Furthermore, the question can remain open as to which spatial and temporal points this self-transcendence of the world's evolution into the history of freedom has reached. In any case, this self-transcendence has been achieved in our realm of experience. If, then, given these premises and in this framework Christian revelation (the more precise formal nature of which need not be discussed here, but which does not postulate an additional miraculous intervention of God, but rather, in the realm of our own experience, actually occurs freely wherever the created spirit's unlimited transcendentality is present) maintains that this world evolution, which at the highest point of its development evolves into spirit, once again actually moves beyond itself (in what is called grace and glory) toward an immediacy to the absolute God, then that can be understood, even when it is nothing more than a datum of revelation, as a prolongation of the world's evolution which, through the power of God himself tends toward that spirit which has an immediacy to God himself.

In a world evolution of this kind matter cannot be conceived as a mere launching pad which is left behind, or the first stage of a movement which is simply cast off. The dogma of the resurrection of the body prevents the Christian thinker from subscribing to this idea.

Even though it is not possible to have much of any positive notion as to what function the material element itself will have and what part it will still have to play in this kind of a final

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

phase of spirit in its immediate unity with absolute spirit, still this dogma which says that matter will be taken up into the finality of the unsurpassable perfection of created spirit, is an apotheosis of matter the likes of which a wretched materialism does not even dare to conceive. (Incidentally, [55] if one conceives the angels in a Platonic but not unbiblical way as having some sort of relationship to matter, then their glory is still no argument against what we have said.) From this, natural scientists would have to take warning that they do not have the right to let the material world disappear at the end, for example, through a gravitational collapse in the black hole of nothingness. Just as they have no right or obligation to "inquire beyond" the big bang, so too it is not their part to speculate about an absolute end of all material reality.

In this kind of integration of salvation history into the entire evolution of the cosmos, something which is at least conceivable, there is a further element for Christian faith. In an evolution of this kind, properly understood, one must allow for surprises, defective developments, dead ends, for a total halt to progress as such. It is precisely for this reason that Christian faith goes on to affirm, with an optimism which stems from God's grace and goes beyond all conceivable pessimism, that this world evolution in the phase of its spiritual history is not only capable of arriving at an immediacy to God, but that even now it has entered upon a phase through which, in a way that is irreversible for the totality of the history of freedom (prescinding from a theoretical affirmation about the individual person), this goal will actually be attained, and that the catastrophe, which in itself is possible, and the total halt to progress will not come to pass. This irreversibility and this orientation toward a future goal that will actually be attained, which are characteristic of the world's evolution and its history of freedom, are present for Christians in the Christian dogma of Jesus Christ as the "Logos of God made flesh," as God's irrevocable promise of salvation in Jesus of Nazareth.

In our context it is especially worthy of note that the point at which God in a final self-communication irrevocably and definitively lays hold on the totality of the reality created by him is characterized not as spirit but as flesh. It is this which authorizes the Christian to integrate the history of salvation into the history of the cosmos, even when myriad questions remain unanswered, as can happen. No matter how clearly and precisely theology and natural science have to be distinguished from one another and the line of demarcation drawn between them, they both have to do with one another, because human beings in all their dimensions, who are nature, endure nature, and pursue the science of nature, are called to that salvation which is the incomprehensible God himself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[56]

3

THEOLOGY TODAY

One might proceed from Christian theology's understanding of itself and from this standpoint survey the other sciences which have gathered together in a university to create an universitas litterarum with the express purpose of being more than just items in a huge shopping center with scarcely any relationship to one another beyond the common purpose of being sold to the individual customers. Conversely, one could proceed from the stand point of the other sciences in the university and ask theology to justify its presence in this gathering. Using today's methods of the philosophy of science a plan could be drawn up containing the whole spectrum of all possible human sciences and then the question could be asked whether in the purpose of this general plan there would be any place for something like theology. One could continue the almost two-centuries-old debate by asking if theology can lay claim to being a science and what its justification is for this claim and what right it has to demand a place in the university.

Well, what about this? Do we theologians feel at home in today's university? Do they not tolerate us simply because the other faculties have problems enough of their own without wrangling with theology, which, after all, does not do anybody any harm? Does the state tolerate theology in the university simply because it does not overburden the budget and because the political parties and public opinion are not as anticlerical as they were a hundred years ago, not because people have become more devout, but because nowadays it is easier to adopt a stance of tolerant indifference than it used to be? Since my treatment of this subject is going to aim at something [57] different than my preliminary remarks indicate, as will soon become evident, I think that the following observations are in order by way of anticipation.

Can anyone tell me why a university should not have theology? Because it is not a science? Well, does anyone really know for sure just what a science is in a university today? Is it because the theological faculties, divided as they are according to confessions, do not represent all Christians, much less those citizens who have no intention of being Christians? But how would it be if these faculties, separated along confessional lines, would work together in an ecumenical spirit and each would positively affirm the other? Must an area of learning which has its proper place in a university be sustained by the interest of the public as a whole? If this were the case, then quite a few university subjects would have to be dropped due to lack of interest on the part of the public at large. Do not large segments of the citizenry who are characterized by a certain philosophy of life have the right to insist that at a university supported by their own taxes questions which are crucial to their own existence be dealt with from the standpoint of scientific reflection? This argument would be especially valid if these Christian groups within a secular society should have no fundamental objection to according a place of scientific reflection in the university to other fundamental ideological conceptions along with that of Christianity, in the case where the size of their membership and the social stability of their organization manifest a more or less similar significance in society to that of the Christian churches.

THE HISTORY OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY

Is not most of what theological faculties pursue as object of their science a part of the intellectual heritage of our culture and our people, so that this object is as worthy of reflection

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

in a university as other objects belonging to our historical tradition, which are studied in the historical branches of the most diverse sciences such as the history of art, the history of medicine, folklore, and so on? If theology were to disappear from the universities, would it not have to be let in again through the back, door, into philosophy, the history of culture, and so on? Nowadays the universities throw open their [58] portals to the most exotic fields of interest such as parapsychology, and so on. Would it be sensible and would it be just to banish theology?

People who want to banish theology from the university in the name of ideological neutrality, which would have the sciences unencumbered by previous assumptions, as they say – something which only the nineteenth century considered viable – or because they have latent anticlerical or antireligious sentiments, should bear in mind that theology would continue to exist even after this banishment, but that serious harm would be done to its spirit of objectivity, of tolerance, and of unemotional reflection. Yet these are the very things which the adversaries of university theology esteem most highly.

Nowadays Christian theologies are looking out beyond their own boundary posts in a very intensive way; they are drawing into their ken all of the world religions and the important ideological positions. Even someone who does not otherwise have much use for theology should appreciate this contribution to cultural cooperation on a global level. And finally, both theological faculties (Catholic and Protestant) work just as seriously and produce just as much as similar humanistic disciplines. A university science would demean itself if it were to measure its ultimate value by the yardstick of commercial utility. Truth is under no obligation to vindicate itself to purely pragmatic or financial interests. My teacher Heidegger once said in a lecture that metaphysics was a subject that had no practical value, something that housemaids made fun of. Well, that is precisely its dignity. And that goes for theology as well. Even today it may move about with unperturbed pace in the halls of a university. The fact that it cannot do this in many other countries is no benefit to the scientific enterprise of those countries but rather a detriment which dates back to a time which the German-speaking countries were lucky enough to survive without incurring this damage.

THE TASK OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY

Here I would like to speak about one particular task of theology vis-à-vis all other sciences in the university. I do not claim that this task can be accomplished in principle only by theology conducted in the academic framework of a university. I have no quarrel with anyone [59] who says that he or she is taking up and accomplishing this task without wanting to be a theologian. What I mean is that this task is so inextricably bound up with theological science that theology would disown its own inmost nature should it fail to address itself to this task. It might appear that philosophy, at least in its classical form, accomplishes this task which I am claiming for theology. If philosophy does this, then that is alright by me. It will have to see how far it gets in accomplishing this task. It is just that I have the feeling that the more modern, theoretical, and scientific philosophy becomes, the less it accomplishes this task. I am not saying that theology alone and in all of the university has solely that task that I am going to treat of today. I only mean that theology would not really be theology should it fail to do this one task. In this discussion it will not be possible to point up the connection between this task and the other tasks which theology has to accomplish in its historical and systematic work.

The Concern of Theology Is God

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What, then, is this task that I have been leading up to in this vague and roundabout way? I cannot answer this question by giving a simple formula that everyone can understand. Let me offer a consideration which might help you to understand what I mean. The concern of theology is God. What if someone should say that theology does not really have to do with God, but rather with speaking of God, with particular reference to the problem of whether one can speak of God at all, and hence this speaking of God is best left to people who have the courage to do so? I would say that ultimately it is God himself that is meant both when we speak of God and when we speak about the words we are using when we speak of God. If this is not the case, then theology would have to be dismissed as a lot of idle chatter replete with old-fashioned images and one should not waste a lot of time and energy fabricating a theology of the death of God. It would be a shame to invest so much time in composing these funeral orations for God; the positivistic natural scientist who makes no mention of God at all would be more honest and he or she would be more preferable to the theologian who literally talks himself or herself to death. I am assuming here – without pretending to justify [60] this assumption right now – that it is possible in all seriousness to speak of God as God, not only because he exists but also because he has made it possible for us to speak of him. It is without doubt terribly difficult to give a more precise explanation of how finite human beings can speak of God without losing sight of the object they want to speak of when they begin to speak of God. The various Christian theologies differ widely in their attempts to explain this. Despite all this one can speak of God in theology. The courage to advance this claim is essential to theology. If and when theology no longer speaks of God and cannot speak of God in a way that God is meant per se, even if it stammers in the attempt to do this and has to hedge itself in with unnumerable reservations; if speaking of God did not mean for us that we were ultimately speaking of God per se, or at least that it would be possible for us to speak about the existence of God per se no matter where we might experience this existence, then theology would have died by its own hand.

Who is meant, then, by this God whom theology claims that it is able to speak of? If God is really to be God and to remain God, then what is meant by this God is the unutterable mystery, he who is ineffable and that which is ineffable, the mysterium ineffabile. To speak of him means only that we have come to that final instant after which we must lapse into a silence that fills all the heavens for all eternity. We Christians, of course, confess that it is precisely this ineffable mystery, which cannot be expressed in words, that has drawn near to us in Jesus, who is our forgiveness and our eternal life. But this God who has drawn near to us would be transformed into a finite creature had he not come precisely as the incomprehensible one who as such cannot be encompassed, if the beatific vision of God face to face were not also the unconditional surrender of blissful love before the incomprehensibility of God, in which surrender the knowledge which reaches out to take possession of its object dissolves itself in freedom in the eternal orthopraxis of love.

Theology is the speaking about the incomprehensible mystery which we call God. If a science always presupposes an object which can be palpably grasped and classified, then theology may not presume to be a science given this presupposition It must aspire to something beyond this. It must break through the borders which are imposed upon an individual science by its very nature. It must extend its interest to everything if it is required to speak of the [41] unfathomable primordial ground of all reality. The object of its interest can be nothing but God, if this true God is exalted in a way that no words can express above all that exists or can be conceived outside of himself. It must address itself to everyone since God is the concern of every human being whether he or she wants this or not, and because every form of indifference to the all-encompassing mystery of his existence has as its result the most frightening relationship to this God, and does not really bring about his absence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This theology must always speak in such a way as to be always aware that it is only repeating in feeble and inadequate words what the existence of every human being, who is constantly being pursued by God, bears testimony to – and it must continue to do this whether people listen or not. Theology must, of course, always point to Jesus Christ, not because he is the explanation of this burning mystery but because he plunges us into it by the accomplishment of his death and forbids us once and for all to stop short of it and to occupy ourselves exclusively with what we can perceive within the narrow horizons of our own life. Even when theology speaks of Jesus Christ, then this speaking can only be understood when it speaks of him as the one who has passed into this mystery through death. This death is itself a part of the fate of this mystery and it has given us the strength of faith, hope, and love which enables us to participate in this consuming mystery without being destroyed by it or turning away from it by acting as though it did not exist.

Theology and the Natural Sciences

What strange things happen when theology establishes itself within the university as though it had every right to do so! The sciences are assembled there; each one of them says, with a kind of suspect modesty, of course, that the research in its field is far from completed, that important and exciting discoveries lie ahead. But each science does know what its own field is, and it is the business of science to bring to light the things that are as yet unknown in this field by pushing forward the frontiers of its assiduous research. Theology thrusts itself into this illustrious circle with a sincerely respectful bow. At the outset theology arrives on the scene in a way that the other sciences do not even recognize it for what it really is; [62] they mistake it for a part of the thoroughly acceptable science of history and culture which is known as the science of religion. And then this theology, with a mixture of embarrassment and audacity, takes it upon itself to speak in this circle, and it is not only addressing the world beyond this temple of science, but it is actually addressing the other sciences themselves. It claims that it has a right to do this and insists that it is fully justified in remaining in this circle and going about its business.

Theology is quite aware that as soon as it opens its mouth the other sciences will gang up on it and declare that the subject of theology can be of no possible interest to the other sciences as such, because the object of theology by definition cannot be found in these other sciences. The other sciences even begin to utter threats about expelling theology or bringing about its demise by applying the impressive array of highly effective means at their disposal: by means of philology, which annuls or relativizes the sacred texts of theology, by means of psychology and social science, which are able to trace in an all too painfully clear way the origin of this odd cultural phenomenon, now gasping in the final throes of its existence, and show how it is involved in a last-ditch attempt to keep its head above water.

Even nowadays, of course, not a few exponents of these other sciences can be found who admit that they are personally religious themselves, but only in their lives as private persons outside of their scientific profession. And in certain circumstances they can even get interested in theology in much the same way as a professor of Sumerian history might take note of a recent moon landing from the daily newspaper. But by and large these scientists do not want to have anything to do with God in the area of their own science. A crucifix might just about be tolerated in a room of a university clinic, but certainly not in a lecture hall. They consider it to be a sign of benign tolerance when the individual sciences do not involve themselves in matters theological, but beyond this nothing at all is owed to theology, except of course to treat it as a cultural phenomenon or as an element of human consciousness which remains a factor to be reckoned with in psychology or psychoanalysis.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But conversely, theology today vis-à-vis the other sciences has become cautious and reserved even to the point of timidity. It is glad that it is even tolerated. And when its representatives discourse with other scientists, it is a distinct rarity that theology itself is the [63] principal partner in the dialogue. This timidity on the part of theology is, in the last analysis, not engendered by the external situation in which it has to live in today's world, but is rather a consequence of its own history. It is theology itself which prompted and affirmed the idea of today's secular world, and then issued a declaration of its own incompetence in this world. The God of theology seems today to be shrouded in silence; the Christ of theology can no longer be found in the uppermost sphere of the caelum empyreum.

Well, then, should not theology withdraw from the university? Can it be that interdisciplinary dialogue between theology and the other sciences is really not possible or that it can only take place in the limited framework of the problems which come up in the other sciences in which theology perforce has a special interest, even when these problems do not really constitute its primary object? My answer is no. Despite all these fundamental difficulties, theology still has something to say to the other sciences, because theology speaks of God and in so doing lays open a dimension which human beings in their autocratic autonomy cannot be the custodians of, because this dimension of God's incomprehensibility is something which does not belong to human beings, but rather human beings belong to it. And for this very reason human beings must be ultimately understood as creatures who are always and fundamentally incomprehensible, creatures whose definition cannot be circumscribed by any limits.

For this reason theology stands as the official representative of a radical opposition to any attempt to absolutize any reality which can be experienced immanently and any immanent value, and the servants of these realities and values are also the natural sciences. Our late-bourgeois mode of thought always perceives the Church and its theology as the guarantor for a perduring conservatism. That is a terrible delusion, but one for which churchmen really must bear a good deal of the blame. Because if we are serious in proclaiming that the incomprehensible God is the only center, the only fixed point which really does exist and is subject to no conditions whatsoever, then everything which exists outside of him – who is not at our disposal but rather we are at his disposal – is relative, temporary, conditioned, and constantly subject to relentless provisions. And this is precisely what theology must say and say it to the other sciences as well.

[64] This theological criticism will not become a part of the principles and methodologies of the individual science as such, but rather it will surround them like a distant horizon; it will address itself to the scientist and not to the individual science in its abstract form. At a time where we have come to recognize that theory and practice, objective science and the subjective pursuit of science, the aim of a science as determined by its intrinsic laws and the political manipulation of this aim cannot be exactly and clearly distinguished even to the point where the demand for objective science unencumbered by any previous assumptions is itself subject to the suspicion of standing at the service of an extremely dangerous ideology, it does not really make any difference ultimately whether the theological criticism is directed to scientists or to their science.

If someone should raise the objection that criticism which relativizes a science is the business of the science itself and need not be delivered by theology, then due attention should be paid to the following point. In point of fact scientists really do run a high risk of positing their science as absolute, of considering their own categories and horizons of understanding as the only useful ones for explaining everything. In point of fact the history of any given science has always been the history of arrogance and self-glorification as well. Furthermore, when and to the extent that any given science in the history of its own development to maturity becomes more modest, when it comes up against the limits which its own horizons

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of understanding and questioning have set for it, when it recognizes its boundaries either intrinsically or due to the power of another science and thereby transcends these boundaries, then it fortunately ceases to be itself, and its representatives move out of the area of their own science (a thing that can be often observed among the sages of antiquity) and begin to pursue theology (or, if you will, theology under the label of philosophy), whether they realize it or not. But when they do this and candidly own up to the fact that they are doing it, then they can have no serious objection to theology doing precisely the same thing in a formal and systematic way that they are doing on the basis of the mature wisdom of their own science or of their personal life experience. And theology does this in a way so radical that it knows no limit save that of losing itself in the incomprehensibility of God. When a science relativizes itself in this way, then what we have is not some marginal phenomenon but rather [65] something that permeates the science through and through, in each science, of course, in a different way.

Take the historical sciences as a concrete example of what we mean. They spend a lot of time and energy in pedantic devotion to detail in the area of verifiable facts. The price they pay for all this is that the rest of humanity could not care less. Does it not make a difference if, on the one hand, historians are convinced in their heart of hearts that history is the repository of a mysterious meaning even if the ultimate point of that meaning is always shrouded in the incomprehensibility of God, and, on the other hand, they are really and truly convinced that they cannot pass judgment and that the history of the world as we experience it is not the final judgment of the world? Need it have no bearing on the writing of history, even if not demonstrable in detail, when one is convinced that history as the history of freedom, which is almost impossible to discern and yet is present, produces something which attains eternal validity before God? Does the person who in his or her heart believes that this history together with its chronicle terminates in sheer nothingness write ultimately the same history as another person? Does history not contain enough realities which are actually there to be discerned but which are overlooked when the questions which theology raises are bracketed out right from the start?

The natural sciences might have their secret pride in being “exact” and for this reason not having God come up in their experiments, and today it is not only the natural scientists but even the theologians as well who combat the real or supposed illusion that God has to appear as an individual datum in the area of scientific empiricism. Of course, when they asked Kekulé* what his religious persuasion was, he answered, “Chemist.” It is true that even today not a few natural scientists are susceptible to this crass stupidity manifested by this great scientist. But natural scientists too should constantly accept theology’s reminder that the world view which is actually a part of their lives and not just something conceived by the monopolistic claims of the natural sciences is something which cannot be determined by their natural science alone; that spirit, freedom, fidelity, love, the infinite question of existence cannot be “explained” by natural science alone, even though the attempt is made over and over [66] again; that people in their thinking always proceed from an infinite question before they begin to ask the experimental questions of natural science – and this infinite question is not merely the extrapolation of the questions posed in the natural sciences and answered soberly as individual questions of limited extent. Is it really prejudicial to objective and modest natural scientists when they are reminded by theologians that the principal and ultimate questions of humanity have already been reflected upon in a profound way and with the utmost existentiell seriousness even before natural science in today’s sense of that term began to exist; that this reflection in antiquity was more profound and more differentiated than natural scientists imagine, given their limited field of research, and that this reflection is

* Friedrich August Kekulé, 1829-1896, German chemist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not something that passes so rapidly into obsolescence? Is spirit merely the product of an evolution from below which in its turn is destined to disappear again, or do matter and spirit originate from an ultimate mystery which establishes both as distinct and lets both be related to one another without dissolving them by merging them into a common inert identity?

However one may determine the more precise relationship between theology and the natural sciences, one thing is clear and theology must insist on this relentlessly: from the point of their inception and in their end result the things that natural scientists themselves personally pursue in their science reach beyond the immediate object of these sciences and in an existentiell sense they are more dangerous than this object. Scientific activity is the free and responsible act of human beings, and this act is always something greater than what natural scientists as scientists are able to apprehend. And this it is which compels them to be something more than natural scientists.

Social scientists have an involvement with theologians because religion and church are social entities which readily admit of critical analysis. But conversely, social scientists have the obligation to open themselves to theologians' questions. For the more strictly and exactly they conceive and understand their science, the easier it is for them to yield to the temptation to view human beings merely as objects of general functional laws, merely in terms of what can be comprehended in a scientific way. But even when human beings are reduced to objects of a social blueprint, even when in theory or practice they are degraded to nothing more than elementary particles [67] of a universal social process that functions blindly, then they still remain free subjects with a history which must ultimately be experienced and which cannot be calculated in advance; they still remain creatures with an openness which always reaches out beyond any administrative manipulation toward that incomprehensibility which we call God.

But if this nature of the human being is not recognized, if methodologically it simply is not taken into account, then what we are left with are at the very most men and women who are living here as completely domesticated animals, no matter what elements of resourcefulness we might attribute to them. If such a thing should be possible contrary to all probability, then men and women would have become in an unexpected way creatures geared to consumption, death, and biological reproduction; in a way we did not expect, the end of humanity would have come through universal suicide. This end of humanity as such is also expected by Christians, but they see it in a much different light.

Whether or not they are aware of it, the social sciences are carried on within the most general horizons of understanding and within these horizons there belongs the question of whether human beings can be understood as nothing more than social creatures or whether they are creatures who constantly defy all clear-cut definitions and tend toward the incomprehensibility of God. Both East and West are in danger of understanding human beings in a materialistic way and in consequence of this of making them objects of mechanical manipulation. When theology rises in protest against this in the university even though its tiny voice might be faint and hesitant, then the social sciences ought to welcome this protest.

Theology and Universitas

If we assign to theology within the university always and especially nowadays the role of troublemaker, the role of the one who uncompromisingly relativizes everything which can be presumed to be unequivocal, the role of the one who constantly sounds the tocsin about a movement toward completion that knows no end, the role of skepticism properly understood, which is at once existentiell but at the same time something that we can live with, then this does not [68] mean (and I repeat this) that this is the same function of theology vis-à-vis the university as a whole. But I do deem this to be one of theology's functions, and not the least significant one. In this function theology finds itself in an awfully precarious position due both to its nature, which compels it to be concerned with God, and its job in the university. It is precisely in the university that theologians go about their task – which is not a particular one, or, if you will, not a scientific one – in the manner of a particular science with all the narrow-mindedness and egoism characteristic of specialists in any field, with the aggressiveness, with the myopic focus on the minutiae of their discipline which thrusts everything else aside, with the pomposity and the indefatigable production of books, in a word, with, all those things which characterize the representatives of any other established science. What theologians have to do then first of all is to subject their own science to all the criticism of that mysteriously silent humane element, of the absolute mystery which alone makes all science truly humane. Theologians know how poorly they accomplish this task of subjecting their own science to self-critical questioning in the name of God. For they are sinners, and this assessment of themselves as persons, which their own science imposes on them, applies to them also as theologians and scientists.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Because theologians do not do a very good job of practicing what they preach to the other sciences, the holy relativism and the silent openness to the ineffable mystery, it comes as no surprise to them, when they are received in the circle of the other sciences of the university with a certain indifference, and endured with a somewhat quietly impatient tolerance. The justification for this kind of treatment may often be attempted on grounds which theologians themselves are not entirely willing to accept. Nevertheless, they will understand their fate within the university as something which is due to other reasons. Those who speak of God and do it poorly, because it is difficult to speak of him at all, and half heartedly, because theologians' hearts are also divided, should not be surprised if what they say sounds jaded and encounters people who are not eve listening or only half listening. And yet they must go on speaking. For God must be spoken of, because there is no place from which his mystery can be absolutely excluded. It may be that when theologians speak of God in the university they have to speak in a manner that is different from the preacher in the pulpit or in the marketplace. There [69] is this difference, but it is a secondary one. Theologians must speak of God and not only of the words used in speaking about God. They would make their task easier for themselves and more acceptable if they would only speak about the words used in speaking of God. But if they did this, they would betray their true and ultimate task. Then they would be nothing more than philosophers of religion or scientists of religion. But in the university God himself must be spoken of. This speaking can only be hesitant. It would not be genuine at all, unless one had the impression that it were grappling with the ultimate problems of life, death, and existence, and if it were not totally different from what is otherwise spoken of at the university. Theological language of this sort, if one adds its orientation toward love, faithfulness, and commitment, can be nothing other then the final word before the human being becomes mute before the blessed mystery of God. But there is this word. It must also be spoken in the university, if this is to be the universitas of that which moves human beings.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[70]

4

THE PRESENT SITUATION OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

Today Catholic theology is no longer an exclusively European enterprise. In the United States Catholic theology has taken on contours that did not exist thirty years ago when it was still a mere outgrowth of European theology. Today, however, it has achieved a marked independence, particularly in the field of moral theology as well as in its critical encounter with Anglo-Saxon philosophy. There is a South American theology known as the theology of liberation which is working toward an explicit emancipation from European theology. The African, Indian, and Japanese Christians are also becoming conscious of their individuality, and they are addressing themselves to the task of developing an indigenous theology which was hardly even conceived of before the Second Vatican Council.

Furthermore, Catholic theology is also inevitably bound by the present trend to turn everything human into a science. Theology, therefore, must now come to terms with those sciences which it was not yet concerned with a few decades ago: linguistic philosophy, the philosophy of science, social sciences, the ever more refined and distinctly developed branches and methods of philology and history. Theology itself has evolved into such a variety of separate disciplines that they cannot possibly be mastered by an individual theologian; only with difficulty can these disciplines maintain contact with each other. In the fields of moral theology and pastoral theology new topics and problems are emerging which simply did not exist in former times. For these and many other reasons it is actually [71] impossible to give an exact account of the present situation of Catholic theology as such today. We must therefore be permitted to allude to various aspects which touch upon this subject as well as others through an arbitrary selection. Many details, and, above all, names will have to be omitted.

THE CHANGE IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

In the middle of the present century a profound change took place in Catholic theology. Neoscholasticism had been dominant until that time; its mentality had an effect on the methods in the historical branches of theology as well as on exegesis and the writing of church history. It was essentially an ecclesiastical science, which preferred to use Latin; by and large it had its established, clearly defined canon of topics and problems promulgated throughout the world. Neoscholasticism resolutely worked within the framework of these topics but rarely considered that its methodology was questionable. Its stance toward Protestant theology and modern intellectual movements was – with some exceptions – defensive and polemic. One withdrew, and this withdrawal took place in a way in which courageous and genuine faith and fearful repression interacted in a peculiar way, and this was considered to be the authentic spirit of the Church. One tried to live as far as possible in an ecclesial autarchy.

The questions which modernism, with its liberal biblical criticism and its evolutionary understanding of the history of dogma, put to the Church and its theology at the beginning of this century were partially answered and partially repressed by this anxious and defensive theology. Rather than being mastered in an open, self-assured, and creative way that would have permitted a positive synthesis between the old Christian faith and the modern mentality to be forged, they were dismissed by the administration of the Church. If we say that neoscholastic theology was the theology of an ecclesial community which was as far as possible turned in upon itself, a defensive, ivory tower theology which was associated with a certain middle-class stratum of society, then this is certainly not a definitive characterization which is accurate in every respect. It may, however, give us some idea of the difference between neoscholasticism and the theology that arose in the middle of this century which has taken [72] over from neoscholastic theology without giving rise to the dramatic internal discord that occurred at the beginning of this century during the crisis of modernism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE NEW THEOLOGY

This new theology cannot be characterized simply as the theology of the Second Vatican Council. With all of the progressiveness of the Council, traditional theology still predominated with its topics, its Latin, its terminology, its use of Scripture, and so on. Nevertheless, the new theology was present during the Council, and already had its effects without the occurrence of any dramatic controversies between the two theologies. This new theology, not purely identical with the nouvelle theologie in France after World War II which still encountered vehement opposition from Pius XII, is a theology which now quite naturally takes up the results of modern exegesis – and especially Protestant exegesis – and engages in biblical theology as it has developed under the influence of the historical critical method.

This new theology, less introspective than in former times, opens itself to the results of research in the history of dogma and the history of theology. With all due respect for the dogma of the Church, it does not strive to construe the results of this research in such a way that one would have to find the present-day teaching of the Church explicitly formulated in all ages and in all places. This new theology is more conversant with modern philosophy since Descartes and Kant. It sees the modern philosophy of German idealism, of existentialism, the Anglo-Saxon philosophy of language, and the scientific theories not simply as the enemy to be opposed, as they were for traditional neoscholasticism, but rather – without compromising its own individuality or shunning critical dialogue with these philosophies – purely and simply as the index of that milieu in which a Christian must also live and critically discern how to be a Christian.

More than in the past the new theology is consciously affected by the concrete questions of the present-day individual, who is a person of technical rationalism and sobriety, a person who is critically engaged in social legislation, and who therefore can appreciate a political theology and a theology of liberation. Because of all these [73] influences, the new theology will inevitably embody a diversity of directions and tendencies; it will inevitably be more fragmented than it was before. It cannot offer a comprehensive systematic construct. It inevitably will be more susceptible to certain fashionable trends which only appear to be Christian: for example, the theology of the death of God. It will be more endangered by tendencies to reduce the Christian faith to a few easily accessible teachings and attitudes, reductions which would ultimately transform Christianity into a vague humanism.

If we say that this new theology replaced neoscholasticism between the middle of the nineteenth and the middle of the twentieth century, then this assertion can only be understood as a straightforward statement of fact, not as an evaluation. The new theology must not consider neoscholasticism the defeated predecessor which it can simply leave behind. This past history is likewise a reality whose values are to be acquired anew; that reality must carry out a critical function vis-à-vis its successor, because it was precisely in this past that the true and full Christianity was alive which, in the present, this new theology must serve. On the other hand, there is, despite spasmodic efforts, no return to neoscholasticism.

One might possibly say that this new theology, with certain fluctuations within individual

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

countries and disciplines, came into existence and was accepted between 1940 and 1965. I refrain from naming particular countries, particular theologians, and particular theological disciplines for that span of time. It would require too much time and would be unfair because one theologian would be mentioned, another omitted. Just one observation: in this transition from neoscholasticism to the new theology, specific questions found new answers, which were not merely extensions of neoscholastic theses. Consider, for example, those problems which were of importance during the Council: freedom of conscience, the proper understanding of the inerrancy of Sacred Scripture, the theological interpretation of non-Christian religions, and the universal history of revelation. It would be even easier to cite examples in moral theology.

THEOLOGY TODAY

We now inquire about the present-day situation in Catholic theology. Until now we have been speaking about the recent past, not about [74] the present. If we say that at the end of the Council and in the succeeding years inspired by the Council the new theology prevailed and took over from neoscholastic theology under the Piuses up to Pope Pius XII, then the question which is posed to us here is all the more clear: What was going on in Catholic theology since Vatican II and is going on at the present time?

An initial reply to this question would be: the new theology has remained. This statement looks simultaneously to the past and to the present. This means: the theology which developed in the middle of the twentieth century is not seriously threatened by the previous neoscholastic theology, even though certain tendencies in this direction can be observed in the Roman Curia. A future historical phase has not yet taken over from this new theology, provided one sees political theology and liberation theology as themselves variations of this new theology.

A Patient Continuation

With these assumptions in mind it must now be said that this new theology itself has entered a phase that differs from the groundbreaking up to the end of the Council and the few succeeding years. In this earlier phase new ground was broken with a certain enthusiasm. Today one can speak of patient continuation at the most. In this second period everything has become a little more pallid. There is unmistakably a certain resignation, almost a danger of the actual Christian-ecclesial life no longer operating in the field of theological discipline but wandering off into other fields, and of scientific theological reflection becoming something like a withered branch on the tree called Church. It has not come to this yet and probably will not, but voices can already be heard that would like to discard such a theology of scientific reflection as old-fashioned and irrelevant.

Perhaps one cannot deny that the generation of theologians associated with the groundbreaking of the new theology, men like von Balthasar, Chenu, Congar, Daniélou, de Lubac, Malmberg, Schillebeeckx, Schoonenberg, has now grown old. They have – I hope I am wrong – not really found successors of the same stature, even though there is certainly work being done in the field of systematic theology and fundamental theology by significant theologians [75] of the succeeding generation such as G. Greshake, W. Kasper, H. Küng, K. Lehmann, J. B. Metz, H. Vorgrimler, and others (to mention only German theologians at this point). If I thus seem to detect a little less brilliance in the present theology of the second stage of the new theology, it is possible that this view may be influenced by the fact that I myself am one of the old people for whom the young ones can never do anything completely right. This opinion is possibly to a great extent also the expression of the fact that new periods in the humanities cannot possibly occur every ten years.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This viewpoint does not deny and obscure the fact that within the individual disciplines good and very successful work is being done. Consider, for example, the great scientific exegetical commentaries by R. Pesch, H. Schlier, R. Schnackenburg, and others; the research into the history of dogma found in the Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte, or in A. Grillmeier, or the history of the Council of Trent by H. Jedin. There are still many specific disciplines in which work is being done diligently and successfully, above all in moral theology, in the fields of liturgy and pastoral theology. All this should not be underestimated or taken lightly. But does this contradict the view that theology in the Church today is less vibrant and active than it was in the first phase of the new theology? Does not the validity of this viewpoint manifest itself in a certain stagnation of ecumenical theology, and in a dearth of high-level theology which would bring Christianity to the unbelievers of our time while speaking in new tongues, confidently and obviously out of the mentality of our time? All things taken into consideration I really do feel that Catholic theology today by and large does not rate a higher mark than Grade C. Such a judgment must not be seen as a reprimand; it is merely a comment, which, in the end, is derived from the unpredictability of all history.

The Advancement of Theology

Every science is also influenced and sustained by factors which are external to itself and to the scientists who pursue it. A science can, for instance, be supported or obstructed by politicians. Theology as well is dependent on external factors for its development, [76] particularly in the ecclesial realm. It can be assisted by benevolent encouragement from officials of the Church; it can be paralyzed by mistrust, indifference, and unjustified restriction of its freedom on the part of these officials. When asked about the present situation of Catholic theology one could raise the question concerning measures which are indispensable for theology's advancement today. The question could be raised whether today's Church in its official role, aside from verbal assurances, really takes the theological enterprise seriously, if there are funds available for its advancement, if enough people are encouraged to pursue it.

The Tasks of Theology

What should theology do today? By theology we are not referring to its historical disciplines because it is easy for them to know what they have to do. We refer rather to the systematic branches, to fundamental theology and dogmatics. This theology must not evolve along esoteric lines dealing with sublime questions which are of interest to specialists in that field alone. Even today the history of dogma must be pursued; one need not, however, be of the opinion, as eminent theologians like Grabmann and Landgraf were, that new scientific achievements can nowadays be produced in historical theology that looks only to the past.

Theology must serve as a science of proclamation of the gospel and must serve the people of our time. It must resolutely and open-mindedly face the mentality of modern men and women. It cannot consider only those who are believers, but it must also consider those who doubt and think that the message of Christianity is indeed a rather beautiful but ultimately old-fashioned myth, a myth that one can tolerate but no longer live by in honesty. Modern theology, in a totally new and radical way, must be a unity of fundamental theology and dogmatic theology. It cannot prove once and for all in an abstract and formal way, as in former times, that divine revelation has happened, and then in dogmatic theology, relying exclusively on Scripture and quotes from the councils, declare that certain things are, simply divine revelation. Without becoming rationalistic, theology must expound ever anew and for every question of dogmatic theology that the article of faith in question is indeed credible and can [77] be lived out in a genuine way; that it truly fits into the fundamentally simple structure of faith, and that it is part of an authentic answer to those questions which human beings find in the center of their existence without the ability to answer them of their own accord.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The proclamation of the Church, including high official statements from Rome, all too often has the tone of a decree from on high which scarcely conceals an inner insecurity. It has a legalistic sound, which relies on the letter rather than on the spirit. This proclamation takes place all too often in a language which, as pious and faith-filled as it may be, speaks only to the devout faithful, or which discusses sociopolitical problems with the others, but does not dare to offer the holy mysteries of Christianity to this secular world. This is where theology should be helpful and should precede the proclamation with good example. While grounded in faith it must nevertheless be consistent with the mentality of today, especially where it rightfully summons that mentality to the judgment seat of God. This is burdensome, difficult work which in the Church itself seldom receives praise or gratitude because it frightens some with an unfamiliar accent that is not traditional enough and for others does not "chime in" with fashionable argon. We still do not have enough of that kind of theology. The kind of theology normally pursued in the Church, which is concerned with its scientific character and fearful of contradictions from the left and from the right, is sometimes put to shame by outsiders. Even if a journalist who is a layman and a theological amateur succeeds in writing a book of three hundred pages bearing the imprimatur of Turin, and in selling 400,000 copies in Italy alone, theology certainly cannot always operate on the level of a Vittorio Messori.[1] It can, however, question whether a certain resigned mediocrity, which we seem to have detected in the present situation of Catholic theology, is appropriate or should, preferably, be overcome.

[1] Vittorio Messori, Faith's Answer: The Mystery of Jesus, ed. Eugene Brown, trans. Kenneth Whitehead (New Rochelle, NY: Don Bosco, Multimedia, 1986).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[78]

5

ASPECTS OF EUROPEAN THEOLOGY

We propose here to consider systematic theology as it exists subject to the influence of conditions prevalent in the principal regions of the world today. Up to now this topic has hardly been dealt with in systematic theology.

GENERAL PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS

Nowadays a science can no longer afford to pursue research only in its own proper area. In addition to this it must enter into a reflection on itself. This kind of reflection goes beyond the mere development of a fundamental scientific theory which serves to legitimize the science and describe its nature. It must also be a reflection which takes into consideration the historical, cultural, and social circumstances which are interacting with it as it goes about the accomplishment of its task. A reflection on its "environment" is imperative because only in this way will it be able to bring to light the hidden factors at work shaping the peculiarities which constitute its own nature and define its limits. Theology cannot have done with this task simply by relegating it to a mere secular science of the history of civilization which describes the peculiarities of any given science with reference to its temporal and environmental framework. Theology has to perform this task without outside help because the science of faith, being the highest human science, can only be "constituted" by itself ultimately, no matter how heavily this undertaking of critical self-reflection might be indebted to continuing dialogue [79] with many other sciences whose aim it is to explore the history and particular characteristics of different civilizations.

Different Forms of Theology

When systematic theology embarks upon this undertaking of self-analysis one can expect right from the outset to encounter a variety of forms in Christian and Catholic theology which are a reflection of the major civilizations in which this theology has taken root. These forms in both their unity and diversity constitute at the same time that single Catholic theology which is the scientific reflection on the unity and variety present in the Church's consciousness of its own faith. If this were not the case, there could ultimately be no history of dogma or of theology, no different schools of theology which the Church and its teaching office have positively affirmed, and the difference which the Church has always consciously acknowledged in theory as well as in practice between the Christian churches of the East and the Latin church in the West would be an illegitimate one. It is obvious that differences in theology which have always been accepted as something quite natural and legitimate, are also (but not exclusively!) the result of factors which are bound up with the diversities of geographical areas and of peoples, with their own mentalities and histories within which each theology has had to unfold.

This diversity, which has always been accepted and assumed to be something quite legitimate (also in Vatican II which affirmed it in a special way), contains larger theological problems than has commonly been recognized. We should like to point out a few of them

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

here because they have a bearing on our present topic. The fact that there have always been various schools of theology which, despite their differences and even mutual contradictions, have received in the past and continue to receive the blessing and support of the Church's authoritative teaching office seems at first glance to present no problem. The Church's teaching office and the theologians apparently see no cause for alarm in this theological pluralism because they feel that all the schools are equally committed to propounding the content of Christian faith and that they are at odds with one [80] another only on questions which do not touch on the actual substance of faith or endanger it.

On closer inspection, however, the question arises whether this distinction between universally binding dogma (along with other authoritative teaching of the Church) and controversial theological opinions (in further interpretation of dogma or in conclusions which theologians derive from dogma on their own accord and at their own risk) is really so clear and simple as is customarily assumed. And one can further ask what the consequences are for the Church's consciousness of truth if this distinction is not as simple as it seems to be.

For example, expert defenders of Bañez's theology of grace will not be convinced that their dispute with the Molinists comes down to nothing more than an insignificant subtlety of theological speculation. Rather, they will discern in the theory of their Molinistic opponents a mentality which is identical with the secular idea of existence characteristic of modern times, which (knowingly or unknowingly) is carrying forward the emancipation from God in a "godless" way. Genuine "Bañesians" will grant that the dispute naturally amounts to nothing more than theological hair-splitting when both sides lost sight of this radical danger. But they will insist that the dispute is of far greater significance, that the very faith itself is at stake in this dispute. Innumerable examples of this kind can be cited. Only when the problem is seen in this light can one understand the fierceness with which theological disputes have been carried on in the past in which the successors to these disputes, who have become superficial and weary of it all, can find nothing more than theological squabbling.

But if it is true that tremendous decisions of faith lie concealed below the surface of these officially tolerated differences of opinion, decisions which reach down into the ultimate foundations of faith and of how one understands God and the world, then what about the unity of faith amid this theological pluralism? How, then, can these schools attain the one and the same truth of faith when their disputes, stemming as they do from quite different basic conceptions are anything but trifling? Does not this situation of theological pluralism, which we try to deal with in a sociopolitical way rather than with reference to the truth manifest the historicity of faith, a historicity which is not something extrinsic to faith? Does this not reveal [81] that in this Christian faith and its unity there is also contained an essential eschatological element of hope that we shall one day attain the one truth in the light of the eternal God himself only by the grace of faith (and never without this grace)? Can we solve this problem in any other way than by assuming that the grace of God in the Church, which is visibly and sacramentally one, invests these different modes of belief with an overarching orientation toward the one truth of God in the Church? And that this is true even despite the fact that these modes of belief, due to their historical and social relativity (which has not been the object of conscious reflection and formulation and therefore cannot be eliminated directly), are also bound up with contradictory interpretations, one of which, at least, must be false?

The church is necessarily and rightly concerned with its unity amid social and cultural diversity. But this legitimate concern must not make us lose sight of the fact that the truth as one truth in the Church necessarily possesses in itself an indispensable element of grace. If this grace is not presupposed, then there is no way of knowing with certainty whether a unity of faith really exists in the Church. Given all these different and antagonistic schools of theology in the Church no one can know exactly whether behind the rules which the teaching office imposes on them for the formulation of their controversial opinions there might not be concealed a difference which could dissolve the real unity of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is naive to think that a real unity of faith is actually present and historically and socially palpable in the one Church simply because a normative imposition of linguistic rules provides identical formulations of the propositions of faith confessed by all in the public arena of the Church. (One cannot look into the consciousness of the individual. Furthermore, the question remains at least whether the official propositions of faith are understood in the individual's consciousness on the basis of the conflicting theologies with the result that they are not really the same propositions at all; or whether these conflicting theologies are rendered relative by these propositions of faith and so become to a certain extent existentielly neutral.) So one can really insist on this real unity of faith only by presuming that the actual dogmatic pronouncements in the Church as a whole are so established in a really existentiell way by a formal predestination of grace that the theological interpretations which might eventually contradict them are rendered innocuous to faith itself.

[82] In dealing with this problematic area we must keep this background in mind even though we cannot fully elucidate it here. In any case it would be a mistake to minimize the differences within Catholic theology in a way that would lead to the assumption that they can be clearly and certainly disentangled from the actual substance of faith; or that with some effort (not yet exerted but possible in the future) they could doubtlessly be elevated into a higher synthesis, in which the affirmations of the various schools could readily be put into their proper and distinct place. Syntheses of this kind which settle the disagreements between the schools are always desirable and quite often they are partially successful. But here on earth no universal synthesis is possible which would "resolve" all differences (in the Hegelian sense), as long as human beings live in history, proceed from different assumptions which have not been and cannot be adequately reflected upon, and have different cultural backgrounds, whose fundamental unification is not possible at all and (despite all the cultural intercommunication which is possible today and which ought to be intensified) not even desirable.

Theology in a Worldwide Church

Today this problem of the unity and pluralism of theological schools within one faith has become qualitatively more acute. Until now the theology of the Catholic Church has been located in the framework of a single civilization even though it was exported on a massive scale to other civilizations – beginning with the time of European colonialism right up to the present. Christian theology was a theology which grew up on the soil of Western civilization whose basis was the world of the Old Testament and Greco-Roman civilization. (Here we can omit the historical question of whether there were minor theologies like those of Armenia, Ethiopia, and so on which cannot be subsumed under the theology of the "West.") In any case it is legitimate to include the theology of the Near East and of Orthodoxy in the theology of Western civilization. While these differ considerably from the actual theology of the West, they still belong to the same civilization and their different elements were developed in a constant historical exchange.

Today, however, the situation of theology has become radically [83] different or is on the point of becoming so. Today the Church has become a worldwide Church. It is no longer the Church of the West with exports conveyed to the whole world (since the sixteenth century) by the modern missionary activity of the Church. And the theology which was exported was not altered in the process of exportation. Today the Church is in fact and not just potentially the worldwide Church with regional churches which have either already inculturated themselves in various civilizations which in their history and social structures are different from Europe, or are now on the point of doing this.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is not the place to consider the enormous question of whether and how a religion which, as a historically revealed religion, obviously has very definite historical roots which are not identical with all the historical forces at work in the world, can make a serious claim to being a world religion for all peoples and civilizations. It would be wrong to answer this question in terms of the propagation of a universal truth which, upon being discovered in a certain place, begins to branch out in all directions. The question is how a concrete religion with its specific modes of existence, its rites, images, and so on can be universally present in all civilizations without forfeiting its historical identity.

Now a religion is something which has to be practiced in real life situations and so it cannot be based solely on concepts and propositions, but rather it is realized and must be realized with the help of all those realities which are part of human existence. Even the proper understanding of the theoretical propositions of a religion is codetermined by all these other realities even if this is not expressly reflected upon. This being the case, one could justifiably entertain doubts as to whether that religion which has really inculturated itself in one civilization is really the same religion as the one which has taken root in another civilization, even though both claim to be one and the same religion by appealing to identical theoretical affirmations and to social relationships. The real core of the problem that has to be dealt with here is that the unity of faith must not be endangered in favor of the diverse civilizations, yet at the same time it would be wrong to minimize in a superficial way the diversity of the theologies in the individual civilizations in favor of the unity of faith.

But if the Church today is present in the whole world, and thus in [84] all civilizations, and if each theology must be codetermined by the respective historical and cultural milieu in which it exists and out of which it must unfold itself – and this is something necessary and indispensable precisely for the fulfillment of its task in the service of proclaiming the gospel – then the question emerges in an entirely new way as to how these different theologies in the one Church and within a common consciousness of faith can coexist. They just cannot exist without taking notice of one another. Each theology is responsible for the truth and unity of the faith of the whole Church. Each theology must serve all the other theologies in the world. In considering this difference of the theologies, which is no longer a difference within one single civilization that is ultimately homogeneous but rather the difference of the theologies in totally disparate civilizations, one must bear in mind what we have already emphasized: that these different theologies, even though they exist in the one Church with its one faith, are really different and they remain different; each one exhibits its own unique and noninterchangeable individuality (even in the process of historical development); and therefore these theologies can never be synthesized into a single homogeneous theology by casting aside the historical elements that condition them.

Here, of course, the question might be asked (and this is, again, a problem which cannot be adequately treated here) how these theologies can be understood ultimately as one theology standing at the service of one faith and how this unity remains tangible for them. Only a brief answer can be indicated here – and we are actually presuming that the question can be answered. All of these theologies are related to the unity and immediacy of the absolute God which are really attainable in grace and faith. (This relationship implies the possibility of communication among the theologies.) All of these theologies are related to Jesus, crucified and risen, as the absolute God's promise of himself which has become historically concrete and irrevocable, who is believed and grasped precisely in his radical sovereignty over all culturally conditioned images of God.

Despite cultural diversities and individual human differences which cannot be reduced to a common denominator and which obviously do color the thinking and teachings of the different theologies, these theologies do communicate with one another on the primary

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

assumption that human beings are able to reach mutual [85] understanding not only on the level of practical signs rooted in their biological nature, but also that they are able to communicate with one another on the level of truth, and that on this level they can understand one another and offer meaningful criticism to one another. But over and above this, the unity of Christian theology is ultimately based on the fact that the signs which occur in the dimension of faith, in and despite the divergency which may accrue to them as a result of cultural conditioning, all these signs – being filled with the grace of God which is God himself – point to an incomprehensible mystery which is God and which extends beyond all differences, and come to their final terminus in him.

Moreover, these different theologies exist in obedience and peace in the one Church which, despite its extension and its "diaspora" throughout the whole world, retains its social, ritual, and sacramental unity and reveals this unity in ever new ways.

When we inquire in this way about the coexistence and intercommunication of these theologies in the one Church, theologies which are and will remain different, then it is irrelevant to our question that many of these theologies have not yet achieved the stature and obvious individuality which the theology in the Church of the West possesses. An Indian, East Asian, African, Latin American theology does not yet possess the scope and articulation of Western theology. But if the Church has just entered the era of a truly worldwide Church, then our question has become inevitable.

EUROPEAN THEOLOGY

At this point one might think that we would first have to describe the character of European theology in order to show its particular task within the entire theology of the Church. But as a matter of fact we cannot proceed in this way. In view of its two-thousand-year history and its enormous differentiation, the attempt at such a characterization of the theology of Europe would be doomed to failure. Moreover, such a procedure would be meaningful only if the character of European theology could be presented in contrast to the other theologies of the worldwide Church. This is even more impossible because the true character of these theologies is still unknown for the most part and it cannot be made clear by superficial references to the [86] Asian mentality, to the Negroid peoples, and the like. We must be content here with considerations of a less complex nature.

The Theology of Rome and the Theology of the Worldwide Church

When inquiring here into the theology of Rome in its relationship to the theologies of the worldwide Church now and in the future, we are talking about the concrete theology of the concrete Roman teaching office. There was in the past, and there is of course now also a Roman theology to the extent that there are theologians, theological academies, and theological literature in Rome, and this theology in Rome vis-à-vis the rest of European theology may also manifest a certain character of its own due to sociological reasons, which cannot be treated here, and due to the relationship of this theology to the Roman teaching office as a social entity as well (even as an unavoidably "bureaucratic" entity). But the Roman theology in this sense vis-à-vis the rest of European (and North American) theology does not possess a character of such importance as to warrant a special treatment. What we are going to consider here, then, is exclusively the theology of the Roman teaching office as it relates to our questions. In doing this we shall of course take for granted the mandate and the authority of this Roman teaching office in respect to the Church as a whole and hence to all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the theologies of the worldwide Church.

This teaching office possesses a definite European theology. This teaching office as a concrete institution (the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, etc.) is of course charged with the responsibility of expounding and safeguarding the one binding faith of the one Catholic Church everywhere, and that is assuredly its sole intent and purpose. But it cannot discharge this duty without the help of what is known as theology. It has recourse to Holy Scripture by means of exegesis; it has recourse to tradition, in which the Church's consciousness of faith is palpable, by means of historical and systematic investigations – in a word, by means of theology. The work of the ecclesial teaching office is certainly carried on in the awareness that its teaching authority has its ultimate foundation in the assistance of the Spirit for the Church. But to accomplish its task it must avail itself of theology as a means, and it has always done this. [87] Up to now this theology has been European theology (how could it be otherwise?) and for the past two centuries it has been neoscholastic theology. Can this situation in the worldwide Church simply remain unchanged in the future?

One cannot maintain that this Roman teaching office is absolutely protected from every error and blunder by the assistance of the Holy Spirit regardless of what theology it might employ as a means. Even with all the undoubted infallibility of the pope in his ex cathedra decisions, the Roman teaching office can go astray in other actions, interpretations, and decisions (even if this is not to be presumed in contrast to a fashionable modern trend); in the twentieth century as well it has often made mistakes or taken steps which were objectively wrong. It is of course unavoidable that these dangers will increase in a worldwide Church in which there are or will be different theologies – historically and culturally conditioned – which can no longer simply be resolved by virtue of an absolutely successful synthesis into a unified theology for which representatives and experts can be easily found. The dangers of misunderstandings among theologians and the danger of an unjustified tutelage and regimentation of the non-European theologies on the part of the ecclesial teaching office with its European theology is increasing. (Examples of these dangers are perhaps not yet quite evident today. But when one considers questions of moral theology and the dogmatic implications contained in the juridical and liturgical measures of Rome, then one becomes aware that dangers of this kind are something more than a bad dream.) How can we counter these dangers?

The question is a difficult one because we may by no means presume that the Roman teaching office has no duty toward the non-European theologies unless there is a question of ex cathedra decisions. It still has a duty toward these theologies when there is a question of the authoritative, authentic teaching power, even when this is not exercised in the area of defined dogma. For this reason there is also a real possibility that this teaching office can be derelict in its duty just as much by omission as by a premature interference in the life of these non-European theologies which ultimately proves to be a mistake. One might suppose that in the process of internationalizing the Roman Curia a sufficient counterweight to these dangers has been provided by placing enough representatives of the other theologies from the other world cultures even in the Congregation [88] for the Doctrine of the Faith and the other Roman curial offices which are in charge of these matters. It is certainly desirable that the major regional churches of the world together with their theologies have a representation within the institutions of the Roman teaching office. Something of this sort is certainly present in the move initiated by Paul VI to internationalize the Roman Curia. Technically, however, it is not very feasible for competent representatives of all the different theologies in the world to be present in Rome itself. There would be too little for them to do and their presence elsewhere would be more imperative. They would serve to swell the bureaucratic machinery in Rome even further, and thus be counterproductive to a necessary decentralization in the Church. In addition to this, it is psychologically understandable and something which seems to be borne out by experience that non-Italians who have been living in Rome for a long time "acclimatize" themselves so well that a real understanding of the culture and theology of their former homeland slowly begins to erode and so they become the least suitable representatives of their homeland, yet they still continue to appeal to their origin. So when an issue of one of these major theologies has developed to such a point that Rome itself can no longer avoid taking a stand on it, then sufficient contacts would have to be set up and cultivated with the exponents of these individual theologies who are based in their own home countries. In addition to this, Rome would have to take the initiative in promoting dialogue among the individual schools of theology in the world so that the problems which have arisen could be settled to the greatest possible extent by the theologies themselves without the necessity of an authoritative intervention on Rome's part.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It would further be desirable to set up institutions in these areas of different cultures which would be invested with the effective powers to permit the teaching authority of the bishops or the bishops' conferences, especially those of the major regions and continents, to have a concrete and effectual representation. Institutions of this sort would be better able to pass positive or negative judgment on the theology in question because they would consist of individuals who share the same cultural background in which this theology has its roots. Practically speaking, the bishops by and large leave the exercise of the ecclesial teaching authority to Rome alone, except in the case of very local problems. For a worldwide Church which has [89] major regional churches of high profile this solution cannot be satisfactory in the long run. If an official ecclesial teaching authority competent for the theology of its own region could be placed in the hands of the major regional churches, then the ecclesial teaching authority could be exercised more judiciously, Rome's work load could be reduced, and the blunders could be avoided which almost necessarily occur when the theology of a totally different world has to be judged from a completely different cultural background. But in any event, the utmost reserve and circumspection is called for on the part of the official Roman teaching authorities when they are called upon to pass judgment on the theology which is indigenous to another culture if they proceed on the basis of their own particular theological position – and this is something which, to a certain extent, can hardly be avoided.

European Theology as the Guardian of Tradition

Even if the Church is a worldwide Church or is in the process of becoming one, even if this means that there are going to be different theologies in this Church notwithstanding its unity and the oneness of its faith, theologies which cannot be reduced to a common denominator, the fact still remains that Europe along with its theology is the "elder daughter" to most of the other churches in the world and their theologies, and the word of God in Jesus Christ due to a mysterious disposition of God reached her before it reached most of the churches which make up the one Church now and will comprise it in the future.

There is a relationship (at least analogously) similar to the one Paul sees between Israel and the Gentile Church (Rom. 11:13ff.). "Favoritism" and "discrimination" of this kind are part and parcel of a historically revealed religion and they have to be accepted by those peoples who were not converted to Christianity until later, or who are just now in the process of conversion, with the same simplicity that Europe in its obedience of faith accepted the fact that the Word of God was made flesh in Asia and not in Europe. This sort of "favoritism" shown in Europe, however, confers not only a privilege but also imposes an obligation on the Christian West and its theology, a responsibility which cannot be abdicated by this European theology even if it is no longer the theology of the Church, but has become one theology among many. For as far into the future as one can see, European theology will remain the guardian and preserver of the tradition of faith of the first two millennia of formal Christianity. The languages used by Christian faith to express itself are by and large the languages of Europe. It was in this civilization that the Church's dogma in a long and turbulent history was forged into the formal expression which we have today and from which the other parts of humanity cannot turn back in their future history of faith, even though the future history of these peoples will not be characterized by the mere reception and repetition of this European history of faith. For this European history of faith will also become a part of their own past and it will remain historically binding when they become Christian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Therefore, by preserving its own history and keeping it alive in its theology, the theology of Europe is preserving the normative past of these other peoples. In a Church which remains one and the same Church of Jesus Christ despite all the diversity of the individual regional churches, the historical experience accumulated in the theology of one of these regional churches is a part of the heritage and trust bequeathed to all the other regional churches. But it is precisely there where these things had their origin that the greatest efforts must be made to preserve and foster them. This applies to all the "material" realities in the framework of which theology must be pursued, beginning with the study of the languages in which the basic texts of Christianity are composed, on through the enormous literature of all these Christian centuries, the cultivation of the other monuments of Christian faith, and right up to the establishment of scientific institutes, libraries, and the like.

But above and beyond this, a living European theology must offer to the other theologies of the world an ever new and credible witness to what Christian faith has achieved in Europe and what remains as living tradition. Taking a critical view of itself, European theology must, of course, help these other theologies to distinguish between the normative and binding elements contained in it and those elements which are specifically European and therefore cannot be looked upon as a directly determining factor for these other theologies. It is precisely out of its own tradition that European theology must help the other theologies to find their own identity and [91] become self-reliant. For it is precisely on the basis of its own tradition, which in Europe bears the hallmarks of differentiation as a result of a long historical process, that European theology – provided that it does not become autocratic, but remains humble – has the ability, perhaps in greater measure than other younger theologies, to distinguish in a self-critical way between what is specifically Christian and what is merely European.

That specific character of European culture which enables a science to take a critical look at itself and call itself into question will probably remain for some time because in this culture, more than anywhere else, the Enlightenment, rational and critical science, the reflexive philosophy of science, all had their origin. Because this belongs to the wisdom of age, younger cultures will not be able to assume such an attitude and maintain it to any intense degree. And so European theology, to a greater degree than theology in other cultures, possesses the capacity and the "technique" of calling itself into question. It is therefore called upon in its position of self-critical reflection to prevent "burdens" from being imposed upon the younger churches and their theologies, burdens which faith is not tempted to impose, but rather which the all too self-assured mentality of one culture is tempted to impose on other cultures and theologies. This self-critical task of European theology becomes more urgent but also easier to accomplish when it encounters the theologies of other cultures, dares to undertake open dialogue with them and in this way is also disposed to learn something from them. We shall have to devote special attention to this point.

European Theology and Today's World Civilization

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

No one can overlook the fact that in the wake of European colonialism a rational-technical civilization (as distinct from cultures which are viewed as the social realization of human beings in all their dimensions) has spread throughout the whole world and is influencing the lives of all human beings and nations to an ever greater degree. The rapid and enormous increase of the world population as well as other factors indicate that this rational-technical civilization is not going to disappear from the lives of the peoples, unless one reckons with a decimation of humanity in an atomic war. If one does [92] not expect this purely rational-technical civilization to simply suppress the real cultures which take human beings in all their dimensions into account and to set itself up in their place, but instead if one perhaps reckons with the possibility that the major cultures of the world will enter into a new and as yet undiscovered synthesis with this external civilization, which has spread or will spread everywhere, and which also has a positive service to perform for the unity and peace of humankind; thus if one considers the preservation and further development of these world cultures within a desirable pluralism of humanity to be an obligation of the nations of the world, then European theology can discern a new task for itself in respect to an undertaking of this kind.

It is beyond question that this modern global civilization with all the threats it poses to an authentic realization of humanity owes its origin and its existence to the European mentality and history in which Christianity has been and continues to be an essential factor. There are even some who maintain that Christianity is responsible for those characteristics of European culture and civilization (taking the two together as one) which have now developed into a threat of annihilation for the whole human race. They maintain that the loss of the sense of the "numinous" in today's world, its God-lessness, its reduction to rationalistic-technical means and ends, and its destruction are to be charged squarely to the debit account of Christianity, or at least European Christianity, which fails to utter any protest against the inhumanity of this civilization but rather has been instrumental in legitimizing it by a definite proclamation of the distance between God and the world.

Even if an accusation of this kind is groundless when leveled against the really authentic nature of Christianity and of the Church, still European Christianity along with its theology cannot sidestep the question of whether and to what extent it has taken on a burden of guilt in the actual course of its history by creating through the hands of people who supposedly chose to be Christians a world civilization whose consequences today confront us with the specter of annihilation. European theology must ask itself if it has not perhaps contributed to these developments – culpably or inculpably – by presenting a view of humankind (along with its ideological distortions) which in truth can find no legitimation and acceptance in [93] Christianity. Theology, too, is a theology of sinful human beings. The theology of the fathers can with its shortcomings, its short-sightedness, and its omissions revenge itself on the children. Therefore, European theology today would have the task of examining its conscience and of taking a kind of inventory of itself so as to be able to offer the other theologies, and along with them the peoples who are represented and influenced by these theologies, a Christianity which is less entangled with the errors and false attitudes which are current in modern civilization and which are perhaps covertly present in those very characteristics of modern civilization which this civilization so warmly recommends to other peoples as a reason for embracing it.

Here, too, there would be a task for "political theology" since this is supposed to reflect on the sociopolitical implications of the whole of Christian theology and in the light of the pure gospel message to make a critical inquiry as well into the social and cultural realities which a false ecclesiastical conservatism passes off in an all too facile way as genuine Christian achievements. European theology as political theology would have to warn the other peoples of a lot of things in our society which are uncritically accepted by us as a matter of course

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and which we are fond of defending with a pseudo-Christian ideology.

European Theology as Mediator among the Other Theologies

Perhaps at some point in the future, European theology will give the representatives of the other theologies the impression of being a somewhat hoary Alexandrianism. Perhaps the day will soon come when an African theologian will ask (even if he has received his doctorate in Europe) whether, for example, a huge volume of church history with thousands of bibliographical entries really has to appear every year in order to broaden theology's horizons and enkindle its fires and make it an instrument for the proclamation of the living word. But on the purely "technical" level (i.e., as far as the number and size of scientific institutes, the amount of literature produced, the number of professors, the financial support for theological undertakings, [94] etc. are concerned) European theology (along with North American theology) will continue far into the future to be that theology among all others which has the broadest and most intensive scope as a scientific undertaking.

For this reason alone it is on the technical level a foregone conclusion that European theology take on the role of mediator and coordinator among the theologies. But it must have the will to carry out this technical and practical task. For example, it is not really proper for all the theologians of the former mission countries who possess the aptitude and calling to do work in scientific theology to pursue their studies at European or North American faculties of theology with the consequence that the native theologates in the other countries are necessarily reduced to a lowly and wretched existence. But for a long time to come young theologians from these countries will be obliged to study in Europe, and rightly so. European theology has to support these programs by practical measures (scholarships, seminaries, and the like).

But above and beyond this, European theology must act as mediator in a higher intellectual sense among the theologies of the world. It is, after all, the starting point and presupposition of these other theologies. Since the Christianity represented by these other theologies came from Europe and these other theologies necessarily bear the stamp of this origin, but at the same time manifest no further relationship to one another than what they have in common with European theology, European theology is in the best position to exercise the function of mediator among them. Within the one Church these theologies simply cannot be permitted to exist parallel to one another in a state of isolation. Intercommunication must be cultivated. The higher the degree of individual development they have attained the greater is the danger that they will go their own separate ways and become estranged from one another. European theology is called upon to surmount this danger since it is equidistant to all these other theologies as the historical starting point. At just the time when Europe has politically and historically lost its role of leadership in the world and given it up to other powers, the theology of this Europe which has grown old will be the last to give the impression that it lays claim to a dominating role which would compromise its authentic role as mediator.

[95]

European Theology as a Safeguard against the Dangers Threatening the Other Theologies

Certain dangers threaten young theologies in cultures which up to now have not been Christian. Since it is precisely their task to inculturate the Christian message in these non-Western cultures, they are naturally exposed to the danger that the mentality of these non-Christian cultures will exert a negative influence on these theologies; that it will act as an obstacle to the understanding of this or that part of the complete Christian message; that it will reject or ignore teachings and attitudes which are deemed to be European but which are in fact indispensable to a genuine Christianity and may not be lost. European theology can be a help to these other theologies in confronting these dangers. In its long history any number of theological directions have been tried out and the most diverse models have been tested. Under certain circumstances European theology possessing a clear view and being well versed in the understanding of foreign cultures, is able to discover elements in the spiritual history of foreign peoples which are useful for the reception and understanding of the Christian message. Today these elements are overlooked by the exponents of a culture of this kind who emphasize certain other elements and tendencies in their spiritual history as being representative and these alone as being really decisive for their culture. But in the spiritual history of every culture the most diverse and conflicting ideas and tendencies may be found. In this lies the possibility and the danger that definite elements of this sort of mentality which has a long history behind it will be treated as the only legitimate ones to the exclusion of the others. Thus Christian theologians will be tempted to try to construct a synthesis with Christianity using these elements in contrast to others which could also be found. The result would then be detrimental to a genuine and complete Christianity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is often easier for an outsider to discern the elements in a culture which correspond internally to the Christian message than it is for someone who belongs to that culture, and who is more easily taken in by the fashionable slogans which claim to express the sole and true nature of a culture and its mentality with the result that these people want to compel the Christian theologian to reconcile Christianity [96] with this "nature." In a familial and at the same time modest manner European theology with its historical experience can bring these dangers to the attention of the other theologies and thereby right from the start render superfluous more stringent and more bitter interventions on the part of the highest teaching office in the Church against these theologies.

European Theology in the Process of Learning

If we consider the matter in a realistic and objective way, we have to admit that the non-European theologies that we are considering here hardly exist as yet. But they are coming because they have to come in a Church which is really and truly on the way to becoming a worldwide Church or actually is such. The universal history of thought, the universal history of civilization, and the phenomenology of cultures – which could not have their birth until the European era of the Enlightenment and of historicism – might perhaps even now provide us with some notion of what a theology of this kind might look like in other cultures. This notion, vague though it might be, should even now start to become operative in European theology. These foreign cultures and their mentalities can even now make European theology attentive to the fact that in its scientific work and teaching, for example, it works with plausibilities which are not even present in these other cultures; that it works with terminologies which cannot be carried over into the language of these other cultures, or only with the greatest of difficulty; that it can learn from these other mentalities of aspects and problems of the whole of reality which up to now it has not given much thought to.

If European theology even now would include in its considerations the problematic areas which these foreign cultures confront us with, it could learn a great deal for itself. It cannot, of course, in this way artificially prefabricate the future theologies of other cultures, but it can learn something for itself from these things and it can pave the way for the emergence of these other theologies, even though they can be made only by the people of these cultures in a manner that gives them their own true and unique characteristics. By taking foreign cultures into account along with the problematic areas they give rise to, European theology would not only do a little advance [97] thinking for those who are going to come later but it could also learn for itself and be enriched in the process.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

New knowledge of this kind or knowledge which has become clearer and has increased in significance is also "interesting" for European theologians and for the people whom they serve directly. For one reason, the mentalities of these other cultures have already begun to exert their influence to a greater or lesser degree on the spiritual and intellectual world of Europe. In the past, for example, dogmatic theology or Christian philosophical anthropology was able to dismiss the "transmigration of souls" in a few lines. Today, however, this idea of Eastern cultures has become so important in Europe that European theology has to start taking this subject seriously and accord it a more differentiated and thorough treatment than it has done in the past. A second example: the way of spiritual ascent and meditation in Eastern anthropology could alert European theology to the fact that it should devote more attention to the neglected areas of prayer and mysticism and not abandon the field exclusively to prescientific spirituality as is done in dogmatic and moral theology.

Numerous other examples of this kind would have to be given to show how these foreign cultures could stimulate European theology to a learning process which could result in some preliminary work being done for theologies which are going to develop outside of Europe. One example of a more general and hence fundamental nature should be given here. As a matter of course, theology has been accustomed to thinking in personalistic and therefore historical terms. The idea that the universal salvation of all humankind should depend on an event which was seen as taking place at a point in time and space presented no particular problem. It was almost taken for granted. This was also true for the conviction that revelation could have an actual history of its own. For this reason it was more or less obvious that Christology should be accorded a place prior to pneumatology and the doctrine of grace, even though in traditional theology there were, of course, convictions and teachings which could call into question this all too facile theological perspective. Perhaps an Eastern theology will one day reverse this perspective. Because of the universal salvific will of God and in legitimate respect for all the major world religions outside of Christianity, it may perhaps make a pneumatology, a teaching of the inmost, divinizing gift of grace for all [98] human beings (as an offer to their freedom), the fundamental point of departure for its entire theology, and then attempt from this point – and this is something that might be achieved only with considerable effort – to gain a real and radical understanding of Christology. For a theology of this kind John 7:39 ("There was no Spirit as yet because Jesus had not yet been glorified") will perhaps be less suitable and intelligible than scriptural passages which extol the universal salvific will of God and which let the Spirit speak through all the prophets and know that the Spirit has been poured out on all flesh.

If we can imagine a theology of Eastern character in this way, then this can also be of use to European theology. For it would have to ask itself in respect to its own task and mission whether the prognosis it is making for another theology in the future might not perhaps be of significance for itself today. For even today European theology has to develop for its own people a credible theology of non-Christian religions. It cannot limit the history of revelation to the revelation in "paradise" and the Old Testament history of revelation from Moses to Jesus. It must provide a better and more understandable interpretation of the conclusion of revelation in Christ. It must grapple with the problems of Islam in a theological way and not just politically and polemically, and so on. To accomplish this task it certainly has within its own tradition the necessary presuppositions and elements, but this all must be carried out in a way that has real clarity and significance for today. And the inducement for this could be, for example, a dialogue with the mentality of the East as a modest preparation for a genuine and original Eastern theology.

With its ideas about other theologies in the future, European theology can really learn something for itself and become something of a pioneer for these future theologies. It can certainly do no more than this. The essential work must be done by others in other, cultures. Should European theology accomplish this modest task which does lie within its power, then this would be a blessing for itself most of all.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[99]

6

A THEOLOGY THAT WE CAN LIVE WITH

If our task is not to present apologetics for the life value of one definite individual theology but rather to speak about theology in general as one and the same thing, does this mean that one single branch of this theology is the main point at issue? Perhaps because I do not really understand anything about these other theological disciplines and especially because it is difficult to praise all of them at once? Do I really mean theology as distinct from the faith upon which it reflects scientifically? Or perhaps I should in the last analysis extol the Christian and Catholic faith as worth living since the distinction between faith and theology is something which is not so easy to make.

THEOLOGY FOR LIFE – BUT FOR WHAT LIFE?

Let me begin with a counter question to the question I am supposed to answer here. Is there a theology that one can live with? The presumption contained in a question of this kind is that people know how they are supposed to live and that they know what is worthwhile in life and now theology is going to be measured by this supposedly obvious criterion in order to test whether theology, too, can to some extent be fit into this general scheme of life. By the demand that theology must be something that one can live with, I cannot imagine that nothing more is meant than a brief list of humdrum requests addressed to the theological schools. I cannot imagine that the only [100] thing meant is that the professors be especially learned and competent; that theology should not be divided up into too many disciplines; that not just the professor's voice should be heard in the seminars; that the examination questions should not be too recondite; that the number of lectures should be decreased and not increased, and so on and on. It goes without saying that these banal, day-to-day demands made on theology should be met as far as is realistically possible so that young theologians can live with their theology.

But when people ask the question about the "livableness" of theology (if I may use that term), then I can counter with the question as to just what kind of a life is meant that theology has to prove and justify itself to as a science that one can live with. Really, just what kind of a life is actually meant? If what is meant is the life of the people of the West in their consumer-oriented society, people earning money, people at play and recreation, people in pursuit of culture which has turned into a kind of self-important industry whose real purpose, if you take a close look at things, is to drown out lethal boredom; if it were absolutely clear that the skeptical positivist is right in forbidding us to talk about something that cannot be demonstrated experimentally; if it is absolutely clear and obvious that the mystical experience of God (I dare to use this term), faith, prayer, the experience of an absolute responsibility, and so on are excluded from that life – if this is the kind of life that is meant, then of course theology is not something that one can live with, because right from the start all of those realities which theology has as the object of its reflection are excluded from this kind of life.

THEOLOGY AND THE REALITY OF FAITH

A further implication of this obvious statement is that one should not pursue theology unless

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one is prepared to open all the areas of one's life to the realities which are the object of theological reflection. We, have, for example, the philosophy of religion, the history of religion, the phenomenology of religions. One can do work in these fields prompted by human and scientific curiosity to a greater or lesser degree. One can even turn these sciences into a bread-and-butter job on the academic level if the state sends the paycheck regularly. We [101] are not going to discuss here how one can live with these sciences. All of that is not theology. In order to be able to make a claim to being worthwhile for life theology presupposes an existentiell relationship to the reality of faith. People who intend to do theology without this Christian or even ecclesial faith had better change their theology pretty quickly into the science of religion, otherwise they will soon discover that they cannot live with it.

When I was a young theology student we still used to pray for the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit before class began. Nowadays, of course, this has been dropped, but the idea behind it is still valid. Theology is a science of faith in the bosom of the Church, and this is the only way it can be pursued, pursued, that is, in a way that one can live with it.

It is quite conceivable, of course, and legitimate for young theologians, whose faith is wavering and who are plagued by the contradictions of their time and of their own lives, to enroll in theology. At this point they are just beginning to do theology in order to live, since they are beginning to discover that they cannot sidestep the question of faith in their lives, that they cannot have done with this question by shunting it off into a convenient and superficial skepticism and relativism. And so if it is economically feasible for them and if they have the intellectual talent to do it, they try to find an answer to the question of their lives not by themselves alone but with the means of scientific, that is, metaphysical and theological reflection. Persons like these may and should do theology because they cannot live without doing theology. They should, however, beware of the idea that people can get out of theology what they want for their own lives if they should try to do theology with a kind of rationalistic mentality – which does not really exist – without putting themselves into it heart and soul and without trying in supreme seriousness to get to the very root of the question of the experience of the contingency of human existence in such a way that the only answer left for this question is the answer of faith with the grace of God.

The first thing, then, that I wanted to point out here is the insight that not just any conceivable life can coexist with theology, but only a very definite one. In this, of course, there is also contained a question which cannot be answered here. What is the more precise relationship between a Christian life of faith and the theological reflection which purports to give an account of this faith given the [102] fact that the two are conditioned by one another? From the standpoint of fundamental theology the scientific reflection on the reasons for believing contained in faith itself can and ought to be significant for the life of faith. As true as that is, the fact still remains that the realization of faith, even when it transpires in a legitimately naive faith, is the presupposition of theology without which one cannot live with theology. The reflexive argumentation can never completely catch up with this kind of naive faith, nor does it have to.

THEOLOGY AS A SPECIAL DISCIPLINE

Even if we grant all this, one can of course still ask whether one can really live with theology as we know it today. Since theology as a reality is something that is not absolutely immune to change, but always exists in the process of history, this question is transformed into the question of what concrete shape theology must have today in the lives of young theologians in order for them to be able to live with it. Permit me to make a few remarks on this question

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even though I realize that not every professional academic theologian will necessarily share my views.

I am not calling into question any theological discipline in the academic area. Naturally there is also a thoroughly legitimate human and scientific curiosity about things pertaining to religion and the Church which only in a very remote way have anything to do with the reality which is existentielly grasped in faith. These things can still be the object of scientific research and teaching. These scientific areas are the domain of certain theological specialists who do a creditable job in their specialized fields. It may perhaps be true that the young theologians who are studying theology with a view to their future life and work in the Church attach little or no importance to them, and so they can get the impression that specialized disciplines are of no practical use to them, that they cannot live with them.

If humanly speaking it is entirely legitimate for scholars to devote their whole lives and energy, for example, to the investigation of an Inca civilization which has long since disappeared, then of course it stands to reason that theological sciences which are devoted to Christian archaeology, which also dig up secondary theological schoolbooks of the Middle Ages, which turn exegetics into philology [103] so that one could begin to get the impression that all these things are being done for their own sake, and so on, are all the more legitimate, and these sciences quite rightly argue that they are useful members in the whole area of the one theology which deals with the question of the ultimate meaning of human existence. But one cannot take it ill if young theologians, who have no intention of becoming specialists, even though all of these undertakings are meaningful, evince no particular interest in these specialized theological disciplines, but rather search for a theology that they can live with both now and later in the concrete situation of their existence.

Today there is certainly a regrettable slackening of interest in the actual scientific pursuit of the individual disciplines of theology without at the same time there being any noticeable decline in actual and scientific interest in the field of theology. But during their training young theologians want a theology that they can live with now as a help to orient themselves among the conflicting ideological claims of the world they live in and to lead religious lives and that will mean something to them in their future lives and work for the Church. If this is the kind of theology they are looking for, then there is no reason why they should not treat the scientific character of theology and its fragmentation into many compartmentalized disciplines as a problem of secondary importance.

This does not mean that they can absolve themselves of the hard work and concentration that the study of theology requires. It does not mean that theology could be a pleasant free-time hobby. But the theology which they have every right to expect if they are supposed to be able to live with it is in the first instance a theology which cannot be a pure science because it is the reflection on a Christianity which is lived and believed existentielly in the Church. And this reflection, indispensable and justified though it be, is different from that of the individual secular sciences in that it is necessarily subsequent to the actualization of the Christian life and there is no reason for it to be otherwise. In structuring the program of theological studies there should be no hesitation in making allowance for this. The sheer boundless nature of the scientific endeavor together with its almost self-defeating methodology and hermeneutics need not be the supreme law of theology, not even if theology in its particular and unique character may call itself a science.

[104]

SUPRASCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY

Theology must be understood as an undertaking that reaches beyond the confines of what is known as a science. For the sake of a term we might call this “suprascientific” theology, if we

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

tell young theologians to pursue theology in this wider perspective, what we are actually saying is that they should concentrate on the really fundamental problems of theo1ogy. In saying this we do not mean to belittle the legitimacy and usefulness of the minor theological disciplines. But it is certainly not of paramount importance for young theologians to master every fine point of the synoptic question or, when they take up the study of church history, to give a fully nuanced account of all the factors involved in the condemnation of John Hus. What is important, if their theology is going to be relevant to their lives, is that they invest every drop of their life's blood and every ounce of their intelligence in an attempt to understand what revelation really means; what the relationship is between the history of religions and a particular and local history or revelation; whether and how one can still seriously and intelligibly speak of God in today's world secularized and riddled with positivistic skepticism; what is actually meant by the word God; how they as human beings in the humdrum existence of their everyday lives can go about discovering something in themselves that they can call an experience of God; how one can in upright integrity of spirit maintain that the incomprehensible God, who, though myriad light years distant from our little planet, lets the cosmos disperse like a cloud of dust, has become a human being, and whether one can understand with some degree of accuracy what this means and also what this does not mean; whether one can understand that the execution that took place two thousand years ago on Golgotha can be seriously accepted by people today as the ground of their own existence; whether the resurrection of Jesus can be something more to people than an ancient myth and what one can honestly understand when one thinks about this resurrection; whether one can really take seriously the idea that this Jesus is coming again to conclude a human history of a few million years and perhaps even a cosmic history of a few billion years beginning with the big bang; whether human beings despite all of their evolution from the animal kingdom, despite psychoanalysis and all their social contingencies are still the same [105] human beings that Christianity understands them to be, as those who in freedom determine what they are ultimately going to be for all eternity and accept this definitiveness before the judgment seat of God (what does that mean?); whether one can seriously maintain that people must in order to be completely human and Christian also have something to do with a Church and its bureaucracy and practice their religion using those rites which are customary in the Roman Catholic Church; how a Church which has a historical origin and has grown up in one very limited corner of history can still seriously strive today to become a worldwide Church present in all cultures.

Questions such as these and many like them are life-and-death questions for Christianity if it still envisages a future for itself today. These are the questions that must form the core of a theology which young theologians must devote themselves to with their whole heart and mind, even at the risk of remaining ignorant of any number of other things which are also done in theology.

A HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS

At the last Ecumenical Council the Church spoke of a hierarchy of the truths of revelation. There is, no doubt, an objective hierarchy present in the substance of Christian revelation and the objective difference among the truths of faith. But there is just as certainly a hierarchy of truths which is governed by the historical moment in which a person has to live his life, as well as by his own personal character and calling. This is the kind of threefold hierarchy that young theologians have to set up for themselves and that is why they must concentrate on those fundamental questions of their faith which we have just outlined.

The Council spoke quite rightly of a "sufficiently long introductory course into the mystery

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of salvation." I have the impression – and I hope it is mistaken – that in the various German theological departments practically nothing has come of this demand of the Council. This basic course would be somewhat different from the theological encyclopedia that was offered in the last century; it would be somewhat different from the first gentle contact with the theological disciplines; for a person living in today's world it would have to manifest a serious responsibility toward the fundamental [106] problems which lie at the root of faith, a responsibility which precedes the multiplicity of the theological disciplines, and by so doing legitimize itself

A COURSE IN THE FUNDAMENTALS OF FAITH

It seems to me that fundamental theology in closer and more obvious cooperation with systematic theology could in fact meet the requirements of a basic course of this kind in a department of theology, but one must not lose sight of the fact that fundamental theology, as traditionally and legitimately understood, has other things to do than setting up a basic course and therefore in concrete practice might run into a number of difficulties in trying to construct a basic course of this kind which is so desperately needed. For example, it falls within the scope of fundamental theology to deal in the traditionally scientific way with the whole range of problems from Jesus to something like the founding of the Church and from Matthew 16 right up to the primacy of the pope as defined in the First Vatican Council. Problems come up like the Aramaic original of the words of Jesus as given in Matthew, tracing the stages in the evolution of the primacy in the complexity of their historical background, and so on.

These problems cannot be handled in such detail in a basic course. Nevertheless, the problems as such are an essential part of any fundamental theology. For this reason a basic course would necessarily be obliged to deal with the question of how I can in honesty be an ordinary Roman Catholic Christian and affirm my belief in Vatican I without having gone down the long and difficult road of studying the historical development of the Church and the primacy in conformity with the exigencies of today's historical science. Young theologians would have to shoulder the personal responsibility of hammering out a very definite basic course of this kind for themselves if none were to be offered in the curriculum of today's theological faculties. They would have to do this if they really want to live seriously with their theology today and do not consider their theological training to be nothing more than an unavoidable drudgery that they have to suffer through if they want to serve the Church as priests, teachers, or in some other capacity, with the idea in the back [107] of their minds that not much theology is needed for this kind of work and what is needed can be found by and large somewhere else. Naturally the courses of the ordinary theological curriculum in the way that they are customarily presented can and must afford essential help for the basic course which they give to themselves for the purpose of assembling their own hierarchy of truths so that they can really live with their theology.

ECCLESIAL THEOLOGY

I would like to make two remarks about this theology which can be classified under the general title of a basic course but which would probably not be restricted to the first semester only and would run through the entire course of theological training. First, this kind of a theology must be an ecclesial theology so that one can live with it in the Church and do this honestly. If young theologians begin to get interested in theology only when it comes into conflict with the Church and its concrete teaching office in Rome, then there is something amiss with the way they are studying their theology. If theology is done properly there is no reason for it to be dull or remote from life when it is pursued in harmony with the ordinary teaching of the Church under the auspices of the Roman teaching office. It goes without saying that theologians have not only the right but also the obligation to take note of the different degrees of binding force entailed in the statements of the Church's teaching office, and in certain circumstances they certainly have the right to bring forth their critical objections on questions that have not been definitively settled by the ecclesial teaching office. On this point one would like to hear a word of encouragement from time to time which acknowledges the possibility and necessity of criticizing the Church out of love for it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Even today one can continue to discuss the morality of the pill and whether women a hundred years from now will still be excluded from the office of the priesthood. But if theologians want to live in the Church with the theology they want to live with, then their theology must really be an ecclesial one, and it must have in principle an open and positive relationship to the ecclesial teaching office. Those days are certainly gone when theology could be a Denzinger theology in [108] the neoscholastic style of the nineteenth century or the first half of the twentieth century. But that is a far cry from saying that the only way young theologians can make their theology studies relevant today is by being asinine enough to eschew all contact with the doctrinal decisions of the Church and by attempting to pursue theology without formal and continuing dialogue with the Church, its teaching office, and its theological history.

One can certainly pursue a political theology in the properly understood sense of that term and a theology of liberation as well which lives and works in the Church, even if for me personally it still seems to be an open question whether the totality of Christian revelation and its theology can be subsumed under the basic elements giving rise to a political theology or a theology of liberation. In any event, these theologies too can and must be ecclesial. If young theologians feel that they can construct their own theology from these theologies and make it relevant, then they should go ahead and do it, but in the process they should set their sights on the whole of the theology which corresponds to all the dimensions of Christian life in the Church, and they should not think that there was no theology done before that could be useful to them now.

A THINKING THEOLOGY

The second thing I want to say about studies which have to do with the actual essence of theology is this: even today one has to think in theology. Whether and to what extent the traditional philosophy in the Church is still adequate for theology; whether and to what extent modern philosophies from Descartes through Kant, German idealism, existentialism right up to Anglo-Saxon positivism and its philosophy of science can serve as useful partners – these things are not the present subject under discussion. In any event, you have to think in theology. Sharply and precisely. Logic and its principle of contradiction are not the enemies of theology. In theology there are real, basic, and ultimate mysteries, but one must not have recourse to mystery or conjure up a sacrficium intellectus simply because one has not done enough exact thinking. In the process of rational thinking in theology itself one should strive to employ as far as is [109] humanly possible all the insights of philosophy together with its individual disciplines which one has at one's disposal.

Here I should like to add that in the long run you will not have a theology you can live with if you have not come to grips sufficiently with the problems which what is called modernism gave rise to in Catholic theology at the beginning of this century and for which,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

when you come right down to it, it really presented very shortsighted solutions. In my humble opinion these problems have still not been sufficiently worked out and made understandable to the larger public of Christians who possess a higher education.

You cannot legitimately do Catholic exegesis if you think that you can just bypass the dogmatic teaching on the inspiration and inerrancy of Holy Scripture. Conversely, however, you must have some idea of inspiration and inerrancy which fits the historical-critical conclusions of today's exegesis. You cannot just separate Jesus from the Church which comes after him and consider them as antagonists; at the same time you have to get an objective and clear understanding of how to conceive the origin of the Church from the historical Jesus. You have to adhere to the doctrine that there are divinely ordained structures in the Church which will continue to be binding on the Church in the future. Yet you must understand this divine ordination and any possible history of this ordination even after the time of Jesus himself in such a way that as a Church historian you will not have to put forward historically untenable assertions. You would have to work out a concept of sacrament which does not convey the impression that it is some kind of magic instrument without at the same time abandoning a properly understood doctrine of the opus operatum.

You must be able to give rational acceptance to the uniqueness and unsurpassable nature of Christianity without using this as a reason for overlooking or obscuring its historical character and its connection to the whole history of religion. You have to understand what is right and what is wrong in the postulate of demythologization and be able to distinguish between the two. You ought to try to work out for yourself and others a reconciliation between the Christian conception of the world and that of the natural sciences which would spare modern Christians some painful embarrassment, because there is still a great deal to be done in this area even if we have now concluded a partial truce. Only if you are modern in an antimodernistic [110] sense and live your lives in open-minded dialogue with the modern world of the natural sciences and, of course, with the world of culture as well, will you be able in the long run to live with your theology. This does not mean that you are supposed to become know-it-alls trying to talk to everybody about everything, but persons who try to make their contribution where nothing is known or where people are searching for a more exact answer or where, despite the best of intentions, people cannot forge any manifestly positive reconciliation between modern knowledge and the affirmations of Christian faith – a case which is quite possible and need not by any means be understood as a contradiction pure and simple. And, at all events, it should be clear to you why and how human beings must and may live with a multiplicity of elements of knowledge which they have not yet succeeded in synthesizing positively without being permitted to conclude from this that they have the right to abandon one or the other of those elements of knowledge which has not yet been synthesized.

A THEOLOGY OF REVELATION

Certainly the revelation with which theology is concerned is the revelation of the free God. But that is a far cry from saying that a positively revealed religion consists of a number of individual propositions which are collated in a merely external way and in this sense would have to be positivistic Denzinger theology in the pejorative sense of the term. The revelation of God who is primordially one has a unity. A fundamental theology could work out the unity and coherence of the individual truths of faith in a clearer and more concrete way than is customarily done. God's favor to humankind in what is called grace, and which must be understood from start to finish on the basis of the uncreated grace of God's self-communication, and the revelation in the unity of word and event (in the words of Vatican II)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have a much more manifest unity than has heretofore been understood. Belief in the Holy Trinity which can be actualized in a truly existentiell way above and beyond a mere verbal acquiescence to the formal authority of the Church can be realized only if the identity between self-inherent Trinity and Trinity as it manifests itself in the divine economy of salvation history is understood.

[111] A theology which seeks the unity amid the diversity of revelation must clearly show the unity and coherence of word and sacrament so as to overcome once and for all the absurd temptation to divide the Church into a Church of word and a Church of sacrament. Salvation history in the revelation of the Old and the New Testament does not begin only with Abraham and Moses but encompasses the whole history of the human race even if it has presumably lasted several million years. And so, in the entire length and breadth of this history, revelation, grace, and hence faith are possible. But thought must be given to how this is to be understood. Just to spare theology the effort, one cannot be too quick to say along with the last Council that all of this is possible in ways known to God alone. The Apostles' Creed will always retain its validity as the fundamental statement of Christian faith, but, in my opinion, if theologians do not succeed in condensing the whole of Christian faith without any essential omission into a brief creedal statement, then they have not made sufficient effort in their theology to lay hold of the unity of the Christian message. If this is the case, then, of course life will be difficult with a theology which looks almost as if it had been pulverized.

A THEOLOGY OF MYSTERY

In my concluding words about a theology that one can live with I would like to say more explicitly than I have before that this theology is and must be a theology of mystery. A theology which in its individual affirmations forgets that all of its propositions have to be broken open and understood in this sense of openness if they are going to be true in reference to the mystery of the incomprehensible and ineffable God would not be a true Christian theology. The mystery before which human beings bow in silent adoration after uttering the last word required of them is in theology not an embarrassing remnant and marginal phenomenon which makes its appearance where rational clarity and unequivocalness reach their ultimate limits; it is, rather, precisely the innermost reality with which theology is concerned. Theology concerns itself with God and not merely with social criticism and human emancipation clothed in old-fashioned terminology. God, and what is meant by God, can only be grasped when we surrender our own conceptual understanding to [112] the ineffable and holy mystery which lays hold on us as the mystery which is near to us and which embraces us in love.

The theologian is not the purely intellectual expositor but the one who thrusts all duly explained earthly realities into the incomprehensible mystery of God. The theologian is the one who shows that no human proposition, no matter how correct and useful it may and should be, is ultimately really understood unless it is released into the blessed incomprehensibility of God. Indeed, the theologian in a radical anthropology of the spirit and of freedom must have understood that the holy mystery we call God does not appear only after we have cheerfully and lightheartedly traversed all the ways of the human spirit and of freedom open to us, but rather that this holy mystery is already a silent presence even there where we make our beginning and that it sends us on our own ways. Only when it has understood that knowledge and freedom are themselves grounded in this mystery can a theology which, empowered and called upon by God himself dares to call the ineffable mystery by name, be a courageous and open theology and in the last analysis, even with all its necessary dialogue with all the other sciences and branches of knowledge, it need tolerate no meddling on the part of other human knowledge.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Those who live in hope, love, and adoration in the shelter of this mystery can and should pursue theology within the limits of their earthly possibilities, and pursue it in the ambience of this mystery. And then they will come to see that this is a theology that one can live with; indeed, they will experience that it is the beginning and the foretaste of that eternal life on which we set our hope.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation [113]

PART TWO

Faith

[115]

7

THE MATURE CHRISTIAN

There are, admittedly, more momentous subjects than "the mature Christian." The threat posed to the whole of humankind by nuclear warfare, the destruction of the human environment by human beings themselves, the "neuroticization" of the whole of society and the human being's relationship to God in faith and love as well – these are some of the more important subjects. But since things are as they are, human beings are creatures who are forced to occupy themselves with any number of things and so, too, with matters of secondary importance. Therefore one is justified in devoting some attention to the maturity of Christians today, at least to the maturity that is expected of them.

"Mature Christian" is a familiar catchword; everybody is using it. For the most part there is not too much thought behind this slogan, and very little that is Christian. It is a slogan currently circulating among Christians in the Church, something that can mean an authentic challenge for Christians and at the same time jeopardize their attachment to the Church. Therefore it is worth making the effort to consider the subject more exactly, even though little of a sensational nature can be said about it.

How is it that nowadays, and especially as a result of the Second Vatican Council, this phrase about the mature Christian is in circulation? It must first of all be said that a Christian must, of course, at all times be a mature Christian to a certain extent. Maturity is something that admits of degrees; it can be smaller or larger. No human being is totally and in every respect mature. This is impossible because one cannot possibly summon to the tribunal of a lucid and [116] decisive conscience all the things and events of one's life with its vast multiplicity in order to decide with total clarity and freedom whether to accept and do a certain thing or to reject it and not to do it. Any number of things in our lives are borne along and done without being scrutinized. There is no avoiding this, and this is why we are never mature persons in every respect and in all the things that concern our lives, but rather in large measure we are persons who are manipulated by our biological constitution and by our society.

Not just today but at all times human beings have had the right as well as the duty to accept the increasing burden of conscious responsibility for their own spirit and their own freedom, to be responsible to themselves, to become mature. Catholic moral theology has always spoken of the person who has reached the use of reason as distinct from a child; various phases of life were distinguished in respect to the responsibility that was expected of them; the point of time was determined at which a person became subject to punishment by law, received the right to vote and to exercise active and passive voice, was old enough to be confirmed and to contract marriage. Thus mature persons have always been distinguished from immature persons. It has always been recognized that people are not simply mature, but that they have to become mature. Perhaps in the past people did not reflect sufficiently on the fact that a person who has reached his or her legal majority and is considered to be mature is still subject, or ought to be subject, to a maturing process in his or her life thereafter. Being mature and becoming mature – and this within the Church as well – is not something new, but something that is quite obvious. People have been aware of this for quite a long time.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE SITUATION TODAY

Still, in our days, the question of a human being's maturity both in the secular as well as in the ecclesial sphere has entered upon an essentially new phase. This may not apply equally to all societies, nations, and cultural complexes in today's world, but for our own society it certainly holds true. Why is this so? To answer this question our explicit reflections must be aimed not primarily at Christians in the Church but at people and their lives in secular areas. In these areas people have become more mature, or at least they are expected [117] to become more mature and they are obliged to do so. What we understand here by maturity is purely and simply the sum of those things which may be presumed of a person's explicit and free responsibility in a definite social or individual situation. The number of the things that may be presumed varies considerably. Without doubt it is something that is individual (in the case of a child or of an adult person) and something that is social (in the different phases of history and according to the degree of development that various cultures have attained, etc.). The number of things presented to the free and responsible decision of a woman in the African bush is much smaller than in the case of a political leader in a modern society, someone who perhaps might even have an atomic bomb at his disposal.

In this sense maturity or the historical responsibility to become mature can grow in an almost incalculable degree, and nowadays this is enormous. The world in which we live is, in contrast to former times, characterized by a vast complexity which is brought about by the mutual dependence of all the peoples and societies of the earth, by the complexity of our individual societies, by the myriad possibilities of subjugating and transforming nature, by the sheer plethora of wants and needs which previously did not exist, by a multiplicity of opinions which no individual person is capable of mastering and which today are no longer separated from one another geographically, but rather are compacted together in one and the same society as in a highly explosive mixture, and by the rapid advances in the sciences, the results of which make our life situation more and more complicated.

Human beings with their spirit and with their freedom are confronted with this life situation which has become vastly complex. First of all, in relation to their own life situation people now have actually become more immature. In those areas of their lives which presented themselves to their freedom of decision people in the past had a situation consisting of relatively few elements which they were in control of; it was relatively easy for them to survey this situation and thus to act in a responsible way with mature freedom.

Nowadays, in relation to our own complex situation, we have become to a certain extent less mature due to the fact that the elements of our own life situation which can be freely manipulated have in their number, amount, and complexity moved beyond our [118] ken. Can the average person today tell us concretely how industrial progress can be brought into harmony with environmental protection or how the struggle to maintain political freedom can succeed without the insanity of modern armaments? How can truly viable alternatives be found for our kind of life with its stress and its unremitting excess of sensual stimuli, a life we are groaning under? If in a certain sense it can be said that we are encountering our life situation in a more immature and helpless way than previously, then there arise the inexorable necessity as well as the moral obligation of becoming more mature. This means that in the individual and social area we must undertake every effort so as to be able in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

lucidity of spirit and in genuine freedom to come to grips with our situation today in a responsible way, and this means that we must become more mature.

The situation in which we are living and in the face of which we have to become more mature has yet another component that we must reflect upon. What we have to do cannot, as opposed to former times, be regulated by universal and clear norms. It goes without saying that norms for moral and social life also exist today and these must be respected. But the leeway and the significance of the things which these universal norms alone cannot clearly regulate have become considerably larger. It is true that in previous times there did exist an area which universal norms could not of themselves determine. Even in previous times vocational choice or the choice of one's spouse could not be undertaken by the mere application of universal rules.

Today the area of what cannot be clearly determined only by universal norms in society, in politics, in cultural life, and in one's individual lifestyle has become more extensive. As soon as an aware person is expected to make a concrete decision of greater importance, he or she begins to experience a sense of helplessness and these persons get the feeling that the universal norms, which they are aware of, have forsaken them, even if they are compelled to recognize and respect the usefulness and binding force of theses norms. How are people supposed to invest their money? What vocational choice should they make in their earlier years? What political party should they vote for? What should their exact position be on questions of the politics of disarmament, of environmental pollution, of alternative lifestyles? What concrete shape should a [119] necessary family planning take if it is to be human and morally unreprehensible?

People today are beleaguered by these questions and similar ones. Even if people are aware of the universal norms and respect them and try to apply them to their concrete decisions, even if they engage in mature discussion with other people and examine the different attempts at solution which are often contradictory, even then they really will not know exactly what to do in the concrete, individual case, and this is the thing that really counts ultimately. One may go so far as to say that it is undeniable that an individual person today is in respect to a number of questions no longer capable of reaching a clear decision and one that for him or for her is certain. Given the availability of education and of information, the complexity of the factual questions is increasing and hand in hand with this people's incompetence in many areas is increasing with ever greater rapidity.

THE ESSENCE OF MATURITY

We do not intend here to reflect further on how people can act conscientiously in cases like these where uncertainty regarding the propriety of a particular decision cannot possibly be resolved. Today, however, there is also a wide spectrum of questions of this kind regarding which, even though the application of universal norms affords no real solution, individuals can still reach clarity and certainty in their decisions "on their own responsibility and at their own risk," provided that they have attained a sufficient degree of maturity. If we try to delineate maturity in this light, we can say the following. Maturity is, first of all, the courage and the resolve to make decisions and to take responsibility for them even if they cannot be legitimized any longer by universal and universally accepted norms. It should be clear from what has been said before that this does not mean that such norms may simply be passed over and violated. It should, however, be added that universal norms do not for the most part possess the absolute clarity and unambiguousness which are often ascribed to them and that in this light the area which is open to individuals in their decisions and which may be presumed by them can be wider than what society or even the Church understands in the interpretation of norms.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[120] Maturity further presumes the will and the resolute effort to inform oneself of the norms which are to be applied in coming to a decision without overlooking their multiplicity and complexity, and to weigh them. The readiness to criticize oneself is also a part of maturity. Through self-criticism people become aware that they have to reckon in themselves with an inadequate level of information, with errors, with prejudices, with the frightful tyranny of public opinion, with elements of egoism which act as though they were something entirely natural, so that one can only too readily take a course of action and claim something as a morally justified decision simply because it is useful for one or convenient. Part of the true nature of maturity (and this holds for the secular area as well) consists of what is commonly known in the religious sphere as wisdom, illumination, a grace-given moral instinct, the guidance of the Holy Spirit, things which for their part presume an openness of spirit, freedom from fanaticism, a willingness to learn, a mastery of one's own aggressiveness, and patience.

The mature person is the person who examines things with equanimity, who is docile to instruction, the person who also appreciates the importance of judgments on the part of experts and other legitimate authorities. A part of maturity is the courage to carry through an honestly made decision which cannot be put off indefinitely, even if it remains open to internal and external criticism, even if that does not necessarily mean that one seeks to propagandize one's decision as the only right one and impose it on others, or that one assails a universal norm of society because it is not at first glance clearly and certainly compatible with one's own decision. The mature person is the person who has grown up. Anyone who leads a life of moral striving and responsibility has some understanding of what human maturity is. A person of this kind also understands this brief definition of maturity, and knows that every human being is always on the way to it and will fully achieve it only when he or she reaches fulfillment in death accepted in serenity and hope.

THE MATURITY OF THE CHRISTIAN IN THE CHURCH

In the Church, too, individuals are individuals in a society; their individuality and their social character can never be torn asunder, yet they cannot be brought into a completely satisfactory consonance [121] with one another either. Thus what we have said about people in society for the purpose of elucidating the concept of maturity is also valid for Christians in the Church.

It must first of all be said that the situation of the individual Christian in the Church has become more complex than in former times, and this manifests itself in the area of theology and moral theology, as well in the framework of the Church viewed as a society. When persons who are Christians enter into the sphere of the Church they do not, after all, leave their complex secular society behind them. Their growth as Christians runs parallel to their character today as rational persons, as persons whose scientific and historical knowledge has advanced enormously in contrast to earlier times. As far as knowledge is concerned, the Church in bygone epochs encountered extremely simple, naive people to whom it was just beginning to make accessible a more sublime knowledge which goes beyond the knowledge of how to master the rudimentary problems of everyday life. Today, however, the Church must communicate its knowledge of faith to people who are already characterized by highly complex knowledge. In earlier times the Church could rely on the fact that a Christian and ecclesial milieu would introduce people into a definite world of thought and belief. Today, however, the Church is forced to come to the realization that a pluralism of values prevails and that this determines the entire life situation of modern Christians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

From a theological standpoint, then, Christians who possess some degree of education and awareness are in the position of always having to compare the Church's proclamation of faith with all those other numerous things known and experienced by them today. Whenever and wherever the Church proclaims its message as well, it will of course be a help for Christians in the necessary synthesis of faith and modern knowledge. But the knowledge and experience of individuals today varies considerably, and so too, therefore, do the problems confronting individual Christians, particularly when they are more highly educated and also as a result of the enormous complexity and differentiation of the modern sciences. For individual Christians many problems remain to be mastered by themselves [122] in synthesizing their faith with their total consciousness and their total knowledge. Then they must differentiate between the greater and lesser degree of binding force of individual Church teachings; even in ultimately binding pronouncements they must reject something, as, for example, in the case of a paleontologist who in the year 1910 was convinced of the relationship between human beings and the animal kingdom when this teaching was rejected by the ecclesial teaching office at that time, albeit not in an ultimately binding way.

If they are to avoid getting into difficulties of faith in certain circumstances – difficulties which really can be avoided – then today's Christians must learn how to make more precise distinctions in many cases of Church teachings between what is certainly affirmed in a teaching and what is, perhaps, only an explanation which is bound up with this teaching. They must have some knowledge of the "hierarchy of the truths of faith." They must know what the really central, existentielly significant, fundamental convictions of their faith are, so that they can acquire an ever more profound understanding of these convictions, while at the same time not denying secondary teachings, but rather relegating them to a secondary position, even to the point of actually ignoring them. Educated Christians must forge for themselves a concept of God and of his eternal salvation grounded in Jesus Christ. It need not be a cause for alarm if they do not know exactly what an indulgence is or how many sacraments there are. By managing the explicit contents of their minds in this economical way, people can quite properly reduce the number of things which are enormously overburdening and cluttering their minds.

In view of the modern state of mind, characterized as it is by a complexity which cannot be adequately reduced to homogeneous terms, the following should be considered in its bearing on Christians' consciousness of faith. Even in the area of secular knowledge people today are conscious of certain things; they have opinions and convictions (and all of this simultaneously) whose objective and logical compatibility is not clearly evident to them. But they do not for that reason reject a conviction simply because its compatibility is not clear to them. This state of affairs, which might be called a truce rather than a state of peace, is quite legitimate and something that is unavoidable; it must be borne with patience. This is likewise true in the case of religious consciousness. One can adhere to secular scientific knowledge and to a teaching of faith simultaneously without [123] having understood their positive compatibility. One should not rush into self-assured assertions concerning this or that teaching of faith, claiming that they manifestly contradict the knowledge of modern science and therefore should be rejected. Reality has a much more complex structure than we are able to recognize at first glance. The patience to sustain limited truces of this kind and to wait calmly for a peace consisting of positive insight is often part of the maturity of faith required of educated Christians today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Tensions of this kind and growth processes which are part of a mature faith are of course to be found especially in the area of moral theology, Christian ethics, and the practice of Christian life. There is no denying that the complexity of individual and social life today and the insights of modern anthropology have given rise to many problems in the area of ethics which admit of no easy solution for people today and which lead to conflicts with traditional church teaching which cannot always be easily resolved. Sexual morality is an example of this, as well as all those questions that have to do with altering social structures with a view to greater justice.

Everything that has been said about Christian doctrine in general has of course special validity when applied to the Church's moral teaching and requires no repetition. Precisely in the area of moral theology it is entirely possible for the Church's magisterium to issue teachings, albeit not in the form of ultimately binding definitions in the strict sense, which do not take into sufficient account the matter itself, its history or a new phase in its development, teachings which are not sufficiently differentiated and which in a certain sense miss the very point at issue, teachings which are simply erroneous. In cases of this kind – and they are entirely possible – the mature faith of the Christian is faced with a great and difficult challenge.

I should like to describe this challenge simply by quoting from the "Letter of the German Bishops to All Who Are Entrusted by the Church with the Proclamation of the Faith," issued on 22 September 1967. One need only read this text attentively and one will see that the situation and the real test of a mature Christian today is honestly described. In numbers 17-21 one reads:

> At this point a difficult problem must be discussed in an objective way. For many Catholics today more than in the past it is a [124] problem that poses a threat either to their faith or to their relationship of unreserved trust to the Church's teaching authority. We are referring to the fact that in the exercise of its office the Church's magisterium can make mistakes and has made mistakes. The Church has always been aware of this possibility, has also admitted it in its theology and has drawn up rules of conduct applying to a situation of this kind. This possibility of error does not extend to those doctrinal propositions proclaimed by a solemn definition of a pope or an ecumenical council or by the ordinary magisterium which are to be adhered to with an absolute assent of faith. Furthermore, the assertion that an error on the Church's part has been later discovered in these dogmas is historically incorrect. This does not deny, of course, that while the original sense of a dogma is upheld an increased understanding of it is always possible and always necessary; one that takes place by sifting out misunderstandings that might previously have been associated with it. Nor should the obvious fact that in addition to immutable divine law in the Church there are also elements of human law that are subject to change be confused with the question at issue. This kind of change has nothing to do with error. At the most it raises the question as to whether an earlier or later regulation was opportune.
>
> Concerning error or the possibility of error in the case of non-defined doctrinal statements of the Church, and these can differ considerably in their degree of binding force, one must admit clearly and unhesitatingly that human life even on its most general terms must always be lived conscientiously according to the best of one's knowledge on the basis of knowledge that on the one hand cannot lay claim to absolute certainty on the theoretical level and yet "here and now," since there is no way of going beyond it at the moment, must be respected as a valid norm for thinking and acting. Every human being is aware of this in the concrete situation of his or her own life. Doctors know this when they make a diagnosis; people who guide the destiny of nations are aware of this that when they have to analyze a political situation and come to a practical decision on the basis of their analysis. And the Church, too, in its teaching and its practice cannot always and in every case let itself be maneuvered into the dilemma of either making an ultimately binding doctrinal decision or of simply remaining silent and leaving everything to the arbitrary opinion of the individual. To safeguard the ultimate substance of faith proper to it the Church must, even at the risk of error in detail, issue doctrinal guidelines that have a definite degree of binding force and yet, because they are not definitions of faith, are stamped with a certain provisional character that extends even to the possibility of error. There is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

simply no [125] other way for the Church to proclaim its faith as a reality that shapes life, to expound it, and to apply it to the constantly changing human situation. In such a case the individual Christian's relationship to the Church is first of all analogous to that of a person who realizes the obligation of accepting the decision of an expert even though being aware at the time that this decision is not infallible.

In any event, an opinion contrary to the Church's provisional doctrinal statement has no place in a sermon or catechetical instruction, even if under certain circumstances the faithful must be instructed about the nature and limited applicability of such a provisional doctrinal statement. This point has already been discussed. People who feel that they may entertain a private opinion of their own which even now supposedly anticipates a better insight of the Church in the future must ask themselves whether they possess the requisite breadth and depth of expert theological knowledge to warrant deviating in their private theory and practice from the current official church teaching. In principle a case like this is conceivable. However, personal arrogance and the presumptuous attitude of the "know-it-all" will be called to an accounting before the judgment seat of God.

The right attitude of faith on a Catholic's part manifests itself in a serious effort to appreciate even a provisional doctrinal statement of the Church and to appropriate it for oneself. And in Church matters there is no need for one to feel embarrassed or taken advantage of in entrusting one's own insights to the Church's teaching even in cases where this teaching cannot be considered as absolutely definitive any more than one would have such feelings in secular life where one also makes far-reaching decisions on the basis of fallible insights provided by other people in good conscience according to the best of their knowledge. It is possible that the Church's teaching does develop too slowly in certain cases. But even in a judgment of this kind caution and modesty are called for. In a Church composed of human beings who live in history doctrinal development of this kind takes time because it cannot proceed more rapidly than is consonant with safeguarding the substance of faith from being lost.

When thinking with the Church in the way that has been described, we need have no fear that we are turning our backs on the demands of the times. The urgent questions of our times which demand an answer from our faith often enough compel us to rethink the truths of faith. But this does not mean that we are calling faith into question. It serves, rather, to deepen our grasp of the truth of divine revelation and our understanding of the Church's [126] teaching. For it is our firm conviction, and we see this borne out by experience, that there is no need for us to deny a truth for the sake of the Catholic faith, nor to deny the Catholic faith for the sake of a truth, provided only that we strive to understand this faith in the spirit of the Church and to grasp it ever more profoundly.

One can readily see why this text fits into our context here, even though it could have been quoted in connection with the question of maturity in the area of dogma and not just in the area of moral theology. It is also an essential function of the Church's magisterium not only to set up binding teachings but also to leave Christians alone, to impose on them alone the responsibility for the ultimate decision in those cases where the magisterium no longer considers itself capable of setting up an ultimately binding dogmatic teaching or a norm of moral theology. In a case of this kind the magisterium leaves the Christian alone, responsible to himself or to herself for his or her ultimate decision. This does not mean that mere convenience, arbitrariness, or an attitude of arrogance and egoism are permitted to hold sway. But because now, even though they continue to be accompanied by the Church's advice and direction, people must ultimately ask themselves in the face of God and his judgment, in the relentlessness of an enlightened mind, an upright conscience, and of course using all the means which are also at the disposal of a Christian and a human being in these cases, what their own conviction and decision is in such a case.

If a person acts in this way, then he or she is in matters of faith a mature Christian. The assessment of one's own capacity for judgment in these areas, at once self-critical as well as courageous, is, of course also a part of this maturity, to mention this point explicitly once again. But however self-critical and modest a self-assessment of this kind must be, it nonetheless is itself a part of the tasks, the responsibility and the risk of Christian maturity because it can be undertaken by no one else.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

MATURITY AND CHURCH LAW

A third challenge to the maturity of a Christian in the Church extends beyond the Church's dogmatic and moral teaching to the area of church law and church life in which the lay person is involved in manifold ways. There is a Sunday obligation; there is an ecclesiastical [127] administration of the sacraments; there are ecclesiastical laws governing matrimony; there are church taxes; there is an ecclesiastical administration which assigns certain priests to Christians for the performance of the liturgy and for the religious instruction of their children without having asked for their assent to these administrative decisions in advance. Things like these and many others like them touch upon the life of the Christian. As a rule they have a dogmatic core of a binding nature inasmuch as the Church and its sacraments have their origin in Jesus Christ. But their concrete form, their concrete norms and the way in which they are implemented are, first of all, things which are determined by human beings; they are subject to the flow of history; they are human traditions containing individual decisions of ecclesiastical authorities which in themselves and of themselves alone are by no means binding. Even if it is true that the Church willed by God could not exist without this kind of earthly incarnation of God's Spirit, nevertheless all of these things remain human, earthly, and open to question. The Church could, if it should choose to do so, do away with the Sunday obligation. Priestly celibacy is good and meaningful, yet the Church could do away with it. Marriage even as a sacrament would not necessarily have to be contracted before a priest in church. It is merely a commandment of the Church that Christians are obliged to receive Holy Communion during the Easter time.

In regard to all of these quite unavoidable and human realities the maturity of the Christian has a special function and hallmark which is different from the maturity in regard to the dogmatic and moral teaching of the Church. The latter had to do with borderline areas of divine revelation; the former are in the first place human realities, even if these are established and approved by legitimate authority in the Church which itself is founded by Jesus Christ. In regard to these human-ecclesiastical realities the maturity of the Christian has another and broader kind of leeway than in regard to the ecclesial teaching office.

Now it is difficult to provide an explanation for something as obvious as this without almost being forced into developing a highly differentiated casuistry, and this is something we cannot become involved in here. We can at most point out a few random examples. The Church grants indulgences; the Christian is free to take them or leave them. There are numerous church laws of human right in which the application of what is known as epikeia is justified, that is, laws [128] which, despite their possessing an apparently universally binding force, are not binding in the case where one can make a reasonable judgment that the lawgiver would not at all have intended to include this case under this law, had the lawgiver been acquainted with the case or had reflected on it. If a person knows before God and after an honest examination of conscience that his or her marriage is also invalid in the eyes of the Church, but is unable to prove this in the forum of the Church so that the Church can allow a new marriage, then a Christian of this kind should contract a civil marriage and he or she is justified before God in doing this. There can also be other cases of conflict between the Church's law and the legitimate claims of individuals and of their moral obligations which can no longer be settled by church authorities themselves.

All of the examples suggested here are rather poor and perhaps they sound a little bit bizarre. They might, however, serve to make clear that in the area of church life there is yet another special challenge to the maturity of the Christian. Precisely in this area further information and explanation might be considered desirable, since day-to-day life gives rise to justifiable desires of this kind. (One need only think of the question of what a Christian should do whose second marriage is invalid according to the norms of the Church and yet the dissolution of this marriage as it now stands would for its part be immoral) However, in this place we can do no more than point to the particular function of the maturity of the Christian in the area of church life and church law.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

COURAGE FOR GREATER FREEDOM

Perhaps it has become somewhat clearer what Christian maturity in the Church is. Maturity means courage for greater freedom and this freedom means greater responsibility. Courage is anything but mere whim and subjective capriciousness. Maturity in its authentic form makes human beings lonely in a certain sense. They have to make their decisions by themselves, without being told in advance what to do. When they are entrusted with their own problems in this way, they are not really left alone but are made to stand before God with the dictates of their own conscience, which is theirs alone and no on else's. They have to pray, to seek divine light and guidance. They [129] must have the courage to make use of this mature responsibility of their own and they must not whine that the world and the Church have left them alone.

There are many questions of individual and social life for which the Church can offer guidelines as a help in solving them and can stake out the area of decisions which are morally possible, but the Church cannot in advance provide the concrete solution to these questions. Otherwise it can too easily happen today, as it has happened in the not too distant past, that Christians assume that they have no further obligation to make a decision or that within the areas drawn up by the Church – and they are wide ones – they can simply do whatever they want or whatever is most convenient or requires the least possible cost to themselves. In the pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes (no. 43) the Second Vatican Council emphasizes explicitly that in sociopolitical questions there can be grave differences of opinion among Christians who appeal to the same gospel, and that these differences are not resolved by a verdict on the part of the Church in its official capacity. The Church, however, presumes that in a situation of this kind the decision on the part of individuals is not an arbitrary one, but rather that before God and according to the dictates of their conscience they must make a very definite decision undertaken solely on their own responsibility, and that they must implement, sustain, and answer for this decision even in contradiction to other Christians.*

Only the mature Christian can do this. Maturity, however, is the burden of responsibility, the sublime task in the Christian's process of growth and a part of the unshackling of freedom to attain its full nature which the grace of God bestows.

* See also the recent answers of Karl Rahner to letters from young people in Mein Problem: Karl Rahner antwortet jungen Menschen (Freiburg, 1982). For the horizontal and vertical dimensions in which responsible decisions are to be made, see, by way of example, Karl Rahner, The Love of Jesus and the Love of Neighbor, translated by Robert Barr (New York: Crossroad, 1983).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[130]

8

JUSTIFYING FAITH IN AN AGNOSTIC WORLD

In the history of humanity there has never yet been as much knowledge as there is today, and the acquisition of knowledge on the part of the sciences is proceeding at breathtaking speed. Precisely because of this, the fact that individuals, judged by the amount of knowledge actually offered to them, are becoming increasingly more ignorant than people of earlier times, judged by the knowledge they had at their disposal, is quite another matter. At the same time humanity is certainly more skeptical than at any other previous time. In earlier times people knew little, but they knew it with certainty (or at least they thought they did) and the incomprehensible (which was called God or gods) was also something quite natural, something that existed and was calculated into life as an obvious reality. If this incomprehensible reality threatened to become unpredictable, then that, too, was just another thing that was also quite natural. The incomprehensible did not give rise to any agnosticism, but was itself clear in its own way.

THE ROOTS OF AGNOSTICISM

Today things are different. The enormous amount of knowledge offered leads to uncertainty. The speed at which the sciences are racing into the future makes every individual element of knowledge already acquired appear to be temporary and subject to revision, presuming of course that each element has a connection with all the [131] others. While it is true that people in practical life muddle through in any number of instances as though the presumed knowledge were certain, and in many cases, of course, they do not have to back down on this, still the doubt remains that everything might in the end turn out quite differently than was originally supposed. An element of the unfathomable surrounds all this knowledge and life in a way that is impenetrable. But people hardly dare anymore to call this unfathomable element by name; they let the matter drop with a certain uneasiness or they declare with a certain testiness that things that cannot be spoken of clearly should be left as they are. And finally, fear begins to spread over all of these things, the fear that all of the thoughts that we have, aside from practical indications referring to the needs of life that we are not yet consciously aware of, are, after all, basically nothing more than a nebulous haze that has nothing at all to do with true reality.

ON THE SITUATION OF AGNOSTICISM

That seems to me to be more or less the picture of agnosticism today, a fate that is apparently something new for us. This “fundamental dimension of life” or whatever else one chooses to call it, is of course repressed for the most part in the public consciousness as well as by the individual person in the banality of everyday life. Scientists continue to thump their breasts with the self-assurance of their individual knowledge which they are constantly increasing and differentiating; philosophers continue to construct their systems, or, if they espouse relativism or skepticism as a system, then it is for its part a system in which they lose sight of the fact that they actually want to reject every system, and their theory does not bring forth in them any fear and trembling at all; politicians continue to churn out the old clichés about

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

official ideals and values for want of something else to say. And even churchmen, too, often give the impression that they are talking about a God whom they say is incomprehensible, but whom they innocuously calculate into their bill under this heading as an obvious item which serves to legitimize the norms of a well mannered and reasonable life. Today there is an atheism which is to some extent the norm of an official state doctrine and it claims to know for certain that there is no God. But a theory of this sort, when [132] measured against the power of agnosticism, is nothing more than the petit-bourgeois cleverness of the nineteenth century, which is now obsolete.

One can of course make the desperate attempt for oneself to deny once again the experience of this agnosticism, to dismiss it as a phantom, something that objective people who know their own limits would not get involved with. But is an abstention of this kind possible? Can it always be sustained? Can one abstain from the experience of this agnosticism without falling into a suffocating banality? Can one do this without losing the ability to take other people and the terrible things that have happened to them really seriously anymore?

I would not attempt to say anything to people who might manage to erect a peaceful barricade around themselves, ensconcing themselves calmly, securely, and definitively in the triviality of everyday life. But I doubt that people like this exist who can do this throughout the whole of their lives, and should people of this sort really exist, then I would not enter into a discussion with them, but rather I would attempt for my part to interpret this brave and responsible determination to turn one's back on a total question of life as an anonymous way of believing.

But how can one cope with this agnosticism, which is our fate, if one cannot and will not repress it, but rather face up to it decisively? It seems to me that this situation of agnosticism is something new. For in earlier times the incomprehensibility of God, which is the actual concern of agnosticism, was for reflexive theology a relatively subsidiary thesis of a special kind within a complex of affirmations about God, but it was not the original experience of God that sustained everything else. And for this reason the theism which is capable of being realized in a really existentiell way (it does not matter whether it is understood here as philosophy or theology) is possible today only in a radical as well as an open encounter with agnosticism. This of course does not mean an encounter with an agnosticism of a kind produced by narrow-minded indifference which does not bother at all about the incomprehensibility of our existence and our inability to cope with it, but rather with an "agnosticism" which is part of our ultimate experience and which is actually the burning pain of our existence.

[133]

AGNOSTICISM AND THE EXPERIENCE OF GOD

An agnosticism of this kind, which from the very outset has superseded every self-complacent form of atheism, is, when properly understood and sustained in hope, nothing other than the way in which God is experienced today Before this conviction can be explained and substantiated, a reservation has to be made. If the experience of agnosticism is going to be interpreted as the root and driving force of a positive experience of God, then this does not mean that this agnosticism is the only access to an experience of God.

Every reality can point to God, and human beings are not simply identical with their experience of agnosticism. In all human beings the concrete experience of God is as complex and multidimensional as human beings themselves are. In this experience of God there is contained the experience of meaning, of love, of fidelity, of history, and of all the other realities which go to make up human beings, which are presented to them and which

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ultimately cannot be completely managed by them, But nowadays it is also a part of these human beings to have as well the burning experience of agnosticism, of the incomprehensibility of their existence.

THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD

The crux of the matter here is how this incomprehensibility is really understood: as the thing that people are trying to repress by being indifferent to it; as the thing that is interpreted as ultimate meaninglessness; or as the mystery that despite its incomprehensibility, yes, even because of this incomprehensibility, is accepted as something salvific. The first interpretation is that of the narrow-minded, and it is irresponsible. The second interpretation, if it were adopted not only in words but actually taken up in the total act of one's life, would be the "mortal" sin of one's life, the hell that may be wished to no one. The third interpretation seems to me to be the fundamental essence of faith. One does not turn away; one remains steadfast; one really accepts the incomprehensibility of one's existence, and does this as a meaningful act of acceptance, one that contains in itself [134] hope. But if one really does this, then God is already basically accepted, and this is actually what is meant by this word and is ultimately understood only in an acceptance of this kind.

At this point the professional theologian and perhaps the ordinary Christian as well will be tempted to raise a warning finger and say, "You are talking about an impersonal 'It' and that is not the personal God who addresses us and loves us and to whom I pray." But this objection may signalize a danger that can be real in what has been said (and perhaps manifests itself in Eastern mysticism), but it is not relevant to what is really meant. Of course there is a personal God, even if in the use of this sentence attention must be drawn to the fact that according to the Fourth Lateran Council there can be posited of God no similarity with us (and thus no "person" either) which is not surpassed by an even greater dissimilarity of the "ineffable" God. If one considers this, then one no longer has the right to evaluate the experience that we are appealing to as the experience of an impersonal "It," but rather one is required to release the valid "personhood" of God himself once again into the incomprehensibility of God. One must, of course, hasten to add: this incomprehensibility of God is really accepted only if one prays to the incomprehensible God, if one says "You" to him.

The question of whether the possibility of a mutually personal relationship of this kind between us and God has always belonged to the spiritual nature of the human being or whether it is only made possible by "grace," in other words, whether for a pure humanness without grace an indifference toward the incomprehensible mystery would be legitimate – this is a point that need not be labored here. In point of fact we experience ourselves as persons who are addressed by this mystery, as persons who can and should have the enormous courage in hope, love, and prayer to draw nigh to this incomprehensibility of God as the sheltering mystery. If we do not turn and run away from this mystery which seems to make a lethal demand on us far beyond our power, but instead, if we require of ourselves the unbelievable conviction that this mystery as it is itself gives itself to us and will itself once be our completion, then we believe. Then we accept the agnostos God, who is the ground of our true agnosticism, as true fulfillment.

Indeed, this "blinding" darkness into which we plunge ourselves and become incomprehensible to ourselves is also of such a nature [135] that we can never say to ourselves with reflexive certainty whether we are really accepting it or whether, despite all the pious and impious chatter, we are ultimately taking refuge in a desperate act of self-assertion. Let us hope that we are accepting this darkness and thus that we are really

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

believing. Can one dare to hope that one has really entrusted oneself to the incomprehensibility that is called God even if one never knows whether one, in culpable freedom, is not positing as something absolute comprehensible realities which most assuredly are not truly God? Can one in the inmost core of one's existence hear the assurance of this love of God, a love which not only makes possible our love of him, but which is also the very cause of this love? And even if one dares to do this (one has to dare it), still as a human being who is possessed both of a body and a history one looks to an experience of another human being whom one is more inclined to trust than oneself, to a human being of whom one can be truly convinced that in the very act of his life and not merely in empty words he has accepted the incomprehensible God as such and in so doing has been accepted by him.

JESUS OF NAZARETH

Christians know a historical event of this kind, ultimately only one, in which all other "cases" for which they dare to hope have their foundation, their certainty and the ultimate witness: Jesus of Nazareth. He has truly plunged unconditionally into the incomprehensibility of God ("My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"). He has been accepted by this incomprehensibility of God ("Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."). And in this he is the eternally valid one, the one who has been saved. It is he to whom, as the one who has risen, the faith of his disciples, the faith of two thousand years of Christianity and one's own hope bear witness, a hope which would give itself up if it were to let this Jesus be swallowed up as by an ultimate absurdity, although he, in contrast to us infatuated worldlings, had always surrendered to the incomprehensible will of the one whom he dared to call Father. But because this Jesus at the same time lived with us in unconditional solidarity, he is the one who is the irrevocable and victorious promise of God to us that the incomprehensible God will bring us to a blessed [136] salvation and will endow us with the gift of himself forever. Jesus, crucified and risen, is the incomprehensible God's unsurpassable word of commitment to us, because he is the one who is eternally accepted by God.

TRUE AGNOSTICISM

What has been briefly indicated here is this: the unconditional surrender of oneself to the incomprehensibility of God is radical agnosticism, and actually this is the only true agnosticism because every other view of agnosticism is innocuous. Whether one surrenders to this mystery is of course an open question for every individual. One can try to accept this certainty once again as the concrete way in which the incomprehensibility of God encounters us. Christians who have such fear for their own salvation must of course hope unconditionally for the salvation of others. It remains incomprehensible to them when they gaze into the darkness of history's wickedness and stupidity how others in the midst of the banality and cruelty of life really accomplish this surrender to God which alone can save them. They can only say that God is greater than our hearts and so in this way they can also realize this incomprehensibility and thus bear their agnosticism as to how they themselves and others really are ultimately. The agnosticism of the philistine and of self-important philosophers is only the unsuccessful attempt at the true agnosticism which is required of Christians. For Christians adore in hope and love the incomprehensibility which is called God, and in this their faith transpires.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[137]

9

THE CHURCH AND ATHEISM

Despite all the undeniable interrelationships, today's atheism is not the same as the atheism at the time of the Enlightenment, nor is it even the same as the atheism that was either presupposed as something obvious or propagated by the criticism of religion in the nineteenth century, especially as found in Feuerbach and Marx. Even if atheism today appears once again in a great variety of forms and subject to widely differing social presuppositions, nonetheless all of these atheisms today share common assumptions and characteristics which permit one to speak of today's atheism in the singular. Everywhere it is an atheism conditioned by today's rationalistic and technological society.

For individuals and for Christians it may be of utmost significance whether they live in bourgeois pluralistic society which is religiously neutral and permits them to live their theism as a matter of private opinion, or whether they have to exist in a society where atheism is propagated by force as a state doctrine – despite all lipservice to freedom of conscience. But both of these atheisms are, after all, consequences of the social, rational, and technological development of today's world, even if these consequences are not absolutely necessary. And because this world civilization is present everywhere, albeit in widely varying degrees and in quite diverse stages of development, there is today something that has no precedent in history, namely a worldwide, omnipresent atheism which is no longer a condition of various individual persons, but which is rather a socially recognized phenomenon and one that has gained universal acceptance.

