© The Centre for Culture, Technology and Values.

Welcome to the works of Karl Rahner, presented by the Centre for Culture, Technology and values at Mary Immaculate College, Limerick. Visit our website at http://cctv.mic.ul.ie/

If you are new to Adobe Acrobat® Reader please read the getting started guide below.

Comprehensive instructions are available through the help menu above under 'Adobe Reader Essentials'.

Getting Started:

This section of the screen is the reading pane. This is where the text is displayed.
To the left is the bookmark pane. The bookmark pane can be used to navigate through the text:

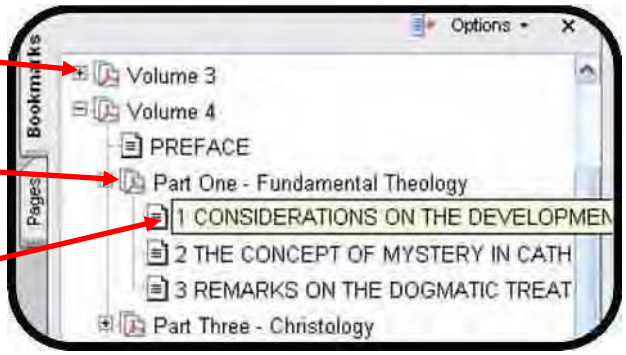
Double click on the volume name to view the parts/chapters in that volume.
Double click on the part name to view the chapters in that part.

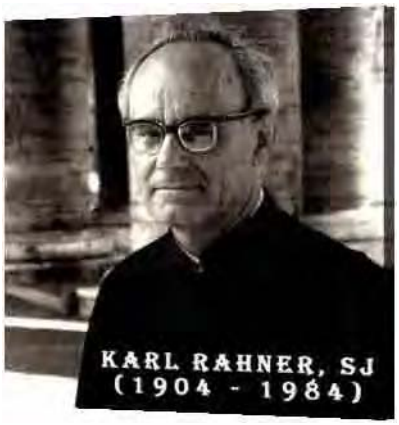
Click on the chapter name to view each chapter in the reading pane.

Volume Name (Double Click)

Part Name (Double Click)

Chapter Name (Click)





Use the scrollbar to the right to advance through the pages. Alternatively use the page controls at the bottom of the screen:

The reading pane and bookmark pane can be resized. Move the mouse to the divide between the panes. When the hand cursor: changes to the resize cursor: click and drag the divide to resize the panes.

Use the zoom controls to magnify the document in the reading pane:

The search button: Search can be used to search for keywords or phrases in the text.

When printing please ensure you enter the correct page range and number of pages or the entire works will be printed each time. Full information is available through the help menu above.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CITING THE THEOLOGICAL INVESTIGATIONS

This edition reproduces, with permission, that first published in London by Darton, Longman and Todd, as follows: volume 1, translated by Cornelius Ernst OP (1961); volume 2, translated by Karl-H. Kruger (1963); volume 3, translated by Karl-H. and Boniface Kruger (1967); volume 4, translated by Kevin Smyth (1966); volume 5, translated by Karl-H. Kruger (1966); volume 6, translated by Karl-H. and Boniface Kruger (1969); volume 7, translated by David Bourke (1971); volume 8, translated by David Bourke (1971); volume 9, translated by Graham Harrison (1972); volume 10, translated by David Bourke (1973); volume 11, translated by David Bourke (1974); volume 12, translated by David Bourke (1974); volume 13, translated by David Bourke (1975); volume 14, translated by David Bourke (1976); volume 15, translated by Lionel Swain (1983); volume 16, translated by David Morland OSB (1979); volume 17, translated by Margaret Kohl (1981); volume 18, translated by Edward Quinn (1984); volume 19, translated by Edward Quinn (1984); volume 20, translated by Edward Quinn (1981); volume 21, translated by Hugh M. Riley (1988); volume 22, translated by Joseph Donceels SJ (1991); volume 23, translated by Joseph Donceels SJ and Hugh M. Riley (1992). The present electronic edition had the full publication details: Limerick, Ireland: Mary Immaculate College, University of Limerick Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, 2004.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

INTRODUCTION

The author of the studies presented here in translation is perhaps the most influential theologian in German-speaking Catholicism today. Some indication of his authority in the world of theology is the fact that he is the present editor of Denzinger's Enchiridion Symbolorum, and co-editor of the new Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche now in course of publication. The editorship of standard works of reference such as these is a guarantee that Fr Rahner possesses one of the essential qualifications of a theologian: a detailed and thorough acquaintance with the sources of theology in the teaching of the Church as this has been propounded throughout her history, not only in the first centuries of her existence but by her living voice today. For Fr Rahner is profoundly aware of that fundamental teaching laid down by Pius XII in the Encyclical Humani Generis, that God has given his Church, together with the sources of Revelation in Scripture and Tradition, a living magisterium for the authentic interpretation of the deposit of faith (cf. Denz 3014).

As the reader will see in these studies, the Catholic theologian's sense of the living utterance of the Church here and now need not be merely a recognition that he has always an external court of appeal to which he must submit his private speculations, as though his faith and his endeavours to deepen and articulate it were fundamentally a private affair though of course subject to some external restraint. Far more than this, the Catholic theologian must be deeply aware, as Fr Rahner is, that his faith is the faith of the Church, that his life of faith, as this is manifested in his theological activity, is a participation in the life and faith of the Church, so that his 'private' and personal life is a manifestation of the Spirit in the open and the 'public' Church. And this is Fr Rahner's second qualification as a theologian. For while he is a professional theologian in the strongest sense of the word, acquainted with the sources and with the writings of other theologians past and [vi] present, and normally engaged in the teaching of theology, he is also a man of the Church, no mere academic figure for whom theology is just one specialized study among others, but a theologian who precisely as a theologian recognizes that his specialized study demands a special obedience in faith and love to the living and authoritative voice of the Church here and now, since his own special task is to receive that teaching as fully and precisely as possible and transmit it and proclaim it to the world and the Church in the world here and now. His very status as 'private theologian', not immediately associated with the authoritative teaching Church in the successors of the Apostles, is a status in the public Church, his personal task of investigation and articulation a task only to be fulfilled in the hierarchical community of the Church.

Consequently the theologian's work will only be of value if it is an independently personal contribution to that historical process by which the community of the Church realizes herself in the world and the world in herself. The theologian's fidelity to the teaching Church can never be the purely passive acceptance, the mechanical registration, of a corpus of doctrine which is definitively dead because it is definitively closed in the past and has nothing to look forward to in the future. Certainly we hold that the Church received her final form and content with the death of the last Apostle; but that form was a living form, the form of a reality living with a more than biological life, whose unity and continuity are guaranteed by the assistance of the Spirit of Christ. The life of the Church is at least the life of an historical community, nourished by the Spirit: that is to say, it is an organized life which realizes itself through a process of generation in time, it is in continual 'happening'. And the happening is both personal and directed. It is personal, because like any human historical happening it takes place in and is affected by the personal life of spiritual beings and their institutions. It is directed, because it is conducted consciously or unconsciously under the guidance of the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Spirit who leads all things into the truth of Christ as this will be realized in a here and now at the Second Coming: the living voice of the magisterium is a manifestation of that living guidance. The theologian's life must be independently personal because it would otherwise cease to be human; but it is independently personal within the historical life of the community of the Church. Historical happening is not an unfortunate accident with which the Church must put up as best she may: it is the very mode of [vii] the Church's existence in the human beings who are brought into her historical community by the Spirit of the Christ who was and is her founder and head. Fr Rahner's 'originality' as a theologian is the creativeness of a thinker whose very remarkable resources as a human person have found expression in the historical growth of the Church. Human creativeness is at the very least the 'material' of the Church's history, however often it may unfortunately have been the case that it has set up tensions within her community at any given time which, by the impatience and pride of the creative spirits or the uncomprehending intransigence of the individuals who exercised her authority, or both, have never been resolved and have resulted in heresy and schism.

The Church's historical happening, we have said, is a realization of herself in the world and the world in herself. Her happening is not just a strand in the complex web of human history: it is rather, we may say, the figure in the carpet, reminding ourselves again that we are the carpet, that we by our active historical lives constitute the texture of history. We may conveniently regard Fr Rahner's theological work from these two points of view, as contributing to the Church's realization of herself in the world, and as contributing to the realization of the world in the Church.

The realization of the Church in the world is the continuous process by which she re-presents to the world the saving event of Christ's Death and Resurrection by tradition and sacrament. The Event was an historical event in the dimension of all created being; and it is the task and the mission of the Church to bring home to the world the Event both in its meaning and in its effectual cosmic consequences. From the earliest times of the Church, even in the inspired documents of the New Testament, we may see that the mission of communicating to the world the meaning of the Event has involved reflexion upon that meaning, primarily a searching of the Scriptures. Theology is still reflexion upon the meaning of the Event; still primarily a searching of the Scriptures, it is also a searching of the historical life of the Church as it has brought that meaning to light in various manifestation. The theologian's chief task is to explore that meaning in and for itself; his professionalism consists in a 'mastery of the sources', which is the continuous endeavour to make those sources the springs of his own life of faith, and so to display them in an ordered whole that each feeds the other and contributes to the intelligibility, at once complex [viii] and simple, of the whole. The first study in these two volumes, and the sketch for a new treatment of dogmatic theology which follows it, show how deeply Fr Rahner has meditated on the synthetic scope of a theology which would be adequate to our need today for an intelligible grasp of the meaning of the Event. The particular studies which follow range so widely that Fr J. Hamer seems to be right in suggesting that Fr Rahner has deliberately taken up one by one all or most of the problems which arise for the Catholic in the modern world.[1] But while it is true that in most cases the questions have already been asked, the 'problematic' determined in advance, so that the theologian's business would seem to be no more than a choice of one or other of the available answers, no one can fail to observe in Fr Rahner's studies at least an awareness of the possibility of asking different questions, questions which have not been asked before. He has indeed more than once asked, and offered an answer to, new questions, often surprisingly new questions.

It is this openness to the pressure of new questions and the capacity to formulate them

[1] 'Bulletin de théologie dogmatique', RSPT XLI (1957), p. 552.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which constitutes Fr Rahner's contribution to what has here been called the realization of the world in the Church. In a providential economy whose character is shaped by the Incarnation, historical happening must take the form of a conversatio, a traffic between Church and world. If divine providence is to be regarded as being at work not only in the past but also now and for the future, then secular history, the history of what is not Church, must also somehow have its relevance in the total course of human history in the divine dispensation. The relevance need not always take the form of an indigence, a deviation into the emptiness of error and sin; it can also have the form of a 'partial plenitude', an achievement whose whole meaning can only be discovered when it is assumed into the sacred history of the Church. But whichever form this relevance takes, it is part of the theologian's task to discern and to disclose it; and this he can only do if he is open to the world to the full extent of his powers, allowing always for his own weakness, and conscious often of the need for prudence in so exposing himself – not every theologian can undergo and satisfy every one of the world's needs, not every theologian can provide in himself an arena for the total triumph of the victorious truth of Christ. It seems to me that Fr Rahner's greatest [ix] virtue as a theologian is that he has been able to undergo and bring to luminous manifestation in the Church so many and such profound needs of the world which is not the Church, to contribute so largely to the realization of the world in the Church. No reader of the studies here translated can fail to admire the astonishing generosity of mind and heart which Fr Rahner brings to his activity as a theologian.

And yet it is here, unfortunately, that the English reader is likely to find Fr Rahner most difficult.[2] It is true enough that in a large sense the spiritual needs of the world today are the same everywhere, and in a still larger sense that they are the same as the needs of the world yesterday; but it must be confessed that the English-speaking world has not been especially concerned to admit the existence of these needs, and that American and still more English Catholicism has largely tended to ignore them. It is difficult to regard the English cultural scene, either inside or outside the Church, without a sense of dissatisfaction often amounting to an exasperated despair.[3] But this is not the place in which to examine the blinkered complacency of so much English philosophy and letters, or the curiously freakish eccentricity of the few attempts which have been made to disturb it; after all, any such examination would also have to recognize the genuine sanity and civilized good manners which is so attractive a feature of English culture, and the almost total lack of these virtues (so it would seem) in continental culture. The relevant fact is that English, and to a lesser extent American, culture has become exceedingly remote from continental culture; and this presents considerable problems in attempting to make available to English readers the work of a theologian who is acutely sensitive to the issues which engage so profoundly the existence of European man.

The key word here is perhaps 'existential'; it is at least a word which the reader of these studies will meet fairly frequently. Although the word itself does not occur in the following extremely penetrating [x] delineation of a tendency common to both philosophy and theology on the Continent today, the approach described by the writer may fairly be called for the moment 'existentialist'. In a footnote to the discussion of a passage from Heidegger's Was heisst Denken?, the writer remarks:

> In this text there comes to the fore in a very striking way an essential aspect of the [2] While apologizing for the personal reference, I feel bound to point out here that, in spite of my name, I have never been to Germany, and my German ancestry is extremely remote, whatever atavistic tendencies the reader may detect.

[3] The trivialization of Wittgenstein by English philosophers is a case in point. What Wittgenstein himself felt about this may be seen from some of the remarks quoted by N. Malcolm, in Ludwig Wittgenstein. A Memoir (1958).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

> present-day picture of man. Man's future is no longer conceived of in terms of what he is, from his eternal nature; but what man is is rather conceived of in terms of the future to which he is directed. Transcendence is no longer conceived of in terms of being, but being in terms of transcendence. We find this kind of thinking in Heidegger, Jaspers, Sartre and their followers, and in Merleau-Ponty. ... A point of contact, so it seems to us, is to be found here between modern philosophy and modern theology. The latter, it would seem, conceives of man in terms of his future as this is revealed in Christ; it sees more and more in Christ the revelation of what we really are.[4]

How many English readers, it may be wondered, will respond sympathetically to this passage? And yet there can be no doubt that it does represent, both in itself and in what it describes, the dominant movement of continental thought; perhaps the fact that it is a Dutch writer we have quoted will help to bring this home: similar discussions may be found in Spanish publications. When, a few years ago, 'Existentialism' became briefly fashionable as a topic of conversation at Oxford sherry parties or in Bloomsbury pubs, it had all the limited interest of a freakish intruder upon the urbane insularity of English culture. Potted introductions to 'Existentialism' poured into print, and caused hardly a ripple on the broad, smooth surface of English sensibility. No single writer of any importance gave any serious attention to what was there offered; and perhaps the most significant episode in this little blind-alley of history was the delivery and publication of Marcel's Gifford lectures on The Mystery of Being. It is not without interest that the translation of Marcel's Metaphysical Journal which followed some time after is now being remaindered in bookshops up and down the country. Protestant interest in Bultmann's work on the New [xi] Testament and 'demythologization' has led to some attention being given to Heidegger, chiefly in Scotland.[5] But on the whole it is fair to say that for the great majority of English readers, 'Existentialism' is associated with the exotic and the queer, a continental 'new look'. Catholic readers suffer from the further handicap of being dimly aware that 'Existentialism' has somehow been officially condemned, though they are not very clear about what exactly has been condemned or in what terms. It can categorically be stated that this condemnation has no application whatsoever in the present case.[6] It would not even be true to say that Fr Rahner is an 'Existentialist' theologian: it would be far less true to call him an 'Existentialist' theologian than it would be to call St Thomas an 'Aristotelian' theologian. It would in fact be an odd sort of theologian who simply took over a philosophy ready-made and somehow applied it to revealed sources. Philosophy for the theologian can never be simply a technique of demonstration but also a process of discovery, a critique.

What has been said so far in this discussion of Existentialism in England has been intended

---

[4] R. C. Kwant, 'De Historie en het Absolute', Tijdschrift voor Philosophie XVII (1955), p. 256.

[5] The S.C.M. Press has published a thoroughly honest study of Bultmann and Heidegger, An Existentialist Theology, by John Macquarrie (1955); a translation by Dr Olive Wyon of a more specialized study of demythologization, The Christian Message and Myth (1958), by Fr L. Malevez, S.J.; and a translation of Heidegger's first major work, Sein und Zeit, is announced, some thirty years after its first publication in Germany. The remarkable series of translations of Kierkegaard should also be mentioned here. Other publications could be listed, but this is hardly the place in which to provide a bibliography of Existentialist writing in English.

[6] The relevant documents of the magisterium are: (1) the condemnation of the opera omnia of Sartre, AAS XL (1948), p. 571, and Clergy Review XXXI (1949), pp. 59-60; (2) the Encyclical Humani Generis (cf. Denz 3006, 3023); (3) the allocutio to the Fédération Mondiale des Jeunesses Féminines Catholiques concerning Situationsethik, AAS XLIV (1952), p. 413, and Clergy Review XXXVII (1952), p. 619. For a comprehensive discussion of what is involved in the references to Existentialism made by Humani Generis, see A. Dondeyne, 'Les Problèmes philosophiques soulevés dans l'Encyclique "Humani Generis"', Revue Philosophique de Louvain XLIX (1951), pp. 5-56, 141-88, 293-356.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to bring into the open the problem of presenting to an English audience the contributions of a continental theologian to the Church's mission of realizing the world in herself. Fr Rahner's openness to the world involves a good deal more than a sympathy for Existentialism; but since the English reader is likely to [xii] find some of his language puzzling, it seems worthwhile to draw attention to its sources and also – though this is even more difficult – to provide a context in which that language has some depth of meaning. It would obviously be impossible to present here, even if I were competent to do so, a survey of the whole field of Existentialist writing; and in any case a survey of this kind would remain external to the real movement of thought out of which the language developed. On the other hand it might be profitable to suggest the kind of question which has been put and variously answered on the Continent during the last thirty years, in the hope that it will provide an exercise in communication, contribute to a community of spirit, between English and continental theologians.

Since this exercise is not to be a piece of history, some historical remarks should be made beforehand. Firstly, our English word 'Existentialism' should properly be applied only to the French movement associated with Sartre in particular: since 'Existentialism' first reached England from France it has unfortunately been usual to speak of all the writers who concern themselves with 'existence' as 'Existentialists'; the German term for the movement is Existenzphilosophie, the philosophy of existence.[7] However, it is often convenient to use a single word rather than a phrase, and I have made no attempt to be consistent in this matter. Secondly, within the German movement there have been and are marked divergences of approach and emphasis. It is Heidegger's approach that we shall primarily have in mind, since it seems clear that Fr Rahner has found most to interest him in this particular tendency of the movement. But thirdly, Heidegger's own work falls into two fairly distinct phases, roughly before and after 1940. To the first phase belong the major work Sein und Zeit and a very remarkable book on Kant; to the second phase a number of smaller pieces, chiefly lectures and essays.[8] It is, I think, fair to say [xiii] that Fr Rahner's writings reflect an engagement with the earlier rather than with the later phase of Heidegger's development. The first edition of Fr Rahner's book Geist in Welt, a study of St Thomas's metaphysics of knowledge, dates from 1939; and he explains in the Preface to the second edition (Munich 1957) that the original work was in fact completed in 1936. It is in this work that Fr Rahner made explicit a philosophical position within the Thomist tradition which was a response to the whole movement of German thought from Kant to Heidegger by way of Hegel; and the philosophical density of his theological studies (notably the essay on Christology in this volume) is not to be fully appreciated without reference to this extremely difficult and yet rewarding statement of position.[9]

---

[7] A brief but authoritative history of the German movement may be found in O. F. Bollnow's introduction to his select bibliography Deutsche Existenzphilosophie, fascicule 23 of the Bibliographische Einführungen in das Studium der Philosophie, Berne, 1953. Fascicule 9, by R. Jolivet, deals with the French movement.

