed: a distinction

[2] I have attempted to say something in a very simple way about the ascetical significance of such primordial images in my article, 'A Spiritual Dialogue at Evening', above, pp. 220 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

must be made between the practice of the devotion and its subsequent reflexive description. The former can, for example, be genuine, vital and profound, while the latter can yet leave much to be desired in exactitude, originality, and theological precision, and reflect a particular situation in the history of spirituality which is not in every respect permanent and must not necessarily be taken as normative for us in all circumstances.

(b) In accordance with the general rules for the interpretation and evaluation of private revelations, this applies equally in those cases where the devotion to the Sacred Heart is based upon such revelations and where these may be accepted as genuine and of divine origin.[3]

(c) If such historical forms of devotion to the Sacred Heart are to be taken over together with their modes of expression, language, and their style, it should further be noted that from a certain point of view (particularly in fact from the point of view of language and certain individual ideas) there are many devotions to the Sacred Heart: that of the mystic, that of the person deeply moved by his redemption, that of the genuine piety of the 'average' Christian, that of creative originality, that of a form in accordance with traditional norms, even one which contains a certain almost unavoidable dose of existential falsity sometimes going as far as actual pseudo-religiosity ('convulsion', mendacity, and pseudo-fervour). The discretion of a good religious pedagogy will note such differences and will observe them according to which group of persons is to be introduced to the devotion to the Sacred Heart.

(d) This discretion (in the form of 'discernment') is particularly to be observed with regard to the sexes, differences in age and national mentalities. Children will as yet be too immature for special devotion to the Sacred Heart. Expressions like 'Long live the Heart of Jesus' strike a German mentality as lacking in taste and consequently should be avoided among us.

[335]

4. Some Preliminary Propositions from the Existential-Ontological Sphere

(a) Honour given to a person is clearly to be differentiated from that given to a thing (picture, relic, institution, material circumstance of a person, official power of a person, and so on) and that to an idea (a principle, norm, and so on), and is ultimately determined by the essence of a person in general and the concrete individuality of the person in question in a particular case.

(b) Of decisive importance (from the point of view of the honour to be paid him) is the fact that a person does not merely have 'attributes' (which he is endowed with and which are unchangeable), but also (free) 'attitudes' towards others which bear the character of freedom, historicity, actuality, momentariness, and unpredictability: these can be historically 'discovered' but never metaphysically deduced.[4] These attitudes of a person towards others (towards himself as another, towards God, towards other persons) exhibit a plurality. In this plurality of attitudes there exists a unity of form which merges the attitudes of the person into one structured, meaningful whole. The previously-given attributes of a person (prior to the free self-possession of the person by himself) are always in freedom taken over, 'understood' (in such or such a way), stamped by this unity. They can therefore be objects of reaction on the part of others in the concrete only in so far as they are so 'understood'; that is, for example, they can be honoured in concreto only in so far as they have undergone, through the attitudes of the person, a quite definite existential characterization, that is in so far as they have become an inner moment in those attitudes.

[3] Cf. e.g. K. Rahner, 'Über Visionen und verwandte Erscheinungen', ZAM XXI (1948), pp. 179-213; also Visions and Prophecies (London 1963).
[4] Cf. e.g. K. Rahner, 'Theos in the New Testament', Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1961), pp. 79-148.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(c) In accordance with the general concept of heart which we have delineated, it can be said that heart is the original, formative unity of the attitudes of a person. Only a person has a heart (animals have a heart-muscle), that is a core of 'existence', and his attitudes are cordial, that is they arise from a common, inmost central point which combines them all and impresses on them their ultimate meaning.

(d) Hence honour paid to a person is a consenting recognition of, an allowing oneself to be determined by, a loving response to the concrete reality, that is to the attitudes of a person, which have been discovered in their freedom, historicity, actuality, and unpredictable momentariness. [336] Honour paid to the heart of a person is honour paid to the person with respect to the original, inmost, formative centre of his attitudes.

(e) In the devotion to the Sacred Heart the proper and adequate 'object' is always the person of the Lord (cf. Denz. 1561; 1563). The fundamental structure of this devotion is therefore that of the cult of latria, because the person of the Lord is worthy of adoration. Hence those prayers too are Sacred Heart prayers in the proper sense, in which the person of the Lord is directly addressed (with the naming of his heart) (cf. for example the Prayer of Reparation of Pius XI for the Feast of the Sacred Heart) and not only prayers which address the heart itself directly. Such prayers are quite possible in accordance with the universal usage of human language ('sweetheart', for example, will be said even in profane life by a lover) and the practice of the Church. But ultimately they just as unequivocally mean the person of the Lord (particularly where acts of the person – 'have mercy on us' – are requested of the heart). As the expression of the language of highest fervour they must be used relatively sparingly and with discretion if they are to be genuinely meant.

(f) Accordingly, in devotion to the Sacred Heart the person of the Lord is given the cult of latria with reference to his 'heart', that is, to the original, inmost (total-human – therefore bodily-spiritual, and personal – therefore divine-human) formative centre of his attitudes towards us, which we have come to know in the history of salvation. But the ultimate discovery that we have made in this way is that this centre (this 'heart') is determined by the free, unfathomable Love which, as the inmost 'essence' of God, bestows itself upon us in free grace[5] and forms and combines all the attitudes of the Lord. In so far as the 'viewpoint' of the cult of latria directed to the person of Jesus is precisely the 'heart' as the inmost core of this person, the objection against the devotion to the Sacred Heart that one could equally well honour some other 'part' of the person of Christ (the face, the blood, the hand, and so on) shows itself to be mistaken from the very beginning. Even though these other devotions are meaningful or even approved by the Church, devotion to the Sacred Heart preserves in their regard its essential difference. The 'viewpoint' of this devotion to the person of the Lord is precisely that which is the inmost formative centre in this person in all his attitudes.

(g) While in the dogmatics of devotion to the Sacred Heart it is usual to distinguish between objectum (materiale and formale) partiale and [337] totale, it seems to us that in this special case this distinction has neither linguistically nor objectively much to recommend it. This distinction is unfortunate with regard to the 'material object': in language (against its intention) it separates the heart and the person of the Lord too much; it objectively misconceives the character of the 'heart', which is not simply a 'part' in a whole, but the original centre of the whole, giving it its unity; it does not give recognition or expression to the character of the person as indivisible, in whom (in a way different from and more radical than things) the 'part' can be rightly seen only in the whole, because the 'part' is taken over and 'understood' by the personal centre, and the whole of the person can only be rightly appreciated from the 'heart-centre'. 'Heart' (so we would prefer to put it) signifies in the Sacred Heart devotion the 'whence', 'whither', the 'viewpoint' in the cult of latria offered to [5] Ibid., pp. 117-124.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the person of Christ. If as a result the Sacred Heart Devotion could be defined as 'the latreutic cult of the person of the Lord directed to his heart in so far as this is determined by the love of God lavishing itself on sinful men, by which God gives himself to the sinner', then it will again be apparent that devotion to the Sacred Heart does not necessarily exist only where the personified heart is itself addressed. Similar remarks must be made with regard to the customary distinction in the formal object of the Sacred Heart devotion in itself (total and partial formal object) and as opposed to the material object. In so far as the 'heart' of Jesus becomes a definite object to our knowledge through the freely bestowed love in which God communicates himself (and not merely his created gifts) to the fallen world, in this case of the Sacred Heart devotion the absolute and relative ground meriting adoration and the object of the adoration coincide objectively (even though not formalissime): the love of God bestowing itself from the personal centre of Christ is adored, and this same fact is also the motive why it is adored. Didactically, then, there is no reason, in explaining the object of the Sacred Heart devotion, for speaking at any length about a distinction of the formal object in itself and in relation to the material object.

II. ON THE QUESTION OF THE THEOLOGICAL FOUNDATION FOR THE SACRED HEART DEVOTION

1. It is theologically necessary and possible to establish the material content of the Sacred Heart Devotion from Scripture and Tradition (in the [338] Fathers and in the Middle Ages), both as regards the more precise content of the object of the Sacred Heart Devotion (the general concept of heart; the Biblical references to the heart of the God-man; his heart as source of life, as origin of the Church, and so on), as also what can be appealed to as honour paid to this heart.

2. Nevertheless this abstract, dogmatic establishment of the Sacred Heart Devotion and the proof of prescription are not a sufficient foundation for the Sacred Heart Devotion of today. The latter cannot forgo the claim to be based upon the 'private revelations' of Paray-le-Monial, or (if you prefer) on the reception (as a matter of historical fact occasioned by them) by the contemporary Church of the Sacred Heart Devotion of today (which has as such not simply always existed); the approval and acceptance by the Church of the Sacred Heart Devotion of today originating in Paray-le-Monial does not signify merely the formal approval of something always possible, but the new creation out of the always valid treasury of faith of something demanded precisely now by the historical situation of the Church. The proof of this proposition lies in the simple fact that the modern devotion to the Sacred Heart such as it now exists, notwithstanding its historical continuity right back to Scripture, has not always existed (the ecclesial-liturgical veneration of the Heart of Jesus; the concentration of certain dogmatic topics under the 'key-word' (archetype) of the heart; determinate forms of devotion to the Sacred Heart; emphasis on reparation in and with Christ) and this 'extra' demands its own justification. This justification of the 'extra' must however not merely justify its 'possibility', but must also be applied to the de facto present realization of this possibility. But this justification cannot in the nature of things be derived from dogmatics (Scripture and Tradition) alone.

3. A private revelation[6] as a mission to the Church signifies not so much an Indicative communicating something new (which would be difficult to reconcile with the essence of a private revelation directed to the Church), but an Imperative which, within the context of a

[6] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Les révélations privées. Quelques remarques théologiques', RAM XXV (1949), pp. 506-514; and K. Rahner, 'Der Einzelne in der Kirche', Stimmen der Zeit CXXXIX (1947), pp. 260-276.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

particular historical situation of the Church, points out a particular course of action from among the many possible according to the universal and public revelation as the one most urgently needing to be realized. The new [339] feature in such a private revelation consists therefore not in its particular material elements but in the imperative marking and shifting of accentuation within the possibilities of Christianity. An imperative of this kind is possible because, while in the knowledge of the faith many things at the same time can be true and good, in the action of the faith not everything that is true and good can be actuated at the same time, to the same degree and with the same intensity. Hence the private revelation as a mission to the Church can be conceived as a heavenly imperative interpretation of the particular situation of the Church at this time; it answers the question as to what is most urgently to be done here and now in accordance with the general principles of the faith. A private revelation corresponds accordingly in the sphere of the Church to that first and second moment of choice in the life of the individual of which St Ignatius speaks, and whose mode of choice can never be completely grasped by purely theoretical considerations alone, because while the universal can circumscribe the relevant individual it can never (at least in principle) precisely pick it out.

4. Hence the interpretation of such a private revelation must be carried out on the one hand in accordance with the universal principles of mystical theology, and on the other with regard to the historical situation of the Church and of the world into which it speaks its divine message.

5. The situation into which the message of Paray-le-Monial brings the interpretation of an existential imperative must not be seen as essentially or finally that of Jansenism. Jansenism as such and its world of ideas are too ephemeral for that. Also the message would first have become effective in a temporal situation which has no longer been determined by Jansenism; this is something that in view of the actual effectiveness of the message and the rule of the Spirit of God in the Church cannot be assumed. This message must therefore be intended for the situation of modern times in general (which first made its appearance with the French Revolution). This is a period which as a whole is characterized (in a still increasing measure) by the secularization of the world (of the State, of society, of commerce, of science, of art, and so on): what pertains to the Christian religion is losing to an ever-increasing extent its objectifications within the world, it becomes more plainly dependent upon the inner, most personal decision of faith of the individual (it is increasingly less the case that there is a Christian world which can carry along the individual to a large extent independently of his own decision); the individual (no [340] matter whether he makes his decision in a Christian or non-Christian sense) must live in a situation of an outer and consequently also inner ‘absence of God’, therefore in a situation which is characteristic in the life of Jesus of Gethsemane and Golgotha (Mk 14:32 sqq.; 15:32 sqq.), in a situation where life lies in death, where abandonment means the deepest proximity to God, where powerlessness is the manifestation of the power of God.

6. At this point the message of Paray-Le-Monial and its reference to a particular situation in the history of the Church becomes understandable (right down to its concrete forms: e.g. Holy Hour). It signifies inwardness, belief in the presence of the love of God in the seeming impossibility of its being discovered (because of the increasing sinfulness and Godlessness of the world, from which believers and unbelievers alike have to suffer), reparation. But the right interpretation of these three characteristic notes of the Sacred Heart Devotion of Paray (which they undoubtedly are from a historical point of view) also becomes evident. ‘Inwardness’ is not the individualistic luxury of a religious introversion, but the loving trust, with all the powers of man in spirit and action, in the power of God in the midst of a world in which love has ‘grown cold’ (at least in the sense of a widespread failure of the objectifications of this divine love in the sphere of ‘public life’ in the ‘world’), inwardness as a growing strong of the inner man in faith and love without the support of an external 'Christian society'; faith in the love of God in and in spite of the divine Judgement, under whose ire the history of God's dominion over the world seems to be in the process of entering into its hour of darkness (and in this the situation of world history and the 'interior' situation of individual souls seem mysteriously to correspond); expiation as a suffering to the bitter end of this Godless situation with and in the Son of Gethsemane and Golgotha, as a share in consummating the seemingly wasted love of Christ for the sinful world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

7. On this basis the question of the 'dependence on its time' of the Sacred Heart Devotion may be answered.

(a) Several aspects of the style of the Sacred Heart Devotion as usually handed on are dependent on its time in the sense that the lack of certain perspectives in this usual presentation of the Sacred Heart Devotion is explicable in terms of the theological and religious situation of the seventeenth century: the failure to integrate the Sacred Heart Devotion into a Trinitarian context (the Ignatian theology of the Exercises is here [341] in fact wider and deeper); a diminution of the living realization of the dogma that Christ is the mediator to the Father, who is from the beginning essentially situated on our side as well, so that the religious and kerygmatic fundamental formula is not: towards Christ, but with him and in him (in a shared accomplishment of his life and death) to the Father. But these ways of dependence on its time are not essential to the Sacred Heart Devotion and can be overcome without difficulty.

(b) The individual material elements of the devotion to the Sacred Heart are quite simply elements of dogma and in this sense the Sacred Heart Devotion is valid for all periods of Christianity. They are so significant and so obviously and naturally synthesized in the concept of heart that one can say: as there has always been a certain Sacred Heart Devotion since the most ancient times in the Church, so there will always be one.

(c) The specific Sacred Heart Devotion such as it was 'newly' promulgated at Paray-Le-Monial and taken over by the Church (particularly by Pius XI: Miserentissime Redemptor) is in a very positive sense relative to a situation. But since this 'situation' (in the sense indicated above) is going to exist for the foreseeable future, indeed is only slowly becoming fully apparent in all its breadth and weight, this devotion to the Sacred Heart is becoming more 'up to date'. If and where it (understood in its correct and profoundest sense) has suffered a set-back in recent times, this is not due to the fact that it is no longer 'up to date', but that such a set-back is either itself a sign of 'love growing cold' or is to be attributed to the fact that it was not rightly preached (because, although this was in no way authorized by its essence, a completion such as that indicated under (a) was excluded), or that one has indiscreetly tried to introduce it to people who must first come to understand the first steps in Christianity and who cannot yet bear the solid food of the mature (which is at the same time the most tender) (cf. Heb 5:6).

(d) Whether this situation of the Sacred Heart Devotion in the stricter sense will last until the end of time or not is something which it is not given to us to know. It is not for us to prophesy but to entrust ourselves in humility and willingness in our time to the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Whoever possesses this humility and willingness can become an agent and apostle of the Sacred Heart Devotion without being possessed of the fanaticism of the 'definitive' and 'unsurpassable'.

[342]

III. ON THE INTEGRATION OF THE SACRED HEART DEVOTION INTO THE WHOLE OF (IGNATIAN) SPIRITUALITY

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

1. In so far as the Sacred Heart Devotion honours the Lord who brings about and constitutes our salvation with reference to his heart, the Sacred Heart Devotion can rightly be called 'totius religionis summa' (Pius XI). For this heart is in truth the 'centre': the centre of mediation, as that point at which and through which everything passes to the Father, the definitive centre. To this extent the devotion to the Sacred Heart is not simply a special form of devotion with a few distinctive practices in the prayers used, a form of devotion which could be omitted or replaced according to one's preference by some other 'devotion'.

2. Nevertheless the Sacred Heart Devotion must not be simply identified with the spiritual life as such, even where devotion to the Sacred Heart is not taken as a particular 'form of devotion', as particular exercises in prayer determined as to matter and time. For though the heart is the centre and source of the whole, it is not simply the developed whole itself. And from the nature of things we who do not proceed from the centre but only approach it gradually understand this unifying centre as a reality only when we have to some extent taken and constantly go on taking possession of the developed whole in its really different parts and aspects: the single and multiple realities of faith, the single dispositions, attitudes, virtues in their own inner structure and their own importance. Where this does not happen the Sacred Heart Devotion would ultimately have to be reduced to the thin abstraction of a vague cultivation of dispositions. The formation of a 'summa' is in the true sense (which does not mean in a strictly temporal sense) the ultimate, the goal, not the way, because in fact it presupposes at least secundum quid the summanda and their religious applications. And taking possession in devotion of the 'summarizing' centre remains genuinely permanent only if we constantly go forth out of this centre into works produced by love: into a participation in the life of the Lord by appropriating his mysteries, in service of the Church, in love for man, in the accomplishment of the life and labour decreed for us by God. All this has a relationship to the heart of the Lord. Yet if one were to call all this activity itself also devotion to the Sacred Heart, then Christianity and Sacred Heart Devotion would be identified both in concept and in fact. This could only do harm to the [343] Sacred Heart Devotion; it would become so 'general' and 'wide' that its own proper nature would disappear in this vagueness and it would no longer be able to make its own special contribution and bring its own blessing to the spiritual life (which does not simply coincide with it).

3. Proceeding from this (1 and 2) we will have to say that an express and reflex and all-encompassing concentration of the whole spiritual life in the Sacred Heart Devotion (taking due account of II, 7a) is indeed possible (that would be a kind of Montfortism transferred to the Sacred Heart Devotion[7]), but it does not form part of the Sacred Heart Devotion as it is demanded of every Jesuit. In this respect full freedom must be reserved to the divine guidance of the individual and the stage of development of his spiritual life. This is applicable equally to the 'dosage' of explicit reference to the heart of the Lord in the spiritual life. The spiritual man never personally fulfils the whole of religious reality in its incalculable multiplicity and intertwined relationships completely, and certainly not at one time. Which religious realities he consciously assumes into his spiritual life and in what degree of intensity, for this there cannot be set up any exact objective which would be valid for all at all times. One can and must take care that certain most fundamental realities and truths (beginning with that which must be believed explicite de necessitate medii aut praecepti) are religiously assimilated and realized, and within the compass of these things the Sacred Heart Devotion will also have its place in a spiritual life such as is appropriate for a Religious. But even when this is presupposed, the most varied types of spiritual life (even of Ignatian and [7] I.e. as Grignon de Montfort aims as far as possible actually and consciously to relate all activities of the spiritual life to the mediation of Mary.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Jesuit stamp) are possible. And with it also the most diverse kinds, degrees and dosages of Sacred Heart Devotion within the whole of spiritual life, which may never simply and universally be identified with devotion to the Sacred Heart.

IV. ON THE 'OBJECT' OF THE SACRED HEART DEVOTION

1. The general concept of 'heart' which we expounded above is also that of the devotion to the Sacred Heart, for Scripture[8] and the teaching and practice of the Church assume, when they speak of the heart of Jesus, the [344] self-same total-human primordial word 'heart' as the inmost original core of the body-soul totality of the person.

2. The object of the Sacred Heart Devotion is consequently the Lord with respect to this his heart. From this it is easy to recognize both what is right and above all what is partially insufficient (merely the corporeal heart as 'symbol' of love), what is too abstract (the 'spiritual inner life of Jesus' alone), in many theories of the object of the Sacred Heart Devotion: these theories proceed either from a physiological concept of the heart (instead of a total-human one) or from an abstract-metaphorical one, which basically presupposes also that 'heart' is primarily a word 'properly' derived from the language of the physiology of the body and then is 'transferred' in a 'metaphorical' sense to the psychological inner life.

3. This heart of the Lord becomes visible in so far as that which gives form and unity to his relationships to us is his redemptive love, in which God gives himself with his inmost life in the Holy Spirit as a free grace: this enters into the history of the sinful world by that giving and gives itself precisely in that it suffers for this sin of the world unto death and endures its own rejection by sinful man, and precisely in this way remains victorious.

4. Because 'heart' signifies the centre of the entire person as a whole (and so cannot be reduced to one of the natural parts which go to constitute a human person or a divine person who is man), the love which is meant as the form-giving unity of this heart is a priori not merely the human love of Christ (as the actualization of a capacity of his human nature), but the divine-human love,[9] that is the divine love of the eternal Word Himself, which – and in so far as it is – is incarnate in the human love of Christ, as it brings about its historical presence and salvific single-mindedness in the sinful world, and so provides us with the pledge that it and not the just anger of God is the first and ultimate word of God to the world.

V. ON THE THEOLOGY OF 'REPARATION' IN THE SACRED HEART DEVOTION

1. In so far as in the Sacred Heart Devotion the Lord is paid the honour of latria with reference to the redemptive love of his divine-human heart, [345] this honouring essentially involves an equal sharing in the accomplishment of this redemptive love and in its fate in the world: reparation.

2. In the actual economy of salvation of sin and its conquest by the Cross of Christ (where sin was conquered by the Lord by the lovingly obedient bearing of precisely the consequence of sin, namely the distancing of the world from God and death), reparation for the sin of the world (one's own and that of others) consists primarily and essentially in the trusting, obedient and loving acceptance of a share in the fate of the Lord, in a taking upon oneself of the appearance of sin in the world: body, darkness, persecution, distance from God, death.

---

[8] Cf. Kittel, TWNT III, 609-611; 614-616.
[9] Cf. Philippe de la Trinité, 'Du Coeur du Christ a l'Esprit d'amour' Le Coeur: Études Carmélitaines 1950, pp. 379-389.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Verbal declarations of reparation (prayers of reparation) and the 'works of supererogation' as reparation are essentially (useful and indispensable as they are to a certain extent for every Christian and certainly for the Religious) only preliminary exercises and a training in faith and in readiness for that share decreed by God in the fate of the Lord, who having 'become sin' as the Lamb of God, takes away the sins of the world.[10]

3. All reparation, as a participation in the fate of Christ in faith, is thereby 'in Christ Jesus' participation in the fate of his Mystical Body for the salvation and blessing of this whole body.

4. In the 'flesh of sin' in which we live, every supernaturally good work has a 'penal' and thereby expiatory character. As long as this participation in the Passion of Christ is accepted faithfully and lovingly in his grace, every 'good work' has eo ipso an expiatory significance, so that it is not in itself a requirement for reparation that in such a work its expiatory significance should be explicitly intended. Where it is necessary to avoid a pseudo-religious introversion and hyperaesthesia (regarding pain and effort) in a certain type of 'sacrificial soul' it may in fact be advisable from the point of view of religious pedagogy that the formal viewpoint of reparation should not be drawn into the foreground of consciousness. The same is true wherever the virtues must still be acquired in their immanent objective sense and content. Like love, so expiation too can in a certain sense be regarded as the 'form' of all virtues (in the order of things since the Fall); but this does not mean (any more than in the case of love) that it should replace or absorb the other virtues: on the contrary, these latter must be understood and practised also in themselves. (This point, too, demonstrates the fact that the Sacred Heart [346] Devotion must not simply swallow up the whole spiritual life into itself.)

5. He to whom this reparation (of Christ as man and of man in Christ) is offered is the Father, or the Blessed Trinity, as the case may be. To this extent the modes of expression of a metaphysical theology can and must include the statement that Christ's reparation in this human nature is offered to himself as the eternal, co-equal Word of the Father (cf. the teaching of dogmatic theologians about the double 'moral' subject in Christ as expiator and as recipient of his own expiation). A consequence of this is the metaphysical-dogmatic justification of the mode of expression which is in fact to be found in the Sacred Heart Devotion (cf. the Prayer of Reparation of Pius XI: 'we offer to you [Christ] the atonement which you made to your Father on the Cross'). Yet one may legitimately ask oneself whether this way of speaking is advisable 'religio-pedagogically' and 'kerygmatically', for the language of prayer, particularly in the daily life of the Christian, should be not merely dogmatically correct, but also as simple and comprehensible as possible, and this in such a way that the decisive lines and fundamental perspectives of a realistically developed faith are plainly made to stand out and are not obliterated. (For example, it is dogmatically correct that Jesus as man can pray to the eternal Logos of the Father and does pray to him; nevertheless, kerygmatically it is certainly out of place in everyday speech to talk of Jesus praying to himself.) In this regard the mode of speech just named can certainly be described as not being a completely happy one in every respect, and it can in any case be said that it is not essential to the Sacred Heart Devotion and its prayers of reparation. The simple Christian will involuntarily gain the impression, even though it is an objectively false one, that the reparation which Christ offers to the Father is being arbitrarily 'readdressed' to become a reparation which is to be offered to Christ; that consciousness which is so utterly necessary for the simple Christian precisely for his 'co-reparation', that Christ is on our side as our mediator over against the Father, that he expiates with us and that we can make our 'reparation' for the sins of the world only in him and with him, this would almost inevitably

[10] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Passion and Asceticism', above, pp. 58 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be obscured by a way of speaking of this kind if often repeated. Hence we do sufficient justice to the thought of reparation which is the basic element in the Sacred Heart Devotion, if we preach (and pray accordingly), that Christ as mediator has so made atonement to the Father (to the holy Majesty of the Eternal God) for our sins by his Passion and his death (the wages of sin itself), that he willed us to have [347] a share in him in the expiatory suffering for the sin of the world; we who play our part in the destiny of his love in the world are permitted to and must continue his Passion and death in the mystical body of the Church until the end of time; in the prayers of reparation we solemnly assure him that we want to enter with his grace in deed and in truth by our life and by our death into the sacrifice which he offered to his eternal Father as our eternal High Priest in the sacrificial love of his heart obedient unto death.

VI. ON 'CONSOLING' THE LORD

1. The thought and the practice in the devotion to the Sacred Heart ('Holy Hour') of wanting by our 'co-suffering' to 'console' the Lord (on the Mount of Olives and in his suffering in general) in his human grief over the sins and the ingratitude of a world which rejects his love requires today a particularly careful interpretation which is both dogmatically and religio-pedagogically correct, if the psychological and religious opposition against the Sacred Heart Devotion is not to be greatly reinforced.

2. Contemplation of the sufferings of Christ (and not merely prayer to the glorified Lord simply as such), and the most intensive possible making-present to oneself of the suffering and dying Redeemer which is so useful to it, undoubtedly belongs to the most important and indispensable 'practices' of the spiritual life, if this is to develop fully and inform the whole of life. This contemplation has therefore of its nature, viewed psychologically, the tendency to eliminate the 'time-differential' between the one who prays and the Passion of Christ. (We are prescinding here from those forms and effects of an elimination of time which are given in a visionary mystical experience in the strict sense.)

3. The real theological and religious significance of this time-surmounting representation on the Passion of Christ does not consist (to begin by speaking in general) in wanting to be an active participant in the represented happening, for example by acting upon Christ; this would not go beyond the sphere of a fictitious play of the imagination, which does not mean that it is to be rejected in principle, but that it should be relegated to the role of a psychological and (if used in right measure) innocent aid to that making-present of the mysteries of the life of Christ which is here properly meant. The theological and religious meaning of [348] this contemplative making-present is rather this: the contemplator clearly grasps those historical events (which as such are in the past) which on the one hand have made the Lord what he now is, and without which he would not be in this concrete being here and now ('he who is pierced', 'the Lamb that was slain', 'he who has learnt obedience by suffering', and so on, purely affirmations of the present) and in which alone on the other hand that 'law' can be read off which as the entelechy implanted in us by the grace of Christ and of his life should permeate our life and to which we must freely open ourselves.

A contemplation of the life and the Passion of Christ which makes them present can therefore not only as a matter of fact be combined with a prayer to the glorified Lord but joins up naturally in virtue of the direction of its own theological and religious meaning with such a prayer; only we must not forget that the glorified Lord is not merely the abstraction of a God-man without a history, but the one in whose concrete reality the most original source and the most real effect of his own history (in fact the 'heart'!) is an eternally valid present. But prayer to Christ cannot, theologically speaking, live in principle on the fact that we seek to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

prescind from his (the glorified Lord's) or from our own (after Christ) time-situation, in order to pray in contemplation of his Passion. Whatever then may be the psychological character of this prayer in point of fact (in view of the limitations of our consciousness), it will not be possible to propose as a positive ideal that we forget that it is directed in its objective theological structure to the glorified Lord. A 'Prayer to the Suffering Saviour' is, from the theological point of view, a prayer to Christ who has suffered, only it must be seen and realized at the same time that the 'having suffered' is a statement which expresses a very real present condition of Christ. An active consoling of the suffering Lord (as an alleviating participation in the Passion) cannot therefore be founded on the basis of the contemplative making-present of the Passion of Christ much as it may in fact have been psychologically excited to a large extent by such a representation (particularly in its visionary forms and probably more then by the theological foundations by which one has sought mostly afterwards to justify it).

4. It is correct to say (and here we come to the theory which is usually accepted today and is proposed in the Encyclical of Pius XI Miserentissimus Redemptor) that the Lord knew in his suffering, in virtue of his direct vision of God and of his infused knowledge, the atonement and [349] reparation and so the co-suffering of men of all times, therefore also of those who lived after him, and could by this knowledge draw from this loving share in his suffering consolation for his human heart. Therefore when we suffer with him 'today', this consoled him 'already then'. But before we declare ourselves content with this explanation of the 'consoling' of the suffering Christ, the following should be noted:

(a) It would at least also have to be expressly demonstrated and not simply presumed to be self-evident from the beginning, that the Lord in his suffering was in fact consoled by this knowledge which without any doubt was his, that is that in the divine direction of his human nature and its changing experiences in his human consciousness during his suffering he permitted the comfort of this his knowledge to have effect. (The appeal to the strengthening angel certainly does not exegetically prove it.) It could be asked whether the inconceivably dreadful and boundless depth of his inner suffering at the God-forsakenness of this sinful world did not exclude precisely the sight (as consoling) of his victory (which 'makes possible' and founds our 'consoling'), whether it is not even true that the sight of our 'good' deeds made him suffer almost as much in his torn wretchedness as the sight of our sins. For an infinite love is it not in a certain sense a disappointment even to be accepted and reciprocated in a very finite way?

(b) If something has 'consoled' the Lord in his suffering, then it is evidently all the works and acts done in his grace and love, and these in the degree of their supernatural worth and existential depth, and not only those where a conscious and formal intention directed to the consoling effect on the suffering Christ was present in the person performing them. If anything has consoled the Lord it is the whole sharing of the burden of the destiny of Christ in faith and obedience at all times and in all places by all men with his grace, and not only those dispositions and loving protestations which expressly had this in view. Indeed, these latter less so than the others. For this sharing of the burden, in so far as it is accomplished in the brutal daily round of life, on the one hand is the really perfect act of the following of Christ which calls upon the entire man to the ultimate power of grace and heart, and on the other often enough of its nature prevents a man from making explicit reference precisely to this temporal-psychological effect on the suffering Christ. The 'consoling' of the Lord is therefore not essentially dependent on its being consciously intended.

[350] (c) Moreover, the question can be asked whether the ordinary Christian in his normal (not mystical visionary) life of prayer can (or even should) leave out of consideration the fact that in the concrete (even in contemplating the Passion) he is after all praying to the glorified Lord, that in the face of his state of blessedness he can therefore no longer have the intention of wanting to console him, even though he knows that actually his present good work did really comfort the Lord at the time. Is this not expecting of the average Christian a complexity of psychological behaviour which he can carry out only with the greatest difficulty and whose ultimate result can be achieved equally well in a much simpler way? For what is ultimately of importance is suffering with Christ in the sense of freely and willingly accepting, by going out to meet sacrifices half-way, the consequences of Christ's law of life, not compassion in the sense of a sympathetic wanting to comfort.[11] The historicity of the Christian economy of salvation and so also the obedient allowing oneself to be put into one's own place in time without attempting to leap over it 'mystically', idealistically or in any other way, also belongs to the fundamental structure of the Christian life. Do we have to abstract, then, in our prayer (even if only in individual cases) from the fact that we are face to face with the glorified Lord (to be sure, with him who has suffered) who has now, as we pray, no need of our consolation? We are not thereby insinuating that the comfort is intended directly for the Lord in his condition now (which of course no one maintains), but only that where the Lord who is at present transfigured is placed before our eyes in prayer, the explicitly and formally intended act of consoling as a relationship which wants to be effective at a moment of his past (which as a suffering moment is in reality past) can be genuinely carried out only with the greatest difficulty.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. From what has been said we may at least conclude that the explicit intention of consoling the suffering Lord should not be enumerated among the constitutive elements of the Sacred Heart Devotion or demanded of everyone devoted to the heart of the Lord. The exposition of the above-mentioned theory of the possibility of such consoling in Miserentissimus Redemptor may be understood on the one hand as an [351] explanation of the objective fact that Christ is consoled in fact by the co-suffering of his Mystical Body (even where this is not explicitly intended), and on the other as explanation of the possibility of an explicitly intended consoling if and when someone should be convinced of being able to carry this out in a genuinely religious way, without thereby necessarily saying that everyone should do this and everyone could do it genuinely. What is essential in the Holy Hour thus remains untouched: the contemplation of the suffering of Christ as the law of our own lives, the practice of and prayer for the grace of co-suffering with Christ, the accomplishment and practice of atonement in and with Christ. By these what is of importance is already in point of fact given in a simpler way: that the head of the Church, even in his earthly life, participated in all that has happened and will happen throughout the whole of history in all the members of his Body as in mourning so also in consolation.[12]

VII. THE PROMISES OF PARAY-LE-MONIAL

1. The promises of Paray are subject to the usual rules of interpretation of private revelations which means in practice: even though they are recognized as a whole as originating in a supernatural inspiration, critical caution is justified and the possibility of inaccuracies and errors in the transmission of the heavenly message by the holy seer cannot be a priori excluded.

2. In general with regard to these promises it should be noted that, looked at as a whole, they do not affirm or promise any more than what was promised to absolute faith by the Lord

[11] Cf. St. von Dunin-Borkowski, 'Leiden mit Christus', Stimmen der Zeit CXVI (1929), pp. 390-391. This little article is at least instructive in the matter of the psychological inhibitions which are felt in point of fact by even devout and well disposed people who are not at all one-sidedly 'rationalistic'.

[12] For an attempt to draw up such a form of Holy Hour, cf. K. Rahner, Heilige Stunde und Passionsandacht (Freiburg 1955).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

himself in the Gospel (Mt 17:20; 21:21 sq.; Mk 16:17 sq.; Jn 14:12 sq.; etc.). What is 'new' therefore in these promises is not exactly what is promised, but the circumstance that what are basically already evangelically promised objects are also promised to devotion to the Sacred Heart. Anyone who has a correct understanding of the Sacred Heart Devotion and practises it in the depth and absoluteness of faith which it involves will not find this 'new' element in these promises any particular problem.

3. These promises are therefore to be interpreted as a whole in exactly the same way as those which are promised in Scripture to the prayer of [352] faith: neither are technical directions for acquiring power over God and the unconditional sovereignty of his inscrutable will; they are given only to him who has surrendered himself (and in so far as he has) in unconditional faith and unquestioning love to the will of God as the absolute – and for us inconceivable – love.[13]

4. Regarding the interpretation of the so-called 'Great Promise' which is attached to the nine First Fridays, reference may be made to what, for example, is said by Richstätter.[14] Whoever is convinced that this promise, exactly as it has been pronounced, does not contradict experience or dogmatic principles (as Richstätter assumes) ought if he preaches it to preach it in such a way that it does not become for many a person the occasion, at least after the novena of First Fridays, of sinning by thoughtlessness or presumption against the mercy of God.

[13] Cf. for the problem of the prayer of petition: K. Rahner, Von der Not und dem Segen des Gebetes[4] (Innsbruck 1955), pp. 78-94.
[14] Cf. Das Herz des Welterlösers (Freiburg 1932), pp. 93 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[353]

PART SIX

Life in the World

[355]

23

THE CHRISTIAN AMONG UNBELIEVING RELATIONS

Anyone who has a knowledge of life and does not live in a milieu which one might call medieval will already be aware from the mere title of this essay what dark, confused and bitter questions it summons up. The Christian of today lives in a Diaspora which penetrates deep into the circle of his relatives.[1] Perhaps he is a convert and by that fact alone is singular among his relatives. Among his relations there are mixed marriages, perhaps among his brothers and sisters, perhaps even his own parents' marriage is such a one. He lives in a family circle whose members although originally Catholic, not only are not zealously 'practising', but if the truth is to be told have become completely without faith, sometimes to the point of being actively hostile, of officially leaving the Church. How many of us live thus isolated and as though lost, as though among strangers, divided from them in what is most intimate and ultimate. If these were people towards whom we were otherwise indifferent, with whom we had from the beginning nothing more to do than matters of profession, work, civil usage, then everything would be so much easier to bear; or better, it would only be the burden which weighs on our spirit and heart at the sight of how little the name of Christ is known and loved in the world after two thousand years. But these are persons who are 'related' to us, whom we love, to whom we are bound with a thousand ties of blood, of shared feelings, of life and destiny, of love, in many respects much more so than with those whom we call fellow members in the household of the faith.

[356] How many questions are involved in this situation, how much anxiety and pain! Are there tears more bitter than those shed by a Christian mother when her son renounces the faith of his fathers which is also hers? How does the heart of a mother not tremble when she asks herself whether it will be her belief or the unbelief of her surroundings which will triumph in the hearts of her children! How wounding can ridicule and mocking rejection be, when it comes from those whom we love (oh yes! unbelievers are not at all as refined in reality as they like to make themselves out to be in their official speeches about tolerance). What a heavy burden is often imposed by the conflicts between one's education in and loyalty to one's own family and the education in and loyalty to Christianity, to the Church and the fellow members in the household of the faith! How many are the particular agonizing questions which arise, which the moralist can perhaps answer easily enough in theory, but which remain obscure in practice! There is the observance of the Sunday and of Friday abstinence in a religiously divided family (where to yield, where to insist?), not to mention the difficult questions of Christian morality which may result in conflicts between married couples divided in their religion. What is a mother to say to her child, when the father does not take part in the celebration of his First Communion, for which she has prepared the child with strong faith and burning love? How should she feel when every increase of love on the

[1] In what follows we are thinking not so much of that confessional division where different Christian denominations are represented within the same family and each one takes his Christianity seriously. Yet it cannot be denied that a mixture of confessions is in not a few cases the expression of a religious indifference or a scarcely concealed scepticism on one side or the other.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

part of the child for his father (which she should of course want) is also an increase of danger for the faith of the child? What is a father to do, when his daughter marries without observing the prescriptions of the Church, when he cannot recognize this marriage as valid in the eyes of God? How is he to behave towards the relatives he acquires in this way? Where does discretion turn into cowardice, the courage of one's convictions into the obtrusiveness of a propaganda which has the opposite effect to that intended? How one can be tortured by the feeling that with these relatives whatever one does is wrong: one compromises the Church by one's own mistakes (which the others only too willingly ascribe to Christianity and not to Christians); one is importunate or cowardly; only too easily one falls into a mood of irritation with ecclesiastical authorities, priests, fellow members in the faith, because by their behaviour (real or imagined) they are bringing Christianity (that is, to be precise, in this case the all-conquering splendour of one's own convictions) into disrepute before non-Catholic relations; one feels embarrassment towards others with regard [357] to the popular manifestations of Catholicism (or of Christianity as it is practised in other, southern lands); one feels annoyance when one thinks of 'the others', of that hotchpotch of belief commonplace tradition, clerical primitiveness and doubtful political opinions which one discovers among one's 'own' people; one trembles already with apprehension when the other out of sheer boredom switches on the 'Catholic Morning Service' on the radio (what will it produce this time?); one feels glad and relieved when an ecclesiastic appears slim and has clean finger-nails; involuntarily one makes comparisons to see whether the good which is outside in science, art and brave and noble humanity, is also to be found inside sufficiently clearly to make everyone (that is everyone whom we know and love) notice it and admit that as Catholics we have not given up or been deprived of anything. In any event one needs thousands of reflections, justifications, and (at least inside oneself) speeches for the defence, in order to manage acceptance of the 'concrete Church', because one sees it and life in it inevitably also with the eyes of those who are outside and whom one loves so much that even though we are utterly and unconditionally Catholic we involuntarily react to all this also with their feelings (alas, that is something a normal Catholic from the good old days could not even imagine, and the majority of clerics still belong to them, unfortunately).

But the most obscure and difficult part of these relationships is the question of the eternal salvation of those whom we love. We would, after all, not be Catholic if we did not regard Christianity, the Church and life in her as God's gracious and compelling will for us and for them, if we did not acknowledge God's grace in the Church as 'necessary for salvation'; we would be frivolous, cowardly, superficial and loveless were we to act as though we had no duty of charity to take thought for the salvation of those to whom divine Providence has bound us. That means we have to bear the burdens of others. What burden is heavier than care and responsibility for eternal salvation? The others may laugh or be astonished ('what anxieties people create for themselves!'); but we cannot be among those who think that there is no eternal life, or that if there is, everything is bound to turn out well. If we – who are baptized, nourished with the body of the Lord, living in the community of God's calling, instructed by God's word, praying – are yet admonished to work out our salvation in fear and trembling, if we have experienced in ourselves how easy it is for a man to deceive himself and flee from his ultimate [358] responsibility, can we do other than think with holy fear also of the eternal salvation of others, can we then so easily reassure ourselves with the good faith of others?

It cannot be the purpose of a small essay to go into each of the questions already posed by the statement of the title. It must suffice to make a point here and there.

The first is this: we will have to make ourselves familiar with this Diaspora situation within the family. The time will not come again within the foreseeable future when a reference work will note in one family entry the religion of the whole family. Naturally we ought to strive for the religious unity of our families. But we are living in times when it can no longer be expected that this will in fact be the norm and in the ordinary way realizable. More than ever we will be strangers even among those whom we love. The words of the Gospel[2] about the division which Christ will introduce into families themselves (Mt 10:21 sq., 34 sqq.), about making a decision for him against one's own kinsfolk (Mt 10:37) take on again today their original hardness and practical significance without our having to extract from them an 'applied' meaning. This is not the place for investigating the reasons for this change from the point of view of cultural and social history,[3] in order to distinguish what is [359] in itself avoidable from the unavoidable in it. The fact remains. But a fact, when it stems from God (even though it may be the result of a fault), is always a challenge, a duty, and a grace. This is something we must come to see. At one time – as in the Breviary – the lives of the Saints began in an almost stereotyped form by saying that the Saint was born of 'honest and pious parents' and therefore quite naturally very early showed signs of holiness. And still today the fact that the parents are not Catholic is a canonical impediment to Ordination for a convert (CIC c. 987, 1). But two mutually exclusive things can yet both be a grace. It is difficult to be a Christian and a Catholic alone in a heathen or secularized family circle. But such Christianity is then never in danger of becoming or remaining the Christianity of a folk costume society (as it has been called). Christianity of such a kind will not confuse the light and grace of faith with a security which is no more than habit and the tendency to continue along the traditional path because that is the most comfortable. The Christianity of such an isolated person must be ever acquired anew, it must live by his own power, it cannot be the sociological effect of his surroundings. It will be more the fruit of exertion, trial and trouble, it will be a tree with fewer leaves and blossoms than the traditional kind, but it will have a deeper root, be more austere and more concentrated on essentials. It will be more personal and less institutional. It will have to distinguish more accurately and more sensitively what belongs to the essence of Catholicism from what in the way it is usually practised is merely the imprint of a particular people, region, or historical period of culture (simply because it cannot afford to hold a brief for all the rest in its family and circle of relatives). But is such Christianity, if and where it succeeds, any worse than medieval and Baroque Christianity, where for the first and last time the world itself was able to give the impression that one was a Christian merely by being like it? Or was one not a Christian even in those days only when one began to distinguish in one's hearing the word of God from the word of man, when one was obedient to the dictates of one's conscience, although (not because) Mr Everyman around one was of a different opinion?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Is not therefore the Diaspora-situation of a Christian today within his own family circle

[2] Cf. also Mt 7:6; 8:21 sq.; 10:21,35-37; 12:46-50; 19:29; 24:10; Mk 6:4; 10:28-30; 13:12 sq.; Lk 2:49; 4:23-30; 9:57-62; 14:26; 17:34 sq.; 18:29 sq.; 21:16; Ac 5:13; 16:1-3; 20:30; Rm 16:52; 1 Co 5:2; 7:12 sqq.; 10:25 sqq.; 15:29; Col 4:5 sq.; 1 Th 4:12; 1 Tm 6:1 sq.; 1 P 2:12; 4:4. It is remarkable that in the Apostolic preaching there is scarcely more than a passing reference to the question of what difficulties the individual Christian had to face in his own family and what moral problems arose from this. Apparently one must assume that in the majority of cases (in spite of the words of Jesus) it was the whole family that became Christian (Ac 11:14; 16:15,32 sqq.; 18:8; 21:5, 9; 23:16; Rm 16:10; 1 Co 1:11,16; 5:10,13; 7:13 sq.; 16:15) which is not improbable in the Orient and when the social Structure of that time is taken into consideration. In itself one might be tempted to think that in these texts the conversion to Christianity of a whole 'household' is specially mentioned because of its rarity. But in that case why is there so little mention of the difficulties which a conversion to Christianity within a heathen family must have caused?

[3] In an essay on 'The Prospects for Christianity Today' an attempt was made to show why, from the standpoint of the history of theology, it is not to be expected that the culturally and institutionally closed forms of Christianity in the West will continue in the form in which we are accustomed to them from medieval times. We must simply refer the reader to those considerations. They are equally valid for the religious structure of individual families and peoples. Cf. K. Rahner, Das freie Wort in der Kirche. Die Chancen des Christentums. Zwei Essays (Einsiedeln 1953), pp. 54-62.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something quite 'normal' if viewed in the light of the essence of Christianity (which does not mean that the earlier was 'abnormal')? This Christianity is more personal, less dependent upon the institutional, the traditional, less conditioned by its surroundings. It is [360] therefore more in danger. Dangers ought not to be courted rashly by a weak man. But where they are a given fact they bring with them the assurance of God's faithfulness: in our case, that a Christianity will grow which is less bound up than it was before with religious elements from below, such as are given in the Middle Ages of every culture. If martyrdom represents the situation of the most extreme contradiction between faith and the world surrounding the believer, then the situation we are here discussing is the beginning or a type of martyrdom. But it is of martyrdom that Ignatius of Antioch has said (Rom 3:2) that only here does one begin to be in truth a disciple of Christ.

The second point we have to make appears to be this: the burden which has been laid on the shoulders of us Middle European Christians – as a grace – ought not to be thrown off by our severing our ties with our kinsfolk as far as possible. This can indeed be managed today. It is not at all difficult with today's loosening of family cohesion: one can quite early 'stand on one's own feet'; one earns one's own bread; one does not concern oneself very much even normally with one's 'nearest and dearest', and this lack of concern is in most cases mutual. But one ought to avoid doing this and so advancing the disintegration of the family because one is a Christian and the relatives are not. There may be extreme cases of such great danger and hostility that nothing remains except, like Abraham, to leave behind one's country, one's kinsfolk and one's father's house (Gn 12:1). But generally speaking one will have to beware that the offering of one's faith to God does not become the pretext for refusing to parents and relatives what is by nature their due according to God's will itself, that one does not do precisely that which Jesus reproves in Mk 7:9-13. The fact of an individual independently becoming a Christian out of an unchristian family in any case almost always presupposes an above average measure of autonomy and independence of thought and judgement. And then it easily comes about that this 'Protestantism' against one's relatives is extended – and now in the name of the new faith – to things which had been better preserved from it. It is for our present problem noteworthy that St Paul wants the community of marriage to be maintained where one partner becomes a Christian, and reserves the initiative for separation to the non-Christian party. It is clear that the Christian ought to give proof of himself as a Christian precisely by greater fidelity to the natural relationships in which the grace of faith coming from above found him (1 Co 7:12-16). The apostle fully expects [361] from this fidelity divine grace for the family, even where it has not, or not yet, become Christian (1 Co 7:14). The simultaneous demand of fidelity to the new divine call to faith and of fidelity to the Old Man may pierce one's heart like a spear; but this must be endured. Such a demand brings with it many conflicts and problems, the intricate casuistical solution of which is naturally not possible here. Where the heart is filled with both courage and selfless love, where it is not surprised at being blessed with the Cross of Christ (more than with his consolation), it will find the right way to take in these questions. Perhaps it will be laborious and require repeated efforts: but in this case, too, we are not bound to do more than patiently continue to labour at a task which is never finished.

Thirdly, we must add a hesitant word on the most obscure part of this whole question: our anxiety for the eternal salvation of those relatives of ours who do not share our faith and our Christian life. One might almost gain the impression today that we avoid this question out of embarrassment. One might gain the impression that we treat in the Catechism the subject of the Church as the exclusive channel of salvation and then silently pass these questions by in daily life, precisely where they become alive and concrete. And yet: 'How is it with my father who died without the Sacraments because he did not bother about such things although he was "as such" a Catholic?' 'How am I to think of my uncle who left the Church and remained outside it until his death?' How often are such questions and many similar ones secretly asked in the most diverse circumstances of life and frequently repressed with an embarrassed shrug of the shoulders.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One thing is immediately self-evident: in no case do we have a real and certain answer; in no case, not even in the case of the 'good Catholics' who died 'fortified with all the Sacraments of the Church'.[4] It is true that in the case of those who died with faith in the community of the Church and with loving hope in Christ (admittedly so far as we are able to judge, and this in itself is a doubtful matter) we write on their grave (as in the primitive Church) N. N. in pace. We write this, because we are called to [362] hope – for ourselves and for others. But this word of confident hope, which on the notifications of death sometimes acquires far too self-assured a tone, as though everything were not unmerited grace and incomprehensible compassion, is no forestalling of the judgement of God. All, including the good Christians, enter silently into the darkness of God, and no mortal eye follows them there on their way, no earthly ear listens in to the judgement of their eternity.

But this uncertainty for all can be contained within the hope for all.

Certainly the fact that someone – in a way that can be grasped by us – died in the peace of the visible Church is an additional ground for hoping that eternal peace is his, an additional ground which we do not have in the case of the others. We must accept this difference in silent humility: 'O man, who art thou, that thou wouldst dispute with God?' (Rm 9:20). And if one person on earth can with his entreaty stand by another who has already departed from this world, then his entreaty will perhaps be most real when this difference is silently accepted.

But we may, indeed we must, hope for the saving mercy of God for all others too. To begin with, the following is universally valid and today more urgently in need of being stated than ever: 'We must rest secure in the fact that no one is guilty of this fault (of failing to belong to the Church) in the eyes of the Lord, who is living in this state in invincible ignorance of the true religion. But who would presume to think that he was in a position to enumerate the cases where such ignorance could no longer be present, which are so different according to types and variations of peoples, lands, the predispositions of the individual, etc.'[5] This must be said not only with reference to distant heathen peoples and times. It may be true also of those who live among us. It is true that the Church is the 'signum elevatum in nationes' which is of itself a motive of faith (Denz. 1794). But this does not mean that everyone living in its proximity is gravely at fault in failing to see it as the Ark of Salvation. Are we Catholics ourselves not often by our faults the cause of averting the gaze of others from the true nature of the Church? Every man, according to Scripture and the teaching of the Church, has sufficient grace to work out his salvation; everyone who has reached the possibility of moral choice accordingly forfeits his salvation always through his own fault alone, and everyone who finds salvation finds that salvation which is objectively that of the Church which, where it achieves its full empirical manifestation, is [363] developed into the visible membership of the Church.[6] But from all this it does not follow that everyone must have in every case sufficient grace, grace frustrated only through grave fault, to permit the [4] We are leaving out of account the case of someone who is canonized. This is not the place for a theological justification of this 'exception'. It is certainly very comforting. For it is a most hopeful fact that there exists in the Church a declaration of holiness, but that in the Kingdom of God on earth there is no such thing as a 'declaration of damnation'.

[5] Pius IX, Singulari quadam (Denz. 1647).

[6] On the question in what sense everyone who attains salvation attains it in and through the Church even if he is not in a manifest way by external profession a member of the visible Church, cf. e.g. K. Rahner, 'Membership of the Church according to the Teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical "Mystici Corporis Christi" ', Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 1-88.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

salvation which he has grasped hold of in faith and love, and which may be possessed prior in time to the visible membership of the Church,[7] to unfold in his case within his lifetime to a visible belonging to the Church. If one were to assert this, one would implicitly be saying that every adult who has lived for a considerable time among Catholic Christians and has not become a Catholic has been gravely at fault in not accepting the grace offered to him. But an assertion of this kind is indemonstrable and offends against the love and respect which we owe to the decisions of conscience on the part of others unless we have positive evidence of their fault. It is a theological truth that one can take hold of the one divine grace for one's salvation, without thereby having integrated it already in its total manifold embodiment into the full sweep of the concreteness of one's life.[8] It would be false to think that this process towards the fully developed acceptance of what is really already grasped was in every case capable of immediately working itself out in this world to the ultimate form of Christian life in all its dimensions. It may therefore very well be the case that someone has bowed before God in faith in some remote level of his conscience which is only with difficulty or not at all accessible to us and that the process of the unfolding of this saving event to full ecclesiastical Catholic Christianity has at some point, perhaps very early, come up against some insurmountable obstacle (in forms of thought, reactions of sensibility, habits, prejudices on both sides, etc.), so that in point of fact the person who in the core of his being is in a state of grace finds it impossible to realize that what he is meeting in such Christianity is only the embodiment in a more articulated and further specified form of what he already is in the depths of his being.

[364] Theologians ask themselves what is indispensable to this state of grace in the depths of the heart. They lay down, usually with reference to Heb 11:6,[9] conditions of such a kind that they may be regarded as certainly fulfilled by many who stand 'outside' the Church and Christianity, particularly when one calls to mind that according to the teaching of the Church's magisterium every really genuine moral choice which submits to the absolute demand of the moral order contains (at least implicitly) the acknowledgement and recognition of God,[10] and that there exists in Catholic theology an opinion, up to now uncontested, according to which the faith demanded (as distinct from a merely metaphysical knowledge of God which is insufficient for salvation)[11] is given in a sufficient degree whenever there is given an obedient disposition for faith, an attitude of faith and a readiness for faith, which is possible even where the object of revelation in the strict sense of the specifically evangelical message has not been arrived at.[12] If we keep all this in mind (which can here be only briefly

---

[7] Cf. Denz. 796; 388; 413.

[8] There is, as we have already said, the votum baptismi (in certain circumstances present only implicitly) which can justify in faith and love before baptism. There is a forgiveness of personal sin committed after baptism before reception of the Sacrament of Penance. There is grace of Christ 'outside' the Church.

[9] 'for whoever wants to reach God's presence, must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who seek him'. Cf. also Denz. 1172.

[10] Cf. Denz. 1290. The fact that according to this doctrinal declaration by the Church there is no moral obligation which is not related to God implies also the contrary: wherever a recognition of the absolute demand of moral value is really present there knowledge of God and a relationship to him is also existentially realized, even though the theoretical explanation of this spiritual process may be only incipient and unexpressed, and perhaps even co-exist with theoretical conceptions which are in contradiction to what has been existentially realized. There really are people who only think that they do not acknowledge God because they are unable to connect the traditional name (with its historical and subjective lumber) with the Inexpressible which they have come up against in the moral and spiritual decisions of their being.

[11] Cf. Denz. 1173 (Innocent XI 1679).

[12] We are speaking here of the so-called fides stricte dicta sed virtualis. Appeal is made on its behalf, not without reason, to Rm 2:12-16. Cf. the account given of the opinions of Vega, Dominic Soto, Ripalda, Gutberlet, Straub, Mitzka in L. Lercher/F. Schlagenhaufen, Institutiones Theologiae Dogmaticae I (Innsbruck 1939), pp. 426-430.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indicated), then we will not regard the virtues of the pagans as 'brilliant vices' merely because they have a natural goodness, though one preliminary to salvation in Christ and ultimately neutral with regard to it.[13] Rather, we will be able in many cases to leave open the possibility that we are dealing with really supernatural virtues informed by the grace of Christ and producing eternal life. Everyone who is saved is saved only through the grace of Christ. There is no work which [365] might be of use for eternal life unless it is accomplished in the grace of Christ. But this does not mean that all this happens only where the man himself expressly knows that it happens in the grace of Christ in the sphere of his objective, conceptually articulated knowledge. Wherever, therefore, we meet men in our surroundings for whose moral character we can only have the greatest esteem, then perhaps we are in the presence of men who simply do not know what power the grace of Christ and the holy power of God has already exercised in their being. Perhaps. But that is sufficient to make us full of trust and hopeful, for really we do not know decisively more even about ourselves, and yet we confidently continue to hope.

Perhaps in this connection we may also add the following: from our practice in catechism and confessional we are accustomed to understand the axiom 'bonum ex integra causa, malum ex quolibet defectu' in far too simple and unjustly strict a way. Fundamentally it is correct: one can refuse God in one dimension of one's being and of the moral order (by a grave fault), and then the whole man is lost to salvation no matter what religious and moral partial values he may have realized otherwise in his being. But does this mean that the primitive conception is simply false, according to which in God's judgement good and evil works are weighed against one another on the scales, a conception which in itself and in its presuppositions helped to shape also in other ways the theological thought of the Fathers on many points. Is man ontologically and ethically really constructed in so loose and pluralistic a fashion in the carrying out of his existence, that one 'piece' of the man could be quite sound and another quite corrupt, and that then in the final result the whole would have to share the lot of the corrupt part? It will surely be more correct[14] (in spite of all the various species of virtues and vices[15] to conceive of man, where [366] he disposes of himself as a whole before God in freedom, as really stamping the whole of his being through and through[16] (which does not necessarily mean that he succeeds in this 'wholly' at every moment) and that ways of behaviour which contradict this decision in freedom do not possess that deep-rooted source in the innermost core of the person which is a prerequisite for an action which is also subjectively gravely culpable,[17] even though such a personally peripheral way of behaviour

[13] Cf. Denz. 1025.

[14] Cf. for the problems only touched upon here: K. Rahner, 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia', Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore 1961), pp. 347-382; 'Guilt and its Remission', Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore 1963), pp. 265-281; Von der Not und dem Segen des Gebetes[3] (Innsbruck 1952), pp. 98-111.

[15] This distinction does remain in the first place an objective one in so far as the particular act is specified by its object which differs in the nature of things. It also also remains a subjective one. For we are not denying that one can e.g. commit a sin against this commandment and yet keep the will to observe that one. But this possibility, which is in a way established by a momentary cross-section through the spiritual history of a person, does not necessarily mean that, in the whole history of a person's decisive choice in freedom (which history has a unity and a structure), good and evil lie alongside one another – indifferent towards one another and held together only by being contained within the same person's skin. The real fundamental decision of a person has rather the tendency to integrate into itself the life of the person in its entirety. Anyone who with St Thomas thinks of man as being in hell because he is obdurate and not as being obdurate because he is in hell, and who does not want to maintain at the same time that man could there still have individual (even natural) virtues, must understand what it is we are trying to say here.

[16] Or begins to transform in a particular direction, which inevitably, if no new decision intervenes, gradually becomes effective in the whole of the person.

[17] We must here point out a notable lacuna in the terminological range of tools at the disposal of the preacher.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

may be objectively of great and even the greatest gravity. If what we have said is correct, then we may surmise[18] and hope that when we meet a man who gives us the impression that in some particular point of the moral order, and this, be it noted, in the long term of his life and in a manner which in some way stamps him as a whole, has made a decision for what is good in an absolute way, then we have good grounds for surmising and hoping that those deeds and attitudes of his life which according to the Christian norm of morals and belief were objectively not right did not spring subjectively from that innermost core of the person and from that inner clearness and freedom of spirit from which alone can spring a fault which is also subjectively grave.

We cannot close this chapter without expressly touching upon a [367] particular question which is met with both in theory and in the bitterness of life only too often and too clearly: what is the situation particularly of those of our relations who were once Catholics and now no longer are or wish to be? Here there is surely a special problem going beyond the general problem of the possibility of salvation for a non-Christian. Does the Epistle to the Hebrews (6:4 sqq.) not say with frightening relentlessness: 'those who were once enlightened, who shared the heavenly gift and received the Holy Spirit, who tasted God's glorious word and the powers that belong to a future life, and then have fallen away, cannot possibly again be brought to conversion' (cf. also 2 Jn 9 sqq.; 2 P 2:20 sqq.)? Is it not stated in the teaching of the First Vatican Council (Denz. 1794; 1815) that Catholics who have once accepted the faith under the magisterium of the Church could have no justified grounds for giving it up or for calling it into doubt by withholding the assent of faith? We cannot here enter into the well-known controversy about the exact meaning of the canon of the Vatican Council, that is whether it is saying any more than that a Catholic cannot have any objectively justified motive for renouncing the faith, or whether it is in addition saying that such a renunciation could come about only with subjective fault, or whether the exact meaning of the definition contains something still further. All this we must leave unresolved here. We make only two comments to console those who – with good reason – mourn the loss of faith of a previously Catholic relative. Not that this consolation is meant to remove the mourning and the fear; not as though we did not have the duty of doing our best (if and in so far we are in a position to do so) to call the wanderer back into the Father's house he has abandoned. The question here is only whether while our mourning remains there does not also remain some room for hope for the eternal salvation even in these cases; whether one can say something more than the general principle that we ought not to judge anyone and ought to hope and pray for all. Two things may then be remarked in this regard. To begin with: even on the strictest interpretation of the above-quoted doctrine of Vatican I a quite definite and precisely understood possession of faith is presupposed[19] which is not certainly present without qualification in everyone who was once a Catholic.[20] There can be a form of being a Catholic (even where there has [368]

There are grave and venial sins. In the nature of things these are distinct in essence and not merely in degree. The reason for this distinction does not lie merely in the purely objective significance of the ob-ject (Gegen*stand*) of the two kinds of sin which varies quantitatively in different cases. The essential difference is also without any doubt founded upon the essentially different personal depth from which the particular act as related to the core of the person proceeds and, if maintained in its process from the person, moulds the person. If this is correct, then the same essential difference (not merely a difference of degree!) must in the nature of things subsist also between good acts. There are 'light' and 'grave' good deeds. A universally accepted terminology for this is lacking. This is the reason for our having to express ourselves in such a circuitous way.

[18] As regards the individual person, there can never be question of anything more than conjecture, even if the theory we have indicated is correct.

[19] The same is true, as can easily be gathered from the text itself, of Heb 6:4 sqq.

[20] Cf. Collectio Lacensis VII, 534 sq.: the explanation by the theologians of the Council that the Conciliar doctrine does not in any way condemn those who hold that in certain circumstances the conscience of a Catholic who is 'rudis' may in particular situations fall into invincible error so that he joins a sect with a different faith

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

been a relatively intensive practice of religion in youth) which is rather sociologically conditioned by one's milieu and is insufficient as the prerequisite for that qualified disposition of faith which the Vatican Council has in mind. It may therefore happen that a religious development does not in fact progress beyond a provisional stage as conditioned by the milieu and does not reach that personal maturity, that clarity of spirit and conscience and personal responsibility which are the pre-requisites for being able to speak of a gravely culpable renunciation of faith (as a sin against faith as such). Cases of this sort will today be more numerous than in the past. For the young person, even if he grows up in a 'good Catholic' family, is today exposed to so many inhibitions of religious growth, so many spiritual forms of resistance and anti-religious movements (conscious and unconscious), that in many cases it is questionable whether his Christianity (even if practised with interest in youth) has reached that depth of properly personal conviction which can be lost only by serious fault.[21]

A second consideration must be added. Let us suppose that in a particular case the Christian and Catholic conviction of faith has been lost in the period of transition between youth and adulthood by personal fault, whether this fault was directly against faith or whether some other sin (carelessness, indifference in the practice of religion, etc.) indirectly destroyed the attitude of faith. Let us now think of this person as having reached a mature age or being near to death. Are we then able to say that it is certain that this fault directly or indirectly against faith presupposed in an earlier period is repented of and so redeemed only if this person has found the faith again in that form in which it was once lost by him? This assertion cannot be proved. Rather, many cases can be thought of in which this is possibly and probably not the case. By this we mean that [369] every free act of choice (whether of a good or blameworthy kind) creates and posits objectifications of itself (habits of thought, lines of association, habitual modes of acting, complexes in feeling, lacunae of memory, etc.) which spring from the free decision and are its result, but which are yet distinct from it and therefore can continue to exist when the free decision in its original core in the centre of the person has ceased through a contrary decision. Moreover, we must also consider the following: there can be (according to the quite usual teaching of theology) a 'virtual', implicit repentance, that is, one in which the person does not directly fix his gaze upon his past action and renounce it as such, but without any such reflection on his past (because he does not think of it or does not explicitly recognize it any longer as sinful) he freely takes up an attitude towards moral good of such a kind that even without any express reflection his earlier attitude is in its essential core given up and rejected. How much of the growth in moral maturity and wisdom of years does take place in this form! If one takes these two things into consideration and in addition keeps in mind what we said above about the possibilities that can be surmised of a very inexpressible faith, then the case is at least thinkable where someone arrives in the depths of his conscience at renouncing his earlier fault and (in the case where he has really lost the faith as such) wins back a real attitude of faith, and is nevertheless unable to surmount the mountain of his acquired prejudices against ecclesiastical Christianity and remains with regard to it, in the manner of a person who has never been a Christian, in invincible error without (new) fault. Consequently we cannot say that where someone has once culpably lost his faith in the Church, we as third parties must assume as certain that he will attain salvation and thus – without any real sin against faith – becomes a material (though not a formal) heretic. It would, however, be mistaken and a curious over-rating of the significance for salvation of the value of civic and profane education, if one were to restrict one's search for the 'rudes' here intended to those who are uneducated in the profane sense. We must rather think of a religious under-development which can be found as often, if not more often, among those who are educated as it can be found among 'simple folk'.

---

[21] Regarding the individual person it can naturally never be decided with certainty (especially not through a third party) which of these has been the case.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only if he has returned to Christianity in the Church in a way visible to us.[22]

To many a person who in his, love wanted to hear as clear as possible an 'exoneration' of his relations who are far from him in faith, what we have said may appear a little round-about and laborious and therefore giving no particular satisfaction and relief. But we must not forget that God and his revelation tell us about the prospects of salvation for men above all what we have to know for our perspective, not what he sees from his all-embracing standpoint. But our perspective is that of the duty [370] to work out our salvation ourselves, to do what we have been called to do. For that reason the demand is made upon us to do in ourselves and in others everything to advance visibly the salvation of God in all its plenitude here below. Therefore for us the ways of mercy which God alone knows and which we have no need to know (because they concern his action not ours) remain in the dark. In fact we are told in the first place by God what we have to do. What effects his mercy has in the depths of conscience over and above this, without his salvation being developed even on this earth into the full stature of Catholic Christianity, about this he had no need to give us exact information. Therefore it remains true what Pius IX said:[23] 'When, freed from the bonds of this bodily nature, we come to see God as he is, then only will we realize how intimately and beautifully the mercy of God and his justice are bound together.'

Even though our trembling and fearful heart can rightly even now recount to itself so many grounds of hope for those who are near and yet so far from us, this does not give us any reason (where this hope is concerned with those who still live among us) merely to hope – and therefore remain comfortable in doing nothing. What is true with regard to the heathen in general is obligatory here too, and here especially: Christianity and full Christianity without any diminution or reservation is a grace and a promise of salvation. How could we dare to fail by our tardiness, timidity or indifference to bring this superabundant help and possibility of salvation closer to those whom we love? And even if we knew with absolute certainty that in their case as it is their ultimate salvation was already secure, this would not relieve apostolic zeal from all meaning and obligation in their regard. The Church and we in her do not have an apostolic mission towards others merely (and perhaps not even primarily) because these others might otherwise be lost, but because (even prescinding from this) God wills his Christ and his grace and truth and salvation to acquire visible and palpable form and presence in the history of mankind even here below. The historical Incarnation of the salvific will of God in Christ, Church, Word and Sacrament has sense and meaning in itself and not only as the instrument of the salvation of the individual in the hereafter. Only he who puts himself willingly and with self-sacrifice at the disposition of God's historical missionary apostolic calling has the right to hope (hope which quietens his heart fearful for well-loved persons) that God's mercy is victorious even where man himself experiences [371] only his powerlessness and defeat. We knock perhaps often enough in vain at the closed doors of hearts through which the Lord himself has entered long ago. And though it is a truth of faith that they will be opened to us and to the word coming to them from without only because God opens them from within, we do not need to think that he can be within only if these hearts are opened to that message from God which we bring. Whoever is honestly prepared to do that part among his relations which he really can do, and also to make the sacrifices which this will bring with it, such a person can do without all fanaticism and excessive zeal which do not really help to advance Christ's cause; he can also remain silent where talking would be senseless, can imitate the forbearance of God which patiently awaits its time, and can be sure of the fact that prayer, example and the patient acceptance of the Diaspora in his own family

[22] Hence we do not need to reflect only on the fact that in the last moments of a man's life, which are beyond the reach of anyone, there may still take place 'miracles of grace' and of the mercy of God.
[23] Denz. 1647.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

are more important means for caring for his relatives' souls than exhortation, preaching and similar activities of directly apostolic zeal. No matter how much the contrary may appear to be the case at first sight, in the long run a more courageous and more intense apostolate will develop where one is convinced that ultimately every apostolate is an uncovering of that Christianity which God in his grace has already hidden in the hearts of those who think that they are not Christians (and of course who are not Christians in the way in which God ultimately wants them to be), more than where one thinks that God himself has completely lost the contest because we have remained unsuccessful with his message in our way of delivering it.

It would be erroneous, against the Christian faith, and arrogant presumption on the part of a creature, were we to think that we knew that all men are saved. If the Lord in speaking of the Judgement always places before our eyes a dual destiny as the possible issue of our existence, then we are clearly bound – theoretically and existentially – to reckon with this double possibility. Every attempt, even an esoteric one, to advance an Origenistic doctrine of an Apokatastasis is fundamentally the assuming of a knowledge which is barred to the creature who must work out his salvation in time and not have certain knowledge of it. We have to work out our salvation in fear and trembling and leave to God his secret. If then we forgo both in our own regard and that of others the theoretical and reflective knowledge of what will be, we are also called upon to hope, firmly and unshakably, in the hope against all hope for ourselves and others. Then we may also with hope read what is written: 'God has [372] included all men in the rebellion, in order to include them all in his pardon' (Rm 11:32), even if we must leave it to God in the case of this word, too, how he alone is to fulfil it. The hope of salvation which we unshakably possess for all loved persons is after all not merely the arousing of the collective instinct of self-preservation, of an animal tribal instinct, but a Christian virtue, given from above by the Holy Spirit. For how could it be otherwise, if we are instructed in a commandment to love God and our neighbour as ourselves, and if we must hope for ourselves? May we not then hope that God, who has himself planted hope in our heart by his Holy Spirit, will not allow it to remain vain? Is something not possible to God even though it is as impossible to man as a camel passing through the eye of a needle (Lk 18:25-27)?

God has placed us in a period of time in which (by contrast with earlier times) there are Christians everywhere who at all times live in the Diaspora. That is our destiny and our mission. It 'can' not be otherwise, if Christ is to be the cornerstone and the sign of contradiction to the end. In a period in which his name has become everywhere a historical visible presence in the story of every people it 'can' not be otherwise than that the contradiction should be everywhere, since it can no longer be brought from outside by a 'hereditary foe' of Christians to peoples homogeneously Christian. Because Christ 'must' suffer and meet with contradiction, we live today in a Diaspora in the midst of our loved ones and neighbours. We must bear it in patience and faith, in responsibility and genuine care for the salvation of these others. We cannot think that we will remain faithful to Heaven by becoming faithless to God's earth. We may hope for all, unshakably and perseveringly, because God's mercy does not have any limit in our powerlessness. This Christian loneliness of ours among those whom we love will always pierce our heart like a spear. But salvation flowed out from a pierced Heart. And it was pierced by those whom it loved.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[373]

24

ON CONVERSIONS TO THE CHURCH

Since there have been divisions and different confessions in Christendom, there have also been cases of persons changing over from one Christian confession to another, conversions and converts. These occur for the most diverse reasons and motives, and are consequently of many different kinds: conversions for merely social or political reasons, those arising from genuine religious motives, and those for which the former reasons provided the occasion but where the latter became gradually the content and real motivation. There are cases where the convert never in a really personal way belonged to his original confession or was already fully estranged from it, and therefore experienced his new Christian commitment simply as the beginning of his Christianity, and those where the new confession is arrived at precisely as the correction or completion of the Christianity accepted heretofore; there are on the other hand those where only the secession from the old, and not the accession to the new, is of real religious significance.

Conversions always made up a chapter which placed a considerable strain on the relations between the Christian confessions. For naturally every confession, in the case of a conversion to itself as long as the most superficial glance did not demonstrate the opposite, presupposed that it was the result of a work of the Holy Spirit bringing recognition of the objectively valid grounds for the truth, and made use of this as an argument in apologetics for the truth and divine origin of its own faith. The other confession on the other hand was then always tempted to impugn not merely the objective rightness of the motives for the conversion (which is natural), but also to do this with regard to the subjective honesty of the convert. But this is quite another matter. The right to this does not belong even to the Catholic in concreto (that is, regarding the concrete individual who is never transparent to another and therefore cannot be judged by him) a priori (that is, on the basis of fundamental dogmatic [374] considerations), not even on the basis of the doctrine of the First Vatican Council according to which no one who has accepted the true faith under the teaching authority of the Church can ever have a just motive for giving it up (Denz. 1815).[1]

Since the relationship between the confessions, at least with us in Middle Europe, has changed not insignificantly as compared with the period of the ‘Reformation’ and ‘Counter-Reformation’, this change makes itself felt also in the question of conversions and their evaluation. We must first, therefore, cautiously clarify the nature of the change which we have just indicated in so far as it is significant for our topic, and then see what conclusions one can be tempted to draw from it, and finally, what conclusions are in reality justified by it.

I

In earlier times (that is to say, in periods when heresies and divisions were historically short lived or were still young) the confessions faced each other in a way which was in every respect utterly hostile: for each the other was false, in violation of the essential meaning of Christianity and of the will of its Founder, and otherwise simply nothing. They had the

[1] Whichever one of the many interpretations of this canon is accepted as being the true one, none of them gives a third person the right to judge a particular individual who gives up the Catholic faith as being certainly guilty before God of a fault which is also subjectively grave.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

feeling that the opposition between them was something new, that there was nothing standing between them but the lack of good will or of insight on the part of the individual as such, since, apart from the difference of doctrine strictly as such, nothing divided them, and that this difference should not be, since it ultimately sprang only from the bad will of the heresiarchs (what else could be the reason for this new division?).

Today the situation is different: on the side of the Evangelical and Orthodox Christians there are men and at least officially tolerated theories maintaining that the Christian confessions are, in essentials, varieties with equal rights of the one Christian reality, so that union need really only consist in this being generally recognized and certain (in themselves unimportant) consequences being drawn from this relativism within Christianity.

Other Christians in all confessions and especially Catholics hold on [375] to the fact that essential matters divide the Christian confessions, that respect for the purity of the Gospel and for the will of Christ forbids one in conscience to regard the differences in doctrine as insignificant, and that we are and remain divided because God, faith and salvation would be denied, were one to unite without being at one on those points for the sake of which we separated.

But no matter how much the old opposition has remained in this regard, much has changed. We live in an opposition of Christian confessions which in this particular form could not have been conceived by the reflection of the old Church, the Middle Ages and the period of the Reformation, since it did not exist in this particular form at that time. This is something else that we ought not to forget when we explain, exactly as our fathers before us did, that we are separated and remain separated for the sake of the one truth of Christ. We are living in a situation different from earlier times. Let us describe it here from the viewpoint of the Catholic.

The Protestant communities have a long history. But this is not a fact which should be taken as being in the past as though the present situation of the Christians separated from us were the same for them as it was at the time that their forefathers separated from the Roman Church. Their history is a fact for them. Their lives proceed from it. Therefore they can never become Catholics as though they had never been non-Catholics. In history one can never in fact move backwards but only forwards. And the future is never the denial, the simple extinction or annulment of the past, but its continuation, the accomplishment of tasks which it lays upon its heirs, but precisely today. The Catholic, who is the Christian of historical continuity, ought to be the last to expect that when an Evangelical Christian becomes a Catholic this will be a generatio aequivoca. He knows that man is never an abstract logical apparatus, that the motives for his action can never adequately coincide with what the reflective reason grasps and expresses of these motives, that man comes into play and is committed as a whole precisely where it is a question of the highest insights and the most profound decisions. To the whole man (precisely because as a religious person he is more than the creature of a day, like certain flies studied by biology but with the addition of understanding) there belongs his history. This history of the Evangelical Christians need not and cannot be regarded even from the Catholic standpoint merely as a religiously negative quantity. That it is not such in its intellectual [376] and cultural aspects has of course never been seriously called into question by any Catholic (or has it?). But it is not such even in its religious aspect. Catholic apologetics are, it is true, always tempted to look upon the history of Protestant Christianity merely as the story of a successive dilution, of an ever-increasing loss of substance in what is Christian. We openly admit that precisely from a strictly theological standpoint (that is from a genuinely theological Church history, which has other norms and categories than a fundamentally profane history of the Christian religion) we cannot regard this way of viewing the matter as in every respect false; merely a simple reference to Mt 15:13 makes that impossible for us. If it is a tenet of a Church's faith that it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

alone is the Church of Christ, it is impossible for her to concede to another community that historical promise which is hers as the Church of Christ. Granted, the question remains how far this difference must become empirically evident, particularly for the view of profane history.[2] Over and above this, the Protestant Christian will view many things quite differently, namely as justified modifications within the Christian way, which appear to the Catholic as signs of decadence; we have all learnt from experience in the last decades that the sense of direction of Evangelical history does not point as unwaveringly towards ever greater Liberalism and Free Thought as we Catholics thought a few decades ago. (Certainly it is also true that many an Evangelical Christian perhaps spoke too triumphantly in the thirties of the final overthrow of Liberalism.)

Whatever may be the exact answer to this question we have touched upon, the history of non-Catholic Christianity is in any case even for the Catholic not merely a falling away from true Christianity by a progressive loss. In the course of a long history outside the Catholic Church, though it was not the case at the start of the division or only in connection with the heresy from which, at that time at least, it could not be separated, there have been actualized in theology, piety, liturgy, community life, art, genuine Christian potentialities which in this way, that is (expressed Scholastically) in this actuality, in this visible realization of an (in itself Catholic) potentiality, have not been realized with us in the Catholic Church, although they belong of themselves to the actual fullness of the [377] historical realization of what is Christian. A part of what the one Church is called to become, and also can become as the one Church, has attained its realization – at least temporarily – outside of her. This reality should and could be in the one Church, but in fact it is not. It appears to the Catholic and to the judgement of his faith mixed and amalgamated with attitudes, doctrines, precepts, etc., which he must reject as false; it is wanting in elements which are essential to the fullness of Christian existence, but the Catholic does not have for this reason either the duty or the right simply to assert that everything ‘over there’ which is not simply inherited ready-made from the time before the division is false, nor does he have to act as though all these new Christian elements ‘over there’ could be found realized and expressed to the same degree among Catholics. This is true even of matters proper to the faith as explicitly developed. When the Encyclical Humani Generis underlines the fact that the Scriptures are a source of the treasures of truth, which is far from having been exhausted because it is in fact inexhaustible (Denz. 2914), it is implicitly also saying that every faithful and enlightened exegesis, no matter where it is carried out, is able to lift the one permanent truth of God into the Christian consciousness of the faith from still new aspects, aspects which have not up to now been pointed out or seen in this express way. Who is there who would doubt the fact that Protestant exegesis has achieved this too?

II

We are under no illusion of having adequately described in what we have said the difference between the original and the contemporary relationship of the confessions. But perhaps what we have said will suffice for our purpose. What conclusion does it lead to in our question of conversions? (Again, we are speaking here of conversions to the Catholic Church.)

To begin with: what conclusion is it not possible to draw from what has been said, although it may appear a tempting one? Often a false conclusion is drawn. It is said that

[2] Nevertheless: if the Church regard her own history as a motive of faith in her divine origin (cf. Denz. 1794), we cannot assert that this, her uniqueness in comparison with other Christian confessions, is merely an article of Catholic faith contradicted by all the appearances.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

individual conversions are mistaken. One ought to work for and wait for the unification of the Christian communities in their entirety. Anything else is a flight from the historical situation in which we are now in fact placed: one is unwilling to suffer to the end the destiny of a divided Christendom because of a cowardly need for security for one's own part. One thus betrays also the historical heritage [378] of one's own religious past which it is up to us to bring with us as a contribution to the future Una Sancta. Fundamentally, then, conversion is desertion. Indeed, it is even a sublime perversion, since the convert wants on his own initiative to anticipate bringing into order what God alone can bring into order, the divided Church. Anyone acts rightly who becomes a rebel in his Church and while remaining in it, if he thinks that it is not embodying the will of Christ perfectly. Here and there it is also said (by those whose theoretical conviction is already entirely Catholic), that it is better to persist in the old Christian community in order to promote Catholic truth within it, until at least the 'holy remnant' can be guided into the Mother-Church in its entirety.

'What are we to say to such a conception? In the first place, whoever is convinced that the Church of Christ herself as such is divided (which for the Catholic is something different from a divided Christendom), whoever therefore believes that all Christian confessions are a long way from being the Church of Christ, or (which is the same thing in a milder form) that all together constitute the one Church (which is therefore after all fundamentally the one undivided Church of Christ), must think of conversion as being a superfluous passing over from one confession to another, which does not affect the real question (namely, the division or imperfectly represented unity of the one Church) and can only rest on very secondary grounds (social conditions, aesthetic needs, the desire for 'security' and so on). But whoever shares such a view can never himself become a Catholic. The Catholic Church dare not and cannot accept him. Converts who are merely 'impressed' by the 'uniformity', by the authority (in the last analysis only perceived in a profane sense) of the Catholic Church, her historical stability, her order and extensiveness and so on, are no converts at all. Every priest has the duty of refusing admission to the Church to people of this kind as long as they remain such.

But for the Catholic and for the genuine convert the question is posed in quite a different way. They are convinced that the one Church of Christ exists, that she is not a conglomeration of many Christian communities, that she does not still have to become one but is one, that she is identical with the Catholic Church (which does not mean that the de facto Catholic Church here and now is already identical with what she – but precisely she herself and not something else – should be according to the will of Christ). They are convinced that the Church is precisely not divided, much as they suffer at the fact that Christendom is divided. They [379] are convinced that the truth of Christ is not 'divided', that on the contrary where there exists a declaration of faith by the Catholic Church which makes an absolute claim to the obedience of faith on the part of Catholics and in so far as it does so, and where this is in real contradiction to the declaration of another confession, the Catholic Church alone thus undivided possesses and declares the truth of Christ. One can then still call this truth (if one so wishes) 'crucified', namely in so far as we Catholics do not act this truth, in so far as (although we have it and it is told) often we through our sin and spiritual sloth do not tell it in such a way that others can grasp it, and (as we have already said) in so far as this or that truth (which is not denied by us) may be more clearly formulated and proclaimed by others. But the truth cannot be divided in the sense of becoming error and no longer having a clearly determinable and unmistakable place anywhere in Christianity. Now, if anyone is convinced that the Roman Catholic Church is the Church of Christ, however much Christian reality there may be outside of her, that she proclaims the truth of Christ without error whenever she speaks in his name in a binding way, that furthermore whoever recognizes the Church as such must according to the will of Christ belong to her, and this also in the dimension of her social and historical external form which she received from her Founder himself, for such a person the answer to the question of conversion must turn out quite differently from the answer given above. There can be no question of desertion. For no one can be called a deserter who submits himself to the truth of Christ and strives to do his will wherever he recognizes it. It is not a question of a need for security which we feel in ourselves, but the simple acceptance of a security (if one wants to call it this) which is accorded us by the authority of the Lord in the Church, which if it exists (and this is the conviction of the Catholic and the convert) renders it meaningless and indeed perverse to want to live 'less securely'. The convert himself, after all, does not flee from the tragedy of the division of Christianity. Or does he no longer suffer over it, merely because he has become a Catholic? Must he not, now that he belongs to the old Church again, more than ever feel the weight of guilt of those forefathers, now become also his own, who once succeeded by their sin in deforming the old Church to such an extent that the appearance of right and – who can deny this a priori – subjective good faith could be with those who thought it a duty to seek Christ and his Church elsewhere? Nor does he deny his own historical past. For it is [380] exactly his conviction that it cannot signify a final end, that he must go beyond it, if he is genuinely to preserve it. Nor does he return home simply to that Church which his fathers once left, but into that Catholic Church which in point of fact would not be as it is if there had been no Reformation, into that Church which is to grow precisely also through his conversion towards that condition which according to God's design it will one day have, namely when it is the unity of the full realization of all that is Christian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If the Church of Christ is to be found in the concrete in the Catholic Church and if according to the will of Christ it is necessary for salvation to belong concretely to this concrete Church (and without this conviction one is not a Catholic and cannot become a Catholic), then there is no longer any room for asking what consequences follow from this: whether by means of it anything else will be put in order; whether one could do more here or there; whether this or that is retained or lost which one could quite rightly in itself retain; there is only one thing to be done: to obey the will of Christ, unconditionally and without question. Naturally certain particular questions will remain open which, as will be readily understood, we cannot embark upon here, as for example the somewhat 'casuistical' question as to how long a person who believes in the Catholic Church and has recognized the duty of conversion may yet 'postpone' the actual conversion for this or that reason. All human activity has in itself and therefore also here a certain temporal latitude within which it can be activated without failing its time. Life can thus pose this practical question, the answering of which would here force us into too many digressive considerations. But in whatever way the casuistical answer may turn out in any individual case, one thing must remain clear: if the one Church of Christ already exists and it is objectively the will of Christ for every Christian that he belong to it, then if anyone has this conviction[3] he must enter the Church. If he does not have this conviction, then neither on the part of the individual person nor on that of the Catholic Church is there [381] present either a compelling or a justifying reason for conversion. What attitude other Christian denominations may take up towards conversions to them without this single conviction is something we can here leave out of consideration. A Catholic priest at any rate would have to say to a Christian who is thinking of becoming a convert: 'As long as you do not hold the Catholic Church to be the only means of sanctification in the sense we have described, you cannot as far as this Church is concerned [3] Perhaps for the sake of accuracy we ought to add here that the conviction in question is that which a person must have (and is right to demand) where he has to make decisions affecting him deeply and in the whole of his being, a conviction, therefore, which has a greater content than a merely theological, rationally 'well-founded opinion' (cf. Denz. 1171). The conviction here in question is deeper and more comprehensive both in its penetration to the personal core of the individual and in its coming through the light of the grace of faith, which makes possible a clearer view of the motives of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

become a convert to it, and as far as you are concerned (for you are after all a Christian) such a conversion would be desertion. But if you have achieved this conviction by the grace of God as a moment in your Christian faith, then you must become a convert. Then your conversion is no desertion but your duty before God and your conscience and a part of that history in which Christianity strives for unity. Since this history is always and essentially, in spite of all solidarity in fortune and misfortune the history of the decision of each individual conscience, and no one is released from the duty of obeying the call once it has reached him simply because others have not yet heard it, so you cannot put off this act of obedience for the reason that the community to which you have until now belonged has not performed it or because you may presume that it does not yet as a whole recognize this duty.' Any other attitude would amount to saying that the Church of Christ is the sum of the Christian confessions or has still to come into existence. In such questions one remains true to the future of one's stock, to the community from which one springs, to one's people, not by planning that future according to one's own ideas and wanting to calculate beforehand the historically correct point for one's intervention, but by obeying and trustfully obeying in such a way that by this obedience, like that given by Abraham, one best serves the brethren with whom one knows oneself to be intimately bound. If this were not so, we would all still be Jews or heathens. For becoming Christian was after all always a matter for the individual and wherever it really happened was never a collective act. But becoming a Catholic must rest upon a conviction of faith with regard to the Catholic Church which is qualitatively the same as the conviction of faith with regard to Christianity in general. Here, as there, there can be no waiting for the Una Sancta of all men or all Christians. This can only come about in so far as the individual does not wait.

[382]

III

Has, then, the changed relationship between the Christian confessions, with which we began, no significance at all for conversions? Indeed it has.

We have said that the convert is in many respects the heir of a past which must be valued as positively Christian. But this means that the convert should bring this heritage with him into the house of our common Father since by this means the Church can also become richer in Christian realizations. One should be able to notice that these converts were once Protestants. They should not regard their heritage merely as something past, but as charging them with a mission to their new Church. The Church is not simply a house and a regiment which remain the same whether many or few live in the house or are members of the regiment. She is the Body of Christ which itself grows when its members multiply, a Body which does not only give to its members but also receives from them. Just because we must concede to our separated brethren whom we must not judge that even before their conversion they were Christians and in good faith, it follows that, in the depths of their grace-filled being (because they were baptized and justified by faith and love) they already were in a radical and incipient way what they now become as converts in an express way in the dimension of the social visible nature of the Church. But this means that their conversion is (precisely in those cases where they were already really Christians, that is men who have staked their life and death upon Jesus Christ our Lord) a becoming conscious of what they already were. What they actually had to give up, namely the error which up to now separated them from the profession of the true faith and the unity of the Church, in so far as it did so, was even beforehand not the reality of their Christian existence but its hitherto unnoticed contradiction. It is this they give up. But they should as far as possible retain what they have themselves already inherited as Christian realizations and developed for themselves, even if and particularly if they should not find these realities in the same degree of clarity in the home to which they are returning. Why should they not be to their new brothers in the faith an example and a stimulus to reverence and love for Holy Scripture and the daily use of it? If it is true that particular peoples are called each in its own way and in its own special accentuation to live and represent the Christian virtues, why should converts from peoples which are still almost completely separated from the Catholic Church not be able to [383] insert a new trait into the picture of Christian life in the Church? If according to the words of Pius XII there should be and is a public opinion in the Church, why should converts (each in his place and in a way befitting him) not make themselves heard within the Church in order to give to the Church the advantage of the experiences of their Christian life before their conversion?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The change in the relationship of the Christian confessions to one another has for the convert still another side. One must in the first place call to mind that the convert does not join the Catholic Church 'in general and as a whole'. He meets the Church very concretely: in the priest and confessor whom he happens to meet, in the sermon which he happens to hear, in the community in which he must live. This Church he often cannot choose. She is in most cases simply given by force of circumstance. It is true that he always finds there also the grace of the Church as a whole, the foundation-pillar of truth, the office of Christ, the concrete word of forgiveness and the true body of Christ in the Sacrament of the altar. But in this concrete Church of his he not infrequently finds – this cannot be hidden under a veil of silence because it is true and it would be dishonest and cowardly to hide it – a Church which deprives him of much that he hitherto possessed, the continued possession of which his being a Catholic in no way forbids him to desire. Perhaps he comes from Church Services which together with complete poverty were yet rich in devotion reverence, and recollection, and now finds a Church Service where the most beautiful liturgy is 'got through' in a business-like and undevout manner. Perhaps up to now he has heard many sermons which were preached from a penetrating faithful meditation on the Word of God in a way close to and filled by the Scriptures, and he now hears in the Church, which he has acquired as the pearl of great price with so many sacrifices, sermons – such as are heard with us only too often. Perhaps he had nourished his spiritual life on the powerfully simple profundity of so many Evangelical hymns, and he must now live in a district where the Catholic hymn-book (sparingly and badly sung) is really much poorer in religious substance. Perhaps he hungers for a word – a good Catholic word merely expounding the Council of Trent – on God's grace as justifying us sinners without any merit on our part, for an echo of the 'tu solus sanctus' of the Gloria of the Mass, for an explanation of the 'per evangelica dicta deleantur nostra delicta' which we pray every day, and he hears, in the only place where he can hear, perhaps, too many moral [384] exhortations. The convert may easily be overtaken by a general feeling of homelessness. For the consciousness of being in one's religious home is not built merely upon the conviction of the truth of the Church as that founded by Christ. How many things in the Church, which fill the life of the Christian in the concrete, are of such a kind that they can be good, beautiful, in the true sense 'edifying', and yet are not necessarily so: they may easily be quite otherwise and so have an 'alienating' effect on those who are not accustomed to them from youth and come from another historical milieu. One who is in the religious sense an absolute beggar will find everything in the Church when he enters it to be fine and satisfying. But this is precisely what the convert is not, if he comes from a vital Protestant Christianity to the Church. He will in fact fail to find much in his 'concrete' Church which he is entitled to expect and search for and he will in fact lose many things which perhaps he has had up to now. He will comfort himself with the faithful consciousness that he has done what he had to do: to find Christ where he wants to be found, in his Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[385]

25

SCIENCE AS A 'CONFESSION'?