[138] It is, then, a given fact that Christianity has entered upon an epoch which presents it with a fundamental challenge and for which there has never yet been a precedent. I venture the opinion that church-related Christianity has not yet become sufficiently aware of its radically new situation today, that it is conducting itself with more or less anxious defensiveness and that it is consoling itself by taking refuge in those social classes and areas into which the consequences of the new historical situation, which have given rise to the worldwide and now manifest atheism, have not yet penetrated to a sufficiently radical degree. It is obvious that the mentality that produces this atheism has not yet reached its full effect among peasants and in the middle- and lower-middle-class of society. This fact, however, does not give us church-related Christians the right to console ourselves with the religiosity which is still present in these groups. It may well be that certain new religious currents can be observed even outside of these social classes that are "still" religious. It may well be that in South America, for example, the Church will succeed in belonging to the vanguard of sociopolitical change and thus be spared the European and North American shock produced by the antagonism between the rationality of the Enlightenment and traditional religiosity. In my humble opinion, however, none of these things will eliminate that technological, rational mentality which in ever new ways and on a global level is actually, if not necessarily producing atheism.

We cannot see into the future, and no one can absolutely rule out the possibility of historical and radical changes of a kind that will one day make atheism appear to be an antiquated crisis in humanity's history. But if we Christians are reckoning with a world more or less as it actually is and will be in the future, and if we middle class European Christians have no serious desire to have this world otherwise but prefer rather to continue business more or less as usual even in the Church, as has been customary up to now, then we must face the fact that in the foreseeable future we are going to have to live with a worldwide and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

socially acceptable atheism, however small the possibility may be of predicting numerically and statistically the exact relationship between atheists and theists, especially in view of the fact that we are unable to make any prognosis about the future fate of the other world religions that honor God.

Christianity has to take into account this atheism of today, and [139] despite all Christian hope it cannot seriously expect to overcome this atheism to a degree that it will simply cease to exist as a worldwide and social phenomenon. Of course this does not mean that we will have to give up the struggle against atheism, using all the weapons of the Spirit and of love and all other legitimate means consonant with that basic respect for freedom of conscience as recognized by Vatican II even in the face of older traditions. This is our sacred duty as men and women of the Church. Nor does this mean that we should cease to reflect more profoundly and more intensively on our strategy for this battle and how we can conduct it in expectation of success. But the continuing coexistence of atheism with a theism and particularly with the Christian belief in God demands of us in addition the development of a theology which takes into account precisely this atheism and our coexistence with it. We cannot simply consider atheism and the necessity of Christianity's coexisting with it as nothing other than an absolutely incomprehensible phenomenon that has caught Christianity by surprise, a foreign element that renders us speechless and awakens in us only anxious and nervous reactions. Some observations on these questions will be presented here. The selection is arbitrary and lays no claim to being a strictly systematic arrangement.

READINESS FOR DIALOGUE

First of all, the Church has expressly indicated its desire for "dialogue conducted solely out of love for truth and with the exercise of appropriate measures of prudence" with "those who cultivate high qualities of the human spirit, but do not yet acknowledge the Source of these qualities," therefore with atheists (Second Vatican Council, Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World [Gaudium et Spes], no. 92). While maintaining its decisive repudiation of atheism the Church strives in this dialogue "to detect in the atheistic mentality the hidden causes for the denial of God and is conscious of how weighty the questions are which atheism raises, and motivated by love for all human beings, the Church believes that these questions ought to be examined seriously and more profoundly" (Gaudium et Spes, no. 21). This willingness for dialogue is thus solemnly declared. Yet, despite all the good and praiseworthy attempts to put [140] into practice this readiness for dialogue, very little of it has as yet been concretely realized.

Without doubt, the fault for this inadequate realization is to be sought not only with us but also on the other side. For years I was editor of an international periodical for dialogue which had as its purpose the advancement of dialogue with atheistic socialism. This periodical ceased publication due to a lack of continued financial support which was necessary on the part of the German bishops and also due to a lack of cooperation from the other side because the opposing parties, who are also at odds with one another in the camp of materialistic-atheistic socialism – the antagonism between socialists who are conformists and those who are critical of the system – managed to achieve a mutual blockade.

It is more important for us, however, to seek among ourselves the reasons for wearying of this dialogue and its lack of success. There is, indeed, in Rome a Secretariat for Non-Believers, and (as the saying goes) people who live in glass houses should not throw stones. But it must be admitted that as yet not much has been forthcoming that has penetrated the consciousness of the Church in general or its teaching office in such a way as to be translated into the palpable proclamation, preaching, and other activity of the Church. Assuredly there are today a number of subjects of fundamental importance which demand a living proclamation in the Church both as an official institution as well as a union of hearts: human rights, for example, or the new challenges arising out of concern for justice in the Third World. But the proclamation of the reality of the living God – and dialogue with atheism is a part of this, and indeed one of the very foremost parts – is also one of these fundamental tasks of the Church. And we are still very far from realizing this to any satisfactory degree. In both of the newest catechisms in Germany, for example, the question of the living experience of God and with it the question of the possible recognition of God's existence fall far short of anything resembling adequate treatment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What we are still basically working with is a form of theism which stems from the era of the Enlightenment. This theism has quite obvious contours and proffers the impossibly naive explanation that all of the vexing problems of humanity can be solved by the existence of God. Present-day existential philosophy, linguistic analysis, and Anglo-Saxon pragmatism are far from being mastered by Christian [141] philosophers in a way that their findings have had any real influence on the Church's consciousness as a whole or as an official institution. We are still living much too much with a precritical mentality in which God is a particular – albeit the highest – element of reality as a whole. We defend the thesis that God and the world cannot be brought together in a univocal concept, while at the same time we lose sight of this thesis in our affirmations about God prior and subsequent to it and we speak of God as of an element of reality that is located on individual points of experience.

The incomprehensibility of God is the content of an individual thesis about God, but this incomprehensibility does not from the very outset always and everywhere permeate our understanding of God and the way we speak of him. Where can we find an epistemology that has penetrated the average consciousness of both herald and believer which from the very outset, from the original essence of human knowledge, takes into account its relationship to this incomprehensibility of God? We Christian philosophers and theologians should really be open to repentance and self-criticism in respect to our theoretical affirmations and we should constantly remind ourselves that our statements about God are too naive and too superficial to convince atheists; in other words, that we have by no means attained that capacity and willingness for dialogue which is the prerequisite for real dialogue with atheism.

There is, in addition, another factor. The vast majority of atheists today in East and West are not people for whom the question of God is really an alarming and agonizing problem. The experience of the existentiell unavoidability of the question of God is something that for the most part has yet to be awakened. In our average textbook philosophy and theology, which form the basis of our ordinary proclamation, where is there to be found a painstakingly and seriously worked-out chapter containing a mystagogy which deals with the experience of an inescapable question about God? Among us Christians the traditional teaching of the schools – in contrast to a Pascal, a Newman, or a Gabriel Marcel and others – continues on its merry and rationalistic way to proffer us the traditional proofs of the existence of God, which, however objectively unassailable they may be, give us no clue as to how one might go about expressing these rational paradigms in a way that they can be understood as the verbal objectification of an existentiell process in human beings whereby [142] they silently experience the unfathomable grounding of their existence in the mystery of God. A chapter like this does not exist in Christian textbook theology; in this theology one begins to have something to do with God only after one has established his existence by rational proofs.

It is no wonder that nowadays traditional proclamation for the most part does not even try anymore to communicate the traditional proofs of the existence of God to the addressee of the proclamation, despite the fact that these proofs are correct in themselves. Instead, in an embarrassed or in a high and mighty way (both come down ultimately to the same thing) it satisfies itself with the simple assertion of the existence of God, and, as an appendage to this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

at most, additionally assures humanity of the usefulness of this theism. Thus it has God existing for humanity, instead of humanity existing for God. And so it does not really convince people today, apart from those who think that they already believe in God's existence anyway. It is my opinion that the Church must maintain dialogue with atheism, and the Church as it now stands has on the whole a great deal of catching up to do if it really is to be itself capable of dialogue.

THE CHURCH AS UNIVERSAL SIGN OF SALVATION

My second statement in respect to the relationship between the Church and atheism is this: the Church is the sacrament of salvation for the atheist also. What does this statement mean? First of all, we know from the Second Vatican Council that the Church understands, itself to be the universal sacrament of salvation for the world. This statement is itself not easy to understand. But when one considers that the Second Vatican Council, relying on its faith in the salvific will of God and in optimism born of hope, is convinced that without doubt God's grace actually effects the salvation of humankind far beyond the radius of Catholics and of baptized Christians and does this for the most part without the saved being incorporated into the visible Church by baptism; and when a Catholic Christian at the same time believes that the salvation of these innumerable people has, nevertheless, a relationship to the Church, then this statement about the Church as universal sacrament of the salvation of all humankind takes on tangible meaning.

[143] The Church viewed as a tangible, historical, and institutional entity is the abiding presence of Christ in history. This Jesus Christ is the historically concrete presence of God's promise of himself to all humankind at all times and in all p1aces, and the Church is the reality of God's historical promise of himself to all humankind, the reality which always continues to make this self-promise historically present and which constantly bears witness to its irrevocability, and it does this for all people whether they have lived before or after Christ and not only when these people have become members of the visible Church by baptism, something that for the most part does not actually happen. The Church is the promise of salvation precisely for those as well who are part of its visible membership. The incorporation of a person by baptism into the visible Church is first of all the continuation of this sign of salvation in time and in history for the people who are not members of the Church in a visible way.

This function of the Church as sacrament of salvation for the non-Christian world is obviously valid for atheists too. We are prescinding here from the question of whether the Church also has this function directly toward atheists who have not heeded the dictates of their conscience (Gaudium et Spes, no. 19). But it has validity in any case for those atheists who are atheists not due to any fault of their own, that is, who have not been disobedient to the dictates of their conscience. That atheists of this kind might exist, in other words, that the existence of a theoretical atheism in a person even over a long period of time would not necessarily be proof of a subjective state of serious guilt – of this the Second Vatican Council is convinced, in opposition to a previous traditional teaching of the schools.

But the Second Vatican Council concedes to persons of this sort even in their present condition a true possibility of salvation. "Nor does divine Providence deny the help necessary for salvation for those who, without blame on their part, have not yet arrived at an explicit knowledge of God, but who strive to lead a good life with the help of God's grace" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church [Lumen Gentium], no. 16). It also holds true for atheists that they, as persons of good will in whose hearts grace works in an unseen way, are linked with the paschal mystery (Gaudium et Spes, no. 22), that they can be led in ways

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

known to God himself to saving faith even though they [144] are inculpably ignorant of the gospel (Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church [Ad Gentes], no. 7).

But even if such a possibility of salvation exists even for atheists, who are outside of the Church's visible membership, the theological question still remains unanswered as to how in inculpable atheists of this kind the faith that is also necessary for them can be present, how they are not dispensed from this faith but rather how they are conducted to it in a mysterious way. But in any case, by way of preliminary answer to this difficult question, it may be stated that the Church is for these inculpable atheists the historically tangible, sacramental sign, that in them this mysterious, salvific grace of faith is nonetheless at work above and beyond their explicit atheism. The Church is also the sacrament of faith and of the grace of faith which is present and efficacious in inculpable atheists beyond their atheism.

One could of course be first tempted to dismiss the theory of the Church as sacrament of universal grace for the whole world as something that amounts to idle speculation. One could say that one can understand that the grace of Christ even outside of the visible bond of the Church is everywhere at work producing salvation and that the positively upright conscience that we can, in principle, also concede to an atheist is already in an unreflexive way an anonymous actualization of faith through the grace of Christ. But then one could object that the relationship of the Church to this nonexplicit salvific process of faith and salvation is not brought out clearly in this way and hence is superfluous. But we must call to mind that at all times and in all places the inner, metahistorical dimension of grace and faith and the dimension of a historical, social, ultimately sacramental tangibility of this grace in the explicit word, in the social character of the Church, in the sacrament, have both a necessary interdependence as well as a variability in their relationship to one another.

The grace of God, which always intends to bring human beings in all their historical dimensions into God's salvation, has of its very nature the tendency to become historically tangible in word, Church, and sacrament, and at the same time this process whereby this grace becomes embodied and historically palpable takes place in very diverse phases. Thus the grace which produces faith in the least explicit way in inculpable atheists is precisely the grace which has [145] brought about in the whole of human history its incarnational, irrevocable embodiment and tangibility, namely, the Church. And conversely, this historical tangibility of grace known as the Church points back to the history of its own workings, which is still present in inculpable atheists who think that they are atheists and nothing else and who are not capable of reflecting on the depths of their existence, even though they are there, depths in which the inculpable conscience without knowing it reflexively does actually accept God in faith.

Because God in his grace wills the salvation of all of humankind there can really be no night of atheism which would not be pierced within by a ray of light as long as human beings do not close themselves off to God by an act of ultimate culpability. And this night of atheism has always been illumined in this way; the existence of the Church as universal sacrament of salvation has borne witness to this over and over again Atheists gaze inculpably into their night. They do not reflect that on the horizon behind them the sun is already rising and that for this reason their night is not as absolutely pitch black as it would be if God and his grace were not at work behind them, thus giving witness to himself as they stand with their backs turned gazing in the other direction.

It goes without saying that inculpable atheists themselves, as long as they remain such, will reject such an interpretation in their theoretical self-reflection. Something of this sort is possible inasmuch as the theoretically reflexive self-interpretation of human beings and their existentiell condition adequate to this need not to be identical nor need they correspond to one another completely.

Christians, however, who for their part believe that the salvation of all humankind is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

effected by God's grace in Christ who continues to be historically present in the world through the Church; Christians who at the same time possess the confident hope that God's grace can be victorious even in those who in their own reflexive theory interpret themselves as godless and without grace – these Christians cannot help but interpret inculpable atheists themselves theoretically reject.

One may, perhaps give to this existence of inculpable atheists, with its mysterious participation in salvation, the name of anonymous Christianity or reject this terminology as open to misunderstanding [146] and emphasize the fact that this terminology cannot itself be used in dialogue with atheists. This, however, does not alter the fact that, at least from the time of the Second Vatican Council, the Church in the history of its understanding of Christianity and of its own self-understanding has itself also arrived at the conviction that inculpable atheists who stand in God's grace do exist and that the existence of the Church in the world bears sacramental witness to this universal possibility of salvation. Before Christ and his abiding presence in the Church the salvation of all human beings as something possible on God's part was not attested in a way that was so historically palpable. This salvation was always there, but its irrevocably victorious efficaciousness was not attested. It is precisely this that constitutes the eschatological nature of the Church. As a particular reality in the world, even in the world of salvation, the Church is not identical with the world's salvation itself. But to the world the Church is witness to this salvation, not, indeed, as a manifestation extrinsic to this salvation but itself as the eschatologically irrevocable appearance of this salvation, as the historical incarnation of God's grace which, poured out over all the world, is the world's salvation. In this sense the Church also bears witness to salvation for atheists who are inculpably such. As the historically concrete presence of grace, the Church already has a function toward atheists even before they themselves have explicitly found and recognized the Church. This does not exclude the fact, but rather includes it, that the Church can be rejected only with culpability wherever it is explicitly recognized as such a sign of salvation for all, and that only with culpability can one refuse one's allegiance to it as sign of salvation for all.

THE STRUGGLE AGAINST ATHEISM

A third statement must be added to what has already been said. From its own very inmost nature the Church must struggle courageously and with all legitimate means against atheism. With the reservation that a more exact universal history and phenomenology of religion would be obliged to make very differentiated statements in respect to the image of God contained in the individual religions of, the world, one can nonetheless say that a socially legitimized and [147] socially widespread atheism has begun to exist only since the time of the Enlightenment. This means that prior to this time the Church was not confronted historically with a radical atheism, but it also means that if such an atheism has begun, then it is a new and fundamental task of the Church to combat it.

The preceding interpretation of inculpable atheists with its optimism as regards salvation – the idea that atheists are to be presumed inculpable according to an authentic Christian understanding in opposition to a previously widespread theological teaching – does not mean, of course, that atheism in the dimension of theoretical reflection and verbalization is not a phenomenon that radically contradicts Christianity in its explicitly confessional dimension and in the dimension of the reflexive practice of Christian life. The proper and traditional understanding of Christian faith requires one to say that the confession of the infinite and eternal God is objectively and in principle the most fundamental confession of Christian faith and that this may not be superseded by a modern "Jesus-ism" or by today's humanism. This most fundamental affirmation of Christianity is contradicted by atheism whether it be interpreted as theoretically explicit atheism or as indifference to God in the conduct of one's life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus the Church has no choice but to struggle against this atheism with all legitimate means. As has already been said, according to Church teaching there are certainly inculpable atheists who find salvation, whose lives conducted in the light of an upright conscience contradict their theoretical atheism in the last resort. However, the terrible danger remains that a theoretical atheism of this kind will also have a feedback effect on a person's existentiell attitude whereby the conviction begins to insinuate itself that it is also old-fashioned and superfluous to heed the dictates of one's conscience. Moreover, God as origin and ultimate goal of all reality is supposed to be present and hold sway not only in the most profound depths of the moral conscience but also in all the dimensions of human history, therefore in human theory and in society. The Church knows, of course, that as long as history continues its course this goal of God's explicit presence and sovereignty in all the dimensions of human beings will never be fully attained and that in approaching this goal there will always be new and unexpected setbacks. But the Church, that is, concretely, the people of the church, cannot simply regard their theism as an indestructible patrimony; in the darkness [148] of private and collective history they must struggle over and over again to make this theism their own and give missionary witness of their faith in God to the secular and secularized world.

What has been said at the beginning must be repeated here. This struggle against atheism is always and foremost a struggle against a view of God which is in danger of replacing the true, incomprehensible God by a human idol. If there is stupidity and malice even in the Church, this can contribute to such a danger. The purity of the teachings about God at the highest official church levels will not prevent the ordinary proclamation of God from fashioning an image of God that is primitive and unworthy of belief, especially since a proclamation that would do nothing more than repeat conciliar and other official teachings about God would be no real proclamation at all and would at all events be devoid of effect. Unavoidably, then, ordinary proclamation offers ample room for the danger of talking about God in such a way that this proclamation of God becomes unworthy of belief. Moreover, as has already been said, a mystagogy of the experience of God in the Church and of its proclamation would have to be developed much more intensively than has actually been the case up to now. The struggle against atheism is foremost and of necessity a struggle against the inadequacy of our own theism. Of course that is not the only element of the struggle against atheism. We must bear witness in public to our faith in God. Openly and without that obtuse arrogance that might awaken the impression that one considers atheists to be either stupid or malicious, that one is oneself a theist who knows nothing of the burden and the wounds that are necessarily involved in a confession of God that can no longer rely on the common sense of society.

For this struggle is there any reason why an attempt should not be made to find a genuine, honest, and practically effective alliance among all religions and ideological groups that acknowledge God and therefore have something in common despite all the divergencies they might have in the interpretation of what they share with one another? It seems to me that Christian ecumenism, despite all verbal assurances to the contrary from every side and despite all goodwill, has reached a point of stagnation. And yet a theistic ecumenism, if one may use the term, is a bitter necessity today. An alliance of this kind should in no way violate any of those principles of religious freedom and freedom of conscience which the Church in the Council [149] has declared to be its own even in contrast to a great deal that was done in its previous practice. This alliance should certainly not be conceived as one among societies or nations which would in one way or another accord theism the status of a state religion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But a theistic ecumenism of this kind could really be effective in many ways. One effect, at least, could be that the theistic religions of the world would stop fighting against one another in practice, and instead consider it be a tremendous miracle of grace that all are striving to adore God explicitly in spirit and in truth. Furthermore, this theological ecumenism could help the theistic religions to learn something from one another for their respective faith in God. Christian theism, too, is immersed in the flow of history. It has not yet reached its final point of development in leading people to truth in its totality, and for its continued progress it can learn something from other theistic religions and their mystagogies. And this learning process can of course be mutual. When we Christians and people of the Church make the alarming discovery how little echo our own mystagogy of the experience of God has among other theistic religions and especially among modern atheists, how our own posture in this area has become defensive to the point of embarrassment, then this can serve as a real impetus for us both to reappraise our own theism and understand it more profoundly as well as to learn something in addition for ourselves from other theisms.

For this struggle of theism we would have to rearrange our proclamation to a certain extent. The Church in its proclamation cannot of course relinquish anything of what it has once believed and taught to be authentic divine revelation. This, however, does not rule out shifts of emphasis and rearrangement of certain materials in its proclamation. Using a variety pf approaches and all possible points of connection, a pastor should frequently preach on how people today in all seriousness can have a living faith in God and truly adore him, how this divine faith is the most natural, and yet at the same time through grace the supreme and most difficult act for a human being if it is to succeed not only theoretically but existentielly as well. If this pastor cannot actually find any more time and energy to preach on indulgences and their benefits, then there is really no great harm done nowadays.

This shift of emphasis in our proclamation, which is required for the struggle against atheism, is far from being carried out to a [150] sufficient degree. I cannot recall any papal encyclical devoted to the problem of atheism and how it is possible today to have faith in God in spirit and truth. The preparation of such an encyclical should not of course be entrusted to neoscholastic theologians alone. It would have to be rational, but not rationalistic. It would have to be addressed to human beings in all their dimensions and in the way that they are today. It would have to be something that people would not put aside in boredom with the theological babble of an old-fashioned clericalism for which God is nothing more than a stabilizing factor for society as it is, and which one would like to keep that way once one has achieved one’s own niche in it among the haves rather than among the have-nots. Why should there not be an encyclical like this? The purpose of my question is not to utter warnings, which ill become me, but only to point out that for a theism which is to combat worldwide atheism in the East and in the West a shift of emphasis in our proclamation is absolutely indispensable. Then it will also be a matter of course that we shall be able to learn from one another in the framework of a theistic ecumenism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[151]

10

THE ACT OF FAITH AND THE CONTENT OF FAITH

The distinction between fides qua and fides quae, between the act of faith and the content of faith is well known in theological tradition. As intelligible as this distinction between the act of confessing and the creed might at first glance appear, it nevertheless conceals a number of problems. Some of these problems will be considered here without making claim to a systematic or exhaustive treatment.

FAITH IS REALITY IN THE HUMAN BEING

In ordinary, everyday thinking no one usually perceives any problem with the distinction between the act of knowledge and the content of knowledge. There is an express or tacit presumption that this or that statement can be made about the act of knowledge as such as distinct from the object of knowledge (the former's immaterial nature, its location within a specific character and historical background of the person knowing, etc.), and these characteristics of the act of knowledge will not at all, or at most vaguely, be brought into relationship with the content of knowledge itself But this content of knowledge will be judged according to criteria that hardly have anything to do with the structure of the act of knowledge as such; questions will be asked about the internal coherence of its individual elements, about its demonstrability, about its relationship to other contents of knowledge, and so on. In point of fact the relationship [152] between the content of knowledge and the metaphysics of knowledge or, as the case may be, an empirical psychology of knowledge, cannot of course be described without a theory of the more precise relationship between act and content. One could, for example, show that Thomas Aquinas's metaphysics of knowledge rests ultimately on the fundamental axiom that being, knowing, and being known are originally and ultimately one and the same thing, therefore that ultimately the object known is nothing other than the act of knowing present to itself so that the difference between the act of knowledge and the object of knowledge and the distinct character of this difference which is also present between the two are secondary phenomena which are the expression of the creatureliness of finite being.

In this light the difference between fides quae and fides qua is also an obscure and difficult matter. However, the questions that this raises will not be pursued further here in an explicit way. There are enough problems of a specifically theological nature. Thus, for example, with a justifiable theological optimism one will concede to human beings of the most diverse kind and condition a faith which leads them to salvation and (given the further assumptions) justification, even though the contents of their faith, their fides quae, are of the most diverse and often contradictory kind. In this one cannot help reasonably presuming, after all, that their faith (as fides qua) is the same, inasmuch as its effect is the same, namely, salvation and justification. One is forced, then, to describe more exactly this fides qua, which is the same everywhere, in order to make clear how it is the same in different cases and has the same salvific effect. On the other hand, one must do this in such a way that the fides quae, the object and content of faith, will retain its essential religious and theological significance. For Christian revelation and proclamation assume most assuredly that "something" is revealed and proclaimed that is accepted in faith and becomes the content of this faith. How can both of these requirements be met simultaneously, requirements which presuppose and maintain the distinction between fides quae and fides qua, without degrading the fides qua as such to a basically neutral, in itself colorless reception of the only important thing in itself the revealed and proclaimed content of faith, and yet at the same time still respect the salutary and theological significance of the content of faith, the fides quae?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In my opinion more thought could be given to this problem and [153] this would not mean only belaboring the obvious in regard to a theological problem that has long since been dealt with in the past from every conceivable angle. After all, the problem does have an ecumenical significance as well as an importance in respect to the religious assessment Christians make of people whom they consider to be non-Christian, at least at first glance and in reference to these people's interpretations of themselves. The significance of our problem requires no further elucidation here. Even for those Christians and theologians who are oriented toward biblical theology the problem is troublesome and difficult because by and large one is forced to incline more to the opinion that the New Testament extols the fides quae and insists on its necessity as the thing that leads to salvation and justification without devoting much attention to the problems of the state of those persons who might perhaps possess a fides qua without being aware of the specific contents of faith, or who do not accept them, contents the acceptance of which in faith are presented by the New Testament as the conditions for justification and salvation.

One cannot deny that Holy Scripture in some respects does, on the other hand, relativize certain contents of faith as far as their necessity for salvation is concerned, and this holds true especially since Scripture has passages about these contents of faith which vary to a considerable degree and which are not systematized. But the Second Vatican Council's affirmation of the possibility of salvation even for those who, in fidelity to their conscience, consider themselves to be atheists is something that is difficult to conceive of in the explicit context of the New Testament. The fact remains that the New Testament puts the emphasis on the fides quae in such a way that the acceptance of this fides quae as the salvific element is extolled and demanded. In view of the current optimism about the salvation of all human beings, however problematic this may be from a theological standpoint, the explicit question about the fides qua is something that can no longer be evaded.

As an answer to this question we shall attempt to formulate a basic thesis. There is a fides qua which exists as something that is a possibility for every human being (albeit something that is offered to a person's freedom) and which makes its significance for salvation and justification understandable through itself and yet at the same time this fides qua possesses a reality of content in its own right, the [154] free acceptance of which can be acknowledged as the acceptance of revelation in faith. In this acceptance, the reality of content, which in the ordinary use of language we recognize to be the content of Old and New Testament revelation in its historical framework, does not lose its salutary and theological significance. The reason why it does not lose this significance is not to be found in the fact that it also implies an objective reality in the salvific-theological sense which would come absolutely from outside and as an additional element to the reality of content of the fides qua, which is always and everywhere possible, but rather because it is the historical (taking place in event and word) self-realization (and, indeed, a self-realization of an irreversible kind) of the reality which in germ and originally is grasped in every fides qua (even though this, perhaps, is not objectively verbalized).

This basic thesis cannot of course be substantiated here in detail in the framework of a Catholic theology. For me it remains to be seen to what extent a Protestant theology (perhaps proceeding from other points of departure and using another terminology) might be able to adopt this basic thesis, especially since the experiences I have had in this regard contain many conflicting elements. It goes without saying that all of these considerations also proceed on the assumption that an optimism in regard to universal salvation in time and space (at least as a possibility of universal salvation) can never at any time or in any place bypass Jesus Christ and his unique act of salvation. So it is always a question of how one could conceive in theological terms this Christian possibility of salvation even in a place to which (before or after Christ) the specific Christian message of revelation has not at all penetrated, or could not be presented in a way that its rejection can seriously be considered to be a decision which imports spiritual peril. A few observations will be added here to this basic thesis which cannot of course exhaust the subject matter of the thesis.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

REVELATION: THE RADICALIZING OF TRANSCENDENTALITY

First of all, we must consider that in the consciousness, in its realization, realities can be present (of a subjective but ultimately also of an objective kind) which are conscious without necessarily [155] having to be verbally objectified as objects which have been explicitly reflected upon. This is a truism that should not be overlooked especially in the age of Freud, but also in a traditional metaphysics of knowledge, one, however, that is easily forgotten in concrete cases. In principle, then, a knowledge can also be present in a fides qua (however more precisely this may be conceived), which knowledge need not at all be an object known and verbalized in the consciousness, a knowledge which the reflexive consciousness even denies possessing.

The Catholic doctrine of grace traditionally speaks of the infused "theological virtues." They are called infused because, coming as they do from the initiative of God's grace they precede the individual act, which receives its content through a posteriori instruction, as permanent capabilities, as conditions of possibility for positing any salutary acts at all (of faith, hope, and love). How these infused capabilities are to be more precisely conceived, particularly their significance as the divine self-communication in the Holy Spirit, need not be discussed more exactly here. In any event, this traditional (in scholastic theology more or less obvious) doctrine presupposes that these theological virtues are characterized by a very definite "formal object" which as a priori goal as formal object can be attained by no other capacity of knowledge (just as ears are not capable of grasping colors).

What has just been said can be quite properly understood as nothing more than the transposition of the teaching of Scripture into the terms of the metaphysics of knowledge, when Scripture says that the reality of faith can be grasped only in the Holy Spirit, and this transposition can be understood as a legitimate attempt to understand the statements of Scripture in a way that is not pietistically "emotional" and hence unworthy of belief.

These God-given "capabilities" may not of course be understood as individual capabilities located in an area alongside of and in addition to the spiritual capabilities of a transcendentally unlimited human knowledge and freedom (as if, for example, a sensory capacity for perceiving electric currents were added to our other five senses), but only as radicalizations of our transcendentality to the immediacy of God, by means of which an understanding of the connection between the human being's endowment with grace in the Holy Spirit and the immediate vision of God promised to us in [156] eternity is also attained. This radicalization of our transcendentality to the immediacy of God, a radicalization which is the formal object of the theological virtues (which, of course, as such may not be confused with its verbalized objectification as an individual object of our consciousness), is, as an interpretation of what is actually meant by divine grace, also a safeguard against an understanding of grace which considers grace to be an individual reality within our consciousness, experienced emotionally and capable of being reflected upon directly, an understanding which in view of modern psychology would have to consider grace to be an old-fashioned instrument used to interpret phenomena of psychology or of depth psychology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

However indisputable it may be that grace in its intrinsic nature can also have effects in the individual phenomena of the consciousness, still grace as such must be understood as an element of the actual transcendentality of human beings by means of which they are always and of necessity open to the absolute reality of God. Otherwise grace could be understood as an old-fashioned interpretation of quite ordinary phenomena of the consciousness. Thus grace, even though it is of course God's unmerited grace, can, because of God's universal salvific will, always and everywhere be present, at least in the mode of an offer, even if it remains entirely open whether this grace will be accepted or rejected by human freedom (much as humans can possess their human nature by way of freely acquiescing to it or by way of desperate protest against themselves).

This radical ordination and this radicalizing of human transcendentality to the immediacy of God, even though it is not the object of explicit reflection and verbalization, can be quite rightly understood as "revelation." For it is gratuitous, whereby the "gratuitous character" must not be confused with the idea of a gift that is fine or exclusive because it is rare or with an endowment which is bestowed at a definite point in place and time, both of which are conceivable but do not belong to the essence of an unmerited grace of God. This radicalizing of human transcendentality to the immediacy of God can further be understood as revelation because it gives to knowledge and freedom a new, otherwise unattainable, formal object. It is a personal revelation of God because it is given through God's free, personal self-communication, which constitutes the actual essence of grace. This revelation can quite properly be understood as fundamentally historical (despite the criticism of Eicher and others) because [157] it is obvious that every transcendental human experience is always mediated by a historical experience and forms a unity with it. (Human beings come to a grasp of themselves as transcendent creatures oriented to God's incomprehensibility only through human intercommunication and by experiencing the world, in the case of an original experience of their transcendentality, and not merely of a secondary or tertiary reflection on this transcendentality.)

In the unity of history and in the divine providence of salvation this mediatory historical experience (and historical realities that are structures of explicitly religious reflection can quite properly be a part of this experience) is always and in every case connected (in a relationship of cause and effect, etc.) with something essentially religious which is the effect and objectification of the original revelatory transcendental endowment of the human being with grace. As part of a history in which, taken as a whole, revelation takes place at all events, a mediation of this kind participates always and everywhere in this history of revelation, even if this mediation, viewed solely in itself be not a historical event of revelation in the strict sense. Those who would in every case require revelation to have a clearer and fuller character for this kind of mediation of a gratuitous experience in time and space in order for this unity of historical aposteriority and gratuitous transcendentality to deserve the name of historical revelation would be obliged either (while upholding the universality of the salvific will of God) to deny that faith in a historical revelation is always necessary for salvation (something that Vatican II, however, also emphasizes), or they would have to postulate a private revelation for many cases. Such a private revelation and its relationship to Christ is more than improbable for reasons which I cannot of course develop in detail here.

HISTORY: THE PLACE WHERE REVELATION OCCURS

If a theological reality of content for the fides qua is vindicated in this way, one that in certain circumstances is sufficiently salutary (even though in certain circumstances the a posteriori

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mediation of the gratuitous a priori experience is merely an object of moral significance which in itself does not also belong to the sphere of actual revelation), then the salvific significance of the fides quae in its [158] reality of content is not thereby diminished. Without sharing the views of "revelation" as found in classical modernists such as G. Tyrell, for whom "revelation" was nothing more than a consequence, in itself unimportant, of a naturally religious disposition, one can without hesitation view the material contents of historical revelation as verbalized objectifications of the "revelation" which is already present in the gratuitous radicalizing of human transcendentality in God's self-communication. This, of course, with the presupposition that these objectifications are essential for this transcendental and aprioristic endowment of the human being with grace; that these objectifications have a collective history guided by the divine providence of salvation; that these objectifications when realized also have of course a normative significance for the future and for other people whose endowment with grace is to be objectified in such a way that the history of this objectification is itself historical revelation and must be termed such, and in this way – not merely in actual words but prior to these – is objectified by historical events.

In this way, individuals as historical beings are part of the history of revelation as the history of grace; they cannot choose their place in this history according to their own whim; they must in principle acknowledge the genuine objectifications of grace in this history as objectifications of their own grace; they must have the fides quae possible for them in their historical situation and presented to them as the objectification of the salvation history of humanity in the order of grace. The fides quae may be quite minimal in content; in certain circumstances (as mediation of the free acceptance of grace) it can consist of that fidelity to one's own conscience in which, according to Vatican II, even persons who in a reflexive way consider themselves to be atheists can still be in union with the salvific mystery of Christ. But in principle the reality of content of this fides quae is not subject to the arbitrariness of the human being. Where a theological reality of content is offered to the conscience of a person in the order of belief as an objectification of grace and thus of revelation, the rejection of it or indifference toward it would be a free no to one's human endowment with grace, to one's fides qua itself. Other considerations on the difference between fides qua and fides quae and on the relationship to one another can easily be added. A few of them will be presented here without any claim to a systematic arrangement.

The fides quae of an individual and the fides quae of the Christian [159] community of faith, the Church, are not simply identical. For the most part the fides quae of the Church as a whole will be richer and more differentiated than the fides quae of an individual, especially when the Church is surveyed not only in a brief, individual period of time, but rather when the fides quae of the Church as a whole over a longer period or in the entire history of its faith is compared to the fides quae of an individual. The explicit faith of an individual is less differentiated for the most part; it is of a more fragmentary nature; it is crisscrossed in a nonreflexive way with currents and amalgamations that are subject to prevailing times and circumstances; it is penetrated by opinions that are not part of faith. And yet in a definite period of time the fides quae of individuals can also be richer and more fully developed than the average faith of the entire believing community, even including the official pronouncements of its teaching office, because the faith of these individuals can be more advanced from the standpoint of the history of faith than the average faith of the believing community as a whole, and perhaps only later will it become exemplary and normative for the community.

This is obvious if Catholic theologians recognize not only a history of theology but an actual history of dogmas in which individuals have been able to grasp something as an actual reality of faith even before the teaching office in its official decisions. At certain times in the Church's history some elements of the fides quae have doubtlessly been emphasized, while at other times the emphasis has changed or is being changed. Inasmuch as the Church's teaching office is dependent on varied emphasis of this kind, on the formation of concepts that takes place first in nonofficial theology, on religious currents, on changes in the spirituality of the Church or of individual regions of the Church, and inasmuch as the official Church does go along with these changes not only in point of fact, but must go along with them in the very nature of things – a pope today, for example, could no longer put forward a doctrine of redemption as a way of outwitting the devil – the actual faith in the Church manifests a normative significance in a certain sense even for the teaching office itself. By no means does the teaching office always and in every respect have the "leading role" in the development of the fides quae that actually exists in the Church, but is, rather, dependent on it. Thus a Catholic understanding of the ecclesial teaching office does not conceive theological work as nothing more than the explanation [160] and defense of that doctrine which is explicitly put forward by the ecclesial teaching office itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

JUSTIFYING FAITH ON ITS "GROUNDS'

The actual fides quae of the individual Christian in the Church has a structure that is not only particular and conditioned by prevailing circumstances – something that is obvious – but it has in the interplay of individual and collective history focal points that form the original approaches for the whole content of faith and represent those realities of content which in reflexive clarity are also actually affirmed with an absolute assent of faith. For a theory of the fides quae in a Catholic sense it is of course correct that in itself everything that God has revealed and the Church has put forward for belief must be believed with this kind of absolute assent of faith. But if one considers the assent of faith really present concretely in individuals, then the matter becomes somewhat more complicated. The formal teaching office's normative authority in matters of faith may (it is to be hoped) in the belief of individual Catholics be one of the realities that their faith grasps. Nowadays, however, this will rarely be the reality of their faith that they affirm first, and starting from which they grasp the remaining realities of content of their faith and organize them intellectually. Actually it cannot be that way at all in the light of traditional fundamental theology in which the authority of Scripture and the Church's teaching authority are never the first chapter, but they come very late. Thus, for example, Augustine's maxim that he would not believe the gospel unless the authority of the Church moved him to do so is, at the very least, highly problematical. In the objective and existentiell structure of the fides quae of a Christian the experience of God and of his Christ can obviously occupy a more original and more fundamental position than the teaching authority of the Church.

Furthermore, in the mentality even of Catholic Christians the authority of the ecclesial teaching office in the sense of Vatican II is very often called into question today, even when more fundamental Christian truths are grasped with an absolute assent of faith. This may be regrettable, but it is a fact. Even in today's secular sphere the general consciousness of individuals is not characterized as much by statements affirmed in an absolute and unquestioning way as it is by ones that are rather accepted with reservations "for the time being", [161] until fuller knowledge has been attained. People today have the impression that scientific progress basically consists of nothing but laying bare the erroneousness of previous opinions. This mentality is carried over to the actual structuring of the fides quae of today's average Christian. There is of course no human being who does not have, either explicitly or implicitly, at least some statements that he or she grasps with absolute assent, even though the transcendental necessity of such statements might not be known in a reflexive way. This is likewise true in its own way in the case of Christian faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is, however, difficult to say exactly which statements are the ones that are grasped with this kind of absolute assent (at least implicitly) in the faith of the individual believer. The answer to this question, if indeed there really is an answer, must be sought among individuals themselves as well as in the belief characteristic of individual periods in the history of faith, and this answer will always be a new and different one. Therefore all of the Christian confessions in their theology would have to engage in continued and intensive reflection in order to ascertain what contents of a fides quae as it exists in today's world can presumably be grasped by people today and can thus constitute the foundation and the existentiell principle of organization for the entire reality of content of Christian faith. Assuredly, neither the authority of Scripture nor that of the Catholic Church's teaching office will appear among the most original primary data today. On the Catholic side both of these things are part of the contents of faith, but they are more or less secondary appendages to the content of a faith that must be objectively and existentielly erected on the basis of quite different and more original points of departure. This also leads, for example, to the insight that the Church's official proclamation of the Christian message should not tacitly presume that the formal authority of the teaching office prevails among those, at least, to whom the message is directed, even among practicing Catholics, and therefore that the only thing required is to put forward a definite teaching as one that has binding force for Catholics. In contrast to past times, Christian proclamation today can no longer reliably build on an already existing acknowledgement of the teaching office's formal authority. Much more than in the past the teaching office must put forward and defend what is taught on its own grounds. Should it succeed in doing this, it would also recover people's confidence in its formal teaching authority in matters of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[162]

11

A HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS

CENTRAL TRUTHS AND REMOTE TRUTHS

Among the many incentives the Second Vatican Council conveyed or at least offered to the Church as a stimulation to pastoral care and pastoral theology the notion of a "hierarchy of truths" was not the most important and the most decisive one on the Council's part, yet it was an impulse that should not be overlooked and one that will assuredly continue to have an effect far into the future of theology and pastoral practice.

THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL'S DECREE ON ECUMENISM

In the Decree on Ecumenism (Unitatis Redintegratio, no. 11) the Council speaks of an order of priority or a hierarchy of truths within Catholic teaching according to the different kind of relationship these truths have to the foundation of Christian faith. In this decree the Council exhorts Catholics to give heed to this hierarchy of the truths of the faith when engaging in ecumenical dialogue. The Council does not specify what is to be understood by this hierarchy of the truths of the faith. It says only that this hierarchy results from the varied relationship the individual truths of faith have with the "foundation" of the faith. Nor is it stated what this "foundation" is.

Apparently the phase "hierarchy of truths" found its way into the Council as a result of an address on this decree delivered by the archbishop of Görz, A. Pangrazio, to the Seventy-Fourth General [163] Congregation on 11 November, 1963, in which he spoke of the hierarchial order of revealed truths and also of the hierarchia veritatum. By emphasizing in his address that even in a hierarchy of this kind all revealed truths must still be held with the same divine faith, he countered in advance a false, but quite widespread interpretation of this teaching of the hierarchy of truths according to which it is permissible to cast aside certain revealed truths, perhaps even ones that have been explicitly defined, or simply to treat them with indifference or pass over them entirely if and when they are more or less remote from the "foundation," that is, from the basic substance of Christianity. It is certainly right to repudiate this false interpretation of the hierarchy of truths, but in so doing one becomes aware of an unsolved problem, one that admits of no simple solution.

First of all, it is not entirely obvious that Christian faith is related in exactly the same way to all the truths of faith, even though it is of course beyond dispute that all of these truths in themselves lay claim to the faith of Christians and can be the object of the fides qua. For it is certain that only in the totality of revelation and of Christian faith is this Christian faith as a human act related to an individual truth which may, perhaps, be quite remote from the foundation of faith. To this extent one can certainly say that the fides qua itself also participates in the hierarchial structure of the fides quae and therefore the statement that all the truths are to be held with the same Christian faith must be taken with a grain of salt. Moreover, the archbishop of Görz's warning must certainly not be construed in such a way that the Council's teaching of the hierarchy of truths would be practically meaningless for the life of Christian faith, the Church's pastoral work, and ecumenical dialogue if one did nothing more than simply insist that all the truths of the faith are to be held with the same divine faith. A. Pangrazio himself, as a matter of fact, uses his teaching only to demonstrate that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christians are already in agreement on the "primary" truths of the Christian religion. The Decree on Ecumenism gives us no further information on the meaning and significance attached to its use of the term "hierarchy of the truths of the faith."

THE FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS

So if we ask what the foundation of faith is in order to gain an understanding of the hierarchy of truths from this standpoint, then of [164] course one can first of all quite properly say that it consists of the fundamental truths of faith, those truths, therefore, on which everything else is based and which themselves are not actually derived from other truths. Such basic summaries of faith which have this foundation as their object and which state it can certainly already be found in the New Testament. This point will not be developed here. In the Apostles' Creed as baptismal profession we certainly also have a basic creedal statement which has this foundation as its object, while later professions of faith certainly add a great deal to this "foundation" which can no longer be considered as part of the "foundation" itself. A simple proof that this is the case even as early as the professions of faith of Nicaea and Constantinople can be seen in the fact that even though this creed was recently reaffirmed by all the churches in Germany as the common profession of faith, and this rightly so, nevertheless the Orthodox Church does not say the Filioque in this creed, and the Anglican Church, without rejecting it, wants to omit it in the explicit creed. That later professions of faith, for example the Tridentine profession of faith, make statements that go far beyond the foundation of faith is obvious.

If the Council's phrase "foundation" of faith simply refers us to the Apostles' Creed, that assuredly does not mean that no other basic creedal statements are conceivable which also have this foundation as their object and which perhaps could be more immediately intelligible to people today than the Apostles' Creed. For the question might at least be posed, for example, whether the Apostles' Creed does not too readily take for granted a genuine and vital understanding of the word God, something that would have to be brought home to people today more explicitly in a modern basic creedal statement. Thus, when speaking pastorally about the hierarchy of truths and its foundation, one should not fasten upon the formulation of this foundation as found in the Apostles' Creed as though nothing further could be said on the matter. If one wants to get this foundation across to people, one will always state it in the words of the Apostles' Creed as well, but not only in these words.

THE "EXISTENTIELL" HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS

From a pastoral point of view the hierarchy of truths and its foundation must be considered under entirely different aspects. There is [165] certainly an "objective" hierarchy of truths, one that theologians and preachers have to reflect upon more profoundly so as to be able to express it in a way that is intelligible and credible. But obviously there is also an "existentiell" hierarchy of truths which is not simply the equivalent of the objective hierarchy of truths. It is determined by the objective relationship of the truths of faith, and this does not mean that they simply condition one another reciprocally, but it is rather a relationship that stems from the "importance" of the individual truths and it is obvious that the importance varies. The existentiell hierarchy of truths does of course have something to do with the objective hierarchy, because the totality of faith as it actually exists in the consciousness of an individual, of an ecclesial group or of a definite period of the Church must continually submit itself to guidance and correction from the objective hierarchy of truths.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For example, if a campesino in Mexico were to have no more or less explicit knowledge of anything except Our Lady of Guadalupe, then one could in all reverence still discover a salvific faith in God even despite the scantiness of such notions. It would not be wrong, however, to hope that this faith would have a closer proximity to the objective hierarchy of the truths of faith. Nonetheless, even in the faith that can really be attained and reasonably expected of a person there is a difference between an existentiell hierarchy of truths and the objective hierarchy. This holds true both for individual periods of church history and for individual groups in the Church as well as for individuals' consciousness of faith in the history of their own lives. Otherwise a history of dogmas would in principle be impossible. It would not be justifiable to speak of the different "spiritualities" that are characteristic of each of the religious orders. Differences in the popular piety of different countries would have to be discountenanced. One could not agree with Pope Paul VI when speaking of indulgences who said that Christians could exercise the option of their Christian freedom to take them or leave them.

The differences in the structures that form the concrete framework for faith are quite justifiable, and that applies to the fides quae as well as the fides qua. It is quite legitimate, since it is absolutely unavoidable, for the truths of faith to be present throughout the world in different ways in the consciousness of faith, sometimes moving to the foreground of this consciousness, sometimes receding to the background, since the persons possessing this faith are themselves different. There are age differences, differences in the times in which [166] they lead their lives, sociological differences, personal differences, and so on. (The Immaculate Conception occupied a place in the foreground of the religious consciousness of a Saint Maximilian Kolbe in a way that was not and should not be the same elsewhere, not even among religious people and saints.) In the concrete religious consciousness the power that these truths of faith have to influence history and the way people live varies considerably. (In earlier times the "Holy Land" produced Crusades; nowadays it produces at most religious tourism.)

CHANGING PLAUSIBILITIES

From a pastoral point of view we ought to become more aware of this existentiell hierarchy of truths and analyze it more profoundly in its application to our times and to the countries of Western Europe. The plausibilities change on the basis of which – without subjecting them to a critical analysis – people of a particular time and in a particular society live their lives and also find a way to understand their faith. Today, for example, many people consider it obvious (at least in theory) that they have to love their neighbor, that they have to work at changing and improving social structures, and in certain circumstances these people will strive in light of this to acquire an understanding of Christian faith and in this way they will of course construct for themselves an existentiell hierarchy in their faith. No doubt it will be different from the hierarchy of Christians who lived, at a time when wars of religion, a feudally structured society, and so, on prevailed. Above and beyond the plausibilities of a particular time and definite society there are, of course, also plausibilities which are characteristic of individuals and so the hierarchy of their faith will be contingent on these.

QUESTIONS TO THOSE ENGAGED IN PASTORAL WORK

This subject of the hierarchy of truths cannot be developed in greater scope here, although much more could be said about it. This brief essay will close, then, with a few questions to those engaged in pastoral work and entrusted with the proclamation of Christian faith today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[167] Given no more than a quarter of an hour can you tell pagans in one of Europe's big cities who have never experienced a really challenging encounter with Christianity what a Christian really believes? Can you tell these people briefly what is meant by the word God, without having this word conjure up in them the image of a supreme tyrant and chief constable whose primary job it is to hunt them down when they get confused about their moral problems? Without compromising one iota of binding faith can you talk to them about Jesus without having Christology sound to these pagans like mythology that they can make no sense of whatsoever for their own lives, and without giving them the impression that you are claiming something about Jesus that might just as well be claimed about the Dalai Lama today, something that they would categorically reject without the slightest qualms of an informed conscience? Can you speak about the modern plausibilities of these present-day pagans so that they can recognize themselves in what you are saying and find the key in these plausibilities that would open their understanding to their need of redemption? In a relatively brief time can you make clear to these pagans that the Church is more than just a huge conglomerate managed by pope, bishops, and pastors, membership in which has as its consequence the obligation of Sunday mass, which they do not understand, and church taxes? If those engaged in pastoral work feel that questions like these cannot be answered with mere clichés and if they make the constant effort to try to answer these questions in the affirmative, then they understand what the hierarchy of truths means, even though this phrase might not be part of their own vocabulary.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[169]

PART THREE

Christianity

[171]

12

CHRISTIANITY'S ABSOLUTE CLAIM

Young people especially have obvious difficulties in understanding Christian faith. Since human beings are enormously complicated and since faith touches on all the dimensions of their existence, it is obvious that the complexity of these difficulties knows no end. This being the case we can treat here only a very limited number of topics that focus around this problem, but they are topics of widespread concern to everybody.

Quite a few people today have the impression that Christian faith is out of date. Owing to historical conditions it is a reality, like so many other things of the past, that has not entirely disappeared from our society. They know that it still exists, but they feel that there is no real justification for its existence anymore and that it is slowly but surely dying out and will one day disappear entirely. History is full of such examples: monarchs, the nobility, certain social conventions and ways of life. The theory of the slow demise of religion is one of communism's basic tenets and other philosophies of history and culture also subscribe to this view. What is to be said about this attitude toward Christian faith?

CHANGING FORMS AND VIEWS

First of all, we must frankly admit that much of what is concretely expressed in all religions including Christianity is conditioned by times and circumstances and that it can die out. Half a century ago it was customary to approach the pope in private audience with a triple genuflection. Even the most conservative of today's popes would not [172] even think of such a thing anymore. The door opens, the pope is standing there, and you shake hands with him. Religious practices such as these and many others like them are historically conditioned; they depend on attitudes and conventions prevalent in secular society and for this reason they are constantly in a state of historical flux.

Assuredly this also holds true for any number of theological views. In earlier times the papacy was conceived more or less as an absolute universal monarchy. In view of the quite different social orders that we are accustomed to today, we must, to some degree at least, have recourse to completely different concepts and notions derived from our own experience to explain the pope's function in the Church; for example, guarantor and guardian of unity. As long as the geocentric world view with its separation of the world into entirely different spheres (globe-shaped shells) prevailed – a view derived from secular science in antiquity and in the Middle Ages – it was no wonder that Christ's ascension was conceived as a kind of journey into the highest "heavenly" sphere. And even as late as the seventeenth century one theologian saw a connection between Mount Vesuvius and hell.

These fusions of what is actually meant by faith and the contemporary views of the secular

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sciences have existed in the past and continue to exist now in innumerable forms. The continuous development that this implies takes place not only in society and its mentality as a whole but also in the life history of the individual. When a child says, "The good Lord is in heaven," and when an educated adult prays, "Our Father who art in heaven," then both of them mean ultimately the same thing, even though the adult perhaps no longer points up to "heaven" with his finger. Ultimately they mean the same thing, and yet the images they use to express this to themselves are really quite different.

So it comes as no surprise either that in the Church there can be differences of opinion on specific questions. When examining a definite teaching of faith the question arises as to where the conception – which is conditioned by its times and is in a process of change – ends, and where the thing that is actually meant by this conception "begins."

Questions like these exist and they are often quite difficult to answer because when an old conception that is no longer tenable is eliminated (for example, the conception of heaven as a particular [173] place), then what is actually meant cannot simply be conceived in itself alone but must be conceived in association with a new, contemporary model, one that is more intelligible to us. Indeed, it often happens that this new conception can not yet be clearly expressed. It is still far from being accepted by everybody. To put it briefly: in respect to its content and so too in respect to the way it is realized (the faith and the act of believing), Christian faith is involved in a constant process both historical and in the lives of individuals, not in respect to what is actually meant, but in respect to the way in which it is conceived.

HAS CHRISTIANITY'S TIME PASSED?

Is Christian faith dying out? Since nobody can prophesy history completely, we cannot know how many Christians there will be in proportion to the world's population in a distant future. This holds true even if Christian faith itself is convinced that it will never disappear from history on the one hand and even if the secular prognoses of futurologists and the most recent experiences of the history of religion can present no convincing objections to this assumption on the part of Christian faith on the other. One need only call to mind the reawakening of Islam, the new religious movements that are emerging in Christianity and the fact that Christian faith is still alive in communist countries, even now in the third generation.

The question has to be put another way. In respect to the things that it actually means to express does Christian faith have a content which warrants the opinion that this content is itself a conception conditioned by the times and subject to historical decline, one that future generations might one day be able to cast aside?

We must proceed here with the utmost caution. Certainly conceptions conditioned by the times have existed in the past and still exist now. When using these conceptions people did not and could not notice their concrete historical nature and transiency. An example of this from theology: The "substance" of bread spoken of by the Council of Trent in its doctrine of the Eucharist was certainly a concept the temporal relativity of which could not be recognized in the way that this concept was concretely conceived at that time. However – speaking in general terms at first – there are in fact concepts the permanent validity of which can be recognized, and this [174] does not mean that such concepts must necessarily be located outside of history. For example, the concepts contained in the principle of contradiction (two directly contradictory statements cannot both be true at one and the same time) cannot be conceived as existing only in finite time, because the conception of a mere temporally limited validity of the principle of contradiction nullifies itself inasmuch as the statement denying the principle of contradiction has meaning only in its implicit affirmation of this principle. Moreover, there are also historical statements a later refutation of which cannot be seriously considered. Future historians will not discover that Charlemagne did not exist. Finally, there are statements that cannot be thought of as one day being destined to pass out of existence because a future refutation would annul the meaningfulness of the present moral existence of human beings. For example, if I say: in the future the moral demand of fidelity will have no validity at all, and therefore even now I can dispense myself from this demand, thereby ushering in the period of its nonvalidity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

These presuppositions and similar ones form the frame of reference for treating the question of whether Christianity's message has a mere temporally conditioned validity that will one day pass away.

To state this explicitly once again: one must definitely take into account the possibility that historical events would not have to lose the validity they once had simply because they first took place at a definite point in time and did not take place previous to this and have not always taken place. To be sure, this statement contains some presuppositions that cannot be discussed here, namely, the existence of God first and foremost, the one-way direction of history which retains its past and does not simply cast it off as something that has dissolved completely, and the nature of freedom which does not keep placing one thing after another on a chain of arbitrary succession, but rather is capable of positing something that has irrevocable finality.

WHAT DOES "CHRISTIANITY" ACTUALLY MEAN?

Let us consider what Christianity's message actually is. Here we are putting aside all the things of secondary value that can be understood from the ultimate essence of Christianity First of all, Christianity says the following. The finite world, this world which – despite the earlier way of conceiving it as almost boundless – has been [175] recognized as finite (in space and time: the world of the hundred billion suns that stem from the big bang) has an absolute, infinite primordial ground which is different from it, and we call this primordial ground God. However intimately the relationship between the world and its primordial ground must be conceived, God cannot be understood as simply being identical with the world since a multiplicity as such presupposes a unity of a more original kind. The "many" can belong to one another only if one excludes the possibility of its absolute mutual disparity on the basis of a single origin. Christianity – which, incidentally, shares this "monotheism" (that is, belief in one God) with other world religions and hence is not the historical product of one definite culture alone – says in its affirmation of an incomprehensible miracle of grace that this God is not merely the eternally distant mystery beyond the world and our existence. Rather, this God has made himself the innermost principle of the world's movement in such a way that this world with the power of its movement and with its goal will arrive at a unity in immediate knowledge and love with this its distant origin at that point where it reaches its completion in its historically unfolding spirit.

In the history of the free, personal spirit what we call God becomes an immediately present goal. It is Christianity's conviction that this innermost, divine, fundamental dynamism is at work everywhere in the world and everywhere in history, and in the history of religion too, and this despite the culpable failure of the freedom of individuals and despite all the dark sides of history and the distortions of religions. This divine fundamental dynamism provides the possibility over and over again for human beings at some point in their existence – and this point can be quite different and needs hardly any express reflection – to open themselves "in faith" and surrender themselves to the incomprehensible mystery of their existence and in this way to find their goal: God in the completion of their history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

DOES HISTORY HAVE A GOAL?

Now in addition to this, Christianity makes still another affirmation, one that is new and crucial. Christians experience the world as a history – just as every human being in the world would have to – and this history is experienced as a history of freedom in human beings themselves. They experience this history at least at that point where [176] it is a history of freedom in personal responsibility and decision, and also as a history of horrendous catastrophes, incomprehensible guilt and senselessness which they themselves cannot set right. In the light of the nature of freedom and the experience of how this freedom is culpably intertwined in an indissoluable unity with catastrophes both great and small, human beings must ask themselves how this history of humanity whose finiteness, despite the millennia of history that still might come, has never been so clearly predictable as it is today, will finally end. Since individuals cannot be reflexively certain of their own goodness, they cannot declare with certainty that they themselves will in any event escape a chaotic collapse of world history as a whole in virtue of the total moral act of their own lives.

But where does the total history of the created spirit end, a spirit that we recognize only in us – prescinding from the "angels" – as the apex of the world's development (as apex because undeniably the world has come to a self-presence – if only in an initial stage – in us)? Does it end by being lost culpably and definitively? Does it end only in ever new efforts that do not result in anything really being achieved definitively? Is God nothing more than a presupposition for us in our freedom to be taxed beyond our strength in the face of our powerlessness and the wickedness of which we are capable? Above and beyond our interior, free hope in a completion in the immediacy of God is there a historical event that can demonstrate to us (even if it is a part of history's continuing course) that the entire history of the world's freedom possesses that inner power which will really arrive at an immediacy with God? Contrary to all (all?) probability is there some place in history where our hope has appeared bearing the guarantee of victory? This question cannot be evaded if we are serious about adhering to a hope that is without any reservations and that extends beyond any limitations of convenience, and we must search in history for a confirmation of this hope, since we, however supremely elevated our spiritual nature may be, still remain concrete historical beings, and for this reason we cannot consider this history as something unimportant for the highest activity of our spirit, the search for God.

JESUS – GOD'S DEFINITIVE PROMISE OF HIMSELF IN HISTORY

Our encounter with Jesus crucified and his triumph over total defeat (his resurrection by which the "definitive triumph of life in his [177] acceptance by God" and "resurrection" are mutually explained) convince us Christians as we confidently live the history of Christian faith that in Jesus and his word, his fate and his triumph in death God's irrevocable promise of himself to human history has taken on historically concrete form as history that actually reaches its goal in God. Basically this is also the statement of the Church's faith in Jesus Christ as formulated by the Council of Chalcedon (451).

But when we say "God" and "Jesus" in this sense: "God" as the mystery that is most real and sublime over every reality of the world, the mystery that as ultimate ground, as innermost dynamism and as final goal gives itself to its world in immediacy; "Jesus" as God's promise of himself to the world and its history, a self-promise that is definitive, irrevocable, and establishes itself by the power of God himself – then actually we have already stated the core content of Christianity. If we assume that this irrevocable self-promise of God which has become historically concrete in Jesus must in its palpable mode of appearance and in its irrevocability be permanently present in history then our statement also implies the historical continuance of a community of faith which is related to this self-promise of God and gives it a permanent presence. As a fellowship of faith of this kind the community must possess all those characteristics which are known to Christian faith as the essential elements of the Church (the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CHRISTIAN FAITH CANNOT BECOME OBSOLETE

Can a message of this kind actually become obsolete, outdated and so disappear from history? In skeptical resignation one might perhaps speculate that humankind – having lost its courage and grown weary and superficial – will one day fail to reach its potential, that it will lose its power of radical optimism that reaches toward the incomprehensible infinity and glory of God, and that like particularly resourceful creatures it will occupy itself exclusively with its perpetual concern for what goes by the name of progress, with ever more elaborate objects presented for its consumption and with the rivalry that results from its egoism. For those who choose to subscribe to this kind of weary and melancholy skeptical resignation or who think that they can cheerily immerse themselves in the ongoing business of humankind, which is never at a loss for something to do [178] but has no clear goal (and do this until death takes them) – for these people, of course, no prescription can be offered.

Christian hope, on the other hand, is convinced that there will always be people who – in many different ways, on quite different occasions, and on the basis of a great variety of modes of mutual understanding and cooperation – will continue to hope and believe in an unsurpassable completion of their own history and of the world, and for this reason that the Church of invincible hope in an absolute future known as “God” will always exist. But if we look at these skeptical relativists who refuse to think their existence through to the end, who set out on journeys without making inquiries as to their destination and who are, in fact, the only real alternative to absolute Christian hope, then it simply does not become evident how this Christian message one day gone out-of-date could, as something obsolete, be replaced by another religion or be thrust aside by the end of all religion. For Christianity does not reject one thing or another thing; it does not consider itself as an antithesis or denial of future human possibilities as yet not even conceived of, things that can one day come at a future time, always, of course, as individual things in space and time, formed out of finite “matter,” which in a material and spiritual way are or will be at the disposal of human beings. Christianity says only that beyond these individual and finite possibilities, whether they be already realized or planned or not even conceived of, an infinite, already open reality is offered to individuals and to the entire history of humankind, a reality that has long since existed, indeed one that always exists and that does not first have to be made, but is rather a reality that must be attained through the freedom of unconditional love, and this reality is called God.

Perhaps someone will say that this is too beautiful to be true. But no one can name a higher, more comprehensive goal that could replace this Christian hope and render it obsolete. In principle that is impossible. For every goal that is in any way meaningful and that can be named and perhaps even programmed in the future has already been anticipated in the Christian conception, even if it is not known as such, because it is already contained and surpassed in the incomprehensible and infinite completion.

In their narrow-mindedness many Christians are inclined to reduce their hope to something less than this. But Christians are always talking about God, and if they take this word seriously as [179] really meaning the content of the indescribable completion, and meaning

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only this and meaning it seriously, then they have no choice but to understand their Christianity in the sense just explained, even though what is meant in this explanation can be expressed in a thousand other ways and obviously much better. But whoever in one way or another has understood what is meant here as belonging to the essence of Christianity cannot imagine or fear that Christianity could become obsolete.

The nameless incomprehensible one who nonetheless wills to give himself to us and has already done so (we need but admit him in silence in a freedom which for its part is itself called grace) has no one beside him, nor will he have a later competitor, because for God there is absolutely no “beside” or “later.” Paul says that God is all in all. But one must have the courage to enter a relationship with him, a relationship with him in adoration and love and not one of hairsplitting argumentation about him and about the paradox that one might really be able to say you to him because he brings it about that we are capable of doing this. It is possible; one need only make the attempt. In the act of unconditional surrender to the incomprehensibility of God who is loved the fear that this might one day be obsolete is dissolved. And this is Christianity. Therefore Christianity cannot be superseded. One can only remain behind it – through one’s own fault or because one has been arrested at an earlier stage of one’s spiritual development.

THE ABIDING SIGNIFICANCE OF JESUS FOR US

And Jesus? Is he not eliminated from this absoluteness of Christianity as an unimportant factor? Is he nothing more than the occasion of our considerations, someone who is interchangeable, hence ultimately superfluous? Is it perhaps necessary for Christianity to move beyond Jesus and develop into a universal religion of a contemplative or active (both in one) immediacy to God, one that no longer disperses the pure white light of divinity into individually colored refractions (with different names) and hence one that can be silent about Jesus?

Before attempting a direct answer to this question we must remind ourselves in all sobriety that a mystical-universal religion of an [180] abstract idea of God (Islam wanted to realize this to a certain degree and in the French Revolution there were similar ideas), if it is to be something real and concrete, would require a social order necessarily conditioned by history with rites, laws, officials, and the like, and thus the question would immediately rise again as to how the concrete form of the religious reality could be reconciled with the veneration of the God who has no name.

But apart from considerations of this kind, in answering our question one must once again make clear what the real and precise content of Christian faith in Jesus is. What is its relationship to the God of Christianity who is acknowledged in his truth only when one surrenders oneself unconditionally to his incomprehensibility? The human doctrine implied in this does not, of course, nullify the properly understood belief in God, but rather says and brings to realization precisely that God is in this way the nameless incomprehensibility by which we allow ourselves to be seized in faith, hope, and love. But for Christian faith Jesus, his life and the accomplishment of his death, is nothing other than God’s definitive invitation to this surrender and the irrevocable promise that this surrender is really accomplished through God’s powerful love and not ultimately by the efforts of our own goodwill. The Church’s entire teaching about Jesus Christ can certainly be deduced from this fundamental conviction of the significance of Jesus for us (“for us and for our salvation,” as the Creed says). This entire Christology, however, is always subject to the belief that this Jesus and his salvific work gave witness to and made available nothing other than the really effective possibility of arriving at immediacy to the true God. If, then, Jesus Christ is the unassailable

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

witness (the one who effects what he gives witness to) for this belief in God, then it is precisely he who in his life and in his fate is for himself and for us the most real testimony, one that in its "success" is palpable, and the event of a belief in God that can never perish.

Another testimony of this kind has yet to appear in our history because all the other great figures in the history of religion did not provide this testimony, and they did not even intend to do so. Every other "prophet" considered himself quite rightly to be only temporary and open to a revelation that was yet to come. And if there were someone after Jesus who made such an absolute claim or who will make one, then his or her arrival is in any case too late, because [181] Jesus has already existed and he has promised "everything" (the absolute God in himself) in such a way that nothing more can be said above and beyond it. The unsurpassability of the Christian belief in God is not threatened but rather confirmed when Christians devote themselves to the event that took place in Jesus in which a human being succeeded in a way that is concrete for us in really reaching God himself as God's affirmation for us.

If for Christians who have such a radical relationship to God it is nonetheless obvious that this incomprehensible God himself has established a historical world in its reality and propels it even intrinsically as well as in its colorful variety toward its goal, then of course, for human beings too, on the basis of their relationship to God of mystical purity and namelessness, a colorful variety of relationships, interconnections, tasks, and so on is just as possible and called for as is present in the variety of their world and of their own nature.

And this also holds true, of course, for the relationship of the Christian to Jesus. Believers have the kind of relationship to Jesus that we have attempted to indicate before as fundamental: a relationship to the authentic and sole witness who is given to them for their lives as a way of leaping into the blessed and saving incomprehensibility of God. This has a very concrete meaning. Christians may and should love Jesus, imitate him in contemplation and action, confess him, pray to him, belong to him in the community of the Church's liturgy and its proclamation. All of this is then the obvious concrete human way of a person's holding fast to Jesus when he or she explicitly and consciously comes into that strange undertow of existence in which one is drawn into the mysterious fascination of God (by everything that happens in one's life up to and including death, whether explicitly reflected upon or not). Jesus is the unique and effective exemplar, wrought by God's power, replete with victorious promise, for belief in God. And so he may and must be and remain for us unreservedly the one who he is in traditional Christian teaching and piety.

IS CHRISTIANITY'S EXISTENCE THREATENED FROM WITHIN?

Do all the other remaining elements, particularly those of the Church's concrete life, pose a threat to the current and future existence [182] of this imperishable and irreplaceable Christianity? This is a final question in the framework of our general considerations that requires at least the beginnings of an answer. Beyond doubt much of what the Church and average Christians do blurs and distorts the Christian's truly authentic relationship to God and reduces the concrete chances of Christianity and the Church in the future. Over and over again such weaknesses and mistakes must be acknowledged and eradicated. There is in the Church a great deal of legalism, ritualism, thirst for power, and worldliness. As in every social body, so too in the Church there is a danger of the institution's asserting itself in a self-serving way. Despite all goodwill on the part of the Church's officials and its people, the necessary renewal is actually carried out too late. This has been true in the past and it will also remain true in the future. Moreover, no reliable forecast for the course of secular history can be provided, not even for the next few decades. Therefore we cannot exactly foresee what the future of the worldwide Church will be like even for this brief period of time.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But does all of this really give us reason to fear that Christianity in its concrete institutional form might die of old age? If it is true that Christianity's actual essence cannot be superseded, then the real existence of this essence is something that is assured, provided only that an essence of this kind is something that corresponds to the most fundamental human need for ultimate meaning (it actually goes beyond this!), and this essence will continue to have a real existence in history as long as human beings continue to exist.

This consideration provides no basis for predicting the absolute or relative number of Christians or their significance in the humanity of the future. Even if we believe and are convinced of the permanence of the Church's present social and institutional structures, we are still far from knowing what concrete form the future realization of these structures will take. The original community in Jerusalem, the imperial Church of Constantine at the time of the Fathers, the feudal Church of the Middle Ages (with its Papal States and its popes who waged war), the bourgeois Church after the French Revolution, which has lasted practically up to our own days, were always one and the same structured community of faith in Jesus – and yet what [183] transformations took place within this entity that is one and the same! No bishop or Christian (apart from the boldness of their Christian faith in Jesus) could ever have imagined that the Church, whose epoch they themselves experienced in the brief span of their own lives, could change so radically without perishing, and yet the Church continued to live just as if it had always been more or less that way. Perhaps at some time in the future the pope will live in the Philippine Islands, perhaps there will be much less Roman organization and bureaucracy (even if that is just as inconceivable for many people as the final disappearance of the Papal States was for a Roman prelate a hundred and fifty years ago). Perhaps even with all of the bishop's power remaining the responsible initiative of Christians at the basis will be much larger than it is today. None of these things can be foreseen and every Christian is free to imagine his or her ideal form for the Church of the future. But there can be and there will be in the future a Church of those people who, united in their gaze on Jesus in faith, hope, and love, go forth to the promise that is infinite.

As a mysterious goal, which at the same time includes creative freedom and human freedom in creative response, this future form of Christian faith and life has already been given to us as a gift now because God himself with his own life and his own freedom has granted himself in grace to the history of the world. For this reason the Christian of today has a responsibility for the future of Christianity. For the present is always the fulfillment of the task of daring the future, of executing the testament of the past precisely by something new that is not already present in an evolutionary way in the old.

Where should one begin when one says that one might have the courage of faith and wants to bear witness to this?

Here is where I begin. At the outset I found myself as a believer, and no reason arose compelling or causing me not to believe. I was born a Catholic because I was born and baptized in a believing environment. I place my hope in God that this faith which has been handed on by tradition has been transformed into my own decision, into an actual faith of my own; that I am also a Catholic Christian in the core of my being, something that ultimately remains God's mystery and the mystery in the depth of my being that is not accessible to reflection and that I am not capable of stating to myself. I say: to me as a believer there has occured first of all no reason that would cause me to stop being the person who I am.

[184] It is my understanding that one would have to have reasons to change in a way that goes contrary to the law according to which one took one's original place. For whoever would change without such reasons, whoever would not first of all be willing to remain faithful to the received situation of one's existence, to what has once been realized in the spiritual nature of one's own person, would be a person who would fall into a void, a person who interiorly could only be in a state of dissolution. What has first been given must, until the opposite has been proved, be regarded as the thing that is to be taken over and preserved, if a human being does not want to give himself or herself up. One can live and grow only out of the roots that already live in the way that they are, only out of the beginning to which one gives the primal trust of existence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If one received from tradition gifts that are sacred, if it opened vistas and summoned one with an absolute and eternal call, then it may well be true that this alone as unreflected experience and simple realization without suspicion and doubt is still no explicit and reflexive justification for this tradition as something that is absolutely true in the face of a critical conscience and an inquiring mind. But in the challenge of faith which I, too, think that I have experienced one thing has always remained clear to me, has sustained me as I have held to it. It is the conviction that what has been inherited and received must not simply be consumed by the emptiness of everyday existence, of spiritual obtuseness, of dark and gloomy skepticism, but at most by what is more powerful and calls to greater freedom, and more irresistible light. The faith I inherited was certainly always the faith that was challenged and could be challenged as well. But this faith was always experienced as that person who asked me: "Will you too go away?" and to whom one could only say always: "Lord, to whom shall I go?" It was experienced as faith that was powerful and good, which I could have given up only if the opposite had been shown.[1] Therefore, until the opposite has been proved. And now: no one has proved the opposite to me, not even the experience of my own life.

[1] An extensive and systematic handbook of spirituality reflecting this faith has been recently published: Karl Rahner, The Practice of Faith: A Handbook of Contemporary Spirituality, edited by Karl Lehmann and Albert Raffelt (New York: Crossroad, 1983).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[185]

13

THE SPECIFIC CHARACTER OF THE CHRISTIAN CONCEPT OF GOD

The question concerning the specific character of the Christian concept of God is more difficult to answer than is commonly believed. Since numerous concepts of God can be distinguished in the history of thought and in the history of religion, and since Christianity itself emerges as a particular phenomenon within this history of religion, one will assume arbitrarily from the outset that Christianity has its own specific concept of God, and hence that the only question is what this specific character consists of. The matter, however, is not quite as simple as it seems.

THE ABILITY TO KNOW GOD BY NATURAL REASON

When dealing with this problem two things must be borne in mind. In the Catholic doctrine on faith the First Vatican Council asserts that the existence of God, of the true God, can be known with certainty by the light of natural reason. It is true that the council makes no unequivocal statement as to how, in what way, and with what concrete reservations the fundamental possibility of a natural knowledge of God is actually realized in detail and in the history of religion, and it teaches that the assistance of the divine revelation in word is a moral necessity for a pure and complete realization of this possibility in the concrete history of humanity. On the basis of this definition, however, Catholic theologians do not have the right to assume that [186] the knowledge of the true God does not occur at all in the history of human thought and religion outside of Christian revelation.[1]

But if a knowledge of the true God can and actually does exist everywhere in the world, even though it be imperfect, dim and fragmentary, if the entire history of religion despite its depravities and its contradictions is the history of the knowledge of the God whom Christians confess, then the question concerning a specific character of the Christian concept of God obviously cannot be answered as simply as might first appear.

There might at least be the fundamental possibility that one or another element which is ascribed to the character of the Christian concept of God could be demonstrated outside of Christianity and its history. And vice versa. No matter how strong the Christian believer's conviction is in the integrity and permanence of the Christian concept of God, supported also by revelation in the proper sense, still it cannot be denied that this concept as well has a history of its own, that this history is a great deal more than the history of this concept emerging in ever brighter clarity but that it also contains a history of darkness and distortion, so that comparing non-Christian and Christian concepts of God is an extremely difficult undertaking and one that requires the most subtle distinctions.

[1] Even among Christian theologians there is today an allergy to metaphysics and natural knowledge of God. This allergy is in part explained by a justifiable reaction to a nonreflexive rationalism characteristic of Catholic fundamental theology particularly since the nineteenth century which more or less right down to our own day has continued to exercise its influence, much of it quite harmful. However, one should not for this reason espouse the view that God has indeed been spoken of in many ways beyond the confines of the Old Testament and the New Testament, but that something totally different is meant from what Christianity means when it uses the term God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE EFFICACY OF REVELATION EVEN OUTSIDE OF ISRAELITE AND CHRISTIAN HISTORY OF RELIGION

There is also a second and perhaps more fundamental difficulty. In Catholic as well as in Protestant theology it is customary not only to make a distinction in terms between divine revelation and the human attempt to know the absolute from below, from the human standpoint, to separate on a conceptual level faith that comes from hearing [187] and metaphysics as a product of one's own human capacity. Further, one proceeded on the more or less tacit assumption that this divine revelation took place only within the historically definable area of Old Testament and New Testament religion, that it could be found only there, and that the remaining field of the history of religion was the field of religion produced by human effort alone and from below. Given this presupposition, it must of course be relatively easy to establish a radical distinction between the Christian concept of God and the concepts of God found in other religions.

The question that we are dealing with here, however, takes on another and more difficult form if one does not go along with this presupposition. For if one accepts with Vatican II the possibility and the reality of a really salutary faith as something that is always and everywhere present in principle in space and time due to the universal salvific will of God, and hence also revelation in the properly theological sense, then one cannot say that it is clear from the outset that the Christian concept of God, stemming from God's revelation, can be found exclusively within the history of revelation as found in the Old and the New Testament, that is, in the Bible.

Furthermore, if one does not take care to use as a basis for the other interpretations of God a hermeneutic which determines the individual statements as far as possible on their immediate wording alone, and which neglects contrary implications as well as the things that are actually meant in the background of the immediate statement and are realized existentielly in order to work out as far as possible clear contours and characteristics of the phenomena of the history of religion, but rather makes a reverential attempt to discover a common element in all religions, Christianity included, then historians of religion and Christian theologians will necessarily have great difficulties in naming a specific characteristic of the Christian concept of God.[2]

THE ANCIENT BIBLICAL CONCEPT OF GOD AND THE NEAR EASTERN HISTORY OF RELIGION

For example, the attempt has been made to distinguish the specific character of the ancient biblical concept of God from its Near Eastern environment by saying that in this environment gods were known only as representatives of a historical, cyclical forces of nature, while the God of ancient Israel was a God of history and of the covenant. But if an expert in this Near Eastern history of religion thinks that it is possible in principle to identify a concept of God like that of Israel even outside of Israel, then Christian theologians need not lodge an a priori objection. They can quite easily leave this question to a neutral a posteriori research, and there is no need for them to assert a priori that a concept of God like that of Israel cannot and may not be found outside of the Old Testament.

[2] Due to lack of time and my own incompetence the attempt cannot be made here and now to make a critical appraisal of the correctness of traditional determinations of the specific character of the Christian concept of God. In principle, Catholic theologians will have no a priori objection if and when an attempt of this kind succeeds in a convincing way. But they would not be obliged to object either if historians of religion maintain that this or that attempt is a failure owing to the facts of the history of religion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN CONCEPT OF GOD

When the inquiry itself is pursued in this objective framework a further element must be taken into consideration. The Christian concept of God has had a history of its own. If we presume that this history as a whole is not about to come to an end, then we must at least take into account a continuation of the history of this concept, one that may well be subject to numerous transformations and unexpected turns. If this history of the presumed specifically Christian concept of God is going to continue, then dialogue between Christianity and the other world religions will certainly have an influence in shaping this history. This dialogue will be characterized less by an enrichment of this concept of God due to extraneous elements than by a reawakened awareness of its own particular character which, in the divine economy of revelation, has first of all taken root and developed more clearly outside of specifically Christian history. Is it unthinkable that we might learn something from the monotheism of Islam? Why should it not be possible to come to an even clearer realization of a Christian personalism contained in the Christian concept of God by bringing in elements of truth contained in the religions and philosophies of the East in respect to a seemingly [189] nonpersonal nature of absolute being? In any case, when we conceive a specific element in the Christian concept of God we must not lose sight of the fact that this concept of God has not yet finished its own historical course, and that if this concept confesses the infinity and the incomprehensibility of God, then it actually postulates thereby a history of our own concept of God that can never be concluded.

POSITIVE STATEMENTS ON THE SPECIFIC CHARACTER OF THE CHRISTIAN CONCEPT OF GOD

Can nothing at all be said, then, about a specific character of the Christian concept of God? Does Christian theology from the very outset forbid such an attempt in every respect? We are now going to attempt to make a positive statement about the specific character of the Christian concept of God without the intention of asserting that this is the only possible statement. We shall attempt to overcome the difficulty which up to now has rendered a positive statement seemingly impossible.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN GOD AND THE WORLD

One must consider the following. If religion makes a distinction between human beings and the world on the one hand and God on the other, yet at the same time places these in a relationship to one another, then one can conceive this relationship in a twofold manner.

The God Who Dwells beyond the World

This relationship can be conceived (albeit in manifold variations) as the relationship of the primordial ground of being to what has been grounded in existence, of the creator to what has been created, of the guarantor to the moral order that has been guaranteed, and the like. In all of these relationships God remains strictly speaking the one who dwells beyond the world, the one who is related to this world by what he creates and effects different from himself His

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[190] intervention in this world takes place always through something different from himself however glorious and beatific this might be and however much it may serve as a guarantee for existence. At least where the difference between an absolute God and a relative world is clearly maintained in contrast to pantheism or panentheism, the relationship between God and the world must be conceived as mediated always by something that is different from God even though it has an orientation to him. Regardless of whether this mediation is conceived as a gift, as a word that represents God, as a sacrament, as happiness effected by God, as the eternal validity of our reality sustained by him, or what you will, God is always related to us in these ways by means of something he establishes different from himself. Indeed, it seems that this cannot be otherwise the more radically one conceives the concept of God. Finite creatures who, if they really want to be devout, may not presume to identify themselves with God, seem to be ultimately non capax infiniti, and the recognition of this distance seems to be what alone constitutes their salvation.

God's Self-Communication

But through Christianity human beings are given the courage that faith, hope, and love bring them to conceive a totally different relationship between God and themselves. In this relationship God is not the one who establishes and guarantees human existence and ultimately brings it to completion, all the while remaining distant from it; rather, he is himself in his own reality the fulfillment of this finite existence, an existence which is really capax infiniti. No matter how radically the difference between a pantheistic and a Christian concept of God may be conceived, the Christian concept of God, when it is really conceived in a Christian way and not in a crudely popular way, is totally different from what the average Christian perceives. For the average Christian God is the Lord, the guarantor of the world, also the one who sees to it that given the requisite good conduct human beings with their lot in life come to a blessed completion (but, to be honest, this is viewed ultimately as a paradise of happiness not much different from the way Moslems conceive it). [191] But for the average Christian God is not the one who in an incomprehensible and improbable outpouring of his love communicates himself with his inmost reality to his creatures and as creator provides that these finite creatures, without being consumed in the fire of divinity, are able to receive God's life, his very glory as their own perfection. The creature is really capax infiniti.

God is not merely the one who as creator establishes a world distant from himself as something different, but rather he is the one who gives himself away to this world and who has his own fate in and with this world. God is not only himself the giver, but he is also the gift. For a pantheistic understanding of existence this statement may be completely obvious. For a Christian understanding of God, in which God and the world are not fused but remain separate for all eternity, this is the most tremendous statement that can be made about God at all. Only when this statement is made, when, within a concept of God that makes a radical distinction between God and the world, God himself is still the very core of the world's reality and the world is truly the fate of God himself, only then is the concept of God attained that is really Christian. It may then perhaps be understood as a paradox, something that cannot be comprehended except in a dialectic way, only as the ultimate point at which human thought plunges into the incomprehensibility of God. But why should it not be a paradox, when one is dealing with the God of eternal incomprehensibility?

THE RECIPROCAL RELATIONSHIP OF FREEDOM

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Something further must be said about this Christian concept of God and its specific character. Christianity conceives humankind's relationship to God as a reciprocal relationship of freedom, God's freedom and the freedom of humankind. It may well be true that the concept of freedom, especially when it is applied in such a universal and fundamental way, is permeated by all the darkness and incomprehensibility which are characteristic of the whole of being, of God, and of humankind in the gradual realization of its orientation to God. It may well be true that freedom in the reciprocal relationship [192] between God and creatures might appear to be a concept that can no longer be realized when one considers creatures in their total dependence on God. It may well be that nowadays freedom is in danger of being devoured by the concept of evolution as the basic pattern of our contemporary thinking. As true as all of these things may be, Christianity still cannot conceive reality in any way other than a history of freedom between God and personal, spiritual creatures, whom the sovereign power of God has constituted in their own reality in such a way that they have a free relationship to God himself, whereby creaturely freedom and the scope of this freedom and God's freedom do not cancel one another out. When divine and human freedom are present in this sense, history is present, unique history, which is not the arbitrary repetition of the same thing, not the possibility of reversing arbitrarily what has been freely done, but rather the event of the coming into existence of what is definitive, unique history of human and divine freedom in a unique dialogue.

This history is really the history of God himself because he has made his most proper untouchable reality the ground, the innermost dynamism, the real content and the goal of this history. It may well be true that the relationship of this history, insofar as it implies created reality, to God's eternal knowledge of this history beyond all time is obscure, but in any case this history is itself something real – it is history that is still running its course, reaching toward a definite goal which is yet to come, history which for its part has a knowledge of itself as an internal element of its own reality, history which in each current moment is in a phase which had not previously existed in its specific character within the whole of history and which will not exist in the future.

At least in principle, this history can ask itself what phase it is in, how far it has advanced, since the element of origination out of the past and the element of futurity in a future yet to come are a part of every instant of history, of every present time. The determination of the specific character of a definite phase of this entire history of freedom is then, because it is a question of the history of God himself, also an element of the concept of God itself. To this extent, then, we may ask whether the revelation that takes place in the history of salvation can provide us with information as to what phase this history has reached, whereby what is characteristic of this phase [193] and the fact of its disclosure are part of the history of salvation and revelation itself

THE HISTORY OF REVELATION AND THE HISTORY OF SALVATION

The history of salvation and revelation actually answers this question for us. This history, which as history of salvation and spiritual peril is actually an open dialogue between divine and human freedom whose final issue cannot be known from the history itself, so that it is an open question whether it will end in definitive salvation or in a state of being lost definitively, does in fact say that it has entered upon a phase in which it has irreversible assurance of salvation for itself as a single and entire history of humanity, even though no theoretical statement is yet allowed about definitive success in regard to the history of a particular individual and even though the history of human freedom as a whole has not yet come to an end. Through God's revelation, and this originally not by means of a theoretical statement

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with which it would have indoctrinated us, but by means of the single historical event of God's incarnation in this history, we know that God's freedom has offered this history not merely a possibility of salvation but rather that God has through himself transformed this possibility of salvation into reality – and this in an irrevocable way. Without being abrogated the creature's freedom for evil has already been surpassed by the greater power of God's own freedom. He has willed absolutely and attained the realization of the world's salvation, not only in the sense that he merely "willed" to offer it to human freedom.

God's self-communication to what is other than himself posits creaturely freedom, and so it is as such conditioned. The history of this self-offer has advanced so far, however, not only in God's eternal plans but in itself that this self-communication actually and irrevocably succeeds, without thereby ceasing to be a history of freedom as well. As has already been said, since the history of this self-communication of God to the world is a history of God himself, and indeed only as the latter can it be the former, the irrevocability of God's blessed self-communication to the world as something that is [194] already present in the world implies an irrevocability of the history of God himself even though this irrevocability must not be understood as a natural necessity but rather as the free decision becoming definitive.[3]

THE CHRISTIAN CONCEPT OF GOD

If we ask in this way what the specific character of the Christian concept of God is, then we would have to make the following cautious statement without claiming that the answer is exhaustive. First of all, of course, this Christian concept of God will stand out over the others that exist by the fact that contrary to all atheism, pantheism, panentheism, deism, and concealed polytheism it lets God really be God, as, for example, the First Vatican Council describes him:

> The true and living God is one, the creator and Lord of heaven and earth, almighty, eternal, infinite, incomprehensible, infinite in understanding, will, and every perfection. Since he is a unique, spiritual being, subsisting in himself, he must be proclaimed as really and essentially different from the world, totally blissful in and from himself and unspeakably sublime over everything that exists and can be thought of outside of himself.

However, since Christianity in its historical makeup in principle makes no claim at all to being able to attain this pure concept of God by itself alone, then with the concept of God just described, however historically Christian it may be, there is still no fundamental assertion of any characteristic of a specifically Christian kind.

If the Christian concept of God is to be grasped in its specific character, then it is clear that the concept in question is one that must be derived from actual revelation as distinct from a metaphysical knowledge of God from the creaturely world as such. In undertaking this, however, one must bear in mind that Christian [195] theology has no right to equate actual, supernatural, personal revelation simply and solely with Old and New Testament revelation in its historical area and its oral and written word.

If, then, one asks what this revelation says about the peculiar nature of God and about what cannot be attained outside of itself, then one may say the following. Precisely this God, [3] However, the definitiveness of God's history must not be understood in a Gnostic or Hegelian way or in the sense of many of today's Christian theologies among Catholic and Protestant theologians. These no longer really uphold the immutability and the blessed sovereignty of God in himself beyond creaturely history. Instead they want to move beyond the statement that God himself really has a history in the world to an assertion of a history of God in his own most proper divinity in itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whom Christianity radically distinguishes from the world as free creator, is the God who has in his most proper reality, and not merely by the mediation of created realities, as inmost dynamism and definitive goal offered and communicated himself to the world in its spiritual creatures so that the otherness of the world can be understood as the condition of the possibility of this self-communication of God; creation exists as the presupposition of grace, and creaturely history actually takes place as an element of the history of God himself. And God's revelation says further that this history of God in his world in the dialogue of human and divine freedom in Jesus Christ has already attained the phase of the irrevocability of an actually blessed conclusion.

In my opinion this is what the specific characteristic of the Christian concept of God is at least in fact, even though this is far from being always attained in the average sermon and in popular piety because these have been retarded in a notion of God who has created the world as something that remains at an eternal distance from him and that is the recipient of his finite gifts. Should it be possible in the history of religion to discover both of these characteristics of the Christian concept of God in non-Christian ideas of God as well, at least in traces and in the vaguest of notions, then Christian theologians would not have to take issue with this. They would simply attribute it to that self-revelation of God which according to their own principles must always and everywhere be present in history, because owing to God's universal salvific will salvation and faith must always and everywhere be possible.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[196]

14

THE QUESTION OF MEANING AS A QUESTION OF GOD

Everyone knows that there is a great deal of talk today about meaning, about the loss of meaning. It seems that the word meaning is out to displace the old word truth to a certain extent. It would seem that people today are no longer seeking truth, comprehensive truth, but rather meaning. In this change of terms one can perhaps also notice that it is human beings themselves who are becoming the focal point of human questioning and human seeking. People occupy themselves with a great deal of knowledge in numerous sciences; they are seeking truths in the plural rather than the absolute truth that Scripture tells us will make us free; and so people today are more inclined to inquire about meaning in the singular. Here, of course, the question remains open – and it will not be given explicit thematic treatment here – whether with this shift of interest from truth to meaning the really one and true meaning of human existence is perhaps being lost sight of as a result of this intellectual egoism (if one may use that term). Inasmuch as we are going to consider the question of meaning as a question of God, this problem has been superseded, because God, if one really understands that term correctly, is at once absolute meaning and absolute truth.

UNDERSTANDING MEANING IN ITS TOTALITY

When discussing meaning, or more precisely the meaning of human life, we are of course not referring to particular, individual interrelations [197] between realities which are themselves particular, as, for example, the obviously meaningful connection between the ability to fly and the structure of a bird's wing. Nor are we referring to the meaning experienced, for example, in a definite, individual artistic experience, the content of which is perceived not as a means to some other end but as something that is meaningful in itself, and thus finds legitimation through itself and not merely through its usefulness for some other purpose. The meaning that we are talking about here is the one and total, universal and definitive meaning of the whole of human existence, which a human being is once supposed to experience and which will manifest itself in this experience as something that is itself perfectly good and beatific. It is our intention to make clear that the question of meaning understood in this sense is to be considered as identical with God. These two terms and the reality meant by them are to be understood in the sense that one explains the other; what absolute meaning is can be understood by the word God and vice versa.

If we want to explain the question of meaning as a question of God, we presume the existence of such a universal and absolute question of meaning and the possibility of meaningful inquiry into such meaning, indeed that the very assertion that a question of meaning is really meaningful and not meaningless from the very outset already includes in itself the reality of such meaning. An assumption of this kind is of course not self-evident. Agnostics and skeptics will indeed admit that in living their lives, however they might decide to do this, people always experience partial elements of purposefulness and meaning. They set up goals for themselves, achieve them, evaluate the results as positive, as gratifying and enjoyable in contrast to failures and disappointments, both because they distinguish these things from other conditions of their lives that they want to avoid or eliminate and because they have experiences in themselves not bound up with any specific purpose and which they evaluate as positive. But skeptics and agnostics will say that a total and definitive meaning of existence cannot be found. Life ultimately fades away into a void; the question of and the demand for a definitive, all-embracing meaning of existence are meaningless from the very outset. Two experiences in particular give rise to this attitude.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

First, it seems that this all-embracing meaning that integrates everything into itself and brings it to completion does not occur in [198] our experience. It seems that our experiences of meaning are only piecemeal and no one of them results in total meaning. Despite their meaningfulness for a specific purpose, they time and again point away to another experience and thus into an indeterminate void, and in any event they pass away. Second, people experience not only the apparently eternal continuation of individual experiences that are always finite but also the senselessness which seems to occur in nature and which is also perpetrated to a hideous extent by their own freedom within human history. The apparent lack of the experience of total meaning, the evanescence of everything temporal, the frightful experience of senselessness seem to give the agnostic and skeptic every justification for denying that human existence has an absolute and universal meaning, or at least for not reckoning with this meaning.

EXERTING REASON AND FREEDOM

But if, despite this, there is still to be a total meaning of human life, then it is obvious from the start that the affirmation of this meaning will require the utmost effort of human reason and of human freedom. The totality of a real meaning of the whole of existence can only be attained by a complete commitment of this existence with all its dimensions. However little this obvious fact dispenses people from exerting all their knowledge with all of its possibilities, it is just as obvious that the real affirmation of this all-embracing meaning of existence is also an act of their freedom in an ultimately reciprocal interpenetration of knowledge and freedom, of theory and practice, of insight and love. Therefore those who uphold the reality of this absolute and universal meaning need not waver because there are sluggish people, people entangled in the details of their existence, people who are overwhelmed by the previously mentioned difficulties of an absolute affirmation of meaning. Indeed, those who commit themselves to an affirmation of an absolute meaning of existence need not hesitate to assume that many agnostics, skeptics, and smug people, who claim objectivity for themselves alone, at some point or other in their existence when, for example, they are selfless contrary to all advantage and profit of their own, affirm in the actual realization of their existence an absolute meaning of their lives contrary to the way they themselves interpret their lives. It can also [199] be quite possible that an agnostic self-interpretation, the admission that with all one’s individual knowledge one has still become lost and confused in the darkness of unknowing, at that point where this apparently agnostic admission is accepted in humble serenity as the ultimate wisdom of life, is no longer an infernally empty agnosticism, but rather a serene acceptance in hope of the mystery that we quite rightly call God.

So as human beings compelled by the very fact of their own existence to be present to themselves and to be responsible to themselves, we are confronted with the question directed particularly to our knowledge and freedom whether we affirm such an all-embracing and definitive meaning of our existence or whether our answer to this question is negative or whether we at least want to try to leave it wearily aside.

The following questions are posed to our mind. Where do the particular experiences of meaning that one necessarily has ultimately originate? How do these experiences coalesce over and over again to more comprehensive, though still finite, interrelations of meaning? Do a little light and meaning emerge from a pure darkness and emptiness of meaning or through an infinite meaning, even though this has not yet been experienced in itself and cannot be grasped?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The question is posed to our freedom, whether it is allowed to understand itself as an absurd damnation, as a freedom that strives toward the infinite, is never satisfied, and yet achieves only what is insignificant and transitory in human life and becomes entangled in these things. The question is posed to our freedom how it finds it possible without affirming an absolute meaning to make a distinction between infidelity and fidelity, truth and falsehood, love and deadly egoism, if all acts, both the good and the base, perish in an ultimate meaninglessness in which nothing can be distinguished anymore. The question is posed to our freedom what responsibility carried through to the end might mean if there is no ultimate meaning; whether without this kind of affirmation responsibility might plainly and simply choose to give itself up by denying itself.

Once again: if the question is posed to our mind and to our freedom whether they say yes to a comprehensive and definitive meaning, this does not mean that this question compels the true answer in a concrete individual. One can of course evade this question. [200] One can feel overtaxed by the question. One can say that one cannot formulate the question clearly, let alone the answer, and so remain silent about such matters right from the outset. One can say that this question and its eventual answer, being themselves universal, have from the outset no preceding system of coordinates from which point question and answer could be rendered intelligible, with the result that question and answer could for this reason have no tangible meaning at all.

These objections are not entirely wrong. Surely they demonstrate that the relationship of thinking human beings to this absolute and universal question of meaning is essentially different from their relationship to the individual objects of their consciousness, which, as individual objects, can be determined in the light of other objects and of formal norms of thought, and for this reason make a different impression of comprehensibility and clarity than the one that is present when individuals in their entirety are all at once confronted by the totality of all questions and by the universality of meaning viewed absolutely.

In a question of this kind an obscurity and ultimate element of the unmasterable must be expected by the mind. In fact these are such an essential part of the matter itself that when one fails to see and accept them, it is obvious right from the start that the question has not been understood and the answer will miss the mark. But despite every possibility of evading this one and total basic question, both mind and freedom are still asked whether they are justified in refusing to face this question. This refusal is of course altogether possible, and its justification must be denied. The total question of meaning must be asked, and mind and freedom must say that they must have a fulfilment by a meaning that is one and infinite, and this for the reasons we have just indicated.

THE HUMAN BEING CONFRONTED WITH THE QUESTION OF MEANING

This conviction is valid among other reasons due to the fact that human beings simply cannot avoid being faced with the total question of meaning. In their theoretical consciousness they may try nervously to avoid facing this question. If the question occurs in an [201] explicitly theoretical way, they may try to thrust it aside as unanswerable or senseless. But in living their lives human beings are necessarily confronted with this question and they have to answer it, regardless of whether their answer is yes or no, regardless of whether and to what extent they once again make this ineluctable answer the object of reflection and verbalization. For there are concrete questions of life which are posed to the freedom of individuals in their entirety; these are called questions of conscience and they must be answered with an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unconditional yes or no on the part of individual subjects in their entirety. These questions allow no neutral abstention because the very attempt to abstain from them would itself be a decision for its part, and a bad one at that. But in decisions like this an absolute meaning is affirmed or denied, because an absolute life and death decision, and one of irrevocable definitiveness, is not possible at all vis-à-vis a particular object alone as such.

It is now immediately evident that this total meaning of existence, which is all embracing and fulfills every demand that meaning can make, cannot be pieced together from things that yield a partial fulfillment of meaning. The attempt to grasp the universal and definitive meaning in this way would only mean a series of things that yield a partial fulfillment of meaning and move on into a void; each one of them would offer only the permanently unfulfilled promise of a total fulfillment of meaning. To attempt to do this would be tantamount to a perpetual condemnation to the toil of Sisyphus; it would be the constantly repeated attempt to attain the whole in something that is only a part.

If in this light a total fulfillment of meaning is conceivable only “outside” of the course of history which proceeds in a fragmentary way, this does not mean, of course, that this total fulfillment of meaning is not at the same time the eternal fruit of history into which this history is elevated. The comprehensive meaning of history itself, however, cannot be a mere fragment of history because freedom, by willing and realizing the particular and individual object in temporal history, always preapprehends the entirety of a definitive and total realization of the free subject, who wills an infinite fulfillment of meaning.

So even though freedom and the spirit in and with this freedom will a “transcendent” fulfillment of meaning for current history, this is always something that at present lies beyond the spirit and freedom, [202] is not yet a definitively grasped, “transcendent” answer of meaning, and yet it is full of meaning for the concrete life that we have to lead here and now. We must not pass over “the hope of eternity” (to express it in biblical terms) with a mere shrug of the shoulders and leave it to dreamers, as though what we have to do here cannot be changed by such metaphysical dreams. For wherever human beings in the present time realize with earnest faith an ultimate openness to a total and definitive meaning of their lives as their own hope, their relationship to the realities of this world and to the tasks of their everyday existence changes, and this change is liberating, brings relief, and provides objective clarity.

Those who in hope believe in and accept an absolute meaning for their lives, which, notwithstanding all their own responsibility for achieving or failing to reach this goal, they do not have to piece together by means of their own achievements, are free persons vis-à-vis the individual realities, tasks, and obligations of their own lives, which would otherwise enslave them. The affirmation of an absolute meaning which overpowers our practical experience is not a matter of idle speculation, but has quite real and tangible consequences.

Should someone object that even other people who do not affirm and hope for this absolute fulfillment of meaning for their lives can nonetheless come to grips with them just as well and as bravely, objectively and serenely as people who strive toward this fulfillment of meaning as their goal, then one would have to answer that this kind of assurance has presumably not yet been confronted with the ultimate abyss and with the despair of human existence if it thinks it can come to grips with life without letting itself be bothered about ultimate meaning. And the further question would have to be asked whether this assertion about being able to come to grips with one’s life without despairing about its ultimate meaninglessness is not really sustained by an ultimate affirmation of meaning at the root of one’s existence, an affirmation that is only concealed by a theoretical counter interpretation on the surface of the consciousness. And finally, one would have to say that a profound despair about the ultimate meaninglessness of existence need not necessarily express itself in concrete psychiatric or psychoanalytic phenomena. The further question would have to be asked whether a serene and quiet resignation which is willing to accept reality as it is,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

patiently and without reservation, is not, in fact, a real form of hope, even though it [203] appears modest and unassuming, in the sense in which we Christians call this final acquiescence in reality which is still on the way.

But before we bring our observations on the absolute and definitive meaning of our life into direct relationship with a statement about God, these observations permit us to say something further about this absolute meaning itself. The meaning about which we are inquiring in contrast to individually meaningful realities must always be and must always remain the mystery that cannot be encompassed, that can never be penetrated or manipulated. The demand for the universal meaning that brings the total reality of meaning in itself into an integral unity would imply a contradiction in se if this meaning were at the same time something that we could penetrate and manipulate. The universal meaning cannot have outside of itself a system of coordinates that reaches beyond this meaning itself, a system on the basis of which it could be penetrated and manipulated.

Thus, for the person who is not identical with this meaning but rather approaches it as one who is questioning and seeking, this meaning must of necessity be unencompassable. Human knowledge reaches out beyond any individual reality, and so, too, does human freedom. But this means that this infinite meaning cannot itself be once again encompassed and mastered in the same way as the individual objects of knowledge and of freedom. Thus human beings are essentially and inexorably confronted with the unencompassable mystery In a preapprehension of knowledge and freedom they move beyond the individual object in order to grasp it by surpassing it in this way, and so they arrive in the presence of the universal meaning as a permanent mystery. Owing to this mystery they “fail” (so to speak) and this is how they find their fulfillment, by the loving acceptance of this mystery as their own completion.

However, when human beings accept the unspeakableness of the meaning that encompasses them and that cannot be encompassed by them and thereby also accept the unspeakableness of their own existence, when they admit it and surrender to it in love, they have found and accepted their own true nature. They accept the total meaning not as one dominated by them, but rather they let themselves be overpowered by it. The learned ignorance in respect to this total meaning, which has the most radical knowledge when it accepts the incomprehensibility of what is known, is the true essence of today’s widespread agnosticism and skepticism, which is not radical [204] enough when it pretends to a profound penetration of the nothingness of all reality, but rather when it really admits the mystery that accepts us and overwhelms us.

Thus our question of meaning is now beset by an odd crisis. We demand meaning – and, quite rightly, a total meaning. Thereby we are tempted almost automatically and unreflexively to understand this meaning as the thing that “can be penetrated,” and “has been penetrated,” as the thing that has been elucidated and therefore sheds light on the darkness of our existence. We demand light and automatically imagine this light, which is supposed to illuminate everything and make it meaningful, as something similar to the kind of lights that we ourselves use when groping about in our darkness. We think that something is known if its individual elements are grasped in their reciprocal relationship and can be incorporated into the larger context of our needs and questions. But the point is precisely that it may not be a question of this when we acknowledge the total meaning as the unencompassable mystery, when we have the experience of the incomprehensibility of the total meaning, in which experience it is not some individually known thing that is accepted as a regrettable remnant of a penetrating knowledge, but rather the mystery is experienced as the ultimate meaning of our entire existence.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

FROM THE QUESTION OF MEANING TO THE QUESTION OF GOD

But now it is time to understand the question of meaning explicitly as the question of God. Actually we have always been talking of God up to now without using that term. The presupposition is only that we grasp that the total, comprehensive, and definitive meaning of our life, the meaning toward which we are tending in spirit and in freedom without being able to produce this meaning by settling upon individual aims which have meaning in themselves, is a reality.

For if this meaning were nothing more than a mental construct, something that is only an ideological postulate, then our question of meaning, insofar as it is the question of an actual human being, would end up in a void, in a nothingness which explains nothing and which can have no motive force, something that is not at all capable of sustaining the radical seriousness of our question of meaning.

[205] If someone thinks that a statement of this kind is something that we have merely concocted in our heads because we have to speak of it in order to tell it to ourselves; if someone believes that only the things that directly strike the experience of our senses are the things that have true reality; if someone feels that things are real and not just mental constructs only in virtue of the realities which we cannot avoid even through our freedom, then of course this person cannot be helped. Persons such as these can only be reminded that these presuppositions have also been thought up by them, therefore that for them they would also have to fall under the suspicion of unreality, that these presuppositions have not been proved and ultimately, even though this is not apparent at first glance, contain contradictions.

Our question of a total meaning is something we take seriously; we consider our answer to this question to be valid; therefore we consider the existence of this universal meaning toward which we are tending without creating it ourselves to be present as an absolute reality, and we call this reality God. Thus for us the question of meaning and the question of God are identical. The reality of an absolute meaning and the reality of God are identical.

When we come in this way from the answer to the question of meaning to the answer to the question of God, we do not mean to say that this way, in its conceptual explicitness, is the only way to a knowledge of God. Ultimately all the ways leading to the knowledge of God will be identical when viewed in final exactness, and so in the last analysis it is not so important whether one calls these ways, or some of them, “proofs of the existence of God.” But we do not wish to assert that the process of coming to a knowledge of God necessarily and for everyone would have to be accessible in a way that is equally good precisely under the catchword “meaning.” We cannot maintain this because the traditional formulations of these ways to the knowledge of God, of these proofs of the existence of God, are accustomed to work in other conceptual frameworks and we certainly have no intention here of calling them into question. Conversely, it is correct that all genuine ways to the knowledge of God, if they do not want to run aground on the rationalistic shoals of a superficial cause-and-effect mode of thought, must always lead over the totality of human existence with its limitless transcendentality and freedom, and so in any event they cannot run very far from the explicit question of meaning and its answer.

[206] If the ultimate answer attainable by human beings to the universal question of meaning contains an ultimate affirmation of the reality of the infinite God, indeed if both are identical, this does not mean that it is possible on the part of human beings alone and of the freedom and spiritual nature proper to them to attain an ultimate and definitive determination of the exact relationship of human beings to this absolute meaning of their existence called God. On the part of human beings alone it remains an open question, even when the ultimate question of meaning is answered, how and to what degree of nearness or distance human beings in the definitive character of their freedom arrive at this divine meaning of their lives.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

On this point it is only Christian revelation that provides a precise and radical answer. God, the absolute meaning, the infinite reality, the eternally hidden one that always remains a mystery gives himself to human beings in their completion by what we call the direct vision of God face to face. And in this, God, no longer through the mediation of a finite reality and of a created happiness, but through himself, is the ultimate, unsurpassable answer of meaning to that question which ultimately human beings themselves are.

It should be once again expressly emphasized that we are not actually answering the absolute question of meaning, which we declare to be justified and unavoidable (even though it can be present in a repressed way), with a God or a concept of God which is brought in from somewhere else as an answer to this question of meaning. Rather, the question about an absolute meaning, if it is really accepted and if it is permitted to articulate itself in its ultimate form, yields of itself the existence of an absolute meaning as something real and thus the existence of God himself There are of course individual human questions which can be answered through an experience quite different from this and through their object. But the total question of meaning, if not denied and if permitted full articulation, contains its answer in itself

Therefore this question together with its answer says originally and through itself what is actually meant by God. Therefore a knowledge of God is also already present when the question of meaning as a question that is meaningful and that answers itself is accepted in the concrete actualization of human life with its decisions of conscience, even when some people have the impression that they can make nothing out of the word God or even out of the words absolute [207] meaning, and similar words. In the inexorable responsibility of their lives as lived concretely these people are confronted by the question of whether there is an ultimate meaning; they, too, answer this question with yes or no and in this way take an ultimate position in respect to God and to his incomprehensibility.

On the other hand, this does not mean that an explicit verbalization of human beings' relationship to the ultimate, divine meaning of their existence is only an idle question for those who are engaged in metaphysical or theological speculation. By no means, since you, the person who is reading these reflections, laborious though they may be, are confronted in a more explicit and inescapable way with this question. Do you want to continue in a life consisting of nothing more than particular experiences of meaning, as though you were on a desert journey passing through an oasis here and there only to die of thirst in the end in the desolate wasteland? Or do you want to structure the life that you are living on the basis of the hopeful conviction that there is an ultimate meaning that beckons with infinite promise, while at the same time committing you to radical responsibility?

And so, if these reflections have proved to be something more than mere human chatter, then something has really happened in which the ultimate degree of promise and of responsibility have announced themselves, perhaps in a hesitant and obscure way, but nonetheless in a way that cannot be passed over. It does make sense to talk about meaning, and this meaning that we have been talking about is not to be found only in those few little fragments of meaning that we encounter on our life journey with all its absurdities. This meaning is infinite and it cannot be encompassed. It is our meaning and it is called God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[208]

15

JESUS CHRIST – THE MEANING OF LIFE

Perhaps these reflections are disappointing for many since they are not so much an intonation of a triumphal hymn of praise to the Christian answer to the question of the meaning of life, but they serve instead to delineate the boundaries of what is also a Christian answer to the question of the meaning of life. For the most that these reflections can do in the last analysis is to summon people to entrust the endless quest for the meaning that will fulfill them as human beings to the intangible mystery of God in the decisiveness of a hopeful faith and to accept the entry into the divine darkness as the only way to gain access to the ascent of the true light.

After all, a Christian answer to the question of the total meaning of human existence must take into account from the very outset that the total answer does not spare us the trouble of seeking in our lives answers to partial and individual questions of meaning. And of course we must not be disappointed if the answer to the question of total meaning remains a very formal one in this earthly history. We must not be disappointed if this answer does not of itself slake our unquenched thirst for a concrete, albeit particular, fulfillment of meaning. The declaration that God is infinite goodness who contains every fulfillment in himself is not going to satisfy our desire to have our cup of coffee sweetened with a lump of sugar.

THE QUESTION OF MEANING

First of all, some clarifications are called for when we speak of Jesus Christ as the meaning of life. When using the term meaning we are of [209] course not referring to particular, individual interrelations between realities which are themselves particular, as, for example, the obviously meaningful connection between the ability to fly and the structure of a bird's wing. Nor are we referring to the insight that a definite, individual artistic experience has a meaning in itself and legitimizes its existence through itself and not merely through its usefulness for some other purpose. The meaning that we are talking about here is the one and total, universal and definitive meaning of the whole of human existence. We presume, then, that there can really be such a meaning, that its essence is conceivable, and that its existence can be realized.

This assumption is not self-evident. Agnostics and skeptics will say that people always experience partial elements of purposefulness and of meaning when they set up goals for themselves and achieve them and when they strive for experiences which they evaluate as positive, as gratifying and enjoyable. But they will say that a total and definitive meaning cannot be found and attained. Life ultimately fades away into a void; the question of and the demand for a definitive, all-embracing meaning of existence are meaningless from the very outset.

Christians are convinced that the opposite is the case. They believe that a comprehensive realization of meaning is possible. They view this as a task of their own freedom to be fulfilled through the completion of this history of their freedom and through the gift of the one whom we call God. It is not until they posit this all-embracing fulfillment of meaning that they can begin to see what is actually meant by the word God.

It would take us too far afield here to justify this fundamental conviction held by Christians and to demonstrate its credibility. Concerning this total meaning, however, two points have to be made.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

First. It is immediately evident that this total meaning of existence, which is all embracing and fulfills every demand that meaning can make, cannot be pieced together from things that yield a partial fulfillment of meaning. The attempt to achieve such a fulfillment of meaning would mean only an infinite progression of things that yield a partial fulfillment of meaning; each one of them would offer only the permanently unfulfilled promise of a total fulfillment of meaning.

Christians seek the total fulfillment of meaning "outside" of the course of history as eternal life given by God himself. By doing this they commit themselves to an answer to their total question of [210] meaning, the only conceivable alternative to which would be simply to waive any claim to an answer at all. But even though the answer of meaning is "transcendent," this answer is, as the only total one, full of meaning for the concrete life that we have to lead here and now. We must not pass over the hope of eternity with a mere shrug of the shoulders and leave it to dreamers as though what we have to do here cannot be changed by such metaphysical dreams. For wherever human beings in the present time realize with earnest faith an ultimate openness to God and his eternal life as their own hope, their relationship to the realities and tasks of this world changes, and this change is liberating, brings relief and provides objective clarity.

This, too, is something that cannot be further elaborated here. One point, however, must be insisted upon. Our quest for meaning here and now, no matter how much it has as its goal that God who overwhelms our practical experience, is not a question of idle speculation, but one that has quite real and tangible consequences.

Conversely, it is true and it must be emphasized that our total question of meaning has God as its goal, and he does not appear in our day-to-day empirical experience, particularly in the way in which this experience is circumscribed by the modern sciences which are oriented toward natural science. But even with this limitation the problem of a metaphysical-existentiell – and thus in some way or other empirical – experience of God is anything but one that has to be answered in a negative way.

Second. It must be stated that the God whom Christianity declares to be the fulfillment of the total question of meaning is and will remain for all eternity the mystery that cannot be encompassed, that can never be penetrated or manipulated. We cannot offer here a justification for this statement which indicates that human knowledge is ultimately oriented to this mystery as such, that owing to this mystery it "fails" (so to speak) and only in this way does it find its fulfillment. We are presuming here the Christian conviction of the incomprehensibility of God which remains a mystery. In the last resort the human being can draw nigh to this only in loving surrender, not, however, with a knowledge which brings the object known before the higher tribunal of knowing.

However, if God is the infinite mystery that can never be encompassed, then the total question of meaning is beset by an odd crisis. We demand meaning, and, quite rightly, a total meaning. Thereby we [211] are tempted almost automatically and unreflexively to understand this meaning as the thing that "can be penetrated and has been penetrated," as the thing that has been elucidated and therefore sheds light on the darkness of our existence. We demand light and automatically imagine this light, which is supposed to illuminate everything and make it meaningful, as something similar to the kind of lights that we ourselves use when groping about in our own darkness. We think that something is known if its individual elements are grasped in their reciprocal relationship and the whole can be incorporated into the larger context of our needs and questions. But the point is precisely that it may not be a question of this when we acknowledge God as the unencompassable mystery. For this experience of the incomprehensible does not consist of a regrettable remnant of a penetrating knowledge, but rather this experience constitutes the ultimate and original essence of knowledge.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If it is a question of the total and definitive meaning of human existence and if this meaning is supposed to be the incomprehensible God, then this meaning becomes the mystery to which one must surrender in the silence of adoring love in order to draw nigh to it. This quite different and unexpected interpretation does not imply a meaning which we can penetrate, seize upon and make subservient to ourselves. This meaning is the mystery that divests us of our very selves. Its blessedness will be bestowed upon us only if we affirm and love this holy mystery for its own sake and not for our sake, only if we give ourselves away instead of covertly turning God into a means of our own self-assertion.

THE QUESTION OF JESUS

Proceeding from these assumptions the question must be asked whether and how Jesus Christ is the Christian answer to the human question of meaning.

The proper and ultimate answer to the question of meaning is of course God, God in the sense that we have just indicated. Insofar as by Jesus Christ we mean the eternal Logos of God who is of one and the same divine substance with the Father, the statement that Jesus Christ is the ultimate answer to the ultimate question of human meaning is identical with the other statement which says that God is [212] this answer, he and no one else and nothing else. But it is obvious that this is not what is meant by the statement that Jesus Christ is the answer to the human question of meaning. This would contain nothing new, characteristic, or specifically Christian. Certainly by Jesus Christ the eternal Logos of God is meant, but precisely insofar as it has become flesh, as John says; insofar as it has entered upon a real, substantial unity with the whole human reality of Jesus of Nazareth.

Thus the question is to what extent this Jesus of Nazareth as a human being with a concrete human history, as one who has died and risen, has a constitutive significance (let us attempt to formulate the question in this way) for the total meaning of our lives. This is not simply meant to coincide with the statement that the eternal Logos is the meaning of our lives. And so Jesus Christ in his human reality and history cannot be the total meaning of our existence in exactly the same way that this can be predicated of God as God.

For Christian faith and Christian life it is clear that this questioning is of fundamental importance. On the one hand, Jesus Christ in his humanity is not simply identical with God, but rather he is one with God in the hypostatic union (to use the traditional expression). This unity in which we believe asserts at the same time the distinction between the human and the divine reality. On the other hand, God alone can be the ultimate goal of human meaning.

What this humanity of Jesus means more precisely for actual salvation, for the total meaning of the human being, is today an urgent question for Christianity.

This question is of course answered in Scripture and in Christian tradition and proclamation in manifold formulations which partially; complement one another and partially say the same thing, statements like the following. In the incarnation of the eternal Logos in Jesus of Nazareth God has accepted the whole of humanity and in this, since he has the same nature as we do, he has become one with the whole of humanity. The eternal Logos has redeemed us in the suffering and obedient death of his human history. For in this way he has made satisfaction to God’s eternal justice and thus become the reason for God’s salvific will; the reason that God holds out to us, despite humanity’s sin, his forgiving grace, which grace is God himself. Jesus of Nazareth is to a certain extent the historical event that; is sustained not only like all of history by the eternal, metahistorical [213] God, but the event in which God himself deals with the world on the stage of history and with it suffers its tragic character through to the end. By the obedience of his passion Jesus, as the loving immaculate one who

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

was utterly guiltless, has opened to us sinners the way to the Father. For he has been totally one with us. Many other statements such as these and similar ones which explain the salvific significance of Jesus Christ – thus his constitutive significance and function for the total meaning of our existence – can be found.[1]

The soteriological (referring to redemption) affirmation of Christian tradition can be divided into two kinds, those which belong more to a pure Chalcedonism and those which come rather under the category of neo-Chalcedonism. This abstruse technical term of theology means the following. In contemplating the unity of divinity and humanity as the ground of redemption, many theologians lay such emphasis on the unity that they – even while upholding the dogma of Chalcedon which asserts that in Jesus the divinity and the humanity remain unmixed – consider the fate of Jesus to be the fate of God in himself. Thus in their interpretation of the dogma of Chalcedon they rely on the theology of Cyril of Alexandria which says that God has suffered, the eternal Logos of God himself has experienced our fate and our death and it is in this way that this fate of ours and our death have been saved and redeemed. The very Logos of the Father has taken upon itself our fate with its debt of sin and death and in this way has redeemed our fate.

Even in our days this "neo-Chalcedonian" theory of redemption can be found – for the most part of course without explicit reference to neo-Chalcedonism. The affirmation in itself is part of the patrimony of faith of Catholic Christianity. For when taken on its own terms it contains the communicatio idiomatum, literally, the communication of properties, that is, the teaching that everything that is predicated of the human being Jesus is also to be predicated of Jesus Christ who is God (and this does not mean: "insofar as" he is God!). [214] But a fine difference, not easily perceptible but nonetheless profound, manifests itself in respect to the neo-Chalcedonian interpretation described above as soon as this affirmation is read in the sense of a pure "Chalcedonism" which insists that the two natures are unmixed.

According to the "neo-Chalcedonian" interpretation of the redemption (even though it fully upholds the mystery), God has suffered and died and in so doing he has redeemed us. Though aware that this remains a mystery, it still understands this affirmation of the "obedient death of Jesus" as applying to the divinity itself. But at this point the exponents of pure Chalcedonism will insist that in the unity of divinity and humanity it must be maintained that the two are at the same time not mixed – even though they fully uphold the hypostatic union of divinity and humanity in Jesus. Death and finiteness belong only to the created reality of Jesus; they are located on this side of the infinite distance between God and what is created, on the created side of the one God-man; the eternal Logos in its divinity, however, cannot as such take on a historical character and suffer an obedient death.

Pure Chalcedonism was always suspicious that the other soteriology would covertly evolve from a communication of properties (of the two natures) into an identity of properties (of both). The eternal God himself who stands beyond all history and suffering is permitted to suffer in himself (in a Gnostic sense or as understood by Schelling or in whatever sense you will). One presumes that our fate can be redeemed by transposing it into the interiority of God himself. Pure Chalcedonism – even though it fully acknowledges the hypostatic union and the corresponding possibility of the communication of properties, to be understood, however, also in a Chalcedonian sense – will emphasize that finiteness and death are, first of all, our fate that has to be redeemed. It is redeemed in that it was also the fate of Jesus; and in [1] At the moment we are prescinding from the fact that such formulations – as often happens and no doubt with justification – can be divided into statements of which some are more ontical in nature and others tend to employ moral concepts and paradigms. Thus there are statements of an ontological unity of the Logos with the created reality which in itself is viewed not merely as a presupposition of salvation, but as a process of salvation itself. Then there are other statements about sacrifice, blood, obedience, etc., in which the salvific happening is discerned in its proper sense.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

him this fate can and must, due to the hypostatic union, also be predicated of the Logos with all legitimacy. But this should not be done in such a way that this affirmation forges an identity between subject and predicate, the eternity of the divinity and the suffering of the humanity. The hypostatic union is an assertion of that unique unity, which does not otherwise occur and is otherwise unknown to us, which includes in itself distinctiveness and nonmergence, and which was proclaimed as a dogma at Chalcedon. [215] Thus for theologians who espouse pure Chalcedonism, then, the question remains in what way this unity of God and a human being bears in itself its function and its significance for redemption.

The question remains how it is that we are redeemed when God demands of the human reality of Jesus our existence which is determined by guilt and death. Jesus' fate is in a true sense God's own fate. But this fate does not impinge upon God's own life, with its meta-historical character and its freedom from suffering and its beatitude without guilt, since God's reality and Jesus' creatureliness remain unmixed. The "pure Chalcedonian" will always say that it is God's holy beatitude; which is not subject to suffering, that has redeemed us formaliter, and not something terrestrial and finite that has been speculated into the interior of God – as he is in himself. The death of Jesus, however further that is to be explained, can only be the cause of why and how God gives us his beatitude free of suffering as our own, but it is not in itself this very redemption (thus formaliter).

If in this way reservations are registered here as well as a certain embarrassment in respect to the neo-Chalcedonian soteriology, this by no means denies that the doctrine of the hypostatic union is the basis of the soteriological, of the "redemption" significance of the fate of Jesus, or that it represents an indispensable element of the redemption.

The question remains whether the understanding of the christological dogma – also of the hypostatic union – might be better served if one proceeds in a way opposite to the one customary in traditional theology, that is, if one does not inquire about the reality of redemption by starting with Jesus' divinity, his hypostatic union, but rather if one tries to reach an understanding of the meaning of the hypostatic union by beginning with the soteriological significance for us of Jesus and his fate. The way suggested leads, then, "from Christ for us" to "Christ in himself." To put it simply: the hypostatic union is understood as the presupposition, in itself perhaps not entirely explicable, for what we experience in Jesus, namely, that he is the ultimate, irrevocable word of God's forgiveness and promise of himself to us. The Christian dogma of Jesus as God and as a human being should be understood as the formulation of the unique and irreplaceable significance of Jesus for our salvation. The hypostatic union is thus the presupposition that is always contained in this statement about Jesus' salvific significance.

[216]

JESUS CHRIST, MEANING AND SALVATION OF HUMANKIND

The salvific significance of Jesus for us is definitive and it cannot be superseded. In order to understand this, let us start at the very bottom. We see a human being whose life is characterized by an unsurpassable nearness to God. It is a life of absolute obedience to God and at the same time of unconditional solidarity with the human race regardless of how these human being might act toward him. This twofold solidarity with God and with humankind is sustained by Jesus unconditionally. The fate of Jesus which comes as a result of this is death in which he surrenders definitively and completely to God and to his inscrutable decree, while still maintaining his unconditional love for humankind. In this plunge into the absolute powerlessness of death, however, he is the one who is definitively affirmed and accepted by God and this is the way we experience him, precisely as the "risen one." (That is Christian faith as experienced by Jesus' disciples and by the Church, the validity of which cannot be accorded specific treatment here.) The fate and the person of Jesus have, therefore, a significance of their own which goes beyond their usual humanness. This Jesus proclaims that with him God turns to us definitively and irrevocably in a love that is forgiving and that contains the offer of himself; that the "kingdom of God" has come irrevocably; that on God's part the triumph of God's forgiving love establishes itself in human history in a way that cannot be overcome. Jesus' claim that with him God's self-communication to the world, despite its sin and its finiteness and its being under the thrall of death, definitively establishes itself is validated and sealed by the fact of Jesus' being definitively accepted by God through his resurrection.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But if this is the case, then Jesus in his self-interpretation, his death and his resurrection, is the unsurpassable, definitive word of God's affirmation of himself to the world. This already contains the traditional doctrine of the substantial, hypostatic unity of the Logos with the human reality of Jesus, if it is understood with radical seriousness. By accepting Jesus as God's irreversible, definitive self-promise to us we are already confessing him as the consubstantial Son of God.

Why is this so? Every created, finite reality exists in its own right within a larger sphere of possibilities. Alongside of it something else [218] is possible, even something contradictory. God, its free creator, has not established himself definitively in this reality alone. Everything that is finite and subject to a historical process, when considered as such in itself, remains retractable, revocable, always the object of a divine freedom which never establishes itself absolutely through this finite object as such alone, nor is it able to do so. Therefore every revelation in which God objectifies and manifests his will through a finite word or a historical occurrence remains open-ended, capable of revision, provisional. Something that as such is merely finite in itself alone is of its very nature incapable of signifying and mediating to us a divine communication which cannot be superseded. The communication always remains provisional in view of the infinity of God's possibilities and the sovereignty of his freedom. If, however, God communicates to us his self-promise as one that is irrevocable and definitive, then the created reality through which this takes place cannot simply stand at the same distance from God as other created realities. It must be the reality of God himself in such a unique way that God would disown his very self if he should supersede it because of its created finiteness.

Only a finite reality which God accepts as his own reality can make something that he establishes in the world irrevocable. God's word of revelation for us beyond which there can be no other must be God's own reality; otherwise it would remain subject to conditions and to revision just as any finite object is. While mere prophets can speak in God's name, the finite utterance that they communicate in word and deed can never proclaim anything more than what is open-ended and capable of being superseded. To put it in biblical terms, only the Son, who is God's Word and not only its finite utterance, can be the definitive, final prophet beyond whom there can be no further one. But Jesus lays claim to being God's definitive self-promise in a way that is unconditional and irreversible, and Jesus' self-interpretation and his claim are confirmed by God through the definitiveness of his existence in death and resurrection. Therefore Jesus' human reality, notwithstanding its historical and finite character, must be something that is not merely established by the God who is beyond the world, but it must be God's own reality – regardless of how limited our capacity is to understand how a divine reality which stands in identity to God is different from a reality of God which is God in virtue of its being accepted, as unity without selfhood.

[218] If the basic thrust of these reflections is correct, even though their formulations are imperfect, we can say the following. Jesus is the consubstantial Son of God. His human reality, notwithstanding its genuine, free, human subjectivity, is the reality of the eternal

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Logos of God. For Jesus is the irrevocable, unsurpassable, and definitive self-promise of God to us. And he can only be this as the consubstantial Son.

FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST

It is now evident that it is quite possible to have a Christology beginning "from below" with the experience of Jesus, experiencing him as our salvation, that is, as the historical experience of God's self-promise. From this point we can easily come to classical Christology's metaphysical statements. The proposition that Jesus is God's definitive self-promise to us and the proposition that Jesus is the incarnate Logos of God are interchangeable, provided only that the first proposition be taken with radical seriousness and that the second proposition concerning the true unity of the Logos and the human reality of Jesus (and not the mere identity) be understood in a Chalcedonian and not a monophysite sense.

There is an ascending Christology (proceeding from the human being Jesus) which coincides with the classical descending Christology (God becomes a human being). This ascending theology shows us how and why an apparently simple relationship trust in Jesus can contain within itself the whole of classical Christology. And this relationship is one that ordinary Christians who are not professional theologians can be expected to achieve. It is of course desirable that such Christians possess some familiarity with the formulations of classical Christology, and if they are educated, this may be expected of them. If, however, they find this difficult and that it involves too much of a metaphysical strain, they need not consider themselves to be poor Christians whose orthodoxy is questionable.

If a Christian can trustingly say: "In Jesus of Nazareth, in his life, his teaching, his cataclysmic death, his victory (which is called resurrection) God has pledged to me himself, his forgiveness, his own life that goes beyond all finite fulfillment"; if a Christian believes that this pledge is unconditional, irreversible, and definitive on God's [219] part and that it will never be superseded or surpassed in some age yet to come, indeed that it cannot be superseded since it is God's final word; if a Christian is committed to this with unreserved faith and gives this unsurpassable hope more validity than all doubts, skepticism, and reservations, then he or she is an orthodox Christian. This Christian has an existentiell realization of classical Christology. This Christian finds and accepts Jesus in a real and properly understood sense as his or her salvation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[220]

16

CHRISTOLOGY TODAY

First of all, I feel that even today Catholic theologians should not simply ignore the classical formulations of Catholic theology. The traditional formulation of a dogma and the way in which the Church's teaching office expresses it are of course not simply identical to the dogma itself. But when we come to deal with Christology, we cannot move beyond the traditional formulation of the dogma to the point where we can do without it entirely. Our own formulations do not reach a degree that is sufficiently adequate on the level of proclamation or of the expression of our personal belief to permit us to depart entirely from the old formulation, or to treat it as nothing more than a statement that belongs exclusively to the past history of the understanding of faith, even though this history is still normative for those engaged in theological reflection.

THE CHRISTOLOGICAL TRADITION

We theologians of today are expected to be objective and to engage in self-criticism. We have to be people not only who think that they have learned something from the history of faith but also who are still willing to learn from it. If we really do have this willingness, how could we possibly entertain the desire simply to abandon the old christological formulations in favor of new formulations of our own? Even if we grant that at some time in the future historical transformations in language might justify our expressing the reality contained in Christology in a totally different way (and in proclamation [221] in yet another, totally different way), objectively and from the standpoint of the history of ideas this future has certainly not yet arrived. And theologians who feel called upon to pioneer the Church into this future must take care not to lose contact with the mass of the faithful behind them and with the bishops. This concern is also an essential part of a genuinely Catholic theology, even if the pace of the march into the future of faith seems to the impatient to be rather slow.