[8] An excellent study of this later phase will be found in A. Dondeyne, 'La Différence ontologique chez M. Heidegger', Revue Philosophique de Louvain, LVI (1958), pp. 35-62, 251-93. See also A. de Waelhens, Phénoménologie et Vérité (Paris, 1953).

[9] This is not to say that I can wholly accept it. In fact, I am prepared to say that, as far as I can understand it, the foundation laid down by Fr Rahner is wholly unacceptable, however interesting the developments upon this foundation may be. What I take to be the foundation runs as follows: 'Erkennen ist Beisichsein des Seins, und dieses Beisichsein ist das Sein des Seienden', 'knowledge is the being-present-to-itself of Being, and this being-present-to-itself is the Being of any entity' (p. 82). I have translated 'any entity', because this is in fact what Fr Rahner maintains, with the utmost seriousness and cogency. Put in colourful terms, this amounts to saying that every entity (every material entity too) is a more or less deficient angel. My main objection to this approach is that what is said cannot be said if the Thomist thesis which the book is supposed to be maintaining is true, namely that our metaphysical knowledge derives from our experience of the world, or, putting it in Fr Rahner's (and Heidegger's) terms, that our 'ontological' knowledge derives from our 'ontic' knowledge. It is not without

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must all of us at some time or other, in some situation or other, have asked ourselves the question, 'What does it all mean?' We should not ordinarily expect an immediate answer when we ask this question: it is not the same question as 'What does it mean?', which we might ask in some limited context, e.g. a passage in a foreign language. When we ask 'What does it all mean?' we reject, by using the [xiv] word 'all', the ordinary limitation of the context; we are generalizing the question. In fact the situation in which we put ourselves the generalized question is frequently one of loss or injury or sin: a death, a disloyalty – the characteristically 'tragic' situations, exploited in a familiar way by Shakespeare. More rarely, we might ask the question after experiencing some great joy or happiness; but only after the experience, for the experience of joy is itself the answer to a question, the satisfaction of the need to ask the question.

But are these situations in any way metaphysically privileged, or have we here merely a sort of exclamation, a cry of pain, the registration of a private 'experience'? It will only be possible to adopt this psychological solution, and so to answer the question by explaining it away, if we assume that, for a human being, to be in a situation is as obvious as for a dog to be in a kennel or a pea in a pod. For scholastic philosophy 'the soul' is only in place per accidens; but unless we are careful to recreate the philosophical meaning of 'soul', this statement may simply leave us with an image of something not-body 'located' in the body but only vaguely located there. It is important to renew this notion of soul by regarding it as the principle which makes possible and actual the kind of being-in-a-situation which is proper to human beings, i.e. we must start from human being-in-a-situation and work back to the 'soul', and not vice versa. We 'inhabit' the earth, we dwell 'in' cities by creating organs and tools of inhabitation which we share in community with others. We only behave humanly in situations because we have made situations possible by being human; our actual behaviour in a situation is a particularization of the human possibility of being-in-a-situation. The fundamental actualization of our human existence, we may say, is being-in-a-situation. Thus while the human body, just like any other body, is really located in space and time, it is also true that the actualization of a human body which can be located in a spatio-temporal system of reference is the actualization of a system of reference which includes spatio-temporal axes of reference as a special part. This larger and indefinitely extensible system of reference is the possibility of situation, of 'world', which is to say civilization, art, morality, religion, science. It may once have been possible to identify this human 'world' with the cosmos; but we can now see that this identification was properly a mythical reconciliation of inner and outer, we no longer live under the vault of heaven but in an historical culture. The fundamental actualization of human existence [xv] is the generation of meaning. 'O' as printed is a shape; it is also a nought or a letter of the alphabet, and it could be neither of the latter without being the former. But we do not ordinarily, nor need we, advert to the shape when we use the sign: we do not advert to the given world when, by actively inhabiting it, we use it as the sign of a human world. Anima est magis continens quam contenta.

The move from situation to the possibility of situation is characteristic of Heidegger's philosophy. We are in fact in situations, situations which do not merely succeed each other but involve each other and develop one out of the other, forming a biography, a more or less significant, more or less coherent growth not simply 'up and down' (Aristotle saw that 'up and down' were biological orientations), but in a dimension of human 'existence' in which significance that Fr Rahner apologizes in one place (p. 87) for appealing to experience for the existence of entities which are not themselves capable of knowing. I very much doubt whether the convertibility of Being and intelligibility can be made the subject of thematic treatment, whether it can ever be more than a disclosure within an act of discovery, remaining always then a horizon of our understanding: the light of this disclosure is what enables us to use the language of participation. However, it is really improper to comment so briefly on a major philosophical work, especially since I cannot pretend to have wholly assimilated it.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

meaning is generated, co-ordinated, condensed or dispersed, renewed and authenticated or conventionalized and trivialized. But to inquire into the possibility of this 'existence' is to raise the 'transcendental' question, in Kant's sense[10]: this is the existenzial as opposed to the existenziell question[11] and the inquiry which attempts explicitly to discuss this existenzial or transcendental question of the possibility of human existence as a generation of meaning is 'fundamental ontology'.

The word 'ontology' should remind us that by philosophizing in this way we are continually concerned with one single question, the question of the meaning of Being, die Frage nach dem Sinn von Sein, as Heidegger has never ceased to insist, although with rather different emphasis in his first and second phases. We cannot disclose, make apparent, the existenzial basis which makes our existenziell existence possible except by exhibiting or expounding (phenomenologically) the concealed orientations latent in this existence, but it is this actual being manifesting itself as already orientated which is the subject of our exposition. The exposition discloses what Heidegger calls 'Existenzialien', Fr Rahner (more in accordance with German inflexion) 'Existentialien', existentials, which are these latent orientations [xvi] of human existence, corresponding to the 'categories' of traditional ontology. They are not particularized phenomena of human existence but the a priori conditions in order that human existence should exhibit particularized phenomena; and again they are not a priori conditions in the sense of ultimate propositional formulations but the modalities of the ontological structure of human existence itself. Thus when Fr Rahner speaks of a 'supernatural existential', what he has in mind is a modality of human existence as this is concretely realized in an economy within which by God's free decision this existence is ordained to supernatural beatitude – a modality prior, that is, to its particularization as either grace or damnation. It should be clear that an 'existential' is an ontological and not a moral determination. There are indeed privileged situations in the existenziell order in which the questionability of our human existence is obscurely revealed; but the existenzial point is the possibility of asking the question at all, 'What does it all mean?' How is it that I am in a situation at all? Why is there Being at all and not rather nothing? What is the intrinsic, not extrinsic, meaning of Being?

Being-in-a-situation is an event, the happening (Geschehen) of a revelation, and it is the unfolding of this revelation which constitutes history (Geschichte). The revelation of the truth of Being, the event and the happening of truth, has been the particular theme of the later Heidegger. It has been very well said that while in his earlier writings Heidegger started from human existence (Dasein) in order to reach the truth of Being, in his later writings he starts from Being in order to reach an interpretation of man in which man is called to be the guardian and the 'shepherd' of the truth of Being.[12] But in both earlier and later writings the truth of Being is presented as revelation, disclosure: an event and a happening, the inexhaustible fertility of which constitutes human historicity as the manifestation of that secret communion with and in Being which is latent in being-in-a-situation, being there (Da-sein). Being in for human existence is essentially being out, ek-sistence into history. In this sense it is 'project' towards a horizon, the transcendental limit of a total situation whose circumscribing finitude is foreshadowed in the light of the revelation. Once human inwardness in no longer sustained by the myth of a hierarchical [xvii] cosmos of the spheres

[10] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Introduction au concept de philosophie existenziale chez Heidegger', RSR XXX (1940), pp. 152-71. This is perhaps the place to point out that there are two Rahners, Karl and Hugo, both members of the Society of Jesus, both Professors (of Dogmatic Theology and Church History respectively) at Innsbruck, both of whom have written on Origen.

[11] I have only distinguished these two words in the translation when it seemed specially important to do so.

[12] Walter Biemel, Le Concept de monde chez Heidegger (Louvain-Paris 1950), p. 86.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

beyond which is God, its ultimate revelation tends to be one of self-enclosed finitude; but there is no reason why we should not learn to seek God as the source of that marriage of man and earth which is consummated in the Event of truth, and which can serve as the sacramental sign of the revelation of the divine Truth itself. Our encounter with a Man can be the revelation of God; our inhabitation of the earth can be and is a sacred history. We are not merely the spectators of a cosmic play, with God behind the scenes as stage-manager and producer; we are the actors and God is our author.[13]

I am keenly aware of the inadequacies of this attempt to put the philosophical question which engages the concern of philosophers on the Continent today. And I am aware too that in spite of its inadequacy it is still quite out of proportion to the proper part played by philosophical concerns in Fr Rahner's studies. My excuse must once again be that the style of these concerns is what English readers are going to find most disconcerting in the studies, and that an introduction to Fr Rahner's work must give it special attention. The philosophy of existence is important for Fr Rahner, as it should be for us, because it has given explicit formulation to that sense of his own being as deeply questionable which is characteristic of man in the modern world; and it is to this man in this world that the old appeal to be converted and to turn to the living God must be addressed.[14]

It will be appreciated that the translation of these studies has been a matter of the utmost difficulty. Fr Rahner naturally assumes a familiarity with scholastic and modern theology, Biblical and speculative, Protestant and Catholic theology, as well as with the philosophy [xviii] of existence.15 The German language still enjoys, in scientific usage anyway, the fluidity which made Elizabethan and Jacobean prose and drama possible, and Fr Rahner exploits its resources to the full. For instance, it is always possible, at least in technical literature, to domesticate a Latin word by the simple process of giving it a German termination, thus practically doubling one's vocabulary. By a process of 'agglutination' pretty well any complex of thought can be presented as a single concept, so that each writer tends to develop his private vocabulary. While this latter process certainly increases and intensifies the expressiveness, the 'pregnancy',16 of the writing, it does not always promote clarity. Fr J. M. Oesterreicher, now an American citizen though an Austrian by origin, once gave me an instructive example of this from his own experience, which I hope he will forgive me for repeating. While still thinking and speaking in German he evolved a statement, die Juden sind ein Menschheitsvolk (literally, 'The Jews are a humanity people') which seemed to him to sum up pregnantly all he wanted to say. Looking back on that statement now, he claims that he is unable to say which of three possible English meanings he intended it to have. The translation of these studies has frequently involved selective interpretation. Again, Fr Rahner delights in the relatively highly differentiated accidence of German which allows [13] Sooner or later someone is going to write a book called Wittgenstein and Heidegger. It would be a book very well worth writing, its main theme being the way in which these two very different philosophers have overcome the division (which is an existential as well as a 'philosophical' one) between inner and outer.

[14] It has been suggested by Fr John F. Sweeney, S.J., in a review of the German edition of this work ('Some Recent Developments in Dogmatic Theology', TS XVII (1956), pp. 375-80) that the anthropological preoccupations of the modern world do not favour new developments in theology, and there is some truth in this observation. And yet anthropological preoccupations are surely at least as relevant to an Incarnational economy as cosmological ones, but no one would wish to deny the importance of Aristotelian cosmology in scholastic theology.

[15] For instance, the notion of 'Heilsgeschichte', normally translated here by 'saving history', since it refers not merely to the historical record of salvation but to the actual happening of salvation, its manifest incarnation in event.

[16] For a simple example, without 'agglutination', of 'pregnancy' we may take das Wort, which I have frequently translated 'the Word' even when no reference is being made to the Second Person of the Trinity. Eighteenth-century English was much more lavish with capital letters than we are.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the construction of long periodic sentences: one of his sentences in these studies runs to twenty-five lines of print. It has constantly been necessary to rethink and recast a great part of what he has written. I have in general assumed a serious reading public willing to put up with awkwardness and 'heaviness' for the sake of what Fr Rahner has to offer. The 'Scheme for a new Treatise of Dogmatic Theology' was only included after much anxious reflexion, because this formidable list of apocalyptic titles and headings proved quite intractable to the process of 'solution' which can generally be adopted in translating a continuous passage. The final decision to include it, as well as to [xix] persevere with a number of the studies,[17] was only taken in virtue of a principle which I think Mr T. S. Eliot once stated about 'difficulty' in poetry, and which applies to Mr Eliot's own poetry too: that 'difficulty' can be tolerated (and will eventually not be felt as such) if a first reading gives sufficient guarantee of the real worth of what is being said. I am myself sufficiently convinced of the worth of these studies to recommend them to at least a first reading by English readers, in spite of their often extreme difficulty. In fact I should like to acknowledge here my profound debt to Fr Rahner; I could never provide an adequate account of the influence these studies have had on me, and my hope is that they will prove equally rewarding to English readers.[18] I must not, however, necessarily be taken to agree with everything Fr Rahner says.

Partly owing to the difficulties of translation, and partly owing to circumstances beyond my control, the publication of this translation has been painfully delayed. I should like publicly to apologize to the English and German publishers, and to Fr Rahner himself, for this delay.

CORNELIUS ERNST, O.P.

[17] The Dutch translation of these studies, Theologische Verkenningstockten (Haarlem 1958), omits all the longer, more difficult, pieces. In the present version, only one or two very small omissions have been made, to which attention is drawn in each case. A few notes have been added, including references to later writings by Fr Rahner where these are known to me.

[18] It has also given me particular pleasure as a Dominican to be instrumental in making so eminent a member of the Society of Jesus better known in England.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[xxi]

PREFACE

The number of specialist journals of theology is gradually becoming incalculable. The result is that essays which 'appear' in them tend rather to be hidden than to be published. Naturally it is not the business of the author to judge whether the obscurity into which these essays fall is a just fate or a regrettable misfortune. But if he has the right to make anything appear at all, he cannot be reproached for trying to publish his work in some other form which will make it more probable that someone will read it. And so we have attempted here to disinter a few essays from periodicals, leaving out work concerned purely with the history of dogma.[1]

The essays on the theology of the spiritual life will appear in a separate volume.

[xxii] The presumptuous intention of this modest collection of theological studies will be achieved if they help just a little (before they are finally forgotten) to confirm young theologians in the conviction that Catholic theology has no reason to rest on its laurels, fine though those may be; that on the contrary it can and must advance, and in such a way that it remains true to its own laws and its tradition.

Innsbruck, July 1954

KARL RAHNER, S.J.

[1] E.g. 'Die geistliche Lehre des Evagrius Pontikus', ZAM VIII (1932), pp. 21-38; 'Le Début d'une doctrine des cinq sens spirituels chez Origène', RAM XIII (1932), pp. 113-45; 'La Doctrine des sens spirituels au moyen âge', RAM XIV (1933) pp. 263-99; 'Der Begriff der ecstasis bei Bonaventura', ZAM IX (1934), pp. 1-19, 'Cœur de Jésus chez Origène', RAM XIV (1934), pp. 171-4; 'Sünde als Gnadenverlust in der frühkirchlichen Literatur', ZKT LX (1936), pp. 471-510; 'Die protestantische Christologie der Gegenwart', Theologie der Zeit I (1936), pp. 189-202, 'Ein messalianisches Fragment über die Taufe', ZKT LXI (1937), pp. 258-71; 'De termino aliquo in Theologia Clementis Alexandrini', Gregorianum XVIII (1937), pp. 426-31; 'Augustinus und der Semipelagianismus', ZKT LXII (1938), pp. 171-96; 'Die Sündenvergebung nach der Taufe in der regula fidei des Irenäus', ZKT LXX (1949), pp. 450-5; 'La Doctrine d'Origène sur la Pénitence', RSR XXXVII (1950), pp. 47-97, 252-86, 422-56; 'Zur Theologie der Busse bei Tertullian', Festschrift für Karl Adam (Düsseldorf 1952), pp. 139-67; 'Busslehre und Busspraxis in der Didascalia Apostolorum', ZKT LXXII (1950), pp. 257-81; 'Die Busslehre des heiligen Cyprian von Carthago', ZKT LXXIV (1952), pp. 257-76, 381-438.

(Many of the studies here translated have been enlarged and revised. Fr Rahner gives in the text a chronological list, which I do not reproduce, of the places of first publication. - Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Volume 1

1 THE PROSPECTS FOR DOGMATIC THEOLOGY
2 A SCHEME FOR A TREATISE OF DOGMATIC THEOLOGY
3 THE DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMA
4 THEOS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT
5 CURRENT PROBLEMS IN CHRISTOLOGY
6 THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION
7 THE INTERPRETATION OF THE DOGMA OF THE ASSUMPTION
8 THEOLOGICAL REFLEXIONS ON MONOGENISM
9 CONCERNING THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN NATURE AND GRACE
10 SOME IMPLICATIONS OF THE SCHOLASTIC CONCEPT OF UNCREATED GRACE
11 THE THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT OF CONCUPISCENTIA

Volume 2

1 MEMBERSHIP OF THE CHURCH ACCORDING TO THE TEACHING OF PIUS XII's ENCYCLICAL 'MYSTICI CORPORIS CHRISTI'
2 FREEDOM IN THE CHURCH
3 PERSONAL AND SACRAMENTAL PIETY
4 FORGOTTEN TRUTHS CONCERNING THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE
5 REMARKS ON THE THEOLOGY OF INDULGENCES
6 THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY
7 ON THE QUESTION OF A FORMAL EXISTENTIAL ETHICS
8 THE DIGNITY AND FREEDOM OF MAN
9 GUILT AND ITS REMISSION THE BORDERLAND BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND PSYCHOTHERAPY
10 PEACEFUL REFLECTIONS ON THE PAROCHIAL PRINCIPLE
11 NOTES ON THE LAY APOSTOLATE

Volume 3

1 REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEM OF THE GRADUAL ASCENT TO CHRISTIAN PERFECTION
2 THOUGHTS ON THE THEOLOGY OF CHRISTMAS
3 THE ETERNAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE HUMANITY OF JESUS FOR OUR RELATIONSHIP WITH GOD
4 REFLECTIONS ON THE THEOLOGY OF RENUNCIATION
5 THE PASSION AND ASCETICISM
6 REFLECTIONS ON THE EXPERIENCE OF GRACE
7 THE CHURCH OF THE SAINTS
8 SOME THOUGHTS ON 'A GOOD INTENTION'
9 THE DOGMA OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION IN OUR SPIRITUAL LIFE
10 THE COMFORT OF TIME
11 THE EUCHARIST AND SUFFERING
12 THE RENEWAL OF PRIESTLY ORDINATION
13 THE MEANING OF FREQUENT CONFESSION OF DEVOTION
14 PROBLEMS CONCERNING CONFESSION
15 THE APOSTOLATE OF PRAYER
16 A SPIRITUAL DIALOGUE AT EVENING: ON SLEEP, PRAYER, AND OTHER SUBJECTS

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

17 PRIESTLY EXISTENCE
18 THE CONSECRATION OF THE LAYMAN TO THE CARE OF SOULS
19 THE IGNATIAN MYSTICISM OF JOY IN THE WORLD
20 PRIEST AND POET
21 'BEHOLD THIS HEART!': PRELIMINARIES TO A THEOLOGY OF DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART
22 SOME THESES FOR A THEOLOGY OF DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART
23 THE CHRISTIAN AMONG UNBELIEVING RELATIONS
24 ON CONVERSIONS TO THE CHURCH
25 SCIENCE AS A 'CONFESSION'?