What we have been doing or at least have tried to do on this day[1] has clearly been this: to establish the correct relationship between that which we know and that which we believe. We have done this by setting out from what we know, that is from the picture of the world presented to us by contemporary science. This process is quite legitimate, if only for the simple fact that we who are placed in our time and hence in its stage of understanding of the world cannot do anything else. But if this mode of procedure is not to give rise to the impression that it is the undisturbed, autonomous and self-sufficient fixed measure of everything else in this question we must at the end ask the opposite question as well, namely how this relationship of the scientific world-view and the divine truth of faith will look if examined from the standpoint of the truth of faith.

Man finds himself already placed in a world as soon as he begins to assume responsibility for his being. This world is not merely a world of facts, if only because facts are always given to us as known and therefore in perceptions and notions. The world in which we found ourselves placed as we began is a world of pieces of knowledge, opinions, conceptions, convictions and the norms and modes of behaviour resting upon them; it is a world already formed by the men who went before us, so that we began with a world-view handed on to us. It is always the case that we begin with not only a pre-given world as a thing, but with a pre-given world of the spirit. This spiritual datum, which we can never adequately nullify, is of a two-fold kind: a metaphysical datum and a historical datum.

A metaphysical datum: by this we mean that every possible attempt to build up a world-view by the experimental handling of things already [386] presupposes in the very first step a whole series of metaphysical, pre-empirical principles, which, being presupposed as universally valid, can to some degree he verified in an always particular experience but can never be properly demonstrated by means of it: that reality exists, that it always and everywhere obeys the principle of contradiction, that there obtains some connection and homogeneity between realities in spite of all differences, that everything has a sufficient reason, and so on. The reason and the evidence in justification of such a priori structures of thought and being are disclosed only to one who in a free act of confidence entrusts himself to them; there is no standpoint outside of them from which they might be judged.

But our intellectual beginning also sets out from a historical datum which we can never adequately escape by going back behind it. We always begin as individuals with a world-view already formed and handed on and not merely with metaphysical principles, even if we set out to substantiate and correct this world-view. Here too the starting-point is a previously determined law of our spiritual Odyssey. Even though we may revolt and protest against it, though we may look upon it with the greatest distrust, we are still not free from it; for even in the protest we are taking up an attitude to it, we are occupied with it and not with something else, we are protesting against something that we would not have to protest against if it did not exist. We would be able to build up an outlook upon the world which was absolutely independent of any other person only if we could succeed in bringing it about that we had never heard another person, that we had never spoken a language learned from others, that we had never read a book, and yet had advanced beyond the experience of a new-born infant or

[1] This article is the text of a discourse given to a small group of natural Scientists at the conclusion of their meeting together for the purpose of Christian recollection.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of a wolf. No, man can in principle never adequately catch up with the presuppositions of his spiritual being, any more than he can, in spite of personality and freedom, go back behind his biological inheritance in such a way that it would no longer be the permanent basis for his self-determination, which is only possible as active because the biological system of his inheritance as passive is open upwards, that is it is multivalent. Man's world-view is essentially historical. This is equally true of the scientific world-view. For this, too, receives guidance a priori, not indeed primarily regarding its individual contents, but in the selection which it makes of its object out of a number of possible objects in itself much larger in the direction of its inquiries, and so on, and this a priori selective principle of natural science, which [387] science itself does not stop to examine since it is not one of its objects is itself historically conditioned. We can only discover what there is to be found in the direction in which the voyage of discovery set its course. The direction of the inquiring gaze, of the tentative sending out of feelers beyond the limits of the already known is not conditioned by the object (which is not yet grasped), that is to say not by the thing concerning which science discourses, but is determined by a previous decision which 'unscientifically' holds and upholds in its grasp the particular science and therefore cannot be made subject to critical examination by this science. Even the subsequent success of discovery does not justify the breakthrough of discovery. What has been discovered can never tell us what was overlooked and missed and whether what has been missed would not have been more important and even spelt salvation. Neither an individual nor a historical epoch can break out in all directions at the same time in order in this way to discover everything. Therefore every conquest is also at the same time a renunciation: every blessing a curse. And the only question is, what one can renounce in one's conquest without the renunciation becoming a fatal curse.

Man has, then, a world-view which has metaphysical presuppositions and which is historical, that is a sum of realities given to him as such in knowledge and activity which constitute in the limited and conditioned singularity of their combination the immediate context of his existence. On both grounds the truth of religion, that is the knowledge of the existence of God and belief in God's historical act of revelation in Jesus Christ, is a priori to a scientific picture of the world. Religious belief springs from a point of human existence which is more original than the point of origin of scientific reflection. Since the truth of religion, as we shall now proceed to show in more detail, is already in possession at that point in the existence of man where lie the presuppositions of science which it itself cannot go beyond, the world-view presented by science is not a court of appeal against religion. Certainly we must always insist on and work for the fact that there should be no double truths, that is truths contradicting one another, that genuinely sober, careful science conscious of its limitations and its hypothetical character does not contradict faith, that in the case of an apparent conflict both sides must seek in honest self-criticism where the reason for the apparent contradiction is to be found, but religion is not thereby simply at the mercy of science and its world-view. It is higher, because of an earlier origin, because [388] sprung from a more original act of existence. This we must now show more clearly.

Man in forming a view of the world knows that he is in this world-view finite, that is, that the finite presents itself to him against the background of an unending series of questions and possibilities. He has a relationship therefore not only to what is given and to what is immediately discoverable in the field already circumscribed by him – all of which together constitutes the world of his particular world-view – but also, indeed primarily and ultimately, to what does not belong to it, what remains distant, what is horizon and background of his world, which precisely as unseizable and unseized discloses the permanently limited and historical character of his world and its image. The inexpressible is the ground of his expression; that of which there can be no image renders possible his world-image. The objective ultimate ground of all reality, which is present only by precisely not being a part of our world-image, and which is the end-goal of our movement to acquire a view of the world, a goal essentially beyond the reach of our own power, we call God. That is why knowledge about God is from the beginning qualitatively different from the knowledge which strives after a view of the world. God is not a part of the world but its pre-requisite; he is not an objective piece of knowledge alongside other objects, but the endlessness always already present prior to the movement of knowledge, the endlessness within which it runs its always finite course. God is not the final hypothesis resulting from a sketching-in of a rounded picture of the world, he is on the contrary the single thesis which is posited with every hypothesis which we use to build up our picture of the world. For always, in every case of the positing of a picture of the world, prior to its construction in detail there is presupposed the fact that it is ruled by meaning, design, mutual relationship between the multiplicity of the things of the world which are combined for us into one structure, and so every world-view at the same time asserts an original meaningful unity which is prior to the multiplicity. Even beyond this, the recognition of the limitation and openness of a world-view on which all science lives and of its liability to critical questioning is itself only possible in virtue of the a priori implicit affirmation of an asymptotically approached, infinite being, whom we call God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus all organizing of the world, all representing of the world, all grasping of the multiplicity of things in ah ordered whole, only takes place by means of a previous reaching forward to the unimaginable, the [389] unintelligible, to that which is not a part of the world and of the world-view but stands behind all multiple world-reality as an unintelligible endlessness not to be reached as a moment in the world and its laws, to that which we call God and which, since precisely as such a transcendent ‘Whither’ of knowledge of the world and ‘Whence’ of the world itself it cannot be thought of as a thing, must rather be thought of as a spiritual person, particularly since it is also the basic ground of similar personal realities in the world.

Christian metaphysics has always known about this transcendence of God and has expressly asserted it. It has always said that God is not a part of the world subject to experience and to calculation, not even its highest coping-stone. It has always known, therefore, that God does not form part of the world-view as its ultimate concluding hypothesis, but is for the world and its knowledge the a priori which precisely does not fall as one case within the system of laws of the world but is their presupposition; this presupposition cannot be directly envisaged by man’s reason, cannot be made immediately its object, but rather is always indirectly known as the unlimited to which the limited object points, as the unconditioned to which the experience of multiplicity and its conditioned nature points, without its being on that account given in itself into the grasp of man.

As we have said, Christian metaphysics has always known this. But paradoxical as it sounds, one must say that it has too little lived it. It was unable in earlier times to accommodate very expressly in a living way into the feeling and into the real process of existence what in itself it knew. For the world was small; or better, the world-view was so unassuming and easily surveyed that practically in every direction its limit was quickly reached; it was imaginatively constructed with its spatial and temporal dimensions in such a way that for concrete experience God became almost something like a part of the world, who was certainly in heaven, but in fact in the heaven which was a homogeneous continuation of the spatiality of the world; the world offered in its events continually, almost at every moment, happenings in which God seemed to be at work palpably as an object (Sache) and not merely as a transcendent First Cause (Ursache).

Today the situation has quite changed through the transformation and the inestimable deepening of our world-view. The world has become a quantity rounded in itself, which is not really open at various points where it makes a transition to God, which does not suffer at

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

determinate [390] points observable by us the causal impact of God on it (if we prescind for the moment from the supernatural history of salvation), but only as a whole and very undemonstratively does it point up to God as its precondition. Because the world as a whole, while expressing itself, only speaks silently of God by leaving unsaid the ultimate word which is proper to it, it is possible to miss hearing this call of silence, it is possible to think that God cannot be found because one always encounters more of the world the further one's investigation penetrates into it. In reality, however, this experience is not the genesis of atheism, but the discovery that the world is not God. There was to be found towards the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth centuries a theoretical and practical atheism which really was so unpardonably naive and so culpably superficial as to assert that it knew that there is no God. It did not produce any great intellects, and it belongs essentially to the past, even though it has only today become a mass psychosis and the dogma of a militant political Weltanschauung. The case is quite different with 'troubled atheism' if we may so call the phenomenon which we are contemplating. Alarm at the absence of God from the world, the feeling of no longer being able to realize the divine, consternation at the silence of God, at God's shutting himself up in his own inaccessibility, at the senseless secularization (Profanwerden) of the world, at the sightless and faceless materiality of the laws of the world up to the point where it is no longer merely a question of nature but of man – this experience, which imagines that it must interpret itself theoretically as atheism, is a genuine experience of deepest existence (even though a false interpretation is partially bound up with it) which the common thinking and speaking of Christianity is far from having learnt to take into account. Fundamentally, however, it is only the realization that God does not belong within the world-view, that the real God is not a Demiurge, that he is not the spring in the clockwork of the world, that wherever anything happens in the world which forms part of the 'normal' make-up of the world it is always possible to discover for it a cause which is not God himself. This realization, which corresponds only to a hypothetical atheism postulated for the purpose of the worldview, and which Thomas Aquinas has already materially established when he says that in the natural order of things God acts through causes distinct from himself, this realization of troubled atheism is fundamentally only the growth of God in the spirit of mankind. We now experience in a novel way and at an unprecedentedly radical level what we always [391] knew notionally with the First Vatican Council but always soft-pedalled, that God is inexpressibly elevated above everything that is or can be thought outside himself. If this is true – and it forms part of the foundations of the Christian faith – then he is elevated above every expressible statement of the world; he does not belong within such a statement; he can be spoken of only in a qualitatively different kind of statement. That this is so is realized by mankind today, since it has come gradually into possession of a scientific picture of the world which is as profane as the world which is not God, since he is inexpressibly elevated above it, so that there obtains no analogy between it and him which would not immediately reveal itself as surrounded by a still greater unlikeness. The truth of God and the view of the world are two things. We are just discovering today that one cannot picture God to oneself in an image that has been carved out of the wood of the world.

The academic of today has the duty which is at once pain and grace of accepting this realization, of not suppressing it in a hasty and cheap apologetic for an anthropomorphic 'belief in God', of interpreting it rightly, that is, of understanding that it has in truth nothing to do with atheism in the proper sense. Let us freely admit to ourselves the crisis of faith. It will do no harm. We cannot discover God ruling in this world of ours quite so naively as was done in former times. We cannot do this, not because God is dead, but because he is greater, more nameless, more in the background, more incomprehensible. God is: that is not a proposition which one can range alongside the other propositions which constitute science. God is: this proposition is more original than any meeting with the world because – whether

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we have heard it or missed hearing it – it is already stated when we begin in wonderment to ask in the sciences how we can intellectually organize the world in which we find ourselves in order to dominate it and snatch away from it a part of its dominion over us. But because the proposition 'God is' is of such an utterly different kind, because though it can be heard as pre-stated in all other propositions its sound can also by that very fact always be drowned by all these other propositions, since in our scientific-worldly-experimental knowledge its object makes itself known through that of other propositions, and never as such for itself and alongside of other objects, for that reason God is so far away. We are far away from him, because he is the unconditioned and illimitable, whereas we are conditioned and it is the lot of our knowledge to grasp by delimiting. The world-view and the [392] truth which is proper to it, specific, creaturely, finite, is the sum of what can be expressed, delimited, calculated; but the absolute truth that God is, is the affirmation that he is the incomprehensible whose extension does not fit into the system of co-ordinates and areas which we set up to express a tangible reality by catching it up in this net of limitation. Such knowledge cannot have the definition, the exactness, which is appropriate to that knowledge which builds up the world-picture of today. Not because the former is less certain and more vague than the latter, but because it is the knowledge which intends what cannot be defined, whose content masters us and not we it; in which we do not take hold but are taken hold of, in which is stated the only self-evident reality which is by that fact incomprehensible to us. If great spiritual processes have their meaning and their promise in spite of the fault and the foolishness of men, out of which they grow with one – but only one – of their roots, then the crisis of faith, the existential anguish of our time in case God should be lost to it, an anguish and a feeling which does not grow only out of the malice and superficiality, the pride and moral fault of men, also has its meaning. God becomes greater. He recedes into a distance which first makes it possible to glimpse his boundlessness. We Christians can be bound by a feeling of brotherhood, not to the militant atheists, but quite certainly to those who are agonized by the question of God, those who are silent, reserved, averse to noisy conviction: all of us have called upon the silent incomprehensibility of God with or without the name, both in us and in them the question of the most exact picture of the universe as a whole is not one that answers itself, they and we have experienced something of what we read in the Scriptures: 'My God, why hast thou forsaken me?'; we hold the opinion concerning them, since we have no right to judge them, that they only think that they do not believe; we know of ourselves that we rightly express what is present in them too in the centre of their spirit and the depths of their conscience without their being able themselves to articulate it conceptually, namely, that everything is encompassed, sustained, known by the knowing and loving, ineffable mystery which we call God. This is the truth of truths, the truth which makes us free; the truth which opens. Without it everything limited, every individual truth within the picture of the world becomes the prison in which man dies the death of an animal – although a clever one. This one truth leads indeed into the incomprehensible, the immense, into a dimension in which we are disposed and do not dispose, the adorers and [393] not the rulers; we are taken into a vastness in which we cannot by ourselves find our way, we are caught in the grip of a destiny which is not guided by us; but the courage, or better, the believing and trusting love which entrusts itself to such incomprehensibility is the act in which man assents to his own most intimate being without tremblingly failing in his speech before it, in which he assents to the endless possibility of endless reality.

Admittedly, when we have related, as we have done up to now, the view of the world and the truth of God by contrasting and connecting them, we have not said all, perhaps not even what is most decisive of all that as Christians we must say. For Christianity is of course not merely the silent honouring of a nameless God, it is tidings of God, word from God, a multitude of single, conceptually articulated propositions about God, it is history, institution,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

authority, commandment, manifold religious practice. Here, naturally, apparent antinomies and cases of conflict between the modern scientific picture of the world and this religion are more easily understandable and have more often come about than if it were only a case of a merely metaphysical belief in God, which is after all somehow abstract, and of today's world-view in relationship to it. For much as God's word is the word of God, much therefore as it is received at a point of existence which is prior to the scientific articulation of our empirical meeting with the world, and much as from this point of view it is consequently unassailable from the standpoint of a world-view, yet the divine truth of the word of God is still expressed by means of human concepts and words. But these are not only of exclusively metaphysical-metahistorical provenance, they are therefore not merely of that nature which is proper to those concepts (in spite of every kind of historical relativity) in which we articulate our knowledge of God which is metaphysical and prior to our world-view. They are in part really determined by our world-view. They work with representations derived from the field of man's a posteriori knowledge and therefore inevitably have a greater area of contact and friction with the world-view of the time than the sublime, but admittedly also very abstract concepts of a purely metaphysical theology (though of course the latter too can never manage without a perceptual clarification of a representational kind). To name a few examples, without desiring to deny the profound qualitative differences existing between them, we speak in revealed theology of the 'Son' of God, of the divine generation, of the anger of God, of the [394] appeasement of God, of heaven, of the descent and ascent of God, of the duration of existence in the next life, of the 'inpouring' of grace, of the union of two natures, of the substance of bread which is changed, of the causality of the Sacraments, of the infused habits of the theological virtues, of three persons and one nature in God, and of many other things in which the revealed word of God itself which has proceeded from him, as it cannot do otherwise, in human language, expresses whatever he wants to tell us about his own reality and his merciful deeds in our regard. As we have said, it is here that greater difficulties for the statements of faith result from the world-view of today than if it were a question only of our knowledge of the existence of God.

It is naturally not our intention here to expound the Fundamental Theology of the possibility and the fact of a revelation on the part of the personal, living God in Jesus Christ. There is no need either for us to go into the notorious tensions which in past centuries bedevilled the relations between Catholic dogmatic teaching and modern science, that is into the questions of the Copernican system, the age of the world, the theory of evolution in its application to man's body and similar questions. In matters of this kind the appearance of conflict between the two instances has in the meantime been removed, and these questions have therefore as such and as particular questions only the methodic interest of a warning against a mutual violation of frontiers. Accordingly we intend to make here only a few observations on the fundamental difficulty which we indicated above.

To begin with, one thing need cause us no surprise: as men of a period of late Rationalism in the West and of natural science and technology with its exactitude, we are today more sensitive to the analogy of all our concepts when they are applied to God and his truth and his salvific act than earlier, more primitive men were. We no longer, or not so easily, succeed in bringing out words like 'Jahveh roars', God 'repents', and many others which in the Old Testament rise quite naturally to the lips. We leave aside the question whether this fact is in all cases and in every respect an advantage. The diminution of graphic clarity of expression is a much greater danger than most people suppose. But in many respects the restrictive feeling of 'inexactitude', 'imagery' in all our talk about God, even as it is given in Revelation itself, is simply our condition – a condition which can also bring blessings with it. For to grasp God as the incomprehensible, inexpressibly transcending all our [395] affirmations, that is a grace and a blessing which is purchased at the cost of the desolation of wandering in shadows and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

images, as the great Newman had inscribed on his grave. But this fact is no reason for doubting the truth and importance of what is signified by these inadequate affirmations. What is known in this way is more significant than all earthly knowledge. To be able to stammer about God is after all more important than to speak exactly about the world. The greater part of the offence which the modern educated layman easily takes at such formulations stems – this must be stated honestly and bluntly – from his ignorance or his defective theological training. Christian theology, very much conscious of the analogous nature of its concepts, constantly renews its efforts to reflect upon what in the representational models used in such concepts can and what can not be transferred to the intended trans-empirical religious reality. Even though in the last resort it is impossible adequately to make this distinction and it remains an attempt similar to that of squaring the circle, yet the effort has not been without result. It would eliminate many of the difficulties which an academic may feel at theological formulae, if these academics really knew what the intellectual work of clarification done by theology had achieved in this direction. Admittedly, we must also add that not every cleric is a professional representative of such theology in a position to elucidate the matter. But then not every electrical engineer is in a position to give satisfaction on modern nuclear physics. With all due respect to recent science of this kind, the two-thousand-year-old theology of Christianity has also not been asleep. The academic of today should not imagine that on the average he poses questions on the meaning of the articles of faith or feels difficulties which have never before occurred to any of the theologians. Certainly he must keep in mind, even if he seeks information in the right places, that the mystery of God remains. That is of the essence of theology. It is not the unmasking of a secret, allowing it to become self-evident, but a glimpse into the bright obscurity of the divine mysteries, so that complete clarity would be nothing but proof that one had gone wide of the divine truth in favour of the easily understood error of a human rationalism.

Besides the analogical character which penetrates all human concepts when we speak of revelation, there is a further category of concepts and schematic representations which are bound up more closely with the scientific outlook on the world proper to an earlier age and which are consequently felt to be particularly inadequate today, so much so that a [396] current of contemporary Protestant theology believes it necessary precisely on this ground to demand a demythologization. When we say ‘God is in heaven’, ‘the Son of God came down on earth’, ‘he descended into the nether world, ascended into heaven’, when we read the apocalyptic descriptions of the end of the world as a universal conflagration, the falling of the stars onto the earth, and so on, when we hear the account of the creation of the world in Genesis, then clearly a picture of the world is being presupposed which is no longer our own, although it was in current use in theology right up to the eighteenth century. It is also not to be denied that Scriptural expressions, because they make use of this world-picture, were at first sight more easily assimilated by a naive outlook into the world-picture of those earlier times than we may succeed in doing today at our first attempts. This also makes understandable that naïve inner-worldliness of God of which we spoke already.

But this is no motive for requiring a demythologizing of such expressions. The reason is twofold: firstly, these expressions wholly retain their meaning even though the world-view on the basis and with the help of which they were once made has become obsolete. And secondly, this meaning is still that which was intended when they were made; that is to say, we are able to see that in principle even the original statements of faith did not identify the content of the expressions which they really intended to convey with the imaginative material derived from their picture of the world, and therefore did not mean to guarantee the truth of this world-view which they made use of in the formulation of such expressions. We can only indicate and demonstrate all this very summarily.

In the first place, it can and must be fully conceded that past ages did not reflect very

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

attentively on the distinction in such statements between the content and the mode of expression. When it was said: 'ascended into heaven', certainly such an expression was understood unabashedly in the sense implied by the ancient picture of the world, in which it was possible to travel in a physically demonstrable manner from the earth to the heaven of the blessed on a path and with a movement in the order of our experience. But it was surely also realized, even if only at the periphery of consciousness, that a distinction could and must be made between the content and the mode of such expressions. For instance, the eschatological expressions which presuppose the ancient picture of the world are palpably made with such abandon and mutual incongruity [397] that certainly even man in ancient times knew and felt that not everything in them could simply be taken literally. Moreover, in the course of the history of dogma and of the Church nothing has ever been defined as content which would stand or fall with the ancient picture of the world. With a little reflection it is easily possible to ascertain a meaning in the old expressions which was always intended and is still valid and is independent of the change in the world-view. As, for example, the ancients knew that being seated at the right hand of God is a piece of imagery and yet has a meaning, we today can equally well recognize that the ascension into heaven does not signify a spatial alteration of place in our physical order and yet has a very clear meaning. We must freely admit that when they are interpreted within the world-view of today these expressions become, not indeed poorer in content, but poorer imaginatively than they were for ancient man, who could clearly picture to himself heaven and hell as places within his world-view. But there are two things we should not overlook: the increasing abstraction of theological discourse from pictorial representation is shared by religious reflection with all other scientific reflection, whose expressions in theoretical physics are becoming ever more abstract. And secondly, the existential emphasis of statements of faith interpreted in this unimaginative and non-pictorial way need not necessarily and in the long run be lessened. For this increase in abstraction is not only a loss but also a gain: the inexpressible greatness of God and of the existence of man as a spiritual person before the absolute God become indeed less imageful, but precisely as such more distinct. The danger of a naïve making-innocuous of religious realities becomes less. It is true the average collective consciousness of men must first become accustomed to the independent, powerful life of the truths of faith even in the new world-view in spite of a mutual incommensurability. Such processes take a long time. As regards the details of such expressions of faith which have lost the imagery which came to them from a world-picture once assumed as correct, it cannot be our task here to show in particular cases that the intended object has not suffered and remains fully within our grasp in its old sense. One would have to examine a large part of Christian dogmatics, which is at this moment of course impossible.

From the priority of origin of religion as knowledge of God and of the acceptance of the revealed word of this living God over the reflex scientific picture of the world, and from the situation of concrete historical [398] and metaphysical existence (even as spiritual) beyond the reach of scientific reflection, there follows a further conclusion, particularly for the academic, which we must now briefly consider to conclude our reflections.

Our intellectual ancestors in the nineteenth century believed that one could account for and fulfil one's existence exclusively from science alone, that is, they thought they were in possession of a science 'without presuppositions' of a reflex kind, of which the enlightened professors, the 'academics', were the managers. Science would suffice to determine what in the existence of man is of importance, and whatever could not be decided on its basis was by that fact unimportant, was merely the sum of inconsequential secondary matters which were 'inessential'. So it happened that at that time a renowned chemist declared chemistry to be his 'confession'. Now, whether the descendants of these people of science as a confession in our country or in America are willing to admit it or not, this attitude which was touchingly naïve

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and damnably arrogant at the same time is from a historical perspective in its death-throes. It has simply become evident that science as a foundation for existence is absolutely over-taxed, that a scientific world-view cannot project a picture of man, that the former is, in spite of all its objectivity, ultimately and at its profoundest dependent on the latter, that before and behind science stand metaphysics and faith as higher and more comprehensive powers, which in spite of the discernment which is theirs in their own way are also essentially dependent upon freedom and choice. If, behind the Iron Curtain, Weltanschauung for the sake of the State is fostered exclusively with the science of the nineteenth century (no matter how happy and pleasant that period was in many respects), the world will not overcome the unbelief of the East which is a religion and not a science. In itself it should always have been easy to see that man cannot live by science alone. Science is reflection: reflection is preceded by a metaphysical and historical a priori which inescapably guides it – always and necessarily. This a priori can never be completely caught up with. Therefore the reflection of science cannot be the one and only root of human existence.

But if this is so, then there follows with absolute necessity an imperative of the greatest moment: reflective science (which is good and willed by God) escapes becoming the poison of a directionless factual knowledge of everything, a curiosity diverting attention from the core of existence, a relativistic being-able-to-have-a-theory-about-everything, only when the root of original unreflective understanding of and consent to existence is [399] not only not cut off, but grows more deeply into the primeval soil of existence to at least the same degree as the neutralizing reflexiveness of the scientific outlook spreads itself upon the scattered breadth and multiplicity of what is scientifically discoverable in the world.

Permit me immediately to translate this axiom essential to human existence into the practical order. If the academic does not devote sufficient time and attention to the fundamental questions of his being, if he does not exist by meditating, praying, meeting the demands of the moral order in ascetical practices, renunciation, and self-sacrifice, if he allows himself to be seduced by the multiplicity of his knowledge and the practical utility of his information into becoming instead of a man the unintelligent-artful robot of his science dazzled into thinking that it would lead of itself to earthly happiness and so to the solution of all the problems of existence, then science and the whole refining process of consolidating the scientific picture of the world becomes for the academic a curse. He then knows all sorts of things, a vast multitude of things. He can do a thousand things which could not be done before. But he does not know himself and the absolute truth, and he no longer knows what is the purpose of everything that he can do. He is like the driver who by applying all his acumen increases the speed of his vehicle beyond all measure, and forgets in doing so where exactly it is that he is going. He is capable of believing that he can make do with this world-picture only if he takes up the short-sighted view that the mere satisfaction of vital drives can appease the metaphysical hunger of man. In reality, as experience proves, it is from the deadly monotony of a being exclusively saturated in this way that there arises the devilishness of desperation to the point of criminality. And don't forget: we are still living among late descendants of the nineteenth century who have not yet noticed the fact that they are living upon the remains of the spiritual riches of a religious and metaphysical age which their parents and grandparents disowned and lost and which cannot be won back by a devotion to the great times of a believing humanity, which is merely historicizing and fundamentally remains aesthetic. In this case too we do not remain without blame if we erect tombs to the prophets whom our fathers slew. Much more must one, perhaps in spiritual poverty, bitterness, in the trouble of a new beginning, of doubt and vexation, be oneself a man of faith, of prayer, of silence, of an unmistakable and sturdy religious practice (anything else remains after all in the ultimate analysis the self-idolization of a vague religious [400] enthusiasm), of moral effort, and one must have the courage for this no matter whether it is or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation is not already the fashion among the ordinary people in the academic world; one must have the courage to perceive that religious action should be looked for primarily not in the 'simple man' but in the academic man, because he has in the first place as a matter of life and death the right and the duty of being at home with the primary foundations of all reality, with absolute truth; one must find this courage not merely from considerations of the history of man's spirit, because without this renewal of original Christianity the West has no future; quite apart from this, one must find this courage because it is demanded of each one of us in his own singular unique existence which each one quite alone must very soon answer for before the judgement seat of God. Only then does it in the ultimate analysis have any meaning or any promise to build up a world-view by science. He who kneels in adoration directly before the absolute truth of God, accepting his word in faith even though it may proceed clothed in the flesh of this earth and in the shadows and similes of human words, is then entitled to arise boldly and confidently to state as his own creative truth in his world-view what absolute truth has told him through the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PREFACE

This new volume of my 'Theological Writings' (Schriften zur Theologie) brings together the essays on dogmatic theology which I have written since the first three volumes appeared, that is, since 1956. The attention which was accorded to the three similar volumes which preceded it may be taken as sufficient justification for this new collection. It is given the sub-title 'More Recent Essays' to indicate that they cover the same general field of theology as the first three volumes, and that the present essays, as far as the contents are concerned, should be inserted between the essays of the earlier volumes. Since this could not be done, for technical reasons, and out of consideration for the owners of the first three volumes of 'Writings', these essays simply follow the earlier ones and appear as 'more recent' in time. Given the objective connexion which exists between dogmatic investigations and considerations on pastoral theology based on dogma, it is not surprising that some of the essays which I collected in my book Sanding und Gnade, Beiträge zur Pastoraltheologie (2nd edn., Innsbruck 1959) would have fitted just as well into this volume-and vice versa ('Mission and Grace: Contributions to Pastoral Theology'). The relevant pieces there are chiefly: 'Redemptive reality in created reality', 'The meaning of the individual Christian in the history of salvation', 'Thanksgiving after Mass', 'On Visits to the Blessed Sacrament', 'Primacy and Episcopacy', 'Dogmatic preliminaries for a proper discussion of the reform of the diaconate', 'On the theology of secular institutes'. Since it may help in judging the essays presented here, we give the list of the publications in which they first appeared, following the order of the present volume: 'Considerations on the development of Dogma', Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie, 80 (1958), 1-16; 'On the Concept of Mystery in Catholic Theology', in Siegfried Behn, Beständiger Aufbruch (Przywara-Festschrift, Nuremberg 1959), 181-216; 'Remarks on the dogmatic Treatise on the Trinity', Universitas (Festschrift für Bischof A. Stohr),1 (Mainz 1960), 130-150; 'On the theology of the Incarnation', Catholica, 12 (1958), 1-16; 'Dogmatic questions on Easter', in B. Fischer [x] and J. Wagner, Paschatis Solemnia (Jungmann-Festschrift, Freiburg 1959), 1-12; 'Virginitas in partu: a contribution to the problem of the development of Dogma and Tradition', in J. Betz and H. Fries, Kirche und Überlieferung (Geiselmann-Festschrift, Freiburg 1960), 52-80; 'Nature and grace according to the doctrine of the Catholic Church', Theologie heute, ed. L. Reinisch (Munich 1960), 89-102; 'Questions of Controversial theology on justification', Tüb. Theol. Quartalschr., 138 (1958), 40-77; 'On the theology of the Symbol', in A. Bea, H. Rahner, H. Rondet and F. Schwendimann, Cor Jesu, I (Rome 1959), 461-505; 'Word and Eucharist', Aktuelle Fragen zur Eucharistie, ed. M. Schmaus (Munich 1960), 7-52; 'The presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper', Catholica, 12 (1958), 109-128; 'On the Presence of Christ in Communion', Geist und Leben, 32 (1959), 442-448; 'Theological principles of the hermeneutics of eschatological assertions', Zeitschr. für kath. Theologie, 82 (1960), 137-158; 'The life of the dead', Trier. Theol. Zeitschr., 68 (1959), 1-7; 'Theological remarks on the problem of leisure', Oberrhein. Pastoralblatt, 60 (1959), 210-218, 233-243; 'The theology of power', Männerwerk Köln, polycopied (1960), 16 pp.

Innsbruck, October 1960

Karl Rahner, S.J.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PART ONE

Fundamental Theology

[3]

1

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMA

If we are to address ourselves to the problem of the development of dogma,[1] the difficulty and importance of the question will be clear at once to all of us who are engaged with dogmatic theology. Our vocation is to treat of the dogmas of the Church. We have not merely to propound and explain them, to bring them within the range of the understanding of modern man; we have also the task of showing, as well as we can, that these dogmas of the Church are contained in the original revelation. For the Church and its magisterium recognize that they are not the mediators of a revelation which is now being granted for the first time. They do not look on their office as prophetic, but as one that has only to guard, transmit and explain the divine revelation which came in Jesus Christ at a given point of past history. Thus the function of the Church and the magisterium differs in quality from the process of the original revelation, though the task of the Church is not to be conceived as merely that of repeating the original revelation, and presenting it as something once uttered long ago. The Church presents revelation as something that takes place 'now' as it is uttered by the living voice and offers itself to be appropriated this day in the hearing of believers. Thus the Church and the magisterium distinguish their function – by differentiation, not separation – from the process of revelation itself, and see their function as that of teaching men authoritatively in each age. It is true that the very fact of the Church and the magisterium, once it has been recognized by faith, is the immediate guarantee of a legitimate connexion between the original [4] revelation and the pronouncement of the magisterium. But this does not render superfluous the efforts of theologians who are trying to demonstrate such a connexion. First of all, this connexion, according to the doctrine of Scripture and the Church is not absolutely transcendent with regard to history. It is found, at least to some extent, on the plane of the historical transmission of the original message and hence is still accessible to the historian, even though a comprehensive view of it, like that of all supernatural salvific acts of God, may be reserved for the believer alone. We could undoubtedly say: the connexion between the later dogmas of the Church and the original revelation is, on principle, a necessary subject in any comprehensive fundamental theology; but since it is concerned with the individual mysteries of faith, it must also be investigated by the dogmatic theologian and its study will be his contribution, so to speak, to fundamental theology. Secondly, this task has a special significance within theology. If the theologian must explain the doctrine of the Church as such and try to make it accessible to his contemporaries, so that they can assimilate it conceptually and existentially, one of his ways of explaining the dogmas of the Church will be to show exactly how they derive from the original revelation. For the meaning, implications and limitations of the derivative dogma can only be clearly seen when one constantly returns to its source, especially as the official magisterium of the Church always makes such an effort when propounding its doctrines, at least by having recourse to Scripture.

[1] This essay is the reproduction of a lecture given at Innsbruck, 3rd October, 1957, at a congress of German professors of dogmatic theology. The essay is presented in the form in which it was given. Hence no effort has been made to turn it into a learned piece of scientific research by the addition of references to other relevant literature, monographs, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But if one of the tasks of the theologian is to demonstrate analytically and synthetically the relation between Church dogma and the original revelation, then he has a further task which he cannot avoid. It is to reflect on the formal structure of such connexions in general; he must consider the development of dogma as a whole, and not merely the question of the derivation of any individual dogma from its original utterance.

We are likewise well aware of the difficulty of the task thus described. The question was indeed never totally absent from Church history. Theology was never completely without the theme of the legitimate mode of tradition, nor did systematic reflexion in scientific form on the nature of theology and the connexions between the articles of faith and the individual truths of faith ever die out altogether, especially when apologetics on behalf of Church dogma against the sola Scriptura doctrine of Protestantism made this question more urgent in itself. But in the form in which we have to take up the question today, it is still very recent and [5] hence to a great extent still lacks clarification. In its present form and urgency it can only have existed since the 19th century. For it is only since the rise of modern historical science and of historicism that we can measure really clearly the difference and the distance between the forms adopted by the history of the spirit in general and the history of religious assertions in particular. The heresies of liberal Protestantism and modernism on the one hand, with their denial of the identity throughout the ages of Church dogma, by an appeal to the results of the history of the human spirit and of dogma; the insufficiency of much current apologetics on behalf of this identity, on the other hand, conceding only a minor change in verbal formulas – both show how difficult and how little mastered the question still is. If one is honest one will hardly say that 'Humani Generis' did more than accomplish one task, a primary one indeed, of the magisterium, namely to warn negatively against a historicist relativization of Church dogma. A really positive and progressive doctrine on the positive legitimacy of such development and its positive modes and possibilities, will undoubtedly be sought in vain in 'Humani Generis'. The question is all the more difficult today, because we have experienced a remarkable change of fronts in recent years. In the 19th century, Protestant liberal theology reproached the Catholic Church with an unreal and fatal petrifaction of ancient dogma. Now neo-Protestant orthodoxy, with a renovated doctrine of sola Scriptura, charges the Catholic magisterium with an arbitrary search for novelty, which creates new dogmas without any foundation in Scripture. Hence while we formerly had to defend our maintenance of ancient Christian dogma, in fact and on principle, and our right to understand it today as it has been understood for fifteen hundred years, now on the contrary we have to uphold positively the right of dogma to undergo development. The question is therefore controverted on two sides: how namely authentic identity on the one hand and really genuine development on the other can be reconciled. The problem is undoubtedly very difficult, because it ultimately reaches down to the obscure depths of a general ontology of being and becoming, of the persistence of identity in change – and also comprises the general metaphysics of knowledge and mind, which frames the same questions in searching for truth, with regard to its identity and real historical involvement. On all these questions therefore we must confine ourselves to a few remarks, rather loosely put together, which are only meant as a basis for discussion.

[6]

I. DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMA WITHIN THE SCRIPTURES

For apologetics, and for the understanding of the history and development of dogma in the Church it is of supreme importance to reflect on the fact that such a development can be already observed within the New Testament. As Catholic theology is normally studied, we are accustomed, apart from a very few particular problems (perhaps especially in Christology

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and – naturally – in fundamental theology), to accept unquestioningly the Scriptures, especially the New Testament, as an absolutely homogeneous and undifferentiated quantity, a sort of Summa of revealed statements all laid down at once, like a code of law or a catechism composed in one piece under the same enterprise. We have of course to some extent an indisputable right to this method, which then goes on to prove individual dogmatic assertions of Church doctrine by means of dicta probantia chosen more or less at random from the Scriptures. Scripture, the inspired word of God, is for us as a whole and in all its parts an unquestionable authority; we see each of its assertions as dogma and not merely theology, and take each of its assertions as a legitimate starting-point for our own theology. True as this may be, and correct as may be therefore the method in question in its positive bearings, it is none the less a one-sided view of Scripture and gives a one-sided method in our dogmatic work. Modern exegesis has taught us that we can no longer reasonably overlook the fact that within what we call one Sacred Scripture, and within the New as well as the Old Testament, the assertions undergo a history and a development. No doubt the contents of Scripture are all dogma, quoad nos, and not just debatable theology. But it is equally certain that we must affirm that much of this scriptural dogma, which has for us the quality of inerrant assertions of revelation, is itself derivative theology with regard to a more primordial utterance of revelation. We must not naively imagine that because of inspiration (which for that very reason is not to be confused with new revelation), each sentence of Scripture as such stems from a new original revelation, tributary only to an act of divine revelation which takes place here and now. Not every single sentence of Scripture was heard as it were on its own by a sort of direct telephone connexion to heaven. We may leave aside the difficult question, too little debated from fear of modernist ideas, of how an original revelation of God to the first recipients is to be conceived. But it is imperative to say that not every sentence in Scripture is this type of [7] original revelation. Many assertions, guaranteed as inerrant at once by the Church of apostolic times and by the inspiration of Scripture, are theology derived from the original revelation. Since this is so, and since this derivative theology within the Scriptures still makes the just claim on us to be accepted as obligatory doctrine of faith, while it is itself a stage of development with regard to its own origin, there is therefore in Scripture itself a real development of dogma, and not merely of theology. Thus the development of dogma within Scripture is the authenticated exemplary instance for the development of dogma in general, an example which is in itself obligatory for all who accept Scripture as a whole as authentic testimony of faith. St Paul’s doctrine, for instance, of the sacrificial character of the cross of Christ, of Christ as the second Adam, of original sin, many sayings about eschatology etc., much of the Johannine theology etc., are theological developments from a few very simple assertions of Jesus about the mystery of his person, and from the experience of his resurrection. One could be tempted therefore, simply because such assertions are the obligatory norm of faith for us, to regard them as having fallen straight from heaven, even as they stand. One could be tempted therefore to spare oneself the labour of reaching an exact understanding of them by referring them back to the original source of revelation distinct from them. But in the long run one would run the risk either of misunderstanding them, or of accepting them as a Summa of positively ordained truths of faith without any real internal connexions, and thus endangering their credibility to those who are without. Since however for the most part we are still unable to manipulate this multi-dimensional disposition of the truths of faith in our theology, these facts can scarcely yet be the exemplary instance which we can use to study the laws of the development of dogma.

II. A PRIORI RULES FOR THE FRAMEWORK OF DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMA

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(a) In the last resort, the development of dogma is not a single process which can be adequately comprehended by formal laws. This first statement that we make may sound obvious. But it is important. The unfolding of the final divine revelation is a process. As a process through which the divine revelation passes it is unique. Therefore it has no a priori categories, distinct from itself and superior to itself and likewise adequately determining it. Unlike the processes of natural science, it cannot be [8] comprised under such formal laws as would enable us to predict properly any later phase. This follows from the nature of the case. If therefore the history of dogmas is constantly full of surprises, if no case is like another and each phase and the development of the different dogmas takes a different course, this is to be expected a priori. We cannot therefore demand that the development of one dogma will conform adequately to the laws of another and so for instance challenge the legitimacy of a given development by appealing to the contrast in another. This follows not merely from the nature of revelation and of its history, a unique history which runs only once between Christ and the end. It follows from the historical nature of the knowledge of truth in general. If man has a history, not only as a physical, biological living thing, but even as spirit, indeed, if it is only as spirit that he possesses a true history, it must be clear at once that this history takes in fact a unique course and is not the constant repetition of the same law. This must be true above all of the sublimest portion of the history of the human spirit, the history of divine revelation in the human spirit and the unfolding of this revelation. It would indeed be strange if there were a history of divine revelation – which no Christian can deny – and yet no history of the unfolding of this revelation and hence no development of dogma, with the uniqueness and unpredictability of such history. For revelation itself has a history, and necessarily so, not just because the speaker, God, can in his freedom act historically, but because the hearer, man, is a historical being. As long then as his history goes on, there must be a history of dogma, although revelation is closed, and in a very strict sense and for a very strict reason can be closed, though the history of man is not yet at an end. There is then no adequate formal theory of the development of dogma which would be in itself sufficient to permit a prognosis for the future. But in saying this we do not of course deny that there are certain formal principles with regard to this development, which follow from the nature of a historical and final revelation, just as much as does the principle enunciated above. Such principles may give rise to justifiable objections to possibly wrong developments in theology.

(b) The revelation in Christ is the final, unsurpassable revelation, which was closed with the end of the apostolic generation. This statement, so obvious in many ways, needs some further explanations, if the important consequences of this statement are to be grasped. The closing of revelation must be properly understood in two regards:

[9] 1. It is a closure, which in the last resort causes revelation to be closed, because this revelation is the dis-closure and openness for the absolute and unsurpassable self-communication of God to the created spirit. Revelation in Jesus Christ is not just the finite sum of finite single sentences, though the subject of these may be infinite. It implies the real, eschatological self-communication of God by incarnation, and by grace as glory already begun, to the created spirit. As we shall have to say more precisely later, grace and the light of faith are constitutive moments of the process of revelation even in so far as it is communication of truth, and so also in so far as it is locutio Dei attestans. This does not mean that revelation only becomes actuality as such in the individual believing hearers, in so far as they are such individuals. But it means that if the totality of the hearers and believers were to cease to be, revelation too, as final and eschatological, would cease to be. Where revelation is to be final and has to a certain extent no longer any future before it, it has to be accepted, that is, to be really believed. Otherwise the final judgment of God upon unbelief is come. A final and closed revelation, and a revelation whose destiny on the part of man is still in the balance, are irreconcilable concepts. A final revelation which is closed implies therefore in its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concept Church, in contradistinction to synagogue, that is, the community of those who through a pre-defining grace of God have arrived at faith and are inescapably but freely comprehended in this salvific will of God. Such a revelation implies a believing Church which as a whole cannot fall away from the faith, though nothing can be said about individuals as such. (Here, by the way, is also the theological reason why the Church as the hearing Church, and hence also as the authoritatively teaching Church, is and must be infallible, though this cannot be said of the synagogue, which was however also a foundation of God's.) To have been closed is the property of the final, absolute and unsurpassable self-communication of God, as such, which provides for itself its believing acceptance. The closing of revelation is not the arbitrary ending of God's speaking, which could have gone on and only as a matter of fact fell silent after some chosen utterance. This must always be noted when we speak of revelation's being closed. It is man's being opened up for and into the real and not merely conceptual self-communication of God. And therein it has within itself, precisely because of this closure, which is dis-closure, its dynamism of inner development, and hence a dynamism of the development of dogma. A divine revelation which was not real self-communication [10] of revealed reality to the spirit of man himself, could neither be a true self-communication of God, nor be really conceived in earnest as closed. This is because a divine dispensation which was the pure decree, 'now he speaks no more', is basically an anthropomorphic representation of God. This is all the more true, because the concept of a personal utterance of God, though perhaps only recognizable to us after the event, cannot be in any way seriously and intelligently thought of, except where God wills to disclose himself. Everything else that God could otherwise say could come by way of the real creation of this communicated finite entity. Anything supernatural that could also be attained per se by natural means if God only willed it otherwise, would be an anthropomorphic non-concept. Hence this would also be true of a communication of truth which comes as a locutio Dei attestans though it could also have come otherwise.

2. On the other hand we must not overlook the fact that this revelation, which closes and discloses the infinite, has the human word as a constitutive element of its essence, as long as we are still on pilgrimage in time far from the Lord, and do not see God face to face. And we must also remember that even this immediacy which we await as the consummation will be an immediacy mediated by the Word of God become flesh. But since the human word and the finite concept remain a constitutive moment of the closed revelation, it is clear that this revelation would either not be closed, or not be constituted essentially in part by the human word, if the development which unfolds the original dogma were to ignore such earlier human concepts, if it did not also (though not only) come about by means of the human concepts in which the earlier form of revelation was uttered. What this signifies, and what are its consequences, can only become clear when we reflect later on the constitutive elements of revelation and dogma and are thus enabled to survey the causes and impulses which carry along together, and in the last resort indivisibly, the one development of dogma.

(c) The development of dogma is necessarily carried along, in an ultimately indissoluble unity, by all the elements which are constitutive of revelation and of the self-developing dogma. This statement can hardly be contested seriously in its formal generality. Dogma, or a dogma, is a unified entity which is constructed of various elements (to be mentioned at once more precisely). If dogma or a dogma develops, all the elements which go to build up such a dogma necessarily develop also. This is only possible however if a dynamic tendency to development is [11] innate in each of these constitutive elements themselves. We recognize of course also at the same time that the dynamic tendencies of each of these single elements can only be effective in the totality and must remain dependent on the unfolding of the whole. Hence any effort to explain the development of a dogma one single element of the dogma and its dynamism, any effort to reduce it to one such single dynamism of development, must be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

rejected out of hand as false and futile, like the opinion that one can succeed in explaining a de facto development of dogma without recourse to all these elements.

It may be that in the various instances, as we see them, the dynamism of development in this or that element of a dogma may stand out more clearly and be grasped more consciously; but it cannot be that any of these elements be missing. Any theory of the development of dogma which disregards or denies this simple fact, and would for instance try to attribute the development of dogma as such merely to the magisterium or to the inspiration of the Spirit or to the logical explication of the virtualities implied in the human assertion, is to be discarded at once as false. This likewise eliminates the attempt to suppose different vehicles of development in the individual instances, as if the various historical cases of a de facto dogmatic development could be thereby more easily described and justified.

III. THE CONSTITUTIVE ELEMENTS OF THE DYNAMISM OF DOGMATIC DEVELOPMENT

We have already said that the elements of dogma are also the constitutive elements of dogmatic development, in their variety and indissoluble unity. We must now mention individually these elements of dogma and dogmatic development – taking of course a selective view of such developments – and see what follows for a correct concept of the development of dogma.

(a) The Spirit and grace

God's self-disclosure in the human word of revelation would nullify itself if it were not bound up with the inner light of grace and strictly supernatural faith. If God were to speak of himself in so far as he is not revealed through his creation, which is distinct from himself, and use human words without the supernatural elevation of the hearer, his utterance would come only under the subjective a priori of the finite spirit as [12] such. And his utterance, if not simply nullified, would be necessarily degraded to an element of the self-understanding and the possibility of self-understanding of the mere creature. It would no longer be a real self-disclosure of God. For here too it is true that whatever is received is received according to the manner and nature of the recipient. It is also true here that knowledge is essentially a process of coming to awareness of self in him who knows. It is enlightened self-possession, so that everything that is received is grasped as an element of this self-accomplishment. Though man is undoubtedly, even as spirit in the natural order, absolute openness to being in general, and hence to God who is cause and principle of this spirit, still, if God's communication about himself were received without grace, it would only be grasped as a moment of this self-accomplishment of man within the world (even if it came as something infinitely open). Only where the act of hearing in what we call grace is really the co-accomplishment of an act of God in a strictly supernatural participation of God himself, and not merely of a quality created by him, can the divine utterance be strictly supernatural, that is, qualitatively supernatural in itself and not merely distinguished as regards the mode of communication from any communication made through merely created things. A divine utterance which is divine by reason of its own nature has no meaning unless it is directed towards a divine hearing. Part therefore of the expression of divine revelation is the Holy Spirit, as the strictly supernatural self-communication of God. He does not enter in merely as the guarantee of its correctness or as the originator of a process of efficient causality on the part of God which takes place per se in the region of the finite. He is there as the thing uttered itself and only with this can the human utterance be self-utterance of God. Here we have at once that infinite openness in the closed revelation, and the dynamism of self-development, whose only limits

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

are in the visio beatifica itself. It is also true (and this is part of the fundamental dogma of a Christianity of the Incarnation) that this self-communication of God really takes place in the human word, and not merely on the occasion of it. Human words are not merely the external occasion for a pneumatic or mystic experience of transcendence directed towards the God who is nameless. Spirit and word can only be possessed in their indissoluble unity, undivided and inconfused. Hence the human word is open from the start to the infinitude of God. (This it is, in so far as it is natural, by virtue of its potentia oboedientialis, and so far as it is supernatural, by virtue of its being uttered by the [13] Spirit and by virtue of its elevation by the Spirit.) And the divine Spirit is given in and through this word, assumed by himself in his own infinity and concrete reality.

Here we have a very special and unique conjuncture which is usually overlooked in theology. There are two modes of knowledge in the region of natural knowledge. In the first, we have an actual experience of the reality in question, in itself or in its effects, and on this basis and in view of this we form our concepts and judgments in its regard. We then constantly start out from these concepts and judgments, to return constantly to the experience of the thing itself whence we are enabled to form anew our concepts and judgments and subject the previous ones to a critical investigation, because we can have the thing itself without any assertion about it. In the second, there exists a type of knowledge which does not possess the thing itself but relies on the assertion of another and so is unable to make direct experimental contact with the thing itself and make itself independent of the judgments communicated to it. The second is what happens in all that is called testimonium. Now, the Catholic, anti-gnostic and anti-mystical view of the reality and truth of divine revelation makes the first mode impossible. That is, we cannot make ourselves independent, in our pilgrim state, of the assertions made in the testimony to revelation. Further, we cannot – like the modernists – set up a wordless state of experience with regard to what is meant in faith, to derive thence new and original statements of revelation in the form of intellectual assertions. From all this the average theology of the schools concludes (without really thinking much about it) that revelation is to be conceived of in accordance with the second of the two modes of human knowledge mentioned above and will be mere verbal testimony, which only indicates something not truly possessed and does not impart the thing itself. That is precisely what is incorrect. In the word of revelation which comes through grace we have something intermediate and higher, between the two modes of knowledge named above: in the word the thing itself is given. Behind the verbal testimony of God in human concepts we cannot go, to reach a wordless possession and experience of the divine reality itself. That will only happen when the Word utters itself in the immediacy of the final fulfilment. All the same, we now have not only the utterance, but the thing itself: God's self-communication to the spirit in his own proper reality – which is already the homogeneous beginning of the vision itself.

[14] This of course can only be said if the Spirit who activates the supernatural hearing of the word of God is not merely a heavenly element of consciousness in the act of faith but really enters in as the light of faith. This does not necessarily mean that this light of faith must be present to the believing mind as a conscious datum and object, distinguishable from the other objects of consciousness. But there must be a genuine presence of the light of faith to consciousness, even though as a datum it is not in the state of an object or the object of reflection. If this is so – and against Molina and his followers, this will be maintained as obvious by the Thomistic school along with Suarez, following Scripture and tradition as yet unclouded by nominalistic thinking – then the Spirit cannot be imagined simply as the transcendent steersman of dogmatic development. He will be an intrinsic element of it, by means of the believing consciousness of the Church, the bearer of this development. In this pregnant sense, dogmatic development takes place 'in the Holy Spirit'. Where in explaining dogmatic development precisely as a process in the consciousness of faith in the Church, this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

element is not also considered and reckoned with, any explanation which claims to be adequate must necessarily go astray. No doubt in the explanation of dogmatic development this Spirit cannot be pointed to as an isolated element, perceptible of itself any more than the light of faith can be objectivated in the analysis fidei. But just as little as in the case of the analysis fidei, the impossibility of mastering consciously and checking such an element in a spiritual process does not mean that this element, integral to dogmatic development, is not present as a process of consciousness. With regard to the manner in which the Spirit is a datum in the development of dogma, everything could be said that also applies to the Spirit, grace, and the light of faith with regard to human consciousness. Hence we need not go into the matter more deeply here. It need not surprise us, if we take account of a formal metaphysic of knowledge in the finite spirit. For it would be a senseless rationalism (easily refuted by a transcendental deduction) to maintain that the finite spirit, while still in the stage of becoming and incompleteness, could or should only have the objects presented to its conscious reflexion as the elements of its knowledge, the logical grounds of its judgments and the motives of its action. Even in the region of natural knowledge, the unobjectivated and unattainable datum – thus however truly a datum – is the inviolable source, the broader horizon and the underlying principle of everything that we represent to our minds on the basis of any object [15] of which we make assertions – partly to admit the presence of that which disposes of us while being itself beyond all control, partly to hide it from ourselves and to hide ourselves from it behind the object.

(b) The magisterium of the Church

The word of God is always the word delivered by the authorized bearer of doctrine and tradition in the hierarchically-constituted Church. The element of being officially delivered, the reference back to an authorized teacher, the hearing of the word from this authoritative teaching person, belongs to the constitutive moments of dogma and hence also of dogmatic development. This is because dogma as such must be proclaimed by the magisterium, the teaching authority, in order that it can be believed fide ecclesiastica along with the Church, as a constitutive moment of the faith of this Church. Thus dogmatic development does not depend merely on the office, in facto esse. It also depends on the magisterium in its fieri. The development itself takes place in a constant dialogue of debate with the office. The unofficial elements of development (the charisma of the Spirit and the labour of theology) always anticipate the thought of the office and direct their thinking towards it. Since their thinking-out of dogma is always done within the hierarchically constituted Church, they always offer their thought to the authoritative teaching office. Even if it is ostensibly a matter of an individual stand-point in theology, they learn whether the authoritative office of the Church and the common consciousness of faith in the hearing Church as a whole can, in the fullness of its spirit, participate in the thinking-through of the individual line of theology, or rejects it as contradictory to its spirit. This is not the place to expound more precisely this ‘ecclesiality’ of the preaching of revelation and hence of dogmatic development. We should have to go back to the character of dialogue primordial to human knowledge in general. We should have to show further that – if one may say so – the fides implicita which gratefully and lovingly refers back its own belief to the faith of the Church, as to an element of its own critical self-transcendence, is a necessary moment of all faith, even if a fides explicita, without which moment faith’s confident knowledge of its own blessedness would not strictly speaking be at all possible. For a real critique of the subjective limitations and impotence of all knowledge, even of the knowledge of faith, is only possible in this outward-looking self-renunciation. This is a critique which – at least when implicitly reckoned with and present as [16] an attitude – alone allows any knowledge to be really quite true, because it abandons itself to the greater truth and the more comprehensive reality, whose adequate subject can only be God

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the salvific nearness of God to us, that is, the Church. Other questions could be answered with regard to this ecclesiality of dogma and dogmatic development, where it would be seen that concrete ecclesiality always necessarily includes reference back to the teaching office of the Church.

The magisterium therefore belongs, in the manner just outlined, to the indispensable elements of the vehicle of dogmatic development. But it is just as true that it is not in itself alone the adequate cause. It has essentially the function of preserving and distinguishing. Further, as history shows, it only promotes the development of dogma when the movement has already been launched by other factors. It is dependent – not for the authority of its decisions, but for the presence of an object on which it passes judgment – on charismatic movements in the Church and the reflexions of theology. In spite of all its authority, assistance of the Holy Spirit and even – in certain cases – infallibility, it comes, and must come, to its decisions in a deliberate, free, rational and hence morally responsible act. Hence, previous to the act which is its own justification because it relies on the assistance of the Holy Spirit, it is so much in need of conscious and rationally comprehensible justification that the assistance of the Holy Spirit will always be directed to seeing that this – let us say – human conscientiousness and justifiability of the official decision will not in fact be wanting. Therefore the magisterium cannot make the work of theology and the rational justification of a new dogma superfluous; it cannot replace them, nor does it desire to do so. It is true that for individual theologians, as for the simple faithful, an official decision of the Church is a fact so founded on the assistance of the Holy Spirit in the Church that it cannot be adequately resolved into other previous data, and so to a certain extent be rendered superfluous. But it is equally true that a decision of the magisterium cannot by itself be the adequate cause of dogmatic development, or the justification demanded of theologians for its legitimacy. If one were to say simply and solely: a legitimate development of dogma has taken place here, because the Church has given a definition, one would indeed have given the individual theologian an adequate reason that he should accept the fact of the legitimacy of this development and presuppose it in his reflexions. But one would not have given an adequate answer to the question why this undoubtedly legitimate [17] dogmatic development is in fact now legitimate. With such an authoritative answer, one would have failed to describe the actual process of such a development as it really happened historically, and one task of theology would be left undone. One would have also failed to render explicit the intrinsic and unquestionably possible grounds for the legitimacy of this development. Nor would one have brought these grounds to that degree of perceptible objectivity which is quite possibly superior to that which was immediately and clearly attainable in the pre-history of the definition. For a definition does not need to have brought its motives and justifications to the highest possible degree of explicit consciousness, at the very moment that it is given, any more than this is necessary elsewhere in human decisions which can be quite reasonably upheld.

One might be inclined to say of certain definitions (e.g. the Assumption of the B.V.M.), that here in fact nothing can be done in the line of rational argumentation or historical proof for explicit conscious faith in the event dating from apostolic times, on close examination, and that basically only reasons of congruity can be adduced which when looked at in the light of day and judged honestly, prove nothing. One might be inclined to say that the magisterium alone brought forth from the depositum fidei the newly defined truth, in a manner absolutely unamenable to all rational understanding, and that a sober theologian, averse to all pious enthusiasm, could not see at all how this truth was contained and implied in the ancient truths. But if one said so, one would be ascribing to the magisterium a role in dogmatic development which cannot belong to it and which it never claimed for itself. One would, basically, atomize the faith into a sum of individual statements, with no unity except in the formal authority of the magisterium. One would thereby make these atomized sentences even more faceless and unintelligible, even less assimilable, because in fact they can only have their true meaning in the totality of faith and of the reality which is the object of faith. One would reduce faith to a formal obedience, though it is more than that, since it is a contact in grace with the very reality believed by faith. One would reduce in fact the historically attainable continuity of traditio – which is also a continuity of content and has always been held to be such – to a continuity of the formal authority of the magisterium. One would in fact be denying that revelation was closed in Christ and that the function of the magisterium is restricted to the preservation and unfolding of this revelation. The magisterium, so understood, would be proclaiming new revelations with each new definition. [18] However, it is not the wish of the magisterium to see instead of us what we do not see. It does not fetch for us out of the depositum fidei what we would be quite unable to bring out along with it. Rather, we see along with it and explicitate along with it. It always has recourse to theology and theology has recourse to it. One is never the substitute for the other, and the importance of the one is never increased by lessening the importance of the other.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(c) Concept and word

It is one of the constitutive elements of divine revelation that it is given in human word and concept. In so far as this human word is spoken by the Spirit and listened to in Him, it is necessarily referred and intrinsically open to the infinite mystery of that truth which is identical with the reality of God and can only be communicated along with the communication of this reality in itself. In so far as this word is spoken by the magisterium of the Church, it always has a validity greater than the inner intelligibility of this individual word when taken by itself, though less than that authority and validity, comprehensive because open to infinity, proper to the word in so far as it is the flesh of the Spirit of God himself, who imparts himself to the hearer in the word. In so far as this word is the word of the Church (in its magisterium), it points on to the general understanding of the Church and has also therein a dignity and validity which surpasses the inner light of the individual word in itself and in the merely human understanding of the individual hearers.

All this, however, cannot hide the fact that this word itself is purely a genuine human word and is only competent to make God's word present to us, as long as the human word remains such, with all the elements and consequences of coming from the human mind. It is as in Christology: the divinity grows in equal, not inverse, proportion to the humanity. The adoption of human reality for the manifestation of God is what really redeems and frees the human element and brings it to its highest actuality – to which it is orientated by its nature, even though only as potentia oboedientialis. Hence too it follows that development of dogma must also take place essentially in the dimensions of human concepts and words. Of necessity, dogmatic development corresponds to what usually takes place in the explicitation of human thought and knowledge, though it is not confined to such processes. We can say at once that on the level of the human words and concepts of revelation, dogmatic development can [19] and must make use of all the modes and means by which human knowledge unfolds itself elsewhere. Once we have designated human knowledge which is aware of its justification as a process of man's ratio – a terminology which best fits Church usage, since for very basic reasons the magisterium rejects a fundamental plurality of faculties of knowledge – we cannot but say that dogmatic development always and necessarily possesses a rational dimension. Hence, if one takes theology as the rational reflexion of faith on itself and its objects, one must also say: dogmatic development necessarily takes place in the form of the development of theology. Indeed, we have already said that the magisterium is in fact always dependent on theology, as one of its sources, for its decisions. In saying this, we reject as inadequate both a mystical and an authoritarian theory of development. Even in dogmatic development, neither charismatic inspiration nor authoritative decision makes the rational effort of theology superfluous. Rather, they work through this theology and pervade it. One had of course always been aware that a new dogma must be in accord with the ancient depositum fidei on the conceptual level. Theories that see in dogmatic development the conceptual explicitation of something already implicitly contained in another assertion; questions as to what explicitation of the formally or merely virtually implicit can be defined as fides divina or fides ecclesiastica – all presuppose the conviction that dogmatic development cannot take place without clarification of human concepts apropos of the dogma. It is however necessary to stress this obvious point. True, what has been said up to now does not define in any way the exact mode of such conceptual explicitation in dogmatic development. It is still an open question whether we can be content with the usual explanations given in scholastic theology, which tries to justify this explicitation on the basis of a formal logic of concepts and syllogisms. But we must not lose sight of the fact that there must be an objective connexion between the ancient depositum and a newly defined dogma, on principle, and that this connexion must be demonstrable. To renounce this would be to postulate in fact, even though one avoided saying so, new official revelations in the Church which would go beyond the apostolic depositum.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Here and there one gets the impression that the search for such rational explanations has been abandoned, wordlessly, and that theologians are ready to renounce such connexions in the theory of dogmatic development. There are various reasons for such defeatism within a rational [20] theology. One proceeds perhaps from the false supposition that such a rationally demonstrable connexion must be able to explain and justify all and everything in dogmatic development. In doing so, one wrongly makes the rational process of explicitation the only element in dogmatic development, which of course it is not. Or one exaggerates the certainty that can be asked of such examples of explicitation. But suppose someone only admitted a theological argument from the implicit to the explicit as certain when it is in fact understood by everyone and when its stringency is denied by no one. By only accepting such an argument, he would be using a terminology which is completely alien to the Church, because the Church designates as rationally intelligible and certain a number of proofs which are contested, not accepted, by numberless people. Further, he would logically be denying that there can be any certain rational knowledge at all, because there is practically no item of knowledge which is contested by nobody, and hence he would have to say that certain knowledge does not exist. The mere fact therefore, that explicitation-arguments for a new dogma are contested by some or many theologians as not being stringent or certain, is far from being a proof that no one has succeeded in demonstrating in fact, with sufficient certainty, the connexion between the ancient depositum fidei and a truth to be newly defined or indeed already defined. A theologian can have the right, and indeed in certain circumstances even the duty, of declaring his arguments to be clear and certain, even when his colleagues refuse to applaud. For in such cases one may not suddenly demand more stringency and certainty than can be achieved, according to Church doctrine, in other theological or philosophical considerations which the Church qualifies as certain. No more certainty then is demanded for the processes of explicitation that can for instance be attained for the proof of the existence of God, the freedom of man, the necessity of confession or for transubstantiation – which last truth can indeed be known, according to the doctrine of the Church, from other data of Scripture. Hence one will at least warn people to be careful, if they are tempted, for instance with regard to the Immaculate Conception, the Assumption and so on, to deny to theological arguments the sort of certainty which alone – but really – must be demanded on this level.

All these problems have perhaps been unnecessarily aggravated by the effort to base the rational stringency of such processes of explicitation too quickly and too one-sidedly on the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formal syllogistic logic of the [21] Scholastics. For 'rational', in our world of concepts, does not merely mean an intelligibility and certainty founded on insight into the validity of a syllogism or on the purely intellectual analysis of a concept. As we have already said, to restrict rationality to these matters would be at the very least contrary to the usual language of the Church. If, in other words, one only allowed rational certainty to be present where a new truth of faith is deduced by a simple syllogism from two revealed premisses, there will of course be hardly a single instance of a dogma's being unfolded on the level of concepts and judgments. But then one ought to be honest and cease to claim that dogmas defined in ancient times have a greater evidence and certainty with regard to their derivation from the assertions of Scripture than the newer dogmas. For instance, the sacramental nature of marriage has been a dogma for seven hundred years, but is no more stringently deducible from Scripture on these terms than, say, the dogmas of 1854 and 1950. Further, even in the region of natural knowledge it is wrong to confine certainty only to places where the stringency of a syllogism is invoked. I know, and I know with certainty, that my mother will not poison me, as long as her mind is in any way sound. And this certainty is undoubtedly rational, because according to ecclesiastical, scholastic and a just and preferable terminology no faculty gives more certain knowledge than precisely this rational one. This certainty as to my mother's behaviour can be called rational, and this massive rational certainty can be explained very subtly and circumstantially for the whole length of a dissertation. No doubt such a commentary is intelligent and indeed to some extent necessary, but it will never exhaust, never quite catch up with, the massive original and thoroughly rational certainty. Indeed, its very point will be to enable man to achieve unhesitatingly and intensively this primordial, unreflective and massive but none the less rationally certain knowledge. It will make this knowledge easier for him and give him the courage not to remain prisoner of rationalistic inhibitions and scrupulosity, but to dare boldly to achieve a genuine certainty and a rational insight. For free decision and insight are precisely not in contradiction with each other but are complementary moments of spiritual knowledge and certainty.

There is then in any case a rational certainty which is not properly syllogistic and which cannot be comprised under that head except imperfectly, though no doubt a transposition into such terms is useful and indeed to a certain extent necessary. Why then should not this rational [22] certainty, in its primordial form, not be found also in theology? Why may we not consider the work of reflective theology as the necessary though always inadequate reflection of the mind of the believing Church on a primordial rational certainty by which it knows the connexion between an old and new utterance of dogma? Given such theological labour, and supposing it has been carried out with the utmost strictness and honesty, but also in an inner, sympathetic contact with the object and the primordial truth, why should it not be qualified as certain knowledge? For we may not forget that this certainty lives by reference to that more primordial certainty and is always sustained by it. Rational reflexion does not really create that certainty for the first time, since it rather lives by that certainty. But it can help it to mature, just as the flower lives by the root, and yet the root still depends on the flower.

In this connexion it is perhaps in order to say a word about the notion of the argument from congruity. The theologian's task with regard to revelation is to expound and clarify the inner meaning and the mutual connexions of revealed truths whose revelation is already established. Considerations which serve this task may be designated as arguments of congruity. Such considerations can of course rely from the very start on assured knowledge of the revealed nature of the truths whose meaning and harmony are taken as themes of study. Medieval theology had no doubt such considerations in mind for the most part, when it put the question: utrum conveniens est . . .? – Is it congruous? Here in consequence the question of the stringency of such considerations plays only a subordinate role. It is different with considerations which are meant to lead to conclusions not yet guaranteed as revealed by the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

magisterium. Here the notion of the 'argument from congruity' can only lead to difficulties which could easily be avoided. For if in such cases one designates such considerations as arguments of congruity it means strictly speaking that the argument shows that if God had in fact done this or that, he would have acted reasonably. But the expression also implies that the fact of his having so acted is not established and is not made any more certain by the argument. In other words, by using such an expression one qualifies the argument as completely insufficient for the actual end in view, and thus one rules out from the start all theological effort at such an unfolding of the dogma. But in doing so, one creates difficulties which in reality do not exist at all. For what is the true state of affairs? Such considerations, if made seriously, precisely and with all desirable rational conscientiousness, [23] are always in the nature of a proposition – if one may say so – put before the magisterium and the understanding of faith in the Church as a whole. The question of what rational certainty is attached to such theological considerations apart from this essential element, the orientation of the thought to the Church as a whole, is undoubtedly a subordinate one. For it arises only from the abstract isolation of one element, the rational one, from the totality of theological thought. The only meaning of such a subordinate question would be to sharpen one's own private theological conscience and to prevent one's being superficial and easy-going with one's own theological work, that is, with what is laid before the general consciousness of the Church. But if this process of isolation and the questions arising from it are disallowed, there is no correct sense in which the argument in question can be qualified as 'of congruity'. For such a qualification evaluates the thing in question before it has reached the full perfection of its own being. But the argument, by the nature of things, is only complete when it is accepted by the universal consciousness of faith in the Church, which alone is competent to pronounce the true verdict on it. It is not from individual theologians but from the universal faith of the Church that the qualification is to come, in a process that may last for centuries, either through a definition, or through disregard of these considerations, so that the question raised by these considerations of theologians is left open. It is quite possible that such theological considerations contain elements of certainty and stringency which cannot be made clearly objective by the syllogisms and conceptual analyses of the individual theologian alone, but only in connexion with the sense of faith of the Church. Hence if one starts by qualifying a certain theological consideration as merely an argument from congruity, the books are closed before they ought to be. Or at least one gives the impression that the act of the magisterium and of the sense of faith, consequent to these theological considerations, has basically nothing to do with those considerations but produces something quite new, in a sort of generatio aequivoca, on the occasion, at most, of these considerations. But in fact, what the magisterium and the Church's sense of faith do is to give objective clarity to a stringency which resided in these considerations themselves, though this immanent stringency in the process of theological development is first brought to conscious objectivity through the qualification granted by the Church – which however is not a substitute for such stringency. In other words, to qualify a theological argument as merely [24] congruous, simply because its stringency can only be recognized, fully reflectively, by the Church as a whole, would be to mistake the true nature of theological thought and to split up something which must indeed be composed of different elements but at the same time is always one in this plurality.

(d) Tradition

As the fourth element of a truth of faith and hence of dogmatic development we must expressly underline the process of 'being handed on'. A divinely revealed utterance is essentially something that takes place when person speaks to person, since divine revelation, being strictly supernatural, is essentially the self-disclosure of God. From the very start therefore, and by their very nature, revealed truths are truths which are spoken to someone.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This handing on of revealed truths is therefore also valid for the dogma of the Church. This element of being handed on, constitutive in the traditio, which is the handing on to truth and reality together, brings with it basically at once the development of dogma. For such a traditio takes place at a given moment of space and time, is necessarily historical, and absorbs the recipient and his historical uniqueness, which is also a property of his knowledge, into the process of traditio itself. In other words, anything said to anybody, if it is really to communicate, also of necessity implies that what is said undergoes a history in the utterance; it is not a mere repetition of the same thing. This is not of course to maintain that the assertion does not remain the same, in the sense of an evolutionist theory of dogmatic development contrary to the doctrine of the first Vatican Council. But if we start from this consideration we can make it clear – just as from the a posteriori data of Scripture – that every kerygma, by the very fact of its being proclaimed, undergoes development, and therefore, since it must remain revealed kerygma which calls for faith, gives rise not merely to theology in history but to dogma in history and hence to dogmatic development.

One might then ask oneself what direction must necessarily be taken by this development, which is already contained in the initial stage of the dogma. Such a question could only be answered by taking into account all the other elements which we discover in dogma. We have said above, under (a), that the Spirit, grace and the light of faith are one of the essential elements of dogma and therefore of its development. If one could enquire, more closely than is possible here, into the way in which this [25] element affects the whole grasp of dogma, we should have to deduce that the light of faith, brought by the Spirit and ultimately identical with him, is the a priori within which the individual objects of revelation are grasped. This is comparable to natural knowledge, where being in general is the a priori horizon in relation to which the spirit in its transcendence grasps each object and first makes it truly intelligible. From this we are to expect a priori a two-fold movement within the development of dogma. The infinite breadth and intensity of the supernatural a priori must necessarily lead to a constantly increasing articulateness in the unfolding of the objects comprised within its horizon. In the confrontation and synthesis between the formal a priori and the a posteriori object of faith, the object is necessarily displayed ever more fully in its virtualities. For each a posteriori object of faith is grasped as a moment of the movement of the spirit towards the one self-communication of God, which is not merely grasped in the act of faith as a statement about a future thing, but actually takes place in that act. But since each truth of faith is in this way a moment of this movement towards the unifying self-communication of God, which is absolutely unified and utterly intensive, the assertion can only function when it is open to more than it contains, to the whole, in fact. But it is only open – unless it is to fulfil this demand by the mere extinction of itself in the mystic darkness of the silent mystery in general – if it unfolds itself in a greater fulness of assertions, through which it is referred ever more fully to revelation as a whole.

The theology of the increasingly lucid analogia fidei is therefore not just the result of an ingenious formal logic which constantly produces new combinations, constantly finds new cross-references and connexions and deduces consequences from them. The theology in question is rather legitimated by the connexion that exists between the comprehension of an individual truth of faith and the enveloping a priori (given in its own reality in grace) of its comprehension in true faith. This divine a priori of faith inaugurates the unfolding of the ancient depositum fidei from its virtualities. Thus the dynamism of dogmatic development aims at an ever fuller expression of the individual dogma. It is expansive. But we must likewise expect, by virtue of the same origin, a dynamism that runs counter to this. For the formal a priori of faith, in contrast to the natural transcendence of the spirit and its a priori relationship, is not a formal abstract a priori, founded on the potentiality of the developing spirit and its openness; it is not merely an a priori of possibility. It is in fact the real [26]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

intensive fulness of what is meant in each individual object of faith, and that not merely in notion or idea, but in the reality itself, which is none other than the triune God in his real self-communication.

In the act of faith therefore, in the utterance and the hearing of revelation, a synthesis takes place between this a priori and each individual object of faith. But then such a synthesis must also launch the dynamism in the direction of a constantly progressive concentration of the variety of the contents of revelation upon this a priori unity which is intended in all this variety. Dogmatic development must also contain a dynamism of compression and simplification, tending towards the blessed darkness of the one mystery of God. It is not at all as if dogmatic development must always move in the direction of multiplying individual assertions. Just as important, indeed, strictly speaking still more important, is the development in the line of simplification, towards an ever clearer view of what is really intended, towards the single mystery, an intensification of the experience in faith of what is infinitely simple and in a very essential sense obvious. The more clearly the ultimate themes are disentangled from the variety of the assertions of faith, the more clearly they are grasped through acceptance of the individual assertions, the more 'dogmatic development' do we have. In practice, the former of these dynamisms will be sustained more by popular piety and by the magisterium, which is responsible to it on justifiable pastoral grounds. The latter contrary, dynamism, will be sustained in practice primarily, though not solely, by the esoteric studies of theology itself. Theology at present however, in our non-authoritative opinion, should not be confined to the service, however justifiable, of popular piety, which strives inevitably and justifiably after the greatest possible diversity, and necessarily explains to itself the fulness of divine reality by a constantly increasing number of particulars. Theology today might well take up more intensively the other charge that falls to it, and in practice, to it alone: the reduction of the multiplicity of faith's assertions to their ultimate structures, in the intelligence of which under certain circumstances the all-embracing and overwhelming mystery of God is more powerfully present for us today than where the spirit only enlarges upon the variety of the individual assertions and further distinctions among them. To use a comparison and meet the facts at the same time one might say: there is a theology of the commonplace in the supernatural by which one tries to find God in a constant multiplication of newer and more distinct particulars. But there is also a theology of the 'mystical' or the [27] silent mystery, in which as in mysticism proper, the particulars are lost to sight as though at night, so that the one totality may become more powerful. One might well think that the second, which demands of theology just as much precision and discernment as the first, is too little practised today. It exists however in the form of a need, mostly not quite conscious of itself, even in the theology of de-mythization.

(e) The acknowledged presence of dogma, AS dogma, AS revealed by God

Where a dogma is present to the full extent of its being, it implies that the conscious faith of the Church, definitively instructed by the magisterium of the Church, holds it as revealed by God. This further element of dogma is now to be considered in relation to the development of dogma. The special quality of this element is that dogmatic development precisely consists of the fact that this element becomes a datum of consciousness: the Church becomes aware that it enunciates a given truth as something revealed by God. But this datum of consciousness – and this is what ultimately constitutes the whole difficulty of the development of dogma – was not always present. It is probably better to formulate it in this manner than to put the matter more crudely and to say that the Church once did not believe a certain truth and only grasped it later. For, looking more closely and deeply into the matter, and distinguishing between an explicitly articulate and a more undifferentiated presence of a divine revelation, one would say more correctly: the Church was not always consciously aware that it possessed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something as a divine truth in its sense of faith, while it was in fact always present to the Church. However that may be, we have in any case to reflect on the fact that such a conscious datum, which was not always present, does enter into the development of dogma. We come now to the really problematical point. The question is; how does this entry take place? How does the Church suddenly notice, as we may say, that the assertion on which it had been brooding in its consciousness perhaps for centuries is held by it with the unconditional assent of faith? If one simply answered the question by saying: it does so because the Pope or the Council defines this truth, the question would merely be transposed. It would then be: in what circumstances and on what evidence has the Pope the right to define something? The question remains even on the unquestionable supposition that the Pope, when he defines something, defines correctly. The formal legitimacy of the act whereby he defines is the guarantee of the correctness of his definition quoad nos. But [28] it is not the objective or the conscientious justification of the papal definition for the Pope himself. But suppose one answers the question as follows: the Pope recurs to tradition to assure himself of the justification of his definition, the old question arises once more. How can the justification be found in tradition since by hypothesis this tradition, coming before the definition, does not contain the element of conscious knowledge of the revealed nature of the proposition to be defined? One might say: yes, this element was already there, because – as was established in fact before the definition by the Pope's questioning the episcopate – this truth was already believed in the Church as something revealed by God, though not of course on the basis of a decision of the extra-ordinary magisterium. But then the question has been changed back once more into its earlier form: how then did the transition take place from a state of belief in the Church, in which a certain proposition was already held, but not yet consciously grasped as something revealed by God, to a state of belief in which this is the case? In other words, the problem remains the same in any case: how and on what grounds and with what right does the believing mind of the Church take the step from a stage in which it possessed a truth without having consciously recognized it as revealed by God, to the stage of making such an assertion? One might think to answer this question adequately by the sole reference to the rational validity of the arguments dealing with the connexion between the ancient depositum fidei and the new proposition, no matter how one conceived of this rational recognition in detail. But then logically one would have to admit that the certainty of the conclusion of this rational argument is itself dependent on the certainty of the argumentation. Therefore it can never lead to the certainty of faith itself, and the Church cannot rest adequately its absolute, irrevocable decision on such a certainty. One could of course reply by saying: this rational argumentation (in the broad sense of which we have spoken earlier and which has not been expounded more precisely here) is not meant to justify in any way the absolute nature of the definition or of the faith, but only the right of the Church to such a definition or an act of faith in which a proposition is really grasped as something revealed by God. But then we should have to ask again: first, how can one recognize a 'right' to such an assent, when the recognition of this right is still not the adequate justification of what really takes place in such an assent? Secondly: how does this assent come about if it contains something more definitive and absolute, and to some extent [29] at least, something more in the line of contents than can simply be derived from the process of explicitation alone?

To put this more concretely and so to repeat once more the two questions: first, explicitation cannot prove the new doctrine, which is only now to be held as revealed, as definable, with the stringency and certainty which are contained in the act of explicit faith and the definition. Explicitation cannot in fact make this claim nor indeed may it make it, because otherwise the remaining motives of faith and its responsible causes would be rendered superfluous. Faith would not be the work of the Spirit and the definition would not come about under the assistance of the Spirit. How then does the Church which believes or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Pope who defines know that they can believe and define? Where do they get the right to do so? The question is not to be over-simplified or made too easy. There are of course certain definitions, or at least there seem to be, where it is clear that the extra-ordinary magisterium only laid down once more, by a definition, something that had already been taught as revealed by the ordinary magisterium and had been believed expressly by the Church. In such cases the novelty is justified by the fact that it is basically only a repetition of the old, the defence of what was already present. But in putting our questions, we are thinking of all the cases where by hypothesis the matter is otherwise, where namely the definition or the faith of the Church intervenes for the first time and does not merely confirm or defend what was already acquired. By what right, consciously known and demonstrable, does the transition take place from the stage in which a proposition is not yet held as certainly revealed by God to the stage where it is accepted as certainly revealed by God? With this the second question becomes clear: how is the transition made from one stage to the other? And it is clear that this passage is the decisive problem of dogmatic development, much more than the question of the content, when the implications of an ancient dogma are unfolded.

But when we look closely at the matter, the question is seen to be an ancient one, a problem known to every theologian, though it has undoubtedly special modifications by reason of the fact that here it is a matter not of the faith of the individual but of the whole Church. We are all aware of the question of the transition, and the justification of it, from a qualitatively lower to a qualitatively higher level of knowledge in the birth of faith in general, in the case of the individual. When someone begins to believe, we have to ask: what exactly happens, and by what right [30] does the former non-believer begin to believe? The first answer that the traditional theology of the schools will give is that he has grasped the praeambula fidei, the rational foundations of faith, in one way or another, and to a degree which is sufficient in his regard. Thus he knows that he has the right and the duty to believe: he has seen the credibility and the credentitas of the faith. Hence he believes, hence he freely decides to believe. But here a theology which goes somewhat deeper will have to say that while accepting this answer we must not overlook the qualitative difference between a rational proof of credibility, with all its problems, doubts and obscurities (no matter how much absolute or relative ‘certainty’ is and must be ascribed to it), and the total, absolute commitment of faith. The same problem is posed us as we discovered in the Church’s development of dogma: the problem of the passage from the stage of not believing or not yet believing to that of belief. We can therefore assert that dogmatic development brings us back to all the problems, theories, differences of opinion and open questions which we meet in the analysis fidei when treating of the origin of faith in the individual. And everything said there can be repeated here. The leap to faith from its necessary presuppositions is the very same there as here, fundamentally. There are two aspects in official Catholic doctrine on faith with regard to its origin. On the one hand, it teaches the necessity of rational presuppositions which can be consciously grasped, and that there is a connexion between these and the faith. It defends them against theories that make the faith irrational by denying such presuppositions and leaving the faith to rest entirely on itself. On the other hand the same Catholic doctrine maintains that there is a qualitative difference between faith, which is an act of God-given grace, even in the zone of consciousness, and its presuppositions, which are rational. The same two aspects recur in our present question. We are also entitled therefore to break off the discussion of the problems posed by dogmatic development and to content ourselves here with having reduced our present question to the more general one. It is indeed enough, because the more general question is in fact a recognized subject of theological study and is clearly envisaged by it, while the question as posed by dogmatic development is probably not so clearly seen. Still less has its identity with the more general question been fully worked out.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Two things only must be remarked in conclusion. The first concerns a still more general case, which does not indeed solve the problem, but shows how real it is, since the occurrence in question is so real and [31] unavoidable. Wherever a decision is freely taken the following case arises. On the one hand, the decision must be preceded and justified by an insight into its meaning, its rights and its duties. On the other hand the decision itself, once it is made, possesses its own evidence, which is intrinsic to it and is only attainable in the decision. In other words, no decision is merely the execution of the judgment. It is also the coming of the light which alone can justify it in the measure in which it feels it must be justified in its own eyes. There is a mental clarity which does not precede the decision but can only be attained in the decision itself, though it does not follow at all that the process is 'irrational' or that it renders superfluous the previous rational considerations which should lead to a correct decision. A metaphysic of freedom and of love would be needed to propound and clarify the matter. This would give us an element of a general existentialist ontology which could be applied to the special question we are dealing with – one which has a great need of such an existentialist ontology.

The second is this: there is a two-fold reason by which it can be shown that in our particular question we have a less acute form of the general problem of how faith arises from rational pre-suppositions without being in homogeneous continuity with them. It is because we are dealing with the whole Church and with a faith that grows out of faith. We are dealing with the faith of the whole Church. First of all, it may be affirmed a posteriori that up to this a papal definition has never been given where the object of the definition was not already in fact believed by the Church as a truth of faith. We will not now go into the question of whether that must be so on principle. The 'ex se infallibilis' of the doctrinal authority of the Pope has not yet settled the matter definitely. For this doctrine only means that the papal decision does not need the subsequent assent of the Church for its validity and that the fulfilment of the conditions necessary for the decision – there are such things! – is not the subject of an examination by others, as if the validity of the papal decision depended on their verifying the conditions. If then one were to say: the Pope defines on principle only what is already believed as a revealed truth in the Church, one would not offend, given the distinctions just made, against the doctrine in question. However, we leave this question aside for the moment. In point of fact, at any rate, the actual faith of the Church as a whole was ascertained before, for instance, the Assumption was defined, by the questionnaire sent to the bishops by the Pope before his definition. [32] Hence this definition at least could be given in view of the faith already there, which recognized the truth to be defined as a revealed one. And it will undoubtedly be difficult to find a clear and convincing example of a different procedure, in point of fact.

Thus, in many cases at least, the faith of the Church with regard to a revealed truth as such intervenes prior to the act of the extra-ordinary magisterium, and hence (in connexion with the ordinary magisterium) in the form of an almost imperceptible growth and ripening of this specified consciousness of the faith, as it 'comes to itself'. The Church as a whole considers a thought which grows out of the whole content of its faith: it ripens, it merges ever more fully with the whole, while the Church lives it and perfects it. And so the Church of a certain day, if we may say so, finds itself simply there, believing in this special manner. This is not surprising. As we have already indicated, all decisions are preceded by preliminary decisions, attitudes and so on; in all decisions there are motives and urges at work, which are not themselves the object of a conscious choice. No wonder then that the same thing should happen with the Church. The interesting thing is that this passage in the development of dogma from groping to grasping, from thinking to the assent of faith, is attributed first and foremost – at least in the cases accessible at once to us – to the Church as a whole. This is easily understood. For the Church is what is ultimately intended by God by the hierarchy and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation its authority. It is the totality of all the God-given guidance, impulses and tendencies in historical development – whereby it would be against the doctrine of the Church to suppose that all these divine movements were always primarily introduced into the Church by means of the hierarchical office. The whole Church is therefore also the easiest place to imagine the quiet transition from one stage to another, of which we have spoken. All we have to do is think of the opposite case. Certain moral and theological pre-suppositions must be available to the Pope when he defines – and it is morally certain that he has them, because the opposite is no doubt excluded by divine providence, along with the possibility of error. How is he to have them in practice, unless he can have before his eyes a truth already present in fact to the faith of the Church, in conjunction with the magisterium ordinarium? It other words, how else is he to have sufficient human certainty that what he is about to define is contained in the depositum fidei? One might say that some other sufficiently certain theological judgment would be enough, for instance, that on [33] various grounds, something was implicitly contained in the heritage of faith. But in point of fact it is unthinkable that this would be discovered for the first time at this precise moment by the Pope. And so the theological reason which the Pope has must also be known and active elsewhere in the Church. Who is to prove that it has not already in fact enabled the whole Church to see the implicit truth as something revealed by God, without any papal definition? Anyone who feels that the importance of the doctrinal authority of the Pope is threatened by such considerations is not thinking correctly. Before all paper definitions, the whole Church probably already believes clearly enough the doctrine about to be defined. And this fact, which has impressed itself slowly and without flourish of trumpets on the believing consciousness of the Church, is probably even the justification of the contents of the definition, though not of course the formal juridical legitimation of the moral right of the Pope to define the doctrine. But such assertions do not restrict the importance of the doctrinal authority of the Pope. For it is undeniable that such acts of the extra-ordinary magisterium also retain their sense and importance where a truth is already de facto explicitly believed in the Church, as revealed by God, under the influence of the ordinary magisterium, including that of the Pope. We do not maintain that the faith of the Church prior to a papal definition has no connexion with the ordinary magisterium. On the contrary, it is precisely when this faith grows and ripens under the guidance of the ordinary magisterium, even where this does not make itself heard clearly by exercising its supreme authority, that the importance of the magisterium, working in harmony with the faith of the listening Church, is all the clearer and greater. The ordinary magisterium, in papal encyclicals, addresses etc, makes a decisive contribution to the ripening and the self-awareness of the believing consciousness of the whole Church. But this process of ripening, as history shows, is more manifold, multi-storied, organic and harmonious than it would be if reduced, as some might imagine, to what survives in a methodical, juridical formalizing of the process: namely the authoritative decree and its obedient acceptance. Further, the faith of the whole Church, existing prior to the definition, does not by any means imply that every individual member already explicitly believes the proposition in question as something revealed by God. It only means that this faith exists in the Church as an attribute of this moral person which is the Church as a whole. The function of the papal decision is precisely to ascertain this [34] faith and so to impart this general faith of the whole Church to those who do not yet believe. The Pope is the point at which the collective consciousness of the whole Church attains effective self-awareness, in a manner which is authoritative for the individual members of the Church. This does not of course mean that the individual is only bound to obedience when he has positively verified the fact that the Pope actually exercised this function as he gave his definition. The mere fact that a legitimate Pope has made a formal definition in the legal way is enough to tell the individual that the Pope has in fact exercised this function. But he does exercise it. He does so, because it is as member of the Church that he is Pope, and it is as member of the Church, on behalf of the Church, that God confers upon him his authority, and because it is the Church ultimately that must be indefectible. Hence the exercise of this authority – especially where it takes place in the service of dogmatic development – rests upon a clarification of the believing consciousness of the whole Church: just as much as it calls for such a development and brings it to its definitive self-understanding.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All that we have just said in this context comes down to this: because, and in so far as, the whole Church is the bearer of dogmatic development, the problem of the transition is somewhat easier than in the case of an individual coming to believe, though the fundamental difficulty remains. In addition, there is a second reason for the easing of the problem, which we shall only indicate here. In the Church, it is a matter of reaching certainty about the revealed nature of a given proposition, on the basis of revelation already believed, starting from other propositions already held by faith. It is not a matter of the complete transition from unbelief to faith, as in the case of the individual which is usually analysed in the analysis fidei. I am well aware that what I have said leave many questions of dogmatic development untouched. Above all, we seem to be now once more at a time when we should look more closely into the questions which were central to previous investigations into this theme, the questions namely about how precisely development takes place on the level of human concepts and propositions. One should have to ask what is the true process of the logic of invention (in contrast to the logic of syllogistic verification) both in general and in the field of theology and reflexion on the faith in particular. One should have to ask what are its laws, what are the influences to which it is subject, etc. We shall not be able to make ends meet, if we are confined there to such primitive concepts [35] as are usually applied (formally or virtually implicit etc.). However, we cannot go into this now. All I wished to do here was to show that prior to the usual questions, there are certain questions that need to be better clarified: the question of dogmatic development within Sacred Scripture; the question of a really adequate grasp of all the elements of propulsion and guidance which are to be considered in dogmatic development, none of which is to be overlooked if a theory of development is not to be one-sided or to lead us into straits; the question of the inner connexion between the problems of the analysis fidei and the development of dogma; the question of the necessary rational connexion between the ancient depositum fidei and a new dogma; the question of the indisputable importance of theology within the development of dogma; the question of the course of development taking a two-fold direction. These and similar questions, which we have touched upon, would have to be solved, if we are to come to a concept of dogmatic development which corresponds to the historical facts as well as to the consciousness of the Church. For we know that in such development the faith of the Church remains the same, at one with what it received as the assertion about the absolute revelation of God, which is Jesus Christ our Lord, he who was crucified and rose again.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[36]

2

THE CONCEPT OF MYSTERY IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

I. FIRST LECTURE

We shall try to indicate in these three lectures the fundamental role played by the concept of mystery in dogmatic theology. The first lecture will be an introduction to the set of problems here envisaged; the second will discuss the notion of mystery to which these problems point; the third will apply this notion to the Christian mysteries as they are presented in Catholic theology and show that these mysteries, though spoken of in the plural, are really only so many facets of the one mystery with which the Christian revelation confronts mankind.