On the other hand, it is just as important to recognize that even the most sacrosanct and abiding formulations of faith require explanation, and this means that they inevitably have to be expanded by the addition of other statements, even though these have widely differing degrees of binding force. (John Paul II insists on the word transubstantiation in the doctrine of the Eucharist. But a poor theologian like myself has no alternative but to start asking questions and to say what is really meant here by the phrases "substance of bread" and "transformation of substance," because they can be taken to mean many things that are not correct and that rightly seem nonsensical to a modern physicist.)

However, if we explain the binding propositions of dogma without succumbing to the illusion that such explanations are simple and obvious or that they might not perhaps be misleading; if in this process we engage in profound intellectual reflection and to the best of our abilities explore all the implications, then the old formulations themselves, and fidelity to them, lead in certain circumstances to statements in Christology that will astonish many people who up to now have heard the old formulas in tranquil familiarity and assumed they understood what they were saying. (For example, the doctrine of the true humanity of Jesus as traditionally proclaimed yields insights about the historical contingency of Jesus' consciousness and about the possibility that his consciousness might even undergo a religious development. In the past these insights were overlooked or even denied by those who

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explained this dogma.)

So Catholic theologians should, in addition to their other approaches, always strive to obtain from the old formulations of Christology new insights which seem important and indispensable for bringing their present-day Christology into a positive relationship to current ways of thinking. This is one way for them to arrive at new formulations without discarding the old ones, and they need not be obtained at the price of a merely negative criticism or by doing away [222] with the classical formulations of Christology. The effect of such a coexistence of old and (quite necessary and legitimate) new formulations on the Church's concrete awareness of faith, in view of the more precise "blending" of the old and new statements in the ordinary Christian's consciousness of faith and in the Church's official proclamation, is something that naturally cannot be exactly programmed in advance and can confidently be left to the future history of faith.

But it is obvious that even in Christology history has not ground to a halt. Genuine orthodoxy demands more than a (desperate and obstinate) repetition of the old christological formulations which are products of history and which will continue to be part of that history. But this historical reality is the very reason why we may not pass them over in silence as though they were now devoid of any binding force for us. Exegetes must tend to their exegesis and biblical theology, but I have no patience with Catholic exegetes whose work manifests no awareness whatsoever of the Council of Chalcedon. There must be an authentic integration of the past if Christology is to have any future. Rome must truly keep watch over the purity of christological doctrine and it must insist on the normative character of the Church's old official Christology. But to do this in such a way as to deny the need of new christological formulations would be a betrayal of the task of future proclamation.

I can accept the words of the Johannine prologue with a faith so steadfast that I am ready to die for it. These words will always be accepted as a real and vital foundation of my own theology. With joyous abandon born of firm faith I can let myself be overwhelmed by the bright darkness of God's revelation and refuse to be a clever rationalist, but even in doing this I may also tremble in the depth of my heart and spirit when I read: "And the Word was made flesh," and I may wonder what this really means and what it does not mean. I may ask this question if at the same I begin to think of the incomprehensibility and immeasurability of the God of a tremendous cosmos and if I also maintain in faith that this God is and remains unchangeable in himself, that he is unspeakably greater than anything that is or can be conceived of outside of himself (and therefore greater than Jesus' created reality). And I must believe that Jesus' human soul, as a human soul, contemplates in adoration from an infinite distance of creatureliness what is or it, too, the enduring [223] incomprehensibility of God. In all of this it remains true that the Word was made flesh.

When considering this article of faith, I refuse to lose sight of the other articles of faith just to make things easier for myself. For this reason we must constantly ask what Christology really means to say and what it does not mean to say, even if classical Christology must always remain one of the starting points for this inquiry. The more recent contributions to present-day Christology may not always be felicitous in their formulations, nevertheless they should be examined with benevolent respect and we should beware of imagining ourselves superior to them in an orthodoxy that ultimately remains sterile. When a little while ago a professor in Rome began his lecture with the observation that E. Schillebeeckx's Christology was heretical and therefore he would not discuss it, such a Christology is condemning itself out of its own mouth to being ignored by people of today and to being no more than an internal ideology of a steadily diminishing group.

A CHRISTOLOGY OF ASCENT

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Any present-day Christology must include a Christology of ascent. The terminology is not the important thing here. But a Catholic theology which upholds the necessity and importance of a fundamental theology which takes history seriously as the place where revelation occurs and which is compelled today to develop a more intense interaction between fundamental theology and dogmatics must start from the concrete historical Jesus of Nazareth. When one starts from here, the historical reports about Jesus should not be considered first of all as dogmatic propositions deriving their inspiration from revelation. In the ordinary objective development of theology faith in Jesus precedes convictions about the Church and its teaching office and the inspiration of the New Testament. A degree of reciprocal influence among all the elements of the one Christian faith need not be denied, but ultimately this does not alter the fact that it is Jesus who is the source of belief in the Church and Scripture, and in principle this cannot be the other way around.

In such a theology of ascent it is entirely legitimate to begin with statements about the significance of Jesus "for us" (which of course [224] express a reality "in itself'), because statements about something existing purely "in itself," whose significance is explained only subsequently, will not be listened to, at least not by people of today, and these statements have no effect. One need not hesitate to say the propter nos at the beginning of the Credo. When this is done in the right way it turns out that what seems to be extremely anthropocentric refers in fact to a person who finds himself only by abandoning himself to the incomprehensibility of God. At the beginning of Christology the question is, "What does he mean for us?" Then comes the question, "Who must he be if he has this significance for us?"

This significance can be described in a great variety of ways, and then of course the demonstration of this significance will have to be correspondingly varied. But the starting point for all of this will always be the encounter with the historical Jesus and the courage (itself shown "transcendentally" to be legitimate and necessary) to endure all the unavoidable difficulties involved when an absolute decision has its origin in a historical reality. All such arguments for the absolute significance of Jesus for us, since they are always and necessarily finite, will in the details of their exposition make one point clear, express another only vaguely, and perhaps overlook and, forget a third. The individual contours of these arguments will vary with people, cultures, and historical periods. It would not be praiseworthy but rather problematic and alarming if these arguments were, too uniform in the Church.

TWO ASPECTS OF AN ORTHODOX CHRISTOLOGY

With this reservation about the absolute validity of this necessary plurality of approaches to and aspects of the significance of Jesus for us, I would still venture to say that these approaches and aspects (combining the two) inevitably yield two fundamental insights.

Jesus Christ, God's Irreversible Pledge

First, I have to see Jesus, through his reality and his word, as the unsurpassable access to the immediacy of God in himself, not just as an access to this immediacy as idea and possibility but as the inherently [225] victorious promise of the realization of this immediacy. I shall try to make this a little clearer, leaving the question open to what extent the required constituents of an absolute religion are to be found only in him or whether the idea is intelligible apart from him and only in its realization has to be recognized in and through

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Jesus.

Absolute and fundamentally unsurpassable immediacy to God, such as finds its completion in the beatific vision, is the presupposition for the genuine universality of a religion. Without this a religion can only be regional, particular, popular, restricted to a specific culture, and so on, because its concern cannot extend beyond a finite element of salvation alongside which, by definition, other elements exist. If this closeness is to involve God in himself, it can only be understood as grace emanating from God's loving freedom. This grace can be thought of either in the form of a more or less neutral offer to human freedom or in the form of the actual God-given victory of this offer, establishing itself by its own power in and through human freedom. Theoretically, there is of course another conceivable form: rejection by human beings, resulting in the definitive catastrophe of human history.

In Jesus (and ultimately only through him) we experience through his life and his word that the history of the offer of an unsurpassable and absolute self-communication of God to humankind has entered a phase which can rightly be interpreted as the final phase of the history of human freedom as well as its first real beginning. In this phase the victory of God's offer of himself to humankind has become irrevocable, as a result of God's action and not merely a posteriori as a result of the actual exercise of human freedom. Jesus is God's promise of himself to humankind, essentially absolutely unlimited and existentielly now in a phase of eschatological irrevocability

It is not my task here to verify this interpretation of Jesus historically. It is, however, implicit in Jesus' proclamation that the kingdom of God has come in him, his message and his work, when one realizes that the kingdom of God, if it is really to be definitive and more than an earthly kingdom, must be identical with God himself and must burst the bounds of a model in which God is related to the world only as the creator and preserver of a world different from him, with its own possibilities and goals.

With the obvious assumption that salvation history is such that another way in which it is a reality is through word, and as a word [226] which occurs as a reality, I venture to say: the statement that Jesus is the irreversible pledge of the God who communicates himself as the content and goal of history and not a reality created by him, is necessarily coterminous with the classical statement of Christology concerning the hypostatic union. This will not be developed further here. But if these statements are really coterminous (and I am convinced that they are), then it is possible to make an "orthodox" christological statement which both implies from the very outset a "Christology for us" and also stands alongside the classical formulation of Christology and so performs a critical function in relation to possible misunderstandings of classical Christology (especially monophysite views which are still strong today). Of course the same critical function is also performed in the opposite direction by classical Christology on the newly proposed formulation.

Jesus' Death and Resurrection

Second, there is one point where I must clarify and elaborate what I have just said. If Jesus is to be God's victorious self-promise in history, the historical fact of this victory and its manifestation is conceivable only if it is seen as the irrevocable acceptance of this divine self-offer in Jesus. But this definitive and irrevocable acceptance of God's promise of himself, visible in history, can be conceived as taking place only through what we call, in Christian terms, Jesus' death and resurrection. However many ways there may be of conceiving the concrete response of freedom to its ultimate determination by "death," a theology of freedom could show that death – and only death – is the event by which freedom's choice becomes definitive. Even though the specific form of Jesus death may be an essential part of salvation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

history, Jesus' death is of fundamental importance to salvation history because it makes definitive the acceptance of God's offer of himself to Jesus (and in him to humankind). Of course either here or at another point in our discussion there would have to be an explanation of why and how there exists an unbreakable solidarity between Jesus and his fate, and humankind, such that God's promise of himself to Jesus and Jesus' acceptance of this promise through himself in his own death are really God's [227] promise of himself to humankind as a whole. But that cannot be presented here.

What has been offered here is nothing more than a few isolated and fragmentary suggestions for the kind of Christology required today. Any number of things could be added to what has been said. It would do no harm for a present-day Christology to take up the ideas of a Teilhard de Chardin and to elaborate them with more precision and clarity, even though in his work it is not very easy to find an intelligible and orthodox connection between Jesus of Nazareth and the cosmic Christ, the Omega Point of world evolution.

Above all, however, such a Christology for today and tomorrow would have to say much more than in the past about the highly personal loving relationship of the individual human being to Jesus of Nazareth. This could perhaps be described very simply and yet radically in such a way as to actually include in it the whole of classical Christology with the result that this classical Christology would lose some of the alien appearance that it often has today even for firmly believing Christians. If this relationship of the individual to Jesus were from the outset clearly understood as a dying with Jesus (in absolute hope) in a surrender to the incomprehensibility of the eternal God, Christology would no longer appear to the other world religions and the other forms of human desire for God as something compatible only with a particular religion, which cannot be the religion of all human beings.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[228]

17

BRIEF OBSERVATIONS ON SYSTEMATIC CHRISTOLOGY TODAY

THE PERMANENCE OF FAITH

Young theologians who study theology today without learning in Christology what the Council of Chalcedon says, what person, nature, hypostatic union, and communication of properties mean, would be deprived of the obvious and requisite tools of Catholic Christology. It goes without saying that things like these are indispensable even today. If we show just a little respect for two millennia of the history of thought, if we still regard Plato, Aristotle, Augustine, Kant, Descartes, and others as our masters and can still learn something new from them even though we philosophers of today are of an entirely different breed, then the same obviously holds true in the case of the Church's traditional two-thousand-year Christology. Far from being embarrassed, we ought to feel obliged to dig deeper into this christological tradition.

I cannot, nor do I have any intention here of explaining and clarifying in detail the unique permanence of Christian faith or that of Christian theology seen in the light of this faith, even though the latter is of a derived and secondary nature. The general contours of intellectual and spiritual history give evidence of this permanence and so does theology in particular. The past is still a vital reality and must always remain such. We have a responsibility toward it. If our own Christology in discharging the obligation and task of theological development encumbent on it today should fail to take issue with this [229] old traditional Christology or in this confrontation should come only to the conclusion that the old and the new have nothing to do with one another or that they contradict one another, this would be an indication that something is amiss with our own Christology, and not vice versa. Permit me this observation, since on this matter I have never held any other opinion in my whole life.

The Church's teaching – to the extent and on the level and in the way it is put forth by the Church – is assuredly a binding norm for a Catholic theology of today, just as it always has been in the past. This is of course particularly true in the case of a teaching as central as Christology. While it is true that all the statements about Jesus Christ can never give full expression to our final, interior, personal relationship to him, to Jesus of Nazareth, in the unique significance he has for living and dying, and that we always have and must have a relationship to him, Jesus of Nazareth, extending far beyond all of these theoretical statements of Christology, this is of course something else again. But we do have the duty – both toward ourselves as well as toward those whom we instruct and to whom we proclaim Christianity – of making it clear to some extent who this Jesus of Nazareth is for us, and this relationship must be clearly distinguished from other personal relationships to other historical figures. We have to involve ourselves in Christology, and this Christology must be the Church's Christology and this Christology of the Church has found its expression in traditional Christology, whose keystone – at least until now – has been Chalcedon, and this Christology must also be ours. That this Christology must nonetheless be anchored in the New Testament and must move forward in concert with our own total intellectual and spiritual situation, with our anxieties, our needs, our happiness, and so on, is something that is obvious.

That this Chalcedonian Christology can also easily fall under the suspicion of being mythological – this is a word I have often used – is yet another matter. If people say today, "Jesus is God," they have on the basis of the Church's normative and traditional Christology

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the right, you can even say the obligation, to make that statement, provided that they are not capable of saying the same thing in another, more intelligible way. I shall come back to this point presently. But there is no denying that a statement of this kind sounds mythological, is open to misunderstanding, and in certain circumstances [230] is simply not credible. And for this reason modern Catholic Christology, with all fidelity, all respect, all deference to the past, with all the normative force established by traditional Chalcedonian Christology, has the duty to reflect and to state in another way what is actually meant when traditional Christology makes a statement of this kind.

A NEW FORMULATION OF FAITH

There are of course devout souls among us, from the simplest of the faithful right up to the bishops, whose psychological and intellectual background enables them to accept these traditional formulations without the slightest difficulty or scruple. It is quite another question whether such people, if they are serious about proclaiming the Church's abiding gospel today, might be better advised to entertain a few scruples that might goad them to do some real thinking and make a real attempt to say what they are obliged to say.

But on the whole there is no escaping the fact that the ontological formulations of traditional Christology, particularly in their abbreviated and simplified form, make people wonder whether these statements are really credible or, for that matter, whether they are intelligible. Therefore, in all loyalty to the Church's traditional Christology, it must be admitted that the same truth of traditional Christology can, in principle at least, be stated in another way. Whether the attempt at another formulation of the same statement will be successful in a particular case (another formulation which, since it is different, will naturally open new, different, additional, and perhaps surprising perspectives on the same matter) – whether such a new and, in principle, possible formulation in a given case will measure up to the Church's consciousness of faith and hold its ground in the face of new theological criticism is an individual question that can be settled only by detailed and specific investigation and reflection.

Whether or not Küng's Christology in his book On Being a Christian meets these simple requirements is a question that cannot be dealt with here, and we do not intend to do so. But an example like this shows us that present-day theologians have the right and the duty in certain circumstances to translate the old Christology, with [231] all deference to its normative character, into a new language, to understand it in a new way, to open up new horizons of understanding, and so on, and then to submit these new attempts to the Church's consciousness of faith (of which the Church's teaching office is also the representative, but not the only one), asking whether this concrete Church of ordinary Christians and perhaps even of frequently rather soporific traditionalist bishops can ultimately accept them or not. Of course this will then obviously serve as a touchstone for one's own Christology.

Permit me to make a personal remark here. When considering my own Christology, I often ask myself with a certain concern and uneasiness whether my attempt at Christology, as far as it goes, really transposes traditional Christology into a new conception or whether certain indispensable elements and statements of the Church's official theology have been omitted, damaged, overlooked, and so on. When my friend Walter Kasper asks certain questions in connection with this, when he seems to be saying that my Christology of ascent (I shall come back to this term later) does not really take traditional theology into adequate account, I am bold enough to venture the opinion that he is wrong. Which one of us is right is obviously a matter of dispute, something that has to be thought through further as far as this is of interest to theologians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What I originally intended to say is the following simple sentence. Even traditional Christology, especially nowadays, has not only the right but also the duty to ask whether and how the same thing can be stated in another, a new, a more intelligible way, one that circumvents certain dangers of mythology. A detailed elaboration of this, the success or failure of individual attempts, Catholic or Protestant, pose yet a further question that obviously cannot be answered here.

My own formulation, and even for me it is not the only one, and I never intended it to be such, is the formulation that Jesus is the final, unsurpassable word of God in his self-promise to humankind. It is my opinion, and this is open to dispute, that from this standpoint Chalcedonian Christology can be reached while at the same time numerous mythological misunderstandings in traditional Christology can be avoided from the outset.

I am further of the opinion that many things can be understood when put in a simpler way without denying or oversimplifying the profundity of the christological mystery. Naturally if someone stands [232] in a sort of almost mythical awe of the traditional christological formulation and loves it for just this reason – credo, quia absurdum – and sees in it the fulfillment, so to speak, of his or her intellectual aspirations, that is this person's privilege. But it is my opinion that the Christian mysteries, the Christian mystery in general and particularly in Christology, can also be formulated in a way that will both preserve the tremendousness of the statement, something that may not be compromised, and will nonetheless not as easily awaken the impression that fairy tales or mythologies are being narrated that people of today can no longer be expected to believe.

When I say that in Jesus, in all that he is, in his teaching, person, behavior, self-interpretation, death and resurrection, God has committed himself visibly in history in a way that this commitment cannot be surpassed and reversed, I have in fact spoken of the incomprehensible profundity of the mystery of God. For me, then, this mystery contained in Christology is virtually already the mystery of Christianity itself. And so I need no additional mysteries, so to speak, in order to have the feeling: credo, quia absurdum. But in this way the incomprehensible is the thing that for its part becomes the most obvious.

But as I have already said, I do not insist that this sort of original formulation of what Jesus is for us, and so what he is in himself, is the only conceivable formulation on the basis of which classical Christology can be derived anew and made really intelligible. I readily admit that there can be all manner of primal christological statements and their wording can be quite varied. As someone who is unfortunately not an exegete, I of course know how difficult it is to match a statement of this kind with the biblical statements whereby a further difficulty arises due to the many different Christologies presented in fact by the Bible itself. But I think – and this is all I wanted to say – that even loyalty to the faith of Chalcedon permits us and obliges us to inquire beyond these formulations of classical Christology and to search for other more original or at least equally original christological statements which are perhaps closer to Scripture or at least to the Christology of the synoptic statements, which we can understand more readily, which sound more credible, and which still yield classical Christology as implicitly contained in them. There is no doubt, of course, that many individual questions in classical Christology pose problems of their own.

[233] I should like to imagine that my work as systematic theologian has in one way or another served to remove many an obstacle in classical textbook theology, thus enabling exegetes to present to the Church the results of their New Testament (synoptics) research with fewer inhibitions than would have been possible thirty or forty years ago and without coming into conflict with church officials. Specific problems about Jesus' consciousness of the imminence of the end, his knowledge, and so on, have to be dealt with in detailed analysis, of course, and on these questions, in all fidelity to the total theology of the classical tradition, there are still enough individual points which have not yet been laid to rest in the archives or for which the archives must perhaps be reopened.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Let me give you one little example of this. Volume 19 of my Theological Investigations contains a brief essay in which I have presented something in a position paper delivered to the bishops' conference on the problem of the Virgin Birth, the brothers of Jesus, and so on.[1] In regard to my respected colleague Leo Scheffczyk in Munich I would also like to enter a plea for more freedom for exegetes. If forty years ago you had said that Jesus proclaimed an imminence of the end which "taken out of the context of his total proclamation in this way is not true when considered in itself," your ecclesiastical permission to teach would most assuredly have been withdrawn. If the way is clear for you to say this today, I think that even exegetes might feel just a little bit of sincere gratitude toward systematic theologians who with great effort and danger to themselves opened just such doors as these, openings that are now taken for granted as obvious truisms, as though they were always open doors that were never closed. That was not as easy as it might seem when one is acquainted with the details of individual cases.

THE UNITY OF CHRISTOLOGY AND SOTERIOLOGY

It is true that traditional textbook theology devoted too little attention to the unity of Christology and soteriology. It was not Luther but we Catholic, neoscholastic textbook theologians who had developed [234] a Christology of the hypostatic union, the communication of properties, and so on, which initially had nothing at all to do with soteriology, with "Christ for us." After this Christology we turned over the page to a new treatise entitled De Deo redemptore. We cannot do it this way anymore of course, and not just because people today are so convinced of their own importance and central position, and so on, that they cannot imagine a theology which does not constantly talk about human beings and their needs. This kind of mentality is, when all is said and done, highly questionable, even though nowadays it gives the appearance of being terribly obvious. But we do confess: qui propter nos homines et propter nostram salutem descendit de caelis. From the outset Christology must be soteriology. The simple implication of this is of course that we have every right in the light of the New Testament or other more speculative viewpoints to attempt a formulation of the nature and meaning of Jesus which is from the outset a soteriological statement and at the same time really expresses the "nature" of Jesus Christ in a truly orthodox way.

It is my considered opinion that a reasonable ontology (or whatever else you want to call it) can and should be convinced from the outset that statements of function and statements of essence do not necessarily contradict one another. But from this it follows that one can quite properly construct a Christology which is called functional in full awareness that in so doing one has also constructed the essential Christology of classical church doctrine. I have already suggested a small example of such a formulation. But I cannot go into this in detail here.

TRANSCENDENTAL CHRISTOLOGY

There is Christology from below and there is transcendental Christology, and there have to be both of these in a Catholic Christology. First, Christology from below is really quite obvious. During a conversation I once had with Hans Küng – I believe it was in Brussels – I told him, much to his surprise, (if I am interpreting him correctly) that Catholic fundamental theology, [1] "Mary's Virginity," in Theological Investigations 19 (New York: Crossroad, 1983), pp. 218-31.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which always had a treatise De Christo legato divino, obviously recognized in practice that there was and had to be a Christology from below. Catholic [235] theology was never simply erected on a sacrificium intellectus or merely sustained by a purely new beginning in the New Testament alone. A traditional, fundamental-theological Christology has always been aware that we have to begin with Jesus, with his actual existence, preaching, self-witness, self-interpretation, and so on, and that we cannot begin there, first of all, with those statements of a Christology of descent which are part of incarnational Christology, but rather with altogether different data. That this ultimately finds its continuation in a classical theology of descent is quite another matter.

However, I still feel that there is also something that can be called a transcendental Christology and that it is indispensable. If someone objects to the term itself, it can be dropped without any problem. But one can imagine a human self-interpretation which can serve as a starting point for something like a Christology which at least appears to be within the realm of the possible. I think that a Christology which is searching in this direction, which has the conception of an absolute messenger of salvation, of an event in history that appears as the unsurpassable word of God, is certainly not something that is detrimental to the mystery, to the incomprehensibility of the incarnation of the eternal Logos, or however else you want to formulate it.

Speaking in the most general terms, there is no transcendental theology that would limit itself so exclusively to the realm of the transcendental, the aprioristic, and the speculative that it would omit any attempt to bring in a posteriori experience and to interpret it. Aristotle's logic, for example, is an aprioristic transcendental logic. But even with its a priori character, universal validity, and transcendental validity it is obvious that it exists only because the peasants' wives who sold potatoes in the marketplace engaged in logic. And so I would naturally not claim to have designed a transcendental theology if there had not been the a posteriori experience of Jesus of Nazareth. But if this empirical reality does exist, and because it does exist, I may and I must reflect on its aprioristic conditions so that I can understand this kind of a posteriori reality occurring in history. There is a reason for this.

I cannot illustrate this now in detail with examples. Let us take, however, at least one example. If we were convinced from the outset that a resurrection of the dead would be something absolutely senseless or something that would not have the slightest thing to do with [236] us in the concrete experience of our existence, the news of Jesus' resurrection would also be something that we could hear only with a shake of the head or a shrug of the shoulders and put aside as something that for us makes just about as much sense (or nonsense) as though we were hearing on the horizons of our own understanding that the Dalai Lama is the reincarnation of Buddha, or some such thing as that.

A searching and transcendental Christology and an a posteriori, empirical, historical Christology necessarily encounter one another, and if they do not, it is to the detriment of the ordinary Catholic empirical a posteriori Christology of Jesus of Nazareth. It is my opinion that an extraordinary amount of work still has to be done in this area of traditional Christology despite all the exegetes. For example, have we thought out in a reflexive way (I am not talking here about the concrete practice of piety in our lives) how it is that another human being is able to have such an absolute meaning for me as an individual, that is, for another human being at all, in the way that we ascribe to Jesus Christ this absolute meaning he has for us? How do I encounter another human being? What dimensions does an encounter of this kind have? How can I encounter someone from the past, Thutmosis or Napoleon or Goethe, and somehow or other discover in their person and work a meaning that challenges me and summons me to decision?

These and similar general anthropological, existential-ontological considerations would have to be made and developed by us Christians with much more exactitude, love,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

thoroughness, and discernment in order to have some kind of a framework of understanding, a horizon that has been reflected upon, for the teaching that tells us, "There is something crucial in my relationship to Jesus of Nazareth." When I was young there were very many things in our traditional Christology which were simply presumed and taken for granted, but they are no longer taken for granted, at least not for us today. How one proceeds in detail is of course another question.

Viewed from this perspective, I feel that many things that have not been considered should be taken up in the chapter of a transcendental existential-ontological preparation for a Christology. For example, there is also the question of a personal relationship to Jesus. Here we have to be much more honest. Is it really so obvious that we can have an interest in Jesus of Nazareth not only as a great historical [237] personality like Thutmosis, Napoleon, or Goethe but also that he can have something essentially to do with me? He can, but I find that this fact is by no means obvious. By the fact that he died and really rose again has he not disappeared into God's enormous darkness only so that I more or less can have virtually nothing more to do with him? How can the exegetes make it clear to me that there is something in his life to be laid hold on which is really concrete and cannot be derived from any other source and which can be normative for me?

In regard to Hans Küng's book On Being a Christian, Eugen Biser only recently raised the legitimate question whether, despite all the beautiful and wonderful things that Küng says about Jesus, at the end the only thing one really knows about Jesus is that he is the one who is "totally different from all others." That is obviously not enough. It is too abstract. The question remains how Jesus, who is a concrete reality, can be a norm for me, not as a universally valid reality but in his historically concrete reality.

No doubt there are many young people today who are carried along by an enthusiastic wave of "Jesus-ism." (I do not mean this sarcastically; I respect them.) They are enthusiastic because they feel that Jesus puts himself more on the side of the underprivileged and the poor than of the rich. But how do I really know that this is just right, that it has to be this way? Or how do I know that this is right not only for Jesus himself, but that it might also be a norm for me? These are questions that have to do with the personal relationship of Jesus to me and I feel that the concrete implications of these questions and the basic conceptual terminology for dealing with them have not even begun to emerge in any really clear form. In Christian spirituality things like these are simply taken for granted and put into practice, but theologians as theologians have not really reflected on them, with a few exceptions here and there, as, for example, Bérulle, a representative of the French school of spirituality in the seventeenth century

THEOLOGY AND FAITH

What I set out to say is really quite simple.

First, traditional, classical Christology still has a normative significance.

[238] Second, an ignorant and superficial parroting of these traditional christological formulations, coupled with the perhaps highly questionable feeling of having understood what they mean, does no service to the Church, to the faith, or to Christianity.

Third, there are in fact other ways of formulating the same Christology. This difference in formulation will perforce cause the object being treated to emerge in a somewhat different light.

Fourth, in traditional Catholic Christology there should be a closer unity between Christology and soteriology because statements of function and statements of essence condition and imply one another, and it is absolutely impossible to conceive them apart from

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this reciprocal interaction.

Fifth, a much clearer Christology of ascent[2] could be developed and a transcendental Christology as well because if I were not in reality already a crypto-Christian thanks to the grace of God I receive from the Spirit of Jesus, I could not make any sense of what is being said about this Jesus as the Christ.

[2] For a further development of this subject, see Karl Rahner, "Approaches to Theological Thinking," in Karl Rahner in Dialogue: Conversations and Interviews, 1965-1982, edited by Paul Imhof and Hubert Biallowons, translation edited by Harvey D. Egan (New York: Crossroad, 1986), pp. 123-33.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[239]

18

THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING OF REDEMPTION

If I am to present something here about the Christian idea of redemption, I must preface it with the remark that I can suggest no more than a few fragmentary notions chosen at random. My observations will not go beyond the framework of those propositions that Catholic dogmatic theologians as such have at their disposal.

REDEMPTION TAKES PLACE IN THE REALIZATION OF FREEDOM

In the Christian view redemption understood as the final salvation of humankind (and of the world in its totality) is bound up with human freedom as an event that takes place in the very exercise of this freedom. Freedom in this sense is of course not to be understood as the ability to make ever new individual choices at one's own discretion, but in the sense of a unique human self-realization (even though this is spread out over a period of time) which tends toward ultimate validity.

Catholic theology of course contains tortuous and abstruse discussions dealing with possibilities and ways of salvation for those who have died before reaching the use of reason. This problem is especially difficult for Christian theology because it rejects the transmigration of souls and insists that redemption must take place in a unique life here in time and space. It finds it very hard to conceive that a (probably rather small) number of the redeemed achieve [240] salvation by exercising their freedom, while the rest (probably the majority) receive their perfection in consequence of a sheer gift of God. Furthermore, it finds it difficult to conceive that a history of freedom can take place in the brief span of existence allotted to someone who dies before reaching the use of reason. The argument that the gratuitous character of God-given redemption manifests itself in an especially clear light in the case of those who attain salvation without the use of reason is a fallacy, because grace and freedom do not rule one another out, since freedom, a God-given capability and act, must itself be looked upon as grace.

In my opinion we do not know what to say about this problem. Actual revelation is silent on the matter. Theological reflection of necessity always peters out in dead ends. There is really no need for us to rack our brains about marginal problems of this sort, and certainly not here, since in my humble opinion we can leave it an open question whether it is really true, as is traditionally believed, that the Fifth Lateran Council's article of faith upholding the immortality of the soul can be construed as necessarily valid also in respect to spiritual persons who have never undergone a history of freedom.

In any case, in respect to ordinary human beings Christian faith does not view redemption as something that just happens to them as a result of an act of God which has nothing to do with their freedom. Redemption is the ultimate validity of this free human act itself, however much this act is first and foremost God's action in the human being. For this very act of freedom, in the conditions which make it possible, in its nature which is radicalized by God in grace toward immediacy to him and even in its very exercise as an act which is in fact good, is something freely determined by God himself in which he in his love communicates himself. This statement, reduced here to bare essentials, is actually obvious for a Christian theology that thinks to some degree on a metaphysical level and that is capable of grasping the relationship between God and creatures.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But it follows directly from this that there is no real and genuine opposition between redemption that comes "from outside" and what is known as self-redemption, since in a Christian understanding of God it is clear from the outset that the "self" is established by God himself, who is, to be sure, someone other than the self, yet not a "stranger" to the self, because we, in our own selves, cannot be conceived apart from him and his freedom. Both in Catholic apologetics [241] and in an anti-Christian view of redemption these two concepts are frequently used. But this either-or alternative is wrong from the very beginning.

For a Catholic doctrine of grace, as opposed to many popular notions, God is not just the partner who stands opposite a human being in such a way that as a result of an odd synergism and reciprocal influence something or other happens that goes by the name of human redemption. God is, rather, the one who creates human beings as well as their freedom, both as possibility and as concrete realization despite all the genuine freedom human beings have and despite the relationship which this implies and which can be viewed as one of partnership. And it is this God who by his free and absolute act of grace makes it possible for human beings to redeem themselves, so to speak. The compatibility of this assertion of the interaction of redemption from outside and self-redemption, both properly understood, with the Christian dogma of redemption by Christ will have to be discussed later.

However, if we take seriously the doctrine of the infused virtues as God-given capabilities of a self-transcendence oriented to immediacy with God and the doctrine that we can perform an act of genuine freedom as a result of God's liberating grace; if we understand that according to Christian teaching redemption in the sense of ultimate salvation is impossible without faith, hope, and love, and that this redemption in its ultimate phase is nothing other than the perfection of faith, hope, and love, then it is simply wrong to maintain that self-redemption and redemption from outside are two things that are mutually exclusive. When these two notions are placed in antagonism to each other, they imply an unmetaphysical and properly speaking even an unchristian understanding of the relationship between God and humankind, because the truth is that human beings are creatures whose own existence and freedom are established by God's creative and grace-bestowing power. Hence what we call redemption is not something that happens without their collaboration.

To be sure, this authentic Christian understanding also implies that this redemption does not redeem human beings from themselves but unto themselves, whereby being positively redeemed unto themselves means that they come to God himself in ecstatic love. If one were to say that human beings are those creatures who realize their absolute transcendence in faith, hope, and love in an act of their own [242] freedom and in this way redeem themselves, this statement would be unobjectionable from a Christian point of view. One would only have to expand the statement by adding that this human self-interpretation understood and realized in this way is for its part (explicitly or implicitly) based on human beings' freely accepted knowledge that they are established by the absolute God, that is, that it is realized as a gift of this God through creation and grace.

REDEMPTION IMPLIES THE SALVATION OF HUMAN BEINGS IN ALL THEIR DIMENSIONS

Redemption in the Christian sense means the salvation of human beings in all their dimensions. Human beings are redeemed in the concrete reality of their existence and this includes what we call their bodily nature and their history. They are not redeemed from these realities, but rather they come to the perfection of these realities themselves, a perfection which transforms them.

Let us elucidate this brief statement which implies the doctrine of the resurrection of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dead, of the meaning that history itself has for salvation, of the eschatological orientation of history, and of the coming of God's kingdom, by determining the relationship between history and transcendence.

Theories dealing with the possibility of redemption in the history of the human race could be divided conveniently into two groups. There are the theories which view redemption as purely a matter of human transcendentality alone or of the transcendentality of history alone, or there are the theories which reject this alternative and see redemption as taking place in the total history in which the history of this transcendentality takes place. Where redemption is seen as an exit from concrete history into an other-worldly transcendentality of nameless silence or as a future in a (secular) history within which the perfection of history is attained as the actual outcome of this history alone, we have conceptions of redemption that imply an either-or alternative between transcendence and history. In a really Christian idea of redemption, however, history is always a history of that human freedom which is absolutely oriented to God in absolute transcendentality; vice versa, transcendentality is truly realized and [243] has a salvific effect for humankind only when it is realized in the concrete reality of history.

For Christianity there is no transcendence in a mystical a historical reality alone existing alongside ordinary human historical reality, in an esoteric mysticism alone. Human transcendentality occurs in concrete historical reality, and an essential part of this reality, but not the only one, is necessarily renunciation and death. But free human transcendentality occurs in the total height and breadth of historical human existence, so that here in the widest variety of forms which go to make up this historical reality redemption can take place. Therefore the Christian theology of redemption does not make a distinction on the one hand between a sort of purely spiritual-subjective, transcendental agent as subject of salvation and a historically concrete bodily nature and incarnate historical reality on the other, which would only be cast aside when salvation occurs, but rather salvation is proper to both, and this of course is the reason why the redemption of the body and the ultimate validity of history are themselves intrinsic elements of Christian redemption. With the church fathers one might not only say, "What is assumed [by God], is redeemed," but also "Everything is assumed and thereby everything is redeemed without having to perish."

For this very reason redemption understood in the Christian sense is most radically excluded from any human possibility of recognizing it or producing it, precisely because for human beings reality taken as a whole has and can have no particular place from which this totality could be adequately determined. When Christianity undertakes criticism of the ideology of other conceptions of redemption, to the extent that they really are not Christian, this is where it would have to begin; in other words, it would have to show that another conception of redemption pretends to know too much of redemption because it does not extend to the redemption of all reality.

REDEMPTION OCCURS IN GOD'S DEFINITIVE COMMUNICATION OF HIMSELF

In the Christian view redemption takes place only when God definitively communicates himself as himself because the Catholic [244] doctrine of grace and creation views the finite as being really capax infiniti. What this means is that the finite cannot really reach its completion unless it has been determined by the infinite, incomprehensible God as God, and that once this determination has been given it will not disintegrate and vanish more or less of its own accord.

Here we touch upon the most radical problem that Christian ontology faces, the coexistence of the absolute God's plenitude of being and finite, subjective being. For

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christians the truth of redemption does not consist in the disappearance of the finite in itself alongside of the infinite God who would then be seen as nothing more than the extrinsic cause of this perfection, located outside of the perfection itself, and the one who guarantees it. This infinite plenitude of being is, rather, itself the perfection of the finite. It does not bring about the perfection, but rather it is itself the perfection.

That there can be this kind of relationship between the absolute and the dependent, between the infinite and the finite; that the nameless infinite can be the perfection of the manifold finite; that the arrival of the infinite means the life of the finite and not its dissolution, is Christianity's fundamental metaphysical conviction, a conviction that can be really sustained in human existence only if it is borne by God's grace, that is, by God's own self-communication. But the opposite is also true. Any view which fundamentally does not explicitly or implicitly conceive of ultimate human satisfaction, happiness or fulfillment as the absoluteness of the triune God, would not do justice to the idea of Christian redemption, but it would be rather what one might call the blissful form of human damnation, and nothing other than that. The fact that God calls human beings to be redeemed in this way and makes them capable of it is what comprises the ultimate dignity of human existence and the extremely excessive demand that is placed upon it.

REDEMPTION PRECEDES SINFULNESS

The human need of redemption should not be conceived first and foremost, purely and inherently, as the need of human beings to have their own sinfulness removed. The human need of redemption precedes human sinfulness which is of course an actual fact. To experience [245] and understand Christianity's ultimate essence more is necessary than human sinfulness and deliverance from guilt. It may be (I would not care to make any judgment here) that this is a specifically Catholic thesis that distinguishes the Catholic doctrine of grace and redemption from that of the Reformation. In any case, this thesis is only another way Catholic doctrine has of saying that given the distinction between nature and grace real salvation, even prior to personal human guilt and also to what is known as original sin, is an event of free divine love to which human beings have no claim on the basis of their nature. In other words, salvation is grace.

No Catholic doctrine of grace can do away with the distinction between nature and grace even prior to sin. And so grace and remission of guilt are not simply identical. This does not deny the fact that in post-Tridentine theology (with some elements already present in the Middle Ages) the distinction between nature and grace was often naively conceived in too static a way and so it looked as if the concept of "pure nature," which is a marginal concept, permitted us to conceive positively a world and a human race capable of coming to perfection in themselves, alongside of God and without grace. The distinction between nature and grace need not remove the paradox that individual human beings can only reach beatitude in a love of God which, despite its "necessity" for them, they must accept as the free love of God to which they have no inherent claim.

Human beings even prior to their sinfulness, to their explicit contradiction of God by their own free acts, are already the ones who can find their perfection only through an absolutely gratuitous self-communication of God which originates from God's free love. This much may in any case be said, whatever the situation may be in respect to all these troublesome questions, if one prescinds from the ultimately mere terminological question of whether one chooses to call the need of a perfection by God in grace prior to guilt a need of redemption, or whether one chooses to use the term need of redemption only in reference to the necessity of the removal of an actual state of sin, of an explicit contradiction between God and human freedom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

That in addition human beings are in the most diverse ways also the ones who as sinners need God's forgiveness and in this sense need redemption is quite another, and obviously (if not in the same sense) also a fundamental matter, even though this need of redemption [246] need not be presented in Catholic theology with the same emotional vehemence as was the case from Augustine right up to the times when people really had a deep-seated Reformation mentality and perceived forgiveness of hellish guilt as the absolute leitmotif of Christianity.

If someone in a kind of naive innocence should think that he or she is actually living without reservation in a loving union with God and that it is rather God than humankind that needs to be justified in view of all the absurd darkness in the world, that what is called guilt and sin should be interpreted rather as a phenomenon of friction in the world and an unavoidable detour necessitated by a development in a world that is still in the process of becoming, this mentality need not be rejected out of hand by Catholic theology as unchristian. Instead this theology would have to interpret such a blithe and naively innocent soul as this as a person whose hellish possibilities have been overcome from the outset and who has already been placed in this state of harmless innocence.

However, if people of this sort want to interpret the world on Christian terms and understand what redemption means, they have no choice but to interpret their buoyant disposition as a gift of God's grace, and they must not deny a capacity for redemption to those people who through the actions of their lives find themselves in an infernal void, in despair and far distant from God.

This interpretation of existence, blithe, unencumbered, free of anxiety, can rightly be understood as a reflection of or an analogy to what Catholic theology teaches about the sinlessness of the Blessed Virgin Mary from the beginning of her existence. That the need of redemption can be present as sin which an individual actually commits or merely as original sin, which is something different from personal guilt, or in the form of a gratuitous preservation from actual guilt or even in the form of a coexistence of these other forms that can be reflexively differentiated is something that can be expected from the outset in Catholic theology when the human need of redemption is properly understood.

On the one hand, I am quite convinced that the innocuousness of people today who no longer take sin and thus the need of redemption seriously, and who instead reproach God when sin appears in the world or see it as a reason for despairing of their existence, is an attempt to minimize the depth and perilousness of human existence. [247] We as Christians cannot simply regard this as something that is a matter of course because it can just as well be an indication of how corrosively guilt can seep into the ultimate root of human existence. But on the other hand, I also believe that there is a real history of faith, and thus alternating phases in the consciousness of faith, in which one or the other aspect of the totality of Christian existence can be more or even less present in the center of the actual consciousness of Christians. I believe that this shift of emphasis can for its part be itself something that God wills also as a part of human historical reality.

Consequently, one phase cannot be summarily condemned by appealing to an earlier phase on the grounds that it is different from the earlier phase. The uncontestable fact that the Christian penitential sermon today has less to say about hell, less than in earlier times even in papal proclamation, certainly ought not to be hailed unreservedly in a naive belief in progress as a praiseworthy step forward. But at the same time it should not necessarily be deplored as symptomatic of a decadence of authentic Christianity. The Christian idea of redemption has a history behind it and it will continue to have a history. There is room for this in Catholic theology's traditional conception of redemption, because redemption and redemption from actual guilt are not identical concepts.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

REDEMPTION ORIGINATES FROM JESUS CHRIST

We must now turn to the question of the origin of redemption from Jesus Christ, his history, his cross and his resurrection. For Christians the redemption of the human race means redemption through Jesus Christ, through his death and resurrection. For Christians there can be no doubting this. This is a central truth of their faith. However, it is not easy to say exactly what this statement means and also what it does not mean. As in the case of all Christian dogmas it is possible that in the actual understanding of faith, at least on the part of average Christians and even of theologians and of those officially entrusted with proclaiming the faith, this dogma of redemption is in fact bound up with opinions which are really transitory.

The fundamental question regarding the origin of redemption from Jesus Christ as a historical event is the question of how redemption [248] as God's self-communication can depend on this historical event and how it can be conceived as dependent on it, when we are faced with the obvious fact that this historical event of Jesus Christ is itself the result and the historical manifestation of a salvific and redemptive will of God that has always existed and therefore which is both cause of this event of the cross itself as well as the effect which flows from it.

Before treating this fundamental problem of redemption through Jesus Christ in greater detail, I would like to apply our first thesis to our question in the following way. Redemption by Jesus Christ does not negate human self-redemption; on the contrary, it constitutes it. The (explicit or implicit) denial of this statement can presumably be attributed to a false understanding of the thoroughly valid statement that the human race is redeemed by the "vicarious" suffering of Jesus. This misapprehension of how the human race is vicariously represented by Christ presumes tacitly that Jesus, taking the place of others, has done something that is absolutely necessary to redeem the human race from sin, something that human beings themselves cannot do, but that Christ can do.

For the moment let us prescind from the problem of how the origin of the unmerited grace of divinization prior to sin as distinct from the remission of guilt can be fit into this – mostly subliminal – conception of vicarious representation. It would certainly not be easy to synthesize the two. Let us also prescind from the question of how in seriousness Christ acting merely as representative of humankind has had to do what humankind cannot in principle do for itself and which therefore cannot really be demanded of it. (That humankind is not able to do what it is nevertheless obliged to do is something that is at least presumed in the theory of vicarious representation as contained in the theory of satisfaction.)

A conception of vicarious redemption in which Jesus does for me, what I actually ought to do myself but am not capable of doing, and which will then be "credited" to me is a conception that I consider to be wrong or at least a misleading formulation of the dogmatic truth that my redemption is dependent on Jesus and his cross. After all, it is precisely through Jesus that it is possible that I myself, by the power of God's self-communication, am really able to aspire to God, to have faith and hope in him and to love him; in other words, that I can really perform the highest act that can be expected of a human [249] being given the highest possible requirements. Through Jesus my own freedom itself contains the possibility of redemption, liberation, and sanctification the like of which cannot be conceived in a higher, more tremendous or more radical way. In view of this undeniable origin of redemption from Christ, one can clearly see that this cause of redemption (in what sense the cross can be the cause of redemption must be explained more clearly) is a result of God's redeeming love.

Wherever we find primarily the idea of an angry God who, as it were, has to be conciliated by great effort on the part of Jesus, we have an ultimately unchristian, popular notion of redemption that is incorrect. This by no means denies that the holy God rejects sin absolutely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and in that sense is "angry" with the sinner. But this rejection always coexists in God with his desire to forgive and to overcome human sin. The cross, the reality of Christ, his love, his faith, his hope, his surrender to God's incomprehensibility are, however, the result of a redeeming love of God which itself has no cause outside of itself. God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, and it was not because the Son gave himself that an angry God with great effort changed his mind about the world.

One need have no reservations in using the formulation of Scotus which says that God would never have permitted sin in the world if he had not loved the world in so radical a way, that sin, without becoming meaningless, would always be overcome by the fact that God willed Jesus Christ crucified and risen. Certainly God's freedom can assume other positions toward the world and one is free to discuss them. But in the practical and concrete order Christians can say that if God had not willed this Jesus of Nazareth with his absolute solidarity both with sinners and with God, he never would have permitted the horror of this sinful world.

At this point the question naturally arises whether this redemptive will of God of its own accord so restricted itself that its mercy leaves behind for all eternity a rubbish heap of history, so to speak, a kind of hell. With Pope John Paul II one can say that while God's mercy is of itself unlimited, it comes up against boundaries when confronted by human freedom. In a certain sense this is correct. However, this may not be understood to assert that God's mercy, should it choose to do so, is not able to remove the guilt of human freedom without overcoming this guilt. Consequently, the final question whether one [250] might possibly be damned and in the end remain unredeemed is a question the answer to which is dependent on God's sovereign disposition. At this point theoretical statements have to stop. Christians, however, are not forbidden to hope for universal redemption.

We must now finally formulate more clearly the specific character of the redemptive causality of Christ's cross. If this cross is the result and not the morally efficient cause of God's redeeming love, then I think some light can be shed on the problem by drawing on a concept of Catholic sacramental theology which is used to elucidate the specific character of sacramental causality.

Let me put it this way. The cross is the signum efficax, the efficacious sign of the redeeming love that communicates God himself because the cross establishes God's love in the world in a definitive and historically irreversible way. I think that today this concept may be validly transferred to soteriology in view of the fact that the concept of sacrament as found in the statement, "The Church is the sacramentum universale salutis mundi, the universal sacrament of the world's salvation," already implies a transfer of this kind, which from the standpoint of the history of dogma is really the return of a concept to its original place of origin. In the concept signum efficax sign and cause condition one another reciprocally. This is what one must give heed to in this concept: cause, because it is an efficacious sign, because it is a real symbol with exhibitive character; sign, because it is caused by what is signified. (Instead of signum efficax, we can just as well use the concept real symbol, which might perhaps be more intelligible to many people: the symbol by the establishment of which the thing symbolized establishes itself and is itself present in the symbol.)

Furthermore, we must make a distinction, as has already been done in the Letter to the Ephesians, between a salvific will hidden in God and a salvific will which, coming forth from its concealment in God, manifests itself to the world, realizes itself in this way, and thereby also makes itself into something that cannot be taken back, a historical definitiveness which, given the assumption that there is a "hypostatic union" between God himself and the manifestation of his will in the world, really makes this manifestation something that really cannot be taken back, something that is irreversible and really eschatological.

Given these presuppositions the cross of Christ can really be seen [251] as the efficacious

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sign of God's salvific will in the world. The cross has a real causality, not in the sense that it causes God's salvific will, which itself establishes the cross as its cause, but precisely because the cross is the result of God's salvific will, and yet the cross makes this will irreversible through its historical appearance in the world in a historically tangible way. To be ontologically precise, this causality belongs primarily more to the category of formal and material causes, but transient efficient causes cannot otherwise be deduced from them.

What transpires in the event of the cross may be compared to what transpires in the process of human freedom. In certain circumstances this freedom reveals its own original decision precisely through a material fact. This material fact is different from the freedom because the freedom is more original. The factual manifestation reveals the original free decision, but then it also makes the decision irreversible. So in this sense the free decision can be said to be caused by its factual manifestation.

This notion presents no insuperable difficulty if we consider the doctrine of the hypostatic union. Because of the hypostatic union Jesus' suffering and death in the incarnation are an intrinsic element of God's salvific will. This will reveals itself in this suffering and death and it makes itself definitive by manifesting itself in this objective way. In Jesus Christ God is performing his own act, the act of turning to the world in an irrevocable way. However, one should in passing take note of the fact that this revelation of God's turning to the world in the cross, the cross being the real symbol (which is also a way of expressing it) of God's definitive and victorious love for the world, also implies in Jesus' obedience unto death the human acceptance of this offer on the part of the world.

Consequently, if one considers the Son of Man as an intrinsic element of the actual world to be part of the world itself – and this is unavoidable if one takes Jesus' incarnation and his solidarity with the human race seriously – actually one could also speak of a self-redemption of the world (a self-redemption that is of course a gift of God in every respect) which experiences its arrival with God himself as the absolute culmination of its own history.

In suggesting this theory of what is meant by the origin of redemption from Jesus Christ we do not mean to assert that all the other aspects of redemption and all the elements that the Christian tradition [252] of faith gives us to explain the redemption more precisely should be eliminated or ignored. But I feel that all of these elements, to the extent that they are really a norm of faith, can be derived from this starting point, and that from this same point misleading interpretations of the redemption, which as a matter of fact do exist – one need only think, for example, of the theory of Jesus' being punished in our stead – can be subjected to a critical analysis and be brought back in line with what belief in redemption really means. We cannot give a detailed analysis of this here.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY

There is a legitimate history of change, and one that is by no means closed, in the way we consider the need of redemption and redemption itself, a change that does not simply deny or ignore any of the aspects which have come up in the actual history of faith. But this development does have as its effect that, in the existentiell history of the realization of these aspects and in the theoretical reflection on them, now one, now another comes into clearer focus. This has always been true in the previous history of Christian belief in redemption, and there is no reason for thinking that this history has now come to its conclusion in a dogmatic theology that is just going to remain static forever.

It is even possible for us to name such possible aspects of a future theology of redemption. For example, a Christology elaborated in the framework of an evolutionary world view could certainly work out aspects of soteriology which up to now have not been given much attention. A theology of the redemption of the body would certainly have a lot more to say than traditional textbook theology. A soteriology worked out in conjunction with the cosmic significance of the Christ-event would presumably bring out some elements of soteriology which up to now have been overlooked. A soteriology of this kind would naturally have to be reconciled with the notions of the entire cosmos that we necessarily have today, and which differ in the extreme from the ancient conception of the world which formed the framework for earlier soteriology. In the continuing history of soteriology it is quite conceivable that on the basis of other religions aspects of redemption will be seen better and more clearly in a [253] soteriology which Christianity does not actually take from outside of itself but only in its own more profound reflection discovers in itself, as a result of a catalytic encounter with other religions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

AGAINST AN ABRIDGEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE OF REDEMPTION

First, let me formulate my reservation in this way. It seems to me that Christian theology in its eschatological statements is frequently not sufficiently aware of the abstract and formal character of the concepts it uses. To put it another way: in eschatological soteriology the huge distance between what is really meant and the requisite metaphorical notions and concepts is not perceived clearly enough. One fails to notice what gaps these concepts leave open, gaps that could be closed in a great many different ways without thereby denying binding elements of dogma.

It is altogether possible that the basically legitimate “demythologization” of the concepts used in soteriology and eschatology (hell as a place, notions of heaven based on terrestrial realities, the sufferings of purgatory) overlooks the fact that through this demythologization the actual matter itself is not simply presented in its pure form, but rather accretions, amalgamations, and so on, are removed without being replaced by a new and better statement more appropriate to the matter in question. This creates lacunae in our knowledge which simply go unnoticed. For example, if one conceives final redemption only as the product of a little bit of plain old-fashioned morality, only as the result of a formally and juridically conceived remission of sins and an arrival at the beatific vision, ignoring the radical changes involved in this that a human being must undergo, then this kind of demythologization is not very illuminating.

One can certainly emphasize our inability to speak about eschatological perfection except in very abstract and formal terms since we are talking about the goal of our transcendence and hope, something that cannot be expressed in words since it becomes lost in the mystery of God (and in respect to the real nature of beatitude this may be quite justifiable). But that is no reason for being sure that this says everything that can be said about the realities which are ontologically [254] (not necessarily temporally) antecedent to this final nature of the perfection of redemption, but which are still a part of this perfection. And because they are realities of this kind, they need not be subject to the verdict of a “more exact” statement about the most essential nature of the eschaton.

Christian and non-Christian statements about events after death, journeys of the soul, gradual purgation after death, cannot as a rule be considered as binding doctrine in the strict sense. But does this necessarily mean that they are wrong, that they are devoid of any meaningful content? Or is it possible that they might serve to bridge the gaps left by the abstract eschatological statements? Do we Christian dogmatic theologians have to claim that we know everything about the nature of perfection and its process or development, about the process of perfection even after death? Might it not be possible to interpret our current formal and abstract teaching on “purgatory” by supplementing it with ideas and statements which would be quite acceptable to us even today and which could be found (at least more clearly) in other religions? Notions such as these need not lay claim to possessing the qualitative character of redemption in the strict sense. But there is also no dogma that says we can know absolutely nothing about the human "other-worldly" realities that (ontologically) precede the actual perfection of redemption. An anthropology of the process of maturity leading to perfection can presumably say a great deal more than what is usually said by a highly formalized and moralistically honed soteriology. This topic cannot be elaborated here at great length. But I felt that a warning was called for against abridging the doctrine of redemption.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[255]

19

RECONCILIATION AND VICARIOUS REPRESENTATION

Without doubt, one of the central ideas of Christian teaching is the idea of reconciliation. Saint Paul uses the word katallagē (from the verb katallassō). Even though this word actually means reconciliation of the world with God, it is worthy of note that the New Testament uses the word diallassō to express the reconciliation of human beings with one another. This fact prompts us to reflect on the relationship between our reconciliation with God and our reconciliation with one another, particularly because the New Testament sees a connection between forgiveness by God and forgiveness among one another. "For if you forgive people their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you" (Mt. 6:14).

MINIMIZING OR EXAGGERATING THE IDEA OF SIN

When using the term reconciliation, the New Testament proceeds on the assumption that the world and the individuals in it find themselves in a situation of sin, spiritual peril, discord, and enmity, a situation that determines radically human beings' relationship to God and to one another. We must pause already at this sentence.

For us whose ears are accustomed to religious phrases the Church's teaching about a situation of spiritual peril as a presupposition of reconciliation and redemption seems perfectly obvious. But it is not obvious. We need not even look beyond our own cultural [256] sphere to awaken to the fact that Christianity's teaching about a situation of spiritual peril is being profoundly threatened. In my opinion the threat is coming principally from two opposite directions. On the one hand, the universal peril that sin implies is not being grasped in its full import. What we Christians call sin,[1] real evil in the world, is not evil but only "What is known as evil."[2] It is a manifestation of unavoidable friction in the process of evolution, depending only on conditions prevalent in society which can be restructured in such a way that this evil will once and for, all vanish from the world, from society and from the life of the individual. In depth psychology sin is dissipated as though it were nothing more than an anxiety dream. Society can form and train people in such a way as to produce pure harmony both in the individual and on the social level, even though it might still take a little while until this universal pacification is achieved. And if all that does not suffice we are told that good and evil, day and night are equally parts of the basic and obvious elements of reality which condition one another reciprocally. This being the case, one can and must make one's final peace with evil; one must live with one's "shadow."[3] Evil is just as necessary as good to bring reality to its perfection, and if we are wise, we will not let it provoke any short-sighted protests.

Evil is rendered innocuous. It is no longer affected by the radical protest of the holy God to whom we ascribe no evil, separated from it as he is by an infinite distance, and who says an inexorable no to this evil of real guilt incurred by creaturely freedom – even though we

[1] See A. Görres and K. Rahner, Das Böse: Wege zu seiner Bewältigung in Psychotherapie und Christentum (Freiburg/Breisgau, 1982).
[2] See K. Lorenz, Das sogennante Böse: Zur Naturgeschichte der Aggression, 25th ptg. (Vienna, 1970).
[3] See C. G. Jung, esp. Mysterium Coniunctionis: An Inquiry into the Separation and Synthesis of Psychic Opposites in Alchemy, Collected Works XIV, translated by R. F. C. Hull, 2nd ed. (Princeton University Press, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

cannot understand how God nevertheless could will misery, pain, and death to his creatures and permit the real evil of guilt freely incurred to enter a world which has been created by him and for all of whose reality he must bear the responsibility. In the mental climate of today the radical nature of the Christian idea of sin is not being grasped in its full import. But the Christian idea of sin is so radical that the holy and all-merciful God's response to it, wherever [257] and whenever it is not extirpated, must be condemnation to that eternal loss which is hell. And this remains true and retains its radical existentiell significance even if we have the right to hope – but not the certainty of a theoretical assertion – that God will have mercy on all.

But there is also a second, fundamental heresy that contradicts the Christian idea of sin. The free decision within history is so absolute that this decision, if really made in radical freedom, is irrevocable and no one can reverse it. Here freedom is conceived to be so autonomous that it is no longer encompassed by the greater power and freedom of God, and so the culpable decision of a human being is inherently so irreversible that this evil decision can neither be forgiven by God, nor does freedom ever forgive itself its evil decision. According to this view evil is something absolute. Human beings are not even permitted to have the desire of having their abysmal guilt forgiven. This guilt would not really be the radical act of freedom – so the argument goes – unless it were understood as radically definitive and irreversible.

THE HOPELESSNESS OF GUILT

Between these two extremes which form, as it were, two sides of a single coin, stands the Christian teaching of the guilt of human freedom and its capability of being forgiven by God alone. In order to understand what reconciliation is, we must, before speaking about the forgiveness of guilt by God, deal more explicitly with the question why human guilt cannot be overcome by human beings alone.

The Dialogical Structure of Becoming Guilty

The inability of human beings alone to overcome real guilt must not be understood according to the model prevalent in civil law where one person commits an offense against another person and remains liable for this even though the perpetrator regrets the offense and wishes it had never happened. In this inadequate model it would not make any difference whether the offense in question caused material damage to the other person or whether it was detrimental to [258] the personal dignity of the other. In any event the "civil law" model is inadequate for an understanding of why human beings are incapable of overcoming guilt incurred before God.

To understand why guilt cannot be overcome we must take into account that a turning back to God, a free repudiation of one's previous decision, being solely a human act as such, still does not mean that guilt is overcome. The inherent hopelessness of guilt is a character of guilt that is obscure and can be explained only with difficulty. The very acceptance of the experience of this hopelessness, our desire to repress which is itself a part of the mystery of guilt, is already a kind of beginning of conversion.

The primary reason for the hopeless insuperability of guilt (as far as one can attempt to give a more precise explanation of this at all) lies in the peculiar dialogical character of human existence in its orientation to God. If this relationship is a free history – free on both sides, therefore on God's side as well – this kind of positive relationship between God and human beings is not reestablished simply by guilty human beings' attempting to revoke their no to God. God's free action is so integral to this salvific love between God and human beings that human beings must interpret even their own love for God, their freedom notwithstanding, as a gift of God's free love for them. God's personal disclosure and communication of himself in his love for human beings is, however, both in itself and as the possibility of our love for him, God's freedom, and it always remains this, regardless of whether one chooses to interpret this love bestowed on the repenting sinner as the abiding presence of this unmerited love or as a new bestowal of this love on God's part.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Ultimate Validity of Free Human Decision

To gain an understanding of the inherent hopelessness of guilt, some further elements must be explained. Human freedom must not be understood as the ability to make a choice that always remains open, that can be continually revised and therefore as something that veers off into a void. In spite of its temporal historical character, freedom is inherently the will toward ultimate validity. Only on this basis is it possible to comprehend why a brief temporal human history ending with a person's death can understandably result in [259] salvation or eternal loss. One cannot imagine God as the one who in an arbitrary act extrinsic to it stops this history of freedom which of itself would choose to continue, and nonetheless responds to it with a judgment that is eternally valid. And Christianity does not allow for a "transmigration of souls" that goes on indefinitely.

In this light the real nature of the experience becomes intelligible whereby human beings, even though they exist in a continuous flow of history have the feeling that past events in their history of freedom are not over and done with. Human beings do not experience the past as something that is overcome simply because their present intentions and actions are in contradiction to their past decisions. If people perceive their previous free actions as abiding and irrevocable, if forgetting their actions or repudiating them is experienced as something that is powerless over against the "eternal" element that has occurred in their previous free actions, they do not attach an excessive importance to their previous history. Rather, they experience the real and mysterious nature of their freedom. And if they nonetheless have hope in the possibility that the mysterious "eternity" of their guilt will be overcome, even though a possibility of this kind cannot be discovered in the realm of mere human experience, this kind of hope is an appeal precisely to that mystery which encompasses all human freedom together with its "eternity," the mystery that we call God. If they hope for the forgiveness of their guilt, although they have, for example, the experience that they are and will for all eternity remain persons who have betrayed their love and fidelity and that this stigma of infidelity does not point to what once was and is now over and done with, but identifies them for what they now are, then the basis of this hope is what we Christians call grace and what human beings experience as something that utterly transcends their own freedom.

Is it not almost necessary to say that people have not understood anything about God until they believe and hope that there is one who contrary to all personal experience of freedom is able to overcome the eternity of the evil deed, whereby, as has already been said, this eternity must not be reduced to the idea that what is done can of course not be undone, but that there is really no reason to get upset about this since the past, even though it cannot be undone, is something that is of itself past – as is the case with anything that is temporal and transitory.

[260] One can, if one chooses to do so, render the mystery of the eternity of a deed freely done more intelligible by distinguishing between a transient action and its permanent consequences. But then again, the understanding gained in this way obscures precisely the mystery of the freely done deed the eternity of which knows only one who is alone more powerful: God, whose love really overcomes the guilt itself, a love whose incomprehensibility as manifested in this forgiveness is part of the incomprehensibility of God as he is in himself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD'S FORGIVENESS

In respect to this kind of guilt which affects God himself, which should neither be minimized nor simply absolutized, which human beings alone cannot overcome – although they hope in the possibility of its being overcome and thus they hope in God – Christian doctrine says that God is always ready and willing to overcome it, to forgive it, to be reconciled with humankind and to reconcile humankind to himself. The past is ultimately not an empty room of what once was but is no more, but the room filled with what has been irrevocably done in freedom. Christians believe that God penetrates this room, makes it "empty" and reconciles human beings not only with God himself but also with their own past. If human beings were really to understand their freedom and their guilty actions, they would have to admit that they cannot grant eternal pardon to themselves for these deeds, that they would annihilate themselves if they were to attempt by their own power to separate their free actions from themselves.

However, God bids them to have this hope of reconciliation and forgiveness; he lets them disown themselves without thereby obliterating themselves. We are really allowed to forget our guilt, even though we do not understand how it is possible for us to forget and how it is that our guilt does not eternally remain before us. The incomprehensibility of this ability to forget is ultimately identical with God's forgiving love. We have not accepted this love until we have the confidence in its capability of really overcoming by its own power the eternity of our guilt and of letting it be forgotten.

God's love which forgives and reconciles is really incomprehensible. We are certainly permitted to say that God has allowed guilt to [261] enter this world only because this world from the beginning and irrevocably is already encompassed by this forgiving and reconciling love. From the beginning God has made himself the world's innermost heart in such a way that the freely incurred guilt of humankind pierces God's heart, and even in the face of this thrust his heart is merciful, forgiving and reconciling love. For love would then turn into the judgment of damnation only if a person were to reject it in a final act of freedom.

Reconciliation through Jesus Christ

Christians know full well that God's forgiving and reconciling love that encompasses all guilt has entered the world in such a way that it can never be revoked. This love has revealed itself in the cross of Jesus Christ who has become our reconciliation. Through Jesus' unconditional solidarity with all sinful human beings, as well as in his unconditional love for the Father, God's forgiving love has reached its historically visible culmination in Jesus' death on the cross, because this love has become irrevocable and has found its acceptance in a human being who was conscious of and who willed his absolute solidarity with all human beings. This is why God has reconciled the world to himself in Jesus the crucified. God has not only offered humankind his merciful love that overcomes guilt, but in addition to this he has revealed that this omnipotent forgiving love is so powerful and victorious that it even manifests itself when accepted by human freedom. And so it also becomes reality for its part when human beings accept it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Forgiveness through God's Grace

If we further inquire how this reconciliation through forgiveness of inherently insuperable guilt is to be conceived, we must first point out that Catholic theology must not conceive this forgiveness as a juridical act, an act that is more or less merely intellectual, upon which there merely follows the communication of divine grace, which is justification. Rather, this forgiveness takes place through divine grace, God's very communication of himself. Therefore we [262] must say that guilt is so radical that it can only be forgiven in that God himself in the infinite power of his love and holiness must communicate himself and must make himself a part of the offense of guilt in order that forgiveness and reconciliation may take place. Only in the love which God himself is can guilt be eradicated and reconciliation occur. But this is something that happens in a really radical way. Colossians 1:19f., which states that "all the fullness of God" dwelling in Jesus Christ "reconciles all things," cannot be taken literally enough.

The Objective Nature of What Happens in Christ's Death on the Cross

We have now explained the "subjective" nature of the reconciliation of God and the human race, and perhaps we have failed to emphasize that this reconciliation takes place in an "objective" way as is emphasized by Scripture and the teaching of the Church. A more exact idea of this objective universal reconciliation of the world with God cannot be easily expressed in a few words.

Everyone is aware of the attempt to explain this objective redemption and reconciliation by using the concept of the (vicarious) satisfaction which God's eternal Son has made to God's holy justice by his obedience unto death on the cross, thereby wiping out the "sins of the world." No doubt the Son's obedience has an unsurpassable moral value which manifests God's holiness and justice in the world. However, the notion of an exchange of goods or even of guilt being punished in the person of the guiltless Jesus must not be allowed to obtrude itself on the notion of satisfaction for the sins of the world by the Son's obedience. Furthermore, one must not lose sight of the fact that the event of the cross is itself the effect and ultimately not the cause of an initiative of God himself which is a result of nothing other than God's free love and his unmerited grace, of a God who reconciles because he is the love that forgives and overcomes all guilt. So for our understanding of this objective reconciliation it might perhaps be sufficient to say here that the Son's obedience, both in radical love for the Father and at the same time in unconditional solidarity with the human race, is the historical event in which God's forgiving love has itself appeared in the world and become irreversible.

[263]

Reconciliation with God as the Source of Reconciliation with One Another

We must point out yet a further aspect of this reconciliation. If there is a unity between God's love and love among human beings, if love among us human beings, as it must be, is possible in its ultimately radical form only because it happens in God and in the mutual love between God and human beings, this necessarily means that a really radical reconciliation among human beings is possible only in God and in the event in which his reconciliation with the world occurs. Discord among human beings, the sheer impossibility of human beings to forgive one another their guilt by their own unaided power is so relentless that only the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reconciling power of God himself can overcome the gulf that divides human beings from one another as a result of their horrible deeds.

Worldly wisdom often demands that people forgive one another, but it is at a loss to know how this can really come about. It feels that people ought perhaps to forgive, but that they are not able to forgive. Hatred, infidelity, elemental injustice, and murder can deal such a lethal blow to our fellow human beings, one from which they can never recover, that it is impossible in this world and its history to see what reconciliation and forgiveness might bring about. Only God's self-communication in love can wipe out that guilt which has created these unfathomable gulfs dividing human beings from one another. But then again this unity between love of neighbor and love of God also means this: when human beings really forgive one another's guilt, something that they are not capable of doing by their own power and therefore when they do it they are consciously or without even recognizing it being borne by God's forgiving love, there is also a reconciliation of the world with God.

Indeed, when one says all these things so glibly and in the routine language of traditional theology, one becomes dismayed and afraid that one is talking recondite theology. But if we pause, reflect, and somehow or other beyond all the routine of everyday existence catch a glimpse of the deadly guilt that puts us at odds with God's holy love and with our fellow human beings, and if we summon up our last energy to hope that this guilt is not the last word in our existence; if we hope with a power which we sense is not our own that our guilt is overcome by an all-reconciling forgiveness, then in this hope we [264] have already said yes to him who reconciles all, to him whom we call God. We have affirmed that the dreadful abysses of guilt have even now been overcome by the love of this God, and that in respect to forgiveness there is only one thing that we may not do, and that is to take it for granted rather than to accept it with the trembling and humble adoration of guilty creatures who give honor to God and know that through him they are reconciled with him and with all others.

VICARIOUS RECONCILATION

Up to this point we have spoken about reconciliation with God. We have seen that God's reconciliation with the world in Jesus Christ manifests itself whenever human beings find the power to forgive one another their unfathomable guilt. Without formulating it explicitly we have, then, already touched upon a phenomenon that can be perceived in the life of a saint like Maximilian Kolbe. His life is a convincing witness of that reconciling love for the world. His exam-pie brings us face to face with the idea of vicarious representation.

However, this idea admits of no simple explanation, and if we want to use it to help interpret our own existence we cannot treat it superficially.

The Inadequacy of the Juridical Interpretation

This notion of vicarious representation can of course be found in the juridical sphere. Without going into a detailed explanation of how one person receives the authorization to act on behalf of another, it is quite clear that one person acting on another's behalf can bring about a situation in which provisions and stipulations are set up which are morally binding on the other person.

For example, you can contract marriage through a proxy. You can authorize another person to make a contract on your own behalf and you are then bound by this contract. But this legal idea of vicarious representation is no help for the problem we are dealing with here. Our question is whether it is conceivable that another person can [265] relieve me of a moral debt

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

before God which, in fact, I myself owe to God. If the final answer to this question is no, does anything remain of the notion of vicarious representation in its application to the religious dimension of the relationship between God and human beings?

The Action of Another Cannot Be Substituted for a Free Human Action

The term vicarious representation is frequently used in religious language. The pope is called Vicarius Christi (the Vicar of Christ) in the Church viewed as a social institution, but this usage is something that pertains to the juridical sphere and need not concern us here. But when we are talking about the vicarious suffering of Christ and understand the phrase "He has suffered and made satisfaction for us" in the sense of vicarious representation, our language is moving on a religious level and raises a question that cannot be easily answered. Can another person really relieve me of a task, or an attitude or a deed before God and oriented to him, of demands which are in fact imposed on me, but which I am not capable of meeting?

This question must not be obfuscated by the obvious fact that the moral actions of one person can be important for another person, and even have a bearing on salvation. If one were to make "vicarious representation" a central feature in the actual realization of salvation as such, it would mean that another person could relieve me of an action that has significance for salvation and results in salvation, one that I myself would be obliged to perform. Thus I would no longer have to perform the action myself and yet I would still attain salvation. Obviously vicarious representation cannot be understood in this sense.

One cannot appeal to the New Testament term hyper hemōn to justify this notion of vicarious representation. It is certain that hyper is used in a great number of passages to mean "for the benefit of," and in none of these passages is it necessary to understand it in a different sense. Furthermore, if we look at the totality of Christian theology, we see that its entire tendency excludes vicarious representation in this sense. If one proceeds on the assumption that in the [266] moral sphere people cannot be seriously expected to do something that they are absolutely incapable of doing, that this kind of failure can never be considered culpable, one must also say that as far as salvation is concerned God demands of each individual that he or she do everything significant for salvation and no one is exempted from anything.

To illustrate this obvious fact one can quite properly assert that every human being redeems himself or herself by his or her own free activity, that self-redemption and redemption from outside are not two mutually exclusive concepts. "Redemption from outside" by Jesus Christ does not mean that human beings would be exempted from doing something that they are obliged to do by means of their own freedom or that something would be conceded to them that they cannot do themselves and which would nevertheless be demanded of them. It means that God by his grace, in view of Jesus Christ and his cross, grants and offers people the possibility, in the most radical self-surrender of their existence through faith, hope, and love, of constituting their own ultimate validity in the order of salvation.

Every act of creaturely freedom presupposes that this possibility is given by God. And so the possibility of salvation through God's free love and therefore through grace is present. But this possibility is realized through our own free action, and we are not exempted from this even though both our ability to act and our very activity are themselves a gift of God's grace for which we may and must praise him.

To put it another way, redemption from outside is the gratuitous bestowal of our own self-redemption. When this kind of free act through which human beings save themselves is impossible due to an absence of the presuppositions required for its performance, such persons who have not reached the use of reason may still receive eternal salvation even without having to exercise their own freedom – but this happens only because they have no possibility whatsoever of exercising their freedom in a concrete way. This, however, does not alter anything in the previously formulated axiom asserting the interaction of redemption from outside and self-redemption. So it seems to me that the concept of vicarious representation, when used in the area pertaining to the realization of salvation, is at the very least a concept that leads to misunderstandings, and it would do no harm if we avoided it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[267]

The Solidarity of Human Beings Extends to Their Free Acts

What, then, are the true and valid elements that are evidently envisaged in this problematical notion of vicarious representation? What it means is that there is a solidarity of human beings with one another and with the God-man that extends right into the ultimate root of our existence, into the area of those decisions that are relevant to salvation. What it means is that there is a human solidarity that has a bearing on salvation; in other words, that the concrete reality of every spiritual subject, known as a human being, is codetermined by the totality of this world and such a reality cannot be completely expressed without codetermining the totality of the world. A distinguished physicist once observed that Sirius trembles when a child throws its doll out of its crib. The history of the physical world together with intellectual and spiritual history, that is, the sum total of everything that happens and the deeds that other people do are the biological and social elements which are always at work determining us, and there is no escaping them. In every one of the free actions we perform we are the beneficiaries of our historical heritage and we are dependent on it, regardless of whether we appropriate it to ourselves or protest against it.

In the Christian understanding of the world and of our existence this solidarity extends right into the area where our ultimate decision of salvation is made. This human solidarity is not just something that pertains to our visible society and our secular history; it is also present in that area where we freely determine our ultimate relationship to God extending beyond all immanent reality even though it might seem that our decision is being made in radical loneliness and isolation. Each one of us determines by our own free actions what we will ultimately be in eternity, and this ultimate validity is our own and it cannot be transferred to someone else. But this ultimate validity – no matter whether it amounts to a final yes or a final no – is compounded of all the presuppositions of such an ultimate validity as has resulted from our own free actions, and therefore it consists of all the elements of necessity and freedom that have been present in human history as a whole.

Indeed, it is a conviction of Christian faith – regardless of how this can be explained more precisely – that even the future, which obviously [268] means nothing more than what has not yet come to be, is already present as a codetermining factor in our own situation of freedom. Otherwise there would be no sense in saying, for example, that those people who before Christ achieved a Christian salvation in freedom are also essentially affected by Christ.

In the one single history of the world and of salvation throughout all times and places all human beings stand in solidarity with one another; the situation and the possibilities of the freedom of all are jointly conditioned by all for all. And this is still a reality even where someone might raise a final protest in freedom against this solidarity This solidarity extends to the utmost limits of reality, even though this one single “field” of that free existence does not, of course, simply manifest a purely homogeneous structure, even though each person does not stand in solidarity with the other in exactly the same way.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

SOLIDARITY IN JESUS CHRIST

Our Christian faith further affirms that this single field of unlimited solidarity is ultimately constituted, or, if you will, consolidated by the deed of the one Jesus Christ who in love freely given remained steadfast in his predestined solidarity with human beings and did not renounce it even when it meant for him the cross and the death of one forsaken by God. That each one of us is in this sense responsible for the salvation of the other is, in the words of Pope Pius XII, a mystery that makes us tremble.[4]

The truth of mutual responsibility also implies the converse. Our own salvation, however much it be our own act, remains a gift bestowed on us by the love and fidelity of all the people in the entire history of humankind.

If we consider this sentence from a human point of view, its interpretation would have to be restricted exclusively to the idea that [269] the acts of all other human beings are an essential element of the situation of freedom which constitutes a part of the final and definitive free act of a human being. But if we consider this sentence in the light of God's initiative, its interpretation can be expanded. We must call to mind the words of Paul (Phil. 2:13) that not only the ability to perform a free act but also the very act itself, however much it is inalienably our own, is God's doing, who causes our own action in accordance with his loving purpose. And we must further call to mind that this action of ours is given to us by God as his grace because and to the extent that he wills the salutary good of this entire history of humankind. Therefore we can also say that the solidarity linking us to one another and to Jesus Christ is an essential element not only of the structure of our situation of freedom but also of our free acts themselves that result in eternal salvation.

The freely given love of Jesus and of all human beings who throughout the whole of history have attained their salvation in Jesus is present in the freedom of our own final decision. The bond that links us to one another is not only one of example and instruction. Our solidarity extends into the inmost recesses that lie at the mysterious roots of our existence known only to God in his omniscience, since he alone is the one who sees and wills the totality of the world and its history in the interdependence of all its parts. Extravagant and absurd as the conclusion may sound, it remains nonetheless true in the light of what we have said that, in the most fundamental sense, we live and attain our final validity in eternity not only as a result of Jesus' love, but also that in our own existence our lives and actions stem from a solidarity with Maximilian Kolbe. And we may even say that he took his martyrdom upon himself in virtue of his solidarity with our good and evil actions.

It may truthfully be said that the entire history of humankind and the history of salvation is one great symphony of praise to the love of the God who moves the sun and the stars.

[4] See Mystici Corporis, no. 43: "A truly awesome mystery that can never be considered sufficiently: that the salvation of many is dependent on the prayers and voluntary acts of penance of the members of the mystical body of Jesus Christ which they take upon themselves for this purpose, and on the collaboration that our divine redeemer requires on the part of the shepherds and the faithful, particularly the fathers and mothers of families."

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PROFANE HISTORY AND SALVATION HISTORY
Published in Christlicher Glaube in moderner Gesellschaft, vol. 23 (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1982), pp. 111—23. This contribution is the second part of the article "Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschichte." The first part of this article was written by G. Mann.

NATURAL SCIENCE AND REASONABLE FAITH
Published in Christlicher Glaube in moderner Gesellschaft, vol. 3 (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1981), pp. 34—78. This contribution is the second part of the article "Weltall—Erde—Mensch." The first part of this article was written by K. Rawer.

THEOLOGY TODAY
Lecture given on April 14, 1980, in Münster, Westphalia, on the occasion of the jubilee celebration of Wilhelm University. Published in Akademische Festreden zum Jubililum 1980. Schriftenreihe der Westfälischen Wilhelms-Universität Münster, ed. H. Dollinger, no. 1 (Münster, 1980), pp. 43—54.

THE PRESENT SITUATION OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY
Hitherto unpublished radio address broadcast by the Bavarian Radio Network on September 26, 1979, under the title “Stand der katholischen Theologie heute.”

ASPECTS OF EUROPEAN THEOLOGY
Published in Problemi e prospettive di teologia dogmatica, ed. K.-H. Neufeld (Brescia, 1983)

A THEOLOGY THAT WE CAN LIVE WITH
Hitherto unpublished lecture held before the faculty of theology of the University of Würzburg on July 22, 1982, and subsequently delivered in Regensburg, Frankfurt am Main, and St. Polten.

THE MATURE CHRISTIAN
Published in Stimmen derZeit 200 (1982) 3—13.

[272]

JUSTIFYING FAITH IN AN AGNOSTIC WORLD
Published in the Frankfurter Aligemeine Zeirung, March 15, 1982. Saturday Supplement, no. 84. The main title of the essay is “Der brennender Schmerz unserer Existenz.”

THE CHURCH AND ATHEISM
Lecture given at the Pontifical Urban University in Rome on October 6, 1980. Published in Stimmen derZeit 199 (1981) 3—13.

THE ACT OF FAITH AND THE CONTENT OF FAITH
Published under the title "Fides qua—fides quae" in Bekennendes Bekenntnis. Form und Formulierung christlichen Glaubens, ed. E. Hultsch and K. Lüthi (Gütersloh, 1982), pp. 63—71.

A HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS
Published in Diakonia 13 (1982) 376—82.

CHRISTIANITY'S ABSOLUTE CLAIM
Published under the title "Stirbt das Christentum aus?" in Antwort des Glaubens, no. 21

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk
Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(Freiburg im Breisgau, 1981), published by the Informationszentrum Berufe der Kirche. Also published under the title "über den Absolutheitsanspruch des Christentums" in Universalität als Auftrag des Glaubens, ed. D. Bader (Munich, 1982), pp. 61—74.

THE SPECIFIC CHARACTER OF THE CHRISTIAN CONCEPT OF GOD
Guest lecture given in Vienna on December 10, 1981, for the Club Pro Wien., Published under the title "über die Eigenart des christlichen Gottesbegriff's" in Diakonia 13 (1982) 150—59.

THE QUESTION OF MEANING AS A QUESTION OF GOD
Lecture held at the Reinhold-Schneider-Stiftung, Freiburg im Breisgau, on June 11, 1982. The lecture has hitherto appeared only in the publications of this Foundation, Reinhold-Schneider-Stiftung Hamburg, no. 20 (1982), pp.21—28.

JESUS CHRIST—THE MEANING OF LIFE
Lecture given on May 30, 1980, on the occasion of the convention of Austrian Physicians in Bad Ischl. Published in Wege zu sinnvollem Leben, ed. K. E. Schiller (Linz, 1980), pp. 45—66. Also published in Geist und Leber 53 (1980) 406-16.

CHRISTOLOGY TODAY
Published in Concilium 18 (1982) 212—16.

[273]

BRIEF OBSERVATIONS ON SYSTEMATIC CHRISTOLOGY TODAY
Published in Glaube an Jesus Christus, ed. J. Blank and G. Hasenhüttl (Düsseldorf, 1980), pp. 134—44.

THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING OF REDEMPTION
Lecture given at the Institut für Indologie of the University of Vienna on February 26, 1981. Published in Epiphanie des Heils. Zur Heilsgegenwart in indischer und christlicher Religion, ed. G. Oberhammer (Vienna, 1982), pp. 149—60. Also published in Erlösung in Christentum und Buddhismus, ed. A. Bsteh (Mödling, 1982), pp. 112—27. This contribution is for the most part identical with the lecture presented for the celebration of the sixty-fifth birthday of Prof. Dr. Eugen Biset on January 6, 1983. The lecture was given at the Cari-Friedrich-von-Siemens-Stiftung in Munich on January 13, 1983.

RECONCILIATION AND VICARIOUS REPRESENTATION
Lecture given on the occasion of the convention of the Academy of the Diocese of Rottenburg-Stuttgart in Stuttgart on November 20, 1982, under the title "Maximilian Kolbe und die Kraft der Versöhnung." Published in Geist und Leben 56 (1982) 98—110.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Humane Society

[3]

1

CONSCIENCE

FREEDOM AND THE DIGNITY OF HUMAN DECISION

Despite many necessary reservations theology is convinced that it has said the ultimately decisive thing about conscience. In doing so theology is aware that theological statements as such tend to introduce conscience into the mystery that we call God. And thus theological statements unavoidably take on some of the vagueness and obscurity that belong to religious language.

THE MANY QUESTIONS THAT MAY AND SHOULD BE ASKED

There are many aspects of the problem which I do not intend to discuss. Here are a few of them: What the Old Testament has to say about conscience, which it called the "heart"; how conscience refers to God, as mentioned already in the Old Testament; what Jesus taught about conscience, which he too called the heart; how the technical term for "conscience" (syneidesis), deriving from popular Stoic philosophy and already adopted in everyday language during the first century, entered Christian literature in Paul's letters; how this notion was transformed by early Christianity; what the Fathers of the Church (e.g., Tertullian, Origen, Chrysostom, and especially Augustine) taught about conscience; what medieval theology said about it, especially as, starting in the twelfth century, it commented on a text of Jerome about synteresis and conscientia; [4] how medieval theology understood with Thomas that an invincibly erroneous conscience remains validly normative;[1] against a secularized conception of conscience that tends to emphasize moral autonomy as opposed to the theonomy of conscience, to uphold the conviction that conscience refers to God; how the idea of conscience continued to develop in Christian theology through new insights coming from modern psychology and depth psychology, sociology and ethnology, leading to the admission of freedom of conscience and religion, as happened for the Catholic Church in the Second Vatican Council. Such are the topics that I cannot discuss here, without implying that they are not important for the theology of conscience.

Likewise many points cannot be brought up which the theologian should say about non-theological theories of conscience. Thus we cannot speak of the fact that conscience cannot be explained by admitting the existence of inborn moral ideas. There will be no explicit

[1] S. Th., 1, 2, q. 19a. 5; De ver., q. 17a. 4 ad 2. Cf. Rudolf Hofmann, "Die Gewissenslehre des Walter von Brügge O.F.M. und die Entwicklung der Gewissenslehre in der Hochscholastik," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters XXXVI/5-6 (Münster 1941), esp. 145-204.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

confrontation with Kant's description of conscience as a transcendental power. We cannot explicitly speak of the origin of the superego according to the psychology of Freud. No explicit evaluation need be expected of the findings of modern existential philosophy, of ethology, of ethnology, of biological evolutionism, and so on. It stands to reason that theology does not ignore all the contributions of the modern anthropological sciences that are important for a full understanding of what is meant by conscience. Of course, there is a development of conscience; of course, it is in part conditioned by biological ways of behaving, for which ethologists discover analogies among animals. Of course, early childhood shows a development of conscience, with all the antecedents and factors of such development. Of course, the concrete formation of conscience is conditioned biologically, sociologically, and culturally by the orders and prohibitions which that formation itself imposes. Of course, we do not clearly discover in the history of prehistoric humanity, cultures, and civilizations any clear and verbalized knowledge of the theonomous nature of conscience. Nor is it possible, even today, to explain it quickly to everybody. But, as we said, we cannot discuss all of this here, because if we did [5] we would be unable to explain thoroughly and clearly enough that which interests the theologian about this topic. I mean the relation that exists between conscience and God.

STARTING FROM THE ERRONEOUS CONSCIENCE

I do not intend to use here the method of a transcendental reflection on the nature of conscience as the unconditional way in which the spirit accepts its freedom. Let me start rather from a quite different consideration, even if at first it seems to be secondary. I will try to reflect on the absolutely binding character of what is called an erroneous conscience.

The Absolutely Binding Character of the Dictates of Conscience

It will soon be evident that, terminologically, it is a mistake to speak of an erroneous conscience. But for the time being this hardly matters.

No ethics, regardless of how radically "objective" it may be, can ever forego subjective human consciousness, because objective moral norms and the objective relationship that exists between freedom and God, which renders the individual norms absolute, become present only through the intermediary of a personal decision of conscience. In other words, even the norms of morality that are considered most objective must appeal to human freedom in order to become real and effective for freedom. Moral norms and commands can become effective only when they are known and understood. Therefore a subjective judgment is a last court of appeal beyond which there can be no other. Objective norms have to be grasped as absolutely binding. That is why a dictate of conscience is absolutely binding for a decision of human freedom.

This is not an endorsement of arbitrary subjectivism. Human beings are obliged to harmonize their knowledge with objective reality, as presented to them, and to accept it as a norm. Theoretically, all those who have the use of their intelligence admit this obligation, since they cannot avoid conforming their knowledge to the reality that forces itself upon them. And so all persons know at least implicitly, but really, that before they make a decision they [6] must look for information and be guided by the reality of objective morality. They know that they cannot act as they please nor make up the laws of their conduct; they know that they must, to the best of their ability and knowledge, submit wholeheartedly to the rules of objective morality. This shows that not every opinion, every preference, every arbitrary

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

prejudice can claim to be a real dictate of conscience. Yet it is true that in situations where people must make decisions and act within the framework of their possibilities, after having given the alternatives sufficient thought, if they reach the conclusion that one of the alternatives is the right one, then their decision is absolutely binding on them. It is a dictate of conscience that obliges them absolutely.

We do not treat explicitly the problem of what people should consider their duty when, in a doubtful case, they feel unable to conclude clearly which of two possible answers is the right one. In such a perplexing case, when there is a lack of conclusive grounds for deciding, and a decision has to be taken, and no greater practical clarity can be reached, we say then that either of the two possibilities is morally acceptable.

So henceforth we will take it for granted that, where a choice has to be made, our decision is a dictate of conscience, if it looks absolutely binding to the subject.

Erroneous Conscience

Before we inquire further what is implied in such a decision, which imposes upon subjects and their freedom an absolute responsibility that cannot be transferred to anybody or anything else, we must keep in mind that even such a decision of conscience can, in a sense that has to be further explained, be an erroneous one. The possibility of an erroneous yet binding dictate of conscience is admitted by Christian moral theology, at least by Thomas Aquinas, and it has revealed its radical consequences in the texts of Vatican II on freedom of conscience and of religion. It has taken the Church a long time to reach this insight, because the doctrine of the possibility of an erroneous decision of conscience is not as obvious as we may think. And also because nowadays almost everyone is inclined to present even pet opinions, which one is unwilling to defend too strenuously, as dictates of conscience. But Christian [7] moral theology does admit that people's opinions about their concrete moral conduct may be erroneous and, at the same time, real dictates of conscience that oblige them absolutely and render them personally responsible. This case is far from obvious. A person's moral judgment may be erroneous, may truly contradict the objective order of values, and yet also be a real self-understanding of the subject. That is evident. It happens everyday; everyone has encountered such cases. We are often mistaken, even in the field of moral values. But that such an erroneous judgment may nevertheless – not always, but often – be a genuine dictate of conscience; that it obliges the erring person absolutely; that, speaking as Christians, it is here and now for that person a command of God; that disobeying it would make the person be rejected by God; that a judgment whose content is morally false may nonetheless constitute a categorical imperative whose transgression would render the person evil – all of this is not obvious.

There are several ways of showing why it is not obvious. One might point out that the moral non-values to which this judgment refers cannot constitute a positive moral injunction for the subject, so that a real dictate of conscience would be excluded. One might say that a dictate of conscience concerning an obligation sent from God cannot oblige one to something that God positively rejects and orders us to avoid. One might say that a moral non-value, unlike a moral value in its absolute sovereignty, cannot give rise to the unconditional decisiveness that belongs to the nature of a dictate of conscience. Yet Christian moral theology as well as human and Christian opinion hold that there are such dictates of conscience, although error and absolute obligation seem to be totally contradictory concepts that cannot coexist in the same reality. Yet according to Vatican II, "conscience frequently errs from invincible ignorance without losing its dignity" (Gaudium et Spes, 16). How does it not lose its dignity when it errs?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Dignity of a Dictate of Conscience

This question can be answered only when one sees that, even in the event of an erroneous decision of conscience, a person performs an act that is founded in the positive dignity and binding character of a dictate of conscience. This dignity and binding character [8] cannot be situated in the categorical object (some moral value or non-value), but must derive from elsewhere, if we are to explain the binding character of even an erroneous dictate of conscience. How is this possible? We can answer this question only by examining the nature and structure of a decision of conscience.

The absolute dignity and obligation of a dictate of conscience does not come properly and solely from the single categorical concrete value with which it is concerned. Why would a single human life, which is perishable after all, be able to demand for itself the absolute right to be respected? How can individuals demand, on the basis of their insignificant reality, that their person be respected in absolute fidelity and love? Where can two persons by themselves alone find a basis for a demand of absolute honesty and integrity in their dealings with each other?

If one wishes to achieve a goal, one must use the necessary means to reach it. If a number of people wish to live peacefully together, some rules will have to be observed. But all these considerations remain hypothetical. They always assume the following form: If you do not want to harm your liver, use alcohol with moderation. But do I personally have to want my liver to stay healthy? Are health, peace, and some kind of happiness values that must be unconditionally achieved? Once more: The world of concrete realities and values, to which binding decisions of conscience refer, cannot by itself alone justify such an absolute claim. So, if such claims exist, their absolute and obligatory character must come from elsewhere.

If there exists a more basic and general source of obligation, prior to all individual values, we see right away that this source of absolute moral claims can be effective also in an erroneous conscience, one that errs about individual concrete realities, without erring about the foundation of their absolute claim. In other words: In both the right and the erroneous decision of conscience, despite their disagreement about the concrete moral value, one and the same basic moral reality is at work. The error refers only to the concrete data, not to what bestows upon them their absolute obligation. That is why the concept “erroneous conscience” is a misnomer. There are no truly erroneous dictates of conscience. If there were, they would not be dictates of conscience because they would not claim an absolute obligation.

The Transcendental Ground of the Absolute Claim

What is the foundation of the absolute character of morality prior to the actual appeal of particular values? This has not yet been made clear by the preceding discussion. In order to answer that question we must go back to what was hinted at above, before we considered the problem of erroneous conscience.

In every dictate of conscience, including the so-called erroneous one, we affirm and accept as unconditionally evident that fundamental and permanent distinction between good and evil, between what ought and what ought not to be, whether or not this distinction is also affirmed for the immediate object of our activity. Every dictate of conscience affirms this basic distinction as permanent. Just as every judgment affirms the principle of contradiction as universally valid and ineradicable, so that even its very denial reaffirms it, thus acknowledging its transcendental necessity, so a dictate of conscience that refers to a free

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

action asserts the transcendental necessity of the distinction between good and evil. Even those who say explicitly that in dictates of conscience this basic distinction is relative and can be denied and ignored would, in their denial, implicitly maintain that their own judgment is valid and the only absolutely correct norm for their freedom. In other words, a transcendental experience of freedom and responsibility does exist, and it cannot be one datum among others within our consciousness. Empirical psychological reflection may, absolutely speaking, reduce every single datum to another one, so that it is unable to discover freedom and responsibility. But still there exists a transcendental experience of our being free and responsible subjects. It is still there when one calls it in doubt, when one is unable to discover it as one datum among others in spatio-temporal experience. One may try to run away from one's freedom and responsibility and interpret oneself as a product of others, of non-I's. But even this self-interpretation is the action of the subject as such. It is an action by which the subject denies itself or interprets its freedom as an enslavement to the arbitrary whim of something alien. It is a self-interpretation that misses its self. Yet in this very action one acts as a free subject and reveals oneself as such in the very misinterpretation. It is a mistake to confuse that which one affirms in this interpretation (the absence of freedom) with the [10] fact of affirming it, the affirmed with the affirming. Of course, the undeniable fact that we are responsible for ourselves is always mediated by some concrete object. But with this mediation, which is not identical with our transcendental self-responsibility, we experience our freedom and genuine responsibility, that is, our conscience. It is an unconditional appeal addressed to me, as a responsible subject; the response to the appeal is up to my freedom, not to my whim. For even if the subject in freedom refuses to heed it, the appeal continues to live in the refusal. All this occurs whenever a person errs about concrete data. That is why every real decision of conscience is to be accepted as an absolute summons to freedom and responsibility, even when it is "erroneous."

Conscience As God's Voice

What are the further implications of this unavoidable transcendental self-givenness of the subject to itself in freedom and responsibility? One becomes a subject only on account of the transcendentality of the spirit and of freedom, both of them unlimited, because of the subject's openness for being as such and in its totality. Without such unlimited transcendentality the subject cannot be really self-possessed and free. Such an unlimited transcendentality implies what we may call the person's dynamic reaching to the infinite and unfathomable Mystery, to God, who is anonymously affirmed whenever unlimited transcendentality with it ensuing freedom and responsibility is accepted. Thus, it is possible to explain the theonomous nature of conscience.

When one interprets conscience as the voice of God, one is basically right. For this does not mean that God intrudes miraculously into our consciousness as a concrete datum. Nor does it mean that the judgment needed in a decision of conscience is always and necessarily right about the concrete reality to which it refers. It means that in every decision of conscience, even in an erroneous one, there arise an absolute obligation and the responsibility of freedom that subjects can reject only by destroying themselves. Such a decision always and necessarily implies an affirmation of God.

[11]

The Freedom of Conscience

By interpreting conscience as a reference to God we understand the principal text of Vatican

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II about conscience, although that text is formulated in religious language. It reads:

> In the depths of his conscience, man detects a law which he does not impose upon himself, but which holds him to obedience. Always summoning him to love good and avoid evil, the voice of conscience can when necessary speak to his heart more specifically: do this, shun that. For man has in his heart a law written by God. To obey it is the very dignity of man; according to it he will be judged.
>
> Conscience is the most secret core and sanctuary of a man. There he is alone with God, whose voice echoes in his depths. In a wonderful manner conscience reveals that law which is fulfilled by love of God and neighbor. In fidelity to conscience, Christians are joined with the rest of men in the search for truth, and for the genuine solution to the numerous problems which arise in the life of individuals and from social relationships. Hence the more that a correct conscience holds sway, the more persons and groups turn aside from blind choice and strive to be guided by objective norms of morality.
>
> Conscience frequently errs from invincible ignorance without losing its dignity. The same cannot be said of a man who cares but little for truth and goodness, or of a conscience which by degrees grows practically sightless as a result of habitual sin. (Gaudium et Spes, 16 in The Documents of Vatican II, edited by Walter Abbott)

There is no need to interpret this text of the Council in more detail. Attention should be drawn, however, to a few points that follow from this understanding of the nature of conscience, especially to what today is called freedom of conscience and of religion. Through their conscience human beings are real subjects; they may not be treated like objects. Conscience must be respected by all social and ecclesiastical authorities, since their immediate function concerns the objective structures of reality. One's freedom of conscience and of religion should not infringe upon that of others because this would constitute what is usually called a violation of the common good. This brings up further questions about conflicts between freedom of conscience and the common good, that is, the freedom of others. We cannot discuss these questions here. [12] No wonder that, in this respect, the Church's doctrine and practice have undergone developments and changes.

Both society and the Church have the right and the duty to teach people about objective norms of morality and to exhort them to observe these norms. In other words: They teach the right way of applying conscience to concrete realities. This does not infringe upon freedom of conscience. The increasing complexity of the human situation and people's activities, both individually and collectively, renders it quite difficult to decide exactly for any concrete case what is objectively true or false. In defending human rights, neither the Church nor society can give up its right to present and defend norms of objective morality. But the Church at least would be well advised if she concentrated her efforts in another direction: namely, to point out more clearly that humanity strives irresistibly for God and that, in this striving, human morality becomes theonomous and, as a result, really autonomous.

It is good and practically indispensable to hold as morally binding and to obey the concrete everyday obligations that make life in society tolerable. But if people are not aware of the exalted dignity of conscience, of the individual's ultimate responsibility before God, or one's irresistible yearning for God, all objective morality and every instance of living up to it would, in the final analysis, be nothing but a higher kind of dog training that is unworthy of human dignity and unworthy of God. To put it a bit too strongly, but in fact correctly, one might say: A dictate of conscience that errs about concrete morality is more important and wonderful than an objectively correct "dictate of conscience" (not really one at all) that would neither explicitly nor implicitly affirm in freedom the transcendental dimension that refers to God.

In instances where one party must presume the presence of a real decision of conscience in another party, they have something in common before God, although there may exist a contradiction in the material content of their decisions, with the result that either one (or often perhaps both) could be false. Should both sides really understand this, should they be aware that before God and in God's grace they share a bond that is more important than bitter discord about the material content of their conscientious decisions, they might develop a genuine tolerance that surpasses by far what is meant by tolerance in the social and political arena. Bitter quarrels about lofty human values and goods may not be considered [13] innocuous; they should not lead to cheap compromises. Rather they are founded in the luminous peace for which every genuine decision of conscience strives, however bitter may be the feud that in such cases we have to endure for the sake of conscience.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[14]

2

DIALOGUE AND TOLERANCE AS THE FOUNDATION OF A HUMANE SOCIETY

Dialogue and tolerance as the foundation of a humane society sounds at first rather problematic. When one declares that one reality is the foundation of another, one generally presupposes two things: that one has a clear and distinct idea of the second reality, which needs a foundation; and that the first reality, which is clearly distinct from the second, is absolutely presupposed by the latter. But if one understands the title of this article, the first presupposition becomes very doubtful. When is a society "humane"?

At the time of the Reformation a ruler who expelled subjects unwilling to share his religion, and who refused dialogue and rejected religious tolerance, might have said that this was the only way to establish and protect a humane society in his country, because only a society that belonged to his denomination, which he considered the true one, could be really humane in all respects. For such a ruler the refusal of open dialogue and the practice of intolerance would have been the unconditional presupposition of a humane society. On closer inspection one would have to say that all fascist and radically socialist regimes share this opinion, because they are convinced that, in the final analysis, philosophical intolerance makes for the actual happiness of the greatest number in a society, and thus for real humanism. That is why they defend their political and social ideology not only with logical arguments but [15] also with intolerance and compulsion, through censorship, removal from office, and so on.

So when we say that dialogue and tolerance are the foundation of a humane society, we presuppose, contrary to the opinion or conviction of others around us, a society whose essential features include dialogue and tolerance. That is why we readily grant that the title of this article contains a tautology. A society is humane only if it allows the widest possible tolerance in social dialogue. And the other way around: Dialogue and tolerance characterize a humane society; it cannot exist without them.

At this point even those who, without hesitation, define a humane society as one characterized by dialogue and tolerance should be cautious. The history of human societies shows clearly that what people mean by dialogue and tolerance has not always been exactly the same. A Greek polis considered itself a seat of freedom and dialogue, although it held as obvious that an economy without slaves was impossible and that it had the right to condemn a Socrates to death, on account of ungodliness. Throughout the centuries the freedom of the Christian has been extolled. Yet, when we measure it with our standards, the history of Christianity has been, to a dreadful extent, a history of intolerance, of persecution of heretics, of wars of religion, and of coercion of conscience by leaders of Church and State.

LIMITS OF DIALOGUE AND TOLERANCE – THE COMMON GOOD

It is precisely this history that saddens the Christian and the humanist, that warns us to be prudent and moderate. Today can we always welcome dialogue? Are we supposed never to terminate or to interrupt it except when the parties have reached an agreement? Is it possible in public life to forego every decision that does not translate a general consensus reached through dialogue? Who has the last word and declares that everything has been sufficiently "thrashed out"? Can a dialogue ever reach an end by itself alone? And again, is it possible in every instance to be tolerant in one's dealings with others?

It is often said (also in modern church declarations as in those of Vatican II) that the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

tolerance one should harbor for the freedom [16] of others has its limits in the common good, which may not be harmed. Nowadays efforts are being made to eliminate from the idea of the common good certain elements that derive from religious beliefs and, from the start, to use this secularized idea of the common good to do away with whatever may lead to religious discord. Are these efforts successful? Is it, for instance, a blatant case of intolerance when some state legislatures in the United States forbid the teaching of evolution in the public schools? Is it a violation of tolerance and the equal rights of an atheistic philosophy when in West Germany the state universities have theological faculties but no faculty whose task it would be to develop a radically atheistic critique of religion?

But even if one was to admit that in our modern progressive society there are still remnants of intolerance to be eliminated, the question would remain what exactly is meant by the common good and who is to decide on its meaning. For even in the most progressive and tolerant society, the common good continues to have the right and the duty to defend itself against encroachments by individuals, without the consent of these individuals. It has the right to be intolerant, if one wishes to define intolerance as treating the freedom of others in a way that they do not approve. So if, on account of the common good, such restriction of freedom is simply unavoidable, and if in this sense intolerance cannot be completely avoided and is in fact not being avoided in any society whatsoever, who determines the common good that legitimates such intolerance?

In a society where (except for a few offenders) there exists no real difference of opinion about the common good, the above question does not arise. If, on the other hand, there exist serious differences of opinion even about the fundamental questions of the common good, how does one then determine the range of dialogue and tolerance as well as its unavoidable limits? True, the genuine conception of the common good is itself one that changes in the course of history; society must continually revise it. But this constant revision burdens the individual human mind and especially the moral conscience with the burning question of what standards to use and what direction to follow in order to live up to its responsibility. At the same time, the idea of the common good, the idea of possible dialogue and of tolerance, are in a process of continual revision.

What degree of tolerance in open dialogue should one favor, if [17] one cannot simply admit that there should be no limits to one’s readiness for dialogue and tolerance? One may, for instance, be morally opposed to abortion, while admitting in a discussion that such an action should not fall under the penal law. A dialogue may present the opportunity to discuss the question of whether the abettors of a voluntary suicide should be prosecuted. However, the Nazi regime, for instance, did things and imposed burdens that are to be rejected out of hand, that are no fitting topic for tolerant dialogue among people who consider each other equally intelligent and humane, even though they disagree about practical matters.

If therefore it is not so easy to explain exactly what is meant by the willingness to welcome dialogue and tolerance, and to explain what it does not include, it is not so simple to divide people into those who are for and those who are against dialogue and tolerance. A sober appraisal of human reality and history will have to grant that there will always be disagreement about the nature of real humanism, hence also about the correct idea of tolerance and willingness to dialogue.

At this rather dim point of our reflections one might wonder whether the point on which all people might agree would not be that they should acknowledge this situation and welcome the greatest possible tolerance and openness to dialogue. But there will be no unanimity about this conclusion either. There will always be those who claim that at times one must force others to reach happiness. This idea of a legitimate intolerance undoubtedly prevails in modern Muslim nations and socialist countries. In both of them an official ideology is imposed on all, and efforts are made to carry it out even if individuals do not agree.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The proponents of such official ideologies might of course reply to us "Westerners," that we too would restrict our tolerance by appealing to an indefinable common good. We would differ from intolerant official ideologies only in our different conceptions of the common good. We of the tolerant West would answer that our idea of the common good is wider, more tolerant, and, therefore, more correct than that of these State ideologies, because freedom, hence also tolerance, is preferable to a common good and a general happiness imposed by force from above. To us in the West that view seems quite obvious, since we cannot conceive of a genuine common good without the greatest possible amount of freedom [18] for the individual, a freedom which is itself an essential element of human well being.

But the other side might inquire whether the amount of tolerance favored by us does not seriously threaten the common good that all have to strive for, so that this threat to the common good would amount to a serious threat to freedom. We might be asked by the other side whether the common good, as we understand it, is not reduced by an exaggerated tolerance to the function of a mere economy of consumption, an inhuman economy headed for absurdity.

These considerations show how problematic are the idea and the ideal of tolerance. It is impossible to conceive of tolerance as wholly independent of the common good. The latter brings up the metaphysical question of the exact nature of the common good. It brings up a social and political problem: How does a given society at a given time envision the longed for reconciliation between the freedom of individuals and groups, on the one hand, and the limits which the structure of society necessarily imposes on that freedom, on the other? This reconciliation cannot be reached once and for all but is a part of ongoing history. So the question which interests both individuals and groups is how real reconciliation in a given society, situation, and period of history will be reached, and whether this society is really determined to stand by it in the future. We in the West will, I hope, resolutely cling to what we call our "free self-government," although we must keep in mind that this free self-government with its concrete tolerance needs to be further developed and that tolerance is not the only and absolute standard of our existence.

TOLERANCE AS REQUIRED BY CHRISTIANITY

We must now consider the nature of tolerance from another point of view, which will better show how thoroughly Christian and how radical the demand for tolerance is. Let us start by insisting once more that, as we show how Christian the radical demand for tolerance is, we do not at all imply that Christianity and the Church have, during the two thousand years of their history, always practiced the tolerance that is demanded by the Christian conception of humanity. To a frightful extent the opposite has very often been [19] the case. We must not forget that a reality in history discovers and realizes itself very slowly. There is always some contradiction between what it is and what it ought to be. But our task here is neither to attack nor to defend the churches' record in the matter of tolerance.

We are speaking rather of the tolerance that should exist, that is demanded by a basic understanding of human freedom, such as it exists in Christians and is available to all. In a short article we cannot, of course, develop a metaphysical and Christian anthropology. Hence we start from an idea that belongs, or should belong, to every kind of humanism. In a lengthy process of spiritual growth Christianity and the churches have painfully discovered that tolerance is part of the Christian message. We mean the idea that even the invincibly erroneous conscience constitutes an unconditional moral demand, to which persons owe unconditional obedience before themselves and before God, and with which nobody has a right to interfere. Hence there arises a demand for tolerance that stands far above all

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

utilitarian considerations about peace or peaceful coexistence in a society of various individuals and opinions.

THE ERRONEOUS CONSCIENCE

We start from the idea that even an invincibly erroneous conscience constitutes an unconditiona1 moral duty, to which persons owe, before themselves and before God, an unconditional obedience. We are not inquiring here how the absolute dictate of conscience should be interpreted metaphysically and theologically. Neither are we inquiring how an unconditional moral obligation should be interpreted or even whether or not it should be interpreted. We are not asking whether or not one should stop at a categorical imperative as an ultimate datum of human existence and freedom, or whether one explains this obligation through a previous knowledge about God and God's will, or whether it is precisely from the unconditionality of moral duty that we begin to understand what is meant by God. As a Christian theologian I am allowed to presuppose that the unconditionality of a moral duty has something to do with the one we call God, without having to try to clarify the connection. In any case, we take for granted that [20] there exist absolute obligations in human existence, which cannot be reduced to psychological, utilitarian, or sociological factors.

Granting therefore that the dictate of conscience possesses this ultimate unconditionality even when it is objectively erroneous, we must first make it clear that not every opinion, every preference, every arbitrary prejudice that people hold and about which they are at least implicitly aware that they are unjustified in holding, can claim to be a dictate of conscience, especially since such opinions are not held with the full commitment of one's existence.

Yet the following statement is still true. When in a given situation persons have to act, and when, to the extent of their possibilities, they reach a decision which they consider true and morally right, and preferable to another available one, this judgment is binding for them; it is a dictate of conscience that is absolutely obliging.

But everyday experience shows that according to objective norms such a judgment may in fact be erroneous. Yet a judgment that is factually erroneous can be a real dictate of conscience that is absolutely binding on a person. This doctrine of the possibility of an erroneous yet absolutely binding dictate of conscience has – albeit only slowly and with all the implied consequences – been generally admitted in Christian moral theology at least since Thomas Aquinas and has, in a slow learning process of the Church, led to radical consequences for freedom of conscience and of religion, as was evidenced in Vatican II.

It is not as obvious as we tend to feel today that it is possible for a decision to come from one's inner existence and to constitute an absolutely binding decision of conscience, even though that decision is wrong. Today people are too prone to present as a decision of conscience their favorite opinions that they are unwilling to justify in a radical way. But current Christian moral theology admits such a possibility, and this with respect to all possible objects of such a decision of conscience. This means (once more): One's judgment concerning one's concrete moral attitude and decision may be wrong and still be a real, radical decision of conscience that obliges one absolutely in an inescapable responsibility, in which the innermost nature of a radically free decision is realized.

This is not an obvious platitude. Everyday life and our individual experience show that we are often wrong, even in the domain of moral values. What is not obvious is that such a judgment can nevertheless be a genuine dictate of conscience with its absolute [21] obligation, so that ignoring it makes one guilty in God's eyes and renders one evil. Yet Christian moral theology as well as human and Christian life-experience insist on the fact that such erroneous, yet absolutely obliging, dictates of conscience may occur in a person's

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

concrete situation, although error and absolute obligation seem to be utterly contradictory notions. “Conscience frequently errs from invincible ignorance without losing its dignity,” says the Second Vatican Council (Gaudium et Spes, 16).

We will have to forego a more detailed explanation of why and how such a decision imposes an absolute obligation, in spite of the error about its immediate object. We can only say that a definite moral decision, in which persons realize their definitive desire of the absolute good and their definitive stance as free subjects, can occur, even through the intermediary of the categorical object of such a decision, which objectively and in itself is not legitimate.

ACKNOWLEDGING THE DIGNITY OF FREEDOM

What is important for our topic is this: What we usually call tolerance is not only a maxim for peaceful coexistence, in which people with different opinions and goals get along without harming each other physically. It is rather the respect we pay to the freedom of other persons as they make their decisions of conscience. These decisions are absolutely binding on them, even when we believe, rightly perhaps, that they are wrong. Because a decision of conscience is absolutely binding, even when in fact it is wrong, it represents an absolute (we do not say infinite) value that must be respected by the person who has made the decision.

During the Council many who opposed the Council’s teaching on freedom of religion declared that error has no rights. The defenders of freedom of religion were right when they answered: Error in itself has no rights, but erring people do. For such a factually wrong dictate of conscience still stands for the dignity of conscience, the dignity of freedom, the dignity of each individual’s personal responsibility, which one can neither shake off nor transfer to another, the dignity that everybody must respect. That is why tolerance is not merely a rule in a game played by realistic and intelligent people who want to get along with one another. It is an acknowledgment of the absolute dignity of the freedom and [22] the personality of human beings. That dignity is still present in erroneous decisions of conscience. It would be rejected and denied if it were given up in behalf of the merely factual correctness of some piece of knowledge. It is precisely because a dictate of conscience may not simply be confused with a shallow opinion and yet may coexist with error that it took Christianity centuries of reflection before it was able to draw the ultimate consequences from the lofty dignity of even an erroneous conscience. It took Christianity a long time to discover that tolerance has something to do with the innermost nature of the human person as a free subject, that tolerance must be practiced even where it is not foisted on one by the physical power of one’s opponents, even where nobody can prevent one from being intolerant. Intolerance cannot be practiced even when we are absolutely convinced that we are speaking for the truth and for the greater good of our opponents, because intolerance would eliminate or unduly restrict the freedom of others, without which they cannot be what they want to be or ought to be, namely, free persons, whose reality, as far as possible, is of their own making. Understood in this way tolerance derives from the human self-understanding that belongs both to Western humanism and to genuine Christianity. It is a tolerance that we would wish to be part of the self-understanding of all human beings.

TOLERANCE AND INTOLERANCE

But here the real problem of tolerance begins. Let us remember what was said in the first part of our reflections where tolerance was presented as a good that, although legitimate and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

desirable, is nevertheless limited by the common good of others. The common good does not allow everything to be tolerated in everybody. Tolerance has its limits, in view of the doctrine that in the common good the right of one person is restricted by the equal rights of others. In the second part of our considerations tolerance was seen as acknowledgment that there are possibilities of freedom which free subjects, on account of their dignity, require to be themselves and that a person's possibilities are not limited by others' possibilities of freedom, but are without limits.

Such tolerance necessarily engenders conflict because it postulates possibilities of freedom for one person that are, or may [23] already be, preempted by another person. For these possibilities of different subjects are not separate, they overlap. And we cannot expect the common possibilities of freedom to be divided peacefully and naturally among free subjects in such a way that there is no conflict, that no one person claims more possibilities than another. The freedom supposed by tolerance, as mentioned in the second part of our reflections, is loaded with conflicts. The common good, the freedom of others, imposes limits on our freedom, which our freedom would not impose on itself if left alone.

The tolerance that lets itself be restricted by the common good is intolerant of the tolerance which free subjects demand spontaneously as their unrestricted right. Although we readily grant that free subjects spontaneously impose some essential norms on themselves, that they do not aim simply at unrestricted subjectivity, at the same time they will often be inclined to do things that they will find impossible to carry out because of the simple reality of the intolerance of others, which, prior to any ill will, imposes limits on the possibilities of others. Reality is not such that everything will always be harmonized.

These propositions have been put quite abstractly, so that the inexorable difficulty meant here may not be too quickly and too cheaply talked away. In their private and public lives people must often be intolerant toward one another, in order to show their tolerance by securing and protecting the possibilities of freedom of others. This bitter necessity is one of the factors of human existence, although it is frequently overlooked. Some people seem to bring off the trick of making everyone feel free without impairing the freedom of anyone else.

This unavoidable difficulty, that there can be no tolerance without some intolerance, that there really exists an intolerance that is a condition of generous tolerance, has another unpalatable aspect: There is no clear and handy criterion that would allow us to determine the exact dosage of tolerance and intolerance, of tolerance for one party and intolerance for the other, and the other way around. Who would be able to set up such a criterion? Is not the whole of human history with its unceasing conflicts between freedom and coercion, with its ceaseless efforts to combine the greatest possible freedom with the least possible coercion, not an ever new proof that there does not exist any handy criterion that will solve all conflicts?

[24] True, from the second part of our remarks one may certainly deduce the maxim that there should be as much freedom and room for freedom as possible and as few instances of restricting and intolerant coercion as possible. But what is the meaning of "as much as possible" and "as few as possible," since freedom ought to exist and since coercion, which contradicts freedom, has to exist as well in order for there to be freedom? There is no such criterion. Should it exist, history would stop and vanish. Neither socialism, which openly wants to restrict everyone's possibilities of freedom and reconcile them in the name of the common good, nor an absolute liberalism, which would give total freedom to all parties, can serve as such a criterion. We cannot escape history, in which the concrete coexistence of freedom and necessity must always be determined ever anew and always in a different way. However, even if this situation cannot be changed, one thing is possible and, as shown above, is in agreement with human and Christian principles. It is also for us a duty for the future.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PRE-EMINENCE OF FREEDOM

The presumption favors freedom. There can exist unavoidable necessities, coercions, and restrictions of freedom. But in the final analysis they have to justify themselves before the bench of freedom, and not the other way around. People may be firmly of this mind. Whether they really are, or only expect others to be, while they themselves betray this maxim in their own attitudes and actions, can quite simply be found out from their answer to the following question: Are you really willing to grant freedom to the other person, insofar as it can be done without harming others, even when you hold a different opinion and have the power to prevent others from doing what they want? Are you willing and patient enough, as far as possible, to find out and to try to feel what others (or another group) want to be and how they want to understand themselves?

The sincere answer to this question with a genuine yes might show whether such tolerance and readiness for dialogue are at hand. But since this question too includes the condition “as far as possible,” the sincerity of the answer is ultimately hidden in the solitude of the individual conscience that can be judged only by [25] God, although the effort must be made, in dialogue, to find out whether the answer was really honest. This allows the theologian to say that all persons will one day be judged before God about this point: whether they have really granted to their neighbor, individually and collectively, the freedom that is their inalienable and most personal right, whether they have in that sense been tolerant and willing to dialogue.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[26]

3

UTOPIA AND REALITY: THE SHAPE OF CHRISTIAN EXISTENCE CAUGHT BETWEEN THE IDEAL AND THE REAL

The combination of the words “utopia” and “reality” points to a basic dualism in human existence. Biologically humans have a lower and an upper, an inner and an outer, component. Their personal reality proceeds from a present that is the product of a past and moves toward a still to be realized future. By experiencing the given realities they discover the basic norms of their activity, by which they measure the positive or negative value of their reality. They speak of an earth and look forward to a heaven. They would like to be sober realists as well as persons who strive creatively for higher goals. Whether happy or unhappy, they measure their reality by standards that are distinct from it. Fortune and misfortune, success and failure, life and death, truth and error, and thousands of like dualisms show that they do not live in complete identity with themselves, that from countless points of view they exist as a unity that remains a diversity. No wonder then that the two words “utopia” and “reality” are juxtaposed and experienced in both their distinction and their mutual relationship.

THE DUALISM OF UTOPIA AND REALITY

But what is utopia? What do we mean by it? What is reality? Which one is meant here? And what have all these ideas and questions to [27] do with the way Christians shape their life and their world? The words “ideal” and “reality” in the subtitle of this article should, for clarity’s sake, be understood in the same sense as utopia and reality. What we are doing is to inquire about the Christian way of shaping life and the world, insofar as this shaping is caught between utopia and reality.

What do we mean here by utopia? This word, coined by St. Thomas More, should not be taken as referring to everything that has not yet been realized, and for which we keep striving, although reaching it is arduous, uncertain, and even unlikely. We beg to be allowed to understand utopia here as those goals and tasks that persons not only can but ought to strive for. As task and duty they stand unrealized before us, they seem to demand too much of us, they look as though they will never be realized.

Humanity seems to be burdened with countless such utopias. We want biological and social security, and we feel threatened and uncertain in our biological and economic existence. We want to know, that is, to get a well-organized picture of reality in our minds, and we admit that we do not succeed very well. We realize that the gap between what we might know and what we actually do know keeps growing, because the knowledge made available to human beings by the sciences is growing much faster than what an individual can assimilate. We admit that we should practice justice and charity in our relations with others, yet at the same time we are aware of a pervasive and virulent selfishness. We cannot get rid of our metaphysical need, our groping awareness of God. Yet we feel inclined to resist God, preferring to stay on earth, the earth we investigate and use with our own power, to our own profit. We want to realize ourselves (as the saying goes) and yet we keep failing. Our life goals remain unrealized. We set up high standards for our environment and society; we fight for a more ideal organization of our society. And the new organization is as much a disappointment as the former one. It is ephemeral, premature, dragging along the unforeseen consequences of what we had in mind. There is no need to go on with a description of this dualism between utopia and reality. We all know of it, suffer from it in our own lives, and in our dealings with Church and State.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[28]

THE IDEALISTIC AND THE REALISTIC SOLUTION OF THE CONFLICT

Equally well known are the many false ways that are used to take care of this basic human situation. A brief mention of them will suffice.

First there are the idealists who cannot get along with reality and try to escape into the heaven of their ideals. Countless are the ways and methods of such false idealism that we, sinners that we are, all practice to some extent. Here is the person who wants to get out of public life, who is unwilling to dirty his hands with politics, who is looking for a quiet realm of private happiness, of leisure, of mere estheticism, of pure ideas. There are the snobs, the homesick, the romantics, the people whose slogan is Horace's "Odi profanum vulgus et arceo" (I hate the vulgar mob and I keep it away from me). There are the Christian idealists whose main occupation is to suffer on account of their Church. There is the person who regrets the greatness and splendor of the former German Reich. There are those who have fathomed the shabbiness and wretchedness of their fellow human beings (generally not their own; however, when they have unmasked themselves, they enjoy this too as the most sublime form of idealism and truth). All these and many other forms of idealism have this in common: that they consider what they discover in human reality, explicitly or implicitly in human conduct, as hopelessly and pitifully wanting. Idealists in this sense are basically people whose "ideals" are not contained in reality, even in germ, but merely hover above so-called reality as its condemnation. This attitude, as we said, does not have to take shape in a theory. It is present where one can only suffer from reality; where one tries to keep away from everything painful, like cardiac patients who avoid whatever might upset them; where one finds in one's beloved ideals solace for failures in real life; where one looks instinctively for protection from present social crises, there to remain as unbothered as possible; where one knows everything better than others, especially politicians and church leaders, who are responsible for the lamentable everyday reality.

The second way in which one wrongly tries to tackle the basic human condition and its dualism is that of the so-called realists. They are proud of the sober outlook with which they view the shabbiness of life and of humanity, without getting upset about it. [29] They are ethical Darwinists, who take it for granted that human life is a struggle for existence in which the hardiest come out on top. They coldly consider the utterances of politicians and clergy to be unrealistic fog, which others – but not they themselves – need as analgesic for life's woes. They hold on to the solid pleasures of life, while carefully avoiding excess. If they still think occasionally of God, they consider their success in life a concrete proof of the divine blessings they deserve. They are fierce and convinced defenders of the social order as the best protector of their own profitable situation. We might add, of course, that there are such closet realists in the Church.

FRAGMENTS OF A CHRISTIAN ANSWER

Keeping in mind this dualism, which is ineradicably rooted in human nature, and the false attitudes, made possible although not justified by this dualism, a few things are to be said about the Christian way of shaping life and the world between the ideal and the real. Let it be said at once that we can, of course, not give practical prescriptions, and that whatever can be said is presented here in rather arbitrarily selected fragments. We are not offering advice for a specific purpose, for which concrete directions should be given. We are speaking in general about self-realization and self-understanding, which cannot be put down in something like a system of coordinates, from a position outside of them. If therefore appeal has to be made to our all-encompassing existence, which loses itself in God's incomprehensibility, it stands to reason that this appeal can be made only in rather arbitrarily chosen fragments.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

TAKING THE UTOPIA OF GOD SERIOUSLY

It is possible to define the Christian understanding of existence as the conviction that what seems to be utopian is the true reality. Hence so-called reality must be viewed as utterly dependent, as provisional, as that which possesses the lower degree of reality, even though we should not, like some Eastern mystics, consider it a mere unreal appearance. This in fact is obvious or, rather, should gradually become obvious through the experience of a long [30] Christian life. Do we not say: There exists an infinite, absolute, eternal God, who is distinct from the world and for whom we are intended; the history of our freedom terminates inexorably in the very immediacy of this God, whom we hope to meet as our redeeming, forgiving, liberating judgment. At the same time, however, Christian faith does not overlook the fact that this God dwells in inaccessible light, that even in face to face vision, God remains for all eternity unfathomable in his nature and in the decisions of his freedom. That is precisely why Christian faith exhorts us to take seriously the world and our tasks in it, with all their humdrum, apparently ephemeral trifles. Our faith tells us that we are responsible before God for this world and our tasks in it, insofar as they depend on the freedom with which we are entrusted. As St. Paul says, this is the way we must work out our salvation: in fear and trembling. For our innermost existence in freedom, as it is inexorably imposed upon us, God is not just a random or even doubtful factor at the edge of our existence, one we might discreetly and somewhat skeptically ignore. God is the reality that suffuses everything, orders everything, attracts everything toward himself and away from us. And precisely as this incomprehensible reality, God renders all other realities around us questionable, relative, and imbued with their own incomprehensibility.

Are we Christians not the people who call this utopia, which we cannot control either in thought or in action, God, whom we consider the true and genuine reality? Are we Christians not the people who consider heaven not only an additional boon that one might (and why not?) welcome at the end but as an integral part of our earthly reckoning and of our "real" life? Of course, one should proclaim a Gospel that loves the earth. Of course, it is impossible to take the tasks of this earth, if correctly understood, seriously enough; of course, one should praise the beauty of the earth, the greatness of humanity, the splendor of love. But it remains true that the God for whom we are headed, for whom we exist, to whom we will have to render an account, is totally other, totally different from the "real" realities with which our experience is concerned. And this God may not be reduced to being the mere splendor with which we exalt our own reality, or try at least to render it somewhat more cheerful. As Christians we are deeply convinced that we exist for God. In his sovereign absolute majesty God is not just an additional item that must balance the budget of our life. Only when we [31] have decided to adore God in his absolute sovereignty, only when we even try to love God with a boldness that seems to be wholly beyond our power, only when in awed silence we capitulate before his incomprehensibility and welcome this capitulation of our knowledge and our life as the beginning of our deepest freedom and our eternal salvation, only then do we start to be Christians. Are we then not the people of a holy utopia and not the people of a so-called realism? Are we not convinced that by thinking and living in this way we grasp genuine reality, whereas we consider and treat what we call reality as merely a stage,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something provisional, even something that is secretly already suffused with and saved by the so-called utopia.

And so the theme of Christian existence between utopia and reality confronts us with the inexorable question: Are we successful in our attempts to consider and to treat as the genuine reality a remote utopia which seems at first very unreal, very difficult to measure and hard to handle, compared to which the obvious solid reality becomes unreal? Do we Christians have the courage to reverse the standards with which we measure what we consider to be the real? Do we have the courage to feel that we are, as the Bible says, pilgrims and aliens in a world that allows one to speak of God at most only at the graveside or from the pulpit, and that finds it embarrassing to talk about God anywhere else? Is all of this too weighty for the idealist, too utopian for the realist? Are God and faith in eternal life part of our everyday life, or is this reality only, an object of pious devotion on Sundays, whereas our everyday morality does not really differ from that of an atheist? Let there be no doubt about it: The "between" of the duality "utopia and reality" truly means that we must turn upside down the standards with which we judge reality and that the appeal of the so-called utopia should be for us the most solid reality.

ENDURING THE LASTING TENSION BETWEEN FULFILLMENT AND LACK OF IT

What all of this really means for us becomes clear when we keep in mind that this tension between utopia and reality, the ideal and the real, is not accepted as soon as we affirm a theoretical statement [32] about it. What is ultimately at stake is not that we Christians affirm theoretically the lasting tension between the ideal and the real, between heaven and earth. Accepting such a theoretical statement is not the same as reacting in the right way to this tension. Theoretically one can be a Christian and still unconsciously in practical life, by siding either with idealism or with so-called realism, not live up to this tension that confronts our freedom. As long as the history of our freedom has not reached its goal, we are always in via, always pilgrims, and thus always people who disrupt to some extent the unity in diversity that is given with this tension. We are people who half-heartedly avoid the radical appeal that is called God, who overlook the fact that we must always correspond to this absolute appeal by faithfully fulfilling our earthly tasks. We are told that we must love God with our whole heart and our whole strength, and, at the same time, admit that we are sinners. Does this not imply that we never totally answer God's absolute appeal, that like idealists we do not take the familiar reality of our existence seriously enough as the way of obeying God's appeal, or that we do it in the wrong way by claiming, like the realists, that daily duty has nothing to do with God's absolute appeal. We are in fact, all of us, half-hearted, unable to discover the right stance between that appeal and so-called reality. We are always swinging back and forth between the danger of losing our hearts to an idealistic dreamlike heaven and the danger of godlessly loving the earth. Moreover, the Christian message teaches that we cannot even tell ourselves with conscious certitude exactly which position we occupy within this tension. We are invited to be full of hope and leave to God's judgment the question of how things really stand with us, of whether we have a good or a bad conscience. We come from a beginning that we ourselves did not initiate. We plod along like pilgrims on a road whose end disappears in the incomprehensibility and the freedom of God; we are stretched between heaven and earth, and we have neither the right nor the possibility of giving up either one. One is not the other, yet neither can be realized without the other. We never know with absolute certitude how our deepest freedom stands with regard to this unavoidable situation of our existence; we have to accept our origin, and we must give our deepest love to the appeal and the end that are called God. And whether or not we really do this, even that we must hopefully leave to God. Christian existence cannot forego any of these [33] requirements. That constitutes its greatness, its radical difficulty, and its ultimate obviousness, because outside of it there is nothing that it might question.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

LIVING WITH HOPE IN GOD

To accept in the right and salutary way the unavoidable dualism between the ideal and the so-called real is called in usual Christian terminology "hope borne by God's grace." Hope is one of the three basic attitudes that establish humanity in a right relationship to God. It is obvious that the salutary acceptance of the enduring tension between the ideal and the so-called real can be called Christian hope. Christians cannot decide for themselves what their "ideal" is to be. Rather they are obliged to strive for the absolute reality of God in immediacy. If they did not do this they would miss the essential destiny that they cannot refuse. Christians have no right to be satisfied with a fulfillment that would be less than God in himself. They have no right to settle down forever in their own finiteness, which would remain familiar and could be arranged as they please. They have to make God their hope, their absolute hope. The eternally incomprehensible God cannot be put, with his essence and his freedom, into a system of coordinates that would be more comprehensive than God. That is why this hopeful striving for God necessarily appears to be totally beyond our power. It can be endured only because God, through his own reality, renders us able to endure it. In that sense we have a right to say that Christian hope is a utopia, since God alone, whom we can neither grasp nor manipulate, allows us to demonstrate that it is possible and meaningful.