Volume 4

PART ONE Fundamental Theology
1 CONSIDERATIONS ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMA
2 THE CONCEPT OF MYSTERY IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY
3 REMARKS ON THE DOGMATIC TREATISE 'DE TRINITATE'
PART THREE Christology
4 ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE INCARNATION
5 DOGMATIC QUESTIONS ON EASTER
6 VIRGINITAS IN PARTU PART FOUR The Doctrine of Grace
7 NATURE AND GRACE
8 QUESTIONS OF CONTROVERSIAL THEOLOGY ON JUSTIFICATION PART FIVE The Sacraments
9 THE THEOLOGY OF THE SYMBOL
10 THE WORD AND THE EUCHARIST
11 THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE SACRAMENT OF THE LORD'S SUPPER
12 ON THE DURATION OF THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST AFTER COMMUNION PART SIX Eschatology
13 THE HERMENEUTICS OF ESCHATOLOGICAL ASSERTIONS
14 THE LIFE OF THE DEAD
PART SEVEN Christian Life
15 POETRY AND THE CHRISTIAN 16 THEOLOGICAL REMARKS ON THE PROBLEM OF LEISURE
17 THE THEOLOGY OF POWER

Volume 5

PART I QUESTIONS OF FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY AND THEOLOGICAL METHOD
1 THOUGHTS ON THE POSSIBILITY OF BELIEF TODAY
2 THEOLOGY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT
3 WHAT IS A DOGMATIC STATEMENT?
4 EXEGESIS AND DOGMATIC THEOLOGY PART II QUESTIONS ON THE THEOLOGY OF HISTORY
5 HISTORY OF THE WORLD AND SALVATION-HISTORY
6 CHRISTIANITY AND THE NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS
7 CHRISTIANITY AND THE 'NEW MAN'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PART III CHRISTOLOGY
8 CHRISTOLOGY WITHIN AN EVOLUTIONARY VIEW OF THE WORLD
9 DOGMATIC REFLECTIONS ON THE KNOWLEDGE AND SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS OF CHRIST PART IV ECCLESIOLOGICAL QUESTIONS
10 REFLECTION ON THE CONCEPT OF 'IUS DIVINUM' IN CATHOLIC THOUGHT 11 ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE COUNCIL
12 THE THEOLOGY OF THE RESTORATION OF THE DIACONATE
13 SOME REMARKS ON THE QUESTION OF CONVERSIONS
14 DOGMATIC NOTES ON 'ECCLESIOLOGICAL PIETY'
15 LATIN AS A CHURCH LANGUAGE PART V THE CHRISTIAN LIFE
16 SOME THESES ON PRAYER 'IN THE NAME OF THE CHURCH'
17 THE 'COMMANDMENT OF LOVE IN RELATION TO THE OTHER COMMANDMENTS
18 THE SAVING FORCE AND HEALING POWER OF FAITH
19 WHAT IS HERESY?

Volume 6

PART ONE Christianity in the Present Age
1 THE MAN OF TODAY AND RELIGION
2 A SMALL QUESTION REGARDING THE CONTEMPORARY PLURALISM IN THE INTELLECTUAL SITUATION OF CATHOLICS AND THE CHURCH
3 REFLECTIONS ON DIALOGUE WITHIN A PLURALISTIC SOCIETY
4 IDEOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY
5 MARXIST UTOPIA AND THE CHRISTIAN FUTURE OF MAN PART TWO Questions of Fundamental Theology
6 PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY
7 A SMALL FRAGMENT 'ON THE COLLECTIVE FINDING OF TRUTH'
8 SCRIPTURE AND THEOLOGY
9 SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION
10 REFLECTIONS ON THE CONTEMPORARY INTELLECTUAL FORMATION OF FUTURE PRIESTS
PART THREE Theological Anthropology
11 THE SECRET OF LIFE
12 THE UNITY OF SPIRIT AND MATTER IN THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING OF FAITH
13 THEOLOGY OF FREEDOM
14 GUILT - RESPONSIBILITY – PUNISHMENT WITHIN THE VIEW OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY
15 JUSTIFIED AND SINNER AT THE SAME TIME
16 REFLECTIONS ON THE UNITY OF THE LOVE OF NEIGHBOUR AND THE LOVE OF GOD PART FOUR Contributions to a Theology of the Church
17 THE CHURCH OF SINNERS
18 THE SINFUL CHURCH IN THE DECREES OF VATICAN II
19 THE CHURCH AND THE PAROUSIA OF CHRIST
20 THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE
21PASTORAL-THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON EPISCOPACY IN THE TEACHING OF VATICAN II

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

22 ON BISHOPS' CONFERENCES
23 ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANS

Volume 7

PART ONE Fundamental Questions
1 CHRISTIAN LIVING FORMERLY AND TODAY
2 BEING OPEN TO GOD AS EVER GREATER
3 INTELLECTUAL HONESTY AND CHRISTIAN FAITH
4 DO NOT STIFLE THE SPIRIT!
5 THE CHRISTIAN IN HIS WORLD
6 'I BELIEVE IN THE CHURCH'
PART TWO Mysteries of the Life of Jesus
7 CHRISTMAS, THE FESTIVAL OF ETERNAL YOUTH
8 HOLY NIGHT
9 PEACE ON EARTH
10 SEE, WHAT A MAN!
11 THE SCANDAL OF DEATH
12 'HE DESCENDED INTO HELL'
13 HIDDEN VICTORY
14 EXPERIENCING EASTER
15 ENCOUNTERS WITH THE RISEN CHRIST
16 HE WILL COME AGAIN
17 THE FESTIVAL OF THE FUTURE OF THE WORLD
18 THE CHURCH AS THE SUBJECT OF THE SENDING OF THE SPIRIT
19 THE SPIRIT THAT IS OVER ALL LIFE
PART THREE The Sacrament of the Lord
20 SUNDAY, THE DAY OF THE LORD
21THE EUCHARIST AND OUR DAILY LIVES
PART FOUR Christian Virtues
22 ON TRUTHFULNESS
23 PARRESIA (BOLDNESS)
24 THE WORKS OF MERCY AND THEIR REWARD
25 PROVING ONESELF IN TIME OF SICKNESS
26 ON CHRISTIAN DYING

Volume 8

PART ONE Patterns of Christianity
1 WHY AND HOW CAN WE VENERATE THE SAINTS?
2 ALL SAINTS
PART TWO Positions and Callings in the Church
3 IDEAS FOR A THEOLOGY OF CHILDHOOD
4 THE SACRAMENTAL BASIS FOR THE ROLE OF THE LAYMAN IN THE CHURCH
5 THE POSITION OF WOMAN IN THE NEW SITUATION IN WHICH THE CHURCH FINDS HERSELF
6 ON THE SITUATION OF THE CATHOLIC INTELLECTUAL 7 THE TASK OF THE WRITER IN RELATION TO CHRISTIAN LIVING
8 PRAYER FOR CREATIVE THINKERS
9 ON THE EVANGELICAL COUNSELS
10 THE THEOLOGY OF POVERTY

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

PART THREE The Veneration of the Sacred Heart
11 THE THEOLOGICAL MEANING OF THE VENERATION OF THE SACRED HEART
12 UNITY – LOVE – MYSTERY PART FOUR Prospects
13 THE FUTURE OF THE RELIGIOUS BOOK

Volume 9

PART ONE The Shape of Contemporary and Future Theology
1 THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL'S CHALLENGE TO THEOLOGY
2 THEOLOGY AND ANTHROPOLOGY
3 PHILOSOPHY AND PHILOSOPHISING IN THEOLOGY
4 THE HISTORICITY OF THEOLOGY
5 THEOLOGY AND THE CHURCH'S TEACHING AUTHORITY AFTER THE COUNCIL
6 PRACTICAL THEOLOGY WITHIN THE TOTALITY OF THEOLOGICAL DISCIPLINES PART TWO The Doctrine of God and Christology
7 THE NEED FOR A 'SHORT FORMULA' OF CHRISTIAN FAITH
8 OBSERVATIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF GOD IN CATHOLIC DOGMATICS
9 ATHEISM AND IMPLICIT CHRISTIANITY
10 'I BELIEVE IN JESUS CHRIST'
11 ONE MEDIATOR AND MANY MEDIATIONS
PART THREE Theological Anthropology
12 CHRISTIAN HUMANISM
13 THE EXPERIMENT WITH MAN
14 THE PROBLEM OF GENETIC MANIPULATION
15 SELF-REALISATION AND TAKING UP ONE'S CROSS

Volume 10

PART ONE Ecclesiology
1 THE NEW IMAGE OF THE CHURCH
2 CHURCH, CHURCHES AND RELIGIONS
3 ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE POPE AND THE COLLEGE OF BISHOPS
4 THE PRESENCE OF THE LORD IN THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY AT WORSHIP
5 ON THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE DIASPORA COMMUNITY ACCORDING TO THE TEACHING OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
6 DIALOGUE IN THE CHURCH
PART TWO Sacraments
7 PENANCE AS AN ADDITIONAL ACT OF RECONCILIATION WITH THE CHURCH
8 A BRIEF THEOLOGICAL STUDY ON INDULGENCE
9 ON THE OFFICIAL TEACHING OF THE CHURCH TODAY ON THE SUBJECT OF INDULGENCES
10 MARRIAGE AS A SACRAMENT
11 THE TEACHING OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL ON THE DIACONATE
PART THREE Eschatology

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

12 A FRAGMENTARY ASPECT OF A THEOLOGICAL EVALUATION OF THE CONCEPT OF THE FUTURE
13 ON THE THEOLOGY OF HOPE
14 THE THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN THE IDEA OF THE 'NEW EARTH'
15 IMMANENT AND TRANSCENDENT CONSUMMATION OF THE WORLD
PART FOUR Church and World
16 ON THE THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS ENTAILED IN A 'PASTORAL CONSTITUTION'
17 THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEM OF SECULARISATION
18 PRACTICAL THEOLOGY AND SOCIAL WORK IN THE CHURCH
19 THE PEACE OF GOD AND THE PEACE OF THE WORLD

Volume 11

PART ONE Tasks and Problems for Contemporary Theology
1 PLURALISM IN THEOLOGY AND THE UNITY OF THE CREED IN THE CHURCH
2 ON THE THEOLOGY OF THE ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION
3 REFLECTIONS ON METHODOLOGY IN THEOLOGY
4 THE NEW CLAIMS WHICH PASTORAL THEOLOGY MAKES UPON THEOLOGY AS A WHOLE
5 THE FUTURE OF THEOLOGY
PART TWO Natural Theology and Christology
6 THE EXPERIENCE OF GOD TODAY
7 THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS ON SECULARIZATION AND ATHEISM
8 THE POSITION OF CHRISTOLOGY IN THE CHURCH BETWEEN EXEGESIS AND DOGMATICS
9 CHRISTOLOGY IN THE SETTING OF MODERN MAN'S UNDERSTANDING OF HIMSELF AND OF HIS WORLD
10 REFLECTIONS ON THE PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN DEVISING A SHORT FORMULA OF THE FAITH PART THREE Anthropology
11 THE SIN OF ADAM
12 ON THE ENCYCLICAL 'HUMANAE VITAE'
13 THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONCEPT OF TIME
14 THEOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS CONCERNING THE MOMENT OF DEATH

Volume 12

PART ONE Ecclesiology
1 THE TEACHING OFFICE OF THE CHURCH IN THE PRESENT-DAY CRISIS OF AUTHORITY
2 THE POINT OF DEPARTURE IN THEOLOGY FOR DETERMINING THE NATURE OF THE PRIESTLY OFFICE
3 THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE PRIESTLY IMAGE OF TODAY AND TOMORROW
4 ON THE DIACONATE
5 OBSERVATIONS ON THE FACTOR OF THE CHARISMATIC IN THE CHURCH
6 SCHISM IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

7 HERESIES IN THE CHURCH TODAY?
8 CONCERNING OUR ASSENT TO THE CHURCH AS SHE EXISTS IN THE CONCRETE
9 ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANITY AND THE MISSIONARY TASK OF THE CHURCH
PART TWO Church and Society
10 THE QUESTION OF THE FUTURE
11 PERSPECTIVES FOR THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH
12 ON THE STRUCTURE OF THE PEOPLE OF THE CHURCH TODAY
13 THE FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH AS A CRITIC OF SOCIETY

Volume 13

PART ONE Theology as Science
1 ON RECOGNIZING THE IMPORTANCE OF THOMAS AQUINAS
2 THOMAS AQUINAS ON TRUTH
3 POSSIBLE COURSES FOR THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE
4 ON THE CURRENT RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY
5 THEOLOGY AS ENGAGED IN AN INTERDISCIPLINARY DIALOGUE WITH THE SCIENCES
6 ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND THE CONTEMPORARY SCIENCES PART TWO Anthropology
7 INSTITUTION AND FREEDOM
8 EXPERIENCE OF SELF AND EXPERIENCE OF GOD
9 DOES TRADITIONAL THEOLOGY REPRESENT GUILT AS INNOCUOUS AS A FACTOR IN HUMAN LIFE?
10 THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONCEPT OF ‘WITNESS’ 11 IDEAS FOR A THEOLOGY OF DEATH
PART THREE Christology
12 HUMAN ASPECTS OF THE BIRTH OF CHRIST
13 THE QUEST FOR APPROACHES LEADING TO AN UNDERSTANDING OF THE MYSTERY OF THE GOD-MAN JESUS
14 REMARKS ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE HISTORY OF JESUS FOR CATHOLIC DOGMATICS 15 THE TWO BASIC TYPES OF CHRISTOLOGY

Volume 14

1 BASIC OBSERVATIONS ON THE SUBJECT OF CHANGEABLE AND UNCHANGEABLE FACTORS IN THE CHURCH
2 THE FAITH OF THE CHRISTIAN AND THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH
3 DOES THE CHURCH OFFER ANY ULTIMATE CERTAINTIES?
4 ON THE CONCEPT OF INFALLIBILITY IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY
5 THE DISPUTE CONCERNING THE CHURCH’S TEACHING OFFICE
6 THE CONGREGATION OF THE FAITH AND THE COMMISSION OF THEOLOGIANS
7 ON THE THEOLOGY OF A ‘PASTORAL SYNOD’ PART TWO Questions in the Church
8 WHAT IS A SACRAMENT?
9 INTRODUCTORY OBSERVATIONS ON THOMAS AQUINAS’ THEOLOGY

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

OF THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL
10 CONSIDERATIONS ON THE ACTIVE ROLE OF THE PERSON IN THE SACRAMENTAL EVENT
11 ASPECTS OF THE EPISCOPAL OFFICE
12 HOW THE PRIEST SHOULD VIEW HIS OFFICIAL MINISTRY
13 THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PERSONAL AND COMMUNAL SPIRITUALITY AND WORK IN THE ORDERS PART THREE The Church in the World
14 SOME PROBLEMS IN CONTEMPORARY ECUMENISM
15 ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY IN THE FUTURE
16 THE UNREADINESS OF THE CHURCH'S MEMBERS TO ACCEPT POVERTY
17 OBSERVATIONS ON THE PROBLEM OF THE 'ANONYMOUS CHRISTIAN'
18 THE CHURCH'S COMMISSION TO BRING SALVATION AND THE HUMANIZATION OF THE WORLD 'HORIZONTALISM' IN CHRISTIANITY AND IN THE CONTEMPORARY CHURCH
19 ON THE THEOLOGY OF REVOLUTION

Volume 15

PART ONE Introduction
1 THE HISTORY OF PENANCE
2 SIN AS LOSS OF GRACE IN EARLY CHURCH LITERATURE
PART TWO The Roman Tradition
3 THE PENITENTIAL TEACHING OF THE SHEPHERD OF HERMAS
4 THE POST-BAPTISMAL FORGIVENESS OF SINS IN THE REGULA FIDEI OF IRENAEUS PART THREE The African Tradition
5 TERTULLIAN' S THEOLOGY OF PENANCE
6 THE PENITENTIAL TEACHING OF CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE
PART FOUR The Tradition of the East
7 PENITENTIAL TEACHING AND PRACTICE ACCORDING TO THE DIDASCALIA APOSTOLORUM
8 THE PENITENTIAL TEACHING OF ORIGEN

Volume 16

PART ONE Faith and Spirit
1 THE FOUNDATION OF BELIEF TODAY
2 EXPERIENCE OF THE SPIRIT AND EXISTENTIAL COMMITMENT
3 RELIGIOUS ENTHUSIASM AND THE EXPERIENCE OF GRACE
4 ANONYMOUS AND EXPLICIT FAITH
5 FAITH BETWEEN RATIONALITY AND EMOTION
PART TWO Spiritual Theology in Christian Tradition
6 THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES' ACCORDING TO ORIGEN
7 THE DOCTRINE OF THE 'SPIRITUAL SENSES' IN THE MIDDLE AGES
8 MODERN PIETY AND THE EXPERIENCE OF RETREATS
9 REFLECTIONS ON A NEW TASK FOR FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY
PART THREE Listening to Scripture
10 THE ACCEPTANCE IN FAITH OF THE TRUTH OF GOD
11 THE OLD TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN DOGMATIC THEOLOGY
12 ON THE 'HISTORY OF REVELATION' ACCORDING TO THE SECOND

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

VATICAN COUNCIL
13 THE ONE CHRIST AND THE UNIVERSALITY OF SALVATION
PART FOUR Questions About God
14 THE HIDDENNESS OF GOD
15 AN INVESTIGATION OF THE INCOMPREHENSIBILITY OF GOD IN ST THOMAS AQUINAS 16 THE MYSTERY OF THE TRINITY

Volume 17

PART ONE The Experience of Jesus
1 CHRISTMAS IN THE LIGHT OF THE IGNATIAN EXERCISES
2 ON THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE EASTER FAITH
3 JESUS' RESURRECTION
4 CHRISTOLOGY TODAY?
5 JESUS CHRIST IN THE NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS
PART TWO Man in the Spirit
6 THE THEOLOGICAL DIMENSION OF THE QUESTION ABOUT MAN
7 THE BODY IN THE ORDER OF SALVATION
8 MYSTICAL EXPERIENCE AND MYSTICAL THEOLOGY
9 THE LIBERTY OF THE SICK, THEOLOGICALLY CONSIDERED
10 'THE INTERMEDIATE STATE' PART THREE The Ministry and the Spirit
11 OPPOSITION IN THE CHURCH THE POSSIBILITIES AND THE LIMITS
12 'MYSTERIUM ECCLESIAE'
13 THE AREA BISHOP: SOME THEOLOGICAL REFLECTIONS
14 TRANSFORMATIONS IN THE CHURCH AND SECULAR SOCIETY
PART FOUR Signs of the Times for the Church
15 THE ONE CHURCH AND THE MANY CHURCHES
16 IS CHURCH UNION DOGMATICALLY POSSIBLE?
17 THIRD CHURCH?
18 RELIGIOUS FEELING INSIDE AND OUTSIDE THE CHURCH
19 SOME CLARIFYING REMARKS ABOUT MY OWN WORK

Volume 18

PART ONE Theological Hermeneutics
1 YESTERDAY'S HISTORY OF DOGMA AND THEOLOGY FOR TOMORROW
2 PSEUDO-PROBLEMS IN ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION
3 MAGISTERIUM AND THEOLOGY
4 ON BAD ARGUMENTS IN MORAL THEOLOGY
PART TWO Theology of God and Christology
5 THE HUMAN QUESTION OF MEANING IN FACE OF THE ABSOLUTE MYSTERY OF GOD
6 ONENESS AND THREEFOLDNESS OF GOD IN DISCUSSION WITH ISLAM
7 DIALOGUE WITH GOD?
8 THE DEATH OF JESUS AND THE CLOSURE OF REVELATION 9 WHAT DOES IT MEAN TODAY TO BELIEVE IN JESUS CHRIST?
10 FOLLOWING THE CRUCIFIED PART THREE Experience of the Spirit
11 EXPERIENCE OF TRANSCENDENCE FROM THE STANDPOINT OF CATHOLIC DOGMATICS