The question is of importance in apologetics. The world in which man lives today seems to him a closed system, sealed off to a certain extent from God, a universe of unthinkable extent and variety, largely impenetrable and fully determined by its own laws. If God is not actually depersonalized, his government of the world is less easily thought of than hitherto on the analogy of the action of someone in this world. God has become more transcendent, and his name simply stands for the unfathomable mystery which lies behind all accessible and definable reality. The world has become less divine, and, by the same token, less important. Its processes are no doubt felt to be inevitable, but not as numinous – much rather as contingent and changeable. But if God is thus nameless and remote, and the world and everything within it profane, provisional, and replaceable, only at an immense remove the work of God's hand and the reflexion of his being: then man's sense of his own existence sets him a strange and oppressive problem. It is no longer so easy for him to see a definitely constituted religion, with its thousand and one truths, customs, prescriptions, and rules, as the concrete obligation of God's will and the necessary institution for his salvation. He finds all this so anthropomorphic and concrete that it is hard for him to realize that this multiplicity [37] of details constitute God's way, and indeed the necessary way, of communicating himself to man for man's salvation.

Dogmatic theology poses the same problems, and perhaps most acutely. As long as men find it a highly complicated collection of arbitrarily linked assertions, their readiness to believe will be inhibited. And this is not because they abhor the incomprehensible. They may be rationalists with regard to a world in which they see nothing numinous, but merely the raw material for science and technology. But that does not mean that they are nothing but rationalists. They are much less so than their forefathers of the 18th and 19th centuries. They sense and revere the nameless and inexpressible. And for that very reason, they find a complicated dogmatic system too knowledgeable by far, too clever, rationalistic and positivist, too ready to lay down the law. They are not much impressed when the theologian appeals to a positive decree of God at every point where his dogmatic theology seems to be at a loss, and goes on from there to construct a world of faith held together only by such decrees, which are now christened mysteries. Men find the mystery of God so all-embracing that they cannot easily bring themselves to accept a multitude of mysteries which look very much like the complications of human reasoning which has tied itself up in knots.

It is therefore a very existential problem, when we ask how the mystery stands to the many mysteries of Catholic faith and doctrine and whether the whole field of mysteries can be understood as a real unity, without of course trying to reduce all mysteries to one, rationalistically. Is Christian doctrine, where it covers real mysteries, really a highly complicated system of orderly statements? Or is it rather a mysteriously simple thing of infinite fulness, which can be propounded in an immense variety of statements while its mysterious and simple unity remains unchanged? So that man, faced with this multiplicity of assertions, need not be the victim of modernistic simplifications of religion if he finds himself as he really is, the being in face of the nameless mystery which he adores: Adoro te devote, latens Deitas.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We start with the conventional notion of mystery as given in the current manuals of dogmatic and fundamental theology. It cannot be our task here to outline the history of the notion, and hence we do not deny that it may once have been richer and more profound than it now appears in the theology of the schools. But when we are trying to see all the [38] problems which the notion presents today we may restrict ourselves without injustice to the average concept as proposed in the schools. There is all the less reason for quarrelling with this procedure because it can be shown that the notion of mystery as now proposed in fundamental and dogmatic theology, is more or less that of the first Vatican Council, which did not go beyond the usual problems of the schools, at least consciously and expressly.

How is the notion of mystery understood in the schools? We begin by noting three remarkable points. First, mystery is regarded from the start as the property of a statement. Then, there are mysteries – in the plural. Finally, this multiplicity of mysteries is comprised of truths which are provisionally incomprehensible. Of course, in the language of the Church and of theology, the object expressed by the truth, the thing to which the statement refers, is also called a mystery. This is obvious, and we do not doubt it in the least. But in the ordinary terminology, it is the truths or statements that have the quality of mystery, even though this stems from the object to which they refer. It is the truths that are mysterious. This is clear at once from the fact the notion of mystery is orientated from the very start to the 'ratio'. It is something mysterious to reason. No one asks whether the relationship which is thus used to clarify the notion is not too narrow and superficial. Without bowing the knee to irrationalism, and without restricting in any way the 'essential role of ratio in religion and theology, we can still ask whether the precise nature of 'ratio' itself is quite so clear and obvious, and if not, whether such a concept may be used to determine the notion of mystery. And may there not be a more primordial unity of the spirit, whatever its name, prior to the division into the 'faculties' of ratio and voluntas? – an authentically scholastic question. (cf. St Thomas, S. th., I, q. 16, a. 4) – and may not this primordial unity be the reality to which the mystery is directed and related? In other words, perhaps the will and its freedom have the same essential relation to the mystery as the ratio, and the mystery to them, when they are considered in their original state of unity with the ratio. Would it be then correct to assume that mystery and mysterious truth are one and the same thing?

Now in the terminology of the schools, mysteries are affirmations whose truth can be guaranteed only by a divine communication and which do not become perspicuous even when communicated by divine revelation but remain essentially the object of faith. This notion of mystery corresponds exactly to the standard notion of revelation, which, in [39] contrast to the biblical theology accepted by Catholics and Protestants, is taken to be the communication of truths, that is, true statements. Revelation is of course and involves essentially the communication of truths. But if we take our concepts from the history of revelation and biblical theology, we shall have to add that it is by his action upon us that God imparts truths to us. The wider concept is that of a revelation which is action and event. This follows at once from the fact that in the actual order of things revelation, even as the communication of truth, only comes to us as the salvific action of God's grace in which he must first bestow on us the capacity of hearing his word of revelation and in which he imparts to us the reality of which the word of revelation speaks. The reality is spoken of only in the grace by which the reality itself is communicated, and revelation only expounds it and makes

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

it the object of consciousness. Revelation is not a preliminary substitute for the thing, as if for the moment we had only a message 'about' the thing and not the thing itself.

Revelation, however, as ordinarily discussed in the schools, is purely a verbal communication and the concept of mystery is likewise referred from the start to statement and assertion, which are then distinguished from the truths of natural reason which can be 'seen', 'comprehended' and 'demonstrated'. Thus the special nature of these truths is measured not by the 'intellectus' which forms a primordial unity with the will, but by the 'ratio', which in Vatican I and in theology is taken to be something well known and easily understood, and as the self-explanatory criterion by which these truths are to he measured. Hence it is said that these truths are not accessible to reason, that they surpass the created intellect (D 1796) and that they remain obscure 'as long as in this mortal life' we are on pilgrimage far from the Lord' (cf. D 1676, 1796). The silent presupposition throughout is that we are dealing with truths which should strictly speaking have come within the scope of reason with its power to see and comprehend, but in this case do not meet its demands.

The pronouncements of the magisterium in the nineteenth century, and the ordinary theology of mystery, do not go any closer into the notion of this 'ratio' to which certain doctrinal statements appear mysterious. But its meaning may be gathered from the pronouncements of Pius IX and the Vatican on mystery. It is the faculty which of its very nature is orientated to 'evidence', insight, perspicuousness and strict proof, and seeks a very definite relationship between the mind and its [40] object: the sort of knowledge which was the ideal of the 18th and 19th centuries and stems basically from the ideal of modern science. Now Vatican I and the theologians of the time and after it, do not say that this concept of ratio is a relative one, which needs itself to be critically examined, or is too restricted for the character of personal communication which is proper to revelation. They take the concept for granted and go on to affirm that mysteries exist and to define them as well as they can in terms of this problematical norm. In the same way, they take it for granted from the start that if there can be any one such truth which falls within the scope of conceptual assertions, that is, of clear-sighted reason, and yet does not quite meet the demands of reason, there can be many such truths or mysteries.

And so the mystery is likewise regarded as, strictly speaking, merely provisional. It is a matter, or so it would seem, of truths obscure and impenetrable for the moment but which will be clarified later on and so finally be adequate to the demands made by human reason for insight and perspicuousness. Both Pius IX and Vatican I state without qualification that these mysteries exist for us 'as long as in this mortal life we are on pilgrimage far from the Lord'. The nature of the mystery as well as its duration are limited to some extent by the visio beatifica. With these elementary indications we have not of course exhausted the theology of the schools on the notion of mystery. Much more could be said even on these problematical points, but this is enough for the moment to arouse our astonishment.

So far we have seen that in Vatican I and current theology the criterion of mystery is the ratio. Since this criterion is applied to mystery and its nature defined by it, mystery is understood as a statement and therefore as something that can obviously occur in the plural. In the light of this criterion it is also understandable that mystery is given a purely negative definition. It is a truth which cannot for the moment be raised to the level of perspicuous insight which is proper to the ratio. It is a truth obscure and veiled, accessible only to faith but not to reason. Theologians are of course prepared to admit that a mysterious truth of faith concerning an important reality is better and more significant than a perspicuous truth of reason concerning some unimportant earthly matter. But the (negative) act by which the more important truth is attained is less highly esteemed than the other.

But what happens when just doubts arise as to the adequacy of the [41] notion of ratio presupposed by the theology of the 19th century in its definition of mystery? What if we must

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

take ratio itself as basically a spiritual entity of absolute transcendence and therefore as the very faculty by which the presence of the mystery is assured? What if we must take the mystery not as the provisional but as the primordial and permanent, so much so that the absence or disregard of mystery, preoccupation with the seemingly known and perspicuous proves to be the provisional, which dissolves before the gradual revelation of the abiding mystery, as such, to the finite reason? What if there be an 'unknowing', centred on itself and the unknown, which when compared with knowledge, that is, with any knowledge not really aware of itself, is not a pure negation, not simply an empty absence, but a positive characteristic of a relationship between one subject and another? What if it be essential and constitutive of true knowledge, of its growth, self-awareness and lucidity, to include precisely the unknown, to know itself orientated from the start to the incomprehensible and inexpressible, to recognize more and more that only in this way can it truly be itself and not be halted at a regrettable limit? What becomes then of the standard notion of mystery? Can it be evolved primarily with reference to reason, the faculty of seeing the evidence of individual truths? Can it be regarded as a merely provisional deficiency in a truth? And can there be many mysteries?

It is in fact remarkable that in general the theology of the schools does not confront the notion of mystery with the doctrine of God's abiding incomprehensibility even in the visio beatifica, a doctrine obvious in itself and dogmatically assured. God remains incomprehensible, and the object of vision is precisely this incomprehensibility, which we may not therefore think of as a sort of regrettably permanent limitation of our blessed comprehension of God. It must rather be thought of as the very substance of our vision and the very object of our blissful love. In other words, if God is directly seen as the infinite and incomprehensible, and if the visio beatifica must then be the permanent presence of the inexpressible and nameless: then, since to possess the absolutely simple in its immediate presence makes it impossible to distinguish between what one comprehends of it and what one does not comprehend, vision must mean grasping and being grasped by the mystery, and the supreme act of knowledge is not the abolition or diminution of the mystery but its final assertion, its eternal and total immediacy. And the concept of mystery receives a new content, which does not contradict the standard notion but becomes for [42] the first time authentic and primordial. It is no longer the limitation of a knowledge which should by right be perspicuous. It is an intrinsic constituent of the very notion of knowledge, and the old, traditional criterion of mystery is basically reduced to a defective mode of a knowledge which is essentially orientated to the mystery as such.

We meet the same type of problem if we take the nature of spirit as our starting-point. Spirit is transcendence. Spirit grasps at the incomprehensible, in as much as it presses on beyond the actual object of comprehension to an anticipatory grasp of the absolute. The 'whither' of this anticipatory grasp – which in the act of grasping the individual and tangible attains the all-embracing incomprehensible – may be called obscure or lucid. Its reality, indescribable because non-objectivated, may be experienced as a divine darkness, or greeted as the light which illuminates all else, since the individual object of knowledge is only present and definable in relation to it. But in any case, this nameless region beyond all categories, on which the transcendence of the spirit lays hold without comprehending, is not an accessory or a preliminary sphere of darkness which is to be gradually lit up. It is the primordial and fundamental which is the ultimate transcendental condition of possibility of knowledge. It alone makes categorical clarity possible in the distinct knowledge of contours.

If then the reason which gives shape and contour to the object lives by the indefinable; if the lucidity of the spirit comes from its being open to the divine and truly super-luminous darkness – what are we to think of mystery? Can it be regarded as a defective type of another and better knowledge which is still to come? Is ratio, understood in the standard sense, just

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

incidentally and secondarily the faculty of mystery, precisely because of its almost too taut tension? Or is it, in spite of the obscurity cast by the standard terminology, the very faculty which is originally and basically the faculty of mystery, and only derivatively ratio in the ordinary sense of the word, as supposed by Vatican I and the theology of the schools?

We are met by the same challenge when we consider the nature of spirit as being one in the 'perichoresis' (circumincession) of knowledge and love. The positivism which places knowledge and love merely de facto beside one another in an unreconciled dualism must be excluded. For one thing – no one knows why – the same existent thing is both knowing and loving. Hence, in spite of a real multiplicity of faculties and acts, this one [43] being must have a primordial and total relationship to itself and absolute being: a basic act, whose components are the interrelated and interdependent acts of knowing and willing, of insight and love, as we call them empirically. But this must ultimately mean that while guarding the distinction between knowing and willing, we must understand the act of knowing in such a way that it will explain why knowledge can only exist in a being when and in so far as that one being realizes itself by an act of love. In other words, the self-transcendence of knowledge, the fact that it comes to be only in so far as it passes over into something else, must be understood in this way: knowledge, though prior to love and freedom, can only be realized in its true sense when and in so far as the subject is more than knowledge, when in fact it is a freely given love. This is only possible if knowledge is ultimately a faculty ordained to an object attainable only because the object is greater than the faculty. And what but the incomprehensibility of mystery can be such an object of knowledge, since it forces knowledge to surpass itself and both preserve and transform itself in a more comprehensive act, that of love?

It is the mystery that forces knowledge either to be more than itself or to despair. For as distinct from love it is the faculty which grasps the object to submit it to its a priori laws, the faculty of weighing and judging, of seizing and comprehending. But in so far as the reason is more than reason, when it is understood as a potentiality only to be actuated in love, then it must indeed be the faculty which welcomes the greater sight unseen, the faculty of simple rapture, of submissive dedication, of loving ecstasy. But this it can only be if its most proper object is that sovereign and all-embracing exigence which cannot be mastered, comprehended or challenged: in a word, the mystery. And mystery is not merely a way of saying that reason has not yet completed its victory. It is the goal where reason arrives when it attains its perfection by becoming love.

This consideration is not an attack upon a well thought out Thomistic intellectualism which is also Christian. For such intellectualism cannot deny that man as spirit is ultimately one, and that its plurality is therefore only intelligible by reason of a prior unity: non enim plura secundum se uniuntur – the multiple is not one by virtue of that by which it is multiple. So there must be one last key-word which conjures up the essence of man, not two or three. And this Thomist intellectualism cannot deny that in Christianity the last word is with love and not knowledge. For we are not saved by knowledge but by love, and this can only mean that the [44] act of loving can be the entrance-fee to a life whose essential perfection is centred on something else than that by which it was attained. If one really wishes to be true to Thomist intellectualism, one must understand the intellect in such a way that love is the perfection of knowledge itself. If so, the object, even initially, must contain something which constrains knowledge to become love, under pain of betraying its own nature. Merely to say that love is aroused when the intellect discloses the goodness and appetibility of the object, would be to fail to establish a true perichoresis and to leave the two faculties without any fundamental unity. For, to use the language of St Thomas, either the truth would then be the good of the intellect, or the intellect's function would merely be to propose an object to be loved by the will, the intellect as such being unable to function further on the object. But then of course

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the question would arise as to how the intellect could even know the good as such, if it cannot as such be comprised by the formal object of the intellect. The mystery, being essential to the 'object' to which the intellect is primarily ordained, forces it either to consume itself in protest or to transform itself in the self-surrender by which it accepts the mystery as such, that is, in love, and so to attain its proper perfection. Thus the nature of spirit also shows that mystery is not just a provisional limit of thought, as it usually appears in the theology of the schools.

These are merely the most general and formal aspects under which the problems posed by the standard concept of mystery may be envisaged. Much more could be said on particular points, but we restrict ourselves to the following brief remarks. There is nothing in the concept of mystery as usually put forward in theology which assigns it essentially to the religious sphere, which seems however to be its proper place. Mystery is usually defined as a truth which one could only hear from God, that is, from another, and as a truth in which the inner compatibility of the terms is not perspicuous either before or after revelation. But it makes no difference to the truth of a statement and my acceptance of it, whether the truth is presented to me by an encounter with the thing itself or by a communication from another. To learn certain truths, it may be necessary that they be communicated to me by another; and it may be impossible to deduce the truth of an affirmation by inspection of its contents. But this does not really prove that the truths in question are of such a nature that they are entitled to the name of mystery. We do not hold that two terms are certainly and finally non-contradictory simply because we do [45] not see any trace of an eventual contradiction, that is, we do not hold the rationalistic view that a mere lack of contradiction in concepts is proof of a real ontological compossibility. There are therefore many items of purely positive knowledge where the de facto compossibility of the terms is known directly or indirectly, but without any really clear insight into the ontological compossibility and without any note of mystery being attached to them. Neither lack of insight into the compatibility of the terms nor the circumstance that they must be communicated by another makes a truth a mystery, nor does a combination of these factors.

This can hardly be gainsaid. For otherwise, to take an example, the statement that there was a river XY in Australia would be a mystery, because not being an Australian, I can only know about it if I am told. Or again, the statement 'It is possible to have a mountain of gold as big as the Matterhorn' would be a mystery, because I might well deny that the ontological possibility of this affirmation is really known and evident. Or at least the statement, 'In Australia there is a mountain of gold as big as the Matterhorn' would be a mystery for me. But this does not really make sense. Such concepts miss the actual phenomenon of 'mystery'.

And the distinction between natural and supernatural mysteries does not take us any further. For the so-called natural mysteries, when regarded clearly, are either not real mysteries at all, or they raise again the question of what makes them mysterious. Is the note of mystery sufficiently justified by the fact that they need to be communicated by another or that the compossibility of their terms is not apparent or by both together? But in any case there are many assertions which on close inspection fulfil exactly the conditions laid down by the standard definition of mystery and which still do not necessarily have that character of the numinous which is ascribed to the mysteries of faith in the strict sense. We are not therefore bound to say that the ordinary definition of mystery is positively wrong. But we can say that it does not work out clearly the difference between such statements as are normally termed 'natural mysteries' and the 'mysteries strictly so-called', which must obviously be kept well apart from 'natural mysteries'. The difference cannot originally be constituted by the simple fact that they derive from different sources. The nature of the truth and our relationship to it need some other foundation than the fact that the real mysteries must either be revealed by God or remain entirely unknown. We should at least be told why some truths can be known

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only by revelation and why this confers on the truths [46] themselves a character which does not belong to the 'natural mysteries', explaining why the mysteria stricte dicta are not constituted as such by the mere lack of positive insight into the compossibility of the terms. For, as we have said, the same impossibility of insight exists also in a whole field of statements which derive either from experience or from a communication which is not a divine revelation.

And the case is not really advanced if we say that the mysteria stricte dicta surpass even the angelic reason. Even if we prescind from the fact that we should be told expressly and clearly why this is true even of the loftiest created intellect imaginable – and so given a definition of mystery based on the special nature of the truth itself and not on its de facto relationship to various sorts of intelligences – my own relationship to a truth said to be a mystery is in no way altered by the fact that it remains a mystery even for another and perhaps higher intelligence. We have not explained why and in what sense something is a mystery to me, simply by saying that it is also incomprehensible to others.

Further, the ordinary concept of mystery, starting as it does always with mystery as a statement, gives no idea of why the communication of the mystery must always be a grace. But obviously there must be some relationship between the mystery and its communication to a subject elevated by divine grace, who responds to the mystery under the inspiration of grace. One relationship, as Vatican I says, is that the revelation of mysteries in the form of truths is necessary if man is called ontologically to a supernatural goal: grace demands the communication of mysteries. But we must go on to affirm that the relationship also exists the other way round. The communication of mystery can only take place in grace; mystery demands, as the condition of possibility of its being heard, a hearer divinized by grace. But this relationship is obscured in the ordinary definition, which does not make it clear why a truth in which the actual objective connexion of the terms and the compatibility of the concepts involved can be known only from revelation, while remaining otherwise inaccessible to man, can and may be imparted only in grace. To say that this holds good only for the divine mysteries, and not for other such statements would be to admit implicitly that by demarcating the mysteria stricte dicta from so-called perspicuous truths nothing has been said about the real nature of the mysteries.

The problems raised by the ordinary concept of mystery, which starts with the proposition and so with propositions in the plural, can be seen [47] still more clearly when we reflect on the silent pre-supposition that there can be many propositions in the nature of mysteria stricte dicta. From the ordinary standpoint there seems to be no possible doubt about it: if there can be any mystery at all – which may be granted for the moment – why could there not be many such? Why can there not be many propositions whose correctness can be known only by revelation and which remain obscure even after revelation?

However: a multiplicity of mysteries presupposes that each proposition has its own distinct content. They cannot all affirm the same thing, if they are really to constitute a number of propositions, each existing in its own right and different from the others. But if they are to have a really different content by which they are distinguished from one another as mysteries, then their sphere of reference can only exist where such primordially distinct contents, that is, distinct realities, occur: in the non-divine sphere. Even if we admit that man cannot express the absolutely simple reality of God except in plural terms, the basis of the mysteriousness of such a plurality of affirmations about God would still remain the same. It would still be the essentially mysterious Godhead of God. And the question would still be, whether the one and the same godhead of these many mysteries could really be the objective basis for so primordial a plurality and differentiation as is pre-supposed in the ordinary concept of mystery: a concept which more or less silently assumes that God could reveal as many mysterious propositions as he liked.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let us suppose on the other hand that the multiplicity of mysteries was based on the multiplicity of really distinct and therefore created realities. The question then arises whether there can ever be a reality among created beings which by virtue of its natural constitution strictly as such can supply a proposition which is really a mystery. This question must be answered with a decided negative in any truly Thomistic metaphysic of being and spirit. By its very nature, any created reality must be such that some ontologically comparable intellect could be ordained to it: and for such an intellect, it would not be an absolute mystery. In other words, if being and consciousness, as Thomistic epistemology holds, grow in the same measure, there can be absolutely no created reality which would not be all the more conscious, all the more intelligible to itself all the less a mystery to itself, the higher the level of its being. Mystery can therefore only exist where it is a matter of the relationship of God, strictly as such, to the created intellect. The multiplicity of divine mysteries, such as is [48] silently presupposed, cannot therefore rely on the multiplicity of created realities. But then the real question is whether a plurality of mysteries is possible in the naive form of the concept as taken for granted in the conventional treatment of mystery. Must not a multiplicity of mysteries, if it is to be shown to be possible with its essential limitation, be derived from the notion of the one single absolute mystery, which is the one God as related to created knowledge?

II. SECOND LECTURE

Our first lecture has not taken us very far. All we have achieved is the conviction that the question of mystery is more obscure than is suggested in the ordinary treatises of fundamental and dogmatic theology. And some relevant questions have been posed. In the present lecture we shall call on the philosophy of religion and then cast further afield into theology, our primary aim being to work out a notion of mystery which may indeed raise new problems for the theology of mystery but at the same time offer a starting-point from which its own questions may be answered. Our aim will be to clarify the notion of mystery in its essence, and in its capacity of including the mysteries. The second lecture therefore simply inquires into mystery.

The first stage of our undertaking will be concerned not with the mystery in itself, understood either as a thing or a proposition, but with the subject who is confronted with the mystery. This we are justified in doing because mystery is always understood as something relative, something which is mysterious to a given finite intellect: the silent presupposition being that God cannot be ‘mysterious’ to himself since he is noesis noeseos, thought of thought, the absolutely clear self-awareness of the absolutely ‘illuminated’ being. We could indeed ask whether it is totally acceptable and correct to understand God’s knowledge simply as the absolute perspicuousness of absolute being. We could ask whether this does not set up, quite unintentionally of course, a fiat and comprehensive knowledge as the divine ideal, a knowledge which is really almost a grasping at the void, because it would take place without any anticipatory grasp of an incomprehensible infinity. We could ask, in other words, whether ‘mystery’ as such, which suggests of course primarily some created condition, may not also imply something positive which does not appertain to the perspicuous intellect but to the mystery in contradistinction [49] to such an intellect, and so as such must belong eminenter to God. We might therefore ask whether the character of mystery does not appertain to God’s knowledge, essentially, in a pre-eminent and analogous sense, and how we are to conceive of this character. However, we leave this question aside, and simply suppose, as we have said above, that a mystery always regards a finite subject, from which we deduce that it is right and possible to begin the explanation of mystery with the subject to whom

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

some reality or the truth expressive of it is a mystery. We inquire therefore into man, as the being who is orientated to the mystery as such, this orientation being a constitutive element of his being both in his natural state and in his supernatural elevation. This is probably the only way to show that the mystery is of itself no merely provisional element of obscurity in a reality or proposition, to be dissipated in time, but always and essentially determinative of the necessary relationship intervening between the created spirit and God. Man, made for mystery, must be such that this mystery constitutes the relationship between God and man, and 'hence the fulfilment of human nature is the consummation of its orientation towards the abiding mystery.

To reach an understanding of these statements, which already point to the conclusion, we begin – proceeding for brevity's sake on a number of assumptions – with the finite spirit's transcendence, which is directed to absolute being. We may fittingly suppose that man in his knowing and willing is a being of absolute and unlimited transcendence. All his spiritual acts, no matter what their object, are founded on this transcendence, which is a reaching forward of knowledge and will. We have only to ask now what this means for our present question. Obviously, this transcendence can only be described by an assertion – also obliged to express itself in objectivating categories – about the 'Whither' of this anticipatory grasp which exceeds all determinate objectivations. And again, this 'Whither' of transcendence can only be spoken of in terms of experience of transcendence as the limitless openness of the subject itself. Act and its finality, in this basic transcendent act, can only be and be understood as a unity. It is also obvious that the activation of this transcendence as such is always something other than its objectivated description, which is always a matter of subsequent reflexion and never really comes abreast of it. Finally, it is also obvious that the most primordial, underivative knowledge of God, which is the basis of all other knowledge of God, is given in the experience of transcendence, in so far as it contains, implicitly [50] and unobjectivated, but irrecusably and inevitably, the 'Whither' of transcendence, which we call God.

With this very primitive outline of our presuppositions we now ask how precisely this transcendent experience is accorded its 'Whither', meaning always the totality of such experience, in love as well as knowledge. We speak of a 'Whither' of transcendence not to be as devious and circumstantial as possible but for two reasons. One: if we simply said 'God' we should always have to fear a misunderstanding, namely that we meant God as he is spoken of in an objectivating set of concepts, whereas the whole point here is that 'God' is known through and in this transcendence previous to such concepts, even where the object of knowledge is something finite. In other words, since we mean God as he is implicitly known in everything (in quolibet, as St Thomas says), and not as he is explicitly known and subsequently described, we cannot simply say God. Two: if we called the 'Whither' of transcendence 'object', we should conjure up the misunderstanding that it was an object such as is present elsewhere in the act of knowledge, and that we were dealing with the Whither of transcendence as if it were expressly objectivated by secondary reflexion upon this immediate transcendence. But we are speaking of the Whither of the original act of transcendence itself. We may now take up the central point of our discussion.

The Whither of transcendental experience is always there as the nameless, the indefinable, the unattainable. For a name distinguishes and demarcates, pins down something by giving it a name chosen among many other names. But the infinite horizon, the Whither of transcendence cannot be so defined. We may reflect upon it, objectivate it, conceive of it so to speak as one object among others, delimit it conceptually: but this set of concepts is only true, and a correct and intelligible expression of the content, when this expression and description is once more conditioned by a transcendent act directed to the Whither of this transcendence. One can only speak correctly of God when he is conceived of as the infinite. But he can only be grasped as such when we return to the transcendent illimitation of every

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

act, since merely to remove the limits of the finite as such is not enough to bring about an understanding of what the absolutely and positively infinite means. All conceptual expressions about God, necessary though they are, always stem from the unobjectivated experience of transcendence as such: the concept from the pre-conception, the name from the experience of the nameless. The pre-conception given [51] in transcendence is directed to the nameless: the condition which makes the names of God possible must itself be essentially unnamed. We could call him (if we wished to give such a title to what is meant) the nameless, that which is other than all finite things, the infinite: but we should not have thereby given him a name, merely said that he has none. We have understood the designation 'nameless' only when we have recognized it as radically and primordially different in its uniqueness from all other designations. Thus the pre-conception is also directed towards the indefinable. The horizon of the transcendent, since it is of immeasurable extent and thus provides the situation for the individual objects of knowledge and love, does indeed always differentiate itself essentially from all that comes within it as conceptual object. And so the distinction between God and all finite beings is not only clearly called for: it is even the condition of possibility for any distinction at all, both between objects in general and the horizon of transcendence, and between object and object. Human knowledge, as it forms its concepts and so makes distinctions, always presupposes, unwittingly or not, the primordial distinction between the absolute Whither of transcendence, absolute being, and all beings – otherwise there could be no distinction between beings. But it is precisely here that absolute being appears as the indefinable. For since it is the condition of possibility for all categorized distinctions and divisions, it cannot itself be distinguished from other things by the same modes of distinction. The horizon cannot be comprised within the horizon, the whither of transcendence cannot really, as such, be brought within the range of transcendence itself to be distinguished from other things. The ultimate measure cannot be measured; the boundary which delimits all things cannot itself be bounded by a still more distant limit. The infinite and immense which comprises and can comprise all things, because it exists only as infinite distance behind which there is nothing, and in relation to which it is indeed meaningless to talk of 'nothingness': such an all-embracing immensity cannot itself be encompassed. So this nameless and indefinable being, distinguishing itself only by itself from all else, and thus holding all else at a distance, the norm of all complying with no norm distinct from itself, this Whither of transcendence is seen as absolutely beyond determination. It is only there in so far as it determines all, and is not only physically but logically beyond any determination on the part of the finite subject. For at the very moment that the subject uses its formal logic and ontology to specify this nameless, indefinable, all-defining Whither [52] of transcendence, to try to catch it as it were in the net of concepts, this never quite successful capture takes place once more by means of the pre-conception of what is to be determined. The measure is therefore measured by the self-same measure that is to be measured. The measure is there, it offers itself to be used, it is there as the obvious and unquestionable measure. We can hardly avoid the impression of being able to judge this measure like any other object. We feel we can use the general norms of logic and ontology which we have at our disposal to determine the special individual object of a specific science (called of course theology) – the object being 'God'. But this is false. Ontology is not a science distinct from natural theology. Ontology with its corresponding logic is not a science in which an object is defined by a priori norms, axioms, co-ordinates and so on, as if its only proper scope were to provide this object with a place within its systematic a priori where it shows itself as it is in itself. On the contrary, ontology is that mysterious event in which the primary measures or principles show themselves as immeasurable, and in which man knows himself to be measured. The Whither of transcendence is at no one's disposal, it is that which disposes of us silently and ceaselessly at the very moment when we begin to dispose of anything, when we make a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

judgment on something and try to submit it to the a priori laws of our understanding. So the Whither of transcendence is there in its own proper way of aloofness and absence. It bestows itself upon us by refusing itself, by keeping silence, by staying afar. To make this clearer, we must of course reflect upon the fact that in our normal experience we possess the Whither of our pre-conception only in the form of the condition of possibility of the grasp of the finite: in our normal experience at any rate we are never granted a direct view of it. It is itself present only as the Whither of the transcendence itself, which is enough to eliminate all forms of Ontologism. The Whither is not experienced in itself, but only in the subjective transcendence and it is known only unobjectivatedly. And its presence in transcendence is the presence of a transcendence which is there merely as a condition of possibility for a categorized knowledge and not of itself and by itself alone. Thus the Whither of transcendence is only there in the form of a distant aloofness. It can never be approached directly or experienced immediately. It is there only by referring us to something else, something finite, which is the object of direct regard.

The Whither of transcendence can further be designated as the holy, [53] when the transcendence is regarded as that of freedom and love. For the Whither of an absolute transcendence of freedom, the nameless being which is at the disposal of none and disposes of all, which rules over transcendence by being loving freedom, is uniquely and precisely that which we can call ‘holy’ in the strict and original sense. For how should one name the nameless, sovereign beloved, which relegates us to our finitude, except as ‘holy’, and what could we call holy if not this? Or to what does the name ‘holy’ belong more primordially than to the infinite Whither of receptive love which before this incomprehensible and inexpressible being becomes trembling adoration? In transcendence therefore is found, in the form of the aloof and distant which rules unruled, the nameless being which is infinitely holy. This we call mystery, or rather, the holy mystery, to recall more expressly that freedom is transcendent with regard to knowledge. Every experience of transcendence is primary, non-derivative: and this same quality of the non-derivative, the non-deducible, holds good for all that is met with in it. For the transcendence and its content has nothing prior to itself: it is there in all other experiences as the condition of their possibility. The determination of its Whither imports no concepts from elsewhere from outside, to the object, but derives from the original object itself. With this experience of transcendence and its Whither one must either reject a given determination as completely unfitting and a misinterpretation of this experience: or one must concede that it is the original site and source for the intelligibility of this determination. There can be no doubt that the designation ‘mystery’ is called for here, and if so, this is the key to the primordial understanding of the word. We must experience here what mystery is, or we shall never understand it in its true and perfect sense.

If we have thus arrived at the primordial concept of mystery, it cannot of course have brought us to a definition of the nature of mystery. The mystery is as undefinable as every other transcendental concept, which only really display themselves in the original transcendental experience. But it is no doubt clear that in the experience of this transcendence, its Whither, absolute being, shows itself in such a way that it is the mystery pure and simple, because of its namelessness, sovereignty, illimitation, its unchallengeable mastery and direction of all knowledge and freedom. In other words, we have here the primordial experience of what we call mystery. Man is therefore, because his real being, as spirit, is transcendence, the being of the holy mystery. Man is he who is always confronted with [54] the holy mystery, even where he is dealing with what is within hand’s reach, comprehensible and amenable to a conceptual framework. So the holy mystery is not something upon which man may ‘also’ stumble, if he is lucky and takes an interest in something else besides the definable objects within the horizon of his consciousness. Man always lives by the holy mystery, even where he is not conscious of it. The lucidity of his

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consciousness derives from the incomprehensibility of this mystery. The proximity of his environment is constituted by the distant aloofness of the mystery: the freedom of his mastery of things comes from his being mastered by the Holy which is itself unmastered.

If man himself is therefore to be understood as the being of the holy mystery, it also follows that God is present to man as the holy mystery. The attribute of holy mystery does not belong accidentally to God like a qualification which could just as well be applied to any other reality. We only grasp what is meant by God when the attribute of holy mystery is seen to belong to God solely and primarily, according to which he is there as the Whither of transcendence. He would not be God if he ceased to be this holy mystery.

The nature of the mystery is therefore somehow involved in the question of the subject to whom the mystery is given. But before we inquire further into the mystery, we shall take man once more as the subject of our considerations, this time considering him as the spiritual subject deriving from the mystery, but in so far as this subject is seen as elevated by grace. Since our time is so short, we shall endeavour to make our point as briefly as possible, and simply take for granted here certain theological truths, which could of themselves be derived from a more basic and transcendental procedure.

Man, elevated by grace, is the spiritual being which is ontologically directed to the beatific vision. Grace, being strictly supernatural, is ultimately the beatific vision or its ontological presupposition. If then grace orientates its spiritual subject towards an immediate grasp of God, where knowledge of God no longer comes through objects and categories derived from created things, this essential quality of grace cannot mean that this immediacy eliminates the transcendental necessity whereby God is essentially the holy mystery. We already pointed out in our first lecture that God remains incomprehensible in the beatific vision, and that this incomprehensibility, because of the absolute simplicity of God and the relationship between knowledge and love in the creature, cannot be just [55] a marginal negative phenomenon of the intuitive knowledge of God. The knowledge of the incomprehensibility of God must rather be one of the positive attributes of such intuitive knowledge. The beatific vision is not contrasted with pilgrim knowledge of God in the way that knowledge of the revealed and hence perspicuous is contrasted with that of the concealed and hence only vaguely suspected. The contrast is between immediate sight of the mystery itself and the merely indirect presence of the mystery after the manner of the distant and aloof. Grace does not imply the promise and the beginning of the elimination of the mystery, but the radical possibility of the absolute proximity of the mystery, which is not eliminated by its proximity, but really presented as mystery. Pilgrim man, still a stranger to the vision of God, can be deceived about the character of absolute mystery in God, because he knows the holy mystery only as the distant and aloof. When he sees God, God’s incomprehensibility is the content of his vision and so the bliss of his love. It would be a foolish and anthropomorphic misunderstanding to think that the proper object of vision and bliss was something perspicuous, comprehensible and perfectly well understood, merely surrounded as it were by an obscure margin and a limit set by the finitude of the creature who must resign himself to this. What is comprehended and what is incomprehensible are in reality one and the same thing. The incomprehensible has of course its positive side. It has a blessed content which can be known even though it cannot really be expressed. Otherwise the incomprehensibility of God would be only a blank unintelligibility, the mere absence of a reality. But the knowledge in question would not bear on God if he were not grasped precisely as the incomprehensible. Knowledge as clarity, sight and perception, and knowledge as possession of the incomprehensible mystery must be taken as the two facets of the same process: both grow in like and not in inverse proportion. Grace and the beatific vision can only be understood as the possibility and the reality respectively of the immediate presence of the holy mystery as such.

When we described the nature of the holy mystery, as present to our transcendence, we

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

said that this presence of the mystery has the nature of the distant and aloof. The holy mystery is accessible only in our experience of subjective transcendence, and only in so far as this transcendence acts as the condition of possibility of an objectivated knowledge according to categories. If these two elements of the distant aloofness of the holy mystery are eliminated: if therefore the Whither of our transcendence is [56] no longer known merely as an overtone as it were of our subjective transcendence but experienced in itself, and if the experience no longer takes place as the condition of possibility of knowledge of categorized objects; and if such experience is possible – which we do not prove a priori but presuppose as guaranteed by revelation: then the holy mystery no longer manifests itself as a distant aloofness. But that does not mean that it no longer is a mystery. On the contrary, the mystery is there and most truly itself, radically nameless, indefinable and inviolable. Grace is therefore the grace of the nearness of the abiding mystery: it makes God accessible in the form of the holy mystery and presents him thus as the incomprehensible. In the vision of God face to face which grace makes possible many mysteries are indeed removed. But this only means that what they express is manifested in its own being and substance, is experienced therefore in itself and must no longer rely for its manifestation on the word that does duty for it and the authority of the recognized spokesman and prophet. Nonetheless, these mysteries remain mysterious and incomprehensible. They do not lose their mystery and become perspicuous. They can still not be resolved into something distinct from their content from which the content could be deduced and so made ‘intelligible’. The Trinity for instance is not ‘clearly understood’ in the vision – it is contemplated as the divine incomprehensibility; otherwise it would not be identical with God who is identical with his incomprehensibility. If the incomprehensibility of God is the definitive blessing, the alpha and omega of reality, behind which there is nothing, and before which there can be nothing – precisely for him who has before him this incomprehensible God – then grace is also the grace of no longer being able to be deceived about the incomprehensibility of God, of no longer being misled into thinking it only provisional. It is the grace of loving the divine darkness without reserves, the divinely-given courage to enter this bliss which is authentic and unique, and to enjoy it as the nourishment of the strong. As long as we measure the loftiness of knowledge by its perspicuity, and think that we know what clarity and insight are, though we do not really know them as they truly are; as long as we imagine that analytical, co-ordinating, deductive and masterful reason is more and not less than experience of the divine incomprehensibility; as long as we think that comprehension is greater than being overwhelmed by light inaccessible, which shows itself as inaccessible in the very moment of giving itself: we have understood nothing of the mystery and of the true nature of grace and glory.

[57] In the course of these considerations, which began with the recipient of the mysteries in his natural and supernaturally elevated transcendence, we have had to mention most of what can be said of the mystery in itself, as far as it can be dealt with in this our second lecture. We need not come back to them again. We shall only make a few complementary remarks about the subject of the mystery in itself. If what has been said hitherto has been rightly understood, and if the following statement is taken up correctly, then we can and must say that the mystery is, in its incomprehensibility, the obvious thing. If the Whither of transcendence is that which by disclosing itself gives transcendence its reality; if transcendence is the condition of possibility of all spiritual understanding and insight; and if the Whither of transcendence is the holy mystery: then the holy mystery is the one thing that is self-explanatory, the one thing that is its own self-sufficient reason, even in our eyes. For all insight is based on this transcendence, all light on this orientation towards the inexpressible darkness – if this is how one wishes to term the bright incomprehensibility of God. Looked at more closely therefore, the mysteriousness of this Whither is not just the contrary of the self-evident. An object of knowledge can only be self-evident to us if it stands on its own. But whatever is 'conceived of' only becomes understandable – though not really self-evident – when it is reduced to something else, resolved on the one hand into the laws of thought and on the other, into the elementary data of the senses. But in this process it is thrown back for its explanation and intelligibility either on the mute opacity of the purely sensible, or on the chiaroscuro of ontology – and so on the mystery. The understanding arrived at is therefore based on the unique self-evidence of the mystery. Hence it has always been familiar to us, and we have always loved it. Nothing is more familiar and obvious to the alerted spirit than the silent question which hovers over all that it has attained and mastered – the challenging question, humbly and lovingly accepted, which alone makes it wise. In his heart of hearts, there is nothing man knows better than that his knowledge, ordinarily so-called, is only a tiny island in the immense ocean of the unexplored. He knows better than anything else that the existential question facing him in knowledge is whether he loves the little island of his so-called knowledge better than the ocean of the infinite mystery; whether or not he will concede that the mystery alone is self-evident; whether he thinks that the little light with which he illuminates this little island – we call it science – should be the eternal light which [58] shines on him for ever (which would be hell). And here we must say at once, since the opportunity may not occur again later, that if the mysteries of Christianity (in the plural) are to be really mysteries, or better, are to be correctly grasped as mysteries, their explanation must carry with it the self-evidence of the mystery, for which men today have undoubtedly an inward understanding. They have been badly explained if they only give the impression of far-fetched concepts and hair-splitting. The mystery is self-evident. That it is unattainable has already been said. Existentially, and for a theory of knowledge, it is at once a menace to man and his blessed peace. It can make him chafe and protest, because it compels him to leave the tiny house of his ostensibly clear self-possession, to advance into the trackless spaces, even in the night. It seems to ask too much of him, to overburden him with monstrous claims. It forces upon him the dilemma of either throwing himself into the uncharted, unending adventure where he commits himself to the infinite, or – despairing at the thought and so embittered – of taking shelter in the suffocating den of his own finite perspicacity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But the mystery is the sole peace of him who trusts himself to it, loves it humbly, and surrenders himself to it fearlessly in knowledge and love. The mystery is eternal light and eternal peace. The Greek Fathers did not under-estimate the glory and the light of the beatific vision, and they did not really adhere to Platonism (an intellectualism which could only think of the incomprehensible as something provisional) when they praised the abiding mystery as blessedness. According to the Areopagite, when we reach the highest stage of life and knowledge, we enter into the darkness in which God is; according to Maximus the Confessor, not to know is the supra-rational knowledge; according to St Gregory of Nyssa, to enter the holy of holies is to be encompassed by the divine darkness. This way of understanding man and his happiness is on the contrary truly Christian, since it reconciles radical creaturehood with absolute immediacy to God, making God's incomprehensibility the blessedness of man and not the limit of his happiness, and seeing man as made for the one abiding mystery. So too we read in St Thomas (de Pot., q. 7, a. 5): ex quo intellectus noster divinam substantiam non adaequat, hoc ipsum quod est Dei substantia remanet nostrum intellectum excedens et ita a nobis ignoratur et propter hoc illud est ultimum cognitionis humanae de Deo, quod sciat se Deum nescire, in quantum cognoscit illud quod Deus est omne ipsum quod de eo intelligimus excedere. ('Since our mind is not proportionate to the divine [59] substance, that which is the substance of God remains beyond our intellect and so is unknown to us. Hence the supreme knowledge which man has of God is to know that he does not know God, in so far as he knows that what God is surpasses all that we can understand of him.') Since the reason for saying that the climax of our knowledge of God is knowledge of our ignorance

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

also holds good for the beatific vision, there is no reason for not applying this principle to the knowledge Of God in the beatific vision. If St Thomas is not misread as though he said that with regard to God, the object of knowledge is different from the object of lack of knowledge – making as it were two distinct objects – the quotation speaks profoundly – and dialectically. It affirms that even in the beatific vision that which is known of God is known as the incomprehensible. The ultimate of human knowledge of God is attained only when its character of mysteriousness is most forcibly displayed: supreme knowledge is knowledge of the supreme mystery as such.

But a new type of problem now arises from the nature of the mystery as so delineated. Mystery is already there with the very essence of the natural and supernaturally elevated being of man. The primordial mystery is already there. This one mystery dominates the first effort of the spirit as well as its final fulfilment. It seems then that the Christian mysteries (in the plural) cannot be essentially new and higher mysteries, compared to the primordial mystery, but at most, secondary derivatives of it. Their very multiplicity seems to imply that they must be mysteries in the form of determinate assertions which are clearly distinct from one another. If so, if they have the character of mystery at all, it seems as though they possess it at best only in a secondary and derivative way. For the mystery which is the vehicle of all distinct and articulate truths must possess the character of mystery in a more primordial sense than the truths of which it is the vehicle and which are only intelligible within its horizon. Single truths, even if they contain mysteries, enter as such, and as differentiated from one another, into a system of co-ordinates which alone makes possible such a localization and differentiation. But the system of co-ordinates itself is, as we have shown, only a norm because it is based on the one original and immeasurable mystery, from which it seems to follow that no individual mystery can represent a heightening of our relationship to the original, comprehensive and immeasurable mystery. Thus the basic difficulty of such concepts comes to light. It is brought up by Goethe and modernism and every mystical ‘night of the soul’ religion, against a [60] doctrinal and institutional religion with truths and special rites: that a silent reverence for the nameless seems to have left behind any relationship in terms of individual truths, even if these truths contain mysteries. Individual mysteries no longer appear mysterious in the original sense of the word, because they do not seem to leave the mystery to subsist as it is, but claim to know something definite about it which will satisfy curiosity. In any case, the self-transcendence of the many mysteries by which they merge in the mystery, remains so unclear, and is so little stressed in the theology of the schools, that one is inclined to think that where they are eliminated, they disappear in comprehension, and not in adoration of the abiding mystery. And hence it comes about, be it said incidentally, that contrary to the biblical data in St Paul, faith is never considered as something that abides (in its inmost kernel), but only as something transitory: ‘donec peregrinamur a Domino’. How then do the mysteries of Christianity, in the plural, stand to the mystery of which we have spoken up to this? This is the question which remains for the third lecture.

III. THIRD LECTURE

The second lecture yielded us a concept of mystery which, as we should like to believe, is more primordial than the concept usually used in the ordinary dogmatic and fundamental theology. Not in the sense that it contradicts it. But the mystery envisaged by both sets of definitions has a more original and fundamental relationship to man as a whole, in the unity of his faculties that is, to knowledge and the freedom of love, than the standard concept presents. Our notion further says that God himself is holy mystery, so essentially and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perpetually, that this mysterious Whither of transcendence, mastering, unmastered and holding sovereign sway, can be given the name of God – as indeed the name of God is the nameless infinity. We may have given the impression that so far all that has been achieved is a merely natural concept of mystery derived from a philosophy of religion. It could be objected that as a purely philosophical concept it was not at all apt to describe the true nature of mystery in the strict theological sense. And on the other hand, the question already came up in the second lecture as to whether in this concept of mystery – which may be called 'absolute' in the most radical sense, because whether far or near it can never be eliminated – the theological notion of a multiplicity of mysteries was not already excluded. The question was whether there [61] could be mysteries in the plural at all in face of the one unresolvable mystery, and whether, if there could be many mysteries, these could have real relevance for the fundamental act of religion, the adoring acceptance of the sway of the mystery in dedicated love.

However, the last lecture has already provided us with some means of transposing our philosophical concept of mystery into the region of the theological. For we considered the recipient of the mystery in so far as he was ordained by grace to the beatific vision. With regard to this subject, and hence theologically, we have shown that as such, in so far as it is ordained to the beatific vision, it is the subject made for the absolute proximity of the mystery and so is the being made for mystery, because grace and vision do not remove the absolute mystery. On the contrary, it is in the immediate present vision of God that the incomprehensible mystery of God is most forcibly evident. God is no longer simply and solely the God of the aloof and distant mystery. But as the God of the absolute proximity of self-communication he is indeed the God whose name is the holy mystery. It cannot therefore be said that our concept, taken initially from the philosophy of religion, bars the way to transposing the notion of mystery into theology. The philosophy of religion, conceiving of God as essentially and perpetually the holy mystery, can of course offer no grounds for a philosophical proof of the possibility of the beatific vision and hence of grace and the supernatural order in general. Need the holy mystery remain always the unattainable Whither of transcendence, given only in the experience of finite categories, that is, always mediated by the finite? Or can it communicate itself, as such, immediately to the creature, while still of course remaining essentially a mystery? These are questions which the creature can never answer and which the philosophical concept of mystery cannot solve. The answer can be given only by revelation, and this revelation cannot be confined to words, but must be also the giving of grace, as an inner, objectless though conscious dynamism directed to the beatific vision. This could lead us to a further consideration, if we took up the point conceded in the discussion that there exists another mystery besides the one already spoken of: the possibility of an absolute self-communication of the mystery, by which it enters into a radical proximity. Starting from the mystery of the absolute self-communication of the holy mystery, one could then try to reach directly the mysteries which the Christian faith as such believes in. And in fact this way is undoubtedly practicable. One could try to show, in spite of all [62] the deadly dangers seemingly involved, that all other mysteries are already implicitly given, if it can once be supposed that the possibility of the absolute proximity of the holy mystery in a direct way had been revealed. And even if this effort could only be effective by presupposing the truth of the mysteries so explicitated; if therefore it offered and could offer no Christian theology based uniquely on the one revealed truth of the possibility of the beatific vision – still such an effort would have its point. For it is a priori quite conceivable that essential connexions can be recognized as strictly necessary, even if we do not succeed in deducing one element from another. And even if it were impossible to deduce the other mysteries from the radically immediate proximity of the holy mystery, a process which we shall not investigate here, still, the delineation of the connexions in question would be of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fundamental significance.

But in keeping with the type of problem to which the second lecture led up, we take here a rather different starting-point for the considerations which follow. Let us remind ourselves once more of the problems in which we became involved in the second lecture. We have already pointed out that creation strictly as such can contain no absolute mysteries. It is true that all beings, and above all the created spirit in its transcendence towards absolute being, partake of the mysterious character of God, in so far as all beings are referred to God, and cannot be adequately understood without this relationship and hence without the term of this relationship. Thus J. Pieper is perfectly correct when he sums up the doctrine of St Thomas on this point by saying that all beings are inscrutable and unfathomable, because they are creatures. Since they are the result of the creative knowledge of God their reality and objective truth has such infinite ramifications, essential to an adequate knowledge of them, that comprehensive knowledge of even the tiniest of them is possible only to God himself. Thus all understanding of any reality whatsoever is in the last resort always a 'reductio in mysterium', and any comprehension which is or seems to be devoid of the character of mystery, is only arrived at through the unspoken convention that this 'reductio in mysterium Dei' should be excluded from the start. However, this silent disregard of the 'reductio in mysterium' can be objectively justified, since the proper object of categorized knowledge on the one hand, and the Whither of transcendence on the other, give rise to two essentially different types of data for the spirit. And once this 'abstraction' is presupposed, it is absolutely true that in the region of the finite as such, there can be no absolute mysteries [63] among the objects of categorized knowledge. Only God as such can be truly a mystery for the created spirit. Here arose the question of whether and in what sense the Christian faith can speak of mysteries in the plural, and how we are to think of the necessary unity which these mysteries form with each other and with the mystery, the notion of which we have been developing.

If we then begin, not with the notion of mystery which we have arrived at, but with the Christian mysteries in the plural, the first question will naturally be what mysteries of this nature are actually envisaged when revelation in Jesus Christ is understood as the revelation of mysteria stricte dicta – in other words, how many such mysteries are there and what they are. It is permissible to think that current theological teaching is not particularly concerned with these questions, which are nonetheless important. This lack of interest is due to something which makes it to some extent understandable. For when we ask what and how many are these mysteria stricte dicta, we really do not mean to deny that everything real and true in the Christian faith partakes in some way of the mysterious character of the mysteries of which we speak. To deny it would be to maintain that there was no intrinsic connexion between the various Christian truths and realities. So if there are any mysteries, the whole Christian message will be determined to some extent in all its elements by the character of mystery, and it becomes understandable that no particular attention is paid to the question of what truths are really 'mysteria stricte dicta' and how many of them there are. But the question still has its importance, especially if it is understood as the search for a given number of mysteries, which can be neither greater or smaller. A faith which believes in the absolute self-disclosure of God face to face cannot imagine that God, if he wished, could constantly bring forth from the treasury, so to speak, of his truths and realities, new mysteries which surpass the understanding of man. It is impossible that the vision should reveal God under aspects which were hitherto completely unknown, just as it is impossible that God, when seen face to face, should still keep concealed within himself definite truths and realities which he absolutely refused to reveal and impart. For this reason alone the notion of an unlimited series of different mysteries is unthinkable. Each mystery is indeed of unfathomable depth and infinite extent. But because each of them signifies the infinity of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God, which is contemplated as such in the beatific vision, their number cannot be indefinite. The question of the number of the mysteries has nothing [64] at all to do with mathematical enumeration, any more than the question of the number of persons in the Trinity opens up a series of numbers which is then extrinsically and arbitrarily terminated.

Let us begin by trying to answer our question rather from the a posteriori point of view, that is, by considering the general and traditional doctrine of the mystery. We can certainly affirm that according to the general teaching of theology the mystery of the Trinity and that of the hypostatic union certainly belong to the mysteria stricte dicta. We are also certainly entitled to say (and it also follows from what was said above) that the mystery of the visio beatifica and hence that of strictly supernatural grace are also among the mysteria stricte dicta. The reason for this statement will at once be apparent. We need not give here a categorical answer to the question as to whether ordinary theological teaching admits other mysteries besides the three named, when the usual concept of mysterium stricte dictum is taken as the starting-point of this question. We can leave this question open to a certain extent, because there are in fact – apart perhaps from the mystery of the Eucharistic transubstantiation and presence of Christ, hardly any truths of which it is affirmed that they are mysteria stricte dicta, and (what is of course important here) cannot be understood as the necessary and intelligible consequence, as we see it, of the three already named. If we take for instance the mystery of original sin, it is comparatively easy to reduce this 'mystery' to the mystery of the supernatural sanctification of man by grace prior to his personal decision. Hence such a 'mystery' does not extend the provisional canon of the three mysteries. If one considers the mystery of transubstantiation, one would have to ask whether such a change of being is conceivable or not apart from the case of Christ, that is, independently of a unio hypostatica. If the question were answered in the affirmative, one could ask in turn how it could be proved that the transubstantiation of one purely natural reality into another was certainly a mysterium stricte dictum. It is probably impossible to give a positive answer to this question. According to our earlier considerations, which went to prove that there could be no mysteria stricte dicta in the region of created things as such, the possibility of transubstantiation in the purely natural order being a strict mystery must be denied. But if transubstantiation is only conceivable at all on the basis of the hypostatic union (which seems theologically more reasonable, just as the contrary seems devoid of theological proof) it follows at once that even if transubstantiation were a strict mystery, it would be so as a necessary [65] consequence of the hypostatic union. Thus once more our canon of the mysteria stricte dicta would not need to be enlarged. Obviously, all positive institutions and decrees of God with regard to Church offices, sacraments and history of salvation can only be called mysteries of faith in so far as they come from a free personal disposition of God: they cannot be deduced a priori, but must be received as facts from the word of divine revelation and left as such. Thus they are not mysteria stricte dicta. The mysteries of soteriology can undoubtedly be reduced to the mystery of the Incarnation; all we have to do is to suppose something which again is not strictly a mystery: that the Word of God took on a nature from among the human race which, by the creative will of God, shared in solidarity one common history of salvation and disaster; and that this human nature of Christ was willed (as is obvious) as something to be actualized, and hence as freely accomplishing the human destiny of life and death. With these presuppositions, which are not strict mysteries, the whole doctrine of the redemption follows from the mystery of the Incarnation. We have thus listed a posteriori all the truths of faith which come in question as mysteria stricte dicta. And there are only three which can seriously be considered as such according to the teaching of theologians: the Trinity, the Incarnation and the divinization of man in grace and glory.

If we then ask why these mysteries are to be called mysteria stricte dicta, we must begin by dividing them into two groups: the trinitarian mystery of God in itself, and the mysteries of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Incarnation, grace and glory, in so far as these last deal with a relationship of God to the non-divine. It is not necessary to dwell on the proof that the mystery of the Trinity is a mysterium stricte dictum in the ordinary sense of the term. For if any real mysteries are possible at all, they must exist in the immanent life of God himself. If God himself were not a mystery, he could not give rise to any and hence there could be no mysteries at all. When we then examine theologically the two other mysteries (or three, if we distinguish grace from glory) we note at once that they have a common element, which links them together, marks them off sharply and clearly from all other relationships of God to the non-divine, and also makes them intelligible as a closed duality. For both mysteries involve what we call in scholastic theology a quasi-formal causality on the part of God, in contradistinction to his efficient causality. By means of his creative efficient causality (which is of course of an absolutely unique and divine type) God brings into [66] existence that which is absolutely other than he. In what we call incarnation, grace and glory, God does not create ex nihilo sui et subjecti something different from himself, but imparts himself to the created nature. What is given in grace and incarnation is not something distinct from God, but God himself. He does not use the creature to impart himself, as when it points to God by its created reality: God imparts himself immediately of himself to the creature. This can be seen at once with regard to the incarnation, on which there is no need to insist here, but it can also be proved with regard to grace and glory. It is true that medieval theology concentrated on created grace when treating of the doctrine of grace, and that this approach still influences – through the Council of Trent – the modern theology of grace, whose positive utterances are rightly tributary to it. However, in its ontology of the beatific vision, medieval theology developed very clearly the doctrine that the vision can only come about by a self-communication of the divine essence, strictly as such, to the creature, and that this self-communication of God by means of a type of formal causality is the ontological presupposition for the proximity and immediacy which the visio beatifica implies, as a conscious process. But if this is true of the visio beatifica, it must be also true of grace, according to the teaching of Leo XIII and Pius XII: grace is the supernatural elevation of man and the formal beginning and ontological prerequisite of the vision. Hence in the doctrine of grace also, the central element is the 'uncreated grace', which is the immediate self-communication of God in quasi-formal causality in contrast to an efficient causality. This distinction between efficient and quasi-formal causality in God is the clear basis of the essential and radical distinction between the natural and the supernatural. And this is not difficult to understand. A reality which is not God himself, and does not exist as consequence of such a self-communication (as created actuation by uncreated act), which is therefore simply a created entity, cannot be supernatural in the strictest sense. For such a reality can as such not be a created substance: the question of its gratuitousness could have absolutely no meaning, since there would be no recipient of the gift distinct from the gratuitous gift. And an additional accidental determination which would also be a purely created one cannot be absolutely supernatural. For it is ontologically quite arbitrary to postulate the logical repugnance and impossibility of a created substance which would not be naturally on the same level of being as the supernatural accidental determination in question. A possible determination of a subject, [67] where the determination is finite and created, can always be ordained to a possible substantial subject, from which it flows as its normal determination. And again, where this ordination of such a subject to such an 'act' is basically impossible, this must be taken as proving that this 'act' is uncreated. It is simply contradictory that something should belong completely to the order of creation, by being created, and still belong to the strictly divine order, by being strictly supernatural. Supernatural reality and reality brought about by a divine self-communication of quasi-formal, not efficient type, are identical concepts. Hence the possibility of such self-communication of God to the creature is what constitutes the theological mystery in these two

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mysteries. They are mysteria stricte dicta, because it is only through revelation (understood as salvific event and word in an indissoluble unity) that we can know that such a thing is actual and possible. The possibility of the finite being endowed with the infinite – which is not imparted and represented by a finite gift, through the possession of which alone one 'partakes' of God – constitutes the incomprehensibility of incarnation and of grace. One can leave the question of whether the finitum is capax infiniti in the obscurity of a separate discussion about the communication of God through a created gift and a communication through an uncreated gift. And then it is easy to answer the question in the affirmative. But when we really take up the question of the self-communication of God, strictly as such, which must take place by means of quasi-formal causality, we find ourselves faced with the absolute mystery, since then God as his own very self must penetrate into the non-divine region of the finite.

Here God communicates himself in his own person to the creature, as absolute proximity and as the absolute holy mystery. We can therefore affirm at once with certainty that the two mysteries of incarnation and grace are simply the mysteriously radical form of the mystery which we have shown to be the primordial one, from the point of view of philosophy of religion and also of theology: God as the holy and abiding mystery for the creature, and in both these cases, not in the guise of distant aloofness but in that of radical proximity. After all that has been said, there is no need to dwell on this, with regard to grace and glory. But we must still say a word on the hypostatic union. We must omit here the question of a more than formal parallelism between the incarnation and grace and glory; we do not enquire into the intrinsic connexion between the two mysteries. Does the vocation of all men to supernatural fellowship [68] with God in grace and glory follow from the hypostatic union of a human nature and the Word of God, on account of its belonging to the same humanity? And again, is this elevation to grace and glory only really possible on the basis of the hypostatic union? Are these two mysteria stricte dicta not merely formally alike, but basically once more a unity: the one self-communication of God to the creature, which is essentially the act whereby God goes out of himself into 'the other' in such a way that he bestows himself upon the other by becoming the other? These are questions of the reduction of the two mysteries to their original onto-logical unity which we shall not further develop here. If any one is inclined to reject the whole idea out of hand, he need only be asked how he then conceives of the permanent significance of the humanity of Christ, eternally united with the Word, with regard to salvation and glory; or again, can he seriously think that the humanity of Jesus is now only the private concern of the Word of God himself, once satisfaction for sin has been made on the cross by means of it.

On the other hand, we must still say a word about the fact that the hypostatic union too is the self-communication of God to the creature, precisely in so far as he is the holy mystery. We must go beyond a merely ontic understanding of the hypostatic union to try to reach an ontological one. And then we must say at once that the substantial unity of the Word of God with his human nature is such that the human nature in question is primarily constituted by God's giving himself to that which is other than himself: he constitutes this created being by taking it up as a spiritual one. Hence the union itself essentially comes about, as fully itself, in the human knowledge of the created spirit about its unity with the Word. Hence the presence of the Logos to the human soul in the beatific vision should not really be taken as a mere supplement to the hypostatic union: it is essentially an ontological element of the union. No objection to this statement can be drawn from the fact that we too, who are not hypostatically united with the Logos, will also have the beatific vision. All that follows in fact is that we can only have this vision in its immediacy, in so far as it is mediated by the hypostatic union of the human nature of Jesus with the Logos of God. Hence the hypostatic union necessarily fulfils its own being in what we call (in neo-Chalcedonian terminology, if you like) the inner divinization of the human nature of Christ in grace and glory. But then it follows that the self-communication of God even in the hypostatic union is essentially the self-communication of God to [69] the creature, in so far as he is the holy mystery and is the holy mystery in radical proximity. For it is in this way that he is present even in the visio beatifica of the created spirit of the Logos.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This truth could of course be arrived at in another way, and one more in keeping with the nature of the matter in question. One could start from the self-transcendence of the created spirit and show that its supreme culmination, even if never attainable by human effort, is to be found in what we call hypostatic union. Since we cannot develop this line of thought here, we must at least refer to the work of Bernhard Welte in the third volume of H. Bacht and A. Grillmeier on the Council of Chalcedon. There the considerations which we cannot go into here are developed boldly, but in a completely orthodox manner. Let us suppose then that the hypostatic union can be shown to be the most radical form of such created self-transcendence, unattainable from below, but fulfilling pre-eminently the nature of transcendence. It follows at once that the hypostatic union is not a mystery beside the mystery of the absolute proximity of God as holy mystery: it is this mystery itself in an unsurpassable form. It is the absolute ontological and existential self-surrender to the holy mystery which God is. And this self-surrender is the proper reality of God himself, in which the Word of God, as the out-spoken mystery, is itself the answer.

We may now take up once again the first of the mysteria stricte dicta which we mentioned. We can only give the briefest outline of what should be said on this point, and more in the form of a thesis than in that of a proof. When we consider the de facto development of the doctrine of the Trinity at the stage of its gradual revelation and at the stage of theological reflection on this revealed mystery, and when we reflect above all on the unsurpassable moment of this revelation given in the New Testament itself, we can certainly affirm: God has given himself so fully in his absolute self-communication to the creature, that the 'immanent' Trinity becomes the Trinity of the 'economy of salvation', and hence in turn the Trinity of salvation which we experience is the immanent Trinity. This means that the Trinity of God's relationship to us is the reality of God as he is in himself: a trinity of persons. Would this be Sabellianism and Modalism? Only if we ignored completely the radical character of disclosure in the hypostatic union and in grace; only if we do not regard the 'modality' of God's relationship to the supernaturally elevated creature as the way God is 'in himself'; only if we suppose God [70] to be so untouched by this relationship to the creature that its manifold nature – as in creation and the natural relationship of God to the world – would constitute no distinction in God, but leave the distinction entirely on the side of the creature. It follows that in thinking of the Trinity we may start without misgivings from the experience of Jesus and his Spirit in us in the history of salvation and faith: the immanent Trinity is already contained therein. It is not a reality confined so to speak to its purely doctrinal expression. The immanent Trinity as such confronts us in the experience of faith – a constitutive component of which is indeed the concrete word of Scripture itself. The absolute self-communication of God to the world, as the mystery which has drawn nigh, is Father as the absolutely primordial and underivative; it is Son, as the principle which itself acts and necessarily must act in history in view of this free self-communication; it is Holy Spirit, as that which is given, and accepted by us. Since this 'as' which is used in relation to us really speaks of the self-communication of God in himself this trinity appertains to God in himself – it signifies a distinction in God himself. And since in both these cases of the communication of God it is a matter of God himself and not of two created things produced by efficient causality, it must always be a matter of the one and the same God. God as the unoriginated origin of the supernatural self-communication, God as the principle itself acting and expressing itself in the world, God as the God who has come to us, been imparted to us and accepted

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

by us, possess the one and the same nature. And they are distinct from one another, since otherwise the difference in the absolute self-communication to the creature would be found only in the creature, and there would be no question of a difference in the self-communication of God.

But this identification of immanent and salvific Trinity has of course a two-fold presupposition. Firstly, the relations of the three divine persons to man in grace are not simply appropriations. Each divine person has his own proper relationship to man in grace, even though each of these relations presupposes and includes the others. But this first presupposition is today no longer unusual in theology, and is in fact gaining ground. It is closer to the assertions of Scripture, if indeed it is not their only objective interpretation; it is favoured by the doctrine of the Greek Fathers; and above all, the immediate vision of the divine persons as such in the visio beatifica cannot be really explained ontologically without it. For the vision of God, and hence of the three divine persons as distinct, is determined [71] by the ontological quasi-causality of what is to be seen, which forms a sort of 'species impressa'. Hence there must be an ontological relationship of man to the three divine persons as distinct (and vice versa), which is not the consequence but the presupposition of knowing them. But that which is common to the three divine persons cannot be the ontological presupposition of their being known as distinct by the subject who knows and contemplates. The second presupposition for the identification of the immanent and the salvific Trinity is this. Only the Logos has such an immanent relationship to the other divine persons that he can be the one who can assume hypostatically a created reality and hence be the essential and irreplaceable revealer of the Father. For if each divine person could become incarnate, the Logos precisely could not appear as himself, as this particular person of the Trinity, in the personal manifestation of God in the economy of salvation. This second presupposition has indeed been rather abandoned and unknown since St Augustine. But it was taken for granted in theology before St Augustine and is accorded at least great sympathy, by St Bonaventure for instance. It is perfectly biblical. For the Logos is called Logos in Scripture in such a way that it can only cause great difficulties if we try to detach the immanent character of Word from the salvific. But in any case, the opposite of this second presupposition has never been proved. Every possible proof relies on the supposition that what one divine hypostasis can do must also be possible to each of the others. But this apparently obvious consideration is in fact a major fallacy. It proceeds entirely from the basically false supposition that what we call 'hypostasis' in God, three times, represents a general concept. The truth is however that what we call hypostasis in God is precisely that by which each of the divine persons is uniquely distinct from the other two, and is absolutely nothing else. It is therefore completely impossible to conclude from what one hypostasis in God can do, to what another must be able to do. We are therefore perfectly entitled to identify the immanent and the salvific Trinity. And this is the only way to prevent the doctrine of the immanent Trinity from appearing as a mere piece of subtle dialectic in a purely formal reconciliation of one and three.

Thus the first of the three mysteries which we have named, the Trinity, appears – if we may say so – as the God-ward aspect of the two absolute self-communications of God in the hypostatic union and in the grace which grows into glory. The truly immanent 'in itself' is identically the two-fold 'for us' which, because it is really self-communication of God in [72] formal causality and not natural efficient causality, must be something of God himself.

If what we have just said, giving indeed only the briefest of indications, is really true, we may draw the following conclusions with regard to the main theme. The three mysteries, the Trinity with its two processions, and the two self-communications of God ad extra in a real formal causality corresponding to the two processions, are not 'intermediate mysteries'. They are not something provisional and deficient in the line of mystery which comes between the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perspicuous truths of our natural knowledge and the absolute mystery of God, in so far as he remains incomprehensible even in the beatific vision. Nor are they as it were mysteries of the beyond, which lie or lay still further on behind the God who is for us the holy mystery. But they signify the articulation of the one single mystery of God, being the radical form of his one comprehensive mysteriousness, since it has been revealed in Jesus Christ that this absolute and abiding mystery can exist not only in the guise of distant aloofness, but also as absolute proximity to us, through the divine self-communication. The mysteries of Christianity, in the plural, can be then understood as the concrete form of the one mystery, once the presupposition is made – which can however be known only by revelation – that this holy mystery also exists, and can exist, as the mystery in absolute proximity. This of course we only know in so far as this absolute proximity has already always been granted us in the concreteness of the incarnation and grace. To this extent, the thesis here put forward does not necessarily include the affirmation that we could start with the abstract notion of the absolute proximity and self-presentation of the holy mystery, and deduce from it the incarnation and the possibility of a divinization of man by grace. The abstract notion of the absolute proximity and self-communication of God, if it is to be ontologically valid and not merely a logical and notional possibility, is and can only be attained in the experience of the incarnation and grace. But in this way it is still possible to recognize that these mysteries are really intrinsically connected, in their character of communication of the absolute proximity of the primordial mystery. And thence it can be shown (though we cannot go into it now) that the canon of the three absolute mysteries, first arrived at by an a posteriori listing, is on principle incapable of further extension. There are these three mysteries in Christianity, no more and no fewer, and the three mysteries affirm the same thing: that God has imparted himself to us through Jesus Christ [73] in his Spirit as he is in himself so that the inexpressible nameless mystery which reigns in us and over us should be in itself the immediate blessedness of the spirit which knows, and transforms itself into love.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[75]

PART TWO

De Deo

[77]

3

REMARKS ON THE DOGMATIC TREATISE 'DE TRINITATE'[1]

I

In a collective volume, produced in honour of a former professor of dogmatic theology who is now the occupant of the see of St Boniface in Mainz, there is one theme at least that should not be omitted, the doctrine of the Trinity. Bishop Stohr himself has written several studies on the theme, which are still of the highest value today.[2] This is a consideration which suggests the theme, though the theme itself is rather terrifying: for the supreme mystery is also the most obscure. And the history of the theme could give the impression that the formal explanation of the formulation has reached a point which might seem almost unsurpassable, signalling something like the end of the story: since the Council of Florence there has been no official doctrinal declaration by the Church in which the magisterium might seem to sanction a real progress in the understanding of this mystery.

Much has been done no doubt since then in the line of research into the history of this dogma, from Petavius and de Regnon to Lebreton and Schmaus – to name only a few of the distinguished names in this chapter of the history of dogma. Still, one has to admit, with astonishment perhaps and a little resignedly – or is this being too pessimistic? – that research into the ancient history of the dogma has, at least for the moment, [78] not stimulated many impulses which would carry the history itself any further. Here and there in religious literature one may undoubtedly see that efforts have been made to link Christian piety more expressly and more vitally with this mystery.[3] Theology too[4] has shown instances of writers who are more consciously and keenly aware of the obligation of presenting the doctrine of the Trinity in such a way that it can become a reality in the concrete religious life of Christians – one thinks of the dogmatic theology of M. Schmaus and of the writings of G.

---

[1] Some points in this essay coincide even in their formulation with the article 'Dreifaltigkeit' by Henri de Lavalette in the LTK III[2], 543-548. The friendly exchanges of ideas which preceded this article of the Lexikon justifies the similarities.

[2] Cf. A. Stohr, Die Trinitätslehre des Hl. Bonaventura (Münster 1923); 'Die Hauptrichtungen der spekulativen Trinitätslehre in der Theologie des 13 Jahrhunderts', TQ 106 (1925) 113-135; 'Des Gottfried von Fontaines Stellung in der Trinitätslehre', ZKT 50 (1926) 177-195; Die Trinitätslehre Ulrichs von Strassburg (Münster 1928); 'Der heilige Albertus über den Ausgang des Heiligen Geistes', DTh 50 (1932) 109-523.

[3] We give as examples: V. Bernadot, Durch die Eucharistie zur Dreifaltigkeit (from the French) (Munich 1927); E. Vandeur, 'O mein Gott, Dreifaltiger, den ich anbete', Gebet der Schwester Elisabeth von der Heiligen Dreifaitigkeit (from the French) (Regensburg 1933); C. Marmion, De H. Drieëenheid in ons geestelijk leven (Bruges 1952); Gabriel a S. Maria Magdalena, Geheimnis der Gottesfreundschaft, 3 vols. (Freiburg 1957/58).

[4] Cf. P. Laborde, Dévotion à la Sainte Trinité (Pamis – Tournai 1922); M. Retaillau, La Sainte Trinité dans les justes (Paris 1923); R. Garrigou – Lagrange, 'L'habitation de la Sainte Trinité et expérience mystique' RT 33 (1928) 449-474; M. Philipon, 'La Sainte Trinité et la vie surnaturelle' RT 44 (1938) 675-698; F. Taymans d'Eypernon, Le mystère primordial. La Trinité dens sa vivante image (Brussels 1946); A. Minon, 'M. Blondel et le mystère de la Sainte Trinité', ETL 23 (1947) 472-498; J. Havet, 'Mystère de la Sainte Tminité et vie chrétienne' Rev. Dioc. Nam. 2 (1947) 161-176; F. Guimet, 'Caritas ordinata et amor discretus dans la théologie trinitaire de Richard de Saint Victor', Rev. M. A. Lat. 4 (1948) 225-236; B. Aperribay, 'Influjo causal de la divinas personas en la experiencia mistica', Verdad y vita 7 (1949) 53-74; G. Philips, La Sainte Trinité dans la vie du chrétien (Liege 1949); H. Rondet, 'La divinisation du chrétien', NRT 71 (1949) 449-476, 561-588; K. Rahner, 'Dreifaltigkeitsmystik', LTK[2] III, 563f.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Philips. One notes also in the history of devotion[5] that in spite of a mystical cult of the [79] supremely one, undifferentiated and nameless God of this mystery, the mystery has not remained the preserve of abstract theology. There has also been, no matter how rare and diffident, a true mysticism of the Trinity. We may mention in this matter St Bonaventure, Ruysbroek, St Ignatius of Loyola. St John of the Cross, Mary of the Incarnation, perhaps Bérulle and some moderns such as Bl. Elisabeth of the Holy Trinity and Anton Jans.

But this does not hide the fact that Christians, for all their orthodox profession of faith in the Trinity, are almost just 'monotheist' in their actual religious existence. One might almost dare to affirm that if the doctrine of the Trinity were to be erased as false, most religious literature could be preserved almost unchanged throughout the process. And it cannot be objected that the Incarnation is such a theologically and religiously central element in Christian life that on that account the Trinity is always and everywhere irremovably present. For when the Incarnation of God is spoken of, theological and religious intention is today concentrated on the fact that 'God' has become man, that 'a' person of the Trinity has assumed flesh – but not on the fact that this person is precisely that of the Word, Logos. One could suspect that as regards the catechism of the head and the heart, in contrast to the catechism in books, the Christian idea of the Incarnation would not have to change at all, if there were no Trinity. God, as one person, would have become man, and the average Christian who professes faith in the Incarnation does not go any farther in his express understanding of the doctrine. There are probably several modern, scientific and extensive Christologies which pay no particular attention to which precisely of the divine hypostases has taken on human nature. The average theological text-book today operates in fact with the abstract concept of a divine hypostasis – a concept which is however a [80] very analogous and precarious unity. It does not operate with the concept of exactly the second person in God as such. It asks what it means that God became man, but not what it means in particular that the Logos, precisely as himself in contradistinction to the other divine persons became man. And this state of affairs is not at all surprising. For since St Augustine, contrary to the tradition preceding him, it has been more or less agreed that each of the divine persons could become man. From which it follows that the Incarnation of the second person in particular

[5] In St Bonaventure, for instance, on account of his exemplarism, where his metaphysical revaluation of the cause exemplaris which put it on the same footing as the cause efficiens and cause finslis, helped him to overcome to a great extent the notion that the world itself could contain nothing trinitarian, strictly speaking, because it was created by efficient causality in an action belonging to God as one. Cf. also: L. Reypens, 'Le Sommet de la contemplation mystique chez le B. Jean de Ruusbroec', RAM 3 (1922) 250-272; 4 (1923) 256-271; A. Ampe, De grondilijnen van Ruusbroec's Drieëenheidsleer als onderbouw van den zieleopgang (Tielt 1950); idem, Kernproblemen uit de leer van Ruusbroec II-III (Tielt 1950/51); idem, De mystieke leer van Ruusbroec over de zieleopgang (Tielt 1957); St Axters, Geschiedenis van de vroomheid in cit Nederlanden II (Antwerp 1953); L. Reypens, 'Dieu (Connaissance mystique)', DSAM III, 883-929; P. Henry, 'La Mystique trinitaire du B. Jean Ruusbroec', RSR 40 (1951/52) 335-368; H. Rahner, 'Die Vision des hl. Ignatius in der Kapelle von La Storta' ZAM 10 (1935) 37-34, 124-139, 202-220, 265-282; J. Iparraguirre, 'Vision ignaciana de Dios', Greg. 37 (1956) 366-390; Efrén de la Madre de Dios, San Juan de la Cruz y el misterio de la Santissima Trinidad en la vida espiritual (Saragossa 1947); P. Blanchard, 'Expérience trinitaire et vision beatifique d'après S. Jean de la Croix', Année théol. 1948, 293-330; J. Klein, L'itinéreire mystique de la Vénéreble Mère Marie de l'Incarnation (Rome 1937); M. Philipon, The Spiritual Doctrine of Sister Elizabeth of the Trinity (Westminster, Md. 1947); H. Urs von Balthasar, Elisabeth von Dijon (Cologne 1952); T. Mandrini, 'Una nuova mistica Carmelitana', Scuola Catt. 69 (1941) 425-432; A. Jans, Ein Mystikerleben der Gegenwert, ed. M. Grabmann (Munich 1934). We cannot discuss here the relevance of the ancient devotion to the Logos, as distinct from speculation about the Logos (beginning with Origen), or of the cult of 'divine wisdom', as found for instance in H. Suso, L. Blosius and C. Druzbicki. Cf. W. Völker, Des Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes (Tübingen 1931); A. Lieske, Die theologische Logosmystik bei Origenes (Münster 1938); B. Krivocheine, 'The Holy Trinity in Greek Patristic Mystical Theology', Sobornost (winter 1947/48) 529-537.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

throws no light on the special character of this person within the divine nature.[6]

It is not surprising therefore that piety draws no more in fact from the doctrine of the Incarnation than that 'God' became man and finds therein no clear assertion about the Trinity. And hence the existence of a clear and conscious faith in the Incarnation is far from being a proof of the fact that the Trinity means something in the normal piety of Christians. And there are other consequences, which show once more how popular piety is reflected in dogmatic theology, and how little the contrast is felt to the fixed, sacral formulas of the ancient liturgy. Theology for instance almost takes it for granted that the 'Our Father' is directed in the same way to the Holy Trinity, to all three divine persons, without any basic distinction whatsoever; that the sacrifice of the Mass is offered to all three divine persons in the same way;[7] that the ordinary contemporary doctrine of satisfaction (and therefore redemption), with its theory of a double moral person in Christ, conceives of an act of redemption which is directed essentially in the same way to all three divine persons; that this doctrine need pay no express attention to the fact that the satisfaction was given precisely by the Word incarnate, and not simply by the Deus-homo; that therefore one could imagine another divine person as man offering a satisfactio [81] condigna to the triune God; and that indeed, we could conceive of such satisfaction even if there were no question of the Trinity as the condition or presupposition at all.[8]

In the same way, the treatise called 'De gratia Christi' gives a doctrine of grace which is in fact monotheistic and not trinitarian, from the consortium divinae naturae to the visio beata essentiae divinae. It is affirmed, of course, that the grace was 'merited' by Christ. But as this grace is explained at best as the grace of the 'Dei-hominis', not as the grace of the Word incarnate as Logos, and as this grace appears only as the restoration of a grace which in its supralapsarian condition is mostly treated merely as gratia Dei, not of the Word, and still less of the Word to be made flesh: the treatise on grace is only very vaguely a theological and religious introduction to the mystery of the Trinity.[9]

The same anti-trinitarian timidity affects theologians when treating of the relationship between man and the three divine persons which is set up by grace. Exceptions like Petavius and Thomassinus, Scheeben, Schauf and so on merely confirm the rule. It is always taken to be a relation founded on 'created grace', a grace brought about by efficient causality, and the relationship is merely 'appropriated' in a different manner by each of the three divine persons. The sacraments and eschatology are naturally treated in the same way. In the doctrine of creation also, as treated today, the Trinity is hardly mentioned – in contrast to the way it was handled by the great theologians of former times like St Bonaventure. This silence is supposed to be justified by the doctrine that the works of God ad extra are performed so much in common by the divine nature that the created world can bear in itself no real sign of [6] There is something strange here. All discussion of the Trinity must stress the fact that in God the hypostasis is that by which Father, Son and Spirit differ, and that wherever there is unity in the three, there is absolute numerical identity, and hence that the concept of hypostasis, when applied to God, is not a general and univocal concept which is predicated of all three persons in the same way. But then this concept is used in Christology as if it could be taken for granted that another divine hypostasis could also exercise a functio hypostatica, with regard to a human nature. One should at least ask whether the particular relative subsistence, in which Father and Spirit are distinct from and not identical with the Son, might not prevent the exercise of such a functio hypostatica (though it does not, in the case of the Son).

---

[7] The author recalls with some remorse that he felt twenty years ago that he had to take M. Schmaus to task for not accepting this assertion as obvious in his dogmatic theology.

[8] In the hypothesis of a two-fold moral person in a substantial personal unity, if there were only one person in God he could still enter upon a hypostatic union with a human nature and so make satisfaction to himself.

[9] The Trinity is not considered at all in the famous constitution of Benedict XII on the Visio Beatifica (Denz. 530). It speaks only of the 'divine essence', to which the most intimate personal act, that of self-disclosure, is attributed. But is this sufficiently explained by the themes of the immediate context?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the divine inner-trinitarian life. Without of course saying so expressly, theologians consider the ancient classical doctrine of the vestigia or imago Trinitatis in the world more or less as a pious speculation, to be indulged in when the essential doctrine about the Trinity has been learnt elsewhere. Such speculations are not considered to add anything important to what is already known independently of the Trinity or of created reality.

[82]

II

As a result of all this, the treatise on the Holy Trinity remains rather isolated in the structure of dogmatic theology as a whole. To put it crudely (and of course with some exaggeration and generalization): once this treatise has been dealt with, it does not recur again in dogmatic theology. Its general function with regard to the whole is only vaguely seen. The mystery appears to have been revealed merely for its own sake. Even after the revelation, the reality of the mystery remains entirely centred on itself. Statements are made about it, but the reality itself has really nothing or almost nothing to do with us ourselves. We might summarize the average theological opinion as follows, without fear of being charged with exaggerating: in Christology, only one hypostatic function of 'one' divine person is considered and it could just as well be exercised by any other divine person; the only thing considered important in the concrete for us is that Christ is 'a' divine person, and which he is does not matter; in Dc Gratia, only strictly appropriated relationships are considered between man and the divine persons; objectively, only the efficient causality of the One God is considered; and this is as much as to say soberly but expressly that we ourselves have really nothing to do with the mystery of the Trinity, beyond receiving some revelation 'about' it.[10]

The only objection to be considered is that it will be our blessedness later on to see this triune God face to face, which means being 'absorbed' into the inner divine life itself, and so attaining our most real perfection, and that this is the reason why the mystery is already revealed to us. But then we must ask how can all this be true if one denies any ontologically real relationship between man and each of the divine persons, and confines it all to appropriations. We must ask whether the vision even of the supreme reality can really make us blessed when, as in the supposition which we are criticizing, it is considered to be absolutely unrelated to us [83] in the real ontological order.[11] The appeal to the beatific vision therefore must be answered either with the challenge to draw the full and final conclusions from the position, or with the question as to whether we are not dealing with something more than mere knowledge about something absolutely unrelated. For if it were something absolutely unrelated, it would remain as isolated from our existential knowledge of ourselves as the treatise on the Trinity does, in today's theology of our pilgrimage, from the other dogmatic treatises in which we learn something about ourselves, to the real benefit of our salvation.

These considerations will help us to understand some other features of modern theology. It

[10] We prescind here (because the opinion which we are attacking also does so) from the fact that real 'knowing', understood in the radical metaphysical sense, implies the most real relationship possible to the object known, and vice versa. But if the full logic of the axiom were applied to the question at issue, it would be seen that the revelatory communication of the mystery of the Trinity ultimately implies and presupposes a real ontological communication of the revealed reality as such to man. It cannot therefore be envisaged in the way that the opinion in question sees it: as a purely verbal communication, which does not change the real relationship between the giver (as triune) and the hearer.

[11] This formulation does not touch on the question of whether God has any 'real' relationships ad extra. We can prescind from this question here. 'Real and ontological', as predicated of each of the divine persons with regard to man, need be understood here only in the analogous sense (with regard to the 'reality', not the special nature of the relationship) – just as the Logos, for instance, has himself a real relationship to his human nature.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is now generally taken for granted that the treatise De Deo Uno must be divided from and placed before De Deo Trino. This approach, which has been in use for a long time, was recently defended as obligatory by J. M. Delmau (PSJ, II^2, 15f.) and others. There are only a few honourable exceptions, such as M. Schmaus and A. Stolz. One cannot however appeal to tradition for the now standard division and order of the two treatises. It only came into general use since the Sententiae of Peter Lombard were replaced by the Summa of St Thomas. One could however follow Scripture and the Greek Fathers and understand ο(θεο/φ primarily of the Father, without letting the word stand exclusively for the Father. Then the trinitarian structure of the Apostles' Creed, seen in the light of the Greek theology of the Trinity, would rather suggest that we begin with the Father and use this first chapter of theology to treat also of the 'essence' of God, the Godhead of this Father. It is worth noting that the Master of the Sentences, for instance, subsumes the general doctrine about God into a doctrine of the Trinity – a point which Grabmann counts as one of the 'main errors' of the Lombard. And the Summa of Alexander Halensis likewise makes no clear distinction between the two treatises. This is only done by St Thomas, for reasons which have not yet been clearly explained. St Thomas does not begin with God the Father as the unengendered origin in the Godhead, the origin of all reality in the world, but with the nature common to all three persons. And the procedure became well-nigh universal. Thus the treatise on the Trinity [84] comes to stand still more in a splendid isolation, which brings it into a still greater danger than that of being found without interest for religious existence: it looks as though everything important about God which touches ourselves has already been said in the treatise De Deo Uno.