Accepting a permanent dualism between the ideal and the real is, when interpreted in a Christian way, really utopian, not only because of the end for which our hope strives but also because of the starting point of this striving. The dualism which we have to endure between the ideal and the so-called real asks us to strive for God, who is not one available object among the so-called realities with which we deal in our daily activities. This hope that aims beyond everything graspable is not supposed to leave the so-called realities behind in their empty glitter, it must carry them along in this hopeful movement, bringing them to perfection as a [34] mediation of its own irresistible dynamism toward God, without identifying God with this mediation. The so-called realities remain different, provisional, impossible to harmonize, yet precisely because we endure and accept them in their limitation, conditionality, and contradiction, they make it possible for us really to accept God as the only absolute goal to our hope and striving. We hope in God when we accept the earthly realities in fidelity as provisional, perishable, and fragile, without trying to find in them a definite end. Hope keeps on advancing and always carries along with itself, while mysteriously transforming, the things which it seems patiently to skip.

PATIENTLY WAITING FOR THE DAWNING OF GOD'S MYSTERY AMID THE GROWING PERPLEXITY

But as we try in this way patiently to accept the immediate so-called realities as mediation of our absolute hope, this so-called reality remains nonetheless what it is and as it is imposed upon us: incomprehensible, forever unfinished, forever resisting a harmonious synthesis. All of this is getting worse today in a way that could not have been imagined in former times. While more and more of reality falls within human powers, at the same time it remains as incomprehensible and unfinished as ever. These features affect our own activity and freedom; they are turning into a burden that humankind has never before experienced to this extent. Let us honestly admit it: Our bewilderment keeps growing. True, we are forced, individually and collectively, to make decisions, an obligation we cannot shirk. But the presuppositions of these decisions are becoming less and less transparent. The more the natural and human sciences develop, continually providing more data for consideration before any major decision, the less transparent are the conditions for our decision. So many possibilities and points of view are presented that we get lost. Today only the simpleminded and the foolish know exactly what should be done by individuals and groups. In earlier times, it seemed as though nature, without consulting us, had imposed on us or preprogrammed for our decision most of what made up our life. That is why more things were obvious to us than is the case today. Individually [35] and collectively, painfully groping and half-blind, we advance along life's path.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To accept such perplexity, to admit and bear it, belongs to our Christian task. We must today carry it out soberly and without idealistic obfuscation. For Christians, perplexity in life is, in the final analysis, nothing but the concrete dawning of the sacred mystery that we call God. Our perplexity should ultimately not astonish us. Wherever we can, we should get rid of it, try to clear it up. But even if we fight it bravely and resolutely, we will not overcome it. It lingers, it overpowers individuals in their lives. The only question is whether we take it as the unveiling of the basic absurdity of life or as the concrete dawning of the Mystery that we accept as our saving, forgiving, fulfilling, and absolute future. This is ultimately the only alternative, from which we cannot run away.

However, the option for either alternative can once more become strangely veiled and ambiguous. An attitude that pretends to be a quiet hope of eternal life may in reality be the veil hiding a so-called realistic way of life that is satisfied in false moderation with the scanty happiness of the present life. And the passionate, seemingly desperate protest against the absurdity of our existence may be the, way in which a fundamental hope may be realized, a hope that finds what it is looking for nowhere on earth, a hope for infinite fulfillment.

Although we may still hear the last echoes of a triumphant humanism that claims to have reached the limits of its self-made fulfillment, today we are assailed by a feeling that we have lost our way, a feeling that all our beautiful ideals are quickly becoming threadbare. Dissonant voices urge us to do a thousand things at once; hopelessness is spreading so inexorably that all ideals, old and new, all programs for the future, which still have a following, look pitiful and lack impact.

In this situation we Christians are not allowed to give up, we must continue to do what our times and every-day life expect from us. We do not even have the right to hope for an end to earthly progress in our history and society. We Christians know that ultimately we should not and cannot choose at our liking the time for the history of our salvation. That is why as human beings and as Christians we have no reason to pretend to be very cheerful nowadays. It seems to me that, if we are honest, we must [36] say that we are living in a wintry season, wintry in both society and Church. Undoubtedly we always have good reasons to demand more from ourselves than we can actually accomplish. But we do not have to ask too much from ourselves, nor from politicians, nor from church leaders. We do not have to act as if, with a little more courage and good will, our individual and collective situation would be changed into one of sheer pleasure and joy. Demanding too much would show that we are putting our hope not in God, but in ourselves.

If the global situation that we are living through, which looks like a harsh winter, is imposed on us, then, having done what we are able with resignation and patience, we have the right to accept the situation as the mysterious dawning of the eternal mystery of God, the end we can and must reach. Christians should not try to avoid failure, disappointment, and adversity by means of strange ideological nostrums that are for sale in society and in the Church. They can, with faith, hope, and charity, accept these adversities as the nearing of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation incomprehensible God. The more frightful, the more hopeless everything looks, the more certain is God's arrival.

THE TEST OF DEATH

What we have said must now be put somewhat more concretely, even at the risk of sounding pietistic, of smacking of that private interiority that can be defended today only by an old-fashioned theology. Each of us has to answer before God questions of whether we have fulfilled our political task, whether we have loved our neighbor, whether we have respected people's freedom and treated them with justice. If this life of ours, with its unavoidable "political" component, has been lived the right way, it will be gloriously harvested in our eternity. Yet it moves inexorably toward death, which does not carry us away into nothingness, but forever surrenders us with the history of our freedom. Our death must be endured by us in loneliness before God. And that is where it will be revealed to each of us once and for all whether we have faced in our life the tension between the ideal and the so-called real; whether we have run away from that tension, either into a pseudo-idealism or a pseudo-realism; whether we have always [37] renewed our efforts to overcome the tension between the ideal and the real, aiming at the point where our contribution might be tendered, where we ourselves, having been enabled by God's grace fully to realize our ideal, will have been united in blessed union with the eternal God in his infinite, holy, incomprehensible splendor.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[38]

4

THE THEOLOGICAL DIMENSION OF PEACE

Peace is a very complex reality. That is why the topic of peace has many aspects to it. I would like to say a few words here about a theological dimension of peace. Peace has in fact many theological dimensions, for all the complex realities that make for peace in the family, in the neighborhood, in the state, in the international community of peoples, refer, each one in its own way, to God; hence the many aspects of the theological dimension of peace. But I intend to shed some light only on one of these dimension, without touching the others.

Let us, for brevity's sake, call "conflict" the opposite of peace. We may then inquire: How does conflict arise? The answer is that conflict among people presupposes that the many realities, particularities, and dimensions that make up humankind, the human community, and its environment do not from the start harmonize without friction. No wonder, since in this world created by God created, hence finite, realities do not constitute a harmony in which every reality immediately fits in with all others. Possibly there are explanations for this beyond the fact that the world and whatever is in it are finite and borne by history. At any rate, this is the way things are, and we have simply to accept this fact humbly and soberly. The multifarious realities do not – at least to the human mind – fit together harmoniously.

[39]

REASONABLE ADJUSTMENTS AND COMPROMISES

As a result of this situation conflict arises among people because they disagree about the way of fitting together the various components of human existence. Every person defends, so to speak, the particular nature of a certain reality, and is unwilling to yield anything on behalf of another element within human existence, which in turn makes its own claims. There is, for instance, only a limited amount of wealth. Everyone lays claim to a greater part of it. Total harmony must be brought about at the cost of some sacrifices to be made by the individual components. When people cannot agree where and from whom such sacrifices, such restrictions, such concessions should be demanded, conflict arises among them.

Now it is clear that almost every such conflict might be settled with the help of some common sense, moderation, and peaceableness. We only have to find out where and to what extent certain concessions can be imposed so as to reach some balance among the various claims of the different realities. We might say that, roughly speaking, all conflicts can be settled. Peace can be reached in the various personal and social domains if everyone is willing to accept such reasonable and obvious restrictions, sacrifices, and concessions. Basically all efforts to reach peace aim at an equilibrium between the claims of individuals and those of groups. As a rule, resolution of conflict is brought about by reasonable adjustments and compromises.

THE REALM OF UNCONDITIONED FREEDOM

Yet, on closer examination, there are in human life many cases of conflicts and endeavors to settle them where things are not so simple. For in many instances – possibly in all conflicts of some importance – it happens that one of the parties in such a conflict may be forced to forego something for the sake of peace and yet receive no perceptible compensation in return.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

True, very often we cay say that a compromise that leads to peace is better for all parties than if one party tries to prevail, without foregoing its own wishes or needs. In a trade war or in a modern nuclear war all parties would fare worse than if they are agreed on a reasonable [40] compromise whereby each one of them would have given up some advantages.

Yet, as we said above, in many cases at least, or maybe even in all serious conflicts, there are situations in which peace is possible only if either or both parties forego something without any compensation, or even without a word of thanks from the other side, as if the outcome were obvious. How would the woman who in midlife has been hurt by the infidelity of her husband be rewarded if, for the sake of the children, she foregoes a divorce? What about a politician who in a political conflict respects the truth and, in order to stay honest, admits that he was wrong, showing that he has regard for the rights of his opponent as much as for his own? Do people respect and thank him for it? Or is he not publicly or privately mocked as an idiot who cannot take care of himself? There are in human life then situations in which concessions and sacrifices are expected that are not really and manifestly rewarded in a sufficient and visible way by the peace that ensures. Life's accounts, even with regard to peace, never come out exactly and smoothly through nicely balanced human computations.

This is the area where a religious dimension of peace comes up, of which we intend to say a few words. In the final analysis, if we do not want to destroy ourselves, we cannot simply give up all claims to things that are radically important for our own existence and self-realization, or that are generally considered such, without demanding that this sacrifice be compensated in some other way. But how will this sacrifice be compensated, when such a compensation is obviously impossible in ordinary experience? There are enough conflicts in which we wonder bitterly, and not without reason, why we ourselves should be the "sucker" who has to pay so that there may be peace.

In such cases persons can have the generosity and inner freedom to accept such sacrifices in silence and without reward only if they are open to that reality and fulfillment which we call God. We might almost say by way of definition: God is the real, universal, and all-encompassing possibility of that peace, the possibility and meaningfulness of which can no longer be shown by means of the individual elements that constitute human reality. In the final analysis only those persons can be peace-loving who are convinced that there is a being able to bestow upon human existence an ultimate, undeniable, indestructible meaningfulness. We call that being God.

[41] Those who believe in God feel no need frantically to defend as absolute something that is so meaningful to them that, even in a radical human conflict, they would be unwilling to give it up. Only those persons who are open to God and to their own fulfillment in God do not have to accept an all-out conflict, when they are faced with the need of sacrifice for the sake of peace, even a sacrifice that takes away from them important values. That is why the question of the presuppositions of peace points to a religious dimension. Persons who, for the sake of peace, succeed in renouncing very important values without thanks or approbation, and even at times without being rewarded by the feeling of their own unselfishness, only such persons have, whether they know it or not, reached the realm of unconditional peace, the realm of the grace of God.

NOT PUTTING UP WITH EVERYTHING

We have referred to God as the condition of the possibility of peace through a renunciation that is not rewarded by some other advantage. This does not mean, of course, that every conflict can be settled in this way. There have always been powerful rulers who, for the sake of a peace that suits them well, urge others to give in, to be quiet and reasonable. Such rulers

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

selfishly want to turn religion into the opium of the people. To reach their own purposes they exhort others to be submissive, reasonable, willing to make sacrifices, and to yield without protest. Persons who are totally open to God and who discover in God the ultimate unsurpassable justification of their way of acting may also in some instances resist, fight, and incur the risk of war, even though they cannot be certain of a favorable outcome. Those who have God for an ally do not have to put up with everything; when their conduct is lawful in God's eyes, they cannot perish in such a conflict.

What we should do in individual cases, whether we should fight for the sake of legitimate earthly realities or, prompted by God, make some sacrifice for the sake of peace, cannot be decided in the light of such general considerations. Persons who are free in God may, in some instances, either venture into conflict or avoid it, and they may do this on the ground of the same ultimate relation to God. In the domain of everyday experience, there exists a love [42] of peace that goes without reward and that people can harbor only if they are open to God. Naturally this also implies that such peace-loving people are open to God, even if they cannot explicitly ten themselves that they are.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[43]

5

THE PROBLEM OF EUROPE'S FUTURE

I shall start with a few preliminary remarks that may, perhaps somewhat immodestly, be called part of a philosophy and theology of history. It is, of course, impossible in an article of this length to offer a philosophy and theology of history with all their many and different themes. Nor may we take for granted that they are known and apply them to our problem of Europe's future. The only thing we can do is choose, perhaps somewhat arbitrarily, a few considerations from this philosophy and theology. Explaining them rather than starting from an empirical analysis of the present situation may show more clearly why we have a right to inquire about Europe's future. Let me present some considerations without explicitly distinguishing between a philosophy and a theology of history.

THE FUTURE AND THE PROBLEM OF THE WHOLE

Mere historical curiosity naturally gives thought not only to the present but also to the possibilities of the future. Positivistic pragmatism, after the manner of politicians and futurologists, probes the foreseeable future of the world as well as of Europe. The question we are about to examine might for a start be formulated as follows: Are there other reasons and considerations showing that it is meaningful and necessary to inquire about Europe's future?

Today's sceptics understand rather easily that such an inquiry does not immediately make sense. It is true that Europe refers to [44] a certain region distinct from other parts of the world. Its history too has some unity that separates it from other historical developments. With all its diversity it shows some "cultural" unity that distinguishes it from other cultures. It possesses a common biological (ethnic) substratum; it has its European community, and so on. Nevertheless, one might wonder whether the word "Europe" does not signify an object that, on closer examination, disintegrates before the observer into the destinies of individuals or into a network of causes and effects that, despite all artificial delimitations, is, or is slowly becoming, identical with the totality of human history.

Today's sceptics will further inquire whether it is possible to make any even slightly reliable predictions about the real future of Europe and of the world. Is it not a fact that, except for the very near future and for foreseeable developments, especially of a technical nature, we know and can know, nothing about the future?

Today's sceptics will ask whether it is possible to say anything serious about the "meaning" of the future of humanity in general and of Europe in particular. They have the impression that one can discover particular connections between aspects of their history and their society, which may at times mean something like real progress. But such particular findings, like small islands of meaning in an ocean of the unknown and the unknowable, do not yield any clear meaning of the whole. Nor do they yield any norms that tell us how things ought to go further, either for the "meaning" of the history of humankind as a whole or for Europe in particular.

Finally, today's sceptics will admit a few moral norms for their private lives and their immediate environment, but they will be inclined to doubt whether it is possible to enunciate binding moral norms for history and politics in general. Determining factors in biology and economics may allow some predictions, but it is doubtful whether norms, ideals, and directions can be formulated for the way in which Europe itself should envisage its own future. Even if we overlook the skeptical experiences of the present, the problem of Europe's future seems to be a very obscure problem.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is not a particular or a "regional" problem within the totality of individuals and their world. It concerns the totality itself. That is why (although it needs the help of particular sciences and human experience) it is ultimately a problem of metaphysics, of faith, of an option that can supply an answer only to those who fully trust this special kind of knowledge, in which persons are involved as [45] a whole with the whole of their reality. All these decisions about the future of Europe directly or indirectly concern the entire person amid the peoples of Europe as a whole and, given the present unity of world history, the totality of humankind. Such questions are ultimately no longer questions about this or that fragment in the whole of reality. They are questions about the whole world. That is also why such questions can be asked and answered only as a result of a precomprehension of the whole of reality. They are, as it were, not questions about a single point in a system of coordinates but questions about the system itself as a whole – and thus questions of a metaphysical anthropology and of the way persons understand themselves in faith. Moreover, they are questions that cannot be answered only through an abstract theory. In order to be answered "rationally" and in a responsible way, they require a free decision, faith, and the help of praxis. One would misunderstand human existence if one were to think that ultimate clarity and certainty can be reached by abstract knowledge alone, independently of an existential option.

ABOUT THE REALITY OF EUROPE

We are now trying to reflect on the different elements of our problem and to do it in the manner mentioned above, which, compared with the historical sciences and with an empirical analysis of the present time is somewhat a priori.

Here is our first question: Can we take it for granted that Europe is a "reality" about whose present and future state we can seriously say anything really important? The question itself is not very clear and should first be explained. When Christian metaphysicians and theologians say something about individual persons, they are convinced (or at least were until the Enlightenment) that these persons have a lasting and definitive value in their nature and in the history of their freedom, that they are "immortal," that, with the enduring achievements of their history and despite all necessary transformations, they end up forever in the eternity of God. This continues to be the conviction of Christians, at least on the basis of their faith. In this sense persons, at least as individuals, have absolute significance, absolute importance. They cannot be reduced to disparate elements and thus be eliminated.

[46] Hence, as a Christian metaphysician and theologian, one can inquire whether such absolute significance and importance also belongs to human collectivities, or whether such units (a social group, a people, a historical epoch, a culture, and so on) belong only to those unavoidable but purely provisional phenomena within whose ephemeral reality persons must develop the history of their own freedom, mere phenomena that disappear as soon as the proper meaning and achievement of history have been reached in the definitiveness of each persons before God. When one seriously considers the possibility that human collectivities may have, at least analogically, such absolute significance as, according to our Christian faith, belongs to human persons, one may also be emboldened to inquire whether "Europe" belongs to the collectivities that are endowed with eternal significance. This does not mean, of course, that Europe will certainly exist in time as long as humankind as a whole exists. It means that Europe as such enters into the definitiveness of history, as does each human being, despite the brevity of human life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Inquiring about the significance of collective human reality in general, and eventually of Europe in particular, may seem to people, in the humdrum of their everyday lives, like a meaningless and empty speculation. But when historical decisions have to be made for such a collectivity, in this instance for Europe, is it not of the greatest importance to know whether they are being made in the perspective of such an absolute meaning, rather than with the implicit, politically fashionable, rhetorically touted conviction that at the end everything turns to nought or, at most, retains some importance only in the fate of individuals? One may ignore this question as unrealistic and artificial. But a Christian remains convinced that politicians as persons are responsible for their decisions before the tribunal of God. And thus we may wonder whether they do not have to submit to God's judgment not only the "intention" that motivated their political decisions but also the real consequences of those decisions in history. Are there then collectivities that have a significance which stands somehow (difficult to determine, of course) on the same level as that of individual subjects, although that significance is naturally not quite the same? If the answer to this question is affirmative, one may further inquire whether this may also apply to the collectivity "Europe," since [47] it stands to reason that all collectivities do not have the same importance.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF COLLECTIVE REALITIES

It is clear that this question can be answered only in connection with a human existential ontology. We can touch on it only briefly here. In the history of anthropology a perennial conflict exists between two conceptions of humanity. According to the first, persons are, in the final analysis, absolute individuals, free subjects, who ultimately exist in radical loneliness. All their "social" dimensions, starting from their biological dependence and extending to the most exalted and sublime creations of their social life, may be understood only as subordinate conditions that make it possible for them to be truly unique persons in freedom. According to the second conception, individuals are not only in fact members of a collectivity, they also exist and can be understood only as such. Individuals exist only so that the collectivity may exist, whatever the nature of this collectivity. Human individuality and human sociality probably represent (I do not want to put it more strongly) two ontological determinations of the human. They cannot exist independently of one another. Neither can one be reduced to the other as a mere aspect of it, as a condition of its possibility, and so on. These are two fundamental determinations of humanity, whose unity and difference are given simultaneously. In both this difference in unity and this unity in difference they refer to the mystery of the one God. It is in God's transcendent unity that the possibility of unity in diversity is rooted, in such a way that the different realities cannot be reduced to each other, while nevertheless constituting a real unity. (It stands to reason that this dialectic of unity and diversity, which finite realities cannot surmount, must be understood in many different ways, according to the degree of being and the multiple composition of each one of them.)

Let us suppose then (we might almost say with metaphysical boldness) that individuality and sociality are determinations of one and the same person that originate together and cannot be adequately reduced to each other. It follows then that, if persons have an absolute and eternal importance and significance, the same characteristics must also be ascribed to their sociality. Consequently, [48] human collectivities too have an analogous (although different) importance and definitiveness before God, similar to the one which a solid anthropology and Christian faith attribute to the person as an individual subject of freedom.

From the point of view of the history of Christian faith as well, the significance of collective human realities is almost obvious. In the history of salvation and faith (of both the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Old and the New Testament) an almost frightful development has occurred. Christian faith can assimilate it only by presupposing that the convictions that explicitly succeed each other in this history constitute the totality of the Christian understanding of humanity only if they are taken together, and that the stages of this history do not obliterate each other. In the Old Testament God made a covenant with a people, not strictly speaking with individuals. It does not matter here whether God, in privileging this partner Israel among a multitude of peoples, has chosen only that people, or whether an analogous relation of God to all other peoples cannot also be accepted. Such a relation would then have been more explicitly grasped by Israel; it became the foundation of the existence of Israel as a people. At any rate, here a people is the addressee of the divine activity. Individuals are important only if and insofar as they take part in the righteous activity of this people, as directed by its covenant with God. Individuals (in their explicit conscious mind) feel safe and know that they are approved and accepted by God if this people continues to live in an obedient relationship to the God of the covenant. The least we can say is that, through long centuries of Israel's history of faith, the question of the eternal significance of the individual is less important than the significance of the people before God.

In the New Testament, after a pre-history of the specifically Christian anthropology that still belongs to the history of Israel, the way humankind is considered undergoes a change. It is true that we still hear of the Christian message being announced to peoples. Other similar Old Testament allusions to collectivities do not simply disappear, especially since the Church, as the main source of salvation, is herself a collectivity. Yet individuals and their salvation are now clearly occupying the foreground. Each one decides in freedom about his or her salvation and will with an inalienable responsibility, stand as an individual before the judgment seat of God.

[49] We should not say that these two conceptions are mutually exclusive, and that a New Testament "individualism" (if we can call it that) is the only valid position to be seriously considered in a Christian interpretation of history. Old Testament theology also remains valid. It recognizes "peoples" as subjects of salvation history, as it occurs within profane history. It speaks of their angels, God's name is invoked over them, a God of all peoples. To these peoples the Gospel of Jesus is preached. Hence it is difficult simply to reduce the salvation history of these peoples (hence their profane history as well) to that of individuals, even as the profane history of peoples cannot be reduced to the mere random interaction of individual histories. They undoubtedly influence each other, but together they also constitute a single meaningful whole. We Christians speak of God's eternal Reign, of the eternal communion of the saints with God. If we do not want to imagine, in the definitiveness of history in God, a kind of hierarchical grouping of individuals organized merely according to a formally moral standard, then, in this eternal realm of the definitiveness of freedom, the individuality of the supraindividual collective histories of peoples should also be maintained and recognized. How the diverse histories of such collectivities can enter into the definitive realm of freedom is beyond our present powers of comprehension, but it should be possible if history is not to have an ephemeral meaning but is itself to reach God's definitiveness. It should be possible if its contribution is to be more than some colorless production of morality or a mere sum of isolated free subjects who do not take with them into the definitiveness of history their collective historical unity. So we may boldly claim that historical collectivities also enter as such into the final consummation of history. They are more than ephemeral realities.

EUROPE AS PART OF THE DEFINITIVE CONSUMMATION OF HISTORY

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At this point the question arises whether Europe belongs to these realities to which one may attribute an absolute eternal significance, so that the problem of its future would derive its ultimate right and importance from that eternal significance.

First let us say that a positive answer to this question does not [50] imply that Europe as a historical entity and not just as a geographical reality must remain forever ("until the end of time") a notable historical reality. True, on the authority of the letter to the Romans, traditional Christian doctrine ascribes to the people of Israel as a historical reality a duration until the end of human history. We do not have to consider the question whether this idea is a dogma of the Christian theology of history or only a plausible idea. For people of earlier times, realities that were spatially, and even more temporally, very small and limited made up the history of humankind. People thought that history would not last very long, thus they could easily imagine that a single people might endure until the end of time, even while they were witnessing the downfall of whole peoples. Still, the thesis of the eternal significance of Europe before God does not imply the conviction that Europe as a historical collectivity has to be historically important forever to an extent that is in some way comparable to its importance today beyond its spatial reality. Even if Europe in that sense should "vanish" from the history of humankind, like other peoples that have disappeared, it might nevertheless belong to those historical realities that remain significant before God in and through the definitive salvation of their members. Of course, our inquiry also implies the question why and how Europe, through the content of its history, could continue as a collective individuality that would remain forever significant in the definitive consummation of universal history. Clearly we cannot present a detailed discussion of this question here.

The historical significance of Europe within the total definitive meaning of history before God derives from two reasons: first, from the special nature and importance of its profane history in itself and for the whole of humankind, an importance that has significance "anonymously" for salvation history; next, from the special contribution made by Europe in the history of its faith and its explicit salvation history, a contribution that is peculiar to it, as compared with the faith and salvation history of other peoples, and in this way is important also for other peoples.

While trying to demonstrate the "eternal" significance and importance of Europe by means of its function and achievements in the history of salvation, we do not mean, of course, that this is the only reason we attribute to it such eternal significance. We mean only that this is the easiest way to show its importance. These [51] achievements in the history of faith and salvation could concretely occur only in connection with the secular and temporal accomplishment of Europe. Moreover, many things happen in secular history that, through God's grace, are anonymously Christian. That is why the secular history of Europe and its peoples has eternal significance when we attribute to Europe a specific and unique task and achievement in the world's history of salvation and faith.

We do not have to consider the question of whether and how "Europe" should or should not be distinguished from the West, and how exactly its derivation from the history of Israel and from the Roman-Greek-Byzantine culture should be considered as part of its nature. These and similar questions cannot be explicitly discussed here.

Even though the concept "Europe" is not exactly unequivocal, we can say that in the unity and despite the diversity of its peoples, Europe is a reality that belongs to salvation history in a way that is analogous to the special position which the Christian theology of history ascribes to the people of Israel. We say analogous because we do not want to answer the question of how far this resemblance goes and yet how great the essential difference is, from the point of view of salvation history, between Israel and Europe. Neither do we have to examine here whether God's "covenant" with Israelis so unique in the salvation history of humankind, that the fact of being a "covenant people" should be denied to all other peoples,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

or whether the unique character of God's covenant with Israel means only that uniqueness with which God, in his goodness, speaks in an ever unique way to each people. We must also not forget to mention that the Christ of all peoples is descended, in that concrete uniqueness that belongs to every event in history, from the people of Israel and from no other people. But if, despite God's universal salvific will, which embraces every place and time, and by which God makes himself into the innermost entelechy and the ultimate end of the whole world, there exists a real history of salvation, then, Europe really has a function, with respect to the salvation of the whole world, resembling that of Israel.

The salvation of the world, starting from Israel, has proceeded throughout the whole of history since Christ from Europe. The importance of all peoples in universal history itself has a history, in which these peoples do not make their decisive contribution to universal history all at the same time. Thus it is not a disparagement [52] or a belittling of the historical vocation of peoples in Asia and Africa to admit that, despite its reprehensible colonialism, Europe has had for all peoples a unique significance. We can say with John that all peoples are called to adore God everywhere in spirit and in truth. They do not have to do it only in Jerusalem. It remains true however that the salvation of the whole world, in its enfleshment and explicitness, has a history. It is also true that salvation has come and continues to come through Europe in historical, ecclesial, and verbal concreteness to other peoples, somewhat in the way in which salvation originated from Israel. This historical uniqueness of Europe within salvation history allows us to consider Europe as one of the peoples that are also of eschatological importance before God, as they must be found in a theology of history that is not one-sidedly individualistic. It stands to reason that Europe's importance in salvation history is of particular significance in universal history, and that this can be seen in profane history as well.

It is true, as we will presently emphasize, that the future of humankind is for us practically unknown. Therefore we cannot know what special contribution Europe and other peoples will yet make to the future common history of humanity. This is true because, in a philosophy of history, it remains quite impossible to explain the factual course of history in the past, the present, and the future in such a way that the several stages and contributions of single peoples become clear for the whole of history. Nevertheless, we can mention some specific contributions of Europe to universal history, contributions that were morally required and that may rightly be considered as "progress" in the history of humanity.

Europe has brought about the unification of the diverse histories of peoples and cultures which used to be divided up regionally to a great extent. This unification into a single history of humankind makes all people interdependent. In this way Europe has introduced into what has become a unified history many features that the whole of humankind has adopted. We mean not only rational technical civilization but also higher human values in cultural and social life. But this topic belongs to the following sections. At any rate, Europe's function in salvation history, which presupposes and includes the secular, human contributions of Europe to the history of humanity, entails a reality and significance that does not depend [53] on individual preferences. For a theology of history, Europe is, at the least, a reality and challenge.

GOD'S SALVIFIC WILL FOR EUROPE

Perhaps we can explain what we said above more precisely. If Europe has a function in and a significance for the salvation history of the whole of humankind, and to some extent for profane history as well, and if this function and significance are analogous to that of Israel, then we may say analogically of Europe what, with Paul, the Christian theology of history

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

says of Israel: God's promises are irrevocable; they are never withdrawn. We have already said that this does not necessarily mean that Europe will constitute an important historical reality for all times. But it does mean that Europe has made a contribution to the definitive reality and meaning of universal history before God, a contribution that, in the final analysis, is undoubtedly positive. This is not readily obvious.

In a rational appraisal and in the light of a Christian conscience, when one thinks of all the historical absurdities and horrors that have filled Europe's history, it is not obvious that Europe has brought forth many positive results or that it deserves to be saved by God. We might make the same appraisal of the history of Israel, filled as it was with guilt and rebellion against God. Yet revelation tells us that, against almost all expectation, God pronounced a judgment on Israel that is definitively positive. Can we have the same hope for Europe? True, without being able to give theoretical reasons, Christians have the right to hope that the history of freedom as a whole will have a positive meaning. But this alone does not allow them to attribute positive value to particular historical realities and developments. If, on scriptural grounds, Christians can hold these convictions with regard to Israel, then, without venturing to prophesy about the world's future, they also have the right to the conviction that God harbors for Europe a salvific will that is active and irrevocable. Although this conviction is by no means indisputable, it seems that Christians can hold it.

This allows the European rightly to feel self-respect and a certain pride, which does not imply a boastful comparison with other Peoples and cultures. Rather it allows the European to be convinced that Europe, through its influence on salvation history and [54] therefore on profane history also, has had and still has a positive significance for universal history that matters before God. It also means that, although ignorant of the future of the world and of universal history, Europeans have no reason to lose heart.

EUROPE AS THE OUTCOME OF A FREE HISTORY

With the reality and significance that we have ascribed to it, Europe is not a mere matter of fact, but the outcome of the free history of real people, who have freely shaped this Europe in spite of all kinds of difficulties and obstacles. And thus the question necessarily arises how the freedom of those who are shaping Europe is related to Europe and its future. The following paragraphs offer a few considerations in response to this question, although they are perhaps no more than questions and guesses and merely an arbitrary selection from among such possible questions.

If Europe is the result of the freedom of former times, and if one may presuppose that the history of this freedom is not at an end, but that it goes on, then the problem of Europe's future is one that confronts the freedom and responsibility of the individuals who are shaping Europe today and who will shape it tomorrow.

About this freedom and responsibility for Europe, one must first say that Europe's future cannot be predicted with certainty. At first sight this statement is undoubtedly a platitude. Who would venture a precise and comprehensive answer to the question of how Europe will look in the year 2200? But we must add that a concrete prognosis, which would give one knowledge of what will happen in the future, is in principle impossible. Of course, there exists the science of futurology; research is being conducted that uses current data and the forces they contain to predict the future of the world and of Europe in particular. Presently we will have to say that such efforts to look into the future constitute a task that cannot be disregarded. But first we should emphasize that, despite all predictions and efforts to foretell it, of its very nature the future will always remain unknown. Much as concrete history in the present, past, and future is ultimately an inextricable unity of necessity and freedom, so every

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dimension of the human situation is also determined in part by human freedom. But this freedom is not only a carrying out of what is necessary and foreseeable. It always contains an element [55] of creativity that, strictly speaking, cannot be deduced from what has gone before. It is a free choice, a decision.

It is, of course, not possible to demonstrate here that, despite all coercive and determining factors forever acting upon them, persons are free beings. Nor is it possible to explain further where and how within human existence freedom is concretely at work, how human reflection is unable to pinpoint it exactly, how that which is immediately given to reflection is always an inextricable synthesis of necessity and freedom, and how therefore it remains always possible to declare that this concrete event was determined. Yet we must hold on to the conviction that freedom is not merely a metaempirical postulate behind an objective world of mere necessity, which would only conceal the subject's freedom, if such freedom exists at all. At least for the subjects who are facing history, who experience their own freedom and responsibility, it is something that always in some way becomes manifest in history itself.

Freedom is not merely the permanent moving factor of reason, praxis not merely that which follows from theory (and its defects). Freedom always creates the new and the unexpected. The many possibilities offered to freedom are not simply objective data, they become such only through the intervention of creative freedom. That is why history is always the merging of the unforeseeable and therefore a journey into an unknown future. Moreover, even if we were to consider history as the mere unrolling of necessary causal connections, ultimately the future would not be predictable. An all-encompassing and exact knowledge of the whole of reality, which would be presupposed for a clear prognosis, is beyond the reach of the human mind, since humanity is only part of the whole of reality. Finally, it is not clear to what extent some kind of indeterminism may be admitted within the subatomic domain.

UNPREDICTABILITY OF THE FUTURE

The journey into the future is therefore also a journey into the dark unpredictability of this future. A responsible activity cannot simply ignore this situation and, with shallow naïveté, content itself with the clear predictability of the immediate future. This uncertain situation means that human activity calls for certain 'virtues" Without which this journey into a dark future cannot be made in [56] a worthy and realistic manner. We should act courageously and take risks, we should decide to attempt more than the obvious, the tried, and the tested. Our "tutiorism" should be a tutiorism of taking risks, which never forgets that a healthy future, one that does not depend only on humans, can be reached only if we are ready to eschew a lazy conservatism, for which what is tried and tested is the supreme norm of activity.

The "principle of hope" – unlike a mere reliance on what is certain – belongs to the essence of a freedom that accepts risks. It belongs also to freedom as a journey into darkness when the future of Europe is at stake. Of course principle alone does not enable us to demonstrate which of the competing historical forces at work in Europe represents a program that is right and that promises Europe a healthy future. But all such competing elements in the concert of Europe should always be ready to answer the question whether they really have the courage to venture into a dark future, whether they have decided to let the future itself do what it has a right to do.

FUTUROLOGY

For those who are aware of their responsibility for Europe's future, that future is always, of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

its very nature, veiled in darkness; it can never be adequately foreseen by rational reflection and examination. This does not mean, of course, that prevision and planning for the future are not tasks that are unconditionally incumbent on people. They can and must plan for the future. Time and again they must ask: Where can we go from here and where should we go? These questions belong to the nature of persons as free subjects in history, and nowadays their answers are even more necessary and more widely possible. Futurology, in the strict sense of the word, such as is possible in our time, did not exist in earlier times; in fact it was not possible to any extent. Today, as free subjects, persons have entered a new stage. They have become responsible for themselves in a way and to an extent that did not exist in the past despite all the planning that occurred.

For today's futurology the whole world, in its great complexity and the mutual interaction of its parts, is open to careful scrutiny. Formerly people commanded a view of only a small section of the earth's total reality. For their philosophy and theology of history the [57] whole of humankind was but a formal postulate, an "Idea." Today futurology can try to predict the probable size of the human race a hundred years from now. To some extent, it can also compute in advance the quantity of resources available for humankind's biological survival in the future. Unlike former times, when people stumbled upon new and greater resources only by chance, it can systematically organized the search for them. In these and many other ways the future of humanity is entrusted in an entirely new way to people themselves and their active planning.

Persons are not and never will be absolute creators of themselves. Their creativity always involves presuppositions that do not depend on themselves, and involves inner and outer limits of their activity. Nevertheless, today persons are, to an extent that was unthinkable in the past, their own planners and creators, even though the experience of the limits of this self-shaping are once more and in new ways becoming clearer and harder to bear. Futurology, by which persons can shape their future, implies a wholly new responsibility. Not only can they plan, they must plan. This rational and technical pre-planning of their material and social environment, and even of their own biological make-up, is for free human subjects a duty that they cannot reject in a nostalgic yearning for the past when everything was simpler and more obvious. All of this applies to those who are responsible for the future of Europe as well.

THE COURAGE TO RISK AND TO PLAN

It is not easy for the Europeans who know that they are responsible for Europe's future to fulfill simultaneously and harmoniously the two obligations that we have mentioned: on the one hand, the courage to incur the risk of a future that basically cannot be computed in advance but that has to be shaped in creative freedom; on the other hand, sober and rational planning. If both obligations are simultaneously required, then Europeans also have the duty to give serious thought to the diverse sources of information and the criteria for such a futurology. The future of Europe, which demands the coordination of both these attitudes and tasks, should be the work not of a single person or of a select few, but ultimately of all Europeans. This brings up the question (as it always [58] did, but always in a new way) of how this collective free subject, composed of a multiplicity of individuals, can discover Europe's future.

The problem of the right composition of the collective agents to shape Europe's future cannot be decided by means of general abstract criteria, such as democratic equality of rights. Attention must be paid to the qualifications that will enable them to carry out their task. The ordinary way of conceiving the legitimacy of a democratic society and of a parliamentary regime may be based too simply and rather naively on the conviction that political decisions are ultimately not decisions of a creative freedom, but are merely the result of a synthesis of moral principles that are always and everywhere valid ("human rights" for example) together with the "necessities of the moment," which can be ascertained by means of scientific and demographic methods. Political decisions are, or certainly should be, partially of this kind, but they are also the real decisions of a collective freedom that always demands that those who make them are really capable of such decisions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

HISTORICAL AND FUTURE IDENTITY OF EUROPE IN A WORLDWIDE SOCIETY

The question of Europe's future is undoubtedly a question about a real future that must freely be shaped by standing the test of future historical situations. But of its very nature it is also the task of safeguarding the basic identity of Europe with its past history. Otherwise Europe would still have its former name and geographical localization, but it would no longer really be Europe.

This brings up a fundamental problem for the philosophy of history: Can we expect the values that have taken shape in Europe's past history to survive? Or will these values in their specifically European peculiarity unavoidably and inexorably disappear in the future, because that future belongs to a global civilization that is more or less the same all over the world? This problem does not refer to the survival of so called cultural values and historical "moments" as remnants of former times. If Europe is not physically obliterated, to some extent they will continue to exist. [59] Nor are we trying to find out whether Europe will in fact keep its own specific cultural values. The question is rather whether it is at all conceivable that a given regional culture can simply hold on to its own specific cultural characteristics and values in the global civilization that already exists and promises to exist in the future. Of course, in such a future worldwide civilization all historical regions will be interdependent, in universal communication with each other, sharing rational and technical knowledge. In such an environment the specific characteristics and values of a given culture will no longer be the same as they once were. The question is whether they can still survive at all. Or does the universal history of humankind tend inexorably toward a point where peoples and individuals, though they differ from each other in the color of their skin and the place where they live, no longer differ in what formerly distinguished the great cultures from one another?

There is no doubt that today we are still far from such a radical cultural uniformity in a generalized way of life (American, Russian or Chinese?). Nor can we doubt that in all great national and other cultures the trend toward uniformity is still counteracted by a resolve to insert one's own culture into the future of humankind in such a way that, despite peaceful coexistence and cultural exchange, contributory cultures may each remain distinct. But the question is whether such efforts in the future can be only a nostalgically delaying factor in history, or whether such a resolve (of Europe in our case) to keep its cultural originality and to transmit it to the future development of the whole of humankind can be a meaningful task and a right and a duty. The question is whether the resolve to remain faithful to oneself and to one's former history and characteristic ways of being human, and to continue to exist in this way in the future, can be justified before the historical and political conscience of Europe. Once more, the question is not whether Europe has this resolve and to what extent it will be carried out in the future. The question is only whether here and flow such a resolve, aiming at the future, really makes sense. That is not quite clear.

Cultures may perish, as has frequently happened in the past, even though heirs of such deceased cultures have always survived. Now, if such a cultural death is possible, the question may arise whether it would not be better and more courageous for a doomed culture

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to [60] realize that death is not far away and to accept it with resignation, just as individuals are supposed to do for their own unavoidable death. It might well be that, in the case of a dying culture, only shallow and ignorant people would behave as if their history were still to have a real future, while wise and courageous people would consciously forego such a spectacle. That is how Benedict left dying Rome, became a hermit in Subiaco and, in this and in no other way, became the "patron saint" of the West.

On the other hand, Christians draw from their theology of history the conviction that in principle it is possible for some specific cultural values, which are not to be found everywhere and always, to survive into a future that remains open. Their faith firmly holds that despite its particular origin an explicit Christianity will continue forever, although they cannot foresee what importance it will possess in the future empirical history, as compared with other historical influences and realities, and how exactly this historically imperishable Christianity will look in times to come. For instance, Holy Scripture, which will forever remain the foundation of Christianity, will retain the characteristics of its historical origins and still remain important for the future. That is why Christians cannot doubt that not every given historical particularity must eventually perish simply because it originated in history. We have demonstrated this conviction through the theology of history. This does not mean that this conviction might not also be derived, in a philosophy of history, from a study of actual history. We only wanted to submit one reason for this conviction, which, for a Christian humanist, may well be the simplest and the strongest.

DOWNFALL OR FUTURE OF EUROPE?

As to maintaining Europe's identity in future history, European Christians must face, in principle and in theory, two possibilities since neither may be rejected a priori: Europe may disappear as an autonomous and distinct cultural reality, fading into a global civilization that will absorb it; or it may in all essential respects retain its identity. The question is which of these abstract possibilities will be the one to be taken into account in making historical decisions. One will probably have to say that pondering this historical problem [61] will, at present, not lead to a clear and unequivocal answer, so that Europe's future still remains uncertain for us. As mentioned above, such a situation is to be expected, since it belongs to the very nature of historical freedom.

This uncertainty is no reason for giving up in the matter. It means that we can freely choose a course that may not a priori be considered impossible, that we can live with the resolve not to despair of the future of Europe but to safeguard it in its characteristic distinctiveness, even in the world's unknown future. Generally speaking, the full development of humanity does not consist in shaping a universal human being, who is everywhere the same, but rather in developing the open-minded and loving unity of all persons who, in the plurality of their distinctive characteristics, make up the human person. Hence the resolve to preserve Europe for the future, with its own values and peculiarities, should not be called a utopia or a meaningless selfishness that simply refuses to disappear into a uniform and homogenized world civilization. So the question that concerns us is no longer purely theoretical. It becomes an invitation to freedom, an invitation to undertake a struggle whose outcome is uncertain.

Moreover Christians at least can take heart from their theology of history, which tells them that something of Europe will continue to exist, even in its historical distinctiveness, insofar as Christianity will not perish in the world. Despite its universal appeal, and even because of it, Christianity can never deny, indeed it must always remember, its historical origin and even the way it has been historically transmitted. Now it happens that this transmission occurred through Europe. For the faith, which European Christians expect will become the faith to be found in the whole world (even if perhaps not the faith of the whole world), is the faith that must forever keep in touch with its origins, which took place in the West, in the very roots of the West. The Christianity of the future all over the world may (so we hope!) look quite different from European Christianity, because it will have taken root in totally different Cultures and in the coming unified world civilization. Yet one of its characteristics will always remain its historical origin; it will always continue to speak of Europe, because the Christianity of the future, flourishing in other countries too, will not be an abstract idea, but a reality that has a history and that preserves its history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[62]

VALUES AND NORMS OF EUROPE

This does not mean, of course, that only specifically Christian characteristics of European culture should be transmitted and be important in the future for the rest of the world. There are undoubtedly many other important human values and characteristics that have become history in Europe. They deserve to survive and to be important for the rest of the world. So again we have to tackle the question whether these European values have a prospect of survival and meaningfulness for the rest of the world insofar as they grow into universal values that may be understood and actualized equally well by all people, or whether they will in the future actually retain a European particularity and, in this way only, become significant for the rest of the world.

For there is no doubt that certain values and norms, which have become explicit and accepted in European history, have continued to develop. They became universal in such a way that they have also become values and norms in other cultures and societies outside of Europe. This is the case, for instance, with all the ideals and purposes that are intended by the words “universal human rights,” “democracy,” “women’s liberation,” and so on. In regard to these human values, this might lead us to think that the task of Europe means only that these values, which historically speaking are of European origin, continue to be valid for Europe and the rest of the world in their universal human significance. The process is like higher mathematics, which historically began in Europe but has now – at least at first sight – become equally well understood and valid everywhere. And thus it seems to have lost its erstwhile European provenance.

Yet one might say and therefore have the right to hope that in individual cultures, whose variety should continue to exist even in a common world civilization, these universal human values would in their turn keep their distinctive cultural stamp and become significant for other cultures precisely in their distinctiveness. In the narrower circle of interpersonal relations, we each act in our own way, which is not the way of others; we are all important for others, as incentives for their further development, as people whose opinion they value, and so on. All members of such a circle accept and welcome one another in their own distinctive way which embodies common shared humanity. Something similar can and should [63] occur in the family of peoples and in world cultures. The different cultures and peoples might embody their common humanity in each one’s distinctive manner, and in this way – not through a formal and abstract realization of their humanity in the most homogeneous way possible – serve other peoples and cultures.

Of course, the differences among the ways of embodying the universally human can also occasion the danger of mutual misunderstanding and conflict, as we see now all over the world, even where appeal is made to the highest human values and principles. Yet the purpose cannot be to render people as uniform as possible, in order to make such conflicts impossible. Time and again problems crop up with efforts that are constantly being made to reconcile what is common to all people with the various forms this common nature has assumed. Take, for instance, the frequent conflicts in Communist countries about the right relation between shared communist principles and the different ways in which these principles are applied in different countries. This is also true for Europe. Europe should keep its own way of embodying the humanity it shares with all others in all dimensions of a culture. And it is precisely in this way – and not by giving up its own distinctiveness – that it must make its own unique contribution to the common culture and future of humankind.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is often difficult to realize the difference between the universally human as such and its concrete application in a given culture, and this for many reasons. The bearers of something that is really universal may exaggerate the importance of the concrete way they embody and realize this universal value; they might consider it an essential part of the value and call it obligatory for all. On the other hand, it is possible to overlook or reject something that belongs to a universal value on the pretext that it originated in a certain historically contingent spot in history and can therefore have no universal validity. Finally it may happen that incomplete ways of embodying what is truly universal are nevertheless taken over by others, as they exchange values and styles, some of which have no universal value.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[65]

PART TWO

Ecumenism

[67]

6

REALISTIC POSSIBILITY OF A UNIFICATION IN FAITH?

I would like to submit a few reflections about the as yet unrealized possibilities contained in our efforts for ecumenical unity. I wish to emphasize that these reflections are submitted in my own name, at my own risk, and that they might be rejected by the Protestant as well by the Catholic side.

All sides claim that ecumenical efforts can and must continue. Yet they seem to stagnate. Is it not allowable then to make suggestions, even if they seem bold or desperate? We are not looking merely for a greater rapprochement between the churches, although this is undoubtedly a worthwhile goal. Our goal is a real unity of the great Christian churches, a goal that seems to be out of reach. Efforts to bring it about seem to stagnate hopelessly. Yet we must seriously consider that efforts aiming at the goal itself, and not merely efforts for a greater rapprochement, are possible, since all Christians have received from their common Lord a command to realize this unity, a command to which they must attach the greatest importance. That is why new, almost utopian suggestions of how we might make progress should not be rejected out of hand as heretical or unrealistic.

The following considerations refer to the dogmatic aspect of the ecumenical problem. We do not consider here the practical problems and those that derive from canon law. This does not mean, of course, that they are not as important as the theological problems. Much more thought should be given to problems coming from canon law. It is indisputable that the one Church of the future [68] cannot come about through a simple assimilation of the great Protestant or Orthodox churches into the Roman Catholic Church as it is juridically organized in the Latin West. And it is obvious that great obstacles will also have to be overcome in the practical life of the churches, both in their ordinary ways of looking at things and in their unconscious moods and habits, if Christians of all separated churches are to feel at ease, like brothers and sisters, in the one Church. It stands to reason that the Church of the future must make room for a broad pluralism in the practical aspects of Christian life. However, as mentioned above, in these reflections we are considering only the dogmatic side of the ecumenical problem, that is, the problem of how the one Church of the future can hold and profess the same Christian faith.

THE FUNDAMENTAL THESIS OF THE DOGMATIC SIDE OF THE ECUMENICAL PROBLEM

This thesis points out that the mentality of people today in spiritual matters is quite different from that of former times. Of course, the real substance of the Christian faith and that which the existing churches have considered as belonging to it cannot have changed and should not be given up. But the manner in which the faith of the existing churches can be brought together into the one faith of the Church of the future may be quite different from the way we thought of this unity in faith during the controversies between the churches.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This fundamental thesis can be explained only if we go back somewhat further to shed light on the spiritual climate in which people of today, and therefore the churches as well, have to live. We wish to describe this spiritual climate, to explain how it has changed in the course of history, to contrast our present situation with the situation in which all the controversies about church unity used to take place, and which naturally lingers on to some extent in our time. It follows, of course, that a description of these situations and of the differences among them will necessarily be oversimplified, that the differences will be emphasized more than those elements which are common and permanent, so that it will be easy to raise objections against such a description.

Yet I believe that what will be said about this topic is more or [69] less correct and of decisive importance for the question of how, at the present time, a unity in faith may be envisaged and demanded.

THE PRESENT SPIRITUAL CLIMATE

How shall we describe today's spiritual climate in which the Christian faith must be proclaimed? How does it differ from the situation in the West when the churches broke away from one another?

Let me put this in a simple and straightforward way. Formerly, the spiritual material, so to speak, with which people worked was relatively limited, affording a general view of the whole. Although they disagreed about many things, especially in their philosophy of life, they rightly took it for granted that they could be mutually understood in their conversations and in their controversies. It was easy to get an overall view of the ideas with which one worked and argued. At least theologians on all sides could take it for granted that they were in command of their discipline and all the problems that it might entail. They could also take it for granted that they were able to make themselves understood by their opponents, who operated with the same very limited conceptual material and experiential data. All sides were convinced therefore that they knew what they were talking about. It does not matter whether this common self-understanding was "objectively" correct, or whether even then controversies arose from an unconscious difference in basic attitudes, fundamental presuppositions, and so on. The self-understanding was there. Catholics, for instance, said that there were seven sacraments, while Protestants denied it. Both of them took for granted that they understood themselves and their opponents, that they were not talking at cross purposes.

This common self-understanding, this homogeneity at the verbal and conceptual levels on which each side was operating, derived, of course, from a fairly widespread cultural unity and shared experience, both of them rather narrow and, as a whole, easy to keep in mind. It was like a conflict between brothers and sisters of the same family. Whatever could be known at that time could be known by an individual, at least by one of sufficient culture and learning. This was not the case with many others, the uneducated, the common people. But that hardly mattered. From the start they were Condemned to keep quiet while learned people argued among themselves [70] and to follow the opinion accepted by the authorities and the learned, wherever they lived.

The world view of an earlier cultural epoch was, insofar as it could be consciously verbalized, relatively simple and easy to grasp in its entirety. Or it became such again after short critical periods between spiritual epochs. Such a world view referred to a geographically and historically limited area. That is why it was easy to view it as a whole and not too difficult to defend it in controversies. In the spiritual domain the opponents played, so to speak, with a limited number of balls, and were able, even where the game consisted in a difference of opinions, to play it with skill. They were convinced that they knew exactly their own opinions and the opinions, which they rejected, of their opponents.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Today the situation as it existed at the time of the breakup of the churches (it has been described very roughly here) has changed considerably. We might even speak not only of a quantitative but also of a qualitative change, even if historically the change occurred slowly and has become noticeable only in the present.

Today we know infinitely more and, as a result (however paradoxical it may sound), each individual, even the most cultured and the most learned, becomes ever more ignorant. Books become ever more numerous, and nobody can read them all. The number of computers keeps growing, as does their input and output. It is still possible to try to build synthetic surveys that will make an otherwise uncontrollable amount of detailed knowledge available to an individual. But the data that can be stored in computers cannot be viewed and controlled in their entirety by the individual.

As an individual, one becomes ever more ignorant. One must rely more and more upon the knowledge of others, without being able to master and to control it. The more skilled and better educated people are, the more they notice how, in every dimension of life, they are in certain respects becoming more ignorant; they have to rely more and more on others. There are more and more experts for countless theoretical and practical questions who behave toward others as authorities used to act toward ignorant people. But these experts understand each other only with the greatest difficulty or not at all. And so they form a dissonant chorus of voices offering their knowledge and their wisdom to others. Everywhere in the world consensus in society tends to move away from an agreement about basic convictions to a consensus that consists merely [71] in the identity of material needs and presuppositions. This situation derives ultimately from the fact that the mass of what can actually be known has become so unwieldy that it can no longer be synthesized in the simple way that used to be possible.

That is why, in comparison with former times, the boundaries between the educated and the uneducated become very unclear. Today there are no longer people who are really educated and others who are not. Today all are educated in some respect and very ignorant in others. The universal savant is extinct.

CONSEQUENCES FOR THE ECUMENICAL QUESTION

This situation affects theology as well. Here too, compared with former times, there is an enormous amount of knowledge available. Consequently the individual theologian, and a fortiori the individual Christian, becomes ever more ignorant in comparison to the total knowledge presently available in theology. Today the biblical scholar can no longer also be a systematic theologian to the extent required by systematic theology itself. The expert in the history of dogma, not without reason, mocks systematic theologians who play with many fewer balls than the history of dogma might offer them. Biblical studies has turned into such an exacting science, one that works with the most diverse methods, that even individual scholars realize that they are able to master only a small part of their own discipline. Of course, there still exist in theology people who try to perform the function of universal experts. Some even must try to do so if, for instance, they happen to belong to the small group in the Congregation of the Faith who have to watch over and judge the orthodoxy of other theologians.

It becomes more and more questionable whether and to what extent such a universal

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological erudition can still be attained by an individual, especially since, in the humanities, technical scientific means are of little use. Theologians too know more and more, and that is why they can understand each other less and less. Individual theologians are becoming steadily less certain that they have understood other theologians. It can be assumed that other theologians can be correctly understood only if their presuppositions are kept in mind. And these presuppositions are no longer within reach. There are, of course, many theologians and church [72] leaders who do not admit that such is the present situation in theology, who repress it, who are still trying to think and work as if the situation had not changed. In a certain sense, they even have the right to do so, since our right to understand others and even to judge whether they are right or wrong cannot be denied. Yet it must be honestly admitted that the present situation exists and that it differs qualitatively from the earlier one.

Before we examine what follows from this situation for the ecumenical question itself we will say a few words about an epistemological problem. When one refrains from affirming a proposition that is certainly or possibly true one does not err. This obvious truth applies not only to cases where the persons in question do not know the proposition or do not understand it. They may know about it, understand it to some extent, and at the same time have serious reasons for refusing to admit it. These reasons do not necessarily have to derive from the actual inner difficulty of the proposition; they may be of another kind. The proposition may, for instance, be unimportant for the person's own situation; taking the trouble to verify its truth, before accepting it, would not be worth the effort. Or the proposition, while correct, may be presented in an unfamiliar terminology or context that makes it hard to understand. In such cases, one cannot say that a given proposition obliges one to give a positive and explicit assent, for the simple reason that one must take its truth into account. In certain cases one may respectfully leave the proposition alone, without infringing upon one's duty to honor the truth.

What is true for individuals applies, of course, to the larger group as well. In their case too a lack of existential interest in certain propositions may be lawful for other reasons, even when the propositions in question are not positively denied and when their truth should be taken into account.

What has been said in general is also true for the statements of a creed and for the people of a Church. It seems evident to me that, in practice, the churches (the Catholic Church too) accept what we have said, at least implicitly. When Christians have been baptized, when they lead a life that is to some extent Christian, the Church considers them legitimate members of the Christian community. The Church does not carefully inquire exactly what statements of the faith are explicitly present in their consciousness or to what extent they are aware of the complete dogma of the Church. She [73] does not try to find out how they feel about certain things that she teaches and may even, in some historical situations, expressly proclaim. She is satisfied if, on the one hand, it is clear from the religious practice of these people that they evidently accept – even if only in a global and rudimentary way – the basic dogmas, the ultimate foundations in the hierarchy of truths of the faith, and if, on the other hand, they do not mentally or verbally explicitly reject statements that the Church claims objectively belong to the heart of the faith. The Church knows that in the individual consciousness of most of her members there exist plenty of religious and profane ideas that do not objectively agree with one another. She knows that, even where one of her members agrees with one of her statement, repeats and professes it, she herself cannot be absolutely certain that this person, when repeating this statement, really understands and accepts what the Church herself means by it.

All the churches, including the Catholic Church, are satisfied when their members live as baptized and practicing believers in a human, juridical, and liturgical unity and when they live up to the essential elements of the Christian faith. (This must be presumed for the external forum at least.) She does not require from every member an explicit assent to every statement which she herself considers part of her binding profession of faith. This epistemological, somewhat minimalistic, tolerance is quite unavoidable, and it is also legitimate in the churches.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE UNITY OF THE CHURCHES

These considerations about the spiritual situation today, as contrasted with that of earlier times, allow us to say the following.

From the dogmatic point of view and with respect to the faith of the Church, unity of the separated churches is conceivable, if no Church declares that a statement held to be binding by another Church is absolutely irreconcilable with her own understanding of the faith. As long as such disagreements existed, or continue to exist, a unity of the churches in faith is naturally unthinkable. But do such discrepancies still exist? I am inclined to doubt it. Theological discussions among theologians of the different churches have not yet sufficiently come to the awareness of church leaders. It is certainly not that the theologians of the different churches [74] who may seriously be considered as representing the faith consciousness of their respective churches (which does not apply to all those who pursue theology as the science of religion) have already reached a positive agreement among themselves in all dogmatic questions. But are there still many serious theologians around today who would declare that the statements which theologians in another confession consider absolutely binding on their Church are irreconcilable with the former theologians' own faith, the faith which they confess as decisive for salvation?

It is certain that in many questions or controversies theologians are not yet in total agreement. But the climate of their conversations has fundamentally changed in comparison with the time of the Reformation. Then they faced each other with positions which the other side always called objectively and absolutely irreconcilable with the foundations of Christianity. Salvation for the other side – if possible at all – was seen as possible only because, for some strange subjective reasons, the others were not responsible for their false doctrine, a doctrine whose falsity they might, with some good will, be able to recognize. Today theologians whose tenets may not yet be totally reconcilable take a different stance toward each other. Both sides take into account not only that a mysterious subjectivity exonerates at times the other before God and before the truth of the Gospel but also that the statements of both sides, when further developed and understood in a wider context, sometimes do not really contradict each other, even when one does not yet clearly see that, in such a wider interpretation, the two sides positively agree.

It seems to me that, in such a new situation, a sufficient unity in faith may have already been achieved among the churches. Protestants would not right away have to give a positive assent of faith to many propositions that Catholics consider binding in faith. Neither would they have to reject them because – as shown by historical development and by today's spiritual climate – they cannot say that accepting these specifically Catholic tenets would mean giving up their own faith, that it would mean denying truths that they rightly consider essential to their faith. Neither does the fact that they refrain from making a judgment about these tenets imply that they are moving toward the Catholic position. These Protestant Christians may assume that, in the ongoing history of the Church's faith-awareness, there is hope that these Catholic tenets will find [75] a clarification and an interpretation that will allow a positive assent. Although they cannot assent at present, they should not feel obliged to reject Roman Catholic teachings out of hand.

On the other hand, it seems to me that the leadership of the Catholic Church could find this position acceptable for a unification of the churches. It implies that the properly fundamental truths of Christian revelation are expressly affirmed by both sides. But a positive assent is not required for every proposition that, in the historical development of the faith-awareness of the Roman Catholic Church, is considered to be objectively given with divine revelation. On their side, the Orthodox and Protestant churches may be willing to refrain from judging (as part of the faith) that some specifically Roman Catholic tenets are utterly irreconcilable with divine revelation and gospel truth, as they judged them at the time of the Reformation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Suppose that both sides accept this kind of existential and epistemological tolerance, whereby that which is explicitly and expressly taught is not coerced into radical contradiction. There would still be leeway for those issues that, although not yet positively compatible, are admittedly reconcilable. In such a case it seems to me that, from the dogmatic point of view, church unity is possible right away.[1]

This statement may sound bold, utopian, perhaps even dogmatically vulnerable. But if one is unwilling to consider unification of the churches absolutely impossible in the present spiritual climate – something forbidden by the basic convictions of Christianity and the Church – then one would have to say that any unification in faith other than the one we have mentioned above is utterly impossible. The suggested approach could therefore be considered legitimate.

OTHER WAYS OF CONCEIVING UNITY

Let us imagine a more ideal and more radical unity of the churches, as always an obvious goal still dreamed of in ecumenical discussions. Let us imagine what this unification would look like if it were really brought about. Would theologians in today's spiritual climate [76] not continue to disagree? Would the faith formulas explicitly accepted by all not continue to be interpreted in very different ways? Would this not follow from the different intellectual horizons, with the different terminologies that would unavoidably continue to exist in this world characterized by cultural pluralism? Consider the narrow personal situation of many of the faithful. Would they not admit that they are not interested in some of the doctrines? Or would they not simply and quietly refrain from giving a positive assent to such doctrines? In an ideal unity of faith these things are not supposed to happen. In the unification we have suggested it would be admitted and legitimate.

What I mean is this: Either one makes of the unification of faith an ideal that is really unreachable and merely pays lip service to it, or one strives for a unification that is realistically possible and that should therefore be admitted as legitimate and rendered theologically understandable. In other words, the unity in faith that, for all practical purposes, exists and must be regarded as legitimate in the Catholic Church differs from the one that ecclesiology implicitly takes for granted and presupposes, and which implies (explicit or at least implicit) positive assent to all that church leadership teaches as a doctrine binding for faith.

Now the unity in faith that actually exists, even within the Catholic Church, differs from this theoretically postulated unity. Yet it is legitimate and should be explicitly acknowledged as such. It follows that for the unity in faith of the future world-Church, one should not demand more than the unity that exists in the Catholic Church, and that one should expressly acknowledge such unity as sufficient and legitimate. Of course, this conception of unity

[1] See the recent important contribution to this topic by H. Fries and K. Rahner, Unity of the Churches: An Actual Possibility (Mahway, N.J.: Paulist Press, 1985). This book contains eight crucial theses about the ecumenical situation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

should also be admitted as sufficient by the Orthodox and Protestant churches. But that should cause no difficulty, since it is easy to see that, even at the present, they are already satisfied with the unity that we consider sufficient for the one Church of the future. In this respect, the only requirement is that these other churches should not positively reject an explicit doctrine of the Catholic Church as irreconcilable with the foundations of their Christianity.

To my mind such a development of ecclesial consciousness has made so much progress that this situation has become possible, although probably not for every individual Christian or theologian in these churches. But one can admit that a majority of individual Christians and theologians in the other churches will no longer [77] anathematize specific Roman Catholic doctrines in the name of faith, so that the leadership in these churches will not anathematize them either. This being granted, it seems to me that there is no need to demand that these churches give a positive assent of faith to specific Roman Catholic teachings and that a sufficient unity of faith may be reached among those who, confessing the triune God and Jesus as Lord and Savior, believe the essential foundations of Christianity and have been baptized. The main thesis that I dared to present points out therefore that in today's spiritual climate no greater unity of faith can be reached than the one I suggested, that this unity must therefore be legitimate if, despite all assurances to the contrary, one does not want to give up the hope of such a unity of the churches in faith.

FURTHER UNSOLVED QUESTIONS

Even if one accepts this theory, much arduous reflection is still needed for a real unity of the churches; many problems remain to be solved. Not much thought has yet been given on all sides to the question of how the Church of the future will look juridically, so that church unity may be a real possibility. It stands to reason that there can be no question of the Protestant and Orthodox churches simply disappearing into the Roman Catholic Church, while the latter would simply remain as she is, with her own liturgy, canon law, manner of appointing bishops, and Roman Curia with all its various functions.

Of course, more reflection is required to find out how exactly this, as it were, more prudent and discreet unity can be maintained and lived in the Church of the future. For in the future too some juridical organization will undoubtedly be required for that purpose. Even today there exists in Germany's Protestant churches the possibility of proceedings for enforcing doctrinal orthodoxy. This shows that the Church of the future should be enabled to defend herself against serious errors that threaten the essentials of her faith, exclude fundamental heresies that will, of course, also be Possible in the future. But the concrete juridical way in which the faith of the Church is presented and defended does not have to be the one used today in the Roman Catholic Church.

Along with this necessary and sufficient unity in faith, the Church [78] of the future will be characterized by a greater pluralism in the laws of individual churches, as well as in Christian life, liturgy, and theology than had been allowed in the Roman Catholic Church. In this respect the Roman Catholic Church could learn from her relationship to the small Uniate churches of the East and take over a few things that could serve as a model for this lawful pluralism in the Church of the future. But this pluralism in the Church of the future will undoubtedly have to be broader than the one we Roman Catholics are used to, especially since the pluralism that has been accepted as basically legitimate among us, on account of the Uniate Eastern churches, has hardly had any practical effects on Western Christians and the Roman Curia.

Orthodox and Protestant partner churches, without positively rejecting as contrary to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith the dogmatic teaching of the First Vatican Council, have not expressly taken it over into their understanding of faith. A difficult question therefore for theory and practice will be how this fact can be reconciled with a concrete acknowledgment, translated into practice, of the function of the Petrine office. This is so especially since no one can forbid the Roman See to exercise that fullness of teaching power that Vatican I attributes to it.

But if the Roman papacy were expressly to promise that, should it ever wish to proclaim a definition ex cathedra, it would use a procedure through which practically, even without a real council, such a definition would be based on the assent of the bishops of all partner churches, this most delicate problem might also be solved. In that way the Orthodox or Protestant churches in the Church of the future would not get the impression that any kind of acceptance of the Petrine function would at once deliver them so much to the doctrinal authority of Rome that there would be a real danger that their own awareness of the faith might be jeopardized.

IMPORTANCE OF THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

Even if one were ready to accept the suggested main thesis, the road leading to the unity of all Christian churches would naturally be long, not only for the reasons mentioned above. The churches, should, in their practice and mentality, get used to one another even more than they have up to the present, so that a visible unity [78] may become possible and achievable. That is why all great and small ecumenical endeavors are very important. Even if they are made with some skepticism about the possibility of a real unity of the churches, they bring us ever closer to this unity.

Christians of the different denominations come closer to each other through such endeavors; they really get to know each other; they become aware of the fact that they are already united in the essential elements of the Christian faith. The feeling of unfamiliarity and indifference that has prevailed among them is decreasing. And so the day may slowly dawn when the churches will in fact wonder: Do we not, after all, have the same Christian faith? Can we not confess it together in greater unity without straining the conscience of the churches that have until now been separated?

By way of conclusion I would say: If we take into account the diversity of the partner churches and the tolerance in matters of faith that will be required and even legitimate in the Church of the future, and if we then compare this Church of the future with the present situation among the churches, we will have to admit that our present ecumenical situation is not as bad as one might at first be tempted to think. The partner churches of the one Church of the future may show very important differences in their way of life. But so does our own Church nowadays. Therefore the present situation in our Church does not differ as much as we might think from the one Church of the future, which will include a great diversity among its partners. As ecumenical convergence continues, we may suddenly notice that we are already much closer to each other than we had thought and than we give credit for to the churches.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[80]

7

CONCRETE OFFICIAL STEPS TOWARD UNIFICATION

Not all properly theological questions that are considered controversial by the Christian churches have been answered with full agreement on all sides. Yet it does seem that today the unification of the churches must become mainly a concern of church leaders. They can no longer plead the fact that, since theologians do not yet agree, they themselves have, for the time being, nothing to do but utter a few friendly words of ecumenical good will. Is it not possible for these church leaders to do something tangible right now? Let me try to say something about this question with respect to the Roman Catholic Church. Two things come to mind.

First, concrete problems of an interconfessional nature that occur today in pastoral work might be reexamined and courageously solved. Germany's Protestant churches have already requested this of the Catholic Church in Germany, but they have had no concrete and encouraging answer. Would it not be possible, with regard to intercommunion, to make new arrangements that the Catholic side has not yet dared to make? Would it not be possible for a Catholic who has married a Protestant to fulfill his or her "Sunday obligation" by attending a Protestant Sunday service occasionally? Would it not be possible to agree upon a more broadminded cooperation among the churches for the education of children of "mixed marriages?" Would it not be possible to invent cooperative ventures in religious education that could be shared by both churches? After all, this education as it now exists can impart little more than [81] the understanding and practice of the most fundamental Christian convictions, and these are shared by both churches.

An answer to these practical questions of pastoral care that is as ecumenical as possible is imperative for both churches and must be found. Certainly Catholic theologians may have to confront limits that cannot be crossed, although the other side would like to see them crossed and believes that it can be done. Have these limits, in theory or in practice, already been reached on the Catholic side? Ecumenically speaking, is it now impossible to go further? I see no proof that it is not.

Furthermore there are many questions about the Church's self-understanding, about canon law and canonical procedures that are ecumenically of great importance and that might be answered by the Catholic Church in a different and better way. The answers to such questions should not be postponed until the time of unification, but should be given as they come up, clearly, officially, and as partial steps toward complete church unity. We should avail ourselves of these possibilities not only in very general declarations of principles, or in non-binding statements of theologians, but in official declarations. In this way, we would make credible our real resolve to make ecumenical progress.

Why should the Holy See not declare right away, every time a case comes up, the possibilities it sees for a real unity of the churches, the possibilities it is willing to grant? This would not imply that, in theory and practice, the Protestant churches would simply and uniformly be taken over by the Latin Church of the West. Or what juridical ways of finding and appointing a bishop are possible that, while differing considerably from the procedure prescribed by the present Roman canon law, still agree with Catholic dogma and might more easily be accepted by the Protestant churches? During the Council the bishops of the Uniate churches of the Near East declared that they were willing to resign at once if the Orthodox churches entered into union with Rome. Would it not be possible for Rome officially to make arrangements like this obligatory in principle?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Such partial but binding agreements would be possible in the domain of dogmatic theology itself. For instance, would it not be possible for the magisterium to make a declaration about the Mass as a sacrifice that would do away with the misgivings of Protestants who believe that Catholics consider the Mass a repetition, [82] not merely a rendering present, of the sacrifice of the cross? Would it not be possible to make a magisterial declaration, clearer even than that of the Council of Trent, to the effect that every justifying human activity is supported by the free, gratuitous action of God's grace and that every good free human action is itself a grace of God, that we reject a naive synergism? Would it not be possible to make officially clear that an ex cathedra decision of the pope is, outside a council, of its very nature an exception and occasioned by particular circumstances? Could it also be made clear that such a decision today, when worldwide communications facilitate the Church's search for truth, will take place in such a way that it is practically a conciliar decision, because the whole Church has cooperated in its elaboration? Hence, if Protestant Christians should recognize the First Vatican Council, they would not have to fear papal decisions that might take them by surprise and demand too much from them. Would it not be quite simple to expound, even officially, a doctrine of the sacraments that would not make people think of magic and sorcery? Would it not be possible to describe the required conditions for a sacramental intention in marriage in such a way that one might more clearly and easily notice the absence of such an intention, so frequent nowadays in civil marriages? These are only a few examples. There are certainly many others that will not be mentioned here.

The conclusions of every theological dialogue among the Christians churches during the last few decades should be published officially. Otherwise, the theological interchurch dialogue does not have the effect that it might have; rather, there is much talk with no tangible results. The importance of developing an awareness that consists in more mutual trust and that aims at practical intercommunion should not be underestimated. But this general awareness will lead to a real unification of the churches only if it can take shape in detailed dogmatic statements. They should be made not only in the ongoing theological discussions that are influenced by theological trends but they should also become statements of the magisterium.

The magisterium of the Catholic Church may not only define doctrines, it may also make authentic statements. Today it must have the courage to use its possibilities, not just through admonitions and restrictions that betray a lack of ecumenism, but through ecumenical measures aiming at unification. When in its encyclicals, [83] for instance, the magisterium not only rejects errors but also positively proclaims the Christian truth, one cannot a priori hold that the Congregation of the Faith has only a supervisory function that expresses itself by rejecting heterodox or dangerous doctrines. The Congregation of the Faith might also, in collaboration with the Secretariat for Unity, propose positive doctrines that contain the results of interchurch discussions among theologians. Only then will one get a concrete idea of what has already been achieved, and of what is still to be achieved in the quest for dogmatic unity.[1]

It seems to me that the Protestant churches too must do some of the things that are here suggested to the Catholic Church. Could they not declare that one has not betrayed the pure grace of God in Jesus Christ if one accepts the Council of Trent's doctrine of justification? But here again the old difficulty comes up. Who can speak with binding power for Protestant Christians?

It seems to me that our ecumenical efforts should little by little produce concrete results.

[1] See on this H. Fries, "Das Petrusamt in anglikanish-katholischen Dialog," in Stimmen der Zeit 200 (1982) 723-38. This article has been written in agreement with K. Rahner.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Interchurch commissions, proceedings of private groups without official binding power, all fall short of the results that are more and more expected today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[84]

8

ECUMENICAL TOGETHERNESS TODAY

In what follows I would like to submit a couple of simple considerations about the question of ecumenical unity: Here and now at a time when the ultimate goal of all ecumenical endeavors has not yet been reached, what must Christians and their churches do to get closer to that goal and to overcome a certain stagnation, resignation, and listlessness, which seem to be hampering the progress of ecumenical work?

As we try to address that question, it is obvious that only a couple of fragments of an answer can be presented, and that we must formulate them not so much as demands made to church leaders on both sides, but as demands made to ourselves, the Christian rank and file.

RADICALIZATION IN THE DIRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST

The first and in fact the most important demand involves the invitation to all Christians, in all churches, to become more intensively, more radically Christian. In its innermost core Christianity is not a theory, joined to a harmonious way of life, which has been transmitted once and for all and which we have accepted and now continue to confess and practice. Real Christianity is spirit and life, a readiness to be overtaxed, a constant new beginning, a pilgrimage that has not yet reached its definitive home, a willingness always to welcome new experiences. Clearly, then, it would be preposterous [85] and un-Christian for the Christian churches simply to carry on, conservatively, in their traditional status quo. They can keep their lawful inheritance for the future only if they are willing to change. They must be attuned to their times. This does not mean that everything is allowed, that alien fashions are arbitrarily accepted. It means an ever renewed and radical return to the innermost heart of the faith, to which both Christians and the churches must bear witness. Christians must become more Christian; then automatically they will come closer to each other. What is required is not a liberalizing diluting of Christianity into a worldwide humanism.

From the time of the Enlightenment, theology and science in the Western world have discovered many truths that are now taken for granted. They should be quietly accepted by the churches. It has been shown, time and again, and ever more clearly, that none of this threatens or questions a radical Christian faith, that the natural sciences, the historical sciences, the historical-critical approach to the Bible, and even a modern sense of the world and of life can really be combined with a genuine Christian faith. That is why in all churches a lively Christianity, which lives ever more intensively from the roots of its faith, is a task that is possible today and required for the sake of ecumenism. True, we cannot simply eliminate by arbitrary decree the old problems of theological controversy among the Christian churches, nor can we call the controversies irrelevant. But all of them would acquire new perspectives and a fresh impact. It would be possible to confront and master them and to solve them together, if they were pondered within the common task of the churches and of Christians, a task that consists of understanding and practicing original, genuine, truly orthodox Christianity, as it grapples with the common problems of our time.

Do we Christians not all confess the ultimate, real incomprehensibility into which we are plunged and which we call God? And with a boldness that finds no justification in ourselves, do we not dare to speak to this uncontrollable incomprehensibility, have dealings with it and trust it, convinced that we are sheltered in it, accepted by it, that we arrive at it in the bottomless pit of our death, and that we are absolved by it as it promises itself to us? Are we not the ones who venture upon this dreadful journey called faith as we look at Jesus and the abyss of his death on the cross, recognizing him as the one who is saved, and accepting because [86] of him the invincible conviction that we too, without being destroyed, will blessedly attain the one whom Jesus calls his Father and to whom he yielded himself unconditionally, while feeling utterly forsaken by him? Have we not all let Jesus tell us the first, the last, and the supreme word, in which God promises himself to us as our goal and our end, as our judgment and our reconciliation? Have we not all been baptized in this final word of God in Jesus, so that – whether we want it or not – we already enjoy, through baptism, a basic unity in the Spirit and in the tangibleness of social testimony? If we remember these realities and if we live them more radically, then slowly and inexorably a unity in faith and belief will grow. Over and above the unity that already exists, this unity will give rise to a community of faith, the goal of the ecumenical movement.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It seems possible for a Christianity that is lived from its innermost core to achieve unity in the doctrines that are to some extent secondary and in which the churches still feel that they are not yet united. Or it may become clear that the apparently controversial statements of the different churches do not really cancel each other out, but rather are attempts to elucidate the inexhaustible fullness of Christianity from different points of view. The attempts to harmonize the theologies of the Christian churches have been very successful during the past few decades. In almost all the major churches – not always in the others – there are theologians who hold that in theological controversy there are no longer any differences of opinion that should really separate the churches. These theologians think that church leaders should now draw the appropriate consequences from this state of affairs, and that they should not, through canon law or otherwise, maintain divisions that no longer exist theologically. The opinion of such theologians may be somewhat too optimistic and ahead of the facts. But it does show that a return to the basic substance of Christianity in the context of a courageous encounter with today's world and a reexamination of the old problems of theological controversy from that point of view may be very important and promising for ecumenism.

The presupposition is, of course, that church leaders feel responsible not only for the past of their churches but even more for their future. The presupposition is that contemporary Christianity is not just theoretically known but practically lived. Here lies our greatest deficiency. If Christians not only thought their truth but lived it, [87] if they were as concerned for orthopraxy as for orthodoxy, if this orthopraxy meant not only social criticism and social change (although here too we notice how frightfully wanting narrowminded conservatism is) but worshipping God in spirit and in truth, since we exist for God and not God for us, then they would soon be able to agree about controversial theological questions that, like it or not, no longer have the same importance as at the time of the Reformation. They are now of secondary importance, not because they would be such in their deepest meaning – grace and justification are not in themselves of secondary importance – but because today we must view such topics in a much wider context, and against a much deeper background. The answers therefore, necessarily display more nuances and can converge more easily than was formerly the case.

NO THIRD CONFESSION

A second maxim that is important today in ecumenical work might be formulated as follows: It is meaningless and even, in the long run, harmful for ecumenical work, when practical ecumenical projects are conducted with so much speed that something like a third confession is created. Ecumenical services are good and Christians may work together harmoniously in the most diverse undertakings. I myself have no objection if a married couple from two churches, when their conscience and their love urges them, attend the same divine service, and eventually the same celebration of the Lord's Supper. But agreements that simply ignore or deny the still existing differences in faith and canon law do not lead toward Christian unity. In both churches the majority of Christians will not take part in such moves, with the result that these efforts lead to a new split, some kind of third confession. Then we have Protestant Christians, Catholic Christians, and overeager ecumenists, who wrongly believe that the Christianity that they practice is the fullness of Christianity and a sufficient foundation of unity. At present such a self-evaluation by these ecumenists may be quite understandable. Yet it amounts to overestimating oneself and ignoring the Christian past and the faith of former times, which we may not give up for the sake of some cheap unity but must introduce into the genuine and complete unity of the Church of the future.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[88] It is quite true that all churches must get rid of much historical baggage if they seriously desire the coming unity. With all due respect to church leaders, we have to wonder, not without fear and worry, whether they really possess enough ecumenical resolve and daring. Yet it is impossible to establish unity by being indifferent to the faith of former times, by building unity on the basis of a minimal content of faith, about which one is not quite sure whether it still is specifically Christian. We cannot simply set aside legitimate church authority and its directives in order to attain a unity of a new splinter group. Efforts toward unity should try to comprise all Christians, even those who more traditionally identify with the present condition of the transmitted creeds and churches. Unity must be realized with, not against, church authorities. The road to such unity may be longer and harder. But building an awareness in the churches that can later bring about and bear a genuine unity cannot be the product of a liberalism that is, after all, just a passing fashion. It must be the product of a real history of faith. That is very difficult and supposes great patience. All of this should not be used by authorities and by lazy Christians as a theological pretext for doing nothing and for putting off the unity of the churches to the day of eternity. But if the ecumenical movement should lead to the establishment of a third confession, it would have missed its goal and produced division instead of unity.

AGAINST CONFESSIONALISM

A third maxim for today's ecumenism might be formulated as follows: Are not some obstacles to unity in reality only creations of a narrow confessionalism? It is quite possible that, until recently, Roman prelates could imagine a union of the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant Church in Germany only in the following way: Protestant-Christians would return to the Catholic Church through massive individual conversions, as it were, whereupon they would be subject to Rome just like lifelong Catholics. For Rome the way in which the churches of the West would be unified (the East is a different case) could be conceived, insofar as they tried to conceive it at all, only as a surrender of the other churches to the Roman Church. The latter would remain unchanged, only growing in numbers. I might ask whether fervent Reformed Christians [89] from Geneva would imagine that the Catholic Church of the future, should it be united with their Church, would become like that Church: sober and without images, temples of the word, not of sacrament. Such imagined models of the coming unity, which have prevailed unconsciously on both sides and still exist today, are obstacles to unity. For a genuine Christian faith they are mere fantasy.

Unity does not mean uniformity. The chimera of uniformity is a big obstacle to ecumenical activity. I cannot help thinking that Rome has not yet clearly, and in concrete details, explained what she would be willing and able to give up, without damage to her faith, for the sake of unity. I would ask whether a similar willingness to yield would not in many respects be possible on the Protestant side.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In her canon law the Catholic Church already admits several jurisdictions in the same territory; it cannot therefore be impossible a priori for her to admit, in the same territory, the existence of several partner churches with a different past history, which remain distinct while nevertheless living in the unity demanded by faith and love. We have, for instance, in the Catholic Church in Germany, a special jurisdiction for the Ukrainians, with its own hierarchy and liturgy, which lives nevertheless in unity and peace with Rome. Why would it not be possible to have, in Hesse, a diocese of "old" Catholics, with Mainz as episcopal see, and alongside it a united Hessian Church, whose historical origin and valid traditions date from the time of the Reformation? A certain amount of creative imagination and spiritual freedom is required in order to envisage something of the kind for the future. But might not such virtues be expected of us, Christians of today and of tomorrow? It stands to reason that both the decision to live in unity and church unity itself must be translated into practice and ensured by a number of juridical norms and laws. This can be done. However, the creation of a unity that includes different churches should by no means imply that the one Church, without changing herself, would lord it over the others and simply absorb them.

To my mind one might even, in this connection, give some thought to the question of whether the unity of faith that is naturally required allows not only for a considerable pluralism in the theologies of the individual partner churches but also for a diversity in the hierarchy of religious truths that are held in these [90] churches. For instance, would a united Hessian Church have to celebrate the feast of the Assumption, or might this be foregone? In Rome's relation to the Uniate churches of the Near East, many major and minor paradigms can be found for the different ways in which a partner Church may be united with Rome, ways that differ considerably one from the other. Rome has apparently seen no insuperable obstacles to unity because of the regional and geographical differences between West and East in the Catholic Church. Although in the Christian churches of the West the geographical separation does not occur, it is not clear why the different historical development of these churches of the West might not give them the same right to a lasting differentiation.

GETTING TO KNOW THE OTHER CONFESSIONS

A fourth maxim might go like this: Get to know each other really well! This maxim sounds utterly obvious. All Christians tell the registry office to what denomination they belong; on the street they see the churches of other denominations; they know that these other denominations are communities of Christians with the same baptism they have received themselves and have the same kind of church organization they know in their own Church. A mixed marriage among their acquaintances gives rise to personal and canonical problems that bring home to them more clearly the pluralism of Christian creeds and confessions.

One would like to believe that this fourth maxim is a necessary presupposition of all ecumenical activities, one that, as a rule, is always and everywhere fulfilled. In fact this is not true. Even today it is still the case that, with regard to other churches, one knows only what can be seen of them in public, what is therefore not especially important for Christian existence itself. Christians who are fully committed to their own Church know little or nothing about the other churches, except some rather insignificant details. They live in the sacred purview of their own Church, they are (we hope) in touch with the pastors of their Church. If they are not theologians, their religious reading matter is more or less supplied only by their own churches (we readily grant that of late there are exceptions to this rule). On close examination, Christians committed to the life of their own Church know little of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

properly religious [91] and Christian life of the other churches. There is no reason to consider this as simply wrong, since a historically conditioned position belongs to each person's life. But today we must broaden our knowledge and experience of the life of our fellow Christians in the other churches.

What matters in this respect is not so much an increase of theoretical knowledge about the other churches as a vivid experience of the concrete Christian life of these other Christians. Otherwise the real chasm between the churches today, the main obstacle to unity of Christians, will not be bridged. For it consists not so much in differences among controverted theological opinions stemming from the past as in the feeling of unfamiliarity with a different religious style of life and in the inability to share that other life spontaneously and naturally. From the point of view of theology and faith, that unfamiliarity may be wholly unimportant, yet practically it is a greater obstacle than all the theological disagreements at the time of the Reformation. Many Protestant Christians will consider the Catholic sign of the cross or a May devotion unacceptable. A Catholic may find the prayer offered by a Protestant pastor pathetic and unctuous. These and a thousand similar differences in the daily life of the churches do not have any theological significance, yet they impede the work of the ecumenical movement. All of us still have much to learn in this respect. We have to acquire a concrete understanding of the way in which Christians of other churches live their Christianity.

It is good but not enough that during the last few decades the number of hymns shared by all Christian churches in Germany has increased, that in public meetings of Catholics and Protestants a speaker from another Church is invited, that in problems in which the churches confront the State or public opinion they adopt a common stand, and so on. The feeling of unfamiliarity and mutual indifference must still be overcome at the grass roots level among individual Christians in their daily lives. It is not easy to say how this should be done, since we can hardly use official directives for this purpose. Those who preach should try to listen to themselves with one ear, as it were, to find out whether what they say would be accepted by Christians of another Church, or would be understood as un-Christian. The same is also true for those who organize a liturgical service for their own Church. Each time they too should ask themselves whether this service would also be acceptable to a [92] Christian of another Church. That is why joint ecumenical services should not merely be tolerated as exercises required by ecumenical good will. They should be humble and brave attempts really to adore God with Jesus in spirit and truth, and to do it together with others better than they can do it alone.

Have we been brave and impartial enough in our attempts to consider the possibility of sharing divine services in places where, for lack of a priest or for other reasons, a service is impossible in one's own Church? Can a Christian not meaningfully make of the church of another denomination a place for private prayer and quiet recollection? Would any harm be done if, in the meeting room of a rectory, both one's own diocesan paper and current religious literature of other churches were on display? Are we still not much too prudent and cautious about tasks shared by the churches in the secular and public domain? In mixed marriages or when the question of the child's baptism comes up, is more attention not being paid to a precise drawing of limits than to unity? Shared practical ecumenical activities, like those of "Action 365," for instance, are not sufficiently emphasized in the average life of the churches. Opposing parties cannot be united if they do not understand each other; they cannot understand each other if they do not know each other; they cannot get to know each other if, out of distrust or indifference, they do not cultivate contacts through which alone they can come to know each other, and finally discover that they are all Christians, able to live in the one large and comprehensive Church of Jesus Christ, in the Church that, from its very nature and not merely by way of concession, comprises a wealth of regional and historically

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

conditioned partner churches, because this is the only way in which the richness of Christ can become manifest in the world.

THE PRESENT UNITY

A last maxim: In order to achieve the unity of Christians, as we are enjoined to do, we should also rejoice on account of the unity that God has already bestowed on us. Have we all not been baptized in the name of the triune God? Do we all not try to live by the merciful grace of God, which we have received without any merit or title of our own? Do we all not read in the word of both Testaments [93] the word of God himself, which judges and pardons us? Do we all not celebrate, as well as we can, the commemoration of the death of Jesus, until the day when the transforming power of this death will become wholly manifest and put an end to history? With the crucified Jesus, do we all not try to take up our own death into the incomprehensibility of God and of our own life? Are we Christians not convinced that in the struggle for justice and freedom in the world we have a frightful task that we have not yet completed? Are these not indications of a unity among Christians that has already been granted to us?

It is not true therefore that we Christians differ as much from each other in our world view and lifestyle as we differ from other political, social, and cultural groups in the world. But it is true that the unity which already unites all of us is not yet being fully used for the good of the whole world. As Christians, we already possess a unity given to us by God, which should fill us with a deep gratitude and joy. But we must also keep a few important things in mind. Even ecumenical unity that, as our proper task, is still ahead of us cannot and should not suppress considerable pluralism in the one Church. Such a pluralism will continue to be both a burden and a temptation in a unified Church of Christ. Even in a unified Church we will have to bear mutual lack of understanding, antagonism, and the like. Even a united Church cannot anticipate within history the blessed unity of the final kingdom of God.

But if we keep this humbly and soberly in mind, if we know that even a possible and necessary unity of Christians cannot anticipate here on earth the realm of eternal peace, and if we hope, with an optimism that comes from God, that God’s grace can bring good even out of human sin and failure, that God can write straight with crooked lines and produce out of disunity a fullness of Christianity that could not have been reached through unity, then we may calmly and gratefully rejoice because of the imperishable unity that God has already granted to Christians. This joy should not turn into an excuse for a resigned stagnation of ecumenical activities. But those who do their share of this work, even if it is small and humble, may, in the glory of God’s mighty grace, rejoice because of the unity that has already been granted to us Christians by God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[95]

PART THREE

The Future of the Church

[97]

9

FORGOTTEN DOGMATIC INITIATIVES OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL

In connection with this topic I intend to consider only dogmatic themes. The Council's intent was to be a pastoral council and that is what it was. Its strongest and most far reaching suggestions referred to the homiletic and pastoral fields and to the strategy of a Church that has now become a world-Church. I will not take them up here. I speak of "initiatives." That means that the Council did not clearly and explicitly teach and interpret doctrines of a dogmatic sort; rather, it said things that are a start, a suggestion, an invitation to further dogmatic reflection and elaboration. Therefore I cannot quote any clear and unquestionable doctrines of the Council for my purpose. I can only point to conciliar statements that lead theologians to new questions requiring further reflection. These questions are important for preaching the faith now and in the future, although they have not yet received a clear answer that is generally accepted in the theology of the Church.

The title of this chapter speaks of "forgotten" initiatives. That does not mean, of course, that I am the only one who thinks of them. That would clearly be nonsense. What I mean is that, to my mind, they have generally not yet received sufficient attention and elaboration in current Catholic theology. I will not mention all possible initiatives. Important and unimportant ones are mentioned at random. I will start with a question that is not unimportant and that will shed light on the formal method of our considerations.

[98]

ATHEISM AND PERSONAL GUILT

Fifty years ago, when I was studying theology, we young theologians were taught as certain doctrine that in the long run positive atheism could not exist in a person without grave personal guilt. There is no need to explain at length what influence such a doctrine would have on the way in which Catholics might treat an atheist in their environment if the doctrine were applied to daily life. For this doctrine, the existence of God was so clear and so easy to demonstrate from reason, and the concept God in the statement "God exists" so obvious that, given normal intelligence and sufficient length of time, only a scoundrel could fail to be convinced of the existence of God. According to this doctrine nowadays we could be sure that we live among countless scoundrels and draw appropriate conclusions for our daily conduct.

During the Council nobody ever mentioned this traditional doctrine, not even the most conservative bishops and theologians; nor was it mentioned in the context of the conciliar debates and deliberations, where one would have expected it to come up. No serious discussions arose when the Council said: "Nor does divine Providence deny the help necessary for salvation to those who, without blame on their part, have not yet arrived at an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explicit knowledge of God, but who strive to lead a good life, thanks to His Grace" (Lumen Gentium, 16). Or elsewhere when the Council, speaking of "all persons of good will in whose hearts grace works in an unseen way," says: "We ought to believe that the Holy Spirit in a manner known only to God offers to every human being the possibility of being associated with this paschal mystery" (Gaudium et Spes, 22).

I believe that a hundred years ago few theologians would have dared to make these and other statements of the Council about atheism and atheists. For the average person in the street today such declarations may sound utterly obvious. For a Church that is resolved at all costs to be faithful to both divine revelation and tradition, such statements in the history of her awareness of the faith are milestones to which she will not return. While positive atheism is always objectively false and a dreadful danger for a person's salvation, it cannot, as concretely present in human consciousness, simply and absolutely be identified with a deadly guilt to which [99] God can react only by a no of damnation. The Church admits also (not only!) a guiltless atheism, at least insofar as individuals in their own salvation history are concerned. So she must also – I say also – admit a positive significance of atheism for salvation at the same time as she fights unbelief in today's world. But with the declarations mentioned above the Church has reached a point in her awareness of the faith that she had not reached before, and she has clarified a position from which a really loving dialogue may be held with all people in the world.

When we consider what has been said, two things become clear. First, formally speaking, in the teaching of the Council on such dramatic questions we must pay attention to the things that are only hinted at or suggested by what has been omitted, even though they are of great importance. And secondly, such suggestions are an initiative for further reflection in theology. The tolerance of the Council, which does not deny that atheists as individuals may be guiltless before God, does not mean that everything here is clear, peaceful, and able to be solved in a liberal way. Rather, theologians are confronted with a pressing and difficult question that requires their attention. They cannot, in a sort of cheap liberalism, take it for granted that persons who have reached the age of reason and can make moral decisions can simply go on living free from guilt before God and enter into God's immediacy in eternal life without having known God.

Are there such guiltless atheists? Given the historical development that has led to the spiritual climate of today and tomorrow, it is hard to doubt it. Then the question comes up how, despite their professed atheism, they can have a real knowledge of God that leads to salvation and renders faith possible, although that faith is hidden, in the foreground of their consciousness, behind the atheism that they express in words. We are facing the problem of an anonymous theism, although quite a number of theologians detest the word "anonymous" in this connection. The word does not matter; what matters is the reality indicated by the statement of the Council, which brings up other more general questions of anthropology in theology as well. There must be more dimensions to human consciousness in its knowing and free decision-making, more foreground and background, more data, verbalized or not, accepted or repressed, than traditional theology has explicitly recognized.

[100]

RELATION OF THE TEACHING AND JURISDICTIONAL PRIMACY OF THE POPE TO THE FULLNESS OF POWER OF THE COLLEGE OF BISHOPS

Here is another initiative that gives us food for thought: the question of the precise relation, in theory and practice, between the universal teaching and jurisdictional primacy of the pope and the same fullness of power that belongs to the college of bishops – with and under the pope to be sure, but really to the college of bishops as such. The Council made a declaration,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which had never before been made in a council, about the college of bishops as the highest bearer of the fullness of all sacramental and canonical power in the Church. The declaration led to rather intense discussions during the Council, although in fact it did not go beyond what the theologians of the First Vatican Council had said. It is known that Pope Paul VI watched anxiously lest the declaration about the nature and the function of the college of bishops overshadow the doctrine of Vatican I about the pope's supreme and universal primacy of jurisdiction and the fullness of his teaching power. These two teachings of the Council are now juxtaposed; both are of equal importance and validity. But the question of how these two subjects endowed with the fullness of power in the Church are related to each other remained unanswered in the Second Vatican Council. For theology, it is something that demands further study. It is easy to see that this question is of great importance for the life of the Church. Yet it looks as though theologians, canon lawyers, and church leaders do not consider it very difficult and worrisome.

In a single society there cannot exist two different subjects endowed with the fullness of power, because this would do away with the unity of the society. We might say however that this is not the case here, because the college of bishops is the bearer of the fullness of power only with and under the pope, so that there can be no question of an adequate distinction between the two subjects of this power. While this statement is true, it removes neither in theory nor in practice the problem brought up for theology and canon law by these two declarations.

In order to reconcile the two declarations it seems to me that we should start by emphasizing that, even when the pope acts on his own in matters of doctrine or law, he exercises his fullness of power as head of the universal episcopate. Otherwise the latter, [101] not being identical with the pope, would be degraded to the rank of an advisory board in the universal Church. The pope's fullness of power must always and everywhere – even when he "acts alone" (which he may do of course) – be integrated into that of the body of bishops. And this body too cannot be understood aside from the unique power of the pope. Even if we hold this speculatively, it does not solve the problem for either theory or practice. The theoretical and practical problems met by Rome in the postconciliar synods of bishops are well known.

Pope Paul VI decided to organize these synods and intended to go on holding them, in order to live up to the teaching and the spirit of the Council about the college of bishops. We should not be surprised that the pope did not want to grant to a synod the rights and full powers of a council, either in theory or in practice. So, up to now, synods have been only meetings of an advisory body, while the pope has reserved to himself – at least in the area of juridical decisions – the full powers of his primacy. During a council the bishops themselves are judices, together with the pope; they are not simply advisors. They should not be and they have not been judices during these synods of bishops. They are only advisors, as was repeatedly made clear in these synods. But if this is the way things are, the ecclesiological problem remains unsolved, that is, whether the highest and universal fullness of power in the Church, which the Council attributed to the universal episcopate, can operate only in a council, or whether there are other ways as well in which these full powers might be active. If there are other ways, what would they look like in the concrete practice of the Church?

If this is impossible a priori, then in reality only the pope would be the bearer of the highest power in the Church, especially since only he can convene a council. This is one reason why the Council's doctrine about the body of bishops as subject of the supreme power in the Church is not easy to understand. We mentioned above that the synod of bishops has only an advisory function for the ruling of the Church by the pope, as indicated rather pointedly by the new Code of Canon Law. These synods of bishops may therefore be considered a modest contribution to a somewhat greater democratization. But one cannot appeal to them to clarify

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the meaning and realization of the Council's doctrine about the world episcopate.

[102] Hence the Council proposes a theological task, which it does not carry out itself: to make it clear, in theory and practice, that the body of bishops directs the Church and how it does this. It is true that theoretically one may answer this question by saying that the college of bishops does it through the pope, who exercises his own full powers as head and as representative of the world episcopate. But this answer is not sufficient. For in practice it is not easy to see that the pope exercises his full powers precisely as head and as representative of the college of bishops. Yet he can exercise full power in this way, even though he does not receive his power from the college of bishops, since the latter does not exist without him. There is no need to show, by concrete examples, that Roman church leaders do not in practice make it clear that they exercise their power by virtue of a sort of feedback to the body of bishops. Yet we might say that such feedback is given by its very nature, although traditional ecclesiology does not clearly state it and the doctrine of the Council on the college of bishops teaches it only implicitly.

The Council's teaching about two somewhat distinct subjects of the highest power in the Church presents theology with a task for further reflection although theologians may be unable to come up with a solution that is absolutely clear. In the juridical field there are problems concerning the coexistence of rights that preclude the hope of a clear solution by means of a higher synthesis. (It seems to me, for instance, that the coexistence in a society of both unity and the need to delegate power is one such problem. It is impossible to solve it completely within a precise juridical framework. Outside the juridical domain we are referred to practice and history, to love and humility.) Yet the task is still there. Ecclesiology and canon law must first clearly explain the theoretical impossibility of solving the problem and draw the necessary conclusions. And for the domain of practice, they must examine how the significance of the college of bishops both within and outside of the papal government can come more fully into its own.

The pope could, for instance, at least jure humano, grant to the synod of bishops a votum deliberativum; canon law admits this possibility. Further, the powers of the individual bishop should be limited as little as possible. He leads the diocese in the name of Christ, not in the name of the pope. Thus it is possible to avoid the impression that individual bishops are merely regional deputies of [103] the pope, whose mission and power are merely delegated to them by the pope.

There is no need to explain at length that the task thus entrusted to theology and canon law is of the highest ecumenical significance. It is enough to think of the problem of the appointment of bishops in the Church. The Church's nature does not demand that these appointments depend solely on the pope's free choice. They can also be made in some other way, under a particular law. The new code (can. 304, para. 1) admits this, although, typically, this admission has been inserted in the code almost as an afterthought.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF SALVATION

Another point that must be considered in connection with our theme, one which I no longer have to explain in detail,[1] is the hope that clearly emerged in the Council of a really universal salvation of the whole world and our ensuing new relationship to the other churches and communities, as well as to the non-Christian world religions. This hope of universal salvation explains why, in contrast to earlier times, the Council presumes good faith, a right moral

[1] See Karl Rahner, Concern for the Church: Theological Investigations 20, trans. Edward Quinn (New York: Crossroad; London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1981), pp. 97-102.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

attitude. It professes that grace is offered to all human beings, although not all of them accept it. This new worldview, which has become irreversible only with the Council, implies a great number of new theological suggestions that are evident and do not have to be explained in detail.

This universal hope is part of the folly of the cross that is expected from us, today's Christians. Despite all hope of progress, peace, and a better life, for a sober realist it is a hope against all hope (Rom. 4:18). In the long run it is the hope of eternal life – but for all. The Council encourages us to harbor this universal hope. Sober and realistic persons will find it hard to entertain such a hope, because every instance of progress they know of also means more dreadful violence and hopeless dying. But for us Christians this hope is obligatory. We are no longer allowed to hold in cold blood, as theoretically certain, like our Christian ancestors, that the definitive and permanent outcome of world history [104] consists mostly in eternal damnation. This universal hope is also a burden. It is hard and we would betray it if we did not exert ourselves not to despair of our society and our history. Universal hope is a lasting gift from the Council; it is both a solace and a summons.

Does this not imply tasks that theology is still far from having carried out? When we keep in mind what the Council teaches about the universal salvific will of God at work everywhere, can grace still be conceived as circumscribed by space and time, as simply effected from without and from above, only given now and then – albeit always again – in a history that otherwise remains natural and profane? How must we interpret the dreadful evil in the world without belittling it, so that the doctrine of the universal, eschatologically irreversible, lasting, and effective salvific will of God does not remain just a verbal theorem, which is repeatedly being refuted by human malice?

How can there exist a real salvific faith in revelation where the verbal revelation of both Old and New Testaments has not penetrated? Is it still possible, in trying to answer this question, to appeal mythologically and naively to the primordial revelation in Paradise? We must now admit millions of years of salvation history, a long history of faith. Are we to explain it by assuming vaguely that the time elapsed between the beginning of humankind and Moses, a period of millions of years, has been taken care of by divine Providence, and without explaining how real revelation and faith in that revelation are possible? Is it enough to say with the Council that there are roads to salvation known only to God? How can, we reconcile the absolute character of Christianity with the admission of a positive significance for salvation of non-Christian religions? Why can we, contrary to the trend that still prevailed under Pius XII, call non-Catholic communities "churches"? Exactly what does the Council mean when it says (Lumen Gentium, 8) that the Church of Jesus Christ is realized (subsistit) in the Roman Catholic Church, while avoiding an absolute identification that would be indicated by the word "is" (esse)? These and many other suggestions and questions that I cannot mention here are offered to us with this universal hope of salvation. That hope embraces all persons, all Christian communities, all non-Christian religions, so that it may gradually dawn on us how Christ has really died for all and how the Church is the universal sacrament of salvation for the whole world.

[105]

TASKS FOR SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY

Here are a few more suggestions and questions that theology has not yet worked out. What theology of freedom stands behind the Declaration on Religious Freedom? What enormous theological tasks are presented to us by the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World? What is implied by the fact that, contrary to the opinion of almost all theologians after the Council of Trent, the Council sees in the sacrament of penance a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

reconciliation with the Church as well? The Constitution on Divine Revelation tells us that the authors of Scripture are to be understood as truly independent authors, and not just persons who wrote what God dictated. How then shall we understand the inspiration of Scripture, the formation of the canon, and how we know about it? These and many other initiatives along the lines of dogmatic theology cannot be considered here. Today a certain weariness and resignation seems to have settled on systematic theology. This is certainly not due to the Council, which supplied theologians with many half-forgotten questions. These questions will have to be tackled bravely so that the proclamation of divine revelation by the Church today may be as it should and can be, and we may do our share so that God's word may be heard and God's grace be active and glorified.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[106]

10

PERSPECTIVES FOR PASTORAL THEOLOGY IN THE FUTURE

A PASTORAL STRATEGY FOR THE WORLD-CHURCH

What follows will contain a few considerations about the necessity of finding a strategy for pastoral theology that will be valid and workable for the world-Church. I do not believe, of course, that I can discover or develop such a plan, or even present it in this short article. I am convinced that such a pastoral strategy for the world-Church does not yet exist. So obviously I cannot develop it. But I hold that we should slowly begin to see that the time for such a global strategy in the Church has definitely come and is demanded by our times. We leave open the question who might develop it. Should it simply be the college of bishops with and under the pope, or the pastoral theologians of the world as they become aware of the problem, or a special Roman body to be organized for that purpose, or finally all of these agencies together?

When I say that the awareness of this task is hardly alive in the Church, I am not pronouncing a judgment on what takes place in the pastoral-theological consciousness of those who bear an immediate responsibility for the universal Church. Nor do I deny that there are tangible beginnings of this planning for a pastoral theological strategy for the world-Church, as for instance in the works of Walbert Bühlmann. I mean only that it is not clearly present and tangible in existing institutions either in the Church at large or in Rome.

[107] What I will say here is a timid attempt, whose only purpose is to contribute, to some extent, to awareness that the Church, in her pastoral theology and planning, has a duty to develop an explicit strategy for her pastoral task as a world-Church.

PASTORAL STRATEGY AND THE SYNOD OF BISHOPS

It might be said that the organization of the synod of bishops by Paul VI showed that such a duty had been recognized and undertaken. If this is true, I do not intend to underestimate the importance of these synods. But it seems to me that up to now the synod has considered what the individual local churches and their bishops have to do in carrying out their immediate duties for the present. I wonder whether in these synods of bishops the Church as world-Church, the Church as a whole, has explicitly pondered her pastoral strategy, as the strategy of the whole Church and as a strategy for the future. Even those who say “Yes” should not object to my present intent: to reflect on the need and the possibility of a pastoral strategy of the world-Church as such, and to hope that this planning, which did not and could not exist formerly, may have an appropriate subject. Should that subject be the college of bishops, or the synod of bishops, or a special Roman body set up for that purpose? This is a question of secondary importance, one that will easily be answered in theory and practice once the conviction is clearly alive in the Church’s collective consciousness that today such a strategic pastoral plan is a necessity. Here then are a few ideas on the nature and need of such a plan.

PASTORAL STRATEGY AND ROMAN CENTRAL GOVERNMENT

One more preliminary remark may be appropriate. One might think that the different bodies

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of the Church's Roman central government were taking care of this problem. There exists a Roman congregation for the evangelization of peoples (a general staff for the missions), a congregation for the oriental churches, one for the bishops, for the clergy, for the discipline of the sacraments [108] and the liturgy, for religious and secular institutes, for education, and so on. There is a Secretariat of State. So, we might think that all these Roman bodies have some vision, that they do not worry only about what is to be done here and now but that in their inquiries and reflection they keep their eyes on the future. We might think that in this way all of them together would have a broad strategic plan for the pastoral tasks of the world Church. Far be it from me to belittle these endeavors, if they exist.

Yet we might be slightly skeptical and wonder whether such a plan really is being developed in Rome. First, because in that case it would be a well-kept secret of the Roman central government. But should not the universal Church know of it, since it can be worked out in the right way only if the whole Church contributes her experience? Yet I do not believe that any member of the synod of bishops has ever heard of such a basic pastoral strategy for the world-Church. Moreover historically the Roman congregations were established and arranged in a random way, which was not modified by the reform of the curia under Paul VI. Can they be an effective and perceptive instrument for developing and carrying out such a plan? One might wonder whether, in their traditional aloofness from each other, the individual congregations are the right agency for such a common plan and its realization. The difficulties with regard to the respective jurisdictions of the Secretariat of State and the individual congregations and secretariats show that an ideal chain of authority and the ensuing collaboration, based on a single carefully worked out strategic plan, are still a desideratum. Finally even if all this had been nicely worked out in Rome, it would not be forbidden to lend a hand in this task.

As we reflect on the nature and the need of a strategic pastoral plan for the Church as a whole, we must not overlook two new facts that characterize the situation of the Church today. Together they make clear the possibility, nature, and necessity of such a pastoral plan for the world-Church, and they tell us who should develop and carry it out. Both the existence of a world-Church and the beginnings of a secular strategy for the future help us understand the nature and necessity of a strategic pastoral plan for the world Church as such.

[109]

Today There Exists a World-Church

Christianity with its message of salvation was, of course, always destined for the whole of humankind and therefore potentially always a world-Church. But in fact neither as Judeo-Christian, nor as the Church of Roman-Christian culture and of the West, was the Church a world-Church in the actual sense of the word. And when, in the wake of European colonialism and imperialism in the sixteenth century, the Church started her expansion into the whole world and to all peoples, the result of her missionary activity was nothing more than Western Christianity exported throughout the world. The Church remained in fact an occidental Church with exports all over the globe. Today, as a result of the policies developed during the Second Vatican Council, the Church has really started to become a world-Church. Everywhere there are native bishops and clergy. The autonomy of the great regional churches was recognized in principle during the last Council. Everywhere, albeit with different intensity, initial moves are being made toward a theology that corresponds to the different cultures. Everywhere the inculturation of Christianity into the different cultures is, at least in principle, admitted as a duty of the Church. The former missionary churches are already starting, although quite timidly, to make their positive and active contribution to the life of the universal Church. Everywhere we notice difficulties and attempted solutions to the question of how to reconcile the unity of the Church with a lawful pluralism of the regional churches, so that the Church may really act and look like a world-Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The emergence of the Church as a world-Church is in fact, although not in its deepest nature, brought about by a newly emerging unity of humankind and by the ensuing development of global social activity and planning for this unified humankind. Formerly the fate and the history of individual peoples and groups were separated by a no man's land. At the time of Frederick William, the Great Elector (1620-88), the reality and history of Prussia were practically independent of the reality and history of Thailand. Today everything is interconnected. The life and destiny of every part of the earth are definitely and tangibly conditioned by whatever happens elsewhere in the world. That is why there have been world wars, which in former times were quite impossible. That is why there exists a United Nations and great superpowers with a [110] global sphere of influence and power. Nowadays human history constitutes a unity; humanity is a unity not only on account of its origin, not only as an idea born in our heads, but as a directly tangible reality.

Humankind Begins to Plan Its Unity

At the same time, both as a result and a cause of this unity, humankind is planning its future and knows that such planning is a necessity. The future used to be considered the more or less unplanned and unconscious result of what befell people as a passively suffered natural fate and of what they themselves could do in their lifetime, without any desire or possibility of planning ahead. Today we are aware, or at least we are becoming aware, that the future is the realization of a plan for the future. In this way world and nature are not so much the available and natural places where people live but rather the material for a place to live, which people themselves plan and construct. That is why there are artificial substances that do not exist in nature, and why energies are tapped that are not of themselves available to humans, and so on.

Of course, this global planning of humanity's future is still in its infancy, because any kind of peaceful world government has still to be established. Such planning necessarily has its limits because, without mentioning other reasons, nobody would ever be able to assimilate all the data provided by a universal computer of rational world planning. Of course, this rational world planning entails enormous dangers for the self-destruction of humanity in the most diverse ways, which as we may notice, are already at work: atomic destruction, overpopulation with all its consequences, destruction of the indispensable requirements of human life, psychic dangers for humankind's global consciousness, of which we have hardly an inkling. But all of this does not change the fact that humankind is about to become a unified, active subject that plans and must plan for the future.

The idea that humanity might return to a more naive and spontaneous stage of consciousness and activity is a nostalgic utopia, whose realization would have to be paid for by the extinction of a great part of humankind. Humanity has reached the stage of conscious, rational self-planning; at least the beginning of this self-planning [111] is evident. In the long run Marxist socialism may prove to be a fashion that will soon be outmoded. At the same time the individualism, which the West was able to afford with the restricted population of former times, is also a way of life of the past. Humankind therefore will have to look for newer and higher forms of socialization.

We can no longer do without global political planning, for which the United Nations is only a modest beginning. It aims at some kind of world government that, it is to be hoped, will not do away with the pluralism of peoples and cultures. One hundred years ago a neo-scholastic philosopher-jurist had already claimed that such a government was demanded by the natural law. It is probable that we will be practically unable and morally forbidden to control and modify human nature biogentically. But this does not mean that our biological existence will not and should not be planned and controlled – and not merely by curbing population growth. It stands to reason that in the future the management, increase, and protection of the prerequisites of human life in nature have to be rationally and globally planned. All these efforts at planning are but the first intimations that humanity's collective awareness is slowly entering the stage of a conscious planning for humankind itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is precisely at this stage of human development, when humankind is slowly becoming the actively planning subject of its own self-realization, that the Church has at least begun to be a real world-Church. In the context of humanity's new theoretical and practical consciousness the Church too must plan for herself and her future in a new way.

PLAN AND FREEDOM

There is a need for an active global pastoral-planning strategy for the world-Church. Before trying to translate this thesis into more concrete language, I have to add a qualification which derives from the nature of human freedom, a freedom that is, of its very nature, never absolute. It is clear that humankind's active self-planning as a secular reality is never complete. The planners themselves are also the planned, and the future is always the coming of the unexpected. Even though we are supremely free, we have to do with available materials, which are never completely transparent. [112] As a result, in spite of all our planning, there are always unforeseen surprises. Moreover, by definition, freedom itself, time and again, upsets its own planning with unplanned decisions. A fortiori, all planning by the Church, every futurological approach to the Church, will in principle be an unfinished business. The Church must move into an unpredictable future. Indeed, the Church is the community of people who expect as their salvation that which cannot be planned, who accept as their everlasting bliss the incomprehensibility of God in the dawning of God's kingdom, who consider expectant waiting and watching for this incalculable future a fundamental duty of the Church. The Church in the world is the sacrament of the unplanned future because this future is the incomprehensibility of God himself.

However, this does not mean that human freedom and the Church's duty do not need any planning. We will be able to see the blessed heavens open above us when all we have built collapses on top of us. Nevertheless, we must always plan ahead and keep on trying to build a better dwelling place for ourselves. And the Church that is watching hopefully for the coming of God's incomprehensibility must also be a Church of social justice, of order, of missionary activity, of human rights, and also of human planning. In principle she has always been such. Today, however, she has to be all of these things as one world-Church, in the new context of a unified world, global human planning, and rational futurology.

DUTIES OF THE WORLD CHURCH

All of this means new problems ahead, which are hardly suspected as yet but which must be solved. For the solution of these problems the Church may have to look for wholly new, totally reorganized agencies. The following are a few comments about this. They do not claim to be systematic or to cover all aspects of the problem.

Building a New Awareness of the Faith

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To mention a first example of a strategy for the world-Church, I believe that thorough reflection and planning are required with regard to the Church's consciousness, by which I mean the concrete [113] awareness of the faith in the Church. The difference between what is officially taught as the faith of the Church and what is actually believed by the majority of the faithful has, for diverse reasons which cannot be analyzed here, become unbelievably greater than used to be the case. The Church should not and cannot manipulate collective consciousness, as happens in totalitarian states. Yet the connection required today between the official doctrine of the Church and the actual faith of the people can no longer be brought about through means that used to suffice for that purpose. The Congregation of the Faith as it is organized today, the encyclicals and allocutions of the pope in traditional vocabulary, the pastoral letters of bishops with their traditional accent and content, the usual preaching from the pulpit whose content is aimed at a few people and has little appeal to unbelievers and marginal Catholics, catechisms that continue to be as inbred as ever, all these are no longer adequate to bring the marvelous message of Christianity to people as they really are. They are unable to bridge the gap between the official faith of the Church and Christian doctrine as it really lives in the heads and hearts of Christians and in the more or less correct information of non-Catholics.

How should such a new shaping and erecting of the actual awareness of the faith be planned and organized? Who is to be entrusted with this task? The instruction of people through mere reliance on church authority keeps losing its efficacy. How can we change it into a formation that persuades through the inner splendor of the truth itself? I have no answer to all these questions. But they cannot be evaded, they must be answered within the framework of the Church's global strategy. The task involves a great diversity of theological problems. To solve them church leaders cannot passively wait for answers from theologians. They must actively cooperate, do their share, so that such questions may be clearly grasped and answered as well as possible.

Recently I asked why there was no papal encyclical about today's atheism. I continue to be amazed that papal encyclicals treat (correctly of course) the Incarnation of the eternal Word, without making the slightest attempt to render this fundamental doctrine of Christianity more accessible to today's unbelievers, to whom it sounds utterly absurd. (Recently a member of the Congregation of the Faith told me that the task of the magisterium was to see to it that Christian doctrine is not falsified or weakened, and that [114] the positive interpretation and defense of this doctrine is the task of theologians.) That is not the way it should be today. Rather, the defense and interpretation of Christian doctrine by theologians should be encouraged and promoted by the magisterium. Eventually the latter should at least draw theologians' attention to the large number of questions that have been neglected. But it seems to me that the magisterium notices these questions even later than do theologians. Does, for instance, the frightening decrease in the frequency of confessions not involve a variety of theological questions, most of which both the magisterium and theologians simply ignore?

Here is a concrete point where, to my mind, what has just been said becomes clear. I suppose that in the old Church people knew what they had to believe upon hearing the Apostles' Creed (at least with a very short explanation). I suspect that, in spite of the normative significance that this creed has and will continue to have, people today understand little or nothing when they recite it, even if I try to explain it to them. They will ask me what they should understand by the word God, since, if God exists at all, he is certainly not living in the empyrean heaven and be still active two hundred million light years from us. Where can we find new, up-to-date, short formulations of the faith, by means of which today's unbelievers begin to understand what we Christians really believe?

A plan for systematic and pastoral theology should calmly and courageously head in the direction of a theology and proclamation that are open to the whole world. It is true that Christianity cannot deny in theory and practice its own historical origin. Everywhere in the world and in all its cultures it should always be clear that Christianity hails from Palestine and that it has passed through Western culture. But if and when Christianity is to become a world religion, that is, the religion of the peoples and cultures that did not originate near the Mediterranean or in the West, the only possible course is to be open to the whole world. This means that, in theory and practice, Christianity must become historically more neutral; it must let its historical origins, insofar as they do not affect its own nature, quietly fade away into history. We may ask what Christianity will look like when, in the non-Western world, its historical provenance has disappeared into a distant past, somewhat like the Jewish theology of Jesus' time that is no longer known to us and is of no interest. Such changes will certainly occur. But both systematic [115] and pastoral theology should make it a policy to teach us to recognize the changes.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Universal Church and Particular Churches

Another important group of questions for a real global strategy of the Church refers to the still unsolved problem of the relation between the universal Church and the great regional churches. True, the Second Vatican Council solemnly declared that these churches are not simply administrative districts of the one universal Church, differing from each other only in a few small details. However, on the whole (if we overlook the small Uniate churches of the Near East) nothing has come of this general principle. Rome continues to look for the most uniform canon law possible. For example, the approved liturgies are in fact nothing but translations of the Roman liturgy.

Of course, some may claim that the Church's unity renders such uniformity necessary in the universal Church. But by holding such a position, they can easily sabotage the principle of the relative independence and diversity of the great regional churches and reduce the principle to mere lip service. What degree of autonomy, what tangible initiatives has Rome really granted to the churches of South America or of Indonesia? Of course in practice it is not easy to work out the consequences of the dialectical relationship between universal and particular churches. But where is the authority that, together with the universal Church, courageously thinks these problems through and sees to it that these consequences are realized?

The World Responsibility of the Church

In the Second Vatican Council the Church loudly and expressly proclaimed her global responsibility, her responsibility for peace and justice in the world. During the past few decades she has certainly done much in this regard, although much of what has been said and done by the highest authority in the Church has afterward been sabotaged by the indolence or quiet resistance of subordinates. Would it not be possible for the Christian churches to think [116] of even more steps, especially more concrete ones, in this regard? Does the Church today have the courage to come up with more concrete demands for social change, for peace and disarmament, even when they are rejected within the Church herself, especially by politicians? Is there an agency in Rome that really studies all these questions systematically and accurately (and not just because of some official's praiseworthy good will) and, with real courage, strives for concrete solutions? Naturally there are those in Rome who busy themselves with such problems, who represent the Holy See at various congresses and meetings. But it is difficult for the average Christian to find a single courageous voice in Rome speaking on behalf of the Church's global responsibility. Indeed, it looks as if in Rome, despite the pope's world travels, the courage for such tasks is decreasing, not increasing. It seems that Rome is anxious and nervous, preferring to call back to the sacristy those Christians who are actively trying to carry out their task of social criticism in the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Diaspora Situation of Christians

It seems to me that this elusive topic of a global pastoral strategy for the world-Church has a further task, in addition to the many others that will not be mentioned here. I would like to call this task the problem of the Church's diaspora situation. For all practical purposes the Church acts on the unstated presupposition that there still exists a more or less intact homogeneous Catholic Christianity, as was the case until well into the twentieth century, and as may still be the case in Poland today. For instance, it was taken for granted that Catholics married Catholics. A mixed marriage could be treated as an unusual exception, which was patiently and cautiously tolerated. It was easy to organize Catholic social organizations, to press for Catholic schools, and to keep artistic, literary, and leisure activities mostly within the Church, under Catholic auspices.

Today this situation is practically finished. Christians live so much in the diaspora that, even in groups controlled by the Church, committed and fervent Catholics are often only a small majority. Although this situation exists in traditionally Christian countries as well as in the so-called missions, it seems to me that it has not [117] yet led the Church to really systematic and courageous theological and pastoral reflection. Everywhere Catholics of the diaspora speak the language of their environment, a secular language. All of this being the case, what religious language can the Church use to make itself understood? What do people today take for granted in their personal lives? Could these questions be the starting point for attempts to make Christianity understandable and believable? The ancient Church tolerated a moral doctrine that included slavery as practiced by the general population. What opinions are "taken for granted" today, although in fact they may be morally questionable or false? Might not the Church quietly, but this time with full awareness, ignore this without wasting its energy in unsuccessful protests?

Can the Church today simply continue to presume as she used to do that outside, and even within, the Church all so-called marriages start with the intention that is required for a really indissoluble marriage? As the Church endeavors to promote morality, should she not more carefully and more impartially take into account the social and political presuppositions of the different cultures than she did formerly, when Western Christian morality was simply exported to mission countries? Recently a bishop from South America asked how useful it was for the Church naively to sing the praise of marriage in a country where the majority of children are born out of wedlock. On what specific fronts of the campaign for morality (and not on all of them at once) should the Church fight resolutely in order to witness in the world to the grandeur and dignity of Christian morality?

Today, as was always the case, Christian morality emphasizes certain points without thereby rescinding or denying other principles. Would it not make more sense to a secularized world if the rejection of the arms race that is becoming more and more insane were a more important characteristic of Christianity than the rejection of artificial contraception? Such shifts in what morality emphasizes have always occurred. (During the reign of Louis XIV the popes did not lose any sleep because of that king's immoral war policy, and who will blame them for it?) But today such shifts in emphasis should be considered in a global pastoral strategy. If the Church does not simply look perfunctorily at this diaspora situation and forget about it, she has to make a choice. Is she going to try by all means possible to hold on [118] to the policy of spreading out pastoral care everywhere as uniformly as possible. Or should she try to develop, somewhat like oases in the desert of our secularized world, instances of pastoral ministry, even if this means the end of a uniformly thin and not very attractive presence? Whatever the solution the universal diaspora situation has confronted our global pastoral strategy with tasks that are far from being sufficiently recognized and fulfilled.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Turning Away from a Bourgeois Church

Today we often talk about turning away from a bourgeois Christianity, from a service Church. What is right in such a demand? What can be done about it today? What is better left for the future? What have we rightly taken over, and what perhaps not so rightly, from other countries and cultures? What is so utopian that it cannot be realized in the future as our secularized society continues to develop? It is, of course, impossible to answer all these questions here.

Yet the demand to turn away from a bourgeois Church includes an important and correct view of the future, which we have to think about and plan for. If, for instance, the Church really wants to hold on to celibacy in the future, this position will entail far-reaching changes. Today's church leaders do not clearly see them and intend them even less, yet changes will inexorably come if the Church is not to shrink into an insignificant sect.

Lay people will necessarily enjoy more independence, power, and importance. In base Christian communities they will, to a large extent, do the work of the Church. As ordinary Christians we will firmly expect that the Church of the future will continue to be the Church of the ancient Christian faith, with that organization which her present faith declares to belong to divine and immutable right.

Nonetheless, in the year 2200 the Church in her visible features will look quite different from what we are used to. Is this transformation of the Church something unwanted and unforeseen but that will happen anyway? Is it going to "happen" gradually without much foresight, imposed upon her piecemeal by the present situation, in the way in which the Church of medieval feudalism followed upon the Church of the Fathers? Or, given the present [119] condition of collective human consciousness, should it not also be – although not primarily – a duty of the Church to foresee and, as much as possible, to plan in advance this coming transformation of the Church? Should there not exist in the Church a global pastoral strategy that looks to the future more than has been the case up to now? And is this not possible? To my mind this is a real problem for the Church of today, which has not yet received sufficient attention.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[120]

11

THE FUTURE OF CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES

Something must be said about the future of the Christian communities that, for all practical purposes, are identified with our parishes. No prophecies are to be made for the next five years; we have to look further ahead into the future. So we have to start from a point that is quite different from what might at first be expected. That is why we ask the reader to be patient.

Christianity has been in existence for two thousand years. Yet the greater part of humanity has not really come under the Church's influence, and so is not yet Christian. If I ask Christians whether we should send missionaries to try to convert these peoples, really good Christians will say, "of course." They will say: "Even if these people who are not Christians are to be saved through the hidden grace of God in a manner that, as the Council says, is known only to God, and provided they have not decisively and definitively acted against their conscience, even then all human beings should become Christians." And they are quite right. But still the question remains how God, in his Providence, after two thousand years, can allow the greater part of humanity to still be living outside Christianity. God must have a reason for this strange fact. While we can say that these reasons are hidden in the unfathomable will of God and should therefore be adored in silent submission, we can still give them some thought.

[121]

A CHRISTIAN WORLD?

Let us suppose for a moment that Christianity has spread all over the world. Everywhere there exist only Christian peoples. Even public opinion is Christian. Everywhere there are churches and bishops that are held in high esteem; the pope is welcomed all over the world with great enthusiasm. Even then the situation of each individual person would still be that of a mysterious radical struggle between light and darkness, between God and evil, between the option for God and eternal life and the option for definitive perdition. In other words, in spite of all the appearances of Christianity, the world would still be one in which darkness and light struggle with each other in a fight whose outcome we cannot predict according to merely human criteria.

If God lets individuals live to the end of their lives in a struggle between good and evil, we must also apply this to ordinary history. According to God's will this struggle must be manifest in a social manner; it cannot remain hidden in the interiority of the individual. So even supposing that one day all of humanity were externally christianized in a certain sense, things would not be very different. In the public eye there would still persist anti-Christian powers; in history, in politics, and in the arts, a lasting struggle would still go on for and against Christ. That is the way God seems to have willed it: God wants humanity to make free decisions, and not merely in each individual's interiority, but in the full view of history.

If we assume this view (although we cannot foresee exactly what it would look like in a humanity that, to all appearances, would everywhere be Christian), we understand at once that in such a situation real Christians would continue to be a minority. Even in such an ideal future, one which popes and bishops may have in mind and long for, real Christians would still be an embattled segment of humankind; they would, as we said, be challenged, opposed, and fought against, not only in the intimacy of each one's moral decision making, but also in the public eye. In other words true Christians cannot seriously expect to live in a uniformly Christian world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[122]

OASES IN A NON-CHRISTIAN WORLD

Let us presuppose all this and ask ourselves how one should envisage the near future of a Christian community. First, it is not certain that in our so-called Christian Europe there will ever be communities that completely cover the whole territory of a country or state. This statement does not proclaim an ideal for the future; it simply makes a sober realistic conjecture about how things will look in reality. There will be too few priests. Of course, we can hope that the number of priests starts growing again, but in a population in which only 10 to 15 percent of the people are actually "practicing" Catholics, we cannot expect that this small percentage will provide so many priests that the other 85 percent will be provided for. So we will have communities that will constitute a minority of the total population. For a realist, it is not probable that European secularized society will in the foreseeable future become Christian again, explicitly and in practice. In other words, we will have small communities with few priests. Thus, in the long run, it will probably not be possible for these communities with their few priests to reach immediately and directly, like police precincts, the whole population, the dechristianized.