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

12 EXPERIENCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT
13 FAITH AS COURAGE
14 CHRISTIAN DYING
PART FOUR Grace and World
15 JUSTIFICATION AND WORLD DEVELOPMENT FROM A CATHOLIC VIEWPOINT
16 LAW AND RIGHTEOUSNESS IN THE CATHOLIC UNDERSTANDING 17 ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS FOR SALVATION

Volume 19

PART ONE Faith and the Church
1 FOUNDATIONS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH
2 ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN NATURAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY
3 THE CHURCH'S REDEMPTIVE HISTORICAL PROVENANCE FROM THE DEATH AND RESURRECTION OF JESUS
4 BRIEF THEOLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE 'STATE OF FALLEN NATURE'
PART TWO Priesthood
5 CONSECRATION IN THE LIFE AND REFLECTION OF THE CHURCH
6 PASTORAL MINISTRIES AND COMMUNITY LEADERSHIP
7 THEOLOGY AND SPIRITUALITY OF PASTORAL WORK IN THE PARISH
8 THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE SECULAR PRIEST
9 THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE PRIEST IN THE LIGHT OF HIS OFFICE
PART THREE Life in the Church
10 ON THE THEOLOGY OF WORSHIP
11 THE SUNDAY PRECEPT IN AN INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY
12 BASIC COMMUNITIES
PART FOUR The Future of the Church
13 ETERNITY FROM TIME SCEPTICISM IN REGARD TO ETERNAL LIFE PART FIVE Sin and Suffering
14 PURGATORY
15 WHY DOES GOD ALLOW US TO SUFFER?
PART SIX Mary and Woman
16 MARY AND THE CHRISTIAN IMAGE OF WOMAN
17 MARY'S VIRGINITY PART SEVEN Angels

Volume 20

PART ONE Faith and Church
1 COURAGE FOR AN ECCLESIAL CHRISTIANITY
2 ON THE SITUATION OF FAITH
PART TWO Priesthood
3 WOMEN AND THE PRIESTHOOD
PART THREE Life in the Church
4 THE CHURCH'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE FREEDOM OF THE INDIVIDUAL
5 THEOLOGICAL JUSTIFICATION OF THE CHURCH'S DEVELOPMENT WORK PART FOUR Future of the Church

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

6 BASIC THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
7 THE ABIDING SIGNIFICANCE OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL
8 THE FUTURE OF THE CHURCH AND THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE
9 STRUCTURAL CHANGE IN THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE
10 DREAM OF THE CHURCH
11 THE SPIRITUALITY OF THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE
12 UNITY OF THE CHURCH – UNITY OF MANKIND
13 THE INEXHAUSTIBLE TRANSCENDENCE OF GOD AND OUR CONCERN FOR THE FUTURE

Volume 21

PART ONE Science and Theology
1 PROFANE HISTORY AND SALVATION HISTORY
2 NATURAL SCIENCE AND REASONABLE FAITH
3 THEOLOGY TODAY
4 THE PRESENT SITUATION OF CATHOLIC THEOLOGY
5 ASPECTS OF EUROPEAN THEOLOGY
6 A THEOLOGY THAT WE CAN LIVE WITH PART TWO Faith
7 THE MATURE CHRISTIAN
8 JUSTIFYING FAITH IN AN AGNOSTIC WORLD
9 THE CHURCH AND ATHEISM
10 THE ACT OF FAITH AND THE CONTENT OF FAITH
11 A HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS
PART THREE Christianity
12 CHRISTIANITY'S ABSOLUTE CLAIM
13 THE SPECIFIC CHARACTER OF THE CHRISTIAN CONCEPT OF GOD
14 THE QUESTION OF MEANING AS A QUESTION OF GOD
15 JESUS CHRIST – THE MEANING OF LIFE
16 CHRISTOLOGY TODAY
17 BRIEF OBSERVATIONS ON SYSTEMATIC CHRISTOLOGY TODAY
18 THE CHRISTIAN UNDERSTANDING OF REDEMPTION
19 RECONCILIATION AND VICARIOUS REPRESENTATION

Volume 22

PART ONE Humane Society
1 CONSCIENCE FREEDOM AND THE DIGNITY OF HUMAN DECISION
2 DIALOGUE AND TOLERANCE AS THE FOUNDATION OF A HUMANE SOCIETY
3 UTOPIA AND REALITY: THE SHAPE OF CHRISTIAN EXISTENCE CAUGHT BETWEEN THE IDEAL AND THE REAL
4 THE THEOLOGICAL DIMENSION OF PEACE
5 THE PROBLEM OF EUROPE'S FUTURE
PART TWO Ecumenism
6 REALISTIC POSSIBILITY OF A UNIFICATION IN FAITH?
7 CONCRETE OFFICIAL STEPS TOWARD UNIFICATION
8 ECUMENICAL TOGETHERNESS TODAY
PART THREE The Future of the Church
9 FORGOTTEN DOGMATIC INITIATIVES OF THE SECOND VATICAN

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

COUNCIL
10 PERSPECTIVES FOR PASTORAL THEOLOGY IN THE FUTURE
11 THE FUTURE OF CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES
12 RITES CONTROVERSY: NEW TASKS FOR THE CHURCH
13 THE RELATION BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND POPULAR RELIGION
14 SOUTH AMERICAN BASE COMMUNITIES IN A EUROPEAN CHURCH
15 CHRISTIAN PESSIMISM
PART FOUR Doctrine and Magisterium
16 WHAT THE CHURCH OFFICIALLY TEACHES AND WHAT THE PEOPLE ACTUALLY BELIEVE 17 THEOLOGY AND THE ROMAN MAGISTERIUM
18 THE PERENNIAL ACTUALITY OF THE PAPACY
19 UNDERSTANDING THE PRIESTLY OFFICE
20 BOOK OF GOD – BOOK OF HUMAN BEINGS

Volume 23

PART ONE Christian Life
1 ANXIETY AND CHRISTIAN TRUST IN THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVE
2 NUCLEAR WEAPONS AND THE CHRISTIAN
3 PLEA FOR A NAMELESS VIRTUE
4 INTELLECTUAL PATIENCE WITH OURSELVES
5 A BASIC THEOLOGICAL AND ANTHROPOLOGICAL UNDERSTANDING OF OLD AGE
6 AUTHORITY
PART TWO The Society of Jesus
7 THE SITUATION OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS SINCE ITS DIFFICULTIES WITH THE VATICAN PART THREE Piety
9 EUCHARISTIC WORSHIP
10 DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART TODAY
11 COURAGE FOR DEVOTION TO MARY
12 UNDERSTANDING CHRISTMAS
13 THE THEOLOGY OF THE RELIGIOUS MEANING OF IMAGES
14 ART AGAINST THE HORIZON OF THEOLOGY AND PIETY
15 AGAINST THE WITCH HYSTERIA PART FOUR Sacraments
16 FAITH AND SACRAMENT
17 QUESTIONS ON THE THEOLOGY OF SACRAMENTS
18 BAPTISM AND THE RENEWAL OF BAPTISM
19 THE STATUS OF THE SACRAMENT OF RECONCILIATION

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

1

THE PROSPECTS FOR DOGMATIC THEOLOGY

Unfulfilled programmes, pronouncements about 'how it should be done' (when nothing has in fact been done) are cheap enough. They arouse the suspicion that their author is one of those people who always know better. But on the other hand no human being has ever got anything done without some sort of plan in mind. Programmes are unavoidable. If it is beginning to seem impossible today for a single theologian to write a complete treatise of dogmatic theology – something more than a textbook or, speaking generally, a convenient summary of received opinions – then even an unfulfilled programme for a treatise may perhaps be more than just a pretension to superior knowledge, in that it can open and support discussion of the question: How should a group of theologians attempt to work out together a treatise of Catholic theology for today?

A brief and open-minded survey of Catholic theological writing in our time brings us to some surprising conclusions. Such conclusions are inevitably onesided and schematic, and will, happily, be unjust in particular cases. It can always be said to the critic who offers them: medice, cura teipsum. But is it really true that a man who lives in a glass house may never throw stones? He might very well be prepared to put up with the breaking of his own windows for the sake of the thing. In a word: if we review the productions of Catholic theology over the last twenty or thirty years – speaking schematically, of course, and with some injustice in particular cases and to particular individuals – we may divide them into three groups[1]: textbooks, historical [2] studies of Christian dogma, and theological studies of special or marginal topics.

The textbooks are – textbooks. Whoever has tried his hand at it will be well aware that it is no easy matter to write a properly planned textbook or even part of one. A whole series of well-arranged textbooks is available in Latin and in modern languages. It follows from the nature of Catholic understanding of the faith, and from its concern with theologians who are beginning the basic study of the Church's teaching, that it should not be the ambition of these Catholic textbooks to seek 'originality' at any price. But is it blasphemous to condemn them (that there are exceptions is not denied) for a quite startling kind of 'unoriginality'? They may have been filled out in many respects over the last twenty or thirty years: some improvement on the historical side, references to literature (seldom assimilated, admittedly) and so on. But let us bear this in mind: no one can deny that in the last two centuries cultural and spiritual transformations have taken place which, to say the very least, are comparable in depth and extent and power to mould men's lives, with those which took place between the time of Augustine and that of the golden age of scholasticism. If we hold that theology is an endeavour of the spirit and a science which has to be of service to its own time, just as it has, or should have, grown out of its own time; and if we hold this because it has to serve [1] We ignore of course the literature of 'haute vulgarisation', theological journalism and theological freebootery (which is naturally also to be found), and still more the often necessary and sometimes superfluous writings in which the mass of the faithful needs to have the daily bread of its religious instruction new baked, new every day, even if it looks just the same today as it did yesterday. We have in mind here only those theological productions which are usually characterized as 'scientific'. Admittedly, the distinction between science and popularization is especially problematic in theology; for here 'science' rests on the faith of the 'people'. And perhaps it has almost always been the case that 'armchair [sitzende]' scientific theology (to make use of an expression, itself problematic, of H. U. von Balthasar's) has learnt more from 'praying' (and preaching) non-scientific theology than the reverse. But that is not our concern here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

salvation and not mere theoretical curiosity (granting always that pure understanding as such is itself a part of salvation) and salvation is always the salvation of individual men here and now; if we hold in faith that divine revelation is a source of such treasures of truth that it can never be exhausted (Denz 3014): then we should have expected to find at least as pronounced a difference between a theological compendium of today and one of, say, 1750, as between the Summa Theologica of St Thomas and the writings of Augustine.

What are the facts? We might just as well look up the average tractatus of Billuart or the Wirceburgenses as a modern treatise. Where it is properly dogmatic theology – that is to say, neither history [3] of dogma or its pitiful crumbs, nor haute vulgarisation – such a modern theological treatise in no way differs from its predecessors of 200 years ago.[2] Let no one say that of course it could not be different from its predecessors in view of the immutability of the depositum fidei. That is simply not true. We need only try to form an idea of the historically contingent character of the uniform canon which has regulated the choice of topics and treatises in a theological textbook for over two hundred years, in order to see that such an assertion concerning the unavoidable immutability of our textbooks is false.[3] How much is missing from our modern manuals which was dealt with at length in the textbook composed by St Thomas (it is called the Summa Theologica)! Where is it laid down that the seven sacraments should be dealt with one after the other and should demand approximately a third of the contents of a textbook? Let us observe how much space is allotted to the tractate De Resurrectione Christi or, more generally, the De Mysteriis Vitae Christi, and let us ask ourselves whether this allotment of space, in itself betraying something of the deeper attitudes and perspectives of the writers' minds, is just the obvious one. We should ask ourselves why for instance in the treatise De Paenitentia the personal, existential side of the sacramental action usually receives explicit and extended treatment (De Virtute Paenitentiae), while in every other sacrament, with a pathetic sense of its obviousness, the treatment of this aspect is supposed to be superfluous, or at most disposed of in a couple of footnotes. Or again, let us imagine a Biblical theology, of a kind which we hardly possess yet but of which we can form a rough idea, and ask ourselves what themes and proportions we [4] might not unreasonably suppose it would give rise to in the field of systematic theology as well. There is a very large number of treatises on dogmatic and moral theology (or is it all of them?) in which practically nothing is said on the Pauline theme of Law and Freedom.[4] Is it simply obvious that this is right? We may test the average textbook's views of history: between Adam (De Deo Creante et Elevante; De Peccato Originali) and Christ we find – nothing. Surely there is room for a theology of saving history in general, treating of both the Old Covenant and of the way of salvation outside the history of Israel (the latter in its own right). Similar examples to illustrate the general approach to problems in the average

[2] Omitting here the consideration of theologia fundametalis.

[3] The vicious circle of a Denzinger Theology is beginning to threaten us here. However 'objective' Denzinger may be as to actual texts chosen and collected there, it is equally subjective as to their choice and collection. It is obviously affected by the canon which regulates the questions and theses of current seminary theology: what it has collected and selected is what is needed in the way of authoritative doctrinal pronouncements in just this context. May not much else be found in Denzinger's sources (Papal letters, bullaria, etc.) if only this other material were thought to be as important as this or that question on which Denzinger does in fact supply explanatory material? Now that Denzinger with its selection (and its Index Systemasicus) is in existence, the theologian feels almost instinctively that it is the canonical norm for what questions are to be treated of in dogmatic theology; for other questions, no evidence may be adduced from Denzinger. The vicious circle is complete.

[4] I have not been able to find an entry for 'Sermon on the Mount' in Noldin's Index Systematicus. In the Encyclical of Leo XIII on Freedom (Libertas praestantissimum) not a word is to be found on the freedom which has become ours by the gift of Christ's redemptive grace. The Encyclical speaks, in terms of philosophy and the Natural Law, only about the freedom which we just always have. Are observations of this kind, which could be multiplied at will, simply to be explained by every author's own personal choice of his theme?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

textbook may easily be produced, in regard to its themes alone.

No one will be able to deny that in fact the history of dogma and Biblical theology have hardly acted as a ferment in the treatment of questions of dogmatic theology itself,

From yet another point of view it can be shown, quite formally, that we cannot make the immutability of dogma the excuse for the uniformity and stagnation of our textbooks. When a scientific discipline loses its power to forge concepts it becomes 'sterile' (to use a word from Humani Generis).[5] Technical concepts are necessary if a science is to develop, because accumulated experience can only become fruitful for the achievement of a new, exact and various understanding when what has been acquired is made available for further employment by resolution into a determinate concept. Hypostasis, the supernatural, opus operatum, transubstantiation, contrition, attrition, habitus, gratia sanctificans, gratia gratis data and many others are concepts of this kind, which have emerged as the condensed results of theological work which has often gone on for centuries, and so could and still can [5] each form a point of departure and a conceptual tool for further theological reflexion. They are as it were symbols and trophies of theological achievements of past centuries. In the field of dogmatic theology proper, are there to be found theological termini technici, accepted as classical and familiar to every theologian, which have been added during the last few centuries to the available stock of means of theological clarification? Corredemptio-corredemptrix perhaps; but there is still a great deal of controversy about this concept.

Is this state of affairs inevitable? We cannot say that all those concepts which we require for our properly theological equipment – or which we would require if we possessed them – have already been developed. Of course this assertion can hardly be demonstrated to self-complacent theologians. But the point here is that anyone who does not hold the (strictly blasphemous) view that theology has pretty well exhausted divine revelation and translated it all into theological intelligibility, must find it strange and disturbing that there is so little active formation of concepts in theology today.

One small example of this may be given. It is admitted that there is an objective distinction between venial and grave sin, not only as regards the 'matter' of the act, but also from the side of the subject, that is, as regards the degree of existential depth, the centrality or superficiality, with which the personal core of the subject is engaged. The same distinction must then be applicable to the morally good act, from the very nature of the case, and in such a way that the ethical quality of these good acts, so various in kind, is only 'analogically' to be comprehended in the same concept of the morally good act. Now there is not a single word in theology for this distinction and for what it should distinguish. If there were an appropriate terminus technicus we could ask, among other things, in another theological field: Does every morally good act (in the supernatural order) increase grace, or only (how are we to put it?) the 'grave' act? Or again, where may we find the theologically and ontologically exact conceptual and terminological equipment with which to determine positively the relation of the angels to the rest of creation, including the material world? (If we qualify them merely as 'pure' spirits, the greater part of what Scripture tells us about their relation to the world remains unexpressed, just a blur in our minds today.)

It must not be supposed that this theological 'progress' as regards themes, the setting and solving of questions, the formation of concepts [6] and so on, could be merely a matter of more or less worthless 'refinements' – apart from a few special fields like Mariology. So long as a new formulation of the question is not worked out (the question itself generally doesn't exist!) and an answer achieved, it always looks as though everything is really quite

[5] 'Experiundo novimus', according to Humani Generis (Denz 3014). Thus the sterility of theology may very well be not just an abstract possibility, but something already experienced as a fact. We cannot naively suppose that something of the sort could only happen in the 'bad old days'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

clear and that all that remains to be discussed is one or two controversies of the schools, fundamentally trivial from the religious point of view. But when we have trained our vision by the study of the history of dogma (or more accurately here, the history of theology), we may recognize that theology does not always advance to ever better and clearer solutions but that its history is always at the same time one of false approximations to a 'mean' (which is to say often mediocre) path. We may recognize too that, through 'exhaustion', it is the history of what are often merely verbal solutions, in which questions are forgetfully allowed to escape by being overlooked in favour of a convenient clarity and comprehensiveness, ad usum delphini. Anyone who pursues the study of theology, moved by the spirit of his time and an eager religious life and a desire to make a real proclamation to his own time, will experience soon enough the impact of new questions, questions which only obtain their clarification and solution by careful and disciplined theological investigation.[6] But because properly-conducted studies in the history of dogma and of theology (of which we have still to speak) have had in fact no far-reaching effect on dogmatic theology; and because religious life and theology seldom form a truly living unity (excepting again individual theologians and limited special questions like Mariology); and finally because the impulses of our time only reach theology in a weakened and as it were disinfected form – that is why our text-books of dogmatic theology look the same today as they did two hundred years ago.

When we attempt to evaluate this situation, we must not suppose that the difference we are looking for need and can consist of a merely [7] literary, verbal or rhetorical adaptation of an old theology to our time, in new 'applications', 'outlooks' or corollaries in the practical order. It is much more a matter here of a dogmatic theology, a genuinely scientific one (in the sense that it listens with exactness and seriousness, and reflects with exactness on what it hears), whose concern it is to be adequate to reality; for then it can allow itself to try to be adequate to its time – a preoccupation full of danger and generally quite unprofitable. For if it is in fact more intimately adequate to reality (than it has been), it spontaneously becomes adequate to its time: it makes the time its own and need not worry about suiting itself to the time, always after the event. From the practical point of view the most serious misunderstanding defended or at least encouraged by the so-called 'kerygmatic theology' was the growth of the belief upon which this theology was based, that speculative theology could remain as it is now, provided that 'by its side' a kerygmatic theology were built up. Essentially, this would consist in saying 'the same' as what had achieved systematic expression in scholastic theology, but only in a slightly different way, 'kerygmatically', together with a few practical modifications. But in fact the strictest theology, that most passionately devoted to reality alone and ever on the alert for new questions, the most scientific theology, is itself in the long run the most kerygmatic. The fact that our textbooks are so little alive, serve proclamation and witness so little, is not due to their superabundance of scholastic and scientific theology but because they offer too little of it, precisely because as relics of the past they are unable even to preserve the past in its purity. For the past can only be preserved in its purity by someone who accepts responsibility for the future, who preserves in so far as he overcomes.