Possibly this division and order of the two treatises goes back ultimately to the Augustinian and western conception of the Trinity, even though this Augustinian concept had not the same predominance in the high Middle Ages which it was later to gain. Here, in contrast to the Greeks, one begins with the one single nature of God as a totality, and only considers him after that as constituted by three persons – though this involves a constant (and necessary) effort to avoid posing the 'essentia' as a 'fourth element' previous to the three persons. It would be more biblical and Greek to start from the one absolutely unoriginated God, who is still the Father, even when it is not yet known that he is the Begetter and Spirator, because he is known as the unoriginated hypostasis, who may not be thought of positively as 'absolute', even when he is not yet known expressly as relative. But the starting-point of the Latins in the Middle Ages was different. And so it is possible to think that the Christian treatise De Deo Uno can and should be placed before De Deo Trino. But then one really writes, or could merely write, a treatise 'De divinitate una', since the unicity of the divine being justifies this procedure, and make it very philosophical and abstract in development – which is of course what happens – with very little concrete reference to the history of salvation. It deals with the necessary metaphysical attributes of God, and not very explicitly with the experiences of the history of salvation which have come from God's freely adopted relations to creation. But if one referred to the history of salvation, one could scarcely avoid noticing that one was constantly speaking of him whom Scripture and Jesus himself calls Father, the Father of Jesus, who sends the Son and gives us himself in the Spirit, his Spirit. But if one begins with the basic notions of the Augustinian and western approach, a non-trinitarian treatise De Deo Uno comes apparently automatically before De Deo Trino. But then the theology of the Trinity cannot but give the impression of being able to make merely formal assertions about the divine persons, with the help of the notions of the two processions and the relations. And even these assertions seem to deal with a reality entirely centred on itself, a Trinity which is not opened to anything outside, and of which we, the outsiders, only know something through a strange paradox.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[85] Efforts are undoubtedly made, in an Augustinian 'psychological' theology of the Trinity, to fill out the contents of the formal concepts[12] of processio, communicatio divinae essentiae, relatio, subsistentia relativa. But one must admit in all honesty that this way does not take us very far. This is not to say that such a psychological doctrine of the Trinity is only sheer – and not even successful – theological speculation. We can certainly say that the two divine processions, whose existence is guaranteed by revelation, have something to do with the two basic acts which we know belong to the spirit: knowledge and love. For this there is a foundation in Scripture. But though the basic starting-point of the Augustinian psychological doctrine of the Trinity is certainly valid, we must also point out its limitations. If one avoids artificial 'eis-egesis', reading things into biblical theology, a frequent fault of scholastic theology in this matter, one finds that the biblical foundation is restricted to the fact that in the dispensation of redemption the divine knowledge is displayed as revealing itself and the divine love as giving itself in personal communication. When theology loses sight of this scriptural connexion, the Augustinian speculation on the Trinity is inevitably brought up against the well-known difficulty which always seems to render futile this marvellously profound type of speculation. One begins with a concept of knowledge and love taken from natural philosophy and uses it to develop a notion of the word and of the 'weight' of love; but after applying these speculative concepts to the Trinity one has to admit that they do not work: for the good reason [86] that knowledge and love remain 'essential' concepts. One cannot and may not evolve a 'personal', 'notional' concept of the word and of the 'weight' of love on the basis of human experience. For then the Word of knowledge and the Spirit of love would demand that a Word and a Spirit should proceed from them, again as persons.

All this does not indeed imply that it is always a mistake to divide the treatises De Deo Uno and De Deo Trino and discuss them in the usual sequence. Even if it is done on the unjustifiable grounds that the division and order in question follows the process of the history of revelation itself, because it progressed from the revelation of the nature to that of the persons,[13] the treatment can simply be regarded as a pedagogical one and not a matter of principle. The important thing after all is what is said in the two treatises and what connexion is made between them in the usual division. The point of our present remarks was simply to note that in the present division and order of the treatises, their unity and interconnexion is not well enough worked out. This is clear at once from the totally unquestioning way in which it is supposed that this division and order is obvious and necessary.

There is another phenomenon which is no doubt connected with this way of sealing off the [12] It must however be conceded here that when Greek theology was most flourishing, among the Cappadocian Fathers, it seems to have been almost more formalistic than the theology of the Trinity in St Augustine – in spite of a starting-point for the doctrine of the Trinity which was taken from the economy of salvation and was directed towards the world. How is this to be explained? Was it not because the Greek Fathers thought of the Trinity as so clearly 'salvific' that they rightly felt that the whole of their theology was a treatise on the Trinity? Their treatise on the Trinity was not meant to portray the whole doctrine, but simply its formal, abstract side. And this was not really intended to be a discussion of each of the three divine persons. It was merely the solution of a problem secondary in the mind of the Greeks, that of the unity of the three persons, who appeared as distinct in theology and redemption. Should we not therefore say that the West took over the formal portion of the theology of the Trinity from the Greeks and made it the (whole) doctrine of the Trinity – since its soteriology retains only the dogmatically unavoidable minimum of the theology of the Trinity? Is not this why western theologians were forced – in contrast to the Greeks – to fill out this almost mathematical and formalistic theology by giving it more substance and content from the 'psychological' doctrine of the Trinity as developed by St Augustine?

[13] It would be at least equally true to say that the history of revelation first shows God as an unoriginated person in his relation to the world, and then progresses to the revelation of this person as the origin of an immanent vital process from which persons proceed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

doctrine of the Trinity and leaving it in the air, so to speak. It is the general anxiety to eliminate all efforts at demonstrating analogies, presentiments and preparations for the doctrine outside Christianity, even in the old Testament. It would not be much of an exaggeration or simplification to say that the main interest of ancient apologetics against pagans and Jews was to find as many traces of the Trinity as possible before the New Testament and outside Christianity, at least in the elementary stage and in privileged spirits. The faith of the patriarchs of the Old Testament knew something of it, and St Augustine admitted, with a magnanimity which would cause scandal nowadays, that the great philosophers had some such knowledge. In recent Catholic apologetics, the normal thing is to reject sharply any effort at discovering presentiments of this mystery outside the New Testament. And this is unquestionably logical. For if this theology does not admit the Trinity, as a reality, into this world and the history of salvation, then it is to say the [87] least unlikely that even the slightest knowledge of it should be found there. Hence before the question is asked a posteriori whether such traces exist or not (a question which of course cannot be answered affirmatively a priori), it is tacitly assumed, more or less, that there can be no such traces. There is at any rate very little inclination to give positive value to hints and analogies in the history of religion or in the Old Testament. Practically all the emphasis is placed on the difference between the doctrines inside and outside of Christianity.

III

The very isolation of the treatise on the Trinity proves at once that something is wrong the thing is impossible! For the Trinity is a mystery of salvation. Otherwise it would never have been revealed. But then it must be possible to see why it is a mystery of salvation. And then it must be possible to show in all dogmatic treatises that the realities of salvation with which they deal cannot be made comprehensible without recurring to this primordial mystery of Christianity. If the intrinsic connexion between the various treatises does not constantly appear, this can only be a sign that in the treatise on the Trinity or in the other treatises attention has not been paid to the points which show that the Trinity is a mystery of salvation in our regard and hence confronts us wherever our salvation is spoken of – that is, in the other dogmatic treatises.

The basic thesis which constitutes the link between the treatises and shows the reality and not just the doctrine of the Trinity as a mystery of salvation for us may be formulated as follows: the Trinity of the economy of salvation is the immanent Trinity and vice versa. This assertion must be explained, proved as far as possible and applied to Christology, so that its importance for the latter may be clearly seen. These tasks are so much interwoven and condition each other so thoroughly that they must be undertaken together and not one after another.

The Trinity of the economy of salvation is the immanent Trinity: this assertion is a defined truth of faith at one point, in one case,[14] for Jesus is not simply God in general, but the Son; the second divine Person, the Logos of God is man, and he alone. So there is at least one ‘sending’, one presence in the world, one reality in the economy of salvation which is [88] not merely appropriated to a certain divine person, but is proper to him. Thus it is not a matter of saying something ‘about’ this particular divine person in the world. Here something takes place in the world itself, outside the immanent divine life, which is not simply the result of the efficient causality of the triune God working as one nature in the world. It is an event [14] At only one point, however, in one single case, which is therefore not enough to justify our calling the whole thesis simply a truth of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

proper to the Logos alone, the history of one divine person in contrast to the others. (This is not changed by saying that the causation of this hypostatic union is the work of the whole Trinity.) There is an assertion with regard to the history of salvation which can only be made of one divine person. But if this is true once, then it is always false to say that there is nothing in the history or 'economy' of salvation which cannot be predicated in the same way of the triune God as a whole and of each person in particular. And the converse is also false: that in the doctrine of the Trinity, meaning what is said of the divine persons in general and particular, there can only be assertions which describe the immanent divine life. And it is certainly correct to say that the doctrine of the Trinity cannot be adequately distinguished from the doctrine of the economy of salvation.[15]

The importance of this consideration for the question in hand is often diminished or obscured in theology by three different lines of thought, which must first be examined, before the significance of the sure starting-point in dogma can be expounded in relation to the more general thesis.

We begin with the best known, most comprehensive and most radical difficulty. It is that the appeal to the hypostatic union, though based on a reality dogmatically certain, must be disallowed, because it does not and cannot deal with a case or instance which falls under a general principle and relationship. The statement about the hypostatic union gives absolutely no right even to consider that it may be used as a paradigm for [89] similar assertions which would as it were open up the Trinity ad extra and allow the conclusion to be finally drawn that the 'economic' and immanent Trinity is identical. The reason for rejecting the Incarnation as an 'instance' of a wider relationship is said to be simple and stringent: that everything is strictly identical in God, except the opposition in the relationship of origin which forms the persons. Consequently, any one divine person can have a special relationship to the world, in contrast to the other divine persons, only by means of a hypostatic union as such – because only in such a union can what is strictly proper to him, his being a person, the hypostatic function, be actualized 'ad extra'. But since there is only one hypostatic union, that of the Logos, and since any special relationship of any divine person can only be hypostatic the truth of the Incarnation cannot give rise to any more general principle – even with regard to possibilities, the possibilities of hypostatic union in other divine persons.

It is not our task or intention here to give a strict analysis of this basic difficulty, in the form in which it has been urged in recent years, especially by Paul Galtier,[16] against the acceptance of other than appropriated relationships between man and the divine persons through grace. This subject has been treated so thoroughly that nothing new and nothing better can be said about it in the framework of this short essay. Suffice it to say that we think the refutation of the objection as given for instance by H. Schauf,[17] is adequate enough. To [15] One cannot escape this conclusion by the would-be clever scholastic reference to the fact that the hypostatic union does not bring about any 'real relation' in the Logos himself and hence that nothing in the order of salvation can be predicated of the Logos as such, as touching the Logos himself. Whatever is the exact meaning of the axiom of scholastic metaphysics, that God has no 'real relations' ad extra, the truth remains – and it must be taken as the decisive norm for this axiom, and not vice versa – that the Logos himself is really and truly man, he and only he and not the Father and not the Spirit. And hence it remains eternally true that if everything that is to be affirmed truly and permanently of the Logos himself is to be included in a doctrine of the divine persons, then this doctrine itself implies an assertion dealing with the order of salvation.

---

[16] P. Galtier, L'habitation en nous des trois personnes (édn revue et augmentée: Rome 1950).

[17] H. Schauf, Die Einwohnung des Heiligen Geistes (Freiburg 1941); cf. also Ph. J. Donnelly, 'The Inhabitation of the Holy Spirit. A solution according to de la Taille', TS 8 (1947) 445-470; J. Trütsch, SS. Trinitatis inhabitatio apud theologos recentiores (Trent 1949); S. J. Dockx, Fils de Dieu par grâce (Paris 1948); C. Sträter, 'Het begrip "appropriatie" bij S. Thomas', Bijdr. 9 (1948) 1-48, 144-186; J. H. Nicolas, 'Présence trinitaire et présence de la Trinité', RT 50 (1950) 183-191; Th. J. Fitzgerald, Dc inhabitatione Spiritus Sencti in doctrine S. Thomae Aquinatis (Mundelein 1950); P. de Letter, 'Sanctifying grace and our union with the Holy Trinity', TS 13 (1952) 33-58; F. Bourassa, 'Adoptive Sonship. Our union with the divine persons', TS 13 (1952)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

say the least, it has not been strictly proved by Galtier and the theologians who share his theory that a special hypostatic relation must be strictly a hypostatic union. Positive arguments [90] against such an identification will occur later in our considerations.[18] Hence we maintain: in principle, the Incarnation can undoubtedly be taken as a dogmatically certain 'case' of a special relationship of a divine person to the world in the order of salvation. With this at least not radically impossible relationship we have the possibility of a real communication of the whole Trinity as such to the world in the process of salvation. Thus we have the identity of the immanent Trinity with the Trinity of the economy of salvation.

The second difficulty, which is to some extent opposed to the first, has already been touched on. It is that if one admits that each divine person can enter into hypostatic union with a created being, then the fact of the incarnation of the Logos really reveals nothing about the Logos himself, that is, about his proper immanent divine being. Basically the Incarnation only means for us, in this view, the experience of God as a person in general – something already known anyway – but not that of a personal God differentiated according to the proper nature of the Trinity. We know (from communications made about it in the form of truths) that it is precisely the second divine person who exercises a hypostatic function with regard to the human reality which can be met with in Jesus. But everything there met with and experienced would be exactly the same as it is at present, if another divine person formed the subsistence of this human reality. The tangible reality of salvation undoubtedly gives a glimpse of the Trinity in the words used in the process, where Jesus speaks of the Father, and of himself precisely as 'Son': but the reality is not attainable in itself, because what happens in the order of salvation could have happened just as well to any other divine person. The event itself, being only the neutral vehicle of a revelation given in words and not a trinitarian revelation in actions, tells nothing of the inner-trinitarian divine life.

[91] We have already indicated how this supposedly obvious principle affects the development of Christology. But is it correct to affirm that each divine person can become man? Our answer is that this pre-supposition is both not proved and false. It is not proved: the most ancient tradition, before St Augustine, never thought of the possibility and really pre-supposed the contrary in its theological reflexions. The Father is by definition the unoriginated who is essentially invisible and who shows and reveals himself only by uttering his Word to the world. And the Word, by definition, is both immanently and in the economy of salvation the revelation of the Father, so that a revelation of the Father without the Logos and his incarnation would be the same as a wordless utterance. But the pre-supposition is also false: one cannot deduce from the mere fact that one divine person became man that this 'possibility' exists for another. Such a deduction supposes: 1. that in God, 'hypostasis' is a univocal conception with regard to the three divine persons; and 2. that the unbridgeable difference between the way each divine person is a person – which is indeed so great that it is only the loosest of analogies that allows us to apply the same notion of person to all three – does not stand in the way of the other two persons entering into a hypostatic union with a created reality, by virtue of their own special and unique way of being a person, in the same

---

309-335; P. de Letter, 'Current Theology. Sanctifying grace and the divine indwelling', TS 13 (1953) 242-272; Ph. J. Donnelly, 'Sanctifying grace and our union with the Holy Trinity: A Reply', TS 13 (1952) 190-204; F. Bourassa, 'Présence de Dieu et union aux divines personnes', Sc. Eccl. 6 (1954) 3-23.

[18] The procedure should be carefully noted: the argument is purely negative to begin with, namely that the argument of Galtier, etc., is not clearly convincing. We do not therefore positively affirm that it can be deduced from the fact of the incarnation as such alone that there could be other similar cases where the really immanent Trinity could enter into such an economy of salvation. (Otherwise we should be contradicting ourselves. For we shall have to say at once that the incarnation of the Logos does not allow us to conclude to the possibility of the incarnation of other divine persons.) Only when the theological reasons have been given to show that there are other cases of such a compenetration of immanent and salvific Trinity, can it be shown that the incarnation is a 'case' of such identity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

way as the second person did. But what is supposed in 1. is false and what is supposed in 2. is not simply proved.[19] The thesis which we here oppose is false. For if it were true, and if it occurred anywhere except on the fringes of theological thought and were really taken seriously, it would throw the whole of theology into confusion.[20] There would be no longer any real and intrinsic connexion between the mission of a divine person and the immanent life of the Trinity. Our sonship in [92] grace would have absolutely nothing to do with the sonship of the Son, since it would have been absolutely the same if it could have been based on any other incarnate person of the Godhead. There would be no way of finding out, from what God is to us, what he is in himself as the Trinity. These and many other similar conclusions which would follow from the thesis in question are quite contrary to the inner movement of Sacred Scripture. This can only be denied if one does not submit one's theology to the norm of Scripture but only allows it to say what is already known from one's scholastic theology and dissolves the rest away in clever and cold-blooded distinctions.

All this could and should be proved in detail. Here we must confine ourselves to affirming the contrary thesis. But since the thesis we reject cannot claim to be obligatory in dogma or theology, it is legitimate in the context of a short essay simply to state that we reject it. In doing so, one is surer of remaining within the framework of what has really been revealed than with the opposite thesis. One has a theology which neither expressly nor silently – which is far more dangerous – counts on an ostensible possibility of which revelation says nothing. One abides by the truth that the Logos is such as he appears to be in revelation: as the revealer of the triune God by virtue of the personal being which is proper to him alone, as Logos of the Father and not as one of the possible bearers of revelation.

The third difficu1ty,[21] which gives the second its full force, is as follows: if the human nature of the Logos is seen only as something self-contained, something constituted by its own rounded-off being, created according to a plan or 'idea' which of itself has nothing to do with the Logos, or at least nothing more than other possible created beings: then this nature subsists in the Logos, of whom this natural reality and its acts may be truly predicated as his own; it can be formally – but, only very [93] formally – said that the Logos is 'present' and 'active' in the world and its history by means of this human reality. But this whole reality really 'betrays' nothing of the Logos himself as such. He displays only the universal traits, those which are 'human' in any case, or at the very most he displays through this reality something miraculous and superhuman, by means of preternatural traits which can be observed in him but which do not belong otherwise to human nature. But universal human nature as such would not display the Logos as such. All he would do would be to show himself therein formally as a subject of action. And thus an immanent trinitarian reality

[19] To deny that the Father or the Spirit could become man would be to deny a 'perfection' in them only if it were certain that such a possibility really exists for the Father or the Spirit and hence is a 'perfection'. But this is precisely what is not established. To proceed from the Father is for instance a perfection for the Son as Son. But to conclude from this that the Father as such must also possess this perfection would be sheer nonsense. But since the hypostatic function ad extra is the divine hypostasis in question, nothing can be deduced from the function of this hypostasis with regard to another hypostasis – even though our abstract general concept of subsistence points to no contradiction in the notion of the Father's giving subsistence to a human nature.

[20] We have already indicated at the beginning of this essay that it is taken for granted almost without a word and has considerable influence, so that it may be said to be an anonymous but very effective factor.

[21] This difficulty is mostly present 'anonymously' in theology. It is difficult to formulate it clearly, though it is probably behind all the Christological debates which still exist today in Catholic Christology – as for instance in the difference between Chalcedonism and neo-Chalcedonism. The question is the following: is the humanity of the Logos simply an alien element which has been assumed, or is it precisely that which comes about when the Logos ex-presses himself in the region of the non-divine? Is the content of the incarnation (that is, what the Logos becomes) to be explained on the basis of human nature as already known – which therefore does not become any better known by the incarnation – or is human nature, to be ultimately explained on the basis of the self-exteriorizing self-expression of the Logos himself?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

would have gone out of itself, in the real economy of salvation, only as an empty formality. Something already known but non-trinitarian would have been created and assumed in this form, as something already pre-supposed, logically and objectively, if not in time. But under such circumstances one could not really say that the Logos has gone out of his immanent divine unrelatedness and has shown himself through his humanity and in his humanity. Likewise, it would not be really possible to say: he who sees me, sees me. The most one could have seen of the Logos as subject, when one met the humanity of Christ as such, would have been the formal, abstract truth of his role as subject.

Here then is the question: how are we to take the non-confusion α∴σνγξυ/τωφ of natures which is affirmed by the Council of Chalcedon? Does it mean that the human nature of the Logos has no other relationship to him than that of any creature to its creator, apart from the fact that it formally subsists by the Logos? The human nature is indeed 'affirmed' by its subject, but this subject does not really affirm itself in it! Possibly the difficulty has never been fully brought to light in the reflective consciousness, but it remains vaguely and therefore all the more effectively and disturbingly at the basis of every Christology. It is still more impossible to give here a proper account of the correct answer, as we see it, to the question here proposed. All we can say is, no, it is not like that: the basic relationship between the Logos and the human nature assumed in Christ is not what the difficulty in question says. The relationship between the two is more essential and intrinsic. Human nature in general is a possible object of the creative knowledge and power of God, because and in so far as the Word is essentially the expressible, he who can be expressed even in the non-divine, being the Word of the Father, in whom the Father can express himself and – freely – exteriorize himself, and because, when this takes place, that which we call human nature comes into being.

[94] In other words, human nature is not an outward mask that is assumed (the προ/σωπον), a dress uniform concealing the Logos while he makes gestures in the world. It is, by virtue of its origin, the constitutive real symbol[22] of the Logos himself, so that we can and must say of its ultimate ontological Origin that man is possible because exteriorization of the Logos is possible. We cannot discuss the thesis more closely here, and still less prove it. We must refer to recent works which consider this question either explicitly or in substance.[23] But if the answer to the question is as we have suggested, we can affirm vigorously and without any silent reserves What Jesus is and does as man, is the self-revealing existence of the Logos as our salvation among us. But then we can really say, in the full sense of the words; here the Logos with God and the Logos with us, the Logos of the immanent Trinity and the Logos of the economy of salvation, is strictly one and the same.[24]

---

[22] On this concept, see my essay, 'On the Theology of the Symbol', pp. 221-252 of this volume.

[23] The following works call for particular attention here: B. Welte, 'Homoousios hemin' in Chalcedon heute III (Wurzburg 1954) 51-80; K. Rahner, 'Current Problems in Christology' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore Md. 1961) 149-200; K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of the Symbol' (see note 22); K. Rahner, 'On the Theology of the Incarnation' in this volume, pp. 105-120; F. Malmberg, 'Der Gottmensch', Quaestiones disputetae 8 (London).

[24] This sameness – since we are not dealing here with the formal subject of the Logos in the abstract but with the concrete, incarnate Logos – is that which Ephesus and Chalcedon express as at once 'inconfused and unseparated', and hence not the sameness of a lifeless identity, where nothing can be distinguished because everything is always the same. It is the sameness in which the one and the same Logos is himself in the human reality, because nothing alien (human nature) has been attached to him as an addition – if it were, this 'union' could not really be thought of as a union, but merely as the juxtaposition of two realities. The Logos constitutes the other as the other, because he thus constitutes and expresses himself. The difference must be thought of as an inner modality of the unity itself. And hence we are to understand that within and 'without' the Trinity, the sameness is direct and immediate, not resulting from the denial of another reality, but the supreme form of true sameness.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Trinity of the economy of salvation is the immanent Trinity – that is the statement which we have undertaken to explain here. We have now shown that this axiom is verified in at least one case which is dogmatically incontrovertible. But that this case is really a precedent or instance can only be proved when we reflect on the doctrine of grace. This is a case of non-appropriated relationships of the divine persons to the justified. The problem and the different opinions to which it has given rise among theologians are well known and need not be expounded again [95] here. But in any case, and to say the least, the thesis of proper, non-appropriated relationships is a free theological opinion and not in conflict with dogma. We pre-suppose it here,[25] and merely try to develop the well-known and widespread – though not undisputed – doctrine in the line of our thesis.

The thesis, which we pre-suppose as justified here,[26] is, when understood rightly and taken seriously, not a piece of scholastic subtlety but a simple and straightforward statement. It is that each of the three divine persons communicates himself as such to man, each in his own special and different way of personal being, in the free gift of grace. This trinitarian communication (the 'indwelling' of God, the 'uncreated grace', to be understood not merely as the communication of the divine 'nature' but also and indeed primarily as communication of the 'persons', since it takes place in a free spiritual personal act and so from person to person) is the real ontological foundation of the life of grace in man and (under the requisite conditions) of the immediate vision of the divine persons at the moment of fulfilment. This self-communication of the divine persons obviously takes place according to their personal proprieties and that means also according to and by virtue of their relation to one another. If a divine person were to communicate himself otherwise than in and through his relationship to the others, to set up his own special relationship to the justified (a reciprocal one), this would mean and pre-suppose that each single person (precisely as such, in so far as he is distinguished by reason from the one and the same nature) would be something absolute and not merely relative. The true foundation of the doctrine of the [96] Trinity would be abandoned. But this means further: these three self-communications are the self-communication of the one, God in the threefold relative way in which God subsists. Hence the Father gives himself, to us as Father, that is, in and by the very fact that being essentially himself he expresses himself and thus imparts the Son as his own personal self-disclosure:[27] and also in and by the very fact that the Father, and the Son who receives all from the Father, affirming themselves in love, inclining to themselves, coming to themselves, impart themselves in loving acceptation, that is, as Holy Spirit. God's relationship to us is three-fold. And this three-fold (free and unmerited) relationship to us is not merely an image or analogy of the immanent Trinity; it is this Trinity itself, even though communicated as free grace. For what is communicated is precisely the triune personal God. And the free communication in [25] Here we note one point only. If one applies the medieval theology and its classic ontology of the beatific vision to the incontestable truth of the vision of the divine persons as such, this thesis cannot be logically denied with regard to the vision. And then it must also hold good for the grace of justification, which is the ontological basis and formal beginning of the immediate vision of God. We have therefore an immediate vision of the divine persons, which cannot be thought of as mediated by a created 'species impressa', but only by the actual reality of the object contemplated itself which imparts itself in real quasi-formal causality to the subject, as the onto-logical condition of possibility of formal knowledge. But this implies necessarily a real and ontological relationship of the subject to each of the persons as such in their real proprieties. This point was perhaps not considered attentively enough by medieval theologians, but it is certainly a consequence of their theological principles with regard to the vision.

[26] Further support for the thesis will be adduced later, even if only in outline, when we consider the actual history of the revelation of the Trinity.

[27] The self-communication of the Father as he 'speaks out' the Word into the world means the reciprocal unity of the incarnation and the bestowal (in grace) of this Word on (believing) men. That this is so and how it is so, we cannot show further here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grace to the creature, if it takes place, can only come about after the manner of the two immanent communications of the divine essence, from the Father to the Son and the Spirit. Any other communication could not impart that which is here imparted, namely the divine persons, since they are absolutely indistinguishable from their own proper mode of communication.

We can now consider the relationship between immanent and salvific Trinity the other way round. The one God imparts himself as absolute self-utterance and absolute gift of love. This communication – the absolute mystery, which is only revealed in Christ – is however self-communication. God does not merely give his creature a 'share' 'in himself' (indirectly) by creating and donating finite realities through his all-powerful efficient causality: but he gives himself, really and in the strictest sense of the word, in a quasi-formal causality.[28] But this self-communication of [97] God to us has, according to the testimony of revelation in the Scripture, a three-fold aspect. It is a self-communication in which that which is imparted remains the sovereign and incomprehensible, and which even as something received continues to be unoriginated and not at the disposal or within the grasp of anyone. It is a self-communication in which the God who reveals himself 'is there',[29] as self-expressive truth and as free directive power acting in history. And it is a self-communication in which the God who imparts himself brings about the acceptation of his gift, in such a way that the acceptance does not reduce the communication to the level of merely created things. But this three-fold aspect of the self-communication must not be considered, in the dimension of the communication, as a merely verbal development of a communication which is of itself undifferentiated. In the dimension of the economy of salvation, the distinction is truly 'real': the origin of the self-communication of God, his radically self-revealing and self-expressing 'existence', the acceptance, which he himself brings about, of the self-communication, are not simply one and the same thing which is merely described by different words. In other words, according to the self-understanding of the experience of faith, as attested in Scripture, the Father, the Word (Son) and the Spirit – no matter how infinitely inadequate all these words are and must be – indicate a true difference, a double mediation within this self-communication.

But again, this two-fold mediation by Word and Spirit (as shown ever more clearly and irrecusably in the history of the self-revealing self-communication) is not a mediation on the plane of the created, where God would not be imparted really as himself. According to the testimony of faith, the salvific self-communication of God is really three-fold, and a Sabellian view of the economy of salvation is false. And again, the modes of being whereby God comes to us are not created intermediaries or powers of this world Such a basically Arian view of God's gift would eliminate all real self-communication and reduce the eschatological event of salvation in Christ to the level of a series of provisional and incomp1ete mediations,

---

[28] It follows as a formal axiom that if the difference present in something imparted by God, as such, is only on the side of the creature, there can be no question of a self-communication, in which there is a real difference in that which is imparted as such, therefore 'for us', God must then be differentiated 'in himself', without prejudice to his unity (which is then characterized as that of the absolute 'essence'), and this differentiation is characterized as the relative mode of the relationship of himself to himself. We may therefore affirm: if revelation (a) attests a real self-communication, and (b) declares that this self-communication contains differences for us (appears as mediated, but not by a mediation of a purely created type, which would destroy its character of real self-communication), then distinction and mediation is eo ipso affirmed of God as he is in himself and of himself.

[29] It must not be forgotten that the concept of the 'Word' is to be taken in its fullest Old Testament sense, i.e. as the powerful and creative word of God expressing itself in action and decision; the word by which God declares himself, through which he is present and active – so that there is never any question of a merely self-contained and theoretical discourse. Looked at in this way, the unity of God's 'Word' is far easier to comprehend when it has become flesh and is exercising its power and judgment over the hearts of men.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

such as prophets and servants of the Lord, angelic powers or [98] descending emanations of the Gnostic or Neoplatonic type. Thus the real communication, divine in nature, which takes place in the dimension of salvation must also be a real communication in God's own immanent life. The 'trinity' of the relationship of God to us in the order of the grace of Christ is nothing else than the reality of God as it is in itself: a 'Trinity of persons'. This would be Sabellianism or modalism only if the character of self-communication were ignored in the 'modality' of the relationship of God to the supernaturally elevated creature who shares by grace in God's own reality. But in uncreated grace and the hypostatic union, this modality is the very way in which God is 'in himself', and we do not consider that God is so little involved in this relationship that the 'difference' – as in creation and the natural relationship of God to the world – implies no distinction in God himself but leaves it rather on the side of the creature.

What then does it mean for the treatise De Trinitate if the identity of the salvific and the immanent Trinity is pre-supposed, or confirmed in the course of the treatise?

When entering upon the doctrine of the Trinity, we need not hesitate to appeal to our own experience of Jesus and his Spirit in us as given in the history of salvation and faith. For here the immanent Trinity itself is already present. The Trinity is not merely a reality to be expressed in purely doctrinal terms: it takes place in us, and does not first reach us in the form of statements communicated by revelation. On the contrary, these statements have been made to us because the reality of which they speak has been accorded to us. They are not made to be the touchstone of faith in something to which we have no real relationship, but because our grace and our glory cannot be disclosed to us except in the statement of this mystery. Both mysteries, that of our grace and that of God in himself are the same fathomless mystery. The treatise on the Trinity should never lose sight of this. It is the existential interest of the mystery for salvation that gives the treatise life and driving force, as it also provides the true key to its understanding. If our basic thesis is rejected, the Trinity can only be something to be revealed in purely conceptual statements, by a revelation given in words in contrast to a revelation given in God's salvific action towards us: and it will remain such as long as we do not have immediate vision of it as it is in itself absolutely.[30] And the treatise becomes as abstract and remote from life as it is in many books. [99] And the proof from Scripture inevitably becomes a method of subtle dialectics which draws conclusions from individual texts and builds them into a system which makes one ask whether God has really revealed us such far-fetched things in so obscure a way that it needs such complicated explanation.

If on the other hand we recognize that the Trinity itself as such is really possessed by us in the historic experience of salvation and grace which is given in Jesus and the Spirit of God working in us, we can always envisage the doctrine by having recourse to this experience. And there should be no treatise on the Trinity in which the most that is done for the doctrine of the 'sendings' is to put them into a relatively incidental or supplementary scholion at the end. Every treatise should be built up from the start from the 'sendings', even if for didactic reasons they are only treated explicitly at the end or perhaps even reserved for other sections of dogmatic theology. Indeed, the more boldly the treatise is aligned with the economy of salvation, the more likely it is to say the needful about the immanent Trinity, and make the truth really part of an understanding of the faith which is at once theoretical and existential.

The treatise can then trace the history of the revelation of this mystery. Whether this is done expressly or implicitly is a secondary question belonging to pedagogy, which we can omit here. It has been the custom of theologians in recent years to be very downright and uncompromising in their rejection of the older ideas that some sort of belief in the Trinity [30] Presupposing that the vision, when so understood, implies no intrinsic contradiction or that none is apparent.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existed even before Christ. A more qualified judgment should now be possible, and if applied to the treatise on the Trinity, should allow of a better understanding on the ancient tradition and the history of the revelation of this mystery.[31] The whole of the Old Testament is pervaded by the basic theme that God is the absolute mystery which no one can see without dying. Yet it is this very God himself who acts in history and converses with the Fathers. But this revelation and self-presentation in the Old Testament is done above all by the 'Word', though it appears also as the Angel of Yahweh, etc. This 'Word' at once makes God present in power and also merely represents him, as does the 'Spirit' which enables the word to be understood and proclaimed. Where Word and Spirit do not exercise their sway, Yahweh has withdrawn from his people; and when he renews his mercy towards the 'holy remnant', he sends the [100] prophets with his word in the fullness of the spirit. (The sapiential literature merely applies the same basic concept to law and wisdom, though in a more individualistic way, which is less impregnated with the dynamism of history.) God is present in the unity of Word and Spirit.

In principal, there is no precise and permanent difference between the three elements. God's presence by the Word in the Spirit must be different from himself, the eternal mystery: and yet it cannot be other than himself something that would stand before him and veil him. If the absolute nearness of the God 'who comes' is to be realized with regard to the covenant in which he really and truly imparts himself to his partner, then the dynamism of this historical process leaves only two courses open. Either the Word of God and the Spirit just disappear as created things, like the many prophets and their many words, in face of the unsurpassable and overwhelming presence of God himself, which is now revealed as the secret object of all partnership with God at all times. Or these two 'communications' remain, and are then at once revealed as being themselves truly divine, that is, as God himself, one with and distinct from the God who is to be revealed, in a unity and distinction which therefore belong to God himself. On this basis, the Old Testament must be understood to contain a genuine secret pre-history of the revelation of the Trinity. And this pre-history – which no one can totally deny – no longer gives the impression of dealing with antique concepts which are suddenly used in the New Testament, and still more in early Church history, to make assertions utterly remote from their genuine contents. When the unity of the salvific and immanent Trinity is thus invoked, another danger may be banished which, when all is said and done, remains the real danger of the doctrine, not so much in the abstract theology of the schools as in the average understanding of the normal Christian. It is that of a crude tritheism,[32] not of course explicit but nonetheless very deeply embedded, [101] which is a much greater danger than a Sabellian modalism. It is undeniable that the doctrine of the three persons in God evokes the almost unavoidable danger, which is usually countered far too late by express correctives, of thinking of three different consciousnesses. The danger is increased in the usual scholarly approach to the doctrine of the Trinity. It begins with a concept-of 'person' taken from experience and philosophy and develops it independently of the revealed doctrine of the Trinity and the history of its revelation. The resulting notion is then applied to God and used in the proof that three such persons exist in God. The treatise [31] Especially in the actual history of the concepts which underwent a real historical process as they gradually and correctly took on a trinitarian meaning.

[32] There is in fact a dilemma which we must make constant efforts to avoid. The ordinary religious consciousness may ignore the Trinity, as we remarked at the beginning of this essay, and replace it by a pure, undifferentiated and lifeless monotheism. Or again, it may try hard to grasp the doctrine of the Trinity and then fall into a tritheism, which is only verbally avoided by a profession of faith in the oneness of God (which is of course never denied). It suffers from the lack of a mediating principle, which allows us to think of the intrinsic unity of the one and triune God, not merely in the formal, static abstract, or as 'God in himself', but also in the concrete and as 'for us': that is, as a reality which allows itself constantly to be vitally realized in us (that is, as the mystery, which bestows itself on us through the Word in the Spirit and as Word and Spirit).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

then generally goes on to reflect on the relationship between unity and triune 'personality' in God, during which no doubt the needful is said about the more exact and correct understanding of these three 'persons'. The process is a sort of after-thought, in which – without, to be sure, admitting it – one makes the necessary modifications and restrictions with regard to the concept of person with which one began this spiritual Odyssey in the ocean of the mystery of God. But in all honesty, one must ask oneself with some embarrassment at the end what right one has to call the surviving remnant of the triune 'personality' in God a person, if one has had to eliminate from these three persons precisely what one began by thinking of as person. And then, when the more subtle distinctions of theology have been returned to oblivion, one notices that one is probably back with the false and basically tritheistic position, in which the three persons are thought of as three personalities with different centres of action.

But why not operate from the very start with a concept and a word – call it 'person' or anything else that seems fitting – which can be more easily adapted to the matter in hand and can render it with less risk of misunderstanding? This is not to affirm with Karl Barth that the word 'person' is not apt when speaking of the reality in question and that it should be replaced by some less ambiguous word in Church terminology. We may however concede that the development of the word 'person' outside the theology of the Trinity, after the definitions of the fourth century, took a very different direction from its originally near-Sabellian tone. It developed the existential meaning (as in Hermes) of the ego which is opposed to every other person in independent, proper and distinctive freedom. The ambiguity of the word was thereby increased. However, there it is, sanctioned by the usage of more than fifteen hundred years, and there is no other word which would be really better, more generally understandable and less exposed to misconceptions. We must therefore [102] continue to use the word, even though we know there is a history behind it and that strictly speaking it is not altogether suitable to express what is meant and has no great advantages. But if one is definite and systematic in approaching the mystery of the Trinity from the stand-point of the economy of salvation, there is as little need to operate with the notion of 'person' from the beginning as in the history of revelation itself.[33] Starting from the presence of God the Father himself, communicated in the economy of salvation through the Word in the Spirit, one could show that the differentiation in the 'God for us' is also that of the 'God in himself', and go on simply to explain that this three-fold quality of God in himself may be called triune 'personality'. Thus we shall on principle confine the notion of 'person' in this context to what may be affirmed of it from this starting-point, which is that offered by the testimony of Scripture. All difficulties would not disappear, because in non-theological contexts the concept of person today has in fact another meaning. But the difficulties could be rendered less acute and the danger of a tritheistic misunderstanding lessened.

Finally, this approach to the mystery would allow us to re-state the question of the relationship, connexion and difference between the two treatises De Deo Uno and De Deo Trino. It is not so easy to distinguish them as it has been supposed to be since St Thomas set the example. For if the title De Deo Uno is taken seriously, we are not dealing merely with the essence and attributes of God, but with the unity of the three divine persons. It is the unity of Father, Son and Spirit and not merely the unicity of the godhead, the mediated unity, of which the Trinity is the proper fulfilment, and not the immediate unicity of the divine nature which if considered as one numerically is of itself far from providing the foundation of the [33] The concept of person in this connexion is sanctioned by the magisterium. But this does not necessarily mean that it must be the starting-point of all theological considerations. It can also be the point at which one arrives after re-tracing in theological thought the development of revelation and of the doctrine of the Church. And precisely because one re-traces this development, one never emancipates oneself for a moment from the doctrine and magisterium of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

three-fold unity in God. But if one begins with the treatise De Deo Uno and not with De Divinitate Una, one is concerned at once with the Father, the unoriginated origin of the Son and the Spirit. And it is then strictly speaking impossible to place one treatise after the other in the disjointed fashion which is still so common today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[103]

PART THREE

Christology

[105]

4

ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE INCARNATION

This is an effort to meditate a little on the mystery which we call the mystery of the incarnation of the Word of God. It is the very centre of the reality from which we Christians live, of the reality which we believe. For the mystery of the divine Trinity is open to us only here; only here is the mystery of our participation in the divine nature accorded us; and the mystery of the Church is only the extension of the mystery of Christ. Since our faith is contained in this conjunction of mysteries, we should meditate on this centre of theology and of Christian life, and often speak less of a thousand other things. For this mystery is inexhaustible and in comparison with it most of the other things of which we speak are unimportant. It is a gloomy sign in theology and Church preaching that when we speak of the all-embracing mystery we do little more than repeat, somewhat tediously, what has already been said. But the truth of faith can only be retained by continuous new efforts in its regard. Here too it is true to say that one can only possess the past by making the present one's own. The only consolation for this deficiency in theology is the fact that there are men who in life and death are united with the Lord in faith – hope and love.

Let us put the simple question: what do we Christians mean when we profess our faith in the incarnation of the Word of God? That is what we must try to say in ever new ways. It is the whole task of Christology, which will never be completed. We put this beginner's question, knowing well that it alone is more than enough to engage us for the brief period of an hour. And we put it in this way, because we reserve the right to be a little arbitrary in selecting this or that fraction from the whole answer which we cannot give. And we shall rather pre-suppose throughout the answer of the magisterium than repeat it in express terms. This does not mean that the ancient formulas which answer the question are eliminated or discarded as antiquated or even false. God forbid! The Church and its [106] faith are always the same throughout their history, otherwise we should have an atomized history of religion composed of event after event, but no one history of the one Church and the abiding self-same faith. But since this one identical Church had and still has a history, the ancient formula is not merely the end. It is also the starting-point of a spiritual movement of departure and return which is our only guarantee – or better, hope – of having understood the ancient formula. For no understanding is possible anywhere if what is understood remains fixed and frozen and is not launched into the movement of that nameless mystery which is the vehicle of all understanding. If this is true in general, that is, if all our insight means being open to the incomprehensible mystery – which is not just the provisional remainder of what is to be grasped, but the condition of possibility of grasping and comprehending anything, the all-encompassing incomprehensibility of the Whole, no matter how it is named – then it is not surprising that it should be true above all when we are attempting to understand the tangible destiny of the incomprehensible Word.

The Word of God became man. To understand this statement, we must, in the brief time at our disposal, deny ourselves all consideration of the subject of the statement, the Word of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God as he is in himself, about whom this statement is made. The procedure, though here unavoidable, is very dangerous. For one could well miss the meaning of the incarnation if one's ideas about the 'Word of God', who became man, are very vague. Since the time of St Augustine it has undoubtedly been customary in the schools to take it for granted that any one of that non-numerical three, whom we call the persons of the one God, could become man, presuming he willed to. On this supposition, the Word of God in the statement made above does not mean much more than any divine subject, a divine hypostasis: 'one of the Trinity became man'. On this supposition therefore one needs to know only what is proper to the divine 'Word' himself. Nothing more is needed to understand the sentence. But if one follows the pre-Augustinian tradition and has doubts about the pre-supposition in question, it will no longer be so easy to give up trying to understand the predicate in the light of the subject of the sentence. For if it is of the essence and meaning of the Word of God that he and he alone is the one who begins and can begin a human history; if indeed God's way of owning the world is that the world is not only his work, a work distinct from him, but becomes his own reality (as the 'nature' which he has assumed or [107] the 'milieu' necessarily adjoined to that nature): then it could well be that one only understands incarnation when one knows what precisely Word of God is. And perhaps one only understands well enough what Word of God is, when one knows what incarnation is. But we lay aside – at least for the moment – this consideration. As the starting-point in our endeavour we take the predicate of the statement which we are going to consider.

I

The Word of God became man. What does it mean: 'became man'? We are here omitting entirely the question of what it means when we say that this Word 'became' something. We are considering only what it became: man. Do we understand that? It could indeed be affirmed that 'man' is easily the most intelligible element of this assertion. Man is what we are, what we experience every day, what has been tried out and interpreted a billion times already in the history to which we belong, what each of us knows inside himself and outside himself in his environment. One could go further and say: This is so well known that we can recognize its basic constituents and distinguish its essential contents from accidental modifications on the one hand and from an ultimate self-hood on the other. We can then give the name of 'nature' to the ultimate constituent and content and say that that is 'what' it is. Thus our assertion will mean: the Word of God has assumed an individual human nature and so has become man. But do we really know from what has been said what man is and so what 'human nature' is? Of course we know a lot about man. Every day the most diverse sciences make assertions about him, and all arts speak, each in their own way, about this inexhaustible theme. But has man been yet 'defined' by all this? To define something, to give a delimiting formula which will sum up adequately all the elements, is only possible when we are dealing with an object composed of elements which are themselves ultimates and understandable in themselves, that is, which are now and by their nature limited.

We omit the question as to whether a definition in the strict sense is ever possible on these terms. At any rate, it is impossible for man. Man is, one might say in way of definition, an indefinability come to consciousness of itself. Much about him can be defined, at least to some extent. He can also be called χωον λογικο/ν, animal rationale. But before one rejoices [108] at the simple clarity of this 'definition', one should ask oneself what λογικο/ν really means. But then one launches into an ocean which is literally boundless: for one can only say what man is by expressing what he is concerned with and what is concerned with him. But that is the boundless, the nameless. Man is therefore mystery in his essence, his nature. He is not in himself the infinite fullness of the mystery which concerns him, for that fullness is inexhaustible, arid the primordial form of all that is mystery to us. But he is mystery in his real being and its ultimate reason, in his nature, which is the humble, conscious state of being referred to the fullness, the form of the mystery which we ourselves are. When we have said everything about ourselves that can be described and defined, we have still said nothing about ourselves, unless we have included or implied the fact that we are beings who are referred to the incomprehensible God. But this reference, which is our nature, can only be conceived and understood when we allow ourselves freely to be grasped by the incomprehensible, ratifying the act which while remaining inexpressible is the condition of possibility of all intelligent expression.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Our whole existence is the acceptance or rejection of the mystery which we are, as we find our poverty referred to the mystery of the fullness. The pre-existent object of our acceptance or refusal, of the decision which is the deed of our life, is the mystery which we are. And this mystery is our nature, because the transcendence which we are and which we accomplish brings our existence and God's existence together: and both as mystery. And here we must always remember that a mystery is not something still undisclosed, which is a second element along with what is grasped and understood. This would be to confuse mystery with the still undiscovered unknown. Mystery on the contrary is the impenetrable which is already present and does not need to be fetched: it is not a second element unmastered only provisionally. It is the indomitable dominant horizon of all understanding, that which makes it possible to understand other things by the fact that it is silently there as the incomprehensible. Mystery is therefore not something provisional which is one day to be done away with or which could in fact be non-mysterious. It is the propriety which always and necessarily characterizes God – and through him, us – so much so, that the immediate vision of God which is promised to us as our fulfilment, is the immediacy of the incomprehensible. It is precisely the removal of the illusion that our lack of total comprehension is only provisional. For in this vision we shall see by God himself and not merely [109] by the infinite poverty of our transcendence that he is incomprehensible. But the vision of the mystery in itself, accepted in love, is the bliss of the creature and really makes what is known as mystery the burning bush of the eternally unquenchable flame of love.

What point have we reached now? We have come closer to our theme. If this is human nature, we begin to understand more clearly – always of course within the framework of the basic mystery which is God and we – what it means to say: God takes on a human nature as his own. The indefinable nature, whose limits – 'definition' – are the unlimited reference to the infinite fullness of the mystery, has, when assumed by God as his reality, simply arrived at the point to which it always strives by virtue of its essence. It is its meaning, and not an incidental activity which could perhaps be left aside, to be that which is delivered up and abandoned, to be that which fulfils itself and finds itself by perpetually disappearing into the incomprehensible. This is done in the strictest sense and reaches an unsurpassable pitch of achievement, when the nature which surrenders[1] itself to the mystery of the fullness belongs

[1] This 'act' of self-surrender is of course primarily the 'act' of the Creator in making human nature, and not something done 'accidentally' by man as a creature in his actus secondus deriving from his own decision. In the relationship however which exists between man's being as constituted by God and man's own action which derives from this being, we recognize the former through the latter. The action is consequent upon the nature, in such a way that (unlike that of sub-spiritual beings) man is called in his action to confront his nature, cause it to 'come to' itself and realize itself. Thus between the nature and its spiritual self-realization there ensues a unity, which (though not simply an identity) is not brought out well enough by the formal ontological 'unity' of substance and accident alone. To understand this properly, it must always be borne in mind that what God produces as the source of the proper activity of the spiritual creature (the 'physis' in the original Aristotelian sense) is precisely not a 'thing' with static 'qualities' which are 'just there' passively. It is a substance in action, an 'actus', which for this very reason, expands in the activity proper to itself and in which this divinely-created

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

so little to itself that it becomes [110] the nature of God himself. The incarnation of God is therefore the unique, supreme, case of the total actualization of human reality, which consists of the fact that man is in so far as he gives up himself. For what does the potentia oboedientialis mean for the hypostatic union? What does it mean when we say that human nature has the possibility of being assumed by the person of the Word of God? Correctly understood, it means that this potentia is not one potentiality along with other possibilities in the constituent elements of human nature: it is objectively identical with the essence of man. But once this is understood, it is impossible to contest on grounds of scholastic theology that one is justified in describing this essence in such a way that it appears precisely as this potentiality. And that is precisely what we have tried to indicate in the simplest possible outline.

This effort does not mean, 1. that the possibility of the hypostatic union can be strictly perspicuous as such a priori, that is, independently of the revelation of its de facto existence. And it does not mean, 2. that such a possibility must be realized in every man who possesses this nature.

1. The transcendence of man makes it clear that it would be wrong to define him, to delimit and put bounds to his possibilities. At least a hypothetical extension and culmination of the possibilities given with his transcendence are justified. But any type of fulfilment whatever remains within the bounds of the hypothetical as long as (and it will undoubtedly be impossible here) it is not proved that the transcendence would lose all meaning if it did not find precisely this fulfilment. And this transcendence means being immeasurably open with regard to the freedom of the mystery, and being utterly abandoned to the necessity of allowing oneself to be disposed of. We can therefore deduce from the transcendence no exigency of such fulfilment. And hence a strict knowledge of its possibility, including aspects which perhaps remain hidden to us, is not possible.

Hence it follows, 2. that the potentiality need not be realized in every man. And the fact of our being simply creatures, the fact of our sinfulness and of our radical peril, shows us, when our situation is brought to light in the word of God, that the possibility has not in fact been actualized in us. And yet we can say: God has taken on a human nature, because it is essentially ready and adoptable, because it alone, in contrast to what is definable without transcendence can exist in total dispossession of itself, and comes therein to the fulfilment of its own incomprehensible meaning. [111] Man has ultimately no choice. He understands himself as a mere void, which one can encompass only to note with the cynical laughter of the damned, that there is nothing behind it. Or – since he is not the fullness which can repose contentedly in itself – he is found by the infinite and so becomes what he is: one who never succeeds in encompassing himself because the finite can only be surpassed by moving out into the unfathomable fullness of God.

But if this is the essence of man, he attains his supreme fulfilment, the gratuitous fulfilment of his essence to which through his own ways of perfection he is always tending, only when he adoringly believes that somewhere there is a being whose existence steps so much out of itself into God, that it is just the question about the mystery utterly given over to the mystery. He must believe that there is a being who is the question which has become unquestioning, basic act realizes itself. Hence there is no other way to express this fact than to say that the spiritual being ‘gives itself, away from itself’, primarily in the act as which God creates it. The abysmal perdition of the creature which refuses to give itself to God can only be truly seen under this aspect. Otherwise there would only be an ‘accidental’ change ‘in it’, which would leave its nature basically intact, so that it would he really surprising that it perishes, and not merely the evil ‘in it’. The ‘existential’ self-dedication which is accomplished in the human spiritual nature of Christ corresponds in intensity to the basic act as which the nature assumed by the Logos was created by God as assumed: from the point of view of the nature, this substantial acceptance is substantial self-dedication.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because it has been accepted as his own answer by him who answers. And then we may perhaps say that it is not so strange, since this strange element already floats before the mind of man in the pure mystery of his primordial understanding, along with the perfected whole. The more difficult question is how and where and when one may give an earthly name to him who is such a being. But if one seeks him, to whom one can bring the eternal mystery of the pure fullness of one's own being for fulfilment, one can see very simply, if one seeks 'quietly', that is, in meekness and with the eyes of innocence, that it is only in Jesus of Nazareth that one can dare to believe such a thing has happened and happens eternally. The rest of us are all farther from God, because we always have to think that we are the only one to understand ourselves. But he knew that only the Father knows his mystery, and so he knew that only he knows the Father.

To avoid misunderstanding, we must note that the Christology outlined above is not a 'Christology of consciousness' in contrast to an onto-logical Christology affirming the substantial unity of the Logos with his human nature. It is based on the metaphysical insight, derived from a strict ontology, that true being is the spirit as such itself. It tries to formulate the necessary ontological counterpart to the ontic statements of tradition, so that we may reach a better understanding of what is meant, and in order that the true traditional affirmations do not give the impression that God has wrapped himself in the disguise of a human nature which only clings to him exteriorly and has come to his earth to set things right because they could not be managed from heaven. And there is [112] another remark to make. It might be imagined that this God-becoming-man takes place as often as men come into existence and that the incarnation is not a unique miracle. This would imply that the historicity and personality in question was reduced to the level of the nature which is everywhere and always the same: and this would be nothing short of mythologizing the truth. It would also ignore the fact the humanity of God – in which he is there as an individual for each individual man, not having come to divinize nature – can be and is in itself [2] favoured with nothing essentially more or less in the line of closeness to and encounter with God, than that which is in fact provided for each man in grace: the beatific vision.

II

The Word of God has become man: this is the assertion which we are trying to understand better. We take the word 'become'. Can God 'become' anything? This question has always been answered in the affirmative by pantheism and all other philosophies in which God exists 'historically'. But it leaves the Christian and all really theistic philosophers in a difficult situation. They proclaim God as the 'Unchangeable', he who simply is – actuus purus – who in blessed security, in the self-sufficiency of infinite reality, possesses from eternity to eternity the absolute, unwavering, glad fullness of what he is. He has not first to become, he has not first to acquire what he is. And precisely because we have received for our part the burden of history and change, as a grace and a distinction, we necessarily proclaim such a God, because it is only because he is the infinite fullness that the processes of spirit and nature can be more than the pointless self-awareness of absolute emptiness which collapses into its own void. And hence the acknowledgement of the unchanging and unchangeable God

[2] The words 'in itself' should be noted. All Catholic theologians are familiar with the view that the hypostatic union of the humanity of Christ with the Logos has as a necessary consequence the intrinsic divinization of this human nature. Though it is a consequence of the hypostatic union which is morally and indeed ontologically necessary, it is distinct from the union, and through it alone is the humanity of Christ sanctified and divinized 'in itself' – and (though in a unique measure of intrinsic holiness) is precisely that which is to be bestowed on all men as grace of justification.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in his eternally perfect fullness is not merely a postulate of philosophy, it is also a dogma of faith. Nonetheless, it remains true: the Word became flesh.

[113] And we are only truly Christians when we have accepted this. It will hardly be denied that here the traditional philosophy and theology of the schools begins to blink and stutter. It affirms that the change and transition takes place in the created reality which is assumed, and not in the Logos. And so everything is clear: the Logos remains unchanged when it takes on something which, as a created reality, is subject to change, including the fact of its being assumed. Hence all change and history, with all their tribulation, remain on this side of the absolute gulf which necessarily sunders the unchangeable God from the world of change and prevents them from mingling. But it still remains true that the Logos became man, that the changing history of this human reality is his own history: our time became the time of the eternal, our death the death of the immortal God himself. And no matter how we distribute the predicates which seem to contradict one another and some of which seem incompatible with God, dividing them up between two realities, the divine Word and created human nature, we still may not forget that one of these, the created reality, is that of the Logos of God himself. And thus, when this attempt at solving the question by the division and distribution of predicates has been made, the whole question begins again. It is the question of how to understand the truth that the immutability of God may not distort our view of the fact that what happened to Jesus on earth is precisely the history of the Word of God himself, and a process which he underwent.

If we face squarely the fact of the incarnation, which our faith testifies to be the fundamental dogma of Christianity, we must simply say: God can become something, he who is unchangeable in himself can himself become subject to change in something else.[3] This brings us to an [114] ontological ultimate, which a purely rational ontology might perhaps never suspect and find it difficult to take cognizance of and insert as a primordial truth into its [3] One can confine oneself to saying that the created thing is the humanity of the Word in itself, and that therefore something has happened, a change has taken place. But if one sees the event as taking place only on this side of the boundary which separates God and the creature, one has seen and said something which is true, but missed by a hairsbreadth and omitted what is really the point of the whole statement: that this event is that of God himself. This has not yet been expressed if one speaks for instance merely of the 'inconfused' human nature! To call it then a 'change' does not really matter: it is a reality (namely, that God himself has become flesh, through the fact that something has taken place in this human dimension), even though one fights shy of the term 'change'. If we do call it a change, then, since God is unchangeable, we must say that God who is unchangeable in himself can change in another (can in fact become man). But this 'changing in another' must neither be taken as denying the immutability of God in himself nor simply be reduced to a changement of the other. Here ontology has to orientate itself according to the message of faith and not try to lecture it. The formal truth of the oneness of God is not denied by the doctrine of the Trinity. But this oneness, such as we can conceive it (and which is a dogma) cannot be used to determine what the nature of the Trinity may be. So too here. We must maintain methodologically the immutability of God, and yet it would be basically a denial of the incarnation if we used it alone to determine what this mystery could be. If, to expedite the mystery, one transferred it into the region of the creature alone, one would really abolish the mystery in the strict sense. For in the finite alone as such there can be no absolute mysteries at all, because one can always conceive a finite intellect proportionate to any finite thing and able to fathom it. The mystery of the incarnation must lie in God himself: in the fact that he, though unchangeable 'in himself', can become something 'in another'. The immutability of God is a dialectical truth like the unity of God. These two truths only – de facto – retain their validity for us when we think at once of the two other truths (of the Trinity and the incarnation). But we cannot and may not think of either as prior to the other. We learn from the doctrine of the Trinity that radical unity (as we might conceive it, were our thinking it out not dominated from the start by divine revelation) is not an absolute ideal. Even in the Most High it is a Trinity because he is absolute perfection. In the same way we learn from the incarnation that immutability (which is not eliminated) is not simply and uniquely a characteristic of God, but that in and in spite of his immutability he can truly become something. He himself, he, in time. And this possibility is not a sign of deficiency, but the height of his perfection, which would be less if in addition to being infinite, he could not become less than he (always) is. This we can and must affirm, without being Hegelians. And it would be a pity if Hegel had to teach Christians such things.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

most basic and seminal utterances: the Absolute, or more correctly, he who is the absolute, has, in the pure freedom of his infinite and abiding unrelatedness, the possibility of himself becoming that other thing, the finite; God, in and by the fact that he empties himself gives away himself, poses the other as his own reality. The basic element to begin with is not the concept of an assumption, which pre-supposes what is to be assumed as something obvious, and has nothing more to do than to assign it to the taker – a term, however, which it never really reaches, since it is rejected by his immutability and may never affect him, since he is unchangeable, when his immutability is considered undialectically and in isolation – in static concepts. On the contrary, the basic element, according to our faith, is the self-emptying, the coming to be, the κε/γωσιφ and γε/νεσιφ of God himself, who can come to be by becoming another thing, derivative, in the act of constituting it, without having to change in his own proper reality which is the unoriginated origin. By the [115] fact that he remains in his infinite fullness while he empties himself-because, being love, that is, the will to fill the void, he has that wherewith to fill all – the ensuing other is his own proper reality. He brings about that which is distinct from himself, in the act of retaining it as his own, and vice versa, because he truly wills to retain the other as his own, he constitutes it in its genuine reality. God himself goes out of himself, God in his quality of the fullness which gives away itself. He can do this. Indeed, his power of subjecting himself to history is primary among his free possibilities. (It is not a primal must!) And for this reason, Scripture defines him as love – whose prodigal freedom is the indefinable itself. What then is his power of being creator, his ability to keep himself aloof while constituting, bringing out of its nothingness, that which in itself is simply something else? It is only a derivative, restricted and secondary possibility, which is ultimately based on the other primal possibility – though the secondary could be realized without the primal.

It follows – and this truth is now situated on a profounder level than before – that the creature is endowed, by virtue of its inmost essence and constitution, with the possibility of being assumed, of becoming the material of a possible history of God. God's creative act always drafts the creature as the paradigm of a possible utterance of himself. And he cannot draft it otherwise, even if he remains silent. For this self-silencing always presupposes ears, which hear the muteness of God. Though we cannot go into it here, this truth might be the key to understanding why precisely the Logos of God became man and why he alone become man. The immanent self-utterance of God in his eternal fullness is the condition of the self-utterance of God outside himself, and the latter continues the former. It is true that the mere constitution of something other than God is the work of God as such, without distinction of persons. Yet the onto-logical possibility of creation can derive from and be based on the fact that God, the unoriginated, expresses himself in himself and for himself and so constitutes the original, divine, distinction in God himself. And when this God utters himself as himself into the void, this expression speaks out this immanent Word, and not something which could be true of another divine person.

And now we can understand better what it means to say: the Logos of God becomes man. There are of course men who are not the Logos himself. There could of course be men, if the Logos had not become man. The lesser can exist without the greater, though the lesser is always [116] founded on the possibility of the greater and not vice versa, as an unworthy, resentful and proletarian type of thinking would have it, all too often and readily – a type of thinking which from sheer force of habit makes everything grow out of a lower stage. But when the Word becomes man, his humanity is not prior. It is something that comes to be and is constituted in essence and existence when and in so far as the Logos empties himself. This man is, as such, the self-utterance of God in its self-emptying, because God expresses himself when he empties himself. He proclaims himself as love when he hides the majesty of this love and shows himself in the ordinary way of men. Otherwise his humanity would be a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

masquerade in borrowed plumes, a signal that tells of the existence of something but reveals nothing of what is there. That there are other men, who are not this self-utterance of God, not another way of being God himself, does not affect the issue. For 'what' he is is the same in him and us: we call it human nature. But the unbridgeable difference is that in his case the 'what' is uttered as his self-expression, which it is not in our case. And the fact that he pronounces as his reality precisely that which we are, also constitutes and redeems our very being and history. He says openly into the freedom of God what we are: the truth in which God could express himself and expose himself to the empty nothingness which necessarily surrounds him. For he is love, and therefore necessarily the miracle of the possibility of the free gift, or better: as love, he is the incomprehensible obvious.

We could now define man, within the framework of his supreme and darkest mystery, as that which ensues when God's self-utterance, his Word, is given out lovingly into the void of god-less nothing. Indeed, the Logos made man has been called the abbreviated Word of God. This abbreviation, this code-word for God is man, that is, the Son of Man and men, who exist ultimately because the Son of Man was to exist. If God wills to become non-God, man comes to be, that and nothing else, we might say. This of course does not mean that man is to be explained in terms of his ordinary everyday life. It means that man is brought back home to the region of the ever incomprehensible mystery. But he is such a mystery. And if God himself is man and remains so for ever, if all theology is therefore eternally an anthropology; if man is forbidden to belittle himself, because to do so would be to belittle God; and if this God remains the insoluble mystery, man is for ever the articulate mystery of God. He is a mystery which partakes for ever of the mystery on which it [117] is founded, and must always be accepted in blissful love as the undecipherable mystery, even in the eternity where the provisional is past and done with. For we may not think that we could completely understand God's expression of himself outside himself, which is man, so that it, and we too, could become tedious to us. We do not think that we could see what is behind man except by seeing through him into the blessed darkness of God himself and then really understanding that this finite being is the finitude of the infinite Word of God himself. Christology is the end and beginning of anthropology. And this anthropology, when most thoroughly realized in Christology, is eternally theology. It is the theology which God himself has taught, by speaking out his Word, as our flesh, into the void of the non-divine and sinful. It is also the theology which we pursue in faith, unless we think that we could find God without the man Christ, and so without man at all.

We could still say of the creator, with the Scripture of the Old Testament, that he is in heaven and we are on earth. But of the God whom we confess in Christ we must say that he is precisely where we are, and can only be found there. And though he still remains the infinite, this does not mean that he is 'also' that and different elsewhere. It means that the finite itself has been given an infinite depth and is no longer a contrast to the infinite, but that which the infinite himself has become, to open a passage into the infinite for all the finite, within which he himself has become a part – to make himself the passage and the door, through whose existence God himself became the reality of nothingness. In the incarnation, the Logos creates by taking on, and takes on by emptying himself. Hence we can verify here, in the most radical and specifically unique way the axiom of all relationship between God and creature, namely that the closeness and the distance, the submissiveness and the independence of the creature do not grow in inverse but in like proportion. Thus Christ is most radically man, and his humanity is the freest and most independent, not in spite of, but because of its being taken up, by being constituted as the self-utterance of God. And the humanity of Christ is not the form in which God appears, in the sense of a vaporous and empty apparition which has no validity of its own in comparison with and in contrast to what is manifested. Since God himself 'goes out of' himself, this form of his existence has the most radical validity, force and reality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must therefore regard as heretical any concept of the incarnation which makes the humanity of Jesus only a disguise used by God to signal [118] his challenging presence. And it is this heresy, which was rejected by the Church in its struggle against docetism, Apollinarism, monophysitism and monotheletism, and not the truly orthodox Christology, which is today felt to be mythic and is rejected as mythology. It must indeed be conceded that such a mythological understanding of Christology can be implicit in the minds of many Christians, in spite of their professed orthodoxy, and inevitably calls forth the protest against mythology. The idea exists that God disguises himself as a man, or that needing to make himself visible, he makes gestures by means of a human reality which is used in such a way that it is not a real man with independence and freedom, but a puppet on strings which the player behind the scenes uses to make himself audible. But this is mythology, and not Church dogma, even though it may be a fair description of the catechism in many Christians' heads in contrast to the printed catechism. And one might go further and ask whether the would-be demythologizers of Christianity have not precisely the same idea of Christian doctrine as the pious and myth-minded Christians, though both know the orthodox formulas. And it may be that some non-Christians are thus led to rely on a cryptogamous heresy of Christians in their effort at demythologizing, thinking all the while that it is a dogma of Christianity.

We must on the other hand consider something which may make it more tolerable to listen to many docetic and monophysite overtones in the way some Christians speak of the incarnation. Many of those who reject the orthodox formulation because they misunderstand it, may still make a genuine existential act of faith in the incarnation of the Word of God. If one looks to Jesus, to his cross and death, and really believes that there the living God has said his last word, decisive, irrevocable and hence comprehensive; if he really believes that there God redeems him from the imprisonment and tyranny of the existentials of his blocked, guilty and doomed existence: he believes something that can only be true and real, if Jesus is what the faith of Christianity confesses. Whether he knows it consciously or not, he believes in the incarnation of the Word of God.

This is not to deny the importance of the formula which is objectively correct and which forms the ecclesio-sociological basis of the faith held and pondered in common. But only the heretic (not the Catholic) – one who identifies a genuinely heart-felt faith in the redeeming truth with the profession of the orthodox formulas of the Church – can deny a priori that there can be true faith in Christ even when the correct formulation [119] of Christology is rejected. In living out one's existence, one cannot adopt existentially every position which is conceptually thinkable. And therefore: whoever accepts Jesus as the ultimate truth about his life, and confesses that in him and in his death God says the last word to him, by which he lives and dies: such a one accepts him thereby as Son of God, such as the Church confesses, no matter how unfortunate or even false may be his own theoretical and conceptual formulation of the faith whereby he directs his existence to Christ. Moreover, Christ has confronted many who did not know that they were laying hold of him and casting themselves into his life and death to find there happiness and redemption: they did not know that they were meeting him whom Christians rightly call Jesus of Nazareth. Created freedom is always the risk of the unknown which, heeded or unheeded, lies within the known object on which the will is set. That which is absolutely unseen and wholly other is not appropriated by the free act, when it aims at definite and limited objects. But that does not mean that what is not expressed and formulated is necessarily quite unseen and unsought for. And the grace of God and Christ are in everything, as the secret essence of all eligible reality: it is not so easy to grasp at anything, without having to do with God and Christ – one way or another. Anyone therefore, no matter how remote from any revelation formulated in words, who accepts his existence, that is, his humanity – no easy thing! – in quiet patience, or better, in faith, hope and love – no matter what he calls them, and accepts it as the mystery which hides itself in the mystery of eternal love and bears life in the womb of death: such a one says yes to something which really is such as his boundless confidence hopes it to be, because God has in fact filled it with the infinite, that is, with himself, since the Word was made flesh. He says yes to Christ, even when he does not know that he does. For he who lets go and jumps, falls into the depths such as they are, and not such as he has himself sounded. Anyone who accepts his own humanity in full – and how immeasurably hard that is, how doubtful whether we really do it! – has accepted the Son of Man, because God has accepted man in him. When we read in Scripture that he who loves his neighbour has fulfilled the law, this is the ultimate truth, because God himself has become this neighbour. He who is at once the nearest to us and the farthest from us is always the one person who is accepted and loved in our nearest and dearest.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Man is a mystery. Indeed, he is the mystery. For he is mystery not [120] merely because he is open in his poverty to the mystery of the incomprehensible fullness of God, but because God uttered this mystery as his own. For supposing God wills to speak himself out into the void of nothingness, supposing he wills to call out his own Word into the mute desert of nothingness – how else could he do it than by creating the inward acceptance of this Word and by uttering his word to be accepted? And so it is all one: the self-utterance of God's Word and its acceptance. That this takes place at all is a mystery. A mystery is something that is totally unexpected and incalculable, something that is at once blissfully, mortally amazing and yet obvious – but obvious only because in the last resort the mystery makes the conceivable understandable and not vice versa. And so the incarnation of God is the absolute and yet the obvious mystery. One could almost think that what is strange, historically contingent and hard about it is not the thing in itself but the fact that the obviously absolute mystery has taken place precisely in Jesus of Nazareth, there and now. But when the longing for the absolute nearness of God, the longing, incomprehensible in itself, which alone makes anything bearable, looks for where this nearness came – not in the postulates of the spirit, but in the flesh and in the housings of the earth: then no resting place can be found except in Jesus of Nazareth, over whom the star of God stands, before whom alone one has the courage to bend the knee and weeping happily to pray: 'And the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[121]

5

DOGMATIC QUESTIONS ON EASTER

The title of this short essay should be taken seriously. It puts questions and gives few answers. And the answers themselves should really be taken as questions: it is only to avoid tediousness that they are not all put in the interrogative form. The dogmatic theologian must ask himself new questions about Easter in his present studies. For when he looks up the dogmatic text-books of today[1] and sees what the dogmatic theologian has to say as a professional on the theology of the resurrection, he has to confess somewhat regretfully that apart from some distinguished exceptions, of which there are naturally a few, at the present time very little is said about this fundamental event of the history of salvation. And that is not because there is little to be said about it. For it cannot be that dogmatic theology has nothing to say on the subject. It can only be due to an accident of history and a shortcoming in the fulfilment of the task that every text-book today offers a long treatise on Good Friday and disposes of Easter in a few lines. But if dogmatic theology is to say more about the Easter event and so help to build up faith among men, it must first be clearer about what it should speak of in this curtailed treatise. The first thing therefore that the theologian must do is to ask himself some questions. And some of these questions are presented here. They do not of course appear here for the first time. They are in fact questions which the faith and theology of the Church as a whole have [122] always been answering in chorus. It is however the task of man and of the theologian in particular to repeat the old questions in a new way, so that they may really have a new and vital understanding of the old questions.

The reasons why the theology of the resurrection as a whole has gone through such an astonishing process of shrinkage are undoubtedly very numerous. Our first task should be to ask what these reasons are, because an illness can only be cured as a rule when its causes are diagnosed. One reason is undoubtedly this: at the end of the 18th century, apologetics and fundamental theology were separated from dogmatic theology and became an independent science, whose object was to give the reasons for Christianity in general, and not just defend Catholic against non-Catholic Christianity. It followed that fundamental theology justifiably claimed the resurrection of Christ as the most important proof of the divine mission of the legatus divinus who founded Christianity. This makes it understandable, though not justifiable, that the dogmatic theologian should have gained the impression that everything important about the resurrection was already said by his colleague in fundamental theology. He thought then that in view of his chronic shortage of time for lectures, and the lack of space in the text-books, he could dispense himself from taking up the theme again and giving it full treatment. But in doing so, he forgot that fundamental theology cannot envisage at all the true content of the resurrection, since it views it only from the formal and hence standard viewpoint of miracle, as the attestation of a divine mission.

The dogmatic theologian could perhaps think that dogma had no more to say about the [1] Compare for instance the recent text-books of L. Ott and J. Solano, which are really excellent on the whole. L. Ott, Grundriss der Dogmatik[4] (Freiburg 1959) gives a page and a half (232f.) to this point, which are almost completely taken up with the apologetic aspects of the resurrection. Its soteriological import is given seven lines: the resurrection belongs to the perfection of the redemption and is the exemplar and pledge of our own bodily and spiritual resurrection. A few lines (234f.) on the soteriological import of the Ascension do not alter the situation. J. Solano, Summa Sacrae Tkeologiae per Patres S.J. Facultatum Theol. in Hispania Professores III[3] (Madrid 1956) offers a Scholion of less than a page to discuss the resurrection, in a Christology of 329 pages.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

resurrection than to affirm its reality, and perhaps to add that it is the transfiguration of the body of Christ and therefore something which Christ could claim to have merited – although he was comprehensor from the start through his immediate vision of God. If so, he does not need to go much beyond what has been said in fundamental theology. Further, the dogmatic theologian may succumb to the view that all that is to be said specifically about the risen and glorified Lord will be presented in eschatology in general, where the resurrection and bodily glorification of all men is spoken of. But one need do no more than leaf through a work of biblical theology, such as that of Durrwell,[2] on the [123] resurrection, to realize that Scripture does not allow us to say as little about the resurrection as is usually said on account of this strange division of labour between fundamental and dogmatic theology.

But the real reasons for the shrinkage in dogmatic theology lie deeper and are older. In contrast to St Thomas, and to Suarez, for instance, in post-Tridentine theology, the modern theology of the schools has become accustomed, without much misgiving, to pass over in silence the various mysteries of the life of Christ as a whole, apart from the incarnation and the crucifixion. They are omitted from Christology and left entirely to exegesis and pious reflexion. It is no wonder then that the mystery of the resurrection knew no better fate. But if we ask why these mysteries of the life of Christ, the circumcision, the baptism, the temptation, the transfiguration and so on, hold so little interest for the dogmatic theologian, we come closer to the profound reasons for the wilting of the treatise on the resurrection. The ultimate reason for this general phenomenon is surely the fact that occidental theology adopted a purely juridical interpretation of the redemption and of the meaning of Christ for salvation, apart from his role as teacher and founder of a religion and a Church. If God only confers salvation upon us because having demanded a satisfactio condigna for the guilt of mankind, he prepared it for himself in the death of Christ on the cross, all other events of the life of Christ can naturally only be regarded as mere preparatives for this salvific action of God, which is formally concentrated on the cross alone. The one decisive event is Good Friday alone, as such. One can no doubt still pay tribute to the older liturgical tradition and celebrate Easter as the chief feast of Christianity, but the real 'feast-day' of Christianity is Good Friday, and the crucified, the man of sorrows, is the object of piety, love and contemplation.

This juridical theory of satisfaction starts from the silent presupposition, that God could have taken any work of satisfaction done by the God-man, no matter what, once it is dignified by the value of the person who does it, and fixed it as the work of redemption; and that in fact he decreed to choose the death of Christ on the cross. Everything then follows naturally from this silent presupposition. Easter is really only interesting with regard to the private destiny of Jesus. It can have no real significance with regard to salvation. It may be honoured at best as a confirmation of the fact that our interpretation of Good Friday is correct. When Protestant Christians make Good Friday the chief feast of the [124] liturgy and when a Rudolf Bultmann in his work of demythologizing appears to look away from Easter, to concentrate his theology, and the faith, exclusively on the cross: these are all consequences, though perhaps of the most radical type, of the 'juridical decree' theory of redemption. It is a theology which can probably be traced back from St Anselm through St Augustine to the beginnings of a specifically western theology in Tertullian and St Cyprian. It looks on the incarnation – not of course consciously, in a rigidity which would be almost on the way to becoming heretical – as really nothing more than the setting up of the subject, who, when he wills to, and when his act is reckoned by God as man's accomplishment, can make an equivalent satisfaction for the [2] F. X. Durrwell, The Resurrection of Jesus (translated from the French) (London & New York 1960); cf. also J. Schmitt, Jesus ressucité dans la predication apostolique (Paris 1949); further literature on the dogmatic aspect of the resurrection is given in the LTK[2] I, 1035, 1041, where Protestant literature is also given.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

insult offered to God by men's sin. Consequently, it is also only natural that western theology should declare that the incarnation of the Logos was only willed by God in view of the obliteration of sin. It is likewise understandable that western theology is slightly embarrassed when it has to answer the question as to what function the risen and exalted Lord still has. The happiness of his humanity in heaven seems after all to mean no more than his own personal bliss.

The Thomistic doctrine of a permanent and 'physical' mediation of grace allotted a function to the humanity of Christ after his resurrection. But the doctrine remained so obscure, and was so constantly controverted,[3] that it could exercise no really formative influence on Christian life and piety. Theological speculation on the blessedness of the individual was based entirely on the concept of the immediate vision of God – nulla mediante creatura in ratione obiecti visi se habente, Denzinger 530. There seemed to be no room here for the humanity of Christ, so this type of speculation also made it difficult to assign a permanent salvific function to the glorified Lord. The constant intercession of the risen Lord (cf. Jn 14.2f.; [125] 14.16; 16.7; Rom 8.34; Heb 7.25; 9.24; 1 Jn 2.1), and the bliss of conversing with him in his humanity, appeared almost as an anthropomorphism. It is no wonder that the piety of the West, refusing of course to abandon Christ and not finding sufficient satisfaction in the earthly life of Jesus, concentrated on the presence of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. Here he was close to Christians. J. A. Jungmann has traced the disappearance of the mediatory function of Christ in salvation, which naturally obscured above all the meaning of Easter, to the struggle of the West against Arianism. It made Christ simply 'God with us', and Christ's role of mediator with the Father had necessarily to recede into the background. This would agree with what has been said above, since the decisive element in the western theory of redemption is simply the dignity of the divine person, so that the peculiar inner-trinitarian relationship of the Son to the Father plays no indispensable and necessary role.[4] This again accords well with the basic attitude of western theology, which, in contrast to the earlier tradition, has taken for granted since St Augustine that each divine person could appear hypostatically in the world, so that the mediation of the Logos within the Trinity is not really continued in the sending of the Son into the world.[5] And one could go on to ask whether this curtailment of the mediatorship of Christ since St Augustine is also connected with the anti-Arian polemics of St Augustine.

No doubt the struggle with Arianism affected all these questions, and so also contributed to the minimizing of the resurrection in theology and piety. But it is far from explaining adequately the historical phenomenon in question. A disciple of Jungmann, H. J. Schulz, has published an interesting book[6] in which he asks why in the East, according to the testimony of the liturgy, an intense devotion to Easter, with cosmic overtones, could be cultivated along with an equally emphatic stress on the divinity of Christ in the same liturgy, which however

---

[3] Cf. Th. Tschipke, Die Menschheit Christi als Heilsorgan der Gottheit unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Lehre des hl. Thomas von Aquin (Freiburg 1940); D. van Meegeren, De causalitate instrumentali humanitatis Christi iuxta D. Thomae doctrinam (Venlo 1939); L. Seiller, L'activité humaine du Christ selon Duns Scot (Paris 1944); J. Backes, 'Die Lehre des hl. Thomas von der Macht der Seele Christi', Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 60 (1951) 153-166. A purely moral causality of the humanity of Christ after his resurrection is not a new act of his free will and hence can only be the permanent validity (morally) of the redemptive act of his earthly life. It offers therefore no solution to our problem. See further: K. Rahner, 'The eternal significance of the humanity of Jesus for our relationship with God' in Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore, Md. 1967); J. Alfaro, 'Christo Glorioso, Revelador del Padre', Greg. 39 (1958) 222-270.

[4] Since western theology holds fast to the view that the redemptive sacrifice is also offered to the Logos himself, it has to suppose a double moral 'subject' in Christ, a concept which would allow any other person of the Trinity (or a merely monotheistic God, who becomes man) to make such satisfaction.

[5] Cf. e.g. M. Schmaus, Die psychologische Trinitätslehre des hl. Augustinus (Münster 1927).

[6] H.-J. Schulz, 'Die "Höllenfahrt" als "Anastasis" ', ZKT 81 (1959) 1-66.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

also allows the strict mediatory function of the man Christ with regard to God to recede to a great extent into the background. Schulz thinks that the answer to the question is to be found in the phenomenon of neo-Chalcedonian theology. In other [126] words, the Christology of St Cyril of Alexandria, while upholding of course the orthodoxy of Chalcedon with its emphasis on the non-confusion of the two natures in Christ, stresses more clearly than pure Chalcedonism the divinization of the creature by the Godhead who assumed it. It could therefore be more amenable to the notion that the cosmic process of divinization inaugurated by the incarnation could bridge the gulf between God and the creature, and attain its definitive triumph in the resurrection of Christ.

Schulz' theory is attractive. It answers a question which can in fact be only clearly formulated when one already has this key-word 'neo-Chalcedonianism' in mind, as the possible answer. But we must proceed carefully, and ask is this answer really correct, and above all, is it adequate. One could begin by putting a sceptical counter-question. Can such a subtle nuance in Christology, of which we are only now beginning to be aware, be invoked as the explanation of the important and palpable difference which exists between the piety of the East and the West with regard to Easter? And there is a further question. Was there not something objectively like neo-Chalcedonianism in the Christology of the West also, as a result of its marked anti-Arianism, and why had it not the same effect as Schulz supposes it to have had in the East? One could also ask whether neo-Chalcedonianism was not a result rather than a cause, stemming from a basic religious and theological attitude of the East which is lacking in the West. It manifests itself in the East in the strong devotion to Easter, which cannot but be absent from the West, even if a certain neo-Chalcedonianism of a conceptual and theoretical type can be found in western theology. Indeed, it is probably true that the theology of redemption was already different in the East and in the West, at a time preceding the differentiation in Christology. In other words, the West was thinking in juridical and moral terms before the $_5$th and 6th centuries. But in the East, while the significance of the cross was not lost sight of, the redemption was felt to be a real ontological process which began in the incarnation and ends not so much in the forgiveness of sin as in the divinization of the world and first demonstrates its victorious might, not so much in the expiation of sin on the cross as in the resurrection of Christ.

Clearly, there are already enough questions to be asked even with regard to the history of the dogmatic theology of Easter and its influence on piety. The few we have touched upon were chosen because of their [127] bearing on the shrinkage of Easter theology and piety in the West. Nothing at all has been said about the history of the individual truths present or called for in such a theology of Easter.

We add some questions about the content of the Easter dogma to the historical questions discussed above. The correct starting-point for a genuine theology of Easter is probably a correct understanding of Good Friday and Holy Saturday, that is, a true theology of death. And this means that the theology of the West need not deny its past to win a larger future for the theology of Easter. It only needs to enquire more profoundly and intensively into a question which has always engaged its attention, the death of Christ. We shall try here to indicate some questions which tend {n this direction. First of all, one should begin with the nature of the death and not merely enquire into the painful sufferings which preceded the death. It is almost automatic in the theology of the death of Christ and its soteriological significance to discuss the mortal suffering and to treat the death itself as the almost happy ending of the suffering to which attention has been confined. But then theology is discussing a subject, called the death of Christ, which is really not essentially different from any other possible work which Christ did or could have done during his life. And then its significance in the work of salvation can only be assessed in moral categories. But then one has missed the death by a hairs-breadth. And probably justifies the oversight by saying that the theology of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the salvific significance of Christ's death needs an object of moral value. Such is said to be absent from the death of Christ as such, in which he only passively undergoes the separation of soul and body, but is said to be found in the 'bitter sufferings' before it, since they alone provided Christ with the opportunity of exercising obedience and love. But before one settles for this, and actually abandons objectively the theology of the death of Christ as such, though perhaps not expressly, one should ask whether one has a correct concept of death at all, such as can make room for a theology of the death of Christ and open up new horizons.

For death[7] cannot perhaps be adequately described merely as the 'separation of soul and body'. Strictly speaking, regarded in the light of the process itself, though it is the climax of the extreme weakening of man's powers and his helpless collapse under the nameless mystery of [128] existence, still, it is also the supreme act of man in which his whole previous life is gathered up in the final decision of his freedom and mastered, so that he ripens for his eternity. If so, the human death of Christ is not just one moral act among others, performed in the moments preceding his actual death. It is of its nature the totality of the life of Christ in act, the definitive act of his freedom, the complete integration of his time on earth with his human eternity. All we can do here is point enquiringly to this truth. But if it is so, then the resurrection of Christ is not another event after his passion and death. In spite of the duration of time which intervenes, which is anyway an intrinsic component of even the most unified and indivisible act of spatio-temporal man,[8] the resurrection is the manifestation of what happened in the death of Christ: the imposed and enforced handing over of the whole bodily man to the mystery of the merciful loving God, by the concentrated freedom of Christ as he disposes of his whole life and existence. In this way, Good Friday and Easter can be seen as two aspects of a strictly unitary event of the existence of Christ which are essentially related to one another. And one need no longer have the impression that Good Friday could really retain it soteriological significance, as satisfaction for the insult to God's majesty, even if no Easter followed. But once this illusion has been eliminated, the soteriological significance of Easter can be seen to go far and essentially beyond its apologetical value and Jesus' personal blessedness. A piece of this world, real to the core, but occupied by the pure and sovereign power of the dispassionate freedom of Christ, is surrendered, in the total self-mastery which can be achieved by fallen man only in the act of death, to the disposition of God, in complete obedience and love. This is Easter, and the redemption of the world.

The resurrection of Christ is essentially, and not merely through being juridically accepted by God, the event in which God irrevocably adopts the creature as his own reality, by his own divine primordial act, as he had [129] 'already' done in the incarnation of the Logos. It is likewise the event in which God so divinizes and transfigures the creature that this glorification is accomplished as the total acceptance of this divine assumption by the freedom of the creature itself. But we must bear two things in mind if we are to understand this assertion. One is that this total acceptance of the divine assumption by the free creature must necessarily be death in an infralapsarian order of things, where death is the birth of life set free. The other is that the world is such a unity, physically, spiritually and morally, that the decision of the man Christ, as a real component of the physical world, as a member of the biological family of humanity (born of a woman as a child of Adam), as a member of the [7] See on the following K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death. Quaestiones Disputatae 2 (London 1964).

[8] A scholastic philosopher who has pondered the nature of the (temporal and spatial) continuum, should not find it hard to understand that a thing or process is not at once independent and distinct because it follows another in time. These moments can be temporal moments in a strictly unitary process, which though prolonged in time, cannot be disjointed as a being. The moments of a being (or at least of a process) do not need, in order to be one, to be simultaneously co-existent at any arbitrarily chosen point of time. We may recall here that even modern physics seems to admit ultimate atoms of time even for physical time, which are not really divisible although they 'last' and so seem to consist of still smaller parts.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human community in its history of light and shadow, is ontologically, and not merely by a juridical disposition of God, the irreversible and embryonically final beginning of the glorification and divinization of the whole reality. This is not to deny, but rather to affirm positively, that the unity of the world in all its dimensions and Christ's real ontological participation in this world is freely constituted by God. But then he does not just assign the world a juridical status in his mind. He creates its real, intrinsic and proper structure.

The notion of sacrifice may also throw light on what has been said. It is of the essence of sacrifice, and not just a more or less certain consequence extrinsic to its being, that it is accepted by God. That is why it needs the authorization of God, the appointment of a priest. God himself creates the possibility of men offering in such a way that their offering is accepted. A sacrifice only really exists when man's gift has really left the sphere of the profane and has entered that of the sacred, has become the 'possession' of God and has passed over to his exclusive disposition. Sacrifice and accepted sacrifice are one and the same thing. And where the sacrifice is offered not just by means of cultic symbol, but 'in the spirit and the truth', that is, where the intention expressed by the cultic sign, the total dedication of human reality to the absolute disposition of God's holiness, is truly effected: the acceptation of the sacrifice, which is of its essence, cannot be a juridical friction. It must be a reality. The proffered gift, which is the man himself, in all its dimensions, in its whole concrete reality, must be at the absolute disposition of God who has graciously accepted it. To be accepted totally and definitively, without restriction or reserve, by God who reveals and communicates himself: that is nothing else than being transfigured in the whole bodily reality, that is, being raised up from death and finally exalted. Hence the sacrifice of Good [130] Friday is only really consummated as a sacrifice when it is the sacrifice accepted in the Easter event. During the three days of Good Friday, Holy Saturday and Easter Sunday, the one, self-same, total event of salvation is accomplished in a sacred memorial (anamnesis), and it remains strictly one even though it continues in order to be itself.[9]

And now theology must look backwards to the question of the essence of the incarnation, to pose it anew and more deeply, so that in its light, the life of Jesus, its salvific value and so the resurrection may be more clearly understood. And it must look onwards to the question of the fact and meaning of the permanent, consummated – not 'ended' – mediation of the exalted Lord as he exercises this function for all men and for all eternity.

The first question might be put as follows. Can we understand the incarnation, the assumption of human reality by the Word, and the essence of this reality itself in such a way that the event of the incarnation is seen from the very start not just as the adoption of a fungible, statistical reality, but as the acquisition of a time, a history, a life-giving death by the Logos himself? So that in virtue of the inmost essence of the incarnation, seen itself as a formally salvific act, the one event composed of death and resurrection is implied and accepted? The history of man, his free action, and the absolute climax of his freedom are not to be considered as accidents attached to the unmodified substance of a nature conceived of as one thing to be registered among others. It must be regarded as the self-realization of a being which only attains its own reality in such a process of freedom, which is therefore not to be regarded so much as a 'faculty' which man 'has' as the power of free disposal which one is,[10] in order to be able to bring one's own imposed being, as itself to its proper [9] Cf. on this point M. de la Taille, Mysterium Fidei[3] (Paris 1931); Elucidatio XII-XV, 131-180.

[10] This is of course to be understood with the reserves which are always to be made in such statements when we are speaking of a finite being and not of the absolute God. But again, once this distinction is made, we must not overlook the fact that the 'act' of a sub-personal being has essentially a more extrinsic relationship to the nature of this being than in the case of a being which is aware of itself and realizes itself in freedom. In this case, the being is entrusted to itself. Though it cannot use its freedom to 'destroy' itself or eliminate itself, the free act still affects the nature in such a way that it is not merely the subject of the act, but becomes in a certain sense the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fulfilment. [131] From this point of view, the event of the incarnation is more closely and essentially allied to the fulfilment of the human life which is taken on, than if it is regarded as the setting up of a human subject, within whose life this or that event is afterwards added in.

With the correct interpretation of the death of Christ in mind, we can also look forward to what comes 'after' death. It is not to be regarded as an event prolonged in time and attached merely to the event of the death. It is the fully self-matured finality of this temporal life itself which has been fulfilled most really by death itself.[11] But if so, the Lord who abides must have a real salvific function which abides, otherwise no such salvific function can be ascribed to death itself. Death ends time by being its consummate validity and therefore eternity. Hence what follows 'after' death (and resurrection as essential element of this death) is precisely the definitive thing which took place in death. And vice versa: what now takes place is definitive and hence what is truly and eternally real and effective. The life of the exalted Lord is not the personal recompense for something which he did in his earthly life and which merely has 'consequences' which now persist in themselves after their cause is past. It is the very reality of the soteriological significance of his temporal life, accepted by God, set free to work, and actually effective.