It seems to me that, as a result, future communities, as well as so-called parishes, will no longer be able to feel responsible administratively for the total population of a country, as they have up to the present. Today, if we ask a pastor, "How many people are in your parish?" he will say, for instance, "ten thousand." By this he means that perhaps 1,500 of them are practicing Christians but that he also feels immediately responsible for the 8,500 others. It will be impossible for this to go on in the foreseeable future. It is not un-Christian and un-Catholic to expect that in the near future (in a matter of decades) Christian communities will be somewhat like oases in a non-Christian world. Communities of the future should, of course, not withdraw into a shell or a ghetto. They should be thoroughly missionary. They will have to present Christianity in a really attractive way. (We will have to come back to this point.) But these separate communities should not feel as though they were pitiful remnants of a larger community to which many more, five times more, people ought to belong. The same also applies to pastors, spiritual leaders, and all who direct such a community.

[123] Once one gets rid of the idea (not out of pessimism or laziness, but in a sober analysis of the situation of Christians in today's Western world) that the Christian parish community must be so organized and administered that it extends all the way to the neighboring parish and that all the members of these parishes should be equal to the total population, one has a picture of the situation in our country that can be expected for the Church in the world at large. Everywhere else in the world there are regions in which Christianity, whether Catholic or not, constitutes only minorities, only isolated oases. So when this situation carries over to Europe, and when the appearance of a universal, public christianization of Europe vanishes, one has only to be concerned with what in principle is to be expected from the Church's nature and from human freedom. We say this in consideration of the Church's situation in the world and in the public eye.

SO THAT GOD'S SALVATION MAY BECOME VISIBLE

One can really say to each community what the Second Vatican Council said about the self-

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understanding of the universal Church as present in the world: The Church is the sacrament of universal salvation. What does this mean? She is a historically tangible sign, willed by God, a sign that God loves the world as a whole, that he does not release it from the grip of his powerful love, and that he intends to lead it to its blessed consummation in ways that are not known to us. The Church is the great sacramental sign of all these things. But a sign is never simply identical with what it signifies. Therefore, while the Church is the sacramental sign of the world's salvation, we know that salvation extends far beyond it.

We can also apply this conception of the nature of the Church to a particular community, as it is now, or as it shows signs of becoming. Such a community is an oasis in a world that is secretly always filled with God's grace but that, seen from without, socially, looks very unholy, very pagan. The community is the visible sign of salvation that God has established in this seemingly godless world. Through this community God says: I am here in this world and I remain with my grace; secretly I fill the deepest depths of humanity, keeping people in the love that I, the eternal God, have for my only-begotten Son, the Incarnate Word. Of this, each Christian [124] community is the sacramental sign for its environment. The sign is different from what it signifies, namely the quiet, hidden salvific will of God in the whole secular world. God desired a sign because, as the God of the Incarnation, as the God become visible, he wanted not only to be the deepest hidden life of the world but also to let his universal love become manifest in history. God desired this to happen in such a way that the salvation which God proffers to the whole world might become visible in its ultimate Christian explicitness.

At this point a Christian might say: If that is true, I myself might make my life easier. I am going over to the world, which, according to what we have just said, is not living outside of God's salvific will, which can attain its salvation even outside the visible Church. I will therefore forego explicit Christianity with all the obligations that go with it: Sunday Mass, receiving the sacraments, being controlled by church authorities, and so on.

Christians, however, may not speak this way. Why? Because they have come under the influence of God's grace in Jesus Christ and in the Church, unlike many others, even though we cannot draw an exact boundary between the two. But those Christians who have expressly encountered Jesus Christ and his Church cannot say: I look for my salvation outside explicit Christianity, which refers to and believes in Jesus Christ and his Church, with her sacraments, and so on. Should they speak that way, after having been specially chosen by God, they would be rejecting their very salvation. In other words: This conception of an oasis-like Christian community, as a sacramental sign of salvation for the world around it by no means implies that Christians would be allowed to break away, as it were, from this sign to which they belong in order to join anonymous Christianity, for which God's salvific will is at work mysteriously – albeit always on account of Christ.

MADE FREE FOR A MISSIONARY TASK

It is time to show that, for reasons derived from the nature of Christianity, the community understood as an oasis will not be surprised that, although only a minority, it stands under order to engage in missionary activity. And the community will understand that, by accepting this minority status, it can accomplish so much [125] more naturally and freely. First, it is clear that this community, as a sign of salvation for others, must take care that the sign does not perish. The visible and tangible presence of the world's salvation, related to Jesus Christ and called Church, must be present in the world until the end of time. We cannot determine how large and powerful this sign is in proportion to the totality of humankind, but it must by all means continue to exist.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Those who know that they have been called to this explicit form of salvation as a sign for others and who therefore cannot ignore their social responsibility, their love for neighbor, must see to it that this community remains alive, that it continues to grow, and that it gains new members from the surrounding secular society. Those who have been taken over by God's grace, not in a wordless anonymous way, that is not without awareness of their privilege, those who know that they really are God's beloved children and who realize that they have been called to an everlasting life in God's immediacy, should also make this privilege known to others. They are aware of the blessing that has come to them. Let them therefore tell others about it so that this sign of the world's salvation that is called Church may keep radiating from them ever more intensely, so that it may win over more people and fill them with the awareness of this innermost blessing of grace.

A community that does not continually lament because only 15 percent of its members are practicing Catholics, but rather rejoices because of those who are active, has a better chance of being filled with missionary zeal than a community in which, like a cancerous growth, the depressing feeling prevails that it is really not what it ought to be, because 85 percent of its members have turned away. The former, impelled by what it knows about itself from faith, is the sacramental sign of salvation for those who do not yet properly and actively belong to it; it can be filed with a much less biased and more lively missionary zeal.

THE TASK OF THE PRIEST

Some time ago I said that a priest or a bishop should be asked how many new Christians he had gained in his so-called Christian, but in rea1ity un-Christian, territory. He should attach more importance to this than to the question of how many "still" belong to his [126] community or his diocese. This question also allows us to understand the proper task of a priest as community leader in the parish of the future. Through his existence, his deeds, and his words, he is, as it were, the living, believing, hoping, loving witness of God's message. That is why he tries to win over at least a few followers.

It is from the characteristics of a spiritual guru (if I may speak this way) that a priest of the future should get an idea of his function. He is not first and foremost the one who must see to it that all those who in fact do not know what it really means receive baptism, be married in the church, and be buried from the church. He is not the one who should in a precise way find out what percentage of his so-called parishioners actually fulfill their Easter duty. Rather, he is one who is filled with a salutary faith in Jesus Christ crucified and risen from the dead. Aware of the fact that be has been freed and redeemed, he is impelled by his faith in life eternal to share with as many people as possible (how many is unimportant) his own experience of redemption and liberation. He would, of course, also share the faith by means of the sacraments, especially the celebration of the Lord's Supper. But all of this must be included in the proclamation of the liberating, redeeming, and saving grace of God.

Such a pastor will feel at ease in a so-called base Christian community. I cannot discuss here the extent to which such base Christian communities should in the future coincide with parish communities. It is quite possible that even in a wonderfully active parish community there may still, or perhaps even there should still, exist base communities, as parts of such a parish. In any case, because of the powerful influence of such a pastor, the parish community itself should become a base community.

BASE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES AND CHANGES

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Persons who share a profound love of God should also share other concerns, and the love that the Holy Spirit inspires for God and neighbor should practically and concretely become manifest in a true community of mutual love and service. The priest, inspired by such true Christian fervor, feels naturally drawn to such a base community, his parish. And such a parish is a missionary parish. Trusting in God, it is not upset by the fact of being only a small [127] minority in the great wide world, because it is a minority that promises and that actually brings God's salvation to the world at large.

This allows us to answer a number of other questions. First, such a base community, with their priest (we might almost call him their "spiritual father"), will be interested in ecumenical work. Its members are those who have come under the mighty spell of God (we might almost call them, by God's grace, mystics of daily life), and they want to live like brothers and sisters. In such a community differences among churches are not, to be sure, simply ignored (this would lead to a third confession), but its genuine Christian spirit renders those differences less important, so that there is hope that they may be overcome. Should a pastor use a chasuble at Mass, or simply a gown, like a minister? Should we make frequent pilgrimages to Rome, or should our reverence for the Petrine office be more reserved, as befits its position in the hierarchy of Christian truths? For such questions, these base charismatic communities may well supply an answer that leads to real church unity.

In such a base community the relationship between priests and lay people undergoes a change. Not in the sense that there should be no more priests in the Church, and not in the sense that in a community needing some kind of organization there would not be different functions and tasks, whose distribution would be accepted by all with respect and love. But in such a community there is a function for everyone. In addition to the function of leading the community, especially at the Lord's Supper, there are many other indispensable functions. The pastor's function would, of course, not be limited to ritual. As community leader, he should feel a responsibility to be, through his whole life, a living and powerful example of Christian life for his brothers and sisters. There will, nevertheless, always remain some difference between an official function in such a community and the real meaning of the community.

THE EXAMPLE OF A CHESS CLUB

I will try to explain this first by means of an example, although that example has often been attacked (for instance by Gisbert Greshake). The main purpose of a chess club is to see to it that its [128] members are good, even outstanding, chess players. That is the purpose and the meaning of a chess club. Yet such a club needs a president, a treasurer, and other officers who arrange everything so that good chess may be played. It is desirable for the president to know something about chess, even to be a very good chess player. That helps him or her understand better how a chess club should be organized. But it is also quite possible that the president is not the best player, that other members are better players.

Something similar happens in the Church. The saints are the best chess players in the chess club of God's Church. Her leaders too, that is, the pope and the bishops, should, of course, be as holy as possible. But nobody can take it amiss (nor has this ever happened in the Church) if they are not as holy, as radically Christian, as powerfully influential for the good as the Church's great saints. I should not call for the resignation of the club president because he or she lost a game with one of the members. Likewise, we cannot demand too much from the leaders of the Church as a "society," as if, in order to be leaders, they had to be the best Christians. A bishop may at times stand spiritually lower than his chauffeur, who is a humble and unselfish Christian, foregoing more lucrative employment to work for his bishop as a service to the Church. It does not follow that the chauffeur should take over the bishop's function. On the other hand, priests, pastors, bishops, and religious, who have specific functions and tasks in the Church, must often remind themselves that, in the long run, they can carry them out in the right way only if they endeavor to be radically Christian.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

NEW FUNCTIONS IN THE CHURCH

The Church has a social organization which, she is convinced, is part of her nature. She is convinced that there will be deacons, priests, and bishops in the Church in the future, as there are today. But two points remain undecided.

First, it is not clear what exactly the task of these three hierarchic functions should be in a given historical and social setting. Possibly, as Franz Xaver Kaufmann has pointed out, a Church of the future would have much smaller dioceses, because more than in the past their vitality will depend on the vitality of their leaders. In the course of history priests have assumed many tasks that do [129] not necessarily belong to their function of presiding at the eucharistic celebration, tasks they have given up at other times. Deacons, priests, and bishops will not necessarily have the same functions in the future as they had in the past.

In the second place, this permanent hierarchic structure of the Church does not mean that all the functions that she has to fulfill as Church belong necessarily to members of the hierarchy. Where, for instance, does the hierarchical structure indicate the need for teachers in the Church? We might say, of course, that the bishop is the official teacher within his diocese. But this does not exclude the possibility, or even the necessity, of specially appointed teachers outside the hierarchic structure. There might also be a special function of official church charity. The Church must practice charity, not only in her members as they take care of the poor, but also as Church. So there could be a function like that of the deacons mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (6:2 ff.). It is not certain that this task can be carried out as it should by priests, pastors, directors of Catholic Charities, or the permanent deacons who are now being ordained. There might also be a function of social criticism that would call attention to social grievances, or a function of explicitly Catholic education or psychotherapy, and so on. All these examples should only make it clear that, besides the three traditional functions mentioned above, there could also exist in the Church other official tasks, which would deserve respect and a certain autonomy. These tasks and functions should not depend on the arbitrary power of the pastor or of the individual bishop. Rather, they should be accepted by the hierarchy as present-day specializations of the one all-embracing function of the Church as required by today's circumstances.

This does not mean that individual laypersons and groups of laypeople would not be important in the Church. The Church does not live only, and certainly not principally, in the hierarchy and its different members. As People of God on its pilgrimage through history, she lives in all her members. And wherever Christians, impelled by their faith, perform their Christian duties in family or society, there the Church lives and there she may have more of an impact than she has through the hierarchy. In the past holy kings did not live in vain. Saints can be found outside the silence of cloistered monasteries. For example, Saint Teresa of Avila regretted that in her time women had so little influence. It is as a missionary [130] for the salvation of the world that Saint Thérèse of Lisieux chose to be a contemplative Carmelite nun, because, as she said, for her there was no other way of doing it. Wherever they are, as members of the Church Christians have a duty to influence the Church as well as the world and public opinion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

TEMPORARY PRIESTS

Many more questions might be brought up about minor points. For instance, without going against the sacramental character of the priesthood, could the Church not admit an easier way for, persons to resign from the priestly life, one that does not morally disqualify the person in question? We might wonder, of course, whether allowing some kind of temporary priesthood might not have an adverse psychological and social influence on the priesthood. This is a question that requires reflection and perhaps some experimentation. But, theoretically speaking, I do not believe that the so-called lasting character of the priesthood, which according to the Council of Trent can never be lost, would dogmatically make priesthood for a time absolutely impossible. The Church does indeed laicize priests, and it is not clear why in the eyes of the Church the grounds for laicization can only consist in some moral lapse. The question comes up then whether a correctly conceived temporary priesthood might not attract more young men who are afraid of assuming the priesthood because they are not sure they can shoulder a commitment for life.

THE ORDINATION OF WOMEN

Moreover, in my humble opinion, the question remains open whether, in a social and, we might say, anthropological setting that differs considerably from our present male-dominated one, the ordination of women is dogmatically impossible. True, the Congregation of the Faith has declared that it is. Therefore, realistically, we need not expect that in the foreseeable future the Church will withdraw this opinion and take the consequences. This declaration of the Congregation of the Faith is not an infallible dogma; it stands in history and might eventually be revised.

[131] The Church's teaching authority has revised and practically withdrawn much more fundamental declarations. To take an example at random: The declaration made by the Biblical Commission under Pius X stating that Moses is, quite literally, the author of the whole Pentateuch was intended to have at least the same authority as the one claiming that women cannot be ordained. Yet after sixty years this declaration has become obsolete and without authority. Could the same thing happen in the present case? Will it happen? How long will it take before it happens? It is impossible to answer these questions. There are undoubtedly many people in North America and also to some extent in Europe who consider it discriminatory against women that they cannot be ordained.

Yet we should not exaggerate. Returning to our chess club we might say, metaphorically: It is much more important for women to be good chess players, that is, to live the Christian life as radically as possible, to live Christianity as the religion of Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen one, as the religion of freedom and of love. This is something that nobody forbids them to do. This matters much more than – in the chess club again – being a pastor or a priest or a bishop in the Church. When we keep in mind the main purpose of Christianity, the question of admissibility to a function in the Church's social dimension is secondary, compared with the question of how a woman today can be autonomous and emancipated and, at the same time, live Christianity as a woman.

THE FARTHEST BECOME THE NEAREST

Today humankind has become a single global entity in the world. Each one's fate depends on all the others. The different groups and nations are no longer separated by historically empty

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

intervals. What happens in Latin America in the next fifty years will influence what happens in Europe, and the other way round. Even the most remote peoples have now become the nearest. A thousand years ago, if we overlook the Turkish danger, what happened in India or East Asia was a matter of indifference to Christians in Europe. Europeans were unable to influence the situation in these countries, and the command of Christian charity had little meaning for their abstract relationship to these peoples. Today the situation is totally different. Ecological concerns, international peace, development of [132] Third World countries, and so on, are the responsibility of every Christian and of every Christian community.

In our time a parish must have an effective relationship with a parish in Nigeria. Problems of disarmament, of peace all over the world, of aid to the Third World, problems that today's so-called Greens bring up (although often in a very emotional and naive way) are problems that must become the responsibility of individual Christians and Christian communities. It is not clear how much individuals can do in this respect. Yet can they do nothing? While that might be true for beggars on the street (and even they can pray for the Third World), ordinary Christians can at least see to it that their representatives in larger social organizations, for instance in political parties and in the State, carry out their obligations and responsibilities with regard to these problems.

How many Christians have protested to their parties, because less than one percent of the gross national product is devoted to the Third World? How many Christians have made it known to their parties that they are willing to give up one percent of their salary for the Third World? In Berlin there are a few university professors who give up a considerable amount of their salary, so that the State, in its eagerness for savings, will not abolish a certain number of academic chairs. A famous educator who is already retired told me that she would honestly have to admit that she could live quite well if her pension were 10 percent less than it is, and that she was willing to take such a cut. If West Germany had civil servants who were willing to take a cut of a few percentage points in their salaries, a great amount of poverty would disappear. Why are there so few Christians who are ready to do something of the kind, and who do not hide this readiness in their heart but make it publicly known? Such things should be considered more openly and critically, with a greater readiness for change, than is the case at present.

A COMMUNITY OF PRAYER

A Christian community should not be a service station, where people come just to satisfy their individual need for piety and salvation. Such a community also has political and social obligations that should be clearly mentioned from the pulpit. (On the other hand, a priest who is mostly concerned with social and political [133] topics should also speak of God, eternal life, faith in and hope of eternity.) However, a truly Christian community should not be just a social or political group, working for justice in the world. It must also be a community that looks to God in worship and prayer.

A community that is no longer attuned to common prayer, to a kind of prayer that is not simply a legalistic fulfillment of an obligation but really prayer in spirit and in truth, prayer that soars beyond all earthly goods to be a prayer of radical hope in the eternal life of God – such a community is no longer a Christian community. There are prayer meetings and services that may and even should have a more private character than the parish liturgy. But even the liturgy should be planned in such a way, with a kind of creative imagination and feeling of religious intimacy, that people can pray personally and fervently and can lift their whole hearts in praise of God in song.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[134]

12

RITES CONTROVERSY: NEW TASKS FOR THE CHURCH

There is at present no controversy over rites, such as the Church endured a few centuries ago, and which was settled only under Pius XI. The enculturation of Christianity and church life in foreign cultures is no longer bound by rigid rules, called useful and necessary by some and totally un-Christian by others. In that original sense there is no more rites controversy today. Yet the real problems behind it are becoming more urgent than ever.

For two reasons. First, Christianity has become a world religion, the Church has really started to be a world-Church. That is why the question of how to make Christianity and the Church acceptable in all cultural milieux has become an urgent question everywhere. There is a second reason too. Until the middle of the twentieth century the West European and North American cultures were predominant in the world, and they considered it their duty to impose their lifestyles as a blessing all over the world. Today this cultural predominance of the West has vanished. There is no doubt that formerly even the Church's missionaries were to a great extent imbued with this idea. Today the superiority of the European style of life has become questionable, and the problem of the enculturation of Christianity in other countries and societies more difficult.

[135]

NO SYNTHESIS

The question first emerged clearly in Matteo Ricci's time. Earlier, for instance, when the Church moved from the Roman to the Germanic culture, it was not so urgent. Today it is more urgent than ever and it points to a fundamental task of the Church. We may believe, as some church pronouncements still believe, that if we dropped or slightly modified some peculiarities generally used in organizing our Christian life or formulating our faith, we would more or less automatically enculturate Christianity in other peoples. There is no need to build gothic churches in China or Japan, or to introduce in these countries the kind of music we use in Europe. The task is quite simple and easy.

I for one believe that it is very, very difficult. Of course, some adaptations must be made, perhaps much more than in the past. But even as the differences between two individuals may be so great that no higher idea or synthesis can bridge them, so there are individual cultures that cannot come to understand each other simply by making a few practical adjustments and adaptations. It is in fact a profound theological problem whether one and the same Church can exist in different cultural milieux. We Christians are convinced that it can.

The Church must have a visible unity in worship, law, and faith. But how to achieve this unity while respecting the profound differences among cultures remains an unsolved problem. At present we expect and admit a pluralism in theologies. Although Rome, of course, keeps putting on the brakes, we admit in principle the possibility, and even the necessity, of great regional churches, with different liturgies and even, despite a basic unity in canon law, with very great differences in the laws of these churches.

The new Code of Canon Law applies only to the Latin Church. But if we overlook the Eastern churches of the Near East, this Latin Church coincides in fact with the Roman Catholic Church of the West, which has spread all over the earth. The trouble is that it is not clear yet whether church leaders sufficiently trust the regional churches to let them develop in their own way. The real rites controversy is still ahead of us. What will the Africans, with their way of understanding marriage, family, and tribal feeling, do with our European moral teachings? To what extent can these moral teachings be transplanted into other cultures? How will religious life [136] look in East Asia, if we allow the Asians to follow their own ways. There can be no doubt that religious life, religious garb, and maybe even the liturgy will look quite different from the way they look today. All this will not be merely a slightly adapted translation of our Christianity, but something quite different. On the other hand, the whole of Christianity must continue to derive from the concrete historical Jesus, and we must maintain the unity of the Church in a real and practical way. There will, of course, always be a pope, although we might wonder with Bühlmann whether it would not be better for him to have his diocese in the Philippines.[1]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

NEW TASKS

There is no need to consider this new universal rites controversy as something distasteful. It is a task that devolves upon the whole Church. And here the courage, the confidence, the optimism, and the open mindedness with which Matteo Ricci viewed foreign cultures can continue to serve as an example. First steps have already been taken. The decrees on the Eastern Church acknowledge that a real autonomy and diversity of the regional churches are a positive characteristic of the Church. It is not a Catholic ideal to render the Church so uniform, so homogeneous, that it is made up merely of regionally different branches of one universal church administration. The same problem exists for ecumenism. We should not aim at a Church in which the Latin Roman Catholic Church swallows up the other Christian churches and becomes the Church of all Christians without any inner change, merely through a quantitative increase in members. If the ecumenical question can be solved at all, it will happen only if we grant to the other great Christian churches the right to be partner churches in the one Catholic Church.

Within the Roman Catholic Church we have already experienced a relatively intense pluralism. Thus the Latin American Church is developing a theology of liberation that probably cannot simply be [137] adopted by us. In Germany and in Western Europe there is a great diversity of theological trends.

UNITY IN CHRIST

Pope Paul VI told me once that theological pluralism should not turn into anarchy. That is quite true. But where does a lawful pluralism start, and how do we distinguish it from an anarchistic pluralism? When that question is asked in concrete cases, it often remains unanswered. Africans too will want to develop an African theology. The question will be how it can be their own while remaining a lawful theology within the one Church. We should probably admit that very often these different theologies cannot quite understand each other. For if they did, we would once more have a synthesis of several theologies, and there would be no more pluralism. In canon law, in theology, in liturgy, and so on, there should prevail in the Church a tolerance which allows everyone to tell the other: I do not quite understand everything you say, and yet you are my brother or sister in the one Church.

I believe that the Church will have to do some rehearsing for this tolerance of different

[1] See W. Bühlmann, Wenn Gott zu allen Menschen geht: Für eine neue Erfahrung der Auserwählten (Basel, 1981), Wo der Glaube lebt: Einblicke in die Lage der Weltkirche (Freiburg i. Br., 1974), and All Have the Same God (Slough, U.K.: St. Paul Publications, 1988).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

opinions which we do not quite understand. The present attitude seems to be somewhat as follows: What I do not understand in the other, what does not positively agree with what I have in mind, cannot be acceptable in the Church. And that is wrong. If we wonder how these theologies that we cannot reconcile with our own can exist in the one Church with her one faith, I would say: We are one because we are all baptized, because we all look on Jesus as the mediator of our salvation. And we are also one because we remain legally and liturgically in communion with one another. This framework provides a unity that enables us to bear and to respect a plurality of opinions. An encounter between two human beings never overcomes an ultimate residue that is unfamiliar and not understandable. Should they perfectly understand each other, they would in fact have become one and the same person. Not only would that be most unreal, it would not be at all interesting. Human beings are such that they accept the other person as one whom they do not understand perfectly, as unfamiliar, as the one who, to some extent, seems strange. This must also be recognized and accepted in the Church.

[138]

LIMITS OF TOLERANCE

But there is also an anarchistic pluralism. When a regional Church, the Church of a given cultural milieu or theology, entrenches and isolates itself, when it solemnly declares that it has nothing to learn from another Church – at that moment the love which tolerates pluralism without giving up unity would vanished. Gone would be the resolve to adhere to the truth of God's universal revelation. So this kind of disunity cannot be accepted.

In the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries the Jesuits and the Dominicans would have acted against their own nature if they had not followed their own ways. But one of these ways is precisely – and this is decisive – a loving openness, a desire to learn from others and to exchange ideas with others, even when these others are at first unfamiliar and to some extent always remain unfamiliar. This rule of thumb is very important and useful for the discernment of spirits. Are the different churches in the world with their peculiar features willing to learn from one another? Or are they convinced that their own nature would be radically threatened and falsified if in an endless process they continue to assimilate more from others? We can safeguard and develop that which is our own only by having the courage to borrow from others.

The Church and theology should not go so far that, impelled by a love and tolerance that make no distinctions, they say Yes and Amen to everything. When a theologian seeks not merely to reflect on ancient dogma in ever new ways but squarely denies it, then the limit has been reached.

THE ROLE OF THE EUROPEANS

We take it for granted now that in the present era of a Church that has become a world-Church all missions either have already become autonomous churches, rooted in their own culture and supported by their own people, or that they are approaching this stage. That is why it is imperative that missionaries from Europe and North America have the courage to yield first place as soon as possible to native priests and bishops. I believe that even today these new churches are happy when Europeans and North Americans work with them – discreetly, as subordinates, [139] but also actively and courageously. There are still many things that European Christianity can say to other cultures.

Of course, the opposite also is true. The Latin American Church can tell us quite a number

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of things about base Christian communities, and the Church of East Asia can share with us Eastern spirituality, which it has assimilated and made truly Christian. It will not be enough simply to exchange imports and leave them as they were in their country of origin. The present situation of a unified humankind demands that every people be a missionary for other people. We continue to have the right, and perhaps the duty, to send missionaries to foreign countries. But this is no longer a one-way street. What we need today is a real exchange, wherein each one gives and receives.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[140]

13

THE RELATION BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND POPULAR RELIGION

The purpose of this chapter is to present a few introductory, hence very general, considerations about the relation between popular religion and theology. We admit right away as our main point that, if scientific theology is to be true to its own nature, it will have to reflect on the religion of the people much more than it usually does. Yet this theme of our considerations is very obscure.

THEORY AND PRACTICE

We might, of course, try to answer the question of the relation between theology and popular religion by starting to explain the relation that exists between theory and practice. Whatever that relation may be, theology would be considered as theory and popular religion as practice, so that the general relation between theory and practice would be the same as the relation between theology and popular religion.

However, the conviction is gaining ground, for a number of different reasons, that practice is not simply the execution of an independently built theory, but that theory consists, at least in part, of a reflection on practice. We might conclude that theology, as theory and science, not only has a relation to practice, which it directs, but that it derives from practice, insofar as practice is the source, or [141] at least one source, of scientific theology. This is true, even though this scientific reflection itself is a constitutive moment of practice, in our case of popular religion. However, this very general scientific foundation for a correct answer to our initial question will not be further examined here.

THEOLOGY AND POPULAR FAITH

It is not possible to determine the relation between theology and popular religion adequately without having a clear idea of them both. This, however, is extraordinarily difficult. Indeed, it is very difficult to explain what theology is. That makes it difficult as well to explain theology's relation to popular religion. A distinction is often made between theology and religious science, where theology is defined as the scientific investigation of the Christian faith, as this faith is taught in the Christian churches and as a given and normative value for theology. Such a definition of theology might be accepted, more or less, by Christian theologians who refuse simply to equate theology with a "neutral" science of religion. But by itself this definition cannot serve as a bridge between theology and popular religion. First, because this vaguely defined "theology" comprises quite different disciplines (systematic, historical, fundamental, dogmatic, theoretical, practical), none of which can be related in the same way to popular religion. Next, because this definition leaves open many questions that are of the greatest importance for the relation between theology and popular religion.

What faith (of the Church) does theology, in its own self-understanding, presuppose as its object of study? Only the one laid down in the canonical Scriptures? If the answer is yes, how may we then understand the relation between this kind of theology and popular religion? Would it be possible for theology to understand popular religion as nothing more than human (religious and sociological) objectifications falling under the judgment (of rejection or forgiveness) of Scripture? But if we accepted this understanding and were then to discover in normative Scripture itself ("sola Scriptura") more popular religion, and would thus again have to look for a canon within the canon, what then?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If we wish to emphasize more clearly and firmly the fundamental relation of theology to the faith of the Church, what Church [142] do we mean? And how do we then explain the relation of theology to popular religion? Do we mean a Church that is organized hierarchically, with an apostolic succession, with a supreme magisterium? Suppose that, in our question, Church is meant clearly and exclusively as a magisterium with its institutional and juridical activities, would we then not have to understand the relation between the Church's theology and popular religion as simply the subordination of popular religion to the Church of the magisterium and its theology? Popular religion then would be lawful only if it put into practice the religion proclaimed by the magisterium and explained by its theology.

But if the Church, despite its institutional character and hierarchical organization, is the Church of the "People of God," a pilgrim Church, in which everyone not only receives but also gives and serves, is "popular religion" then not a constitutive moment of this Church of the one and entire people of God, whose faith is the point of reference for theology and the real object of its reflection? We would then still have to determine within this one Church as the People of God the precise relation, one to another, of the magisterium, official church doctrine, the life of faith, popular religion, and so on. But it would be impossible to deny that popular religion has a fundamental importance for theology (and not just the other way round). We will have to come back to this point.

RELIGION OF THE PEOPLE

Bridging the gap is very difficult, not only if we start from the idea of theology as a church science but also if we do so from the idea of popular religion, that is, the religion of the people. What do we mean here by "people"? Certainly not simply the "People of God" in its usual sense. If this were the intended meaning the statement "theology has an essential relation to popular religion" would be identical with the statement "theology has an essential relation to the faith of the Church." The latter statement could be rejected or doubted only by those who acknowledge, within the faith and the life of the one, entire Church, two essentially distinct realities: the genuine revelation of God coming from above, which we can clearly and safely separate from everything else, and the human response to it, conceived as something clearly distinct from [143] revelation as such, from the pure Word of God. Therefore this human response might be called popular religion, even if it were practiced by the whole People of God, the sum total of all those who have been baptized and lead a Christian life. However, such a complete and clear distinction between revelation and the living faith that accepts it is actually impossible. That is why such an interpretation of Christian popular religion does not make much sense and is of little use.

The notion popular religion, the religion of the people, has meaning only if the term "people" is used as a sociological term. Then it would mean that not everybody necessarily belongs to this people, that there are considerable differences in ways of belonging to it, that therefore the religion of the people is not simply and necessarily the religion of all the members of the Church. The final and decisive point is this: Despite these qualifications, the religion of the people has a theological significance; it exerts on theology itself an influence that is to some extent normative and creative.

Let us examine whether these postulates for a popular religion may be realized, at least in their major dimensions. For the sociological meaning of the concept "people" there is no difficulty, even if such a "people" is presumed to exist in the Church. We might add that, for our theological reflection, the precise meaning of the term is relatively indifferent. It is up to the sociologist to find out whether this "people" is characterized by its lower level of education, by the idea of the "masses," by its economic standing, by its marginalization in society as a whole, by its inability clearly to objectify its thoughts and wishes in cultural creations, by its lack of social power, and so on. Such features are not necessarily mutually exclusive. It is ultimately a question of terminology, which feature is essential for the concept of people.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

At any rate, there is such a "people" also in the Church, because these features belong to human beings and characterize them insofar as they are members of the Church, live in her, and are influenced in their religious life by these features. It is, for instance, evident that in the Church too there are differences in cultural levels and that these differences influence people's religious life. It is (another example) all too clear from history that differences in secular power held by individuals affect their position in the Church, although the gospels and the Letter of James warn against this.

So the only real purpose of our question is to know whether it [144] is possible, and even necessary, for the "people" in the Church (as distinguished from the Church as the People of God), with their popular religion, to have a creative and normative influence upon (scientific) theology. It is clear that, if the answer is affirmative, we must also explain more precisely what this influence consists of. For in a revealed religion, one that admits an initiative of the God who transcends world and history, popular religion cannot by itself alone be the first and last source of theology.

REVELATION AND PEOPLE

It seems that we must answer the above question affirmatively. To show this I offer a few necessarily fragmentary remarks. First, revelation exists concretely only as a revelation that has been heard and is believed. Now, without having to accept the errors of modernism, we may say that the first addressee and recipient of this revelation that is believed is the human person in general. Because of God's universal salvific will and the need of a real faith in revelation for salvation, owing to God's universal standing invitation to accept divinization through grace, the human person is already the addressee of divine revelation. The prophets, on the other hand, the legati divini, those who announce revelation, are, to be sure, the authentic interpreters who put into words God's self-revelation which occurs always and everywhere through God's grace. But the prophets are not the very first and only recipients of revelation, sent to announce something that would simply not exist without this message. Humanity as a whole, under God's universal salvific will, is the first addressee of divine revelation. Yet this revelation has, and must have, its history, in which it must be expounded and become irreversible in the history of revelation. Humanity, as the first addressee of revelation, is naturally not just the sum total of individuals, but humanity as it always exists in social groups, in peoples, and in nations with their history.

The "people," this collectivity of which we are speaking here, always lives in the social groups that constitute humanity as the first recipient of revelation. It too is an element in the first addressee of revelation. Such a "people," in all its diversity, in whatever ways its religious life may be organized, is, for the most diverse reasons, not at all acquainted with those human pursuits that presuppose [145] an intense reflection and attention, that is, with science and especially with theology. Now original revelation, as mentioned above, is addressed to the whole of humankind, because the possibility at least of salvation is given to all of humanity. And the "people" may be considered to be the recipient of original revelation that has been least influenced by theology as a product of human reflection. Theology, as a human undertaking, is subject to all the historical limitations of any human enterprise. On the other hand, the faith of the people, although exposed (as the history of religions shows) to countless deformations and corruptions, is, nevertheless, because it is not so freely directed by human beings, closer to that first source of genuine religiosity and real faith that consists in God's universal standing invitation to accept divinization. The superiority of popular religion to theology does not properly consist in the fact that the former has, through critical reflection, freed itself better from corruptions and misinterpretations of original revelation. It consists in the fact that popular religion is continually being unconsciously inspired and carried by original revelation, and it has not passed through the screen of systematic, hence narrowing, theology. That is why popular religion, borne by the power of grace, may spontaneously welcome and realize every human possibility, and, in that sense, have the courage simply to be human.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CHURCH AND PEOPLE

The "people" can and may exist in the Church as well, although as the community in which faith has become historically irreversible in Christ, the Church has the most developed theology. It is also the Church of the written word of Scripture and of formulated doctrine, which is already theology. But the Church would not be herself if she were not built and carried on by persons who are the recipients of God's gracious self-communication (as revelation and not merely as salvation). Every doctrine in the Church is ultimately an interpretation and a verbalization of this innermost divinization of persons in the Church, whether primarily as doctrine and proclamation or secondarily as theology. Proclamation and theology necessarily refer to this primitive revelation occurring as God's self-communication to the members of the Church. This self-communication that reveals God must be objectified here and [146] now and translated into the human words of proclamation and consciously shared faith. It depends also on the previous self-awareness of the primitive revelation as guaranteed by God; hence it depends on the Church, along with the Scriptures and the magisterium. And this objectified faith of the Church in its turn depends on and refers to the primordial revelation given through the "unction of the Spirit," by which every individual is taught by God.

That is why the Second Vatican Council in its Constitution on the Church says that Christ fulfils this prophetic function not only by the hierarchy with its magisterium but also by the laity who possess a sense of the faith (no. 35). The same Constitution states:

> The body of the faithful as a whole, anointed as they are by the Holy One (cf. Jn. 2:20, 27), cannot err in matters of belief. Thanks to a supernatural sense of the faith which characterizes the People as a whole, it manifests this unerring quality when, "from the bishops down to the last member of the laity," it shows universal agreement in matters of faith and morals.
>
> For, by this sense of faith which is aroused and sustained by the Spirit of truth, God's People accepts not the word of men but the very Word of God (cf. 1 Th. 2:13). It clings without fail to the faith once delivered to the saints (cf. Jude 3), penetrates it more deeply by accurate insights, and applies it more thoroughly to life. (Lumen Gentium, 12, Abbott edition)

Of course, here this declaration of the Council refers to the whole People of God, which is the Church, and not merely to the people in the Church, of which we are speaking in this chapter. Yet what the Council says must also apply to the people in the Church, since they are part of the people that is identical with the Church. It would not make sense to deny to the people in the Church what we affirm of the Church as a whole. We can, of course, say of the people in the Church what the Council says of the sensus fidelium only insofar as this people

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation is, and continues to be, part of the Church, living in intimate union with her other parts and her leaders. But when we attentively read the text of the Council quoted above it is clear that, although this sensus fidelium must remain in constant union with the magisterium, with Scripture, and so on, it does not simply proceed from them. For this sense of faith comes from the Spirit of Truth, the unction of the saints, and it is given to all.

[147]

POPULAR RELIGION IN THE CHURCH

This brings us to the point where we can start reflecting on the creative and normative significance of popular religion in the Church. God's revelation occurs as divine self-communication to the People of God, to the Church, and thus also to the people in the Church. It is heard only when this self-communication is perceived and accepted, not as theory, but more profoundly in the very living of human life, to which also belong – but not only – the spoken word and a beginning of reflection and theory. That is why revelation, when it has been heard and explained in theology, is a revelation that has already been mediated by the concrete life of its hearers.

This mediation also happens in the Church through the concrete life of the people in the Church. That is why, in a theology of popular faith, we would have to inquire how God's original revelation is also mediated by the religious life of the people in the Church and thus becomes a revelation that is heard and believed. We would have to inquire what is revealed in this way and only in this way. For we cannot suppose that every human reality (as life and as word) is equally fit to mediate every aspect of divine revelation. There exists a history not only of theology but also of faith and of the revelation contained in it. This history of faith and revelation is in part determined and kept alive by all that occurs in human history. That is why we must ask what contribution the people in the Church have made and continue to make to this history of faith and revelation through themselves, and through their life and history. It may happen that at times scientific theology does not notice this contribution, that it overlooks developments in the history of the people's faith and never catches up with these developments.

So the real and urgent question is: What does popular religion have to say to learned theology? It has something to say, not only because popular religion is the popular application of an official proclamation of the Church and of theology, but also because the people themselves (within the whole Church) are an addressee of primitive revelation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[148]

14

SOUTH AMERICAN BASE COMMUNITIES IN A EUROPEAN CHURCH

The purpose of this chapter is to present a few remarks about base communities. These remarks can only be very general and abstract; they cannot give concrete pastoral suggestions for the formation and success of base communities.

What is a base community? How does it compare with our traditional parishes? What can we learn from South America? Where are the boundaries between a sect and a prayer group?

WHAT IS PROPERLY MEANT BY BASE COMMUNITIES?

First, we might say: Every Christian community should be a base community. A base community cannot simply be understood as being in competition with or an alternative to a real parish. Wherever Christians come together and establish a Christian community, they must support each other, really love each other in a truly tangible way, help each other in need, and answer to each other. As Paul would put it, they must edify each other, that is, they must help one another to be genuine Christians who adore and love God, who look to Jesus Christ and his cross and resurrection, who, strengthened by this Jesus, assume responsibility for their own lives, and who love their neighbor as themselves, not only in word and theory but in deed and in truth. When Christians establish [149] a Christian community of this kind, it is a base community. In fact, every parish should be a base community.

It has rightly been said that at present our communities are only groups of people who have a priest to take care of their religious needs. When this happens in a public gathering it is called a religious service. But in such a parish there is hardly any inner bond between people. That is why they do not constitute a base community.

Yet, during the last decades or centuries, we have seen in our countries remarkable substitutes for these base communities that should be identical with a true parish. In this country there have been Holy Name societies, sodalities, the Legion of Mary, the Catholic Youth Organization, and so on. In these groups there often was something that began to look like a base community. Members knew each other, kept together, looked together for ways and means of leading a common Christian life. They met socially, their religious and secular life coincided, at least to some extent. In short, these associations possessed something that should properly be realized in a parish: truly shared Christian life, in which everyone tries, as the Gospel demands, to help bear the burdens of others; where all, impelled by an inner feeling of solidarity, pray and work together and try together to solve the problems of life. The fact that formerly these active groups existed, as well as many others, shows that Christians of former times had not totally forgotten that a parish should not look like a place where a church attendant, called a priest, takes care, on an individual basis, of the people’s religious needs.

This simple fact alone shows that there is a need for base communities. Christians are Christians insofar as they are brothers and sisters to one other in the Christian community. Otherwise something essential is lacking in their Christianity. Communities must become real at a certain place, in a common life. They should not be service stations where church officials try to satisfy the religious needs of individuals. Christians must come together to constitute their Church – always of course in communion with the hierarchy, always with their priests – through officially approved religious services and the reception of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation sacraments. And even more importantly: By the very fact that they themselves constitute a Church, a local Church, they realize what is properly meant by a base community.

[150]

CONTACT AND UNITY WITH THE PARISHES

The need for base communities is obvious. Every parish should turn from being an administrative district in the care of the official Church into a real community of faith, hope, and love, into a pilgrim people. That is, of course, quite difficult in our countries. We cannot simply take over the organization and lifestyle of base communities as they exist in Latin America, where they have become the hope of the Church and of Christianity.

The expression “base community,” which speaks today to the minds and hearts of Christians in our countries, is undoubtedly imported from Latin America. So we are naturally tempted to imitate the way in which those communities are organized there, especially in Brazil. In that country there are thousands of lively base communities that start from the grassroots, not in opposition to the official Church, but because Christians are aware that, wherever they really live in the faith and hope of Jesus Christ, they naturally come together in true community. Animated by that faith, they feel responsible for secular society and they naturally build base communities. That is especially true because of the shortage of priests in Latin-American countries; not every community can have its pastor, as was still customary thirty or forty years ago in our country, where even the smallest village had its own Church and its own pastor.

The example of Latin America, where base communities are numerous and active, may be a warning for us in Europe and in the U.S. and an incentive to build active base communities, especially since we are also experiencing a shortage of priests. But the way in which these base communities should be organized among us cannot simply be taken over from Latin America.

There are two reasons for this. We simply cannot overlook our many parishes and the way in which they are still set up among us. Almost nothing of the kind exists in Latin America; therefore base communities compete much less with traditional parishes, such as they are in our country. Of course, even in our countries there may exist small base communities that are not the same as a parish. When a pastor has no interest in religion and shows no initiative, it may happen, in certain circumstances, that Christians have the right, while remaining in communion with the sacramental Church, to come together to help each other, to read Holy Scripture, [151] to pray together. They may do all this, even when their efforts are hardly aided and understood by this or that pastor who may be little more than a routine church employee. Nevertheless, among us a base community should, as much as possible, be organized in such a way that the parish itself becomes the base community of people who really live Christianity.

In other words, if base communities emerge among us, they have a more urgent responsibility to seek to make contact with and eventually to unite with existing parishes and pastors. We cannot act as if, here in Central Europe, we might use base communities to build up a Church that would ignore the rather bureaucratic Church of the traditional parishes and dioceses. That could lead to no other result than a number of small sects that would soon wither and die.

NO BLIND IMITATION OF SOUTH-AMERICAN COMMUNITIES

As mentioned above, in some circumstances, when Christians have no priest or do not find a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

priest with an active Christian faith, they may organize a small Christian cell, a base community. But in our countries such praiseworthy initiatives should not lead to sect-like small groups that stay apart from the clerical Church, from the legitimate administration of the sacraments and the authority of bishops. At least for the time being, this may not be a problem in other countries, such as in Latin America, but it would be a problem for us. Our base communities cannot simply be a copy of the South-American communities, because we have a legitimate and meaningful hierarchically organized Church that is still important and with which the base communities would have to compete. There is a second reason, of a more secular and social kind. In Latin-American society, where there are few secular organizations, a true Christian community necessarily has duties that it must fulfill and can legitimately fulfill, but which do not exist for our Christian communities. In our countries many social tasks, which must be fulfilled to make life more human, are assumed by secular society, so that these tasks are no longer the sole responsibilities of Christian community. When a woman is taken sick in a South-American rain forest and the nearest hospital is a hundred miles away, it is quite natural for her neighbor to nurse her and [152] to take care of her children. In a society where people are hungry and perhaps even starving, and where the State does nothing about it, Christian charity sees that these people do not starve. But in a country with unemployment compensation, social security, and so on, many obligations have been taken over by secular society. They need no longer be fulfilled by base Christian communities.

During the Middle Ages almost all schools and hospitals were run by the Church. It would make no sense if the base communities, in order to be really Christian, tried to assume again these functions in education and public health, which secular society has taken over and can probably carry out better than a small base community. It may still make sense that a few really Christian schools are run by a religious order or a parish. But that adds nothing to the fact that today most schools are run by the State. Reviving medieval models along these lines, so that the Christian communities might have something to do, is a utopia, and not even a good utopia.

DIFFERENCE FROM A SECT

In our countries base communities are facing a difficult dilemma: Can they and should they – in order to be really active and useful – be more than merely religious organizations in the strict sense of the word? Or should they be communities whose only activities are praying, preaching the Gospel, and administering the sacraments, since they find no other fields of activity? Such is the dilemma that faces a base community in our countries. That dilemma should undoubtedly be solved in favor of base communities that do more than pray, worship, receive the sacraments, and preach the Gospel. It seems to me that a base community can be that only when, going beyond a pure abstract devotion, it becomes a group of people with a feeling of togetherness, a community, a real family, and a union of love. United in genuine Christian faith, this community should be a family where Christian love is not only preached but is actually practiced. Otherwise it would not be a base community, but would revert to the style of the parish, precisely the style we are trying to overcome by means of base communities.

Are there tasks and activities that go beyond the narrow circle of abstract and theoretical religiosity and that have not been taken over by secular society and its organizations? It seems to me [153] that there are. Of course, a base community does not have to become self-sufficient for all personal needs, wishes, aspirations, and activities. Music does not necessarily belong only in a base community; we may attend concerts that have not been organized by it. There are countless aspects of adult education that do not have to come, as in a ghetto, from a base community. In such things a base community should clearly differ from a sect.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A sect is a religious organization that not only breaks away from the larger religious group for some reason but that also tries to provide everything for its members. They keep together for all human activities, they are afraid of the chilly winds of secular life, they are striving in fact for an ideal that, until quite recently, very strongly stamped the life of the Church and the faithful. My grandmother did not go to the public library or a secular bookstore when she wanted novels. She went to the library of the Borromeo Society. The books she gave us for Christmas also came through a gift certificate from the Borromeo Society. I have nothing against parish libraries. Why should they not exist, if they are well run and meet a true religious need, which today's secular libraries do not satisfy? But a modern base community should not try to realize the ideal of a sectarian community that is self-sufficient in all domains and for all activities. That would be wrong.

MORE THAN A PRAYER GROUP

What then are the human needs, not strictly religious yet truly human, that secular groups and associations do not fill and that might be tasks for a true base community? Of course, a genuine base community should be a community that prays together, reads and studies Holy Scripture together, and practices Christian charity. However, although we cannot simply imitate the South-American base communities, base communities in our countries too must be more than a group of Christians who, not satisfied with their everyday life, feel a religious need and look for religious activities. Much creative imagination is needed in order to discover and to realize among us today some of the possibilities for a base community. People everywhere complain that, despite social protection and organization, they feel lonely, they lack a warm trusting contact with others, and they do not feel that they can rely [154] on others and love others. So there should be plenty of opportunities for a base community that does not wish to be just a prayer group in the strict sense of the word.

It does not follow that Christians should be able to find only in such base communities what they excel at providing. A more individualistic kind of Christianity is not excluded, where Christians attend Sunday Mass, receive the sacraments, read Holy Scripture privately, and keep up their interest in religious problems. Such Christians may live a good life and not belong to a base community. But there are certainly many people who feel alone, cold in their religious life, who experience a stronger desire to praise and adore God together with their brothers and sisters, who would like to speak heart to heart about religious questions and problems. There are certainly people who are convinced that they cannot practice real and unselfish love for others if they cannot, in a really Christian community, hence in a base community, meet others and help them bear their burdens.

There are certainly many people who rightly feel that they are far from having fulfilled their human and Christian duty of unselfish love, if they just pay their taxes to the State and contribute to the Red Cross and other praiseworthy organizations. Why then should there not exist real Christian base communities, in which people are united by the bond of love, that is by the Holy Spirit, and not only by human affection, where they not only praise God together but also help each other, whenever possible, to carry the burdens of life? Of course, no Christian should be obliged by any authority to belong to such communities. But there are undoubtedly many opportunities for them today, which we should discover with the eyes of love, and try to use in the power of the Spirit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[155]

15

CHRISTIAN PESSIMISM

The following considerations have been inspired by what Paul says in 2 Corinthians 4:8. To describe, from the human point of view, his situation as an apostle, he dialectically uses the opposition aporoumenoi all' ouk exaporoumenoi. These words may be translated in many different ways: "sore pressed, but not destitute," "sometimes in doubt, but never in despair," "perplexed, but not even driven to despair," "at a loss, but never despairing," are a few translations in modern editions of the New Testament. They show how difficult it is to translate the Apostle's words.

Whatever the translation, this is the way in which Paul characterizes his situation as an apostle. He feels that this situation is a permanent, not merely a passing feature of his life. We may add, without demonstrating it further, that it is also a feature of Christian life always and everywhere.

The second part of this dialectical unity, as occurring in human life, exaporoumenoi (destitute, in despair) is especially obscure, because in the same letter (1:8) the Apostle seems to affirm of himself what he denies in 4:8. At any rate, it shows that the perplexity mentioned in the first part of 4:8 must be taken very seriously. We might say that, for Paul, Christians are people who live in radical perplexity. We might even wonder how we are able to see this existentiell[1] perplexity in every human dimension without abolishing [156] it, and at the same time how it is, in turn, enveloped and saved by what is specifically Christian. That is the question I intend to consider in what follows.

HUMANITY'S FUNDAMENTAL SITUATION

Our existence is one of radical perplexity. We have neither the right nor the possibility to ignore this situation or to believe that we can abolish it in any dimension of our experience. I need not point out, or bemoan in detail, the daily experiences that make us perplexed.

In the beginning of Scripture God tells us that we must rule over nature and her powers. When we do it we start misusing them. We invent all kinds of social systems, and every one of them turns without fail into an occasion of injustice and abuse of power. We claim that we are looking for peace among all peoples, and we get ready for war in order to find peace. The whole of human history is a perpetual swinging back and forth between individualism and collectivism, and humanity has never succeeded in discovering a permanent and universally acceptable compromise between these basic demands of human nature.

What matters here however is to understand that, for a Christian anthropology, this perplexity in human existence is not merely a transitory stage that, with patience and creative imagination, might eventually be removed from human existence. It is a permanent existential of humanity in history and, although it keeps assuming new forms, it can never be

[1] The two spellings, "existentiell" here and "existential" later, follow the German usage. "Existential,' as in Rahner's phrase 'supernatural existential,' refers to an element in [the human] ontological constitution precisely as human being, an element which is constitutive of [one's] existence as [human] prior to [one's] exercise of freedom. It is an aspect of concrete human nature precisely as human. 'Existentiell,' as in Rahner's phrase 'existentiell Christology' refers to the free, personal and subjective appropriation and actualization of something which can also be spoken of in abstract theory of objective concepts without such a subjective and personal realization" (Karl Rahner, Foundations of Christian Faith, p. 16, translator's note).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

wholly overcome in history. This is an essential feature of a Christian pessimism. It does not matter here whether we explain this pessimism through the fact that we are creatures, and finite creatures at that, or through an appeal to original sin, or by making our ineradicable sinfulness an argument for pessimism.

Of course, we cannot say that human finitude and historicity alone explain the fact that history cannot follow its course without friction and without blind alleys. Nor can this Christian [157] pessimism be justified merely by the fact that it is impossible fully to harmonize all human knowledge with its many disparate sources, or to build a fully harmonious praxis on the basis of such disparate knowledge. We might also mention that we can never fully understand the meaning of suffering and death. Yet in spite of all this, the Christian interpretation of human existence says that, within history, it is never possible wholly and definitively to overcome the riddles of human existence and history, which we experience so clearly and so painfully. Such a hope is excluded by the Christian conviction that we arrive at God's definitive realm only by passing through death, which itself is the ultimate and all-embracing enigma of human existence. It is true that Christian hope has the right and the duty to project, in the empirical space of our human existence, an image and a promise of a definitive existence. But ultimately this is only the manner in which we practice faith in the consummation that God alone gives, that God's self is.

TASK OF CHRISTIAN PREACHING

People are afraid of this pessimism. They do not accept it. They repress it. That is why it is the first task of Christian preaching to speak up for it. We used to say that the Christian message must convince people of their sinfulness, which they refuse to acknowledge. Undoubtedly this continues to be a task of Christianity and of the Church. And today we may rightly emphasize it, because we are still to a great extent living in a period of euphoric belief in progress. That belief is still far from dead, although our recent experiences have led us to be more pessimistic about the human situation. But we take it for granted that better times lie ahead and that our precarious situation will be easy to correct. Preaching Christian pessimism is quite legitimate, because the Christian message is convinced that a great part of human suffering is caused by sin, so that, in the final analysis, to admit sin is the same as to admit suffering.

I wonder whether the Church is sufficiently opposed to the repression of Christian pessimism. We were quite upset when the Nazis reproached Christianity for speaking of a "valley of tears." Although I took part in the elaboration of Gaudium et Spes at the [158] Council, I would not deny that its undertone is too euphoric in its evaluation of humanity and the human condition. What it says may be true, but it produces the overall impression that it is enough to observe its norms, and everything will more or less turn out well.

It does not insist enough on the fact that all human endeavors, with all their sagacity and good will, often end up in blind alleys; that in questions of morality, when we really face the whole of reality, we get lost in obscurities which no moral formula can wholly remove. In short, as Scripture says, the world is in a bad way and it will stay that way, even if, as we are obliged to do, we fight against evil to the death. The Council wishes to get rid of triumphalism, but some of it has lingered on. The idea that, if only the unbelieving world were to accept the living Church and her message, it would find salvation and happiness, is subconsciously present and continues to be voiced frequently in declarations of the magisterium. That the Church herself is a Church of sinners, that even her true and salutary doctrines lead to riddles, that the Church too, in the final analysis, does not know exactly, clearly, and convincingly how we should go about it, is not the most clearly voiced

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation conviction of the living Church.

TASKS FOR AN ACADEMY

Even Christians meet insoluble perplexities in every dimension of their existence. While the Church really has neither the power nor the desire to solve them, she must help people to admit their true situation or universal perplexity. She should be careful not to promote an unreal and un-Christian repression of this pessimism.

Might this not be the first, if not the last or only task, of a Catholic learned society? Such an academy is not supposed to be the source of cheap Cassandra-like prophecies, because this pessimism cannot be the pretext for a lame and cheap resignation. Its function is to explain situations in which we can act realistically, fight and win partial victories, and soberly and courageously accept partial defeats. But it really is a duty of such an academy to speak for a realistic pessimism, for an insight into our perplexed situation. Should it not tell all parties in society that none of them has a clear-cut formula for happiness, that all parties are lying when they act as if it were possible to discover such a formula, that political leaders [159] act in a cowardly and un-Christian way when they are not ready honestly to admit the mistakes they have made? Should the academy not be a place where thought is honestly and soberly given to riddles in the Church's message, where the conscience of the Church of sinners may be voiced, where the praises of the Church are not sung in sacred euphoria? The Church's theology can no longer boast of that neo-scholastic homogeneity that has been customary since the time of Pius IX. Should it not be possible for such a fact to become evident at least in an academy? Should an academy not resist the current tendency to claim that there is unity in theology, where such a unity can honestly not exist? Such a claim is made only in order to place in opposition a militant, aggressive Church and a wicked world. Should an academy not be the place where human rights even in the Church are defended, because it is not evident that such rights are always respected in the Church? All unrest does not come from an evil source, every doubt is not destructive, not every fight is worse than a graveyard peace, not every little conflict is bad. The really bad situation would be if church leaders never had the courage to admit that, with all their good will and conscientiousness, they had made mistakes. Thus, for instance, I cannot help regretting that, with one possible exception, the mistakes of the magisterium under Pius X have never been officially rescinded. A Catholic academy should be a place that acknowledges the perplexities that occur in every dimension of human and ecclesial life.

It is obvious that this does not amount to a license for ceaseless grumbling in Church and society, or permission to fight the hierarchy in the Church and authorities in the State, and to reject their legitimate decisions. True pessimists, with all their perplexities, will be tolerant with regard to an existing situation, because they know that another, possibly preferable situation, for which they may certainly fight, will not be heaven on earth either. There is no need to glorify a pope in order to live with him in peace and obedience.

THE SOLUTION OF THE APOSTLE PAUL

What we have said above has not yet led us to the question brought up by the Apostle's two dialectically opposed expressions. For Paul not only tells us that, even as Christians, we will never grow out [160] of our perplexities in this world, that we must see them and bear them, but also that in spite of them we are ouk exaporoumenoi (not driven to despair). It is true that as Christians we put our trust in God, and that we are freed and consoled in all our needs and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

fears by the Holy Spirit. It is for this reason that Christianity is a message of joy, courage, and unshakable confidence. All of this means that, as Christians, we have the sacred duty, for which we will be held accountable before God, to fight for this very history of ours joyfully, courageously, confidently. We also have the duty to bring about a foretaste of God's eternal reign through our solidarity, unselfishness, willingness to share, and love of peace.

Yet it seems to me that we have not yet mastered the problem of the two existentials put together by Paul. How can we be perplexed pessimists, how can we admit that we are lost in existence, how can we acknowledge that this situation is at present irremediable, yet in Paul's words "not be driven to despair"? Do these two attitudes not cancel each other out? Are there only two possibilities open to Christians? Do Christians simply capitulate before the insuperable darkness of existence and honestly admit that they are capitulating? Or do they simply ignore their perplexity and become right away persons who have victoriously overcome the hopelessness of life? Is it possible for Christians neither simply to despair nor overlook in a false optimism the bitter hopelessness of their existence? It seems to me that it is not easy to answer these questions theoretically. Yet the questions and their answers are of the greatest importance for Christian life, even if they occur only in the more or less unconscious praxis of life, and even if the very question about this Christian perplexity falls under the law of this same perplexity. This situation make it impossible to give clear answers to the questions.

The coexistence of these two existentials, which are not necessarily mutually exclusive, is evidently based on the fundamental difference between a knowledge that all persons can attain by their own powers and the knowledge that believers alone receive from God and God's grace. Because these two ways of knowing, and the truths known through each one of them, are incompatible, the two existentials may coexist in human life. Christians may feel the hopelessness of their existence, accept it without illusion, and for these very reasons be free, cheerful, and (in a certain sense) persons who have already arrived.

[161] Christians, helped by God's grace, let themselves fall into the abyss of God's incomprehensibility and discover that this ultimate and permanent mystery of God's incomprehensibility is itself true fulfillment, freedom, and forgiving salvation. They experience their radical fall into the abyss of divinity as their deepest perplexity. They continue to experience this darkness, always more intensely and more bitterly, in a certain sense, until the dreadful absurdity of death. They see that this experience of darkness is confirmed by the fate of Jesus. At the same time, in a mysterious paradox, they feel that this very experience is sent to them by God and is the experience of the arrival of God near them. The perplexity and the fact that it is lifted by God's grace are not really two successive stages of human existence. God's grace does not totally remove the perplexity of existence. The lifting, the ouk exaporoumenoi, accepted and filled with grace, is the real truth of the perplexity itself.

For if it is true that we shall one day see God as he is, immediately, face to face, and if he is seen there precisely as the ineffable, unfathomable mystery that can be accepted and endured only in love, that is, in a total yielding up of self, then fulfillment for Christians is the height of human perplexity. Compared to it, all our riddles, our ignorance, our disappointments are but forerunners and first installments of the perplexity that consists in losing ourselves entirely through love in the mystery that is God. In the bliss of accepting the infinite mystery, that is, in absolute perplexity, all our partial perplexities, bewilderments, and disappointments disappear. The reverse is also true. As we expect and accept this end of our existence, our present perplexities are not removed, but encompassed. We are liberated, because they no longer dominate us. They have become the occasion and the mediation of our welcoming of the unfathomable mystery that gives itself to us and causes us to accept it in love.

While we are thus freed from every enslaving power and domination, the world remains

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

what it is: the task, the challenge, the battlefield, with its victories and its defeats, as they succeed and overlap each other. We are unable to control them completely; we must accept them with their own perplexities. Within the ultimate freedom and even serenity of those for whom night and day, defeat and victory, are encompassed by the reality of God who is for us, nothing seems to have changed. We remain the [162] aporoumenoi. And even the fact that we are more than saved and liberated aporoumenoi remains mysteriously hidden from us (often or forever, I do not know). But even then the fact remains that our perplexity is redeemed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[163]

PART FOUR

Doctrine and Magisterium

[165]

16

WHAT THE CHURCH OFFICIALLY TEACHES AND WHAT THE PEOPLE ACTUALLY BELIEVE

If we consider the material content of the faith, nobody can deny that there exists a considerable difference between that which is explicitly and officially taught as part of the content of the faith and that which the average Christian in the Church knows about the faith and believes. Most Christians believe explicitly much less than what is explicitly present in the doctrine of the magisterium. This actual faith is to a considerable extent riddled with misunderstandings. Many things are held as belonging to this faith that in reality do not belong to it.

A PRELIMINARY REMARK

As matters stand it is not so easy to avoid the difficulty by insisting that, despite its weakness, the actual faith of these Christians includes the absolute assent of faith, whereby people believe, at least implicitly, all that the Church tells them to believe. For in their actual faith many Christians not only do not affirm this or that truth of the faith with absolute assent, they do not even affirm the absolute authority of the Church's magisterium (even in its definitive decisions) with an absolute assent of faith. Therefore it is not as easy as it might appear to avoid the difficulty by appealing to the implicit faith of the average believer.

[166] True, the great majority of average Christians give an absolute assent of faith to this or that fundamental point of faith. Other points which may be true or false are held only in such a way that they do not destroy the absolute assent of faith that is also present in their mind. Their faith then really is a salutary faith. But this changes nothing in the description we gave of the average Christian, because the object of the absolute assent of faith, which for all that may indeed exist, is not precisely the teaching authority of the Church.

The difference between what the Church officially believes and what the average Christian actually believes has always existed. We might safely say that the pluralism of New Testament theologies is already a proof of it. One can distinguish, for instance, several levels in Origen's understanding of faith, and one is pressed to make theological heads or tails out of that. We hear of Christians who, as they were dying, professed their full assent to the faith of the Church. This implies that a material identity between the official faith of the Church and their own personal faith is not to be taken for granted and that eventually they wanted to make sure of that identity by this profession. Moral theology has inquired what truths of the faith have to be known and professed explicitly by all Christians. This question takes for granted therefore that there is a considerable difference between the official faith of the Church and the actual faith of many Christians. Attempts have been made, by the way, to narrow this difference by means of the doctrine that, in the long run, a positive atheism is not possible without serious subjective guilt. But it looks as if Vatican II has quietly dropped this doctrine.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

So although the situation we are discussing has always been recognized to some extent, theological reflection has never probed it very intensively. Today it has assumed an important new aspect. Among average Christians of former times, those who could barely read or write (the "unlearned"), the awareness of the content of the faith might have been fragmentary and incomplete. But it was not opposed to other opinions, to other Weltanschauungen, because they did not exist in the consciousness of such people. A "primitive" awareness of the faith was, roughly speaking, matched only with ignorance. That is why in a feudal society, in which authorities decided on the faith of their subjects, one could suppose that everybody naturally shared the same faith and that there [167] really existed Christian or Catholic peoples. This is no longer true today.

A fragmentary and imperfect faith coexists today with countless other ideas, many of which – at least as they are actually understood – stand in logical contradiction to the content of faith, whether people are clearly aware of it or not. It follows that the material defectiveness of actual faith is quite different from what it used to be. This explains why, as mentioned above, even the formal principle of faith, the formal authority of the Church, is threatened. Today's faith is not like the fragmentary faith through simple ignorance of former times, but coexists with positively contradictory elements in some kind of mostly unconscious schizoid state. Even if we suppose that no objective contradictions exist among the particulars in an individual's consciousness (statements of faith included), these contents are incredibly complex and almost impossible to harmonize. It is practically impossible for individuals to harmonize all the data of consciousness with the contents of the faith, although it is a tenet of that faith that such a harmonization is theoretically possible. This is one more reason why the gap between the official faith of the Church and the actual faith of the people differs essentially today from what it used to be.

THE REFUSAL TO ACKNOWLEDGE THIS

The first points to be mentioned about this fact is that it has not been sufficiently noticed by the official Church and that theology has not yet investigated it with sufficient care. Of course, as we said above, the fact is not denied and occasionally it is the object of some rather perfunctory theological reflection. Although we are aware of the fact, we relegate it to the edge of our consciousness. And in our official jargon, we continue to speak of "Christians" or "Catholics," wherever such people have not explicitly left a Christian Church or the Catholic Church or have not in some other way explicitly made known their total dissent from Christianity.

Thus "Catholics" are opposed to the new laws on abortion. Some "central committee" speaks in the name of "German Catholics." With the use of colors on maps, religious statisticians continue to designate regions that are more than 50 percent "Catholic." There is, of course, nothing wrong in this way of speaking, but the statistics [168] have nothing to do with the inner faith of the people. They misrepresent the fact that the percentage of "practicing" Christians is quite low. Spain is a Catholic country, even though on Sundays only 10 percent of the people of Madrid attend Sunday mass. In theological discussions (for instance, with Hans Küng) official reports anxiously refrain from asking what percentage of Catholics might agree with the official position and what percentage might agree with the condemned opinion.

As a rule official announcements simply presuppose that those who read them have no

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

doubts about the formal authority of the magisterium. That is why they generally do not take the trouble to explain to these "Catholics" the intrinsic reason for their decision. (A theologian who used to be influential in Rome told me once that this custom is quite legitimate, since it derives from the very nature of the magisterium. Defending the decision with rational arguments should be the task of theologians, not of the magisterium.)

This mentality takes for granted that Catholics are well informed. As a rule it does not try to address non-Catholics and the many very poorly educated Catholics. As a result, in their properly theological parts, important Roman documents of the Church use an esoteric theological language. They presuppose that their readers admit many things which these readers do not. They ignore fundamental theology and continue to use Scripture in the old way by quoting dicta probantia. In a word, the official Church and its magisterium presuppose, without ever saying so, that, when they address Catholics, they have to do with a relatively homogeneous group of people whose Weltanschauung contains, in fact, nothing but a clearly articulated Christian faith, together with a more or less absolute respect for the authority of the Church's magisterium.

While this situation, naturally, is not explicitly affirmed and many statements and actions presuppose the opposite, yet, roughly speaking, what we have said is true. In theory and practice, hardly any notice is taken of the extraordinarily large difference between the official faith of the Church and the actual faith of a large percentage of Catholics. This might open up to fundamental, dogmatic, and pastoral theology a wide field for reflection. I would like to add a couple of simple remarks, although I am afraid that they do not yet reach the heart of the matter.

[169]

POSITIVE THEOLOGICAL EVALUATION OF THE DIFFERENCE

First, if seems to me that this difference does not have a merely negative value, but a theologically positive aspect as well. The fact that the index systematicus of Denzinger can rarely be found in the heads of ordinary Christians is not as deplorable as it may seem to many people who are tempted to identify saving faith with theological formation. Sophisticated knowledge of something may even be a great obstacle to its personal assimilation. I suspect that today's catechisms, however modern they claim to be, still contain too many things and that they do not present the heart of the Christian message, that which must by all means be said in a striking, really intelligible way. Moreover, it is the faith in the Church that actually exists in beads and hearts, and not properly official Church doctrine, that immediately and in itself is the faith that constitutes the Church.

Of course, we can rightly say that the often fragmentary and undifferentiated faith of the individual, and therefore also of many individuals, stands in relation to the faith of the whole Church. It is within the faith of the whole Church that the great and luminous totality of Christian faith is believed and practiced. One of its essential components is the faith of the saints, the heroes of faith, the mystics. But the Church does not consist only of its saints. The faith of the average Christian is not just a pitiable sketch of the official faith. It is a salutary faith borne by God's self-communication. It is really the faith that God's grace wishes to bring forth and keep alive in the Church.

We may not judge this faith by its objective verbal contents. Even when its objectification in words and concepts is very poor and deficient, it is still God's action in us, constituted by the self-communication of God in the Holy Spirit. As such, it infinitely transcends the most sublime theological objectification of the faith. The depositum fidei is not first and foremost a sum of statements formulated in human language. It is God's Spirit, irrevocably communicated to humankind, activating in persons the salutary faith that they really possess.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course, the same Spirit also brings forth in this way the community of the faithful, in which the unity and fullness of Christian faith are objectified and brought to consciousness in what we perceive as the official faith of the institutional [170] Church. Nevertheless, what matters above all is the faith that really lives in the ordinary Christian. That is the faith that actually saves, in which God communicates himself to humanity, however pitiful and fragmentary its conceptualization may be.

Human transcendence, which is created by the Spirit of God, borne by God's self-communication, and enabled by God's self to aim at God's immediacy, is called faith. It always has a starting point in the world, a mediation, some individual "object" that is believed. But this mediation leading to ultimate salvation may, under God's Providence, be of different kinds. It may be paltry, it may be rich, and it has its own history. It is obviously not God's intention that every individual believer should enjoy all at once the fullness of this history of mediation – not even the faithful in the Church, although the Church makes possible a richer and more detailed knowledge of the totality of these historical mediations.

THE NORMATIVE SIGNIFICANCE OF POPULAR FAITH FOR THE MAGISTERIUM

These considerations allow us to say that the actual faith of the faithful in the Church has a normative significance for the official faith of the Church. The latter, of course, has a normative significance for the former, a point that is rightly emphasized by the teaching of the Church. Certainly we may not say that the faith of the magisterium should be directed by that of the faithful, as discovered by an opinion poll. That would be false, not only because of the very nature of the faith but also because it is impossible to discover, by the usual canvassing methods, what the faithful believe.

The official faith of the Church contains data that derive from the history of the Church's faith, data that have become irreversible and are normative for the faith of the present-day Church. The Church possesses an authoritative magisterium that is, in principle, normative for the faith of the individual, although this magisterium, while remaining essentially the same, is itself affected by historical change in its existence and its praxis. But this does not exclude the fact that the actual faith of Christians has a normative influence on the magisterium and on the official faith of the Church. However, this "normativeness" is essentially different [171] from the one we attribute to the magisterium and its faith. These two influences mutually condition each other, although we must add that mutual does not mean equal.

First, it is obvious that, considered historically, the official faith of the Church depends for its growth and differentiation on the growth and differentiation of the actual faith of the faithful. Among them are theologians with their work, even though this work, just like the faith of others, in the Church, operates in constant dialogue with the Church's official doctrine. To put it with a bit of malice: Before the doctrine of the Council of Florence on the Trinity, theologians held a similar doctrine that had not yet received the blessing of the magisterium. The doctrine of the seven sacraments or of transubstantiation were theologumena before the Church's magisterium declared them defined propositions.

We should keep this in mind in looking at the last few centuries, when some popes have spoken as if the task of theologians consisted merely in defending and explaining the statements of the magisterium. If we do not want to make of theologians a special group in the Church, like that of the bishops, we must say that theologians belong to the People of God. To be sure, their concern is also the traditional faith that has already been officially approved. But it is broader than that. And whatever they work at, they do as members of the People of God with its concrete "theology." That is why their theologumena belong to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

actual faith of the People of God, especially since they too may be called to order by the magisterium.

It is from these elements of the actual faith of the People of God that the Church's magisterium learns and should continue to learn. While it thus keeps learning, the magisterium declares that the doctrine discovered in this way is binding because it belongs to the actual faith of the Church and shares therefore in the infallibility of the believing Church. It follows that the actual faith of the Church has not only an actual but also a normative influence upon the Church's official faith. Distinguishing what merely happens to be present in the consciousness of the People of God from what is binding in faith may, in the final analysis, be a prerogative of the magisterium of the Church. The magisterium is then considered an indispensable component of the Church, as a community of faith. Yet it remains true that the faith of the People of God, as actually existing and not merely as officially approved, is [172] a source of, and to some extent also a norm for, the official faith of the Church. Nor does it follow that there would have originally existed a believing Church without a magisterium (the first apostolic "witnesses") or that there would have been a time in which these two realities would not have mutually, although differently, influenced each other.

We might also put it as follows: In the eschatologically definitive and invincible community of faith that is the Church, there can be no teaching that would not be accepted by some obedient faith. That is why this obedient faith is also a necessary and rightful norm and criterion for the preaching of the faith, and not the other way around.

WHY THE ACCENT SHOULD SHIFT

The official faith of the Church is a norm for the actual faith of the Church. The faithful should be clearly aware of this. On the other hand, in its preaching, the magisterium should also pay attention to the actual faith of the faithful as it has always unconsciously done to some extent. It praised the devotion to the Sacred Heart after this devotion had already been promoted by the faithful in the Church. Countless such examples might be mentioned. However, in our age when people have become more aware of such things even in the Church, the question may be raised whether this influence on the magisterium by the actual faith of the people might not to some extent occur in a more conscious way, by means of surveys, adapted for this special purpose and different from other opinion polls.

This would not amount simply to a yielding to modern trends in the actual faith of the people. It might be possible that the official teaching from above is already being influenced by the faith from below, without noticing it, and that this would become clear only if this faith from below were better known. For instance, has the preaching of the possibility of eternal rejection of a person, that is, of hell, not become considerably more subdued during the last few decades, under the influence of today's general mentality? Whether this is a legitimate development is, of course, quite a different question and does not have to be decided here. It is not clear what form such "feedback" of actual faith upon the magisterium [173] and its teaching should take. But it is certain that there can be no question in Catholic theology of withdrawing a defined doctrine because a considerable part of the faithful have refused to accept it.

However, this does not answer a further question: Should this widespread non-reception not induce the magisterium to give more thought to its doctrine (even if defined), to formulate it in a wider and newer context, and to remove the accretions that do not really belong to the faith and that may unconsciously adhere to a defined doctrine? Time and again, in the Church's awareness of the faith the accent has shifted. The history of dogma shows this very

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

clearly. Would it not be possible today, prudently and discreetly, and with an eye on the actual faith of the people in the Church, to make such shifts consciously?

Let us take an example. The Church continues to give the impression that she makes known moral alternatives between which people must choose for their salvation or their perdition. That is the prevailing impression, while teachings about God's saving activity have a slighter impact. At the same time, compared with former times, people worry much less about their eternal salvation. Rather than feeling guilty in the presence of God they ask God to answer for the dreadful world he has created. Might not such remarks lead to a very important shift of emphasis in official teachings, without the need for the Church to deny any dogma that she has already proclaimed?

ACKNOWLEDGING POPULAR FAITH AND ITS CONSEQUENCES FOR CHURCH AND THEOLOGY

Even if we did not touch the real core of the question, it is easy to see that such considerations are important for ecumenical endeavors. Between the actual faith of devout Protestants and that of practicing Catholics (we are not speaking of their church organization or of their liturgy) there is today hardly any difference. In our ecumenical efforts should we not attach to this simple fact the importance it deserves? To be sure, in the eventuality of the unification of the Catholic Church with the Reformed churches, the Catholic Church would not withdraw the dogmas which the other side challenges. But does she necessarily have to insist that, when [174] the churches have united, these dogmas be expressly taught by the magisterium as absolutely binding? This is really a valid question, when we see how the Catholic Church keeps very quiet about the fact that her own members do not accept quite a number of dogmas. It is a question when we see that the filioque does not have to be expressly mentioned everywhere in the profession of faith, when we may doubt that the procession of the Spirit "from the Son" and the procession "through the Son" mean absolutely the same thing. It is a question when we keep in mind the diversity of the material mediations of the one salvific faith in all stages of the history of salvation.

Our mentality today is not the same as it used to be. In earlier times people thought along simple either-or lines, or according to propositions to which an absolute assent was at least presumed. Today they rather presume that a simple either-or is a priori false. And propositions are as a rule affirmed conditionally, until, as is always possible, the opposite is demonstrated. It would be wrong to attach an absolute value to today's mentality. That would contradict its own nature. But even if we attach only a relative value to it, we may still wonder whether the differences between the Christian churches must be formulated in the same way in which they were and had to be formulated under a different mentality.

Can we seriously still think, as at the time of the Reformation, of an either-or with regard to the number of sacraments? If we take the modern mentality into account, might we not iron out differences concerning Vatican I, for instance, by explaining more clearly how the pope's decision is connected with the faith of the whole Church, by emphasizing more simply and clearly the fact that even a papal definition is historically conditioned, and so on? If the great regional churches in the Catholic Church have a certain autonomy, and if that also implies an autonomy of their theologies which do not simply echo Roman theology, something similar should also be true for the churches of the Reformation if they are again united with Rome. What this means more precisely should, of course, first be explained. And that would undoubtedly also involve some reflection on the actual faith of the people in the churches.

A last consequence of our reflections deserves to be explicitly mentioned. All salutary

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian faith must contain a moment of absolute assent. This assent, even as absolute with regard to the salvific and saving incomprehensibility of God, contains an empirical [175] moment of mediation. But as pointed out above, this empirical moment of mediation has been incredibly varied in the course of salvation history. On the evidence of empirical facts, this moment in the Catholic Church has not always and everywhere been the infallible authority of the Church's magisterium. That authority is often questioned or ignored, and believers have in mind quite different mediations for their absolute assent to God's saving self-communication, for instance the Christ event or an unconditional hope.

That is why the Church's teaching should try to find the most efficient and obvious moment of such a mediation in our time. We should not preach indiscriminately everything that belongs to the fullness of the faith of the official Church. Judicious emphasis is needed. And it should be put where the actual faith, or a real possibility of faith, for humanity today exists. From this point of view too, the actual faith of people would have a (correctly understood) "normative" significance for the Church's official faith and teaching. This actual faith must certainly not be the whole of what is taught, but it should serve as a starting point. That may be a platitude, but it is a very important one, and one that is too often forgotten.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[176]

17

THEOLOGY AND THE ROMAN MAGISTERIUM

Despite everything that has already been said in the traditional fundamental theologies and ecclesiologies, and despite many declarations of the Church's magisterium from the nineteen century until the second Vatican Council (and even recently by Pope John Paul II), the precise relation between the magisterium of the Roman Church and theologians remains very obscure. We need not expect it ever to be so lucidly set forth that conflicts between both parties would be excluded a priori, even if the rules were quite clear, easy to follow, and faithfully observed. Such an ideal and unruffled peace cannot be reached even with the best norms and principles. On both sides there are finite human beings, with a mutual incommensurability in thinking and willing that cannot be removed even by good will, Christian virtue, and the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Yet we might say that some principles could be stated more clearly than they have been, principles that would make for more peace and harmony.

The Roman magisterium takes for granted that for listeners of good will and with some theological formation its declarations are immediately understandable. This refers to the meaning of such a declaration as well as to the degree of obligation ascribed to it by the magisterium itself. It also takes for granted that in relation to theologians the magisterium has the final word, which theologians must simply respect in its (relative) binding power. More or less underlying such a declaration is the opinion that theologians' only [177] task is to defend these declarations of the magisterium (by showing how they derive from the primary sources of revelation) and to explain them, insofar as this may be required for a given cultural and social situation.

On the other hand, while readily granting the Holy Spirit's assistance to the Church, theologians remark that such declarations of the magisterium are also the work of theologians and that, as a result, they are affected by the historical and human limitations of their authors, limitations that are often quite evident. Such declarations must be examined by using a method that can be very complicated, because their unconscious presuppositions make them less clear than their authors believe them to be. Such an interpretation is unavoidable, although Roman theologians often dislike it. It gives rise to new formulations that are as correct as the previous ones, although they may not be too well received in Rome.

Theologians insist that it is not at all true that their work begins and ends with the declarations of the magisterium. In countless cases these declarations are the result of theological activity that from the start has not been directed from above. Theology can and must ask many questions that have not yet been settled by official declarations. Theology that has not been officially approved can be very important for the progress of Christian faith, in the world and for practical life. Theologians say that for this kind of work they need a certain amount of freedom and the opportunity to do research that is not controlled. They would be unable to do this kind of work if, from the start and at every moment, they were worried about avoiding the danger of erring, if uniformity in theology were desirable, and if a legitimate pluralism were suppressed as impossible or dangerous.

These demands of the magisterium and of theologians do not necessarily contradict each other. The trouble is that it is not easy to see how they can be easily reconciled. Also each "party" generally admits the demands of the other "party" sotto voce, while loudly defending its own side, as if in practice only that one really mattered.

We are trying to make some progress by attempting to formulate what each side must grant

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to the other more expressly than is usually done and try then to put it into practice.

[178]

SELF-UNDERSTANDING AND PRAXIS OF THE MAGISTERIUM

Those who represent the magisterium should explicitly say in its name, and put in to practice, something along the following lines: We too are human beings when we make our decisions. We are men who should not be rash and full of prejudice, yet we cannot help being such. Abstracting from the fact that strictly binding decisions of the pope and a council are preserved from error by the Holy Spirit, we, the pope too, can err in our decisions, and we have often done so in the past. This is obvious and it does not imply that the magisterium is either illegitimate or unnecessary. It is our duty to work with this risk, because we have a duty and a function, even when the presuppositions and conditions of strictly binding decisions are not given, exactly as a physician can make diagnoses even when he is not absolutely certain of them. Moreover, you theologians do not have the right to assume that our decisions are wrong for the simple reason that they contradict the opinions that you, or quite a number of you, have defended.

On the other hand, we have a duty that up to now we have generally shirked. We should expressly indicate in a text that a given declaration is not absolutely binding. You theologians should understand that up to now we have not done this enough and thus have made it look as though whatever we say is absolutely binding, with no possibility of error. Of course, with our tacit consent, every ecclesiology says the opposite. But that is the only place where it is being said. It does not come to the knowledge, nor act upon the conscience, of the faithful. What the German Bishops' Conference said about this in its Königstein declaration of 1968 has unfortunately evoked little attention and imitation. In this way our official declarations too easily produce the impression that, for reasons of faith, not the slightest doubt may exist or be tolerated about their truth. That is where we should modify our praxis, not only saying that our declarations are really binding (although not all to the same degree) but also mentioning more precisely the degree and relativity of the obligation they impose. A few decades ago the magisterium ordered you expressly to indicate in your theology lectures the theological qualification of your theses. Why should we not do the same when we issue official declarations?

But you theologians must also help to bring about what is required [179] for us to proceed differently in the future. If you or members of the faithful simply presuppose that a non-defining declaration has practically no importance, and so you lay it aside with a shrug and a smile, you must not be surprised if we speak as though our declarations were irreformable. So you must collaborate to bring about a spiritual climate in which authentic declarations, even when they are not strictly binding, really have some importance in the Church.

REACTIONS OF THE THEOLOGIANS TO MEASURES TAKEN BY THE MAGISTERIUM

There is a great variety of possible reactions. They have not been fairly described by the Council in Lumen Gentium, and they cannot be set forth exactly by means of general rules. When should a theologian expressly, head on as it were, come up against a declaration that is not irreformable? When and how might it be a theologian's duty to do the opposite (presumption favors this course) and expressly defend and supply evidence for a Roman declaration? Where might a silentium obsequiosum, an obedient silence, be desirable? Where and when would it be opportune to examine and evaluate a Roman declaration with due care,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

make the necessary distinctions, and in this way suggest corrections or possible interpretations not expressly seen in Rome? When or where would it be indicated to put the content of such a Roman declaration in a wider context which we have not explicitly thought of so far, removing from the start perspectives that are too short-sighted? In this way we who are also willing to learn may understand that, even if one ignores the immediate text of the declaration, that which we properly meant survives.

We are honestly ready to expect such distinctions and not to take offense at those who do not wholly agree with our provisional decisions. It may be desirable that a time of silentium obsequiosum not last too long before one expressly requests a revision. (The present pope speaks calmly of the Yahwist, whereas seventy years ago we would not have been indulgent toward a Catholic exegete who spoke that way.) For concrete cases, however, there are no general and easy rules to help us decide whether a reaction takes place for good reasons and with sufficient respect for the Church's [180] magisterium. In such a judgment you may be wrong and we may be wrong. Especially since this is also a question of spiritual discernment. We cannot adopt as our policy that our reactions to your opinions must not allow the slightest possibility of a doubt or that we should not react at all. Everyone must expect that in such cases mistakes may be made and injustices committed.

While these points can be granted, no license is given to commit the sins of pride, rashness, or self-righteousness. Rather, we are warned to feel gravely responsible to fulfill our duty courageously, and at the same time to consider realistically the possibility that we may blunder. But you, as the Christians you want to be, must patiently bear the burden that is so often put on your shoulders without good reason or necessity. To be removed from office, to be condemned, is certainly not pretty, and you may defend yourself against it with every lawful means, and you may fight to insure that these lawful means are not withheld from you. But if all this does not help, then removal from office and other measures can also be the fate of a Christian, just as when some public authority or terminal disease puts an end to someone. Life is that way. In the world and in history things do not always work out smoothly when several people and groups fulfill their duties and avail themselves of their rights.

You should not a priori and in general deny the right of the pope or the bishops to take administrative measures as consequences of doctrinal decisions. When, for instance, a theology professor teaches candidates for the priesthood on behalf of the bishop, the bishop can and must eventually withdraw that commission if he reaches the conclusion that it is not being carried out in accordance with the faith of the Church, for which the pope and bishops are more authentic spokesmen than anyone else. Of course, we office bearers should proceed in all this with utmost prudence and fairness. Who among us would claim that this has always been the case? But there are decisions in the world that have to be upheld, even if one knows that they may offend against truth and justice.

STRICTLY BINDING DECISIONS

We come now to the cases where we are dealing with a strictly binding conciliar or papal decision. We office holders do not wish [181] to demonstrate here and now, from the nature of the eschatological Church, that there must exist in the Church such strictly binding propositions of faith expressed in human words, and that we are not reduced to living in the truth without being able to grasp any part of it. We wish only to formulate a few practical maxims, some of them for us, some for you. If there are such definitions, it is evident at once that the magisterium cannot tolerate theologians who publicly, in direct confrontation, reject such truths of the divine and Catholic faith. Whatever may be the case with the private faith of individual Christians who absolutely reject for themselves certain dogmas of the Church, it is clear that no one may act as a church theologian and at the same time publicly reject church dogmas. Where that happens, the magisterium must intervene, officially declare this contradiction, and exercise the basic right to draw administrative consequences from this declaration.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But other cases are conceivable and concretely possible, in which theologians deny that their positions are irreconcilable with the Church's dogma, whereas the magisterium is convinced of the opposite. In such cases these theologians may, of course, be summoned to declare their express consent to the defined dogma and its normativity for their own theology.

When we go further and demand that they withdraw their own positions ("laudabiliter se subiecit"), of course, the situation becomes complicated, as we should admit more openly than we have done so far. In this case what does it mean to withdraw such positions? Does it mean that those theologians have reached the conclusion that their positions cannot be reconciled with dogma, although they had held the opposite opinion? How quickly do they have to reach this new conviction? How is it that we who speak for the magisterium have the right to demand such a declaration, since it is naturally also possible that we are mistaken when we assert that the positions are irreconcilable? After all, our assertion does not belong to the content of the revealed faith. Is the following attitude acceptable? A theologian has been censured. He or she claims to accept the dogma in question, and also the legitimacy of the way in which the Church formulates it. He or she accepts the imposed terminology (language used for a dogma that is not simply identical with its content) as normative for his or her own theology. As for the rest, the theologian holds on to his or her theological freedom of opinion, even if the Roman authorities do [183] not like it very much in this case. Well, we in Rome have not yet given enough thought to such questions. And so we are tempted to treat you simply in the old-fashioned feudal way. We have not pondered enough what we want and what we do not want from you in questions of faith.

We in Rome cannot investigate the ideas of theologians with any precision. Their faith is based on a very complex process of consciousness, which is unavoidably an amalgam of correct propositions and a subjective way of understanding them. We cannot make sure whether, in all of this, that which must be believed in our dogma is really present, or whether it is practically eliminated by arbitrary interpretations and we are able to prove none of this. Moreover, in many other domains, the Church has already learned to distinguish in individuals a public and a private dimension and to avoid intruding into the private sphere. There are things that we ought to consider more carefully in Rome, so that we may draw conclusions from them with regard to what we may honestly and fairly require from censured theologians. In this respect we should find better formulas that no longer sound like submission formulas out of a feudal age. If, in this respect, a few fundamental adjustments were worked out, theologians would, in a concrete case, have to declare that they accept these general rules as applicable to their case. That would be enough.

It is not to be expected that in the foreseeable future pending disputes in theology will be decided through real definitions. We all agree that past definitions entail an undeniable obligation for your further theological work. It is evident that former definitions may not through your silence be driven into oblivion. On the other hand, we should admit that such definitions cannot be the beginning and end of your work, but that they can and must be "re-examined." Their meaning, the differences that exist between them and the interpretations that have been passed on with them without being identical with them, their meaning within the context of the whole of faith and of a new mentality, are not necessarily as clear and as unequivocal as today's preaching of the Gospel demands. It is certainly often the case that we in Rome, with its clerical milieu, do not notice how necessary such interpretations are, and that without them it is impossible, at least outside of Rome, to proclaim the Christian message in a convincing way.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[183]

REINTERPRETATION OF THE DOGMAS

It is quite possibly a sign of health and vitality that conflicts arise between the theology that we are traditionally used to here in Rome and the theology that you hold, as you interpret dogma. In these attempts and their evaluation by us both of us may have differences of opinion, we may get into conflicts and make mistakes. In that case (provided no theologian radically denies a dogma) everything that applies to declarations of the magisterium that are not strictly binding applies also to the interpretation of dogma, because the conflict is not between dogma and the denial of it, but between two interpretations, neither of which is infallible.

We should become more clearly aware in Rome that nowadays this work of interpretation is needed to a much greater extent than is actually being done or than suits our theological laziness. If basic dogmas of Christianity are to be announced in a credible way in a milieu that is not traditionally Christian, a reinterpretation of dogma is required that is much more extensive and intensive than your theology is already providing. What would an average Christian have in mind when he or she says that there are three persons in God? (I am afraid a heresy, which he or she considers to be a tenet of the faith!) If there is a history of dogma still going on, it is certain that the traditional formulas of classic Christology are not absolutely beyond improvement and that their meaning can be expressed in a different way.

In your thinking, theologians, you have certainly not caught up with all that an evolutionary conception of the world, a universal history of salvation, a positive significance for salvation of non-Christian religious, a positive interpretation of the divisions in Christianity, today's secular world, and many other things have added to your task. Moreover, there is also the problem of pluralism in theology, the problem of the different theologies of Africa, Latin America, and East Asia. Here are assignments that should render you humble and modest and inspire us only with good will toward you. We should rather be upset when you do not upset us, when dogma looks more like sacrosanct immobility than like living power.

Even a definition does not put an end to the history of truth. Our task in Rome is not merely to condemn. We must also make positive statements, that is, perform theological work in the strict [184] sense. The pope cannot always write his encyclicals by himself. As a rule he should not. (Bellarmine cautioned the pope not to prepare his decisions by means of his private theology.) So we are in need of your collaboration. Why does the International Commission of Theologians lead such a pitiful existence beside the Congregation of the Faith, whose head has expressly refused to consult this international group of theologians? The theologians who belong to the Congregation of the Faith should have an international reputation, and it should be public knowledge which one of them has collaborated in a given decision. May we not hope that the Church would have that much openness?

ABOUT THE PROCEDURE OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE FAITH

It stands to reason that, when the Congregation of the Faith has summoned a theologian, it must submit to him or her all the pertinent data of the trial in all its stages. It was still happening just a few years ago that a thick dossier was compiled against a theologian and printed up like a book, with numerous letters of denunciation, and yet it was forbidden to be shown to the theologian in question. Quite recently the relator pro autore, the counsel for the defense, who is officially appointed in such a procedure, was not made known to the defendant. He was not even allowed to know who would defend him. Such secretiveness is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

absurd and must end. In such things Roman authority violates human rights which the Church claims to defend.

I consider it also out-dated and impractical for the Congregation of the Faith to run the procedure in two different panels. A case is first discussed by the consulta of theologians. The result is then presented to ten cardinals, who alone make the decision. Of course, in the final analysis, the authority of the magisterium does not derive from the weight of theological arguments and the shrewdness of theologians, although the magisterium is obliged to use these means with the greatest energy. Yet this does not imply that the higher "panel" of cardinals alone should discuss and decide what will then be finally submitted to the formal authority of the pope, especially since these cardinals, salva omni reverentia, for the most part understand nothing of theology that is to be found [185] outside their old textbooks. What harm would it do if theologians and a couple of really competent cardinals worked together from the start, even if the theologians were present only in an advisory capacity? One more remark: Such procedures should be terminated more rapidly. It is wrong for a theologian to have to wait in fear for many years until the Roman bureaucracy has reached a decision. Prudence and careful scrutiny do not justify such long delays. And in the international curia of a world-Church, which Rome claims to be, it should be possible for the colloquy between the theologian and the Roman authority to be held in all the usual international languages.

SELF-UNDERSTANDING AND PRAXIS OF THEOLOGY

On the other hand, theologians should say something like this: First, we are not a mafia, where everyone can speak in the name of theology and for all theologians. Neither do we feel obliged, whenever an individual theologian comes in conflict with Rome, to voice our indignation at once in the name of freedom and theology. Undoubtedly, we have the right and the duty to side with Rome against another theologian, when we are convinced that a Roman declaration is correct. Among theologians too cronyism is repugnant. Have we reached the point where theologians have compromised themselves when they support a Roman decision?

Collective declarations of theologians deserve the serious attention of the Roman authorities. In principle they should not ignore them. They should not think that every dialogue with theologians goes against the nature of the Roman magisterium, because according to canon law, it is "the highest chair" independent of any other human power.

Nevertheless such declarations are a questionable thing. The fact that they are frequently used in the world, that they are modern, is not yet a convincing argument for such collective declarations. They very quickly lose their usefulness. They easily indulge in generalities that nobody denies. God and the devil, however, are to be found in the details that such declarations often glibly ignore. Appeals for more freedom in theology are especially questionable and useless if they do not state clearly what they mean and what they do not mean.

[186]

ACKNOWLEDGING THE MAGISTERIUM

The first thing that we from our side, as theologians, have to say is therefore that we acknowledge our duty with regard to the Roman magisterium. As theologians we have, of course, an autonomous function and a pastoral responsibility in the Church; we are not just the handymen of the magisterium and church authorities. But the magisterium is for us

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theologians a binding authority, and we discharge our function within the hierarchical Roman Catholic Church and according to her rules. This task goes beyond a mere defense and interpretation of the magisterium, for the simple reason that the development of the faith in the Church cannot be adequately directed by the magisterium. At the same time, this task can be carried out only in basic agreement with the Church's magisterium.

As declarations about the relation between the magisterium and theology keep multiplying so quickly that nobody can keep up with them, we theologians should not in one breath formally acknowledge the magisterium, and in the next emphatically and emotionally demand our freedom. We should also insist somewhat more on how to respect the magisterium. The latter does not act presumptuously when it censures us. Such a procedure is not basically a threat to the freedom of our theological research. The relationship between faith and the teaching of it, on the one hand, and scientific theology, on the other, may be fluid and vague. Yet a theology that would have no connection with the preaching and the practice of faith would no longer be a Christian theology, but at the most a secular science of religion. That is also why there are no clearly delimited domains or methods in scientific theology that are absolutely outside the competence of the magisterium.

It has already been emphasized that there is a difference between publications of scientific theology and those intended for a wider public. Disregarding the fact that such a distinction is difficult to make, because the media inform everyone about everything, the distinction continues to make sense. It invites the magisterium to a greater tolerance toward scientific theological writings, especially when they are composed and written in the tentative and hypothetical way that belongs to scientific research. However, as long as theology does not degenerate [187] into mere religious science, as long as it lives and thinks within the faith of the Church, scientific publications and periodicals cannot in principle reject the supervision of the magisterium.

On the other hand, we must now tell the Church's magisterium that we theologians do not clearly see, in many cases, what respect for the magisterium and the fact that it is a norm for us concretely requires of us and what it does not. That this norm has different levels and degrees follows from the official doctrine that all the declarations of the Church's magisterium do not impose the same degree of obligation. This situation entails a difference in our reaction to such declarations. But the magisterium does not at all clarify for us theologians what these differences are and what they are not. Or it publishes norms that are so vague that either they are false or they do not help us.

TO WHAT DO OFFICIAL DECLARATIONS OBLIGE?

If, for instance, the statements of Lumen Gentium (no. 25) about this question were absolutely valid, the world-wide dissent of Catholic moral theologians from the encyclical Humanae Vitae would be a massive and global offense against the authority of the magisterium. Yet the magisterium accepts this offense, showing that the norm of Lumen Gentium, and of many similar declarations of the last hundred years, does not describe precisely enough the relation between the magisterium and theologians. Should Catholic exegetes have kept silent so long about their problems under Pius X? They have respectfully done so and thus made it harder for educated Catholics to believe. What should moral theologians do with Roman declarations about sexual morality that they consider lacking in distinctions? Should they keep quiet, or should they contradict them and make the necessary distinctions?

The absence of more precise norms may derive from the difficulty of the problem. So in every case we ourselves have to look for a way out with courage and prudence. We cannot stop at being prudent, not even at the risk of our jobs; we must also have the courage to take

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

risks, that is, we must consider the possibility of being censured by Rome.

[188] But this does not quite answer the question. Suppose that the censure of a theologian or of a group of theologians is accepted by them with all due respect and docility, but that it is not certain that the traditional theology, the opinion that has to that point been held in the Church and to which Rome appeals, is identical with a clearly defined dogma. In such a case the formal authority of the magisterium is not irreformable. As history has shown, it has often been wrong. Let us further suppose that, despite an obvious docility, the arguments of the magisterium do not convince the theologian in question, and that we have to do with an important question, which implies that this theologian has a duty to speak for the truth, and which at the same time increases the interest of the magisterium. What happens in such a case? Is a silentium obsequiosum sufficient? Is the theologian allowed, is he or she obliged, publicly to contradict? If we say yes, what happens then to the "sincere assent" which the Council's decree expects from the theologian? If the disagreement is only on this one point, and the theologian maintains an inner respect and submission, how can the magisterium make sure of this? Should it be satisfied with this general attitude and quietly tolerate the disagreement on this point? If we say that, on this one point, the theologian should simply keep quiet, the important question arises how the progress of knowledge, which is necessary for the life of the Church and for the credibility of her teaching, can be assured since the magisterium may be wrong in such a declaration. If, for instance, all theologians had shown this "sincere assent" by an obedient silence with regard to the biblical decrees of Pius X, the present pope could not speak of the Yahwist, and no introduction to the New Testament would be allowed to say that Luke's Gospel was written after the fall of Jerusalem.

It seems to me that, after mature consideration, the theologian has the right, and frequently the duty, to contradict a declaration of the magisterium and to maintain his or her opposition. The magisterium could tolerate this contradiction and use it to improve its own arguments without suppressing the theologians that side with it. The best policy would be to let the question of which side is right be decided by ongoing discussion and by the future history of the faith.

[189]

TOLERANCE OF THE MAGISTERIUM WITH REGARD TO THEOLOGY

The magisterium should not give up the right to put an end to a theological controversy by means of a decision. But this basic right does not mean that the magisterium should put an end to every discussion, nor that there are always good reasons for doing so, nor that a non-defining decision would always terminate a controversy in such a way as to preclude further discussion. Through its administrative measures, the magisterium can, in individual cases, unreasonably and unjustly curtail the freedom of theology. Such cases have happened and do happen time and again. Far be it from me to assume that every intervention of the magisterium is a restriction of the freedom of theologians. Yet I must say that the number of cases of unjustified curtailment of freedom that I have seen inflicted on other theologians during my lifetime is considerable. The situation is especially serious since the Holy Office is also responsible for measures that it requires superiors of religious orders to impose on their theologians.

Tolerance for statements of theologians who disagree with non-defining declarations of the magisterium has been widely practiced during the past few years. Is this de facto tolerance the result of circumstances, namely that, given the great number of cases, Rome can no longer "keep up" with them? Is it the consequence of a practical powerlessness that one would prefer to overcome? Or does it result from an insight into the legitimacy of such tolerance? We would like to think that the latter possibility is true, and we would be happy if

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Rome expressly told us so.

No end, not even a good and important end, justifies the means one uses to reach it. This principle holds for the magisterium, which must not yield to the temptation to use wrong means to attain mandatory and praiseworthy goals. It must respect the tolerance toward theological discussion that should be acknowledged by Rome. One of the questionable methods is the denial of the freedom required by theology, a denial that derives from a secret distrust of the power of truth. A dead orthodoxy is no true orthodoxy. Allowing a legitimate freedom to theology does not consist in making a few harmless theoretical declarations. It means that the authorities, while having the power of preventing it, allow a theologian to express an opinion [190] that they consider false (although either side's opinion may be wrong).

Powerful people live in constant temptation. This principle holds even for the Roman magisterium, even if we presume that they act in good faith when they obstruct theological freedom. In concrete cases, theologians should not, as has frequently happened of late, react with proud and unkind moralistic reproaches, an attitude that does not quite reflect the spirit of Jesus. All human beings are sinners; all are tempted. Even church leaders are not presumed to be immune from these weaknesses in the exercise of their official duties.

That is why, with all due respect, we are allowed to call the attention of these leaders to the fact that the burden of proof does not generally rest with the freedom of theology, but with the curtailment of this freedom. Once more: Why does Rome itself not expressly state these evident truths? Is Rome afraid? Why does Rome not understand that such expressly acknowledged principles would not diminish, but rather increase, the authority of the magisterium?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[191]

18

THE PERENNIAL ACTUALITY OF THE PAPACY

Presenting an ideal picture of a pope for the future should not mean that we criticize popes, past or present. The only certainty we have about the future is that it will differ from both the past and the present. If we do not wish simply to present a few dogmatic reflections on the permanent nature of the papacy, but to allow our thoughts to scan the future, we will have to give some thought, or at least indulge in vague conjectures, about what the papacy may look like in the near future.

Because I had already been invited once to relate my dream about the pope of the future,[1] I started to dream again. I dreamed about the letter which follows. Dreams, of course, are always quite arbitrary and vague. It is evident that they may tell more about the dreamer than about the thing dreamed. Even in dreams I cannot see the future. That is why what my pope writes remains necessarily very abstract, why it says nothing about the concrete future that an inscrutable Providence is also preparing for the papacy.

Vatican City
Rome

Dear Peppino:

Now your old friend has become pope. Which one of us would ever have thought this would happen when we were studying together [192] in Rome in the 1960s. You must have been startled when you heard the news. So was I. But we can do nothing about it and, to tell the truth, I am rather happy that an Italian has again become pope. True, the pope, as Peter, is bishop of the whole Church, but he is also bishop of Rome, in Italy. When we were studying ecclesiology, we never found out whether the pope is also bishop of Rome, or the bishop of Rome also pope. But he is bishop of Rome. And that might as well be evident in the person of the pope. I say this because, during the last few centuries, we Italians have not been any worse at discharging this function than have people of other nations. This is true even if the history of Italy during the last century has not been too glorious. (But don't worry, I will not speak much of Italy, except when speaking to Italians.) At any rate, this is the only cheerful thing in my election as pope.

Undoubtedly there have often been ambitious popes; you will admit that I am not one of them. When I look not only at the task but also at the situation in which I will have to carry out the papacy now and in the near future, I see no reason for being ambitious or for coveting such a job. There is no way to perform it as it should be performed; and in the years to come less than ever.

Peppino, during the coming months I will, of course, have no time for the luxury of writing letters. But I am thinking of Giovanni, our teacher, who said, "Don't take yourself too seriously." So get ready for a long letter from your old friend. By the way, for you I remain the old Leone, even if I am now called Paul VII, for reasons that I do not have to explain to you. Another reason for this letter is that it allows me to give some thought to how I myself view this pontificate. Before the election, as a cardinal, I never racked my brain about this. I

[1] See Karl Rahner, "Dream of the Church," in Concern for the Church: Theological Investigations 20, trans. Edward Quinn (New York: Crossroad Publishing Company; London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1981), pp. 133-42.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

let my colleagues do it. I am telling you what I think, because I expect your criticism. Peppino, for heaven's sake always be the kind of person who breaks through the haze with which people, and even cardinals, piously but stupidly surround the pope with their acclaim. It is quite possible – I am a normal man, who loves to be praised – that I will react crossly to your sober criticism. But this is your duty, as my friend and as a priest. And I will certainly not throw you out when you come to me. We may even have our meals together. Starting with John Paul II the court ceremonial became a little more human and reasonable. At the very start, as I think of my task, a few things come to mind that I want you to know. It is not a [193] program for my administration. That will come out in my first encyclical, which I will soon have to write or ask someone to write for me.

First, I will be the kind of pope that quite a number of popes have been before me. I hope not to be the worst one (which is perhaps not so very difficult). I will live and act with the conviction, which we learned and made our own as Christians and young theologians, that my office possesses the fullness of power. Vatican I remains, of course, fully valid for me. Yet I must tell you now, vested as I am with this fullness of power, that this conviction, based on faith, has become quite mysterious to me. Do you remember, when we were students, how Congar criticized the titles given to the pope? I will try to see to it that, while maintaining the dogma, there is not too much talk of the "Vicar of Christ." Christ does not need a vicar, be stays with his Church, and even with her pope, in whose very weakness he remains effective. The practical demythologization of the pope has made much progress in recent years. There is no more tiara, no more sedia gestatoria. In a private audience a visitor no longer has to make the triple genuflection, thanks be to God! Certainly there are still plenty of antiquated customs in the Vatican that may have to go. That much I may be able to bring about. It is no easy task, because so many nice, pious people simply love this traditional ceremonial. Do you remember that, as a student, I said that I would like to see a pope playing tennis in white slacks? I will probably not go that far. And I know, of course, that even a mixture of Catholic dogma and an analysis of the modern mentality will not provide us with a concrete image of how a pope ought to live and rule. So I will certainly leave many things as they have developed historically, even though it is not evident that they belong to the nature of the papacy, as many traditionalists involuntarily and unconsciously feel they do. On the other hand, I would not like to be a pope who drags along too much old-fashioned baggage from the past.

THE BUREAUCRACY MIGHT BE SIMPLIFIED

For instance, I am not at all convinced that the enormous bureaucracy that has grown in Rome during the last two centuries follows naturally from the dogma of the pope's universal primacy. If, as [194] we hope, the Holy Spirit not only helps the pope (although unfortunately, as we once learned, mostly through an assistentia per se negativa) but is at work everywhere in the Church, it cannot be necessary that every good, holy, and wise thing starting to grow in the Church should first be blessed by a Roman authority. What I mean is that the pope and his helpers should imitate God and operate with an assistentia per se negativa, that is, prevent what is wrong and not imagine that they are the only ones able to plant the seeds of new growth.

I intend to consider whether in the Roman Curia it would not be wise to employ only priests who have successfully performed normal priestly duties for fifteen years. That would eliminate some of the often-deplored arrogance and smugness that the Roman "staff officers" (read: the members of the curia) display in their dealings with the "frontline officers" (read: the bishops). Of course, I do not know yet what precisely can and should be changed in

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Rome. However, my Peppino's ideal of a pope, humble and poor like Jesus, will probably not induce me to leave the Vatican and settle in a simple house in Trastevere or in the Philippines, as Bühlmann had suggested when we were students. But the bureaucracy of the curia can certainly be simplified to a great extent, for the simple reason that a Church that is no longer the Church of Europe with a few outlying sections, but which has become a world-Church, can no longer be "ruled" in such a centralized way as before. I am the sort of person who likes to delegate responsibility and power, who does not want to know and to do everything myself. Exactly what this means, as I said before, still has to be settled.

It seems to me that a pope too has the right to be a normal human being, a struggling Christian, an individual among many others, and to show this without affectation, humbly, if you wish At one time, both of us studied the history of the popes. Peppino, how many frightful, stupid, narrow-minded, backward things have happened in that history! We say this even as we remember that this history is the inscrutable will of the eternal God and that not even the pope is God's private counselor. Of course, we will not repeat the horrors and stupidities of former times. But still should I not fear that, as pope, I may commit other stupidities, despite all my good will and honest endeavors? Human beings, and therefore popes as well, always perform their duties poorly. Otherwise we [195] would not be poor sinners, finite creatures, who painfully grope along in history's darkness.

Even if I do not impute to any of my predecessors, or at least to my immediate predecessors, a lack of humility and modesty, it seems to me that today a pope may, even publicly, make this critical self-evaluation more clearly than it used to be done. Important people in the history of both the world and the Church used to have the idea that their legitimate authority would be jeopardized, if they let their "subjects" see that they too were only human beings who committed blunders. It is only after their death that church historians were allowed to discover faults, mistakes, or backwardness in a pope. But if I am convinced that even as pope I remain a human being who will commit faults, perhaps even serious ones, why would I not be allowed to admit this even during my lifetime? Is the mentality of people who really matter not such today that authority does not suffer damage, but rather profits, when its bearer openly admits the limitations of a poor and sinful human being, and is not afraid to acknowledge them? For the time being at least, I am willing to listen to public discussions in my presence, eventually to learn from others, and to admit that I have learned.

Even as pope I would like to continue to learn. Let people notice that a pope can err, make mistakes, be poorly informed, and choose the wrong kind of assistants. All of this is evident and I believe that no recent pope has seriously doubted it. But why must such evidence remain hidden and covered up? Peter allowed Paul to confront him to his face, and I suppose that Peter acknowledged that Paul was right. Even today a pope may allow himself something of the kind. I for one, lay claim to that right and I am willing, if necessary, to let my authority suffer a loss, which it would be my duty to accept.

A MODEST PONTIFICATE AS COUNTERBALANCE

Peppino, there is something else I want to tell you. I shall not be a great pope. I do not have the wherewithal. You know that too. We have never fooled ourselves; so much the better. So I will not have an inferiority complex if I look quite modest compared with the great popes of the twentieth century. To me that seems [196] providential. I have a feeling that through their grandeur these popes had an influence in the Church that they probably never intended and that had its questionable side, an influence that I will try to offset with my more modest pontificate.

Is it not true? Have these great popes not involuntarily fostered a mentality in the Church

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that overestimates the pope's proper function, as it should be according to dogma, and as it was in most of the history of the popes? Does this mentality not imply that a pope must in all respects be the greatest one in the Church, a point of reference for all initiatives, a teacher who is superior to all thinkers and theologians, a saint and a prophet, a man who conquers all hearts with his fascinating personality, a great leader who molds his century and makes statesmen and other great personalities pale into insignificance, a pontiff, whom all bishops respectfully approach, like petty officials before their king, in order to listen obediently to his words and orders? Peppino, I will not become such a pope and I do not consider it necessary at all. The pope has a task in the Church that is strictly limited, despite the universal jurisdiction and the fullness of teaching authority mentioned by the First Vatican council. I will exercise this fullness of power, but within the limits imposed on me by the limitations of my own nature. That, and nothing more. I will not be the holiest one in the Church. Before God I am less than the saints who live today in the Church, those who pray in silence, those who are mystically enraptured, those who perish for their faith in the prisons of the enemies of Christ and the Church, those who love unselfishly, as Teresa of Calcutta did, all the unknown and unrewarded heroes of everyday duty and abnegation. Nobody can deny that even an Innocent III pales before Francis of Assisi, and that the popes named Pius of the last two centuries are less important than a Curé d'Ars or a St. Thérèse of Lisieux. You may say, of course, that I am comparing realities that cannot be compared. However, in the life of the Church and before God's eternal tribunal, saints and great theologians, like a Thomas Aquinas or a John Henry Newman, are more important than most popes, and especially more important than I will ever be.

There are many charisms in the Church, and the pope does not have all of them himself. If it is true that we can really understand only our own charisms, even a pope must tell himself that he cannot evaluate everything that develops in the Church, and that God [197] alone, and not the pope, stands where all that is good and holy in the Church merges into a perfect symphony.

That is why no harm will be done if my pontificate corrects, to some extent, the mentality of those pious Christians who wrongly expect from the popes what they can receive only from saints and great minds in the Church and possibly from themselves. Are there Christians, and perhaps popes, who remember that when they pray the Our Father with impatient hope for the coming of God's eternal kingdom they are praying also for the end of the papacy? An insignificant pope too may be providential.

However, I confess that I feel responsible for real progress in ecumenism, and I fear God's judgment if I were not to do absolutely everything in my power to promote it. During the past century all sides have been asserting that the churches have no right simply to go on as they have since the separation of East and West and the Reformation. We can say that, during the last fifty years and especially since the Second Vatican Council, a great deal has happened in the ecumenical domain. I am quite willing to admit that some people have done excellent work. But we may also say that we have not made real progress. The great churches are still disunited, and the rapprochement that has been growing between them does not change that fact. I wonder desperately whether this must go on.

Of course, the unity to which all Christians are obliged does not depend only on Rome. But I wonder whether we might not do more, even though we have been convinced up to now that we have done everything possible. I do not know how to proceed from here; I really do not see it. But I will honestly say that I do not see it, and I will ask others where they see new possibilities of making progress. I am determined to have the courage of ecumenical probabilism. In other words, I feel obliged in this question to try all measures and steps that are proposed to me, where no clear veto of my faith or conscience speaks against such measures and steps. In this question we must push to the utmost limit of what is theologically

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possible, we must adopt the tutiorism of boldness. Why, for instance, should we ask more for unity in faith than we, in fact, require today from people within the Roman Catholic Church? Why should the Christian churches, with their long histories, not be allowed to go on existing as partner churches and particular rites within the one Church? Why should I not be allowed to declare expressly that neither I nor future popes will proclaim an ex cathedra [198] decision except when we are in clear and obvious agreement with the body of bishops of the whole Church, to which the other churches too will belong as permanent partner churches?

Did Pius IX and Pius XI not act in this way when proclaiming such decisions? Why could we not expressly consider such a procedure a valid norm? Would it not be possible to assure the leaders of the churches of the Reformation, expressly and solemnly, that in the one Church these churches will enjoy at least as much autonomy and historical continuity as Rome grants to the partner churches of the East? It simply has to be possible to make progress in the ecumenical question. If I admit that all persons are of good will, have honest motives, and are open to the Holy Spirit, I can simply not believe that, as some would say, "for the time being, unfortunately, nothing can be done."

INTELLIGENT EXPERTS INSTEAD OF SOLEMN DIGNITARIES

During the first years of my pontificate, I will advance very slowly, I intentionally so, because I am convinced that it is impossible to devise a program for the Church's history and life in the crucible of abstract theology and without the help of secular futurology. In the era into which we are clearly entering the Church will have to do more ecclesial futurology and programming of her future than she has done up to now. I will not convoke an ecumenical council, and it is for me still an open question whether the synods of bishops in Rome are the best way to achieve what I have in mind I would prefer to call together a group of intelligent theologians, sociologists, futurologists, and historians. Such a group would exhibit real competence, courage, and a certain amount of creative imagination, and would try to formulate how the Church should proceed, insofar as it is possible to plan such things. We have to develop a strategic pastoral plan for the world-Church. Nothing of the kind exists as yet.

Today in the secular world, in society at large, history is not constructed step by step in some improvised way. Rather, history is planned ahead of time. Well, the Church too should do something of the kind. Especially now that she has become a world-Church and is no longer the self-confident Western Church, [199] exporting missionaries all over the world with the help of European colonialism.

As yet I do not see clearly what I have in mind. Today, humankind is clearly interdependent in all its parts, economies, and cultures, such as has never existed before. In order not to perish, humankind has had to come to a self-awareness that was impossible in earlier times. Thus it actively assumes, in a wholly new way, the conscious responsibility of its own future. The world-Church faces a similar new situation. My new group of experts in pastoral strategy should tell me and the Roman congregations exactly what this new situation is.

The canon law of the universal Church cannot remain in the twenty-first century what it was in the 1980s. In a world of enlightened rationality, of technical civilization, of a global interdependence of all cultural powers, the preaching of the one and forever valid Gospel message cannot proceed as it did in the beginning of the twentieth century. Then we had the Church's antimodernism, her reactionary distrust of all profound social and economic change. We must change our methods, and we must do it consciously and intentionally. We must ask ourselves in a new and explicit way how the Church's responsibility for peace and justice is to be carried out in ways and forms that we do not even suspect, that perhaps we even oppose. Liturgy throughout the world must not forever be the Roman liturgy translated into the vernacular. Is the valid hierarchical structure of the Church wholly reconciled with all the social changes that have been introduced, or at least planned, and that also have a right to exist in the Church of the future?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Undoubtedly the Christian message will remain what it has always been: that God gives himself in grace and in life eternal, that this and nothing else is the end of all evolution, and that it has been definitively and irrevocably promised to us in Jesus, who died on the cross and rose from the dead.

But this message must also be expressed in wholly other ways; it must be seen from wholly other points of view and in wholly other contexts than those we learned long ago at the Gregorian University in Rome. And the old message may grow in itself, not only in the way we express it. What else would really be the meaning of the Gospel's word that the Holy Spirit will slowly introduce us into all truth? This "progress" cannot be brought about by the pope or [200] by the Congregation of the Faith. What we can do here in Rome is to encourage others to work for it and to respect courageous efforts, even though they are not always the final word in wisdom or orthodoxy. Despite all the pluralism in theology that cannot be abolished today, it is still possible to see where the true substance of Christianity is being impaired by foolish or brash theologians and then have the courage to stop them. For theologians are not the highest court in the Church.

I would like to write an encyclical showing that we can express the fundamental truths of Jesus' message in a way that differs from the one we are used to because we learned it in school. Will I ever be able to do it? I doubt it, because such an encyclical will not speak of relatively secondary points in the "hierarchy of truths," which is rather easy to do. I will have to say, against every form of atheism, that the living God exists (and we ought to understand atheism if we wish to overcome it), that God has come among us in this world and in this history (although the reality that is distinct from God is billions of years old), and that the experience of death is not the ultimate experience.

Of course, one who teaches what is highest and most important may be somewhat behind the times with regard to what is less important (otherwise the eternal kingdom of truth and love would already be here). But that must not mean that the Church (as in the centuries since the Enlightenment) should always be afflicted with a certain old-fashioned clerical futility. I am afraid that there are people in Rome (and naturally elsewhere as well) who try to justify this stance with profound ideological reasons such as "the folly of the cross," or "Christianity can never be fashionable," and try to push Rome's activity in that direction. That was also Lefebvre's idea some time ago.

THREE FACTS MUST BE KEPT IN MIND

My good and faithful Peppino, I want to tell you something. I hope that during my pontificate I will not forget three things (in addition to many others naturally). First, for two million years, human beings had to seek and were able to find the eternal God without a papacy. That is a truism, for the papacy is conceivable only at "the end of time" after Jesus Christ. But that truism deserves to be kept [201] in mind especially by a pope. Strictly speaking, the old ways of finding God have not been abolished by the papacy. They have only been strengthened and radicalized. Theologians should give more thought to the question of how a headhunter in the Stone Age, who pierced the head of the foe he had killed, might have anything to do with God, with eternal life – and this in Jesus Christ, without passing him by. Theologians should not take the easy way out by referring to the Second Vatican Council, which on this question

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

speaks of "ways known only to God." Ultimately I too am saved in ways known only to God, yet I must try to understand them. And people today can accept that only in Jesus Christ will they find their salvation, if they can understand, to some extent, how this possibility also existed for those who lived before Christ.

The second thing I would like not to forget is that there are still today countless persons for whom the papacy does not exist, and whose consciences are often challenged in life and death-threatening ways: The billions of Chinese, the people who live in societies where atheism is the state religion, the hundreds of millions of Muslims, the millions of baptized Christians who acknowledge Jesus Christ as their Lord and Messiah and yet do not want to have anything to do with the pope, the other people whom we usually call "pagans," the many Catholics who, in fact if not expressly, feel nothing for the papacy. Yet even in this final phase of salvation history, in which there is a papacy, I have a right and a duty to hope, and even in my way of acting to presume, that all these people find the God of Jesus Christ, in whom everything moves and has its being, and reach God as their eternal destiny.

If this is true, the papacy, although objectively binding, is not the highest or most fundamental truth in the hierarchy of truths. It is a reality and a truth that can be reached by inference only by those who have already found God in Jesus Christ. It is also possible that countless persons who find God and Jesus Christ are unable to make this inference, without any fault of their own. They may even be convinced that the papacy cannot be inferred from their basic faith or that they are forbidden to make such an inference. How modest, how prudent, how mild a pope should be before this world, for which the papacy is either unknown or, at most, a strange happening in history.

A third point must influence my way of acting as a pope in the world. The pope has to be a witness to the basic truth of salvation [202] that concerns all human beings. But, as he preaches the Gospel, he must not give the impression of believing that he can solve all the problems people meet in their private or public lives. I cannot tell any man what woman he should marry, although for him this is an important matter for time and eternity. During our studies in the sixties, we both noticed how many questions of capital importance the sociology of the Church could not clearly answer, but had to leave to secular intelligence and to history's experiments. Although these issues are of great interest to many people, there are thousands and thousands of questions in the human and natural sciences for which the Church has no answer. I do not have the slightest doubt that the Christian message about God and eternal life in Jesus Christ, when properly conveyed and really accepted, has a strong and creative importance for our life on earth, for both individuals and society, with regard to the problems that ultimately they have to solve by themselves. But that adds nothing to the fact that, like everyone else, a pope, when his message about eternity concerns concrete human problems, must entrust the world to God, to God's inscrutable grace and the historical freedom of human beings. The pope has no prescriptions that must be followed as exactly as possible so that nothing but peace and happiness may reign in the world.

Despite its great importance for the Church and the world, the papacy is only one factor in the strife and harmony of a world that God alone grasps and directs. These things are evident, of course, and it is to be hoped that no pope has ever doubted them. But I will do my utmost never, in my conduct or in my words, to produce the slightest impression that I have forgotten these obvious truths. I will speak gently and modestly. When presenting to people the truths of the Gospel that are so important for their everyday lives, I will always, in a true dialogue, ask them how these truths can be translated into the reality of their lives, something that I cannot clearly know from the start.

THE CHRISTIAN MESSAGE AND SECULAR KNOWLEDGE COMPLETE EACH

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The truth of Christianity is not subject to the secular self-understanding of human beings or of their sciences. Yet, if we [203] really wish to understand this Christian truth, we need an ongoing dialogue between those who announce the Christian message and those who voice the secular self-understanding. God has not willed that this double knowledge fully exist in a unified way in a single human being, not even in a pope. Undoubtedly the pope must lay claim to the teaching authority that Christ and the Church have given him; he must speak like one who has power and not like the scribes; but he must always also convey his message in open dialogue.

I will try to speak and to be silent in such a way that my words and my silence may reach the immense multitude of those who cannot yet acknowledge the papacy as a reality of their faith. I will speak and be silent, aware that the true message can reach its fulness only through dialogue, when it has been accepted by human self-understanding in a synthesis that ultimately God alone, and not the pope, brings about. I believe that this is the real reason why the full doctrinal authority of the pope must shun any kind of triumphalism.

Peppino, with all these reservations, I believe in the papacy and I accept it as my task, according to the teaching of the holy Catholic faith. What then is the true nature of the papacy, as it operates in word and sacrament for the whole Church? We live in the endtimes, even if that end lasts a very long time. Who knows how long it will last, since human beings now have the power of committing collective suicide? “The end of times has already come and the renewal of the world has already and irrevocably begun” – words of the Second Vatican Council that theologians do not ponder sufficiently.

The true and happy outcome of world history is irrevocable. It consists in the communication of the absolute God to his creatures. By dying on the cross and rising from the dead Jesus has made it irrevocable. That is the reason for the papacy; to this it is the basic and definitive witness, from this it derives its task and its fulness of power. Because this message can never die, because this message is one that can never be surpassed, this message about the end of time is also the promise that the gates of death will not prevail against the papacy during this endtime until the Lord comes, who will also put an end to the papacy.

The message and the messenger will always be with us. That is why it is ultimately a secondary question how many people acknowledge as legitimate the messenger who, at all events, brings a [204] message announcing the salvation even of those who believe that they are not allowed to acknowledge the messenger! That is why, to my mind, the question of the visible success or failure of the papacy during my pontificate should not bother me too much. My pontificate will not be very glorious. I do not have what it takes, and God is not obliged always and in every instance to make up for the shortcomings of those who convey his eternal message hesitantly and inadequately, but truly.

Peppino, I believe that what the fourteenth chapter of Matthew says about Peter is as important for the papacy and for me as the scripture texts that are usually quoted. I am a Peter who tries to reach the Lord by walking on water, who always fears that he will drown, whom Jesus time and again takes by the hand and brings into the boat that really reaches the shores of eternity.

Dear Peppino, I wish to bring up something else, even if I cannot finish my letter today. If that is impossible, I’ll go on tomorrow. Listen: My head is as empty as it used to be when we faced our examiners at the Gregorian. I must admit that I really do not know more about what a pope is now than I knew then, when we studied the doctrine of the papacy in ecclesiology. Of course, I also know what I have learned from experience during the past few decades, although this experience itself is for me a problem that I find difficult to solve. I am discovering in myself what the Second Vatican Council says about the pope, that he receives

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

no new revelations. Although this is very much the case with me, I hope for God's help. But because this help is very unobtrusive it is very difficult to distinguish it from human considerations and impulses. So, I do not know more about the papacy than you do. But I know that the doctrine of the papacy, like all other truths of our faith, is surrounded by all the obscurities that, despite the greatest possible conceptual precision, lead into the mystery of God. I know that the doctrine of the papacy is valid throughout all time, like all the other truths of our faith, although we express them with concepts and images that are somehow – in different ways, of course – historically conditioned. I know that all these statements about our faith, including those on the papacy, stand in history and are therefore mixed with "accretions" (as we used to call them) which do not belong to what has been revealed. These accretions are recognized as such only in the course of time and are then removed. Then, the truth that is meant and asserted is stated once more under other historically [205] conditioned concepts and images, but we are not yet aware that they too are conditioned.

Do you remember how years ago we used to speculate about transubstantiation, as defined by Trent, and how we wondered, without doubting what was meant, what we might mean today by substance, since we do not even know whether atoms and subatomic particles can be considered individual substances in the way in which the Fathers of Trent conceived of the substance of bread and wine. I do not have to insist on this or to bring up examples of other dogmas in which it is clear how an eternal truth of the faith is stated with concepts and images whose problematic and questionable nature is noticed only much later. You know enough examples of this kind, and even then we said that it is impossible to avoid the difficulty as easily as Pius XII thought, by claiming that in such dogmatic statements we have to do with concepts whose meaning and validity are evident to every mind at all times.

And now, Peppino, I suddenly wonder, much more intensively than I used to, what consequences the above-mentioned evident facts have when we apply them to the doctrine of the papacy and the pope's universal primacy of jurisdiction. That primacy exists; I am convinced of it. But what exactly does it mean? The Church's doctrine speaks of a plena potestas. But what does that mean and what does it not mean? I believe that there never was a pope who did not know that his power had limits. That is clear. The pope cannot create an eighth sacrament. He cannot make the Letters of Ignatius part of the canon or remove an epistle from the canon that some people consider "insipid." I cannot command you, Peppino, to become a Carthusian, or tell them to admit an old fellow like you. The pope's fullness of power is undoubtedly limited. True, I do not doubt that eventually I would have the competence of the competence (I do not have to explain to you what this is). But if this full primacy of jurisdiction has its limits, imposed by both divine and human law, and, what is more, if the pope may be forbidden, for moral reasons, to do something which we cannot prove lies outside his juridical competence, where then are the precise limits of this full primacy of jurisdiction? It would, for instance, be impossible for me to impose upon the Eastern Uniate churches the procedure for appointing bishops that has become customary in the Latin Church. It would be impossible for me to prescribe Latin as the language for the Eastern Church, somewhat [206] as Muslims have made Arabic the language for the recitation of the Quran all over the world. I cannot at my whim impose upon a religious order, which grows through the free decisions of its members, every conceivable (maybe even reasonable) rule of life, which these members never envisaged when they joined it. I cannot transform the Jesuit order – whether I like it or not – into an order of discalced priests.

All these things are evident. As a rule they are respected in church history for the simple reason that the opposite would simply be impossible to carry out. But this does not mean that, in concrete instances, a pope does not, in good faith, transgress the limits of his fulness of power.

That is why I would like to hear more precisely from canonists where these limits are, not only in general but also in particular. Such limits exist, as I said, in the governing as well as in the teaching authority of the pope, limits that may in fact be transgressed. Was the Church allowed and obliged to give up all claims to the Papal States only under Pius XI? Did the wise Leo XIII not assign to Thomas Aquinas, whom both of us love so much, a position and a function in Catholic theology that an individual theologian simply cannot have? Have we not, by appealing to papal primacy, tried to force on the Eastern Church norms that, speaking plainly and honestly, belong among such transgressions? You can probably think of other instances. I intend not to commit such transgressions. I intend to see clearly, insofar as this is possible, where the limits are that I may not transgress. And that is why I would like professors of dogma and canonists to examine this question more accurately than they have done up to now. I will not cut them short at once if they do so loudly and become guilty of infringing their own limits.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Something else worries me on this topic, even if I may tell myself (thanks be to God) that during my pontificate, which will be very short, these difficulties will not become much more serious than they are now. The concepts describing the duties of a pope in governing the Church derive from our own culture and history. That is why we may suspect that, unknown to us, they are mixed with certain accretions that do not really belong to the revealed truth itself, although we are unable to separate them from it. It is obvious that such a fact has practical consequences. What happens when doctrine (with the praxis made lawful by it) has to be transferred, "inculturated," into other cultures? Such cultures exist, of course, [207] and they have equal rights in the Church as a world-Church. But their way of thinking, of feeling, and of living is quite different from ours in the West. Although the West long ago ceased to dominate the world, it has not readily given up the dominance it still enjoyed in the Church during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. I often think of this problem, although it cannot be solved during my pontificate.