The studies in the history of dogma, forming the second of the groups into which we divided current work in scientific theology, cannot make good this deficiency of the textbooks; not only because dogmatic theology and the history of dogma are not the same thing, but also for a reason almost more important: the greater part of these works has its eye

[6] By way of a small example of this, I may refer to my little book Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951). Cf. B. Neuheuser, 'Die vielen Messen', Catholica IX (1953), pp. 151-3, and the essay by F. Vandenbroucke, 'La Concélébration, acte liturgique communautaire', La Maison-Dieu XXXV (1953), pp. 48 s. (See also K. Rahner, 'Die vielen Messen als die vielen Opfer Christi', ZKT LXXVII (1955), pp. 94-101, and H. F. Davis, 'The Pope and Private Masses', Clergy Review XLII (1957), pp. 2-14.–Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exclusively on the past. They derive from the past no impulse for the future of dogmatic theology. They confine themselves to showing how what prevails today came into being; starting from today they simply go backwards. It is only rarely that one of these works comes upon an old crossing of the ways, past which the theologians of the time had gone their way unnoticing and perhaps [8] even fatefully, and finds there a route which we today can follow into a territory not yet explored. Of course there is bound to be a number of works of an historical kind which were originally undertaken out of a simple historical interest in past facts and processes; as far as these are concerned, we must for the moment leave undecided the question whether it might not be possible at some time – either in conjunction with other studies or in a larger context – to derive from them further results of greater significance for theology than the mere backward-looking acquaintance with their own past. Perhaps it may be possible to keep our gaze turned forwards while we glance to the rear and find in the past an ingredient of a future not yet attained. Anyone who demands quick theological returns from individual historical works (and this is specially true of the beginner, who tends to be much too impatient in looking for what can be 'got out of' historical studies) exposes historical investigation in theology to the dangers of triviality and superficiality, and encourages a dilettantism which would reap before it has sown. But however important a truth this may be, it must still be asked whether current Catholic writing in the field of the history of dogma has not been too sterile for theology proper. On the one hand it has not approached the past with a real question, one which is still open to the test of the facts. On the other it has not interrogated the past closely enough to hear it with all the overtones with which it once resounded, overtones which at that time were not perhaps the explicit formulations of a scientific theology, but rather the echoes of preaching, faith and Christian life. Yet utterances of this kind could very well be more important for us today than many other truths or theologoumena which exhibit a more immediately comprehensible history. If they are to have any value for dogmatic theology, histories of dogma must not propose merely to chronicle in a summary way what was said about this or that in times past. The historian of such a course of the spirit must look at reality itself with the very eyes of the theologian of the past, listening to what he says: not chronicle past theology but practise the study of theology in company with it. It is true of course that such a method runs a greater danger of misinterpreting the sources by reading modern problems into them than the mere report. But in the last resort it is by this method alone that we can get at the thoughts and not just the words of our source-texts. Success in an attempt of this kind is not demonstrated by the fact that someone has examined the body of [9] texts available, has arranged them and imposed a quite exterior structure upon them, and then, from the judgment seat of modern theology, has uttered a summary pronouncement upon the fact and extent of the intelligence of the author concerned as compared with ours. This lecture-room method puts everything on the same level; it cannot elicit the hidden energies of an old theology, it fails to discover what has remained implicit and what is consequently most active there, the secret presuppositions. It is insensitive to the opposition or the gap which may sometimes be present between what is said and what is meant, between the perhaps over-facile solution of a particular problem and the fundamental principle; possessing the parts, it lacks the spirit which informs the whole. Thus it fails to discover precisely that in the theology of the past which might be of value for theology today. Consider for example Hermann Lange's treatise De Gratia. This work is the best-informed scholastic manual on the theology of grace. Lange really knew the 'results' of historical investigation in this field, in so far as they were readily available.[7] But if we ask ourselves what significance these 'results' had for the properly theological content of his [7] Up to the date at which his book appeared of course. Is it too much to hope that after the work of Bouillard, de Lubac, Auer, Landgraf and Alfaro, there will be some changes over a great part of this field?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

book we are bound to answer with all due respect (the judgment is a summary one of course): none at all. The fault is not Lange's but that of the historical works of which we have been speaking, their lack of dogmatic fruitfulness. Similar remarks could be made about our best scholastic manual De Paenitentia, by P. Galtier. Galtier is one of the best-informed scholars on the history of penance and has done some of the best research in this field. But if we leave out of his treatise the historical notes and the apologetic for the Church's teaching against misinterpretations of the history of penance, we are left with a dogmatic treatise which is the split image of any treatise written over the last two centuries. Is this Galtier's fault as a dogmatic theologian? By no means: it is the fault of the historical works themselves. That this need not necessarily be the case may be seen from Poschmann's research into the history of indulgences, to choose intentionally a quite unpretentious example.[8] What is it that makes the properly historical in studies like those of de Lubac or de la Taille so stimulating and to the point? Surely it is the art of reading [10] texts in such a way that they become not just votes cast in favour of or against our current positions (positions taken up long ago), but say something to us which we in our time have not considered at all or not closely enough, about reality itself. This is not to say that we should study the history of theology in order to justify our own private innovations, although this sort of culpable silliness is by no means unknown; but that we should enter into association with a thinker of the past, not only to become acquainted with his views but in the last resort to learn something about reality. It is because historical theology is too much lecture-room disquisition and too little συνθεολογει=ν that we generally learn from it only about that part of the past which is in any case already preserved in modern theology, but not about that part which shapes our future in our past. It is no wonder then that the great work of historical theology, one which deserves our constant praise as regards our positive gains from it, has so far been able to exert so little pressure to overcome the deficiencies of the textbooks.

The third group which we distinguished above has for its theme special and marginal questions of dogmatic theology. That is to say, there are many works, especially in the field of Mariology, the only objection to which is that they are not supported by a sufficiently large number of other works dealing with more central questions. It is thus that we gain the impression (quite unjustly, perhaps, as regards individual theologians) that these works are being made use of as a 'convenient alibi', 'as a means of evading issues which, although they cannot be ignored when the architectural laws of revealed truth are taken into account, yet would demand a more resolute and variously cultivated spirit' than the subject which is in fact chosen for treatment. The doctrines of the Trinity, of the God-Man, of Redemption, of the Passion and Resurrection, of Predestination and the Last Things, simply bristle with formulations which no one examines but towards which everyone makes a reverential bow. This deference is a mistake. The thought of earlier generations, even if it has had results in the form of conciliar definitions, is not a sort of couch for the thought of later generations. Definitions are much less an end than a beginning. A Hic Rhodus. An opening. No real achievement is ever lost to the Church. But theologians are never spared the task of prompt renewal. Anything which is merely conserved, or which is merely handed down without a fresh, personal exertion beginning at the very sources of Revelation, rots as the manna did. And the longer living Tradition is [11] interrupted by mere mechanical handing down, the more difficult it may become to restore contact again.[9] All honour to the countless number of Mariological works being written today; and let there be no doubt that the greater part of them, at least, is sustained by that Marian movement in the Church today which is a gift of [8] See vol. II of these studies, 'Remarks on the Theology of Indulgences'.

[9] H. U. von Balthasar, 'Was soll Theologie? Ihr Ort und ihre Gestalt im Leben der Kirche', Wort und Wahrheit VIII (1953), pp. 325-32. (Citation from p. 330.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

her Spirit. But how many themes, just as important in themselves, remain unexamined! Over how many questions does there reign the graveyard calm of weariness and boredom! There persisted into the late Middle Ages sharp differences of Trinitarian teaching within the limits of orthodoxy. Today 99 per cent of those who have followed a regular course of theological studies will have to admit that they are quite ignorant of these differences and that they were told hardly anything of them during their studies. Where are theological works to be found on the mysteries of Christ's life? A thick volume in French and Spanish on the Ascension, for instance, pays no attention to matters other than textual criticism and the apologetic defence of the Ascension as an historical event. In spite of its enormous size the Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique has simply forgotten to have an article about it at all. An even more notable deficiency in current theology is the lack of any fundamental consideration of the mysteries of Christ's life in general. In modern dogmatic theology the only moments in the life of Jesus to which attention is still given are the Incarnation itself, the foundation of the Church, Christ's teaching, the Last Supper and the death of Christ. In addition the Resurrection is considered in Apologetics from the point of view of theologia fundamentalis. Everything else to do with the mysteries of Christ's life is no longer to be found in dogmatic theology but only in the literature of edification. Where may we find an up-to-date work on the doctrine of transubstantiation and the worldview of modern physics?[10] The Encyclical Humani Generis has not given a warning against the dangers of false attempts in this matter just so that nothing at all should be done about it. We [12] may consult any bibliography we like, and yet be horrified by the thinness or the entire lack of properly dogmatic investigation into the theology of death. Poets and philosophers reflect on it; but in our theology all we find is a few chilly remarks on death as a penal consequence of original sin. And that is pretty well all. What is said about it in Eschatology is at most a tenth of what we could learn from revealed sources, if we really read them with all our mind and heart. What thinness and lack of interest in Eschatology itself! Why can we find no work, at least no exact, thorough and patient work, on the rules of interpretation of eschatological utterances in the revealed sources? The eschatological reality itself and the mode of its manifestation inevitably act as co-determinants of the genus litterarium of such utterances. And yet all we find on the question as to what is content and what form in such utterances is ad hoc improvisation. Who has ever written a theology of the concept of time and of our understanding of it?[11] Until as late as the eighteenth century there was at least some speculation about Heaven and its local character. Today we say that Heaven is a place and that no one knows where it is. Simple, but a little too convenient. Surely there is more to be said than that. In the field of eschatology a great deal more could be done from the point of view of history of dogma alone. How poor we still are in the 'theology of history'! A formal theology of the history of the Church after Christ is entirely lacking. The Introductions to Church history are astonishingly thin. Are there for example genuine theological criteria of an intrinsic kind for assigning the history of the Church into periods? How far is Church history a theological science? What is its subject and its formal object, distinguishing it from the Christian part of the general history of religion (even if the latter is treated of by a Catholic, for whom the Christian doctrine and conviction of the divine foundation of the Church furnish a negative norm for his consequent researches into the history of religion)? All these are offered as a [10] The new edition of Filograssi's treatise on the Eucharist says nothing at all on this point. When shall we ever have a scholastic treatise on the Eucharist which at last abandons the usual superficial division according to which first the Real Presence and then the sacrifice of the Mass is treated of, as though this division arose from the very nature of the case?

[11] The work by F. Beemelmans, Zeit und Ewigkeit nach Thomas von Aquin (Münster 1914), although it belongs to Bäumker's Beiträge series, is startlingly naive, a typical example of the 'chronicle', instead of the reflective renewal of someone else's thought, and for that reason quite profitless.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

few random examples of the fact that special studies on the history of dogma and dogmatic theology are clearly influenced by an unacknowledged selective principle by no means obvious in itself, and that in consequence a vast number of topics in [13] dogmatic theology receive no treatment at all. It is not at all easy to see what this curious principle of selection might be: a diffidence before difficult questions, perhaps; the false idea that in certain fields dogmatic theology has entered upon the final phase of its development; the paralysing impression made by the massive immobility of certain controversies of the schools, apparently stranded for good; the shrinkage of collaboration between theologians[12]; the false but widespread feeling that there is no longer any way of going beyond 'differences of opinion' when discussing new questions. The result of this last misapprehension is a despondent belief that it would be gratuitous to commit oneself too 'enthusiastically' to just one point of view which must always remain controversial; and so people prefer to express their 'point of view' in works of edification, where it will not be challenged but will be accepted in a spirit of pious faith.[13]

One common feature emerges to view from a consideration of these three divisions of theological literature: dogmatic theology today is very orthodox.[14] But it is not very vividly alive. To have established this point is to offer no sort of reproach about its being 'long-winded', 'flat', 'dry' or 'boringly pedantic', or that it isn't stylistically elegant, or that it doesn't 'edify' everyone at first go. Scientific work in dogmatic theology can dispense with all these qualities provided it does just one thing: that it devotes itself to the reality in question with that passionate sympathy which this unique reality can demand more [14] than any other, and without which it does not become truly accessible. Then what we find too little of today would be bound to emerge spontaneously: theological treatises which are not just mechanically repetitive textbooks (adorned with bibliographical data and historical notes); studies in the history of dogma which look backwards so as to go beyond the current position; specialized theological studies which have the courage to make investigations in the many dogmatic fields over which there prevails today more or less the stillness of a building site abandoned while building was still in progress. The three desiderata for the three divisions of theological literature are interconnected. They may be reduced to a single requirement: more dogmatic theology in the handbooks, more dogmatic theology in the historical studies, more dogmatic theology in the special studies over the whole range of dogmatic theology and not just in limited fields. The tentative sketch, following this essay, of a more inclusive treatise of the whole of dogmatic theology is offered as a small contribution to the task described in this critique. Perhaps it may have some significance even if a treatise constructed exactly on its model never comes into being. All this sketch is intended to do (however much laborious reflexion it has involved[15]) is just to show in its own way what we [12] For example, it is worth pointing out that even in the field of theology, although it has fortunately not caught up with the others yet, reviewers have adopted the modern practice of a more or less uncommitted 'notice' of new publications, and have given up any concern to come to terms with a writer by a close and reasoned examination of his thought.

[13] This may be just one reason why more originality and vitality of thought is often to be found in such writings than in the so-called 'specialist' literature.

[14] That such orthodoxy can also be a danger is shown in K. Rahner, Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln 1950). (Also in Wort und Wahrheit IV (1949), pp. 881-91.) Once the danger of explicit and theoretically formulated heresy appearing within the Church and seeking to spread within it has been largely excluded by a very high degree of reflective precision concerning the formal principles of faith and theology, then heresy can appear in just two forms: as 'cryptogamic' heresy, merely lived out existentially and avoiding self-expression in a theoretical reflexive form, and as dead orthodoxy, which may be true to the letter simply because it is fundamentally uninterested in the whole business.

[15] It should be mentioned here that the first draft of this sketch goes back to reflexions upon which the author was engaged together with Hans Urs von Balthasar many years ago. It is no longer possible to distinguish what in it, whether good or bad, is due to him and what to me. I am alone responsible for the published version.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

tried to see just now from a different standpoint, namely the abundance of undeveloped themes which awaits the dogmatic theologian.

Only a fully elaborated synthesis could, if at all, establish and justify its plan of construction. Consequently we shall not attempt here to explain and justify this sketch. We shall only make a few preliminary remarks and some brief notes on a few points without any intention of offering a complete commentary.

Every Catholic theology must be a theology of both essence and existence, or putting it simply, it must both look for necessary and intrinsic structures and connexions and it must report what in fact, without metaphysical or logical necessity, took place in saving history. The second requirement needs no explanation. But the first retains its truth in spite of every kind of modern Existentialism. For theology is thinking; and it is quite impossible to think irreducibly atomized facts. [15] For even what is freely posited has its nature and structure, its connexions, homologies and analogies. Thus in the very midst of the report that this or that took place, it has always to be said what intrinsically it was that took place. And this what is never absolutely incommensurate with other things. There are structures which persist even in the most surprising novel event. Otherwise it would be meaningless to speak of a single saving history taking its course according to a comprehensive and eternally abiding divine plan, although one which only slowly discloses itself to us. It is impossible, at every point in the report of the history of salvation, to deal with such common characters of an 'essential' kind in an entirely new way. Here too it becomes a matter of seeing and saying the common precisely as such. And so it is necessary to practise an abstract theology of essence, granted always that authentic knowledge of such things is only had when it is read off the facts of saving history. Consequently when we find in dogmatic treatises of a traditional sort what is apparently a 'methodologically impure' mixture of theology of essence (i.e. statements about how things always and everywhere went on and will go on in the history of salvation – those statements, precisely, about what is necessarily the case) and of saving history itself ('narrative', 'Biblical history'), this is no defect but a necessity arising from the very nature of the reality studied by theology. But there is a real inadequacy if no reflexive account is given of these fundamental relationships; and this inadequacy is to be observed in pretty well all dogmatic treatises. The consequence of this is that either the theology of essence or the theology of existence is abbreviated without due inspection. Many fundamental themes remain undeveloped because they are merely 'narrated': so, for instance, Revelation and Time.[16] On the other hand many events are not narrated because concern is directed exclusively to the universally significant in the history of salvation. We have already pointed out above that for the average dogmatic treatise nothing really took place between Adam and Christ which might not very well be left to Bible stories for children. A tractate De Gratia is so timeless and anhistorical that everything in it gives the appearance [16] of being universally applicable at any time, even when some brief reference is made to the fact that the just of pre-Christian times possessed the grace of Christ.[17]

This inevitable co-operation and interpenetration of the theologies of essence and existence (theological ontology and historical report) must be realized and appreciated for a better

[16] For instance, where are we to find in our treatises a fundamental, compact and closely worked-out dissertation on the questions why, how and in what measure God has spoken to the fathers at various times and in various ways, why nevertheless this does not go on now since the coming of the Son, what follows from this, and so on?
[17] This is quite correct. But is the difference between the ways in which grace is given sufficiently described by saying that before Christ the grace of Christ was not given so 'abundantly'? From the point of view of Biblical theology, is this not on the one hand to say too little, if we think of Abraham, Father of the faithful, in Heb 11, etc., and on the other hand too much, if we look at Jn 7:39 and other texts like it? Why is it not possible to have the beatific vision as Christ's grace before Christ, in the same way as it is possible to have Christ's grace before Christ? Where is the question, Grace and Time (History), in the tractate De Gratia?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

understanding of the way in which the following sketch has set out and distributed its themes.

It is no longer practicable to abandon the division into dogmatic and moral theology which was still unknown to the Middle Ages – fortunately for them, we might feel. The consequences of this division, which may be avoidable but are in fact generally not avoided, are well known. Dogmatic theology tends to become an esoteric doctrine, the significance of which for the achievement of the Christian life is barely adverted to. Moral theology is always in danger of becoming a peculiar mixture of philosophical ethics, natural law, a positivism based on canon law, and casuistry; in such a mixture the theology (both positive and speculative) in 'moral theology' is only a distant memory. We have only to look at the usual plan of such a treatise of moral theology in this light, or to examine the Bible for some indication of the contents and mode of treatment proper to a moral theology, in order to realize that the average treatise could do with a little more theology.[18] But that is not our business here. Yet dogmatic theology cannot abdicate its task of declaring the fullness of dogmatic truth to moral theology itself; for this task is no one else's. Moreover dogmatic theology is the older and more venerable discipline; it has the privilege of the first word. If moral theology sets itself up as a theological discipline in its own right, it must come to terms with this right of primogeniture of dogmatic theology, and must itself examine the adequacy of the reasons it [17] alleges for its own separate existence. In fact dogmatic theology has to this very day regarded as its own many themes which we find also in treatises of moral theology, or which perhaps we should even be tempted to suppose would be found there alone. If there is discussion, and lengthy discussion, of such subjects as 'de virtute Paenitentiae', 'de virtutibus theologicis' or 'de Fide' in a dogmatic treatise, the fundamental claims of dogmatic theology in this direction are clear. But if these claims are justified, then to this fundamental right there corresponds a fundamental duty, which may not be evaded by cheap talk about 'practical division of labour' or 'avoiding duplication of labour'. That is to say, then: it is the business of dogmatic theology itself comprehensively and with uniform thoroughness to establish the authentic foundations of the Christian Can, Ought and May: to answer the question, 'What must I do that I may enter into eternal life?' All dogmatic theology can say is that moral theology should concern itself with what, once this answer is presupposed, remains to be done. Suppose there is a science which tries as closely as possible to listen to and understand and, whatever its situation might be, to appropriate what God has said; suppose too that this understanding and appropriating science of Listening is called dogmatic theology; now God's utterance contains both the one indissolubly actual Truth (always and in every case – not just facts plus circumambient 'ideals') and the Love to be actualized (always and in every case): then it follows that dogmatic theology cannot be made into something morally neutral. But then we must ask with some bewilderment why current dogmatic treatises treat of this or that notably moral topic (quite correctly) and (quite problematically) abandon others to moral theology, where they are treated of in a manner notably – moralistic. If this state of affairs is considered, there will be no difficulty in seeing the justification for inserting a number of themes into this sketch for a dogmatic treatise.