We must of course ask ourselves how precisely this effective reality of a soteriological nature may be more adequately conceived of. How for instance is one to explain the fact that the humanity of Jesus retains its significance here and now, precisely where the infinite reality of the eternal God presents itself to the vision of the blessed to be enjoyed by them? One would have to show, in other words, that in the incarnation, and in the resurrection which is its consummation, the transfigured human reality of the Logos remains truly and perpetually the mediator to the immediacy of God. One would have to show that the essence of the supernatural grace bestowed upon creatures, given in the hypostatic union and essentially deriving from it[12] and not elsewhere, implies an immediacy which [132] has a certain ontological presupposition, which may be indicated by the concept of a mediated immediacy. For immediacy is always immediacy to something. The need for a certain manner of being or condition, etc., in the term to which something is to be immediately related, is not a contradiction of this immediacy but its necessary pre-supposition. Hence, for instance, all theological tradition, including the Council of Vienne, postulates the lumen gloriae as the presupposition for the immediate vision of God, and does not feel that this concept is contradictory to the immediacy, though this lumen is considered to be a created act itself. Man for instance does not merely commit evil actions: he himself becomes evil by these actions. And vice versa, where a free spiritual being is willed and accepted, the self-realization as such is willed and accepted, and not merely 'made possible' and (eventually) foreseen.

---

[11] Cf. on this point e.g. K. Rahner, 'The Life of the Dead' in this volume pp. 347-354.

[12] There is in fact reason to think that the connexion between incarnation and uncreated grace, in which God bestows himself supernaturally on man, is not merely de facto but essential. As regards the hypostatic union, this statement will hardly be contradicted by theologians. All will concede – to avoid falling into an unavowed Nestorianism and contradicting the real intention of the Christology of St Cyril – that the human nature of Christ must also be intrinsically divinized by what we call sanctifying grace. But then one must also note that this human nature is essentially part of mankind (as may be shown by a transcendental deduction from man's character as partner in a dialogue and as member of a family community) and hence cannot ultimately (as nature!) be withdrawn from its solidarity with the one human nature as a whole. We can then understand why the divinization of the human nature of the Logos by grace necessarily implies the call of all men to supernatural fellowship with God. And hence it is not too daring to suspect that there is also a necessary connexion from the other side: if there is to be grace as, a supernatural participation of man in the inner life of God through God's real self-communication to man, there must also be incarnation (where both are free because they are one consistent thing, and the necessity is the necessary consequence of something in itself free and necessary). But to make this quite clear, we should have to show that the hypostatic union is the necessary mediation of the immediacy which exists in the immediate vision of God, the supreme actuation of grace. But this demonstration cannot be attempted within the limits of this short essay.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reality. It admits therefore to the immediacy of God, it is sheer openness, it is that strictly supernatural created thing which in contrast to the natural order, and in consequence of a strictly formal and not efficient causality on the part of God, refers of itself to God as the infinitely remote ground of its being but, further, gives God himself absolutely, because it exists only through the absolute self-communication of God.

This leads to the question of how the lumen gloriae, which admits to the immediacy of God, is related to the glorified humanity of Christ, for which we have also claimed the function of perpetual mediation of the immediacy of the vision of God. This function must exist, if we are really to affirm a perpetual function of mediatorship in the God-man, and if it is not to be excluded by what is after all the essence of salvation and supernatural bliss, the immediate vision of God. The risen and exalted Lord must be the permanent and ever-active access to God, which is always being used anew and can never be left as something passed over and past. He must always show the Father. Only when we have understood [133] this, have we understood Easter as it is: the consummation of the world which gives access to God, who is really all in all through the Easter event, which has already begun but is still reaching completion in us.

When these considerations, which have been put here in the form of questions, have been really exactly answered, a more exact insight must result into the relationship between Easter as event and the fact of Christ's being risen (to indicate briefly what we mean). The relationship between an event and its effects, between a process and its results is not always the same. The event in which something eschatologically final comes to pass is infinitely closer to the result than an event which produces something which then continues to exist in the same process of time in which it came about. In the former case, the result does not go 'on', but is definitively what happened there. And in such a case, the event cannot recede into the past: it cannot become merely something that has been there, because the state of having been something only ensues when what remains takes on a new and different future, which is no longer that which came about by the event in question. A closer exposition of these observations must lead to the insight that the Easter feast refers to the event of Easter in an anamnesis[13] or memorial which really celebrates it, since the event has remained present in an ontologically unique and unsurpassable manner. But this again determines the unique character of the celebration itself. Anamnesis and that which is made present by it in its celebration condition each other reciprocally. On this basis one might show how every eucharistic celebration is essentially an Easter feast, not merely because it refers back to a 'past' event, but because it is the presence of that which came to be at Easter, to be finally the validity of the event itself. And then the feast of Easter would be merely a higher degree of expressiveness of what is always celebrated in the Eucharist in veritable anamnesis: the one event composed of the death and resurrection of Christ, which is of course past in the physical world (cf. Rom 6.9; Denzinger 2297) and which indeed had really to pass, in order that the definitive could come and stay, but which 'remains' in what is proper to it and hence can be enacted in its celebration.

[13] Cf. A. Darlapp 'Anamnese', LTK[2] 483-48.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[134]

6

VIRGINITAS IN PARTU

A contribution to the problem of the development of dogma and of tradition

It is well known that the question of the meaning and bearings of the Mariological doctrine, which is traditionally summed up as the doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu', has recently been posed anew by the book written by A. Mitterer.[1] An (unprinted) Innsbruck dissertation by W. Zauner (Untersuchungen zum Begriff der 'Virginitas in partu', Innsbruck 1955) expressed cautiously worded agreement with the theory of [135] Mitterer, though following a quite different method, more critically speculative and more concerned with the history of dogma.

Mitterer does not take as his starting-point the traditional content of the title 'virginitas in partu', as understood in fact in theology. He uses modern science to make a close analysis of the concepts of motherhood and virginity, in a way which must be called a priori from the point of view of theology and its data. On the supposition that full motherhood and full virginity are to be ascribed to Mary, according to the testimony of faith, Mitterer's analysis of the concepts leads him to the conclusion that full motherhood includes the processes which are denied it by the traditional interpretation, on the grounds that they are excluded by the 'virginitas in partu' – the opening of the genital passages, the breach of the hymen, the birth-pangs. He holds that full virginity can be preserved, hence even 'in partu', when these processes take place,[2] because they have nothing to do with the concept of bodily virginity. Accordingly, the miracle of the 'virginitas in partu', according to Mitterer (who maintains both the virginity and its miraculous character in the case in question), is not concerned with the actual manner of the process of birth and its consequences;[3] the miracle consists of the

---

[1] Dogma und Biologie der Heiligen Familie (Vienna 1952). For comment on Mitterer's position see H. Doms, 'Ein Kapitel aus den gegenwartigen Beziehungen zwischen Theologie und Biologie', Th. Rv. 48 (1952) 201-212. W. Dettloff, 'Virgo-Mater. Kirchenväter und moderne Biologie zur jungfräulichen Mutterschaft Mariens' Wi. Wei. 20 (1957) 221-226; For other recent discussion of the question see (apart from text-books of theology and Mariology in general) H. Koch, Virgo Eva – Virgo Maria. Neue Untersuchungen über die Lebre von der Jungfrauschaft und Ehe Mariens in der ältesten Kirche (Berlin-Leipzig 1937); J. C. Plumpe, 'Some little-known early witnesses to Mary's Virginitas in Partu', TS 9 (1948) 567-577; H. Rahner, Die Marienkunde in der lateinischen Patristik: Maria in der Offenbarung, ed. by P. Sträter (Paderborn 1947) 137-182; J. Ortiz de Urbina, Die Marienkunde in der Patristik des Ostens, ibid. 85-118; Ch.-G. Le Jouassard, 'Marie à travers la Patristique' in H. du Manoir, Marie. Etudes sur la Sainte Vierge I (Paris 1959) 69-157: J. Auer, 'Maria und das christliche Jungfräulichkeitsideal. Eine biblisch-dogmatische Studie', GuL 23 (1950) 411-425; G. Soll 'Die Mariologie der Kappadokier im Lichte der Dogmengeschichte', TQ 131 (1951) 288-319; 426-457; G. Miegge, La Vergine Maria. Saggi di storia del dogma (Torre Pellice 1950); J. Guitton, La Virgen – Maria (Madrid 1952); A. Garcia ' "Integritas carnis" e "virginitas mentis" in Alano da Lilla', Mar 16 (1954) 125-149; G. M. Roschini, La Madonna secondo la fede e la Teologia I (Rome 1953); M. Balagué, 'La virginidad de Maria', Cultura biblica 11 (Seville 1954) 285-292; Th. U. Mullaney, 'Mary Ever-Virgin', Am. Eccl. Rev. 131 (1954) 159-167, 256-267; Ch. Donnelly, 'The Perpetual Virginity of the Mother of God', in E. Carol, Mariology (Milwaukee 1954) 228-296; G. Owens 'Our Lady's Virginity in the Birth of Jesus', Marian Studies 7 (1954) 43-68; A. M. Sancho, La virginidad de Maria Madre de Dios. Estudio historico-teologico del dogma (Madrid 1955); J. Rózycki, 'De Beatae Mariae Virginitate in Partu', Coll. Theol. 27 (Warsaw 1956) 439-467.

[2] Mitterer is correct in saying that its absence is not an unambiguous proof of virginity. If for instance a child is conceived by means of artificial insemination and the birth takes place by means of a Caesarian operation, the mother retains the traditional signs of virginitas in partu, but there is in fact no question of virginitas in partu.

[3] For Mitterer, these constitute the signs of true motherhood for a mother who has given birth to a child, and hence must not be treated as indifferent or worthless. Mitterer also correctly emphasizes that according to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fact that in this birth, which took place according to the natural processes, the natural presupposition is lacking, which it should have had in the natural order of things, and for which the normal birth is the unambiguous sign: the conception of the child from the man. Mitterer therefore holds that the 'virginitas in partu' is not a separate process, but simply the application of the doctrine of the perpetual virginity of Mary to the birth. And this has a sense, because normally the birth is the decisive criterion which excludes full virginity. The meaning usually given to 'virginitas in partu' is said to betray too much pre-occupation with the hymen, growing out of other times and cultures, to endanger true motherhood by having logically to deny the [136] mother any active part in the process of child-birth, and to eliminate all pain, though Mary did not escape suffering elsewhere.[4] As far as we know, only a few authors, apart from W. Zauner, have given unmistakable, though cautious assent to the theory of Mitterer (cf. L. Ott,[5] W. Dettloff, H. Doms). Others, like J. de Aldama,[6] expressly reject the theory.

Here we offer some observations on the problem which has thus been re-opened. They do not aim at being more than marginal notes. They do not uphold any set thesis and they do not take sides for or against other opinions. They only claim the right to be more modest in a brief essay than a dogmatic theologian is allowed to be when he has to present a definite and well-rounded thesis in a dogmatic text-book or in a complete treatise on Mariology, and to give the doctrine of the Church clearly, exhaustively and sifted out from mere theological propositions. Since we are dealing only with marginal notes, the order in which they appear is also unimportant.

I

In recent Catholic theology one can note a certain tendency, independently of Mitterer, Ott and so on, to be more reserved when giving the theological qualification of this doctrine, and above all, when determining the contents of it. J. B. Heinrich, for instance, with Th. Specht, and among recent authors L. Lercher and F. Dander maintain that the bodily integrity of the Blessed Virgin during the birth as defined doctrine, understanding this integrity in the traditional way.[7] But F. Egger, H. Hurter, M. Glossner, Ch. Pesch, J. Pohle-J. Gummersbach, F. Diekamp-K. Jüssen [137] etc, qualify this 'integritas corporalis' only as 'de fide'.[8] J. de Aldama[9] assesses it as 'de fide divina et catholica', but expressly declares that he prescinds from any precise explanation of the 'integritas corporalis' which is asserted. L. Ott uses the Scripture (Lk 2:6) and tradition Mary is mother in the full sense of the word, and hence actively gave birth to her child in a truly human process.

---

[4] One could point to the fact that pious meditation thinks of the new-born child as capable of suffering and actually suffering, just as Scripture and dogmatic theology do in general in combating Docetism as contrary to the faith. If so, how can one refuse to ascribe to the child the 'pain' of being born, without the risk of Docetism? And then how can one deny that there was likewise 'pain' (in the theological and biological sense) when Mary gave birth, such as is normally to be found in the process of birth in the present biological (infralapsarian) order of things?

[5] L. Ott, Grundriss der Katholischen Dogmatik (Freiburg [3] 1957) 247f.

[6] J. de Aldama, 'Mariologia', in Sacrae Theologiae Summa III (Madrid [3] 1956) 392.

[7] J.B. Heinrich, Dogmatische Theologie VII (Mainz 1896) 402; Th. Specht, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik (Regensburg [3] 1925) 380; L. Lercher, Inst. Theol. Dogmat. III (Barcelona [4]1945) 288; F. Dander, Summarium Tract. Dogm. De Matre-Socia Salvatoris (Innsbruck 1952) 8.

[8] F. Egger, Enchiridion Theol. Dogmat. Spec. (Brixen [9]1928) 511,; H. Hurter, Theol. Dogmat. Spec. II (Innsbruck [7]1891) 512; M. Glossner, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik I (Regensburg 1874) 104; Ch. Pesch, Compendium Theol. Dogmat. III (Freiburg [5]1935) 101; J. Pohle-J. Gummersbach, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik II (Paderborn [10]1956) 390; F. Diekamp-K. Jüssen, Kath. Dogmatik II (Munster [10]1952) 382.

[9] J. de Aldama, op. cit. 394.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

qualification 'de fide', but gives the statement the meaning already mentioned, which is essentially more restricted. B. Bartmann[10] likewise qualifies it as 'de fide', but for all practical purposes really gives up all effort to determine the exact content of the phrase. But he adjoins a warning against docetism and contests the parallel often drawn by Fathers and theologians between the processes of the resurrection and the birth – entrance or exit through 'closed doors'. M. Schmaus[11] takes the same line: the assertion is a truth of faith, it means primarily 'bodily integrity', but 'we are not in a position to decide what is the essence of bodily integrity as understood by revelation'.

Here the question arises as to which statement is more important: that one must maintain the 'bodily integrity' as a matter of faith – and that therefore the concept is bound up with a certain content, which one must know to be able to believe it – or that we do not know what constitutes bodily integrity. But the first statement undoubtedly possesses more normative force, as Schmaus too certainly holds. Hence a certain determination of the content of the phrase, 'bodily integrity' cannot be eliminated as radically as Schmaus thinks, though he may be correct in thinking that the delimitation of the concept can only be carried out on a restricted scale. But then the question arises, why this, no doubt relative, reserve in determining the content of the concept is on principle not merely justifiable, but demanded, when theological tradition on the whole gives little sign of such reserve.[12] The truth is that a certain reserve is called for both with regard to the qualification and content of the 'virginitas in partu', in spite of all the respect due to a theologically binding tradition in this [138] matter, which exists alongside of what is dated and lacking authority. One cannot seriously maintain, with Scheeben, that the doctrine is already expressed in the Apostles' Creed.[13] If it is supposed to be expressed simply in the 'semper virgo' of tradition and of many official utterances of the magisterium,[14] we must first ask whether the magisterium, in designating Mary by this title, wishes to define also the content of the title itself. But above all, we must point out that the precise content of the 'virginitas in partu' which is perhaps included in the title still remains an open question.[15] It is true that the Synod of Milan, under St Ambrose, also condemned Jovinian for denying the virginal birth of Christ, which St Ambrose certainly took to be 'the retention of the virginal bars in the genital parts'.[16] But this is only a local

---

[10] B. Bartmann, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik I (Freiburg [8]1932) 425.
[11] M. Schmaus, Kath. Dogmatik II/2 (Munich [5]1955) 171, 176.
[12] See for instance the pages devoted by F. Suárez to the question of the after-birth at the birth of Jesus: F. Suárez, De mysteriis vitae Christi, disp. V, sect. 2 (Op. omn, XIX, 83ff.); disp. XIII, sect. 1, (Op. omn. XIX, 212ff.).
[13] As St Ambrose first tried to argue, quoting the 'natus ex Maria Virgine': St Ambrose Ep. 42:12 (PL 16, 1128). Cf. M.J. Scheeben, Handbuch der kath. Dogmatik II (Freiburg 1933) 939. So too St Augustine, cf. Note 31, p. 142.
[14] Cf. e.g. Denz. 13, 201f., 214, 255f., 344, 429, 462, 735, 993; John II, Ep. 3 ad Senat. Const., Mansi VIII 803 E ff.
[15] It is not enough to say that the expression must be understood in the general sense in which it was used in ecclesiastical terminology at the time when it was used by the magisterium. This hermeneutic principle is correct fundamentally. But it cannot be applied to this case. For a number of examples can be adduced from tradition where the virginitas in partu implied by simper virgo was in fact understood only ratione conceptionis; there are examples which show that the perpetual virginity was sometimes only understood as the exclusion of all sexual intercourse; it could be shown that even where a miraculous child-birth was in question, the notion of what took place in the process was far from uniform. Once a concept has come into use in tradition and the magisterium (as α)ειπαρθε/νοφ was, as for instance in the Symbolum Epiphanii, at a time when the exact meaning of virginitas in partu was far from clear or well established), its continued use to express truths of faith is not in itself enough to prove that it can or ought sanction all the precise shades of meaning that may have been attached to it later in theology and piety, even though such de facto meanings were very widespread.
[16] St Ambrose, De institut. virg. cap. VIII, 52 (PL 16, 320): 'Porta igitur Maria . . . genitalia virginitatis claustra non solvit'. Cf. Ph. Friedrich, 'St Ambrosius von Mailand über die Jungfrauengeburt Marias (virginitas

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

synod, and it would be difficult to prove that the condemnation of Jovinian[17] amounts to a positive sanction of everything that was in the mind of his opponent, St Ambrose, on this matter. Siricius himself does not mention the point under the heads of the accusation which he drew up against Jovinian and sent to [139] St Ambrose. Hence the Roman synod of 390, which condemned Jovinian, cannot be invoked as an authority on this point.

St Leo the Great writes, in the Epistola dogmatica ad Flavianum, cap 2: 'Her virginity was intact when she brought him forth, just as it was intact when she conceived him'.[18] But the statement of itself has not, of course, the same dogmatic weight as the letter has when dealing with the precise point of controversy against Eutyches. Further, though the virginity at the birth is taught, nothing is said as to what precisely it implies. St Leo does not go beyond the 'semper virgo'. In the letter of Pope Hormisdas,[19] the traditional doctrine is undoubtedly re-affirmed. But there is of course no question of a definition here. It is merely the repetition and transmission of the traditional doctrine. The Lateran synod of 649, under Martin I, which dealt with monotheletism, says in c. 5 (Denzinger 256) that the 'semper virgo' also 'incorruptibiliter genuisse',[20] just as she conceived without man's action, and was to remain a virgin after the birth. But here it must be said at once that this synod did not acquire the rank and importance of a general council in the mind of the Church as time went on. Though a certain tendency could be noticed, which sought to range this synod as the sixth general council after the earlier five, this place was in fact reserved for the council of 680.[21] The main reason for promulgating the canon was the fact that the monophysites and the monothelites had appealed to the 'virginitas in partu' to establish the complete domination of the Word over his body, such as the doctrine of the one nature and the one energeia implied, as they saw it.[22] The orthodox declared on the contrary that Christ was really born in the body, otherwise docetism, with which the monophysites were reproached in the question, could not be avoided. It was for this reason that the 'virginitatis integritas' had to be a miracle.[23] The Latin 'incorruptibiliter' is meant to render the Greek α)ψθο/πωφ. The content of this 'incorruptibilitas' and the 'virginitatis integritas', of which Martin I spoke in his explanatory discourse to the council, the denial of 'solvere virginitatem', is not exactly determined. No doubt the Pope thought of the content in the terms which were then [140] already current, especially as the parallels with the risen Lord's leaving the tomb and Christ's walking on the waters also recur at this point. On the other hand, the Pope stresses against the monophysite Theodore of Pharan, that the child was not born 'incorporaliter' and not 'abs que corporeo tumore' (α)ο&γκωφ) and that Christ did not pass through Mary as through a fistula, in the Apollinarist sense.[24] He even appeals to St Gregory of Nazianzen, who held that Mary was subject to the νο&μοφ κνη&σεωφ.[25]

It is not easy to say how the Pope considered that these disparate elements of his thought were to be combined clearly and without tension. But one may draw the conclusion that no strict explanation and dogmatic determination of any more precise content was intended, and hence we may say: a local synod repeats incidentally the doctrine of the perpetual virginity, Mariae in partu)' in Festgabe für A. Knöpfler (Freiburg 1917) 89-109; J. Huhn, Das Geheimnis der Jungfrau-Mutter Maria nach dem Kirchenvater Ambrosius (Wurzburg 1954) 110-226.

---

[17] W. Hailer, Jovinianus, die Fragmente seiner Schrifien, die Quellen zu seiner Geschichte, sein Leben und seine Lehre (Leipzig 1897) 127, 151-158.

[18] Mansi V 1370 A.

[19] Epist 79 (PL 63, 514C) '. . . matris vulvam natus non aperiens . . .'

[20] In connexion with a general summary of the faith, chs. 1-5.

[21] Cf. E. Caspar, 'Die Lateransynode von 649', ZKG 51 (1932) 75-137.

[22] Cf. Mansi X 961 C, 965 E (giving the opinion of the Monothelite Theodore of Pharan on the birth of Christ).

[23] Mansi X, 963ff. (the discourse of Martin I at the Synod).

[24] Mansi X, 966D.

[25] Mansi X, 968A.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

against the background of the interpretation then current, without wishing to give a doctrinal definition of the exact content of this interpretation. Indeed, we may note the clear consciousness of the need of avoiding the danger of docetism in this question, and of preserving the truth of the real motherhood and birth. It is remarkable that in 675, at the first synod of Toledo (Denzinger 282), the 'partus Virginis' is spoken of in such a way that its miraculous character – in spite of the quotation from St Augustine, who clearly takes the side of the traditional thesis in his own special context – is based really on the virginal conception alone. When Sixtus IV (1476) and Paul IV (1555)[26] stress the perpetual 'virginitatis integritas', even 'in partu', as Paul IV says, they merely re-affirm what must be held as the dogmatic kernel of the tradition, that Mary is ever virgin, and they avoid any more precise determination of the content of the assertion. The same is true when Pius XII ('Mystici Corporis') says: 'She brought forth Christ in a marvellous way'.[27]

In view of the magisterium therefore, the marked reserve of recent theology, with regard to the qualification and the determination of the content of the doctrine, is quite understandable. There is no question of an express definition. If one wishes to qualify the doctrine as 'de fide', which is quite justifiable, in view of the fifteen hundred years of the doctrine and the ordinary magisterium of the present day, one will have to emphasize at the same time that this does not solve the question of the exact determination of the content of the doctrine. For one could use a more precise history of the doctrine to prove that the determination of its [141] content is not so uniform and clear, and not always so free from misgivings that one could simply say: the careful, somewhat vague and generalized assertion of the 'virginitas in partu' in the ordinary magisterium, in the present state of the pronouncements of the extraordinary magisterium and in the average preaching of the faith, means precisely what is said more exactly and in detail in the Fathers and theologians, and in much edifying literature.[28] The doctrine as it strictly is, and the authority it carries, are not always presented in such a way that they are expressly and consciously distinguished from a given set of images, which are used to couch the doctrine which is specifically taught. Can it be proved in detail that the tradition[29] in question lacks from many points of view the purity, clarity, firmness and unquestionable intrinsic theological foundation, which would enable us to declare it simply, wholly and without nuances a sheer, pure traditio divino-apostolica? Such a proof, to be completely convincing, could be given only by an exact and critical history of

---

[26] Denz. 734, 993.
[27] AAS 35 (1943) 247.
[28] One must be very careful with such arguments, as may be seen from the doctrine of the formation of Adam from the dust of the earth. Here too a tradition of two thousand years' duration expressed a permanent truth in a definite, concrete imagery, distinct from the truth implied and not a permanent form, which was not however distinguished by tradition from the truth implied.
[29] Tradition, historically speaking, is simply the concrete sum of the theological propositions to be found in the Church, along with their transmission, in so far as the ordinary or extraordinary magisterium has not discounted such propositions as not permissible in the Church. This tradition contains, without precise, conscious and official distinction both the traditio divina-apostolica and the traditio humana (theological views and efforts and opinions of profane, human origin), which are propagated together. It may indeed be said that whatever is preached (even without the intervention of the extraordinary magisterium, over a long period) expressly, clearly and universally as certainly part of the faith, does in fact belong to the traditio divina-apostolica. But it cannot be said that only such things are part of it, nor that everything is proved to be traditio divina-apostolica simply because it has been in fact unchallenged in the (whole) universal tradition and been generally held to be correct. There can be a traditio mere humana which is universal, of long standing, and universally held in the Church, and it need not be always expressly and consciously marked off and distinguished from the traditio divina-apostolica. If the magisterium does not note this difference at a given point, this does not mean that it does not exist. Such conscious demarcations have a real history. To prove that they did not exist earlier is not a proof that such distinctions are not objectively justified. Cf. Die mündliche Überlieferung. Beitrage zum Begriff der Tradition, H. Bacht, H. Fries, J. R. Geiselmann, ed. M. Schmaus (Munich 1957).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the doctrine,[30] which clearly cannot be attempted here.

[142]

II

If a professor of dogmatic theology wants a clear, telling and easily managed example of the history and development of dogma, which he can use as a model by which to demonstrate to his pupils the problem of such development, he has one here, which could hardly be bettered. The example is remarkable in many ways. We first have the impression that this doctrine can be traced back explicitly and immediately to the apostolic preaching. St Augustine[31] had already presented the matter in this guise, and even referred the doctrine to an express communication of the Lord.[32] But then we see that this is historically impossible. We come inevitably to the conclusion that we are dealing with a strictly theological process of explanation, though the later doctrine is qualified as 'de fide'. If we pursue the history of this explanatory process more closely, we see that the first beginnings of the process are more or less buried in obscurity, and that in part they were conditioned de facto by pressures which were not theologically irreproachable – though the final result is not open to doubt. It would be seen that these pressures, exactly as today, do not always come primarily from the magisterium and the learned theologians. We could use this model to study something which is not always clearly kept in mind even today in dogmatic theology as it is actually practised, namely that the so-called argument from tradition and the Fathers can have two meanings, which are essentially different:

(a) The dogmatic meaning, that is, it undertakes to prove that something was taught by the Church and believed in it at a given time as divine revelation, and that it is therefore binding on us today also. Here, as a matter of principle, it does not matter what particular period of time is involved in the proof, how near this period is to the apostolic age, and whether the conviction of faith in a given age can be proved, by historically clear and tangible data and testimonies, to derive immediately and explicitly from the Apostles.

(b) The meaning in the history of dogma, that is, it undertakes to prove – a task which is one of the tasks proper to dogmatic theology itself – that (and in what manner) the doctrine in question stems from the apostolic [143] preaching, and can be traced back to it historically. This it does by proving that the doctrine was already directly and expressly proclaimed, though perhaps in another formulation, in the apostolic teaching. Or it can prove that the doctrine, being implicitly contained therein, has grown out of the apostolic doctrine, by a legitimate historical, logical and theological process, as its authentic development.

These two points of view are not usually kept apart in text-books of dogmatic theology when dealing with the doctrine now in question. They thus give the impression that the apostolic origin of the doctrine has been proven historically (and not merely dogmatically) when explicit statements of the Fathers can be adduced in its favour from the 3rd century on. One often has the impression that such dogmatic text-books suppose that the gap between us and apostolic times has been bridged historically, if one can produce texts of the Fathers for this doctrine from the beginning of the 3rd century. There are of course exceptions, but most theologians pay too little attention to the background of the text in question, its spiritual milieu and its real bearing.[33] This typical example could provide an opportunity of practising

---

[30] At least when we prescind from the indirect argument which is considered equivalently in Part II.

[31] St Augustine, Sermo 296, ch. 1 (PL 38, 999); Sermo 225 (PL 38, 1073) Enchiridion ch. 34 (PL 40, 249). Cf. Ph. Friedrich, 'Die Mariologie des hl. Augustinus' in the Festschrift K. Adam (Düsseldorf 1952) 213-224.

[32] St Augustine, In Jo. evang. tract 91, n. 3 (PL 35, 1862).

[33] The average text-book of dogmatic theology does not make it at all clear that the text constantly quoted from Clement of Alexandria, which figures as one of the main witnesses in this question, is more of a difficulty than a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

how to use these tools of research.

And here perhaps it is permissible to make a point which can serve as an example, one which the author finds a certain satisfaction in making in this volume in honour of J. R. Geiselmann to which he contributes this modest essay. As is well known, J. R. Geiselmann has re-opened and re-kindled the old question and controversy between Catholics on the relation of Scripture and tradition.[34] It is not our intention to take up a set position of our own in this essay, with regard to the controversy. But we cannot refrain from making a few remarks. H. Lennerz[35] has written an essay on the subject in which he flatly rejects the position of Geiselmann. The main reason for the rejection seems to be, when very simply formulated: there are many truths which are to be considered revealed [144] truths of faith and yet are not expressed in Scripture and cannot be deduced from relevant statements in Scripture. Therefore tradition must be a material source of revelation beside Scripture, and the 'partim – partim' in the declaration of the Council of Trent,[36] though it was omitted and replaced by 'et', remains the obvious and unavoidable meaning of the declaration. This essay, as we have said, is not the place to investigate whether there are in fact such truths of revelation which cannot be derived from Scripture. We cannot therefore deal with the pre-supposition and the main interest of Lennerz' position.[37] But in this context we may [145] proof. We shall have to come back to this later.

---

[34] J. R. Geiselmann, 'Das Konzil von Trent über das Verhältnis der Heiligen Schrift und der nicht geschriebenen Traditionen. Sein Missverständnis in der nachtridentinisch Theologie und die Überwindung dieses Missverständnis', in Die mündliche Überlieferung. Beitrage zum Begriff der Tradition, by H. Bacht, H. Fries, J. R. Geiselmann, ed. M. Schmaus (Munich 1957) 223-206.

[35] H. Lennerz, 'Scriptura sola?' Gr. 40 (1959) 38-53; 'Sine scripto traditiones' Gr. 40 (1959) 624 – 635.

[36] Denz. 783 'Recipiuntur libri sacri et traditiones Apostolorum'.

[37] I have tried to explain elsewhere why the fixing of the canon by the Church cannot be considered as a 'case' of a more general law and relationship, cf. Über die Schriftinspiration. Quaestiones Disputatae (Freiburg ^{2}1959) 42-45, 80-84. The other examples and cases adduced by Lennerz are at least open to reasonable doubt as to whether when correctly interpreted, with due and precise attention to the substance of the doctrine, they cannot be deduced from Scripture, that is, from the total meaning of the Christian message contained in and attested by Scripture, when truly lived and adequately interpreted. Why cannot this be true of the sacramental character and similar doctrines? And why did the Fathers always search hard for such a derivation in their theology, considering tradition rather as a proof for the correctness of this derivation than as simply an independent source of such truths? This leaves untouched, as we have said, the essential point of difference between Geiselmann and Lennerz. We may however make one remark, even if strictly speaking we do not decide here whether tradition is an independent and materially important source of revealed truth apart from Scripture, or not. Even if one adopted Lennerz' thesis with regard to the interpretation of Trent, one could always say that justice has been done to it by the acceptance of the canon on the basis of tradition alone, even though one might deny that this was a case capable of being applied more extensively. And one could still maintain the position (which need not be contested even by a Protestant theologian today) that tradition as such, that is, in so far as it obviously preceded Scripture, as apostolic kerygma, and continued after the coming of Scripture, did not of course cease, in its fundamental formal character, to testify to this apostolic content, and that such tradition is still valid today and hence must be accepted pari reverentia. And one can still ask whether this tradition really contains things which are not also really contained in Scripture, and whether one is forced by Trent to draw this further conclusion (which is not expressed but must be at best deduced). One may still doubt it. What is meant, for instance, when the Church declares that Scripture is also the 'ultimate foundation' for the Assumption of Mary? It is hard to conceive of any truth which is less directly and explicitly in Scripture than this. It will therefore be difficult to find cases where tradition must have a larger role to play than here. And yet even here Scripture is the ultimate foundation. But something can only be the foundation of a given truth when this truth is contained implicitly in this 'foundation'. For it will be hard to indicate any other sort of foundation which can be seriously called a foundation. The fact that a truth (or truths) does not contradict another set of truths, or is compatible with them, etc., does not permit one to affirm that the former have the latter as their foundation. But what other types of connexion between Scripture and the dogma of the Assumption can we think of except these two possibilities (implication or compatibility of a negative type)? But if one cannot call the second type 'foundation', only the first in fact remains: implication. But if it is true in this case, what truths (apart from the fixing of the canon) can be named of which one would be obliged to say that they are certainly not contained in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

refer to the typical instance we are dealing with and call attention to the following points.

Lennerz' position would be attractive, because it simplifies the problem, if it were really true, as Lennerz supposes far too optimistically, that the truths whose derivation from Scripture Lennerz casts doubts on, could be traced back with ease and certainty to apostolic times, as explicit doctrine, by a procedure based on proofs from the history of dogma. But this is precisely what one may doubt, and the doctrine we are now dealing with is an instructive example. For what has been gained when one has made a 'cross-section' of dogma from the faith as firmly held in a given period, and so proved that the doctrine must be of apostolic origin? Much, no doubt. But the dogmatic theologian still has the task of making an overall survey of the history of dogma to show how and why, even historically speaking, the doctrine in question is of apostolic origin. Merely to appeal to tradition – in the dogmatic sense of a dogmatic argument – does not help him at all. He has to show that either (a) the doctrine was explicitly asserted in the apostolic age itself or (b) it must have been at least implicitly contained in the assertions of the time. It is not a sufficient proof of (a) to show for instance, as is the case of the doctrine now in question, that it is clear in the 3rd century. For simply to say that tangible proofs are lacking earlier, because the literary tradition is too fragmentary to follow, but that they must have existed, is to replace work on the history of dogma by a dogmatic postulate – even though it is perhaps correct.[38] But such a postulate would be quite wrong, when it could be [146] shown, with more or less historical certainty, though possibly only indirectly, as in the present case, that the missing historical links with the apostolic times can never have existed at all. This can be done when it can be shown that the first actual historical testimonies are of such a nature that earlier testimonies of the same type cannot have existed before them.

But if it is then postulated, in accordance with the second procedure described above, that there were other truths in the apostolic preaching in which the doctrine in question must have been implicitly contained, because there are no earlier explicit testimonies available or because they cannot have existed: by what right – and with what hope – does one postulate that the apostolic tradition really contained more than is still available to us, when the Scripture as a whole is examined carefully and searchingly enough? The first two centuries are too well known to us for anyone to make out a plausible case to the effect that certain truths were then universally presented in the official preaching of the Church, as matters of faith, which, through an accident of history, are no longer accessible to us. If more historical testimonies to the apostolic doctrine had come down to us, we should certainly have a more detailed and plastic image of the doctrine, but not really something which would be a new addition to our previous knowledge and not deducible from it. And in this connexion there is something else which we must not overlook. It would be no help dogmatically if in the question we are dealing with for instance, we had a statement from a Father of the Church from the middle of the 2nd century instead of from the beginning of the 3rd. If the Father did

---

Scripture? In a word: Lennerz must be asked whether in his opinion it is a truth, certainly defined, that there are truths of faith – apart from the canon – of which a theologian is obliged to say positively that they are certainly not contained in Scripture, either implicitly or explicitly. And he must further be asked, what is the point of this statement, supposing it must be made, if up to the present there has never existed a consent in the Church, as to what particular truths are involved, and whether he believes that agreement will ever be reached on this question.

[38] Correct however only when it is certainly proved that the doctrine in question could not have been present merely implicitly in former times and hence must always have been transmitted explicitly. But such a proof is scarcely possible in any concrete case, and always probably relies on theoretical presuppositions about the nature and possibilities of the development of dogma, which again can be contested (relying for instance on the assertion that only a metaphysically necessary deduction from two revealed premises can be taken as a revealed truth, and hence that where such a deduction cannot be demonstrated, the truth in question must always have been explicitly present, if it is to claim later to have been revealed).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not do us the pleasure, which is more than unlikely, of declaring expressly and solemnly that the doctrine in question was of apostolic origin and of absolutely universal authority in the Church, the Father's statement would only tell us that the doctrine is contained in tradition, but not that it certainly belongs to the traditio divino-apostolica. And that is the important point.

But this can only be ascertained when it is proved that the truth stands [147] in a (sufficiently) necessary relationship to those truths of faith in which we are already sure that they were authoritatively preached from the beginning as explicit elements of revelation. But all such truths are to be found in Sacred Scripture. (There is nothing in all this which allows us to under-estimate the irreplaceable function of tradition, as the objective and material aspect of the living magisterium. This should be obvious and does not need to be expounded here. It can be read up in Geiselmann himself.) Hence Lennerz' position has not in fact the dogmatic advantages which Lennerz claims for it in contrast to the thesis of Geiselmann. A dogmatic and historical proof from tradition, if worked out honestly and carefully, offers in fact as many difficulties as a proof from Scripture, especially with regard to those truths of faith, which do not occur in Scripture in the 'way' in which they were later formulated. This observation can be illustrated precisely by the typical case we have in mind. And this brings us back to our original theme, to examine it more closely.

How does our doctrine stand with regard to all the points of view and all the questions which have suggested that it can be used as a typical case by the dogmatic theologian when he is studying the actual history and development of dogma? We call attention to one point only, which seems to us to be decisive in the matter: it is the first visible trace we have of the explicit doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu'. If we do not presuppose what is to be proved, and so do not read a 'virginitas in partu' into the 'born of the virgin' (because it can be understood of a virginal birth by reason of the conception, and was so understood originally),[39] the first [148] testimony, if we leave the apocrypha aside for the moment, is in Clement of Alexandria.[40] Writing towards the end of the 2nd century he affirms that 'some say' that Mary was 'found to be a virgin' after she had given birth and been safely delivered, but that 'most still' hold for a perfectly normal birth. This testimony is very precise and all its elements are to be studied carefully. Clement obviously knows that the assertion has a history.

(a) Clement, who is pleading for the 'virginitas in partu', concedes that it was more or less

---

[39] Hence St Ignatius of Antioch (Ep. Ad Smyrn. 1, 1, in Die Apost. Vater, ed. J. A. Fischer [Darmstaddt 1956] 204) is not a witness to our doctrine, especially as St Ignatius is here interested specifically in the reality of the birth as against Docetism. He says (Ep. ad Eph. 19; op. cit. 157) that the mystery of the birth of Christ was hidden from the devil; but he does not say why or in what regard. If St Ignatius held that the position of Jesus as ξυ/ριοφ remained hidden throughout all the moments of his life, and that contrary to the opinion of the Docetae, all the stages of the bodily existence of the ξυ/ριοφ were mysteries, the meaning of the passage is quite clear, without its including a special miracle in partu. Neither is St Justin (Dial. 84 [Otto 303f.]; cf. also Dial. 67 [Otto 237]) a witness for the virginitas in partu except ratione conceptionis, as is clearly shown by the context of the explanation of Isaiah 7:14. And neither is St Irenaeus (c. 890) (Epideixis 2, 14: TU, ed. A. von Harnack-C. Schmidt III [Leipzig 1907] 59) – against Bardenhewer, Plumpe, etc. – since, though he cites Isaiah 66:7, he sees the text as fulfilled by the 'unhoped-for and unexpected' event of the birth alone, as is also shown for instance by his Adv. Haer. IV, 33, 4 and III, 19, 3 (Harvey II, 259 and II, 90); he does not appeal to any particular circumstances of the birth. In Adv. Haer. IV, 33, 11 (Harvey II, 266) all that can be said is that everything is obscure: who is meant (the Church or Mary or both) and what is meant (the 'pure opening of the womb' tells rather against than for virginity in the birth). We need not give here the literature on this much-discussed text (cf. N. Moholy, St Irenaeus. The Father of Mariology. Franciscan Marian Congress [Burlington 1952] 129-187.

[40] Clement of Alexandria, Strom VII, 16, 93, 7 (Stählin III, 66:20ff.):

)Αλλə,ω(φ ε)/οικεν, τοιφπολλιφ και∴ με/ξρι νυν δοκει η(Μαρια_μ λεξω_ ει)ναι δια_ τη_ν του παιδι/ο υ γε/ννησιν ου)κ λεγω_: και∴ γα_ρ μετα το_ τεκειν αυ)τη_ν μαιωθεισαν, φασι/ τινεφ μαρθε&νον ευ(πεθηναι.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unknown (explicitly) earlier on, that 'even now most people' reject it and only 'some' hold a different opinion. We may therefore affirm that round the beginning of the 3rd century there is no question of a universal doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu', much less of its being obligatory in the Church. But the doctrine is already known, indeed, making progress, but it is still a minority doctrine. If it had always been present, in the state of explicit profession, since the apostolic tradition was in force, the situation described by Clement would not have been possible. And when Clement appeals to the opinions of others, it is only to support his own opinion. To put it in modern terms, he knows only 'sententiae liberae et disputatae' in the matter. His testimony is likewise completely in accord with what we know otherwise. It accords with the fact that Tertullian[41] does not really attack the 'virginitas in partu', but, without any misgivings,[42] takes the opposite opinion for granted,[43] and goes on, with the help of a crude description, to defend the true birth [149] of Christ against Marcion, as something which is of the essence of Christianity. (Origen too, at the beginning, agrees that the womb, etc., were opened at the birth. He sees no contradiction with the perpetual virginity of Mary, which he so often stresses.)[44]

(b) What are we to think of the 'some' upholders of the 'virginitas in partu' in the other sense, of whom Clement speaks? They are the apocryphal histories of the Infancy,[45] which must be dated before Clement, probably about the middle of the 2nd century: the Protoevangelium of James,[46] the Ascensio Isaiae[47], the Odes of Solomon[48] and (perhaps) the eighth Sibylline Oracle.[49] This is not the place to analyse this literature with regard to its antiquity, tendencies and theological level, or to give a more precise exegesis of its testimonies to the virginal birth. But we may undoubtedly say that they all have an unmistakably docetic[50] tinge in this matter: the birth as such, which is asserted by St Luke, is passed over (the child is simply there), or more or less clearly replaced by another process (a luminous cloud which condenses into a child). The child takes its mother's breast, but merely so as not to be recognized.[51]

---

[41] Tertullian, Adv. Marc. 3, 11; 4, 21 (CSEL 47, 393; 47, 488); de carne Christi 4; 23 (CSEL 69/70, 596; 69/70, 247).

[42] Though he is undoubtedly familiar with the nove nasci with regard to the virginal conception.

[43] There is nothing to suggest that Tertullian was in the least conscious of coming into conflict with anti-Gnostic and anti-Docetic Christians, or of starting a controversy within the Catholic Church. All he does is to emphasize against Marcion his concept of the true, human birth of Christ, to which he adheres unquestioningly as an anti-Docetic Christian.

[44] Origen, Hom. 14 in Lc (GCS 9, 100).

[45] More exactly, the circle in which this literature arose.

[46] Translation of the Protoevangelium Jacobi, by O. Cullmann, 'Kindheitsevangelien', in E. Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 3rd, completely revised edition by W. Schneemelcher I (Tübingen 1959) 277-290. Cf. L. M. Peretto, La Mariologia del Protoevangelo di Giacomo (Rome 1955). – It is quite possible that Plumpe (p. 572) is correct in thinking that the purpose of the Protoevangelium is not merely edification, but that the two women (the midwife and Salome) who quarrel about the virgin birth, represent the two parties in the debate, of which Clement tells us. 20, 4 (Hennecke 89f.) perhaps concedes that the virginal birth had been unknown up to this.

[47] J. Flemming-H. Duensing, 'Die Himmelfahrt des Jesaia', Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, ed. E. Hennecke (Tubingen 2 1924) 303-314.

[48] Translation of the Odes of Solomon by H. Gressmann in Hennecke, 455f.

[49] J. Geffcken, 'Christliche Sibyllinen', in Hennecke 475f.

[50] It may at least be suspected that the Odes of Solomon show in general Gnostic tendencies, so that the otherwise harmless text (Ode 59) at any rate belongs to the same literary genre as the other texts. It is not quite clear what is meant by παρτηενικο_φ τοκετο/φ in the eighth Sibylline oracle.

[51] The content of the doctrine also varies to some extent in these first testimonies. n the Protoevangelium, Mary has birth-pangs, which is why a midwife is wanted. The most important thing is the integrity of the genital passages. The Ascension of Isaiah also mentions this, but adds, for the first time, that the birth was painless. Hence there is no midwife. The Odes of Solomon mention only the painlessness of the birth.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[150] (c) Clement's testimony also fits in with the observation that, according to all reasonable expectations, a really apostolic explicit tradition is most unlikely in this matter. Is it psychologically probable that Mary herself would have given information about the intimacy of child-birth? It is probable that Mary alone, and not Jesus himself, who is the source for the history of the infancy of Jesus,[52] as recounted in Luke and Matthew, which she probably told after the death of Jesus. But it does not by any means follow that she also gave an account of the much more intimate details which did not concern Jesus directly, unlike his virginal conception. And even if she had done so, we could not say we knew the exact contents of the narrative, which, as a record of an actual experience, would of course have to have been based on actual details. For when the question of the process of the birth of Jesus is first audible, the information given is anything but uniform and does not give the impression of going back to the concrete narrative based on the experiences of an eye-witness. The infancy narratives of Matthew and Luke, in spite of the emergent interest in biography which is apparent in them, in contrast to the body of the gospels, and in spite of being based on special sources which are not simply identical with the apostolic message of salvation (which begins with the baptism when it tells of the life of Jesus, Ac 1.21f.; 10.36ff.; 13.24ff.), are genuine Christian theology of revelation and present the message of salvation. This is because they are still genuinely linked with the kernel of the Gospel message. But even if this is so, we may not overlook the fact that these narratives are already definitely marginal. It is therefore historically most improbable that there were other explicit and authoritative[53] accounts in circulation which dealt with the details of the history of the infancy.

If this supposition is correct, the starting-point of all discussion of the 'virginitas in partu' must be as follows: the doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu' must be considered, in theological method, as contained only implicitly at first in the apostolic deposit. If – and in so far as – the later explicit preaching of the faith does not provide a sure dogmatic proof of a more copious, detailed or definite content to the doctrine,[54] we can only [151] take as dogmatically binding what can be deduced by explicitation from the explicit apostolic tradition. The testimonies must of course be carefully and methodically weighed, and as much as possible in the light of the whole heritage of faith. Anything that cannot be proved, according to the criterion of apostolic tradition, to be implicitly contained in other truths, may not be maintained as binding in faith. Once the content of the doctrine has been thus determined, anything else that occurs in the line of concrete details in the de facto theological tradition of the doctrine, in Fathers and theologians, must be considered as free theological propositions, or as free interpretations of what is strictly meant by the doctrine – as long as there is no strict dogmatic proof that the content of the doctrine, in so far as it is binding in faith, is really wider. And then the more detailed concept of the content which occurs in the Fathers and theologians would really be sanctioned. But, as we have said, we do not think that such is really the case in point of fact.

We cannot properly justify this assertion here, because the proof would demand a precise and complete history of the whole doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu'. But we can at least give some indications. We have already mentioned the reserved attitude of the magisterium,

---

[52] Cf. P. Gaechter, Maria im Erdenleben (Innsbruck 193) 75.

[53] If we do not make these presuppositions, a (hypothetical) explicit testimony of apostolic times would leave us at a loss (unless it came from Mary herself): how could one know that it was true?

[54] If this were in fact the case (though we hold that the case is unreal), it would not prove that the basic principle just put forward must be false. As with other doctrines of the Church which were only made explicit later, it is quite possible that the individual theologian has simply not yet in fact managed to actualize sufficiently by theological methods the theological virtualities which are present in the depositum fidei of the primitive Church and were made explicit in an instinctive and general way by the sense of faith of the whole Church. Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Development of Dogma' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore, Md. 1961) 39-77; 'Dogmenentwicklung', LTK III^2, 457-463; Considerations on the Development of Dogma, in this volume 1-35.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and also the growing cautiousness of present-day theologians. We must keep clearly in mind the reality of the birth of Jesus from Mary, understanding it actively and passively. We must note that two passible human beings are concerned, and that passibility is a truth of faith, of soteriological significance. From the point of view of method, it must be noted that the reality of the birth, which is a truth of faith, is the critical norm for the doctrine of the 'virginitas in partu', rather than vice versa. It follows from all this, that it is not so easy to give the second doctrine a content which will do justice to the first. Many elements in the de facto tradition must certainly be rejected as theologically unsound, e.g. the parellels drawn with the resurrection. There is much in the tradition which reveals problems which were not solved, but buried gradually in silence. Ratramnus [152] of Corby asks, for instance (PL, 121, 82), is it possible to understand virginity at the birth as the 'integrity' of the genital passages, if the reality of the birth demands that the child must pass through the normal channels to see the light of day – unlike the resurrection, which had no fixed route. The question had already been touched on by St John Damascene (PG, 94, 1161), but it can hardly be said that an intelligible answer was ever found. Many Fathers emphasize expressly that the manner of the birth remains a mystery; so, in the East, St Athanasius,[55] St Gregory of Nazianzen,[56] Amphilochius of Iconium,[57] St John Chrysostom,[58] Proclus[59] and St Cyril of Alexandria;[60] in the West, St Jerome[61] and St Augustine[62] among others. One may well ask how this is possible, when writers like St Ephraim,[63] St Epiphanius of Salamis[64] and Zeno of Verona[65] claimed to know the manner of the birth even in the most indiscreet details, and indeed must have known it, on the supposition of a direct and explicit tradition coming from Mary and Christ. The fact that the 'virginitas in partu' is declared to be a miracle does not make the thing itself, that is the manner of it, very mysterious. What of the real process of birth itself, when for instance St Gregory of Nazianzen,[66] St Epiphanius[67] and Zeno,[68] and later, the theologian Paschasius Radbertus,[69] in express terms, reject an after-birth as unfitting? The exact content of the doctrine is not given quite uniformly. St Athanasius,[70] St John Chrysostom,[71] Proclus,[72] [153] Hesychius,[73] St Cyril,[74] St Hilary,[75] Zeno,[76] St Jerome,[77] St

---

[55] Expos. fidei I: PG 25, 201.
[56] Orat. 40, 45: PG 36, 424 B.
[57] Orat. in occ. Dom. 2: PG 39, 48 B
[58] In nat. Christ. diem: PG 56, 388.
[59] Sermo de S. Clem.: PG 65, 845 A.
[60] In Jo. Ev.. 1: PG 73, 21 B.
[61] Hom, in Jo. 1, 1-14: G. Morin, Anecdota III, 2, 390, 16.
[62] Ep. 137, 2, 8: PL 33, 519.
[63] Assemani II, 266 A-C, D; II, 422 F; cf. L. Hammersberger, Die Mariologie der ephremischen Schriften (Innsbruck 1938) 47ff.
[64] Adv. haer. c. 78, 79: PG 42, 700-756.
[65] Tract. II, 8, 2f.: PL II, 414 A-417 A.
[66] Orat. 40, 45: PG 36, 424 B.
[67] Adv. haer. II, 2 (Anaceph.): PG 42, 879 A. But in Adv. haer. III, 2, 19: PG 42, 730 C, Epiphanius seems to admit that the opening of the womb would not be contrary to virginity.
[68] Tract. H, 8: PL II, 415.
[69] De part. virg. 2: PL 120, 1385.
[70] Ep. ad Epict. 5: PG 26, 1060.
[71] In nat. Christ, diem: PG 56, 388.
[72] Orat. I, 10: PG 65, 691 A (though here Proclus, like Epiphanius, does not hesitate to combine the claustra virginitatis with the statement: naturae quidem portas aperuit ut homo, connecting the virginal integrity expressly with Christ ut deus).
[73] Hom. IV de S. Maria Deipara: PG 93, 1466.
[74] Adv. Anthropomorph.: PG 76, 1129 A.
[75] De Trinit. III, 39: PL 10, 87 A (where some see in the controverted phrase ipsa de suis non imminuta the first western testimony for the virginitas in partu, though De Trinit. II, 24-26: PL 10, 66 A-68 seems rather to testify

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Ambrose,[78] St Augustine,[79] Rufinus,[80] Gaudentius,[81] St Maximus[82] and St Gregory the Great[83] speak expressly of the integrity of the hymen or the genital passages. But only St Ephraim,[84] St Epiphanius,[85] St Cyril,[86] Zeno,[87] St Maximus,[88] and St Peter Chrysologus[89] mention the painlessness of the birth. And only St Gregory of Nazianzen, St Epiphanius and Zeno (see above) mention the absence of the after-birth. St Ephraim, Amphilochius, St John Chrysostom, Proclus, Hesychius, Theodotus and St Cyril do not mention the matter at all, but none of the Fathers concedes it expressly. It is interesting that St Ephraim, in the 'Parable of the Mussel'[90] is so intent on preserving the reality of the birth that he even thinks of a sort of restitutio in integrum, after the birth has taken place in the normal way. It is also remarkable that St Jerome is the first to reject expressly one of the oldest sources for the doctrine of the virginal birth, the apocrypha (cf. for instance, the story of the mid-wife).[91] As in the case of the Assumption, the apocrypha were in fact the first 'source', in the sense of an initial theological reflexion.

[154]

III

If it is methodologically correct in the present question to treat the 'virginitas in partu' as a truth only implicitly contained in the apostolic preaching (contrary to what might appear at first sight), then the question arises as to where[92] this doctrine is to be found implicitly. On this point too, where of course a clear idea of the dogmatic development of this truth is decisive, we can only offer a few observations, which do not claim to give a comprehensive answer to the question.

---

to a natural birth: 'Dei igitur imago invisibilis pudorem humani exordii non recusavit, et per conceptionem, partum . . . omnes naturae nostrae contumelias transcurrit . . . Quia ornnia continet, humani partus lege profertur').

[76] Tract II, 8, 2: PL 11, 415 A.

[77] Comm. in Ez. 44, 3: PL 25, 430 A; cf. J. Niessen, Die Mariologie des hl. Hieronyrnus (Münster 1913) 141-144.

[78] De inst. virg. 8, 53 PL 16, 320 A B.

[79] Ep. 137, 2, 8: PL 33, 519.

[80] Comm. Symb.: PL 21, 349.

[81] Sermo 9: PL 20, 900.

[82] Sermo 53: PL 638.

[83] In Evang. hom. II, 26, 5: PL 76, 1197.

[84] Assemani II, 266 C.

[85] Adv. haer. I, 2, 20: PG 45, 438.

[86] In Lc.: PG 72, 489 C.

[87] Tract. II, 8, 2: PL 11, 417.

[88] Hom. 5: PL 57, 235 C.

[89] Sermo 117: PL 52, 520.

[90] Assemani II, 266 C; cf. P. Krüger ('Die somat. Virginitat der Gottesmutter im Schrifttume Ephräms des Syrers': Alma Socia Christi V, I: Acta Congr. Mariolog.-marian. Romae 1950 (Rome 1951) 46-86, who does not go into the statement in the parable of the mussel.

[91] Contr. Helv. 8: PL 23, 192; Comm. in Mt 13:50: PL 26, 84. On the parallel drawn between the uterus clausus and the 'closed gate' of Ezekiel, see A. Kassing, 'Das Verschlossene Tor, Ezk 44:1-3,' Wi. Wei. 16 (1953) 171-190.

[92] For our purposes and the limited scope of our investigation we may be permitted here simply to interrogate the rest of Mariology as a whole with regard to the origin of the virginitas in partu. It is of course possible that by doing so we shall take as premises for our doctrine certain Mariological statements which again need to be based on the primary data of apostolic Mariology, to satisfy the demands of history of dogma. And thus it would be true to say that we are merely transposing the problem elsewhere. But when properly viewed, the problem then becomes quite naturally part of certain doctrines which cannot be made the theme of our present study, though of course they must be part of a general Mariology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(a) In spite of the reserves made above, Mary is a real theological theme of the apostolic preaching, and not merely an unavoidable detail in unintentional but unavoidable biographical notes about Jesus. This is clear from the theology of St Luke and from the Apostles' Creed. This apostolic Mariology contains a basic concept, not very consciously formulated perhaps, but still real, and capable of offering matter for reflexion. This is not the place to discuss how this basic concept should be more precisely formulated.[93] At any rate, Mary is~ a person who as such is part of the history of salvation. Our salvation therefore depends in part on her. Her motherhood is free, completely human, not merely biological and so sub-human. And in this motherhood, by the power of the free, gracious and divinely-initiated coming of the Logos as our unique salvation, this eschatological salvation was freely accepted for Mary and for us all. Thus Mary herself became, as this final salvation became flesh 'out of Mary', the perfected prototype of the redemption and of the absolute new beginning [155] in flesh and spirit.[94] No matter what further precisions are given to this picture, we may be sure at least of one thing: that the active birth (the act of giving birth) is not simply a biological event which is merely a fractional happening within the sphere of a human being, and which could then be the same even in people who were inwardly different. It is much rather, and must therefore be considered, an act that involves the whole man and will express the totality of the human person in question in the way in which it is done, suffered and experienced.[95]

Once this concept of the active birth as something involving the whole man is presupposed,[96] the following formal, theological and anthropological proposition may clearly be formulated at once: that in Mary, the active birth corresponds to her nature. But since her whole reality is a unique and miraculous work of grace, the same holds good eo ipso of her act of child-bearing. This of course brings us for the moment only to a formal delimitation of the special nature of the birth. However, it brings us at once to the fundamental justification of a theological assessment of the birth. And it also allows us to ask whether we have attained a correct concept of the 'virginitas in partu' only when the content has been expressed unambiguously in material and biologically concrete terms. And it may also suggest that whether we approach the concept from the point of view of the history of the dogma (which began as a truth merely implicit in the original revelation), or whether we approach it from the [156] point of view of Mary's nature[97] (which certainly expresses itself in her way of

---

[93] Cf. e.g. B. J. Bover, 'El principio mariologico de analogia', Alma Socia Christi XI, 1-13 (Acta Congr. Mariolog.-marian. Romae 1950); K. Rahner, 'Le principe fondamental de la théologie mariale', RSR 42 (1954) 481-522 (Engl. tr. Theological Digest 4 (1956) 72f.); P. Sanchez-Cepedes, El rnisterio de Maria. Mariologia biblica I: El principio fundamental (Santander 1955); P. Mahoney, 'The Unitive Principle of Marian Theology', Thomist 18 (1955) 443-479; C. Dillenschneider, Le principe premier d'une théologie mariale organique (Paris 1955); A. O. Patfoort, ' "Le" principe premier de la Mariologie?' RSPT 41 (1957) 445-454.

[94] As thus radically and perfectly redeemed, she is the 'immaculate conception', as a radically new beginning in spirit and flesh she is virgin mother, in such a way that (as being perfectly redeemed) she is totally given to this function in the history salvation for all her life, so that person and office are one.

[95] And possibly also the impotence of the person to master events exterior to his person and to build them into the totality of a being which understands itself to be free, to make them part of his authentic 'existence', to 'understand' them in the light of the kernel of his being, 'know what to do with them', express himself in them and stamp them with his character. Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore, Md. 1961) 347-382.

[96] Mitterer's mistake, formally speaking, is that he works only with a circumscribed, biological notion of birth, and so finds himself faced from the start with only two alternatives. He must indicate and admit certain material peculiarities of a miraculous nature for the birth; or he can point to no peculiarities (at least in the formal process) which would differentiate this birth from others. He is then forced to find a difference (which on account of tradition he cannot totally deny) which is totally derived 'ab extrinseco', from the virginal conception in fact; but the birth as such – which is what tradition is thinking of after all – must be kept really distinct from the conception.

[97] By 'nature' we mean of course always the whole, concrete, unique, natural and supernatural, personal and giving birth), no direct statement as to its material content may be expected at all, on principle. If these misgivings are justified by the very nature of the matter, then the fact that the doctrine is only formally determined, and cannot at once be translated into sturdy propositions readily accessible to the imagination, is not an argument against our view, but rather tells in favour of it. In any case, we have not yet reached the final stage in the clarification of the formal statement.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(b) One could of course object at this stage of the proceedings that the perspectives here opened up allow us to appreciate the fact that Mary's act of giving birth is indeed Mary's as such, 'Marian', we may say, but do not help us to understand how it is virginal. We must ask in return whether we are clear about what virginal means when applied to the birth. The presence or absence of pain has undoubtedly nothing to do with virginity (– whether there were in fact pains or not may be left a completely open question). But no one can seriously maintain that the notion, at least, of 'bodily integrity' has anything to do with virginity, except in so far as this is connected (also) with sexual intercourse, but not as it is connected with birth.[98] Hence 'virginitas in partu' appears as at least a highly problematical notion when the concepts are analysed. In any case, the process which the traditional doctrine takes to be the concrete content, cannot be derived from the (logically anterior) concept of 'virginitas in partu', which can only be regarded as a subsequent and not very happy summary of what one knows of the process from other sources. Thus the question arises as to what is the consistent objective basis from which the details in question could eventually be determined.

A close analysis of tradition reveals very soon that the train of thought [157] is not: Mary is a virgin in the act of giving birth; but the concept of virgin obviously implies certain factors; these factors must have been characteristic of the birth. The patristic teaching may often give the impression that the argument proceeds on these lines. But that is an illusion, arising from their pedagogical methods of instruction. For one has only to ask how it could be known that Mary was, in this sense, 'virgin' at the birth. Can it be seriously maintained that the content of the doctrine (no matter how envisaged) is deduced from the logically anterior revealed abstract notion of virginity? Or is the content of the concept in fact established by arguments 'from what is fitting', that is, not from the formal concept of virginity, but from the dignity of the divine motherhood, etc? In view of all this, one can easily assert that the objection, which is apparently so clear, is really unjustified.

And with this in mind, one may also answer the difficulty by pointing out that in the statements in question 'virgin' stands simply for Mary in her whole reality. Mary is 'the virgin' during the birth: and this means precisely what we said above, that the child-bearing of the Blessed Virgin corresponds to the unique and marvellous figure of the Blessed Virgin as a whole in her God-given role in the history of salvation. We do not need to confine ourselves to this provisionally formal statement of the nature of the birth, though one could already say at this point that we have attained a certain understanding of tradition, formal though it be, and hence an 'intelligible' content for the doctrine – even though we did not succeed in completing it with more material details.[99] And hence we ask: what particular ecclesial reality of Mary (as element of the economy of redemption). But if this nature is essentially mystery, one reason for which is the dialectical duality of the attributes of Mary (who is of the race of sinners – and beginning of the new redeemed creation; who is under the law of suffering and everyday life – and freed from the concupiscence of the flesh, etc.), we should not expect her child-bearing to be described in the undialectically smooth and clear terms, lacking all touch of mystery, which some 'pious people' seem to think is the most pious and orthodox theology.

---

[98] Here Mitterer is quite right at the start. His position only becomes questionable when it presupposes, more or less silently, that if the peculiarities attached to the birth by tradition cannot be deduced from the objective notion of virginity, they are at once excluded.

[99] It seems to us that this consideration provides us with some sort of answer (if only a formal one) to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

elements in the general mind of the Church can be drawn on, in order to reach a still more concrete picture of the doctrine?

One element must certainly be considered: the 'integrity' of the Blessed Virgin, that is, her freedom from concupiscence. We must proceed carefully here, for many reasons. First of all the doctrine of the integrity of Mary is no more express and tangible in the apostolic tradition as such than is the doctrine which we are discussing. Consequently, the methodological observation made above is to be kept in mind here. But though this difficulty of method and therefore of fact is to be carefully noted, one can still say: the detailed explicitation of a general concept of the nature of Mary and her place in the economy of salvation may not have reached a [158] given statement by a transition which seems to us today to be the almost indispensable link.[100] But this does not prove that when we use this transition we do not interpret correctly the faith of the Church, even of the ancient Church.[101] But there is still another difficulty which must be clearly envisaged, if we are not to draw false conclusions from the notion of freedom from concupiscence. Such integrity must be understood essentially, as indeed in Jesus Christ himself, as 'infralapsarian'. This does not diminish it. It rather reinforces it, but still it must not be understood automatically in the light of paradise and Adam. It must be understood in the light of Christ. And then it appears as the power of full moral integration of the whole being (here exposed to suffering and death) into the personal decision.[102] What this warning implies will be at once clear.

Biblically, our proposed view may be stated as follows. The actual manner of child-bearing appears, according to the testimony of Scripture (Gen 3.15) as a process which combines with its positive, human, God-given structure and meaning, the stigma of sin and death, which are the usual powers of the world,[103] and affect everything in it.[104] But if Mary is [159] the mother of the redeeming Word of God, if her child-bearing, the act of the immaculate, is part of the new beginning of the world, then the birth cannot carry this stigma; this birth must be 'different'. Since she is not subject to concupiscence, she integrates the passive elements of her life entirely, though in an infralapsarian way, into the basic decision of her personality.

---

question which we did not deal with at the beginning when presenting the doctrine of M. Schmaus.

[100] Something of the sort is an everyday experience in profane matters; the spiritual unity of consciousness contains many objects which are more or less consciously present, and also contains the connexions between these objects, which are likewise known either expressly or in a general way. In other words, there can be a genuine discovery of the truth, where the result can appear clearly before all the objective reasons are seen with the same clearness, even though they had been subjectively at work. And the subjective efficacity of such objectively efficacious reasons cannot be denied on the grounds that a quick, spontaneous discovery of the (correct) result, which seems to omit the objectively valid process of thought, was also in fact stimulated and enlightened by subjective preferences and attentiveness and the spiritual attitudes of the times in question, which cannot claim permanent validity. The human aspect of the development of dogma can undoubtedly show such traits.

[101] In a comprehensive Mariology we should have to show that as understood by the ancient Church, Mariology contained the doctrine of her integrity, and why it did so. But here again, integrity must be correctly understood, not as miraculously paradisaical, but as 'infralapsarian'. And we should have to show how even if grasped only in a general and inarticulate way, it could help the doctrine in question to be expressly stated.

[102] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore, Md. 1961) 347-382. And then, going more deeply into the question, J. B. Metz, Der Begriff der Concupiszenz bei Thomas von Aquin (Munich 1961).

[103] But in the most profound and central processes (always when seen as involving the whole man) this law of sin and death takes on its sharpest and most challenging outlines. And this is most precisely true of the act whereby man emancipates himself for a new and responsible life of his own, and asserts himself against the law of death, which he himself set up. Cf. K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death. Quaestiones Disputatae 2 (London ^{5}1964).

[104] The theological meaning of the expression must be formulated in this way because if one concentrates too directly and materially on the 'birth-pangs', one could get the impression that the text of Genesis was meaningless, since such pains are not always felt and it is morally lawful to try to avoid them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

She can turn what she has to submit to into the pure expression of her active decision. Thus she undergoes the passive adventure of child-bearing in a way different from other human beings, who always experience what the life-forces of the world inflict upon them as something alien and restrictive, which works upon them to the detriment of their freedom. We must not leap to the conclusion, in the light of Gen 3.15, that this birth was therefore free from pain. This formula may well suggest itself to someone who feels that he has the whole of tradition behind him, and indeed that he could arrive at this conclusion from the starting-point which has been developed here. But he still must ask himself does he knew so exactly what pain is, and when and in what measure pain is really an expression of sin and not that of a healthy nature and an exuberance of life. Does he know well enough how pain is constituted, with its purely physiological components and its basic spiritual attitude, so that he can be asked how he understands painlessness, in view of the complexity of the concept of pain? Has the physiological element been changed, or the personal interpretation, which is an intrinsic element of the pain which is experienced? He must ask himself whether for instance a pain which serves life[105] can, from the anthropological and theological point of view, be simply ranked with pain caused by hostile attack and [160] moral misdeeds.[106] Has he paid enough attention to Jn 9:1ff. in this connexion? Has he considered well enough that painless birth need be anything but a miracle? And has he considered that Mary's integrity is infralapsarian, that is, that it works in and through the law of suffering and pain, on which the Christian doctrine of Mary as Queen of Martyrs and mother of sorrows, who passed through death to her glory, is perfectly clear?

We cannot simply conclude however from these considerations that Mitterer is right and that we should definitely attribute birth-pangs to Mary. We could even say it follows certainly from our basic principle that the subjective experiences of Mary at the birth were different from those of other human beings. It may be objected that this element of a beneficent process can only be felt as painful by a human being who is subject to concupiscence, because only such a one will feel the apt experience as contradictory to his basic attitude, and hence painfully and strangely unintegrated. But if one is thinking in these terms, it can and must be said that Mary felt no 'pain' at the birth – but nothing will have been decided thereby about the purely physiological side of the process. For no matter how this aspect is thought of, the decisive point is always how this element is integrated with her personality and attitude as a whole, where it receives its final determination. Since the whole person of Mary was essentially different, through the miracle of grace, the whole, and hence every element of her child-birth, even as such (and it was a truly human type), was different from that of sinful mortals. But if we bear this principle in mind, we can understand how prudent one must be, to say the least, if one tries to depict this 'otherness' in detail. One finds oneself forced to maintain dialectically opposed positions at one and the same time: a really new beginning, in the midst of the old, which is being truly and patiently taken over in the flesh and the spirit – this is the criterion of the salvific economy of Christ in general. It is difficult, if not impossible, to balance out both sides correctly. This is also true of Mary as [105] St Thomas, for instance, undoubtedly gave such pains as such an interpretation which was physiologically wrong, when dealing with our question (S. Th. III q. 35 a. 6; III q. 28 a. 2; cf. also S.c.G. IV c. 45). He thought they came from a violent opening of the genital passages and a lesion of them. They are of themselves, in reality, a normal accompaniment of the mother's action, as she expels the child by compressing the womb. They are intrinsically closer to the active child-bearing, which may not be denied in the case of Mary, than was hitherto thought. Hence in former times it was easier to deny their existence, without further ado, than it is today.

[106] Mitterer, to my mind, overlooks this essential distinction when he appeals to the birth-pangs of Mary to make the concept of 'mother of sorrows' at once intelligible. Theologians exclude, for instance, all 'sickness' in the case of Jesus (but when is one 'sick'?), though they do not wish to deny his suffering – and this is interior, though caused by external assaults which are hostile to life and contrary to the moral order.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

she gives birth to the Lord.

And there is another difficulty which must be noted in this connexion. [161] Hesychius of Jerusalem seems to have been the only writer in the patristic age who referred expressly to Gen 3.16 in this context.[107] This observation of W. Zauner may be correct. But we can safely say that wherever the Fathers speak of the pangs of birth as something that ought not to be, and hence foreign to Mary (though they do not forget that Mary had to suffer otherwise), these pains are viewed in the light of their general interpretation of human existence: all these experiences are seen as a sign of the sinfulness of human existence. For what other reason could they have for denying that Mary suffered these pains? Perhaps because they were 'unpleasant'? But then they would have had to exclude them from all other situations of her life. Or perhaps because pains were not quite fitting at a joyful birth? But then why did the Fathers not have recourse to Jn 16.21? And then they would have had to deny that the child suffered the pain of being born, the misery of the stable, etc – which, at least for the most part, they did not do. It is therefore safe to consider that the background of their theological propositions was their understanding of Gen 3.16, even though it is not cited expressly. Since the sinful flesh is redeemed in this birth (cf. also Jn 1.13), since a new beginning is made here, the Fathers could justifiably think that it was not the same as other births. And hence they deny the 'pain'. They may have drawn their conclusions without enough theological nuances and without all the necessary care, still, they base their considerations on the same principles as we have tried to enunciate more specifically here.

(c) What are we then to think of the other details with which tradition tried to render the difference in Mary's child-bearing? We have already remarked that one is not obliged to accept at once all such elements of tradition as definitely dogmatic and certainly binding. But leaving this consideration aside, the question arises once more: what is really included in the concept of 'bodily integrity' and what does it imply? If it is considered as a revealed concept, anterior to the individual details, it will be difficult to say what it really implies and whether the usual conclusions drawn from it really follow. Is, for instance, the normal expansion of the genital passages in a completely healthy birth to be considered a breach of 'bodily integrity'? Will anyone have the courage to maintain this categorically? Are any of the processes of normal birth to be placed under the rubric of 'injury' or 'damage' (corruptio)? And if so, what has been damaged? The 'virginity' or a bodily 'integrity', 'soundness'? All this is very [162] problematical, and can hardly be a pointer to the concrete details which we are looking for, as should be clear from the general trend of the discussion in Mitterer and in these pages.

Some theologians may firmly reject all these efforts, and take up the stand-point that the usual details indicated by tradition (painlessness, non-rupture of the hymen, 'sine sordibus' – by which the Fathers meant above all the after-birth) cannot seriously be deduced from any other source, and still hold that they are data which must be accepted as a matter of faith. But then they must be consistent and say: they have been explicitly revealed in these terms, and have only been summed up subsequently in the general notion of 'integrity' – of virginity, of body, etc. But what theologian would be ready to make such an assertion today? How would he then explain the hesitations and variations of tradition when indicating such details? Can it be really true that the item usually named in the third place, the 'sordes', was explicitly revealed? And why should this be in a less privileged position? And does one not come then to a docetic idea of the birth? Why should other physiological processes, such as the signs of pregnancy, the giving suck to the child, etc, which tradition has no hesitation in ascribing to Mary, be considered less 'unfitting'? But if the 'sordes' are conceded, why should the other two elements be in a stronger position, either from the nature of things or from tradition? If [107] Hom. de S. Maria Deipara IV: PG 93, 1454.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we consider all these difficulties and unsolved problems, it is impossible to say that we are clearly faced with the necessity either of being able to deduce (and deducing) the concrete details from our initial principle or of giving up this principle as insufficient and not doing justice to tradition. Hence we by no means affirm, with Mitterer, that these particularities never existed. All we say is this: Church doctrine affirms, with the real substance of tradition, that Mary's child-birth, as regards both child and mother, like the conception, is, in its total reality, as the completely human act of this 'virgin', in itself (and not just by reason of the conception, as Mitterer says), an act corresponding to the nature of this mother, and hence it is unique, miraculous and 'virginal'. But this proposition, which is directly intelligible, does not offer us the possibility of deducing assertions about the concrete details of the process, which would be certain and universally binding.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[163]

PART FOUR

The Doctrine of Grace

[165]

7

NATURE AND GRACE[1]

The discussion of the theme 'nature and grace' is generally left nowadays to a very small circle of specialists. But at least they come back to the theme again and again, and do not just talk about it when it cannot be avoided, as in the theology of the schools. The theme is passionately debated. There is no general agreement and the controversy is obviously more than a scholastic exercise. We can be glad of this. For since the controversy between Catholics and reformers grew sterile and died away in the 18th century, and since the traditional scholastic theology came once more into its own in the neo-Scholasticism of the 19th century after the meagre efforts of the 'Enlightenment' period, the general impression was that the books had been closed on the theme of 'nature and grace' by general consent, and that anything worth knowing about it was more or less already known.

If we now try to give the average concept of nature and grace in post-Tridentine and neo-Scholastic theology, it must be remembered that we are always talking about the average approach. No one denies that the theology of today is the heir to all the ages of theological thinking. Nothing is ever quite forgotten in the Church. And the explicit assertions of theology always contain inexhaustible riches of implicit meanings which are part of the whole, even though not immediately seen. It would therefore be easy to impute injustice and distortion to the description of the average way of understanding a question in the current theology of the schools. But such average concepts do exist. And sometimes they affect the life of the Church more than the sublime insights which are the possession of the few.

[166] What then has been the average concept of the relationship of nature and grace in neo-Scholasticism? To see the peculiar elements of this concept, which was not strictly speaking clear to the theologians themselves, we must start by discussing a position which is apparently only a marginal one in the doctrine of supernatural grace. This grace by which man is justified, and by which he is enabled to perform salutary acts, was taken to be something totally beyond the region of consciousness. In itself this is merely a scholastic opinion, which was always in fact disputed. For Thomistic theology always maintained that a supernatural act had a formal object which could never be attained by a purely natural act. But the opposite opinion was predominant in the schools and determined the average mentality: supernatural grace is a reality of which one knows something through the teaching of faith but which is in itself completely inaccessible and gives no sign of its presence in the conscious, personal life of man. Once taught of its existence by faith, man must of course refer to it, take care to possess it (by moral acts and the reception of the sacraments), treasure it as the divinization of his being and the pledge and presupposition of eternal life. But the space where he comes to himself, experiences himself and lives, is, as regards the data of

[1] The bibliographical notes can obviously offer only a very limited and inevitably arbitrary choice from the theological and historical literature on the dogmatic doctrine of grace. In general, we must confine ourselves to a choice from the literature of the last two hundred years.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consciousness, not filled by this grace. His experience of his spiritual and moral acts in their proper reality (in contrast to their proposed objects, which are distinct from the acts) remains exactly what it would and could be, if there were no such thing as a supernatural 'elevation' of these acts. Thus grace, of itself, according to this very common opinion, is a superstructure beyond the realm of consciousness, with regard to the mental experience of the moral being, though it is of course a conscious object of faith and acknowledged to be the most sublime and divine element in man, his only salutary possession.

This view also seems to be the only possible and the obvious one. One can know nothing of one's state of grace, or at most, one can make deductions about it, more or less probable, using certain indications. But one does not 'notice' grace at all, or at the very most, only some of the 'healing' graces which help to fulfil the natural law and are of themselves natural aids. Simple experience and the teaching of Trent[2] (Denzinger 802; [167] 805; 825; 826) seem to confirm this opinion which anyway presents itself as the obvious one. Once it is accepted, the region where we know ourselves as active spiritually and morally seems to be naturally identifiable with the dimension of 'nature'. Indeed, this state becomes the very definition of what we mean by nature: that which we know about ourselves without the word of revelation – for that is nature and merely nature. And vice versa; nature alone and its acts are the components of the life which we experience as our own. We use the elements of natural concepts, attitudes etc, to construct the acts in which we refer ourselves by our intention to the realities of the revealed mysteries of God, acts which we know to be 'ontologically' elevated to the supernatural plane – but only 'ontologically'. Supernatural 'enlightenment', moral 'impulse' and 'inspiration' to good acts, the 'light' of faith, the breath of the Spirit and other similar concepts from Scripture and tradition (the unction, the signing of the Spirit etc.), are reduced either to this purely entitative elevation of our natural moral acts, or to a natural influence of a psychological type – which is however considered to be providentially directed to our supernatural salvation. In a word, the relationship between nature and grace is conceived in such a way that they appear as two layers so carefully placed that they penetrate each other as little as possible.

In the same way, the orientation of 'nature' to grace is conceived of in as negative a way as possible. Grace is, it is true, an unsurpassable perfectioning of nature; God as the Lord of this nature can command man to submit to his de facto will and to be receptive to his grace, which direct man to a supernatural life and end. But of itself nature has only a 'potentia obedientialis' to such an end, and this capacity is thought of as negatively as possible. It is no more than non-repugnance to such an elevation. Of itself, nature would find its perfection just as readily and harmoniously in its own proper realm, in a purely natural end, without an immediate intuition of God in the beatific vision. When it finds itself in immediate [168] possession of itself – as is part of the essence of the spirit, 'reditio completa in seipsum' – it meets itself as though it were 'pure nature'. According to the well-known axiom (which is a matter of opinion), it is distinguished from pure nature only 'sicut spoliatus a nudo'. And this 'state of being despoiled' is silently considered as a merely extrinsic element with regard to the absence of sanctifying grace: a deprivation due to a divine decree (which demands the

[2] Cf. for instance: A. Stakemeier, Das Konzil von Trient über die Heilsgewissheit (Heidelberg 1947); V. Heyneck, 'Das Votum des Generals der Konventualen Bonaventura Costassiaro vom 26 Nov. 1546 über die Gnadengewissheit', Franz. Stud. 31 (1949) 274-304, 350-395; Fr. Buuck, 'Zum Rechtfertigungsdekret. Die Unterscheidung zwischen fehlbaren und unfehlbaren Glauben in den vorbereitenden Verhandlungen', Fr. J. Schierse, 'Das Trienter Konzil und die Frage nach der christlichen Gewissheit' both in: Georg Schreiber, Das Weltkonzil von Trient I (Freiburg 1951) 117-167; G. M. Lachance, 'L'homme peut-il savoir, qu'il a la grâce?' Rev. Univ. Ottawa 24 (1954) 65-92; M. Guérard des Lauriers, 'Saint Augustin et la question de la certitude de la grâce au Concile de Trente' in Augustinus Magister (Congrès International Aug. 1954), Communications 2, 1057-1067; L. M. Poliseno, 'I Carmelitani e la certezza dello stato di grazia nel Concilio Tridentino', Carmelus 1 (1954) 111-145.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possession of grace) and to an historical fact of the past (the guilt of Adam). But we do not usually think that the lack of grace might be different in the two cases, that of pure nature and that of fallen nature.

This popular view cannot be absolved from a certain 'extrinsicism', as it has been called, if it can be shown that all the data of official Church teaching on the relationship of nature and grace can be maintained untouched even if the relationship is held to be closer than it is described in this current opinion. And it cannot be denied, though it is distasteful to some to admit it, that the current view is not without danger in practice. For if it is correct, the known spiritual life of man must take place within the region of his pure nature, which has two sectors: the 'purely natural' which is totally confined to its own dimensions, apart from an 'elevation' which is outside consciousness, and then a number of acts of knowledge which are (subjectively) composed of purely natural elements (in matters of the spiritual as such) and are referred to the supernatural only by their objects (by faith, by a pure intention etc.). If this is true, then it is not surprising – though not of course justifiable – that man should take very little interest in this mysterious superstructure of his being. After all, he does not find grace where he finds himself, in the immediate activation of his spiritual being. And one could have the impression – not objectively justifiable – that something originally called grace had come to be considered, in the course of the medieval evolution of dogma, as an act produced by nature's own capacity (e.g. its possibility of loving God above all things); after which, to conceal the process, this same act was once more placed above nature as the 'supernatural'. And then this supernatural was displaced into a region beyond consciousness, as an unconscious modality of what was spiritual and moral in nature, so that it was very hard to say what use it was at all. Let us think, for instance, of the distinction (correct in a certain sense) between a natural and a supernatural 'love of God above all things'. How are these two acts to be distinguished as acts of love, that is, spiritually, if the supernaturalness of [169] supernatural love only consists of its entitative 'elevation'? Is it totally misguided, to see modern naturalism as having some connexion with this theory? Is it quite wrong to suggest that the modern lack of interest in the supernatural can only have developed on the basis of such a view of grace, which must be to some extent nominalist?

The correctness or adequacy of the standard view is now once more the subject of theological debate, for many reasons.

One is philosophical. It is the contribution of a school of scholastic philosophy which is linked with the work of J. Maréchal.[3] In his intellectual and transcendental dynamism, Maréchal considers man (as spirit, i.e. in his 'nature') in the inmost heart of his being as 'desiderium naturale visionis beatificae' – to use the words of St Thomas. This desire is conditional and so there is no necessity for the actual call to the vision by grace. But it is a real longing for the absolute being and one which is present in every spiritual act as its raison d'être. Without being expressly and conceptually present, it is the a priori condition of all knowledge where a finite object is grasped. Thus the return to the doctrine of the natural desire for the immediate vision of God in Maréchal shows at once how an apparently minor thesis in St Thomas becomes the essential and central concept for the understanding of a spiritual nature. It is understandable that the theology of the 1930's was much pre-occupied with the question of how this desiderium naturale in Maréchal and his followers was to be understood and whether it was compatible with the Church doctrine of the supernatural [3] In this short theological essay, we do not give a bibliography of this philosophical trend, which has been of great importance in the confrontation of scholastic philosophy with modern philosophy. A large proportion of present-day Catholic philosophy is tributary to a greater or lesser degree to the doctrine of Maréchal. We may think of the work of A. T. G. Hayen, A. Grégoire, G. Siewerth, Max Müller, J. B. Lotz and many others.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nature and gratuitousness of the immediate vision of God.[4] At any rate, there was an increasing understanding of the [170] view that man's orientation, as spirit, towards God was not merely something that was 'also' present in man, but that man's ordination to God, even though an implicit and a priori transcendental, makes him what he experiences himself to be, something that he can deny and repress only at the cost of sin, because even then it is affirmed in every act of his spiritual existence (though only as an implicitly transcendental a priori).

From the point of view of history of theology,[5] new approaches were [171] opened up by research into the history of theological reflexion on the supernatural and how it is distinguished from the natural. Theologians came to recognize that the present theological

[4] See for instance B. E. Brisboir, 'Désir naturel et vision de Dieu' NRT 54 (1927) 81-97; H. Lennerz, 'Kann die Vernunft die Möglichkeit der beseligenden Anschauung Gottes beweisen?' Schol. 5 (1930) 102-108; 'Ist die Anschauung Gottes ein Geheimnis?', Schol. 7 (1932) 208-232; M. Corvez, 'Est-il possible de démontrer l'existence en Dieu d'un ordre de mystères strictement surnaturels?' RT 37 (1932) 660-667; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, 'La possibilité de la vision béatifique peut-elle se démontrer?' RT 38 (1933) 669-688; further literature in Bull. Thom. 1932, n. 743-769; 1933, n. 896-907; Bull. Thom. V (1937ff.) n. 632-643; n. 728; P. Descoqs, Le mystère de notre élévation surnaturelle (Paris 1938). Further literature in Z. Alszeghy, Greg. 31 (1950) 444-446. This whole complex of questions also brings up the question of whether a finality ordained to God such as Maréchal accepts, could at least demonstrate the possibility of the beatific vision. We cannot go into this question here.

[5] We can refer here only to a small selection of the literature of the last twenty-five years, omitting biblical theology, because it has had unfortunately little influence on the whole on the dogmatic theology of the schools. We list first the book of H. Rondet, which gives a survey of the whole history of the theology of grace, then some works on patristic theology, and then the history of the dogma of grace in medieval and modern times. H. Rondet, Gratia Christi. Essai d'histoire du dogme et de théologie dogmatique (Paris 1948); H. Rahner, Die Gottesgeburt. Die Lehre der Kirchenväter von der Geburt Christi im Herzen der Gläubigen' ZKT 59 (1935) 333-418; E. Mersch, Le corps mystique du Christ I-II^2 (Louvain 1936); A. Lieske, Die Theologie der Logosmystik bei Origenes (Münster 1938); J. Gross, La divinisation du chrétien d'après les pères grecs (Paris 1938); A. Lieske, 'Zur Theologie der Christusmystik Gregors von Nyssa' Schol. 14 (1939) 408-514; J. Loosen, Logos und Pneuma im begnadeten Menschen bei Maximus Confessor (Münster 1941); A. Mayer, Das Bild Gottes im Menschen nach Clemens von Alexandrien (Rome 1942); H. U. von Balthasar, Présence et Pensée. Essai sur la philosophie religieuse de Grégoire de Nysse (Paris 1942); J. B. Schoemann, 'Gregors von Nyssa theologische Anthropologie als Bildtheologie', Schol. 18 (1943) 31-53, 175-200; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique. Essai sur la doctrine spirituelle de saint Grégoire de Nysse (Paris 1944); H. du Manoir, Dogme et spiritualité chez S. Cyrille d'Alexandrie (Paris 1945); P. Galtier, Le Saint-Esprit en nous d'après les pères grecs (Rome 1946); A. Lieske, 'Die Theologie der Christusmystik Gregors von Nyssa', ZKT 70 (1948) 49-93; 129-168, 315-340; J. Grabowski, 'St Augustine and the Presence of God', TS 13 (1952) 336-348; E. Braem, 'Augustinus' leer over de heiligmakende genade' Augustiniana I (1951) 7-20, 77-90; II (1952) 201-204; III (1953) 328-340; IV (1954) 196-204; H. Merki, 'Ομοι/ωσιφ θεω|~~ von der platonischen Angleichung an Gott zur Gottähnlichkeit bei Gregor von Nyssa (Freiburg/Switzerland 1952). H. Doms, Die Gnadenlehre des seligen Albertus Magnus (Breslau 1929); J. Schupp, Die Gnadenlehre des Petrus Lombardus (Freiburg 1932); F. Stegmüller, Zur Gnadenlehre des jungen Suarez (Freiburg 1933); F. Stegmüller, Francisco de Vitoria y la doctrina de la gracia en la escuela salmantina (Barcelona 1934); F. Stegmüller, Geschichte des Molinismus I: Neue Molinaschriften (Münster 1935); E. Köster, Die Heilslehre des Hugo von St Viktor (Emsdetten 1940); H. Bouillard, Conversion et grâce chez saint Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1944); R. C. Dhont, Le problème de la préparation à la grâce. Debuts de l'école franciscaine (Paris 1946); M. Flick, L'attimo della giustificazione secondo S. Tommaso (Rome 1947); Z. Alszeghy, 'La teologia dell'ordine sopranaturale nella scolastica antica' Greg. 31 (1950) 414-450 (with wide survey of the literature of the last decades); S. Gonzalez Rivas, 'Suarez frente al misterio de la inhabitacion' Estud. Eccl. 24 (1950) 341-366; J. Auer, Entwicklung der Gnadenlehre in der Hochscholastik mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des Kardinals Matteo d'Aquasparta, I (Freiburg 1942), II (Freiburg 1951); A. M. Landgraf, Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik Part 1, vols. I-II, Die Gnadenlehre (Regensburg 1951-1952); H. Lais, Die Gnadenlehre des hl. Thomas in der Summa contra Gentiles und der Kommentar des Franziskus Sylvestris von Ferrara (Munich 1951); J. Alfaro, Lo natural y lo sobrenatural. Estudio historico desde santo Thomas hasta Cayetano (1274-1534), (Madrid 1952); O. Lottin, Psychologie et morale aux XII et XIII siècles, I, II, III, 1-2, IV, 1-2 (Louvain 1942-1959); W. A. van Roo, Grace and Original Justice according to St Thomas (Rome 1955); Z. Alszeghy, Nova creatura. La nozione della grazia nei commentari medievali di S. Paolo (Rome 1956).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concept of the supernatural (and so the concept of nature in contrast to the supernatural) was the result of a slow development, and that it only came very slowly to be applied to the various individual theological questions – such as the necessity of internal and strictly supernatural grace for every salutary act; the possibility and the limits of the distinction between naturally and supernaturally moral acts; the distinction between supernatural actual grace and habitual grace; the exclusion of a positive preparation for justification by moral acts not activated by strictly salutary grace; the possibility of a purely natural final happiness of man etc. It may be said on the whole that all these developments were legitimate and evolved correctly from the initial data of revelation strictly speaking. It may therefore be said that the development was not an aberration. It may also be said that it was so far advanced in St Thomas that one can see in him the direction of later evolution – which does not mean that it had reached with St Thomas the stage verified in Cajetan and after Trent. But the course of the development is now clear enough to show that we may not read into earlier theologies all the insights and concepts of a later time. And once this piece of this history of dogma has been acquired, one is once more in the situation of being able to ask oneself whether part of the price of progress was not the loss of some valuable insights of earlier times and so whether one must not try to win back some of the gains that were once the possession of theology.