There are other questions too that worry me and that I cannot evade during my pontificate. What I have written to you undoubtedly shows that I must be very prudent, very tactful, when I have to use my authority in doctrine and government. Such prudence and discretion do not mean, of course, that I might not act or make decisions. I must have the courage to act, even if my action entails the risk of initiating developments whose final outcome cannot be foreseen or of eventually slowing down developments that will gain acceptance in the future. That belongs to the burden of history which even a pope cannot shake off. Does it surprise you then when I tell you that, for all these reasons, I wonder already whether or not I should remain pope until I die. I am allowed to resign, if I realize that this would be more useful to the Church and if I am willing to do so. But might it not happen that I live to an age when I am no longer able to understand this, and when, in spite of my senility, nobody can depose me? A frightening thought! Or maybe, in the final analysis, a comforting thought, because it shows that, even in the Church, God's gracious Providence does not accomplish everything through the activity of a wise and strong pope. We will see.

It is time to stop. I have come to the end of my sheet and of my time. And yet I have not told you most of what I wanted to write to you, my old friend. What I have written is very imperfect and problematic. And I would not like (I am joking) to submit this letter to the Holy Office. Burn it when you have read it. Drop in soon. Friuli is not that far from Rome. Patet porta et cor magis. I hug you.

Your old friend Leone, who is now called Paul VII.

P.S. Our old friend Rosa recently died. Both of us have become the poorer for it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[208]

19

UNDERSTANDING THE PRIESTLY OFFICE

Many years ago I published a short essay on preliminary questions concerning an ecumenical understanding of the priestly office.[1] I do not have the impression that my paper has attracted much attention. I suspect that Protestant ecumenists feel that in this essay I stated the obvious, as I painstakingly tried to make plausible something that for them is absolutely evident. I suspect that there are some Catholic ecumenists who agree at least with the basic thrust of my paper. They share my conviction that the opinion, traditional among Catholics, of the invalidity of orders in the Protestant churches (at least, as a rule) and of what this implies for the validity of the Lord's Supper and the words of absolution is not above all doubt. But generally speaking, and especially in the statements of the official Church, my work has been courteously ignored. Moreover, they speak as if the ancient denial of the sacramental validity of orders outside of the Catholic and Orthodox churches would, in the future too, remain a point that brooked no discussion. I cannot, in the pages that follow, tackle this problem again as a whole in all its details. So this is an outline of the considerations that belong to this group of questions.

[209]

THE SACRAMENTS AS SIGNIFYING AND AS EFFECTIVE

Our traditional Catholic position on the ecumenical problem of the priestly office derives almost naturally and tacitly from a conception of the activity of the sacraments that I consider too narrow and that, nevertheless, implies consequences for the problem of the priestly office.

Our conception of sacramental powers (the power of celebrating the Eucharist, of confirming, of forgiving sins in the sacrament of reconciliation, of anointing the sick, and of ordaining priests) presupposes (if we use a traditional scholastic term) a rather narrow efficient causality of the sacraments. This conception forgets the well-known axiom that the sacraments are efficient causes of grace insofar as and because they signify this grace. If the priest who performs the sacraments brings about the sacramental grace in the way in which we usually think of efficient causality, it is evident that he does not, by himself possess the power of exerting such a causality. He must receive it from elsewhere.

Now the way in which such a power is passed on is a very special one, without which the imparting of such a grace and other sacramental operations (transubstantiation and so on) are simply not possible. According to this conception of sacramentality, the fact that sacraments are signs has no decisive influence on our way of understanding their effectiveness, that is, sacramental causality. It is merely an additional statement that is added to the statement that they are efficient causes of grace. Strictly speaking, in the traditional doctrine of the sacraments, we should say: Sacramenta significant gratiam et efficiunt (the sacraments signify grace and bring it about), but not: Sacramenta significando efficiunt gratiam (the sacraments bring about grace by signifying it). Only the second proposition would state the deepest understanding of the Catholic doctrine of the sacraments. That understanding is contained in it, yet the usual totally objectifying explanations tend to obscure it.

If we want to see what might follow from this for the question of priestly office, we must

[1] See "Pseudo-Problems in Ecumenical Discussion," in Theological Investigations 18, trans. Edward Quinn (New York: Crossroad; London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1983), pp. 35-53.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

show just what the sacraments "signify," that is, ritually make manifest in space and time within the Church's social dimension. It would be erroneous and would dim the nature of the Christian eschatological expectation of salvation, if we were to think that the sacraments simply and in isolation signify only the grace that is here and now imparted to the individual [210] recipient of the sacraments. If this were so, the sacraments would signify only that which they still have to produce. But prior to this and beyond this they are the manifestation, in space and time, of the grace that has its origin in Christ, which has irrevocably and victoriously been introduced into the world.

Because of this eschatological irrevocability, this grace presents itself through its becoming-manifest concretely ex opere operato, to individuals and to their freedom, and is (normally) accepted by them. Of their very nature the sacraments are the becoming-manifest of God's grace in Christ, which has become eschatologically irrevocable.

If we were to substantiate this statement in more detail, we would have to describe the very special nature of the possibilities of salvation originating from Christ. We would have to describe the nature of the Church as eschatological sign, the sacramentum salutis mundi (the sacrament of the world's salvation). We would have to explain that only through the eschatologically sacramental nature of the Church can we really explain (without using magic) the true meaning of the fact that the sacraments work ex opere operato. Today we know from biblical theology and the history of dogma that the sacraments cannot, with historical plausibility, simply be traced back to words by which Christ would have instituted them. Yet, in all truth, they must derive from him. So we would have to show that the real sacramentality of the sacraments and their provenance from Christ can be rendered intelligible only if they are conceived as basic activities of the Church that derive from Christ and is the real fundamental sacrament of the world's salvation. This fundamental sacrament is the permanent historical tangibility of God's self-promise to the world in Christ. The sacraments are the innermost activities of the Church, in which she actualizes her own nature in individuals. We would have to show that this is the only way of settling the tiresome old dispute about the number of sacraments.

The reality of the Church, as an indissoluble unity of truth and grace, on the one hand, and of historical tangibility, on the other, underlies the activities of the sacraments. It confers upon them their nature and their effectiveness. It is this ecclesial reality that the sacraments originally "signify": significant ecclesiam ut sacramentum salutis mundi (they signify the Church as the sacrament of the world's salvation). What the sacraments signify first and foremost [211] is not what they bring forth, but that which brings them forth and which they are enabled to signify because they are brought forth by it, that is, by the Church.

HOW THE CHURCH BECOMES MANIFEST AS BASIC SACRAMENT

If we may presuppose what has been mentioned briefly, that sacramental operations refer to the historically and socially tangible manifestation of grace and salvation that bestows on them their reality and power, the question comes up precisely how we are to conceive of this disclosure in space and time of the sacramentum mundi. The question comes up whether such signifying disclosures of the manifestation of the one sacramentum mundi at a certain place and time may not be considered to have many degrees. They might be called sacraments only under certain presuppositions. We may not deny that other activities in which the sacrament of the world becomes manifest also have a positive Christian significance and power. Some of these activities are: praying together in the name of Jesus and the religious rites that we Catholics call sacramentals. Actually, sacramentals exist under other names, with other theological interpretations, everywhere in the Christian churches. There are undoubtedly,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

over and above the signs of salvation offered by the Church that we call "sacraments," other signs that, for whatever reason, are not and should not be called "sacraments," although they are genuine attestations of the fundamental sacrament of salvation called Church, and they share therefore the effectiveness of that fundamental sacrament and its properly sacramental testimony.

Such social-historical and ritual references to the fundamental sacrament that is the Church, whence they derive their meaning and power, may be classified in quite different ways. For instance, they could be classified according to their content, according to their user, and so on. Such references should be considered legitimate. They constitute the historical becoming-manifest of the fundamental sacrament when their content refers to it in the right way, when they appeal to it, and when they are performed with Christian faith. More cannot be required for the legitimacy of such references.

[212] What makes these signs into legitimate references is not that they constitute that to which they refer. It is rather the fact that what they refer to already exists: the Church as sacramentum salutis mundi and God's salvific will, by which God has already offered himself to every human being. Moreover, we must presume, unless the opposite is proven, that those who use this sign have the right disposition. This presumption is sufficient for the validity of such a reference, since, where the Church uses signs that are undoubtedly valid, such a presumption about the presence of an "intention" is presupposed and considered sufficient. In this connection it is also clear that the legitimacy of such a reference does not require a priori that these signs be used expressly within the juridical sphere of the Roman Catholic Church. If this were so, the Church would be unable to admit the validity of baptisms conferred by heretics.

Of course, it might be objected that for every sacrament, except baptism, the very nature of the sacrament may suppose conditions for its validity that are not present when the one who performs the rite has not received Roman Catholic ordination

However, even then this ritual action refers to the objective and permanent fundamental sacramentum salutis mundi. It is performed in Christian faith, with a holy intention, in a church, in a religious environment, in which the good faith of those who perform it must be taken for granted. Where then would be the distinction between a sacrament that is valid for traditional Catholic theology and such a rite outside the normal Catholic sacramental order? It seems that it would consist in this: In the first case, we have to do with a "normal" sacramental signifying action. In the second case, we have to do with a sign that stands outside this normal order, with the result that it cannot be called a valid sacrament. This supposes, of course, that we have adopted a terminology that calls such a sign a "sacrament" only when it is used in the "normal" Catholic sacramental order. But is this the possible terminology? And even if we say that it is, must we then claim that a ritual referring to the universal sacrament of salvation, a ritual performed in faith outside the "normal" order, has no effectiveness? Would the normal sacramental order in such a case not stand above God, although God is above this order and cannot be subject to it, when the fact that it is not observed implies no fault in those who perform the action, and when in a concrete situation it is impossible to observe the "normal" order?

[213] There exist certain important subjective events inspired by grace (for instance, the implicit "baptism of desire") among persons who have never had any contact with explicit Christianity. These events cannot be called "sacraments," although they bring about or deepen justification. But does this certainly and clearly show that we must call every ritual action invalid if it is performed by somebody who is not, according to Catholic norms, validly ordained (although according to these norms ordination is normally required for validity). All sacramental signs, including the usual ones, hold their efficacy from a previous, ever present, eschatological salvific situation called Church. And this situation is witnessed to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(in ritual words) even where this is not done and cannot be done in the usual way that the Roman Catholic Church imposes. Is the Roman Catholic Church's right to impose norms for the validity of the sacramental signs so apodictic that it excludes even the possibility of exceptions?

These are questions for which I wanted to suggest a few viewpoints. There are only questions, without any clear answer. Our whole discussion presupposed, without mentioning it, something that Protestant theologians do not admit, namely, that the question of the validity of orders is asked here from a Catholic point of view, that the Catholic administration of the sacraments is therefore presupposed as the norm. It is with this presupposition in mind that we have asked whether the non-Catholic administration of the sacraments (the Lord's Supper and so on) may be considered valid even when it does not comply with the usual Catholic norms for celebrating the sacraments. Naturally, Protestant theologians will immediately reject this presupposition of our considerations. They will refuse to confront the ritual ceremonies of their Church with the question of their validity according to the Roman norms. Yet even such theologians might be interested in the question whether even the Catholic doctrine of sacraments might not eventually admit (even for cases other than baptism) the validity of Protestant orders and their exercise in a more comprehensive way than is usually the case in traditional Catholic theology and preaching.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[214]

20

BOOK OF GOD – BOOK OF HUMAN BEINGS

In our innermost being there exists an uncanny awareness of our creaturely finitude, whether or not we admit this awareness or whether it has reached the surface of our consciousness. And just as in nature where the groundwater is fed by rain coming from above, so the hidden ground-knowledge of our creatureliness is fed ever anew by the experiences of humanity in its history and through its sciences. To this basic knowledge belong the mysterious experience we all have of being afloat in a world that is billions of light years old, and the experience therefore of the frightening relativity and insignificance of all that individuals, as well as humankind in its totality, do and experience in their concrete life situations, in the short history allotted to them within the enormous timespan of the universe.

HUMANKIND IN THE UNIVERSE

When we think of ourselves in relation to the universe, we seem like puny ants hauling a small pine needle a few inches at a time and considering this an important achievement without realizing how insignificant their laborious efforts are on the earth as a whole, which is itself only a tiny mote of a universe that extends over billions of light years and continues to expand in an enormous burst of energy. Viewed from this creaturely experience of our unimportance, whatever we do or undergo, whatever we consider as [215] happiness or fear as misfortune, all vanish into insignificance. Considered from a cosmic point of view, the most horrible thing that we might fear for all of humankind would be like a bit of friction in the enormous machinery of the universe. This might lead us to think that the whole history of humanity is basically nothing but a small, forlorn anthill in a universe that, among countless other things, has brought forth, incidentally as it were and quite indifferently, this three million years of human history to let it, after a brief time, wither away and die.

Yet the reality of the universe is in fact totally different from what this experience of our nothingness and forlornness in a cosmos ruthlessly going its way tries to make us believe. First, because this enormous power and energy that posits the cosmos in its reality and keeps unfolding it into an endlessly growing diversity is the most simple, most radical unity. This unity does not itself expand with the cosmos and thus disintegrate with it into multiplicity, but as one and as a whole, it is everywhere totally present at every point of the cosmos. This primordial power, which as an undivided totality subsists omnipotently everywhere at ever point, we call God.

However, this God, who in his entirety and omnipotence is present everywhere – even in the fir needle that the tiny ant is dragging along – has, in his power and overflowing love, freely decided to communicate himself, to insinuate himself entirely into this universe at a few seemingly forlorn points in it. Indeed, God has let this whole universe, in its apparently immeasurable and enormous size, come into being only so that the stage might be set for the occurrence of that divine self-communication to what is not divine, a self-communication that does not divide or scatter God, but bestows him entirely on the universe.

The points at which the universe is not only borne by God's undergirding power, but at which God is received in his unity and totality, are called human persons. To make possible this inconceivable marvel of divine, self-lavishing love, human beings must have already received from God an infinite openness and receptivity for God. The clearest sign of the fact that such an unlimited openness and receptivity constitutes human nature consists in the fact that human beings can objectively represent themselves to themselves, as well as all parts of their cosmic environment and the universe as a whole. It consists in the fact that in the tiny part of the universe inhabited by humans the whole universe finds a place, that in [216] their consciousness human persons are always at once parts of the universe and parts that know about the whole – they are "ants" in which the whole universe is enacted. Persons with this infinite capacity can and should accept and experience God in his infinity, incomprehensibility, and freedom; they should accept and experience God as such and possess him as the absolute future beyond which extend no more possibilities.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Are there still other places in the cosmos in which, individually, the cosmos as a whole is aware of itself and which also receive God's own infinity? We do not know. But we might in connection with our question think, parenthetically, of the angels. We do not have to think of them as realities that exist absolutely and from the start beyond a material cosmos. If we admit that they too have a relationship, albeit a more comprehensive one, to the material cosmos, then our question, whether on other planets there also exist personal spiritual beings who receive God's grace, would already have been anticipated. Or, at least, it would lose a special actuality and importance. Really, the cosmos, which at first sight frightens us so badly, crushing us into insignificance, helps us to realize the importance, the uniqueness, and the definitiveness of humankind and of human history, as Christian anthropology has always held.

MEETING OF GOD AND WORLD

We must now make clear that the event in which through humankind the cosmos is aware of itself and its origin itself has a history. This history is an ultimate ongoing unity in a multiplicity of single events, in which humanity gradually reaches self-awareness and the free self-communication of God. Ultimately, the whole cultural and religious history of humanity is identical with this history, in which humanity increasingly becomes aware of itself and of the fact that it is called to God's immediacy. This is not the place to discover more precisely how the enduring fundamental structure of this history stands in relation to the real changes and significant breaks that occur in it.

It may be quite difficult to make out whether and how this history of humanity is the history of an ascent and a progress toward higher perfection in the most diverse dimensions of being human. But Christian faith is convinced that, in the history of humankind, [217] there have been decisive breaks and periods that subdivide this whole history and direct it toward something definitive. If there were not, Christianity would not speak of the Old and the New Testament, of a covenant of God with Israel, of the new and eternal covenant of God with humanity in Christ.

From this basic perspective of the history of the cosmos and of humankind we Christians may say: The new and definitive stage of the history of the cosmos and of humanity consists in this, that at least in humanity (although maybe elsewhere too) the world has come to itself and to the conviction that its real end is its immediacy to its ultimate origin. And this is so, not only as a possibility presented to human freedom but also as a reality already existing for the future through the victorious power of God. In other words, although the history of the cosmos is always a history of freedom, this history has already entered a stage in which the arrival of the world near God, or the arrival in the world of God in his innermost reality, is already and irrevocably a fact. We might mention here that this was expressly asserted by the Second Vatican Council.

This meeting of God and world, which can no longer be nullified, is not only an event in the ultimate depths of created free subjects, it has also become manifest in collective history

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and, precisely in this way, has itself become irrevocable. This event of an historically borne, definitive unity of God (who freely communicates himself) and humanity (who freely accepts this communication) is called Jesus Christ, who died on the cross and rose from the dead. In Jesus Christ the dialogue between God and creature has reached an ultimate agreement that cannot be revoked. Because this Jesus is the unity between God's pledge and the acceptance of this pledge in faith, because Jesus always acts in an unbroken (by him) solidarity with individuals and with all humanity, this event of the indissoluble unity of God and world in Jesus is also a pledge of salvation for the whole of humanity.

In Jesus the irrevocable self-promise of God to the world, as the creative origin and ground of the cosmos and as its end that can really be reached in itself, has become a definitive event. It can no longer disappear from the world and its history. Thus in its eschatological irrevocability, it remains present in the indestructible community of those who believe: the Church. The Church is not just some kind of institution for the promotion of individual religiosity and virtuous living. She is first and last, in her faith, the [218] sacramental presence of God's self-promise to the world, a promise that, from God's side, is forever victorious.

HOLY SCRIPTURE AS CONSTITUTIVE OF THE PRIMITIVE COMMUNITY

Now we can finally arrive at an understanding of what we call Holy Scripture. This historical and irrevocable presence of the eschatological and irreversible salvific will of God has its origin in Jesus Christ and the primitive community around him. The historically continuing existence of this community of faith, as the presence of God's victorious salvation, is essentially related to the unique and unrepeatable event of the God-man and of the primitive community. Both of them remain forever the norm.

However, this does not mean that it was a particular religious phenomenon in the history of humanity, beside which other equally important phenomena and objectifications might exist. For Jesus and his original community are the event and the attestation of humanity's arrival near the infinite God, an arrival that is not merely a possibility but a reality. When we consider where humanity arrives, such an arrival has, of its very nature, no equivalent. And the historical attestation by Jesus Christ of this "having-arrived" has in fact, before him or next to him, no equivalent and it can have none after him, because beyond it nothing more can be said.

The primitive community given with Jesus, as the eschatological self-promise of God, must necessarily be constituted in the way in which such a community unavoidably had to have been constituted in its then cultural situation, and as it still has to be constituted, if it is to be the norm and the permanent standard for the faith community that continually renews itself generation after generation, as the sacramental salvific presence of God. This means concretely: One of the constitutive elements of this primitive community is a book. We say this without prejudging a further precision required by this statement, as will be shown later on.

In the cultural situation of humanity at that time, which had already reached the stage of writing and of putting together something like a book, a faith-community with a shared faith-consciousness is not conceivable except with the help of a book that has set down what is being believed and hoped. That book is [219] a medium through which individuals communicate in their faith-consciousness, enabling them to constitute a unity. It is the medium of language and, at that time undoubtedly, also the medium of writing and of books. One of the constitutive factors of the primitive community of those who believe in Jesus is the book. This is true of this community in itself and of its function as norm for the future.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must therefore consider this book as a constitutive element of the primitive community in its function of norm for all time to come. At the same time, this primitive community must be considered as the eschatological presence of God's promise of salvation irrevocably wrought by God's power. In this way, it seems to me that all that is being said about the Sacred Scripture of the Old and New Testaments – about God as the main author of Scripture, about inspiration, about Scripture as norm, about the inerrancy of Scripture – can be understood without recourse to the miraculous, which does not find credence today. It shows also how a reference to the sacred writings of other great cultural religions should not confuse Christians in their way of understanding the Holy Scriptures of Christianity.

HOLY SCRIPTURE – WORD OF GOD AND WORD OF HUMAN BEINGS

The Second Vatican Council expressly emphasizes that the human authors of the Holy Scriptures truly composed these writings. They did not merely write what was dictated to them by God, who alone would be their "author." We may here ignore the question of whether a Catholic theology of Scripture after the Second Vatican Council is able to speak of verbal inspiration. God did not dictate the Scriptures in the usually understood sense of one person dictating to another. There was no need for God to feed statements into the consciousness of the writers through a miraculous intervention. If the human authors really wrote the Scriptures, God's authorship of Holy Scripture, which is a clear doctrine of our faith, must be understood in a way that does not imply that God composed them. Human beings composed the Scriptures. The fact that God is their author must mean something else.

We are entitled to say what follows: God, in his unchallenged and powerful grace, which does not cancel human freedom, causes [220] the salvific event consisting of Christ and the primitive faith-community. God wills and guarantees that they will forever be the norm of faith. Now this primitive community cannot possibly exist nor be such a norm without the written objectification of its faith. If and insofar as this is true, it is also true that God is in a real way the author of Scripture, having already "inspired" it, and guarantees its "inerrancy" in the sense and with the limits that fit the proper task of Scripture. In other words: In the power of his grace God produces the primitive community. He produces it as a permanent norm for the future Church. He produces it as objectifying itself in special writings, which are the norm of the coming Church. In this way God produces these writings.

This leaves open all the possibilities of the individuality and freedom of the human composers in the primitive community as well as the fact that they were influenced by the situation in which they lived. These persons are the writers and their writings mirror their individuality. The writings originate through theological reflection on their experience of Jesus Christ, as the definitive and irrevocable self-promise of God in history. From the human point of view these writings often come into being fortuitously. They were not intentionally planned as a unity according to some basic system; they manifest a diversity of theological starting points, terminologies, and plausibilities. But even in their variety and differences they are valid witnesses to the faith of the primitive community. As such they were willed and brought forth by divine Providence, in God's perennial salvific grace, as the norm of faith for the coming Church throughout all generations.

Of course, besides the Scriptures transmitted to us, in the primitive community there were certainly other written objectifications of the faith of that community. Some of them would have been unfit to serve as normative objectifications of the faith of the primitive community, but others might have been accepted as such (for instance, the lost letters of Paul). The discernment made by the primitive community between written productions that would serve as norm and witness for later times and those that would not, in other words, the constitution

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and delimitation of the so-called canon of the Scriptures, must be attributed to the faith-instinct of the Church, as she moved from apostolic to post-apostolic times. We of later generations might notice that this discernment was very broadminded, and that as a result writings were admitted into the [221] canon that we might not easily admit today. On the other hand, we might say that it was so strict that even today, despite their considerable differences in points of view and in Christian warmth and depth, all these writings constitute a genuine corpus of Scripture, serving as a lucid testimony of the Christian faith.

We must now say something about the Old Testament. Insofar as it was the Holy Scripture of Jesus, and as it belongs to the prehistory of Christianity and is acknowledged as such by the Christ-event, the Old Testament too belongs to the Holy Scriptures of Christianity. Christians discover it through Christ. Would we be able to discover it today as divinely produced Holy Scripture independently of Christ? Or would we, without Christ, consider it for our own existence and salvation only as a document of the history of religions, a document stemming from the Middle East, although a very important one, unsurpassed in ancient history? We will not try to answer this question.

The Old Testament is Holy Scripture for us, in the concrete situation of our faith and salvation, insofar as it was the Holy Scripture of Jesus, insofar as it "is about Christ." This does not deny the further religious significance of the Old Testament. It only emphasizes the fact that Christians arrive at it only through Jesus, that we must always read it with an eye on him who was crucified and rose from the dead. Although God's salvific will emerges and is already manifest in it, the Old Testament as such does not yet attest that this salvific will of God has come down to us, not as an ambivalent possibility of salvation, but as triumphant and irreversible. That is why it is rightly called the Old Testament.

Scripture is a human word, a human product, insofar as in it human beings bear witness that God is no longer the mysterious ground of a history that presses on into the unforeseeable future, but that God hastens to meet history as its absolute future and introduces it into his own infinity and luminous sovereignty. As human word, Scripture does not bear witness to what God, in his creative power, does here and there to finite reality. But Scripture is also God's word, and as God's word, it bears witness to God himself, as infinite gift to the world. Such an attestation is possible only if it is made by God himself, in a unique manner that goes beyond God's usual creative activity.

If Scripture did not, through God himself (through what we call the light of faith), bear witness to God, as a gift that victoriously [222] makes its way, it would speak only of realities that are distinct from God, even if it spoke of them in their relation to God. In that case the content of its statements would not differ basically from content that, in principle, might also be reached by unaided human words. And then that essential difference from other human words, which Scripture itself attests, would no longer exist. Of course, this essential difference between Scripture as God's word and human words can ultimately be conceived and defended only if we grasp Scripture's essential relation to the cross and the resurrection of Jesus. For only in these eschatological salvific events is the triumph of God's self-promise to the world presented historically and therefore in words. The words of Scripture are, when we read them with faith, once more animated by this self-communication of God. Thus they are not only words about God (although authorized by God) and thus only human words. They are indeed words of God. If Scripture is to be God's word reaching us and mediating God, it must, of course, also speak of humanity; it must also be human speech about humans. Thus human word about humanity has, in Scripture as elsewhere, diverse dimensions and degrees of binding force, in and with which human beings can speak about themselves and bear witness to themselves and their history. Thus much may be said in Scripture about humanity that may be important and, in some cases, remain forever valid for them. But all of this derives its ultimate binding power and importance from the fact that it happens in the context of the statement that God, in his infinity and absolute sovereignty, has not only offered himself to human beings, making possible their salvation, but also victoriously realizes this possibility. Every Christian anthropology that is intended to agree with Scripture should never forget this basic principle, and it should always remember that, because of human historicity, what it tells us about humanity does not always have the same degree of binding force.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

HOLY SCRIPTURE AS A BOOK

Scripture as God's word, the Christian book of the Old and the New Testaments, was certainly, for all essentials, already present with and in the Church of apostolic times, that Church which is the lasting normative beginning of the eschatological stage of salvation [223] history. But when we start speaking of the book of Holy Scripture, we should not overlook the fact that this book as a book has had a further history, in which its proper nature has been realized even more fully than before. Scripture is a message for all humanity and for each human person. This feature of Scripture is more radically realized, when it can immediately reach everybody everywhere. This has happened only since the time Scripture became a book that could be so easily reproduced that it could become everybody's book, that is, through the momentous breakthrough in our cultural history signified by the name Gutenberg.

Before the invention of printing Scripture existed, but not Scripture as book for everyone. That is Scripture's purpose, although, on the conscious level, the Catholic Church has clearly grasped this fact only through a long and laborious process, and said expressly, for the first time, in the Second Vatican Council that she wishes Scripture to be in everybody's hands. Formerly she treated Scripture almost like some secret writing that should be used only by experts in theology and in official preaching. It was only at the end of the fifteenth century that Scripture entered the stage of the full realization of its own nature. Every book, every library, every bookshop tells those for whom history derives its basic meaning from the fact that it is the salvation history of eternal life that the word of God, as incarnated in human words and hence in the written word, has reached the fullness of its nature.

Let us, at the end of these considerations, return once more to their start. The immense and breathtaking history of the cosmos derives its ultimate meaning from the fact that within this history there may emerge an immeasurable quantity of seemingly minute histories of spirit and freedom, in each of which the history of the cosmos comes to itself. And this history of spirit and freedom that occurs countless times as the coming-to-itself of the cosmos is at the same time the history of the self-communication of God as absolute future to this history of the freedom and the spirit of the cosmos.

The final outcome of this whole history of spirit and freedom, in which the cosmos comes to itself, and keeps striving for God, is called the everlasting kingdom of God. But in this history of the cosmos, of the spirit, and of freedom, the irrevocable victory of history is already attested and has already started. This beginning of the blessed fulfillment of the cosmos is called Jesus Christ, [224] the one who passed through death to resurrection. The permanent presence of this victorious promise of God in Jesus Christ) is called the Church of those who believe in Jesus, who love him and love God in him, and who, full of hope, die with him into the incomprehensibility of God

Countless are the witnesses of this blessed fulfillment. In the reality of what is attested is already present. Because of our bodily being God has provided an incarnational objectification of these witnesses. We call it Holy Scripture. It must, of course, be read with faith, else it would be only a human book that would perish in the fire of doomsday. Its word

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

must ever and again be enacted in the sacramental word and in the word of preaching. However, because the history of humankind is not only human history but also the history of God (unconfused and undivided), there exists in it not only sculptures, buildings, poems, and books, in which human beings express their own nature in order to realize it, but also the man Jesus and his history, recorded in a book that must truly be called God's book, because in it God pledges himself to us as our eternal life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[225-227]

VOLUME 22

LIST OF SOURCES

CONSCIENCE
Lecture delivered on 11 March 1983 in Vienna; published in Orientierung 47 (1983) 246-50.

DIALOGUE AND TOLERANCE AS THE FOUNDATION OF A HUMANE SOCIETY
Lecture delivered on 11 June 1983 in Pforzheim; published in Stimmen der Zeit 201 (1983) 579-89.

UTOPIA AND REALITY: THE SHAPE OF CHRISTIAN EXISTENCE CAUGHT BETWEEN THE IDEAL AND THE REAL
Lecture delivered on 27 February 1983 in Bad Camberg; published in Geist und Leben 56 (1983) 422-32, under the title "Christliche Welt- und Lebensgestaltung zwischen Anspruch und Wirklichkeit."

THE THEOLOGICAL DIMENSION OF PEACE
Published in Entschluss 38 (3/1983) 11-13, under the title "Die Offenheit auf Gott hin."

THE PROBLEM OF EUROPE'S FUTURE
Published in Europa – Horizonte der Hoffnung, edited by F. König and K. Rahner (Graz, 1983), pp. 11-34

REALISTIC POSSIBILITY OF A UNIFICATION IN FAITH?
Lecture delivered on 20 January 1982 in Basel; published in Das Ringen um die Einheit der Christen: Zum Stand des evangelisch katholischen Dialogs, edited by H. Fries (Dusseldorf, 1983), pp. 176-92, under the title "Was kann realistischerweise Ziel der ökumenischen Bemühungen um die Einheit im Glauben sein?"; also in Communicatio fidei: Festschrift für Eugen Biser, edited by H. Bürkle and G. Becker (Regensburg, 1983), pp. 175-83; in part in Evangelische Kommentare 15 (1983) 480-84, under the title "Ökumenischer Realismus: Über das Ziel einer Einheit im Glauben."

CONCRETE OFFICIAL STEPS TOWARD UNIFICATION
Published in Ökumene Möglichkeiten und Grenzen heute, edited by K. Froehlich (Tubingen, 1982), pp. 80-85.

ECUMENICAL TOGETHERNESS TODAY
Published in Quatember 44 (1980) 3-12.

FORGOTTEN DOGMATIC INITIATIVES OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
Lecture delivered on 27 November 1982 in Freiburg; not previously published.

PERSPECTIVES FOR PASTORAL THEOLOGY IN THE FUTURE
Published in Diakonia 12 (1981) 221-35.

THE FUTURE OF CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES
Published in Entschluss 37 (12/1982), 11 f., 16-20, under the title "Warum die Christen einer

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Minderheit bleiben."

RITES CONTROVERSY: NEW TASKS FOR THE CHURCH
Published in Entschluss 38 (7/8/1983) 28, 30f., under the title "Austausch statt Einbahn?"

THE RELATION BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND POPULAR RELIGION
Published in Volksreligion – Religion des Volkes, edited by K. Rahner, C. Modehn, and M. Göpfert (Stuttgart, 1979), pp. 9-16, under the title "Einleitende Überlegungen zum Verhältnis von Theologie und Volksreligion."

SOUTH AMERICAN BASE COMMUNITIES IN A EUROPEAN CHURCH
Published in Entschluss 36 (1/1981) 4-8.

CHRISTIAN PESSIMISM
Lecture delivered on 10 November 1983 in Frankfurt; previously unpublished.

WHAT THE CHURCH OFFICIALLY TEACHES AND WHAT THE PEOPLE ACTUALLY BELIEVES
Published in Theologie in Freiheit und Verantwortung, edited by K. Rahner and H. Fries (Munich, 1981), pp. 15-29.

THEOLOGY AND THE ROMAN MAGISTERIUM
Published in Stimmen der Zeit 198 (1980) 363-75, under the title "Theologie und Lehramt."

THE PERENNIAL ACTUALITY OF THE PAPACY
Published in Das Papsttum: Epochen und Gestalten, edited by B. Moser (Munich, 1983), pp. 277-92, under the title "Paul VII. an Peppino – Ein Papstbrief aus dem 21. Jahrhundert."

UNDERSTANDING THE PRIESTLY OFFICE
Published in Auf Wegen der Versöhnung: Beiträge zum ökumenischen Gespräch, edited by P. Neuner and F. Wolfinger (Frankfurt, 1982), pp. 215-19, under the title "Kleine Randbemerkungen zur Frage des Amstverständnisses."

BOOK OF GOD – BOOK OF HUMAN BEINGS
Published in Stimmen der Zeit 202 (1984) 35-44, under the title "Die Heilige Schrift – Buch Gottes und Buch der Menschen."

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

PART ONE

Christian Life

[3]

1

ANXIETY AND CHRISTIAN TRUST IN THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVE

Our point of departure will be the customary distinction between fear and anxiety. Fear refers to a definite object that we know and that appears threatening to us. Thus fear is a relationship between the conscious subject and a specific, "categorical" object within consciousness.

THE THEOLOGICAL CONNECTION BETWEEN ANXIETY AND FEAR

At this point, of course, the theologian might ask whether one can "fear" God, whether the expression "the fear of God" and similar ones are correct or whether they are used inaccurately. Since the word and the concept "God" occupy a definite, individual place within our consciousness and thus understandably provoke feelings of fear and awe, the expression "the fear of God" can of course be readily understood and its use is justified. However, if we proceed from the understanding that "God" does not really mean a particular object viewed individually which in the ordinary way is present alongside other individual contents of our consciousness and the objects presumed to be there, but rather that "God" means a reality that is totally unique, incommensurable, all-encompassing but itself never encompassable, already antecedent to every individual specification, a reality that implies an impenetrable mystery, it is understandable that the expressions "fear of God" and "awe of God" can be used only in a terminology that is highly inaccurate.

[4] If we understand it in this way, this reality of God (despite the word God) is not a reality that comes to rest as an individual object within our conceptual systems. The subject's original relationship to God does not come about in the otherwise usual manner of knowing an object (Australia, for example), but rather it is present as spirit and freedom in the human being's original transcendentality which underlies all individual knowledge as the condition which makes this knowledge possible. So this relationship is one in respect to which the word and the concept "God" within our consciousness can only mean a subsequent secondary representation standing for what is originally meant. Only in a terminology that is highly inaccurate can one speak of "fear of God" or "awe of God." The expression "anxiety of God" would actually be more accurate, but this expression is not common and could be introduced only with difficulty.

But if theology has to treat of anxiety and fear, and when it does the two words have to be distinguished, and if theology treats of God and the human being's relationship to God, then strictly speaking it is obliged to speak of anxiety and not of fear. One could even go so far as to say that when the expression "fear of God" is used, and this expression is taken in a really strict sense rather than in a broad and imprecise sense, then we are talking about a God who does not even exist. In the strict sense of the word one can really fear only an idol which from the outset is viewed as a particular, albeit extremely threatening individual reality existing along with many others that are equally justified.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is of course annoying and impractical that we cannot really use the expression "anxiety of God," since in the ordinary use of language anxiety is understood as something that has to do more or less with a nameless and bewildering terror of an interiorly destructive nature. But of course this should have nothing to do with anxiety before God (if we may use such an expression). Nor can we get around this linguistic difficulty by speaking merely of awe, adoration, a feeling of absolute dependence, submission, and so on. It is not as though words like these that characterize the relationship human beings are supposed to have to God were not justified or that they ought to be eliminated in favor of the word anxiety. All of them are justified and perhaps, too, in the ordinary way of speaking about human beings' relationship to God, they are more readily understood and more useful for proclamation. However, since the word anxiety does exist, and since the thing that is meant by this word and that has to be described more exactly also exists, the question [5] whether and how this anxiety itself, properly understood, is relevant to those dimensions of the human being that are the concern of Christian faith and theology is an indispensable one.

Necessary Distinctions between Fear and Anxiety

But before delving deeper into this question we have to consider further what we said at the beginning. We have made a distinction between "categorical" fear and "objectless transcendental" anxiety. There are transcendental conditions for the possibility of knowledge (and of freedom), which are nonobjective and therefore conscious in a way that can be overlooked. The question can be raised as to whether and in what way this spiritual transcendentality of the human being, without its being actualized by being grasped as a particular object, can be conscious for itself alone in mystical states, in inward communion or in some other way; whether and how the empty, unlimited consciousness, oriented to being as such (or to "nothingness") can be present to itself alone. This question will not be dealt with here. But then we must presuppose and say – and we have every right to do this – that in the normal case of everyday consciousness transcendental anxiety exists in a synthesis with an individual conscious object of fear.

If for Kant concrete sense perception and the abstract concept always and of necessity belong together, if for Thomas Aquinas a particular intellectual concept cannot be known except in a conversio ad phantasma, then the same holds true for the relationship between anxiety and fear. Anxiety is experienced only in a synthesis with fear (at least in the ordinary case, and that is the only one we want to talk about here). In the individual case the relationship between the two realities is quite varied. A person can have fear without adverting in a really reflexive way to the fundamental condition of existence with its characteristic anxiety which this fear actually implies. Even when vegetables are being sold in a market, the transcendentally necessary logic is more or less present and operative even though the woman selling the vegetables does not "notice" it and has never even heard of such a thing. And conversely, in an experience of fear that exists without being reflected upon, the bottomless insecurity of existence as such can occupy the consciousness so completely and nameless anxiety can spread so far that one no longer even notices what the original source of the anxiety was. These variations of the more precise relationship between fear and anxiety in their [6] differences and their unity are subjects of psychology and existential philosophy and not so much the tasks of theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Anxiety Concerning Salvation or the Ultimate Security of Existence before God?

If theologians are to speak of anxiety and have of course to put this in relationship to God, they are confronted with a difficult situation. To people today it seems obvious beyond dispute that one may not and need not have any anxiety before God. They think that anxiety before God is inherently an improper, foolishly pagan perversion of the human being's relationship to God. They perceive God (even though this perception is not necessarily justified) as the one who gives the ultimate guarantee that existential anxiety is unnecessary. On the other hand, religious people, relying on Scripture, find it a matter of course to speak of the holy fear of God, of working out their salvation in fear and trembling, of the fear of the Lord that is the beginning of wisdom. They view the overcoming of anxiety about salvation and of sinfulness and mortality as precisely the achievement of that faith which alone saves. And so they presume that this anxiety about salvation is always present in human beings who do not sinfully repress the truth of their existence.

Are we, then, threatened by God in such a way that we would have to have anxiety before him? The average, everyday Christian whose mental makeup is not overly complicated will be of the opinion that God can only be threatening if one sins. However, good-living Christians avoid sin and so they do not have to have any anxiety before God. In respect to definite individual sins, fear before God is, then, a specific matter that can actually be cleared up by the simple expedient of contrition and the avoidance of sin in the future. But this, then, is the peace with God that excludes anxiety and fear. Therefore spasms of fear and anxiety are to be struggled against; it is possible to overcome them over and over again by courageous trust in God and in one's own integrity and to dismiss them from one's consciousness. In this way the ordinary Christian could virtually arrive at that state of mind which is obvious from the outset to secular people today; namely, that before God, if he exists, there is no need to have any anxiety because God is, after all, by definition, the guarantee of the ultimate security of existence. How can we find a way out of this awkward terminology and the obscurity of the matter itself?

[7]

EXISTENTIELL INSECURITY AND THE EXPERIENCE OF CONTINGENCY AS THE REASON FOR THE EXISTENTIAL ANXIETY OF HUMAN BEINGS

We proceed on the assumption that human beings experience an ultimate insecurity of their reality, of their existence. This insecurity of existence as such need not necessarily be understood as something negative. It can initially be perceived as simply a fact that is so universal and inevitable that there is nothing particularly surprising about it. We do not originate from ourselves. We have had a beginning and we did not establish and decide this beginning ourselves. We are constantly thrown back upon and dependent upon realities, situations, and helps that are not our own and that are not ours to dispose of as we see fit. We are proceeding toward an end that we ourselves cannot determine (not even by suicide). As free agents we would like to take up this or that position toward everything in our lives. But this "everything" has not been chosen by us; rather, it is given to us and taken from us without our being consulted. We are people who have been put here without being consulted, dependent people who came from somewhere but who are not able to determine this origin and future ourselves. Even the ultimate free subjectivity is experienced as something that is not self-evident, something that is limited, that functions on the basis of elements outside ourselves, that cannot achieve pure reflection, that is condemned to itself. In brief, human beings experience themselves as those who are not secure in themselves alone, as beings who are not self-evident.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Human beings can repress this experience. People can forget this contingency in the face of the variety of things that make up their day-to-day life experience right up to their highest ideals, those, however, that they themselves have reflected upon. But the experience is there. It constantly thrusts itself forward. This experience of contingency can certainly be given different reflexive interpretations. It can be interpreted as the experience of createdness; atheistic philosophies can give it some other name. But it is there and it inexorably bears the character of what may be called anxiety in distinction to fear. This anxiety need not be a particular, physiologically and psychologically determinable individual event, and it cannot be such in its proper nature as distinct from its objectified reflection. As such it need not even be reflected upon or judged as something negative for reflection. It is entirely possible for human beings to flee into the routine of everyday life and to brush aside the desire of this anxiety to manifest itself as reprehensible depression, [8] as a mental quirk. They are able to live with this anxiety in a happy-go-lucky way and it is possible that they will not even find a word for it.

In the light of a Christian anthropology of free subjects who as such are not only capable of performing this or that act in the objective order but also have free disposition over themselves in a radical way oriented to ultimate validity, we must say that this continuing condition of createdness, this origin of our existence from elements not at our disposal, and the anxiety that this implies, can exist either in the form of something merely given antecedently for freedom (for those who do not have the use of reason) or in the form of acceptance by freedom (usually without theoretical reflection) or in the form of rejection, of protest on the part of freedom. In the light of traditional ontology (which cannot be presented here) and Christian optimism motivated by the divine revelation of salvation, we may say that in general human beings accept themselves in this origin that is not at their disposal, despite all individual protests and despite the moral and objective shortcomings and individual contradictions to their nature (sins as distinct from “sin”) which give these protests their concrete form, and that they freely accept the final existential anxiety that this also implies. And so we may say that they “are in agreement with themselves and satisfied.”

But even then their existential anxiety is not simply removed. Even then their origin and their standpoint is not at their disposal. But their anxiety is in a state (difficult to describe because it is quite common) of release; it is a matter of course; it takes the form of an inner conviction, requiring no additional reflection, that we will not fall even though we are not holding on tightly. It is the conviction that the things that are not at our disposal and not reflected upon are ultimately more worthy of our trust than all of our clear calculations, that the obscure origin is more self-evident than what we think we can penetrate with our knowledge, that ultimately it is not better and more secure if we think that we alone should have free disposal of ourselves.

EXISTENCE IN ANXIETY AND EXISTENTIAL FUNDAMENTALS OF CHRISTIAN TRUST

This is not the place to give a more detailed description of what has just been said and to transpose it into theological concepts with their [9] numerous differentiations. We shall confine ourselves to the following statement. If our origin, which is not at our disposal, is the result of the creative act of the God who is and will always remains incomprehensible, who (both in fact and in freely given grace) sets us on a course whose goal is immediacy to himself (known as grace and the beatific vision), this fundamental redemptive acceptance of our existence in anxiety can develop into three fundamental Christian existential components:

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation faith, hope, and love.

We cannot and need not occupy ourselves here with the question whether and how these three basic conditions are to be distinguished, or whether and how under different aspects they always mean one and the same totality of the redemptive acceptance of existence (as it is established by God in grace). If we consider the ordinary unity of these three basic acts within the single totality of the realization of existence, without thereby denying that a real distinction can be made among these three basic existential acts in the process of the realization of existence (the process of justification), we can also view this single totality under the aspect of hope; then we can describe this single totality as a final, comprehensive trust in this existence which is given anterior to freedom, which freedom cannot dispose of as it sees fit, and therefore which is an existence in anxiety.

This trust as understood here is not trust that we place in this or that individual element in our existence that might appear to us as something we can hold onto. Rather, it is a free acquiescence in existence in its totality and oneness in which the subject as such assumes the risk of self-abandonment. As we have already said, this single basic act of existence known as trust is not of course something that ordinarily happens in the isolation of mystical experience as such. Rather, it is accomplished by turning to the concrete tasks that are posed to freedom in dealing with individual material, social, and historical realities. These three aspects of our realities, as we have them in the world, for their part condition one another reciprocally, but this does not cause them to lose their individual identities. It follows obviously from this, by the way, that faith and love (despite their movement in the direction of the incomprehensible infinity of God as he is in himself) are realized in historical encounters which reach their unsurpassable culmination in the believing and loving human being's relationship to Jesus Christ.

[10]

TRUST AND DESPAIR AS ACTS OF HUMAN FREEDOM

The ("transcendental") trust that exists in union with an anxiety that is just as aprioristic must be described in further detail. As we have already said, traditional ontology (which views evil as a deficiency of being and not as another kind of being in a Manichaean duality, although this Manichaeism is a constant threat in the form of a latent reality that is not reflected upon) and Christian optimism (which proclaims the eschatological victory of God's love in the consummation of his kingdom and which in hope, and not in theoretical analysis, transcends all the limits that can be possibly be placed upon it) do not view human freedom as something that is confronted by two equally valid, albeit radically opposed possibilities. Furthermore, they do not view this freedom as something that would choose between two such radically opposed possibilities without its being for its part encompassed by the free sovereignty of God, who wills the good, a thing which in no way detracts from this freedom. Nor should one say that the sovereign and free God would necessarily require a hell so that both human freedom and the manifest character of God's justice might be upheld. But despite this, Christians must not be so presumptuous as to construct in theory or in fact a system for their existence which would absolutely exclude the possibility of saying a no to God which would mean eternal loss. Therefore, one must always allow for the possibility that the insecurity of existence over which we have no control and which implies anxiety might also lead to a free protest against this existence, and that the primordial trust as described, having been freely rejected, one might choose despair rather than trust.

What name we should give to this despair, the ways in which it appears, whether tacit or overt, unreflected or systematized, the wide variety of forms it assumes in its involvement with history which is necessary for it, too (forms that perhaps go by quite different names and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only with great difficulty can be recognized as expressions of a final, free, culpable despair) – all of these things cannot be discussed here. We must leave this to a descriptive psychology that will have to try at least indirectly to detect this despair which can be the object of this psychology only to a limited degree because this despair as such is itself not an individual object within consciousness but rather an experience of the totality of existence as such.

The ultimate fundamental condition of existence (this primordial trust or this final despair) can be reflected upon to a certain degree; [11] then it also becomes present in the consciousness as a particular quasi-categorical object, whereby, however, the really basic existentiell attitude and its quasi-categorical objective reality need not coincide, but rather they can contradict one another (all of which is the presupposition for the impossibility of our "judging" ourselves of which Scripture speaks). And so it is quite possible, for example, for people to construct a theoretical system of the absurdity of existence, while at the same time being in their real fundamental condition hoping and trusting persons who do not even notice the contradiction between their innermost realization of existence and their reflexive system of existence.

The converse is also possible. In their theoretical reflection and on the level of the objective reality of their actions, people think that they must have trust and that they do, in fact, have trust, while in truth their innermost fundamental condition is one of sheer despair, which of course can then assume the widest variety of forms. This implies that it is not possible for concrete individual human beings to have a reflexive certainty concerning the existence of this primordial trust.

In theological terms this means that human beings (according to the Council of Trent) cannot be absolutely certain whether they are in the state of grace. They do not even have the obligation and the right to entertain the desire to bring about, more or less by force, such an absolute certitude in itself. Just the mere hope that we have this trust, that we have this primordial hope as distinct from a certainty subject to our control and with which we could have sovereign disposal over our existence, is an intrinsic element of that confidence whereby in anxiety we may let go of ourselves in a way that is without anxiety and yet not fall (or fall into the hands of him and of him alone whom we call God and about whom to know in faith is granted to us only when this trust is realized).

This kind of trust that determines the whole of our existence cannot of its very nature be brought about by putting together individual contents of our consciousness either. We do this when we reflect on these contents, but in so doing we do not bring about real trust itself but only its reflexive representation within our consciousness. Real trust can be discerned only indirectly (in that we once again trust and are not compelled to make an explicit theoretical determination and analysis), and so this is why it is experienced as "grace."

Ultimately we come to a state of equanimity, despite the ever-present anxiety. Existential anxiety and anxiety about salvation mean ultimately [12] one and the same thing, since "salvation" does not mean a particular event within existence; rather, it is the totality of an existence that has succeeded, an existence that as such and taken as a whole is a threatening one, and not a neutral terrain on which happy and unhappy events occur. Our equanimity comes from the conviction that when all is said and done nothing can really happen to us, and in this sense we are secure (despite the insecurity of existence which can become secure only when we accept its insecurity).

We examine our conscience whose individual contents and objects are always assessed as symptoms and manifestations of our actual free fundamental condition. We are at peace with our conscience; we reject what we disapprove of; and we have the conviction that while this contrition does not actually cause the forgiveness of our guilt, it is itself the sign that the forgiving grace of God, who alone can forgive real guilt that once freely incurred cannot otherwise be overcome by us, is reaching us. We experience in ourselves (despite all the anxiety) a lightheartedness, a feeling of relief and a cheerfulness (for no apparent reason), all of which gives us the right to hope that in the depth of our being that cannot be penetrated by the categorical judgments of our reflection everything is as it should be, that there is a peace which, as Scripture says, surpasses all understanding. We turn lovingly to our neighbor (without again subjecting this love to a test of truth) and in so doing we forget ourselves and are at peace. The apparently overwhelming anxiety that we shall never escape from ourselves and therefore that we shall be lost is a condition that for its part is imbedded in the truth that God is greater than our hearts, that he knows everything, and that even when our own strength fails, we are really forgiven and this failure is transformed from a burden into a relief.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

All of the things that have been said here about a certain possibility of ascertaining this salvific primordial trust should not of course be looked upon as recipes with which the father confessor or psychotherapist can produce this primordial trust or demonstrate its existence with logical certainty. This is just as impossible as wanting to produce faith itself by having recourse to arguments for the trustworthiness of faith. All of these things can be nothing more than an appeal to the freedom that trusts, whereby, however, this act of freedom can and ultimately even must occur in such a way that for its part does not seek reassurance of itself, and its willingness to do without this reassurance is part of its own nature.

[13]

CLINICAL PSYCHOLOGY AND THEOLOGICAL PASTORAL CARE

All that has been said has primarily nothing to do with a psychology geared to the therapeutic treatment of demonstrable psychic disorders. What has been said about an anxiety at the root of created being applies to the most ordinary of people who in a matter-of-fact way declare that they have no anxiety whatsoever and that they just take life as it comes and enjoy it. On the other hand, things that are the proper and praiseworthy concern of psychotherapy can have nothing to do with this fundamental anxiety, and so it is neither proper nor necessary for this psychotherapy to claim that it brings about in freedom the fundamental trust in existence that is supposed to extend to all the remaining fundamental anxiety. It is of course entirely possible that phenomena which fall under the scope and treatment of psychotherapy are ultimately rooted in a person’s refusal of free primordial trust in existence as a whole. But this need not necessarily be the case.

An example might help to illustrate this more clearly. If someone suffers from insomnia after surreptitiously committing a “deliberate murder,” and if this murder can be quite properly interpreted as the categorical objectification of a freely chosen despair concerning the meaning of existence, the insomnia that psychotherapy has to treat is certainly related to this actual origin of the phenomenon requiring clinical treatment. But it is altogether conceivable that a profound conversion to an innocent trust in existence will still not cure this insomnia; conversely, it is just as conceivable that this insomnia can be cured without overcoming the actual guilt. For while it is true that there is a connection between cause and effect, the effect can remain even though the original cause is no longer present, and under certain circumstances an effect can be overcome by means other than simply removing the first cause. This is the reason why psychotherapy and pastoral care are in the theological sense interdependent. However, they are not identical and one cannot replace the other.

It is obvious that in this brief essay we cannot go into further detail about the relationship between psychotherapy and pastoral care, even though this would be a highly rewarding task. However, we do want to bring out one point. All of psychotherapy can concern itself with all the psychic disorders that are accessible to it. It may even attempt to remove those disorders whose actual cause must be presumed to be in an area beyond its competence. On the other hand, it should not be the purpose [14] of theological pastoral care to undertake a healing process in respect to phenomena that fall under the scope and analysis of psychotherapy, not even if it is justified in hoping that success in its own proper sphere of activity will produce results that will be psychotherapeutically beneficial. Since the goal of pastoral care (for example, in the sacrament of penance and in penitential sermons) is this salvific primordial trust, it is of its nature essentially different from the psychotherapeutic art of healing, even if it is able to avail itself of ordinary human, and hence psychotherapeutic means when they can be useful. Its proper means, however, are the word of proclamation and its culminations in the history of the individual, the sacraments. This word is not only the word of a human being, just like any other human word, but, strictly speaking, the word of God, since the human word exists (to some degree in a hypostatic union analogous to that in Christology) in union (not identity) with the grace of God in which God in his own reality offers himself to human freedom as the ground of this primordial trust, as its source and its goal.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This real offer, once accepted, is experienced (which does not mean that it is grasped with the certainty of reflection) in the experience of a human transcendentality accepted in hope free of anxiety, which does not tend toward nothingness but rather toward God's reality which cannot be encompassed and so will remain a mystery.

The refusal of trust in the face of and despite the insecurity of existence which is called despair finds expression in the widest variety of forms and shapes corresponding to the objective categorical reality within which and on the basis of which this refusal is actualized. These multiple forms of despair must be classified and described by psychology, depth psychology, and categorical moral theology. In doing this, one should bear in mind that an experience of the psychological and moral fathomlessness and impenetrability of existence which presses in upon a person intensely and floods the day-to-day consciousness – an experience that can be very much physiologically conditioned – is not yet despair in a theological sense, unless it were freely accepted by freely rejecting that ultimately divine security which for its part encompasses this experience of extreme insecurity. Whether this security is accepted in hope or whether it is really rejected, if only tacitly, is something which, as we have already said, cannot for its part be ascertained with reflexive certainty. (The Council of 'Trent was of the opinion that according to Luther's theology of faith this kind of reflexive certainty would have to be forced and could be forced, although Luther himself, of course, [15] was aware of the constant challenge to faith, to trust in the fulfillment of salvation.)

In order to explain the radical nature of this lack of certitude ("the dark night of the senses and of the spirit"), one need not maintain that it implies a real and ultimate abandonment by God (a participation in such an abandonment by God as is attributed – quite wrongly, ultimately – to Jesus on the cross). One could readily say that given such a presupposition, this abandonment by God would be beyond the realm of experience. A particularly intense description of such phenomena belongs to the field of mystical theology (even if in their most proper essentials they are simply a part of human existence).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[16]

2

NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND THE CHRISTIAN

We shall now address ourselves to the problem of the moral justification of nuclear weapons as a political and military instrument. This limitation of the subject must not be misunderstood. The question of ethical responsibility raised by other kinds of armaments and methods of waging war confronts the human conscience with extremely difficult problems. For human beings are in conscience responsible for every kind of violence and suffering that they inflict on their fellow human beings.

However, we must first make the following objective observation. In conventional armaments we have possibilities ranging from collective self-defense, which in fact has always been permitted by the Church under the limitations of the just war teaching, right up to a holocaust which conventional weapons can cause and whose effects differ only in quantitative degree from a nuclear holocaust. But in the practical and concrete order there is a qualitative distinction (one that is still repressed in the consciousness of many Christians) in respect to the moral judgments of war today as opposed to earlier times because the threat of nuclear war as opposed to any previous war, due to its immediate and long-term consequences, affects not only the nations waging the war but also the entire human family and its future. However, that still does not mean that there has ever been a conventional war or that there can even be one today that really raises no problem for the Christian conscience.

[17]

JUST WAR TEACHING

Just war teaching – however much it intended to restrict war's murderous consequences and sought to uphold or restore justice as opposed to violence – has in the reality of history also served as a salve for the conscience which enabled Christian kings and emperors, Christian generals right on down to Christian foot soldiers to carry on their wars and colonial conquests without any noticeable scruples, to the extent that they recognized power politics at all as a profound moral problem. There have always been people who have equated the power to act in a particular way with the moral right to do so. For example, we need only call to mind the highly developed cultures that were sacrificed to the wars of colonial conquest in the age of Charles V or Philip II, the Christian generals who wore hair shirts and went on pilgrimages and yet at the same time waged wars; of them we must ask the question today how it was possible to wage wars like these while at the same time probably maintaining what is known as a "good" conscience, for the most part unchallenged. Consider the strange attitude that enabled even devout Christians to justify Hitler's war of aggression against the Soviet Union as a crusade against Bolshevism.

Therefore solicitude for the future of the human race demands today that we have the existentiell courage to pose anew the question concerning the forms and limits of our resistance when confronted with the problem of maintaining or restoring the right to life, justice, and freedom of thought, conscience, and religion. When reconsidering the question we must not simply proceed on the assumption that the conventional evaluation of the wars that have been waged in the history of the Christian West was absolutely correct. We must take the risk of departing from traditional paradigms for the interpretation of war since they are more an outgrowth of the political role played by Christianity beginning with the epoch of Constantine than a reflection of the Christian churches' basic truths of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If people expect theological casuistry based on a conventional understanding of war to tell them under what circumstances, with what weapons, and within what limits even a modern war may be waged, they have not yet faced the gravity of the problem and the perilousness of the historical times in which they live. Traditional attitudes toward war are simply adopted as a point of departure for distinguishing between responsible and irresponsible actions without asking whether these traditional attitudes have been rendered obsolete, at least by the course [18] of history even if they were supposed to have been justified in earlier times. People refuse to recognize the extreme danger that war in the modern world will result in an explosion of extreme and boundless violence – comparable to a nuclear chain reaction that has gone out of control – that will sweep all the sophisticated distinctions of casuistry onto the rubbish heap of history.

Furthermore, people are not sufficiently aware at the present moment of human history that ultimately every individual's decision of conscience is made alone and is answerable to the incomprehensible God; therefore, despite all of its obvious dependence on the historical circumstances in which it is made, it may not of itself always appeal to this dependence and let others make this decision for it. Human beings' dignity consists in a responsibility to God that they cannot delegate to others. But people who have experienced the loneliness entailed in this ultimate and direct responsibility to God and who have to fear their own capacity for error as well as their culpable self-deception will not consider it to be a presumptuous encroachment on their own freedom of decision if they are required to form their conscience in the community of the Church and as hearers of the word of God.

This formation of conscience on a question of such fundamental importance as has been indicated above really cannot consist in the unreflected adoption of, for example, the casuistry of a learned theological commission or in the adoption of reassuring declarations of individual ecclesiastical personalities or institutions, much less of political parties. It cannot consist in the opinion that the problem of present-day armaments is much too complicated for average Christians, that it is in fact beyond their responsibility and therefore must be left to the responsibility of experts. Rather, the formation of conscience must consist in guiding people to a fresh experience of the basic tenets of Christian faith.

REJECTION OF NUCLEAR ARMAMENT

After these preliminary observations we come to the presentation of our own position on nuclear weaponry. This position has two parts.

1. The acknowledgement of the theoretical uncertainty of every definite position on this question and the evaluation of the opponents of one's own position that this uncertainty implies.

[19] 2. The decision for a definite position. We reject unconditionally the use of nuclear weapons regardless of whether these weapons are to be used offensively or defensively.

As a consequence of this decision we reject nuclear armament and we opt for unilateral steps toward disarmament, without waiting for guarantees or reciprocal action from the other side. Our decision for this position arises ultimately from a Christian motivation since a decision must be made despite the theoretical uncertainty of a definite opinion, and this Christian decision can be made.

Epistemological Uncertainties

In our opinion, ways of securing peace and political freedom that are really effective and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

justifiable from a Christian viewpoint fall under the competence of human prudence and discretion, and such questions cannot really be clearly settled on a purely theoretical level. To maintain the opposite, in our opinion, amounts to overconfidence in the rational argumentation put forth in support of one or the other ways of securing peace. More will be said on this matter when the arguments are presented which the human conscience can appeal to in favor of nuclear disarmament, even that form of disarmament which commits us to taking "unilateral steps." Among Christians one should from the outset not attempt to conjure up the possibility of absolute theoretical certainty on questions such as these, and one should refrain from using such false certainties as a means of imputing ignorance, false pacifism, or (vice versa) bellicose desires to people who have a different opinion. This by no means implies that the definite position that we ourselves have chosen can be rejected as arbitrary and the Christian who opposes our position may not assert that this position cannot arise from a Christian motivation.

As a matter of fact, the epistemological situation that we are considering here in connection with nuclear armament is not unknown in Christian moral theology. In principle, Christian moral theologians have always been aware that both for the individual and for the churches there are ethical questions that cannot be resolved in a way that is really certain and beyond doubt, questions that are disputed even among Christians with a basic Christian attitude without their coming to a commonly accepted conviction, questions, however, which nonetheless ineluctably require a definite decision this way or that way on the part [20] of those who have to take a course of action and so in a certain sense have to be decided absolutely.

For such a situation where a theoretical decision is impossible, moral theologians, and especially teachers of the spiritual life, have sought to develop norms and rules of conduct to assist individual Christians in arriving at a practical decision for which they can answer to God despite this theoretical uncertainty. Among Christians it has been the conviction, at least in general, that in cases where a theoretical decision is impossible individual Christians may not simply decide their course of action arbitrarily. Despite this theoretical uncertainty, they can and must make a definite, concrete decision in another way, one that is not simply left to their own individual fancy. In this context one relied on the gifts of prudence enlightened by grace, on the guidance of God's Holy Spirit, on inspiration. In any case, however, it is acknowledged that in such questions that cannot be theoretically resolved Christians in their concrete decisions can appeal to the ultimate sources of Christian motivation, to the actual decision of their conscience, and they may also attempt to explain this to others as far as this is possible.

The Second Vatican Council's pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes (no. 43) states explicitly that parties involved in a dispute within the Church (therefore not one party or the other, but both parties) may appeal to a Christian motivation. The only thing that is forbidden in such disputes is for one party to claim official church approval for itself alone. A sober reserve is required of both sides in assessing their own competence in the area in question and their own motivation. In what follows it will become clear that we are not talking about an objectively impossible attempt to "harmonize" different decisions of conscience in respect to the concrete questions of nuclear armaments.

Preventing War

We must first point out that all reasonable people and all Christians are asking themselves how a nuclear war can be prevented. Christians, therefore, have no disagreement on the point that all possible measures must be taken to prevent such a war. The problem at issue is how to do this in a way that promises the greatest possible success. Given this presupposition, we say frankly and honestly that we do not impute bad faith or [21] mere unreasonableness to those who endorse nuclear armaments under definite conditions as a way of securing peace, even though we cannot subscribe to the illusion that everyone involved in the process of nuclear armament really has an honest and upright conscience.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But as far as Christians are concerned, we further presume that they recognize the teaching of the churches condemning total war itself under any and all circumstances. We know that the Second Vatican Council (Gaudium et Spes, no. 80) calls every act of war aimed indiscriminately at destruction of entire cities or of extensive areas along with their populations a crime against God and humankind. A nuclear war essentially consisting of a chain of such actions, is, then, absolutely rejected. In the context of what is meant this holds true not only for the readiness and willingness to conduct a first nuclear strike in certain circumstances. In this condemnation it is obviously a question of the objective structure of such actions themselves which cannot be justified by any intention, therefore not even by the intention of defense. This unconditional rejection of such acts of war, which comprise the essence of a total war, must also be considered, each in itself, by those Christians and reasonable people who today consider further nuclear armament to be a meaningful way precisely of avoiding a total war. These people must, however, face the dilemma of how deterrence is to be maintained in a "credible" way against an adversary who also possesses nuclear armaments if, as has been presumed, they are not willing under any circumstances to engage in a nuclear war.

REASONS FOR A POSITION OF PACIFISM

In what follows we want to try to present the reasons for a "pacifist" position. Some of them are based on objective human considerations; others have their origin in ultimate Christian motivations. In our opinion these reasons have a right to serious consideration on the part of a really Christian conscience. Whether they move such a conscience to a concrete decision for this position or whether it decides on the basis of human and Christian motivation for the opposite course of action is something that can be decided only in the suprarational way that has been indicated above.

[22]

Rational-Humane Objection

It is our deliberate intention to present the rational-humane objection to nuclear armament in question form because we do not want to convey the impression that our argumentation is necessarily beyond all doubt. The reader who here expects fully worked out theses and answers instead of questions should also be aware that problem areas are being addressed on whose answer the survival of entire nations depends. We should not like to conceal from ourselves or others by the use of clever rhetoric the necessity of the utmost efforts of reflection or the fact that answers supported by a consensus have not yet been found.

First of all, we consider the distinction between nuclear armament and nuclear war as something that ultimately can seriously be called into question as far as real life is concerned. Do those who consider this distinction to be viable in practice allow in a sufficiently realistic way, even on their own side, for the malevolence, the craving for power, the misinterpretation of social realities as the Christian conviction of human sinfulness compels us to do? Will such nuclear armament not lead to a destruction of social equilibrium and of peace even among us, so that there will be an ever-increasing temptation (as history teaches us) to overcome the internal problems of society by waging external wars? Can this armament really be justified except by attributing to political adversaries from the outset only the bad motives of an absolute addiction to power and the will to assault their opponents? Why is it that in these controversies the adversaries always depict one another in the most diabolical light, unless this shabby and poor argumentation were necessary to justify armament?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If from the bottom of their hearts people place their hope exclusively on nuclear armament and summarily reject as unrealistic all attempts to develop conceptions for securing peace in which the use of weapons of mass destruction as an option for human action is rejected in principle, they are tacitly presuming that on the other side, and not only on the part of individuals but also of nations, at least among the power elites, they would have to expect as a matter of principle that the basest instincts, only the other side's aggressiveness and its urge to destroy, will as a rule prevail. This is just the way to foster the mental climate in which aggressiveness leading precisely to nuclear wars will thrive, a mentality which does not really consider a nuclear war to be basically immoral but endeavors to avoid it only as long as there is no chance of waging it victoriously in its own interest. It is of course true that Christians may [23] not assume in guileless idealism that the others are not also sinners. This is why many Christians justify nuclear armament precisely with the argument that only in this way can adversaries be made to understand "that the effort required for an attack or a blackmail attempt does not correspond in any way to the advantages they might gain from it and therefore that it does not seem advisable."[1]

But if we are convinced that this legitimate right may be defended by a constant readiness for total war and that it can be defended in this way, do we not run the risk of claiming every right for ourselves while in fact ascribing total blame to the opposite side? Yet as Christians we ought to be far more afraid of the enticements and temptations to evil on our own side, a fear that is singularly absent in the current widespread mentality. It is precisely for this reason that we should also fear nuclear armament on our own side as a temptation to a nuclear war that threatens to annihilate the human race, even though it was originally intended only as a means of deterrence.

Does not nuclear armament tacitly foster the conviction that we have to advance the welfare of our own nation instead of considering from the outset the well-being of the whole family of nations? Does it make sense for us to say that we must continue to increase our nuclear armaments so that we can later bring about a situation in which we can seriously and successfully negotiate a really effective disarmament? Will this not result in a permanent postponement of such a situation, because the adversary will take immediate steps to catch up with us and the stalemate will remain, only this time worse, that we wanted to overcome in order to have more successful negotiations, and in which we are forever wrangling about the meaning of advance armament and subsequent armament?

Can anyone prove that nuclear armament really prevents the frightful chaos that we are all afraid of? Are those who are for nuclear armament for the purpose of preventing a nuclear war entirely sure that they really reject this war under any and all circumstances? To make this deterrence policy "credible," they at least have to pretend to the adversary that they are willing to embark on nuclear war, and this means that they have to dupe at least their own soldiers into believing that such a war is justified when they equip them with nuclear weapons, all the while taking pains to avoid any public discussion of the matter.

[24] Does this not inevitably produce a frame of mind that views geographically limited nuclear wars as a real option under certain circumstances and feels that it is possible to wage such wars? Are we fully aware that the development of new and more effective nuclear weapons can be a temptation for one side to take immediate advantage of its presumably

[1] See the position paper of the Central Committee of German Catholics, Zur aktuellen Friedensdiskussion.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

superior position in order to forestall the adversary to whom we undoubtedly impute bellicose intentions? And in this process it is obvious that the possibilities afforded by the rapidly increasing development in the field of microelectronics increase the temptation to develop first-strike technologies and even to make use of them as soon as we think that a first-strike can be successfully carried out, even without our ascribing to the present-day political leadership of a country the intention of unleashing a first strike. With this kind of armament can we really have a guarantee that a nuclear war will not break out due to technical defects and miscalculation, even though it is not fully intended? Even if we could rely on technical fail-safe measures (experts doubt this possibility), has the adversaries' increasing fear of one another in an escalating arms race been assessed with sufficient realism, a fear that can lead to the outbreak of a total war even though neither side has actually entertained an aggressive intention?

We doubt that many of the proponents of further armament, who are convinced of their own sense of realism, are even sufficiently aware of their own fear and the fear of others. And we further doubt that this fear can be kept subject to political control in the long run. In addition to this the fixation that the tendency to this kind of armament gives rise to must necessarily lead to a neglect of the other tasks within the family of nations. Will not this preoccupation itself turn into a temptation to settle the unresolved conflicts within this family of nations by recourse to wars? In the long run, what effective means do we propose to prevent nuclear armament on the part of an ever-increasing number of countries? And finally, does not the continuation of nuclear armament lead to the loss of our possibility of preserving and developing those very values and goals whose defense we consider today to be the reason for nuclear deterrence?

The questions brought up here describe the magnitude of the danger with which nuclear armament is threatening us. Hence it is our wish that those who defend further nuclear armament under definite conditions would not present their arguments in such a way as to give the impression that they must appear as immediately evident to all persons of intelligence and good will.

[25] When, for example, the Central Committee of German Catholics declares without a trace of scruple that the NATO double-track decision is an example of a policy that has as its aim the reduction of armaments, détente, and peace by providing a balance of military power, far be it from us to call into question the upright intentions of the Central Committee or of NATO. However, it would be advisable to temper this assertion with a bit of skepticism which would allow for a more open-minded evaluation of the different views current even on the side of the West concerning the criteria to be employed in judging the other side's willingness for détente and peace, and concerning the nature and the extent of the armaments that are required. In view of the way that the Central Committee formulates its case, can there be any room left to agree with Cardinal Höffner's declaration that Christians of equal conscientiousness can arrive at different decisions about how to secure peace?

When expressing judgments of our own about how peace is to be secured, our formulations should make it clear that we acknowledge equal conscientiousness on the part of Christians who have come to an opposite judgment. Beyond this it will hardly be possible to demonstrate which side possesses the greater intelligence and expertise, because an analysis of this kind and the results it yields will still encounter the same differences of opinion.

The Message of God's Kingdom

For those of us who are trying to be Christians there is a further horizon that impels us to oppose nuclear armament. It would be well both for our partners and our adversaries to pay

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

close heed to the arguments that originate from this horizon too. The message of the cross, the resurrection, and the advent of God's kingdom moves on a level that is different from the level of ordinary moral activity. In their private as well as their public lives Christians have to deal not only with "commandments" and "norms" which they acknowledge as reasonable and justified and which they can make clear to a certain degree even to non-Christians. They are also aware of other criteria and motivations, "appeals" and "calls" through which God makes particularly urgent demands on them. This means that their decisions will be formed on a totally different horizon. What takes place on this level is described by Scripture with the words, "He that can take it, let him take it."

[26] When called upon to make decisions involving the whole of their being, non-Christians also find themselves propelled by a force which likewise bursts the bonds of the reality that is subject to rational analysis. Even though the reasons they give for it are different, both Christians and non-Christians can come to the same decision of conscience, one for which neither they themselves nor others can give a completely adequate rational explanation. When this happens, Christians will rejoice in the knowledge that their own decision is being confirmed from another quarter. Just as they hope for themselves that God's grace is at work in their own decision, so, too, they quite naturally see this same grace at work in their non-Christian contemporaries drawing them, too, beyond the bounds of objective knowledge.

In their decisions Christians and non-Christians alike must adhere to their conscience. Both, however, must also be cautious in assessing their own motivation because the ultimate and real wellsprings of the motivation from which their decisions actually flow themselves defy transparent reflexive analysis. Christians are of the belief that they must leave it to God to pass judgment on what their real motivation is. In this world there is no final word about themselves or others.

The decision of Christians must ultimately be made before the cross of Christ. This is their salvation; this is where the true meaning of their existence shines forth in clear light. But, as Saint Paul says, it is in the cross that God is victorious through the powerlessness and folly of him who dies upon it, even though he was unshakably convinced that with him God's kingdom had come. Christians' decisions must conform to the proclamation of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount. They must accept the folly of the cross which lays claim to Christians as their true wisdom. Saint Paul says that the foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of human beings, that what is lowly and rejected has been chosen by God that no flesh may glory in his sight and that the Scripture might be fulfilled which says that God's strength fulfills itself in weakness. This sentence sounds unworldly, indeed even pathetic and silly to those who wish to make God an immanent element of human history whose job it is to see to it that this history can always be understood and calculated and be brought to an outcome satisfactory to us. However, our reliance is not on a God who blesses weapons and guarantees success in this world. We try to believe in the incomprehensible God to whom we entrust ourselves precisely in view of the folly of the cross.

The horizon on which Christians have to make their decisions and which we have not described with anything even remotely approaching [27] the full treatment it deserves is valid, of course, not only for the conduct of private life. The Sermon on the Mount has political significance too. It is also a touchstone for public activity. It may not simply be relegated to the private sphere because it is the constitution of God's kingdom, and this kingdom extends to the peoples of the earth and is striving to manifest itself in concrete history. To be sure, the particular, objective individual norms governing public life and politics are different from those of the personal and private sphere and those used to shape the lifestyle of individuals for the simple reason that the realities that these norms are meant to regulate are different. When the plain and simple business of living obviously requires a definite way of acting, no one will hesitate to agree that there is no need whatever to appeal to the Sermon on the Mount and one can refrain from invoking the folly of the cross.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Anyone who is considering the construction of a bridge even as a form of moral achievement certainly need not bother about a blueprint that contradicts the most elementary rules of statics. But when we are dealing with questions of what it means to be a human being in the fullest sense of the term, with questions of a complexity that is beyond measure and that defies total analysis, with questions that do not admit of a universally accepted solution through the application of immediately evident objective norms, Christians have the right and the duty to appeal to the Sermon on the Mount and to make their decisions under the cross, under its folly and its powerlessness. Christian politicians must also make their decisions on this horizon. They are not permitted to be merely representatives of a lifestyle which in its understandable bourgeois character is first and foremost in possessione. Christianity is, after all, not a preservative, to be used as sparingly as possible, for the purpose of safeguarding a humane, rational, bourgeois lifestyle from excesses that also threaten it. However much the bearers of political power in a democratic society depend on the voters for their mandate and have to submit their power to the controls of constitutionally established institutions and not least of all to the cross fire of public opinion, they nonetheless still may not pass off their personal responsibility to others for what they do or fail to do.

The question of a truly Christian moral theology, precisely how the ethos of the Sermon on the Mount is to be interpreted, how its “appeals” and “calls” can be validated in the political arena, has of course not been answered in a complete and precise way in the few indications we have given here. What concrete chances the Sermon on the Mount actually has of becoming an element that helps to determine history and politics [28] is of course also an open question. It is sufficient here to avow that for Christians the Sermon on the Mount does have a part to play in political decision-making. Even our secular and political life will go astray if we fail to take into account the folly of the cross and the hope of eternal life in God.

If we now put the question of nuclear armament in this framework of the Christian horizon of decision and of specific Christian motivation, our conviction is that we must say no to nuclear armament. If precisely on the question of war and peace in the nuclear age, on such a radical and comprehensive question, we disallow this horizon of decision, how could we possibly continue to convince ourselves that the Sermon on the Mount and the folly of the cross still have a really radical meaning in our lives? If someone should reproach us with the fact that the principles of the Sermon on the Mount and of the folly of the cross are not otherwise tangibly evident in our lives either, we could still not accept this as a reason for not letting them have an effect in the question of nuclear armament.

Nuclear Disarmament

So from this standpoint we are for nuclear disarmament even if it means committing ourselves to unilateral steps. Thereby we actually consider the term “unilateral steps” to be one that discriminates against what Christians are really deciding when they renounce armament. For this term insinuates that it is a question of cunning calculation and of a trick that is not to be taken with total seriousness because one expects the other side to follow suit with “subsequent steps” and is resolved to rearm as quickly as possible should the other side fail to follow suit, or in any case does not follow quickly enough. What is meant here by the Christian decision is precisely that it is not part of a deal, but rather it moves beyond the area of this kind of give and take. Christians motivated by the appeal of the Sermon on the Mount, humanists basing their actions on radical-human considerations and on a consciousness of their responsibility for the future of humankind and of the totality of life – something for which there can be no completely adequate rational explanation – who decide to take this road must be aware of the danger it involves. The possibility of losing political freedom is something that cannot be excluded. It is part of their credibility to admit this danger.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But if they opt for disarmament even with unilateral steps – and if [29] this option in some way succeeds in influencing the practical politics of their country – they may also have the hope and the expectation that this decision will be a blessing for the world. Why should this hope be denied them? Should it be a reason for writing them off as absolutely unrealistic dreamers? If large-scale disarmament were obviously taking place and the other side began to be convinced that it was meant seriously, can anyone say for sure that the adversary's response would only be continued armament or even war or some other kind of political aggression? And if this kind of power politics were the only response we received for our disarmament, can anyone really prove that this would cost us our political freedom in the long run, or that this loss would not be overcome by some other form of resistance (as we have seen in the example of Gandhi)[2] even against a foreign enemy. How can we maintain that this kind of disarmament in the form of unilateral steps would not bring about profound changes in the Warsaw Pact countries or that the people in power there would always be able to maintain their present course and cling to those intentions that many of the proponents of armament are accustomed to impute to them?

The demand for disarmament is necessarily and inseparably bound up with the demand for a change of attitude and a change in our political modes of thought in many respects. If this kind of change does not occur among the countries of the world, alternative conceptions of political security will not be able to exercise a historical influence. As long as this change does not reach the politically influential groups in the different societies, these alternative conceptions will be either ignored by the significant part of the political and military experts in East and West who opt for the current conception of the threat of "assured mutual destruction," or these alternative conceptions of political security will be rejected outright as unrealistic and dangerous. The proponents of assured mutual destruction will argue that their conception, while expensive, is at least something that in the long run could be managed by the experts. They will talk about the conceivable "military use of nuclear force," deploring as irrational and as a danger to peace all the fear that such talk engenders in people.

To be sure, this change must occur in both of the power blocks if a new order of peace, or at least initially a coexistence of the different social systems without the threat of mutual destruction, is to be a real [30] political possibility. Here, however, we are concentrating the discussion on a change of attitude on our side, because without this change it is useless to expect that appeals to the other side will bear any fruit. What we are dealing with here is a lifesaving task; it is the most difficult political challenge of modern times. Both to us and to many reasonable and responsible people it is painfully clear that given the present political reality, there is no comprehensive and clearly viable solution in sight. This is something that has to be worked out step by step. Nonetheless we are relying on the possibility that there is a way out of the peril of a nuclear holocaust, one that is justifiable from a Christian point of view and that can be translated into practical politics, and from this standpoint we consider it our right and our duty to point out some directions that we (together with many others) see as lifesaving.

Even in the democracies of the West there is an inherent unrest that has to be overcome, but it cannot be overcome by armaments but only by a change in people's attitude, a change which in our opinion cannot be seriously expected by those who in fact consider armament to be our only solution. Despite all the threatening signs of a worldwide crisis for whose scope

[2] For a treatment of this difficult question, see the document of the Evangelical Church in Germany, Frieden wahren, fördern und erneuern.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

history provides no relevant example, the West, even up to the present day, does not seem to be capable of presenting an ethically, economically, and ecologically convincing conception for the further development of peace and freedom for the entire family of nations or of seriously dealing with the notions that the Third World has in this regard. Without a conception of this kind how could peace and freedom be guaranteed even for the West alone? Without a conception of this kind, which would certainly also include profound changes that are now becoming necessary in the capitalistic way of life, how could there be a permanently peaceful solution to the North-South conflict? If, then, this kind of change has become an inescapable necessity today at all events, why should we overlook this when dealing with the question of armament and say instead that in these questions a change in our way of thinking that has moral, economic, and ecological consequences has nothing to do with the question of our chance for disarmament?

We are for disarmament in explicit conjunction with a change of consciousness among ourselves which will make us attach a higher priority to the misery of several hundred million people living in absolute poverty than to our own need of security. But a policy that really takes this misery seriously is impeded from the very outset if economic assets and human talent are increasingly tied up in armament. And the industrial nations must also acknowledge their share of the responsibility for the [31] proliferation of armaments in the Third World. Not only do they bear part of the blame for many of the unresolved conflicts that have broken out in these countries, but they are also the chief exporters of munitions. And again, no one with two eyes in his or her head can be done with the matter by putting all the blame for this state of affairs on the Soviet striving for hegemony. Those who want to use the argument of legitimate security interests on the part of the receiver countries in individual cases should not close their eyes to the part played by the struggle of the superpowers on both sides for political and economic spheres of influence and by the desire to reap a profit from the sickness of deterrence, armament, and war that afflicts world society today.

THE BURDEN OF PROOF LIES ON THE POWERFUL

We now return to the point where our considerations began. In this peril our conscience points out two directional markers to us: the inescapable no to every use of nuclear weapons and, what for us is bound up with this, the demand for disarmament even with unilateral steps. First of all, we have to pause and become aware of the danger. So we support the appeal of the American peace movement calling for a freeze of nuclear weapons first of all in East and West – at least no further armament. This is still not enough, but halting is a presupposition for conversion. Markers are indispensable on a way that leads along dangerous precipices. Those who leave these markers out of fear and look for the way haphazardly are lost.

Others with a manifestly upright conscience are convinced that unilateral renunciation of nuclear armament, and especially large-scale unilateral disarmament, will only increase the danger of war. They consider the risks of nuclear armament even today to be smaller than the risks of a “pacifistic” position. We have given our reasons which show in an objective and in particular a Christian way what has led us to our position. We have also stated, and we repeat here, that we respect those who, even though they are working with us toward the goal of outlawing nuclear weapons unconditionally and toward the goal of total nuclear disarmament, and affirm the necessity of making a “constant and continuing effort” to abolish war in the atomic age, yet do not agree with us on the way to achieve this goal. People who claim for themselves the right and duty to form their own opinion in a situation of lethal danger would do well to call to mind Saint Thomas More’s attitude in taking up [32] his position. He

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

claimed the right and the duty to sustain his conviction to the point of death, but he did not set himself up as moral judge of those who took up a contrary position.

At the conclusion of our considerations, we should like to present two additional thoughts. The first is addressed to Christian and non-Christian opponents of our position. We are not dealing here with questions of personal morality. In the question of nuclear armament nations must make historical decisions that cannot be postponed and these decisions have to be borne alone. The opponents of our position also make decisions involving the greatest risk for those who do not go along with them. Therefore they have no right to say that those who oppose nuclear armaments do indeed have praiseworthy motives, but they should keep these motives for themselves and may not elevate them into norms that help to determine the political life of others.

The second thought concerns the question of the justification of a definite position and is addressed to the people who have to make the decisions. The burden of justifying a definite way as being pleasing to God rests first of all on the powerful and not on the powerless, on the rich and not on the poor, on the successful and not on the unsuccessful, on the shrewd and not on the simple. Those who ponder this will not place on the powerless who support disarmament the entire burden of proving how their way can be realized in the clash of the political powers. Rather, it is the powerful themselves who have the constant burden of proving why they do not decisively take this way. Can we not say that in case of doubt the way that God is showing us is the way of disarmament and not the way of nuclear armament? However Christians decide, they must proceed from the conviction that what is acknowledged by them to be evil cannot be justified even if in the judgment of those involved in the action a lofty and noble goal is to be achieved.[3]

[3] See Karl Rahner, 'The Catholic Church and the Peace Movement," in Karl Rahner in Dialogue: Conversations and Interviews 1965-1982, ed. Paul Imhof and Hubert Biallowons (New York: Crossroad, 1986), 359-61; and 'The Theological Dimension of Peace," in Theological Investigations 22, trans. Joseph Donceel (New York: Crossroad, London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1991), 38-42.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[33]

3

PLEA FOR A NAMELESS VIRTUE

All over the world people have explicitly recognized virtues, that is, ways of behaving that are morally good, and they have given these virtues names. It may be that they often did this only so as to be able to make demands on others. But still, nomenclatures and distinctions of this sort are unavoidable and they are useful. We see more clearly what we have to do. It makes it easier for us to check whether we are really living up to the moral demands placed upon us by our own nature and by our own life. Moral theologians and moral philosophers have worked out entire systems of virtues, subdividing them and showing their relationship to one another, and they have seen to it that there are no blank spaces on the map of our moral obligations.

The reason why ethics and moral theology today devote less attention to these catalogues of individual virtues may, perhaps, be due to the fact that they are concerned with questions antecedent to these descriptions and catalogues of individual modes of moral behavior. It may also be that we have the impression that this kind of greenhouse of individual virtues is not particularly useful for real life. But if in addition to knowing the things we are allowed to do as human beings and Christians, we also have to know how and why we are to act in face of the sheer variety of life and the multiplicity of its tasks, and if reflection also has its necessary and rightful place in the area of moral freedom, we must constantly inquire into the virtues, however we may choose to do it and whatever be the terminology we use in dealing with questions of this sort.

Are there virtues which have gone unnamed but which, even though practiced (we hope) in life, have received no explicit treatment in the reflection of moral theology and moral philosophy? Since all human tasks and modes of activity are interrelated, it is quite improbable that [34] a definite moral mode of behavior, even though it has not been given much reflection, could not be classified at all as belonging to an already known and explicitly named virtue, that is, that it has really remained nameless.

It is, however, possible that the theoretical reflection on the whole of morality has not grasped each and every individual element with equal clarity and explicitness with the result that one or other moral mode of behavior does remain nameless and is mostly lost sight of in a universal and abstract concept. The simple fact that the catalogues of virtues, ethical systems, and terminologies belonging to individual eras, civilizations, and styles of life were and are quite different and can hardly be brought into conformity with one another shows that something like this is quite conceivable. The lifestyle in one period of history unintentionally and unavoidably neglects this or that virtue which another lifestyle explicitly recognizes and cultivates. This cannot be explained solely by the fact that the extramoral and premoral conditions of human life vary and for this reason also require morally different ways of acting.

ANONYMOUS VIRTUE

Is it possible to give a concrete example that would substantiate the a priori expectation that there must be virtues that have remained anonymous? As has already been said, when something like this is attempted, one must always allow for the objection that what is meant has long since been known and that it has been named and is called this or that. But this is no problem, provided only that what is meant is now seen more clearly and is marked off from something else and something of a more universal nature under which it has been concealed until now. The remaining difficulty, of course, consists in whether or not a brief and understandable new name can also be suggested for what is meant. But even if a brief and clear baptismal name can still not be suggested for what is meant and has been discovered, the problem presented can still have a meaning and a solution. One simply draws attention with many words to a definite moral mode of behavior and leaves it to others to find an individual and understandable word for it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We proceed from the distinction often or usually prevailing in moral activity between the problematic uncertainty of the rational-reflexive justification of a moral attitude and the absoluteness of a free decision as such. We always, or almost always (it is to be hoped), have good reasons [35] for a moral decision, but these are rarely absolutely beyond doubt. There are usually serious reasons and justifications on the other side for an opposite decision, and yet the free act as such is itself unambiguous and absolute, and, if we examine it more closely, irreversible. It cannot be reached by that "on the one hand – on the other hand" consideration, by those reservations which are part of the nature of rational reflection. All of the traditional "moral systems" in Catholic moral theology presuppose this divergence between an ambiguous theory and practice that must be unambiguous, and they endeavor to provide principles that will enable a person to deal with this dichotomy. These principles are of no further interest to us here. What is important here is what all of these systems presuppose – namely, that quite often the moral reflection antecedent to the action itself cannot provide that unambiguousness and unquestionable certainty with which, whether we want it or not, we nonetheless perform the action itself.

SKEPTICAL RELATIVISM

In this situation that confronts us countless times in our lives a twofold (false) reaction is initially conceivable. In a skeptical relativism the significance of the moral reflection preceding the action can be devalued with the idea that this is not the important thing since it cannot provide the absolute unambiguousness which necessarily characterizes the action. This attitude of relativism is widespread, especially in respect to religious and ideological problems. We are aware of the problematic nature of all rational, fundamental-theological justification antecedent to an ideological decision of this kind, and so we consider it to be useless and superfluous. We feel justified in making the decision arbitrarily, according to whim, origin, and so on. On the theoretical level, we remain in an attitude of indecisiveness that refuses to be pinned down and think that in this way we have escaped making a decision. But that is not really the case at all since the refusal to make a decision is the very decision itself and quite assuredly not the best one. Or we refuse to accept the problematic nature of the moral reflections antecedent to a decision; we deny to ourselves and others that there is a problem; we declare that the rational reflexive justification of our own decision is in every respect absolutely obvious and that there are no serious grounds to the contrary that have not long since been convincingly refuted for every honest and intelligent person.

[36]

IDEOLOGICAL FANATICISM

Right up to our own day this kind of ideological fanaticism has been all too common among Christians in their confessional disputes. Even in the area of ideological, fundamental-theological and apologetic argumentation people on both sides acted all too often as though

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the justification for their own standpoint were completely clear and only ignorance and ill will could prevent people from recognizing this. Even the language of the First Vatican Council (DS 3009) proceeds somewhat naively on the assumption that the true religion must necessarily contain fundamental-theological arguments which must be immediately evident to every well-instructed person of goodwill. Catholic fundamental theology was not always and everywhere immune to the error that the certainty of fundamental-theological argumentation must more or less coincide with the absoluteness of the assent of faith itself.

In all areas (not only in the religious area) this kind of attitude, which wants to see the unavoidable absoluteness of the free decision as something already present in the antecedent examination of its objective and ethical justification, is precisely what constitutes the real nature of ideological fanaticism. Skeptical relativism which thinks that it can dispense itself from making a decision and ideological fanaticism which wants to derive the absoluteness of the free decision from an absoluteness of the rational consideration, an absoluteness which does not really exist, are the two false consequences that can very easily result from the insuperable difference between the problematic nature of reflection and the absoluteness of decision, between theory and practice.

THE MIDDLE WAY BETWEEN THE TWO EXTREMES

Between these two extremes there is a middle way. It is a virtue and it seems to me that this virtue is nameless. This middle way which takes seriously the antecedent reflection on the justification of a decision and which nonetheless does not demand more of the reflection than it can provide, which honestly admits its problematic nature and despite this does not stand in the way of the courage for a serene and brave decision, is the hallmark of the proper self-understanding of a person who is neither the god of an absolute and universal certainty and clarity nor the creature of a sterile arbitrariness which views everything as equally right and equally wrong, a person who has human qualities that command [37] respect even if these qualities do not have the effulgence of the divine or the transparence of the obvious.

It is difficult to steer this middle course because there is no way of justifying its concrete application by referring back to an absolutely obvious and indisputable principle. It belongs to that area of life wisdom which intellectual acumen cannot alone provide. Ultimately it does not matter whether one along with Saint Thomas Aquinas calls this virtue an intellectual virtue or whether one calls it a moral virtue. It is the virtue that takes theoretical rationality seriously and yet does not turn practice into a merely secondary derivation of theory, but rather acknowledges an ultimate independence and underivability of freedom and of practice. It is the virtue of active respect for the mutual relationship of theory and practice, of knowledge and freedom, and at the same time for their disconsonance. It is the virtue of the unity and diversity of the two realities without which one would be sacrificed in favor of the other.

It seems to me that there is a behavior of this kind and therefore that a human virtue of this kind does exist. But what name are we to give it? That is difficult to say. If we were to call it the courage to make a decision that is meaningful and is still not simply the product of rationality, we would have chosen a too general and indefinite name because it would obviously contain more than is meant here. And so it would seem that this important virtue has no brief and generally understandable name. Presumably the ultimate reason for this is to be found in the fact that the relationship between theory and practice even today remains an obscure problem in philosophy. The virtue we are looking for can of course be subsumed under the virtue of prudence or perhaps that of wisdom. But if we subsume it in this way, something particular becomes lost in something that is general.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Whether or not this virtue's name is known is in the end not so important. But this virtue ought to be practiced. Today, especially, when one could get the impression that the majority of humankind is divided into weary relativists and obstinate fanatics.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[38]

4

INTELLECTUAL PATIENCE WITH OURSELVES

The simplest things that wise people do spontaneously are often the things that can be talked about only in a cumbersome and tedious way. One of these simple things is, in my opinion, having patience with ourselves.

IS PATIENCE SOMETHING OBVIOUS?

It seems obvious to me that in general people need to have patience with themselves. But it is one of those obvious things that we do not really succeed at very well. There may be people who feel that they do not need to have patience with themselves because they are living in complete accord with themselves and what they are doing. But I hope we will not envy the good fortune of these simple souls. If we look at ourselves honestly, we shall see quite readily that we are not yet done with ourselves; we cannot produce a state of total accord with ourselves by a simple command, nor by a psychological trick or something of that sort. And so, in the absence of such complete accord with ourselves and in view of the fact that we are powerless to achieve this peace, we need to have patience with ourselves.

The person inside us that we really are greets painfully the person that we want to be. Here we are omitting the question whether we would be people who are still in a process of becoming and who have a future before us if this difference did not exist; the question whether this peace with ourselves would not be death; the question how one might conceive [39] this peace so that it would be worth striving for as eternal life and eternal peace. In any event, however, we are now on the way; we are living between a past and a future, both of which, each in its own way, is concealed from us. We never have everything together that we have to live from. We are always conditioned historically, manipulated sociologically, and threatened biologically – and we know it. We can try to repress our knowledge of this situation; we can try to accept stoically what we cannot change; we can misuse the really good things of life as an anodyne for the mysterious disquietude of our existence and when this concealed disquietude manifests itself, we can interpret it as psychic depression that we have to weather or combat with a wide array of tranquilizers.

But if we have the courage to let this disquietude encounter us, if we do not turn from it but rather accept it without simply interpreting it as the stuff that forges heroes and without letting it reduce us to despair, then we have patience with ourselves; we are in agreement that we have not yet found pure harmony with ourselves. There are many people who think they have this patience and that it is the most obvious thing in the world. But if these people would take a closer look at themselves, they would see that they are not really accepting patiently the pain of their own disquietude, untransfigured and without animosity, but rather that they are seeking refuge in the routine of day-to-day existence, and in this way are claiming to be objective and sober. Or they would see that they are dominated by a despair that they do not admit or by a desperate resignation, and that they really feel that there is no sense in living. They would see that they are not practicing patience in the face of the questionableness of existence, but rather are practicing how to look the other way and get the substitute for patience with which they think life can also be lived.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE PATIENT PERSON IS SERENE

People who are truly patient, however, really endure their disquietude. They accept it and do not turn away from the pain it brings. Truly patient people further endure the fact that they do not know for sure whether they are really accepting this disquietude in patience or whether they are not really rejecting it by erecting a cheap façade of patience. Patient people are patient with their own impatience and so serenely and almost cheerfully renounce any final accord with themselves. They do not really [40] know the origin of this serenity in which they acquiesce; they hope that they have it. Indeed, in cheerful confidence they make no attempt to close themselves off from the anodynes of the impatient because they are precisely the ones who can handle them since they do not allow them to have any lasting effect. Patient people are serene and so they are free.

What we have become involved in when we acquiesce in this serene patience is a question that we cannot consider further here. In respect to this question there will be people who think that they have become involved in nothingness and so they could be the victors who from this standpoint overcome in themselves the dissonance of finite realities. There are other people who are convinced that nothingness, when understood in its true sense, is useless, that it has no power to produce peace. It is their conviction, rather, that when they really let go of themselves and accept the unrest, they have, whether they reflect on it or not, become involved with the one who is called God in the sense that this word is really understood in everyday existence, and that this involvement in God's silent incomprehensibility can succeed only because God in his grace accepts those who "let go of themselves."

Perhaps you yourselves have already grown impatient and feel that your impatience is justified. Your impatience may be justified in respect to my discourse on patience; however, it would not be justified if it were directed against the reality itself that I am attempting to indicate with my stammering words, if it were directed against that patient composure in the face of ambiguity, the composure that I presume exists among you and that is known as patience.

THE MENTAL CLIMATE OF OUR TIMES: BOUNDLESS KNOWLEDGE

If we are to speak further about intellectual patience or, better, about patience with the limitations and incalculability of our knowledge, we must first speak about an inescapable mental climate in which we find ourselves today as opposed to former times. Never before has humankind known as much as it knows today. People today have more than just a vague notion of how to keep body and soul together; they do more than just keep the memory of the past alive in myth, saga, and perhaps with a smattering of history; they work at more than just a bit of metaphysics with a lot of effort and a great many setbacks; they [41] do not just practice religion and stammer about the divine in many tongues.

Today people work at science. They explore nature systematically; in psychology and psychoanalysis they see what makes them tick; in more recent times they have conquered new fields of knowledge like the social sciences. They develop a philosophy of their own sciences and then investigate the history of all these sciences. Even their everyday life experiences are erected into structures of systematic knowledge. They develop data processing systems and methods of storing their own knowledge.

Today all the countries in the world and the lives of everybody living in them have become part of this systematic process of science and they are involved in a continuous exchange. The number of books published is increasing at a dizzying pace; libraries are getting bigger and bigger; new methods of storing scientific data are being discovered; the progress of knowledge is no longer being left to chance or to arbitrary insight and inspiration but is being systematically calculated in advance, even though precisely in this way new elements are emerging that cannot be calculated, and the unity of all these sciences and the directions they are going to take are not things that can be planned in advance.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But if "people" know infinitely more than they used to, they at once become terribly embarrassed when asked who these "people" actually are that know so much and are increasing their knowledge as such a rate of speed. I am not one of these "people"; there can no longer be any one human being who can stand for these "people" who have such enormous knowledge. The desire to become a universal polymath is something we have had to forgo. The most intelligent are condemned to being narrow specialists (to use the current derogatory term) and to remaining such.

Of course even today we can strive for the broadest possible education; we can put a few encyclopedic reference works on our bookshelves which always contain a ludicrously small number of books; we can frequent reference libraries; in what are known as interdisciplinary dialogues we can listen to what others know and what they have to tell us and come away with the impression that we do not after all really understand what we are being told by one of the representatives of another science.

To a certain extent, of course, we can profit from the knowledge of others by turning on the radio or by using a computer that we would be Incapable of constructing ourselves. We can master the necessary tricks [42] that show us how to make an ostensible contribution to every discussion without at the same time betraying our ignorance, but in the end that is no help either.

Measured by the yardstick of the amount of knowledge available in principle at any given time, the individual person today is becoming progressively more ignorant. In former times people knew relatively little but an individual person could know almost all of what was then known. Today people know a great deal, but the individual can know only a tiny fragment of this. To be sure, this enormous amount of knowledge available in principle today can be stored in libraries and computers, and means can certainly be found to enable individuals quickly and conveniently to call up from this mass of knowledge just what they need right here and now or what they might be curious about. This, however, presupposes that these individuals are still capable of realizing that there is something of interest or use to them here and now that they do not yet know, a presupposition that is by no means obvious anymore.

But all this knowledge stored in books and computers is in itself alone only the material distillation of real knowledge and it will become real knowledge only when it is once again restored to the consciousness of real human beings. A human library on Mars would in fact no longer be a human library. But as opposed to former times, this knowledge that has taken on material form can no longer in its totality be translated back into the consciousness of the individual as such. So the fact remains: the individual as such, who alone can be the real repository of true knowledge, is becoming progressively more ignorant.

That might not be so bad because, as the saying goes, "What you don't know won't hurt you." In the case of individuals, however, this applies only when they are unaware of their lack of knowledge. Almost everyone knows today how enormously this ignorance can be repressed and how people can take an all-too-naive pleasure in the number of things really known to them. People who think that the really crucial knowledge the world needs is stored in their own little brains can actually fancy themselves to be educated people and they can even be pompous, narrow specialists. But today in a way never before possible, we can also become aware of the distance between what we do know and what we can know. Whether or not this dawning awareness of our ignorance may be called a docta ignorantia, a learned ignorance, is a question we can leave open. In any case, however, this ignorance is very painful for us and it is humiliating.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[43]

THE FUNDAMENTAL LACK OF CONCEPTUAL CLARITY

Before proceeding any further we must point out another characteristic of our actual knowledge. This particular element has its origin in the enormous sphere of ignorance that surrounds our knowledge. To a degree heretofore unknown, this ignorance is relentlessly corroding the clarity of our concepts and the intrinsic consistency of our knowledge and threatening them. Conceptual precision and clarity, the delight of previous generations, is now diminishing rapidly. To be sure, in the past this clarity may to a great extent have been due to an ignorance that people were simply not aware of, and this made clear and simple thinking easy. It is easy to draw straight lines on a plane surface; in the past it was easy for people to define something if they were unaware of the obscure and problematic nature of the elements used in defining the concept.

For us today, however, each and every individual reality that we contemplate is related in many ways to countless other individual realities that would have to be taken into account if the first reality is to be rendered clear and distinct; and all the other individual realities, which would have to be understood in order to understand the first, begin to blur and disappear in a dense fog of the obscure and the unknown.

In the area of material realities who can still tell us what substance, time, space, and place mean? Can we still make a plain and simple statement about the human being today without being constantly tormented by the awareness that we have neglected or been ignorant of a thousand things that we really should have known and taken into consideration if we wanted to make an honest and responsible attempt to make such a statement? Is there anyone of us today who can use a concept of theology or philosophy without worrying about whether this concept has been used much too naively and superficially if we really do not know the whole complicated history of this concept? Do we not constantly have to ask ourselves whether we may use such concepts when we really know that their history has been treated somewhere or other in scholarly tomes that we have not had time to read in our brief lifetime? Are we not becoming increasingly unsure of what we are saying? Is it so easy to counter this by a reflexively produced naiveté?

In view of all this, the decline in the consistency of our knowledge is obvious. In former times we had at our disposal only a relatively limited [44] amount of knowledge that could be kept in clear view and that was more or less – at least to our own satisfaction – structured in clear concepts, and for this reason its intrinsic coherence and its freedom from inconsistency was also obvious. However limited an individual's knowledge is when compared with the knowledge actually available today, it is, nonetheless, still enormous taken in itself and thus it is no longer possible for an individual to gain a full grasp of the mutual consistency of its individual elements. If an individual today should subject his or her knowledge to an honest and objective appraisal, he or she would have to say, "So much knowledge, so many opinions and views from every side have found their way into the storehouse of my consciousness that, try as I may, I really couldn't tell you anymore if and how it all fits together, and I couldn't even tell you how even in principle it could be synthesized into a consistent 'system.' "

All things considered, however, this has been the lot of human beings from time immemorial, since people have always been burdened with errors which were incompatible with other true insights that they had. But this situation of an insuperable inconsistency in the whole of our knowledge in itself has been exacerbated tremendously. Our knowledge is too vast for us to bring it even to some small degree of harmony. What we say today contradicts what we said yesterday and we do not even notice it. What can also happen, of course, is that given the lack of clarity in our concepts, we think we have discovered a contradiction

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between two statements and we challenge someone, even though these two statements might really be quite compatible if the concepts used and the limitations implied in both statements were clear.

In any event, the fragmentation of our consciousness has increased and we are aware of it. Indeed, we cannot refrain from considering others to be obtuse, naive, and primitive if they are not aware of this fragmentation and fail in their utterances to realize the lack of clarity in their concepts and the inconsistency in their knowledge.

That is the situation of our consciousness today. Overcoming this situation to the extent that it can be overcome is certainly a constant challenge and a task that we have to master. But we must also have the courage to see and to admit that this situation of increasing "stupidity," of an increasing lack of clarity in our concepts, and an inconsistency in our knowledge is ultimately insuperable, that it is the price that we constantly have to pay for the immense increase of our knowledge.

[45]

THE INTELLECTUAL VIRTUE OF PATIENCE

What are we to do in the face of this situation that holds inexorable sway over us? As we said at the beginning of our discourse: patience is necessary. We must have patience even in the face of our own ignorance. We have got to understand that this patience is anything but obvious, that it is no easy task. Those who are only ignorant are not even aware of their own ignorance and so they need no patience with their intellectual situation. But those who are wise in their ignorance – and I hope that we belong to this group – experience the bitter pain of their ignorance and must learn how to bear it in patience.

In this situation we must always ask ourselves whether we are avoiding the danger of letting ourselves sink impatiently into a skeptical resignation, whether we are not covertly attempting to rid ourselves of this task of patience in some other way, by repressing the situation or by taking naive pleasure in the knowledge we do have. We must ask ourselves whether we really do have this patience and are practicing it even when it seems to us to be obviously present among the virtues that we possess. If on this question we feel that we can quite readily set our conscience at ease, we would have to ask ourselves whether we have really faced the pain of our ignorance that today more than ever before is imposed upon us or whether we are wrongly allowing ourselves to be satisfied with our paltry knowledge, a satisfaction that is not permitted us.

I would now like to make a timorous attempt to show some of the implications of this patience that our situation requires of us. This might help us to understand a little better what is actually meant by this intellectual virtue of patience, this unknown virtue.

Patience as a Way to God

First of all, this patience is akin to that real docta ignorantia of which philosophers remotely speak and which mystics in East and West strive to attain, if we experience that an infinite ocean of nameless mystery spreads out beyond the pitifully small island of our knowledge, and if we interpret this experience in the light of the experience that we have previously been speaking about, perhaps the unity of this twofold experience can bring us a little closer to the enormous courage of the saints and mystics who submerged their soul in its source, and awaken [46] this courage in us too. For they experience this ocean of holy mystery bounding "the tiny island of their knowledge" no longer as a boundary that confines them; they dare to set out on this ocean; they are not afraid that its silent immensity will swallow them up; they

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

entrust themselves to this "unknown that is known," seeing in it the blessed mystery that shelters them. They dare to enter the void of their consciousness. The individual elements of knowledge cease to exist, and in the ensuing "nothingness" they experience the real and comprehensive truth that can no longer be divided up into a number of individual propositions.

We may proceed no further here in our discussion of this ineffable mystery which transforms the pain of ignorance and of our own obtuseness into the blessedness of the light which to our everyday consciousness appears as a dark night. Nor need we spend much time here warning of the dangers that at least Christians are aware of who know that the patient endurance of our earthly multiplicity and inconsistency is ultimately the only way that leads through the reality of death with Jesus, the crucified, to the blessed incomprehensibility of the true God; who know that true mystics must always be ready to leave their sublime contemplation, their mystical silence, and divide their bread with the needy; and that the solemn festival of blessed union with the incomprehensible mystery can be celebrated only when they have plodded through the drudgery of everyday existence and its duties. Here we only wanted to suggest briefly the notion that the patience we have undertaken to praise might also be the entrance gate to that docta ignorantia that brings all human knowledge in its distracting details into the light which we Christians even today do not hesitate to call God.

Patience and Tolerance

But this patience with our intellectual situation contains still other implications. Let us consider tolerance first. On the one hand, we say that people should be tolerant of one another, but that truth is inexorably intolerant of error. That is assuredly a maxim that we can and must subscribe to. It is really not our intention here to talk about a convenient relativism. Nor are we denying the fact that the legitimate freedom to make concrete decisions necessarily involves a certain unyielding intolerance toward those who want to decide differently, even if we might wish this to be otherwise. Not everything in the world can always be settled by a compromise that suits everybody.

[47] Nevertheless, if the reasons we have given for intellectual patience are correct, we can see that the truth which is our human truth and not God's divine truth involves in and of itself a dimension of tolerance. For our statements and concepts, however correct and true they maybe, and hence certainly not willing to accept a contrary statement as equally justified, point of their very nature to unknown elements which, had they been known and taken into consideration, would also cause these statements and concepts to appear in a different light, inasmuch as these are always statements and concepts that point beyond themselves. The unknown elements would require us to be more cautious in interpreting these statements in their approximate truth. They would make it understandable that these finite and historical statements of ours, even if their validity remains intact, would have much less need of rejecting as error the things that someone else is attempting to assert as truth.

It was an axiom of scholastic philosophy that an abstraction did not necessarily imply an error: Abstrahentium non est mendacium. This axiom is correct, but it is also a dangerous axiom which those with excessive zeal for their own convictions pervert over and over again. Not only in God's heaven are there many rooms, but also in the house of the one, all-embracing truth.

Those who experience the pain of their own ignorance and endure it with patience can be more tolerant, and genuinely tolerant, in the area of ideology than those who view this tolerance as nothing more than a convenience for people who have to live with one another

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

but are divided in their views. To anyone who has the impression that the legitimate and inexorable claim of truth over all the facile forms of relativism hardly leaves room for the tolerance which we have just tried to show as an intrinsic characteristic of our human truth, then, prior to the quite necessary and altogether possible attempts to reconcile this apparent contradiction, I would say that an admittedly temporary lack of compatibility between the adamant stand on behalf of the truth on the one hand and tolerance on the other has to be endured with the patience we are talking about. It is quite possible that this reconciliation of tolerance with inexorable conviction is also a task that has to be mastered anew as is true in thousands of other cases where we adhere to two truths and convictions without clearly seeing that they are inherently compatible even though they are apparently contradictory. Those who really manage to have intellectual patience with themselves will also be tolerant toward their neighbors and will not behave as though they were absolute truth in person.

[48]

Knowledge and Freedom

We are all called upon to exercise this patience in yet another way. There is always a radical tension between our knowledge and our freedom. In a certain sense our free acts are irrevocable and hence absolute, while the knowledge leading to these decisions cannot fully justify their irrevocability. There are always reasons for deciding one way or another, even though this does not mean that the reasons are equally valid. Choosing among these reasons, freedom makes its decision for one course of action and translates this into reality, leaving the other course perpetually unrealized. For us today, the ever-present condition of incalculability between insight and freedom which then turns freedom into something more than the mere executor of reason has become more acute as a result of the situation now calling upon our patience.

More than ever before, the insight that forms the basis of our decisions is fragmentary and vague. We have to make our decisions knowing that we are ignorant of many things which, if they were known to us, would actually render our free decisions transparent and innocuous. Today, more than ever before, we know that all our decisions are hazardous ventures into the unknown. Of course we do have to decide because usually the attempt to abstain from making an unambiguous decision would itself amount to a decision, one that would usually be the worst possible decision and the one least capable of being justified. But these decisions that must be made and so in principle have a moral right to stand despite their lack of lucidity must still be made on the basis of a rational justification which is always strained beyond its limits, and this tension causes us pain. But this is why patience, the endurance of the present-day tension between rational insight and free decision, is especially difficult and yet at the same time more necessary than ever.

Today our intellect, when called upon to make a free decision possible and to justify this decision, is harassed by countless contradictory reasons; yet it still may not permit us to cast aside our rational responsibility and make things easier for ourselves by making our decisions in a purely arbitrary way. How difficult it is today to steer between the extremes of succumbing, on the one hand, to a weary skepticism and relativism that see everything as equally right and equally wrong, and boast of a detachment and wisdom capable of dissolving everything into a void, and of paying homage, on the other hand, to a fanaticism that sees no need of a rational justification that requires us to bridle the vehemence of our emotions and subject its concepts and arguments to an [49] objective examination if we are going to use it as a basis for acting. Our times and our generation would, however, probably not seek refuge in a voluntaristic irrationalism because the rationality that we are capable of having sees more clearly today how fragmentary and arduous everything is, provided that it does not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

overestimate itself and that it has patience with its own inadequacy that it has realized and suffered through.

IN WINTRY TIMES: PATIENCE

Presumably we could expand our considerations into a treatise on one of the dianoetic virtues as they used to be called. It was a conviction in former times that the dimension of knowledge viewed in itself contained not only technically developed skills, but that this cognitive dimension itself was also composed of elements that called for a moral qualification, that is, virtues, as paradoxical as this statement might appear at first glance. The times we live in are to a great extent blind and can see no virtue in cognition and knowledge but only a proficiency that is ultimately not subject to value-judgment, and hence is more or less free of responsibility. The potential for catastrophe present in this cognition that is blind to values is therefore usually not noticed until it is too late. But this cannot be treated in greater detail here.

I shall speak no further of the patience that we must have today in view of our cognitive limitations. I hope that I have not overtaxed your patience. It seems to me that as a result of the progress we are experiencing today in all the dimensions of knowledge, individuals have the growing feeling that they know very little and are not able to overcome the inadequacy of their knowledge; that the intoxicating pleasure of former times that accompanied the acquisition of ever new knowledge is denied them, without their being allowed for these reasons to commit mental suicide; that therefore they must have patience with themselves as in wintry times.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[50]

5

A BASIC THEOLOGICAL AND ANTHROPOLOGICAL UNDERSTANDING OF OLD AGE

You could say that I must be the right person for this job. I am a theologian and I shall soon be eighty years old. But things are not quite as simple as that. After all, in traditional theology aging and old age are not subjects that have been explicitly treated in any great detail. Hence any theology of old age would have to begin with research in other anthropological disciplines to ascertain what they know about old age. It would then have to ask whether and how this knowledge has theological significance and whether theology can bring this knowledge to a deeper level.

But an investigation of this kind also presumes a competence that I do not possess and at my age am no longer capable of attaining – not even for a contribution to a theological gerontology. For example, when I delve into Simone de Beauvoir's huge tome on old age and am confronted with the enormous amount of information contained in this book (information which, however, has not always been effectively synthesized), the task I am expected to perform could discourage a person of my age.[1] But I have the feeling (and this itself is a tiny contribution to this theology of old age) that a touch of timidity is permitted because honest patience with one's own weakness and pusillanimity is both a prerogative of old age as well as a challenge to it.

Nor can I simply collate and assemble the explicit theological statements that Scripture and tradition have made on the subject of old age. [51] Scripture itself has perhaps said a great many important and wonderful things on this subject, but it assuredly does not contain an explicit and consistently structured theology of old age. Hence any attempt to construct a systematic teaching from the statements of Scripture would, properly speaking, yield only the system of the particular theologian making this attempt, but not really that of Scripture itself. Recourse to the Church's tradition would quite quickly find it necessary to move beyond this tradition into the immeasurable breadth and multiplicity of the most diverse styles characteristic of aging and old age and their interpretation in human history because human life experience and life experience that is explicitly Christian cannot be completely distinguished from one another.

OLD AGE AS A HISTORICAL AND SOCIAL PHENOMENON

The human process of aging and old age that we ourselves experience is a union of nature and history, physiology and social situation (or however one wants to describe this indissoluble unity in duality that determines the total existence of human beings throughout all of their dimensions) that defies total analysis. Human beings have a "nature" about which the natural sciences today, from physics to biology, from paleontology to modern medicine, can tell us an enormous number of things that can be used in a scientific gerontology. This gerontology tells us how this biological creature, the human being, grows old and how this aging process affects all the dimensions of human beings reaching right up to the very tip of their highest mental and spiritual faculties.

These natural sciences (along with a psychology of old age that is also based on natural

[1] Simone de Beauvoir, La vieillesse (Paris, 1970).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

science) can also describe how this aging proceeds, even though they perhaps do not ultimately know why this complex biological reality known as a human being inevitably grows old and dies. But even though all these natural sciences together have developed their gerontology, human aging and old age have not been completely described, and so it is not possible to say that individuals understand their own old age and know how to deal with it properly on the basis of scientific information alone. Rather, aging and old age, despite their ultimately inseparable union with their biological side, are phenomena of a social, historical, and cultural kind.

One can say (from the standpoint of natural science) that human beings always grow old and die in the same way. (For example, in the [52] mummies of the most ancient times physicians can discover the same illnesses that we still have today.) One can also say (from the social and historical standpoint) that aging, old age, and dying in every historical period and social situation (both of which are constantly changing) are completely different. The second statement is also true.

In primitive tribes old age and dying are experienced differently from the way we experience them today in a home for the aged. The way society views old age, the power or lack of power that old people have, the number of old people and their average life expectancy, economic and medical possibilities of dealing with the situation of old age, and so on in different cultures, different economic systems and social orders reveal an enormous variety of forms, so that one might almost say that in the different historical periods and cultures almost the only point of agreement in respect to old age is that it ends in death.

Moreover, the explicit interpretation of old age and death in different cultures, religions, and worldviews itself works retroactively in helping to determine how aging and dying will be experienced in the concrete, so that from this standpoint as well the most diverse styles characteristic of the way old people live and die can be found. And finally, human beings for their part in their unity and incalculable quality are not merely random specimens of a genus or of a collective entity but also unique individuals who help to shape their own lives in inalienable freedom. So in this light, too, old age is not merely a social and cultural-historical phenomenon in a socio-cultural context but also a part of the ever unique individual that every human being is.

If, then, old age is both a union of nature and history that cannot ultimately be completely dissolved and an existence that is ever unique, for us old people this has a simple, yet strange consequence, and dealing with this is also part of the burden and the challenge of our old age. We are nature; that is, we have to accept ourselves as people who are growing old biologically together with everything that this inexorably implies in regard to the waning of our vitality and of our intellectual powers as well, without making a senseless protest against God and the nature willed by him. Our old age is also a historical and social phenomenon. We do indeed have the right and the duty to attempt to influence present history and our society and to change them so that they will become more humane and more just, but this historical and social situation which our old age helps to determine and which itself is a part of our old age is for the most part practically unalterable in the time still remaining to us. And so this situation must be accepted with [53] serenity and patience, and this acceptance is something that is part of our old age if we live it successfully.

OLD AGE AND THE PAST

Old age also inexorably means that, as a matter of fact, we have most of our life behind us. This is a truism, but we have to consider this statement closely in order to understand what it really means. If we are talking about “a matter of fact,” this term is just the right one. Our past (at least at first glance – we shall also have to take a second look) is an objective "matter" which came to be through the "way" in which we exercised our freedom, and in a true sense this past has become definitive. But the person who thinks more exactly and profoundly, particularly if he or she is a Christian, must be taken aback by our remark that we have our life "behind us." For we should really have to say that in old age we now have our life present "before us." Out of countless possibilities, as though out of a dark ground, which lies behind us as something "given" and not subject to our disposal, the free history of our life, by means of our free actions, brought the concrete shape of our life forth and brought it before us. And this concrete shape of our life is something that is and it stands before the critical gaze of our memory and what we have stored up there. Whatever may be the case in regard to the events of mere natural history once they have happened and are past, the human being's past with its history of actual freedom is not just something that once was and has now simply fallen down into the nothingness of what has ceased to exist, something that is dissolved and is nothing anymore.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Precisely because in freedom it once became the way it is, our life is, not gone, but rather it has gone forth from the dark ground of the merely possible as something eternally real. However one may explain this fact of the eternally abiding character of the history of freedom, and it is certainly not easy, the fact remains. To understand it better one may have recourse to the idea of the "Book of Life," the heavenly book in which God has inscribed all of our deeds according to which he will judge us. Or one may prefer to understand it in terms of the soul. The substantial and abiding ground of our spiritual soul receives from the actions of our lives permanent impressions which no longer pass away, even though we forget them and other waters of time flow over this ground. Or perhaps we can succeed in making present to ourselves the [54] permanence of our free history, which only seems to be past, in contrast to our dangerous "forgetfulness." Whatever explanation we choose, it is ultimately secondary. The inescapable fact remains that now in old age we are the persons that we have become throughout the whole of our lives.

We can try to forget this or to repress it. In old age our brain undergoes physiological changes that can make it impossible for us to recollect many things from our past or can cause us to remember events long past more clearly than things that have recently happened. Our remembrance of our own past can be colored in a way that does not correspond to its reality; we see things in a kindlier or more terrifying light than is really warranted. None of these things alter the fact that in old age we are the persons that we have become throughout the whole of our lives. Herein lies an immense challenge for us in our old age. It is not the only one, not entirely, since we are still living our lives and we do still have some future that we have to shape. When we old people think frequently and intensely about our past life, this is not an idle exercise nor need it make us sad. Old age still has a great deal of work to do on the history of its past life. The shape that we have given to our lives and that we now are is not yet complete.

Under certain circumstances this shape can be changed quite radically and improved. If we were now to proceed under the catchword "contrition," our considerations would be too limited. Christians are certainly aware that when they turn to God in repentance and conversion, to God who is also Lord of their own past, the God of forgiveness, they can give their past life an entirely new interpretation, they can give it another shape, a radically new meaning. But as true as it is that we cannot forgive ourselves the evil of our past life, but rather must and can let ourselves be forgiven by God in humble love, still the notion of contrition and forgiveness can easily lead to the misunderstanding that the evil past is only blotted out and thus simply sinks into the abyss of what is merely past. If we consider the matter more exactly, however, contrition and conversion do not erase the past but transform it by God's action in our lives. The past, even the evil past, receives a new meaning. But this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

gives old age a great and positive task in respect to life past, and it makes it possible to accomplish this task.

There is a lot of talk today about "overcoming the past." This is mostly idle chatter that does not even understand itself. But the person who is old has a really blessed task and one that can be accomplished. Perhaps it would be better to call this a new shaping of the past rather than overcoming [55] the past. Old people can still learn; they can learn things from the past that help to interpret this past anew. They can eliminate the bitterness that has accumulated in them like sediment. They can acquire a better understanding of their lives than they have had before. They can become wiser and more serene. By turning to God and together with him they themselves may once again with the forgiving God judge the shortcomings and dark elements of their lives mercifully and grant pardon; with the Church's liturgy they may interpret all this felix culpa, "happy fault."

Looking at our own past life can make us more tolerant of others. We can try to reduce the lifetime accumulation of aggression and prejudices against ourselves, against others, and against the outward circumstances of our lives. (In an hour of peace and quiet we need but attempt such a "revision of life" to see how much has to be done in this area and how much could be done.) In a word, old age has not only the eventual task of repentance, in the narrower sense of the word, in respect to guilt incurred in past life, a guilt which has not ceased to exist merely because it is part of the temporal past; over and above this, old age has also an almost boundless task in respect to what we have become in the past and now still are. We old people are not finished with our lives yet. In a true sense everything is still open; only the future will reveal the outcome of life's drama. And everything that is inexorable in the light of the past is subject to the verdict of the God of a love that can transform everything, and who can also change our past life into blessed freedom without having to wipe it out. In his eternity all our time can remain valid and yet be so transformed that our time has been preserved and can then be accepted without regret. To be sure, our hope of this has its source in a faith that is credible only in the light of Jesus Christ and his message. That faith must be proclaimed in the Church over and over again.

At this point perhaps another remark is called for by way of afterthought. From the standpoint of our biological and physiological life, which in the highest degree helps to determine even our mental and spiritual life, it is quite possible for us in our old age to be beset by a physical and mental condition which makes it more or less or even completely impossible for us to accomplish all of these beautiful tasks of old age that we have spoken about or propose to speak about. Let us be honest and let us face up to the harsh realities that can strike even us. We can become piteously senile. A softening of the brain can occur. No moral theologian, much less any other reasonable human being, will [56] deny that in our old age we can be assailed by excruciating physical pain and deep, physiologically conditioned depression and mental confusion of such a kind that one can no longer seriously say that we are really morally accountable for the things we do in states such as these. We can admire saints in their martyrdom and Indians at the stake for the unrelenting clarity of their mind even unto death. In the end, however, it is not within our power or the power of our freedom, but it is within God's to say whether a similar state of mind will be possible for us in our old age and when we are dying.

We can hope that in death our mind will be tranquil, lucid, and composed. We must do everything in our power to cope, in courage and resignation to God's will, with the pain and depression that assail us in old age. But we are not obliged to do more than lies within our power, and Christian teaching does not expect the impossible of us. If physical pain and psychic depression plunge us into a state in which we can no longer do what we are, presumably, obliged to do, then we have come to the point where the eternal God in his love gently relieves us of all responsibility for our life. What "happens" after that is, humanly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

speaking irrelevant and does not matter in God's eyes. If a person in this state seems to be desperately cursing God, this must be viewed as a physiological occurrence and not as a human act, just as in the case of a dying person whose mind begins to wander. We can pray for a cheerful old age and a "happy" death, but the shape in which old age and death will come to us is something that lies in God's hands. It is one of the tasks of old age to prepare ourselves to accept this situation of old age and death that is approaching us in a way we cannot foresee, and to know that everything can be grace, even when there is nothing more left to us but the helplessness of the vanquished.

OLD AGE AS A BRIDGE BETWEEN GENERATIONS

We shall now speak of a special task that old age can perform. Old people can often try to be a bridge between generations. We should not harbor illusions or promote utopian ideas in this matter. The elderly poor reduced to living in a crowded home for the aged, more or less forgotten by their own kin, have practically no way of taking on the task we are about to describe, and as human beings and Christians they must find other ways of coping with their old age. But many old people do [57] have the opportunity to perform this task. But they have to be willing to see what it is and seize the opportunity of doing it.

The role played by "grandpa" and "grandma" in many families is well-known and prized. For the two generations with whom they live the youngsters love to have them as go-betweens and the grown-ups cherish them for this. In former times old people had an almost institutionalized function of giving counsel, handing on traditions, and serving as a stabilizing force. This intermediary function of old people need not be restricted to family and clan in the narrower sense. It can be expanded far beyond these. Just because the leaders who have the decision-making power in the various organizations of society do not let old people have "the last word" is no reason for them to withdraw in a huff from these organizations, condemn themselves to the limbo of old age, and feel that they have been put on the shelf. They should demand a little bit of modesty and self-effacement of themselves and not hesitate to continue in these organizations in a cheerful and matter-of-fact way, even though now they might perhaps not always be given a seat in the front row. Continuing to make an appearance at the customary social get-togethers with friends and acquaintances, even if one is a little bit hard of hearing and does not catch everything that is said and so is now forced to play second fiddle, can really be a Christian task of old age. One must want to be present here and there, even though sometimes it can be a little bit boring for the elderly person. Just going to a lecture can be a task of old age in mediating between the generations. The elderly man need not try to look and behave like a young fellow and the elderly lady need not feel obliged to turn up at every party. But old people should not be afraid to stay with the rest of humankind without feeling inhibited and self-conscious about it. Their life experience is capital that can yield interest for coming generations.

The same can also be said about continuing to work in church organizations and parish societies. In these, elderly people can still perform any number of functions which might appear too lowly to others and yet are still important for church life, even though it might be nothing more than collecting used postage stamps and getting them ready for shipment to the missions. Old people have to act as intermediaries between the generations. They just have to be willing to see this intermediary function and perform it, even though it might seem to be only a modest one.

[58]

FAITH IN ETERNAL LIFE

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In all the phases of our lives all of us live on the border of God's eternity. Younger and middle-aged people can be victims of heart attacks, traffic accidents, and other fatalities. But we old people are living in a situation in which, both from within and from without, we receive special signals warning us of our closer proximity to this end allotted to all human beings, warning us that death is approaching inescapably. We are still living, but we are looking toward the end.

Our Christian belief in eternal life accompanies this. This eternal life should evoke something more in us than the grumbling admission that we have no objection to it since, after all, we cannot go on living here forever, and so almost with a kind of resignation whose lack of faith is scarcely concealed we let them give us the message of eternal life. We must look toward this eternal life in loving hope. And so we old people live in a strange and unique state of tension between the courage to live here and now and the hope of eternal life. We are still living and so we must strive to go on living. To be sure, the candle of our earthly life is burning lower now and its flame casts a dimmer light and often flickers anxiously. To be sure, this limits our possibilities and we have no need of talking ourselves into the illusion that it is just a matter of willpower to keep up our former stride. There are a lot of shallow slogans for this ("You're as old as you feel," etc.) that we should not goad ourselves with, but rather honestly and objectively admit the fact that our vitality is ebbing in all the dimensions of our life (including the intellectual one). Nonetheless, the fact remains that we are still living and we should have the desire really to live the life still remaining to us and live it to completion.

Some old people let themselves go. They neglect the rules of physical hygiene and do not otherwise keep themselves up even though they are perfectly capable of doing this. That is stupid and cowardly. The elderly lady who takes care to make a well-groomed appearance without trying to imitate young girls is doing just the right thing. People quite advanced in years can have all sorts of interests; they can keep up their personal acquaintanceships, take up new hobbies, and soon. To be sure, we know that the time is coming when we will be lying on our deathbed and will not be able to do these things anymore. But what we still can do, we really should do, instead of letting ourselves get cranky, and with false resignation and cowardice wish to thrust ourselves prematurely into that darkness into which God will one day lead us; but he will do it gently [59] and softly and not in the way we do it to ourselves. In old age we can talk about something other than our illnesses and our aches and pains. As long as we still have ourselves under control – and we should not try to convince ourselves prematurely of the opposite – we can forbid ourselves this kind of talk which is useless to ourselves and a burden to others.