The status of theologia fundamentalis as an independent discipline alongside of or prior to dogmatic theology can, or perhaps better must, be granted and recognized. Moreover if a dogmatic theology grasps its own nature as something supported by the faith which comprehends and judges all things but is judged by no other court and is beyond the comprehension of reason (in the sense of a superior tribunal), then it is clear that dogmatic theology must develop out of itself and within itself a theology of theologia fundamentalis. It [18] For instance, how much importance is given in current moral theology to Scriptural themes such as the Pauline conception of freedom, the imitation of Christ, charismata, the Beatitudes, being crucified with Christ and so on?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

must, that is to say, declare as a part of its own proper discourse, the existence, mode and [18] meaning of a rational demonstration of the faith from without and with a view to those without, as possible and necessary. Dogmatic theology does not execute this demonstration; but it autonomously determines the possibility, the sense and the limits of such a demonstration. We call this task of dogmatic theology fundamental theology, which is not to be confused with what is currently known as theologia fundamentalis. Such a fundamental theology has to consider in like manner both the subjective and the objective aspects of this possibility of a theologia fundamentalis.

Where (as is the case in dogmatic theology) a unified and yet incomprehensibly manifold reality has to be expounded, the primary axiom of which is the infinite Incomprehensibility of God, the overlapping of individual themes is unavoidable; and it is impossible to lay down a single logically compelling scheme which is simply the best. There is no need to be frightened of such overlapping: it does no harm for the whole to return in every part. Extremely plain and lucid schemata in dogmatic theology are only purchased in exchange for an impoverishment of points of view. On the other hand it may very well contribute to the elucidation of the plenitude of reality contained in a truth and reality of faith if 'the same thing' is treated of in different places, as though it had apparently been divided up. For instance, one does not really do justice to the central place of the Mass as Sacrifice of the Church and in the Church, to treat of the Eucharist as one of the seven sacraments and take the occasion to speak of it as being a sacrifice too (if possible after it has already been discussed as a sacrament). Thus it can very well be maintained that the general theory of the sacraments should form part of the dogmatic theology of the Church,[19] and that the individual sacraments should be treated of according to their appropriate places in the Christian life. Enough of introductory remarks. Some attempt will be made to clarify particular points in the notes.

[19] If this is not done, no genuine principle is available for determining the essential structure common to the sacraments. Consequently the De Sacramentis in genere can be regarded only from the point of view of the individual sacraments, and infant baptism becomes in fact the unique model of a sacrament as such. The result of this is that all the sacraments are monotonously discussed according to one and the same pattern, the existential side of the sacrament (with the striking exception of Penance) is given no clear place 'by rights', and the essential differences between the individual sacraments (cf. Denz 848, a text which is hardly ever explored theologically) are obscured.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[19]

A SCHEME FOR A TREATISE OF DOGMATIC THEOLOGY

DIVISION ONE: FORMAL AND FUDNAMENTAL THEOLOGY

Part One: Formal Theology

A. The Fundamental Relationship between God and Creature[1]

B. The General Possibility of Revelation to the World

I. The God of a possible Revelation: the divine character of Revelation

1. The transcendent God. Transcendence and Revelation.[2]
2. God's Freedom in Revelation (Revelation as Grace).
3. The Content of Revelation and Revelation as Act. The essential and the existential character of God's speech. [20]
4. God's speech and deed: verbum efficax.
5. The 'personal' relationship between God and man arising from God's Call. Revelation as formal prototype of God's supernatural love of grace, in which he discloses himself.

II. Revelation in the world: Revelation as belonging to the world.

1. The Revelation of the Absolute in the finite, conditioned and temporal.
   Revelation in space and time.
   The Activity of Salvation and space-time.
2. The Historicity of Revelation.
   Saving history.
   'Tradition'.

---

[1] So far as this is possible in advance (although what is involved is a permanent feature of all we know concretely by faith about God and the world), the point here is to determine the formal nature of that fundamental relationship between God and the world which may serve as standard for the whole of theology in its treatment of particular questions: God as the ever greater God, who is never contained within a formula derived from the world ('Deus semper major'; cf. Denz 432). To this ever greater God the world is always open, without being able of itself to capture him in this openness; the world, as what has been created by God's free love, and which in spite of its radical finitude and contingency, is no mere negative quantity before God and over against him (so that here a protective wall is to be set up against that danger which always threatens pure ontology, of conceiving finite beings as mere 'limitation' of a pure Being – a view with which a really eternal validity of the world before God is no longer compatible); the basic Christian law that nearness to God and distance from him increase in direct (and not in inverse) proportion, that the means by which God shows forth his divinity among us is the very fact that we are and become.

[2] Following on from A, the point here is to develop the theological concept of divine transcendence, which is not simply identical with that of a philosophical doctrine of God. To this there would have to be added a close examination of the concept of a revelation of God which need not be identical with the (creation of the) world but which is uttered by God to the world: the examination, that is, of the concept of a revelation which is not the world but takes place in the world, and takes place through the Word. The Word would have to be exhibited as a reality the place of which in the self-disclosure of the transcendent God can be taken by absolutely nothing belonging to the intramundane realm of the created or the creatable.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Revelation as essential and as existential.
4. The social character of Revelation, 'Church'.
5. The symbolic order.
   a. Sign, word, image, concept, myth, symbol. The nature, possibility and limits of revelation by word. Revelation and mysticism.
   Revelation and gnosis.
   b. Miracle (as 'sign' of the sign).
   c. The sacramental character of God's Word in general.
6. Provisional and definitive Revelation (the history of Revelation). The formal distinction between Old and New Covenants. Definitive Revelation: Revelation as an eschatological value; the two aions.
7. Revelation as Mysterium.

III. Revelation in the Bearer of Revelation.

1. The idea of the Prophet.
2. The idea of the Mediator.
3. The idea of enduring Revelation: Church. [21]

IV. Revelation in the apprehending subject.

1. The power to hear Revelation: man's constitution as a power to apprehend Revelation.
   a. The power of hearing as nature.[3]
   b. The power of hearing as effect of grace.
2. Hearing.
   a. Hearing as apprehension of inner and outer Word (corresponding to God's speech and deed in Revelation). Appropriation of the tidings: Faith.
   b. The formal relationship between nature and grace, reason and faith (the meaning and limits of Apologetics).
   c. The historical, social and symbolic order, in the ever new and changing subject who apprehends (development of dogma).
   d. The freedom to hear or not to hear, and the possibility of rebellion: the supernatural in itself as a cross of nature.
3. Stages of hearing. Faith – gnosis.

C. The Idea of a Redemptive Revelation

Transposition of the formal Revelation relationship to a new mode, the order of sin and redemption.

I. Redemptive Revelation as proceeding from God.

1. Modification of the 'content' of Revelation.
   a. The Revelation of Wrath and Judgment, and hence of man's situation as one lost.
   b. The Revelation of atoning grace.
2. Modification of the mode in which Revelation is manifested.
   a. Revelation as 'Law'; as 'scandal'; as 'Judgment'.

[3] Cf. K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich 1941). ('Hören' means both to hear and to listen to. – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. Revelation as kenosis and extinction: theologia crucis.

II. The form of the Mediator as Redeemer.

III.The hearer of Revelation as a sinner in need of redemption.

1. Sinfulness as unwillingness to hear Revelation.
2. The transformation of the sinner into a hearer: the grace of faith as submission and obedience. [22]
3. The qualification of the historical, social and symbolic orders, and of the two aions.

D. The Idea of Theology as Science

I. 'Theology'; Revelation, Proclamation, Faith and Theology.

II. Theology as grace.

III.Theology as rational system.

IV.Theology and revealed 'sources' (Scripture – Tradition).

V. Theology and the magisterium.

VI. Theologia viatoris – theologia peccatoris – theologia crucis in rational theology.

VII.Theology and theologies.
The typology of theologies.
The theological meaning of the history of theology.

VIII. Dogmatic theology in the narrower sense as a discipline within theology.

Part Two: Fundamental Theology

(Revelation within a concrete civilization, already in existence)
The Differentiation of Roman Catholic Christianity from other forms of religion

A. Phenomenology of religion in general

Nature, existence, justification.
Theology – Philosophy of religion – History of religion – Phenomenology of religion – Psychology of religion.

B. 'Religion' and the individual's approach to it
Principles by which the true religion may be distinguished

The general question of truth in matters of religion.
The possibility of a decision.
The obligation of a decision, of profession, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Existential criteria of decision. [23]

C. Phenomenology of non-Christian religions

I. Phenomenology of religious forms.
II. The Meaning of religious forms and of the history of religions from the point of view of the theology of history.
The Theology of the history of religions.
III. Christianity as the total religion.

D. Phenomenology of Christianity

I. Human religion from below and Christianity as a religion instituted by revelation.
The claim to absoluteness.
Syncretism and complexio oppositorum.
II. Christ the Founder (legatus divinus as a concept of Apologetics).
III. The Church. Notes of the true Church in the world.

E. Phenomenology of Christian heresies

I. The philosophical and theological theory of heresy.
1. The possibility of error.
2. Heresy in the Church.
   a. As yet undifferentiated: tendencies of schools. Faith and gnosis, etc.
   b. In the precise sense: secret heresy.
3. Heresy as splitting off from the Church.
   Heresy and truth in faith.
   Heresy and unity in love.

II. Heresies as opinions and as churches, in the light of the theology of history.

F. Phenomenology of Roman Catholic Christianity

G. The theory of the individual's approach to the true religion

I. The possibility and limits of such a theory (in the graced mode of existence proper to faith).
II. Interior grace and external criteria in the recognition of the duty of faith.
III. Naive and scientific proofs. The meaning of scientific apologetics for the individual believer or pagan.

[24]

DIVISION TWO: SPECIAL DOGMATIC THEOLOGY

Part One: Man (and his world) as a nature with a supernatural finality[4]

A. Creatureliness as such[5]

[4] It is impossible to speak here either of man alone, or with such generality of created being in general that man is not the end in view. It is the single reality of all created being that is meant, but in such a way that we have to see it from the point of view of humanity; and this precisely in the sense that this reality is prior to the order of sin and redemption, and furthermore persists in that order (though admittedly transposed into a different key).
[5] 'Creatureliness' is not here a characterization of Nature in so far as this is distinguished from Grace and the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I. Createdness (Creation and conservation).
II. The freedom of God's creative act.
III . The temporal mode of created being.
IV . The finitude of created being. The finite creature as a positive quantity.
V. God's transcendence and omnipotence as regards all created being.
VI. The formal doctrine of the ends of creation and of created being.
VII. The unity and interconnectedness of all created being.[6]

B. Man as a unity (of 'nature' and 'supernature')

I. The single concrete end; supernaturality as the ultimate form of man in the concrete.
1. The concrete end and the obligation it imposes.
2. The supernaturality of this end. [25]

II. 'Nature' as 'remainder' and genuine, but still formal, 'possibility'.[7]
The diversity and interconnectedness of statements about these two aspects of 'nature'.

C. 'Nature'

I. The possibility of a theology of nature
1. In terms of an immediate revelation of 'natural' truths.
2. In terms of a 'preservation' and 'interpretation' by revelation and the magisterium of truths known naturally. The possibility of a 'neutral' theological anthropology.

II. Nature: Man.

1. The inner dimensions of man.
a. Man as person.
(i) The immediacy to God of man as person (individualism; creationism).
(ii) Intellectuality and freedom.
(iii) Logic and ethics.
b. Man as 'nature' (a bodily, spatio-temporal person).
(i) Spiritual personality as belonging to nature.
(ii) The theology of the corporeality of the human person.
(iii) The theology of the duality of the sexes.
(iv) The theology of the states and events of human life.
Birth.
Age.
Eating and drinking.
Work.
Seeing, hearing, etc. Speech, silence, laughter, tears.

---

supernatural finality of all created being; it is a fundamental property of all reality other than God, prior to the distinction between Nature and Grace: indeed it achieves its fullest realization in the order of supernatural grace, because 'creatureliness' is not a merely negative expression.

[6] It is not just the unity of the material cosmos, of humanity, etc., that is meant here, but a unity to which the angels belong too. It would be really worthwhile to attempt to state in properly ontological terms how far the angels, in spite of their 'pure' intellectuality, belong to the world by their very nature, contrary to certain neo-Platonic tendencies in theology.

[7] See pp. 297-317, below.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The arts (music, dance, etc.)
The basic achievements of the intellectual life.
Civilization.
Death (as a natural phenomenon).
The natural 'other-world [8] [26]

2. The outer dimensions: the world.
   a. The human realm.
      (i) The theology of marriage and of the family.
      (ii) The theology of race and of the state, and of the plurality of races.
      (iii) The theology of humanity.
         The unity of the human race (Adam as a natural reality).
         The purposive unity of human history: the formal theology of history.
   b. The realm below man: the theology of Nature.
      (i) The theology of physics and biology: the overt manifestations of Nature.
      (ii) Nature as symbol.
      (iii) Magic and taboo (Nature and the spirit world).
         Spiritualism, etc., sorcery.
   c. The realm above man.
      (i) The existence and nature of the angelic world.
      (ii) The angelic world and the human world (as a natural unity).

3. Nature: Man and God.
   a. God as knowable from the world and man.
   b. The theology of the ('natural') Creator-God.
      (i) The formal doctrine of God (his 'necessary' attributes).
      (ii) The material-existential doctrine of God: his free countenance to the world.
         Wrath; love; the alternation of the two; his general purpose of salvation, etc.
   c. God and man.
      (i) God over man: his omnipotence; providence; predestination.
      (ii) Man under God: religion.
         Freedom and God's omnipotence. [27]

D. The Supernatural dimension of human reality

I. The God of the order of supernatural life and revelation.

1. The three Persons of the Godhead as an economy.
   Three different modes of relatedness of the graced man to God.
   a. Spirit.
   b. Son.
   c. Father.
2. The three Persons in God as immanently constituting the absoluteness of the supernatural world.

[8] We are thinking here of a theology of man's ontological condition, in so far as he loses his bodily place in the world of space and time when he dies, and yet belongs to the world; he is not simply withdrawn from the world and its conditions, but continues to belong to it in reciprocal action and reaction, all this without prejudice to the question whether his final condition as an individual person is blessedness or damnation. This would also be the place to clarify such questions as the ontological presuppositions for the possibility of Purgatory, of the 'poena sensus', and the significance of general eschatology for the individual in spite of the individual judgment.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a. The three Persons:
   (i) Father.
   (ii) Son.
   (iii) Spirit.
b. The formal doctrine of the Trinity.

II. Participation in the Trinitarian life of God.

1. Supernatural sanctification (de gratia habituali)
   a. Gratia increata: participation in God.
   b. Created habitual grace.
   c. Grace as original state.
      (i) The grace of the angels and the grace of Paradise.
      (ii) The dona praeternaturalia as consequences of the grace of Paradise. 'Paradise.'
      (iii) The supernatural unity in Adam of the human race, in itself and with the angels.
2. The active accomplishment of supernatural sanctification.
   a. The life of the human spirit and supernatural grace in general: The necessity, nature and formal object of 'actual' grace; how far we may be aware of it.
   b. Logic and supernatural grace: faith.
   c. Ethics and supernatural grace:
      Hope and Love.
      The supernatural moral virtues.
   d. Growth in grace (merit), stages in the development of moral life. [28]
   e. The basic specifications of the spiritual life: vita activa and vita contemplate
   f. God's supralapsarian economy of Grace.

III. The Mediator: the God-man.[9]

1. The theology of the God-man.
   a. The God-man. Unio hypostatica; communicatio idiomatum, etc.
   b. The consequences of the hypostatic union for Christ's human nature.
   c. Christ's 'offices'.
   d. The general significance of the hypostatic union in its onto-logical-metaphysical and ethical aspects.

[9] No difficulty will be found in granting that our scheme for inserting the doctrine of the Trinity into a theology of the sanctification of man need do no injury to the intrinsic value of the former topic, if it is remembered that the interior life of the Blessed Trinity is revealed to us just because and in so far as our redemption and sanctification have been revealed to us. It will readily be admitted that it is only by drawing into close connexion the doctrines of grace and the Trinity that the empty formalism of the average modern teaching on the Trinity can be overcome. More problematic (it must be admitted) is the suggested treatment of Christology under the head of theological anthropology. But it must be remembered that Christology is taken up again from the point of view of the Redemption. Christology more easily avoids the appearance, otherwise not easily avoidable, of the mythological and the miraculous, when the Incarnation of the Logos (granting its uniqueness and gratuitousness, and its imprevisibility from this world) is seen as the supreme realization of that fundamental relationship which prevails between God and the spiritual creation in general. In this context Christ's Person and Office are more clearly seen in their unity. And finally a viewpoint 'quoad nos', of an anthropological kind, need not conceal the structures of reality 'in se', of a different kind; rather it can release them more fully than a treatment which proceeds from the first in the most objectivistic way possible. See pp. 149-200, below.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a. The participation of humanity in the Mediator.
   a. Mary's divine Motherhood. Mary as the representative of humanity. The fundamental principle of Mariology.[10]
   b. The supernatural unity of humanity in Christ (the mystical Body of Christ in its universality). [29]
   c. The unity of all creation in Christ.
      (i) Christ and the world below man.
      (ii) Christ and the angels.

Part Two: Fall and Redemption

A. Sin

I. The nature of Sin.

II. The fall of the angels.

1. In itself.
   a. The fact. Its nature.
   b. Eternal reprobation.
2. The cosmic and anthropological consequences of the fall of the angels: potestas diaboli; the demonization of Nature (idolatry).

III. Original culpability.
1. The Fall.
2. Original Sin. The kingdom of sin. Sin and death.

IV. The sins of men.
1. The possibility and the fact of personal sins.
2. The state of sin.
3. Social sins other than the sin of the human race.

B. God and Sin

I. The Wrath of God.

II. Reprobation and hell.

III. Sin as something positive before (and through) God alone ('felix culpa').

IV. God's saving purpose after the Fall.

1. His general saving purpose.
2. His differential saving purpose.
   (Sufficient and efficacious grace after the Fall, predestination.)

[30]

[10] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Le Principe fondamentale de la théologie mariale', RSR XLII (1954) pp. 481-522.– Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

C. The Redeemer

I. The theology of the history of humanity up to the time of the Redeemer.
1. Primitive revelation and the revealed content of the world religions.
2. From Adam to Abraham. The 'natural law'; paganism.
3. The theology of the nature and history of the Old Covenant. Salvation under the Law.
4. The fullness of time.

II. The Incarnation as redemption ('physical' redemption).
1. As establishing the reconciling Mediator.
2. As assumptio carnis peccati, the acceptance in principle of death and the consecration of humanity.

III. The theology of the human life of Our Lord.
1. The general theology of the life of Jesus.
   a. The events of Jesus' life as 'model'.
   b. The events of Jesus' life as 'mysteries'.
2. The theology of individual events in the life of Jesus.