It may well be that some studies of the history of dogma exaggerate the [172] difference between the medieval theology of grace, above all that of St Thomas, and the post-Tridentine. It may well be that the 'Augustinian' theology of grace as taught in the 17th and 18th centuries contain certain elements which cannot be held today, even though Benedict XIV defended them against the charge of crypto-Jansensism. But once the nuances of a spiritual development have been noticed, once it has been understood that this history cannot simply be divided into the story of an unchangeable truth, always clear and never contested by a truly orthodox theologian, and the story of a merely wicked and heretical doctrine: then a historical survey will be more than a mere account of how we have now reached the definitive and unsurpassable results of the theology of today. It will be the re-discovery of themes which were once well-known but have today been forgotten by a conventional theology which is always liable to take the handiest and simplest form of a doctrine as the criterion of truth and sacred tradition. And then one sees – to take some examples from the question which interests us here – that the concept of the desiderium naturale in visionem beatificam in St Thomas is not just a piece of historically explicable atavism going back to an age when theology was not so clear about the supernatural and gratuitous quality of the vision of God (as St Thomas himself was); that the reluctance to admit a strictly supernatural actual grace (along with the habitual) is not merely due to a stubborn blockage of thought, which could only be brought slowly to see that a salutory act preceding justification, and still impossible without grace, necessarily demands such a grace;[6] that one can still learn something from St Thomas about the compenetration of sacrament and personal act, which has been either almost forgotten or over-simplified in later theology; that medieval theology had a greater and profounder idea of 'uncreated grace' than the post-Tridentine theology of the schools, which derives the 'indwelling of the Holy Spirit' more or less exclusively from 'created grace' and is too much inclined to consider the latter as the grace, strictly speaking, in its reaction against the Reformation.

[6] For St Thomas, the really 'preparatory' acts before justification are essentially acts of the 'taking over' of justification, which are already done with the grace of justification; hence he did not need to pay much attention to preparatory acts which also precede justification temporally; he can therefore tell us something new, and not just we him.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The third impulse for re-opening the question of the relations of nature and grace comes from the revival of dialogue with Reformed [173] theology.[7] By the nature of things, this theology has to put itself this question, though from other viewpoints. And it has done so once more: with regard to the Bible, with regard to Luther, with regard to its debate with modern humanism and an Anglo-American optimistic view of the world. So it had to ask itself: what then is man, if he is a sinner, how far does he remain a sinner when he is justified? The ancient doctrine of the Reformers is maintained, that there is absolutely no good in man, which serves his salvation, without grace. But the question really only begins with this statement, which if properly understood, is also affirmed by Catholics; and this opens up new possibilities of discussion with Catholic theology, which have been to some extent exploited. And Catholic theology in turn, though only in the case of a few theologians, has felt itself impelled to ask once more what true interests the Reformers represent and how such interests may be better catered for among Catholics. It is a matter of asking how Christocentric is the whole actual world and order of salvation; of proving that the supernatural character of grace does not mean that man is in fact a closed, self-contained and finished system, which he can work out in his 'natural' existence, while grace is a sort of pure superstructure imposed on it, but leaving the lower element unaltered in itself; of considering whether and in what sense a Catholic understanding of the axiom 'simul justus et peccator' might be found; of giving full value to the existentialist, actualist and personalist elements which are implicit also in the traditional Catholic concept of grace and are capable of clearing up the misunderstanding, that an 'entitative' and 'habitual' infused grace implies an unjustifiable distortion of the biblical concept of grace.

That the mentality of the present day must be an effective stimulus to theology does not need much proof. After the synthesis of the diversity of reality, a unified view of man is sought for. Thought is 'existential'. One strives to 'experience' the reality of grace precisely there where one lives one's own existence; and so one tries to see supernatural – and not just medicinal – grace as the activation and the force of concrete existence. [174] In keeping with other tendencies in the spirit of the times, one tries to see grace as something more than the presupposition and content of individual salvation. More conscious effort is made to reflect once more on the ecclesiological aspects of the doctrine of grace, on grace in the history of salvation outside Christianity constituted as a Church, on the possibility of grace and its most sublime manifestations in the world of non-Christian religions.

If we now indicate some of the 'results' of these theological efforts, we are of course not speaking of 'results' which have already been officially recognized or become simply 'sententia communis'. The development of Church doctrine does not go so fast, especially as today the immediately topical questions, especially of morals, and Mariology, claim more attention than such deeper questions of theology, which inevitably need a long time to mature. All we can attempt to do here is to indicate very vaguely (more is impossible here), with reference rather to the doctrine itself what are the essential lines of development in these theological efforts.

[7] We mention here only a few Catholic works on the matter: H. U. von Balthasar, 'Deux Notes sur Karl Barth', RSR 35 (1948) 92-111; J. Hamer, Karl Barth. L'occasionalisme théologique de Karl Barth. Etude sur sa méthode dogmatique (Paris 1949); H. Volk, Emil Brunners Lehre von dem Sünder (Münster 1950); H. U. von Balthasar, Karl Barth, Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie (Cologne 1951); A. Ebneter, Der Mensch in der Theologie Karl Barths (Zurich 1952); H. Küng, Justification (London & New York 1964).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One may well think that the question of 'uncreated grace' may be taken further.[8] In the encyclical 'Mystici Corporis' Pius XII indicated that there [175] were open questions here, which were deliberately left open by the magisterium. If, as Pius XII emphasizes, grace and glory are two stages of the one divinization of man; if, as classical theology has always emphasized, glory means a self-communication of God to the created spirit which is not a created quality or entity distinct from God, produced by efficient causality, but God's imparting himself to man by means of quasi-formal causality: then this notion can be applied far more explicitly to grace than has been customary hitherto in theology. 'Uncreated grace' will then no longer appear to be merely a consequence of the creation of 'infused' habitual grace, regarded as a 'physical accident'. It will be rather seen as what is truly central in grace – which will explain much better the strictly mysterious character of grace, since a purely created entity, strictly as such, can never be an absolute mystery. God communicates himself to man in his own proper reality. That is the mystery and the fullness of grace. Starting from here, it will be much easier to find the link with the mystery of the Incarnation and that of the Trinity.

It seems indeed to be true that the opinion maintained by Petavius, Scheeben and others, each in their own way, is gaining ground: that grace founds a relationship between man and each of the three divine persons which is not an appropriation, but something proper to each divine person. If one supposes that the immediate vision of God can only be based on a quasi-formal self-communication of God in vision, and not (adequately) on a created quality in the spirit of man; and if one recalls the obvious truth, that each of the three divine persons is the object of immediate intuition in his personal propriety: then that entitative (ontic) quasiformal communication of God, which takes the place of a species impressa as the ontological foundation of man's possession of God in knowledge, must include a non-appropriated relationship of each of the three divine persons to man. On this basis, the relation of the 'immanent' to the 'redemptive' Trinity could be thought out anew. And the supreme mystery of the Christian faith could appear more clearly as a reality with which man has to do not merely conceptually (and through the incarnation of the Logos) but also really, in the exercise of his life of grace. It could be seen that God is not only trinitarian in himself, but also communicates himself in a trinitarian way, in grace, which means more than efficient causality on the part of God in the line of creatio ex nihilo outside himself – though it remains true that where God exercises efficient causality, the work is to be attributed to the whole Trinity as one single cause. [176] One may and perhaps must go still further. As a rule, the connexion

[8] On the whole question of uncreated grace and the appropriated or non-appropriated indwelling of the divine persons we mention a few recent works: H. Kuhaupt, Die Formalursache der Gotteskindschaft (Münster 1940); H. Schauf, Die Einwohnung des Heiligen Geistes. Die Lehre von der nichtappropriierten Einwohnung des Heiligen Geistes als Beitrag zur Theologiegeschichte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der beiden Theologen Carl Passaglia und Clemens Schrader (Freiburg 1941); Ph. J. Donnelly, 'The Inhabitation of the Holy Spirit: a solution according to de la Taille', TS 8 (1947) 445-470; J. Trütsch, SS. Trinitatis inhabitatio apud theologos recentiores (Trento 1949); S. J. Dockx, Fils de Dieu par grâce (Paris 1948); C. Sträter, 'Het begrip "appropriatie" bij S. Thomas', Bijdr. 9 (1948) 1-41, 144-186; J.-H. Nicolas, 'Présence trinitaire et présence de la Trinité', RT 50 (1950) 183-191; Th. J. Fitzgerald, De inhabitatione Spiritus Sancti doctrina Sancti Thomae Aquinatis (Mundelein 1950); R. Morency, L'Union de grâce selon saint Thomas d'Aquin (Montreal 1950); P. Galtier, L'Habitation en nous des trois personnes (Rome 1950); H. P. C. Lyons, 'The Grace of Sonship', ETL 27 (1951) 438-466; C. Kaliba, Die Welt als Gleichnis des dreieinigen Gottes. Entwurf zu einer trinitarischen Ontologie (Salzburg 1952); P. de Letter, 'Sanctifying Grace and our Union with the Holy Trinity', TS 13 (1952) 33-58; Ph. J. Donnelly, 'Sanctifying Grace and our Union with the Holy Trinity. A Reply', TS 13 (1952) 190-204; F. Bourassa, 'Adoptive Sonship. Our union with the divine persons', TS 13 (1952) 309-335; P. de Letter, 'Current Theology. Sanctifying Grace and the Divine Indwelling', TS 14 (1953) 242-272; F. Bourassa, 'Présence de Dieu et union aux divines personnes', Sc. Eccl. 6 (1954) 3-23; K. Rahner, 'Some Implications of the scholastic concept of Uncreated Grace' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore Md. 1961) 319-346.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between the Incarnation and grace is thought of as merely de facto:[9] God has in fact decreed that the order of grace should depend on the Incarnate Word. It is implicitly supposed that things could be otherwise. But is this supposition clear and certainly correct? Both the order of grace and the Incarnation derive from God's free grace. But does it follow that both these objects of God's gracious will, in both of which he communicates himself, as himself, ad extra, though in different ways, are really two different acts of his freely exercised love? Is there anything in Catholic principles to prevent us taking the Scotist point of view and considering the primal act of God, in which everything else is in fact given, as the self-exteriorization of God who is the love which gives itself in the incarnation? And then the order of grace would already be instituted, which would (probably) be unthinkable without such a decree of God with regard to his personal communication. Are there any valid arguments against the position which holds that the possibility of creation rests on that of the Incarnation, even though the fact of creation (as nature) does not necessarily imply the actual realization of the self-exteriorization of God in the Incarnation? Let us assume this position, which is recommended by its lofty simplicity, not to mention its more positive support in the Logos-theology of pre-Nicene and pre-Augustinian theology. Then grace has a much more radically Christological character. The Logos who has become part of the world is not merely the de facto mediator of grace by his merit – which only became necessary because Adam had cast this grace away – he is also the person who by his free Incarnation creates the order of grace and nature as his own presupposition (nature) and his milieu (the grace of the other spiritual creatures). This would enable us, as we have already said, to reach a deeper understanding of the immanent Trinity. The Logos would not be merely one of the divine persons who could become man if they wished: he would be the person in whom God communicates himself hypostatically to the world. The Incarnation would mirror the personal propriety of the second divine person, the Logos as such. The Trinity of the economy of redemption would enable us to have some insight into the immanent Trinity. This is not impossible, [177] because the axiom that the efficient causality of God ad extra is common to the one God without distinction of persons cannot be applied to this quasi-formal causality. This invites us to re-consider the speculation of pre-Nicene theology and of the Greeks in general. It will appear that on this point St Augustine had too little understanding of the most ancient theology, which held that it is the Logos who appears and must appear if God wishes to show himself personally to the world.

With a more exact concept of 'uncreated grace' in mind, we can also see more clearly how the Catholic theology of grace, on its own proper principles (grace is not just pardon for the poor sinner but 'participation in the divine nature'), can go beyond the notion of a merely entitative, created state and the merely 'ontic' and non-existential element of a 'physical accident'.[10] Grace is God himself, the communication in which he gives himself to man as the divinizing favour which he is himself. Here his work is really himself since it is he who is imparted. Such grace, from the very start, cannot be thought of independently of the personal love of God and its answer in man. This grace is not thought of as a 'thing'. It is something that is only 'put at man's disposal' in that act of 'letting oneself be disposed of' which is the proper gift of the freest grace, the miracle of love. Ontic categories are only maintained here (even by Catholics) because and in so far as a Catholic philosophy does hold that the real (and what could be more real and effective than the love of God?) must be thought of as 'real' and 'being', that the highest must be expressed in the most abstract words, and that therefore the act of divine love towards us – God's act, not ours, though enabling us to act, [9] Cf. N. Sanders, 'Een bovennatuurlijke orde mogelijk zonder Christus?' Stud. Cath. 29 (1954) 152-158; K. Rahner, 'Thoughts on the theology of Christmas', in Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore 1967); ibid. 'The eternal significance of the humanity of Jesus for our relationship with God'.

[10] J. Auer, 'Um den Begriff der Gnade', ZKT 70 (1948) 341-368.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and not just submit – previous to our act, must be considered as that which renders possible our moral and religious decisions. It cannot therefore be expressed except in categories of being such as state, accident, habit, infusion etc. Such expressions are not confusing if properly understood, and they need not distort one's view of the fact that grace is always the free action of divine love which is only 'at the disposal' of man precisely in so far as he is at the disposal of this divine love. One must indeed always remember that God is not diminished by our becoming greater. And in the last resort, Christianity is not the religion whose basic attitude is fear of its going to our head – and not into our grateful heart – if we extol the greatness to which God has raised man in order that he might praise God. This is true of Mariology. And it is also true of [178] grace, of which Mariology is merely the most beautiful part of the doctrine.

This grace affects our conscious life, not just our being but our existence. The Thomistic doctrine[11] of the specific object of the act entitatively elevated to the supernatural, an object which, as formal, cannot be attained by any natural act, must be fully considered once more and again be given a predominant place. For in such a context 'object' does not mean 'something present like other objects, distinguishable from them and placed beside them by reflexion'. A formal object is neither a datum of knowledge nor, an abstract and merely consequent summing up of what is common to many individual objects. It is the a priori horizon given in consciousness, under which, in grasping the individual a posteriori object, everything is known which is grasped as an object strictly speaking. If we understand aright the old scholastic doctrine of the formal object as the a priori 'light' under which and in which all single objects are grasped, no one can object to the old Thomistic doctrine of the formal supernatural object by appealing to 'experience', which is supposed to know nothing of such a formal object – meaning in fact material object! It must only be noted that the a priori formal object of an act is not the same thing conceptually as a formal object which is clearly distinguishable by reflexion from another formal object. For a metaphysics of knowledge, there is no great difficulty in recognizing that transcendence towards being in general, the natural openness for being as a whole, cannot be clearly distinguished in subsequent reflexion from the supernatural transcendence, the openness of the soul informed by grace, which is directed in all its supernaturally elevated acts towards the God of eternal life, towards the immediate experience of the (triune) absolute being. And this is true although both modes of transcendence, the formal object of the natural spirit and the formal object of the supernaturally [179] elevated spirit, are both given in consciousness. Such considerations, taken from a metaphysics of the spirit, though barely indicated here, show that the ancient Thomistic doctrine is perfectly defensible.

It has in its favour that it is a transposition into metaphysical and theological terms of a conviction which is voiced in the Scriptures. Let us take the doctrine of Scripture as it is, honestly and without prejudice, and without correcting it in the light of the silent presupposition that it cannot have said something, because this something is supposed to be impossible. Then we must say that for Scripture, the communication of the Spirit (the divine pneuma) is not just a trans-conscious entitative 'elevation' of the conscious moral acts of man, which remain existentially the same and are only changed extrinsically by the fides ex [11] There is no point in quoting here the text-books which deal with this question. We only remark in passing that this question is also of great importance in the problem of the foundations of faith. Cf. for instance A. Lang, Die Wege der Glaubensbegründung bei den Theologen des 14 Jahrhunderts (Münster 1950); F. Schlagenhaufen, 'Die Glaubensgewissheit und ihre Begründung in der Neuscholastik', ZKT 56 (1932) 313-374, 530-595; G. Englhardt, Die Entwicklung der dogmatischen Glaubenspsychologie in der mittelalterischen Scholastik vom Abälardstreit bis zu Philipp dem Kanzler (Münster 1933); R. Aubert, Le problème de l'acte de foi (Louvain [2]1950). Cf. also K. Rahner, 'Reflections on the experience of grace' in Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore, Md. 1967).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

auditu. It is 'life', 'unction', 'consolation', 'light', the inexpressible co-intercession of the Spirit, pneuma which is more than nous, an inward attraction, testimony given by the Spirit etc. It would be well if the doctrine of Scripture were carefully examined in the light of this scholastic controversy. If this were done, one would gradually rid oneself of the unavowed opinion that in an objectively serious and religiously important question one is already certain a priori that no more light is to be had from Scripture if the subject is controverted in the schools, because otherwise the question would have been settled long ago. Once all the schools are of the opinion that supernatural actual graces are to be described as 'lights' and 'inspirations', this doctrine of tradition must be taken seriously. It may not be so interpreted in anti-Thomistic teaching that nothing of it in fact remains. For an entitatively elevated act which remains from the point of view of consciousness a natural act, cannot be characterized as an inward illumination and inspiration without doing violence to language. The fact that the anti-Thomistic (Molinist) thesis still holds on to this characterization and tries to do justice to it, shows how strongly tradition is convinced that the act due to supernatural grace is even spiritually different from the natural act. The difference is felt to be conscious and existential, and not confined to an entitative modality.

Here we must note something else, which should be borne more clearly in mind than is usually the case. Acts inspired supernaturally by grace are not confined to the justified. There are stirrings of grace which precede the act of accepting justification in a free act of faith and love. There is also grace outside the Church and its sacraments. The offer of grace to a man who has reached in his spiritual development the immediate [180] possibility of an existential decision is not intermittent, restricted to some very definite occasions and 'actual' in this momentary sense. There is no stringent theological reason for thinking it should be so. 'Actual' means that grace is given prior to an existential decision, as an 'offer' and 'possibility' (of a free salutary act). In this sense, the moral freedom of man to dispose of himself always exists in the prior possibility of supernatural acts, a possibility effected by grace.[12] If this is so, then we may say that the supernatural transcendence is always present in every man who has reached the age of moral reason. That does not necessarily mean that he is justified. He may be a sinner and an unbeliever. But where and in so far as he has the concrete possibility of a morally good act, he is in fact constantly within the open horizon of transcendence towards the God of the supernatural life, whether his free act is in accord or in conflict with this prior state of his supernaturally elevated spiritual existence. If in every moral act he takes a positive or negative attitude to the totality of his de facto existence (a supposition whose reality we need not examine here): then we must say: every morally good act of man is, in the actual order of salvation, also in fact a supernaturally salutary act. We should then have arrived at the well-known point of view maintained by Ripalda. This conclusion need not terrify us. First of all, the thesis of Ripalda, though rarely maintained, is exposed to no theological censure. And secondly, one could still hold the basic position outlined here, even if the supposition which brought us to the thesis of Ripalda were contested, which would avoid the position of Ripalda. However that may be, the notions which we have outlined show clearly that it is quite conceivable that the whole spiritual life of man is constantly affected by grace. It is not a rare and sporadic event just because grace is unmerited. Theology has been too long and too often bedevilled by the unavowed supposition that grace would be no longer grace if it were too generously distributed by the love of God! Our whole spiritual life is lived in the realm of the salvific will of God, of his prevenient grace, of his call as it becomes efficacious: all of which is an element within the region of our [12] Under the necessary external presuppositions, hence the external possibility of faith, where however we must note that in the theory of Straub, everyone who has come to the use of moral reason can possess it, at least as fides stricte dicta sed virtualis.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consciousness, though one which remains anonymous as long as it is not interpreted from without by the message of faith. Even when he does not 'know' it and does not believe it, that is, even when he cannot make it an [181] individual object of knowledge by merely inward reflexion, man always lives consciously in the presence of the triune God of eternal life. God is the unexpressed but real 'Whither' of the dynamism of all spiritual and moral life in the realm of spiritual existence which is in fact founded, that is, supernaturally elevated by God. It is a 'purely a priori'. Whither, but always there, present to consciousness without being in the nature of an object, but nonetheless there.

We do not need to insist on the existence of such an a priori of a supernatural nature in spiritual existence, even though it can only be clearly expounded and translated into objectivated knowledge in the light of the word of revelation which comes from without. It manifests itself as the mysterious activation of individual and collective spiritual life in countless ways, which would not exist if this mysterious activation and dynamism were not at work. It follows that even outside the process of official revelation the history of religion is not merely a product of natural reason and sin. Precisely in its consciously tangible results, in its objective spirit, it is the product of the natural spirit, grace and sin. Thus when man is summoned by the message of faith given by the visible Church, it is not the first time that he comes into spiritual contact with the reality preached by the Church: such conceptual knowledge of it is not primary. The call only makes him consciously aware of – and of course forces him to make a choice about – the grace which already encompassed him inarticulately but really as an element of his spiritual existence. The preaching is the express awakening of what is already present in the depths of man's being, not by nature, but by grace. But it is a grace which always surrounds man, even the sinner and the unbeliever, as the inescapable setting of his existence.

We are now in a position to face the real problem[13] of 'nature and [182] grace' in the strict sense and to pose it properly. It is clear that by living out his spiritual existence, man always attains his 'nature', even in the theological sense, where this concept is opposed to that of grace and the supernatural. For in every question which he poses about himself, in every [13] We can offer here only a somewhat arbitrary selection from the controversial literature which grew up, above all, around the historical and theological writings of H. de Lubac. We include some essays which deal with the doctrine of the encyclical Humani Generis, since it is well known that the encyclical takes up a position on this matter. Other works dealing with Humani Generis are listed, e.g. in the Revista Española de Teologia 11 (1951) 173-176; 311-339. We recall therefore: H. de Lubac, 'Remarques sur l'histoire du mot surnaturel' NRT 61 (1934) 225-249, 350-370; J. Martinez-Gomez, 'Notas sobre unas notas para la historia de la palabra sobrenatural', Arch. T. Gran. 1 (1938) 57-85; H. de Lubac, Surnaturel. Etudes historiques (Paris 1946); H. Rondet, 'Nature et surnaturel dans la théologie de St Thomas d'Aquin', RSR 33 (1946) 56-91; C. Boyer, 'Nature pure et surnatural dans le "Surnaturel" du Père de Lubac', Greg. 28 (1947) 379-395; G. de Broglie, De fine ultimo humanae vitae. Pars prior, positiva (Paris 1948); H. Rondet, 'Le problème de la nature pure et la théologie du XVI[e] siècle', RSR 56 (1949) 80-121; H. de Lubac, 'Le mystère du surnaturel', RSR 36 (1949) 80-121; Ph. J. Donnelly, 'The gratuity of the beatific vision and the possibility of a natural destiny', TS 11 (1950) 374-404 (with literature); W. Brugger, 'Das Ziel des Menschen und das Verlangen nach der Gottesschau', Schol. 25 (1950) 535-548; M. J. de Guillou, 'Surnaturel', RSPT 34 (1950) 226-243; R. Panikkar, El concepto de naturaleza. Analisis historico y metafisico de un concepto (Madrid 1951); G. Weigel, 'Historical Background of the Encyclical Humani Generis', TS 12 (1951) 208-230; G. Weigel, 'Gleanings from the Commentaries on Humani Generis', TS 12 (1950) 520-549; J. Simon, 'Transcendence et immanence dans la doctrine de la grâce', Rev. Univ. Ottawa 21 (1951) 344-369; L. Renwart, 'La "nature pure" à la lumière de l'encyclique Humani Generis', NRT 74 (1952) 337-354; E. Gutwenger, 'Natur und Übernatur', ZKT 75 (1953) 82-97; H. U. von Balthasar–E. Gutwenger, 'Der Begriff der Natur in der Theologie', ZKT 75 (1953) 452-464; J. Ternus, 'Natur-Übernatur in der vortridentinischen Theologie seit Thomas von Aquin', Schol. 28 (1953) 399-404; M.-R. Gagnebet, 'L'enseignement du magistère at le problème du surnaturel', RT 53 (1953) 5-27; L. Malevez, 'La gratuité du surnaturel', NRT 75 (1953) 561-586; K. Rahner, 'Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore, Md. 1961) 297-317. R. Bruch, 'Das Verhältnis von Natur und Übernatur nach der Auffassung der neueren Theologie', Th. Gl. 46 (1956) 81-102.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

judgment where he contrasts himself with an object and grasps it in the perspective of an unlimited transcendence, he experiences himself as something which he must necessarily be, as something that is a unity and a totality which cannot be dissolved into variables, which either is there as a whole or is not there at all. He grasps his metaphysical being: spirit in transcendence and freedom. And on the basis of this initial transcendental analysis of what is implicitly asserted about man in each of his human acts, much more could probably be affirmed as 'essential' to him: his existence in a world, his having a body, his belonging to a society of his fellows. In a word, there is such a thing as a metaphysical knowledge of man, his essence and nature, by the light of his reason, which means here primarily independently of the word of revelation; but it also means knowledge through the means (his reason) which is itself an element of the essence so grasped. But it also follows from the theological data already given that this de facto human nature, as it knows itself here, and in view of all its experiences (especially when this human experience [183] is viewed in the light of the whole history of mankind, where alone its development is fully realized) cannot and need not be considered as the reflexion of that 'pure' nature which is distinguished in theology from everything supernatural. Our actual nature is never 'pure' nature. It is a nature installed in a supernatural order which man can never leave, even as a sinner and unbeliever. It is a nature which is continually being determined (which does not mean justified) by the supernatural grace of salvation offered to it. And these 'existentials' of man's concrete, 'historical' nature are not purely states of being beyond consciousness. They make themselves felt in the experience of man. By simple reflexion on himself, in the light of natural reason, he cannot simply and clearly distinguish them from the natural spiritual activity which is the manifestation of his nature. But once he knows from revelation that there is an order of grace, not due to him and not belonging to the necessary constitutives of his being, he becomes more cautious. He must allow for the fact that much of his concrete experience which he is almost automatically tempted to attribute to his 'nature' may perhaps in fact be the effect in him of what he must recognize as unmerited grace in the light of theology.

This does not mean that he is now quite ignorant of what is natural to him. The nature of a spiritual being and its supernatural elevation are not opposed to each other like two things which lie side by side, so that they must be either kept separate or confused. The supernatural elevation of man is, though not due to him, the absolute fulfilment of his being, whose spiritual quality and transcendence towards being as such prevents its being 'defined', that is, 'delimited' in the same way that sub-human entities can. For these are 'defined' by the fact that it is their essence to be restricted to a certain realm of reality. (It is therefore impossible, for instance, for them to be 'elevated' to a supernatural fulfilment: such an elevation would destroy their being which is essentially limit.) The 'definition' of the created spirit is its 'openness' to being as such: as created, it is open to the fullness of reality; as spirit, it is open to absolute reality in general. It is not therefore surprising that the grandeur of the (varying) fulfilment of this openness (which does not of itself imply necessarily an absolute and unsurpassable fulfilment and yet, as absolute openness, still has a sense without such fulfilment) cannot be recognized at once as 'due' or 'undue'. And yet the basic essence of man, his nature as such openness (transcendence) can be perfectly well established. The initial elements of such fulfilment are already present: the experience of [184] infinite longings, of radical optimism, of unquenchable discontent, of the torment of the insufficiency of everything attainable, of the radical protest against death, the experience of being confronted with an absolute love precisely where it is lethally incomprehensible and seems to be silent and aloof, the experience of a radical guilt and of a still abiding hope etc. These elements are in fact tributary to that divine force which impels the created spirit – by grace – to an absolute fulfilment. Hence in them grace is experienced and the natural being of man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For the essence of man is such that it is experienced where grace is experienced, since grace is only experienced where the spirit naturally is. And vice versa: where spirit is experienced in the actual order of things, it is a supernaturally elevated spirit. As long as we confine our considerations of the relationship of nature and grace to the most general formalities, the question offers no particular difficulties, though the spiritual nature is only found in a supernatural order and the spirit as 'pure nature' is never met with. But let us ask more precisely what is now, in the concrete and in particular, natural to this nature, and what is real in it and expected of it, just because it is a nature elevated to the supernatural order. Let us ask, for instance, whether the resurrection of the body appertains to any form of the fulfilment of man as a spirit-person, or is it something that is only a consequence of grace. Or let us ask how we are to think of the fulfilment of pure nature in the concrete. Then we find ourselves faced with questions which could only be answered if one could make experiments on pure nature and draw up a concrete teleology on this basis.[14] But in reality all such efforts fail to go beyond an essentially formal teleology of a 'natural' type, which, as was obviously to be expected from what has been said, is merely the concrete supernatural teleology rendered in an abstract, formal way. It follows therefore from these considerations that the great theologians of the middle ages did well not to cudgel their brains too hard about natural beatitude. There is in fact no such thing, and further, the result would be basically only a formalizing abstract set of concepts derived from what theological teleology knows in fact as the supernatural end, (and which is not very helpful); and again, where it tries to be concrete or becomes so unwittingly, it borrows illegitimately from the theology.

[185] In point of fact, such a 'pure' philosophy of the essence of natural man is also unnecessary. When one speaks to a non-believer, one has only to take care that no premises are derived from the historical word of revelation, as long as the interlocutor does not admit its existence. When in such a discussion an item of man's experience of himself is appealed to, one will simply have to note what the non-believing partner accepts of such experience. If he refuses it at a given point, it may be because he is incapable of having a certain legitimate 'natural' experience, either because it has not been properly demonstrated to him or because in spite of the demonstration he does not consciously follow it (though he has the experience). Or it may be that one has in fact appealed to an experience of grace which the other has not had clearly enough for him to understand the argument drawn from it (though he has had it to some degree, according to what has been said above). Since both cases can arise, and since even Christians find it hard to distinguish one from the other, because a 'supernatural' argument can be quite meaningful and successful even with an unbeliever (where an argument from the word of revelation is not possible): the question of whether a metaphysical (that is, pre-theological) argument starts in fact from 'pure' nature or actual nature is of little practical importance.

The concept of pure nature is legitimate. If someone affirms: I experience myself as a being which is absolutely ordained for the immediate possession of God, his statement need not be false. He will only be mistaken if he maintains that this unconditional longing is an essential element of 'pure' nature, or if he says that such pure nature, which does not exist, could not exist. Where man knows of the visio beatifica by the word of revelation, and experiences it as the marvel of the free love of God in his longing for it, he has to say that it is not due to him (by nature), even as an existing nature – so that the gratuitousness of creation, as a free act of God, and grace as a free gift to the creature, as something already existing, are not one and the same gift of God's free act. To say this is to recognize implicitly the concept [14] If there can be any such thing, given the endless openness of this nature – and if every such concrete end is not either a finite perfection freely decreed by God but not deducible a priori from the nature, or its absolute fulfilment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of 'pure nature'. And it is not an empty concept of otiose theological speculation but a concept which, in the long run, is the necessary background against which one recognizes that the beatific vision is a gratuitous grace, not merely not due to man as a sinner, but not due to man even as a creature.

Even when the gratuitousness of grace for human nature as such has been recognized, it is still helpful to try to work out more clearly how [186] human nature is ordained to grace, as a potentia oboedientialis. It is not necessary to take this potentia oboedientialis as more or less just a non-repugnance, which would be the extrinsicism of which we have spoken already. To be ordained to grace, and to be so constituted that there is an exigency for grace which would render the whole ordination to grace futile if grace were not actually imparted, are by no means the same thing. Spirit, that is, openness for God, freedom and conscious self-possession, is essentially impossible without a transcendence whose absolute fulfilment is grace. Still, a fulfilment of this sort is not owed to it, if we suppose that this conscious possession of self in freedom before God is meaningful in itself, and not just as a pure means and a mere stage on the way to the beatific vision. This supposition arises from the absolute (not 'infinite') value and validity of every personal act, in itself. If it be granted, it follows that there can be no spirit without a transcendence open to the supernatural; but spirit is meaningful, without supernatural grace. Hence its fulfilment in grace cannot be demanded by its essence, though it is open for such grace. Once this is clear there is nothing to prevent us – as for instance, an apparent danger of failing to recognize the supernatural and gratuitous character of grace – applying it clearly to the supernaturally – orientated transcendence of the spirit and working it out as rigorously as possible.

Man is only really known in his 'indefinable' essence when he is understood as potentia oboedientialis for the divine life and when this is his nature. His nature is such that it must look to grace for its absolute fulfilment, and hence, as regards itself, it must reckon with a non-frustrating absence of an absolute fulfilment. One can even try to understand the hypostatic union in the line of the absolute fulfilment of what man means strictly speaking. Such considerations, which aim at the closest possible combination of the doctrine of grace with a metaphysical anthropology, and try to see the higher as the gratuitous fulfilment of the lower,[15] are not just amusements for a leisure hour. In the long run, it would be impossible without them to arouse the existential interest of man in that mysterious life which is given with supernatural grace. Further, such an exposition of the content of the concept of potentia oboedientialis must not [187] be confined, as it too often is, to man's knowledge. If, according to Scripture, God is love and not 'thought of thought', no understanding of man and of the absolute fulfilment of his being (by grace) can succeed, unless man is considered as freedom and love, which again may not be considered just as a by-product of the act of knowledge.

In the light of what has been said up to this, it is no great loss if the analysis of man as potentia oboedientialis is not a 'chemically pure' presentation of pure nature but is mixed up with trace elements from actual nature, and hence from its state of grace. Who can say that the utterances of earthly philosophy, even of a completely non-Christian or pre-Christian type, are merely the voice of pure nature (and perhaps of its guilt)? May they not be the sighing of the creature, secretly moved by the Holy Spirit of grace, which longs for the glory of the children of God and already unwittingly feels itself to be such a child of God?

Much more could be said on the subject of grace in present-day theology and of what it ought to be. One could speak for instance of grace in its relationship to the Church,[16] on the [15] Fulfilment and gratuitousness in one, in a truly differentiated world constructed hierarchically without discontinuity (and such is the construction of the world where differences derive from the One), are characteristic of the relationship between two realities.

[16] H. de Lubac, Catholicisme. Les Aspects sociaux du dogme (Paris 1938).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

social significance and bearings of grace, which in the current manuals of theology is considered in a perspective which is strangely narrow. One could refer to the newly-opened discussion of the relationship between grace and the personal action of man. But space forbids us here.

Tiny advances or displacements in the field of scientific theory often begin by being impossible to evaluate. Such changes may appear at first as pastimes reserved to the leisurely keen-wittedness of scholars. But when one considers that such new acquisitions then become part of the general consciousness and so become the automatic presuppositions of action, one can perhaps recognize that much may depend on them, and sometimes everything. This is also true of theology. It is very strange. But we Christians often seem to be completely unconvinced of the power of thought with regard to our Christian faith, and to be very doubtful that 'theory' can bring about very practical effects. That is why we often prefer to think over Church politics, social questions, methods of propaganda and so on. That is why living theology is so little esteemed. Many people in the Church have the impression that it merely casts useless obscurity on truths that have long been clear, that it generates unrest and distracts from more important matters. Such people miss the point, [188] that a living, questing, questioning theology is working today for the preaching of tomorrow, so that it can reach the spirit and heart of man. Such theological work may often seem fussy and futile. It is nonetheless necessary. Even though the heart and grace remain the one thing which is irreplaceable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[189]

8

QUESTIONS OF CONTROVERSIAL THEOLOGY ON JUSTIFICATION[1]

The book which we shall discuss briefly here is important enough to justify further study of it. But as it is already well known in its main outlines, we may be permitted to confine ourselves to a few remarks on some questions raised by it. So we suppose that its contents are known. The remarks which we have to make should not give the reader the impression that the most important points in the book have been singled out. That is not the case at all. Thinking as we do, as we shall shortly explain, that we do not understand Barth's doctrine better than Barth, and that Küng propounds on all essential points a doctrine of justification which is in accord with Catholic doctrine, nothing very note-worthy can be said here on the actual theme of the book. Our considerations are therefore marginal notes with regard to the object and contents of the book, and we wish them to be understood as such.

I. BARTH'S AGREEMENT WITH THE CATHOLIC DOCTRINE OF JUSTIFICATION

Küng gives a picture of Barth's doctrine of justification (pp. 21-101; cf. also 253ff.). In the second section he also gives the Catholic doctrine of justification (pp. 105-276). In this second section he is undoubtedly interested in working out as far as possible those aspects of the Catholic doctrine which must be of primary importance for an accord with Barth. In doing so, Küng undoubtedly includes theological propositions which are not simply taken for granted in conventioned Catholic theology – which does not mean at once that they are contested. We shall have [190] occasion to speak of the most important of these propositions. Küng has every right to use them. If we voice now and then a mild wish for greater clarity and less ambiguity, as can be done with regard to even the best theological works, this is no reason for doubting the orthodoxy of the general presentation of the Catholic doctrine of justification in Küng. Its orthodoxy has also been attested by Bouyer, de Broglie, Ebneter,[2] Stirnimann and many others. If Küng gives more space to truths which Barth misses in Catholic doctrine, than to those which are known to Barth, the procedure is understandable, given the object of his discussion. His point is to show that those very truths which Barth finds lacking in the Catholic position are actually held in it, the truths which he declares must never be given up if the gospel is to be maintained. Küng is not open to the reproach of having suppressed or minimized for the sake of his thesis those Catholic truths which seem at first sight unpleasant or misleading to Protestants. He tries to explain them and make them intelligible. And this is the task of controversial theology, which is not allowed to attribute

---

[1] Remarks about the book of Hans Küng, Justification. The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (London & New York 1964).

[2] Cf. e.g. A. Ebneter in Orientierung 21 (1957) 157: 'We may say in general that Küng's presentation gives the orthodox doctrine as taught by the Church'. Similar positive verdicts (from J. Aranguren, H. Fries, N. Greitemann, R. Grosche, J. P. Michael, W. Seibel, E. Stakemeier, W. H. van de Pol) are to be found in H. Küng, 'Rechtfertigung in katholischer Besinnung', Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung 125 (1957) 619-621, 637-639. Stirnimann too may be taken as a friendly witness, in so far as he 'stresses very clearly' (Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie 4 [1957] 321f.), that 'the most important reserves' which he makes 'are concerned with questions which are dealt with "intra muros"'. It seems to me however that Küng deserves more good will, a more sympathetic understanding and a juster and more balanced consideration of all the elements in his presentation than he finds, to my mind, in Stirnimann. But Küng has already expressed himself sufficiently on this matter.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

either stupidity or malice to its opponent. On this basis, all that is left is to explain one's own doctrine better, more comprehensively, more fully, from new standpoints and in other contexts and another vocabulary, in the hope that the intelligent and benevolent opponent may understand one's real meaning and can agree that it is correct. If one does not take this course, one has really renounced any effort at dialogue, even though one does not admit this officially.

Küng therefore presents much of the Catholic doctrine of justification from stand-points other than the usual ones. He says some things expressly which are elsewhere skipped as being 'questions in themselves'. This is not only his right but his duty in controversial theology, provided that [191] he says nothing that may not be said in the Catholic Church, and is not led by a false eirenism to pass over in silence what must be said in the Catholic Church. But Küng has fulfilled these conditions. When his business brings him to make use of theological themes which are not simply doctrines of the magisterium, he is also within his rights. He can think that they are attested in Scripture or tradition and that they could contribute helpfully to the image of the Catholic doctrine of justification which non-Catholics might find convincing. But more important still in this connexion is a reason which may be looked on as basic: may it not be that a truth (a defined one, for instance) will only appear intelligible and acceptable to a non-Catholic when it is enunciated in conjunction with a truth which is not defined, which is indeed perhaps controverted? If one starts by accepting the formal teaching authority of the Church, there will be no problems in this matter. But things are different in controversy with Protestant Christians. It is the other way round: they often have difficulties in accepting the formal authority of the magisterium, because they have difficulties with doctrines taught by the magisterium. To overcome this inhibition, it may be quite necessary existentially in controversial theology to have recourse to assertions and theological propositions which are not official teaching, in order to make defined truths more assimilable. It may be necessary to use mere theology in order to proclaim dogmatic truth.[3] How could one for instance give an intelligible account today of the Catholic doctrine on original sin, without stressing and developing the theological proposition about the analogous character of this sin in comparison with personal sin? This is actually the only way even for Catholic theologians to learn something from theological controversy. We are often too little ready to learn, and that is why we are so little successful in teaching. We have to emphasize this, in order that what follows may be understood correctly.

Now Barth declares in his accompanying letter (pp. 11-12), expressly and almost solemnly, both that Küng's presentation of the doctrine of [192] justification is correct, and that he could accept the presentation of the doctrine which Küng puts forward as the Catholic one.[4] On the second point Barth makes the reservation that Catholics have to decide whether what

[3] It is not really unfortunate that now and again the main witness adduced is a relatively 'lone' theologian, whose authority will not tell particularly with the reader who is not already convinced of the correctness of the proposition in question. And there is likewise no strict principle which enables us to say that a view for which one can quote a Catholic theologian who has not been officially challenged, is thereby proved to be at least tolerable 'intra muros'. But in any case, Küng mostly quotes so many good authorities, that he must be said to have proved that the propositions which have no official standing can still find a place in Catholic theology.

[4] This second point, to my mind, was not given its due weight in Ebneter's article. For if we bear it in mind, it will not do to put a question-mark after Küng's presentation of Barth's doctrine by appealing to Barth's dogmatic theology – which again needs interpretation. To be able to question Küng's conclusions, one would have to explain how it was that Barth could declare himself to be in agreement with Küng's presentation of Catholic doctrine (put forward as agreeing with Barth's), though Ebneter admits that this presentation is correct. If one refuses to admit that there is agreement, as Küng aimed at proving, there is only one answer left: Barth read this presentation of Catholic doctrine with so much good will and through such strong Barthian spectacles, that he simply read his own doctrine into it – in other words, he must have completely misunderstood Küng. This is not a priori impossible. But it would need to be proved very exactly and seriously. And meanwhile we must presume the contrary.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Küng puts forward as his own view is really the Catholic doctrine of justification. This reservation can be catered for. Küng's presentation is Catholic. Not in the sense that everything it says is defined or universal doctrine, but in the sense that none of it is in contradiction to any doctrine of the magisterium. More one cannot ask. Otherwise all a Catholic theologian could do would be to recite word for word the Council of Trent, which is obviously not all that can be asked of him. For it follows from the nature of things and from the history of Catholic theology that as soon as a Catholic theologian takes it upon himself, at his own risk, to explain and expound what the Church teaches, he must inevitably go beyond the doctrine to be explained and make affirmations with which not everyone will agree fully. To my mind, the most one could object to in Küng's presentation of the Catholic doctrine is that some elements of it could be 'misunderstood' and are therefore 'dangerous' and so on. In answer to this one can only ask in return whether they must be misunderstood – and affirm that they need not be – and whether the supposed 'danger' is really greater than that which terrifies the pure and simple 'orthodox', whose great fear is that they may not meet with agreement from the other side. Or – for heaven's sake – has contradiction from the other side become the unambiguous criterion of our having kept to the truth and of having enunciated it in the best possible way?

This two-fold agreement on the part of Barth is astonishing. It seems to me that it should have been greeted with greater surprise and joy than it has been hitherto, as far as I know. Barth is not simply the Protestant [193] doctrine of justification. Here (p. 276) Küng in fact exaggerates a little at the end of his book. Schlink, for instance, whom Küng cites (p. 275) as contesting a merely imputed righteousness, would still maintain that he could not accept the Tridentine doctrine of justification. But is not this agreement still amazing and something that can stir the heart and the spirit? Barth is not just anybody in Protestant theology. And he says: You give a hundred pages to my doctrine of justification; the presentation is excellent and completely acceptable. And I have no difficulty in accepting what you put forward as the Catholic doctrine. Is this something easily imaginable? Or is it evidence of a development which strengthens our Christian hope, which God's commandment obliges us to have, that it is possible to advance in matters of the unity of the Christian faith? It is simple and comfortable to remain 'sober' and 'realistic' in these matters and not to let oneself 'be excited' – because after all, everything remains the same. But it would be more Christian to allow oneself to hope, to give God thanks, that everything is not at a deadlock, and to deduce from this event that it is worth while working for a real understanding in controversial theology.

We should not be too quick to say that this consent is only 'verbal'. It is restricted, to be sure, for the moment in any case to one point, the doctrine of justification, and Barth is separated from us in the faith by enough other things (original sin, doctrine of election, sacraments, Church, papacy, Mariology, etc.), as Küng indeed recognizes. And undoubtedly Barth's theology has a certain 'slant' (as Küng notes (pp. 270-272) and remarks on expressly), which can lead to dissent not only in these points, but also in the doctrine of justification itself. No doubt certain statements of Barth need to be interpreted with benevolence – but what theologian or Father of the Church can do without it? – and to be considered in the light of his doctrine as a whole, if they are to be given a Catholic sense. One can certainly ask whether we (and Barth himself) are not bound to understand his doctrine of justification otherwise than Küng and Barth himself do, if they think it out with reference to certain other positions of Barth, his doctrine of predestination, for instance, and develops it consistently on such lines. However, one could just as well put the question the other way round and correct Barth's other positions in the light of his doctrine of justification; in a theology which stems from copious use of Scripture texts and tries to take all their assertions

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

seriously, there is – happily – no systematic principle which [194] claims to be so primary and unique that everything else is reduced to a dependent function of it.

All this is true, but it does not give us the right to speak of a merely verbal consent. It is not our intention to debate with experts in Barthian theology whether Küng's interpretation corresponds exactly and in all regards to the objective contents of Barth's Church dogmatics. That would be too difficult a task, which must be left to the experts in this field. It is enough for the non-expert and more important objectively, as we shall shortly have to show, that Barth himself considers that Küng renders his views correctly and in both parts of his book. And the layman has only to add finally that it is Barth who must know best what he really means. We can believe him and register the fact gladly and thankfully, even though we know that it is far from making Barth a Catholic. In contrast to this, it is in any case a secondary, if not superfluous, matter,[5] to point an accusing finger and say: yes, there and there Barth has said something which is inconsistent with that! Why should Barth not have understood better what he really meant, as he was reading Küng? Why should such a progressive piece of controversial theology not have offered him formulations in which he sees his interests clearly served, and which in the eyes of Catholics avoid the dangers which made us anxious about the previous formulations of Barth? Is an agreement arrived at in such a way merely verbal? We do not of course mean to say that those who claim to understand Barth better than he does himself are only seeing ghosts. They see dangers which are really present in Barth. But there is something else that we must remember here, and the fundamental importance of such considerations is so great that we are justified in dwelling on them for a moment. It is that we cannot pursue controversial theology merely in terms of objective truths, that is, we cannot confine our debate with our Protestant brethren to the subject of the Church, the papacy and the magisterium, until agreement is reached on these points, on the plea that any other agreement must be precarious and hedged about with reserves, as long as there is no agreement about these formal criteria of orthodoxy. For the truth is, as we have said, that the existing [195] disagreement about these formal criteria lives (to some extent), psychologically and historically, from dissent with regard to other matters. If this is so, then when conversing with Protestants, we are exactly in the position that a Thomist and a Molinist would be in during their debates, if they did not know all the time that they both owed allegiance to the one Church and its magisterium. The Molinist could always say to the Thomist: yes, you accept verbally the freedom of man under grace; but if you were really serious about it and really understood what it meant, you could not defend the praemotio physica. And the Thomist could always say to the Molinist: yes, you hold verbally the efficaciousness of grace even with regard to freedom, and you reject verbally the semi-Pelagian position. But with the scientia media you maintain positions which nullify in fact these verbal concessions. And each of the two would declare that though there were two aspects to his doctrine in each case, he refused to allow himself to be faced with the dilemma of having to choose between the two aspects of his doctrine, or to pick out one aspect as more decisive, or as more important if he had to make a choice between them. He would insist that he cannot give up either aspect of his position. To put it more generally: wherever an agreement is reached between two men, who have come to this agreement from different directions,[6] and when this consent is not based on a third element, that of formal authority

[5] We still of course have the task of reading Barth critically, of noting inconsistencies, etc. The fact that he declares a certain presentation of the Catholic doctrine of justification to be acceptable, obviously does not mean that every single sentence which he wrote down previously must be beyond suspicion. But we have the right and even the duty of interpreting favourably, as far as possible, his individual statements and lines of thought.

[6] This coming together from different sides, which is still noticeable in each of those who have reached agreement, is in fact the destiny which weighs down the finite spirit in its search for truth, since it inevitably has different perspectives even when it is looking at the same truth and reality. And since this always makes itself

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which both have accepted prior to the debate, the consent is always and essentially precarious and threatened, and can always be called in question. Indeed, the fact of consent can never be established with absolute certainty, because every formula concordiae aimed at establishing that the parties have agreed in fact and not merely in words, needs in turn a formula concordiae for the formula concordiae and so ad infinitum. For this reason, to say that agreement is merely verbal is absurd. The process of agreement upon truth always takes place on common sociological ground between men, and if it is reached there, it is reached in fact. But it is reached there, when it is reached in words and statements, (verbally, if one wants to put it that way), which are employed by men who listen carefully and speak circumspectly.

[196] We cannot ask such men to try to see into the inmost depths of the spirit of others, where only God can see and tell what they are 'really' thinking. In a controversial theology in particular the danger could arise that a too neurotic fear of not being perhaps 'really' in agreement 'in depth' could disrupt the unity which is possible. Such fears then give rise to those strange efforts (noticeable in the theology of controversy) to find new sets of ever more subtle formulae and nuances so as to prove the existence of mutual dissent. This procedure is found necessary at points where our ancestors of the sixteenth century, less subtle in their phraseology, would have registered a disagreement which everyone could recognize and express – or would have simply reached an agreement. We have now reached a point in many items of controversial theology where only the finest theological eloquence can manage to show the initiates (not the normal man) where the real difference is to be found. In such cases (there are of course many others of a different type) it would be better and more Christian to admit that one is in agreement or could perfectly well be; just as Barth has done, courageously and soberly. To have the right to live in separate Churches, one would have to be sure (to put it crudely for once) that one is clearly in disagreement about the truth. It is not enough not to be quite sure of being really in agreement, or of what the other exactly means or of having understood him quite correctly. This principle results, to my mind, from the Christian duty of unity in one Church and from the essential impossibility of an absolute certainty about an ultimate inward uniformity of conviction. Absolute certainty about one's own inmost orthodoxy in the sight of God (which would be the presupposition of such absolute certainty) seems to me to be as impossible and as un-Catholic as absolute certainty about one's own justice in the sight of God. And perhaps the formulas of union of ancient times, which were drawn up apparently rather artificially and as a matter of politics, were not in fact the worst. The artificiality of an apparently merely verbal unity is often the only thing possible for men who are placed before the incomprehensible mystery. They must try to find a formula which allows both sides to retain what they consider as indispensable in the controversy and in the act of union; and one which obliges both sides to see and to express the truth which each had overlooked in the position of the other, or if not overlooked, had not seen clearly enough to recognize that it had been preserved.

It would therefore be wrong to add to every formula of agreement: [197] keep on asking questions, and divergencies will show, which were only masked by the very general formulations. As if such suspicions could not be occasioned by every agreement among Catholics! Or would it not be said today that Galtier and Parente, for instance, conceal very important 'divergencies' under the same Chalcedonian formula? Even among us Catholics there should he a limit to cross-questioning, if one wishes to avoid discovering all sorts of differences in matters on which we wish to be and must be and are at one. In spite of the fact that the abiding truth is always liable to being corrupted by and in finite man, men can be felt, unity and truth, if it is really to be seen and made permanent, must include love, humility, mutual tolerance and patience.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

really at one. This of course we cannot dwell on now, as an exact proof of it is a matter of the philosophy and theology of human knowledge. Not everyone who could fall has in fact fallen, even though his genuine proneness to falling could be demonstrated. In the same way, an erroneous opinion is not held by everyone of whom it could be proved that from his mentality, from his loosely formulated premises, from his placing of emphasis, that he was liable to fall into the error in question. Least of all should one use a hyper-intelligent dialectic to force him either to overcome positively at once the peril of his presuppositions, which he often cannot and is not obliged to do, or to acknowledge the full-blown error.

It may be thought on the other hand that without at least the formal authority of which we spoke earlier nothing more than a verbal agreement could be possible. But this would be to overlook two things. Firstly, formal authority as such and union under it can indeed promote and guarantee agreement on a given matter, but cannot replace it in essential things. Union is not possible simply on the grounds that one accepts in common the same formal authority a priori, if it is accepted simply as a formal authority – to some extent, simply by fides implicita. Secondly, we do share with Barth a common authority, Scripture. Why should we not feel at one, where, having accepted unreservedly the same testimony of Scripture, we permit ourselves to think that we have come to an agreement about its interpretation. The Church has a common official teaching, but there are also several different explanations of it. Only the naive who have not understood them can separate these explanations cleanly and wholly from the general doctrine binding on all, and so find it no problem but simply obvious that we should be united ‘on real matters’. But if these different schools come from very different directions and even had ancestors ‘tainted with original sin’, called heretics, why should Barth’s [198] doctrine be only admitted to be above suspicion, when its origin could no longer be recognized?

The fact remains, as we think, that Küng’s book has achieved an astonishing result: the consent of a great Protestant theologian to a presentation of a doctrine of justification which must be considered as capable of and needing improvement on certain points, but which cannot be designated as un-Catholic. One can be a Catholic and hold this doctrine of justification, which Barth has declared to be the same as his own. Barth cannot therefore affirm that it is the doctrine of justification which prevents him from being a Catholic, as long as Küng’s presentation has not been condemned by the Catholic magisterium as un-Catholic on some essential point, or as long as it has not been rejected by Catholic theologians as clearly contradicting Catholic doctrine. Barth asks does Küng’s presentation really render the Catholic doctrine. The answer must be the counter-declaration that an official approbation of this rendering is not to be expected but that neither is it necessary; one could be of Küng’s opinion and remain in full and positive agreement with the Church and its official doctrine. For it is not at all likely that the limits set by the magisterium (‘definitions’) in its defensive statements of a truth, will express adequately all aspects of the truth as it exists in the mind of the Church. Nor are they meant to spare the individual Christian the trouble of trying to understand the truth and so forming his own theological opinion.

II. MINOR POINTS OF CRITICISM

We have already said that we have no doubts about the orthodoxy of Küng’s presentation of the Catholic doctrine of justification. But this does not mean that there are no questions to be asked and no objections of a minor nature to be raised on some particular points. It would be foolish to take this to mean that we are half-way to withdrawing our general verdict. Orthodox theology can occasion such questions and misgivings, as is shown by the differences of opinion which exist among theologians. And often enough the unquestionable

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

orthodoxy of a manual – where it does not simply repeat Denzinger – means no more than that although one could put critical questions, one has given up doing so either from boredom or routine. But when someone begins to do theology on his own, in a dialogue with a new and serious opponent, the reader finds that [199] the old becomes young and that he is listening hard, putting questions and forming objections. Some of these are presented here. They are all concerned with the Catholic doctrine, not with the exposition of Barth's position.

(a) Justification and sanctification: faith and love

One may readily concede that Scripture makes a distinction between justification and sanctification: it uses distinct terms for the two and so makes the distinction in the same perspective as that in which it sees the one salvation of the sinner by grace. Küng proves this directly from Scripture and can appeal to important Catholic exegetes. We may also readily concede to Küng that it is not unjustifiable (if and in so far as the above distinction exists) to see faith, in contradistinction to love, as primarily ordained to justification. We can then speak in this definite sense of 'justification' by faith in a way in which we cannot speak of justification by love. Further, to avoid any misunderstanding of Küng, we must expressly emphasize the fact that where he attributes man's justification to faith (justification here being very pregnantly distinguished formally, not materially, from sanctification), he speaks expressly of living faith, of fides formata (p. 250f.; 252), of faith to which love is inwardly present, and that hence his doctrine is irreproachable. But still this chapter of Küng's book leaves something to be desired. And one feels that even if these desires were met with, one could still understand Barth and go to meet him as far as possible (even as far as consent). To begin with, it does not seem to me to remain always clear in Küng as in Barth, whether justification and sanctification are two aspects of one and the same process, or two stages, one after the other. It seems to me that according to Trent and its ordinary interpretation in Catholic theology and also according to the Scriptures, one must speak of two sides of one and the same process, not of two phases one after another – at least if we understand justification not as the 'objective' process of 'redemption', but as that real, efficacious absolution from sin, which makes the individual righteous when he believes (in the Pauline sense) and is baptized.

Justification may be understood (as in Barth) as that objective and real transformation of the existential situation of each (and of 'all') which is already realized by the incarnation, death and resurrection of Christ (prior to a subjective decision (faith) and a sacramental conferring (baptism) in the individual). Then of course justification may be seen as [200] a special phase of salvation which precedes the event in which man consciously and really ratifies and makes his own this existential situation, which was created for him without his doing by Christ alone. What the second phase is to be called in this case (simply 'sanctification' or 'subjective' justification-sanctification) would be a further question. In any case Küng (like Barth) is quite right to avoid strange nominalistic ways of speaking, in spatial categories, and not to restrict to subjective redemption the real importance of redemption in Jesus Christ for the individual. No matter how one forms the ontological categories and concepts which may help one to grasp the matter clearly, there can be no doubt about the thing itself. Prior to any subjective attitude, man is really different (from what he would be as mere creature and mere sinner), because redemption has taken place in Christ, because God loves him in Christ as long as he is on pilgrimage: so much so, that for all eternity, even in his damnation, man remains determined by this 'is'. This 'is' which determines him for ever is not procured by faith and love. He rather 'takes cognisance' of it through faith and love, accepting it of course and ratifying it existentially, so that through this act, something happens in him which means his salvation, because if he 'took cognisance' of it with refusal or indifference, this same reality, this 'is', would mean his damnation. If we call this 'is' a supernatural existential we could say: prior to any subjective appropriation of salvation, man is inwardly determined by a supernatural existential, which consists of the fact that Christ in his death 'justified' sinful man before the all-holy God. Anyone who finds such terminology painful, need only think of the following in simple scholastic terms: if through faith bestowed by grace and through love man can be subjectively justified before God, and if this 'can be' obviously precedes the act of (subjective) justification, then this 'can', this potency, is his on the one hand, hence 'intrinsic' to him (no matter how much it permanently depends on the grace of God); and it is still something on the other hand which is not due to him by 'nature', but only comes to him by the death of Christ. This intrinsic ability, necessarily prior to the subjective appropriation of salvation of which it is the vehicle and in which it becomes one's own, can be simply called the supernatural existential of being (objectively) redeemed or of being (objectively) justified. Difficulties can really only arise where one thinks that man ceases to be at the point where his skin forms a limit, and that everything is extrinsic which cannot be localized imaginatively within this sack of skin; or when one thinks [201] that complicated words are being used for something obvious which every Christian knows and which could be put more simply. There is good reason for putting it so, because it is the only way of making it clear in theological concepts, though it is of course always known by the genuine Christian: the fact that the event of the subjective justification of the individual is really and most intimately connected with Christ and his cross. It is not simply a subjective conversion to a God who by reason of his metaphysical goodness has to be gracious in any case, if we ourselves are only interested in it. This is the only way to make it clear that the death on the cross is not merely a historical matter, but that it is now the essential vehicle of my salvation, since God has done something to me in Christ before I do anything. All this is correct and of decisive importance. And it may and can be said that the supernatural existential of being justified (objectively) by Christ before God precedes the subjective appropriation of salvation – which of course also brings about supremely 'objective' relationships.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But – to return to the actual question – if one is speaking of the subjective justification of the individual by faith and baptism, justification and sanctification can only be considered as two sides or aspects of one and the same process. The two concepts can still be formally different in content, so that one need not be able to say formally the same thing of justification and sanctification. And this formal distinction need not be an otiose matter of pure hair-splitting. And in fact it is not. For if one distinguishes different aspects in one and the same reality, for the sake of our necessarily manifold knowledge, though these aspects cannot be separated in the thing itself then and only then does one gain a full view of this reality. One can respond to it fully by a multiplicity of attitudes, which are distinct from one another and must be so, and can only be so when the difference of the inseparable aspects are seen in the one thing. Thus, for instance, justice and goodness are inseparable aspects in God. But I must distinguish them to be able to respond realistically to the one reality of God by a multiplicity of acts which correspond to each different aspect: for instance, by fear of God and by confidence, which are not the same thing. But if justification and sanctification are merely different aspects – not different succeeding phases – of the same process (and are really such!), then I can ordain a particular human act specifically to justification, in so far as it is brought about by God, and another to sanctification, in so far as this is also God's action on me. If one liked, [202] one could put it this way: justification takes place when one knows and makes one's own the efficacious absolution of sinners which is the work of God alone in Christ. It may then be rightly said to take place precisely in 'faith', because this is the terminology of Scripture and clear expression is thus given to its character of being mere acceptance of the act of God on man – this acceptance remaining of course an action brought about by God as the deed of man. It is thus distinguished from a work accomplished by man,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in which man produces something (autonomously in the Pelagian sense or by grace in the Christian sense) which claims to be valuable before God (wrongly or rightly). And in view of this, there is no harm in refusing to say that justification (formally as such, i.e. in so far as it can be distinguished from sanctification) takes place through love (formally as such, in so far as it can be distinguished as one aspect of one total act of the process of justification from other aspects, faith and hope).

However: if justification and sanctification are only two aspects of the one process, love must be included in this process as much as faith. Hence it seems to us that Küng leaves himself somewhat open to misunderstanding when he speaks at times as if love, in the faith that justifies, is present merely in embryo or initially, or as if it is not really a presupposition for the one process, of which one aspect is in fact justification.[7] On the contrary, faith, in so far as it justifies, is a faith informed by love, where love itself must also be fully present, if the process is to be one of justification. Further, one should not try to prove the immediate relationship of justification-faith (in contrast to sanctification-love), by ranging love among (grace-inspired) 'works'. Theologically speaking love is no more a work than faith. One may, with a perfect right, not only distinguish faith from the Pharisaically autonomous works of a total or partial ('synergistic') self-justification before God; one may also make a justifiable distinction between faith and work[8] brought about by grace as fruit [203] of the Spirit, where God favours us so that we can bring forth fruits of eternal life worthy of praise and reward. And in this sense we may say with St Paul and the Council of Trent that we are justified by faith and not by works, because according to the Council nothing at all (not even faith) which precedes justification (and sanctification) merits this justification (and sanctification), since such fruits and works can only be produced by one who has been changed from death to life, from being an evil tree to being a good tree. But even under this aspect, love, as the way in which justification and sanctification take place, belongs to the side of faith and not of works. Not only because in justification as such itself, which has no works by reason of which it is given, love is already there, whereas the supernaturally meritorious works only follow justification (and sanctification). But because love, as much as and even more than faith, is a process in which man looks away from himself, forbidden to envisage any merit (even if objectively some has been placed therein), and gives himself totally and without reserve to God for his own sake (and not for ours) – because God gives himself to us in grace and therein, by communicating to us the Spirit of his love, first makes it possible for us to leave ourselves.

'Works', even those which do not try to be self-justification before God, but which are the gift of God who grants to his beloved child the possibility and the reality of works valid before him and his judgment, are different from this love. To put it in scholastic terms: by (good) works (in so far as they can and must be distinguished from love as such), I mean the finite moral good, which is aimed at in love set free by God himself, in which I may and must love myself; by love I mean God himself (as in faith), as he has given himself to me by his act in Christ, and only so. Hence this love is precisely the truest climax of what takes place in faith. It is not something which comes after faith, like a work. It is radical, loving and total

[7] Thus Küng says (249) that as regards justification 'man has no other recourse than to place his whole trust in the Lord'. Either that is too little, because if man is to be justified, he must love, or one must make the sentence mean in fact that only he who loves puts his whole trust in the Lord.

[8] When Küng, appealing to St Thomas (238f.) says that not only are the works of the ritual law excluded from justification in faith, but also the works of the decalogue, his statement is correct but would have benefited by more precision. The works of the decalogue are of a two-fold kind which are to be sharply distinguished: the effort to accomplish such works autonomously, by one's own strength, and without grace, - and the works of the decalogue as fruit of the Holy Spirit. One cannot simply say that both types of works of the decalogue are excluded in the same way, though this may be said of both types with regard to the process of justification, in the sense of Denz. 801.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

capitulation of man before God. It can only be accomplished by man when he gives up the sinful fearfulness of his self-centred autonomy to see and accept the fact that God loves him and has accepted him in Christ: which leaves him culpably stupid if he does not dare to orientate his love away from himself. Catholic dogmatic theology recognizes no love of God except where this act itself is an act of faith [204] (formally or eminenter), because the higher and more complete activity of the one Christian existence includes the partial activity or aspect and preserves its formal nature – which cannot be said of every 'work' as such. It seems to us to follow from what has been said that the subjective attainment of salvation is justification as forgiveness of sin and sanctification as inward quickening in one act with two distinguishable formal aspects. And in the adult, this single process is so determined by faith (with hope and contrition) and love, that these two aspects of the subjective appropriation can be ordained to the two other aspects of salvation (as an act of God). But in this one process, love plays as decisive a role as faith. It is not merely required to be there 'in embryo', but has the peculiarity and uniqueness, in contrast to all other modes of behaviour, that it contains the whole in itself and is not merely a partial element of the whole. To maintain that the sanctifying process of justification embraces faith and love as aspects of the one process is not of course to deny that given the temporally and materially pluralistic constitution of man various acts are possible, which do not bring with them this event of justification as such and as a whole. Still, these acts are already orientated to it under the impulse of grace, and among these acts there can be found a 'faith' which has not yet transformed itself into love and so, being fides nondum caritate formata, does not yet justify. It may be pointed out that the doctrine of Trent on the temporal and historical plurality of preparation for justification (under the impulse of a grace already becoming efficacious) is far from proving that one should be able to indicate existentially the moment of entry into justification for the individual. It may be pointed out that the doctrine of the possibility of faith's remaining in spite of the loss of grace, as proposed by Trent, is primarily a distinction of principle with regard to the nature of things. It does not decide whether in practice in very many or in most cases mortal sin is not also a sin against faith. After all, the outward confession of faith and a certain psychological readiness to believe and to be influenced by the preaching of faith are no sure proofs that man believes in the depth of his being by a faith inspired by grace. And it is certain that for a more penetrating 'psychology', these Christian attitudes, in spite of their plurality, are more closely linked together than a happy-go-lucky everyday experience thinks. Hence most sins are committed because one does not sincerely believe, and vice versa, every sin by its very nature tends to fulfil itself in unbelief. All this is true, yet according to Trent one cannot deny on [205] principle (nor does Küng of course) that faith can exist as the initial working of grace and yet of itself not justify. The inevitable consequence is clear: when speaking of the one process of justification-sanctification, one cannot push love so completely to one side as Küng seems to do at times.

(b) Faith as an act inspired by grace

We may here call attention to something which links up very fittingly with the question which we have just treated. Küng (like Barth) is very interested in proving that faith, which is the presupposition of (subjective) justification, is truly not a 'work' and not a 'merit' with regard to justification. To make this – quite correct – point, Küng has recourse, or so it appears to me, to the notion found in Barth that one must distinguish[9] between an act of faith

[9] One can and must of course distinguish, with Trent to which Küng appeals (248), between the act of faith which disposes to justification and the infused virtue of faith. But this distinction does not simply mean that the former is purely human and the latter given by God. The act is as radically a gift of God as the infused virtue – which are distinguished not by their cause but by their duration, as actus and habitus. But if this is clear, I find the argument put forward (249) to explain why the act of faith can do as little as any other human act for

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which man makes as the condition of justification, and a faith which God brings about – which latter, (am I right?) Küng then identifies with the 'infused' habit of faith (255). Granted this distinction it is of course clear that the faith which man has in a very human way [206] and in merely a human way, cannot be a 'work' which can claim justification as its reward; even though it is active and free, it is really only man's allowing the divine action to happen to him. It seems to me however, that this is not a very happy way of speaking, and not a very good explanation of what is to be maintained, namely that the grace of justification is absolutely beyond all meriting. I even find that the ordinary Catholic text-book way of talking is better suited to Barth's purposes than the formulas given by Küng. Küng (p. 258) rightly rejects any 'synergism' in grace, which would make God and man pull at the same rope and each credit himself with half the achievement. But if one rejects such synergism – and the Catholic doctrine of grace is not a synergism of this type, in spite of the 'cooperari' of Trent – one should also not distinguish between a divine and a human faith, as if they were two different realities. The very faith which man has as his own free human act is the faith which God gives us in his action upon us, because he can give to the creature not only its passively accepted determinations, but the free act of its 'yes' to the grace of God; not only the offer, but the acceptance of the offer is entirely the grace of God. And since the acceptance is free, the very freedom of this acceptance is once more the gift of God. And every Catholic theologian, including Küng of course, knows and confesses – the Molinists too, for that matter – that God's grace is the natural basic possibility of the acceptance, inasmuch as the power to accept is created by God out of his free bounty, and – as Küng would rightly add (cf. sect. III, below) – this faculty is only preserved in sinful man because he has been created in Christ and redeemed by him. The power to accept is God's free gift: it is the possibility of an act which really corresponds to the call of God's personal self-disclosure, of a supernatural salutary act, as we say. It can therefore be only fully constituted by prevenient grace, which alone makes man truly capable of believing in a way which is for his salvation. Beyond this again, the acceptance of justification is the gift of God, according to the universal doctrine of theologians, absolutely decisively – a point that Küng does not stress enough against Barth, though it seems to clinch the matter: not only the possibility of the acceptance, in all its components, but the free actuation itself of this possibility by man, that is, what the actual act adds to the power of acting, is again the free gift of God. He acts through what Catholic theology calls the necessarily efficacious grace of God, in contradistinction to 'sufficient' grace, which gives the full power, but not the actual free act. [207] Every Catholic theologian confesses that the salutary act, even in the extra element which distinguishes it from the God-given power to make a salutary act, is once more the free gift of the grace of God which cannot be merited. Hence likewise man's faith itself is the pure grace of God; in so far as it precedes justification, it is not merely not something which could justification, somewhat hard to follow: namely, that it cannot cause justification because it is itself an element of the justification which God works in man. We shall discuss expressly in the next pages the sense in which Trent says (Denz. 801) that faith does not bring about justification. We must however admit explicitly that in another context (e.g. 244) Küng speaks of 'God's justifying grace which overcomes and gives life to these human acts', or can say that human acts 'must cling to and be informed by the reality of grace given ("infused") by God in Christ' (249). But Küng goes on to say – though primarily as a rendering of Barth's position, which however is obviously accepted – 'The believer [so he does believe!] is wholly dependent on God's action which allows a new state of existence to become real in him and only thus makes him capable of the true [hence obviously different from the preceding!] faith necessary for justification' (my italics). And then one has once more the ambiguous impression, that an effort is being made to construct a purely human faith (beside another which is of a divine type), to be able to say more easily that it does not justify, that it has merely a 'cognitive character'. From the point of view of the Catholic doctrine of grace, one should really say that a human 'faith', which is not itself the work of God's grace, is not even a correct 'recognition' of the objective redemption (the objective 'justification' in Barth's terminology): it would not only not be 'creative', it would not even be 'cognitive'.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

merit grace (because it is 'human'): it is itself a grace bestowed by God. The question therefore cannot arise, as to whether it could merit grace, because it is itself a grace.

Here we can see once more what we may rightly concede to Küng in the previous question. The act, which following Scripture we call 'faith' consists precisely of the fact that it accepts itself directly for what it is: the free grace of God. One could almost say: the act inspired by supernatural grace, in so far as it understands itself directly and explicitly as the act of God which justifies man is faith (fides caritate viva). For in itself, the gracious and gratuitous character of an event or of a gift received is not diminished or weakened, if it is understood as the effect – and hence 'merited' – of a previous act which is itself a pure grace of God's absolute and gracious initiative alone. In the eyes of a Catholic theologian, it does not derogate from the graciousness of the order of salvation, it merely describes in juridical terms (which are also found in Scripture) what Scripture likewise depicts as growth and development and fruit-bearing of a God-given life, if an act inspired by grace is called 'meritorious', with regard to an act which stems from it or with regard to an 'increase' of grace. (From a certain point of view, every subsequent act and all 'increase' of grace are linked to some extent to grace which is absolutely gratuitous and unmerited; and furthermore, every salutary act and hence perseverance in 'increased', 'habitual' grace depends immediately and ever anew on each new efficacious grace. Thus all depends on something absolutely 'actual', the ever new event of God's goodness and favour, which as such cannot be merited at all.)

Yet Catholic theology affirms with the Council of Trent that even this faith which leads to justification in no way merits this justification, even though it is a gift of God's free grace: such is the anxiety to remove the notion of merit all the way from this faith right up to justification. When therefore it is kept in mind that 'human' faith itself is a work of divine grace, we have undoubtedly an even stronger assurance against the idea that the faith which leads to justification is another sort of 'work' which could merit salvation – a stronger assurance than it seems to me is given [208] in Küng's presentation.[10] This would also make it clearer, why Catholic theology is not in danger of holding a doctrine of an apocatastasis or of reducing faith to a mere act of recognition – which is ultimately of no importance whatsoever for the decision which God has taken in Christ alone. Faith itself is the grace and act of God in Christ, not merely the 'objective' justification (redemption) by God alone as it is taken cognisance of in faith. If this faith itself has real significance for salvation, the 'triumph of grace' (to use G. C. Berkouwer's terms) is not thereby diminished. For grace itself triumphs in the same way in the 'objective' and in the 'subjective' sphere, because it supports the whole reality of man's salvation, which, being in the created order, is constituted by a polarity of two mutually irreducible realities: by the conditions of and the room for and the previous possibility of freedom in the creature on the one hand, and by the act of freedom itself on the other. But both components are the result of grace, each in its own way; in both grace triumphs. But to say that grace is deprived of its full triumph where it is not accepted – that is forbidden to man. All he could say in this case would be that man does not gain his only possible victory, which is to allow himself to be given gifts by the love of God. Whether in the sight of God, and for him, God's spurned love has not conquered, or whether it

[10] It would not then be necessary to insist so anxiously, as Küng appears to do (253, 246), that faith is merely the condition, not the cause of justification. It may be safely considered as that through which God works in us in his act of justification. When we have put it this way, it remains equally clear that faith does not merit justification. Küng himself speaks boldly – in his interpretation of Barth, 82f. – of the 'creative power' of faith, which faith itself receives from God. But it is precisely this faith which we mean when we speak of the faith of man who is to be justified; and the act of faith which man freely makes is precisely the faith which God brings about in us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

celebrates its most incomprehensible triumph – what creature can tell, as long as we are on pilgrimage far from the Lord?

(c)

There are other themes on which Küng stimulates us to think further and more carefully, and to which he contributes a mass of material from all corners of theology and its history, so that his book is often a useful work of reference. We mention only some of them here, without any further comment: biblical terminology and its normative character – the fact and its limits (pp. 116-118; 123; 180ff.; 195f.; 206); the nature and meaning of [209] tradition and ecclesiastical definitions for theology[11] (pp. 116-124); the Catholic sense of 'simul justus et peccator' (pp. 231-242); the concept of 'reward as grace' (pp. 263ff.);[12] the relationship of the Logos become man to all time (the pre-existence of the Verbum incarnandum et incarnatum) (127-138; 277-288); the effort to go beyond the controversy between Thomists and Scotists on the motive of the incarnation (pp. 127-150; 169-171); the exact interpretation of some canons of the Council of Orange (pp. 176-178; 186; 188); the sense in which the acts of sinners and unbelievers can still be said to be good (pp. 186-188);[13] the biblical and [210] ecclesiastical terminology of freedom, liberum arbitrium etc. (pp. 181-185); sin as always an act against Christ[14] (pp. 172f.); the Catholic understanding of 'sola fide' (pp. 243-256).

III. CREATION AND CHRIST

We come now to a further point, which is perhaps the most interesting in Küng's book. We said at the start that Küng has a perfect right, when seeking agreement with his interlocutor, to appeal to theological propositions which are not express doctrines of the magisterium, the only condition being that they do not contradict such doctrine. This procedure is now [11] One must also note the explanations which Küng has added in his answer to Stirnimann, Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung 125 (1957) 619-621.

[12] We permit ourselves to remark here that these explanations (following J. Schmid and G. Didier) do not seem to us to be among the clearest things that Küng has written. We hold with Trent that every 'work', since it means bringing forth fruit by the action of God, is in the same dimension as the coming blessed life of the same children of God. And hence we continue to think that there is no real difficulty in calling this work a beginning and a cause, and hence objectively, 'from outside' as it were, a meritorious thing with regard to the 'reward in heaven'. This objective connexion results simply from the nature of things, which is that of sowing and harvest. A completely different question is whether this objective connexion of merit and reward may be made the first and last motive of the Christian life. As every Catholic schoolboy should know, this question is to be answered with an unambiguous No. Every Christian should know that no one can be saved unless he loves God first and last, and makes this the attitude which encompasses his existence and into which all others must be integrated. But when and in so far as one loves God, one cannot seek in such an act one's merit and one's reward. An act which would do so would not be an act of love. But besides love, in the wide field which it sustains and leaves free, there are and must be, on account of the plurality of man as a creature, other acts and attitudes of man; and the acceptance of this plurality can be an act of the humility of man's love, which is not of course the simplicity of God and hence is not absolutely 'love'. This is not denied when we assert the necessary primacy of love which does not seek the reward which is actually there. Is one therefore bound to say, in order to avoid being a Pharisee, if one is considering matters objectively, that is, not giving motives, that even justified man 'always falls short of the task proposed to him'? His real 'task' was always to allow himself to be surpassed by the demands of the love of God, but to be humble and loving and joyful therein; his ultimate 'duty' was to act, not from duty but from love. His merit (in the objective sense) is precisely in the act of love, which seeks for no reward. But such 'merit', bestowed on him by God's grace, is objectively and truly valuable in heaven.

[13] The statement (180) that 'the majority of Catholic theologians' now concede that there is de facto 'no purely natural good acts exist in fact' is undoubtedly somewhat of an exaggeration. Most theologians today would still maintain the contrary against Ripalda and Vasquez. Whether they or the few who are on the other side (Schmaus, for instance) are right is of course another question.

[14] But one can hardly appeal (163) to the Church's rejection of the 'peccatum philosophicum' to prove this.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

followed by Küng at one point where it is very noticeable. We devote some consideration to it here, not to dispute the theological proposition, but to look for some further light on it.

The thesis is that the actual order of creation (of man and the world) is founded even as a natural order on Christ (the Verbum incarnandum et incarnatum) and reposes on him, so that the world even in its natural state is in fact everywhere and always a Christian thing, even though it is possible to some extent to 'prescind' from this, and (another) world without Christ is possible. From this the conclusion is drawn, for instance, that all sin is against Christ, that the conservation of the natural state of man as something capable of salvation is already the grace of Christ. Otherwise sin by its nature would have cast man down to absolute ruin, through death to the 'second' death or through total annihilation. But it was caught up by the mercy of God because it was committed in the order of things belonging to Christ and remains involved in it. Hence too the natural and yet Christ-borne realm being the place of this sin automatically absorbs its consequences. The 'nature' of man which is still present and capable of salvation in the sinner is not 'the remnant which survives unharmed in sin', but the beginning of salvation constantly renewed by God's goodness in Christ, against sin and its universally destructive tendency. This new beginning stems from the unrepentant loyalty of God towards his covenant, which has ordained all creation from the start to his absolute yes' to Christ. This eternal affirmation upholds everything from the beginning and can maintain even a given temporal event eternally, as when it envisages the temporal and spatial [211] determinations of the eternal Logos in the flesh. It follows, for instance, that free will, in so far as it survives after sin according to Trent, is not merely a natural, neutral good (lacking only what it should have, its supernatural elevation) but actually a grace of Christ. It only remains because God's merciful loyalty to his covenant in Christ, which upholds everything, even the actual creation, continues to preserve it. Otherwise it would have been buried at least in the damnation of the absolute impossibility of doing otherwise.

This, we hope, is an objective summary of Küng's opinion. We need not dwell on the fact that it goes very far to meet Barth's concept of the priority of the covenant to creation and of Christology to any form of anthropology, nor on the fact that it could actually take the inability of the sinner to do anything of himself for salvation, even further than the Reformers. We have called this theory a theological proposition. But that does not mean that it is no more than an arbitrary hypothesis,[15] without hints or testimonies of it in tradition. On the contrary, Küng can adduce a very impressive body of support from Scripture and [15] Stirnimann rejects this as 'pure speculation', which even reminds him 'in a way, of Gnosticism', but this verdict is quite unjust. It is not very difficult to admit that the whole 'de facto' order of things (in contrast to another possible one: Stirnimann objects at once to the expression) is not foreseen and decreed simply by the 'Deus unus' of metaphysics and of a treatise 'De Deo uno … et creatore' drawn up only on metaphysical lines in which the 'Deus unus' appears as the cause and the end. And it is not difficult to admit that the present order depends on the Word by which all things were made, and exists because this Logos wished to communicate himself (in incarnation and grace) to uncreated being, so that in this sense he is really the 'ground of being' of all created reality (the other expression to which Stirnimann objects). This is all that is necessary for Küng's position, and this is all that he actually affirms in his thesis. And it is enough to enable him to draw the consequences with regard to sin and soteriology against which Stirnimann protests. I hold that it is incorrect to say that sin could have as its consequence the annihilation (instead of the damnation) of man, if its effects were not arrested by the mercy of God in Christ. Küng leaves the question open in the last resort. But is it certainly false and dogmatically untenable? It is not incompatible with the natural immortality of the soul. But if one leaves the question hypothetically open, a good Thomist would not find it so bad 'to go on to the annihilation of the whole cosmos'. Without spirit, the material world would have no meaning. See also A. Grillmeier in: Fragen der Theologie heute, edited by J. Feiner, J. Trütsch, F. Böckle (Einsiedeln 1957), 270: 'The recognition of the fact that the locus classicus for the praedestinatio Christi, Col. 1:15ff., speaks of the incarnate Word (and hence that what is said there about the pre-existing Logos must not be separated from what is said of Christ as man) provides a strong biblical foundation for the concept (that our history and creation in general is absolutely Christocentric)'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

tradition. All one [212] can say is that anyone who opposed the thesis would not be attacking a doctrine so clear, express and universal that he would have to expect an immediate protest from the magisterium. One can undoubtedly differ from Küng on this point without fear of contradiction from the official voice of the Church, and to this extent at least Küng's thesis is his opinion, and therefore a theological proposition which will be accepted by those who find his arguments convincing. Given the possibility of growth in the knowledge of the faith and in the sureness of our knowledge with regard to what belongs to divine revelation, to qualify a thesis as a theological proposition (quoad nos) does not imply that the statement in question is of itself and objectively to be excluded from the truths of revelation. Küng's effort to prove that the substance of his thesis is found in Scripture and is therefore part of revelation is perfectly legitimate, and is not in conflict with the qualification which we have attributed to it.

We shall not here discuss the basic position itself, that is, the fact of the actual creation in its entirety and not merely supernatural grace being based on Christ, and we shall not examine the arguments for the position and so on. We accept the position as a hypothesis. Taken in general, it is certainly not open to reproach in the name of certain truths of faith; it even appears to us – if we may say so, without offering any proof – correct on the whole and theologically demonstrable. Our purpose here is rather to ask whether the fundamental thesis gives adequate support to all that Küng deduces from it. To explain what we mean, we must take up another point.

Is it true that the statement, God could have created a world without Christ had he willed to, he could have created spiritual beings without the grace of his self-communication and divine sonship, merely a statement about a possible world which does not in fact exist, and which therefore is without importance for us and our statements about the actually existing world? Or is something significant with regard to the religious understanding of our actual situation, something important theologically, given expression in this form of statement, which seems so abstract and hypothetical? The latter is true. Why? Because it is a way of expressing the fact that we who exist, and are realized (in our 'nature') receive grace once more – as grace, as free benevolence, in our present state. It is not true, as the 'new theology' was tempted to say from time to time, that everything is grace, because everything has been given freely by God, or because everything that is or will be is eventually given in fact to [213] sinners. What is called 'supernatural grace' in Catholic doctrine is something uncalled-for with regard to our present de facto permanent condition (our 'nature'), even prior to sin. It is not merely free with regard to our 'non-necessary existence' and God's free, uncalled-for decision to create us. If then the term of reference itself 'nature', is totally free, in so far as nature has no 'right' to be called into existence by God and God does not owe it existence, a similar state exists once more within the whole of de facto human nature: nothing is due to it, there is a complete lack of rights and claims as regards any endowment with the divine life, any personal self-communication of the triune God, so far as existing human nature is concerned. This created being must not only say: I am something freely instituted by God, but: God disposes of me freely. This is important, because on the one hand, given the inner coherence of the various elements of the nature of an existing being, the case in question does not arise for all the elements of such a being. Many must be considered as existing in combination only as the result of the one disposition of the rational action of God. The personal self-communication of God on the other hand, if justice is to be done to its nature, must not appear as something inevitably instituted with the creation of man of itself. It must appear as the free gift of incalculable grace even to man in so far as he has been constituted. The mere creation of man is as it were a transcendent free act of God, the anonymous miracle which is always man's background. Within his life, however, another miracle is to take place, that of the historical self-communication of God, which to some extent is not anonymous but

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

falls under categories. But if the formal gratuitousness as such of this event were to be placed on the same level as the 'grace and favour' of creation (or as a gift given to a sinner qua sinner) this self-communication would no longer be that miracle of unfathomable benevolence which it is felt to be in Scripture (though this cannot be demonstrated here).

This must be remembered, if Küng's theologumenon is to be correctly assessed and interpreted, according to the terms in which we have set it out, correctly, as we hope. What we have just said does not make it necessarily untrue. We can say at once, even bearing in mind what has just been said, that the creation of 'nature' takes place in Christ. There is no difficulty in thinking that the first, primal and comprehensively eternal will of God is his own self-expression, through which the Logos of God comes to exist in the emptiness of the non-divine, and that in this act of [214] will God wills the humanity of Christ and hence creation in general as its setting. There is no basic difficulty in thinking that the de facto creation takes place as the presupposition which God creates simply because he, the eternal, decrees to have a history, that of love giving itself – a covenant: and that hence he wills, in this eternal decree, the natural creation as it actually is; and that he wills it, because once it exists by virtue of this will, it can never be excluded from this covenanting will of God, which also upholds it as the presupposition of this irrevocable covenant. There is no difficulty likewise in saying that sin denounces and destroys the covenant with God, so far as this lies within sin and its unnaturalness, that it does all it can to hurl creation and man into absolute destruction, since it contradicts what upholds the natural creation in the existing order of things. And this affirmation need not be complicated by the question as to whether the immortality of the human soul is 'natural', that is, resulting from its nature without a new intervention of grace, or not. For it is quite thinkable in Catholic theology that the unnaturalness of sin, in its radical monstrosity and mysterious irrationality can be directed with absolute hostility against something that is natural, and drive something destructively into its definitive unnaturalness – an unnaturalness which consists precisely of the fact that it is definitive in its radical self-negation. Sin would cease to be serious and would become triumphant before God, if the sinner could really escape into simple non-being.

But it must be remembered just as clearly that this original, eternal, comprehensive and all-important covenanting will of God, intent on his supernatural self-communication must bring about this distinction and this bent within the structure of the creature.[16] God can only impart himself, and will to impart himself, by creating something for whose very existence this communication is a pure grace. In view not only of the [215] possible but of the actual creature as such, God owes it to the sheer sovereignty of his love not to make the creature the *pre*supposition of this act of most personal love, except in such a way that even when created and instituted it must receive as free grace that for which in fact it was created. And hence one has to say that it could have been created without this communication.

If this nature exists without grace and justification, when and in so far as it is sinful, its further existence as something that can be saved from damnation is indeed a grace, since it is due to the decree of God to impart himself, to uphold his covenant, to be incarnate in Christ. In the actual order of things, this is true even with regard to continued existence as a man. But this 'grace', whereby this nature continues to exist on account of Christ, is not simply the [16] Küng (137) does indeed speak of a 'double gift' (creation and creation in Christ). But he does not seem to have made it quite clear that the first gratuitousness is not simply that of a possible order of things, but that both are found differentiated in the actual world, even though the second encompasses and sustains the first, but without eliminating the first as differentiated from the gratuitousness of the specifically supernatural order. The theme is indeed intoned (169, 170) in so far as it is affirmed that this grace of Christ, which is given with the preservation of creation, is 'grace (in the widest sense)', 'grace (in an all-encompassing sense, not in the sense of "justifying" grace)'. But it is not only barely touched on, it is also not very happily formulated by the use of 'justifying' grace as its opposite (instead of: supernatural grace of salvation).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

same grace as the divine self-communication itself. Before and after sin, there is the same discrepancy between the two graces as between natural creation and God's self-communication to it, as between nature and supernatural grace, as between creation and covenant. This can perhaps be seen most clearly from the fact that the 'grace' of the conservation of natural man in and in spite of sin, remains ambiguous in itself and for us. It remains an open question, which we can never answer, even if this state of continued existence became entirely transparent to us. We can never know whether the sparing and preservation of the sinner is for judgment or for a new salvation, whether we use it aright or pervert it by sin, which one can never do with grace strictly speaking. If this split did not exist within the one concrete human being, if even 'in Christ' our nature was not still ambivalent – as real grace never is – it would be incomprehensible that creation could really not believe and that unbelief could be more than merely apparent – or ultimately quite harmless. A subject whose being or nature was grace in such a way as grace is just grace, would be, even as a subject, the pure affirmation of God, and could do nothing else but ratify the affirmation of God in Christ: it would have to believe. And since the subject is real and therefore very 'objective', without this objective inclination in human nature, there would be no difference at all between objective and subjective redemption, there could be no possible contrast between the two dimensions which would be more than apparent. Not only are there grades[17] of 'being in Christ' (p. 148f.), there are also [216] essential gradations in the gratuitousness of grace itself. An example of the first case would be the permanence of the free will in a sinner. It can be called a 'grace' in Christ, because it is willed and preserved by reason of the divine decree with regard to God's self-communication in Christ and with regard to the forgiveness of sins which is already predefined in that decree. But these two reasons are different from this free will, which in itself, strictly as such, even in the present order of things is a 'grace' of creation, but not 'in itself' a grace of Christ. An example of the second case would be the communication of the Holy Spirit, which is in itself grace in the strictest sense. If the higher makes the lower its presupposition, as the condition of its own possibility, the lower does not cease to be lower than the higher. The grace of the strictly supernatural procures for itself the grace of creation as its own presupposition on a lower level, maintains and animates it by virtue of the stronger will of God with regard to the higher grace: but it still leaves it as the lower grace.

From this we can understand why ecclesiastical terminology, in spite of or in consequence of the Council of Orange, does not use the word grace to designate the human nature which survives in sin, free will and so on, when it speaks of justification and the like.[18] Everything exists in Christ; there are degrees in this 'everything'; Küng rightly stresses the two things. But – a point which Küng seems to me to bring out less clearly – the existence which the degrees have in Christ is of different kinds. The lower 'degree' only has its existence in Christ, the higher 'degree' consists essentially of the self-communication of God in Christ. This implies fundamentally and radically an essential difference from merely 'having existence', even though once more the mere 'existence' is given in the actual order of things because God decreed to impart himself. To work out more clearly this distinction, which has been barely indicated here, we should not begin by taking 'nature' as a fixed and obviously settled concept as mostly happens in the Catholic theology of the schools, and hence, in spite [17] It is also emphasized (272) that the mystery of creation is never to be placed 'on a par with' the mystery of the incarnation.