In a word, as long as we live we should also want to live. But for Christians, life here on earth is seen in the perspective of eternal life. This hope of eternal life is not a cheap consolation when we have nothing else left; it is a sacred task. Is there any reason why old people should pray less than in their earlier years? It is stupid and mean to consider every form of religious devotion practiced by ourselves or others in old age as suspect, and to want to expose it as the cowardly grovelling of a person in the last decrepit stages of life who now wants to become "religious" quickly. Without doubt, there are forms of religious devotion in old age that are bogus and cowardly. But these are not the only ones. Might a person not become more mature, wiser, and therefore more devout as well in old age? Why should a person's religious development have to be arrested at an earlier, perhaps quite infantile stage? Just to avoid having to admit that one has learned a little more and is forced to abandon a number of things formerly considered to be right? If we now perhaps take a critical look at many of the things we have done in the past, this can no longer change these things externally, but that is still no reason for us to persist in our old standpoint, since even the things that can no longer be changed by us can still be transformed by God's incomprehensible goodness and power. In old age we should not hesitate to have the courage to become more devout.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is true, of course, that the expectation of eternal life that is implied in this, and that has to be shaped more intensively, can have very different shapes and forms. So we are not obliged to demand of ourselves a particular shape such as is customarily described in the lives of the saints. "Till we meet again in heaven, you dumbbell,"[2] the sister of one of my deaf brethren said to him, and died. This kind of lighthearted trust is not bestowed upon everyone. Saint Theresa of the Child Jesus died in a quite different way in the throes of her consumption, assailed by the indescribable darkness by which she was engulfed. And yet she trusted and hoped.

[60] The hope of eternal life takes on different forms in death, and to die in the way that God has disposed is also a part of true hope itself. With Jesus we must pray, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," but in death one may also pray with Jesus the words of the psalm, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" because God will answer this prayer, too, by giving us his eternal life. And so the forms of the hopeful expectation of eternal life that we have while living our old age vary considerably. The hope of eternal life can fill the hearts of some as a wonderfully consoling light and thus they can draw nigh to the final hour in joy. To others it is given (this is ultimately the same grace) to live in the steadfastness of a prosaic faith without desiring to paint heaven in their own colors: "I believe in life everlasting." People such as these will say to themselves, "My own heart is weak and narrow. I am almost afraid to look for a place where there is still room for this faith alongside the weariness and barrenness of my old age. But God is greater than my heart and does not demand more of me than I am honestly capable of doing." Old people are placed on the borderline between time and eternity. And there is where they have their most sacred task. This can be a heavy burden. But God bears it with us and takes it from us when we can really bear it no longer.

[2] The word play here is not apparent in English. The expression taube Nuss, here rendered "dumbbell," literally "empty nut," is a colloquialism like our "old coot." However, the word taub also means "deaf." – Editor

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[61]

6

AUTHORITY

AUTHORITY IN GENERAL

We are presupposing that the etymology of the word authority provides very little help for an inquiry into the intrinsic nature of authority.

Preliminary Remarks on Conceptual Methodology and Limitation of the Inquiry

Auctoritas in the sense of "authorship" obviously implies that the thing caused is dependent on its cause and thus in certain circumstances that the cause can continue to exercise a determining influence on the thing caused. However, in the various human societies the idea of authority is commonly understood as a relationship between the person holding the authority and the person determined by the authority in which relationship a causal and total origination of the person determined from the person determining is not implied or at least need not be implied.

At the beginning of our considerations it is of course not really certain that the different realities characterized as authority can really be subsumed under a more or less univocal concept. Nevertheless, the attempt may be made to elucidate the one and the same concept that more or less fits all "authorities." If this attempt is successful, it will enable us at least to draw a few general lines of demarcation and to set up a few general norms which from the outset are valid in their application to all "authorities." It must, however, be understood that the general concept of authority being sought here can only be a very "analogous" one. [62] Furthermore, it remains beyond doubt that concrete "authorities" are necessarily and to a very great degree different from one another despite the unity of this general concept. Therefore this must always be kept clearly in mind if lines of demarcation and norms are to be predicated about individual "authorities."

It would no doubt be methodologically wrong, even in an ultimately theological treatment, to begin here with the "authority of God" as the point of departure. For in the presumed origin from God (and if one will, from his authority) of any and all legitimate authority, it is clear from the start that God's authority (if one wants to apply this concept to him) is of an absolutely unique kind. A Christian theology and a sober rational philosophy can always and everywhere "ascend" to God, but they cannot proceed from him as that which is first known. Even when making this ascent they must use a large number of a posteriori empirical concepts, one of which is of course the concept "authority." And finally, God's authority is not part of the sphere of social relationships in which we are quite rightly seeking our concept of authority.

Possible "Frictions" among Free Subjects as a Starting Point for a General Concept of Authority

We proceed from general and very elementary phenomena which can be observed in human life, quite rightly acknowledging in them, without going into detailed analysis, an ontological dignity and a transcendental necessity. Both things and persons make up the environment in which human beings exist in this world. There is a plurality of individual realities which (quite apart from a reciprocal dependence on one another) cannot simply be understood as mere determinations of one and the same reality. Rather, they are really different from one another, demarcated from one another, each standing in itself, each a "substantial" reality. This "substantial" difference of the individual realities comprising the things and persons of the human being's environment may for its own part be a very variable concept. And even the relationship between independence and relativity to other things may also for its part be quite different in individual cases (even to the point of plural determinations which can be conceived of one and the same reality).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There is no doubt, however, that at least human beings as subjects, who are aware of themselves and have a free history, each with a responsibility of his or her own, are not simply mere determinations of [63] the world or of a higher collective entity to which individuals are simply subordinate, but rather that they really have in themselves a specific independence that cannot be derived from anything else. At the same time, however, these nonderivable individuals are determined from outside: they stem from their parents; they are physically and biologically dependent on others for their existence; they are involved in intellectual and personal exchange (with other cultures) without which not even the physical-biological existence of human beings could in fact continue.

In their actual realization the free independence of human beings and their mutual interdependence condition each other reciprocally. The interdependence and determination from outside necessary for the existence of human beings in all their dimensions would not attain their goal of securing human existence if the free subject, instead of choosing to affirm them, simply wanted to close itself off to them. The free subject, even as free subject, is not absolutely self-sufficient. Rather, its condition is necessarily one of reaction to determination from outside, without which it could not as such exist. Conversely, however, even the determining element from outside is itself often the product of the free action of the subject, which product is then retroactively operative on the subject itself and on other subjects.

The plurality and diversity of the realities existing in the world, and especially among human beings, and the reciprocally conditioned relationship of independence and determination from outside are not, at least in fact, present in such a way that the individual entities fit together in a way that is "frictionless." "Frictionless" may be a very unphilosophical word. It refers to all sorts of realities. Two bodies cannot simply be present simultaneously in one and the same place, at least according to our empirical observations in the macrocosm; the biological realm is dominated by a "struggle for existence" concomitant with death and annihilation, and this assessment from the standpoint of the individual living organism is not without justification; the physical and changing environment of the biological realm is not always and to the same degree favorable to the individual living organisms; at least from the outset, harmony and peace in the area of the freedoms that cannot be derived from one another do not prevail in such a way that the exercise of freedom on the part of one person is likewise always positively the goal and the presupposition of the freedom of another. But all of these very different realities taken together – and these are what we mean when we say that they are not "frictionless" – do reach a common point of agreement in that they are resistant to one another, do [64] not simply fit together smoothly, tend to contradict one another when making claim to a common space where they can exist.

Authority as the Mandatory Power to Regulate "Frictions"

Thus the question arises as to how these "frictions" are to be eliminated. They cannot mean simply that there is an absolute "struggle for existence" in which one entity considers the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other as an enemy pure and simple whose existence is simply to be ruled out due to this threatening friction.

Thus the "regulation" that is required varies quite considerably according to the concrete cases and the different levels of being. In certain circumstances it is even quite possible for it to be identical with the right of the stronger, or with what are known as physical and biological laws. In our search for regulations of this kind we are restricting our reflections here exclusively to the relations of personal, free subjects among one another. Material and biological dimensions are also obviously included in these human free subjects. Thus, in this regulation being sought, such regulations as are part of the human being's subhuman dimensions must not be omitted (or just simply excluded by an ethical idealism). We must insist on this, even though the "frictions" that this implies and the subhuman regulations of these frictions, being susceptible to the influence of free, human decisions, themselves raise a problem and constitute an object requiring regulations which derive from the dimension of the free subject as such.

One could stop here and ask whether an approach beginning with the possible "friction" among free subjects might not be too narrow to provide an understanding of authority from the outset, or whether it might not lead in a false direction. One might also ask whether this approach does not from the outset conceal the real nature of authority in its majesty and dignity. However, if authority means the mandatory power to regulate human beings' social relations on the one hand, and if one acknowledges on the other that the free subject has a dignity and legitimacy that takes precedence over the regulations imposed upon it by other natural instances (something that could be demonstrated in an ontology and a theology of the free subject, and would have to be demonstrated, and this is of course impossible here), this approach cannot be summarily dismissed as inadequate or misleading. Overcoming frictions can quite properly be understood positively as providing a free [65] subject with the possibility of self-realizations which are inconceivable apart from the overcoming of such frictions. But in this way authority as the mandatory power to remove these frictions can quite properly be vested with a dignity and importance which, at first glance, one might think is ignored in an approach of this kind.

Human Freedom Presupposes the Necessity of Social Regulations

The kind of regulations that we are seeking can serve to eliminate frictions arising in the interpersonal relations of individuals as such without their having to be part of the actual social sphere. Or they can be regulations that serve to eliminate actual social tensions. This distinction is to be expected because we are presupposing here that the relationship between the human being as an individual and an individual free subject on the one hand and the human being as a member of a society on the other is not one of absolute identity, in virtue of which one aspect of the human being could be completely transferred to the other. With this presupposition it is our intention here to inquire only about regulations pertinent to frictions in the social sphere. Therefore we are prescinding here from a consideration of regulations that can be sought, for example, in the area of personal love and the possible cases of conflict there, however important and necessary for human beings these regulations may be.

No one will deny that in the social sphere there can in fact be disharmony and contradictions arising from the needs of individuals and of particular groups in a society, and that frictions like these – or whatever else you want to call them – do actually exist in all societies. There will of course be social systems and theories which implicitly or explicitly proceed on the assumption that there really is an ideal social order capable of being grasped and put into practice, and that once this order is realized it will necessarily and permanently

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exclude these frictions among this society's concrete members, and this will mean that everyone can live in perfect harmony, peace, and happiness with everyone else. Given this presupposition, the regulations to be sought would consist of structures and norms which would have to be realized once and for all in this society along with instructions on how to bring about this not yet existing society.

Here, however, we are proceeding on the conviction that a society [66] of this kind is impossible. The course of the world in general, which is one of the factors conditioning this society, cannot be foreseen in its ultimate concrete form and so it certainly cannot be manipulated in a completely effective way. And human freedom, after all, in its own history is constantly creating new and unforeseeable situations, tendencies, desires, and so on, which for their part are not just secondary material for the social order, but rather themselves help to change it and to call it into question.

So if this presupposition is the starting point, the rules being sought for the elimination of social frictions can also contain some sort of ideal conceptions about a desirable social structure or one that is desirable for the immediate future. But these rules cannot simply correspond identically to this social structure. Rather, they must of necessity also contain elements that are always merely provisional; they must be rules of temporary assistance and of improvisation; they must be capable of being implemented in such a way that the regulation governing one case here and now may and must be different for another case. The necessity of having the kind of regulations (and people responsible for them) which admit of improvised temporary assistance is simply a consequence of the impossibility of having a definitively ideal social order in which the necessity of regulations on a case-by-case basis would have abolished itself. This necessity is also a consequence of the nature of human freedom (here it does not matter whether and how this second reason is identical with the first). Freedom does not mean that we simply do what is commanded by general laws which would only have to be known precisely enough and their purpose comprehended for them to transform freedom into the peace which makes us happy in the knowledge that we have done what is necessary. If freedom really creates something new that cannot be completely and positively known and deduced from its presuppositions (at least by us), the regulations which such new realities require are not already present in the general constitutive structures of the realities alone, but they themselves must be set up anew.

At this point it still does not matter whether this new regulation required by a definite act of freedom is itself one that must be derived in a (morally) unambiguous and compulsory way from the situation at hand or whether it is itself, rather, a (morally legitimate) free regulation which could justifiably be different. In very many instances the second is certainly the case. But at the moment that is not the point at issue. Despite the necessity of a balanced regulation of conflicts in a society, that is, of "frictions" which are present in a society due to the plurality [67] of realities that have not yet been harmonized a priori, such regulations are obviously not always present in advance. They have to be decided upon first and constantly be set up anew, and for this reason they require concrete agents who are themselves present in history. When eliminating these frictions in a pluralistic society, these agents have the task of respecting the demands arising from the objective circumstances. Thus they have to be "just" and respect the legitimate claims of all the competing and conflicting realities, and when making these regulations they may not lose sight of the unity of the social system. But it is a necessary and unavoidable part of their legitimate duties and rights to make a decision that does not and cannot completely arise from the objective claims of the matters at hand. There are various reasons why this is true, but they cannot be enumerated exhaustively here.

First of all, the reality to which this regulation is supposed to react has either come to be through an exercise of freedom or such exercises of freedom have helped to determine it. Even apart from the fact that no reality involving ourselves can be known by us completely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and therefore does not present all the persons involved in the action the same aspects determining their decision to act, at least those established realities to which the regulation is supposed to respond are realities that cannot ultimately be derived or foreseen, so that in this light the indeterminability which is already peculiar to every reality becomes essentially more acute. It is precisely the ambiguity of the reality that makes it impossible to respond to it with only one single legitimate reaction.

Furthermore, it is part of the nature of the freedom claimed by the agent of such a regulation, a freedom also claimed to make this regulation (at least until the opposite is proved), that in the case of categorical decisions it can choose among several possibilities, all of which are morally permissible. For it is senseless to assume that freedom means only the choice between two alternatives, one morally good and the other morally reprehensible, that there is no freedom when freedom's choice is limited only to what is morally good, that real freedom exists only when it has to take into account what is morally reprehensible as well as what is morally good. But if this regulation is a free one, if and because it cannot be made in any way other than an act of freedom, it necessarily contains, partially at least, the nonderivability, the "arbitrariness" characteristic of an act of freedom. It must of course be "objectively sound"; that is, it must take into account as far as possible the nature, the independence, and the freedom of the realities which have to be balanced in making this regulation. But this regulation will [68] not labor under the opinion that there can only be one objectively sound regulation and that this may not contain an element of the free, nonderivable decision.

THE INTRINSIC NATURE OF AUTHORITY

We have seen the necessity and the reality of a phenomenon that we call "authority."

The General Concept and the Concrete Manifestation of Authority

The word authority is known to us from the everyday use of language, and time and again we have experienced a reality that we call by this name. And now we declare that what we have just seen in the preceding reflection is to be called "authority." The justification for making these two terms identical is found in the fact that there are no demonstrable phenomena which would not perforce have to be called "authority" in the ordinary use of language that would not be identical with what we have come upon in our preparatory consideration. It is of course conceivable, as a matter of fact it is to be expected from the outset, that those realities which we encounter concretely and which in day-to-day life we usually call "authority" also manifest peculiarities which were not discovered in our previous consideration. Even presuming that this were the case, without citing examples for it at the moment, this still need not be evidence in refutation of our making "authority" identical with the phenomenon that we have in mind. For it is conceivable that the concrete reality of a definite authority possesses peculiarities which really are a part of the correct concept of this authority already envisaged by us, even though our correct conceptual approach has not yet worked out distinctly this peculiarity of this definite authority. That is quite possible.

It is also conceivable that the concrete phenomenon of authority that is our point of reference is amalgamated with realities from which it is not clearly distinguished, realities which in principle are not part of its essence and which have to be eliminated from the really essential concept of authority as such. For example, for authority to be recognized and to function in a seventeenth- or eighteenth-century society a [69] particular style was required

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation that is not necessarily bound up with the actual essence of authority. The manner of recognizing papal primacy still customary at the end of the twentieth century does not necessarily derive from the essence of the pope's primacy in the Church. If we allow for both of these possibilities, there is no reason why we cannot say that we have indeed envisaged in a general way the real essence of authority in our preparatory considerations. One must bear in mind that the essence of authority described here in a general way will be considerably modified according to the concrete nature of the society in question. Therefore we must dismiss the objection that this or that concrete authority in a definite society manifests peculiarities which cannot be positively deduced or understood from our concept of authority.

An Attempt to Describe Briefly the Reality of Authority

For a reality such as authority it cannot be expected that an actual definition or a succinct description can be found. Those realities which refer to being as such or to a subject that is open to absolute being in an unlimited way occupy no position that would permit one to "define" them from outside. If we keep this in mind, we need not be upset by the expected objection that such definitions work with tautologies.

In a brief description that still has to be explained, we "define" authority as "the morally justified capacity of a human being to regulate and determine social relations among members of society in a way that is binding on these members." According to this description, the holder of authority is a human being. Whether and how such a concept can be applied to God to denote a relationship of God to creatures, ultimately, of course, unique and nontransferable, need not for the moment concern us here, as we have already indicated in our introduction. As a creaturely reality, authority falls in any event under those statements which characterize all finite realities as creatures of God. It comes from God, is constantly sustained by him, is directed to him, is responsible to him, is finite and conditioned, and its establishment in a way that is absolute is forbidden. There is a danger that it can be corrupted and turned into an idol. It always exists in a historical process whose future outcome cannot be foreseen. It can be a means of redemption as well as a vehicle of guilt.

[70]

Individual and Collective Bearers of Authority

If the bearers of authority thus described are human beings, it is understood that they are in full possession of their essential being in a way that can be actualized directly. Human beings in any other condition (as embryos, as legally incapacitated persons, etc.) can receive authority potentially, but they cannot have it in act. It has been pointed out above that there must be authority in societies. The necessity of socialization arises from the nature of human beings, and so there are societies which, without prejudice to their mutability in individual detail, participate as such in the necessity of socialization. And then there are certainly societies which stem from free establishment on the part of human beings or as such have only a remote and tenuous connection with a participation in the social nature of human beings. But if both necessary and freely established societies are presumed to exist, the necessity of having authority and those who bear authority holds true for both. How exactly these bearers of human authority are constituted concretely is at this point an entirely open, question. The fact that the bearers of authority might really be identical with the totality of the members of the society in question does not in principle preclude the necessity of authority. The only presupposition for this is that these collective bearers who are really identical with the society (or with a definite group in it) are capable of freely making a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

regulation because of which there must be such an authority. Whether or in what more concrete forms such collective bearers of authority can be conceived is a question that we can for the moment leave open.

Of course it also conceivable that the possibility of a regulatory activity on the part of collective bearers of authority will increase or decrease in stages which are difficult to determine and recognize, and for this reason a conflict can even arise as to whether or not this possibility still exists. In our previous considerations what we had in mind was rather an individual bearer of authority because the regulation that he or she must make has a margin of freedom and must) be made freely. In the ordinary case it seems to us that the bearer of authority is the individual human being. In saying this, however, it is still an open question how this individual bearer will be found and appointed.

[71]

Basic Elements concerning the Appointment of Bearers of Authority

The agent responsible for this appointment can of course be a collective body. One can object that this collective body (a town or city council, a parliament, a senate of cardinals, a meeting of members of an association) which appoints a bearer of authority exercises thereby a function of social regulation and so it must itself have authority. Therefore this authority must be conceived as something more original than that borne by a collective body. The following must be said in regard to this objection. First, it is not an a priori fact that all legitimate bearers of authority must be appointed by a collective bearer of authority. The history of human socializations obviously contains examples of bearers of authority who do not derive from collective appointments. (How the college of cardinals is a bearer of authority will be an obscure problem in church law.)

The moral dignity of personal subjects certainly means that a society consisting of such subjects has both the right and obligation to live in an orderly fashion. It follows from this that it also has the right and the obligation to appoint someone to regulate social relations if (in the abstract or due to concrete historical circumstances) such a person does not yet exist. But, apart from the fact that a larger society, if it is to undertake such an appointment, must be conceived as one already ordered and constituted in some way or other, indeed even as one already provided with bearers of authority, the question remains whether one should even call this right and obligation of a society “authority,” if it is actually directed by all to all at the same time and does not yet possess the peculiar element of a one-way claim on an individual by society through the medium of a concrete bearer of authority. A community’s right to make such an appointment is, after all, not being called into question just because one does not want to call the community’s possibility of making this appointment “authority.” In democratic societies we are accustomed to trace back the authority of the individual functionaries to an appointment by this society itself, thereby quite understandably ascribing “authority” to the collective body, the society itself. But the problem that then arises is whether one is to conceive the appointment of the functionary as creation, as communication of authority itself, or as mere designation of its bearer to whom his or her authority then comes from some other source (from God, from the natural law, etc.).

But does the capacity for appointing a bearer of authority always and [72] necessarily presuppose actual authority on the part of those who make the appointment? Or is this capacity (where it must be conceived as present in a collective body as such) actually rather a consequence of the fact that no authority is as yet present? Is it not rather an expression of the obligation to see to it that there is a bearer of authority and thus to ensure the concrete existence of authority? The usual contrary notion is presumably based on a feudal conception which views bearers of authority as persons who authoritatively through themselves directly

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

create moral obligations in their "subjects," and who are endowed with a sovereignty ultimately emanating from God that bestows on them a special dignity over and above all other members of the society in question.

This of course gives rise to the following questions. What is the source of an authority so conceived? Does not the society bestowing the authority have to possess this kind of authority from the outset? Or is this authority bestowed directly by God as soon as the bearer is designated? If one leaves aside these notions of a special dignity on the part of the bearer of authority, there is nothing preventing the society – if and to the extent that it may be conceived as not being in advance possession of an agent for regulating social relations (some-thing that is not obvious) – from providing itself with a bearer of authority of this kind, even though it does not antecedently possess real authority in the sense in which we understand it. In this light, then, it is always individual persons who are the bearers of real authority, as is, in fact, the case in democratic forms of government. The fact that a small group is the bearer of one and the same authority may be viewed as a marginal case as far as this fundamental principle is concerned, because even in this case there must be a very small, manageable group, and even though equality of the members is the goal sought by this group, it still must have primus inter pares, a first among equals. And so here, too, we see that the principle ultimately prevails according to which the bearer of authority is fundamentally an individual person.

The Theory of Delegation and the Theory of Designation

Scholastic social teaching treats the question that we have just come upon as the problem of what it calls "the theory of designation" and "the theory of delegation," and asks which of the two theories is the correct [73] one. Both theories presuppose a social reality in which the concrete bearers of authority together with their authority come from a society.

The delegation theory presupposes that the society in question itself possesses the authority and transmits it to concrete and legally competent bearers of authority. As far as the authority of the state is concerned, the presupposition here is that this authority cannot be retained by the society as a whole, but for its really concrete exercise must be delegated to concrete bearers of authority, no matter whether the bearer of authority is a democratic parliament and a democratic government or a monarch. This view of course raises the question whether one can speak of authority in the proper sense if it cannot be exercised by its own bearer but must unavoidably be transferred.

According to the designation theory, the social entity from which the concrete bearer of authority comes does not itself initially possess this authority. It only constitutes or designates the concrete bearer of authority to whom this authority itself then comes from elsewhere (from the objective necessity of having an ordered society, from God, etc.). This theory is certainly applicable in very definite cases (for example, when the college of cardinals elects a pope during a vacancy of the papal see, and must elect one, although this college without a pope cannot be said to be in possession of the papal powers). However, the question still remains whether this designation theory applies in the case of constituting the authority of the state, or whether the people of the state are themselves originally in possession of the state's authority and transfer it in this way to a government (in the sense that all the power of the state "comes from the people"). In this designation theory this legitimate capacity for designating marks off its bearer from others who might eventually lay claim to this designation, and a mandatory power, a right, is ascribed to this bearer in regard to which the question may be asked whether this right might not also be called authority.

Thus on closer inspection it would seem that the two theories differ only in their

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

terminology but not in fact. The delegation theory cannot deny that the "delegated" authority in the concrete is vastly different from the authority residing in the social entity that makes the delegation. The designation theory, on the other hand, must presuppose that something resembling a mandatory power, or authority, is present in the entity that makes the designation. It is no longer possible to discern a really objective difference in the legitimacy that those social entities have to constitute a concrete social authority. Of course one can imagine cases where in view of concrete circumstances a social entity (for [74] example, the totality of the male members of a small tribe, etc.) holds full and total social ("state") authority and then in particular instances delegates this authority as such (for practical reasons). Such cases, however, are marginal; they are due to concrete circumstances and do not by and large stem from the necessity of the general nature of authority.

The Dignity of Authority and the Order of Precedence among its Bearers

The moral necessity for the existence of a bearer of authority, the moral demand that the exercise of this authority makes in respect to the observance of a social regulation are not identical with authority itself. They are extremely variable and correlate to the nature of the society in question and to its necessity or nonnecessity. One can say that authority in any society derives as such from that society's necessity of having functionaries. There is a moral obligation to respect both those who bear these functions and the necessary functions they perform, even in cases where their individual decisions unavoidably involve an element of the "subjective" freedom of the bearer of authority. One can say that this authority also has a certain dignity due to the fact that it also makes a moral demand on the society's members. But this dignity does not actually elevate the bearers of authority to the highest position in the society in question. Judged from the standpoint of a society's nature and meaning, this highest position (if one chooses to view a society as structured on a vertical axis from above to below and the converse) is occupied by those whose activity contributes the most to the realization of this nature and meaning. In principle, however, it is not necessarily the functionaries who do this, "those who govern," but rather, in a secular society constituted in form of a state, for example, either those who are indispensable for its continued existence or those who make the greatest cultural contributions. In the Church it is not the bishops and popes as such, but rather the saints (both those who are known and those who remain hidden).

The Relationship between Authority and Coercive Power

The opposite impression (the notion that bearers of authority have a particular rank that places them on a level above others) is probably [75] due to the fact that in the societies actually existing the bearers of authority do in fact have a position of power as a presupposition or a consequence of their authority as such, through which they compel a particular respect for themselves. But this power, which can extend to the actual use of physical force, is not identical with actual authority. This more or less demythologizing view of authority as a function of society, an authority that on the one hand is necessary but on the other hand secondary vis-à-vis the actual nature of a society and its task and its life, does not, however, deny that in view of the great and often essential diversity among societies there is also a great, and under certain circumstances essential, diversity among the authorities and their dignity.

If a distinction must be made between authority and an actual power to coerce, because the former in its regulations in themselves appeals to the free moral consent of the members of the society in question while the latter means that the area in which a subject (in itself) can exercise its freedom can be changed without the subject's prior consent, this distinction still does not tell us very much in advance about the more precise relationship of these two entities to each other. Fundamentally one will have to say that authority can be quite real even if it is not linked with "coercive power" (even with coercive power that is morally beyond reproach). There is no cogent reason for thinking that the possibility of establishing even a moral obligation would always and of necessity have to be conjoined with the possibility of using physical force. The mutual moral obligations arising from a personal love do not possess a power of coercion for their realization either.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Conversely, authority does not necessarily exclude in its bearer every capacity for the application of physical force. The only presupposition is that one does not consider the use of force to be always and inherently immoral, and that in a definite society for definite regulations of social relations the application of this force can be shown to be indispensable for the efficient functioning of these regulations. In this case, of course, a concrete authority in a concrete society is of its nature and in a morally legitimate way equipped with the capacity for using force. It is obvious that the concrete use of the force necessary in certain circumstances for the exercise of authority must be proportional to the greater or lesser importance of the social regulation that has to be undertaken by the authority, and that one does not overstep the boundaries imposed by the situation.

[76] If and to the extent that the regulation intends an order that includes a morally absolute value, this power to coerce connatural to authority has more or less the character of punitive justice. Here, however, one must bear in mind that a social authority together with the coercive power connatural to it is not properly and directly the guardian of the God-given moral order as such, but is only tangential to it in an indirect way to the extent that it is required to establish and protect a social order. When and if moral values and transgressions against these values have no (grave) consequences for the social order as far as can be judged (and this assessment is historically quite variable), a secular authority should not presume any punitive power either. Whether or not this is different in the ecclesial society is a question that will be treated later and depends on the question whether or not an ecclesial authority is equipped with a power to coerce vis-à-vis the members of the Church.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

Authority is necessary for a society's existence and therefore it participates in the (graduated) necessity of a definite society, the necessity of which can in its turn be absolute or hypothetical. Therefore a distinct bestowal of authority is not necessary. The only thing necessary is to determine in an objective and morally irreproachable way who in a concrete society the bearer of this authority is, an authority that must of necessity be present in this society. The interrelationship between a particular individual and this individual's function of being bearer of authority can vary considerably. This interrelationship can even be conceived in such a way that a particular individual actually and beyond challenge exercises this function and that if this function were to be wrested from the society, great damage would in fact be inflicted on the society and its well-being. It cannot be said that the democratic claim that every member of the society must be involved in the appointment of a bearer of authority is an inalienable and abidingly subsisting valid right of every human being. A democratic right of this kind does not issue simply from the abstract nature of any society nor does it emanate from the fundamental rights of every human being. This right, however, can exist in a derived way if without it the society in question would itself incur great damage in its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation nature and its activity.

[77]

AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH

If one wants to discuss authority in the Church in a context of philosophical reflection, a fundamental difficulty arises right from the outset.

The Necessity of Church Authority as a Result of the Socialization of a Common Faith

A Christian church, and especially the Roman Catholic Church, certainly considers itself to be a society. In so doing it simply cannot avoid having its self-interpretation confronted by concepts and insights that come from a secular sphere of human experience and social theory. Otherwise ecclesiology would have to avoid using the word society, and the churches would not be permitted to manifest empirical realities whereby they obviously occupy a prominent place in earthly societies. How the individual churches more precisely determine the relationship of their social realities to their actual proper nature according to their different denominational self-interpretations is a matter of indifference. This proper, intrinsic nature of the Church may be conceived in a variety of ways in the different Christian denominations; such individual Christian socializations may or may not merit the name “church,” (and if they do not, then they are called “sects”); a Christian conviction or mentality may even exist in an individual instance without there being a real socialization. But a common Christian mentality, a common faith, and a common way of life are inconceivable apart from some form or other of socialization. But if Christianity at all times and in all places does factually manifest a socialization, a society, that is, a Church, then an authority is also present everywhere that lays claim to making binding regulations for the relations of the members in this Christian social reality, relations which of course even here are not simply and permanently regulated already. In the different Christian churches and churchlike societies the authority that is always and unavoidably present will be interpreted and exercised differently (according to the total self-understanding that each of these societies has of itself). Since, despite all the diversity of their self-understanding, all these Christian churches still derive their nature and their justification for existence from Jesus Christ, albeit in very different ways (indirectly or directly, exclusively or otherwise), in all of them it is actually unavoidable that the authority be conceived, whether explicitly or not, as coming from Jesus Christ.

[78] Because of the limited space available to us here, we must restrict our observations to the question of authority in the Roman Catholic Church. Since this Church has the most stringent understanding of authority, the authority present in it is not something that has validity for the other churches. Still, as an extreme instance of something that has ultimately one and the same nature, the Roman Catholic Church’s understanding of authority can be instructive for the self-understanding of the other churches and their understanding of authority. It is obvious that we cannot present here a Catholic ecclesiology in the proper sense, that is, a doctrine of the concrete constitution of the Catholic Church, for the purpose of developing from it a concrete understanding of authority in this Church. Rather, it is our intention to present only a few disparate observations on this matter in a way that is not entirely systematic and by no means exhaustive.

THE ORIGIN OF AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The nature of authority in this Church is conditioned by its origination. Initially this matter seems to be simple in Catholic ecclesiology.

Church Authority and the Problem of the Church's Foundation

Whatever the case may be in respect to the question of the origin of authority in the Church as seen in the ecclesiologies of the other churches, Catholic ecclesiology at least has taught for centuries that the following is part of the dogmatic, absolutely binding self-understanding of the Church. Authority in the Church does not come from below, from a mandate given by the Church's people, but from Jesus Christ, the founder of the Church. It has been handed on by "apostolic succession" beginning with Jesus Christ through the officeholders themselves and in this way it has come to the present-day bearers of this authority.

If we prescind at first from other questions of this doctrine's precise interpretation which is concerned with the problems of the more concrete and historically variable appointment of officeholders in the Church, we find not only in Protestant, but today even in Catholic ecclesiology and fundamental theology, a problem in regard to the origin of church authority that was not clearly discerned in former times. Beginning with the twentieth century the general and comprehensive problem [79] of the Church's foundation by the historical Jesus has been one of the acute problems among the questions raised by what is known as modernism. Today the response to this problem must be more differentiated than was possible or necessary in the past.

In earlier times one proceeded on the assumption that the historical Jesus in his earthly life, partly after his resurrection (at the time no real difference was seen between Jesus' life before and after his resurrection as far as the question of the foundation of the Church was concerned), founded the Church by explicit and formally expressed words of institution, that through Peter and the Twelve he appointed in an unambiguously juridical sense a college of officeholders for this Church with the explicitly expressed intention that this college of officeholders should continue to propagate itself in a Church which was explicitly assigned a task even for a distant future. In connection with this the problem of the imminent expectation of the eschatological end, even in the consciousness of Jesus, was passed over completely. While it is true that even the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council does not teach this conception with a definitively binding force, it is still more or less tacitly presupposed as obvious. But what this conception basically means of course is that the Church really comes from Jesus, crucified and risen, as the eschatologically unsurpassable self-promise of God grasped in the faith of a community, wherein definite social realities of the pre-Easter life and activity of Jesus can and indeed must also be conceived as being a constitutive part of the post-Easter community of faith (the circle of disciples, the position of Peter, the institution of the Last Supper, etc.).

If Jesus crucified and risen is to be God's unsurpassable, historical self-promise for the whole world, there must exist for all times a community of faith that accepts this self-promise of God in faith and bears witness to it before the world. Such a community of faith, if it is to be the historically abiding presence of God's eschatological self-promise to the world in Jesus, must necessarily be a socially constituted entity, and thus it must also come in a legitimate way from the historical Jesus and his circle of disciples. Conversely, however, one will not have to ascribe to the consciousness of Jesus that ecclesiology which is a description of the local churches and the one Church in apostolic times, much less the completely structured Church from the second century to the First Vatican Council. Here, of course, we cannot go into further detail on the problem of the Church's foundation by Jesus. Here we are simply presupposing that the Church can and does come from Jesus in a way that [80] is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

binding even though we cannot adhere to an act of church institution on the part of Jesus in exactly the same way as this act was formerly conceived.

The Historical Margin of Freedom for Shaping Church Office and Its Authority

Presuming what has been said above, authority in the Church can indeed be understood as coming from Jesus (the pre-Easter Jesus and the risen Jesus) without having to have unambiguous recourse to a verbal and juridical mandate and to the institution of a juridical form of succession for this mandate. This means that the concrete modalities governing the exercise of this church authority (even as Jesus' authority) can be ascribed to a development of the post-Easter Church to a greater extent than has been previously conceived according to the old model of institution. This thesis need not mean, at least not in every case, that concrete structures of this church authority, the specific characteristics and requirements on the part of its bearers, the mode of handing on the authority, and so on, would have to be liable to change for all future times just because they are historical forms that emerged in the apostolic Church and cannot simply make claim to explicit verbal instructions of Jesus, particularly because such instructions cannot be demonstrated historically and it is senseless to postulate them simply for the purpose of maintaining the old model of institution.

I have explained elsewhere[1] that a constitutional structure in the concrete Church can be conceived as being juris divini, (of divine, irreversible command) and is to be expected even though it did not take on historical form until the time of the apostolic Church, and that it nonetheless belongs to the irreversible decisions of the Church's history, and that this is a history that the historical subject "Church" can no longer go back beyond. Those who consider this to be absolutely inconceivable would have the burden of explaining how the canon is part of the Church's normative faith for all times, even though it did not take shape and was not constituted as such, albeit relatively early, until after the "death of the apostles." On the other hand, as has already been said, this conception implies that for its historical development, even [81] in what pertains to the shaping of office and its authority, the Church has been given a wide margin of freedom. This margin of freedom must not be prematurely narrowed by a constitutional doctrine that retrojects present-day church structures into the earlier times in a way that is too unhistorical so as to exclude other possibilities with dogmatic absoluteness.

The authority of the Church originates from Jesus and for this very reason it is historically quite flexible. It need not deny itself as though it were nothing other than a mere human construct; at the same time it need not simply identify itself with historical shapes and forms of its constitution and its authority under which it has appeared in the course of history if these shapes and forms can themselves be recognized as things that have developed historically. It is entirely possible in a dogmatically binding way to define particular church structures and the authority contained in them as things that are permanently normative, for example, the primacy of the pope. In so doing, however, one should not overlook the fact that a definition of this kind unavoidably occurs according to a concrete conceptual model (indeed, that it cannot be abstracted from this model in an absolutely perfect way) which is not, after all, a part of the abiding essence of the thing itself.

The origin of church authority from Jesus and the origin of the Church as God's irreversible self-promise to the world in Jesus crucified and risen are for us, therefore, not two things that cancel each other out. In order to understand this, the Church, from whose [1] See Concern for the Church: Theological Investigations 20, translated by Edward Quinn (New York: Crossroad, London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1981).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nature and reality its authority derives, should not be understood as an abstract idea from whose speculatively conceived nature its authority can be postulated. From the very beginning the Church is the concrete community of faith, and it is this as the historical permanence of God's promise of himself in Jesus. And since it is and always has been socially constituted in a concrete way, albeit originally in a very modest form, it lays claim to possessing authority. There is no necessity of deducing speculatively from the Church's abstract nature the concreteness of its authority together with the bearers of this authority. It is quite sufficient to grasp that the concrete Church makes its legitimate claim to concrete authority on the basis of its theological-metaphysical nature. To put it more concretely: one cannot deduce speculatively that there would have to be a Peter. One can, however, experience that the concrete reality of this entity "Church" is present in this post-Easter community of faith and that otherwise it is not present, and that it claims its authority on the basis of its nature.

[82] For the origination of church authority from Jesus in later times, it is sufficient to demonstrate how and where the later Church in the clearest possible way can trace itself back to the earlier Church without a revolutionary rupture between the earlier and the later historical form of the Church. Even prescinding here from the question whether and in what sense other Christian churches and societies can rightfully lay claim to some of the authority of Jesus (something that cannot be denied and in fact has never really been totally denied by the Catholic Church because the Catholic Church has never denied the existence of valid sacraments in other Christian churches), in any case it is the conviction of the Roman Catholic Church that it stems from the first Church in a continuity that is historically unassailable and most complete, and therefore that it possesses from Jesus the authority which comes to the concrete, eschatologically permanent faith community of Jesus.

ON THE RELATIONSHIP OF AUTHORITY AND COERCIVE POWER IN THE CHURCH

We have already pointed out that authority in a society and the legitimate possession of the power of physical coercion need not necessarily exist together in every case. Naturally the concrete exercise of authority always implies a change in the freedom possessed by a member of this society prior to his or her consent. To this extent one may say that authority necessarily includes an element of coercive power. But undoubtedly there are societies in which this authority is legitimately equipped with the possibility of exercising coercive power that goes beyond what is already necessarily implied in authority as such. If this is true, then there is a real question whether the Church's authority according to the dogmatically certain self-understanding of the Church is equipped with a legitimate coercive power which goes beyond what is already necessarily implied in the exercise of authority (and which in concrete cases can have a very considerable impact, as, for example, when the bearers of church authority withdraw a person's ecclesiastical teaching license). As has been stated already, traditional canon law teaching has given an affirmative answer to this question right up to most recent times. This teaching proceeded on the assumption that while the Church had no right to use force in respect to non-Christians, a baptized person, by the very fact of his or her being [83] baptized, belonged irrevocably to the Church, and that the Church has in regard to such a person a power of coercion which as a matter of course was conceived as something going beyond the exercise of its authority.

If we make bold to answer this question in the negative, both for today and tomorrow, it does not mean that we are passing a negative judgment on former times in the Church. It is entirely possible to conceive of social situations, a symbiosis of Church and secular society

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and so on, in which the exercise of such a power of coercion was legitimate. If today one denies both the possibility and the meaningfulness of a papal church-state and says that this cannot be derived from the permanent nature of the Church, this is not tantamount to asserting that the church-state of the tenth or of the sixteenth century stood in absolute contradiction to the nature of the Church.

If today we not only take into account the sacramental nature of baptism and its permanent sacramental character in regard to the question of church membership in a concrete social sense, but also take seriously the teachings of the Second Vatican Council concerning the freedom of religion in which the argumentation proceeds from the nature of faith as a free personal act and hence must have validity for the baptized as well; furthermore, if we take into consideration the Church's understanding of itself as a free community of like-minded persons in contrast to societies existing from a natural necessity, we will be permitted to say that the Church in the light of its intrinsic nature does not have to be conceived of as being equipped with a power of social coercion. According to this kind of understanding, then, attempts to exercise such coercive power are either part of the remnants of an earlier social situation of the Church and its consequences which perhaps might still be legitimate here and there. Or, on the other hand, they should be assessed as attempts to claim for the Church a power which it does not possess either on the basis of its own nature or its present-day situation in a pluralistic society. Therefore the Church should nowhere respond to a conflict between itself and one of its members with civil and material consequences. In this connection, it should not be denied that the blunt reaction of bearers of authority can in particular cases unavoidably involve unpleasant consequences even in the material and civil sphere. But fundamentally authority in the Church pertains to the regulations of those relations in it which are implied in the nature of the Church.

[84]

TEACHING AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH

It is beyond doubt that according to the Catholic Church's understanding of itself there is a teaching authority, a teaching office in the Church. Yet the question about the nature of this teaching office is more obscure than is commonly supposed. That the Church is a community with a common faith and creed oriented to the unsurpassable salvific significance of Jesus Christ, and thus that the Church has something to do with teaching, is something that requires no further explanation. It should also remain clear that the teaching authority, however it is to be conceived in a more precise analysis, derives its sustenance and its life from the "authority" of the truth to which the Church bears witness. A mere appeal to formal teaching authority on the part of the ecclesial teaching office, if it is not combined with an ongoing, intensive effort to elucidate the meaning of what is proclaimed and taught, would ultimately result in a destruction of faith itself because faith implies an existentiell, practical, and theoretical relationship to the truth of faith itself; hence faith may not be reduced to mere obedience to the formal teaching authority of the Church. Furthermore, the existence and the claim of an ecclesial teaching instance is itself an object, and a secondary one at that, of that faith which, antecedent to this recognition of a teaching authority, lives from the compelling power of the truth contained in God's revelation of himself in Jesus Christ.

The recognition of the ecclesial teaching authority is dependent on the "authority" of revelation which ultimately (despite all the reciprocally conditioned relationships that the concrete realization of faith involves) sustains the teaching authority and is not sustained by it. This is an obvious teaching of Catholic fundamental theology which forbids us to see in this teaching authority an absolutely primary datum. The question concerning the actual nature of the ecclesial teaching authority focuses on whether this authority itself implies a completely theoretical instance of truth instituted as such by the omniscient and self-revealing God, or whether it must be deduced from the nature of the Church as an eschatologically permanent and socially constituted creedal community. This question is not a theoretical quibble because there are some important consequences involved regarding the more precise exercise of this teaching authority depending on how we answer it. In our opinion, the second answer to the question is the right one. The teaching authority is a necessary element of sociopolitical authority in the Church, but only if the nature of the Church as a socially constituted [85] creedal community that receives God's historical promise of himself to the world in an eschatologically permanent way is taken into proper account. But it is not more than this.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There is a teaching authority in the Church not because the truth of revelation as such must be guaranteed for itself but because there must be an eschatologically permanent presence of Christ's word in the history of the last days. If this were not the case, one would have to expect that God's salvific truth of revelation, which has always been present, would everywhere and at all times be furnished with an authority of this kind. This limitation of the teaching authority in the Church does not mean that we are denying the theoretical character of the truth of revelation itself which, after all, is not simply and absolutely coterminous materially and logically with the object of the Church's teaching authority. Therefore one could say that it is the task of the teaching authority in the Church to see to it that in the Church the truth of revelation is given proper witness and proclamation. Only to this degree and extent does this teaching authority extend as well to the correct belief of the individual who, so to speak, has to take it upon himself or herself to see to it that his or her faith corresponds to this social presence of Christ's truth in the Church and through the Church in the world. The Church's teaching office can provide this pure presence of the truth of revelation in the Church, but it is not in a position to supervise the conformity of the individual's specific faith with the Church's doctrine.

In respect to the individual's faith, when this faith takes on tangible form in society, the teaching office can only ascertain that this particular expression of faith does not contradict the universal faith of the Church. The teaching office cannot actually go beyond this negative form of certification, a kind of nihil obstat that this expression of an individual's faith is not open to objection on grounds of orthodoxy. The more concrete norms governing the practical activity of the ecclesial teaching office that result from this interpretation of its authority cannot be considered further here. What has been said can of course also be applied to the concrete exercise of church authority in regard to the other dimensions of the Church (the practice of Christian life, the administration of the sacraments, etc.), which are part of the nature of this community of faith.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[87]

PART TWO

The Society of Jesus

[89]

7

THE SITUATION OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS SINCE ITS DIFFICULTIES WITH THE VATICAN

I am dividing my presentation into three parts. In the first section I would like to present some general and fundamental considerations that in some way or other have a bearing on all the events that have occurred and the declarations that have been made since the pope appointed a personal delegate.[1] In the second section I would like to present some reflections on a paper of Father Dezza in which he treats of our relationship to the ecclesial teaching office. In the third part of my considerations I make reference to a further paper of Father Dezza that discusses our apostolate and the norms for this apostolate set up by the thirty-second General Congregation of the Society of Jesus.[2] It is obvious that the remarks I intend to make will not be able to deal with every aspect of the subject. So it is naturally to be expected that relatively unimportant matters will be dealt with in detail and much more important things will only be touched upon briefly or not even mentioned at all. I shall certainly try not to speak in a disrespectful way. However, in a case of conflict between honesty and respect I am for honesty. It is likewise obvious that many questions will be treated for which there is [90] either no unambiguous and generally accepted answer at all or for which the answer will at least have to remain outstanding on my part. I do not intend to develop a fully balanced casuistry concerning obedience in a religious order.

I also want to admit in advance that while my remarks concerning our relationship to the ecclesial teaching office will indicate the difficult and problematical nature of this relationship, they will not really provide any simple rules that can be neatly applied to specific cases involving possible conflict between the teaching office and the individual theologian or the truthful conscience of a Jesuit. Many of my brethren will certainly regret this.

THE CONDITIONS OF OUR TIMES AS A CAUSE OF THE DIFFICULTIES OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS

First, I would like to present a fundamental and general consideration. It goes without saying that our order has its difficulties and that there are some things that are not as they should be.

---

[1] On 5 October 1981 Pope John Paul II appointed Father Paolo Dezza, SJ., as papal delegate entrusted with the leadership of the Society of Jesus.

[2] In connection with this, see the recent Letter of Father Dezza to the whole Society of Jesus (2 March 1982), esp. the appendix, “Guidelines (direct norms) for putting into practice the wishes of the Holy Father” (nos. 1-9). On 8 December 1982 the convocation of a General Congregation was announced.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In times past this was also the case, and it is quite legitimate to ask whether the difficulties we are having today are greater than those we had in the eighteenth century. Specific abuses which can be remedied by a little bit of effort and clear thinking should be remedied.[3] But the difficulties we are having today, taken as a whole, are conditioned by the general situation of the Church and the world. If we look at the matter closely, we shall see that it is the intellectual, spiritual, cultural, and social situation of today's world that is at the root of the difficulties and problems that we are experiencing and suffering in our day-to-day life in the order. Every period in world history has to some degree or other labored under the impression that it was standing at a precarious turning point between two worlds and that it was threatened by enormous dangers; so caution is certainly called for when analyzing such situations and Cassandralike cries should be uttered sparingly The fact remains, however, that today we are really living in a time of violent upheavals and cataclysmic dangers the likes of which have simply never been known before.

Never before has the world population numbered six billion and there has never before been a time when this population could increase to [91] ten billion within the space of a few decades. Rational technology has never before existed, as we know it today, nor has the secularization on a global level that we are experiencing today. There has never before been such an interlocking of individual societies and countries on this earth. There has never before been a religion which, as an organized social entity, set out to be a world religion, to move out beyond its own limited cultural roots and to inculturate itself in many historical periods and civilizations, even though it has a historically and regionally limited origin, an origin which cannot simply be discarded.

This then, briefly indicated, is the general situation of our historical era and of the Church in which we live today even in our religious order. If this radical situation, which has never before existed, had no determining influence on our order, the order would be dead. However, if the order is a living reality, it is necessarily involved in an intensive communication with the total situation on the intellectual, spiritual, and social level. Is it any wonder, then, that we share in the sufferings brought on by the problems, the insecurities, and the uncertainties? Should our question not rather be whether we are bearing too little of the burden of this totality of the world's fate? Should our first question not rather be whether we really want to perpetuate too anxiously and conservatively that mentality and manner of living characteristic of the religious ghetto into which the Church maneuvered itself during the epoch of the pian popes, even though it should actually be clear to us that genuine conservatism consists in having the courage to do something new?

What I want to say is simply this. We really ought to view all of our difficulties, honestly admitting them, ultimately as a matter of course, and in the final analysis we should rather be amazed that these difficulties are not greater, since it is by no means certain and obvious that the absence of such difficulties is a sign of health. It is only the dead or those groups ossified in their conservatism who have no difficulties.

There is no use in considering reforms in our course of studies or training unless we put them in the framework of this kind of analysis of our spiritual and intellectual situation. When reflecting upon our external lifestyle, we must take into account realistically that the difference between our own present-day lifestyle and that of our contemporaries must not and cannot be essentially greater than the difference between an eighteenth-century Jesuit's lifestyle and that of the other people of that time; in other words, that the practical norms for this lifestyle cannot be derived from that of the eighteenth century. This is of course a truism. However, if one calls to mind that a few decades ago the installation [92] of an elevator in the [3] In connection with this, see V. Seibel, 'Die Gesellschaft Jesu auf dem Prüfstand," Geist und Leben 3 (1982): 213-23.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Biblical Institute in Rome was still a problem requiring a solution on the part of the superior general of the order, or if one recalls Father General Janssen's regulation determining the transportation of typewriters from one house to another or his attempts to make us wear a cassock, then one sees that such truisms are apparently not always grasped.

Recollections such as these are not intended as a reproach for the past but only to draw attention to the fact that the dangers of such mischievous conservatism has not yet been completely eliminated even today. I am not talking about laxity or worldliness in our lifestyle, but I would like to express my concern about possible renewed attempts to impose a lifestyle on us which perhaps in Poland or in Rome does not yet manifest that difference from the lifestyle of the rest of the world as it does here among us. In our theology, in our training, and in our lifestyle there can obviously be defects even today which perhaps can be more clearly seen and corrected by looking at the past. But in a falsely understood fidelity to its history, an order should not create difficulties for itself or let such difficulties be created by restoration attempts which would make sense and have durability only if we could reverse conditions that are simply beyond our control, on the assumption that only the old days were shaped according to God's will.

Honestly and objectively speaking, I have the impression that from this standpoint all these fundamental considerations are not being given sufficient weight in the declarations of our curia. Obviously the Constitutions of Saint Ignatius should be heard in these Roman declarations. Obviously these decrees will always refer to declarations of previous General Congregations and generals. But if a present-day dogmatic theology cannot be simply put together from texts of Holy Scripture, even despite the permanent immutability of divine revelation, then it is even less appropriate for such Roman decrees to give rise to the impression that they are doing nothing more than reiterating the old norms and that everything beyond this is only a reluctant and peevishly granted concession to what even Rome itself sees as something that can no longer be reversed. Should not the declarations from Rome also have the courage and clarity to give expression to the difficulties which, after all, do exist and which cannot be gotten rid of simply by adhering to a few naively formulated principles?

When recently one of our brethren, no doubt with polemical exaggeration, wrote to Rome saying that many of the statements coming from the curia of our order sounded like a Soviet declaration on the occasion [93] of an armed intervention in a foreign country interpreting the action as one of brotherly assistance and friendship, that was surely an exaggeration. But it would certainly do us no harm if the people in Rome exercised more consideration of the way in which we perceive style, a way that is more honest and open. I shall come back to this point later.

Obedience

However, when "total obedience to the Holy See" is being spoken about, given the necessary distinctions, one can certainly recognize elements that are quite important and correct, but in our part of the world we do in fact have the impression that there is in reality no total obedience (and that Ignatius did not really demand this), that a "total obedience" of this kind cannot be achieved so easily because it is not exactly known what this obedience really commands us to do and what in definite circumstances it does not command, that one indeed hears from Ignatius that obedience reaches its limits when confronted with a conscience that protests against sin. Roman declarations are stylistically formulated in such a way as to lead one to think that such limits can never seriously occur in real life, something that is just not true even if one attributes to the Roman offices at least as much moral capacity for judgment

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as to oneself.

The Notion of Church

A further problem that constantly comes up when one reads the Roman declarations is the following. It seems to me that these declarations are undergirded by a notion of Church, a notion that cannot be readily grasped and is certainly not explicitly formulated, which I consider to be false from a dogmatic, human, and realistic standpoint. One has the impression that it is presupposed that all true and legitimate activities in the Church, all new initiatives and ideas, proceed from the highest powers in Rome or at least that they cannot be legitimate unless they have the explicit or at least tacit approbation of Rome. This notion of Church, which in the secular sphere would be called totalitarianism, is, however, wrong.

Certainly everything that occurs in the name of Jesus must ultimately occur fundamentally within the Church and its unity, and everything [94] that factually occurs outside of this Church under the inspiration of the gospel contains an internal dynamism oriented to the one Church of Jesus Christ. But even if this is true and even if the Holy See bears ultimate responsibility for the unity of this Church to the extent that it is tangibly present in society, a responsibility that has no higher earthly power beyond it, this does not mean that there can be no legitimate pluralism of initiatives and ways of shaping Christian life.

Historically there is always this kind of pluralism which from the outset is not positively inaugurated and shaped by Rome, even if one on formal grounds chooses to see in the existence of this pluralism without contradiction on Rome's part a tacitly granted approbation. This pluralism is legitimate. The first desert fathers went out into the desert without a positive approbation that would have been obligatory for them. The poor man of Assisi gave his clothes back to his father without having positive approbation for this from the official Church. The veneration of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus arose and was propagated when those in Rome did not want to hear about it. The new exegesis arose in the face of opposition from the Biblical Commission under Pius X. Saint Teresa of Avila established her convents only in the face of massive difficulties with Rome. In the quarrel between the Catholic workers' associations and the Christian labor unions under Pius X, the German Jesuits were certainly not the ones who fulfilled the wishes and intentions of the pope, but they were right nonetheless. Saint Ignatius might not have been seized by a fit of trembling when Paul IV was elected pope if no tendencies had been permitted to exist in the Church which the Holy See had not given its positive blessing to from the outset.

I certainly do not maintain that things as obvious as these would be challenged in Rome if thematically presented in a clear-cut way. But one should not pretend either that things were different from the way they really were, or simply cover over decisions with a cloak of silence, when afterwards they have proved to be wrong and have been revised. Such measures should also be revoked explicitly. (The prior censorship, imposed on me before the council was never revoked either by the Holy Office or by our curia; therefore it would actually still be in force.)

What I want to say is this. In our relationship with Rome we should never act as if this legitimate pluralism did not exist in the Church, as if we were nothing other than executors of the Holy See's commands and wishes. We stand in the true and Catholic relationship to Rome precisely when we serve the pope gladly and with genuine self-effacement, but not only when we do this. The Holy Spirit does not grant his initiatives to [95] the Church solely and exclusively through the pope. Therefore there are no principles that can be facilely applied to the Church's life whereby, if we only adhere to them exactly, every conflict between Christians and the Church's officeholders right up to the pope would be absolutely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

excluded. Somebody once told me that the biggest obstacle to the beatification of Vincent Palotti was the fact that he once said that Pius IX was obtuse. Was this an unecclesial utterance or is it quite permissible in an honest, down-to-earth, and thus Christian and Catholic mentality? In any event, difficulties in all these things cannot be eliminated by paying covert obeisance to an ecclesiastical totalitarianism.

THE JESUIT ORDER AND THE TEACHING OFFICE

It is obvious that Father Dezza's statements contain a number of elements that are quite correct and important for Jesuits. Papal teaching, even if it does not contain a dogmatic definition, must in principle be accorded the proper respect due to it, corresponding, of course, in its turn to the degree of binding force that this teaching itself intends, and which in the nature of things can be quite minimal. (For example, if the pope speaks of the Yahwist in one of his Wednesday audiences, Old Testament exegetes will be happy at the recognition thus accorded to their teaching which from Pius X on had been proscribed for decades. It is, however, obvious that they can ascribe no real theological importance to a remark of this kind.) It is also obvious that criticism of papal statements must be made in a manner that manifests a basic respect for the ecclesial teaching office. It is obvious that criticism of this kind has no place in sermons or in catechetical instruction, as, for example, has been emphasized by the 1967 instruction of the German bishops, "even if the faithful under certain circumstances are to be instructed concerning the nature and restricted scope of such a provisional doctrinal decision," as the bishops remark.[4] To put it briefly: "A serious effort to evaluate positively and to appropriate even a provisional doctrinal statement of the Church is part of the proper attitude of faith on the part of a Catholic," and this is especially true of a Jesuit.

But, as the German bishops emphasize, there is no denying that there can be cases in which the well-informed conscience of a Christian and [96] of a Jesuit can disagree with such an authoritatively proposed teaching, withhold assent to it, and also give expression to this with the required respect because the ecclesial teaching office can err and has erred in making such merely authoritative doctrinal declarations. "The Church has always been aware of this possibility and has also admitted it in its theology and has developed rules of conduct for such a situation." This fact, which no one seriously doubts, does not really emerge clearly in Father Dezza's paper, it is more or less covered up and repressed. There are conclusions resulting from this that are really unacceptable even to the most ecclesial of Jesuit theologians, and if, despite this, they should be insisted upon, they would do great harm to an objective and responsible theology, would make Jesuit theology unworthy of trust in the eyes of the public, and would even engender a climate of dishonesty. We shall now treat this in detail.

On the Theology of the Jesuits

The following contains eight points.

1. First of all, Father Dezza's paper is extremely imprecise, since it does not tell us clearly whether the rules of conduct developed in it are valid only for us Jesuits or for all theologians who think with the Church. This lack of clarity has nothing to do with the question whether

[4] J. Neuner and H. Roos, eds., Der Glaube der Kirche in den Urkunden der Lehrerkündigung, 10th ed., no. 469.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Jesuits have a proper and special obligation to respect the ecclesial teaching office that non-Jesuits do not have. An additional moral obligation, which one need not hesitate to admit, does not answer the question whether other and additional norms apply to Jesuit theologians or not. In the first case Jesuit theology would lose its public credibility; it would be perceived as a mere mouthpiece for an authoritarian teaching power.

The question then arises as to how to justify this kind of difference of Jesuit theology in doctrinal matters as opposed to any other theology. There can be no such justification. From the spirit of their order the Jesuits can be obligated to special fidelity to the ecclesial teaching office, but this fidelity can only manifest itself in the exact observation of the rules that apply to all theologians. In the following, then, we presume a negative answer to the question just asked.

2. Father Dezza's observations concerning our attitude toward declarations of the ecclesial teaching office that contain an ultimate dogmatic [97] binding force need not be challenged. These observations may be taken for granted. But they are too simple to provide much help for a theologian. There is no doubt that under certain circumstances, even in the case of those definitions proclaimed by the Church, theologians present very different interpretations, even though the theologians recognize the absolutely binding force of these definitions as a matter of course. In such a case, it may well be that the official magisterium inclines to one definite interpretation rather than to another, even though this does not mean that this preference has itself the force of a definition. What is to be done in a case like this? At this point Father Dezza abandons the theologian, failing to take into account that even today the obligation in regard to a dogma almost necessarily leads to the question of the theologian's attitude toward the merely authoritative teaching office of the Church. According to the teaching of Vatican I, it is certainly correct that further explanation of a dogma may not alter its original sense.

But things are not as simple as Father Dezza makes them out to be when he makes a distinction between the content of the statement and the way the statement is expressed. Father Dezza employs a massive oversimplification that is no help for the theologian. For it is undeniable that even perpetually binding dogmas can be bound up with conceptions, patterns of thought, and so on, that have to be eliminated, so that the question arises as to where the boundary lies between those conceptions that can be amalgamated with the dogmas and the actual dogma itself and what criteria must be found to enable one to draw this boundary. (For example, does the doctrine of original sin, which was certainly formulated under the presupposition of monogenism, imply an absolute obligation to this monogenism, or can monogenism be given up as was permitted by a commission directed by Dhanis in Rome under Paul VI, although a scheme of Vatican II and Humani Generis were of another opinion?)

3. What Father Dezza says about the Catholic theologian's relationship to nondefined but authoritative doctrinal statements of the ecclesial teaching office is, to say the least, so imprecise and one-sided that if these rules were to be proclaimed, one could fear that they would cause conflicts of a most profound nature. According to Father Dezza, a critical position toward such official teaching on the part of a Jesuit theologian can be presented only privately to the Roman teaching office. Father Dezza does not even allow for the publication of critical positions in scientific journals. But to forbid or to suppress this would mean [98] the death of theology. How can we seriously be expected to make the progress absolutely necessary for the efficaciousness of the gospel and the faith of the Church if every advance should first be required to have the positive blessing of the Roman doctrinal office which, at least up to now, has in many cases taken up a position that is objectively wrong? At the time of Pius X, how could one have taken those positions that are accepted today by the whole of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic Old and New Testament exegesis if a prior approbation for them had been required by the Biblical Commission? How would the teaching of the biological link between the human being and the animal kingdom have become possible – a teaching that was even permitted by Pius XII in 1950 – if all the theologians and biologists between Darwin and the middle of our century would have had to get previous approval from Rome?

The fact of the matter is that the ecclesial teaching office can err and has erred quite often, even in our own century, and that in the concrete such errors that are detrimental to the Christian message can be over-come only if public criticism of these errors is possible, no matter how cautious and respectful such criticism may be. This criticism must be possible at least in scientific journals and books. In unpublished theses circulating in the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which I happened to see, the legitimacy of this kind of scientific criticism on the part of theologians is fully recognized for journals and scientific works. Father Dezza does not say anything about this; as a matter of fact, he rules this out for Jesuits. He does not really even mention the possibility that the teaching office can err and has erred, something, for example, that the German bishops explicitly admit. Or is this something that still has to be proved? Do we have to point to doctrinal statements of a very authoritative kind under Pius X which no exegete today any longer accepts and which have been retracted by Rome only partially and half-heartedly? Do we have to make a point of referring to numerous declarations in the struggle against modernism which emanated from the teaching office at the time and which are hardly accepted today by any theologian trained in the history of dogma in the form in which they were presented at that time? Shall we point to the development of Christian social and economic teaching which contains a large number of official declarations that objectively contradict one another? Are we to understand official declarations on the liturgy containing differences that verge on contradiction merely as declarations that have nothing at all to do with the actual teaching office?

Such errors do in fact exist and we might have expected from Father [99] Dezza practical and down-to-earth advice on what to do in such cases. The concession of an “internal difference of opinion” will not suffice. This internal difference of opinion alone is not enough to keep scientific research “open,” to use Father Dezza’s term. The possibility of bringing one’s objection only before the “teaching authorities of the Church” is simply not enough. If the possibility of airing an objection in the “social media of communication” is excluded, then it seems that critical positions on the scientific level as well are also excluded by Father Dezza. But that would be the death of theology in the way it is required to function for the salvation of souls. However, if Father Dezza does not want to exclude criticism on the scientific level, why does he not say so explicitly, since this is of the utmost importance for the work of the theologian?

If the teaching office can make errors in its teaching, how can one go along with Father Dezza’s demand that our teaching “must be in complete agreement with that of the magisterium,” always and absolutely. If we really take this word complete with total seriousness, we would be required to teach, defend, and propagate errors even when we recognize them to be such; we would have to vouch for these errors until the teaching office revokes them explicitly. Or perhaps the word complete does not really mean complete at all. If this is the case, then one might warmly recommend a use of language that is more in keeping with our ordinary German usage that esteems sobriety and honesty. Father Dezza’s statement that teachings which in the sense expounded above are not in agreement with the magisterium must “not be disseminated in publications by Jesuits” is at the very least so undifferentiated that it can be used as an instrument for suppressing any free theological research that is also required to be critical.

4. We must also draw attention to the following difficulty. It is obviously correct that

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theologians must keep in mind the people they are talking to, and so not every theological statement is suitable for everybody. But one must honestly and realistically admit that modern communications media make it very difficult to keep theological reflections locked up in the camera caritatis of the theological sciences. No matter how esoteric the language of theological criticism may be or how obscure the place of its publication, we may be sure that journalists will bring it to the attention of a broad public. While it is true that the customary distinction, and the one also made in the previously mentioned theses of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, between scientific and [100] nonscientific publications even today is not devoid of all meaning, still it is not really helpful for the activities of theologians and contributes, little to the ecclesial teaching office's legitimate attempt to direct theological work into proper channels. Father Dezza does not give us any really helpful rules for dealing with this problem.

Father Dezza does admit that there can be "difficulties" and that "it seems important that they be made public." But what does that mean? Does it mean then that we really may publish these "difficulties," or could an exegete even as early as 1930 state that the traditional way of making Genesis dependent on the historical Moses is not only "difficult" but also wrong? What does a Jesuit theologian do when an educated lay Catholic asks him for information on a theological question concerning which the Jesuit's conscience in all honesty forbids him to do nothing more than just repeat and positively defend the magisterium's authoritative, but nondefined teaching? When it is a question of his own conscience and the salvation of the questioner's soul, can he communicate his own conviction when it diverges from Rome's authoritative teaching? Would he have been allowed to do this, for example, as early as 1930 in regard to the biological origin of the human being, even though Rome did not explicitly permit him to do this until 1950? How is a Jesuit supposed to conceal his opinion which he might perhaps share with the overwhelming majority of Catholic moral theologians in Germany who are not in total agreement with the teaching of Humanae Vitae? If the curia of our order is going to provide helpful instructions" for Jesuit theologians, it will have to address itself to questions such as these.

5. Father Dezza's instruction does not contain a fully realistic understanding of the task of theology. If we should take Father Dezza's remarks at their face value, we would be forced to come to the conclusion that theology's only task is to accept, explain, and defend the explicit teaching of the teaching office. This, however, is a view of theology that does not correspond, for example, to the view propounded by John Paul II in Germany (in Altötting). It is simply not true that the teaching office "is based" only on the direct "assistance of the Holy Spirit" and not on the work of theologians as well. Naturally the teaching office has a function different from that of theology, and this function cannot be reduced to scientific theology alone, If, however, the teaching office does not receive any new revelations and if besides this the Holy Spirit's assistance is an assistentia per se negativa, then it is simply [101] impossible for the teaching office to manage without the work of the theologian, even though perhaps in former times theologians and official teachers were one and the same persons.

Have there ever been formulations or advances on the part of the teaching office that were not first to be found among "theologians"? One could cite any number of examples showing that the teaching office at first mistrusted theological work and tried to slow it down, then finally accepted it and perhaps even acted as if these findings had always been clear and obvious to the ecclesial teaching office. Are not many of the present pope's pronouncements in regard to human rights, religious freedom, and the interpretation of Christian marriage drawn from these findings of theological science which the official Church first looked upon with deep suspicion?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

6. Does not Father Dezza even elevate a papal encyclical practically to the level of a solemn definition, even though an encyclical does not intend to be such and is not such? Why does Father Dezza declare that the sole duty of the servants of the Church is to "communicate" the teaching of an encyclical to the faithful "and to help them to live it"? How are we to argue against Hans Kung's objectively false criticism of papal infallibility when Kung says that Humanae Vitae lays practical claim to infallibility while at the same time containing a teaching that large segments of the Church are justifiably opposed to? What are we supposed to say when Father Dezza practically forbids each and every objection to a papal encyclical?

7. In view of all these considerations it seems to me justifiable, with all due respect to the papal delegate Father Paolo Dezza, to express the urgent desire that before the general publication of the guidelines being discussed here, he should once again in a detailed and open way avail himself of the counsel of really competent theologians who really understand all the particulars and difficulties contained in the questions under discussion and who themselves possess experience in their own field of work.

8. What has been presented here had to be composed very hastily and makes no claim to being perfectly systematized. It is the pope's desire that we Jesuits be required to uphold the Second Vatican Council. If this is done by means of a detailed and precise study of the entire teaching of the council, many other important things bearing on the questions [102] under discussion could be found. What about the consensus fidelium if it is brought to bear on our question? Would it not be possible in the council's sense to understand even the theologian's mission as a charism and the theologian as one who in a peculiar way receives the promise of the Holy Spirit's assistance? Could not insights be gained from the teaching of this council that would open perspectives for a legitimate pluralism even in theology, insights that cannot be attained by mere conformity to the Roman teaching office alone? If the council's teaching contains insights on freedom of religion which were previously not recognized by the official ecclesial teaching office in the nineteenth century, could not this fact lead to further insights which are important for our question? If statements in the council were deliberately avoided that were previously put forth by the Church's official teaching office and that had also found their way into preconciliar schemata (statements, for example, concerning monogenism, the relationship between Scripture and tradition, the nature of inspiration, etc), could insights not be deduced from these statements concerning a legitimate distance even from authoritative doctrinal statements, if such previous statements under certain circumstances were also tacitly abandoned even in the council?

THE APOSTOLATE OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS

In the third and final section of my talk, I want to deal with Father Dezza's third paper of 26 February 1982 which takes up the question of our apostolate.

Faith and Justice

It must first of all be stated that Pope John Paul II in his address to the fathers provincial, and Father Dezza as well, appropriated the fourth decree of the thirty-second General Congregation which says that our mission today consists in the service of faith and the advancement of justice, just as the Synod of Bishops recognized in 1971 that the advancement of justice is an integral part of evangelization.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This of course, does not answer all the questions concerning the more exact relationship of these two tasks and their unity. But perhaps one might put it in the following simple terms. Just as Christians are commanded to love God and their neighbor, just as these two tasks condition [103] each other, and while one cannot be simply reduced to the other, still they form an indissoluble unity, so too is the case with the twofold task which our order has set for itself in the thirty-second General Congregation. Both the popes and Father Dezza as well make it obvious to me that the attacks voiced in some quarters among us against the twofold nature of our task as established in the thirty-second General Congregation are certainly not justified.

Excesses which assuredly occur here and there in our work for justice in the world cannot be avoided or combatted by rejecting the position of the thirty-second General Congregation itself. One might even go so far as to say that it is by no means obvious that the Society of Jesus is everywhere shouldering sufficient responsibility for this second task (the efforts to promote justice). It goes without saying that we must reject any attempt to reduce our total task in the wrong sense to the horizontal plane of a mere struggle for social justice in the world. A genuinely serious political theology will share this opinion. As always in life, the difficulties of course lie in managing the details. The emphasis will differ according to the different countries, social situations, the possibilities that the different provinces have at their disposal and also the capabilities and talents of individual Jesuits. The dangers of a false or excessive emphasis will likewise be different.

In this connection, Father Dezza's remark also seems to me to be noteworthy when he says that the social apostolate has not only a fundamental place in the planning of our apostolate but that in all other forms of our apostolate the social dimension must also be taken into account. If we really take this statement of Father Dezza seriously, we could deduce from it the legitimacy of what is known as "political theology," for all that this theology really wants to do is to introduce into all the dimensions of theology an explicit reflection on the social aspect of all the realities that come under theology's scope and give this social aspect its proper due. When Father Dezza says that the advancement of justice is to be understood "as necessary in the light of the service of faith," that can certainly be understood correctly, provided that "faith" is understood as the absolute totality of the Christian life and the Christian task. It may, however, be feared that someone might take this as the occasion of once again trying to reduce the advancement of justice to the proclamation of faith, which was the exclusive understanding of the concrete advancement of justice in former times. Assuredly one can speak of a "primary goal of our religious and priestly apostolate which consists in the proclamation of the gospel and in the communication [104] of faith in the grace of Christ," and naturally at all times and in all places human beings, and so, too, priests who proclaim faith, have a relationship to God in faith, hope, and love that infinitely transcends all immanent and interpersonal values.

But when using the word primary we must bear in mind that even in an order of priests love of neighbor together with all the challenges and possibilities this involves cannot ultimately be simply made equivalent to this transcendent love of God and be dissolved in it, since God has created a real world which is truly different from him, and m addition to this he has himself become a man, divinizing the world unto himself in such a way that he has communicated to it that it is precisely only in the world that he can be reached, but that it is indeed he himself, and therefore the first commandment of love of God and the second commandment of love of neighbor can no longer be separated from one another.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In human life and its socializations and so, too, in the Church it happens that individuals have different functions and tasks. Our order, at least according to its status under church law up to now, happens to be an order of priests. And so we who have taken upon ourselves this priestly task and function in the Church and in society can expect to be just that, priests, and that we want to be priests. Whatever more precise theological interpretation this priesthood may undergo (and in this respect theology even today faces momentous tasks particularly because the priest, too, in a historically changing world cannot simply remain exactly the way he was in former times), in any event the fact remains that we have taken on a particular task with our religious priesthood. Therefore a Jesuit cannot occupy himself with anything and everything that is good and even necessary in our own day and age. And so when popes Paul VI, John Paul I, and John Paul II insist that in principle we are to keep within the limits of our priestly task given by the nature of the priesthood and established by canon law, this is something that may actually be taken for granted. We Jesuits need not feel called to do anything and everything.

Both the history of our order and our present-day activity show that our radius of action is really quite broad. It should not be our desire to take upon ourselves anything and everything in the world just because [105] it is good and perhaps absolutely necessary. Mother Teresa is doing wonderful things in Calcutta. In Central America I have no difficulty imagining a mission under Christian inspiration that is accomplished with a rifle. But this is a far cry from saying that things like these must also be a part of our tasks and even that they must be a normal part of our tasks. In the ordinary case it is quite right for the priest to leave to lay Christians tasks which are not his but which belong to lay persons. It is the part of reasonable human beings and Christians to limit themselves soberly to a particular task in the human race and in society.

Those who feel called to the Carthusian life of contemplative solitude should not become Jesuits. And those who have the entirely conceivable Christian vocation to become social revolutionaries should likewise not become Jesuits either. We have the right not to want everything. Only those who are able to affirm this limitation of the order's tasks should become and remain members of the order. For when we accept this limitation, and it is, after all, not really a straitjacket, we serve the whole of the Church and humankind better than if we wanted to carry the whole world on our shoulders.

True, the popes and Father Dezza as well admit that there can also be "extraordinary cases" in which a Jesuit may move beyond the limits actually imposed on him in principle by his priestly task, that he might indeed even be required to do this. When Father Dezza says that this might be conceivable only in "really extraordinary cases," this restriction cannot reasonably be construed to mean that there can be no such cases like these at all. When Father Dezza says that such cases require the "consent of the bishops and of father general" one will be permitted to take the liberty of adding that a consent of this kind coming from the other side is in certain circumstances even demanded and is not something that merely lies within the discretion of these superiors. One may ask which bishops are meant since it is a well-known fact that the bishops have considerable differences of opinions concerning critical social questions. In all realism one will also make allowance for the case that someone who knows with certainty that he is called to this kind of direct political mission will depart from the Society of Jesus in peace as Hermann Muckermann did in a similar case a few decades ago. Naturally our efforts to promote justice must be in "accordance with the directives of the local hierarchy." But it must also be honestly admitted that in the concrete situations of life this norm cannot be the only principle governing our action. Particularly in this area conflicts can arise similar to those that can arise with the teaching office in the theoretical area of [106] theology. So, too, in the advancement of justice obedience cannot simply be blind obedience, nor can it be the sole norm. In the final analysis, abstract norms alone will prove insufficient

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation for overcoming conflicts in this area too.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[107]

PART THREE

Piety

[109]

8

DIMENSIONS OF MARTYRDOM

I would like to make a plea here for a certain widening of the traditional concept of martyrdom.

The traditional concept as used in the Church is well known. We are not inquiring here how it developed during the history of the Church, or bow it is related to the biblical concept of martyrdom, or how this New Testament concept itself is further connected with such notions as preaching, prophecy, confession, death, and so on.

Here we start with the traditional concept of martyrdom. As used in dogmatic and fundamental theology, this concept means the freely endured (not actively fighting, like a soldier) acceptance of death for the sake of faith. “Faith” includes Christian morality, as clearly shown by the fact that Saint Maria Goretti, who was killed in 1902 by a youth from the neighborhood because she strenuously resisted his importunities, is honored by the Church as a martyr. “Faith” may mean the whole of the Christian confession, or one single truth of the Christian doctrine of faith or morals. Of course, in such a case, this single truth is viewed within the totality of the Christian message. Death in odium fidei (because of hatred for the faith) must be consciously accepted; therefore, martyrdom and “baptism by blood” must be distinguished.

What is peculiar is that the Church currently excludes from the concept of martyrdom a death suffered in active combat. So our question is whether death suffered in active combat on behalf of the Christian faith and its moral demands (including social ones) must necessarily remain excluded from the concept of martyrdom. This question is very important for Christian life in the Church, because granting the title of martyr to a fighting Christian would amount to a strong recommendation by [110] the official Church of such active combat as something to be imitated by other Christians.

First it is evident that such concepts as those of which we are speaking have a history and may legitimately vary in meaning. The only question here is whether in this case the passive endurance of death for the sake of the faith and suffering death in active combat for the faith, or some of its demands, might not be brought together under the one concept of martyrdom. Although they are different, these two kinds of death have many features in common, and putting both of them under one concept does not deny the lasting distinction between them. There are many concepts that put two realities together because of their resemblance, without thereby denying or necessarily obscuring their differences For example, the concept of “sin” is used by the Church both for original sin and for freely committed personal sins, without denying the radical differences between these two conditions.

Of course, it is certainly true that the endured suffering of death for the sake of faith has a special relation to the death of Jesus, who became the faithful and reliable witness precisely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

through the death that he suffered. But this undeniable difference between the two kinds of death does not prevent us from bringing them together under the one concept and using the same word, martyrdom.

In order to see this and in order to make clear the inner and essential similarity between these two ways of dying, despite their differences, we must consider many things. First, the "passively undergone" death of Jesus is the consequence of his fight against the religious and political authorities of his time. He died because he fought; his death may not be seen apart from his life. On the other hand, those who die in active combat for the demands of their Christian conviction (at times, of course, also for social causes) also "endure" their death. Even such a death is not directly intended; it includes a passive element just as the death of martyrs in the traditional sense also includes an active element because, through their active witness and life, they too brought about the situation in which they could have escaped death only by denying their faith.

The question is, of course, how to describe the active struggle more precisely and how to distinguish it from similar events, so that this death could be called martyrdom. Not everyone who dies in a religious war on the Christian side should be called a martyr. In religious wars too many worldly motives intervene. The question remains open whether every combatant in such wars confronts the possibility of dying and really accepts death. But why wouldn't Archbishop Oscar Romero, for instance, who fell in the struggle for social justice, a struggle that he carried on because of his deeply Christian conviction, be a martyr? He certainly considered the possibility of dying.

We must not imagine the passive endurance of death solely in the way in which we habitually picture the first Christian martyrs standing before the tribunal and being condemned. The passive endurance of death, accepted in a voluntary decision, may happen quite differently. The modern "persecutors of Christians" will not give today's Christians any chance at all to confess their faith in the way in which it was done in the first Christian centuries and to accept the death which the tribunal decrees for them. Yet death in the more anonymous forms of modern persecution may be foreseen and accepted as it was by the ancient martyrs. And this death can be a consequence of an active struggle for justice and other Christian values. It is strange that the Church canonizes Maximilian Kolbe as a confessor and not a martyr. Rather than focus on his earlier life, an unprejudiced understanding of Maximilian Kolbe will consider his behavior in the concentration camp and at the moment of death, and understand him as a martyr of unselfish Christian love.

The difference between a death in active combat for the sake of faith and death passively endured for the sake of faith is too subtle and too difficult to determine to make it worthwhile to separate them conceptually or verbally. Ultimately, both express the same resolute acceptance of death prompted by the same Christian motivation; in both cases death means acceptance of the death of Christ, which, as the highest act of love and courage, puts humanity unreservedly at God's disposal. It is a radical unity of active love and endurance of the painful being-snatched-away-from-oneself, while facing the incomprehensible but powerful no of men and women to the love of God revealing itself. In both cases death appears as the complete and public manifestation of the true nature of Christian death. Where death is suffered in a struggle for Christian conviction, it also bears witness to an unshakable faith that, inspired by God's grace, is ready to go all the way up to and including death, and all this is patiently endured in an experience of the deepest inner and outer powerlessness. That applies also to death in combat, because, like the martyr who suffers in the traditional sense, the combatant experiences in his apparent failure the power of evil and his own impotence.

In this plea for a certain widening of the traditional concept of martyrdom, we may also appeal to Thomas Aquinas. He says that, through [112] a death that has a clear relation to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christ, one is a martyr when one defends the commonwealth (res publica) against the assaults of its foes, who would try to destroy the Christian faith, and in doing so suffers death.[1] The destruction of the faith in Christ, against which such a defender fights, may also refer to a single dimension of the Christian faith. If it did not we could not call martyrdom the passive enduring of death for the sake of a single Christian moral demand. Thus Thomas proposes in his Commentary on the Sentences a broad concept of martyrdom, such as the one we are suggesting here.

A legitimate "political theology" and a theology of liberation should take up this conceptual widening. It has a very concrete practical meaning for a Christianity and a Church that wish to become aware of their responsibility for justice and peace.

[1] IV Sent. dist. 49 q. 5 a. 3 qc. 2 ad 11.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[113]

9

EUCHARISTIC WORSHIP

The Church has a history that is still far from over, that is difficult to foresee, and that time and again surprises us. This applies also to piety, both that of individuals in the Church and that of the Church herself and of large groups in the Church. So there exists a history of piety. Such a history always brings about changes that provide novelties wrought by the Spirit of God. But unavoidably it also contains its dangers.

Throughout the changes in her history in general and in her piety in particular, the Church of Jesus Christ, because it is assisted by the Spirit of God and of Jesus Christ, can and will not lose her identity. Hence in this history the nature of the Church remains the same through all change. Moreover, the past never disappears in such a way that it would have nothing more to say to the future. As history goes on, something ancient can again become new, can instruct and inspire later history. That is why, if we wish to create a new future, we may have to return to the sources. The ancient customs that are continually revived in this way do not come into later times as something lifeless and dead, or as a respectfully preserved museum piece; they stay alive by insinuating themselves actively into the future. They change while keeping their ancient nature.

What has been said in general about the Church, her history, and the history of piety applies also to eucharistic piety, to the piety with which the institution of the Lord's Supper must always be celebrated. The purpose of this short essay is to say a few words about the possibility of reviving ancient customs in the history of eucharistic piety, of not indifferently giving them up as out-dated, but of viewing them as a new possibility and task for the future.

[114] When we honestly consider the present life of the Church, we cannot deny that eucharistic piety has experienced a certain decline. Is adoration before the tabernacle, with the sanctuary lamp burning, still practiced as it used to be in the past? How many monasteries continue to have "perpetual adoration"? Has the Corpus Christi procession in many places not been given up or at least considerably reduced? In how many churches is the monstrance still used today? Genuflecting before the Blessed Sacrament is frequently omitted. Most people who come to Mass sit down in the pews right away and wait impatiently for the service to begin. That it would be possible to kneel down for a few moments and to adore the Lord present in the Eucharist never seems to occur to most of them. Receiving communion as one attends Mass has, more than formerly, become almost a natural Sunday practice, but possibly too often only a routine. Giving thanks privately after communion and at the end of the Mass used to be almost taken for granted. Nowadays it seems to be more or less forgotten. Certainly there exists no necessary connection between the sacrament of "confession" and the reception of the Eucharist, although only a few decades ago, many Christians considered it obligatory. But are average Christians today sufficiently aware of the obligation of going to confession before receiving communion when they have committed a serious sin? More examples might be mentioned of a decline in eucharistic piety. What should we say about it?

It is, of course, not possible here and now to consider all the manifestations of eucharistic piety that were customary during past centuries and to wonder whether they might be revived. Many of these practices will certainly not have any promise for the future, although they may have been very pious and we may regret their loss, if we used them in our own lives. I do not know whether a beautiful monstrance will always remain part of the usual furnishings of a church. But undoubtedly in the eucharistic piety of the past there were many things that should be kept, that make sense even for the future, and that should not perish. They belong to that past which the future must recover, if it is to be great. Today I will mention only one of them and say a few words about it: quiet individual prayer before the tabernacle.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

To be sure, we may adore God everywhere in spirit and in truth. God hears the prayer that we say alone in our room. It is true that Christians should learn to find God everywhere and in all things, thus making their daily life into a religious service. But if we are honest, we will have to admit that only those who are always and everywhere united with God in love will really value the liturgy, public prayer in the Church with [115] their brothers and sisters, and the explicit and bodily expressions of their nearness to God. Those who wish to be united to God will value the explicit and bodily manifestations of their piety as lovingly performed high points of their union with God. They know of no opposition between the permanent devotion of their daily life and the hours that are expressly consecrated to God.

This applies especially to eucharistic piety. It is part of the Catholic faith that Jesus Christ is truly present with his divinity and his humanity under the eucharistic species. It is true that this presence under symbols of human food points to the reception and enjoyment of this eucharistic nourishment. Nevertheless, in this nourishment Jesus Christ is present with his divinity and his humanity not only when received but also before that, so that he may be received in a bodily way. That is why Catholics may, under the eucharistic signs, adore Jesus, the divine pledge of their salvation. True, compared with the real reception of the heavenly bread, such adoration is not the highest point of the sacramental happening. But it is a practice that follows legitimately from the Catholic belief in the true presence of the Lord in the sacrament.

Therefore this worshipping of Jesus in the sacrament must not disappear. Its history may have started from almost unnoticeable beginnings. However, in salvation history and in the history of the Church something cannot disappear simply because it started almost without being noticed. No, as Catholics we wish, individually and together, to look to the sign of the presence of the one who has loved us and has offered himself up for us. It should not be unusual for us to kneel at times in private prayer before the Lord who has saved us.

Forty years ago in Vienna I still saw people in the trolley car make the sign of the cross or tip their hat when the car passed a church. Such a custom may have become strange for us, and not without reason, so that we should not try to revive such expressions of piety. However, real worship of the sacrament of the altar, both in private and in common, even apart from Holy Communion, must not disappear. We should examine ourselves and ask whether this holy tradition of eucharistic piety still appeals to us. Do we not want to carry it on? This ancient custom contains a blessing for the future, a blessing we should not miss.

It seems to me that in the Church of the future as well as of the past, and not only on exceptional occasions, we should see Christians kneeling in church, alone and in silence, before the tabernacle in which the bread of life is kept, so that it may be received. These Christians know that God is everywhere, that he carries everything with his power and [116] his love, and is incredibly near to everything; they know that the whole world is the cathedral where he is eternally adored. But these Christians also know that their own adoring love is not always near the God who is always near them. They know that they themselves must continue to try to be near God. And they know that the God who is everywhere present in power and in love has, because we are not always near him, created a few places and realities that make it easier for us, prisoners of space and time, to reach his presence.

Now Jesus is the event in which God has granted his salvific presence to finite human beings in an unsurpassable and irrevocably way. And it is before this Jesus, present in the body although hidden under sacramental signs, that these Christians are kneeling. In Jesus God has, in an unsurpassable and definitive way, become world. In this sacrament we discover how he leads this world back into the splendor of God. Christians kneel before him. They look at the one who has been pierced. They are in the bodily presence of the one in whom God has assumed the world as his own reality. These Christians pray silently, they allow the quiet peace of this sacrament to fill them, they can tell this sacramentally present Lord of their life about their concerns. But ultimately they only desire to be introduced by this sacramentally present Jesus into the truth and love of God, which radiate silently from this sacramental sign.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It seems to me that even today and in the future we must not forget what our Christian forebears practiced. The sanctuary lamp of our Catholic churches continues to invite us to a silent lingering before the mystery of our redemption.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[117]

10

DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART TODAY

Devotion to the Sacred Heart is going through a crisis. Yet it has a long history, it has been strongly supported by recent popes, even until Paul VI, and it occupies a very high rank in the liturgy.

In Western Europe at least the heart of Jesus is hardly ever mentioned in a sermon. Writings about this devotion have clearly become scarcer during the last few decades, the Messengers of the Sacred Heart are obsolete. Even Rome's official utterances are less numerous and more reserved. And in the religious orders that have made this devotion their special task the members seem to have lost courage, to have been intimidated by a modern trend in spirituality that seems to be almost unable to do anything at all with a devotion to the Sacred Heart.

I intend to defend the position that, even today, the worship of the divine heart of Jesus Christ can and should be meaningful and significant. Although I will try to explain who might be expected to promote this exercise of Catholic piety of the last few centuries and who may continue to find it useful, my conviction does not derive from a pessimistic evaluation of the present situation of the Church and of modern spirituality in general.

THE CHURCH IS SUBJECT TO CHANGE

The Church and her piety are part of history. Therefore not only in the past but in the present and the future as well, they are legitimately subject [118] to change. The same God-given realities do not always occupy the foreground of Christian faith, although that one and selfsame faith always centers around the eternal God, Jesus Christ, and the irrevocable self-communication of the incomprehensible God in Jesus Christ. That is why it is natural that in an age of universal atheism and of a secularization that is more than the legitimate acknowledgment of the autonomy of earthly realities, in an age that knows less and less about the central message of Christianity, in an age of deadly danger for the whole world and of hitherto unknown and arduous challenges in organizing social life and the international community, in such a time the theme of an explicit verbalized devotion to the Sacred Heart cannot have, in the general awareness of the Church or in the ordinary awareness of the faithful in the world, the same "central position" that it supposedly occupied for the two past centuries, up to the middle of our own.

In the darkness of our times, which are threatened by the death of both spirit and body, we cry to the incomprehensible God of our history we announce, with the last power of the faith, that we have kept the crucified one as our own fate; we hope that this fate hanging over us individually and socially will end up in salvation.

It is not surprising then that, in the presence of these ultimate questions and of the answers to them which we grasp with all the courage of our existence, devotion to the Sacred Heart no longer attracts us. It sounds too bland, too individualistic, too merely "introspective." We no longer see why we should translate, even if it were possible, the ultimate answers to the ultimate questions, which are forced upon us and expected from us, into the language of a devotion to the Sacred Heart. We have the impression that this devotion is slowly entering the domain of ways of acting and speaking that belong to a Christian past. These ways existed once, they were lively and good, but they no longer appeal to us. It is like the special

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

veneration of Jesus' Five Wounds, the Infant of Prague, the Precious Blood, and many other practices of Christian piety, which once captivated and delighted the spirit and heart of Christians.

As we recall from history how important indulgences once were in the Church (fifty years ago we ourselves may still have had high esteem for them), and as we consider that even a pope who cared as much for tradition as Paul VI did, while maintaining the traditional doctrine of indulgences, admitted without hesitation that Christians were free with regard to indulgences, and as we notice that they continue in use only in small religious subcultures, playing no more role in the life of the universal [119] Church, we can naturally wonder whether devotion to the Sacred Heart will not meet the same fate.

THE CHURCH NEEDS PEOPLE WITH MYSTICAL-CHARISMATIC EXPERIENCE

However, I am convinced that the opposite is true. I have pointed this out previously, and I intend to submit here a few considerations in defense of this conviction. This conviction does not include the opinion that devotion to the Sacred Heart should in the future loom as large in the awareness of large numbers of people in the Church as it still did under Pius XI and Pius XII. If in the Church's consciousness, as constituted by all Christians, this devotion should not in the future be as natural and as intense as it was formerly, I would not protest against this or try to oppose this trend.

However, there is also in the Church, and there ought to be, a somewhat esoteric elite, which is not made up of specially trained people, such as theologians and officeholders, but is an elite to which may belong the poor and those who are socially weak. I mean here the elite of the saints, of those who, on account of their mystical-charismatic experience, are always for the Church a source of new life and a witness to God's grace in the world. Such a secret elite must exist even in the more democratic Church of the People of God. It stands to reason that this elite should contain as many priests as possible. Although they have a social function in the Church, these representatives of the Church should, as much as possible, combine letter and spirit, law and freedom, rite and grace, official function and free charism. I am convinced that in such a properly understood humble and unselfish elite, including priests, devotion to the Sacred Heart should and will have a future. This devotion must have a distinct character, even though it may differ considerably in its style and way of speaking from what used to be. It will differ less explicitly than before from ordinary Christian and priestly spirituality. Such a conviction is not to be understood as a prophecy, but rather as an invitation to shape priestly piety, a shaping that is not only grace but also an act of our freedom.

With this conviction in mind I can offer only a few short considerations on behalf of devotion to the Sacred Heart. We cannot appeal here to the Gospel of Saint John to defend devotion to the heart of Jesus. It is impossible to bring up the great history of this devotion, in order to [120] ask whether we, the Church's present-day philistines, intend to betray this wonderful history of piety. We cannot surrey every dimension of this devotion which Pius XI did not hesitate to declare the sum of the Christian religion. It is impossible to explain the dogmatic and theological meaning of worship of the Sacred Heart, which should be known before one ventures to present one's own opinion about it. It is impossible to say anything here about the archetypes in the depths of human existence of such perennial and universal words as heart, even though we know more about the physiological cardiac muscle and are capable of replacing it in heart transplants.

Here and now I would like to call attention to two ideas. The first one belongs to the history of theology. The other one considers the very unusual historical situation in which the Church exists today. Taken together, both considerations may at least make us wonder whether it would not be theologically imprudent, and even foolish, to expect a disappearance of devotion to the Sacred Heart, even though in the Church we can never simply passively await the future or predict it by means of rationalistic computations, since the future remains entrusted to our freedom, responsibility, and action.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE CHURCH – A UNITY THAT KEEPS ITS IDENTITY IN HISTORY

The first consideration refers to the irreversibility of the history of the Church's consciousness. The Church is one. Despite all great, often terrible, and absolutely unforeseeable changes she does not lose her identity. This implies that new events may occur in her, events that are really important, that determine her future destiny, that truly cannot be rationally deduced from what came before. They are new, surprising interventions of God's Spirit in the Church. It does not follow, and it is even excluded, that important events which shape the whole Christian Church fade away without leaving a lasting trace simply because they occurred after the time of the primitive Church.

Possibly there exists a true history of jus divinum in the Church. This divine law is not simply transmitted all the way from Jesus to the present without any changes. Rather it attains its reality only through later historical decisions. The binding decisions of the councils cannot be rejected later on. They cannot even be totally forgotten. The history of the liturgy is not only a series of changes, but it is also one unified history. [121 In that history the inner nature of Christian public worship not only remains the same; in its new forms it realizes itself in such a way that the basic nature of former historical forms is maintained and becomes manifest.

Many things in the Church's life, in her piety, her relation to the secular world, her interpretation of nature and of humankind, and the organization of ordinary life, may at first sight seem to disappear and be replaced by something quite different. However, as this history is the history of the one Church, the history of the one body of the one Christ, it is more than an external succession of single events, even if these events are considered to be grounded in a reality and a doctrine that remains rigidly the same. The Church grows while remaining the same. That is why she cannot simply lay aside and forget her former history. She is always the one that she has become. She always acts according to the experiences gathered in her history. She is always young, but this youth, with its possibilities of the surprisingly new, is the youth in which her past history resides. This is something like the case of the adult who, as Paul says, lays aside what is childish, without thus becoming a new child who simply starts over. The Church always brings her history with her into the present and in this way carries it on.

The memory of the past, a memory that keeps things alive and out of which the present emerges in ever new ways, thus preserving the past, is a basic category of ecclesiology. Without it the history of the Church cannot be understood and lived. Of course, that which remains of the past in the present and the future of the Church varies according to the relationship between an historical event and the basic nature of the Church, a relationship that, naturally, can vary much in the single events that occur in the Church.

Today there may be no hermits living atop a column. They have become an oddity of historical curiosity. But the real spirit of the fathers of the desert and the experience of that time may nevertheless have a meaning for us today. We would not belong in the Church today, if we left all this behind us as wholly unimportant, if we did not keep it as an experience that challenges us now, or that will challenge us later, in a wholly new way. Even in the future with all the changes that are still possible in eucharistic piety, we will never be able simply to forget the knowledge that, in the twelfth century, was given to the Church

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

about the presence of Jesus in the Lord's Supper and under the eucharistic signs, and which she professed officially in the dogma of Trent. That is why eucharistic worship will not simply return to the simplicity it had in [122] the time of the fathers of the Church. In this respect too, the Church, having reached greater maturity, will not simply return to her childhood, even though we cannot say just what this worship will look like in Africa two hundred years from now.

In a Church that only now is slowly turning into a real world-Church, the papacy too will experience, in its relation to the worldwide territorial churches, changes that cannot now be foreseen. But it will certainly not return to its beginnings at the time of Cyprian. Because the Church is an ecclesial unity that keeps its identity in history, she carries along from the past into the future, not only her abstract essence but also her history. She does this in many different ways, of course, according to the significance of these historical developments in the past, in ways that we cannot theoretically deduce and thus predict. But because of her own identity in history, and in spite of the fact that her historical achievements and decisions originated in time, her past will never simply disappear.

THE DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART BELONGS TO THE WORSHIP OF THE CHURCH

I am convinced that this is true also of the veneration of the Sacred Heart with an explicit spirituality and a particular worship. It is true that, despite its roots in John's theology of the pierced side as the source of water and Spirit from which the Church is born, and despite the beginnings of an explicit devotion in the Middle Ages, this devotion is an historical event and an historical experience that were given to the Church only in the modern age. Naturally, this spiritual experience has its human-historical limitations that do not always have to remain the same. Christian faith and theological reflection have only slowly understood the proper nature of this spiritual experience, and what is properly meant when we speak of the heart of Jesus. We do not have to hold onto everything that has ever been said in the theology of the devotion to the Sacred Heart, in its efforts to assimilate spiritual experience. Nor are we supposed to hold onto the concrete devotional practices that were very much alive in former times. But when we consider the history of devotion to the Sacred Heart – not superficially, superciliously, or with scorn – and when we see the wealth of spiritual and charismatic experience it contained, when we bear in mind all the Church's official declarations about it, when we remember the liturgical worship of the [123] heart of Jesus in all its grandeur and impressiveness, we should not venture to say that we can simply forget about this devotion as something antiquated. If we were to think and to act that way, we would have to say that we were about to give up something that belongs to the Church's past and therefore something of our own spiritual experience in the Church as well.

We may feel that we can easily forget about this past of our Church. In the laziness of our heart we are all too tempted to do so. But this does not prove that we are allowed to do so before God and considering our responsibility for the continuity of the Church's history. Such a feeling must rather frighten us. We should face the question whether such a lazy slipping back into a primitive spirituality that wrongly appeals to ancient times, when the Sacred Heart devotion was unknown, is not something that we must overcome in a spirit of hopeful determination, if we do not want to be condemned by our past, we should wonder whether it is possible to expect a renewed understanding of the nature of this devotion and a renewed practice of it. What today seems utterly plausible, all that is everywhere bought and sold, are not always the only things that make us great and holy before God, nor important for the future of the Church. That which is patiently and laboriously learned might also deserve our

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation attention.

THE CHURCH HARBORS A UNIVERSAL HOPE FOR ALL HUMANITY

A second consideration is in order. Humanity – and humanity in the Church also – is living today in a situation of frightening ambivalence. Humanity is coming out of a modern enlightened optimism, for which the human is naturally good and about to build an earthly paradise of freedom, universal justice, and happiness. In this era of naive optimism, something happened in the Church's consciousness that looks like the result or the echo of this bourgeois enlightened optimism, finding in it a favorable climate for growth, although, in the final analysis, it has a quite different cause and justification. Divine revelation, given to the Church in Jesus, makes her hope that all human beings not only may be saved but will be saved. True, she will never preach a theoretical doctrine of universal salvation, because, while carefully eschewing theoretical curiosity in eschatology, she will always humbly submit to the fear instilled by the threatening apocalyptic sermons of Jesus. But it seems to me that [124] the Church has learned to have a universal hope for all and to forgo making any theoretical and dogmatically binding statements about the actual occurrence of definitive damnation for a part of humankind.

Thomas Aquinas was of the opinion that we may hope only for ourselves, not for others. Today we hope for ourselves, because we know that we may; but we must hope for others and we may hope for all. Formerly Christians discussed what percentage of the massa damnata (the damned mass) of humanity and of Christians were actually saved. Because of Saint Augustine's doctrine of original sin they considered the failure of human existence through definitive perdition as the normal case, as the outcome of divine predestination, of an unfathomable divine justice. The salvation of a few chosen ones was felt to be a work of God; only in this way could God show that he willed to be not only the God of justice with regard to the many who were doomed but also a God of mercy for the few elect. Today we no longer preach about hell as we used to do, even though in our life and in our preaching we must always realize that we are sinners, who by ourselves are lost, and who do not possess God's incomprehensible grace as something that is at our disposition.

As the Second Vatican Council shows, almost without being aware of it, there exists today a universal hope for the blessed outcome of the whole of history – no more than that. But this is a legitimate fruit, granted to the Church today, which, in the long history of her understanding of the faith, has been given to her by Jesus, who was crucified, burdened with the guilt of all humankind, and in this way plunged into the abyss of happiness. And here is the amazing thing which can deeply upset us: with this optimism about salvation gathered in the history of her faith, with this optimism that seemed to be a product of an enlightened world's presumptuous optimism, the Church advances into the future, while maintaining the optimism that she received from God.

But this future which she enters with her courageous hope of universal salvation is, if all the signs are not misleading, a time that is totally different from the past out of which the Church and the world are emerging. Although those who continue to harbor great secular optimism are not forbidden to do so, this dawning time is one in which people are, to a large extent, running into limits they can no longer exceed. It is a time of crisis offering no possible alternatives, a time of resignation, of weariness, sterility, and exhaustion, a time in which individuals become ever more ignorant because they feel increasingly helpless before the enormity of what needs to be known. It is a time [125] in which, despite all the talk of freedom and democracy, individuals are subject to ever more planning, and must be, because otherwise the enormous mass of people could not coexist, because otherwise people would

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exterminate a great part of the rest of the world by means of nuclear wars, just so that the survivors might have enough space in which to live. We are living in a time in which the anthropological sciences madly endeavor to smash people's illusions, to unmask human beings as the mere product of fortuitous evolution, of the powers of their unconscious, of their drives, and of a society that does not know where it comes from and where it is going. Nature, exploited by humans, threatens them, and they themselves have learned how to bring about the universal suicide of humankind.

It is into such a humanity that the Church enters with Jesus Christ's message of universal salvation. It is because of Christ that we are emboldened to hope that the individual and humankind are advancing irreversibly, singlemindedly, toward eternal salvation in God, when they seem only to be plunging into the dark abyss of death.

The Church keeps this hope, because she wishes to be faithful to the true God and the crucified Jesus. She holds on to it, while being fully aware of the dreadful, seemingly unabating wickedness of world history, which only discovers new and unprecedented ways of spending itself in hopeless guilt. In all this hopelessness for the present and the future, the Church remains the one that harbors universal hope, that even dares to hope more thoroughly than she did in the past.

This universal hope is not an easy painkiller in the wretchedness of our time, but, considered from the human point of view, it is an exorbitant demand. It is a modern form of the folly of the Cross, of hoping against all hope. It is a folly that sets God's wisdom against the world's wisdom, a wisdom in which the world begins to have doubts about itself. It is the courage to live that alone makes us really free; that, without uselessly counting the cost, teaches to let go and to give; that alone can prefer being to having and that can even love the enemy by whom one is killed. True, this hope does not exempt us from thinking about how to make the earth habitable for as many people as possible, from working hard to that effect, fighting for it, even with violence, if we have to.

But this universal hope alone, which the Church herself has only slowly reached as an evident truth, can shed some light in the darkness in which we are drifting, a darkness that we have to bear today and tomorrow, even if we allow ourselves to think that historically such times of darkness have been followed by more luminous periods. And if our [126] thinking nowadays is less individualistic, but more political and collective (or if at least we imagine that it is), the universal hope that the whole of history is not rushing into a final abyss of nothingness and that there cannot be an eternal and definitive rubbish heap for part of this universal history is the final confirmation and the crowning conviction of such a way of thinking and of a political theology.

The universal hope that lives in all individuals and that accompanies them in their inescapable death is for them the form their hope takes today, that hope which, as one of the three theological virtues, saves them and secures their happiness. Who would have the courage today of proudly trusting that their absolute future will be one of fulfillment, if they did not assume the blessed obligation to hope in the same end for all others?

THE HEART AS THE INNERMOST CENTER

But what is the connection between devotion to the Sacred Heart and this frightfully strange situation, in which the Church must proclaim the foolish message of a universal hope for a despairing humanity?

If we wanted to give a really clear answer to this question (we cannot do it here) we would have to say that, despite God's fundamental oneness for which human beings are heading, persons in their religious existence have to do with a great number of religious realities that time and again overwhelm them. If this were not the case, the council would have found it impossible to speak of a hierarchy of truths that is presented to those who believe and that, under the guidance of the Spirit, all persons have to build for themselves and for their own situation. When religious-minded people wish time and again to summarize and organize this huge number of religious realities and to center it around the ultimate mystery of God, they look for basic words, words that in a mysterious way contain infinity. As single words they refer to everything. They emerge from the innermost center of one's own existence, where all is still one, and call forth the ultimate unity of all reality. There are many such basic words. Everyone may have his or her own, that tells one everything.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The word "heart" is certainly one of these basic words. It refers to the innermost center where the multiple is still one. So when we say "heart of Jesus" we evoke the innermost core of Jesus Christ, and we say that it is filled with the mystery of God. We say, in a way that frightens us [127] to death while yet making us utterly happy, in a way that contradicts all our experiences of emptiness, futility, and death, that there reigns in this heart the infinite love of God's self-giving. That is what we believe and confess, with all the power of our heart, when we say "heart of Jesus." That is what we confess in the desolation that settles upon us and induces us powerfully to look to the one whose heart was pierced. Many Christians may feel – and it may even be true for them – that "heart of Jesus" is but a verbal duplicate for "Jesus Christ." But those who, in the adventure of their religious existence, are willing to experience more clearly the enormous height and depth, length and breadth of salvation, must remind themselves time and again of the innermost center and the ultimate truth of this great blend of life and death, doom and happiness, laughing and weeping, light and darkness. And then they say, "heart of Jesus." Then they turn toward the heart that was pierced, that loves, that loves us in the darkness of our hopelessness, that is God's very heart and that, without abolishing it, discloses to us God's fundamental mystery.

There is only one place in which, without being destroyed, without falling into despair, we may totally and unconditionally let go of that which is most our own, the salvation which we basically are in the definitiveness of our free decision. It is God whom we experience as mercy. Not as though we were to detach this forgiving and saving mercy from God and from the depths of God's incomprehensibility and sovereignty, and not as though we were to appropriate it as if it were directed by ourselves, but we must surrender to God totally, unconditionally, and without reserve in what we call faith and hope. We can do this only if we commit ourselves to God as to that love in which we must believe, of which we may hope that it is given to us.

This act can be consciously performed only before Jesus Christ, the one who has been crucified and raised from the dead. It is possible only before his heart, his pierced heart, the heart that has known the extreme plight of death and of being forsaken by God, the heart that has surrendered to God's judgment over the world. It is possible only before the heart that, in the ever new and surprising wonder of grace, gives us the unselfish courage to believe in its love as a love granted to each one personally, or, more precisely, the courage to hope for this love in that act of hope which is more than faith, which is already the beginning of love.

We look at the heart of the Lord and the question that is decisive for eternity fills our innermost being, our innermost heart and life: Do you love me? Do you love me in such a way that this love generates a blessed eternity, that it truly, powerfully, and invincibly generates my everlasting [128] life? This question is not answered because the answer would no longer be a secret; we could give it to ourselves. The question enters the mystery that has come near to us in the heart of the Lord. But when it enters this heart, because it is asked with faith, hope, and love, that question is not answered but overpowered by the mystery that is love, by the unquestionable reality of the mystery of God.

God, eternal mystery, immensity without name, blessed abyss, containing everything,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

contained by nothing, you have uttered your eternal Word in creation and in our being, so that your everlasting mystery might become the unutterable sheltering nearness for us and the very center of the world! We look at this your uttered Word, we look at the one who is the heart of the world, we look at the heart of the Son that we have pierced. All the incomprehensibility that we and our existence are is hidden in this heart. All the anxiety of existence remains in its grip; whatever is lofty and holy returns to this, its origin. There everything finds its true nature and recognizes itself as love. Everything enters the mystery that is blessed love.

It is impossible properly to teach devotion to the Sacred Heart. With confidence in the Church and the Spirit, we must try to approach its mystery. We must eventually, in the luminous and in the dark hours of life, try to pray: “Heart of Jesus, have mercy on me.”

We should perhaps try to practice a prayer like the Jesus prayer of the Russian pilgrim. We might venture to use this word like a mantra in Eastern style meditation. But over and above all that, we must experience in life that it is most improbable, most impossible, and so most evident that God, the incomprehensible, truly loves us and that in the heart of Jesus Christ this love has become irrevocable. There first, but, so we dare to hope, there for all.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[129]

11

COURAGE FOR DEVOTION TO MARY

Mariology and devotion to Mary have had a very stormy time during the last fifty years. Let us remember that on November 1, 1950, Pius XII solemnly defined the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, body and soul, into God's glory. Let us remember the great efforts made during the 1950s to declare Mary the co-redemptrix and mediatrix of all grace. Let us think of the serious discussions about whether the Second Vatican Council should promulgate a separate dogmatic constitution about Mary, or whether a chapter of the Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) should expressly treat of Mary and, if it did, what the content of the chapter would be. As a result of this discussion the Constitution on the Church contains, after its seventh chapter on the eschatological nature of the pilgrim Church and its connection with the Church in heaven, an eighth chapter on the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and her function in the mystery of Christ and the Church.

However, we cannot ignore the fact that during the same decades, zeal for and emphasis on devotion to Mary have known great changes. Efforts to define a doctrine of mediation of all grace by Mary seem to have faded away since the council. While attributing to Mary a special function within the economy of salvation, the council avoided speaking of any other mediation of grace than that of the one mediator, Jesus Christ. We get the impression that the practice of the rosary has considerably declined. We might notice that the Sodalities of Our Lady are being called "Christian life communities." Prevailing church architecture does not favor the construction of beautiful altars to the Blessed [130] Mother. May devotions are far from having the importance they used to have in the piety of great numbers of people. Pilgrimages to great Marian shrines have not disappeared; in our age of mass tourism they are even enjoying a revival here and there. But one cannot say that, in the religious life of the average educated Catholic in our rational and enlightened world, devotion to Mary is either intense or explicit.

On the other hand, the council not only presented in the chapter mentioned above a relatively extensive Mariology, it also added a special section on "Devotion to the Blessed Virgin in the Church." The number of writings in theology or spirituality is increasing, which seek to create a new understanding of the dogma of and devotion to Mary and which try "carefully and equally avoid the falsity of exaggeration on the one hand, and the excess of narrow-mindedness on the other" in considering "the unique dignity of the Mother of God" (Lumen Gentium, 67). Therefore the theme of devotion to Mary may today again deserve the attention of those who, as Christians, really believe in redemption through Jesus Christ.

AN ANTHROPOLOGICAL APPROACH

When we wish to reflect on the veneration of Mary, we should not deny in Catholic theology and piety the human motivation that undoubtedly influenced the traditional cult of Mary in the past. Why would we disown the human (secular, if you prefer) inspiration for this veneration? It is evident that in the ancient veneration of Mary human reverence for the woman, the mother, the spotless virgin, etc., were at work. Should someone say (as indeed it has often been said) that the veneration of Mary is a continuation of the cult of mother divinities of pre-Christian religions, we should not consider this, if it is rightly understood, an objection to the veneration of Mary. At the most it proves the wonderful fact that in its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

religiosity Christianity does not omit a single human dimension, that it is not afraid of points of contact, that it does not consider the loftiness of its relation to God through grace to be endangered when Christian existence becomes earthly, carnal, full-blooded, willing to assume whatever is human. If today, when compared with its past, devotion to Mary seems to have become abstract and anemic, then discovering human influences in the ancient cult is a challenge for us today.

How little understanding we have today for all the marvelously human features that used to be alive in devotion to Mary. Is it not a sign [131] of the banality of our modern sensitivity when we see what little interest we show in erecting an image of the great, beautiful, and pure woman and decorating it with flowers? A democratization of society and a legitimate emancipation of women are certainly unavoidable and, in themselves, lawful developments in today's society and culture. But they should not stifle in us the capacity for honoring the majestic image of an exalted human being. They should not smother in us the secular mysticism (so to speak) of the cult of woman, as still presented to us in our time in Paul Claudel's Satin Slipper, for instance. The weakness of the veneration of Mary is basically the result of a human weakness in us.

CHRISTIAN ROOTS OF THE VENERATION OF MARY

The Christian and truly Catholic veneration of Mary has, of course, deep roots in the Christian message itself. Its decline is ultimately a sign of the decline of our ability to realize in a deeply human and religious way what is properly Christian. It is praiseworthy that excesses of piety and false emphases have been eliminated from piety that often produced the impression that the radical relationship to the incomprehensible God was replaced by a piety that referred only to the powerful reality of the "Immaculate Virgin."

Solidarity with the Deceased

Let me start by asking whether we still possess a genuine relationship with our deceased that derives from the basic tenets of Christianity. Or while as Christians we do not deny that they remain, beyond death, true and real before God, do we give up any living relationship to them? Do we believe in the "communion of saints," the living solidarity of all who are sheltered by and united in God's holy love, whether they are living on earth or have already reached their fulfillment?[1] One of the latest trends in theology starts from the premise that all our Christian convictions, as well as the possibility of speaking theologically, can only be based on our solidarity with those who have been abused in history and with those who are dead. It is held that we give up this solidarity [132] only at the risk of a banal and inhuman egoism, whereby we reduce the history of the dead and of those who have been unjustly treated in history to being the humus on which our pitiable happiness has been flowering, because we are the ones who came later and so are closer to the future paradise. But is such solidarity with the deceased a reality in our religious life? Do the deceased still live for us or have they, so to speak, totally vanished from our life? Does the city-dweller still feel a need, like the peasant, to visit the cemetery on Sunday after Mass? Appealing to the great number of historical monographs and to the, cult of heroes that is manifest in them does not answer our question. For this hero worship of the saints and of other great people in history may be

[1] About this see K. Rahner and Johannes B. Metz, "Prayer to the Saints," in The Courage to Pray, trans. Sarah O'Brien Twohig (New York: Crossroad, 1981), 29-87.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation very praiseworthy, but it is turned only toward a historical past, to Napoleon or Bodelschwingh or Charles de Foucauld or Maximilian Kolbe. It does not imply a relationship to a person who is still alive and who has reached fulfillment in God.

Living Relation to the Deceased

The Catholic doctrine of the communion of saints, of the unity of the Church militant and the Church triumphant, of devotion to the saints, tells us that in our religious life we can and should succeed in developing a strong relationship to living persons who have reached fulfillment, even when they seem to have moved infinitely far away from us beyond the gates of death. We may not, of course, use the methods of modern spiritualists in order to fulfil this duty. They believe that through their mediums they can establish contact with the deceased. Yet they get in touch only with persons who have not really overcome the narrowness and the wretchedness of our life on earth. Christian faith, on the other hand, in its veneration of the saints and through a living relationship with all those who have reached fulfillment in God's grace and love, is looking for persons who have really entered the nameless mystery that we call God.

Thus we meet the fundamental difficulty that, for us today, seems to render almost impossible this living relationship to the dead who are really alive. In earlier times people clearly did not have this difficulty. However, their greater ease in becoming religiously aware of the living existence of the deceased does not necessarily speak in their favor. It may also be explained in part by the fact that they did not sufficiently realize the incomprehensibility and absolute sovereignty of God. But [133] the way we feel about all this gives us the impression that the deceased vanish into the namelessness and the unavailability of God, and this precisely to the extent that we believe them to be with God and not merely to have reached some creaturely fulfillment. It is precisely here, however, that Christian faith protests against what looks so plausible to us, namely, that the more God's infinity and incomprehensibility invade our existence, the closer we finite creatures come to nothingness.

Christian faith teaches – even though this message seems to expect too much from our spirit and heart – that the following two things are true at the same time: that God is all in all, and that, nevertheless, precisely when he has really come to us as the Absolute, he causes us to exist and reach fulfillment. Christian faith says that God does not compete with the creature that is distinct from him. Christian faith confesses that God as God can arrive with his infinity and incomprehensibility in the land of our finiteness – God himself near us – without the need for him to become finite, without the need for us to perish in the burning absoluteness of his divinity. Hence the radical optimism of Christianity commands us to seek God as God where, according to our pitiful opinion, he cannot be without destroying finiteness. It commands us to look for God among us on earth and not only in heaven.

Veneration of the Saints

It is only from this starting point that the Catholic veneration of the saints can be understood in its ultimate meaning, the praise of God's arrival near humanity. The veneration of the saints affirms human persons, their definitive salvation with God, the definitive consummation of their history on this earth. It is intended for real people who are known to us from their history and recognized as having reached consummation in their history.

But this consummation is ultimately and basically God, who does not create a creaturely reality that consummates persons, but who imparts to persons his own reality and splendor

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and thus consummates them through himself. That is why the veneration of the saints is something permanent within the most authentic *theo*logy. It is a statement about the history of God who, in fulfillment of the incarnation of his eternal Logos, gives himself to persons and thus both has a history and consummates his own history in this history of the saints. That is why the veneration of the saints means that we find and praise God in his own [134] splendor where he has himself deigned to come. We can understand the veneration of the saints only if we understand in faith that God is not only the one who is infinitely exalted above every created reality and to be adored as such, but that in his grace he has decided to become the innermost reality of his creatures, as a real consequence and completion of the incarnation of the eternal Word. It is true that God and his world do not coincide in simple identity. Yet where the world is consummated and is truly assumed by God as his own reality in the incarnate Son, we may not simply conceive them as being juxtaposed. We find God when we encounter human beings who are filled with grace, saved, and perfected. There the summit of the unity of love of God and love of neighbor is reached. There in the vehemence of the love uniting God and humanity we may almost confuse the two, because in grace the really innermost center of the human is God himself.

It is by starting from such a theology, a theology of God's descent into the world and of God's solidarity with humanity, a true theology of the veneration of saints, that we must understand the veneration of Mary.

If it is possible to find God in the person who is loved by God, filled with God's own reality, it is even more true of the holy Virgin, the Mother of Jesus, the one who is blessed among women, and who, according to the words of Scripture, is to be praised by all generations.

MARY'S IMPORTANCE IN THE HISTORY OF SALVATION

However, before we apply to Mary the theology of the veneration of saints, we should also justify and explain it in a quite different way. The veneration of saints does not refer to the abstract idea of humanity in general, but to real persons with their concrete and completed history. True, all the saints have reached consummation. But all of them reached it in their ultimately unique way with their own history, important for themselves and for all others. All of them reached their fulfillment with their own God-given personality, with which they are, without envy, accepted by all the others in the unity of God's love that embraces all of, them and that, in this way, grants to each of them their own personal kind of holiness. That is why the personal way in which Mary is important for all in the history of salvation must first be explained before the veneration of Mary may be understood theologically in connection with the veneration of all other saints.

Mary is certainly the humble handmaid of the Lord. We do no damage [135] to her honor if we view her first as a modest young woman, a poor and unimportant woman among many women, in a forsaken corner of the world. We do no damage to her honor if, from the religious and spiritual point of view, we allow her to remain in the circle of pious women among her people and in her time. Yet, when God looks upon the humility of his handmaid, the power of God's grace can work great things in that person, even very great things, without removing her humanity in a miraculous way. This grace induced Mary to allow the incarnation of the eternal God to happen in her, freely, through her faith, in order to share with the world this extreme nearness of God.

She is certainly not a wholly independent partner in the dialogue between God and the world in which the world's salvation is at stake. Her freedom and her free yes are themselves the gracious gift of God's sovereign love, whose only cause is itself. But God's grace itself

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

posits human freedom and the consent of this freedom to the grace of God. God's grace itself brings it about that it has to do with a human partner. That is why the omnipotent predominance of grace is really acknowledged and praised only when it is discerned in the partner whom it faces, because this grace is able to bring forth a free yes to itself.

And thus Mary stands at a place where a humble and unimportant person has, for the salvation of the whole of humankind, freely accepted the enfleshed Grace, first in her faith and then in her womb, for herself and for all of us. The one mediator between God and humanity was able to bring it about that he was freely accepted, that his being freely accepted was one more grace, and that, at the same time, grace would bring forth its own free acceptance. It is at this unique point in salvation history, so important for all times and places of human history, that Mary stands. She is not grace, she is not the one mediator, but she is the free acceptance of grace and of the one mediator, that in the history of salvation occurred once for all of us. In this sense she is really the one who has begotten God, the mother of God, even though, of course, the divinity of her child is not the fruit of her body.

May we call Mary co-redemptrix and mediatrix of all graces, as has been suggested and even said in pontifical declarations of secondary importance? Or should we avoid it in order to prevent misunderstandings and in order not to overshadow the one unique mediation of Jesus Christ? This is not an essential question for theology and faith. Catholic faith acknowledges that Mary has an extraordinary and unique place in the one history of salvation, in which ultimately all persons constitute a [136] common community of salvation. She is the second Eve, the mother of Jesus and thus of all those who believe. Her yes, through which it was done to her according to the Angel's word, is one of the constitutive grounds and dimensions of salvation for Christians, if they really believe in Jesus Christ, their Messiah and Savior, and in the insurpassable nearness of God to him in history, because, although it was this same Jesus who granted this yes to his mother, he himself entered the world on account of it.

ABOUT THE EQUALITY OF MEN AND WOMEN

Nowadays we are quite convinced of the equality and the equal rights of the sexes, unlike ancient anthropology that has continued massively to influence the history of theology, causing a regrettable lack of appreciation of women that we must overcome. That is why, as Christians and as theologians, we are asked how this way of evaluating the sexes, how the equal rights of women must be translated and realized in our theology of salvation history. And, if we are to be honest, this at once brings up a question whose answer is not quite obvious: Why do we have to acknowledge the one mediator as a man, and not as a woman? We will no doubt say that, for his universal and salvific importance, the masculinity of the one mediator is, in the final analysis, unimportant for us and belongs among the contingent particularities which God's eternal Word has to accept in one way or another in wishing to assume our history in a single human nature. Or we will at least entrust this question in obedient resignation to God's sovereign disposition, especially since we ourselves could not be consulted whether we wished to become a human person as a man or as a woman. Our unlimited destiny transcends every sexual difference, while not suppressing it.

In this connection we must also keep in mind that the real human reality of the mediator Jesus Christ also had to be filled with the divine self-communication called grace, which God wants to impart to all human beings, whether men or women. When in this context we consider the unique and irreplaceable position and function of the Holy Virgin, we will no longer be able to say that, from the point of view of theology, we must, in that salvation history that involves all people in solidarity, attribute to woman a function and task that is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

lower than that of man.

[137] It seems to me that today, on the basis of the anthropology which we accept, every theology faces the question of what rank to attribute to women in salvation history. In Mariology traditional Catholic theology has already upheld the specific nature and the uniqueness of women in general. Now theology should more widely and resolutely than before develop this Marian starting point in the whole of theology and of Christian life.

VENERATION OF THE SAINTS AND VENERATION OF MARY ON THE BASIS OF FINAL SALVATION IN GOD

If we explain the veneration of Mary by means of the theology of the veneration of the saints in general and if we realize through our faith the unique function of Mary in salvation history, it is possible to develop a rationale for this devotion to Mary. The salvation history that underlies the way in which each one of us reaches salvation and human fulfillment has not wholly vanished in the past. It goes on really and definitively in all those persons who are already fulfilled in God and have definitively reached their highest reality in God's seemingly silent incomprehensibility. These are the real persons whom the cult of the saints has in mind, finding in them God himself, whose grace has found in them embodiment and consummation. This is true also for Mary, provided our faith does not overlook her unique place in salvation history.

Those who have reached blessed salvation are not abstract uniform models but real persons, whose history on earth has been definitively saved in its uniqueness. We mentioned already that our relationship to them today has become more difficult. It takes all the strength of our faith to overcome the impression that the silent infinity of God into which the deceased have entered has obliterated them, to believe rather that it has confirmed them and made them real for themselves and for us. This power to continue to see individuals in the mysterious reality of God, to trust that God does not let them perish but introduces them as individuals into definitiveness, is already assured for Christians, since they can have such a relationship with the glorified man Jesus. Even in God's incomprehensibility this man may be known and loved. He shows us that God's supreme power transcends every metaphysics of infinity.

CONCRETE VENERATION OF MARY

To what extent do individual Christians succeed in doing this in their religious life? Can they clearly, or only vaguely and darkly, still distinguish, as it were, the individual blessed beings in the supraluminous darkness of God without falsely transforming them into magic-working minor deities? This is a question for the religious history of each individual. It cannot be answered for everyone in general. Jesus says that there are many dwelling places in his Father's house. Everyone does not have every charism which the Holy Spirit may grant to people It is quite legitimate for individuals modestly to admit that they do not possess a certain charism that they discover and admire in another person, or that they have it only to a very small extent, provided only that they do not, in principle, absolutely reject such a charism if it is offered to them by God's grace in the course of their religious development. This is also true for the veneration of Mary.

It may be present in someone only as a germ, only as good will that is not skeptical or does not feel superior to the veneration which others pay to Mary. We may be good Christians in the Catholic Church, even if we can discover in ourselves little of the deep faith and heartfelt enthusiasm that others feel in venerating the Blessed Mother. It is not always a sign of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

neurotic sensitivity when married women suspect in many an image of the Virgin Mother a quiet kind of discrimination. Do we not often have to do with a myth about Mary rather than with faith in Mary (V. Schurr)? Undoubtedly we have the right to reject certain forms of the veneration of Mary, as the Second Vatican Council emphasizes, when such forms turn into superstitions or employ practices that contradict the uniqueness of the mediation of Jesus Christ or the free sovereignty of divine grace, or when they hold the absurd opinion that it is easier to be certain of Mary's love than of the infinite mercy and love of the eternal God.

So it is quite legitimate to keep our own religious practice away from a legitimate devotion to Mary. Yet even though this aloofness is allowed, we should not hold it up as a principle It is better to remain open to a further development in our religious life, in which a more intense and explicit veneration of Mary can also have a place. As often emphasized above, a truly radical Christian relationship to God does not imply that we fade away the closer we come to God and his incomprehensibility.

Moreover, we should not overlook the fact that in the one communion of saints, m the mystical body of Christ, individual Christians have [139] different talents and different duties. Hence the Church as a whole can foster veneration of Mary in a way that is not the way of each individual. The Church as whole has a relationship to Mary, even though the same relationship cannot be expected to the same degree from each individual.

From her beginnings the Church as a whole has honored and praised Mary, as we can see in the Gospels of Luke and of John. About the exact content and meaning of Mary's title as Mother of the Church, which the council avoided and Pope Paul VI adopted all the same,[2] we may think what we will. At any rate the Church as a whole has at all times honored the Blessed Mother, although, of course, with different emphasis at different times in an eventful history. This praise of Mary simply belongs to the idea the Church has of herself. Despite all the dangers and the sinfulness that threaten her, the Church in her ongoing history is the holy community of those who believe not only in an abstract possibility of salvation but in its reality. They hold the firm hope and conviction that the power of God's grace actually transforms the possibility of salvation into a reality. That is why acknowledging the victorious arrival of God's power among the dangers that threaten our existence is part of the idea the Church has of herself.

Now how would the Church more clearly and more concretely realize this way of understanding herself, this way of praising God, than by singling out a human being in whom this wonder of God's triumphant grace has operated in all dimensions of this person, and who belongs in this way to the Church? By praising and honoring Mary, the Church welcomes and calls by name that which God has done and continues to do for her until the end of time. The Church fulfills Mary's prophecy that all generations will call her blessed because God has looked graciously upon the lowliness of his handmaid. And as the Church thus praises Mary, she becomes actually, and not just theoretically, aware of her own vocation: that God may become all in all in her and that precisely in this way the blessed perfection of human beings may be achieved.

[2] See the apostolic letter Marialis cultus (1975) on devotion to Mary.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[140]

12

UNDERSTANDING CHRISTMAS

THE MESSAGE OF THE BIRTH

The message of Christmas is first the message of the birth of a man. Jesus' beginning, his birth, must be understood by starting from his life and from his death, from the destiny of a man, a very special man, of course. As Christians, we can gain real access to the fact and the meaning of Christmas only by starting from the cross and resurrection of Jesus Christ. We celebrate the birth of the one whom we have discovered, in his death and resurrection, as our redeemer and lord, as God's irrevocable promise of salvation. Only thus can Jesus' birth be radically significant for us, namely, as the beginning of that life and death in which our life received the irrevocable promise of eternal freedom. Christmas may remain the lovely feast of a gracious child, but we would not be able to grasp its meaning if we did not understand it as the beginning of a life that, by traveling through the depths of human experience, leads us to the blessed fulfillment hidden in the incomprehensible mystery of God.

Without suppressing our freedom the knowledge and will of God contain and carry forward the whole of human life. Through his own will God disposes of the beginning of life and leads it to its end and completion. Since a life and its completion reveal what its beginning already contained, life and its completion disclose the beginning as it was willed and destined by God for this very concrete end. That is why Christmas is for Jesus, as it is for us, the beginning of death.

Death suffuses the whole length and breadth of our life; it is not simply something that happens at the end and that does not yet concern us. [141] In our everyday life, therefore, if we live in a sober but not dull fashion, and if we always try to accept our death, then we may celebrate Christmas in a very sober way.

Christmas is really the beginning of that consummation in which Jesus unreservedly and without clinging to anything but God let himself fall into the incomprehensibility of God as his own consummation, a consummation which he himself did not control. Christmas is the beginning of the man who, like us, would have to die in an act that is the most profound act of his faith and obedience.

When, full of faith, we stand before the crib of the newly born child, we must see that here begins the downfall that is called death and that alone saves us, because its emptiness is filled with the nameless incomprehensibility of God. That incomprehensibility alone answers all the questions that come up in our life in the guise of thousands of partial questions. It answers them because it transcends them. Of course, we are speaking here of death as it is saved by God, filled with God, of death that for us means the end of our existence and for God means God's dawning in what we call resurrection. Christmas is the start of this redeemed death, and it can really be understood only from this point of view.