IV. The theology of the Cross.
1. The Cross as Jesus' reality in his own eyes: the Way of kenosis and of glory (Christ's merit for himself).
2. The Cross as vicarious sacrifice and expiation for humanity (the Cross as merit for others).
3. The descent into hell.

V. The theology of the glorified Lord.

D. The Church of Christ

I. Christ and the Church.

1. The Church and Christ as incarnate Logos.
   The Church and consecrated humanity.
   Christ as the Head who dispenses grace (gratia capitis; the sanctifying function of Christ's humanity).
2. The Church and Christ as legatus divinus.
   The Church as Christ's foundation.
   The Church as Christ's authority (speaking).
   The Church as Christ's obedience (hearing). [31]
3. The relation between the two.
4. The extent of the Church's realm.

II. The basic structure of the Church: the total sacrament of Christ. The effectual visibility of her life, her truth and her grace.

III. The sacramentality of the Church in her essential offices (the shape of the Church).
1. The presence of Christ's truth.
   a. Tradition: as conservation of truth;
   as ever new effective presence of Revelation;
   as history and development of Revelation.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. The teaching office as authoritative articulation of Tradition (bearers, sources, report, extent of the teaching office, infallibility, limits, etc.).
c. The Scriptures.
(i) as Word of God; inspiration.[11]
(ii) as the Book of the Church (the Scriptures in the Church and over the Church).
(iii) as ever new truth (typical, spiritual sense, etc.).

2. The presence of Christ's will: jurisdiction and law.
a. The existence of divine law in the Church, and the bearers of this law.
b. Ius humanum in the Church's law.
c. The formal character peculiar to the New Testament law of the Church as opposed to secular and Old Testament law.

3. The presence of Christ's grace in the Church.
a. The Church as total sacrament.
Membership of the Church as 'res et sacramentum' of grace and salvation.
b. The Mass as central mysterium of the Church, in which she realizes herself totally towards God, Christ and her members.
(i) The Mass as Christ's effective presence in the Church.
(ii) The Mass as sacrifice.
(iii) The Mass as realization of the Church.
c. The articulation of the mysterium of the Church in individual sacraments (de sacramentis in genere). [32]
Their mode of efficacy (opus operatum).
Ministers of the sacraments.
Opus operatum and opus operands.
The sacraments and Christ.
The sacraments and the Church. 'Character sacramentalis'.
The sacraments as signs of Him that cometh.
d. The sanctification of the whole sphere of the profane through the Church.

IV. The inner shape of the Church.

1. The relation between 'exterior' and 'interior' hierarchy.
2. Christ as Head ('firstborn among many brethren') of the interior Church.
3. Mary as perfection of the Church.
a. The Immaculate Conception; freedom from sin.
b. Co-patient and co-agent in our Redemption.
c. Assumed into heaven.
d. Mediatrix of all graces.
4. The Biblical fathers of the Church:
Patriarchs and prophets (the 'sages' of old).
The Baptist.
The Apostles, Joseph.
5. States of life in the Church in general.
6. Gnostics and charismatics.
7. The saints and the veneration of saints.
8. The extra-sacramental life of grace as a life of the Church ('spiritual reception' of the Sacraments).

V.The Church of sinners[12]: the erring Church.

[11] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Über die Schriftinspiration', ZKT LXXVIII (1956), pp. 137-68. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the sinful Church.

VI. Historical theology of the Church.

1. The ontology and gnoseology needed for a theological consideration of the history of the Church.
   Sources: prophecy, experience. Subject, etc.
2. The formal theology of history. [33]
   a. The possibility of theologically assigning the Church's history into periods.
   b. Historical forces in the history of the Church.
   c. The eschatological achievement of the Church's history.
   d. The 'growth' and 'development' of the Church (extensively and intensively).
   e. The 'decrease' of the Church (intensively and extensively).
   f. Concepts such as 'Renaissance', 'Reformations', 'Persecution'.

3. The material theology of the Church's history.
   a. The Church ex Iudaeis. The annulment and persistence of the Old Covenant.
   b. The Church of the Gentiles.
   c. The Church in the Roman Empire.
   d. The World Church.
   e. The Church of the last days, Antichrist, etc.
   f. The 'Church' of eternity.
      (i) The Church and the definitive establishment of the kingdom of God.
      (ii) The suffering and the triumphant Church.

E. The Theological Anthropology of the Redeemed

I. The general nature of Christian morality.
1. The basic norm (norma honestatis supernaturalis [hominis lapsi et reparati]).
2. Law and freedom.
3. Conscience and guidance by the Holy Spirit.

II. Dying with Christ.
1. The interior process of justification.
   The precise character of penitential conversion (and consequently of life after it) in contrast to the 'ideal' virtues of 'pure' supernature.
   a. The faith (of 'unbelievers' and 'sinners').
   b. Metanoia; dying.
   c. Love.
   d. The graciousness and gratuitousness of 'vocation'.
2. Baptism as the sacramental visibility of this process. [34]
3. Life dying (mortified, hidden) with Christ as form of the Christian life (vita contemplativa as a Christian category).
   a. As a form of life common to all Christians.
      The nature of Christian ascetism[13] (the Sermon on the Mount, following in the [12] Cf. K. Rahner, Die Kirche der Sünder (Freiburg 1948); Flemish translation Kerk der Zondaren (ingeleid door F. Fransen, Antwerp 1952). In this Flemish edition a more precise account is given of what is meant, and with what restrictions, by the phrase 'erring Church'.

---

[13] Cf. e.g. K. Rahner, 'Passion und Aszese', Geist und Leben XXII (1949) pp. 15-36; 'Zur Theologie der

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation footsteps of the Crucified, etc.).

b. As monasticism: the representation of Christian life in monasticism; the evangelical counsels.
c. As mysticism considered as a form of asceticism.[14]
d. As martyrdom as a quasi-sacramental visibility of the Christian form of life.
e. Christian 'asceticism' in the face of the great secular complexes (State, civilization, etc.).

III. Living out of Christ (vita activa; divine life as manifest in human life).
Mission into the world by the Spirit who becomes manifest in Christians.
1. The general mission.
a. Apostolate (witness, etc.) as a basic Christian attitude.
b. Confirmation as the sacramental visibility of mission.
c. Martyrdom as witness which overcomes the world.
2. Individual vocation.
a. Charisms in general; professions; choice of a profession.
b. The free charisms. Marriage. The widow.
d. Ordination and the priesthood. [35]
3. The ultimate relation between vita activa and vita contemplativa.
4. The idea of Christian perfection.

IV. The central sacrament of the Christian life: the Eucharist as the sacramental connexion between II and III.
1. Continuing participation in Christ's death.
2. Life in the Church.
3. Communio mundi; the transformation of the world.
4. 'Spiritual' communion.
5. 'Eucharistic piety'.

V. The Christian's struggle with sin.
1. The Christian's sinfulness.
a. Concupiscence.
b. Temptation by the world and the devil.
c. 'Venial' sin.
2. The consciousness of sin.
3. The possibility of the loss of grace.
a. The grave sins of the Christian.
b. Unbelief.
4. The possibility of the repeated remission of sins.
5. The struggle with sin.
a. The personal acts of the Christian (penance, contrition, attrition, etc., metanola as an habitual attitude, prayer for perseverance).

---

evangelischen Rate', Orientierung XVII (1953), pp. 252-5 (see also vol. III of these studies).

[14] This would be the place to inquire into the nature of mysticism, in so far as it is not just a psychological phenomenon but something specifically Christian. If asceticism is conceived not as a moral drill, but as participation in our Lord's Passion and Death (and as their practice), it follows as a further consequence that mysticism is a renunciatory asceticism in faith practised by the spiritual person: not an anticipation of the beatific vision but an entry into the Passion of the Lord (through 'passive purification of the spirit', through the 'night' of the senses and of the spirit). Thus it follows that mysticism is to be conceived in terms of asceticism and not vice versa, assuming that something generally Christian is understood by both concepts.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. The necessity of remedial grace for the justified.
c. The sacramentality of ecclesiastical penance.
d. Indulgences.

6. Concern for salvation in general.
   a. Hope and trust.
   b. The hiddenness of salvation.
   c. The grace of perseverance.

VI. The theology of death.[15]

1. The supernatural dimensions of death.
   a. The supernatural character of death in general in the present dispensation. [36]
   b. Death as punishment. First and second death and their relationship.
   c. Death as dying with Christ and redemption.
   d. Death as supernatural consummation and as supernatural separation from this world.
2. The sacramentality of dying: extreme unction.
3. Individual death as the beginning of the Last Things, as judgment.
   a. The possibility of eternal reprobation.
   b. Hell as private destiny.[16]
   c. The definitive character of union with God.

F. Eschatology

I. The theological gnoseology of eschatological statements considered in their possibility and their limits.[17]

II. The Eschata.

1. The new Aion as a whole.
   a. The transformation of time.
   b. The transformation of matter.
   c. The consummation of the spirit.
   d. The consummation of the new aion.
2. The relation between individual eschatology and collective eschatology. [37]
3. The relation between the present and the future aion.
4. The individual elements of Eschatology.
   a. The Return of Christ.

---

[15] Death must first of all be seen as something which takes place in this Christian world here and now, as a part of the Christian life. However much it may be the end of the whole of life, it is also an inner reality within the whole; so that our whole life through we are dying into our death. Death must not be left out of account by immediately looking forward to what properly comes after it. For some reflexions on the whole theme of Christian death, see K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie des Todes', Synopsis, no. 3 (Hamburg 1949), pp. 87-112. (See also by the same author 'Zur Theologie des Todes', ZKT LXXIX (1957), pp. 1-44. Also printed separately. – Tr.)

[16] 'Private' in a twofold sense, as applying to the destiny of the individual, and as applying to the destiny of this individual, condemned to a loveless isolation by his own fault. 'Individual' eschatology is intentionally introduced here, before Eschatology, so as to make it clear in this way too that Eschatology is fundamentally 'general' eschatology and thus that something essential remains to be said over and above 'special' eschatology.

[17] It would be necessary here to discuss the question whether these limits are the same for 'Heaven' and for 'Hell', or whether (what would be more correct) we are bound in certain respects to deny this. This would then have to be kept in mind when in what follows the two final states are treated of in succession as though they were on the same level.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. The Resurrection of the body. The general Judgment.
d. Hell as the collective destiny of the ‘Corpus diaboli’.
e. Heaven as the eternal kingdom of God the Father.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3

THE DEVELOPMENT OF DOGMA

Many of the Church's doctrines are characterized by the fact that they have not always been present in the Church and in her consciousness in faith in an expressly apprehensible form. The bodily Assumption of our Lady into Heaven is an example of this which touches us especially closely today. This doctrine has not always been in existence as an explicit statement; at any rate we today cannot grasp it or point to it as something in the past with a persistent identity; it seems not to have been proposed to the faith of every age with the clarity, the precision, the definiteness and the binding character which it has today. That is to say it has – in a certain sense – 'developed', it has, in a sense still to be determined, 'come to be' within the course of Christian history, for when the Gospel was first preached this doctrine was not to be found in its present form.

But if we are to gain a true understanding of this doctrine (and all those others which are characterized by such a 'development'), we are forced to make some fundamental reflexions on the meaning, the possibility and the limits of such a 'development of dogma' in general.[1]

[1] We cannot do more here than offer a few summary indications. Without writing a whole book on the subject it is clearly out of the question to consider the history of the doctrine of development, or to take up positions with regard to the particular theories defended by theologians today. Consequently we cite only a selection of the relevant literature (omitting purely historical studies), above all the more important works or those which treat the subject with special reference to the new dogma. General works: J. H. Newman, An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, 1845 and (notably revised by Newman) 1878; J. B. Franzelin, De divina Traditione et Scriptura[4], Rome 1896; J. Bainvel, 'Histoire d'un dogme', Etudes CI (5904), pp. 612-32; Ch. Pesch, Glaube, Dogmen und historische Tatsachen (Theologische Zeitfragen IV), Freiburg 1908; A. Gardeil, Le Donné Revélé et la theologie[2], Paris 1910; A. Rademacher, Der Entwicklungsgedanke in Religion und Dogma, Cologne 1914; M. Tuyaerts, L'Evolution du dogme, Lyons 1919; R. M. Schultes, Introductio in historiam dogmatum, Paris 1922 (with a valuable bibliography, pp. 149-52); F. Marin-Sola, L'Evolution homogène du dogme catholique I and II[2], Fribourg 1924; H. Dieckmann, De Ecclesia II, Freiburg 1925; L. de Grandmaison, Le Dogme chrétien, Paris 1928; H. Pinard, art. 'Dogme', DAFC I, 1122-84; E. Dublanchy, art. 'Dogme', DTC IV, 1574-650; L. Charlier, Essai sur le problème théologique Thuilles 1938 (on the Index); Fidel García Martinez, 'A proposito de la Llamada "fe ecclesiastica": ¿Debe ser admitida en teologia?', Miscelanea Comillas VI (Santander 1946), pp. 9-45; J. Hocedez, Histoire de la théologie au XIXe siècle III, Brussels 1947, pp. 161-72; H. de Lubac, 'Le Problème du développement du dogme', RSR XXXV (1948), pp. 530-60; E. Seiterich, 'Das kirchliche Verständnis der Dogmenentwicklung', Oberrhein. Pastoralblatt (1952), pp. 225-31, 255-63; E. Dhanis, 'Révélation explicite et implicite', Gregorianum XXXIV (1953) pp. 187-237 (further references p. 226 s.). See also *Lo sviluppo del dogma secondo la dottrina cattolica. Relazioni lette nella seconda settimana teologica 24-28 settembre 19*51, Rome 1953. We cannot here go into the studies by Flick, Spiazzi, Rambaldi, Bea, Balic, Filograssi, Dhanis and Boyer assembled there, as this essay was already complete when they appeared.

Works with special reference to the dogma of the Assumption (the general question is often only touched on here): L. Carli, 'La definibilità dommatica dell'Assunzione di Maria', Marianum VIII (1945), pp. 59-77; C. Balic, De definibilitate Assumptionis B.V.M. in coelum, Rome 1945 (=Antonianum XXI (1946), pp. 3-67); E. Sauras, 'Definibilidad de la Asunción de la Santissima Virgen', Estudios Marianos VI (1947), pp. 23-44; C. Colombo, 'La definibilità dommatica dell'Assunzione di Maria SS. nella teologia recente', La Scuola Cattolica LXXV (1947), pp. 265-81; LXXVI (1948), pp. 1-16; J. Ternus, Der gegenwärtige Stand der Assumptafrage, Regensburg 1948; G. M. Paris, 'De definibilitate dogmatica assumptionis corporeae B.M.V. in coelum', Divus Thomas (Plac) LI (1948), pp. 354-5; G. Philips, 'Autour de la définibilité d'un dogme', Marianum X (1948), pp. 81-111; R. Garrigou-Lagrange, 'L'Assomption est-elle formellement révélée de façon implicite?', Doctor Communis (Acta Pont. Acad. Rom. S. Thomae) I (1948), pp. 28-63; C. Dillenschneider, 'L'Assomption corporelle de Marie', Etudes Mariales VI (1948), pp. 13-55 (further references given); J. Filograssi, 'Traditio divino-apostolica et Assumptio B.M.V.', Gregorianum XXX (1949) pp. 481-9; C. Balic, 'De Assumptione B.V. Mariae quatenus in deposito fidei continetur', Antonianum XXIV (1949), pp. 553-82; C. Koser, 'Cualificación

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course this is a heavy undertaking, because whatever the [41] general meaning, possibility and limits of a development of dogma may be, they cannot be deduced with the necessary exactness and precision from general theological considerations alone but must be arrived at inductively from the actual facts of such a development. In itself this is not remarkable: we discover the possible from the real. We discover the laws of development of a living thing – and of something spiritually alive too, regarded as a process of spiritual unfolding – from its actual development. But in our case this has its special difficulties; for the living spirit with which we are concerned here appears in its authentic form in a solitary instance: the unique historical fortune of the Gospel of Christ under the direction of that Spirit which leads us into all truth, from the time of Christ himself to the moment when by his return faith will be transformed into the vision of God, face to face. We have here a homogeneous process of which there is just one instance. Certainly it has its laws, with which it emerged from the very beginning; it takes place according to laws promulgated at the very beginning, by which it remains bound for ever and ever and which are in force throughout the whole course of a history that has been guaranteed by the Spirit. Moreover laws certainly exist which may be observed in a section of this total process, and which can then be applied to other (later) phases and partial developments. The perfected law of dogmatic development however may only be laid down when the whole unique process has reached its term. And because it is a genuinely historical process, under the impulse of the Spirit of God, who never makes himself accessible without remainder to laws which can be grasped by human minds, it is never just the working out of a formula and an all-embracing law. [42] It is manifestly erroneous a priori to attempt to construct an adequate formula of this kind, and by this means to master the single sense of this process and combat possible 'deviations' as false developments. The historical course of the development of dogma is itself the process in which its own mystery is progressively unveiled. It is in the very act of developing, and not in any prior reflexion, that the living reality of the Church's consciousness in faith comes progressively into a fuller possession of itself. Let us suppose that in the development of the doctrine of the Assumption, for example, forms and properties of the development of dogma become apparent which cannot be demonstrated with the same clarity in other phases and sectors of this development; these properties may even clearly be of a kind which do not harmonize with the accounts of development given in the ordinary theological treatment (not of course in the authoritative pronouncements of the Church). Yet this would not indicate any false development here, a 'rank growth' in the development of doctrine; at most it would be a sign that the scheme proposed in the average treatment requires to be improved, qualified or enlarged.

An anxious theologian may enquire, 'How are we to get anywhere, if no adequate laws of this development can be formulated? Are we not leaving the field open to the rankest teológica de la Asunción', Actas del Congresso Asuncionistico Franciscano de America Latina (Buenos Aires 1949), pp. 329-53; H. Rondet, 'La Définibilité de l'Assomption. Questions de methode', Etudes Mariales VI (1949), pp. 59-95; J. Filograssi, 'Theologia catholica et Assumptio B.M.V.', Gregorianum XXXI (1950), pp. 323-60; J. F. Bonnefoy, 'L'Assomption de la T. S. Vierge est-elle définissable comme révélée "formaliter implicite"?', Marianum XII (1950), pp. 194-226; J. Filograssi, 'Constitutio Apostolica "Munificentissimus Deus" de Assumptione B.M.V.', Gregorianum XXXI (1950), pp. 483-525; B. Capelle, 'Théologie de l'Assomption d'après la bulle "Munificentissimus Deus", NRT LXXXII (1950), pp. 1009-27; M. Labourdette and M.-J. Nicolas, 'La définition de l'Assomption', RTL (1950); C. Colombo, 'La Constituzione dommatica "Munificentissimus Deus" e la Teologia', La Scuola Cattolica LXXIX (1951); J. Ternus, 'Theologische Erwägungen zur Bulle "Munificentissimus Deus", Scholastik XXVI (1951), pp. 11-35; A. Kolping, 'Zur theologischen Erkenntnismethode anlässlich der Definition der leiblichen Aufnahme Mariens in den Himmel', Divus Thomas (Fribourg) XXIX (1951) pp. 81-105. Further literature in: Marianum XII (1950) Supplementum, nn. 396-434 (pp. 37-39); C. Balic, Testimonia de Assumptione B.V.M. Pars Altera. Rome 1950, pp. 442-5; E. Dhanis, loc. cit., pp. 226 s.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

proliferations of pseudo-theological speculation and callow visionary enthusiasm?' The answer is that this danger, one which is involved in all human experience, is not going to be realized for three reasons. In the first place there are of course certain laws of dogmatic development which, because they are known a priori (we shall discuss this later), may be applied to 'developments' in an obvious way – though certainly with prudence – in order to determine whether they are genuine developments of the faith of the Church or on the other hand contain the danger of a wrong turning. Such laws do exist, even if they can be applied only in the Church and in the last resort only by the Church herself; for applications made by individual Christians and theologians are never more than appeals to the Church herself, who consequently has to be recognized as the court of last appeal. Secondly, just as with all living things, every advance achieved in this world of the finite, of shadows and images, always has something final about it and inevitably marks a restriction of future possibilities. The fuller and clearer truth becomes, the more strict it becomes, and more thoroughly excludes possibilities of future error. Looked at from this point of view, progress [43] in the development of dogmas must in a certain respect become progressively slower, which is not to say that it must come to a standstill. Thirdly, and this is the decisive point, the danger of the human factor simply remains a danger, and no precautionary measures exist which can exclude it unambiguously at the very start. Any attempt to protect oneself by human sharpsightedness against such a danger, so that it is simply not possible for anything to 'slip through', is itself radically false. It is the promise of the Spirit and that alone which prevents the final realization of an ever-present danger.