[18] This is even truer of the use of 'natural' and 'supernatural'. The being of man itself has, in the actual order, an inevitable orientation towards God's strictly supernatural grace (a supernatural existential); but to designate it then as in itself 'supernatural' instead of 'natural' can only lead to hopeless confusion and blur beyond recognition the objective distinction between nature and grace. Hence this seems to be more than 'a semantic and therefore a secondary question', as Küng affirms (138).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of all mutual reassurances on the part of Barth and others, gives the impression of something which remains untouched by [217] sin and the loss of grace. We must begin with man as a unity and totality, willed by God in Christ and for the sake of Christ, called to the covenant and to immediate fellowship with God and of himself sinful. And then we must show that the Catholic distinction between nature and grace within this one actual man is demanded by this starting-point, to the praise of the sovereign grace of God – and not because the 'natural' remains intact in any case.[19]

The notion of such gradated grace is no stranger to scholastic theology and is even quite normal as a matter of terminology. Theologians have been long accustomed to the concepts of entitatively and modally supernatural. And on the question precisely of whether fallen man as such can keep the natural moral law wholly or in part, they make use of the concept of a 'medicinal' or 'healing' grace, which is on the one hand 'entitatively natural' and on the other, since it is given by God, in spite of the unworthiness of the sinner, in view of the supernatural end, and for the sake of Christ, is said to be quoad fontem et finem supernatural in its modality. This distinction may seem at first sight a little extrinsic and arbitrary, and rather in the nature of a concession to popular religious speech, which gives the name of 'grace' even to the external helps provided by God, such as good dispositions, absence of temptation etc. But this classic distinction can be given its profoundest and final justification if we use the point developed by Küng. Since everything is created in Christ and for him, and since from the start 'nature' is always and irrevocably conceived by God as the presupposed condition of possibility of grace strictly speaking, nature itself cannot be entitatively supernatural grace. But it is always and necessarily endowed with a supernatural finality in its existence, in its conservation in spite of sin, in all the helps provided by God, even on the natural level, for the conservation and development of its existence. It is modally supernatural. The unity and difference of nature and (entitatively supernatural) grace, precisely from the point of view of gratuitousness, result from the same principle. Hence nature is not simply and non-dialectically non-grace. It is not something which – in the actual order of things! – rests on its own foundations and is sufficient 'for itself', even without grace. It is not the substructure which could exist even without the superstructure, but the lower, which though the presupposition of the higher, still depends on the higher, because in the last [218] resort all depends on the highest – who freely willed to be the love that imparts itself.

We asked at the beginning of this section whether in view of the precisions which we have tried to indicate, Küng's basic thesis could be still equal to the task for which it is used in his book. His point was to show that the Catholic doctrine of the persistence of man's being and power of choice (the permanence of his God-given 'nature') by no means involved the autonomy and indifference of this nature with regard to grace and the covenant, as Barth thought. We must now sum up and answer this question. Even when we keep clearly in mind the distinction between nature and strictly supernatural grace in man as be now exists, it remains possible – even using traditional terminology – to consider the existence, conservation and activity of fallen, though redeemable, nature as grace, in the actual order of things. This is because the origin, existence and one end of all this, which preserves even the natural from radical damnation is to be found in God's absolute and irrevocable will that the Logos should become man as a member of the one, though sinful, humanity. This 'grace' is conceivable as the deficient mode of the grace which must presuppose this 'grace' as the condition of having anybody at all who can be endowed with grace.

[19] Cf. for instance the indications given in my article 'Anthropologie' (dogmatic) in LTK[2] I, 618-627.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[219]

PART FIVE

The Sacraments

[221]

9

THE THEOLOGY OF THE SYMBOL

From its beginnings to the present day,[1] the theology of devotion to the heart of Jesus, as understood by the simple faithful, by the theologians in their discussions and by the magisterium in its pronouncements, teaches that the heart of the Lord is a symbol[2] of the love of Christ. Whatever answer is to be given to the question as to what is the proper object of this devotion, what is the relationship of the physical heart of the Lord, as object of devotion and as symbol of the [222] object of devotion, to the love of Christ, which is certainly implicated in the object of this devotion; the word symbol cannot be avoided in the theology of the devotion. It indicates a component without which the nature and meaning of devotion

[1] Here too there has been a certain change. An equally ancient tradition, which is now falling into the background (it is not mentioned for instance in 'Haurietis aquas') takes the heart also to be the 'seat' and 'organ' of love or of the life of the soul in general. Thus the translator of Origen, Hieronymus, speaks of the principale (το_ η(γεμονικο&ν) cordis Jesu, because according to Stoic doctrine, followed by Origen, the η(γεμονικο&ν has its seat in the heart. Cf. K. Rahner, RAM 14 (1934) 171-174. On βλэ, καρδι/α, as seat of physical life and of the life of the soul in general in the Old Testament, among the Greeks, and in the New Testament, see Kittel, TWNT III, 609-616; see also Etudes Carmélitaines, Le Cœur (Paris 1950). But even here we should ask how far this description of the heart as the seat and organ of the inner life of the soul is already to a great extent to be understood 'symbolically' (even though it is prompted by physical feelings in the heart during strongly emotional experiences), and hence means ultimately the same thing as we express by speaking of the heart as a 'symbol'.

[2] So for instance (if we prescind from the middle ages) in the more recent forms of devotion to the heart of Jesus: in G. I. Languet (Hamon IV, 83); in J. Croiset (1895 edition, Montreuil-sur-Mer, p. 5): '. . . il a donc fallu trouver un symbole; et quel symbole plus propre et plus naturel de l'amour que le cœur?', before this, however, we read (p. 4) that the heart is 'en quelque manière et la source et le siège de l'amour', as L. Galliffet and P. Froment (Hamon III, 389; IV, 44) took it to be, about the same time; this was contradicted by Benedict XIV (De servorum Dei beatificatione IV, §2, c. 31 and 25); in Pius VI (Epist. ad Scip. Ricci Episc., 29th June, 1781); in Leo XIII (Encycl. 'Annum Sacrum', 25th May, 1899: 'inest Sacro Cordi symbolum atque expressa imago infinitae Jesu Christi caritatis' AAS 31 [1898-99] 649); Pius XII ('Haurietis Aquas' AAS 48 [1956] 316, 317, 320, 327, 344: 'naturalis index seu symbolus caritatis; signum et index divini amoris; naturalis symbolus' are the expressions used); among theologians, as for instance Franzelin (Tractatus de Verbo incarnato[5] [Rome 1902] 469-473), Lercher (Inst. Theol. Dogmat. III[3] [Innsbruck 1942] 247-255) and in the other classical works on devotion to the heart of Jesus, which we need not indicate here. We should note, however, as regards the use of the word 'symbol' in this doctrine: a. on the whole, the general sense of the word symbol is hardly clarified in this context. When, for instance, 'Haurietis Aquas' speaks of a 'naturalis symbolus', we need understand no more than a symbol which comes to mind spontaneously and as it were, of itself. The expression gives no grounds for an exact and positive determination of the concept, such as we shall give here. There will of course be no contradiction between the two concepts. They will be related to each other as any other current concept in everyday language is to an attempt at a metaphysical explanation of it. b. Similarly, as regards how the heart is symbol of the love of Christ, and how these two elements are related to each other with regard to the object of devotion to the heart of Jesus, theologians are not unanimous. We shall not discuss the point here. At the end of our considerations, we shall take up the theory of Solano and others who do their best in fact to exclude the notion of 'symbol' from the theology of devotion to the heart of Jesus.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to the heart of Jesus cannot be properly understood. But this calls for a more precise statement about what a symbol is in general. For it is not true, as is often thought, that the word 'symbol' has in general a clear and definite meaning in every instance and that therefore if there is any difficulty in understanding the assertion; the heart of Jesus is the symbol of the love of Christ, the difficulty does not come from the word symbol at least. An enquiry into the general sense of the word 'symbol' will show however that the concept is much more obscure, difficult and ambiguous than is usually thought, so that one of the tasks of these considerations must be to show that it is wrong to take the concept as an obvious one. This will in turn allow us to state clearly what it really means or can mean to speak of the symbol in the theology of devotion to the Sacred Heart. Such investigations, at least in this context are almost entirely lacking. If then the effort raises many problematical and unsolved points, the fair-minded reader will not be surprised.

I. THE ONTOLOGY OF SYMBOLIC REALITY IN GENERAL[3]

[3] We cannot attempt to give here even an approximately exhaustive bibliography on the philosophy and to some extent on the theology of the symbol. We shall merely list some works, very arbitrarily chosen indeed, which may give the uninitiated reader some idea of the variety of philosophical effort with regard to the concept of the symbol.

J. Volkelt, Der Symbolbegriff in der neuesten Aesthetik (Jena 1876). Fr. Th. Vischert, Altes and Neues (Stuttgart 1889), from which the essay 'Das Symbol' is re-printed in Deutscher Geist, ein Lesebuch aus zwei Jahrhunderten, 2 vols., S. Fischer Verlag (Berlin 1940) 726ff. R. Hamann, Das Symbol (Diss. Berlin 1902). M. Schlesinger, Grundlagen und Geschichte des Symbols (Berlin 1912). E. Brunner, Das Symbolische in der religiösen Erkenntnis (Tübingen 1914). R. Gätschenberger, Symbola. Anfangsgründe einer Erkenntnistheorie (Karlsruhe 1920). F. Ebner, Das Wort und die geistigen Realitäten (Regensburg 1921). R. Otto, Das Heilige (Breslau ^{6}1921). E. Cassirer, Philosophie der symbolischen Formen, 3 vols. (Berlin 1923-31; Freiburg ^{2}1954). H. Schreiner, Geist and Gestalt (Schwerin 1926). R. Guardini, Von heiligen Zeichen (Mainz 1927). O. Casel, 'Kath. Kultprobleme', Jb. f. Liturgiewissensch. 7 (1927) 105-124, O. Casel, The Mystery of Christian Worship (London & Westminster, Md. 1962). Blätter f. d. Philos. 1 (1928): No. 4 as a whole treats of the symbol. E. Unger, Wirklichkeit, Mythos, Erkenntnis (Munich–Berlin 1930). P. Tillich, Religiöse Verwirklichung. Aufsätze (Berlin ^{2}1930) 88f., 'Das religiöse Symbol'. R. Winkler, 'Die Frage nach dem symbolischen Charakter der religiösen Erkenntnis', Christentum und Wissenschaft (1929) 252 ff. W. Müri, Symbolon. Wort- und sachgeschichtliche Studie (Bern 1931). F. Weinhandl, Über das aufschliessende Symbol (Berlin 1931); reviewed by M. Radacovic, 'Zur Wiedergeburt des symbolischen Denkens', Hochland 29 (1931-1932) 494-505. K. Plachte, Symbol und Idol. Über die Bedeutung der symbolischen Formen im Sinnvollzug der religiöse Erfahrung (Berlin 1931). C. G. Jung, Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious (London & New York 1959). C. G. Jung, Psychological Types (London & New York 1923). R. Scherer, 'Das Symbolische. Eine philosophishe Analyse', Phil. Jahrb. d. Görresges. 48 (1935) 210-257. K. Bühler, Ausdruckstheorie (Jena 1936). H. Noack, Symbol und Existenz der Wissenschaft. Untersuchungen zur Grundlegung einer philosophischen Wissenschaftslehre (Halle 1936). G. Söhngen, Symbol und Wirklichkeit im Kultmysterium (Bonn 1937, ^{2}1940). G. Söhngen, Der Wesensauf bau des Mysteriums (Bonn 1938). J. Maritain, 'Sign and Symbol', Journal of the Warburg Institute 1 (1937). W. M. Urban, Language and Reality (London 1939), ch. 12, 'Religious Symbols and the Problem of Religious Knowledge'. W. M. Urban, 'Symbolism as a Theological Principle', Journal of Religion 19 (1939) No. 1. G. Thomas, 'Myth and Symbol in Religion', Journal of Bible and Religion 7 (1939) 163-171. O. Doering–M. Hartig, Christliche Symbole (Freiburg ^{2}1940). E. Bevan, Symbolism and Belief (London 1938). M. D. Koster, 'Symbol und Sakrament', Die neue Ordnung 5 (1947) 385 ff. T. T. Segerstedt, Die Macht des Wortes. Eine Sprachsoziologie (from the Swedish) (Zurich 1947). K. Jaspers, Von der Wahrheit (Munich 1947). K. Jaspers, Philosophie (Heidelberg 1948). St. V. Szmanski, Das Symbol (Diss. Innsbruck 1947). E. Gombrich, 'Icones Symbolicae. The Visual Image in Neo-Platonic Thought', J. Warburg and Courtauld Institute 11 (1948) 163 ff. H. Friedmann, Wissenschaft und Symbol (Munich 1949); the same, Epilegomena (Munich 1954) 130-155 'Die symbolnahen Begriffe'. J. S. Bayne, Secret and Symbol (Edinburgh 1949). H. Schmalenbach, Phénomenologie du signe: Signe et Symbole (op. coll.) (Neuchâtel 1949). H. Ording 'Symbol und Wirklichkeit', Theol. Lit. Z. 3 (1948) 129 ff. M. Heideggar, Holzwege (Frankfurt a. M. 1950). E. Biser, Das Christusgeheimnis der Sakramente (Heidelberg 1950); 'Das religiöse Symbol in Aufbau des Geisteslebens', Münch. Theol. Z. 5 (1954) 114-140. J. Münzhuber, 'Sinnbild und Symbol', Z. Phil. Forsch. 5 (1950) 62-74. J. Daniélou, 'The Problem of Symbolism', Thought 25 (1950) 423-440. Th. Bogler, 'Zur

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the short space at our disposition, we must renounce the attempt to approach the question proper from the point of view of history of [224] philosophy and the human understanding of existence in general. There would be many points to be considered: the usage and history of the word symbol and kindred words; how its changing meanings are related to the original radical meaning which made such changes possible; the meaning and history of concepts which point linguistically and objectively in the same direction: ει]δοφ, μορφη/, sign, figure, expression, image, aspect, appearance, etc. We must omit all such historical preparatives which lead up to the actual question, though we thereby risk overlooking many relevant questions on which light could be thrown by the history of the problem. We take up the matter in hand therefore without preparing the ground beforehand.

1. Our first statement, which we put forward as the basic principle of an ontology of symbolism, is as follows: all beings are by their nature symbolic, because they necessarily 'express' themselves in order to attain their own nature.

We should already be dealing with merely derivative modes of symbolic [225] being if we started with the fact that two realities, each of which is supposed to be already constituted in its essence and intelligible of itself, 'agreed' with one another on a certain point, and stated that this 'agreement' made it possible for each of them (more particularly the better known and more accessible of the two, of course) to refer to the other and call attention to it, and hence be used by us as a symbol for the other, precisely by reason of the 'agreement'. Symbols would then only vary, and be distinguishable from one another, by the degree and precise mode, of this subsequent similarity between the two realities. Since in the long run everything agrees in some way or another with everything else, to start the analysis of symbols this way would make it impossible to distinguish really genuine symbols ('symbolic realities') from merely arbitrary 'signs', 'signals' and 'codes' ('symbolic representations'). Anything could be the symbol of anything else, the orientation from the symbol to the thing symbolized could run the other way round or be determined merely accidentally, from a view point extrinsic to the matter itself by the human observer, who finds one aspect more telling than another. Such derivative, secondary cases of symbolism do of course exist, so that it is not easy to say where the function of being merely a sign and indicator so predominates over the 'function of expressiveness' that a symbol loses its 'overplus of meaning' (Fr. Th. Vischer) and sinks to the level of a sign with little symbolism. The margins are fluid. One

---

Theologie der Kunst', Liturgie and Mönchtum 7 (1950) 46-63. A. Brunner, Glaube und Erkenntnis (Munich 1951); the same, Die Religion (Freiburg 1956). M. Eliade, Images and Symbols (Paris 1952). M. Thiel, 'Die Symbolik als philosophisches Problem und philosophische Aufgabe', Stud. Gen. 6 (1953) 235-256. H. Looff, 'Symbol und Tranzendenz' Stud. Gen. 6 (1953) 324-332; the same, Der Symbolbegriff in der neueren Religionsphilosophie und Theologie (Kantstudien, Cologne 1955). H. Meyer, 'Symbolgebilde der Sprache', Stud. Gen. 6 (1953) 195-206. J. Pieper, Weistum, Dichtung, Sakrament (Munich 1954). F. Kaulbach, Philosophische Grundlegung zu einer wissenschaftlichen Symbolik (Meisenheim 1954). R. Boyle, 'The Nature of Metaphor', The Modern Schoolman 31 (1954) 257-280. L. Fremgen, Offenbarung und Symbol (Gütersloh 1954). G. Mensching, 'Religiöse Ursymbole der Menschheit', Stud. Gen. 8 (1955) 362-370. A. Rosenberg, Die christliche Bildmeditation (Munich 1955). E. Przywara, 'Bild, Gleichnis, Symbol, Mythos, Mysterium, Logos', Archivio di Filosofia 2-3 (Rome 1956) 7-38. K. Kerenyi, 'Symbolismus in der antiken Religionen', ibid., 119-129. A. Grillmeier, Der Logos am Kreuz (Munich 1956). F. König, Religionswissenschaftliches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1956) 849-851. G. van der Leeuw, Phänomenologie der Religion (Tübingen ^{2}1956). K. Rahner, Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore Md. 1967): 'Priest and Poet', 'Behold this heart', 'Some Theses…'; the same, 'Der theologische Sinn der Verehrung des Herzens-Jesu' in Festschrift zur Hundertjahrfeier des Theol. Konvikts Innsbruck 1858-1958 (Innsbruck 1958) 102-109. M. Vereno, Vom Mythos zum Christos (Salzburg 1958). B. Liebrucks, 'Sprache und Mythos: Konkrete Vernunft', Festschrift E. Rothacker (Bonn 1958) 253-280. G. Kittel, TWNT, eidos, II, 371-373; eikon, II, 378-396; morphe, IV, 750-760. Enciclopedia Filosofica, IV, 625-627.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

need only recall that our numbers once had a religious and sacral character. Indeed it often happens that in a vocabulary more attentive to history of art and aesthetics 'symbol' represents a very derivative case of the symbolic. It is a feature of such terminology that the symbol (an anchor, a fish and so on) indicates a lower degree of the symbolic than for instance a religious image. We shall not discuss these matters further now. Our task will be to look for the highest and most primordial manner in which one reality can represent another – considering the matter primarily from the formal ontological point of view. And we call this supreme and primal representation, in which one reality renders another present (primarily 'for itself' and only secondarily for others), a symbol: the representation which allows the other 'to be there'.

To reach the primary concept of symbol, we must start from the fact that all beings (each of them, in fact) are multiple,[4] and are or can be [226] essentially the expression of another in this unity of the multiple and one[5] in this plurality, by reason of its plural unity.[6] The first part of this assertion is axiomatic in an ontology of the finite. Each finite being as such bears the stigma of the finite by the very fact that it is not absolutely 'simple'. Within the permanent inclusive unity of its reality (as essence and existence) it is not simply and homogeneously the same in a deathlike collapse into identity. It has of itself a real multiplicity, which is not merely a mental distinction and division extrinsic to the reality and only due to the limited intelligence of the external and finite observer, who only explicitates for himself the absolutely simple fullness of the being in question by using several terms (presuming that it would be thinkable at all under these circumstances).

In saying this, however, we do not mean to assert that an intrinsic plurality and distinction must always be merely the stigma of the finiteness of a being. We know, on the contrary, from the mystery of the Trinity – we are doing theological ontology, which need not be afraid of adducing revealed data: that there is a true and real – even though 'only' relative – distinction of 'persons' in the supreme simplicity of God, and hence a plurality, at least in this sense. Let us now further consider – in keeping with a theology[7] of the 'traces' and 'reflexions' of the inner-trinitarian plurality – that it is quite thinkable that the pluralism of the finite creature is not merely a consequence and indicator of its finiteness, as a merely [227] negative qualification, but also a consequence – even though not naturally recognizable as such – of that divine plurality which does not imply imperfection and weakness and limitation of being, but the supreme fullness of unity and concentrated force: then we may say candidly, though also cautiously, that being is plural in itself and formulate this as a general principle without restrictions. On this supposition, we do not need to take it as merely part of the ontology of the finite as such. Even where it is applied to a plurality of the finite as such, we can take it as an assertion which understands even the plurality of the finite as an

[4] We choose here a method which will bring us to our goal as easily and quickly as possible, even though it simplifies matters by presupposing ontological and theological principles which would have to be demonstrated, not supposed, in a properly worked out ontology of the symbol. However, in view of the reader who is primarily envisaged here, these presuppositions may be made without misgiving.

[5] We say very vaguely 'one'. This 'unity' of a moment in a being can of course again only be envisaged analogically, in comparison with the unity and totality which is predicated of the Being which is totally one and yet plural in itself.

[6] We do not wish to anticipate here the question as to whether the one moment, in relation to the other within the one plural being must necessarily have a formally expressive function (for instance, to use the theological formula of the Trinity, must proceed from the other moment 'in similitudinem naturae'), or is only de facto 'expression' and displays a 'likeness'. Even in the second case, the important point remains, that the likeness is originally constituted as an inner self-realization, and qua distinct, is an inner moment of the abiding unity itself.

[7] We may mention a modern effort in this direction, inspired by present-day philosophy, the book of C. Kaliba, Die Welt als Gleichnis des dreieinigen Gottes. Entwurf zu einer trinitarischen Ontologie (Salzburg 1952), which, in spite of the misgivings it arouses on particular points, takes up a theme which is unduly neglected today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

allusion – disclosed only in revelation – to a plurality which is more than an indistinguishable identity and simplicity. We should of course have to think of it so, if even our sublimest ontological ideals were not further directed by the self-revelation of the God who is still loftier than these ideals, and who by thus surpassing our always approximate metaphysical ideals comes once more, suddenly and strangely, that is, miraculously and mysteriously, close to us. It is therefore true: a being is, of itself, independently of any comparison with anything else, plural in its unity.

But these plural moments in the unity of a being must have an inner agreement among themselves on account of the unity of the being, even though the plurality of moments in a being must be constituted by the reciprocal diversity of these moments. And they cannot have this agreement as the simple juxtaposition, so to speak, of moments which are there as such originally. This would imply a denial of the unity of the being in question: unity would be the subsequent conjunction of separate elements which once stood only on their own. This would be to betray the profound principle of St Thomas: non enim plura secundum se uniuntur: there can be no union of things which are of themselves multiple. A plurality in an original and an originally superior unity can only be understood as follows: the 'one' develops, the plural stems from an original 'one', in a relationship of origin and consequence; the original unity, which also forms the unity which unites the plural, maintains itself while resolving itself and 'dis-closing' itself into a plurality in order to find itself precisely there. A consideration of the Trinity shows that the 'one' of unity and plurality, thus understood, is an ontological ultimate, which may not be reduced to an abstract and merely apparently 'higher' unity and simplicity: it cannot be a hollow, lifeless identity. It would be theologically a heresy, and therefore ontologically an absurdity, to think that God would be really 'simpler' and hence more perfect, if there were [228] no real distinction of persons in God. There exists therefore a differentiation which is in itself a 'perfectio pura' and which must be taken into consideration from the very start of a theological understanding of being. It is not provisional, but something absolutely final, an ultimate of the self-communicating unity itself as such, which constitutes this unity itself: it does not half destroy, so to speak, this unity. Being as such, and hence as one (ens as unum), for the fulfilment[8] of its being and its unity, emerges into a plurality – of which the supreme mode is the Trinity. The distinct moments deriving from the 'one' which make for the perfection of its unity stem essentially, i.e. by their origin in and from another, from this most primary unity: they have therefore a more primary and basic 'agreement' with it than anything produced by efficient causality.

But this means that each being, as a unity, possesses a plurality-implying perfection – formed by the special derivativeness of the plural from the original unity: the plural is in agreement with its source in a way which corresponds to its origin, and hence is 'expression' of its origin by an agreement which it owes to its origin. Since this holds good for being in general, we may say that each being forms, in its own way, more or less perfectly according to its degree of being, something distinct from itself and yet one with itself, 'for' its own fulfilment. (Here unity and distinction are correlatives which increase in like proportions, not in inverse proportions which would reduce each to be contradictory and exclusive of the other.) And this differentiated being, which is still originally one, is in agreement because derivative, and because derivatively in agreement is expressive.

That that which is derivatively in agreement, and hence one with the origin while still distinct from it, must be considered as the 'expression' of the origin and of the primordial unity needs some further explanation. The agreement with its origin (by reason of its

[8] 'For fulfilment' can and must be in some cases (e.g. the Trinity) understood also as 'on account of its being perfect'. What is common to both cases is that the other which is constituted in an act of self-realization (actus, resultatio, processio) necessarily belongs to the perfection of the agent.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

derivation) of that which is constituted as different within the unity is at once, in a certain sense, the constitution of the derivative as an expression. For there is an agreement which is explained by the relation of being originated. We may therefore prescind from the question as to whether we must always consider such a derivation as the formal constitution of the agreement as such and hence whether we must always think of it formally as expression.

[229] Whether and when and why this is so in certain cases may be left without misgivings to a special ontology concerned with certain spheres. We shall meet such cases in the (second) theological consideration of the matter. But prescinding from this question, we may already affirm: every being as such possesses a plurality as intrinsic element of its significant unity; this plurality constitutes itself, by virtue of its origin from an original unity, as the way to fulfil the unity (or on account of the unity already perfect), in such a way that that which is originated and different is in agreement with its origin and hence has (at least in a 'specificative', if not always in a 'reduplicative' sense) the character of expression or 'symbol' with regard to its origin. But this brings us to the full statement of our first affirmation: being is of itself symbolic, because it necessarily 'expresses' itself. This affirmation needs some further explanation in the light of what has been said, and then its applicability to some well-known themes must be demonstrated.

Being expresses itself because it must realize itself through a plurality in unity. This plurality is often, and in many respects, an indication of finiteness and deficiency, but it can also be something positive, of which at least a 'trace' remains even in the plurality which is given formally with the finiteness of a being. The self-constitutive act whereby a being constitutes itself as a plurality which leads to its fulfilment or rather (in certain circumstances) which is a reality given with the perfection of the being, is however the condition of possibility of possession of self in knowledge and love. In tantum est ens cognoscens et cognitum, in quantum est ens actu. This statement also holds good of course if inverted: the degree of 'reditio completa in seipsum' is the indication of its degree of being. 'Being present to itself' is only another way of describing the actuality, that is, the intrinsic self-realization of the being. But then it follows that a being 'comes to itself' in its expression, in the derivative agreement of the differentiated which is preserved as the perfection of the unity. For realization as plurality and as possession of self cannot be disparate elements simply juxtaposed in a being, since possession of self (in knowledge and love) is not just an element, but the content of that which we call being (and hence self-realization). And it comes to itself in the measure in which it realizes itself by constituting a plurality.[9] But this means that each being – in as much as it has and realizes being – is itself [230] primarily 'symbolic'. It expresses itself and possesses itself by doing so. It gives itself away from itself into the 'other', and there finds itself in knowledge and love, because it is by constituting the inward 'other' that it comes to (or: from) its self-fulfilment, which is the presupposition or the act of being present to itself in knowledge and love.

A symbol is therefore not to be primarily considered as a secondary relationship between two different beings, which are given the function of indicating one another by a third, or by an observer who notes a certain agreement between them. The symbolic is not merely an intrinsic propriety of beings in so far as a being, to attain fulfilment, constitutes the differentiation which is retained in the unity, and which is in agreement with the original originating unity and so is its expression. A being is also 'symbolic' in itself because the harmonious expression, which it retains while constituting it as the 'other', is the way in [9] These considerations are not open to the objection that, if correct, they could deduce the Trinity from purely rational philosophical considerations. For their starting-point (which is not capable of proof by purely philosophical arguments) is that there is a plurality even in the supreme Being, without detriment to his unity. Hence our considerations presuppose the Trinity. They do not prove it, but use the knowledge of it given in revelation as the starting-point of ontological theological considerations. This is a perfectly legitimate method.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which it communicates itself to itself in knowledge and love. A being comes to itself by means of 'expression', in so far as it comes to itself at all. The expression, that is, the 'symbol' – as the word is now to be understood in the light of the foregoing considerations – is the way of knowledge of self, possession of self, in general.

This is the only starting-point from which one can arrive at a correct theory of the symbol in general, where the symbol is the reality in which another attains knowledge of a being. On strictly scholastic terms, knowledge of a being by another is not the process which only takes place in the knower, and hence depends only on his potency and actuality, being related to an 'object' which persists completely unaffected in its own proper reality. On the contrary, the knowability and the actual knowledge of a being (as object of knowledge) depend on the degree of actuality in the thing to be known itself: ens est cognitum et cognoscibile, in quantum ipsum est actu. But then it follows: if beings are of themselves symbolic, in so far as they realize themselves in a plurality, and possess themselves in this derivative agreement of the 'other' with its primordial origin, the same holds good for the knowledge of these beings by others. A being can be and is known, in so far as it is itself ontically (in itself) symbolic [231] because it is ontologically (for itself) symbolic. What then is the primordial meaning of symbol and symbolic, according to which each being is in itself and for itself symbolic, and hence (and to this extent) symbolic for another? It is this: as a being realizes itself in its own intrinsic 'otherness' (which is constitutive of its being), retentive of its intrinsic plurality (which is contained in its self-realization) as its derivative and hence congruous expression, it makes itself known. This derivative and congruous expression, constitutive of each being, is the symbol which comes in addition from the object of knowledge to the knower – in addition only, because already initially present in the depths of the grounds of each one's being. The being is known in this symbol, without which it cannot be known at all: thus it is symbol in the original (transcendental) sense of the word.

We must now confront the notion of symbol thus arrived at, with some well-known data of scholastic philosophy, so that it may be still more easily understood. It would call for too wide a sweep through the history of philosophy, if one were to try to illustrate what has been said by showing the whole extension of the concepts of eidos and morphe (in the philosophia perennis from the time of the Greeks to the classic age of scholastic philosophy). If we could follow these lines, it could be shown that the two extremes of this extension, the manifest, visible 'figure' on the one hand (eidos and morphe together), and the 'essence' which gives rise to the figure on the other hand, make up together the full sense of one concept. For how does the figure-forming essence of a being (material, to start with) constitute and perfect itself? It does so by really projecting its visible figure outside itself as its – symbol, its appearance, which allows it to be there, which brings it out to existence in the world: and in doing so, it retains it – 'possessing itself in the other'. The essence is there for itself and for others precisely through its appearance – in the 'analogous' measure, of course, in which a being is there for itself and for others according to its own measure of being.

A deeper understanding of Thomist ontology is then possible. For it is clear that St Thomas[10] recognizes the most diverse forms of the 'self-realization' of a being, which cannot be subsumed under the denomination of transitive efficient causality. The notion of causa formalis must be mentioned at once in this context. The 'form' gives itself away from itself by imparting itself to the material cause. It does not work on it [232] subsequently and 'from outside', by bringing about in it something different from itself and alien to its essence. The 'effect' is the 'cause' itself, in so far as the cause itself is the reality, the 'act' of the material cause, which is becoming its own 'potency'. But when the formal cause is such, it is not simply such as it must be considered to be previous to its actual formal causality. For there [10] For the following, see K. Rahner, Geist in Welt[2] (Munich 1957).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

are, according to St Thomas, 'forms' which are not exhausted in their formal causality, because they are not completely 'poured out' on their matter; their primordiality is still 'reserved'. Hence not every form realizes its being by emptying itself fully and giving itself as act away to the other that consumes it (the 'materia prima'). The difference between form and its actual formal causality need not be merely mental, even though this difference cannot be thought of in the same way as that between a substance conceived of as static (having already come to be from its formal causes) and its accidental 'second' act. The giving of the form by the formal cause, the 'formatio actualis' of the potency by the (substantial) form, 'brings about' that which is formed, the actual thing (where it does not matter to us here what forms this process takes, once we distinguish between the dimension of substance and the formally quantitative being in time and space). This external manifestation of the substantial form or cause is indeed, according to the basic doctrines of scholasticism just alluded to, different from the form as such. But it still manifests this basic form in this very difference: it is a symbol which is created by that which is symbolized as its own self-realization. In this differentiated 'symbol' that which is symbolized is present, the form itself (creating the 'ontological-symbolic' difference between symbolic reality and symbolic representation), since it brings about the 'other' which it forms, in as much as it imparts to it the reality which the form itself has.

But apart from the concept of formal causality, there are other concepts of Thomist ontology which belong to the sphere of the self-realization which is a self-proclamation and hence – in the broadest but original sense – constitutive of a symbol. Here the concept of 'resultance' should be noted. St Thomas does not merely think of a finite being as a reality simply complete, constituted by God in its essence and faculties. He does not merely see it as a passive and static reality, which then sets a number of accidental acts, of an immanent or transitive nature, which emanate indeed from the substance by efficient causality and to this extent 'determine' it, but leave it untouched in its inner nature. He also recognizes an [233] inner self-realization of the total essence itself (dependent of course on the creative activity of God), prior to its accidental 'second' acts: a self-realization which objectively and conceptually, according to St Thomas, cannot be simply reduced to formal and material causality, as this is usually understood in the traditional philosophy of the schools – and can still less be subsumed under the categories of the ordinary (second) 'activity'. Thus St Thomas recognizes, for instance, a 'resultance', an 'out-flowing' of the faculties from the substance. Thus for him the essence as a whole builds itself up – for the faculties belong to the totality of the essence, in spite of their being accidents; the substantial kernel emanates into its faculties and only thus attains its own possibilities; it finds itself – since it must be spiritual etc. by projecting from itself the 'otherness' of its faculties, which according to St Thomas is really distinct from the substance.

It does not follow at once from the fact that the 'other' results within the unity of the same being, for the achievement of the essence, that we have in it an intrinsic and connatural symbol as a moment of the self-realization of the being in question, or at any rate, we shall not pursue the thought further now. It is enough to have proved, from the theory of the emanation and 'resultance' of a faculty, a power, an accident, that the starting-point for our proffered theory of the symbol is perfectly Thomist. We shall only pursue this line of thought in one direction. According to St Thomas, we must also suppose the process of 'resultance' in the formation of a given quantity as such (with spatially limited dimensions) and as vehicle of other qualitative proprieties in a material being. When the substantial 'form' – 'pouring itself out' – gives itself to materia prima (which is the ontological basis of spatiality, though itself without any determinate dimensions), the determinate quantity is brought about in this communication, really distinct from the substance (composed of forma substantialis and materia prima) and from the reality which comes from it. This quantity, which today we would call the given, concrete spatio-temporality, or spatio-temporal figure, with its further given qualitative determinations (which are however based on this spatio-temporality), is, according to St Thomas, to be definitely taken as the 'species',[11] the outward form, aspect and figure, which the basic substance [234] provides for itself, to fulfil itself, to 'express' itself and to manifest itself thus. The 'species' of the material thing is undoubtedly the symbol - brought about by the essence, retained with the efficient cause in a differentiated unity, constituting the necessary 'communication' of the self-realization – in which the material being possesses itself and presents itself to view, in the varying forms proper to its being. In the case of the species of material things, we have in St Thomas – on this definite level of being and with the presuppositions which it entails – all the elements which we have worked out for the original concept of symbol in a more general ontology of multiple beings; the formation of the symbol as a self-realization of the thing symbolized itself, the fact that the symbol belongs intrinsically to what is expressed; self-realization by means of the constitution of this expression springing from the essence. There is another doctrine in scholasticism which can also be adduced to confirm the concept of symbol given above, of which we shall speak more fully in another context: it is the doctrine which holds that the soul is the 'form' of the body, the body being the expression of the basic spiritual reality of man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To sum up and propound once more the results arrived at up to this, we may invert the first assertion which we put forward as the fundamental principle of an ontology of the symbol, by affirming as a second assertion:

2. The symbol strictly speaking (symbolic reality) is the self-realization of a being in the other, which is constitutive of its essence.

Where there is such a self-realization in the other – as the necessary mode of the fulfilment of its own essence – we have a symbol of the being in question. One might ask for whom does this self-realization in the other express the being and make it present, and who possesses the being in such a symbol – the being in question itself or another; one might ask in what (essentially different) degrees and in what ways this self-realization in the symbol and this presence are realized, in a self-discovery which is really knowledge and love or in a way relatively deficient compared to this. But these are secondary questions which, in comparison with these two first principles, enquire into distinctions which are secondary in relation to this general ontology of the symbol. They arise because the concept of a being is 'analogous', that is, it displays the various types of self-realization of each being, and being in itself, and hence also the concept and reality of the symbol are flexible. But because these are necessarily given with the general concept of beings and being – as the [235] 'unveiled' figure of the most primordial 'truth' of being – the symbol shares this 'analogia entis' with being which it symbolizes.

II. ON THE THEOLOGY OF SYMBOLIC REALITY

If what has been said up to this is correct, it is only to be expected that no theology can be complete without also being a theology of the symbol, of the appearance and the expression, of self-presence in that which has been constituted as the other. And in fact the whole of theology is incomprehensible if it is not essentially a theology of symbols, although in general very little attention is paid, systematically and expressly, to this basic characteristic. And again: since a simple listing of dogmatic assertions throughout the whole field of [11] The theologian is most familiar with the word from its use in the theology of the Eucharist, where this terminology has also become part of the vocabulary of the magisterium (Denz. 626, 676, 698, 876, 884, etc.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theology shows how much need it has of the concept of symbol and how much it uses it (no doubt in the most diverse acceptations and applications), the necessity of our general ontological considerations is confirmed once more from another direction.

We shall of course have to be content with a few indications. The attentive reader, especially if trained in theology, will not have failed to remark that the thought of the mystery of the Trinity was the constant background of the ontological considerations. The freedom of our method has already allowed us to appeal expressly to this mystery. We used it to show that a plurality in a being is not necessarily to be considered as a pointer to finiteness and imperfection, and that therefore a general ontology – which only speaks of beings strictly as such – may very properly start from the fact that each being bears within itself an intrinsic plurality, without detriment to its unity and perfection – which may eventually be supreme – precisely as the perfection of its unity. Hence an ontology confined to a particular field and likewise a theology may well ask what this means with regard to the symbolic nature of individual beings.

When we were working out the ontology of the symbol, we took no great pains to formulate it so that it would be immediately applicable to the theology of the Trinity in blameless orthodoxy. Even now we shall not try to establish expressly the convergence of this ontology and the theology of the Trinity (especially the theology of the Logos). It is enough for our purpose to point out very simply that the theology of the Logos is strictly a theology of the symbol, and indeed the supreme form of it, if we keep to the meaning of the word which we have already worked out, and do not give the term quite derivative meanings, such as the [236] ordinary language of popular speech attributes to it. The Logos is the 'word' of the Father, his perfect 'image', his 'imprint', his radiance, his self-expression. Whatever answer is to be given to the question of how binding the psychological theory of the Trinity, as put forward by St Augustine, may be – whether the Father utters the eternal Word because he knows himself or in order to know himself, two items at any rate must be retained. One, the Word – as reality of the immanent divine life – is 'generated' by the Father as the image and expression of the Father. Two, this process is necessarily given with the divine act of self-knowledge, and without it the absolute act of divine self-possession in knowledge cannot exist. But if we retain these two elements, which are traditional in theology – not to give them a higher qualification – then we may and must say without misgivings: the Father is himself by the very fact that he opposes to himself the image which is of the same essence as himself, as the person who is other than himself, and so he possesses himself. But this means that the Logos is the 'symbol' of the Father, in the very sense which we have given the word: the inward symbol which remains distinct from what is symbolized, which is constituted by what is symbolized, where what is symbolized expresses itself and possesses itself. We omit the question of what this means – prior to a theology of the Incarnation – for the understanding of the Father and his relation to the world. If, following a theological tradition which began only since St Augustine, one simply takes it for granted that each of the divine persons could set up, each for himself, his own hypostatic relationship to a given reality in the world and so could 'appear', then the fact that within the divinity the Logos is the image of the Father would give the Logos no special character of symbol for the world, which would be due to him alone on account of his relationship of origin to the Father. The Father could also reveal himself and 'appear' without reference, so to speak, to the Son. But if one does not make this pre-supposition with St Augustine, which has no clear roots in the earlier tradition[12] and still less in Scripture, one need have no difficulty in thinking that the [12] Here the opposite opinion was practically unanimously held. Cf. e.g. M. Schmaus, Die psychologische Trinitätslehre des hl. Augustin (Münster 1927) 20 ff.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Word's being symbol of the Father has significance for God's action ad extra, in spite of such action being common to all three persons.

It is because God 'must' 'express' himself inwardly that he can also utter himself outwardly; the finite, created utterance ad extra is a continuation [237] of the immanent constitution of 'image and likeness' – a free continuation, because its object is finite – and takes place in fact 'through' the Logos (Jn 1:3), in a sense which cannot be determined more closely here. But it is not our intention to go into this difficult subject here. But it has to be mentioned, even if only in passing, because we could hardly omit this link between a symbolic reality within and without the divine, since it has also been noted to some extent in tradition.

If a theology of symbolic realities is to be written, Christology, the doctrine of the incarnation of the Word, will obviously form the central chapter. And this chapter need almost be no more than an exegesis of the saying: 'He that sees me, sees the Father' (Jn 14:9). There is no need to dwell here on the fact that the Logos is image, likeness, reflexion, representation, and presence – filled with all the fullness of the Godhead. But if this is true, we can understand the statement: the incarnate word is the absolute symbol of God in the world, filled as nothing else can be with what is symbolized. He is not merely the presence and revelation of what God is in himself. He is also the expressive presence of what – or rather, who – God wished to be, in free grace, to the world, in such a way that this divine attitude, once so expressed, can never be reversed, but is and remains final and unsurpassable.

But there are some comments to be made on the generally accepted dogmatic teaching which is here presupposed. They have not the same degree of certainty in theology, but they seem necessary if we are to have a proper understanding of the Incarnation in a theology of the symbol. If we simply say: the Logos took on a human nature, considering this defined doctrine of faith as the adequate expression of what is meant by the dogma of the incarnation (though such a description of the hypostatic union makes no such claim), the full sense of the symbolic reality, which the humanity of the Logos represents with regard to the Logos, is given no clear expression. For if the humanity which is assumed is considered only as that well-known reality which we know in ourselves, and which is only very generally 'image and likeness' of God; and if this humanity is supposed only to subsist in a static, ontic sense, that is, as 'borne' and 'taken on' by the Logos: then the humanity has no doubt the function of a signal or a uniform with regard to the Logos, but not in full truth the function of such a symbol as we have developed above. The Logos would make himself audible and perceptible through a reality which was of itself alien to him, had intrinsically and essentially nothing [238] to do with him, and could have been chosen at random from a whole series of such realities. No matter how close we consider the union between the speaker and his means of communication – the union is in fact hypostatic – it would not change the fact that the sign and that which is signified are really disparate, and that the sign could therefore only be an arbitrary one. Or we could put it more exactly: the assumed humanity would be an organ of speech substantially united to him who is to be made audible: but it would not be this speech itself. It itself would only tell something about – itself, it could only tell about the Word in so far as the Word used it to form words and direct actions which would divulge something about the word by their meaning and their marvellous quality. It is not surprising that a theology with these unavowed, unconscious but effective presuppositions should in the concrete make Jesus the revelation of the Father and his inward life only through his doctrine but not through what he is in his human nature. In such a position, the most that could come in question would be a revelation by means of his (virtuous) actions.

To continue on these lines, and to give greater clarity to the inexhaustible content of the truth of faith which expresses the incarnation, one could take up here the Thomistic doctrine, that the humanity of Christ exists by the existence of the Logos. But when putting forward

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this thesis, one should be clear that this existence of the Word is again not to be thought of as the reality which – merely because of its being infinite – could bestow existence on any thinkable 'essence', as if it could offer any essence a ground of existence which in itself was indifferent to this essence rather than that or to which manner of existent being arose thereby. The being of the Logos – considered of course as that which is received by procession from the Father – must be thought of as exteriorizing itself, so that without detriment to its immutability in itself and of itself, it becomes itself in truth the existence of a created reality – which must in all truth and reality be predicated of the being of the Logos, because it is so. But then, starting from these Thomistic principles, we arrive at considerations and insights which show how truly and radically the humanity of Christ is really the 'appearance' of the Logos itself, its symbolic reality in the pre-eminent sense, not something in itself alien to the Logos and its reality, which is only taken up from outside like an instrument to make its own music but not strictly speaking to reveal anything of him who uses it. However, these considerations have already been put forward in an earlier chapter on the mystery of the incarnation. [239] We showed there that the humanity of Christ is not to be considered as something in which God dresses up and masquerades – a mere signal of which he makes use, so that something audible can be uttered about the Logos by means of this signal. The humanity is the self-disclosure of the Logos itself, so that when God, expressing himself, exteriorizes himself, that very thing appears which we call the humanity of the Logos. Thus anthropology itself is finally based on something more than the doctrine of the possibilities open to an infinite Creator – who would not however really betray himself when he created. Its ultimate source is the doctrine about God himself, in so far as it depicts that which 'appears' when in his self-exteriorization he goes out of himself into that which is other than he. However, we must refer to the earlier chapter for these considerations.

It follows from what has been said that the Logos, as Son of the Father, is truly, in his humanity as such, the revelatory symbol in which the Father enunciates himself, in this Son, to the world – revelatory, because the symbol renders present what is revealed. But in saying this, we are really only at the beginning of a theology of the symbol, in the light of the incarnation, not at the end. For in view of this truth, we should have to consider that the natural depth of the symbolic reality of all things – which is of itself restricted to the world or has a merely natural transcendence towards God – has now in ontological reality received an infinite extension by the fact that this reality has become also a determination of the Logos himself or of his milieu. Every God-given reality, where it has not been degraded to a purely human tool and to merely utilitarian purposes, states much more than itself: each in its own way is an echo and indication of all reality. If the individual reality, by making the all present, also speaks of God – ultimately by its transcendental reference to him as the efficient, exemplary and final cause – this transcendence is made radical, even though only in a way accessible to faith, by the fact that in Christ this reality no longer refers to God merely as its cause: it points to God as to him to whom this reality belongs as his substantial determination or as his own proper environment. All things are held together by the incarnate Word in whom they exist (Col 1.17), and hence all things possess, even in their quality of symbol, an unfathomable depth, which faith alone can sound. It would be well to explain all these abstract statements in detail, by applying them to individual realities – water, bread, hand, eye, sleep, hunger and countless other affairs of man and of the world which surrounds him, bears him up [240] and is referred to him – if one wished to know exactly what theology of symbolic reality is based on the truth that the Logos, as Word of the Father, expresses the Father in the 'abbreviation' of his human nature and constitutes the symbol which communicates him to the world.

When we say that the Church is the persisting presence of the incarnate Word in space and time, we imply at once that it continues the symbolic function of the Logos in the world. To understand this statement correctly, we must consider two points. One, where a reality which is to be proclaimed in symbol, is a completely human one, and so has its social and existential (freely-chosen) aspect, the fact that the symbol is of a social and hence juridically determined nature is no proof that the symbol is merely in the nature of arbitrary sign and representation, and not a reality symbolic in itself. Where a free decision is to be proclaimed by the symbol and to be made in it, the juridical composition and the free establishment is precisely what is demanded by the very nature of a symbolic reality in this case and what is to be expected. A non-existential reality cannot express itself in this free and juridically constituted way, where the symbol is likewise a symbolic reality which contains the reality of the thing symbolized itself, because it has realized itself by passing over into the 'otherness' of the symbol. This would be contrary to the nature of the non-existential reality. But exactly the opposite is true when it is a matter of something which has been freely constituted by God himself and which has a social structure. When such a reality renders itself present in a freely constituted symbolism formed on social and juridical lines, the process is merely what its essence demands and is no objection to the presence of a symbolic reality.[13] But the Church, even as a reality tributary [241] to the Spirit, is a free creation of the redemptive act of Christ and is a social entity. When therefore it is constituted along juridically established lines, the result does not contradict the fact that it is the symbolic reality of the presence of Christ, of his definitive work of salvation in the world and so of the redemption. Secondly, according to the Church's own teaching, especially as voiced by Leo XIII and Pius XII, the Church is not merely a social and juridical entity. The grace of salvation, the Holy Spirit himself, is of its essence. But this is to affirm that this symbol of the grace of God really contains what it signifies; that it is the primary sacrament[14] of the grace of God, which does not merely designate but really possesses what was brought definitively into the world by Christ: the irrevocable, eschatological grace of God which conquers triumphantly the guilt of man. The Church as indefectible, as Church of infallible truth and as Church of the sacraments, as opus operatum and as indestructibly holy as a whole, even in the subjective grace of men – by which it is not merely object but even motive of faith – really constitutes the full symbol of the fact that Christ has remained there as triumphant mercy.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The teaching on the sacraments is the classic place in which a theology of the symbol is put forward in general in Catholic theology. The sacraments make concrete and actual, for the life of the individual, the symbolic reality of the Church as the primary sacrament and therefore constitute at once, in keeping with the nature of this Church a symbolic reality. Thus the sacraments are expressly described in theology as 'sacred signs' of God's grace that is as, 'symbols', an expression which occurs expressly in this context.[15] The basic axioms of sacramental theology are well known: Sacramenta efficiunt quod significant et significant [13] A profane example: when two spouses say their Yes before the legitimate authority (ecclesiastical or civil), this external, freely spoken word, which is to be uttered with certain formalities, is the symbolic reality. It is not a subsequent and extrinsic sign, which merely refers from outside to the 'thing' (the inward consent). The consent is given in the audible expression, so much so, that the intended effect (the permanent marriage bond) cannot be realized without this audible expression. The expression and the thing expressed really are related here like body and soul. They form an inner unity, where both elements are interdependent, though each in its own way. Still, this symbol, under which the thing symbolized is realized and made present, is something freely and juridically constituted. Hence whether a 'signum' (arbitraruim) is a symbolic reality or the merely extrinsic representational symbol of a reality, cannot be decided by the mere fact that it is 'arbitrary'. This characteristic can actually be demanded by the nature of the thing symbolized, without detriment to the reality of the symbolism.

[14] Cf. O. Semmelroth, Die Kirche als Ursakrament (Frankfurt 1953). The Church is of course the 'primary' sacrament in relation to the single sacraments, not to Christ. Cf. K. Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments. Quaestiones Disputatae 9 (London & New York 1963).

[15] Cf. e.g. CIC Decret. Gratiani III de consecratione II, c. Sacrificium 32 (ed. Friedberg I, 1324).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

quod efficiunt. If these axioms are taken seriously, they point to that mutually supporting relationship which in our notion of the symbol intervenes between it and what is symbolized. Hence too in recent times theological efforts have been multiplied[16] which try to explain the causality of the sacraments in [242] terms of the symbol. Theologians try to show that the function of cause and the function of sign in the sacraments are not linked merely de facto by an extrinsic decree of God, but that they have an intrinsic connexion by virtue of the nature of things – here, their symbolic character, rightly understood. As God's work of grace on man is accomplished (incarnates itself), it enters the spatio-temporal historicity of man as sacrament, and as it does so, it becomes active with regard to man, it constitutes itself. For as soon as one sees the sacraments as the action of God on man – even though it takes place through someone who acts as 'minister' by divine mandate and gives body to the action done to man and so renders it concretely present and active – then the question no longer arises as to how the sacramental sign 'works on'[17] God, and it is no longer possible to ask whether this sign produces grace by 'physical' or 'moral' causality. For at no stage can the sign be seen apart from what is signified, since it in understood a priori as a symbolic reality, which the signified itself brings about in order to be really present itself. But we can on the other hand see that the sacrament is precisely 'cause' of grace, in so far as it is its 'sign' and that the grace – seen as coming from God – is the cause of the sign, bringing it about and so alone making itself present. So the old axioms receive their very pregnant sense; sacramenta gratiam efficiunt, quatenus eam significant – where this significatio is always to be understood in the strict sense as a symbolic reality. So too: sacramenta significant gratiam, quia eam efficiunt. In a word, the grace of God constitutes itself actively present in the sacraments by creating their expression, their historical tangibility in space and time, which is its own symbol. That the juridically established structure of the sacraments does not run counter to this view of the sacraments as symbolic realities has already been explained equivalently, when the same objection was eliminated in the question of the Church as symbolic reality of the grace of God.

Further indications of the prevalent structure of Christian reality as a unity of reality and its symbolic reality must be omitted here. They can only be presented adequately when the bodily reality of man, and so his acts in the dimensions of space and time, history and society, are conceived [243] of as symbolic realities embodying his person and its primordial decisions. This would be the real starting-point for reaching an understanding of the historically attainable life of the Church as symbolic embodiment of the Spirit of God and of the inner history of the dialogue between God's free love and human freedom. The result of this would be to show that no adequate treatise can be written 'De Gratia', unless it contributes to the theology of the symbol in the Christian history of salvation.

We call attention only in passing to the theology of the sacred image in Christianity.[18] An exact investigation into the history of this theology would no doubt have to call attention to a two-fold concept of image which is presented by tradition. One is more Aristotelian, and treats the image as an outward sign of a reality distinct from the image, a merely pedagogical indication provided for man as a being who knows through the senses. The other is more

---

[16] Cf. esp. H. Schillebeeckx, De sacramentale Heilseconomie (Antwerp 1952); 'Sakramente als Organe der Gottbegegnung', in Fragen der Theologie heute (Einsiedeln 1957) 379-401. L. Monden, 'Symbooloorzakelijkheid als eigen Causaliteit van het Sacrament', Bijdr. 13 (1952) 277-285.

[17] Where, for reasons that are good in themselves, one rejects a 'physical causality' (of instrumental type), one soon finds oneself embarrassed. In the ordinary notion of the relationship between sign and grace, the sign almost necessarily becomes a 'titulus juris' to grace with regard to God: it becomes a sort of 'causality' of the sacramental action directed towards God.

[18] For the literature on the distinction which is only outlined here, cf. A. Grillmeier, Der Logos am Kreuz (Munich 1956) and LTK II^2, 458-460, 461-467 and note 3 above.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Platonic, and in this concept the image participates in the reality of the exemplar – brings about the real presence of the exemplar which dwells in the image. The ultimate reason why theological explanation of the image can vary so widely is the principle which we have already adduced; that there are in fact 'symbols', images, which are of the nature which is ascribed to sacred images in a more strongly Platonist theology. The only question is whether sacred images in the strict sense – statues and pictures – may be explained without more ado in terms of the symbol of the primordial type which we have discussed; or whether such images belong to the class of derivative and secondary symbols, which of course exist, as a result of relatively arbitrary arrangements and conventions. The question is further complicated by the fact that the images which portray the incarnate Logos and his saints – in contrast to God the Father, the 'invisible', and to some extent the angels – depict the human body, of which we shall have to say later that it is the natural symbol of man. It is not surprising therefore that ancient theology and that of the Byzantine Church should also have made this distinction between God the Father or the Trinity and the incarnate Logos when justifying the use of images, and did not consider everything as equally capable of being portrayed. However, we cannot go into this here. This set of questions was recalled only to indicate that a theology [244] of symbols could find in the Greek theology of images support and confirmation for its more general considerations.

It might be thought that eschatology would be the part of theology which treated of the final disappearance of the sign and hence of the symbol, in favour of a naked immediacy of God with regard to the creature – 'face to face'. But this would once more be a position – this time with regard to eschatology – in which the symbol is considered as an extrinsic and accidental intermediary, something really outside the reality transmitted through it, so that strictly speaking the thing could be attained even without the symbol. But this presupposition is false, and it is still false with regard to eschatology. For the true and proper symbol, being an intrinsic moment of the thing itself has a function of mediation which is not at all opposed in reality to the immediacy of what is meant by it, but is a mediation to immediacy, if one may so formulate the actual facts of the matter. In the end, of course, many signs and symbols will cease to be; the institutional Church, the sacraments in the usual sense, the whole historical succession of manifestations through which God continually imparts himself to man, while he still travels far from the immediacy of God's face, among images and likenesses. But the humanity of Christ will have eternal significance for the immediacy of the visio beata.[19] The incarnation of the Logos may well be considered as the indispensable presupposition for strictly supernatural grace and glory,[20] so that the gracious freedom of God with regard to these two realities does indeed remain, but remains a freedom. And the dependence of the self-communication of God to the created spirit in glory with regard to the incarnation does not indicate a merely moral relationship, arising from the fact that the incarnate Logos once 'merited' this glory for us in time. The relationship is a real and permanent ontological one. If we accept this proposition (which cannot be propounded more fully now), it implies that what has been affirmed of the symbolic function of the incarnate Logos as Logos and man, also holds good for the perfected existence of man, for his eschata. Eschatology also teaches us about the symbolic reality which conveys to us the immediacy of God at the end; the Word which became flesh. [245] We sum up the result of this second stage of our considerations in some affirmations:

[19] Cf. K. Rahner, 'The eternal significance of the humanity of Jesus for our relationship with God' in Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore, 1967); J. Alfaro, 'Cristo Revelador del Padre', Greg. 39 (1958) 222-270.

[20] This statement cannot of course be demonstrated here. We ask the reader simply to accept it as at least a possible theological proposition.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. The principle that the concept of symbol – in the sense defined in nos. 1 and 2 – is an essential key-concept in all theological treatises, without which it is impossible to have a correct understanding of the subject-matter of the various treatises in themselves and in relation to other treatises.
4. The principle that God's salvific action on man, from its first foundations to its completion, always takes place in such a way that God himself is the reality of salvation,[21] because it is given to man and grasped by him[22] in the symbol, which does not represent an absent and merely promised reality but exhibits this reality as something present, by means of the symbol formed by it.

III. THE BODY AS SYMBOL OF MAN[23]

This preliminary draft and outline sketch of a possible theology of the symbol in general is still to be completed by some considerations on the body as the symbolic reality of man, in keeping with the general theme of [246] which the theology of the symbol forms part. It is not the intention of this essay to investigate the relationship between the heart of the God-man and his love. This question concerns directly the meaning of the word 'heart' in devotion to the Sacred Heart, and the dogmatic enquiry into the object of this devotion. Hence it lies outside the scope of this essay. But in a general theology of the symbol which is meant to be a preparation for a theology of devotion to the heart of Jesus, we may be allowed to say something more explicit about the theology of the body as symbol of man. These considerations will bring us automatically to the threshold of the real theology of devotion to [21] Here we need not dwell on the fact that all mysteries of salvation in the really strict sense, and hence salvation itself, always consist of a self-communication of God by a type of quasi-formal causality, in contrast to the efficient causality whereby God creates ex nihilo sui et subjecti something distinct from himself. So in the hypostatic union, in uncreated grace (which in alone grace attains its true being, though sanctifying grace also implies in its concept a 'created' grace: cf. K. Rahner, Schriften zur Theologie I[3] [Einsiedeln 1958] 347-375: 'Zur scholastischen Begrifflichkeit der ungeschaffenen Gnade'. English translation, 'Some Implications of the scholastic concept of Uncreated Grace' in Theological Investigations I (London & Baltimore, Md. 1961) 319-346), and in the quasi-formal causality which the divine essence exerts in the visio beata on the spirit of man (as quasi-species impressa).

[22] The free acceptance by the spirit of man is also a totally human act, which is therefore also a bodily one and hence also takes place in the symbol; and so the act is also historical and social and hence also 'ecclesial'.

[23] Some bibliographical references from the most recent literature on the subject: L. Klages, Grundlegung der Wissenschaft vom Ausdruck (Leipzig [5]1936). Ph. Lersch, Gesicht und Seele (Munich 1932). A Gehlen, Der Mensch. Seine Natur u.s. Stellung in d. Welt (Bonn [4]1950). H. Plessner, Lachen und Weinen. Eine Untersuchung nach den Grenzen menschlichen Verhaltens (Sammlung Dalp 54, Berne [2]1950). A. Wenzl, Das Leib-Seele-Problem im Lichte der neueren Theorien der physischen und seelischen Wirklichkeit (Munich 1933). M. Picard, Das Menschengesicht (Munich [3]1929); Grenzen der menschlichen Physionomie (Zurich-Leipzig 1937). V. Poucel, Mystique de la terre, vol. 1, Plaidoyer pour le corps (Le Puy 1937). J. Bernhart, J. Schröteler, H. Muckermann, J. Ternus, Vom Wert des Leibes in Antike, Christentum und Anthropologie (Salzburg 1936). K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich 1941) 175-189; the same, Geist in Welt (Munich [2]1957); the same, Theological Investigations II (London & Baltimore, Md. 1963), 265-281, and III (London & Baltimore, Md. 1967) 'Priest and Prophet' sections 1 & 2, and '"Behold this heart": Preliminaries'. B. Welte, Die Leiblichkeit des Menschen als Hinweis auf das christliche Heil: Beuroner Hochschulwoche 1948 (Freiburg 1949) 77-109. M. Reding, 'Person, Individuum und Leiblichkeit', Tüb. Th. Quartalschrift 129 (1949) 195-203. W. Brugger, 'Die Verleiblichung des Wollens', Schol. 25 (1950) 248-253. G. Trapp, 'Humanae animae competit uniri corpori (S. Th. I, q. 51, a lc). Uberlegungen zu einer Philosophie des menschlichen Ausdrucks' Schol. 27 (1952) 382-399. L. Binswanger, Grundformen und Erkenntnis des menschlichen Daseins (Zürich [2]1952). G. Siewerth, Der Mensch und sein Leib (Einsiedeln 1953). W. Stählin, Vom Sinn des Leibes (Stuttgart [3]1953). Anima 9 (1954) 97-142, special number on the body. C. Tresmontant, Biblisches Denken und hellenische Überlieferung (Düsseldorf 1956) 62-77. J. B. Metz, 'Zur Metaphysik der menschlichen Leiblichkeit', Arzt und Christ 4 (1958) 78-84.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the heart of Jesus. This third part of our considerations takes up a subject which is a relatively minor part of the subject-matter already treated, and which has been touched on already, at least implicitly. But the attention given to this special subject is demanded or at least justified by the general theme of the book.

That the body can and may be considered as the symbol, that is, as the symbolic reality of man, follows at once from the Thomist doctrine that the soul is the substantial form of the body. When we do not take just any scholastic doctrine on the relationship of soul and body – all scholastics affirm, along with the Council of Vienna, that the soul is 'form' – but the strictly Thomist one, then the above affirmation is clear. For if we ascribe to the body an actual being, a positive content, which is prior to the reality of the soul, it would be impossible to see why this bodily entity should be still the expression and so the symbol of the soul. At best, we could call 'expression' what the soul, by means of its 'information', [247] makes of this prior entity which perseveres in its previous reality. At the very most, something in the body could be symbol of the soul, but not the body as such and as a whole. But man, strictly speaking, according to the clear doctrine of Thomism, is not composed of a soul and a body, but of a soul and materia prima. And this matter is of itself the strictly potential substratum of the substantial self-realization of the 'anima' (which is its 'in-formation' in the metaphysical sense), which by imparting itself thus gives its reality to the passive possibility of materia prima, so that anything that is act (and reality) in this potentiality is precisely the soul. It follows at once that what we call body is nothing else than the actuality of the soul itself in the 'other' of materia prima, the 'otherness' produced by the soul itself, and hence its expression and symbol in the very sense which we have given to the term symbolic reality. This is not the place to defend this Thomist concept, which alone can guarantee the strict unity of man and the real humanness of his body, against the empirical objections which seem to prove that the material reality of the body has a greater degree of independence and a proper reality less tributary to the soul. But the 'forma corporis' is polyvalent with regard to the accidental determinations of the body. Hence which precise possibilities of its own the soul realizes may well depend on the prior determinations of the concrete matter, precisely when all the determinations of the actual body are constituted by the soul. Once this is understood, one will see no insuperable objection in the ordinary difficulties brought up against the doctrine of the 'anima unica forma corporis'. Hence we may formulate in our theory of symbols:

5. The principle that the body is the symbol of the soul, in as much as it is formed as the self-realization of the soul, though it is not adequately this, and the soul renders itself present and makes its 'appearance' in the body which is distinct from it.

A genuinely Thomist natural philosophy would however have to complete this strictly axiomatic statement by adding an essential complement, which is important in our particular context. We could formulate this addition as the sixth principle of our set of themes: in this unity of symbol and thing symbolized, constituted by soul and body, the individual parts of the body are more than mere pieces put together quantitatively to form the whole body; they are rather parts in so special a way that they also comprise in themselves the whole, though this is not true in the same strict way of each of the individual parts.

[248] This supplementary statement must be explained to some extent. To make its understanding easier, there are several points which may be made. It is well known that in every human expression, mimetic, phonetic etc. in nature, the whole man is somehow present and expressing himself, though the expressive form is confined to start with to one portion of the body. Medical science which is concerned with the whole man, even when it does not try precisely to be 'psychosomatic', knows that it is never merely a particular organ that is sick, but always the whole man, so that the condition of the whole man is manifested in an organically localized illness, just as it is also to some extent determined by the illness. This is so true, that in psychogenic illnesses of the body, the most diverse illnesses of different organs can substitute vicariously for one another. It has always been more or less clearly known that the axiom: the part is only understandable in the whole, and the whole is in each part, was true above all of the human body. The axiom is represented even in Scripture, 1 Cor 12.12-26. In the light of this immediate experience, the scholastic doctrine, that the soul is fully present in each part of the body, being simple, comes to have a fuller and deeper meaning. It is not just that the simple substantial principle of a quantitatively extended entity must inevitably be as a whole in every part of this entity. The assertion also means that this substantial 'presence' of the soul implies that it determines and informs each part as part of the whole. And this once more cannot merely mean that the part is ordained, as regards its physiological function, to the service of the whole. It also implies that in a mysterious concentration of the symbolic function of the body, each part bears once more within itself the symbolic force and function of the whole, by contributing its part to the whole of the symbol.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But this propriety of each part of the body must be placed squarely in the perspective of its ontological origin: it must be seen as coming from the originating principle of the body and its parts in their unity and arrangement, that is, from the soul. And this 'soul' once more must not be understood – quite unscholastically – as a fragmentary portion of the whole man. It is the one originating source of the whole man, which explicitates itself in what we know as 'powers', faculties and acts of the soul (understood now empirically in the concrete), and which expresses itself in what we call the body of man (understood as animated by the soul). And this prior ontological unity of the whole man also appears in each part of the body; as the unity unfolds, it projects its proper manifestation, [249] its symbol, into the part in question and thus possesses itself there as a whole, though not totally. This symbolic relationship of the part of the body to the original whole, from which the part derives, may vary in intensity in different parts of the body, but it can never be entirely absent wherever a given part is substantially informed by the soul. No doubt a material reality is either informed by the spiritual soul or it is not: from the purely abstract viewpoint, the actuation is 'in indivisibili'. Yet differences clearly exist in the various 'parts' (organs, etc.) of the body with regard to their power of expression, their degree of belonging to the soul, their openness to the soul. We may therefore say that the organs privileged in this respect are those which according to the data of empirical observation are of irreplaceable value for the survival and perfection of the whole. It is a moot point whether biological and physiological necessity corresponds to symbolic function in like degree in the various parts, and the question is probably to be answered in the negative. But a proper answer would call for very difficult researches and considerations, involving questions of historical evolutionary descent, which cannot be undertaken here. But if we are right in what we said about the presence of the whole in the part and therefore about the symbolic function of the part, then we are also justified in saying that a word used to designate part of the human body (head, heart, breast, hand) in a symbolic sense, does not signify only the part as such, that is, as a quantitative, material piece of the whole body: it always signifies the one whole, composed of the symbol-generating origin and the material piece of reality which, as portion of the whole, single and symbolic body, bears within it under a certain aspect the symbolic function of the whole body.[24]

All discussion of the object and meaning of devotion to the heart of Jesus should take place in the perspective of a theology of symbolic reality. Such a theology has not yet been written, and the foregoing considerations do not replace it. Their only aim was to show – and this has [24] That is why we have tried to define the whole matter in hand in an analysis of the nature of the 'primary word'. Cf. K. Rahner, Theological Investigations III (London & Baltimore, Md. 1967); Mission and Grace III (London & New York 1966) 193-210.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perhaps been achieved in spite of their brevity and other defects – that such a theology of Christian symbolism could and should be written, because reality in general and above all, Christian reality is essentially and [250] from its origin a reality to whose self-constitution the 'symbol' necessarily belongs. There may be still a long way to go from such an insight to the full understanding of the devotion to the heart of Jesus. But it would be a way which would lead to a deeper understanding of this devotion.

We refer in conclusion to one more point, which may help to show how directly the ideas here put forward are connected with a theology of devotion to the heart of Jesus, no matter how much is still to be done in detail for the exploitation of the general theology of the symbol.

A large number of present-day theologians determine the object of devotion to the heart of Jesus as follows. They presuppose 'a broader but proper sense of the word heart' in general, and then take it that the word designates 'the whole subject of the inner life' (including in fact the bodily heart), the 'cor ethicum', the 'principium fontale et subjectivum vitae interioris moralis' (so Lempl, Noldin, Donat, Lercher, Solano, etc.). Hence these theologians often reject the idea that the bodily heart of Christ is revered in so far as it is the 'symbol' of the love of Christ (as Nilles, Franzelin, Billot, Pesch, Galtier, Pohle-Gierens, Scheeben, etc., put it, in contrast to the other concept of heart). This older view – whether it means that the bodily heart is revered because it is the symbol of the love of Christ, or that the love of Christ is adored 'under' the symbol of the heart of Christ – involves, according to Solano, etc., a division of the single object of the devotion to the heart of Jesus, as it is found in fact in the practice of piety and as it is expressed in the teachings of the magisterium. The unity of the object is said to be saved only by over-subtle explanations.

Hence the first-named group of theologians reject more or less definitely the expression, that the heart is the symbol of the love of Christ. So for instance Solano, who does so most clearly.[25] But then this view is confronted with a difficulty; even the most recent pronouncements of the magisterium have no difficulty in speaking of the heart as the 'symbol' (so 'Haurietis aquas'). Hence Solano is forced to explain; 'Encyclica "Haurietis aquas" terminologiam "Symboli" quidem conservat, nec tamen putamus hoc magisterii documentum subtiliorem hanc questionem voluisse tangere, quae et solum modum concipiendi spectat et a recentissimis auctoribus diversimode iudicatur' ('The Encyclical retains the term "symbol", but we [251] do not think this document of the magisterium wished to deal with the more subtle question involved here, which has to do only with the manner in which it is understood and which is solved in different ways by modern authors'). There is no great objection, from the point of view of the formal principles of interpreting documents of the magisterium, to this way of solving the difficulty in Solano's position, which is supported by serious arguments, by the texts of the ecclesiastical devotion to the heart of Jesus, and by recent authors. But it is a pity that one should feel bound to come into conflict, apparently at least, with the terminology of the Encyclical, for the sake of this good position. In reality, the apparent contradiction arises only from the fact that Lercher, Solano etc. consider only the concept of symbol where the symbol and the thing symbolized are only extrinsically ordained to one another. But if one presupposes the concept of symbol as it has been developed in these pages, and applies it to the (bodily) heart of Jesus, it follows at once that one can accept the position of Lercher, Solano, etc., and still have no difficulty in speaking of the 'heart' as a symbol, as the Encyclical does. In a real theology of the symbol, based on the fundamental truths of Christianity, a symbol is not something separate from the symbolized (or different, but really or mentally united with the symbolized by a mere process

[25] Cf. Patres S. J. . . . in Hispania Professores, Sacrae Theologiae Summa III (Madrid [3]1956) 224f. (n. 542f.); 237 (n. 566).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of addition), which indicates the object but does not contain it. On the contrary, the symbol is the reality, constituted by the thing symbolized as an inner moment of moment of itself, which reveals and proclaims the thing symbolized, and is itself full of the thing symbolized, being its concrete form of existence. If this concept of symbol is presupposed, then 'heart' means exactly what the authors in question mean by their broader but still proper concept; the inner centre of the person, which realizes itself and expresses itself in the bodily existence. And one can still describe the bodily heart as symbol of the whole (since it is an inner element of this whole) and hence retain the terminology of the Encyclical. When understood in a sense which it does not impose but still leaves free, it is quite adequate to the matter it deals with.

We note on the other hand that in medieval tradition and in St Margaret Mary, 'heart' is used spontaneously in the broad sense; it does not designate simply the 'bodily heart', nor does it designate simply the 'inwardness' of Christ in the metaphorical sense. It is used as a 'primordial word' of religious speech, and signifies from the start the unity of both – a unity which has not to be created subsequently, as when an object is [252] linked to a sign exterior to it as its symbolic representation. The unity is more original than the distinction, because the symbol is a distinct and yet intrinsic moment of the reality as it manifests itself. But then this older terminology is perfectly justified by the ontological and theological considerations which we have put forward. And this is the only way by which devotion to the heart of Jesus can escape the otherwise fatal question, as to why one cannot revere the love of Christ, to which one has after all immediate access, without making a special effort to think expressly of the 'bodily heart'. Reality and its appearance in the flesh are for ever one in Christianity, inconfused and inseparable. The reality of the divine self-communication creates for itself its immediacy by constituting itself present in the symbol, which does not divide as it mediates but unites immediately, because the true symbol is united with the thing symbolized, since the latter constitutes the former as its own self-realization. This basic structure of all Christianity, which a theology of the symbol should investigate, is found once more in the devotion to the heart of Jesus, and is its perpetual justification.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[253]

10

THE WORD AND THE EUCHARIST

This investigation is entitled 'The Word and the Eucharist', meaning the question which is usually discussed under the more general heading of 'Word and Sacrament', and it is an invitation to treat the general question in the perspective of the sacrament of the altar. But the wider question and its solution cannot be simply taken as known. And the problems in question have only been given notable place in Catholic theology quite recently, while a unanimous answer is still lacking. It seems then that we should first treat the general question and then institute the more particular enquiry about the relationship between the word of God and the central sacrament of the Church. This gives us the headings for the two parts of our investigation.

I. THE WORD AND THE SACRAMENT IN GENERAL

When we discuss the relationship between these two things, the word in question is of course the word of God, as it appears in the preaching of the Church. The word of God is thus displayed at once as a word which is also the word of man, on the lips of men who are charged by the Church to deliver this word to men. But the Church, though preaching by divine command, is always likewise the hearer – even in those to whom the word has been entrusted for preaching – and hence the believer. Thus the word of God always comes as the word that is heard and believed the word that is preached and attested because believed. Thus it is always praise of God directed to God, who gave this word to the Church to be at once heard and preached by the Church.

When the word is thus understood as the word of God on the lips of the Church, the Church which believes and praises, preaches and has authority, the question arises at once of how the word stands with regard to the sacraments in the Church. The reasons are both intrinsic to the case [254] and conditioned by the situation. First, the intrinsic reasons. As soon as one asks oneself what this word of God in the Church precisely is, how it works, how God speaks in it, whom it addresses, what it should accomplish in the hearer, what speakers and hearers it presupposes and constitutes, a number of affirmations must be made – on the basis of Scripture and by the nature of the case – which, as we shall see later, have an astonishing similarity, to say no more, with the affirmations generally used to describe the sacraments. And this is the real reason for enquiring into the relationship of word and sacrament. They are so like each other that one cannot but ask what is the reason for their similarity and what is the possibility of making a distinction between them in spite of, or indeed because of their similarity and its cause. Otherwise there can be no real theological understanding of the matters in question. Then there is another reason. Word and sacrament constitute the Church. Or to put it more exactly: the power to preach the word of God by the authority of God and of his Christ, and the power to administer the sacraments to men are the two basic powers of the Church which are constitutive of its essence. We need not here go into the well-known controversy as to whether two or three basic 'potestates' are to be distinguished in the Church: the potestas ordinis and iurisdictionis, or the power of teaching, governing and sanctifying. In any case, the power of the sacrament and the word characterize fundamentally the nature of the Church. But these two powers cannot simply exist side by side, without relation to each other, if they constitute the one Church as the one presence of the one salvation in the one Christ. Thus ecclesiology itself poses the question of the relationship of word and sacrament. And finally, the question is suggested by the teaching on the sacraments. We are accustomed to consider the 'word' as a constitutive and indeed the formal, that is to say, decisive element of the sacramental sign. If we are not to remain on the surface of things, we cannot treat this word, which occurs in the middle of the sacramental action itself as of no particular import: it must be the word addressed to us by the authority of God himself, the word which Christ himself speaks in us and through us, the word which is active and effective of what it signifies because it is his word, the word which renders present what it proclaims. Here again it is impossible to avoid the question as to how this word is actually related to the authoritative word of Christ which is heard elsewhere in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In view of all this, it is really astonishing that we Catholics provide no [255] space, no systematic place for a theology of the word in the average theology of our schools, in the Latin manuals, etc. We speak in fundamental theology or apologetics of the magisterium of the Church, of the powers which the Church received from Christ as it was made teacher of revelation. But this section of fundamental theology proceeds to speak directly only of the Church. The word of God is discussed only in obliquo. But even here the word is always restricted silently, and hence all the more effectively, to a matter of doctrines. It is the word which teaches something, the true and binding word 'about' something, the word which makes a statement about something. It is not treated as the word in which the reality itself draws nigh and announces itself and constitutes itself present. Thus the treatise on the magisterium of the Church cannot be considered as fully equivalent to a treatise 'De Verbo divino'. Even less is said of set purpose in the treatise on the sacraments in general, about the relation between word and sacrament. Thus a theme which appears to be highly relevant has remained to a great extent unnoticed in the Catholic theology of the last few hundred years.

The present situation of Catholic theology seems however to be changing all this. There are many reasons for the new approach, which can only be briefly signalled here. Present-day preaching is in such straits that it feels the need of a theology of preaching and not merely of counsels of a psychological and pedagogical type bearing on rhetoric and homiletics. But a theology of preaching cannot but force us to take up a theology of the annunciation of the word of God. Biblical theology has ceased to regard itself as the mere transmitter of proof-texts for the theses laid down by the theology of the schools. As it listens more attentively to Scripture itself, it can no longer overlook the fact that the Old Testament and above all the New have more to say about the living, efficacious, mighty and creative word of God than the standard theses of the theology of the schools has grown accustomed to say about it. It is significant that in the index to Denzinger, for instance, there is no section on 'The Word of God': the section 'De Revelatione' is too much concerned a priori with doctrine to be considered an equivalent. We note here the same phenomenon which may also be observed in fundamental theology: in contrast to present-day Protestant and Catholic biblical theology, revelation is always taken in the theology of the schools as a purely doctrinal revelation couched in statements, not as a revelatory action and event, in which God acts creatively to bestow grace upon men, uttering [256] his word in it and for it, as in inner moment of this action on man – or in which, to put it biblically, the action is the word, because God's word must produce what it says.

So too the present-day discussion on grace is leaving aside a too material concept of grace to stress its personal element – primarily understood as the uncreated self-communication of God – and is thus finding an approach to the word of God and a more comprehensive understanding of it, regarding it as the means whereby a person discloses himself and freely imparts himself to another. Further, as the theology of the Greek Fathers comes into its own, the incarnation itself is being regarded as a moment of the redemption, and not merely as the act whereby someone is placed in a position where he can be redeemer, if he wills and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dedicates himself to the task by a completely new act, so to speak. Thus the advent of the incarnate Logos of the Father is being almost inevitably seen as the most radical case of a salvific, creative word of God in general, which calls for a theology of the word of God as a soteriological entity in general. This would be even clearer, if the incarnation of the Logos were not regarded as the incarnation of just any one of the three divine persons, so that any other of them could just as well have become man, but as the incarnation of the Word precisely and exactly as such, since on account of his inner-trinitarian propriety it is precisely he who becomes man and who alone can do so.

The closer communication which exists once more today between Catholic and Protestant theologians also forces us to re-consider a theology of the word. Catholic theology, no more than the magisterium, has never been able to accept the formula, that the fellowship of Protestant Christians constitutes the Church of the word while we Catholics are the Church of the sacraments. Among the Protestants of the centuries since the Enlightenment, preaching (thanks to a genuinely Protestant impulse) was almost everything, and the sacraments almost just something like an appendix to the preaching of the pure doctrine, a relic explicable as no more than a traditional survival. And for all practical purposes, Catholics mostly regarded all preaching merely as the unavoidable preparation for the sacraments (and Christian life), while the sacraments were taken to be totally different from the word, since of course they contained no ‘teaching’ ‘about something’. But Protestant theology is now beginning to take the sacraments seriously again, and to see their essential and irreplaceable significance for Christian existence. And we Catholics are reflecting more [257] expressly on the fact that we are the Church of the word of God, which does not merely mean that the Church is God’s class-room where Christians are taught how to behave if they are in fact to receive the sacraments and lead decent lives.

What is desired therefore is a theology of the word in which its essence as word of God in the Church is clearly brought out. All we shall be concerned with here is to note the characteristics of the word which are of immediate significance for the intrinsic relationship of word and sacrament. Even in this restricted field, it is obvious that we cannot really develop the theology of the word here and establish it from theological sources. We shall only try to draw up a list of theses in which at least the most important points are stated, and then indicate where perhaps the theological foundation for the theses in question may be found.

1. The word of God is uttered by the Church, where it is preserved inviolate in its entirety, and necessarily so, in its character of the word of God. This statement should be clear. To deny it would be to deny the essence of the Church, in which and through which (and not passing by it) Christ makes his message contemporary to all ages as the word of God, the Church through which he is present to us in his own mission.

2. This word of God in the Church is an inner moment of God’s salvific action on man. Salvation is indeed the work of God, but this work of God is not totally identifiable with the word of God which comes in human words, in so far as it comes in human words. For God’s salvific action on man is not merely a forensic imputation of the justice of Christ. And it is not merely the announcement of a purely future act of God. Nor is it constituted merely by man’s faith, however this is to be further interpreted. It is a true, real, creative action of God in grace, which renews man interiorly by making him participate in the divine nature – all of which, being the condition of possibility of a salutary action on the part of man, is prior, at least logically, to such action of man. But this act whereby man is created anew by God through his prevenient gift, cannot take place, in the case of a man actively exercising his personal freedom, without man’s personally participating in this new creation in faith, hope and love: indeed, man’s act is an intrinsic moment of the whole process. This follows at once from the fact that not only the grace of divinization, but even the acceptance of this gift must

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

according to all theological sources be characterized as grace. Hence the acceptance of the divine gift of justification is itself part of the gift, in so far as this [258] grace works as efficacious grace to bring about the act of acceptance in its entity and works as elevating grace to bring it about in its quality. It follows that the free, personal consent must be brought about as such by God, that is, as a spiritual, personal act, as an act which knows itself as an act of acceptance. But this prevenient grace of God, which constitutes man's act in its reality and bestows on it its quality, is to be qualified as enlightenment and inspiration according to the theological sources. Hence it is by definition 'word', that is, spiritual self-communication of God to the creature, especially as this grace is not this or that created reality, but the real self-communication of God in 'uncreated' grace and – at least according to Thomistic doctrine – every entitatively supernatural grace creates a conscious condition of consciousness in man by means of its supernatural formal object, which cannot be brought about by any purely natural object. But this inward self-communication of God, 'verbal' though it is in itself, cannot alone be adequate for the normal and fully developed act of its acceptance. Of itself it would remain to a certain extent merely a transcendental, unobjectivated knowledge of this gracious act of God on man, which could not be brought into the region of reflective consciousness. That might be enough, under certain circumstances, for a salutary act (even as an act of faith with regard to a 'revelation'), a point we shall not deal with here: but this inner word of grace alone cannot make it possible for man to have a developed, objectivated, fully conscious understanding of himself as the believing recipient of the divine self-communication. For if the verbal communication of God was already complete in the inner word of grace, in the 'illumination' by interior grace alone, then man would always and essentially accomplish his salvation only in the non-reflective, unobjectivated transcendence of his being, while the dimension of worldly objects and categories remained outside the scope of salutary acts, and man would be claimed by God only in the 'fine point' of his soul, in his secret profundities, but not in the whole width of his being with all its dimensions. Or if not, man would already be absolutely certain of his state of grace and ultimately of the visio beatifica: because he could develop merely from the depths of his conscious grace the whole content of this blessing, since the adequate presentation of the inner divinization to consciousness is by definition 'visio beatifica'. Further, if things were so man would not be claimed by the event of salvation in his social dimension. But if man is essentially and primordially a being in a community, even in the dimension of the [259] individual salutary decision, then knowledge of his grace cannot be adequately given by his inner experience of grace alone: it must also come to him from without, though not exclusively, from the world, from the community, from the history of salvation which is a social event historically transmitted. But this means that the proclamation of the word of God, that is, the word in so far as it is conveyed by the historical, external salvific act of God as an intrinsic moment of this act and by the community of believers, belongs necessarily to the inner moments of God's salvific action on man.

3.As an inner moment of this salvific action of God, the word shares in the special character of the salvific action of God in Christ (and the Church). To understand this statement, we must recall the essential connexion between the inner word of grace and the external, historical, social ('ecclesiastical') word of revelation. Both are essentially connected and are still ordained to one another, even where there is (perhaps) in fact a separation between the two of them in a given individual destiny – a point which cannot be dealt with here. The external, historical word expounds the inner one, brings it to the light of consciousness in the categories of human understanding, compels man definitely to take a decision with regard to the inner word, transposes the inner grace of man into the dimension of the community and renders it present there, makes possible the insertion of grace into the external, historical field of human life. And on the other hand: it is only the inner grace, as light of faith and inward

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

connaturality with God, that makes it possible for man to hear the external, historical word of God strictly as the word of God, without subjecting it to the a priori of his own human spirit and thereby debasing it. In a word, for the full normal accomplishment of the personal self-disclosure of God to the personally actualized man, the inner word of grace and the external historical word come together, as the mutually complementary moments of the one word of God to man. From which it follows that this one word is in itself an action of God on man in grace, an element of his revelation in acts. Hence it participates inevitably in the character of the salvific action of God on man in Christ. Assertions about God's salvific action on man are of their nature assertions about the word of God – understood as two-fold in the unity of the inner and the outward word. On this basis, the next thesis can be understood as the development of the thesis just put forward.

4. This word of God (as inner moment of the salvific action of God on [260] man and so with it and because of it) is the salutary word which brings with it what it affirms. It is itself therefore salvific event, which, in its outward, historical and social aspect, displays what happens in it and under it, and brings about what it displays. It renders the grace of God present.

To prevent the reader rejecting the thesis at once, on the ground that it is exactly the definition of a sacrament, we must anticipate our next thesis to some extent. There it will be said that the actual effectiveness of the word of God is essentially variable, and hence the nature of the word of God in the thesis just stated is defined according to its most intensive realization as it well may be, without denying or obscuring the fact that this realization can take place at a very low potential – which is the usual basis on which Catholic theology considers the word of God in the Church. But it will also be said that the full and adequate realization of this definition of the word of God will prove to be what we call sacraments in Catholic theology. For the moment then let us proceed to outline and explain our justification of this definition of the word of God in the Church as the presence of the act of God's salvation of men in the Church. Taking for granted the proof to be given later, that the proposed definition of the word of God in general will not do detriment to the nature, particularities and special position of the sacraments, the word of God itself will here be explained as the word which displays itself effectively, as the presence of the action of God on man.

First however an explanation of the logic of the matter. Two things can exist side by side, each being by its essence a completely different entity. And the nature in each case can be to some extent statistically fixed and unchangeable, so that it exists in the way it is and must be according to its essence, or it cannot exist at all. But an essence may also be intrinsically changeable; the same essence (being, for instance, life, spirit, dignity, beauty and so on) can be realized in ways which not only differ specifically, but are only analogously alike. In this case it is perfectly justifiable and methodically unobjectionable – though perhaps not always strictly called for – to describe the thing in question in terms of the supreme term of the analogy, its highest form of realization (if this is accessible and known), and to take the other, secondary attributions as deficient manners of the realization of the thing in question (supposing, of course, one can explain how and why such deficient realizations of the essence came about). This is to be borne in mind in what follows.

[261] We have now to prove that the word of God, in its full, original sense, is not to be taken as a set of doctrinal propositions 'about something': it is not just the intellectual description of something which exists and is available completely independently of this doctrinal instruction. It is a revelatory, actualizing word, in which and under which alone the thing designated is present, in a reciprocal relationship of such a kind that the word is formed by the thing which thus comes, and the thing comes by making itself thus audible. Proof of this may be offered in very different ways.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The first and decisive proof would be that the sacred scripture of the Old and New Testament understands the concept of 'the word' in this way. It seems to me possible to affirm that present-day biblical theology teaches this thesis expressly, though it does not seem to trouble itself much about the question of how the thesis can be reconciled with the doctrine of the magisterium on the sacraments. The word of God – on the lips of the preaching Church as elsewhere – is not 'didache', (teaching), from beginning to end, but proclamation in which the arrival of the thing proclaimed itself takes place. It is the mighty, creative dabar (word), of God to man, the way in which the reality which is being proclaimed discloses itself, and thereby and thus becomes present to us, coming forth itself from its divine concealment and coming where we are for the very first time. Detailed proof of this may be omitted, since this view is that of Catholic biblical theology at the present day, to say nothing of Protestants.

But even if the dogmatic theologian does not find the biblical theology of the exegetes entirely convincing, he has data of his own, in a form readily available even in the theology of the schools, which can explain this thesis of the revelatory efficacity of the word of God. Every dogmatic theologian is actually familiar with the matter in question, even though in other terms, at least when he starts with the hearing of the word in faith. We all say that the message of faith, the proclamation of the word of God, is directed to believing ears, and is only fully intelligible there. But such hearing in faith can only take place in the connaturality with the word of God which comes through grace. This grace of hearing in faith and love and of responding in a fully human way is not just any aid which is given to produce finally a merely human act: it is the acceptance of justification in the self-communication of God which takes place by virtue of the reality here present by its being proclaimed and accepted. Hence at least [262] the message heard in faith is for every dogmatic theologian not just the hearing of a statement about something, but the reception of the reality itself about which the audible statement is made – the reality which causes its communication to be heard and lovingly believed. But since the message of faith is preached by God's authority and command, to summons man imperatively and demand from him, in the name of God, a faith which he can only have by God's grace, the message is in itself a clear assurance from God that he is offering the possibility of faith and hence the reality of what is believed, which he desires to give as truly as he offers it. For if t is true that God never refuses the grace for a salutary act, where he demands the salutary act as the moral duty of man, it is also dogmatically certain that where the moral obligation of faith arises from the preaching of the faith, and in so far as it arises, grace too is offered, which is the reality of what is preached. Thus the word of God, as preached and imperative, is the coming of what is preached, as the possibility of the acceptance of the reality itself which is preached. We need not dwell on the fact that in this preaching it is never a matter of just individual truths of a historic nature on their own. All the individual truths are uttered and held as elements of the one announcement in which God proclaims his own self-communication to the world and to each individual in Christ Jesus. And thus of course the last foolish objection is excluded, which says that everything that is preached does not itself become reality in the hearer as he hears the word which discloses it. For the one, actual, permanent reality of salvation which implies the individual elements is in fact uttered: offered in the word, it is really present and accepted in the hearing of faith and love, and in it everything historical and purely objective belonging to it which is a moment of this real salvation; anything else is actualized only in so far as it is the presupposition and historical condition of this reality.