The light of Christmas and the song of the angels, as they praise God and announce to human beings their ultimate reconciliation through the grace of God, must fall into the abyss of death. Otherwise they are neither seen nor heard. Christmas is not a cheerful feast, to make us forget for a while the mystery of our destiny. It should be celebrated where we are living, in the looming shadow of our death, because the birth of Jesus was the beginning of his death.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

THE CENTRAL DIFFICULTY

We must now consider the principal difficulty that we meet when we celebrate Christmas, a difficulty that we meet even if, from lack of interest, indifference, or boredom, we do not simply capitulate to what has become routine. This general difficulty is rather complex. It has two main aspects: the remoteness in time of the event and its contingent historicity make it difficult for us to understand Christmas as the foundation of the salvation of our whole existence.

[142]

REMOTENESS IN TIME

The remoteness of Christmas in time frightens us; it happened so terribly long ago. Like other events out of a distance past, Christmas too seems to demand too much from us. As human beings we cannot help wondering whether history in general can tell us anything, whether we are people who can still react with grief or pride to any event of our history, whether decisions made by our forebears have the power of binding us, whether we are endowed with a historical, memory.

If we are honest we will have to admit that m the average person today the sense of history is underdeveloped. The knowledge of general immutable laws of nature and the planning for a future that has not yet come to be are the main concern of modern consciousness and produce, forgetting of the past that is often inhuman.

To the extent that people neglect history they become inhuman and disoriented. Their life should be the creative conquest of an unknown future. But the future will always turn out to be the completion of the beginning, the product of a history that started long before the tiny light of our individual consciousness began to shine.

Christmas is a question addressed to us. It asks whether we are persons without a memory, in the proper sense of the word, living only for the everyday bustle of the present and unable to build a future because we have no past, or whether our mind and heart can stand the living tension within ourselves that introduced the past into the present and carries it into an everlasting future. If we find it difficult to celebrate Christmas, the reason might be that, having no history, we have allowed the roots of our existence to die away in whole or in part, the roots that reach back into the past, into the beginning, to find there the fullness of the future. If Christmas is a strain for us, there is no harm in that. It may be the strain that unavoidably accompanies that return into the past which means a true return to being truly human.

A SINGLE EVENT IN HISTORY WITH A UNIVERSAL SIGNIFICANCE?

Next we consider that difficulty of faith in Christmas that is supposed to be the hardest and the most specific. It has been known ever since the [143] time of the Enlightenment and it remains worth considering. Is it possible that a unique event, localized in time and space, would be decisive for the total salvation of the whole person and of all of humanity; that an historical truth would have universal meaning for human existence; that a single point in history would decide the whole of history, a history that we know today is a history of perhaps millions of years? Is it possible that the whole chain of history, which in its origin and in its end is lost in the unknown, would not only be carried by the Lord of history who lives outside of it in eternity, but that it would also be suspended from a single line of the chain?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For three hundred years theology and philosophy, and secretly even the preaching of the gospel, have struggled with this problem. The faith of Christians may clearly refer to this one event, "Jesus Christ," within time and history, as to the Lord and key of this whole history, and never falter in that respect. But this does not imply that efforts to understand this fact of our faith are finished, or that all Christian theologies have reached the same conclusion. In order better to understand this central difficulty we must go way back and start from the central point of Christology itself.

THE DESCENT OF THE WORD OF GOD INTO THE WORLD

With the amazing boldness of John and of Paul, especially in the letter to the Colossians and in the hymn to Christ in the letter to the Philippians, we can start with the descent of the divine Logos of God into the world. 'And the Word was made flesh." This implies that God has not only created a world distinct from himself, which he encompasses and directs without being affected by it, but that he wishes to communicate himself with his divine splendor, to insinuate himself into the very heart of the world, as its innermost dynamism and definitive goal. Hence we confess that this penetration of God into the world has irrevocably happened in Jesus, with the result that Jesus, as one who was from the start of his existence definitively and irrevocably accepted, is the definitive, historically tangible self-promise of God to his world.

In this way we let God, apparently straight from above, enter the world for its salvation only at the point "Jesus." However, we cannot forget that this apparently unique event, being historical in a historical world, was actually prepared for by a prehistory, and that this history of [144] the world, as a preparation for the arrival of the divine Logos would not really have been his prehistory if it had not been filled and borne by the working of the Holy Spirit of God, who, from the beginning of history, was already the innermost dynamism of the world.

And thus this invasion from above of the self-communicating God into his world may be equally well understood as the irruption of the Holy Spirit of God from the innermost center of history into the tangibility of this history. In this way God confers upon his work, including humanity's free history, definitiveness and irreversibility.

JESUS, THE BEGINNING OF THE REALIZATION OF ALL HUMAN HOPE

The important point in our study of Christmas is the following: when we meet the historical Jesus as the unity of human question and divine answer in his life, death, and resurrection, when we accept this life as the measure and strength of our own life, then we are at a point from which Christmas may be understood. Christmas is the start of that life, the birth that is able to initiate such a life.

What does it properly mean when we say: The eternal Word, in which the eternal God, called the Father, expressed himself from all eternity for himself, while being with himself, has become man, he who is the ground directing everything, positing all things in their diversity and keeping them together, the foundation of this inconceivably immense world of matter, life, and spirit, which we know today is still becoming? Is this God not at once too near and yet too remote from all things, so that we might think of him, almost as in Greek mythology, as if he were someone walking around on the small forlorn planet that we call our earth? We say 'And the Word was made flesh," and we say, "The man Jesus from the start was so radically accepted by God and remained so to the end, that because of him we may also hope to be accepted by God." And, if we understand them well, these two statements say

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the same thing.

In Jesus the human question and God's answer have become one, unconfounded and undivided. In him God and humanity are one without suppressing the other. In Jesus God as the unutterable mystery has totally and irrevocably expressed himself as Word; in him the Word is present as spoken to all of us, as the God of nearness, inexpressible intimacy, and forgiveness.

[145]

THE CHILD – BORN UKE US

So this is how we stand before the crib of Jesus; the stable and the cattle in it do not surprise us. Things still look the same today where we were born, even if it happens in the sterile elegance of a modern obstetrical ward. There, in that crib, someone starts to be a human being. He has not decided to do this; he has not been consulted. His whole existence has been imposed on him with the inexorability of the will of another – of God – so inexorably that every question, every conceivable protest, comes too late.

This child fares like us: it is there without having been consulted. But there is a difference between the child and us. We are tempted to experience this inexorable necessity to be, the fact that we cannot step out of our existence, as a stifling constraint, just like the terrible fact that it is impossible for us not to be. Because this child is a true man, indeed the man who, when the time came, went down into the depths of his humanity in a Godforsaken death, this child has undoubtedly also gone through the dreadful experience of being unable not to exist. However (and there he may differ from us, who philistines that we are, never quite know whether, we do not deep down in ourselves hate this necessity) this child accepted this experience as the experience of the effect of love. The inexorability of his being born without being consulted was for him but the blessed inexorability of love, the marvel of being chosen, the obviousness of being, that must answer for itself in the presence of nothingness.

The child possessed this terrible, seemingly destructive knowledge: I am once more encompassed by a love that is a gift and the result of my own free response. I am allowed to be, I want to be, and accept the necessity of my being, as the product of an infinite love that has posited me in a sovereignty that is answerable to none, only in order to give itself boldly away to what it has posited. That is the fundamental act of this child, that he had to carry on throughout his life, until he used it also to illuminate the dark abyss of death.

ACCEPTING OUR EXISTENCE

We are standing before the crib of this child, and we ask ourselves whether we too manage to accept the existence imposed on us. Do we accept it? The fact that we actually exist is not yet a proof that we have [146] really accepted our existence, as it was, as it is, and as it will unexpectedly turn out to be for us. We have certainly not yet accepted it wholeheartedly in all its dimensions. It always remains with us an open question, a question which we do not as a rule even admit: that is, whether we love or hate the one who has imposed our existence on us, whether we lovingly accept that existence as the marvel of love or reject it in secret protest.

The child in the crib had to start his life under Caesar Augustus, at that very moment, no sooner, no later. At that moment the wheel of his time started to turn, the moments started to run, one after the other, each one only once, all of them in an inexorable course that, without stopping, headed for the end of time. In that child, eternity assumed time, for that child and so for the whole world, encompassing it from beginning to end, carrying each one of its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

moments. Otherwise our time would really be what it seems to be to us: a fleeting time, in which moment by moment our life dwindles away. But where through faith, hope, and love our time turns into the time of this child, becomes a continuation of his life in ours, there death has died in our earthly life, and we live the time whose end is the beginning of eternal reality.

We are standing before the crib. There, in that stable, starts the earthly life in which God expressed himself, even though this expression seems to be as frightfully ordinary as in every human life. There, in that stable, starts the self-uttering of God. The stage of this divine drama seems to be pitifully narrow and small, with a few worn props where not much can be shown. The place is narrow and remains narrow, exactly like our existence.

Yet in this child God succeeds in squeezing his infinity into a small existence. That God may be wholly everywhere may seem relatively obvious to a metaphysical mind, but that he might give himself away, with his infinity, to the puny existence that we are is vouched for only by the child in the crib on Christmas day. Our existence may seem to us as narrow as a crib in a stable, tedious, not smelling too good, suffocating. We would hardly have the courage to hope that we would ever get out of it, if God had not entered into this child in this stable, and thus made obsolete the terrible question of how the eternal creature might ever get out of its narrowness.

[147]

SAVED AND LIBERATED BY THE CHILD

We are standing before the crib. The frightful narrowness of our existence may squeeze our heart – so much so that we believe we have lost the breath we need to hope that we might escape. Alas, we are so tired, resigned without admitting it, so that even the word of unending hope seems to make us more irritated and overtaxed. The night seems to become even darker when we begin to speak of the dawning day. Yet we are standing before the crib. It is no easy pretence but – since we ourselves say it with the last strength of our heart – it is the truth, that this child also hopes for us, when our hope seems to die, when we feel that we can only save ourselves by fleeing into the humdrum of everyday where we do not have to believe, hope, and love, and where therefore we do not feel threatened by despair.

But the child has come. And just as we were not asked whether we wanted to exist, neither are we asked whether we want to be saved and liberated. We are saved and liberated by that child. God's grace will undoubtedly induce us to accept this salvation. For this acceptance too, the last action of our life, is one more grace. Paul also said it: God who is faithful has called us, and will bring it about in us.

We are placed before the crib. We will not succeed in running away from it. Christmas has occurred in the night of our existence.

GOD IS NEAR US

Those who in the quiet of peaceful recollection, of docile resignation, in the silent Christmas of their own heart, let the press of things, of people, of desires fall back, which would otherwise obstruct their view of infinity, those who for a while at least extinguish the earthly lights that prevent them from seeing the stars in the sky, only those who, in a silent night of their heart, allow themselves to be called by the ineffable, wordless nearness of God speaking through its own silence, if we have the right ears for it, only they celebrate Christmas as it should be celebrated, if it is not to degenerate into a mere worldly holiday. We should feel as we do on a clear winter night, when we walk under the starry sky: far away the lights of human nearness and the security of home are still calling us. But above us stretches the sky, and we feel the silent night, which may at times impress us as uncanny and frightening, like the quiet nearness [148] of the infinite mystery of our existence that is at once sheltering love and wide expanse.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The eternal future has entered our time. Its brightness is still dazzling, so that we believe it to be night. But it is a blessed night, a night that is already warmed and illuminated, a beautiful night, cozy and sheltering, because of the eternal day that it carries in its dark womb. It is silent night, holy night. But it is so for us only if we allow the stillness of that night to enter our inner person, then m our heart too “all is calm “And that is not difficult. For such a loneliness and stillness are not heavy. Its only heaviness is that which belongs to all sublime things that are both simple and great.

Yes, we are lonely. There exists in our heart an inner land, where we are alone, to which nobody finds the way except God. This innermost unreachable chamber in our heart exists. The question is whether we, in a foolishly guilty way, avoid it, because nobody else and nothing of what is familiar to us on earth can enter into it with us. Let us enter there ever so quietly! Let us shut the door behind us! Let us listen to the ineffable melody that fills the silence of that night. Here the silent and lonely soul sings for the God of her heart her finest and most personal song. And she may be sure that God hears it. For this song no longer has to seek the beloved God beyond the stars in that inaccessible light where he dwells and where no one can see him. Because it is Christmas, because the Word was made flesh, God is near, and the faintest word in the quiet chamber of our heart, the word of love, reaches his ear and his heart.

We must be quiet and not fear the night, else we will hear nothing. For the ultimate message is uttered only in the night’s stillness ever since, through the gracious arrival of the Word into the night of our life, Christmas’ silent night, holy night came down among us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[149]

13

THE THEOLOGY OF THE RELIGIOUS MEANING OF IMAGES

As I try to write a few things about this topic, I must start by saying that I do not claim to possess the competence that belongs to an expert in the philosophy or history of art, whether sacred or secular. I understand little about these things. I do not even believe that I belong among those who have more than an average background in these fields. In my theological and "philosophical" considerations (if they can be called such) statements will be blended somewhat. I feel entitled to do this because I believe that the "philosophical" statements are either sufficiently supported by the theological assertions or they meaningfully complement them.

CHRISTIAN ANTHROPOLOGY

I would like first to present a few considerations about the insuperable pluralism in empirical human experience. First, for a Christian anthropology persons are beings of an a posteriori, historical, and sensory experience. This holds also for that dimension of their existence in which they face God in their religion. Until recent years repeated efforts were made to devise a metaphysical anthropology that postulated for human beings a specific source of religious knowledge, which would not depend at all on sensory or historical experience. These efforts derived generally from the conviction that only through such a source of knowledge could religion be possible as a relationship to the absolute and personal God.

[150] We do not have to consider in more detail how this source of knowledge was explained, whether as a mystical experience that is within one's reach, or in the sense of ontologism, or as the operation of a religious organ that is more or less independent of other cognitive powers. Ordinary Christian anthropology is convinced that in human knowledge two levels must be distinguished: sense knowledge, that is, one having a strictly material component, and spiritual conceptual knowledge, that is, one reaching out to being as such. However, against all kinds of ontologism, against all attempts to safeguard religious knowledge by detaching it from other kinds of knowledge, traditional Christian anthropology has always clearly insisted that sense knowledge and spiritual knowledge constitute a unity, that all spiritual knowledge, however sublime it may be, is initiated and filled with content by sense experience. Thomas Aquinas, for instance, emphasizes expressly in his metaphysics of knowledge that even the most spiritual, most "transcendental," most sublime concept can be reached by human beings on this earth only through a "conversio ad phantasmata," that is (in Kantian language) that every concept without sense intuition is empty, that is, nonexistent. This statement applies also to religious knowledge. That knowledge too is necessarily reached by an intuition that depends on sensory, and therefore also historical experience.

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE – SENSE INTUITION

It is, of course, not our task here to show, against a large segment of modern philosophy, why, even when we admit that metaphysical knowledge depends on sense experience, a real knowledge of God is possible, although this God is infinitely exalted above all that can be grasped with the senses. Although this task may be very difficult, we must presuppose that it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can be carried out. The only thing that concerns us here is that every religious experience has its origin in sense experience and exists only by referring – ever so implicitly – to some sense intuition. There exist in religious language very concrete concepts, representations, and images, and beside them a language that, as we say, sounds abstract, imageless, purely conceptual. But, in the final analysis, even in the religious domain, concepts and words can only be understood if and insofar as they contain a sensory moment. Once more it is not possible to show here in detail, by means of examples, [151] how such a sensory element is present in all religious operations that contain a conscious component or are simply states of consciousness. The livelier these religious operations are, the clearer is the sensory component. This is evident especially in Catholic piety. Central to it is the preaching of the Word, whose concepts also are always carried by representations that enter into consciousness through sense experience and that are present in the concepts even when, to ordinary people, the latter seem to be wholly abstract and devoid of imagery. Moreover in this piety there are also sacramental signs, bodily attitudes for prayer, pilgrimages, songs, vestments, incense, and a thousand other things, through which human sensory corporality is involved in religious activity.

RELIGIOUS ACTIVITIES INVOLVE THE BODY, REFER TO THE NAMELESS GOD

Meanwhile there will always exist a certain antagonism between this corporality of religious activities and their transcendental reference to the nameless God, whom, as we are told in John 1:18, nobody has ever seen. Catholic doctrine and devotion too speak of a mystical ascent to contemplation, which is experienced as being without images, without object, as being engulfed in the incomprehensibility of God. They emphasize that we will one day contemplate God directly, without the help of any created concepts or images. Nevertheless, by emphasizing the resurrection of the flesh, the lasting incarnation of the eternal Logos, Christianity remains the religion that can conceive of human fulfillment only as the consummation of the whole human being, in which that being, although transformed in a way that we do not understand, reaches its consummation with all the dimensions of its reality in their unity, hence not by shedding some dimensions that would belong to it only in this life. For Christianity, human beings take with them, in their consummation, albeit in a way that we can neither conceive nor imagine, their whole reality, hence also their body, their senses, their history. We must reject the idea stemming from the Enlightenment, according to which the “immortal soul” would already be such that, without a radical transformation but simply by shedding the body as a merely provisional instrument, it might enter the realm of final fulfillment.

[152]

SENSE POWERS – A COMPLEX REALITY

All of this, although indicated very roughly, is here presupposed. What concerns us here, as we continue to reflect on it, is that what Christian philosophical and theological anthropology generally calls corporality, more exactly the human sense level, is a very complex reality. Despite the unity of the human subject it consists truly of many and ultimately incommensurable powers. Let me mention now that it is only when we understand this clearly that we will be able really to understand the meaning of images in religion.

What do we mean when we speak of the plurality of sense experience as ultimately incommensurable? Let us start very simply. Everyone has heard of the five senses. We do not have to examine here whether there really are five senses or more, whether sense perception

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

as a whole should be subdivided and arranged in another and better way, how the plurality of sense powers has slowly developed during the evolution of animal life. In any case, there is a plurality of sense experiences. We hear, we see, we touch, we feel the movements of our body from within; we smell, we taste, we feel pain and we experience bodily well-being. We cannot suppress this plurality of sense experiences; we cannot, as we experience them in space and time through our bodily nature, reduce this plurality to a unity. True, we may combine them under the concept and word sensorium as the a posteriori power of experiencing things in space and time. We may even abstractly, through concepts, think that there might still exist other such powers, for instance, the power of seeing ultra violet light or others that are supposed to exist in bats, and so on. Biochemistry can certainly discover and describe common features in all these different senses and thus also explain the possibility of a differentiation that happened during evolution.

INCOMMENSURABLE PLURALITY OF SENSE EXPERIENCES

It is undeniable that there exists a plurality of sense experiences that cannot be reduced to each other. Seeing and hearing are not the same. It is true that we can, through our power of abstract concepts, through words and ideas, describe seeing and hearing together in their diversity as well as in their abstract similarity. But from such a description [153] a person who has never seen would understand about seeing about as much as an individual born blind to whom we try to explain what seeing is. The same is true for the other sense experiences. They are in themselves incommensurable with each other; they remain such in the unity of the experiencing subject, even if, as spiritual, that subject can reflect on these experiences with concepts. By mentioning this incommensurability of sense experiences we are not denying the unity of the experiencing subject, through which these sense experiences communicate with each other and thus bring about a unity of this plurality. Nor do we claim that every one of these sense powers and dimensions occupies the same rank and is equally important for the subject.

What is implied in the thesis of an incommensurable plurality of the sense powers and experiences is that, where one is totally (insofar as this is possible at all) self-aware and self-present, all these various sense faculties must enter into action together. In other words, to be completely human, persons must produce a work of art for which all their powers collaborate. This may be beyond their reach. Because of their immersion in time it is possible that they can fully realize themselves, even on the sense level, only partially and in successive attempts. At any rate, every human sense power has an essential importance and cannot be replaced or repressed by another one. We are and we should be persons in whom the many incommensurable dimensions of our sensorium enter into activity.

THE EYES OF FAITH – THE ETERNAL LOGOS AS GOD'S ETERNAL IMAGE

What we have said applies also to human sense powers insofar as they are an essential element of the human capacity for religion. For Christianity, as one of the principal religions, this is evident with regard to the word, to hearing. In a positive (but, as we intend to explain it here, not exclusive) sense Luther is right when he says: the ears are the organ of the Christian. Paul is right when he says: faith comes from hearing. But if persons are fully themselves only when all their sense powers work together, if these powers are incommensurable, if the complete person and complete Christian are identical, then Christianity can be present in persons fully and completely only if it has entered them

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

through all [154] the gates of their senses, and not merely through their ears, through the word.

It is not true that the divine reality which must penetrate into human beings can enter their existence fully and completely through the single gate of the ears, of hearing. This statement does not imply that all these sensory gates are equally wide and important for God's self-communication to humanity. So we are not rejecting what Luther said or, more importantly, what a lengthy Christian tradition holds, namely, that revelation and God's gracious self-communication happen fundamentally through the word and through the hearing of the message conveyed by words.

However, Christian language speaks also of the eyes of faith, the eternal Logos is conceived not only as God's self-utterance but also as God's eternal image. Eternal happiness is presented primarily as a seeing of the triune God face to face, not as a hearing. So, in principle, we may not deny that sight is a power that cannot be replaced by other sources of experience within human sense faculties, that sight also belongs to the sensory foundation of religious knowledge.

We cannot here, in a philosophical and theological epistemology, explain in more detail how reality perceived by the senses is a starting point and a moment of religious experience and knowledge. That would lead us too far. Therefore what we said above about the function of sight, which can be replaced by no other sensory power, not even by hearing, is at first still a very vague and obscure formal statement, which does not bring us much light. But it might perhaps serve as a basis for a few considerations about religious images, which we will presently submit.

WHY RELIGIOUS IMAGES ARE IMPORTANT IN CHRISTIANITY

Religious images have always had a great importance in Christianity. The production, the appreciation, even the veneration of images is one of the features that distinguish Christianity and its from the piety of the Old Testament, with its prohibition of image and from Islam, hence from the two other great monotheistic world religions. The fact that these two other monotheistic religions reject religious images, at least in principle, is also time and again a new incentive for rejecting religious images in Christianity as well. Well known [155] are the rejection of images in the East, between 730 and 843; a similar Carolingian opposition to images at the end of the eighth century; the rejection of images by Karlstadt, Zwingli and Calvin; and the iconoclasm in Zurich, France, and the Low Countries in the second half of the sixteenth century.

Upon closer examination, the Orthodox and the Roman-Catholic defense of images derives from very different mentalities and arguments. In the East (if we may put it so briefly and simplistically) the veneration of images is supported by the mystical feeling of an "incarnational" identity between the image and its object (Christ, the saints, God). In the West a more rational feeling prevails; images are legitimate in the religious domain. Compared with the importance of the word they are a kind of biblia pauperum (poor people's Bible), which makes the story and the doctrine that have been explained more vivid for those who cannot read.

OUR OWN STARTING POINT

These two basic ways of understanding religious images are of course generally combined in practice and in the theory that tries to interpret it. They led to the complicated theories (from

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

John Damascene to Thomas Aquinas to Bellarmine) that justified in more detail the veneration and cult of images and that, within the domain of piety too, are still today, even in the Catholic Church, very different in different countries and popular mentalities. I do not have to insist here on these questions, which are generally treated in the theology of the veneration of the saints. I will rather try, by using my own starting point, to submit a few considerations about religious images. At first, no attention will be paid to the distinction between properly religious icons that enjoy a cultic veneration (in places of pilgrimage, etc.) and religious images in general.

THEOLOGY OF RELIGIOUS SEEING

Our starting point leads us to say that because they can be seen religious images have a religious significance that cannot be replaced by the word. Religious images are in principle more than simply a poor people's Bible, a way of illustrating, for pedagogical reasons, the religious [156] realities that can be conveyed wholly to people only through the word. Even though, within a religion based on a historical and social revelation, we must attribute to the word an irreplaceable and fundamental importance, the viewing of images is not a mere illustration of the spoken word, but it has its own religious significance. We may naturally speak of this significance, interpret it, and thus once more explain the image by means of words. Yet these words are no substitute for the viewing in itself and as a religious activity. The fact that theology speaks of this specific and irreplaceable significance of religious viewing not at all or very rarely, and practically only in passing, is not an argument against this assertion. Theology does not say more about religious dance either. In the doctrine of the sacraments, after having spoken abstractly of the sacramental matter, it speaks only of the "form," the word, of the sacrament. And one has the impression that the "matter" of the sacraments (washing, anointing, imposition of hands) is only a more or less arbitrarily prescribed ceremony, which could just as well have been replaced by another.

REACHING GOD WITH THE EARTH

In connection with this basic thesis, if we ask how this irreplaceable function of viewing images is to be conceived in the total religious act, we should first emphasize again that we are speaking here of a fundamental and irreducible moment of the total religious act. Now this moment can be rendered intelligible only by performing it, not by talking about it. Here analogically we may apply the old adage: use images, artists, no words! If this basic thesis is correct, the modern attempts to meditate with images may be recommended, even though, as mentioned above, it remains a difficult question to reconcile contemplation without any object with the significance of meditating with images. This question is connected with a question that refers to Christianity as a whole, which, in its efforts to arrive at the absolute God, intends to take along the earth as a whole, the glorified earth. It is only if we accept this basic thesis that it is possible ultimately to understand the Ignatian method of meditation, for example, in which contemplation has an important role, one which requires frequent practice and in which the "application of the senses" is to be considered not the lowest but a most sublime level of meditation.

[157]

EVENTS OF SALVATION HISTORY MUST ALSO BE CONTEMPLATED

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But once more: how shall we more precisely conceive of the function of seeing, as compared with that of hearing, as an irreplaceable moment in the total religious act? We might start by saying: insofar as religious images represent events of salvation history that may be grasped by the senses, this question presents no special problem. Such images provide the experience of visible historical events. In this way the problem is moved further, transformed into the question how the first historical and visible experience of salvation history could have a religious significance. This is a question that we cannot examine any further. But we can say: one irreplaceable way of getting to know a person is to see and not just to hear that person; a portrait cannot be totally replaced by a biography. The same is true of salvation-historical events. They must also be seen, and seen in an image, if we are not actually present to see them.

VIEWING A PROPERLY RELIGIOUS PHENOMENON

But still we have not totally grasped the proper nature of images and of seeing as a properly religious phenomenon. A religious reality is truly such only when it helps us to refer directly to the absolute God. It stands to reason that such a direct reference of an innerworldly reality to the true and sovereign God is conceivable only in connection with what we Christians call grace, whether or not we are aware of this grace when referring to God. We do not have to spend more time on this problem, nor on other presuppositions of an innerworldly reality's mediating function with regard to God.

RELIGIOUS IMAGE – ITS MEDIATING FUNCTION TO THE ABSOLUTE GOD

An important point for us here is the following: if religious images may exist, it must be possible for them to have such a mediating function with regard to the absolute God. Such a function should not belong exclusively to the word. This assumption is implicitly present in our basic thesis, which holds that all peak experiences of every sense domain, and [158] not only those of the sense of hearing, may be the basis and element of a religious act. We must grant, of course, that such a function is more immediately and easily understandable in the case of words than in that of images, insofar as words contain essentially a moment of negation, enabling them at once to transcend beyond the finite object toward the absolute God.

At first it may seem as though viewing stops at the finite object which is immediately seen, making it thus impossible to transcend it toward the absolute God. But we may reject this and say: every experience of an object, even though the object is always a single and finite one, is carried by an a priori pre-apprehension of the whole breadth of the formal object of the sense power. It is more than the grasping of the concrete single object that is being known. This is not true for hearing alone. It is not true only for the spirit as such with its unlimited transcendentality. It is true that the senses and the spirit differ from each other by the fact that the latter has an unlimited formal object, an unlimited a priori pre-apprehension, whereas this is not true for the senses. Yet, even so, every act of the sense powers as such implies some experience of transcendence. Thus every time we hear a certain sound we also hear the stillness that surrounds it and constitutes the space in which a single sound may be heard.

SEEING TOO IMPLIES A SENSORY EXPERIENCE OF TRANSCENDENCE

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Such an experience of transcendence, although a limited one, is also necessarily given in the act of seeing. Every time we see an object, we look, as it were, beyond it, into the expanse of all that may be seen. We see something as well determined because, in this seeing, we are also aware of the unseen fullness of what may be seen. We can experience the limits and the proper nature of what we directly see only because our glance goes beyond this limit into the expanse of what might be seen, without being seen. Hence in seeing too, and not only in hearing, there is a kind of sensory experience of transcendence, that serves as foundation and mediation in referring the sense-endowed spiritual subject to God.

[159]

RELIGIOUS IMAGES WITHOUT IMMEDIATE RELIGIOUS THEMES

If this is so it follows, rather surprisingly, that even an image that does not have a specifically religious theme can be a religious image, when viewing it helps to bring about, through a sensory experience of transcendence (if we may call it so), that properly religious experience of transcendence. This consequence, which chooses sides in a strongly disputed question from an angle that is perhaps otherwise not explicitly mentioned, should not surprise the theologian too much. A naive theology will spontaneously think or silently presuppose that only explicitly religious acts (of prayer, of expressed love of God, of explicit observation of a moral norm as a command of God) will bring about a salutary relation to God. But, theologically speaking, that is false. Moral acts may be conducive to salvation; by God's grace they may be finalized toward God's immediacy, without any objectively represented or verbalized reference to God. Salutary acts do not always and necessarily have to be accompanied by a "good intention." The totality of a free subject's way of life is always and undeniably a yes or a no to God, even when this subject is not aware of it or does not put it into words. Hence the statement that viewing an image that has no explicitly religious object may be the experience of a freely accepted transcendence toward God, may be a religious act, and that, in this sense, the image may have a religious significance, is not as surprising for the theologian as it may seem at first.

IMAGES THAT POINT TO SALVATION HISTORY

This does not deny the necessity of specifically religious images for Christians. In their piety, Christians have always to keep in mind their faith in a special salvation history, which can be narrated and visualized, as part of the whole of secular history. So they cannot express and visualize their religiosity only by means of abstract paintings without using, for instance, the crucifix and other explicitly religious images. This is especially true for the Church as a community that is constituted by professing the same faith in words used and understood by all its members. It needs images that are basically understood by all and that refer explicitly to the history of salvation that all believe in and confess. On the other hand, as we have said, this does not exclude the possibility of [160] images that may be religious, although their object is not directly and clearly such.

IMAGE AND WORD HAVE COMPLEMENTARY FUNCFIONS

So when we affirm the special and irreplaceable religious significance of images, we do not deny (to say it once again and more explicitly) that images need a verbal explanation, both to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

be recognized as expressly Christian by those who see them, and in order that, as the religious images of a Christian community, they may perform a social function in the Church. There exists naturally no visible reality from which alone its Christian significance might be gathered. That this image of the crucified Jesus Christ refers to the historical savior cannot be gathered just from seeing it, although the religious significance of this image of the crucified Lord is not totally explained by the words used to interpret it. That is why images that serve as Christian images for a community particularly require a verbal explanation. Such an explanation is given also when it is presented with conventional signs and symbols. In this way word and image have complementary functions and work together in constituting the religious act. It is, of course, not possible to expatiate here on this statement by pointing to other sense experiences that could be added to this word-image unity in the religious act. Such are spatial features provided by architecture; experiences of movement provided by liturgical gestures, walking in pilgrimages, or religious dance; olfactory experiences deriving from incense; experiences of touching or of tasting in sacramental activities. All the sense powers may, in their mutually irreducible experiences, and in countless different ways and combinations, enter into the religious act.

THE COLLECTIVE FUNCFION OF THE CULTIC IMAGE

One more remark based on what has been said above must still be added about the properly cultic image, the icon, insofar as it is more than an ordinary religious image with a content taken from salvation history. As a rule, the proper character of a cultic image, in the strict sense, is gathered from the fact that it is actually an object of veneration, and it enjoys some kind of official approbation. Hence the main question [161] for the theological interpretation of the cultic image is how veneration of such a cultic image may be justified and how this veneration should more precisely be interpreted. Is it being paid in some way to the image itself, or does the veneration, as it were, through and beyond the image, aim only at the person who is represented? And is it possible to show that the different interpretations of this veneration of an image do not cancel each other out?

Our previous considerations allow us to say: an image is cultic if the image is always considered religious in the experience of a great number of Christians, and if this collective meaning is known and acknowledged. The cultic image is “venerated” because it has for many people a lasting religious meaning. From this point of view, it is an additional and secondary question whether, and in what sense, this image is “venerated.” In whatever way this veneration may be described more precisely, it is based on the image’s collective function as a religious image, the viewing of which has become an essential element of the religious act. On account of this function such an image may be highly esteemed and put above other religious images. In that sense it may itself be “venerated.” We do not have to insist on the fact that the veneration belongs only to the reality represented by the image.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[162]

14

ART AGAINST THE HORIZON OF THEOLOGY AND PIETY

We must perhaps first inquire precisely what art is. It is already difficult to decide whether the different arts – sculpture, painting, music, poetry – may really be subsumed under the one concept "art." In connection with our discussion, I would like to defer consideration of the arts that operate with human words. For such Wortkunst ("word-art"), as we say in German, is, of its very nature, quite similar to theology, which expresses itself also by means of words. If we consider only those arts that do not use words – architecture, sculpture, painting, music – we may start by saying that all these arts are also ways in which people express themselves, in some way return to themselves. And thus the question arises again whether self-expression in the arts that do not use words is of the same level and importance as in the arts that do use words.

Musicians will certainly claim that their music is not a lower kind of human self-expression, but a special and irreplaceable one, which cannot be replaced even by words and by the arts that use words. The same might be said about painting and sculpture. Standing before a Rembrandt painting, we may, of course, try to translate by means of words what this painting expresses. But even though it is possible to translate from one art into another one, we will eventually conclude that sculpture, painting, and music (let us not speak of architecture, because it is more utilitarian) may be considered autonomous ways of human self-expression that cannot be adequately translated into words.

[163]

ART – ACTIVE ELEMENT OF THEOLOGY

If we admit that it is impossible to reduce all the arts to the art of words, the question comes up: what is the precise relation between theology and these arts? Insofar as in all the arts, and in theology as well, persons express themselves, although in different ways, these different arts and theology are mutually related. But the situation is more complicated than it would appear to be. If theology is the conscious self-expression of persons about themselves from the point of view of divine revelation, we might submit the thesis that the most perfect kind of theology would be the one that appropriates these arts as an integral part of itself. We might then argue that the self-expression contained in a Rembrandt painting or in a Bruckner symphony is so strongly inspired and borne by divine revelation, by grace, and by the self-communication of God that it tells us, in a way that cannot be translated adequately in a verbal theology, what persons really are in the sight of God. If, from the start, we do not identify theology with a theology that uses words, but understand it as the total human self-expression, insofar as it is backed up by God's self-communication, religious phenomena in the arts themselves would be constituent elements of an adequate theology.

Practically speaking, this is rarely being done. Yet, when listening to a Bach oratorio, why would we not have the impression that, not only through its text but also through its music, we are in a very special way brought into a relationship with divine revelation about humanity? Why would we not believe that this too is theology? Of course, if we arbitrarily define theology as being identical with the theology that uses words, we cannot say this. But the question comes up then whether, by thus reducing all theology to a theology that uses words, we do not unfairly degrade the dignity and the special nature of these other arts as well as the fact that God uses them for divine purposes.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

A ROAD TO THE ORIGINAL EXPERIENCE

If we come back to the distinction made above, and separate art that uses words from the other arts and think only of lyric, dramatic, and epic art, this kind of art should presumably be characterized, from the theological standpoint, by the fact that in different ways and by what is peculiar to it, it succeeds in making people aware of their original religious experience. When I say for instance, "We must love God," I have [164] said something very profound in a simple statement, but in the shallow dullness of life I have not really brought it home. However, when I read a lyrical poem in the style of John of the Cross or a novel by Julian Green, through which, to be sure, the immediate genuine religious experience cannot be conveyed (because that is quite impossible), but my own religious experience may be evoked, then this religious work of literature has a function which an explicit, purely conceptual and rational theology cannot perform.

There are theologians in the stricter sense – I am thinking of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas with his eucharistic hymns – in whom religious experience and explicit conceptualization are closely connected. But this is rather exceptional and something that is hard to find in modern theology, at the most perhaps in a sermon by Newman. Hans Urs van Balthasar said once that our modern times lack a kniende Theologie (a theology on its knees). We might also say that our times also lack a poetic theology. That is a real lack. But we must be prudent. There is also a theology that, holding its breath, as it were, patiently and rightly undertakes long conceptual explorations from which we cannot expect immediate religious or mystical experiences. We have to leave it to individual theologians to decide to what extent they appeal or do not appeal to religious experience in their theology. But we must admit that it is a consequence as well as a defect of a theology that is rationalistic and proceeds only "scientifically" that the poetic touch is lacking. Nowadays we demand from theology something which, although not new, has been neglected during the last few centuries: theology must somehow be "mystagogical," that is, it should not merely speak about objects in abstract concepts, but it must encourage people really to experience that which is expressed in such concepts. To that extent we might understand poetic theology as one method of a mystagogical theology.

DIFFICULTY OF A NEW SYMBOLIZATION

We say generally that a poet speaks in images and metaphors. The possibility of such religious language is ultimately based on the analogy of being, meaning that all realities have an inner connection, refer to each other, are in some way related, and can in the final analysis be understood only when we transcend them, as individual things, in the direction of the whole of reality. This analogia entis enables poets to understand a certain human experience as mysteriously pointing to God. They can [165] present human love in its mysteriousness as an analogous reference to God's love. Faithfulness, responsibility, resignation to the mystery of life, et cetera are, even when they are mentioned in a context that is not explicitly religious, references to that of which theology expressly speaks.

I am not certain that there is today so much less Christian religious literature of a poetic or artistic kind. It is possible that the symbols used today by real poets have changed and can therefore not be correctly understood by traditionally pious people, although their authors are basically treating religious topics by means of unfamiliar symbols. This question should be carefully examined.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The whole of Christian theology should, in the right sense of the word, be "subjective." It cannot speak of objects that are situated beyond the spiritual, personal, free human reality. We cannot make a theological statement about a ladybug. That is why, a priori, no object studied by the positive sciences falls within the domain of theology. So we might say that theology starts only where it becomes really subjective. This does not mean that theology can say anything at all, that it can swear that black is white.

Christian theology must be subjective because it speaks of faith, hope, and love, of our personal relationship to God. It must be subjective because, in the final analysis, it describes and evokes directly or indirectly these personal spiritual relationships of persons with God, because it introduces them mystagogically into those relationships. In other words: theology, even as theology of revelation, is precisely that which transmits God's invitation to human subjectivity. Where theology no longer manages to do that, where, in the wrong sense of the word, theology becomes objective, it is no longer a good theology, but a bad one.

THE ETERNAL IN HISTORICAL PECULIARITY

Analogy makes it possible to understand a given reality as a secret revelation of a higher, different, more comprehensive reality. Whatever is expressed in art is a product of that human transcendentality by which, as spiritual and free beings, we strive for the totality of all reality. It is only because from the start we are beings that transcend every limit, that can never stop, that are always reaching for the incomprehensible mystery; it is only because we are transcendental beings that art and theology can really exist.

[166] Another question is why and how this human transcendence in art is expressed in a certain historical way. Genuine art is the result of a well determined historical event of human transcendentality. That is why art can and must always be historical. There exists a real history of art. Artists do not always say the same thing.

Of their very nature artists are discoverers of a concrete situation in which persons concretely realize their transcendental being in a new way, one that differs from former ways. This does not entail an opposition between historicity and transcendence, but their necessary mutual relationship. Real artists undoubtedly announce what is eternal in truth, love, and eternal yearning. But they are artists and not. concept-mongering rationalists They announce what is eternal m a unique manner, in which their historical peculiarity and their longing for eternity are combined m a unity that constitutes the essence of the work of art. I may understand Dürer's hare as the most concrete aspect of a well-determined insignificant human experience, but when I look at it with the eyes of an artist, I am beholding, if I may say so the infinity and incomprehensibility of God.

THE WHOLE PERSON LISTENS

The difficulty is that the eye as an optical instrument or the ear as an acoustical instrument cannot, as such, perceive God. To claim the opposite would be nonsense. In the Middle Ages the question was raised whether the human senses are used in heaven in the contemplation of God, and the answer was negative. But when something exceptionally intense is seen or heard, is it not possible for the whole person, with all one's powers, to have a very powerful religious experience? In other words, might it happen that, when the whole person is absorbed in seeing or hearing, a religious experience takes place? Let us, for instance, take the German song, "Dear moon, how quietly you glide," a trite song that has nothing to do with religion. They say that the melody of that song is the same as one we used for the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Tantum Ergo Sacramentum. It follows that an acoustical phenomenon – depending on the human context in which it takes place – may be religious or not. If hearing is not the work of the ears alone, but of the whole person, an acoustical phenomenon is religious or not depending on the disposition and the concrete situation of the person listening. The religious quality of this melody depends simply on this: is the melody evaluated only in [167] an acoustical context, or is the overall human situation also taken into account? In the latter case even acoustics are different – not in themselves, but because of the situation.

The statement "God is everywhere with his grace" does not mean that every reality has the same relation to me or to God. God is not present in the same way in a physico-chemical reaction occurring in my stomach as when I practice faithfulness, love, or responsibility on behalf of others. Likewise, the problem of art with regard to religion is a difficult one. I may say, for instance, that the paintings of Impressionism are not religious because basically they try only to reproduce the color impressions of one's immediate surroundings. If this is their only purpose and result, we will probably have to say that they are not religious art. And we must, without hesitation, say that there may exist art that is not religious. It does not have to be anti-religious. But it moves in a dimension of humanity where the relationship to God is not yet present.

But it is quite another question when I put the painting of an Impressionist of the early twentieth century in a wider context, a more human one, which would also bring up the question of its religiosity. This might allow us to speak of the anonymous piety even of an Impressionistic picture. Especially since a religious painting is not simply identical with one that represents an explicitly religious object.

When I paint the crib with Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, using aureoles to show from the outset what is being represented, I have, objectively speaking, a religious picture. It may, in fact, not be very religious, because it is unable to evoke in those who see it a genuine and deep religious reaction. There exists what we call religious Kitsch. We might perhaps say that basically the pictures in the nineteenth century of the Holy Family were painted with the best intentions by pious people, but nevertheless, they were not truly religious paintings, because they do not affect us deeply enough to elicit religious feelings. On the other hand, it is quite possible that a Rembrandt painting, which is not intended as religious, moves people so deeply, bringing up the question of life's ultimate meaning, that it is, strictly speaking, a religious painting.

BEING HOLY AND HUMAN

We are touching here a real problem. We might defend the thesis that real saints are those who have developed all their human potentialities. When people are fully attuned to life, have wholly developed their [168] power of seeing and hearing, their experience is at once identical with their religious attitude. One of the reasons why we may say this is that in heaven one is obviously not only very pious but also absolutely human, enjoying the full development of all one's human capabilities. That is one side.

However, if we proceed empirically, we may easily reach an opposite opinion. Are there not people who are really genuine saints, who love God and their neighbor in a radically unselfish way, and who, nevertheless, have hardly developed any artistic capabilities, who in matters of art are real lowbrows, capable only of rudimentary reactions? On the other hand, there are those who have developed an extraordinary artistic sensibility without being saints. We probably have once more to distinguish here between innate and freely accepted religious possibilities.

Thus a case might be made for asserting that Goethe had developed his humanity to such a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation breadth and depth that, if he had started to love God, he would have done it with the whole fullness and intensity of his humanity, therefore in a much greater, wider, freer, more differentiated way than a nice pious saint. Nonetheless, possibly Goethe might, in fact, not have done this, might not have used these possibilities sufficiently to actualize his developed humanity in the service of God, whereas the lesser, more modest possibilities of a nice humble saint may have been better utilized. Here we touch upon the old problem: to what extent does holiness mean psychic health? This too is a difficult question. Wasn't St. Margaret Mary Alacoque, as many Catholic psychotherapists say today, a very neurotic person? Wasn't St. Alphonsus Liguori, the founder of the Redemptorists, in his old age both a real saint and a neurotic one? All these questions might be transposed into the following one: what is the relation between artistic talent and holiness?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[169]

15

AGAINST THE WITCH HYSTERIA

WHAT CAN FRIEDRICH SPEE TELL US TODAY?

When a modern Jesuit of the older generation considers the life of Friedrich Spee (1591-1635), he may notice how the way a man like Spee lived in the Society of Jesus has survived until today: two years of novitiate, three years of philosophy, a few years of activity in the education of young men, four years of theology, and then (often soon thereafter) tertianship. And then the normal activity, which, then as today, was generally quite diversified: pastoral work, teaching of philosophy and theology, writing, and so on. Thus a Jesuit today (if we overlook the latest changes) could have the impression that, both then and now, life was much the same in the order.

This may give rise to some surprise, to some joy too, that a program of life adopted by an order could be maintained and remain viable for such a long time. One might also wonder whether many of these old customs have not become outdated, or whether many of today's novelties have not been too easily adopted.

But (you will excuse me for saying this) it is a beautiful thing to live centuries later in the same order as a man like Spee, and to notice how great was the basic conception of Ignatius Loyola who, impelled by a mystical experience of God, tried for God's sake to work in the service of others serving and building up the Church, and who was thus capable of transmitting a charism that is still active centuries later.

[170]

IMITATING THE CRUCIFIED ONE: DYING IN ORDER TO LWE

But when a Jesuit of today considers Spee's life, something else occurs to him. Ignatius Loyola wished to see his followers imitate the crucified Jesus. They had to understand that one had to die with Christ in order to live with him, as is written in the Second Letter to Timothy (2:11). That was realized in a frightful way in Spee's life, but it is generally overlooked, when the greatness of this man is praised in the history of humanitarianism and of poetry. The very fact that Spee led the ordinary life of a Jesuit shows his courage in faith and hope, which enabled him to lead with many others a regulated life that was quite dull and ordinary. He was put to all sorts of tasks without being consulted; he lived according to the will of his superiors, in a restless age, in many places, with many occupations, which generally, he did not choose himself. His special difficulties with the order will be mentioned later.

But there was much more. He lived during the fearsome Thirty Years War, amid dreadful epidemics and in immediate contact with the stake at which poor women, after much torture, were burned alive as witches. He was firmly convinced, in mind and heart, that these women were innocent. How bitter a life, yet how ordinary! Moreover, the word of Jesus about the grain of wheat that must die was fulfilled in his life. Many of his hymns passed anonymously into the Church's repertoire. Two of his books came out only after his death. His Cautio criminalis had to come out without his name;[1] his moral theology disappeared anonymously

[1] Friedrich Spee von Langenfeld, Sämtliche Schriften, 3 vols. (Munich, 1968); idem, Cautio criminalis oder rechtliches Bedenken wegen der Hexenprozesse (Munich, 1982).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

into that of his successor H. Busenbaum, whose work reached a couple of hundred editions by the end of the eighteenth century. Spee always had to start all over again and never really saw the full results of his work and of his unselfish service. His death was undoubtedly the completion of an unselfish love for people of all kinds, but to die in a pestilential epidemic is a pitiful thing, when one has to die at the early age of 44.

Nowadays together with Leibniz, Brentano, Ricarda Huch and other important witnesses we sing the praises of Spee. But we should not forget how socially narrow, how ordinary, and how bitter was this man's life. And that is why I believe that this life, almost more through its normalcy than through its grandeur, asks us whether we can cope with our life today; whether (like Spee before the witches' stake) we can believe [171] in God in a time of the Holocaust and still dare to hope for humanity; whether, even amid the constraints of our society and beyond all protests against its inhumanity, we still understand our life as an imitation of the crucified Jesus and feel able to grasp, even now, ultimate freedom in God; whether we can hold out to the end despite our frightful anxiety amid ominous dangers; whether (as Boll says in praise of Spee) although wholly disconsolate, we reject both cheap consolation and despondency.

Even though the blessed ecstasy of the pious child in Spee may seem far away from us, this Christian's brave common sense amid life's bitterness might continue to be a reminder.

A FEARLESS FIGHTER AGAINST THE INHUMANITY OF HIS TIME

When we start to acknowledge and praise Spee's greatness as a poet, this praise is generally introduced with the remark that nowadays we can no longer do much with his spiritual bucolic poetry, with his bridal mysticism and his mystique of the wounds of Jesus, and with his talk about "sweet Jesus." We are even tempted to add that for us such ways of speaking about religion have become utterly insufferable. Now it is quite true that every epoch has a right to its own religiosity and that our piety and that of Spee are not and should not be of the same kind. But, prompted by the peculiar nature of Spee's religious lyricism, if we read it not only as poetry but also as a religious witness, we should also be willing to face the question whether the reason why Spee's piety has become so strange to us that we are unable to share it is because our own piety has become lukewarm. After all, although he enjoyed mystical familiarity with God and Jesus, he was not naive or timid or inclined to flee from reality into sentimentality. Rather, he fought fearlessly against the inhumanity of his time, against stupidity and superstition, against envy and a frightful sadism that was on the rampage at all levels of society. He publicly exposed the untruthfulness and cruelty of the penal system of his time. He visited prisons. He rescued and nursed the wounded, and he shared the death pangs of the poor women who were to be burned alive. For him the experience of God's nearness in ecstatic love was translated into looking for the poor and the sick in the city, buying a basket of white bread for the sick in the hospitals, paying for poor students' schoolbooks.

[172]

OUT OF AN UNCONDITIONAL, WORSHIPFUL LOVE OF GOD

Spee shows us that his spiritual bucolic poetry probably had a different meaning from what we gather today from his verses. He asks us whether our love for neighbor and our commitment to justice in the world are not, despite all our noisy slogans, so pitiful and so prone to drown time and again in our narrowminded selfishness, because we do not love God with our whole heart, as evidenced by the prosaic scantiness of today's piety. According to a modern historian of literature, Spee's prose and poetry "combine strength and sweetness, inner musicality and festive exuberance in perfectly constructed writing." These are not only literary qualities in Spee's work that we can still appreciate and enjoy today, they emerge from a most intimate experience of God that enabled him to overcome all anxiety and to enjoy the sweet intimacy of an unconditional worshipful love for God in Jesus Christ. It is a Protestant prejudice that induced Ricarda Huch to believe that the young Spee had entered the cloister so that he would not have to see, the sufferings of so many people. He joined the order so that he might be sent to the missions, where he would certainly have been unable to avoid encountering the world's suffering. Nor did he foster any illusions about it, since in that time missionaries had to envisage the possibility of real martyrdom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The intimacy of his experience of God and the will to help people bear their sufferings were for him always inseparably united, even as in the gospels the commandment of love for neighbor and of love for God form a unity. That is why the intimacy of his rapturous love for which affects us as truly baroque, should not simply be shrugged off as the style of life of a time that is passé. It should rather make us face the question whether we ourselves really love our neighbor in deed and in truth, or whether we imagine that such an unselfish love of others does not require an ardent love of God.

MASS HYSTERIA – FORMERLY, YESTERDAY, AND TODAY

Spee has been generally admired for the undaunted courage with which, in his Cautio criminalis, he spoke up for the victims of witchhunts. He did so with all the sagacity of a mind trained in scholastic philosophy and theology, and also with the full power of a heart that loved others and [173] shared their plight. Even today his Cautio criminalis is a work that may still captivate our mind and our heart. It contains maxims that have not yet become self-evident. For instance, Spee wrote: "Christ's command in Matthew chapter 13 said: When there is danger that the wheat may be uprooted, one must not destroy the weeds." Even today this maxim does not appear obvious to us, although it is based on the gospel. Penologists especially might let Spee invite them to have a good look at the way people are punished in prisons, so that they may see what in fact they are sponsoring with the penal norms that are in force.

There is another point, however, where the Cautio criminalis challenges us today. True, the frightful mass hysteria of Spee's time and of long thereafter has disappeared. But even if the obsession with witches as it existed then is a thing of the past, it demonstrates that even so-called Christian countries, at all social levels, may become victims of mass hysteria. People might keep a good conscience and defend this hysteria in the name of reason or the gospel, as something that is evident, not subject to discussion, something that only people who arc not quite normal could call into doubt.

Are we so sure that today these kinds of hysteria do not exist among us? Has the mass hysteria of National Socialism disappeared so long ago and so completely into the past that we can now imagine ourselves free of such mass psychoses, which may exist even among intelligent people and popular leaders, without anyone noticing or admitting it? Is the arms race all over the world, at costs that allow millions of people to starve and die, not such a mass psychosis? Should other maxims of certain lifestyles, which present themselves as obvious, not be unmasked by a "political theology" and shown to be norms suggested by mass hysteria? Is it not a fact that in all our present social organizations similar false ideas, considered to be self-evident, are at work, as they were in Spee's time? Do we have enough men and women who, prompted by a sound mind and the selfless love of their heart and guided by the basic truth of the gospel, spot these erroneous ideas, expose and combat them with all their strength, even if they are opposed and mocked as naive idealists or cranks, even if people tell them they are choosing pious utopias that a clearheaded realist cannot share? Should we, who cannot at least a priori let false opinions go unnoticed, not try to be more prudent and kinder to contemporary prophets in the style of Spee? Are there not still today church dignitaries who react to warning voices like that of Spee, as they did to Spee, in the frightfully naive conviction that nobody could seriously deny that numerous witches really existed? Do [174] we today have enough courageous people who criticize the false plausibilities with which we live quite comfortably, without wanting to be disturbed?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

True, there are quite a few gospel norms that are defended by church authorities against prevailing opinions. We must admit this, although it is sometimes difficult totally to get rid of the suspicion that these Christian norms are so strongly defended by the Church because they are supported by what was plausible in the past. But are there not norms that should be defended against a present lifestyle, considered sanctioned by the past, norms that most church authorities ignore or defend too faintheartedly and too weakly? Should not many Cautiones criminales be written against the madness of our times, and for which we wait in vain? Nor would it be a bad idea if such a Cautio were written for a change not by the highest authorities, but first by some humble and unimportant priest or lay person, as was done by Spee.

BETWEEN THE VOICE OF CONSCIENCE AND RELIGIOUS OBEDIENCE

A Jesuit of today might be allowed to say a few things about Spee's relation to his order. Spee wanted to be a Jesuit, to remain a Jesuit, and he was one until his death. Today too we ought to respect this unconditional decision of this great man, if we want to do him justice. Many peculiarities of his life in the order, which may surprise an outsider, are, viewed from within the order, more or less ordinary harmless events. In an order made up of men, each man has his own ways and convictions, which he cannot simply turn off in community life.

In a religious order, when a man's request to be sent to the missions is turned down, when that man is sent to work in many different places, at many different occupations, when it happens that he is discharged from some function, when he cannot always live in perfect harmony with his superiors, all of this is for a true Jesuit, as Spee was, a matter of course, something that is unavoidable, that he has to expect in the order, even though he does not like it, and with which he tries to cope with common sense. In this respect many things in Spee's life are not surprising for those who are familiar with the way Jesuits live. However, when he spoke out against the witch hysteria, a situation did occur in Spee's life that cannot simply be considered a matter of course for one who lives in a religious order.

[175] Apparently, Spee really wrote the Cautio criminalis hoping that it would be read by others and aware that, by so doing, he ran the risk of entering into conflict with his superiors and his vow of obedience. However, if we understand religious obedience correctly, we may not claim that one offends against the spirit of one's order by assuming such a risk

In doing so, one is not looking out for oneself, for one's own opinion, fame, "self-realization," or convenience, but wants to obey the voice of conscience and an unselfish love for neighbor. Jesuit obedience does not at all mean that a Jesuit is forbidden to assume personal responsibility, to take initiatives that have not already been approved from above. The opposite is true; both belong basically to this obedience as understood in this order. Therefore Spee could write his Cautio criminalis without a previous order or permission of his superiors.

It is a question for historians whether Spee himself secretly arranged the first and second editions of his Cautio in order to bypass the order's censorship or whether he really knew

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nothing about it and the Cautio was printed without his knowledge and permission. But even should the first supposition be correct, we must not accuse Spee of having offended against his vow of obedience and the spirit of his order in this particular case. Every moral theologian will admit that, in the concreteness of a human life, situations may occur in which two distinct demands present themselves in such a way that they cannot be satisfied harmoniously at the same time, but that only one or the other can be carried out.

Ignatius Loyola deems it possible that a superior may, in good faith and clear conscience, give a Jesuit an order that the latter cannot, in conscience, not consider a sin, and therefore would refuse to obey. That is why we may admit in principle that Spee might have considered the task of speaking up against the witch hysteria so unconditionally binding on his conscience that an eventual order of his superiors in the opposite sense could not impose any real obligation on him. He would then have had to accept all the consequences of this decision of conscience, consequences which his superiors, on account of their own conscience, deemed necessary. Such bitter situations often occur in human and Christian life. In a religious order, they may occur as a dilemma between a decision of conscience, responsibly taken before God, and the command of a religious superior, even when the latter is fully credited with good will.

God's providence saw to it that in fact Spee did not have to face an ultimate conflict between his legitimate mission and his obedience as a Jesuit. It is useless to rack one's brain about how Spee should or would [176] have acted, if he had been confronted with an absolute dilemma: either to obey his superiors' orders or to give up the Cautio criminalis and its publication. I for one consider it a comforting fact that in Spee's case such a clear dilemma was avoided until his death. Indeed his provincial superior in Cologne, Goswin Nickel, who kindly and gently defended Spee against the general of the order at the time, later became general superior himself. Conflicts such as the one Spee confronted may still arise in the Church, even with the best intentions of both parties. This is one more reason why Spee's life could be an important example for priests and lay persons in the Church. His life shows that an artificially contrived harmony among all members of the Church would in fact amount to a graveyard peace, and is by no means an ideal to be sought in all circumstances.

EXAMPLE FOR BOTH HIGH AND LOW

In his life Spee was not only the courageous author of the Cautio criminalis and the tender author of poetry, he was an ordinary priest, active in schools, in young people's sodalities, in jails, in village pulpits, a chairs of theology, which in his time did not bestow a special distinction on those who occupied them. Thus Spee is not only a patron and model for courageous critics of the mentality of their time, not only a great figure in German literature, but also a model for the ordinary workers in God's vineyard who, without expecting much gratitude and fame, bear the heat and burden of the day. If the widow's mite in God's poorbox is more highly appreciated than the fat alms of the wealthy, something similar may apply to the everyday work of an average parish priest compared to the spectacular deeds of exalted leaders in the world and in the Church. In a strange way Spee belongs among both the great ones and the little ones in the Church and in the world. He was by nature intent only on the ideal of a good and pious life in his order. But it happened that in that life great possibilities were presented to him and much was expected from him. In the valiant love of his heart he answered the call.

A SAINT?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Some have wondered why Spee has not been canonized by the Church. As far as we can judge, he would have deserved it, as does also Wilhelm [177] Eberschweiler, who is buried in the same church as Spee and who represents a quite different type of Jesuit. But there is no need for every saintly person to be officially declared holy. We may try to imitate them and pray that they intercede for us before God, even if they are not expressly mentioned in the missal of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[179]

PART FOUR

Sacraments

[181]

16

FAITH AND SACRAMENT

When we remember how Paul and, in fact, the whole New Testament emphasize the unique and fundamental importance of faith for our salvation, we may be somewhat surprised that faith and sacrament are mentioned in the same breath. This seems to imply that they are equally important. Faith means our total personal dedication, as free subjects, to God in response to God's self-manifesting and self-communicating revelation. It does not seem possible that, compared with faith, any other reality in our lives could have the same salvific significance.

Indeed Christians are convinced that salvation even without sacraments is possible, whereas no salvation is possible without real faith. And since the Second Vatican Council it is impossible to admit that in many cases a more fundamental moral attitude could replace real theological faith. This position makes it very difficult to find an answer to the question of how a genuine faith in response to a real revelation is possible for the incalculable multitude of people who have not been reached by the historically revealed message of the Old and the New Testament. Compared to faith, sacrament seems to play only a secondary role, if any at all.

On the other hand, Catholic Christianity at least, almost naively, considers it self-evident that infants, when baptized, experience the basic event of salvation. It claims (although this is rightly being called into question today) that children who die unbaptized are not saved but are consigned to limbo. When, on reaching the age of reason, baptized children make a conscious act of faith, this faith is almost considered as just a secondary actualization of the habit of faith received in baptism. Belonging to the Church is considered an effect of baptism alone, so that [182] it is deemed impossible for those who are not baptized to belong to the Church, even when they openly declare that they are convinced of the Christian message. However, as a result of a theology of the catechumenate, the exact limits of the Church have again become somewhat imprecise.

All this goes to show that the real relationship between faith and sacrament is not as clear and obvious as may seem to follow from traditional theology, which tends, somewhat too positively, to juxtapose the different doctrines of the faith. Of course (let me say this at once and in a very imprecise way) behind the difficulty of the relationship between faith and sacrament lurks the difficulty of determining and clearly expressing the exact relationship between existence and essence (in the modern sense of these words), between persons as free subjects and persons as "nature," between persons as unique individuals and persons as generic beings, between persons who cannot adequately objectify their true self-realization and persons who necessarily reach this self-realization as bodily, social, and historical beings, and in history, and in this way alone take full possession of themselves. All these and other dialectical relationships of diversity and mutuality make up the background of the dialectical

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unity and diversity of faith and sacrament. But here we cannot expressly study the background of our topic. We will start immediately from faith and sacrament in order to shed some light on their mutual relationship.

Faith comes from hearing says theology with Paul and with a history of revelation that reaches back into the Old Testament. Faith is the answer to the hearing of God's self-revelation. By starting from this point we might (at least so it seems) make rapid progress in our study. Faith is based on a revelation, which is understood as one that has been spoken in history. In Christianity that revelation, which has been heard in history, is of an eschatological nature, because it is unsurpassable and irreversible, because it is the sovereign and victorious pledge to the world of God's innermost reality.

That is why the word that proclaims the eschatological and, as far as it is concerned, victorious self-promise of God has an exhibitive character, which means that what it says is not merely a word about God, but a word of God who promises himself, hence necessarily it is also a conferring of grace. God speaks and he is heard because, by communicating himself to the messenger and to the hearer, he contributes to this conferring of grace by means of his own reality. Thus the revealed word has an historical and exhibitive character; it produces grace, and [183] in this sense it works "ex opere operato," as a sacrament. That is why a sacrament in the traditional sense is but the most intensive instance of God's revealing word, insofar as it is addressed to individuals, in a peak moment of their life of faith, by the proper and ultimate messenger of this revealed word, that is, by the Church.

Let me mention by the way that, in the final analysis, as we face the historical difficulties of sacramental theology, we will be able to vindicate the traditional and binding doctrine of the nature of the sacraments, of their differentiation and their number, only by using the above starting point. Moreover, and once more by the way, from the exegetical point of view and quite unlike the situation at the time of the Reformation, today the difficulty of vindicating the sacramentality of most sacraments is not greater than it is for baptism and the Lord's Supper, so that ecumenical agreement in the doctrine of sacraments is possibly easier.

In the eschatological stage of our faith it is through the very nature of this faith that the sacramental character of faith itself, hence the sacraments also, may be rendered intelligible. The sacraments are presented as the high points of the history of revelation and of our faith. They are not presented as additions to faith. In this way may our binary title "Faith and Sacrament," be read correctly and it is relatively simple to answer the basic question that we have brought up. There is no need to explain in more detail or more exactly what we have only briefly mentioned.

FAITH AND REVELATION

But we must speak of a difficulty that could be brought up against this basic conception of faith as the foundation of the sacraments. More or less consciously, in many ways, in the most diverse theological contexts, and under the most different labels, this difficulty has always been at work. In the time of the Fathers people had already given thought to the possibility of salvation for pagans, or at least for catechumens. But for all practical purposes, until way into the nineteenth century, even almost up to the Second Vatican Council, the possibility of salvation was said to exist only for those who in some explicit way had entered into contact with the revelation of the Old and the New Testament. Some authors used hypotheses that sounded very mythological; some of them substituted other realities for revelation or for theological faith in revelation; [184] others, with a humanitarian optimism, simply allowed the majority of humankind to reach salvation without any faith at all in revelation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Today, after Vatican II, the theological situation in this question has become more difficult. On the other hand, according to the council's decree on the missions, one can no longer admit a possibility of salvation without supernatural faith in revelation in the strict sense of the word. On the other hand, considering the universal optimism of the council about salvation, which does not exclude even guiltless atheists and polytheistic pagans, we must admit that faith in revelation, inspired by grace, is a universal possibility even for those who are not reached by the revelation of the Old and New Testament, as they are understood traditionally as well as in the council's Constitution on Divine Revelation, which, after the so-called primordial revelation, blithely skips a few million years and lets the history of revelation continue with Abraham and Moses.

The following explanation is one to fill this gap. The supernatural grace of salvation that is offered to all (without necessarily becoming conscious or verbalized) provides the spiritual free subject with a new formal object, because through it the subject strives for God's immediacy. This new formal object realizes fundamentally the idea of a genuine personal and free self-revelation of God. And thus the free acceptance by a subjectivity that is aiming for the immediacy of God truly means theological faith in the proper sense of the word. I accept this interpretation, and I do not see it we can defend the doctrine that the true faith is universally, always and everywhere, offered to human beings without it. At the council the magisterium did not have to defend it because it is not its function to construct theological theories. But in theology, when we try to vindicate Christianity, we may not content ourselves with saying simply that God will find some way to lead to a faith in revelation those who are cut off from every historical revelation.

However, if we solve the problem of the universal possibility of faith for all human beings in this or some similar way, we meet the difficulty that claims our attention in this paper. It is possible to render intelligible the universal possibility of faith, and thus the universality of a revelation that reaches all only by approaching the question "transcendentally" (if I may be allowed to use this way of speaking). By claiming that this possibility of faith is already given by the proffer of supernatural salvific grace wherever spirit and freedom exist, we are saying that, through the always offered grace of God, spirit and freedom are being directed toward God's immediacy. If we establish the universal possibility of faith in this [185] way, "transcendentally," by appealing to the grace that is everywhere and always proffered and that, despite its universality, remains gratuitous and freely given, faith seems to be possible. However, both faith and revelation seem to lose their historical and their fully sacramental character. The way we have suggested for defending the universality of faith seems to rob faith of its relation (as explained above) to sacrament (to the sacramentality of the exhibitive word of grace, to the Church as the sacrament of salvation). This is obviously a fundamental problem for Christianity.

HISTORY AND GRACE

Christianity is an historical religion, in which revelation itself (and not only the human theological reflection on it) happens historically. And the same Christianity intends to be the universal religion, destined for all, required for salvation even by those who lived before Christianity started. Christianity wants to be both universal and sacramental, and if we consider these two concepts more attentively and do not indulge in primitive pragmatism, these concepts seem difficult to reconcile. The problem does not consist in the fact that faith is possible even without sacrament in the traditional sense of that word. The fact that faith and the grace of faith may exist, without (collectively or individually) its full historical development in the sacrament of faith, in baptism (and in the other sacraments of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church), is admitted by all and is not a special problem for those who can think of grace as an existential of historical humanity.

But this does not yet explain how this grace (established transcendentally) always and everywhere possesses a sacramental character in the broadest sense of the word, an incarnational character that ultimately refers to the Church. That grace must always and everywhere, at least initially, be historical, incarnational, and sacramental (which does not mean: mediated by a real sacrament of the Church). Are these conditions fulfilled simply by the fact that it is the grace of historical human beings, who mediate their transcendental essence (in the domain of nature or of grace) always and everywhere by means of historical activities, and never without them? It is true that human beings never possess their spiritual nature as intellect and freedom in abstract purity, but only as concrete historical beings. They do not live their transcendentality apart from their history (as in some pure mysticism, for instance), but in and [186] through their history. It is in history and not outside of it that we experience for the first time what spirit and freedom is. This applies also therefore to that transcendental, existential endowment of human beings that we call grace, in which through his self-communication God has become the inner principle of the creature's striving for God's immediacy.

The primordial revelation in paradise seems to be an old mythological idea that we are no longer able to accept. Moreover, in a realistic history of religion, it is difficult to imagine how such a revelation would have been developed and transmitted in later times. However, if we understand the primordial revelation of paradise as the primordial historical mediation of God's self-revelation that is always provided by grace, a historical mediation at the very beginnings, which belongs to the nature of a human being who has received grace (even though, of course, we cannot imagine that mediation and we may think of it as very primitive and barely conscious), then primordial revelation loses its mythological appearance. It becomes self-evident for those who can think that wherever there is spirit and freedom, hence human beings even in their most primitive guise, these beings are already, although quite unconsciously, striving for God's immediacy under the influence of grace, and they have accepted themselves as what they are. This may rightly be called "faith as the acceptance of God's self-revelation" because human spiritual transcendence has been radicalized toward God's immediacy.

GRACE AND REVELATION

Our problem is solved if we accept two things: first, if we construe grace transcendentally as a revelation of God and admit that it is always transmitted to spirit and freedom through historical concreteness. Secondly, if we understand this historical transmission of the grace of revelation to human spirit and freedom as historical revelation. The latter point may sound bold and unusual; it may produce the impression that we downgrade the history of revelation to the level of the general history of freedom that goes on always and everywhere. But in reality, history and the history of revelation are not simply identical, but the history of revelation is coextensive with history as such. This cannot be denied by a Christian who admits that salvation may occur always and everywhere in history and that this salvation must always and everywhere be salvation [187] produced by faith. What we add here to this conviction of Christianity today is only the assertion that the indispensable categorial and historical mediation of the grace of faith may occur everywhere in human life. Hence it occurs where "only" the voice of moral conscience is being heard and where this apparently merely "natural" message is nevertheless the transcendental proffer of grace, the self-revelation of God, thus constituting what we necessarily call the historical revelation of God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Theologically speaking we cannot require more.

Whoever, on the one hand, with Vatican II, considers as necessary for salvation a genuine faith in divine revelation, which is more than what the old terminology called natural revelation, and who, on the other hand, says that nevertheless the guiltless atheist finds salvation, cannot demand more for the salvific faith of this guiltless atheist (who remains an atheist) than the grace of a radicalization and orientation of his moral activity toward God's immediacy (which includes God's self-revelation) and the historical mediation of the free acceptance of the subjectivity that has thus been raised by grace. This mediation, despite its seemingly natural character, transforms the moral decision, elevated by grace, into an historical revelation.

This position implies of course that, on account of the unity of human history, every moment in it includes an objective reference to the totality of this history, hence also to its summits, among which belongs that which, in the traditional sense of the word, we call the explicit history of revelation with its highest summit in Jesus Christ. It also implies that it belongs to the nature of freedom to accept, when making absolute decisions, those implications of reality of which we cannot become expressly aware in a free decision. If we accept these presuppositions (and nothing seems to make this absolutely impossible), we may understand all real faith as referring to its origin in the historical event of revelation. This applies also to that grace which we must consider as universally given because of the universal infralapsarian salvific will of God. On this point, we wondered, because of its transcendence, how it was possible to discover in it any incarnational character.

True, every grace that makes for faith and salvation is rooted in human transcendence. But, since that grace is necessarily mediated historically, and because of the unity of human history, in which every moment is related to the whole and influenced by all other moments, we may say that this grace is to a sufficient degree incarnational, historically mediated, and in this sense a sacramental grace. We do not even have to deny the sacramentality of a grace that is not immediately mediated [188] through an historically visible relationship to the revelation of the Old or of the New Testament.

Those who require more than what we considered necessary, but also sufficient, for the sacramental character of all grace that leads to salvation must wonder how they will handle the following dilemma: either one excludes too many human beings from a concrete possibility of salvation, which we believe today to be excluded only by personal guilt and by nothing else (not even by original sin); or one grants to many persons a possibility of salvation that bears no relation to Christian revelation and to God's grace founded on Jesus Christ. It may require some arduous theological thinking to reconcile the universality of Christian salvation with the historicity of revelation and of Christianity. It is only when we succeed in doing this, only when we show that every divine grace, in which God communicates himself to humanity, has an inner dynamism pushing it to become historically and irreversibly manifest in Jesus Christ, in the Church, and in the sacraments, that the binary expression "Faith and Sacrament" may be understood as a real unity of two realities that condition and require each other. Only then does the expression "Faith and Sacrament" have a real theological importance.

For today's proclamation of Christian faith it is of decisive importance that the connection among the individual mysteries of the faith be established by theology as accurately as possible and proclaimed in the Christian message. When the realities of faith are merely enumerated one after the other, as so many ideas happening to occur in God's mind, they become hard to believe. That is why we should explain that the one and entire self-communication of God to the one and entire world in its one history itself has a history. God's self-communication has a history not in the sense that this coming of grace into history occurs only here and there amid other natural and secular events, but in the sense that this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

universal and permanent descent of grace into the world has a history, has gradually become manifest, and that it is God's will that in the history of creaturely freedom it may reach its eschatological definitiveness. Where the universal and permanent descent of grace into the world reaches the historical stage of irreversibility, there is the Church, there are the sacraments.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[189]

17

QUESTIONS ON THE THEOLOGY OF SACRAMENTS

If we wish to understand sacraments, we must first keep in mind that everywhere in human life, and not only in the religious domain, there are gestures that express something, signify something, but, in addition, that also really bring about that which they signify. This is not obvious; there are many gestures that do not bring about what they signify. When I telephone to somebody and tell him that we are having a thunderstorm, that storm is not affected at all by my message. But when somebody consciously and spitefully slaps another person in the face, such a slap expresses the offender's contempt and hatred. But the expressions of these feelings sometimes produces an increase of this contempt and hatred in the offender, and it may make them insurmountable. Persons who are in love certainly give each other kisses that are not only an expression of love but also the concrete activation of this love, so that it would not be the same love if it were not expressed in this way.

EXPRESSION AND EFFECT

There are gestures that bring about what they express. If this is true for human life in general, we may apply it to the properly religious domain: God, Jesus, and the Church – the three of them considered, as it were, as one acting subject – make a sign or a gesture that expresses not only that the person to whom it is addressed has a loving relationship to God but that also brings about this relationship. There are certainly [190] many such gestures in the religious domain. When a father blesses his child, when a mother traces the sign of the cross on her child's forehead, when somebody kneels or kisses a crucifix, these are all religious gestures and signs of an inner human happening, and to some extent at least they effect that which they express. Where the Church addresses such a gesture to a person, in a solemn and official way, we have to do, in this gesture of the Church, with what we call a sacrament. When the Church admits a baby into the community, when she lets a person share the Lord's Supper, her bond of unity, when during a serious illness she comforts people by imposing her hand, which tells them in a dark hour of their life that, despite all, God is merciful to them – in such gestures decisive situations are marked with holy signs, and such gestures effect what they signify.

DERIVING FROM JESUS

In a long history of reflection on her faith the Church has become aware that she has seven such fundamental gestures for individual Christians, which through God's power effect what they signify. These seven fundamental signs or gestures, possessing this power, are called sacraments. Such a "gesture" will generally consist of an action and the words that go with it. It may also consist only of words. The Church is aware that these gestures and signs have been given to her in virtue of the authority of Jesus.

How can these holy gestures of the Church be traced back to Jesus? That is a rather difficult theological question. It is at once clear from the New Testament that Jesus instituted the Eucharist. And we may refer to Matthew 28, where Jesus gives the command to baptize his followers.) However, we might bring up a difficultly against this point: does this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

injunction to baptize, as mentioned there, really go back to the historical Jesus? The trinitarian formula used in baptism and mentioned in this text cannot so easily be considered as having been used by Jesus.

However, even if we cannot trace the sacraments back to Jesus in this way, by appealing to the words by which he would have instituted them, this does not by any means deny or cast doubt on the real connection between the Church's individual sacraments and Jesus. First, it is not necessary that every single sacrament be traced back to Jesus, in exactly the same way. The Council of Trent teaches explicitly that the individual sacraments differ considerably from one another in their [191] nature and significance. It is also possible to apply this teaching to the way in which the individual sacraments were instituted by Jesus. It is not impossible, it is even probable, when we consider the way in which the sacraments grew in the early Church, that for serious reasons, using the power given to her, the Church, so to speak, divided a sacrament. Thus the early Church was convinced that baptism not only forgave sins, made the person a member of the Church, but also imparted the Holy Spirit in a very special way to the neophyte. It is easy to see how baptism with water and the imparting of the Holy Spirit through the laying on of hands, which immediately followed, have been separated and thus represent two sacraments for the later reflection of the Church.

However, the decisive point in this question of the origin of the sacraments is the following one: he who was crucified and rose from the dead is the last, unsurpassable, definitive, and victorious pledge through which God communicated himself definitively to the world. He is, as we might say in our terminology, the sign of God's grace whereby that which the sign means and intends to say is irrevocably given to the world.

THE PERMANENT ACCEPTANCE

If this permanent and definitive pledge addressed to the whole world and to the whole of human history is really to stay with the world, it can do so only as accepted, therefore as really believed, by persons throughout all times to come. God's pledge to the world, a pledge called Jesus Christ, must be and remain the pledge that is accepted and believed. The permanent presence of this divine pledge in Jesus Christ is called Church, the community of those who believe, who not only accept something that Jesus said but who, with their faith, help to constitute through all times the permanence in the world of the divine pledge in Jesus. We must not hesitate to say this in other words, as the Second Vatican Council did: the Church is the irrevocable sacrament of the salvation of the world that perdures in the world. The Church is the great and unique gesture of God and the accepting gesture of humankind, in which divine love, reconciliation, and the self-communication of God are forever manifested and imparted.

Now when the Church diversifies, as it were, this word which she herself is and utters it in the individual histories of persons at the decisive points of their existence, such a tangible instance of the sacrament that is called Church has, with regard to individuals, the very characteristics [192] that belong to the nature of the Church. It is the active word of the Church, a word which imparts what it says, a word that is infallibly effective by itself. When the Church addresses this word to a certain person, a word in which she, as it were, diversifies and embodies herself; this word must be accepted by the faith of the person who receives it. Failing this, it is and remains inoperative.

This victorious, definitive, irrevocable significance of the Church's word in the sacramental signs is also called the effectiveness of the sacraments of and by themselves: in Latin opus operatum. This by no means denies or obscures the fact that what God on his side tells people unconditionally in the word of the Church can reach them only in faith, hope, and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation charity. But it is God's word, and it is either a person's happiness or, if received without faith, their judgment, as Paul expressly says about the Eucharist.

HISTORY IS NOT FINISHED

The way in which the Church promises to individuals her innermost being as the presence of God's victorious grace has itself, in the course of two millennia, had a varied history. The rite of baptism has not always been the same. It is necessarily different for babies and for adults. The way in which the Eucharist was received has changed at different times: in the manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper, in the kind of bread, in the question of whether only the bread or also the chalice would be received by the faithful, in the secondary question of communion received on the tongue or in the hand. The same happened for the other sacraments. The conditions under which the Church allows the word of lasting love between two human beings to have the value of a sacrament have changed and have been changing until the present day. For the most diverse reasons (among them social ones) the frequency of the anointing of the sick has varied considerably at different times. The same is true for confirmation. In the Eastern churches it continues to be conferred immediately after baptism. In the West many years of religious education separate baptism and confirmation.

The sacrament of reconciliation has had an enormously eventful history. And it does not look as if this history has yet reached a praxis that will forever remain unchanged. For many and justified reasons, deriving from the concrete social and historical situation, the indispensable priestly function, which, in the final analysis, is one in the Church, had [193] to be divided into different partial functions. Very early the functions of priests, bishops, and deacons had already become different, and accordingly the concrete rites under which the corresponding powers were conferred have been shaped differently. Thus until the pontificate of Pius XII it was not absolutely certain in the West whether the laying on of hands was the decisive rite, or whether the validity of priestly ordination required that the bishop hand over paten and chalice to the candidate for the priesthood. Such developments are not definitively excluded for the future. It is, for instance, quite conceivable that in fact the Church performs a holy rite, hence a gesture of God that confers grace, without knowing expressly and certainly that this is a sacramental rite. In the Middle Ages Saint Thomas said that episcopal consecration was not a sacrament. It was performed at that time almost in the same way as today, but it was not clear to the Church of that period that this gesture carried the dignity of a real sacrament of Jesus Christ. Today, in the Second Vatican Council, the Church has expressly affirmed the sacramentality of episcopal consecration. She has, so to speak, made progress in her reflection.

We might think today that other functions, too, that are entrusted to different people in the Church might share the sacramentality of the transmission of functions in the Church, although the Church is not yet clearly aware of it. I do not believe that it would be heretical to claim that the official, solemn, and permanent appointment of a pastoral assistant might share the sacramentality of the transmission of functions in the Church, since Saint Thomas claimed that this was the case for the function of acolyte in the Church. This is not a terribly important question. But it shows that in the Catholic theology of sacraments all questions have not yet been elucidated. And new questions may come up that have a serious religious significance.

A GREATER LATITUDE

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We already said above that the reception of such a sign and gesture of the Church, which confers what it signifies, is meaningful and morally justified only when it takes place in a way that corresponds to this gesture. The mere receiving of the eucharistic bread by those who do not have the right moral disposition, who routinely accompany the others to the altar, is absurd and immoral. Paul already demanded that those who attend the Lord's Supper first examine themselves to find out whether [194] they have the right disposition and really discern the eucharistic bread from other bread. This requires not only that they have a certain, even if rudimentary, knowledge of the Eucharist; they must also have the right fundamental moral attitude.

As for the so-called "disposition," that is, that which is presupposed in soul and body for the true and fruitful reception of Holy Communion, the Church teaches that those who objectively and subjectively are aware of serious guilt, which they have not yet erased in the sacrament of reconciliation, should receive the Eucharist only after having been sacramentally absolved. This applies to normal situations. Exceptionally, an inner return to God in sincere contrition for sins committed may be sufficient.

However, the question of when and in what circumstances we have to do with objectively and subjectively serious guilt (not yet sacramentally remitted) is a difficult one and not easy to answer. In previous decades average Christians had the impression that, when they missed Sunday Mass out of laziness they had committed a serious sin, which they had to erase through confession before they could receive communion again. Today there may be many good Christians who are convinced that such a missing of Sunday Mass does not constitute before God, at least subjectively, a serious offense that must be blotted out sacramentally before a new reception of communion.

Because these questions cannot clearly be answered by the Church, they leave a very great latitude to individual Christians with regard to the question: may they or may they not allow themselves to receive Holy Communion without previous confession? We cannot deny that during the past few decades certain changes have occurred with respect to these questions. It is praiseworthy and quite unlike the praxis of former times that nowadays an ordinary Christian is convinced that, as a rule, attending the Eucharist implies also that one personally receives communion. However, this also entails the danger that Christians may admit a certain laxity of which we cannot approve.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[195]

18

BAPTISM AND THE RENEWAL OF BAPTISM

The Church understands baptism as the sacramental entrance into the Church and thus into the fullness of Christian life. That is why we really understand baptism only to the extent that we understand Christianity and the Church. So if we wish to render baptism understandable, we must in fact speak of Christianity and of the Church herself. Since it is, of course, impossible to explain sufficiently, in a short paper, what Christianity means in the Church, what we will say about baptism is necessarily fragmentary, not more than a rather arbitrary selection among things that should be said about baptism.

According to Christian doctrine baptism, as we read in the New Testament, is the sacrament of faith and justification. Hence it imparts that life which God gives us through his self-communication, or indwelling, or sealing with the Holy Spirit, in order to make us capable of eternal life in immediate unity and community with God. So, when we wish to explain baptism, we should in fact speak of God, his eternal life, his self-communication to us through the grace of the Holy Spirit. But that would no longer be the doctrine about one single sacrament or active sign of grace, but the doctrine about Christian humanity in general.

That is why for our considerations we will use another approach, which may help us better and more clearly to handle the main difficulty concerning baptism which today troubles quite a number of people even in the Church. They ask why baptism, and even baptism of infants, exists, when we know, or at least hope, that God leads to eternal salvation every person of good will, hence also non-Christians, “heathens,” and [196] even atheists (if they obey the voice of conscience). Before trying to answer this difficulty, a few preliminary remarks are in order.

DISPOSITION AND GESTURE

Persons are one yet manifold. Their unity is the unity of many things that are distinct but still constitute a unity. These differences condition each other in this unity and neither difference nor unity can reach its own perfection without the other. We have put this very abstractly. But what we mean is universally observable in human life. For example, the love of one person for another, considered as an inner disposition, differs from a glance, a gesture, a caress, and so on. Yet the inner disposition of love can often fully develop only if it is also expressed and “embodied” in such a bodily gesture. The inner solidarity of several people is something in their disposition. Yet it often becomes wholly itself only when these people share a common meal.

In such cases and in countless others there is in people an interior and an exterior. They differ from each other, yet they belong together. The interior reaches its perfection wholly and clearly only when it manifests and embodies itself in the exterior. Occasionally the exterior may deceive (as in a Judas-kiss) when the exterior, which should be actualized and manifested by it, is not really present. But when people perform the exterior action sincerely and readily, that action may bring about the interior disposition. Thus many people have suddenly and intimately understood the meaning of prayer simply by kneeling down. Love itself may increase as innermost reality simply through the fact that one person treats another person with love. We will suppose that these remarks have been understood and accepted. The question remains what they may mean for an understanding of baptism.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

IRREVOCABLE OFFER

Let us quietly and confidently start from this certitude: God loves all human beings, having called them by their name. At the moment of calling them into existence, God has already, in free love, inserted him-self with all his reality in each person as innermost strength and as final end. God offers himself to all persons and to their freedom as their goal and, at the same time, as their innermost strength and their dynamism [197] toward that goal, even though human freedom may reject that offer that is always given and always irrevocable. This is possible because human beings are undeniably spiritual beings, who nevertheless may freely, in an animal way, contradict their inalienable being. Seen from God's side, this ever-present offer of divine life exists, whether we know it or not, because God has willed the whole of humankind for the sake of the Word-made-flesh, because the whole of humanity has been adopted by God in Jesus, in the one who was crucified and raised from among the dead. That is why God's innermost offer of grace, from which no human being is ever excluded, is also essentially "Christian."

Now this innermost presence of grace in each person wants to embody itself in all the dimensions of humanity and to become manifest as a divine and "Christian" reality. It is intended for the individual as irreplaceably individual and as member of the whole of humanity. Of course, this inner presence of grace in persons can also exist without the appropriate outer embodiment and manifestation. Christian faith has always known this: it speaks of baptism of desire as justifying, that is, as endowing persons with divine life, even before they are baptized with water. It speaks of perfect contrition through which persons, even before receiving the sacrament of reconciliation, freely accept the divine life that is always proffered to them.

Yet this does not mean that the embodiment and manifestation of divine grace through the sacrament (baptism or sacrament of reconciliation) is something that is up to individuals. For, of its very nature, this divine life in the grace of the Holy Spirit wants to embody itself, to become visible in the social domain of believers, called the Church. Those who freely and guiltily resist this tendency of divine life to become visible in a bodily and social way not only reject this embodiment as such but also the very offer of grace. It is as though we said in our heart that we love a person with whom we live while refusing to render that person a necessary service through which this inner love should be experienced. Refusing to render the service is tantamount to denying the inner love, even though love and service are not the same thing. This applies also to baptism.

If someone knows nothing about baptism or is unable to receive it, divine life nevertheless lives, in the innermost heart of this person, as proffered or as freely accepted divine life. As accepted, even if not in some expressly conscious way, the person welcomes this divine offer in what we call faith, hope, and love. These virtues may be present, even in a wholly unconscious way, in unselfish acts of love for neighbor [198] and in other decisions through which one gets involved in the divine life.

BODY OF GRACE

However, when people are living in a situation where the bodily and social manifestation of divine life, called baptism, is possible, they cannot say that they desire divine life while rejecting its bodily manifestation. That would be as if someone refused a concrete act of love while, at the same time, affirming one's love. Or, as if a person refused to grow because it is said that even as an embryo one is already a human being and, for that reason, the person forgoes further development. Baptism is the concrete becoming-visible of the divine life, insofar as this life is also a Christian and therefore an ecclesial life. Because this embodiment of the divine life is also an ecclesial reality, it is not up to individuals in what way they will shape this bodily expression of divine life. They must shape it in the way that is prescribed to them by this ecclesial community. And this way is precisely baptism with water and the invocation of the triune God. When somebody wants to state a juridically effective intention to bequeath an estate to a freely chosen heir, his intention, in order to be effective, must be stated in a will that is valid according to the laws of society. Something similar is true for baptism with water.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must still give some thought to two questions that follow from what precedes and that present some difficulties. The first question derives from the way in which we have approached the problem: sacramental causality with regard to grace seems to be less intelligible than it would be if we simply thought of the sacramental activity as the cause of grace, without first seeing baptism as manifestation and so as sign of the inner conferring of grace. The second difficulty that we must consider refers to the baptism of children.

ACTION OF GOD HIMSELF

Up to now we have seen baptism as the historical and social manifestation of divine grace, of God's coming into our innermost being and God's offering of self to our freedom as the power of faith, hope, and love directed toward God. Seen in this way baptism seems only to be the disclosure of a reality that is also given without it. However, the doctrine [199] of the Church speaks of an efficient causality of the sacraments, which is also applied to baptism with regard to grace. Can these two statements be reconciled? Or can we say that the character of baptism as a sign disclosing grace on the one hand and the efficient causality of baptism on the other mutually condition each other, so that we may affirm baptism as the cause of grace because it is the sign of grace? It stands to reason that, if we are to speak this way, we cannot make use of an arbitrary concept of cause, but we must have a correct and meaningful notion of the causality that is at work here. Even traditional textbook theology draws our attention to this point when it states that in baptism God is the real and the only creative cause of divine grace, that baptism may be conceived only as an "instrumental cause." Theologians offer the most diverse theories to explain this instrumental causality of the sacraments. One cannot reject a priori our approach to an understanding of baptism, which started from the fact that baptism is a sign, for the following reason. When adults are baptized they must, in order to receive the sacrament worthily, bring to baptism faith, hope, and charity. The usual expectation is that this charity is love of God for God's own sake. It must be "perfect love," as distinguished from the love that is implied in "imperfect contrition," that is, contrition caused by fear. When these conditions are fulfilled, the common doctrine of the Church and of theologians holds that these adults come to baptism already "justified"; they have already accepted the divine life offered to them; they are, through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, children of God. In such a case at least those who are baptized already possess what baptism is supposed to give them, the grace of justification.

Theologians try to avoid this difficulty by saying that the baptism of persons who are already justified causes an increase of this grace of justification and gives them besides something which they do not yet possess, namely, the "baptismal character" and social and juridical incorporation in the visible Church. This explanation seems to be rather artificial, but we cannot insist on this point.

In order to proceed, let us start from a consideration that was presented at the beginning.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What happens when someone sincerely loves another person and, although for one reason or another he or she may not find it easy, addresses the decisive word of love to this other person? This word is a declaration and a decision about one's love. Yet this love is realized in its full intensity and definitiveness through this word; the love would not be the same if it did not express itself in its disclosure and so translate itself into reality. To that extent we may consider this [200] word, the sign of this love, as being also its cause, because this love renders itself real through the disclosure that is, at the same time, distinct from it.

Let us apply this to the baptism of those who are already justified. They bring to their baptism the grace of God that has already freely been accepted. But through the ceremony of baptism this very grace wants to make itself visible historically (in time and space, in the body) and socially (in the Church). And by becoming visible in this way it becomes present also in the bodily and social dimensions of the baptized person. Baptism is an effect of grace in such a way that through it this grace itself assumes full reality. And to that extent baptism is also the cause of grace. (The explanation mentioned above, is correct in itself: that baptism "increases sanctifying grace" in the person who is already justified before being baptized. Only it understands this "increase" almost as a quantitative addition, not as a self-realization of the same grace that is fully realized on account of the sacramental sign.) When we look at it this way, we understand what we mean when we say that the sacrament, as sign of grace, is the cause of grace. If we understand things correctly, sacramental sign and sacramental cause do not occur next to each other, but in each other.

THE BAPTISM OF CHILDREN

Finally we must present a few considerations about the baptism of children, which for so many centuries was taken for granted in the Church. Today it has again come under attack because (as some say) there is no mention of it in the New Testament and it contradicts the personal character of becoming a Christian. The Church nevertheless clings inexorably to the fundamental correctness and meaningfulness of the baptism of children, although we may not affirm with the same assurance the obligation of baptizing children.

Why is the baptism of children meaningful? Why should it not be rejected by parents who say that becoming a Christian and a member of the Church should be left to the free decision of the child, that the child should therefore not be baptized before it is of age? First, that which baptism reveals visibly and socially is not something optional, something about which people may decide as they please. For God's love, through which God becomes the innermost dynamism of human beings [201] and of their history, is irrevocably and always prior to a personal free decision. God asks us whether or not we are willing to accept the challenging love of God, whether it is to turn, through our free decision, into our salvation or our judgment. We are necessarily being invited – whatever our answer to the invitation – and baptism discloses this iv-revocable "being-invited" by the holy love of God. When we are born, we may accept or we may hate our existence, but we cannot get rid of it. Human freedom is always and unquestionably a reaction to something that we have not chosen; it is not merely creative in an empty space. So if in baptism that which a human person really is becomes manifest – namely the creature loved by God, destined to receive divine life – then freedom does not suffer any injustice, because, with regard to God and the world, it is always a responsive freedom that never has the first word.

Should someone object that baptism not only manifests the inescapable relationship between human persons and God, but that it also makes them members of a visible Church, something which they ought to be allowed to choose freely, we would answer: in her real nature the Church understands herself as the historical and social manifestation of the fact

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that all persons are called by God. That is why the Church feels that belonging to it is a natural "becoming-visible" of the standing invitation addressed to everyone by God. We may admit, without going into detail, that in earlier times the Church concluded from this fact that the baptized belong in the Church, a conclusion that is questionable. She also concluded that she had the right to use compulsion against baptized people, a right which, as she understands herself, she did not have with regard to the non-baptized. But the Church no longer draws such a conclusion, because she admits that both the baptized and the nonbaptized enjoy the same freedom of conscience. Thus the difficulty deriving from church membership no longer exists. Baptism is the obvious manifestation of the fact that every human being should belong to the Church. As such it is not an anticipation of a decision that depends only on human freedom.

But something else deserves our attention with respect to the baptism of children. In our region of the world it is overlooked because here baptisms of children are frequent and baptisms of adults unusual. If baptism is the effective becoming-visible of God's love for human beings, bestowing upon them not some created good but God's love for human beings, it is of its very nature an invitation to accept this love. That is why we [202] can say that the baptism of children reaches its real meaning and completion when eventually they accept in faith, hope, and love this love of God which is offered to them. The baptism of children reaches its full meaning and purpose only in adults.

The decisive question is not whether, through the love and fidelity of their ordinary Christian life, they accept God's self-donation offered to them when they were children or whether, time and again, explicitly in Christian freedom, they ratify the baptism they received as children. The ultimate and decisive acceptance of baptism in personal freedom takes place throughout the length and breadth of human and Christian life. Yet it is certainly good and helpful to revive explicitly, with faith and confidence, the memory of the baptism received at the start of life.

That which the liturgy presents to each Christian during the Easter Vigil in the renewal of the baptismal vows might also take place independently of the official liturgy in the life of every Christian. They look back upon their life, knowing that from the start they have been accompanied by God's power and love and that, in his providence, God has lovingly disposed that this love should be manifest to them, in a bodily and explicit way, by means of their baptism at the beginning of their life. Christians may time and again render the event of their baptism present and accept it. When we read in 2 Timothy 1:6f., "Hence I remind you to rekindle the gift of God that is within you through the laying on of hands; for God did not give us a spirit of timidity but a spirit of power and love and self-control," all Christians can take this word, which was originally said about the conferring of a church function, and apply it to their own baptism. In it they received the divine Spirit of love and they have the duty to keep this divine fire burning. We should also, in the privacy of our room, renew our baptismal vows.

RENEWAL OF BAPTISM

To help us understand what is meant by renewal of baptism, we should first remember that a Christian's life of grace is a real life. It develops, grows, and increases during a life lived in free Christian responsibility. There is a life and expansion of grace wherever people freely direct their life toward God, hence also in the seeming banality of everyday life. Now this growing and maturing life is, of course, the life and growth of [203] the grace that is received with sacramental tangibility in baptism. So it is a life and increase and ripening of baptismal grace. When we are honest, when we work hard and unselfishly in the service of our

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

neighbor, when we are courageous and control our moods, when we remain cheerful, even when it is far from easy, but especially when we make the great and heavy decisions of life in a Christian way, we also come nearer to God (even though we do not always explicitly think of God), and the grace of our baptism keeps growing. In order to avoid expressions that are too simplistic and quantitative, we might better say: baptismal grace is more and more assimilated, becomes more deeply rooted in the center of a human existence.

All of this is properly already a renewal of baptism, even when we do not expressly think of the fact that we are baptized Christians; baptismal grace lives and grows in the whole length and breadth of Christian life. Yet in daily life we might also once in a while tell ourselves explicitly, "You have been baptized. The Holy Spirit lives and wants to operate in the innermost core of your being. God has called you by your name, sanctifying and divinizing you. God wishes this divine life to grow strong in your life, all the way down to the smallest details. It is not enough for you to be sealed with the Holy Spirit; you must also bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, which according to Paul are love, joy, peace, patience, goodness, fidelity, meekness and self-control." When we try in this way explicitly to remember our baptismal grace and expressly urge ourselves to live out of its spirit and power, we explicitly renew our baptism. If we seriously mean it and we honestly try to do what we prompt ourselves to do, baptismal grace really increases, it acquires increasing influence in our life, and we become what we were in the seed planted at baptism: Christians.

The words "renewal of baptism" should also remind us of the renewal of baptism that is celebrated in common by a Christian community in liturgical solemnity during the Easter Vigil. Over and beyond what was mentioned above, such a feast can call our attention to two main points: in such a renewal of baptism we also renew our rejection of the dark powers of evil that are always trying to take over our life. We are reminded therefore that a renewal of baptism, whether or not it is made explicitly in everyday life, also has to include the fight against evil in and around ourselves, in individual life and in society. We are also reminded that the grace of our baptism can stay alive and active in us only if we are always ready to deny ourselves certain pleasures, if we have the courage to say a Christian no. The renewal of baptism in a Christian community [204] reminds us also that the life and growth of baptismal grace is not an individualistic event, but that we can ultimately bring our Christian existence to maturity only in common prayer, love, and solidarity in grace, even as the different members of a body or the branches of a vine can reach their full development only in union with the whole of which they are a member or a branch.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[205]

19

THE STATUS OF THE SACRAMENT OF RECONCILIATION

Recently a new development has occurred in the sacrament of reconciliation that deserves to be examined.[1] For many centuries (since the early Middle Ages) the practice of this sacrament had hardly changed. Catholics had the impression that they were obliged to confess their sins at least once a year to their parish priest. And besides this the so-called confession of devotion was taken for granted by pious Catholics, who confessed minor sins in the sacrament of reconciliation more than once a year, or even as often as they received Holy Communion.

Today the sacrament of reconciliation is going through a critical stage. To put it in a few words, people go less frequently to confession, in many cases the sacrament is not received at all by Catholics who consider themselves devout Christians and who most likely receive Holy Communion every time they attend Mass. We wish to give some thought to the way one might pass judgment on such a crisis.

It is, of course, not true that every new development in the Church must be evaluated positively. There are undoubtedly developments of longer or shorter duration that are less desirable, that might even have to be resisted and suppressed. Because such a thing is quite possible in the Church, the question arises how the present state of the sacrament of reconciliation should be evaluated. This question must be asked, but the answer is not immediately clear. To answer it, we must first say something about another question, namely, what obligation divine law [206] imposes and does not impose on Christians with regard to individual sacramental confession.

CONFESSION AND SERIOUS SIN

The answer to the question about the obligation of divine law is that Catholics are obliged to receive the sacrament of reconciliation if, and only if, they have committed a sin that is subjectively and objectively grave. We will not inquire here how quickly they have to fulfill this obligation. This may be considered a secondary question, which we do not have to take up here. Actually this question has been answered by a commandment of the Church issued by the Fourth Lateran Council, which obliges a Catholic who has committed a sin that is objectively and subjectively grave to fulfill this obligation of the divine law within a year.

But we have to give some more attention to the general principle that we have mentioned above. According to the doctrine of the Council of Trent, it is difficult to question the obligation of Catholics who have committed a serious sin to erase their guilt by receiving the sacrament of reconciliation in individual confession, although even here a few theologians would have questions to ask. In such a case, neither purely subjective contrition with a private prayer for forgiveness nor a so-called penitential service is sufficient. Let us then take as our starting point that in such a case there exists the obligation of an “auricular” confession, an obligation imposed by divine law, which follows both from the nature of a person’s relation to the Church and from the nature of the Church herself and of the sacrament of reconciliation within the Church. Hence it is not within the Church’s power to [1] On this see also K. Rahner, “Vom Geheimnis menschlicher Schuld und göttlicher Vergebung,” in Geist und Leben 55 (1982): 39-54.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

abolish this obligation.

However, with such a principle the concrete practical question facing us is not yet answered. For when we admit this principle and want to translate it into practice, the question unavoidably arises about when such an objectively and subjectively grave sin exists. It is obvious that there are sins which do not belong to this category, which therefore a Christian does not have to confess. In catechism jargon we usually call them venial sins, as opposed to so-called grave or mortal sins. In other words, the question comes up now how to distinguish these two kinds of sins, which are essentially different. We are speaking not only of the objective difference between a grave and a venial sin, for instance, the objective difference between a murder and a voluntary inattention or distraction during prayer, or a voluntary but slight unkindness with regard to another person.

That there exists such an objective difference is a doctrine of the Church, which was clearly stated by the Council of Trent. But when we speak of an obligation to confess, we have to consider not only an objective distinction between grave and venial sins (only the former having to be confessed) but also the question of the person's subjective guilt. Certainly a person may violate an obligation that is, of its very nature, objectively grave in such a way that in God's eyes this person is not really guilty. It is wrong to poison somebody. But if, through some negligence, a pharmacist makes a mistake in preparing a prescription, and the client dies as a result, we may speak of an objectively grave offense. Yet subjectively, the error does not in the proper sense render the pharmacist absolutely guilty before God, that between God and this person there would occur an absolute, albeit remediable, separation.

So this principle, that we must have grave sins forgiven by means of an individual sacramental confession, must be understood for sins that are both objectively and subjectively grave. In the case of a sin that is objectively grave, but not really experienced as such by the person in question, there is, according to the doctrine of the Council of Trent, no absolute duty, obliging under pain of another grave sin, to make use of individual sacramental confession.

SUBJECTIVELY AND OBJECTIVELY GRAVE SIN

For many centuries – at least from the early Middle Ages until the present time – religious education in the Church more or less neglected this fundamental distinction between a sin that is both subjectively and objectively grave and one that is grave only objectively speaking. Ordinary Catholics in the sacramental confession that they made at least once a year, or even more often, simply confessed whatever the usual moral teaching called objectively grave. Not much thought had been given to the question whether the traditional evaluation of a sin by moral theologians was truly certain, or only a more or less reasonable but not absolutely certain opinion of theologians.

The obligation of Catholics, if not legitimately prevented, to attend Sunday Mass was called a grave obligation by theologians. Whoever did not fulfil it had committed a grave sin. Not much attention has been paid to the fact that in many cases the question came up whether an objective [208] transgression of this commandment of the Church was also subjectively a grave sin. Catholics simply confessed: "I have missed Sunday Mass so many times, although I would have been able to attend it, since I was not sick or in some other way legitimately prevented." And they have considered this the concrete performance of their obligation to confess serious sins.

Quite recently, for a number of reasons, there has been much discussion about what constitutes not only objectively serious sin but also one that is subjectively serious as well. First, even moral theologians now admit that, in a great number of cases, notwithstanding

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

traditional moral teaching, things that were formerly considered to be serious obligations or objectively grave sins are really not such. It is difficult to affirm today that every voluntary omission of a single Sunday Mass plunges Catholics into the same utter enmity with God that they would have incurred if they had treacherously murdered another person.

When we speak of sin today, we will make more distinctions and, in many cases, be more lenient with regard to objective gravity. We will also rightly and without any moral laxity say that, in many cases, there is no subjectively grave guilt. Many people do not in fact possess that power of moral discernment by which every objectively serious conflict with the divine will is felt to be so grave that they tell themselves: "If I do this anyway I say a really radical no to God and to God's will."

We know more clearly today than ever before that a great number of people have little power of discernment with regard to the urgency of a moral duty. That ability is often weaker than would be desirable. But it is weak. We know from modern psychology how often we may admit a lower degree of responsibility, not only in criminal cases but also in everyday life. Moreover, we also have the impression, rightly, that people who are poor, weak, living in a difficult environment will not so easily and so often enter into such a conflict with the divine will that this conflict (if not settled through contrition) would have to be punished with eternal damnation by God's holy justice. We may even – and once more not without good reason – be of the opinion that a really subjectively serious sin, one that deserves eternal damnation, is not something that will occur very often and very easily in the life of a decent Christian. In this respect we are more optimistic, and why would we not have the right to be?

We do not have too high an opinion of the moral quality of the average Christian. We know that they are weak and strongly influenced by a public opinion that may be very un-Christian. Because of their background, [209] their lack of education, and the ups and downs of life, they may have a relatively obtuse and primitive moral sense. We cannot be very enthusiastic about the moral standards of most people today.

But at the same time, as Christians, we cannot rightly claim that people today are, as a rule, so wicked in the very core of their free will, that they address an absolute no to God, which is but the reverse side of eternal perdition. Basically we are more optimistic than Saint Augustine, who considered humanity massa damnata out of which only a few were saved through the exceptional grace of God.

DECREASE IN THE FREQUENCY OF CONFESSION

However, while on the question of the existence of subjectively grave guilt we take a more cautious position than formerly, and while we have a right to have an optimistic opinion of human beings in spite of their primitive moral sense, the question of when and how often a Catholic is strictly obliged to receive the sacrament of reconciliation is much more difficult. In its pastoral activity the Church has not tried very hard to make the faithful aware of the difference between objectively grave and subjectively grave guilt, nor has it elaborated this doctrine. But according to the Church's official teaching it is undoubtedly true that only when the faithful have a sufficient moral (albeit not absolute) certitude that their sin is also subjectively grave are they obliged by divine law to go to confession. And if today, as explained above, we judge for good reasons that subjectively grave sins do not occur often or naturally in the life of an ordinary Christian, we have a right to say that the existence of a divine command to receive the sacrament of reconciliation does not occur as frequently as the formal pastoral doctrine practically and tacitly assumed.

We might, of course, say much more about what I explained above. We might speak of the problem of the difference between venial and grave sin, a question that is not as simple as I

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

have presented it above and as it is also assumed to be in our ordinary moral theology. We might inquire how, in the practice of Christian life, we might, with a certain moral certitude, reach a reasonable conclusion that in this case we have to do only with a subjectively venial sin, and in another case with a subjectively grave sin, and so on.

But here and now we cannot further discuss all these very important questions. We can only observe that, if we interpret more accurately [210] the obligation to confess, we will find it not so strange and inconsistent that people go less frequently to confession. Is this decline in the frequency of confession desirable or deplorable? Should it be stopped and reversed by means of prudent pastoral education? This is another question, about which we will have to say something later on. However, should someone ask whether the decreasing number of confessions is a clear proof that a great number of Catholics ignore the obligation to go to confession when they have committed a subjectively serious sin, we would answer this question negatively. The purely numerical decrease in the number of confessions does not allow us to conclude with certitude that today's Catholics transgress an important divine command. This might be said only if, on the one hand, people rarely went to confession and, on the other hand, if really subjectively grave sins occurred not rarely, but frequently. But since the latter statement cannot be made with certainty, and since we may certainly hope that such sins which render human beings worthy of eternal damnation do not, at least in a normal Christian life, occur frequently, or even at all, we may not, from the lower frequency of confessions, conclude with certainty that Catholics do not in fact comply with an obligation to confess that is objectively binding for them.

True, there are also Catholics who infringe such an obligation, while committing really serious sins, sins that are both objectively and subjectively grave. When a mother, who might very well have another child, who economically and personally would be quite capable of it, who is not living in cramped external conditions, but who merely out of laziness or for other shabby reasons, accepts an abortion, there is a real possibility that we are dealing not only with an objectively but also with a subjectively serious transgression of the fifth commandment.

But even if this is granted, it is not yet certain that subjectively serious guilt occurs so frequently in the life of the ordinary Christian that we may conclude, because of the infringement of the obligation to confess, that there exists a frightful and massive dechristianization. The praxis of the Church in pastoral activity, in sermons, in promoting the use of the confessional, and in catechetical instruction in the schools should not try to bring back a more frequent use of the sacrament by using false and invalid arguments, or by concealing principles that apply objectively in this matter and that we have mentioned above. Even a very devout Christian, on the authority of God's command, might say even at Easter: "I am not going to confession, and I am not thereby infringing the Church's commandment, because thanks to God's grace I know [211] that I am not guilty of any subjectively grave sin; therefore even at Easter there is no obligation for me to receive this sacrament."

I used to know a pious old lady who, possibly on account of a strange set of psychological reasons, was simply unable to enter the confessional and there to whisper something in the priest's ear. And she was a devout, prayerful woman, who would never hurt anybody and who loved God with her whole heart. We should tell her: If you have these subjective inhibitions against confession, you do not have to confess, even at Easter. That is perfectly all right, in full agreement with the doctrine of the Church and her commandments.

However, the considerations outlined above do not solve the problem. If only that which we have said up to now were important and taken into account, we might say that the present falling off in the frequency of confession is legitimate and nothing but the fulfillment of the divine precept that only really serious sins have to be confessed. We are rightly convinced that such sins are not all too frequent, or at least that there is no proof that they are very

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation frequent within the Church. Therefore, we might conclude, if today confessions are so scarce, this is nothing but the obvious application of the dogma which the Church proclaimed at the Council of Trent. However, things are not quite that simple.

CONFESSION – NOT PUT OFF UNTIL DEATH

To proceed further we must first submit a general consideration. There are necessarily in the Church many important things that are not immediately covered by a divine order, by the church institution itself. There are, for example, religious orders in the Church. The fact that a Franciscan, a Jesuit, a Benedictine order, and so on exists may not be considered a divine command strictly obliging on the Church. Yet there must exist in the Church the kind of life that flourishes in religious orders, that is organized and protected by them. We might say that the divine instructions about the Church and its life are, as it were, something like the skeleton of a living organism. Yet much more than bones are needed in the organism. There must be flesh, there must be metabolism, and so on. Something similar is true in the Church. There are religious orders, there are certain devotions, there are certain developments in theology, there are theological schools, there are special ways of leading a Christian life. All of these aspects of Christian life are present in the Church not simply as the result of a divine obligation.

[212] Almost paradoxically we might say: The Church is obliged by God to include realities, activities, signs of life that in themselves are not imposed by God. Whoever would claim that whatever expresses the life of the Church, of Christianity, needs a divine authentication juris divini would state something that is absolutely false and would – however strange this may sound – suppress the real life of the Church. In order to be fully alive the Church must include activities and lifestyles that cannot themselves immediately appeal to a divine authorization and that nevertheless belong more or less necessarily to the full life of the Church.

Something similar applies to frequent confession. The first evidence we might bring up is the simple fact noticed even by a few of the church fathers that, if only very serious sins were confessed, this obligation would in fact cancel itself out or be put off until the individual's death. If, for instance, it was certain that all the people waiting at the confessional had committed very grave sins – perjuring themselves, breaking their marriage vows in a really terrible way, and so on – it would be obvious that these people would not be waiting at the confessional, because, in that way they publicly accuse themselves of very grave sins. We cannot expect this from people.

This simple reason would already allow us to say that, if only grave sins were confessed because they have to be confessed, none would be confessed at all. From the pastoral point of view, it is clear that the Church will see to it that the sacrament of reconciliation is received also by those who are not obliged to receive it on account of a really grave sin. The ancient Church in fact experimentally demonstrates this. In the beginning only very grave sins were confessed. The result was that Christians often postponed confession until their deathbed

From the point of view of divine law it would be hard to demonstrate that such a postponement of confession of serious sins until the time of death is explicitly contrary to God's law. But everyone understands that a truly active Christian life, which supposes that one takes sin very seriously and that one is firmly resolved to be at peace with God, would be destroyed more or less by such a practice.

So from this point of view, the Church is right in her desire that the sacrament of reconciliation be used more often than is absolutely commanded. And ancient practice thoroughly convinced her that she may naturally use her powers of forgiving not only for

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

grave sins, in the strict sense of the word, but also for other offenses and sins. Jesus' statement in John 20:23, that when the Church forgives sins, she does so before [213] God, does not make any a priori distinction between sins. That is why it would be foolish to claim that the Church can only forgive very serious sins and cannot use for other sins the full power of forgiving given her by Jesus.

Moreover, there are still many other reasons that render frequent confessions of devotion meaningful. We cannot fully present and develop them here, because this would lead us too much into a theology of sin, into a theology of the life of a Christian between grace and sin, into a complete theology of the Church and of her nature as the sacrament of forgiveness in general. That is not possible here. We will only briefly mention a few points.

SACRAMENTAL AND EXISTENTIELL FORGIVENESS

First, for many centuries Christians have had the impression that their sins were more certainly and clearly forgiven when they submitted them to the sacramental judgment of the Church and heard God's forgiving word expressly from the mouth of the Church. If we are honest and use sober theological reflection, this conviction is not so obvious, for it is obviously true that, apart from grave sins, such sins can also be forgiven by God if we are truly sorry for them and refrain from them. Without such an inner disposition, which basically already brings about the forgiveness of such sins, the sacrament of reconciliation too would not have any effect. For those who only admit their imperfections and sins without at the same time being sincerely sorry and resolved to avoid them, sacramental confession is perfectly meaningless and useless. It was obvious to Saint Thomas Aquinas that whoever receives the sacrament of reconciliation must normally come to it in a state of mind that by itself before reception of the sacrament, already brings about the forgiveness of the sins for which one is truly sorry. From this point of view it is not so obvious why ordinary Christians feel that they may have more confidence in the remission of their sins when they receive sacramental absolution. It would be better not to separate this inner – we might say existentiell[2] – process of grace, justification, and forgiveness from the sacramental, ecclesial, bodily signifying process in the sacrament. It stands to reason, for instance, that if unbaptized adults believe, hope, and love before being baptized and turn with an inner heart-felt decision toward [214] the God of love, forgiveness, and grace, they are already justified before their baptism. Yet nobody will say: Therefore these adults, who are justified by their subjective acts, should forgo baptism. According to the principle stated above, baptism would be unnecessary, since its purpose is to render persons justified, and since these persons, before their baptism, are already justified, in the state of grace, bound to God in love through grace, and so on. This example, taken from another sacrament, from the most fundamental sacrament, shows that we should not consider the inner process and its outer sacramental embodiment to be two processes lying next to each other without any connection. They must be viewed as an inner unity. The sacramental sign must be the ecclesial incarnation of that which happens in the innermost center of a person's existence.

SACRAMENTAL ACTIVITY AS EMBODIMENT

In other domains too it is true that we almost necessarily translate through bodily expressions the inner sentiments of our heart. We do not simply love each other, we embrace each other,

[2] Existentiell might also be rendered "personally felt." –Translator.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

kiss each other, and perhaps caress each other. We do not in inner secret loathing turn away from some outrage, we clench our fists. We do not merely adore God in the innermost core of our heart, we kneel down before God. In short, our innermost religious life in our relation to God spontaneously has the tendency to embody itself.

For the baptized sinner the fullest ecclesial embodiment of our turning away from guilt, of our turning back to God, is the Church's sacrament of reconciliation. There we not only hear mysteriously, intangibly, with the ears of faith, in the core of our heart, God's gentle word of forgiveness, we also hear with our bodily ears: "Your sins are forgiven." In God's place, commissioned by the Church, the priest causes the Church to make perceptible the intimate spiritual process, which – such is the nature of bodily humanity – has a congenital desire to be embodied.

Of course, this embodiment has many different degrees. When I like somebody I may shake hands with him, pat his back, I may perhaps also embrace him. And two people who love each other, who are really in love with each other, as a married couple, will express this innermost communion of their hearts not only by shaking hands or kissing each other, but in a much more intimate way. This embodiment of the most intimate subjective processes runs the whole gamut of intensities. Thus [215] people may really pray in the Lord's prayer, "forgive us our trespasses," while having the genuine and true awareness, based on their faith, that God forgives them their sins. But they may also express this embodiment of their contrition, their hope of forgiveness, and their confidence in God in a much clearer and more solid way, precisely by having recourse to the sacrament of reconciliation. And even from the purely human point of view, independently of the Church's teaching on sacramental activity, such an expression of a human attitude rooted in our bodily nature not only expresses this inner attitude, but reciprocally it strengthens and deepens it.

When, for instance, two persons who love each other in true communion have in some way offended each other, it may happen – as is often the case in everyday life – that this is settled simply by carrying on as before without mentioning it further. Each party thinks, as it were, "Let bygones be bygones, let's forget it." But it may also happen that such an inner readiness to forgive becomes more radical, more genuine, more determined, if they express their forgiveness to each other. Pascal knew that a gesture expressing humility is not only the expression but also the cause of inner humility. There have been many people who have, as it were, finally had the courage to capitulate in love and hope before God only after kneeling down and not before.

In other words, the sacramental embodiment of contrition and forgiveness between God and humanity serves not only to express the fact of forgiveness in a human incarnational way, it also has the purpose of arousing that inner attitude of which it is a sign and an expression. This is the remarkable thing in human beings, that the body shapes the soul and the soul shapes the body. The inner and outer life are intimately connected, hence that mutual relation between that which in our body expresses our feelings and that which induces them.

SOCIAL DIMENSION OF SIN AND FORGIVENESS

Many more considerations might, of course, be presented, but we cannot take them up here. For instance, the fact that practically, in all minor or major offenses and mistakes, we not only go astray as individuals, but we also assume a social debt. That too, among many other points, should be more carefully considered. Thinking up again a conviction that seemed obvious in the ancient and medieval Church until Luther, the Second Vatican Council taught that ecclesial forgiveness of sins also means our [216] reconciliation with the Church. The sinner offends not only God but also, more or less intensely, the Body of Christ. And this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

offense inflicted on the Body of Christ is forgiven when one turns back to God with sorrow. It is therefore natural that this peace with the Church be embodied in and sealed by an act of the Church.

Much more might be said about this question that refers more to the usefulness of confession for one's supernatural growth, but we cannot do so here. It is a fact that most people clearly and deliberately face their sinfulness only when these sins are acknowledged and forgiven in the sacrament of reconciliation. Christians who lead a really Christian life must, of course, attach great importance to the petition for forgiveness of their sins in the Our Father. They should likewise take part in the confession of sins at the beginning of the eucharistic celebration, even though this is not in the strictest sense a sacramental action. They should occasionally attend a penitential service. Every night, in their evening prayers they should ask God's pardon for their sins, and so on. But individual sacramental confession, even though not imposed by divine law, is a concrete action that helps ordinary Christians to live up to this inner disposition which makes them constantly turn away from sin and turn back to God. The more searching examination of conscience, the possibility of making, on the occasion of such a sacramental confession, what the French call a revision de vie, all these and many other advantages are given with sacramental confession, advantages that Christian should not scorn and by which they may be induced to make use of sacramental confession when they are not strictly obliged to do so.

FREQUENCY OF CONFESSION

The question of the frequency of confession can probably be answered only on an individual basis. It depends on so many things: on the possibility or the practical impossibility of going frequently to confession, on the individual disposition of each person, and on the kind of life each one has to lead and in which more or less serious and numerous occasions of sin may occur. These and other factors make it difficult to suggest a general norm for the frequency of devotional confession. So we will not try to do it. But we will say that we surely may be excused from sacramental confession if, on looking back over a short span of our life, we can say, with some reason, that nothing has happened of which we might seriously repent.

[217] Of course, we may be sorry for more things than the ordinary Christian might consider. There is unkindness, indifference with regard to one's duties, lack of interest for one's environment, lack of care for one's neighbor, for whom one is perhaps responsible. There are such things that spread over a whole life almost unnoticeably. Thus a serious examination of conscience may make it eventually more possible for us seriously to repent and to change than we would suspect in our everyday unfeeling mood. On the other hand, as we said, nobody should feel obliged or bound to go to confession who can really say: "Here and now I really have nothing to repent. My daily life has proceeded so normally, albeit in a rather bourgeois way, that I cannot feel it right now as the proper object of a sacramental accusation."

When we look at both parts of our reflections a few more remarks seem called for. They are, to my knowledge, rarely mentioned or suggested in usual pastoral practice. If lay people (I am speaking of them here) are inclined to receive the sacrament more frequently, even though they are convinced that, strictly speaking they do not need sacramental absolution, they should make a wise choice of confessor. It stands to reason that, although all elements of a sacramental procedure must be present in every confession – examination of conscience, contrition, confession of sin, absolution – in a confession of devotion the emphasis shifts more to the subjective life of the penitent than is the case in the absolution given for a serious sin. In other words, frequent confession merely out of routine, in which practically nothing

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

happens for the subject's inner life, makes no sense as a sacramental activity.

The possibility of taking such a confession of devotion seriously also depends on which confessor one chooses. Ever since the Middle Ages the Church has tried more and more to put a great selection of confessors at the disposal of lay people. While the Fourth Lateran Council still prescribed that the yearly confession be made to the local pastor, the Church in canon law, made it more possible and pastorally feasible to choose a confessor freely. In a confession of devotion as we understand it today, quite correctly to my mind, it is evident that a mere sacramental absolution does not, in this case, make much sense. That is why the inner attitude of the penitent is of decisive importance, and such an attitude may be strongly influenced by a suitable confessor. There have been and there still are, of course, pastors who see in the greatest possible number of absolutions on Saturdays a triumph for their pastoral activity. There used to be Christians, for instance in convents where this was possible, who asked for absolution everyday in the sacrament of reconciliation. [218] Such practices that make no real sense for the life of the soul should be dropped. Ultimately the number of times we receive a sacrament does not matter. And that is why it is also important to choose the right kind of confessor for the correctly understood confession of devotion.

It is really not evident that every priest who has the liturgical and sacramental power of giving absolution is for this reason alone a suitable confessor. We should not exaggerate the effects of a sacrament. I believe that in the pious practice of the last few centuries there have frequently been confessions that were practically invalid. The accusation referred very often to sins which people really, in their heart, did not wish to give up. It followed that there was no real contrition; therefore the absolution was useless and ineffective. This may very often have happened in good faith, yet it is not to be recommended.

A good confessor should occasionally be ready for a serious conversation during confession. He should have an ear for things that have perhaps not been completely stated in the accusation, not in order to discover sins which the penitent would have forgotten or withheld – as happened with Don Bosco – but to discover real difficulties in the penitent's psychic life and to help him or her to the extent of his abilities. The confessor does not have to be a real psychotherapist in the sacrament. He has before him a penitent who is looking for forgiveness from God and the Church, not for psychotherapeutic advice. This may be quite true, yet the priest should not be an absolution-machine, because this makes no sense and is of no use. It contradicts the nature of a sacrament, in which, according to the doctrine of Saint Thomas, the person's inner personal collaboration is an inner element of sacramental activity and not merely a preparation for it. How can one find such a confessor? How should one speak to him in confession so that he may really be of help? The answers to these questions differ according to the penitent's different situations, and we cannot give any precise answers and directives

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[219-221]

VOLUME 23

LIST OF SOURCES

ANXIETY AND CHRISTIAN TRUST IN THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVE
Published in Christlicher Glaube in moderner Gesellschaft, vol. 9 (Freiburg i Br., 1981), pp. 86-98. This is the second part of an article, "Angst und christliches Vertrauen," of which M. Boss wrote the first part.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND THE CHRISTIAN
Written with T. Cremer, published in Atomrüstung-christlich zu verantworten?, edited by A. Battke (Dusseldorf, 1982), pp. 98-115.

PLEA FOR A NAMELESS VIRTUE
Published in Mut zur Tugend: Von der Fähigkeit, menschlicher zu leben (Festschrift for R. Scherer), edited by K. Rahner and B. Welte (Freiburg, 1980), pp. 11-18. Main title of essay: "Die Spannung austragen zwischen Leben und Denken."

INTELLECTUAL PATIENCE WITH OURSELVES
Lecture delivered on 13 May 1982 in Tübingen upon bestowal of the Dr. Leopold Lucas Prize; previously unpublished.

A BASIC THEOLOGICAL AND ANTHROPOLOGICAL UNDERSTANDING OF OLD AGE
Published in Nochmals glauben lernen: Sinn und Chancen des Alters, edited by M. Schmid and W. Kirchschläger (Innsbruck, 1982), pp. 9-21. Main title of essay: "Lebensstationen im 20. Jahrhundert."

AUTHORITY
Published in Christlicher G1aube in moderner Gesellschaft, vol. 14 (Freiburg i. Br., 1982), pp. 5-36.

THE SITUATION OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS SINCE ITS DIFFICULTIES WITH THE VATICAN
Lecture on 14 April 1982 in Freising at a symposium of the South German Province of the Society of Jesus; previously unpublished.

DIMENSIONS OF MARTYRDOM
Published in Concilium 18 (1983) 174-76.

EUCHARISTIC WORSHIP
Published in Geist und Leben 54 (1981) 188-91.

DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART TODAY
Published in Korrespondenzblatt des Canisianums 116 (1/1982/83) 2-8.

COURAGE FOR DEVOTION TO MARY
Published in Geist und Leben 56 (1983) 163-73. In part identical to "Die Gemeinschaft der

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Heiligen und die Heligenverehrung," in Die Heiligen heute ehren: Eine theologisch-pastorale Handreichnung, edited by W. Beinert (Freiburg, 1983), pp. 233-42.

UNDERSTANDING CHRISTMAS
Published as the Foreword to "Fürchtet euch nicht": Das Weihnachtsgeschehen in Zeugnissen der abendländischen Kultur, edited by K. Gröning (Munich, 1983), pp. 11-19, largely derived from K. Rahner, Die Gabe der Weihnacht (Freiburg i. Br., 1980), and K. Rahner, Gott ist Mensch geworden (Freiburg i. Br., 1975).

THE THEOLOGY OF THE RELIGIOUS MEANING OF IMAGES
Lecture of 10 November 1983 in Munich; published in the biannual publication of the German Society for Christian Art, Munich (5/1983) 2-8.

ART AGAINST THE HORIZON OF THEOLOGY AND PIETY
Published in Entschluß 37 (1/1982) 4-7, under the title "Nicht jeder Künstler ist ein Heiliger: Zur Theologie der Kunst."

AGAINST THE WITCH HYSTERIA
Published in Geist und Leben 56 (1983) 284-91; also in Friedrich Spee im Licht der Wissenschaften, edited by A. Arens (Trier, 1984).

FAITH AND SACRAMENT
Published in Fides Sacramenti: Sacramentum Fidei (Festschrift for P. Smulders), edited by H. J. Auf der Mauer et al. (Assen, 1981), pp. 245-52, under the title "Kleine theologische Reflexion über die gegenseitige Beziehung von Glaube und Sakrament."

QUESTIONS ON THE THEOLOGY OF SACRAMENTS
Published in Entschluß 38 (11/1983) 6, 8-9. Main title of essay: "Das endgültige und siegreiche Zusagewort für die Welt."

BAPTISM AND THE RENEWAL OF BAPTISM
Published in Entschluß 37 (9/10/1982) 6-11. Main title of essay: "Das göttliche Feuer in sich lebendig halten."

THE STATUS OF THE SACRAMENT OF RECONCILIATION
Published in Entschluß 35(9/10/1980) 4-12. Main title of essay: "Warum man trotzdem beichten soll."

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

AKKR	Archiv für Katholisches Kirchenrecht
ASS	Acta Apostolicae Sedis
Am. Eccl. Rev.	American Ecclesiastical Review
Arch T. Gran	Archivo Teologico Granadino
Bijdr.	Bijdragen
Blätter f. d. Philos.	Blätter für die Philosophie
Bull. Thom.	Bulletin Thomiste
CIC	Codex Iuris Canonici
Coll. Theol.	Collectanea Theologica
CSEL	Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum
DAFC	Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique
DDC	Dictionnaire de Droit Canoigue
Denz.	Denzinger-Rahner, Enchiridion Symbolorum (1953)
DS	Denzinger Schönmetzer, Enchiridion Symbolorum
DSAM	Dictionnaire de Spiritualité Ascétique et Mystique
DTC	Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique
D. Th.	Divus Thomas
Estud. Eccl.	Estudios Ecclesiasticos
ETL	Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses
Franz. Stud	Franziskaner Studien
GCS	Griechische Christliche Schrifttsteller
Greg.	Gregorianum
GuL	Geist und Leben
LTK	Lexicn für Theologie und Kirche (2nd ed.)
Mar.	Marianum. Ephemerides Mariologicae
Münch. Theol. Z.	Münchener Theolgische Zeitschrift
NRT	Nouvelle Revue Théologique
PG	Patrologiae graecae, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1844-)
Phil. Jahrb. D. Görreges.	Philologisches Jahrbuch der Görresgesellschaft
PL	Patrologiae latinae, ed. J.P. Migne (Paris 1857-)
RAM	Revue d'Ascétique et Mystique
Rev. Dioc. Nam.	Revue Diocésaine de Namur
Rev M. A. Lat.	Revue du Moyen Age Latin
Rev. Univ. Ottawa	Revue d l'Université d'Ottawa
RGG	Die Religion in Geschicte und Gegenwart
RSPT	Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Théologiques
RSR	Recherches de Science Religieuse
RT	Revue Thomiste
Sc. Eccl.	Sciences Ecclésiastiques
Schol.	Scholastik
Stud. Cath	Studia Catholica
Stud. Gen.	Studia Generalia
Theol. Lit. Z.	Theologische Literaturzeitung
Th. Gl.	Theologie und Glaube

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ThPQ	Theologische Praktische Quartalschrift
Th. Rv.	Theologische Revue
TQ	Theologische Quartalschrift
TS	Theological Studies
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen
Tüb. Th. Quartalschrift	Tübinge Theologische Quartalschrift
TWNT	Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Kittel)
Wi. Wei.	Wissenschaft und Weisheit
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte
ZKT	Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie
Z. Phil. Forsch	Zeitschrift der Philosophischen Forschung