With this we must end the very summary outline of the possible proofs of this thesis. It is in itself very obvious. However, in Catholic theology it is mostly dealt with under other headings and in other perspectives, and hence at first sight the thesis may appear strange and unusual. Let us take just one example to clarify the matter. A sinner hears the authoritative word of the Church calling him to repentance. Can we say that if he hears and accepts this word of God through the Church in faith and love, the event of God's offer of the grace of repentance infallibly takes place in him – though of course there is no absolute certainty about the de facto [263] fulfilment of these conditions, any more than there is about the necessary dispositions for the sacraments? Can we say that then there is infallibly a repentance which on account of the universal salvific will of God is not just the subjective attitude of the man on the human plane, but God's action on him, which consists of the fact that in the communication of sanctifying grace, which is fundamentally God himself, God himself is accepted as he who confers salvation? This can and must be affirmed. It is basically no more than a simple truth of our faith. But this means that in this efficacious preaching of the word of God, that which is preached takes on the character of an event. It means that the grace of God is not merely spoken of but takes place as an event in this utterance. The word which speaks of grace and grace itself must then always be distinguished as moments of a total process, because they do not simply coincide, any more than the efficacious sacramental sign is simply identical with the grace which it signifies and produces. But this does not change the fact that word and reality, in contrast to ordinary human speech, are essentially related to one another and form a unity. The word of preaching is the efficacious proclamation which brings about what it speaks of, the grace announced: it is truly word of life, creative word of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5. To avoid misunderstandings, however, we must at once add another thesis: this word, which is in the nature of an event and an exhibition, takes place in the Church in essentially varying degrees of concentration and intensity. The concept of word of God in the Church which we have arrived at is analogous: it is capable of and subject to inner changes. This is something with which we are all familiar, if we consider this word with regard to its summons to belief. From this point of view we are all perfectly familiar with the intrinsic changeableness of the concept. We all affirm that all words of truth in the Church have not the same binding force. They have not all the same absolute character. There are words of truth in the Church which demand from man the absolute assent of his faith and hence are also absolutely linked with the reality of the matter attested. But there are also words in the Church which certainly mean to make a statement, impart truth, present realities to men's minds, but still do not claim and guarantee this ultimately indissoluble bond with the thing intended. They claim our assent in certain circumstances, and rightly so, because without them the truths affirmed absolutely would not be assimilable in the actual exercise of the knowledge of truth. But they are assertions where the Church does not actualize and exercise fully and [264] entirely its character as the definitive eschatological presence and disclosure of truth – does not pledge its official teaching infallibility, as we say. We are used to giving norms for distinguishing between one word of truth and another, precisely because we rightly see the two in the one perspective. They are not simply disparate attestations of the truth. They are analogous modifications of the one word of truth, which in the first case attains a full and radical realization of its essence, but in the second appears to some extent in a provisional, secondary, subsidiary and deficient guise, in which it serves, makes possible, prepares for and protects the first truth in question. Thus as regards the word of God in the Church, we are quite familiar with the analogous nature of this concept, which lends the essence of the word an inner mutability. But we must say the same of the word of God as the revelatory presence of that which is announced in it. The coming and presence of God in his word in the Church as he proclaims himself is not always simply the same. There are degrees. And we know these degrees, since we say for instance that one has the grace of infused faith and another has also the grace of infused charity and so justification itself. By speaking in this way, we make distinctions, though in other words, between the degrees of God's self-communication to men, or of the existential acceptance of this self-communication by men. And these are in fact degrees of how the word of God makes the reality present. The reality in question always strives for a single, all-embracing goal: which is that God should bestow himself totally on man, in man's total acceptance, through and in love which justifies, of this self-surrendering love of God. But this single and absolute goal of grace is only reached by stages in finite man who is involved in history and so attains only by a gradual process the single totality of his life. (The coming of justification is a historical process, which post-Trindentine theology was correct in considering a matter of phases, unlike the medieval doctrine which saw it more statically – though our present-day theology is now in great danger of reducing the whole process to a mere temporal succession of disparate single acts, which would be to atomize the process.) And the same historicity and phased activity is also to be predicated of the word of God. It can realize its essence only in a historical process, it is not always and at every moment fully its whole self: it grows, it becomes what it is and must be, it can have its deficient, provisional and preparatory phases and moments. It is not possible here to depict the causes and types of the inner changes in the being of the word [265] of God in the Church and in the process of Christian existence, to measure so to speak the extent of possible variation in the forms taken by the word of God. Various elements contribute to determine the actual degree of concentration and intensity of the word of God in each case, and hence that of the coming of what is preached and the certainty of this efficacious presence alike. Since it is essentially a matter of the word uttered in the dialogue between God-Christ in the Church on the one hand, and the human hearer on the other, both sides share in these moments: the difference in the content of the utterance; the consequent difference in its importance; the varying degrees of commitment on the side of the Church; the essential difference of the existential import of the situation on the side of the hearers, where this word is uttered as God's word and redemptive answer to the given situation; the difference in the ecclesiological importance of this dialogue between the Church (as bearer of the word of Christ and abiding presence of his word of grace in the world) and man as member of this Church, a difference on which again depend in part the varying degrees of commitment of the Church in the proclamation of this word; the difference in the concrete recipients of the word – as for instance when the Church as a whole or an individual in his most intimate and unique quest of salvation is addressed, or again, when neither is in question, but something provisional and intermediate, through which the word inevitably becomes something like pure teaching; these and other elements, which would have to be worked out, make for the inner variability of the one essence of the word of God in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the light of the foregoing, it might perhaps be possible to work out a fundamental analysis of the meaning of the many different expressions used in Scripture to designate the word of God. They all point to the one essence of this word, but signify this essence in its inner changes: to speak prophetically, to teach, to exhort, to instruct, to edify, to console, to persuade, to announce, to transmit, to recall, to utter the (sacramental) word of life, to judge, to give testimony, etc. But we cannot go into this here. We turn at once to the supreme and most intensive realization of the essence of the word, the sacramental word. Hence our next thesis is as follows:

6. The supreme realization of the efficacious word of God, as the coming of the salvific action of God in the radical commitment of the Church (that is, as the Church's own, full actualization), in the situations decisive for the individual's salvation, is the sacrament and only the sacrament.

[266] Before we try to explain this thesis and indicate its justification to some extent, some preliminary remarks are called for. To begin with: an authoritative and effective word, which brings about something real (as for instance in worldly matters, the official promulgation of a law, the last will and testament, etc.), is by nature completely dependent on its being couched in the form ordained by the ultimate author of its efficacious character. If something of a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

doctrinal nature is to be imparted which is independent of the means of communication, the validity of the communication need only depend on the fact that the matter is correctly expressed and proposed intelligibly to the hearer. More is obviously demanded in the case of a 'practical', operative word which not merely affirms something but constitutes it. And this overplus can be determined, not merely by the nature of things, but also by the positive institution of the speaker from whom the constitutive force of the word is derived. Further: we are accustomed when speaking of the sacraments to distinguish between the word and the element, or in hylomorphic terms, between matter and form. But this distinction, correct though it be in itself, ought not obscure the fact that both elements, the word and the sacramental action, participate in the symbolic character of the sacrament and hence in its quality of being word. The sacramental action too has the character of a word. It designates something, it expresses something, it reveals something that is of itself hidden. To put it briefly, it too is a word. Hence it is not at all surprising that the distinction between matter and form, action and word, can be applied only very artificially in some sacraments. In the sacraments of penance and marriage there are only words. The sacramental sign consists solely of these words, which is not contrary to the nature of the sacrament, because its nature is to be an efficacious sign, an expressivity which produces and presents what is rendered perceptible. Thus it is perfectly legitimate and objectively perfectly justifiable to subsume the whole sacrament under the concept of the efficacious word. In some sacraments this efficacious word must be pronounced in a form which includes the element of the ritual action. This is due to the positive decree of him who institutes the efficacious word. One can of course ask what are the intrinsic reasons why in these cases, by the will of Christ, the significant word should have this still more bodily form. These reasons must surely be important and easy to find and will ultimately stem from the incarnational character of Christian salvation as a whole. But this does not change the fact that basically a [267] sacrament is and remains an efficacious word. For signs and words, from the metaphysical and theological point of view, are of exactly the same nature: especially as in all the sacraments we have signs which, in so far as they are sacramental, always go back to a positive institution of Christ. In this sense they are not simply an intrinsic echo of the thing which is rendered audible. They are all freely created signs, in the same sense that 'words' are, which are not merely signs of the thing, but likewise always signs of the free personal self-disclosure of a person, in contrast to things, which have always automatically made themselves known and cannot be closed in on themselves. In other words: since grace is the free personal self-communication of God, its divulgation is always free and personal and hence essentially word. Thus the whole sign of grace, no matter what form it takes, must partake of the character of the word.

In the relationship of matter and form in the sacraments, we must not overlook the following: it is not true and it cannot be true that the material element in the sacrament (water, ablution, etc.) is decisive. The ultimate reason for this is easily seen. One could formulate it as the following thesis: in the case of strictly supernatural realities (which ultimately consist of the gratuitous, personal and radical self-communication of God in his own trinitarian glory), a purely natural thing in the nature of an object can never function as a sign in such a way that the supernatural reality could be attained through it alone. Whenever a reality of the world is to be sign, indication and historical presence of a strictly supernatural reality, it can be so only when the spiritual, transcendental ('subjective') openness and orientation of man, pointing beyond the finite to God himself becomes an intrinsically constitutive element of this sign. But this implies that supernatural reality can display itself only through the medium of the human word, as long as it cannot present itself in its own proper reality, which is basically in the immediate vision of God. For a more exact proof of this thesis I may perhaps be allowed to refer readers to the discussion in my book 'Hörer des

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Wortes' (Hearers of the Word). In any case, it is all to be found ultimately in the first Vatican Council, session 3, chapter 2, where it is taught that a divine revelation in words, in contrast to the natural revelation through created things, is absolutely necessary, if man is ordained to a supernatural end. Man can therefore be informed of this end only by the word, not by means of natural objects. It follows that in the manifestation of grace which is called the sacrament, the word is necessarily and inevitably the [268] decisive element: an objective element in the nature of a thing only enters this manifestation of the supernatural in so far as it is absorbed into this utterance in the word.

Hence there can be no objection, at least on principle, to the effort to determine the nature of the sacraments from their quality of 'word'. The only question is whether such an effort can succeed in delimiting, 'defining' their essence in contradistinction to other words in the Church. The effort is made in the thesis here put forward.

But before we try to explain the thesis itself, we must consider briefly some efforts which show a certain similarity to our own, because these definitions too start from the insight gained by biblical theology into the character of event and efficacity belonging to the word of God in the Church: and thus they are faced with the problem which is otherwise not felt very keenly in Catholic theology – how the sacraments are to be distinguished from the word of God elsewhere, since God's word after all is absolutely efficacious of itself. The difficulty which all these efforts have to meet, and ours too, is the doctrine of the Council of Trent. Omitting all reflexions on the theology of the word, which is rather surprising, in view of the Protestant doctrine, the Council declares that the sacraments (and eventually, the desire for them) are the source of the grace of justification, and hence are absolutely necessary (necessitate medii), where this doctrine, taken in the strict sense, is no doubt to be understood rather sensu exclusivo than merely sensu positivo. (Cf. e.g. Denzinger 843a: all true justice begins, grows and is restored through the sacraments.)

It is true that according to the mind of the Council, apart from the question of the efficaciousness of the word of God in general as a salvific event, its statement about the exclusiveness of the sacraments is to be taken cum grano salis. For the Council mentions for instance a growth in grace which can be merited apart from the sacraments, which is a growth in the grace of justification. The Council mentions actual graces which precede sacramental justification. And when it says that under certain circumstances the sacrament can be replaced by the desire for it, it certainly does not – as St Thomas would – affirm that the sacrament works by anticipation. It ascribes this justifying effect to the subjective faith and love of man himself, making the desire only an implicit condition, as all theologians unhesitatingly affirm since Trent. In this they follow Scotus, and show perhaps too little hesitation and too little sense of the problem, [269] but in any case they do not come into conflict with Trent. However, where this 'non-sacramental' justification takes place, even though including the desire of the sacrament, faith remains the root and foundation, as the Council itself says. And as faith comes from hearing the word of God, the Council and its doctrine provide at least a start for a theology of the word of God, where it is itself a salvific event and not merely an instruction about the possibility of such a grace acting upon man.

Nonetheless, the question still remains from the Council of Trent, as to how a theology of the intrinsically efficacious word can be reconciled with the doctrine of the sacraments as the efficacious signs and words of grace. The efforts of recent theology to solve the question, which we barely indicate here, must not be considered false in what they positively affirm. But to my mind they are not quite adequate. Wilms, for instance, distinguished word and sacrament as one would infallible truth and operation of grace. But this is precisely to renounce once more the biblical notion of the efficacious word. Others say that the word apart from the sacraments produces its effect ex opere operantis, while the word in the sacraments does so e*x opere operato*; others say that the former produces only actual grace,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

while the latter confers sanctifying grace, or that the former arouses the disposition, while the latter gives grace to the man so disposed, the former proclaims the coming of grace, the latter effectively gives it. Such distinctions are to be found for instance in Victor Warnach, Hänsli, Betz and others. We are not at all, as we have said, interested in rejecting the positive elements contained in these positions. All we think we should do is to make some remarks which will show how problematic these distinctions are.

It has already been said that justification can take place in a salutary action even outside the sacraments – through the necessary intervention of the word of God – and that in such cases the votum sacramenti, the desire, is the condition but not the cause of it, according to the general opinion of theologians. This alone makes it impossible to ascribe to the word of God outside the sacraments merely actual grace, to the exclusion of sanctifying grace. The interpretation of the relationship between word and sacrament thus criticized may perhaps be further defended by saying that 'non-sacramental' justification always tends by its whole nature towards a tangible sacramental realization of this justification and only finds its true completion therein: but this, while correct and of decisive importance, is already to go beyond the principles of the theory, in question. [270] Further, it must not be thought that the distinction between opus operatum and opus operantis can be presupposed as something quite obvious and perfectly clear in such efforts to solve the problem. For the meaning of opus opera turn is not at all very clear. If one simply says that opus operatum is the operation which produces grace in virtue of Christ, without merit on the part of the agent of this operation or on the part of the subject on whom it is performed: then we must recall that all grace comes by the power of Christ, and that there are non-sacramental occasions on which grace is given without any merit, as is the case with every prevenient actual grace. And here it should be noted that it would be quite wrong to say that because each sacrament confers a specific grace, the effect of the sacrament is only habitual grace, as if actual grace could not be an effect of the sacrament as such. It must also be noted that according to the ordinary doctrine of theologians, there can very well be an opus opera turn which is not at once a sacrament. Thus the notion of opus operatum alone is not of itself adequate to demarcate a sacrament in contrast to anything else. Or at any rate, some further criterion must be invoked when such a distinction is made. If the infallibility of the effect is stressed in the notion of opus operatum, we have to point out first, that this infallible effect, in spite of being ascribed to the sacrament 'taken on its own', is in fact, according to the Council of Trent, bound up with a condition in actu secundo: the (varying) dispositions of the recipient. And this readily intelligible fact is not altered because the condition is not precisely the cause of the effect in question, but merely the condition necessary for it. Further, there are still other cases where, by the free disposition of God, grace is infallibily connected with some action which still remains a mere pre-condition, to the exclusion of merit, as for instance purely petitionary prayer as such for something which makes certainly and unconditionally for supernatural salvation and the glory of God. Such prayer is certain of its effect, according to the express promise of Jesus, whose words it is not our business to modify. Why is this not an opus operatum? After all, it is a word to which infallible efficacity is ascribed by Christ's promise; and a sacramental sign, the prayer at extreme unction, for instance, can take the form and the formal sense of a petition to God. It may be suggested that we must take all these elements together – primarily therefore the absence of merit, the infallibility of effect, relation to sanctifying grace – to have the concept of opus opera turn. But the question still remains as to whether these characteristics cannot also be found united outside the sacraments, [271] and above all, as to how this combination is to be given a unified basis so that finally the real essence of an opus operatum and hence of a sacrament – when the other conditions are fulfilled – may be understood. However, these remarks must now suffice as critical notes on the present-day attempts to solve the question of the demarcation, as between the efficacious

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

word of God in the Church in general, and the efficacious word of God which we have precisely in the sacraments. We now come to the explanation and the outline proof of the thesis proper.

In its positive sense it really hardly needs to be proved. The sacramental word is so unquestionably the supreme form of the efficacious word of God that the tendency in Catholic theology is rather to make it the only efficacious word. The word in the sacrament – along with the ritual action as an element of the whole speaking sign – is clearly efficacious, effects what it signifies, is uttered by the authority of Christ, is the word which undoubtedly represents the supreme exercise of the authority of the Church and hence also its supreme moment of self-realization, brings about the decisive thing in the history of the individual's salvation, first and second justification. Hence this word is certainly the event in which God imparts himself in his own reality and majesty as eternal salvation as he justifies and sanctifies man. It is certain that no higher form of God's efficacious word is conceivable. Thus the only question about the thesis here proposed is whether the sacraments can be clearly and sufficiently distinguished from other forms of God's efficacious word, and whether the nature of a sacrament can be sufficiently clarified under this aspect. Some further remarks are called for on these questions.

First, an indirect answer may be given: anything that can be said of a sign may also be said under the heading of 'word'. If Catholic theology usually uses the notion of sign to determine the nature of a sacrament and mark it off from other things, the same process should also be possible when dealing with the 'word'. The only question is what specific notes must be attached to the generic concept of 'sign' or 'word' so as to reduce this genus to the species 'sacrament' and so determine the essence of the sacrament. That these features include the mission of Christ, authority from him, the fact that the word is uttered and the sign performed in his name is an obvious truth which sets no problems. In the classic definition of the sacraments the generic concept 'sign' is specified by the addition of the difference: (signum) efficax gratiae – ex opere operato. The same formal process of logic could also be applied to the concept 'word' and the [272] sacrament could be defined: the word of Christ on the lips of the Church, which confers grace e*x opere operato*. But even when we prescind from the fact that this traditional definition of a sacrament already raises difficulties, quite apart from the considerations which we have put forward, new problems arise from what we have said under thesis 4, which make the definition of a sacrament harder to deal with. We can no longer maintain that the conferring of grace can be ascribed only to the sacramental word in the strictest sense, since we are bound to ascribe such efficacity – even though in varying degrees – to every word which God utters, even when he does so through the Church. And hence we cannot take the concept of 'opus operatum' to be so obvious and so clear in itself that we can use it at once as the differentia specifica in our definition. Nonetheless, it is still possible to affirm: if, starting from our basic principle – the concept of the efficacious word of God in the Church, which is variable in its efficacity – we succeed in giving a description or demarcation or definition of the concept 'opus opera turn' and insert this 'definition' in the required definition of a sacrament, instead of the mere phrase 'opus operatum', we have certainly arrived at what we sought. The definition would then be traditional, because it only expresses more exactly what is asserted in the standard definition, by giving the words sign and opus operatum a clearer sense. And such a definition will likewise be found capable of distinguishing the sacramental word from other forms of the efficacious word, because it describes the special form of its efficacity, which belongs only to the sacramental word, in such a way that this description coincides with that of the opus operatum. This is precisely what we have sought to do in the statement put forward above. Let us look at it in detail.

In the statement in question we indicated two features which when taken together constitute, to our mind, the objective content of the concept opus opera turn in its unity: the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

word as the fullest actualization of the Church in its absolute commitment, and the word spoken in the decisive situations of human salvation.

To understand why these two features when taken together cover in fact the concept of the opus operatum and indeed determine it more exactly than is usual, we must reflect on the nature of the Church as the primary sacrament. Unfortunately, this can be done here only extremely briefly. The Church, in its concrete reality, is the permanent sign of the fact that God does not merely offer the grace of his self-communication but that in the triumphant efficacity of his grace – efficacious in formal [273] pre-definition with regard to mankind as a whole and the Church – he also powerfully brings about the acceptance of this offer. Grace is not merely in the world; it is not merely there as an offer: since Christ and through Christ it is also in fact triumphantly there. It is not just that the world can be saved if it wills, it is in fact saved, as a whole, because God brings it about in Christ that the world does will to be saved. It is the redeemed, not just the redeemable world. In and through the eschatological triumph of grace the destiny of the world as a whole is already decided. The history of salvation is not yet closed for the individual as such and the knowledge of his future, but as a whole the history of salvation is already decided positively. And of this eschatological situation of the history of salvation, as already basically decided in the positive sense, the Church, as historically visible, is the sign, the historically audible word which proclaims this victory and in which this victory constitutes itself present in the world. And the Church is such in her unfailing truth and her inexhaustible saving powers, as well as in the unconquerable subjective holiness of her members as a whole. Both elements are there, and not by an arbitrary disposition of God, though such a two-fold disposition did not exist, for instance, in the Old Testament: they are there because with and through Christ the kingdom of God is there in the world, really and invincibly, and the Church is the abiding presence of this very Christ; they are there in the incarnational reality of the Church, as the historical sign and word of this victory which is already definitive. Since the Church is the presence of Christ in the world, as the eschatologically definitive salvation and the definitively triumphant grace of God, the Church visible, its historical tangibility, its character of being the word proclaiming salvation, is definitive and eschatological. But this means that the reality of the Church has the character of a sign, definitively and inviolably, finally and for ever. The pre-Christian, Old Testament, and other non-Christian manifestations of God's salvific dealings with men in the realities of accessible history could be rendered ineffective by men's disbelief, their refusal to hear – as is still possible today with regard to individual words of God to individual men. More than that, they could void themselves, lose their character of efficacious promise of God's salvation; they could be abolished and hence always existed as the crisis of a history of salvation that was still undeclared, merely provisional and the shadow of reality. They were never valid except in so far as they went beyond themselves to point on [274] to the future: they were the coming, not the presence, of the grace of God.

The Church is of itself the final, irrevocable, eschatologically permanent word of salvation to the world. In it God has of himself uttered permanently his word of grace to the world, his last irrevocable word, which is no longer open to change in the dialogue of a history still running its course. And thereby he has declared that this is his last and efficacious word, not the word that judges and rejects. And hence the Church is the primary sacrament, and the treatise 'De sacramentis in genere' is a treatise on the genus, the origin and root of the sacraments, and this is the Church. (This could give us, incidentally, a new and broader basis for discussing the old question, so difficult historically, of the institution of all the sacraments by Christ himself: he instituted the sacraments, which are not attested by any express texts of Scripture, by instituting the Church; and he instituted the sacraments which were explicitly instituted, as moments in the institution of the Church, as is perfectly clear from all the three sacraments in question.) And now the concept of opus operatum may be envisaged in its real origin. This concept cannot be defined simply by saying, in formal juridical terms of a decretal theology, that such a process is efficacious of itself and without merit on the part of the subject of the process. For there are other processes, as we have already said, of which the same may be said. But the opus operatum is to be taken as the supreme degree of the Church's actuality, as the act of its self-realization – and as such, much more proper to its nature as a society than if the opus operatum was something static and substance – like, less dependent on an act being done. It follows at once that such an act participates in the nature of the Church, as described when we said that it was the final, unvoidable and intrinsically definitive sign of God's absolute self-bestowal on the world in his triumphant grace. And precisely the same may be said of the basic acts of the Church. Where it actualizes itself in an ultimate commitment of its being towards an individual, becoming for him the aforesaid merciful word of God in the concrete critical situation of his salvation, hence the final efficacious word, no longer provisional and conditional in a dialectical dialogue: this is precisely what we should describe as an opus operatum. The opus operatum is the eschatologically unconditional word of God to man, which is no longer in the balance and in danger of being abrogated by a new and different word in the history of salvation. The opus operatum is the eschatologically efficacious word of God, as the [275] absolute self-realization of the Church, according to its essence as the primary sacrament.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Though this is a self-realization of the Church in its primordial sacramental nature, by means of an absolute engagement, as the definitive manifestation of God's grace in history, it is by the nature of things subject to certain conditions, some of which are intrinsic, others dependent like the Church itself on the free decree of Christ. It depends on intrinsic conditions: because this absolute self-realization of the Church with regard to the truth of the word which constitutes this self-realization, is clearly only possible where it is a matter of the whole Church's being committed to this truth. And where it is a matter of the efficacity of a word which of its nature is mostly or always directed to the individual, such an absolute commitment is only possible where the individual is envisaged in situations decisive for his salvation, and not in cases which represent insignificant factors compared with the totality of the Christian existence of the individual. (It is the same as in moral theology: a radical subjective decision is only possible with regard to 'materia objective gravis'.) This does not mean of course that we are now enabled to deduce the seven sacraments purely a priori. It can be demonstrated that the group of seven is not purely arbitrary, that it is not just as easy to imagine that there could be substantially more or fewer sacraments. Such positivism in theology would already be suspect from its inevitable consequence: that it would call for proof in each sacrament of strict, verbal, explicit institution by Christ. And this is not only historically impossible, it must be rejected as historically improbable. But this again does not mean that it must be possible to deduce the sacraments a priori, individually and as to their fixed number. Nor do we mean this, when we say that each sacrament is an act of the absolute self-realization of the Church in an absolute commitment. The Church itself in its concrete reality is the free institution of Christ – with regard to the time and place of its origin, and hence with regard to many other things which do not simply stem from its essential nature of being the presence of Christ as eschatological salvation in the world. And thus its nature, in its actual concrete realization, cannot be wholly and definitely deduced from its basic, abstract concept. We may and must be simply prepared to accept a priori the basic acts which the Church recognizes as corresponding to its essence individually and exactly and retains as such in its understanding of itself. Our definition of a sacrament may not be objected to on the grounds that other such absolute acts of self-realization [276] are thinkable, or that some sacraments cannot be so easily identified as such acts. By the nature of things, there must be a certain margin of freedom in marking the frontier between the absolute and the non-absolute acts of self-realization, we have to register a posteriori what is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

outside the boundary, when dealing with particular questions when marking this frontier. It is nonetheless clear that initiation (in its two-fold character of baptism and confirmation) and reconciliation (of the sinner, with the holy Church and with God) are such basic acts, both for the Church itself and in the history of the salvation of the individual as such in and in face of the Church. If in these cases the Church could not realize itself absolutely as the primary sign of the eschatological grace which is historically tangible in it, then it could never do so and it would not be that sign. If man exists essentially in society, if therefore his social nature is of significance for salvation, and if for the Church itself this society is of significance, both on account of its fruitfulness and on account of the marriage partners: then marriage is an essential moment in the life of the Church, which becomes manifest in an essential way in the marriage of its members. It is decisively represented by marriage, and it appears there as itself in a historically tangible manifestation which attests the Church. Hence marriage must partake of the absolute character of sign which belongs to the Church, that is, it must be a sacrament. Whether this consideration is of itself stringent or not is a matter of indifference. In the course of its history, basing itself on biblical data, the Church has recognized marriage as a sacrament. And it did so, because marriage represents the love which unites Christ and the Church, and such a sign cannot be an empty one in the New Testament. It recognized therefore marriage as a sacrament, because it has a symbolic relationship to the Church itself, and therefore because the Church finds itself once more in marriage. And thus our basic observation on marriage is proved correct, and again, the correctness of the observation is confirmed, even if it were not simply stringent as the individual theologian's private considerations, outside the self-understanding of the Church. That the installation of an office-bearer in the Church can and must be thought of as a radical situation in the Christian existence of the individual – in so far as he appears, so to speak, on the side of Christ as opposed to the Church – as well as in the self-realization of the Church, in so far as it gives itself this leadership, seems obvious enough. And so too is the sacramental character of this action, in virtue of our fundamental principle. As we shall [277] speak of the Eucharist in particular in the second part of this study, there remains only the anointing of the sick. Without weakening its true sacramental character, one may find it possible to take it – like confirmation in relation to baptism – as a development of the comprehensive sacrament of the forgiveness of sins in the Church with regard to its sinful members. There is much to be said for this point of view, and it means that there need be no particular difficulty in deducing this sacrament from our basic principle. Since the sinful member of the Church has sinned against the essence of the Church as a holy society and hence as witness to the sanctifying grace of God in the world, every time the Church absolves him from his sin, it realizes its own essence in fundamental fashion. For the Church is the presence of God's grace of pardon. If then the anointing of the sick, in view above all of the epistle of James, chapter is taken as a sacrament of the forgiveness of sins, in a particularly urgent situation to be sure – how close to one another the two sacraments were felt to be is still palpable in Origen – its sacramental quality is relatively easy to deduce from our basic principle (in so far as such a thing, as has been said, may be readily demanded). If however one is determined to keep the sacraments of penance and extreme unction clearly apart, then one must stress the fact that a decisive situation exists, for the individual and for the Church, wherever the imminent danger of death places a member of the Church in the decisive crisis. It is at least very probable that here the word of grace on the lips of the Church must have an absolute seriousness. These considerations should suffice to understand the anointing of the sick in the perspective of our basic principle.

Granted this principle, namely that the sacraments are basic acts of the self-realization of the Church with regard to individuals at decisive situations of their lives, we can understand the character of these processes as opus operatum, and likewise, because the Church is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

instituted by Christ as the primary, permanent sign of his triumphant eschatological grace in the world, their sacramental character. Thus our description of the sacraments as efficacious words of God is justified, once it is supposed that it can be satisfactorily shown that other processes in the Church, which, are not sacramental, do not also fulfil this definition and hence prove it to be false or insufficient. As regards this last requirement, we saw that all other acts in which the Church realizes its being as the permanence of the (basically) efficacious grace of God's word in the world, are insufficient. Either they are not directed to the individual in this decisive way, or they [278] do not find him in a situation decisive for salvation, or at least not in a specifically new one – the result being that such processes need not be taken as real sacraments, since they need be no more than concomitant, introductory or complementary aspects of a sacramental process. Or again, they are not processes which signify precisely grace as such, or they cannot be considered as the Church's absolute commitment, as the radical self-realization of the Church in its character of primary sacrament. We cannot be asked to prove that it is absolutely impossible that further sacramental processes should exist. Hence it is enough to maintain, for the rest of the proof, that no one can name a process in the Church outside the seven sacraments which fulfils clearly and definitely all the conditions of a sacrament named in our definition. If one lists the processes found in fact in the Church – which we may be excused from doing here – one will always find that some or at least one of the above conditions and criteria are lacking. Our definition can therefore be taken as correct until proof of the contrary.

The considerations which we have put forward are of course no more than cursory indications. We should above all have proved more clearly, fully and definitely that our view of the essence of the Church as the eschatological sign of salvation leads to a basic understanding of the opus operatum which is an improvement on the usual one – though it does in fact contain, on the basis of our principle, all that is indicated elsewhere as characteristic of the opus operatum. But this cannot be undertaken now.

But before ending this first part of our considerations, there is perhaps one task which should be performed more explicitly. This would be to show, as is indeed yet to be done in this discussion of the sacraments, what was in fact the starting-point of our considerations. It remains to be shown that the efficacious word of God does exist in the Church outside the sacraments, and that this word does not first become efficacious and does not only appear as the presence of God's grace in the Church, when it becomes sacramental in the strictest sense. We must make at least some observations on this question. Every word of God on the lips of the Church, which precedes, accompanies and follows the sacramental word of the Church, must always and everywhere be considered as ordained to this sacramental word. For God does not say all sorts of things to men, and his words are not a miscellany of disconnected subjects. In the last resort he utters only one thing, which is himself as eternal salvation in the Spirit of the incarnate Logos of God. And hence the diverse words have [279] all an intrinsic connexion and derive their sense and value from this one concentration of meaning, which comes to a climax in the sacramental word. And hence so far as it is within the whole, each word of God in the Church takes on, in keeping with its significance within the whole, the character – analogously and in a lower degree – of the one whole word of God. As we indicated at the start, there exists between the sacramental word of God in the Church and the other words of the Church's preaching, the same relationship as between the process of sacramental justification and the non-sacramental. There is one sacramental process of justification, and it is necessary to salvation. But the Church and the theologians have never maintained, at least not since the early middle ages, that there could be no non-sacramental justification, because otherwise the value and necessity of sacramental justification would disappear. It cannot be said that from the point of view of history of dogma and systematic theology the question of the relationship between these two 'ways' of justifications has been

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

solved wholly satisfactorily. But the basic lines of a solution are clear enough, and they are the same as in our own question of the relationship between the sacramental and non-sacramental word of efficacious power in the Church. We must not start by taking the two things as independent and disparate juxtaposed realities: they are phases and moments of the same process. The one, complete, efficacious word of God's salvation has its history and therefore its phases; each phase shares the being of the whole, the whole reality is truly present and effective in each phase. But this does not make the succeeding phase superfluous and meaningless. On the contrary, it is what really demands it, because it is only in the fully-formed, historical and tangible whole, that is, in the sacrament, that the essentially – envisaged whole, the decisive moment, reaches its full 'manifestation' – a manifestation which is of the essence of the thing in an incarnational structure of salvation. A process as a whole, since it pervades all phases and yet is only fully present in the whole, can display a sort of shift in the phases: in the 'reviviscence' of a sacrament which has been unworthily but validly received, we have the historically tangible event of salvation before grace; in justification preceding the sacrament, the situation is reversed – because the thing essentially envisaged is already there, before its historical sacramental manifestation has been fully expressed, when it is called sacrament. This second case is so normal, starting in Scripture with the case of Cornelius and going on into the sacramental theology of St Thomas, without prejudice to the [280] necessity and meaningfulness of the sacrament, that St Thomas even held that it formed a binding rule. And yet St Thomas never doubted for a moment the sense and necessity of the sacrament. But all grace has an incarnational structure. All acceptance of the grace is an acceptance in faith, in hearing, of the word of God, which is uttered interiorly or externally or in both ways. Hence all phases of such a salvific process have basically the same structure. They are phases of the self-realization and historical self-presentation of the one and the same essence of the one efficacious word of God, which, where and only where it attains under God and Christ its unambiguous, historical and ecclesiological presence, its embodiment and eschatological absoluteness, is called sacrament. But because the word reaches its supreme degree of actualization in the sacrament, while always aiming at this degree, it is inchoate everywhere in this quality of efficacious word. It can have a lesser degree of efficacity, because its content is too specialized, or because it is existentially addressed to a man only under a particular aspect, or because it is from the start only the setting and accompaniment of the sacramental word – and so on.

The following point must finally be noted, if our thesis is to be understood correctly. If the thesis is correct, then it is clear from the start that the sacramental word and the word uttered in the preaching of the Church are similar and dissimilar in all elements which characterize the word of God. Hence in what we have said up to this, we do not claim to have analysed, noted and distinguished all the elements of the word of God which can possibly be thought of and which are theologically important for our special question: the word as statement and as event, the word as part of a dialogue, the word as eschatological word, the word as participation in the incarnation and the redemption on the Cross, the word as anamnesis, as prediction, as affirmation and as promise, as call and answer at once, as interior and exterior word etc. In these and other aspects the non-sacramental and the sacramental word both agree and differ. And since we have not analysed these various aspects in detail, the theory which we have proposed is only a formal draft of a solution, it does not really state the full contents of the solution. The agreement and disagreement touching each of these moments of the sacramental and non-sacramental word would have to be precisely considered, before it could be said that the proposed theory had been to some extent properly developed. Thus it is not against what is positively implied in the results of O. Semmelroth's work, for instance, on our problem. He maintains [281] that the strictly sacramental word is more closely connected with the answering word of mankind in Christ on the cross (since the sacraments are specially related to the work of the cross, while the cross is not only the event of the word of God to man, but also man's answer to God in the dialogue: mankind, summed up in Christ, accepted God's offer of himself in the incarnation). The non-sacramental word in the preaching of the Church is said to be a continuation of the coming of the Logos of God into the world, as the offer of God to mankind. The distinction is undoubtedly correct. But it seems to me to be only one of the many distinctions between the two forms and phases of the one word of God. And it also seems to me that in this theory the non-sacramental word, in spite of the stress laid on its efficacity, is seen too much as doctrinal (even though the element of event is included). Hence the theory seems to overlook to some extent the fact that we find in the Church, in the real preaching of repentance for instance, a non-sacramental word, in the nature of doctrine and in the nature of event, which refers men to the event of the cross and hence does not derive entirely from the incarnation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II. WORD AND EUCHARIST

We shall now try to apply these general considerations to the sacrament of the Eucharist.

It should be clear at once that all that has been said hitherto comes here to an unsurpassable climax. The Eucharist is 'word': because here the incarnate Logos of God is himself present in his substance; because here the absolute proclamation of the whole mystery of salvation takes place: there is the anamnesis, in which the event of God's giving himself to the world and the acceptance of this gift on the cross of the Son becomes actually present among us, sacramentally, in the space and time we live in; and there is the anticipation, sacramentally, of final salvation in the pignus futurae gloriae, because here the death of Christ and his corning are exhibited and proclaimed; and because here we have the supreme selfrealization of the Church. For here the Church realizes itself in an absolute commitment which not merely regards the individual: the Church itself, as the community of salvation, actuates itself supremely in the sacrifice and meal of the Eucharist. There is no need to develop this further here. But if all this is true, then the Eucharist is not only the supreme case of those acts of self-realization of the Church which are called sacraments, [282] it is the real origin of all other sacraments – which again are so much the self-realization of the Church that all other words and actions of the Church have essentially the functioning of serving these acts of self-realization, and are only really justified and intelligible in the light of the sacraments. And then we can say that the Eucharist is simply the word of God in the Church which supports and conveys all other words, which forms the centre whence all the reality of the Church derives its meaning. The Eucharist is the word of the Church absolutely. As the Council of Trent says, it renders present not merely the grace of Christ but the source of grace itself it is what the Council had chiefly and most intensively in mind when it anathematized those who taught that all the sacraments of the Church were of equal dignity. It is the word through which the triumphant and divinely-accepted act of redemption is present as an actual reality. It is the word which when uttered and heard in faith, alone gives full reality to what the Church is: the presence of Christ and his redemption in the world. All other words, sacramental and non-sacramental, must therefore be considered merely as exposition and application, preliminaries and echoes of this word, which makes the crucified and risen Lord and his whole work of salvation present in the Church. All the teaching of the Church merely points to this event, which is present and permanent in the word of this sacrament. All the words of the other sacraments merely distribute and bring down to concrete situations the reality and the presence which is here in its totality. All words of command, exhortation and correction can aim only at one thing: that man should come there, and come with a mind to believe and accept in love what is here present in sacred solemnity: the gift of God to man in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

him who gave himself up for us. It is indeed possible, and perhaps only too often a reality, that man's acceptance of the incarnate and crucified Logos, with the ultimate decisiveness which brings salvation, takes place outside the Eucharistic celebration. But even here it takes place by virtue of the event which constantly procures for itself in the Eucharist a new manifestation and presence in the midst of the Church, and imparts itself invisibly to all by becoming sacramentally visible here.

But here in fact the temptation might arise, to see in the Eucharist the strongest 'No' to all that has been said up to this. It could perhaps be urged that the Catholic piety of the West has implicitly felt the difficulty since the end of the tenth century. While in Protestant piety the Church is the sacred place where the word of God is efficaciously preached, in [283] Catholic piety, more or less since the time of Berengarius, the Church is the place where the sacrament is mutely and apparently wordlessly present, as the silent presence of the Lord. And so this very sacrament brings up once more the old question as to whether there are, as Thomas à Kempis says, simply two tables in the Church, one for Scripture and one for the bread of life; and whether it remains an open question, how these two tables, which seem to be so different, are ultimately related to one another; and whether there is really a choice between being the Church of the word or the Church of the sacrament.

But it can be seen at once that these questions are based on misinterpretations and stunted versions of Catholic doctrine. The Eucharist is in all truth the sacrament of the word absolutely, the absolute case of the word anywhere. To understand this properly, we must bear in mind that according to the Council of Trent, Christ is present by virtue of the panis vinique benedictio (Denzinger 874), the consecration (Denzinger 876). No doubt the Council of Trent does not emphasize very expressly the permanent importance of the word pronounced over the bread and wine, as a constitutive element of the visibility or historical perceptibility under which Christ is present. But its importance is recognized in so far as the Council emphasizes expressly (apart from the places noted above) that the body and blood of Christ are present 'vi verborum' (Denzinger 876; 1921). And it also appears from the fact that the Augustinian definition of a sacrament is acknowledged without any difficulty as applying also to the Eucharist (Denzinger 876), while this definition expressly names the word as an element of the sacramental symbol. Further, the Council of Florence says expressly in the Decretum pro Armenis: forma huius sacramenti sunt verba salvatoris, quibus hoc confecit sacramentum – 'the form of this sacrament is the words of the Saviour by which he instituted this sacrament'. Here it must be emphasized from the scholastic point of view that the 'forma' is not primarily the efficient cause of the sacrament, but a permanently constitutive element of the sacramental sign itself. The words of consecration are not the means whereby the sacrament came to be 'in fieri', to continue to exist apart from these words. They are an element of that by which the sacrament exists and abides. It is only because they permanently refer back to the words of consecration that the species of bread and wine constitute the sign which indicates and contains the presence of Christ. If we say that Christ is present under the species, we can also say that Christ is only present [284] through the permanent validity of the anamnesis, the words of consecration pronounced over the bread and wine. The species would not really be sacramental species if they were not being constantly determined by the words of consecration, the words of explanation, which are pronounced over them. We must avoid taking too materialistic a view in this matter. A sign is by nature a properly human reality; it can therefore be constituted not merely of material entities – and this is true also of the sacraments – but also by specifically human realities, such as the permanent validity of a statement. These are not ideas put forward just to suit this particular thesis. They are good ancient scholastic tradition. Compare for instance Ch. Pesch: num verba sint forma constitutiva huius sacramenti. Species eucharistiae per se non significant quod continent, i.e. Christum, nisi in quantum ad hanc significationem determinatae sunt per verba. Neque enim

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

intelligimus has species esse consecratas et significare Christum, nisi in quantum scimus circa eas prolata esse verba. Unde relatio signi est in speciebus, ut sunt determinatae verbis et hoc sufficit ut verba dicantur in genere signi constituere hoc sacramentum (Praelectiones, VI, n. 785) ('Are the words the constitutive form of this sacrament? The Eucharistic species do not signify what they contain, Christ, except in so far as they are given this signification by the words. We do not know that the species are consecrated and signify Christ except in so far as we know that the words have been pronounced about them. Thus the species contain the relation of sign, in so far as they are determined by the words. With this it can be said that the words, being in the nature of a sign, constitute this sacrament'). Pesch then cites Suarez (Disp. 42, sect. 7) and de Lugo (Disp. 1, sect. 4 and 5). We can therefore say that the eucharist too as a sacrament is in the nature of a sign. The explanatory words of Christ are not merely the efficient cause of this sign, but an intrinsic constitutive element of it. If the sacrament of the altar, in consequence of its character as food, is a permanent sacrament, then it must also be permanent in genere signi – with all the constitutive elements which go to make up the sign. But if the explanatory words are a constitutive element, they must also be considered permanent, even though they are ended as a sound. There is no difficulty here. A word in its human reality is not completely dependent on and just merely co-existent to its sound in the physical world. A word of love, a promise, a threat still exist after their audible expression has passed away. And thus the words of consecration remain as an element of the sacramental sign even 'after' the actual [285] moment of consecration, which was the reason for their being uttered, but not for their being permanently in existence. And so the Eucharist, even as a permanent sacrament which is 'reserved' in its special place, is constituted by the explanatory words of the Lord on the lips of the Church. The Eucharist is and remains the presence of the Lord through and under the efficacious word, which has two components: the purely material one, indeterminate in itself and needing to be determined, of the physical species of bread and wine, and the more spiritual one, formal, determinative, clear, clarifying and declaratory, that of the explanatory words of the Lord. And both are needed – both having the character of a sign and hence of a word – to form the one sign in this sacrament, through which he that is signified is present.

We may even go a step further. The word of God in this final, definitive age of Christ is the triumphant word which – freely, of course – is heard because God has so uttered it in the power of his grace that it is really heard. For the Church is the community of believers to the end, and as a whole it is also subjectively holy, and hence truly believing. In this reciprocal relationship of efficacious word of God and the effective hearing of the word effected by God himself, both realities are ordained to each other in such a way that one may safely say: if one did not exist, the other could not exist either, that is, be what it is. In other words, the word of the sacrament of the altar, which means the presence of the Lord, is supported by the faith of the Church, which hears this word and so really confers on it its true reality, that of the powerfully triumphant word – just as on the other hand the faith of the Church in the Lord present in the Eucharist is supported entirely by his word, under which he is present. We are not speaking of course of the faith of the individual as the individual. The presence of the Lord is independent of this. The Reformation doctrine which maintained that the act of faith alone constituted the presence of the Lord was false and heretical as applied to the individual; but it can have a good Catholic sense when said of the Church as a whole. If it were not, by the triumphant grace of God, always the believing Church, it would not be the word which it is, triumphant, eschatological and efficacious, nor would it then be the word which is the triumphant eschatological presence of the Lord. It must always be remembered that the Church is not just the resultant sum of its fallible and possibly unbelieving individuals, but the efficaciously predestined community of those embraced by the grace of God, without whom the Church would not be what it is – [286] though it is likewise not just this. We have

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

therefore a perfect right to say that the Lord is present in the absolute word of the Church, heard and believed in the Church, the word which proclaims the death of the Lord till he comes again: and in and with him his redemption is present, as something granted to mankind absolutely and definitively, though the individual as such must still work out his salvation in fear and trembling.

The efficacious word of the Mass, being the proclamation of the death of Christ, is the primary kerygma. And every other efficacious word becomes so in the Church because it participates in this kerygma in such a way that the whole force of this primary kerygma can already be embodied in the participation, and for this very reason this mere participation is intrinsically ordained to be absorbed into the Eucharistic kerygma, to find there its full manifestation. It could be said that we find the same relationship existing between the objective word and the sacrament as Catholic theology has always seen to intervene between the actual reception of a sacrament, of the Eucharist in particular, and the desire or votum of a sacrament. In the desire of the sacrament, the whole power and reality of grace can already be there: one need only recall for instance the doctrine of Trent on spiritual communion, which is not make-believe and the mere longing for something not there, but the reception of the grace of the sacrament even without the sacramental sign. But the votum is precisely the votum sacramenti, and it is supported by the grace which provides itself with its most unambiguous eschatological presence in the history of salvation by means of the sacrament, and which is only fully itself when it has provided itself with its complete historical figure in the public life of the Church.

If we are correct in the way we have determined the relationship of the Eucharist and the other sacraments to the word, there can be no question of dividing up and distributing the effects of the two entities as between word and sacrament. Grace is always there in the form of the word: grace is present always and everywhere from beginning to end, from the first word of preaching to the sacrament inclusively, in the form of the word. And this one word of grace and this one grace in the word has its own proper stages as the word of God, as the word accepted existentially in faith, as the word of the Church. And where this word attains its absolute climax, as the incarnational and eschatological word of God, and absolute self-expression of the Church as a whole and as directed to the individual, the word of the Eucharist is heard.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[287]

11

THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE SACRAMENT OF THE LORD'S SUPPER

The theme to be treated is the presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to Catholic faith in contrast to Lutheran Protestant faith.[1] The theme seems to me to be very difficult. Not merely because I am not an expert on this subject. Not merely because the question touches a central mystery where the lack of personal commitment would endanger or render impossible the understanding of what is taught and professed, while personal commitment makes it more difficult for us to understand one another. The particular reason which makes this theme seem very difficult for me is quite different, and I should like to state it at the very beginning, even at the risk of making my – our – position more difficult with regard to our Protestant brothers. The reason is that it is not at all easy to say what we teach in this matter. This statement may seem surprising; it seems to be quite improbable in the light of the clear, sober and realistic language of the Council of Trent. Our forefathers and indeed the vast majority of present-day Catholic theologians would be puzzled if they heard this statement, especially as in contrast to other points of doctrine, the doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the sacrament did not cause the Council Fathers much difficulty at Trent. They merely repeated, as was in itself the right thing to do, what the Church had already been saying for many hundreds of years before them when such discussion arose, in the same explicit formulas. But it still seems to me difficult today, to say what we really profess and what we do not profess. Why that is so or at least why it appears so to me will appear later. But the fact that it is so – if it really is so – is a heavier burden for the Catholic than for the Protestant theologian. For past confessions of faith are normative for his faith –and his [288] theology – in a much more absolute sense than they are for Protestant theologians. As long as he can distinguish clearly and articulately the simple language of the faith and creeds of his Church from further theological theories and opinions about the dogma of the Church, the task of the Catholic theologian is simple. But when it is not so easy to distinguish the explicit dogma in terms of what is binding on the Church from the theorems of theology, his task is harder, both in itself and in its controversial elements. It is not that he doubts in the least about the binding quality of the doctrine of the Church, but because he finds it heavy going to repeat it exactly. Anyone who doubts that this is possible must have the fixed opinion that all pronouncements of the magisterium must, because they are binding, possess the supreme degree of intelligibility of unvarying quality – which would still be something different from rational perspicuousness and intrinsic evidence. This is not true. A new age, a new historical situation, can make a doctrinal proposition seem clearer or more obscure quoad nos, by the simple fact that it puts it into a new context of knowledge – even if one felt sure of how it was understood earlier, even when one accepts it fully as valid for oneself, and even when one puts it into practice without difficulty in the exercise of the Christian life. This seems to me to be the case with the theme which is now in question. It seems to me therefore that there is nothing for me to do except to state clearly the nature of this difficulty, even though it is primarily a problem within Catholicism and makes our position more difficult in face of Protestant theologians. This is all rather obscure, but it will become clearer. In other words, I am concerned to say, right from the start, that I do not consider it the task and the duty of a Catholic theologian to act as if everything were perfectly clear, as if the firmness of his assent to the doctrine of his Church depended on his having the answer to all questions.

[1] This section is the text of a lecture addressed to Catholic and Protestant theologians. No effort has been made to change the original style.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We divide our remarks into three sections:
1. Preliminary remarks.
2. The doctrine of the Council of Trent on the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist.
3. What remains obscure and open?

1. PRELIMINARY REMARKS

1. I must renounce any effort to give a survey of the history of the dogma of the real presence and of the development of the doctrine. In this context [289] the effort would only lead to facile simplifications. It is true that here as elsewhere it is important for the Catholic theologian to trace the historical way to the express formulation of the faith which the Church – his Church – professes. But the ultimate foundation of his assent to this faith is not the fact that he can prove historically the legitimacy of this historical way. Hence a purely descriptive method which merely registers opinions cannot at once be considered unjustifiable in a given context. This is all the more true, since the Catholic theologian cannot admit that a later certainty and a later clarity in Church dogma is illegitimate or subject to possible revision, simply because it did not always exist.

And we shall likewise omit discussion of certain themes, which are connected with our actual question but are still not identical with it: the question of the reservation and adoration of the Eucharist, the questions connected with the two-fold nature of the species, the question of reception sub utraque specie, the more precise questions about the presence of Christ in the sacrament which arise from the divisibility of the species – the breaking of the bread, the drinking from one chalice. The omission of the controverted question of the sacrifice of the Mass – and hence the question of the presence of the sacrifice of the Cross in the Eucharist – has been agreed on already.

2. Another preliminary remark is called for. It concerns a basic attitude to the theme, which results from certain theological a prioris in general.

(a) In the doctrine of the Eucharist, a Catholic cannot make the silent presupposition that a dogmatic assertion can only refer to something which lies as such beyond the region of human experience. In other words, an assertion cannot at once be rejected as a dogmatic assertion, as a truth of faith, simply because the objects within its scope are not really removed from human experience. The empty grave, for instance, is the object of an assertion of faith and not mythology, though the empty grave is in principle within the scope of non-religious assertions. Truths of faith cannot be so restricted, in principle at least, with regard to their objects, that the possibility of contact with profane knowledge can be excluded a priori, so that nothing can result from them for the region of the profane. I can never say, for instance, that the historical existence of Jesus is in principle of no importance for the Christ of faith. Hence for instance, if the Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist contains metaphysical implications, the Catholic theologian can never see in this the a priori proof that he has trespassed beyond the bounds of a truth of faith. Since [290] God in his act of salvation and revelation has also intended the reality in which we usually live, though not this alone, and since he intervenes in it and transforms it, a basic historical or metaphysical scepticism, an absolute discontinuity, postulated a priori, between truths of faith and other assertions is inacceptable. This general principle must be stressed as a preliminary to our particular question, since otherwise the impression might easily arise, unavowed perhaps but hence all the more forceful, that the Catholic dogmatic assertion about the real presence, on account of the ‘realism’ with which it speaks of a tangible reality, goes beyond the bounds of any possible dogmatic assertion – that it postulates a ‘miracle’. This is the first point.

(b) On the other hand, we must also affirm the following: in view of the bearing of a truth of faith on salvation, and of the fact that it is directed to all men and that its real content must be understood at all times, it is a priori improbable – more we may not say – that a dogma can only

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be formulated and understood in dependence on a well-defined philosophical system. It is not clear, of course, in such a statement, what we are to understand by a philosophical system, where it begins and where it leaves off. It cannot be said that every concept which is not immediately traceable to the most primitive experience is at once so much of a philosophical product that there could be no question of it in a truth of faith, or that it could not be implicitly guaranteed as correct by a truth of faith. Catholic theology – I state this merely as a fact, without any polemical purpose – will never allow itself to appeal easily and quickly to what is paradoxical and not amenable to logic. But if that is so, if one is steadfast with regard to the mystery, and if one really tries to be guided by the facts, one cannot simply avoid all the rational consequences of the immediate truth of faith, or leave them aside as of no interest even for the defence of this truth. Nonetheless, it has proved true again and again – and most controversies within Catholic theology derive from this fact – that the truths of faith do not clearly imply any particular philosophical system, which would then be imposed as binding by the magisterium on account of this implication. Hence just as we Catholic theologians cannot practise a priori a non-metaphysical dogmatic theology, so too we need not expect a priori that dogmatic theology will provide us with any particular metaphysical system – an Aristotelian hylemorphism for instance in the present question. With this – I should almost like to say, unhappily – we have gained no clear and handy principle, which will enable us to steer a smooth course [291] between a theology devoid of ontology and a theology transformed into a metaphysics: but at least we have been warned against both.

2. THE DOCTRINE OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT ON THE REAL PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE EUCHARIST

We shall omit, as we have said, the presentation of the Catholic doctrine of the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, and simply present the doctrine itself according to the most express declarations of it in the Council of Trent. We may remark here that the history of the discussions of this point at the Council is not very enlightening and helpful. Hence this too we omit here.

1. The Council confesses the real presence of Christ in the sacrament.

(a) As regards the presence as such, the formulation varies. The Council speaks of a 'contineri' (Denzinger 874), of a 'sacramentaliter praesens sua substantia nobis adesse' (l.c.), of a 'suum corpus praebere' (Denzinger 874; 876; 877), of an 'in Eucharistia esse' (Denzinger 876), of a 'sub speciebus existere' or 'contineri' (Denzinger 876; 885), of an 'esse in sacramento' (Denzinger 886) and 'in hostiis remanere' (Denzinger 886).

This 'contineri sub specie illarum rerum sensibilium' is characterized as a 'vere, realiter ac substantialiter contineri', (Denzinger 874; 883) and contrasted with a 'tantummodo esse in sacramenta ut in signa vel figura aut virtute' (Denzinger 883).[2] This 'realis praesentia' (Denzinger 874, title) is described as one which we 'vix verbis exprimere possumus', but which is to be affirmed in faith; it is distinguished as a sacramental mode of existence from the 'modus existendi naturalis' which belongs to the exalted Lord in heaven (Denzinger 874). For the fact of the real presence, the Council appeals to the words of Christ in the Synoptic gospels and in St Paul, which are supposed to show clearly that Jesus' words had their proper sense and not a figurative or metaphorical one, and hence that he really gave his Apostles his real body and blood. This is said to have been the constant doctrine of the Fathers and the unanimous interpretation of the Church. More precise general reflexions on the nature of this presence are not given.

---

[2] The encyclical Humani generis (Denz. 2318) condemns as erroneous the opinion by which 'realis Christi praesentia ... ad quendam symbolismum reducatur, quatenus consecratae species non nisi signa efficacia sint spiritualis presentiae Christ: eiusque intimae coniunctionis cum fidelibus membris in corpore Mystico'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[292] (b) The whole Christ is present, and wholly present under each species: his body and blood vi verborum of the consecration, but the whole Christ with body and soul, humanity and divinity, because he is the man transformed and raised from the dead, who is no longer subject to the separation of body and soul in death, and because a separation of humanity and divinity is impossible on account of the hypostatic union (Denzinger 876). Hence the real presence is affirmed, without distinction, of 'Jesus Christ true God and man' (Denzinger 874), of his body and of his blood (Denzinger 874; 876), of the totus et integer Christus (Denzinger 876), of body and blood along with soul and divinity, of the 'whole Christ' (Denzinger 883; 885).

(c) Christ is present by reason of the panis vinique benedictio (Denzinger 874), the consecratio (Denzinger 876). The permanent significance of the word which is pronounced over the bread and wine, as a constitutive element of the visibility under which Christ is present, is not stressed very explicitly by the Council. But it is affirmed in so far as – apart from the words just quoted – the Council expressly emphasizes that it is 'vi verborum' that the body and blood of Christ are present (Denzinger 876; 1921), while the whole Christ is there concomitanter (l.c.). It is also affirmed by the fact that the Augustinian definition of a sacrament is recognised unhesitatingly as applying to the Eucharist, since this definition states that the word is an element of the sacramental symbolism. And the Decretum pro Armenis of the Council of Florence(Denzinger 698; cf. 715) says expressly: forma huius sacramenti sum verba Salvatoris, quibus hoc confecit sacramentum, where it must be emphasized, precisely from the scholastic point of view, that 'forma' does not indicate primarily the efficient cause, but a permanent constitutive element of the sacramental sign. It is only by their being constantly referred back to the words of consecration that the species of bread and wine constitute the sign (symbolism in the Augustinian sense) which indicates and contains the presence of Christ.[3] The sign of the presence of Christ, the notification of the real presence, is therefore the one sign composed of the empirical [293] perceptibility of bread and wine and of the word, which is pronounced over them in obedience to Jesus' command for the anamnesis, by ordained representatives of the Church, with the intention of performing the act which the Church is charged to do. (As regards the 'intention', cf. Denzinger 424; 672; 695; 854; 860; 1318; as regards the priest, Denzinger 424; 430; 574a; 715). Part of the constitution of the sign, under which alone Christ is present, is the relationship of the bread and wine to a meal, their character of nourishment. Clearly as the Council rejects the doctrine that Christ is only present 'in usu, dum sumitur' (Denzinger 886; 876), it concedes just as readily that this sacrament was instituted by Christ 'ut sumatur' (Denzinger 878). Bread and wine are anthropological realities and concepts, and as such they are essentially related to consumption, to usus. And they are only the sign of the real presence of Christ in so far as they have this relationship. But since the character of nourishment is prior to the consumption strictly as such – it is not constituted by the latter, but it renders the latter possible – and because Christ affirmed that what he gave was his body (Denzinger 876), before the Apostles ate of it, Christ is present before the actual usus. But this does not deny, but rather affirms, that the sign of the presence of Christ is the blessed food as such. The more clearly therefore the reverent adoration of Christ in the sacrament is referred back to the eating of the body of Christ, the more Eucharistic piety corresponds to the full truth and reality of the sacrament.

(d) Granted the suppositions made above, the real presence is there independently of the faith of the individual priest or communicant, so that even the sinner or the unbeliever receives the body of the Lord, though only sacramentally and not spiritually, that is, when the objectively real event of the reception of the body means judgment for him (Denzinger 881; 880). Hence the

---

[3] Cf. Pesch VI no. 785: 'num verba sint forma constitutive huius sacramenti; species eucharisticae per se non significant id quodcontinent, i.e. Christum, nisi in quantum ad hanc significationem determinatae sunt per verba. Neque enim intelligimus has species esse consecrates et significare Christum, nisi inquantum scimus circa eas prolata esse verba. Unde relatio signi est in speciebus, ut sunt determinatae verbis et hoc sufficit ut verba dicantur in genere signi constituere hoc sacramentum' (cf. Suarez, disp. 42 sect. 7; de Lugo, disp. r sect. 4·5).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reception of the body, though of course it does not set up a reciprocal physical influence between the body of Christ and the communicant in the realm of experience as such (cf. Denzinger 546),[4] is characterized as 'sacramental and real',[5] and not merely as 'mentally spiritual' (spiritualiter) (Denzinger 890), though the Council [294] itself calls the sacrament a 'spiritualis animarum cibus' (Denzinger 875), and it was recognised in the debates of the Council that the phrase 'manducatio spiritualis' could have an orthodox sense (D.Th.C., V 1327).

(e) If we prescind for the moment from the question of 'in usu – ante usum', it seems to me that with regard to the real presence in the sacrament itself, otherwise than with regard to transubstantiation, there is no essential difference between the Catholic and the Lutheran faith. For the Lutheran confession also teaches a real presence, by which Christ is 'truly, really, vitally' present in the sacrament; it uses 'vere et substantialiter' to characterize this presence, it rejects the 'in figura' (figurate) or the mere 'in virtute' just as much as Trent. It further seems to me to be of decisive importance that the Lutheran confession, like the Council of Trent, appeals for this to the fact that this confession relies on the unambiguous words of Scripture, and on the faith as it is accepted in the whole Church.[6] It also rejects expressly the idea that fides brings about the real presence (Solida Declaratio, VII, 10, 121), it holds that even unworthy unbelievers really receive the body (l.c., 12, 123). It is the doctrine of the Sacramentarians and not of the Lutherans, that there is no essential difference between the word about the heavenly Christ and the sacrament of Christ present among us here (SD, VII, Introduction): 'edere corpus Christi' and 'credere in Christum' are not the same. Hence there is a real presence of an objective nature, which is prior to faith's reception, faith's appropriation of the sacramental happening. One could put it this way: the true body of Christ is not merely received 'vere et substantialiter', but it is there and is given and thus received. 'Sentiunt et docent cum pane et vino vere et substantialiter adesse, exhiberi et sumi corpus et sanguinem Christi' (SD, VII, 14) (cf. also the 'vere porrigi etiam indignis', contrasted with the 'vere sumere'; l.c., 16).[7] It seems to me incorrect to try to water down this consent (partial though it is) between Catholics and Lutherans by invoking a dissent which is supposed to go deeper, as for instance in the general notion of sacrament, the meaning of faith etc. For this consent is attached by both sides to something that precedes all theological back-[295]grounds and a prioris in all good theology: the word of Scripture and the consent of the Church and its tradition.

I find it therefore incorrect to interpret the real presence in Lutheran doctrine[8] in such a way that the body of Christ is said to be already present everywhere and at all times, on account of the permanent actuality of the sacrifice of the cross and/or the ubiquity of the body of Christ – so that all that remains to be done is to 'distribute the ever-present gifts'. No, even according to the Lutheran confessions, an event takes place: the body of Christ which is not always already present becomes present through the words of the anamnesis of the Lord's Supper. Lutherans and Catholics are at one in affirming that the coming to be of the presence is in the nature of an

---

[4] The 'hoc est substantive et essentialiter, non autem quantitative vel qualitative vel localiter' of the formula of union put forward by the Lutherans at Marburg could be subscribed to by Catholic theologians (cf. Die Bekenntnisschriften der evangelisehlutherischen Kirche, published by the Deutschcn Evangelischen Kirchenausschuss [Gottingen [21]952] 65, n.r),

[5] This corresponds to Luther's 'ore edi et bibi' (Solida Declaratio VII, 32: Die Bekenntnisschriften … 982), to the 'naturale corpus' (l.c, 33).

[6] Apologia Confessionis Augustanae 10 (Die Bekenntnisschrifien … 247/48).

[7] We should also note what 'usus' really means in the Lutheran vocabulary: the whole liturgical process, not the sola manducat lo quae ore fit (Solida Declaratio VII, 85 f.). Luthcrans take it for granted that Christ must be adored in the Eucharist in usu (Solida Declaratio VII, 15, 126). The concept of usus in Denz., 876 seems to be narrower.

[8] As in the latest essay by Regin Prenter: 'Das Augsburgische Bekenntnis und die romische Messopferlehre', Kerygma und Dogma I (1955) 42–58, esp. 55.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation actual happening. Otherwise there would be no point in the Lutheran restriction of this presence to the 'usus'. Nor in the linking of this presence to bread and wine. Nor in saying that the unbeliever eats the body – 'eating and drinking with the mouth'. Luther teaches expressly in the large catechism for instance, that the word must take place or the element remains a mere element, but that the sacrament only becomes the body and blood of Christ when the word is spoken.[9] One may call the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation a 'miraculous transformation' (of which more later), but it seems to me certain that to make the real presence of Christ the 'universal presence' of a 'love not bounded by space' is Calvinist at the very best: it is not Lutheran (against Prenter). There would have been no need in this position to appeal to the omnipotence of God and the marvellous nature of the happening, as Luther does (in the large catechism). Luther's effort to bring in the doctrine of the divine ubiquity to explain the real presence of the body of Christ is a theological after-thought, which should not be used as the invariable starting-point to explain and restrict the view which Luther wished to have maintained with regard to the sacrament, because the explanation should be brought into line with what is to be explained, and not vice versa. Hence the 'multiple presence at will' of Chemnitz ('ubicumque velit'; SD 29, 78, 92) is a more correct (though restrictive) interpretation of Luther's doctrine than the absolutely universal presence of the human [296] nature of Christ, as found in Brenz and the Formula Concordiae (803, ll. 11 and 18) and in the quotations from Luther in the SD, 81 ff.

2. The Council confesses that the real presence of Christ in the sacrament comes about by transubstantiation.

(a) The meaning of this affirmation is expressed as follows (Denzinger 877): conversio totius substantiae panis insubstantiam corporis Christi ... et totius substantiae vini in substantiam. sanguinis eius, quae conversio convenienter et propria a sancta catholica Ecclesia transsubstantiatio est appellata.[10] In the corresponding canon (Denzinger 884) this conversio is called mirabilis et singularis, and then further interpreted (the expression 'accident' from scholastic philosophy being avoided) by being said to take place 'manentibus dumtaxat speciebus panis et vini'.[11] This is not the first time that the expression transsubstantiatio occurs in documents of the magisterium. Berengarius' confession of faith at the Roman Council of 1079 mentions a 'substantialiter converti' (Denzinger 355), and the term transsubstantiari is used to describe the process by Pope Innocent III (Denzinger 416); transsubstantiatio is mentioned in the profession of faith drawn up by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215 – transsubstantiatis pane in corpus et vino in sanguinem, Denzinger 430) and that of the Second Council of Lyons (1274, Denzinger 465 – quod in ipso sacramento panis vere transsubstantiatur in corpus et vinum in sanguinem Domini nostri Jesus Christi).[12] The definition given in the Council of Trent is taken almost word for word from St Thomas, Ill, q. 75, a. 4.[13]

---

[9] The Solida Declaratio VII, 10, 121 is even clearer, as is the Formula Concordiae VII Negativa XI (Die Bekenntnisschrifien … 1014, 802): the body of Christ is present, ubi coelna Domini celebratur.

[10] The same definition in the Tridentine profession of faith (Denz. 997) and Denz. 1469 (Benediet XlV's profession of faith for the Orientals) and Denz. 1529 (against the synod of Pistoia).

[11] Elsewhere too the word 'species' is always used: sub specie illarum rerum sensibilium (Denz. 874), sub panis et vini specie (876), sub alterutra specie … (876), sub specie panis (877), sub unaquaque specie (885). But the expression vini accidentia is already found in a brief of Innocent III (416) and later in the condemnation of Wycliff by the Council of Constance (582); species pani set vini however in the fourth Lateran Council (430) and in the Decretum pro Armenis (698). (All numbers refer to Denz.)

[12] Further texts Denz. 544: transsubstantiatio; 581 against the affirmation of Wycliff at Constance: substantia panis ... et substantia vini ... remanent in sacramenta altaris; the same in Denz. 666; Decretum pro Armenis A.D. 1439, Denz. 698: substantia panis in corpus Christi … convertuntur; Decretum pro Jacobitis A.D. 1442, Denz. 715: transsubstantiari; Denz. 1529, against the Synod of Pistoia of A.D. 1794.

[13] Luther, however, is still wrong, when he ascribes the formation of the concept of transubstantiation to St Thomas (M. Luther, Werke, Kritische Gesamtausgabe VI, 456[36]). The expression comes from the theology of the 12th century (Magister Roland, about 1150; Stephen of Toumai, about 1160; Petrus Comestor 1160–1170).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[297] The Encyclical Humani Generis states disapprovingly that some Catholic theologians had voiced the opinion that the doctrine rested on the out-moded concept of substance and needed to be corrected (‘transsubstantiationis doctrinam, utpote antiquo notione philosophica substantiae innixam’, Denzinger 3018) – in the sense of a purely spiritual presence of Christ. Since the dogma of transubstantiation, even in its explicit formulation, has stood for centuries in the faith of the Church, the Church would have had to deny its own being, as it understood itself to be, if it gave up this doctrine. While the Council of Trent had had to struggle to find the correct expression for its faith in such matters as inherent righteousness, certainty of salvation and so on, it was otherwise with transubstantiation. There was no real debate about it at the Council. The Council regarded this doctrine as something definitive, on which there could be no going back.

(b) The Council finds proof of this doctrine[14] in the fact that Christ declares that what he offers (the Apostles) under the appearance of bread is his body. This means that if the words of consecration are to be taken in their strict and literal sense, and if they bring about the event of the presence of the body of Christ, then what Christ offers his Apostles is not bread, but his body. This statement, as it stands, must be accepted by all who refuse to give a vague, figurative meaning to the words of Christ. Hence we frequently find in the Lutheran confessions of faith the words ‘panem esse corpus Christi’ – and not first and last ‘porrecto pane simul adesse et vere exhiberi corpus Christi’[15] or the like. But if what Christ gives [298] his Apostles is his body, and if we must really and truly take it, without misgivings, that what our experience knows apart from our faith in the word of Christ is the same as before: then this two-fold premise, if it is not to be voided in one direction or the other, can be expressed by saying that what is given is really and truly the body of Christ, under the experimental reality (but only this!) of bread. If – borrowing an obvious terminology but not adopting its proper meaning – I call the proper, definitive and true reality of a concrete ‘substance’[16] the species (appearance,

---

[14] Cf. J. A. de Aldama, De S. Eucharistia[2] (Madrid 1953) 294 no. 105; ‘nota: argumentationem totam [on transubstantiation] fieri ex veritate verborum ... sc. nisi admittatur transsubstantiatio, veritas verborum Christi salvari non potest.’ This argument is said to be certain, at least along with the declaration of the Church. And apparently (ut videtur) also independently of it. After the Council, the opposing view of Scotus(?), Durandus and the Nominalists (DTC V, 1305f.), namely that transubstantiation cannot be proved from the words of Christ, is said to be no longer tenable.

[15] Concordia of Wittenberg, 1536, no. 2 (Die Bekennmisschriften … 65); Grosser Katechismus, De sacramenta altaris: ‘quomodo panis et vinum Christi corpus et sanguis esse possunt’; this is the more original formula, compared to (ibid.): ‘corpus et sanguinem ... in et sub pane …’. This is also recognized in the Solida Declaratio VII, 34/35 (Die Bckenntnisschrifien … 983): the words ‘sub pane, cum pane, in pane’ are to explain ‘panem ill coena esse corpus Christi’. The Schmalkaldlan Articles III, 6 (Die Bekenntnisschrifien … 450): ‘de sacramenta altaris statuimus panem et vinum in coena esse verum corpus et sanguinem Christi’ (In the German text: Vom Sakrament des Altars halten wir dass [unter] Brot und Wein im Abendmahl sei der wahrhaftige Leib und Blut Christi … [under the bread and wine is the true body and blood of Christ]’. The ‘under’ is therefore an addition or correction in the manuscript: Die Bekenninisschriften ... XXIV; contemporaneous but secondary).

[16] Cf. F. Selvaggi, ‘Il Concetto di sostanza nel Dogma Eucaristico in relazione alla fisica moderna’, Greg. 30 (1949) 7–45. We read p. 13:

> E’ ovvio che nella definizione conciliare il termine sostanza deve essere preso in primo luogo in questo significato volgare, vago ancora ed indeterminato, secondo il quale la sostanza del pane è semplicemente il pane, ciò per cui il pane è realmente pane, ciò che si richiede per la verità della proposizione: questo è pane ... Che la sostanza sia ens in se et per se subsistens, come rileveremo meglio in seguito, e una determinarione filosofica aggiunta a1 significate puramente volgare, e non richiesta dal senso della definizione ...

He goes on to say (17) that there is no apodictic proof to be drawn from the definition, that the species is a realtà oggetiva and (really) distinct from the substance. This is said to be only the interpretazione piu naturale delle formule del Tridentino, but not part of the dogma, merely the usual common doctrine of theologians. There is, he says, even less reason to count the other elements which Aristotle and St Thomas include under substance and accident (ens in se subsistens and ens in alio) as part of the dogma.

He says that modern science forbids us to speak as St Thomas did of a substantial form of bread which informs the mass of bread and gives it its substantial unity (42).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

look, understood as an objective but partial and particularly prominent reality); and if I see the species as the way the reality presents itself to a particular standpoint, but not as it is criticized and disclosed in its relativity from the true and absolute point of view – in this case, the word of God; then it can be said that what is given is not the substance of the bread, but the substance of the body of Christ under the species of [299] bread. If one also considers that the giving has the character of an event, that it includes or presupposes a happening, in other words, that it was not always true that this was the body of Christ, then one can and should express the matter as follows: what is offered to be eaten, the body of Christ under the species of bread, has come from the substance of bread by a change and transformation. One may call this a 'miraculous transformation' but still, transubstantiation is merely the exact form of the statement which is to be – logically – justified, and in which the Council sees the basis for the traditional doctrine of transubstantiation: that that which Christ gives his Apostles is his body, this and nothing else. If one said that what Christ gives his Apostles is bread and his body, understanding by bread, in a sort of positivist empiricism, the experimental reality strictly as such and nothing else, one would have said nothing contrary to Catholic dogma. At the most, one would not have covered it entirely. It is only when one says that the 'substance' of bread is there along with the substance of the body of Christ that one would be in formal contradiction to the Catholic dogma. But one would also have said something about which experience gives no information, and on which the words of Christ give no instruction, but rather say the contrary. For if what is given is also simply bread, hence bread from every aspect, hence the substance of bread – substance in the sense given above, which will be further developed, but not in the metaphysical sense of a given philosophical system – it would not be the body of Christ, but bread. And the bread could be called body only by the metonymy of taking the container for the contained, a metonymy unknown to tradition – and not suggested by the nature of things. But if one once accepts such a metonymy, a purely figurative and symbolic interpretation can no longer be excluded. The statement, of course, in the restricted sense first quoted above, would not be false, but it would say less than the Tridentine dogma. And one cannot say that one is rightly content with this modest formula, which simply couples extrinsically the word of Christ with the testimony of our limited, positivist experience. For this would mean that what is given is the body of Christ under the 'bread' in the merely empiricist sense. But then the question is inevitable: can this way of understanding bread in an empiricist and positivist sense be affirmed as absolutely as when we speak of bread in the language of everyday life, and mean bread which is also objectively and in itself nothing else but bread and is entirely bread? If the answer is yes, then the apparently modest statement of faith [300] and positivist experience would be the equivalent of maintaining two substances; and every connexion between the appearance of bread and the body of Christ would be eliminated, though there must be one, if that which is given in the form of bread is to be truly the body of Christ. If one does not say (at least silently) that the substance of bread has ceased to be, then one speaks of bread (in the empiricist sense), in so far as it has absolutely nothing to do with the presence of the body of Christ. But it can no longer be said of such 'bread' that it is the body of Christ.

(c) Up to the present, we have merely been trying to explain the reasons given by the Council for transubstantiation. This effort has already involved us rather deeply in the explanation of this Catholic dogma and the delimitation of its meaning. We have not in fact been able to avoid a particular interpretation of the meaning and its demarcation, for which we

---

If, he says, we follow modern physics when speaking of physical change, and call it a change which can be described by a definizione operativa, that is, one that can be registered by a series of at least conceivable experiments, transubstantiation is evidently not a physical change (44). In this sense, the dogma of the Eucharist is outside the scope of physics and scientific criticism. The Councils of thc Church never intended to define the scholastic theses of substance and accident. But the Church has made it sufficiently clear that it is fully in accord with this doctrine, which cannot be denied without temerity (44–45).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ourselves must take responsibility and where it is not certain that all Catholic theologians will agree with me. Some further remarks are called for on the meaning and limits of the affirmation which speaks of transubstantiation, even though this must be on our own account and at our own risk, and even though it means anticipating to some extent the subject matter of the third part of our investigation. If I go rather far afield, I can only ask to be excused. There is no other way of explaining what I mean.

First I should wish to make a conceptual distinction of a fundamental nature, which I shall make use of later. I should like to distinguish between a logical and an ontic explanation of a matter, and try to explain this distinction. The logical explanation of a statement about a given matter would be a statement which makes the statement to be explained clear, that is, more definite and unmistakable, by interpreting it on its own terms, that is, without appealing to matters distinct from the matter to be explained. The logical explanation – to put it crudely for the moment explains by giving precisions, but does not affirm anything else in explanation of the matter in hand. Hence the conceptual tools used for the explanation can be deciphered in the matter itself and derived from it. This would still be the case if the verbal terminology used in the explanation were actually derived from somewhere else, provided that it were understood – implicitly or explicitly – that the terminology thus used was intended only in the sense, scope and implications which result from the matter to be explained itself. I suspect that we have in theology many such logical explanations of originally dogmatic statements. That it is sometimes, not always, so, may perhaps be indicated by the fact that the more [301] precise declaration and interpretation of this declaration may vary widely among theologians, so much so, that one must ask oneself what is really held in common about the objective content of the dogma, when the further explanations differ so widely. I must forbear to give examples. But I may say in passing that the efforts of Catholic theologians to give an ontic explanation of the dogma of transubstantiation are profoundly different, and that this seems to me to indicate that the dogma of transubstantiation itself is a logical explanation of the words of Christ, not an ontic one, such as is attempted in the various free opinions put forward by Catholic theologians in the further explanation of transubstantiation. But more of this later. The ontic explanation of a statement about a given matter would be the explanation which asserts something else than the matter in question, but something which is capable of rendering it intelligible, and so preserving it from misunderstandings, by giving for instance indications of its cause, of the precise, concrete way in which it came about and so on. I have explained the darkness before my eyes ontically when I connect the statement, ‘it grows dark before my eyes’ with the switching off of the light or a physiological atrophy of the nerve of sight.

It should then be clear at once, that for the proper understanding of a logical explanation the retrospective reference to the assertion to be explained always remains necessary. For it is always a matter of the same content, and in the cases met with in theology, this is never accessible independently of the original formulations which are to be explained. Hence it seems to me that the ancient dogma of the Church about the hypostatic union of the two natures in the one person of the Word is an example of such a logical explanation of what is said in the Scriptures about Jesus Christ. One remarks in fact that when one tries to grasp the meaning of nature and hypostasis, in so far as they are really distinct from one another – which is the only way that these concepts are useful in the doctrine of the hypostatic union – one constantly has to have recourse to statements such as are made of Christ precisely in Scripture. The ontic explanation however (as the little example given above shows) is not confined to the matter to be explained but exists in its own right, because it in fact expresses another content. We cannot go into further particulars of the question here: but in spite of the constant retrospective reference in the logical explanation to the statement to be explained, a reference from which it derives its vitality and without which it perishes in empty [302] verbalism and a conceptual rationalism without content, the logical explanation is of supreme importance. Everyone knows

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

why basically, everyone uses this sort of explanation. Anyone who studies biblical theology for instance tries to say exactly what Scripture says, and yet cannot simply repeat the words of Scripture. The difference between Catholic and Protestant theology here seems to me to be only this – an essential one, to be sure – that for the Catholic theologian the logical explanation of the words of Scripture by the Church can become a definite truth of faith, while on principle for the Protestant theologian it remains – theology, which is always subject to revision in the opposite sense. We may remark in passing that though the logical explanation can become unchangeable dogma for us, our explanation still shows that a qualitative difference remains as regards Scripture. Both for its validity as binding in faith, and for its content and meaning, such a formula always remains bound to the word of Scripture (or primitive tradition), just as of course the word of Scripture only remains living and judging when it constantly finds its way into each changing historical situation through dogmatically binding explanations (of a logical type).

Presupposing this distinction, I should like to put forward the thesis that the dogma of transubstantiation (in so far as it is really strict dogma) is a logical and not an ontic explanation of the words of Christ taken literally. This of course must be properly understood. It does not imply that the statement about transubstantiation is not concerned with any objective reality as to its content. It does of course affirm a reality. It intends to say exactly what Christ says: that what he gives is his body and no longer bread, though bread had been there, because his declaration effectively changes the reality and produces what it affirms: the reality of the body of Christ instead of the substance of the bread. I call the doctrine of transubstantiation logical on account of its relationship to the words of Christ, which are to be explained and guarded against all misunderstandings that would weaken or deny their sense. By this I mean that the doctrine of transubstantiation tells me no more than do the words of Christ, when I take them seriously. The function of this doctrine is not to explain the real presence by accounting for how it takes place, so that the manner of its coming, understood in itself as another process, .would explain how the real presence came to be. Transubstantiation, as a dogma, means more than just any sort of a real presence, but it does not affirm anything more than the real presence which is there when what is given [303] is understood as the presence of the body of Christ. It is a way of formulating the truth that the body is present, and it is correct and significant so far as it explains and defends that truth. But it is not an explanation which reduces the truth to something else which could be grasped in its own distinct content. This thesis does not mean that the dogma so understood, and thus limited to its defined sense, has not further implications which in certain circumstances may also be made explicit in theological reflexion. The further explanation of the dogma of transubstantiation as given by theologians in books and class-room does in fact go beyond what is certainly defined in the dogma, and tries to turn the logical explanation of the words of Christ into an ontic one. This or that attempt may be, at least to some extent, the common doctrine of the schools. Possibly some element of such an attempt may be so strongly supported by stringent reasoning and the universal consent of theologians that it cannot be positively called in doubt without temerity (as we say). It may be that the Church rejects a particular effort in the line of a further ontic explanation of transubstantiation and the words of Christ which are given logical precisions thereby, as denying or endangering its dogma. But all such efforts of scholasticism in their various forms (reproduction, adduction, pure conversion and so on), presupposing the standard metaphysics of substance and accident accepted by this scholasticism – and which I for my part find quite correct – and other attempts of the same kind which are rather based on a Cartesian or a dynamic notion of material being, are explanations which are not to be identified with the dogma. This rests solely on the words of Christ, and implies only the possibility of what is implied in these words of Christ: it does not imply other matters which can only be known by presupposing a given philosophical system. Since it is not always easy to keep the two matters clearly apart, differences of opinion may occur among Catholic theologians as to what on the one hand is precisely and clearly implied in the dogma of transubstantiation (because implied in Christ's words) and therefore belongs to the dogma, and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as to what on the other hand only belongs to the theological explanation of the doctrine in terms of a given philosophical conception. But that the two things must be distinguished on principle is undoubtedly accepted by all Catholic theologians. The dogma therefore, with regard to its sense quoad nos, is to some extent blurred round the edges: but this it shares with all human utterances, even those of Scripture. I can understand a text of Scripture quite well and accept it unconditionally, and still be in the dark [304] as to whether this or that is implied in its meaning and hence affirmed along with the truth.

What is the proof that the doctrine of transubstantiation intends to be no more than a logical explanation, in our sense, of the words of Christ? It seems to me to be the fact that on the one hand, the Council declares that this doctrine is derived from the words of Christ.[17] Hence one can say that it can imply no more than what results from these words. This is not however a clear proof of the thesis put forward. It is possible a priori that a statement could be deduced from another, the content of which is not the same as the first. But if one notes on the other hand that apart from the meaning of the dogma so postulated and defined, the further theological explanation displays either merely verbal agreement or a lack of unity; and if one notes that the theologians state expressly, as a principle, that a distinction must be made between the content of the dogma as such, and its theological explanation with the help of certain metaphysical presuppositions: it all adds up to the correctness of the thesis.

If this thesis is presupposed, we can only repeat what we have already said about the meaning of the dogma of transubstantiation. How substance is to be understood dogmatically in the strict definition of the Council, what species (appearance, figure) means here, is to be derived from the statement itself which is to be explained. In an adequate and comprehensively valid statement of reality, therefore where God speaks or where man may rightly speak on his own behalf, substance is that which makes it objectively true that a certain thing pointed to and distributed is either really bread and bread alone, or is not bread, but the body of Christ. The species is the empirical appearances of a thing, as it presents itself to us, but not as criticized from a higher, more comprehensive, 'truer', standpoint. In this sense of the words we say: out of the substance of bread, while the mere species of bread remains, the substance of the body of Christ has come to be. The Catholic magisterium (in 'Humani Generis') has recently rejected various efforts on the part of some Catholic theologians which looked for an easy solution, by interpreting away rationalistically the concepts of substance and species, giving a much too intelligible distinction between concrete reality and religious interpretation. The former became a parallel to accident, the latter to 'substance' and [305] transubstantiation was made very understandable, much too understandable. This will not do, because in the Catholic understanding of the faith, it is impossible to evaporate either the substance of bread or the substance of the body of Christ by idealizing them as some sort of realities only in the world of meaning and interpretation. Christ speaks in the dimensions in which he very concretely gives food to his Apostles, that food being his body. But even this most recent rejection of an incautious effort to interpret the doctrine of transubstantiation has in no way expanded the strictly defined dogma of the real presence of Christ and of transubstantiation. It still has the simple meaning which we have ascribed to it.

(d) Why the Lutheran confession of faith rejects transubstantiation while affirming the real presence I have not been able to see. In the Schmalkaldian Articles it is rejected as 'cunning sophistry'.[18] In the Formula Concordiae it is rejected as papistical, without any further reasons being given. In the Solida Declaratio[19] of the Formula Concordiae it is rejected only in a passing [17] According to de Aldama, it is no longer possible to hold, with the nominalist theologians of the late middle ages, that transubstantiation can be arrived at except from the words of Christ.

[18] Die Bekenntnisschriften ... 452.

[19] Ibid., 977, 983.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reference. But we may perhaps find here (983) an explanation of the negative attitude, because the Protestant doctrine of the union of bread and body is seen as an analogy to the doctrine of the two natures in Christ – though here it must be emphasized that the Solida Declaratio itself has to allow for the difference between a hypostatic and a sacramental union, and does so candidly. The third place where the Solida Declaratio speaks of the matter[20] likewise offers no further explanations. In the Confession of Augsburg and in the Apology the question is, as we know, evaded, and even the Refutation of the Confessio Augustana refers rather timidly to the fact that the doctrine of transubstantiation should be added to the teaching on the presence of the Confessio Augustana. No doubt there were several motives at work in the rejection. Some of the scholastic speculation with regard to transubstantiation may have been identified with the defined dogma, so that the dogma itself especially from the point of view of a Protestant understanding of faith and theology – could have been taken to be 'cunning sophistry' and hence contested. One might also ask whether a more modern and positivist concept of reality did not play a part when it was maintained that the bread remained as it was before, hence that the substance of the bread remained. The rejection of the adoration offered to Christ in the sacrament outside the 'usus and the rejection of medieval devotion to the Eucharist may also have affected the issue, though there is no stringent [306] logical connexion between the two matters. The appeal to Scripture (1 Cor. 10.16; 11.28), where Paul calls the Eucharist 'bread' is probably a Scripture argument produced as an after-thought, because there is no reason why St Paul should not have called the Eucharist bread, either by reason of the species or by reason of its character as 'heavenly' food, whether there was transubstantiation or not. Perhaps the objection raised most recently by Prenter, that the Catholic doctrine involves a 'miraculous transformation', points after all in the right direction, to the ultimate source of all disagreement. I say what I mean in frankly polemical terms and hope to give offence to nobody: it is an effort to confine the action of God to the purely divine sphere; it does not intervene to change anything where the things of the world are – the bread, morals, the grave and so on. It remains somewhere beyond the experience of unbelief, which is quite true, but it also remains outside worldly reality itself; God's in his heaven; but nothing happens where the bread is. But then to my mind it would be more logical to say: Christ is present only in faith, indeed only through faith. It would then not be just an accident that on the whole the doctrine of Zwingli or Calvin has prevailed to a great extent with regard to the Lord's Supper. But this does not prevent us from being glad of the amount of agreement which exists between the Lutheran and the Catholic doctrine.

3. WHAT REMAINS OBSCURE AND OPEN?

I mean among us Catholics. And here I must be brief.

1. To begin with, the controversies in the schools about various Catholic efforts to express the dogma more exactly and give it an ontic explanation remain open and obscure. It is quite impossible even to list them briefly. But from various points of view, they are in themselves not unimportant. For their being tolerated in the Church, that is, the fact that the magisterium sees no threat to dogma in them, in spite of their mutual opposition, shows that one must really make a distinction in this question between theology and metaphysical ontic explanation on the one hand, and dogma and (logical) explanation on the other, so that really the most that is left open is where exactly to draw the line between the two. These scholastic controversies need a good cleaning, to rid them of the dust of the school-room, and little has been done in this matter. When properly understood and sincerely debated, they are concerned to a great extent [307] with matters which could be important for the understanding of the dogma itself. The

[20] Ibid. 1010.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

adductionism of Bellarmine and the view defended for instance by de la Taille with reference to St Thomas, have as their foundation or as their consequence a very profound difference in the real nature of 'presence' in the real presence; the 'spatiality' of this presence is conceived very differently in each case. These questions could still be of interest to controversial theology in inter-denominational discussions. But first Catholic theologians must learn to see the theological importance of such ancient controversies between the schools in a new light.

2. A clearer line of demarcation must be drawn in our question between the dogma and the theological propositions. The difference is no doubt recognised as a matter of principle. But in actual practice, the explanation of the dogma becomes the theology of the schools, without much notice being taken of the change. I do not think that every manual of theology announces at once like Selvaggi when it comes to the notion of substance, that 'ens per se et in se subsistens' goes beyond the popular notion as given in the definition of Trent. The effort at demarcation which we have made cannot claim to enjoy universal support, and still less, that it could not be better and clearer, even if one is convinced that an absolute delimitation, which is clearly made in conscious thought, is quite impossible, given the structure of human knowledge.

3. A more precise definition would also be very desirable for the concept 'substantia panis'. Not only is it not quite clear what is the popular concept of substance, in contrast to a strictly systematic one in philosophy, but it is not quite clear what 'substantia panis' means. Here we meet with obscurity, precisely when one keeps to the theology of the schools and does not take the popular notion of substance as described above, but follows a procedure, justifiable in itself and perhaps logically stringent, and thinks of it as the 'ens per se et in se' of scholastic philosophy as most, if not all, Catholic theologians do. For then it must be said that the substance of bread, as envisaged by St Thomas and the Fathers of the Council – envisaged, not defined – does not exist. One may be convinced of the permanent validity of the metaphysical concept of substance, one may hold that this concept can be defended in a transcendental a priori methodology against all empiricism as a condition of possibility of any true affirmation. But still one can no longer maintain today that bread is a substance, as St Thomas and the Fathers of the Council obviously thought it was. One can only regard a morsel of bread as an agglomeration [308] of substances and we do not know in which elementary particles the notion of substance is verified, and in what particular fashion this concept can be imagined as verified in material beings, in view of the lack of sharp distinction between one particle and its surroundings, its 'field', etc. One could of course say that these questions made no difference to the dogma or to its ordinary metaphysical interpretation in the schools. One could say that if there is substance at all (and it is still certain that there is, even when the most modern physics is supposed, when this does not cease to be physics to become a mere positivism, not just methodologically but in objective content), and if there is an agglomeration of substances in bread (which may also be taken for granted), then there can be a transubstantiation of the substance of bread in the metaphysical sense (which goes beyond the necessary meaning of the dogma). It would be transubstantiation of the agglomeration of substances which we call bread, and hence theology would be justified in holding on to its ancient position, unaffected by the changes in modern science. We do not intend to challenge this answer. But one may perhaps doubt whether it is adequate.

First of all, it would be interesting to hear more precisely from the theologians who give this answer, what are the hermeneutical principles of conciliar interpretation which allow them to reach their agglomeratum substantiarum from the 'substantia panis' of the Council. What is to prevent our saying that the Fathers of the Council thought of bread as one substance, and hence this is what they defined and hence this is what also exists? Is not this the procedure used in other cases where the assertions of a Council are interpreted? What then are the exact hermeneutic principles which must necessarily be deduced from such observation of the actual interpretation of conciliar statements? And then there is the question of the content: is the agglomeration in question, being an agglomeration of substances, of such a nature that one can say that the bread

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