After these preliminary remarks we have now to consider a few essential features of a Catholic doctrinal development. From what has been said it will be clear why it is impossible to propose an interpretation merely in terms of a universally applicable formula or indeed one which is authoritatively taught by the Church. The general theory of the development of dogma is still in a rudimentary stage, because the history from which it must in large part be derived is not nearly sufficiently investigated for the purpose. All the same a few principles may be set down.

In the first place it is obvious that a revealed truth remains what it is, remains precisely 'true', i.e. it corresponds to reality and is always binding. What the Church has once taken possession of as a portion of the Revelation which has fallen to her share, as the object of her unconditional faith, is from then on her permanently valid possession. No doctrinal development could be merely the reflexion of a general history of humanity, a history of civilizations containing nothing but the objectivization of the everchanging sentiments, opinions and attitudes of a continual succession of historical epochs. Such an historical relativism is simply false, metaphysically and still more theologically. Yet all human statements, even those in which faith expresses God's saving truths, are finite. By this we mean that they never declare the whole of a reality. In the last resort every reality, even the most limited, is connected with and related to every other reality. The most wretched little physical process isolated in a carefully contrived experiment can only be described adequately if the investigator possesses the one comprehensive and exhaustive formula for the whole cosmos. But he does not possess such a formula; he could have it if and only if he could place himself in his own physical reality at a point which lay absolutely outside the cosmos – which is impossible. This is even more true of spiritual and divine realities. The statements [44] which we make about them, relying on the Word of God which itself became 'flesh' in human words, can never express them once and for all in an entirely adequate form. But they are not for this reason false. They are an 'adaequatio intellectus et rei', in so far as they state absolutely nothing which is false. Anyone who wants to call them 'half false' because they do not state everything about the whole truth of the matter in question, would eventually abolish the distinction between truth and falsehood. On the other hand, anyone who proposes to regard these propositions of faith, because they are wholly true, as in themselves adequate to the matter in question, i.e. as exhaustive statements, would be falsely elevating human truth to God's simple and exhaustive knowledge of himself and of all that takes its origin from him. Just because they are true, an infinite qualitative difference separates them, in spite of their finitude, from false propositions, however hard it may (even often) be in individual cases accurately to determine in the concrete where the boundary lies between an inadequate and a false statement. But because our statements about the infinite divine realities are finite and hence in this sense inadequate – that is, while actually corresponding to reality, yet not simply congruent with it – so every formula in which the faith is expressed can in principle be surpassed while still retaining its truth. That is to say, in principle at least it can be replaced by another which states the same thing, and what is more states it not only without excluding more extensive, more delicately nuanced prospects, but positively opening them up: prospects on to facts, realities, truths, which had not been seen explicitly in the earlier formulation and which make it possible to see the same reality from a new point of view, in a fresh perspective.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now this evolution within the same truth is not, at any rate not necessarily, the play of empty curiosity; it can have an essential significance for man and his salvation. The human mind is not like a photographic plate, which without preference or alteration simply registers anything which falls upon it at a particular isolated moment. Rather, in order simply to understand what he sees or hears, a human being must react, take up a stand, bring the new experience into connexion with what he already knows or has been affected by or dealt with, the whole historical sum of his experience. He must find a place for his own reality, his own life and conduct in the order of divine truth, and direct his life accordingly; and this is a matter of [45] faith and love and observance, in worship, in the ordinances and the activity of the Church, and in his day-to-day life in the world. And so he can never abstract from what he is, from his ever new, changing historical reality. For it is not just his unchangeable metaphysical 'entity' which he has to insert into the economy of God's Message, but his concrete, historical 'contingent' reality, his 'existence' with all it includes: his talents, his particular, limited and evolving endowments; the spirit of his time, the possibilities of his epoch; his concepts, which, granting all the fixity of metaphysical truth, are none the less historically conditioned; the particular task, always changing and always sharply defined, which is set him by his inescapable situation in the world – and this situation again must never be thought of as just the result of a secular historical development, but is itself the result of Christ's government of his Church, as he gradually leads her, sometimes by new ways, through a changing reality to his own single Truth. If a human being does all this – and he must do it, because he always has his eye (metaphysically and theologically) on the Absolute, though always from a finite historical viewpoint – no change takes place in the divine reality, nor do the true propositions concerning this reality become false; but there is a certain change in the perspective in which he sees the reality through these propositions: he expresses this reality differently, he can state something new about it which he had not explicitly noticed before. The decisive feature of such a change is not 'progress' in the sense of acquiring a sort of plus-quantity of knowledge (as though the Church were somehow to become 'cleverer'), but (in principle, at least) the change, the new look, of the same reality and truth, appropriate to just this age of the Church: it is change in, not of, identity. By this again is not meant that the change is necessarily an entire abandonment of the earlier view or perspective; this would be a conception of change as we see it in the material and not in the spiritual realm. The mind of humanity, and even more the Church, has a 'memory'. They change while they preserve, they become new without losing anything of the old. We today have our own philosophy, while we still philosophize with Plato and his abiding truth. And still more we have our theology, which bears the undeniable stamp of our time, while we continue to learn anew from Scripture, the Fathers, the Scholastics. If we fail either to preserve or to change, we should betray the truth, either by falling into error or by failing to make the truth our own in a really existential way.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[46] Now it may at first sight seem that this formulation of the concept of a change within a single abiding truth is concerned just with what could be called 'theology' as opposed to revealed faith. We should then be dealing merely with the human understanding of revelation, which as it were circles continually round this fixed point of Scripture and perhaps a few fixed data of (early) Tradition too: at once removed from it and gravitating towards it. Thus we should be dealing all the time with theology, with something which could never become the authentic and plenary revealed Word which grasps Revelation itself. Such a relation between Revelation on the one hand, and human understanding (always conditioned by time and situation, and striving to reach perfection) on the other, does undoubtedly exist. In relation to Revelation there is such a thing as theology, the human word which seeks to express and understand the Revealed; so that one can have no certain guarantee from Revelation itself that the attempt has been successful. But there is question not only of a theology which evolves and revolves round the fixed point of a revealed utterance which has been pronounced once and for all. There exists not only a development of theology but also a development of dogma, not only a history of theology but also (after Christ, if only in the same Christ) a history of faith; and this for two reasons. Firstly the Church understands her doctrinal decisions not just as 'theology' but as the Word of faith – not indeed as newly revealed but as the Word which utters Revelation itself truly and with binding force. Secondly this doctrinal Word can be understood within broad limits and at the same time not as a merely external, verbal modification of the original revealed propositions. On the contrary it is very often impossible to say that the new doctrinal utterance is simply the old one 'differently expressed', so that the individual Christian cannot invariably limit its doctrinal content a priori to what he himself could recognize as 'identical' with the corresponding declaration made previously. For example, the declarations of Nicaea and Florence on the mystery of the Blessed Trinity, which are intended to be propositions of faith and not merely theological explorations, have a fixed meaning. This meaning is proposed as an object of faith, even if I myself as an individual Christian and a private theologian do not succeed in demonstrating off my own bat, i.e. by the methods of philological exegesis, that these declarations say 'just the same as', 'only in other words', what I have been able to extract from Scripture and early Tradition 'by a critical study of the [47] sources'. There can of course be no question of a contradiction between the two sets of propositions, and such a contradiction could never be demonstrated historically. We shall return later to the question as to how the difference (varying in magnitude, presumably, according to the matter under consideration) between an earlier and a later pronouncement of the magisterium may more exactly be understood objectively. For the moment it is sufficient to establish the fact that quoad nos, at least, i.e. for the individual and his private theology, such a difference can and in many cases does exist: that is, that at least in this one sense quoad nos a development of dogma does in fact exist, as shown in the actual practice of the Church when she proclaims a doctrine.

It is also relatively easy to see that a development of this kind must necessarily exist. God's revealing Word is directed through the medium of the historical process at the total history of humanity (speaking generally).[2] For this reason the historically conditioned mode in which Revelation is appropriated at any time need not lie absolutely outside this Revelation itself.

[2] It is not possible to say any more here about how we should determine more exactly the ontological and theological conditions which make it possible for a statement arrived at at a definite point in history to be directed at all men at all periods of that history.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

For the real understanding of what is revealed and its existential appropriation by men is wholly dependent on the transformation of the propositions of faith, as they were originally heard, into propositions which relate what is heard to the historical situation of the men who hear; it is only then that they become propositions of faith, emerging into the real, historically conditioned world of men as decision and living deed. If these translating propositions are just theology and nothing more, 'private interpretations' of the original propositions; if there were no guarantee that the proposition heard has been correctly understood: then on the one hand the proclamation of faith itself could only be a monotonous repetition, with a purely material accuracy, of the same propositions of Scripture (and perhaps of a limited early Tradition as well); and on the other what we have understood of it, in the situation which is precisely ours, would be subjective theology – an appropriation of the faith, which is itself faith, would not come to pass.

What has so far been said is only intended to indicate briefly the fact[3] of a dogmatic development, and offer a first approximation to [48] an understanding of its nature. In order to grasp its nature more clearly, we shall take as our starting-point a proposition which belongs to the basic pronouncements of the magisterium on faith, and which apparently points in a direction contrary to that indicated by the proposition that a development of dogma is both possible and has actually taken place.

It is a doctrine of the Church, though not in the strict sense a defined one, that Revelation 'was closed with the death of the (last) Apostle(s)' (Denz 2020 s.). What does this proposition mean? It would be false to interpret it as meaning more or less that when the last Apostle died there was left a fixed summary of strictly drafted propositions like a legal code with its clearly defined paragraphs, a sort of definitive catechism, which, while itself remaining fixed, was going to be for ever expounded, explained and commented upon. An idea like this would do justice neither to the mode of being proper to intellectual knowledge nor to the fullness of life of divine faith and its content. When we try to discover the profound reasons for the completeness of Revelation, we begin to see how we should approach the interpretation of this proposition. To start with, Revelation is not the communication of a definite number of propositions, a numerical sum, to which additions may conceivably be made at will or which can suddenly and arbitrarily be limited, but an historical dialogue between God and man in which something happens, and in which the communication is related to the continuous 'happening' and enterprise of God. This dialogue moves to a quite definite term, in which first the happening and consequently the communication comes to its never to be surpassed climax and so to its conclusion. Revelation is a saving Happening, and only then and in relation to this a communication of 'truths'. This continuous Happening of saving history has now reached its never to be surpassed climax in Jesus Christ: God himself has definitively given himself to the world. Christianity is not a phase or epoch of a history of world civilizations which could be displaced by another phase, another secular 'Aion'. If formerly, before Christ, something took place in history, it was and is invariably conditioned, provisional, something with its own limited range and endurance and thus leading to death and emptiness: one aion after another. The present always dies in the future. Each age goes by in successive rise and fall, infinitely far from the true Eternity which abides beyond: each carries its own death within it, from the moment of its birth: [49] civilizations, nations, states, or intellectual, political, economic systems. Before Christ even God's enterprise in revealing himself to the world was 'open': times and orders of salvation were created and displaced each other, and it was still not apparent how God was going at last to respond to the human answer, usually negative, to his own initiating act: whether the ultimate utterance of his creative Word would be the word of wrath or of love. But 'now' the definitive reality is

[3] And so stands still more in need of a posteriori proof from history itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

established, one which can no longer become obsolete or be displaced: the indissoluble, irrevocable presence of God in the world as salvation, love and forgiveness, as communication to the world of the most intimate depths of the divine Reality itself and of its Trinitarian life: Christ. Now there is nothing more to come: no new age, no other aion, no fresh plan of salvation, but only the unveiling of what is already 'here' as God's presence at the end of a human time stretched out to breaking-point: the Last and eternally the latest, newest day. It is because the definitive Reality which resolves history proper is already here that Revelation is 'closed'. Closed, because open to the concealed presence of divine plenitude in Christ. Nothing new remains to be said, not as though there were not still much to say, but because everything has been said, everything given in the Son of Love, in whom God and the world have become one, for ever without confusion, but for ever undivided. That Revelation has been closed is a positive and not a negative statement, a pure Amen, a conclusion which includes everything and excludes nothing of the divine plenitude, conclusion as fulfilled presence of an all-embracing plenitude.

It is further to be observed that the 'closed' Revelation with which we are concerned here is a Revelation made to the believing Church, in possession of the revealed Reality itself. A sure knowledge of this reality of divine salvation can only be gained through the divine tidings and through the faith which comes from hearing and speaks in human concepts and human propositions. Any attempts to transcend this divine message – in some 'religious experience' or emotive state, some experimental contact eliminating the faith which hears – so as to grasp this reality immediately and without reference to the message, is delusive and impossible, and must inevitably lead to a modernistic rationalization of Christianity. Our religion, in so far as it moves within the sphere of our intellectual and moral 'consciousness', is inseparably dependent upon the announcing Word. But in the aion of Christ it is not just of the remote future that this Word [50] brings us tidings, a mere anticipatory shadow of a reality still to come, but it utters what is present. The believing Church possesses what she believes: Christ, his Spirit, the earnest of eternal life and its vital powers. She cannot leave the Word behind in order to grasp this reality. But no more does she possess a word about the thing instead of the thing itself. Consequently her hearing of the Word and her reflexion upon the Word heard are not merely a logical activity, an attempt gradually to squeeze out all the logical virtualities and consequences of the Word heard as though it were a numerical sum of propositions; they are a reflexion on the propositions heard in living contact with the thing itself. This reflective consideration practised by the Church, which takes place in us as a 'theological' comprehension, unfolding and clarification of the Church's faith, results in 'new' propositions of faith and not just theology, takes place simultaneously in the word and in the thing itself: each in the other, neither without the other. Or putting it differently, the light of faith and the assistance of the Spirit which are at work in this reflexion and progressive self-achievement do not mean just a sort of supervision given by a teacher. The teacher's concern is to see that his pupil does not go astray in his calculations and deductions, so that what the pupil learns (if he proceeds correctly) is due only to his own insight and logical acumen and the virtualities of his own premises. It is much more in the actual result that the light of the Spirit and of faith exert their influence: the hidden but present and posited Reality takes part in its own understanding. The 'unction' teaches. We find a reflected image there of what we have seen with our own eyes of the living Word of Truth, what we have looked upon and touched with our hands (1 Jn 1:1). Consequently we need not be able to isolate this light and its operation reflexively, as against other impulses by which we grow and advance in the knowledge of faith. Even in the natural order reflexion upon our mental processes never quite exhausts what are in fact the grounds and motives at work in our intellectual growth or our behaviour: we always understand more by a direct and simple view of things than reflexion and the detailed analysis of this intellectual vision can produce for inspection, our behaviour is always more variously motivated than prior or subsequent reflexion upon it can make explicit. The common man, still more, in his direct apprehension of the objects of everyday life, has not reflexive or theoretical awareness of the nature of his intellectual powers or of formal logic, while he does in fact make use [51] of both. How much more true this is of knowledge in faith, and how much more it is a question of principle here! The light of faith, the impulse of the Spirit, do not permit of being isolated for inspection by a reflexive process in which attention is turned back upon itself and withdrawn from the object of faith. They are the brightness which illuminates the object of faith, the horizon within which it is contained, the mysterious sympathy with which it is understood, and not properly the object directly regarded, not a sun which we can immediately contemplate. But they are present and take part in the apprehension and unfolding of the object of faith; they form the co-operating subjectivity (God's and caused by God) with which the Word is for the first time understood in the act of hearing and understood ever new. Knowledge in faith takes place in the power of the Spirit of God, while at the same time that Spirit is the concrete reality believed: Spirit of the Father and of the Son, Spirit of the Crucified and Ascended, Spirit of the Church and earnest of eternal life, Spirit of justification, holiness and freedom from sin and death. It follows that the object of faith is not something merely passive, indifferently set over against a subjective attitude to it, but simultaneously the principle by which it is itself grasped as object. This statement of course only acquires its full significance on the assumption that the actual support given to faith under the grace of the Holy Spirit is not a merely ontological modality of the act of faith beyond conscious apprehension, but also has a specific effect in consciousness (which is not necessarily to say that it is reflexively distinguishable). This effect makes it possible to apprehend the objects of faith given through the hearing of the external announcement, under a 'light', a subjective a priori under grace (the formal object), which is not available to someone without grace. As is well known, this assumption is a controversial topic in Catholic theology. Nevertheless the Thomist view, which does make this assumption, seems to us to be true on Biblical and theological grounds, and we have consequently the right to make this assumption ourselves without being able further to justify it here. But if we do proceed on this assumption, we cannot allow that the unfolding of the Church's consciousness in faith is supported merely by an insight of a conceptual and logical kind and an 'assistentia per se negativa' (i.e. a protection against final error in this work of human, logical understanding) given by the Holy Spirit. It must be insisted upon that between firstly a new revelation, delivering materially new [52] elements, and secondly an assistentia per se negativa which contributes nothing to the treasury of faith as it unfolds but only prevents erroneous decisions and consequently offers an external guarantee of the validity of decisions in matters of faith, a third possibility is open: and that is a development and unfolding of the original treasures of faith under a positive influence of the light of faith bestowed upon the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If from this point of view we ask what tasks and limits are imposed upon the logical activity which can and does take place upon the original propositions of faith as such (i.e. in so far as the act of grasping them can be distinguished in any way from the possession of the concealed object of faith itself as an apprehended datum, in and through these propositions with the help of the Spirit as light), we come to the following conclusion: the faith of the Church is ever reflected anew in the propositions of faith. It discovers what is implicitly contained in them, the logical and real implications which result from individual propositions or the combination of several. These 'consequences' can be binding even from a purely logical point of view; but they need not necessarily be so. There is also the possibility, in the abstract, of relations between propositions, of consequences from them, which, considered from a purely logical point of view, may be 'proximate', etc., but just by themselves can produce no conclusion which is absolutely binding logically. It may occur that a more

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

particular or more exact statement appears to fit in harmoniously with a more general, less determined combination of statements or ideas; in this way each throws light on and supports the other, without its being possible to see that the more particular statement can be inferred with logical stringency from the more general one as its only possible consequence. In this case we have the so-called 'theological convenientia' 'probable' arguments from Scripture or Tradition, and the like. But it would be false to suppose that in such a case any sure knowledge in faith is in principle automatically excluded. For such a supposition proceeds from the explicit or tacit assumption that progress in theological understanding in the order of faith relies uniquely upon human operations of a logical kind. This is not so. A sure knowledge is acquired in the form of knowledge in faith proper to the Church as such (if she steps in) not just through the merely logical explication[4] [53] of propositions as such but through the luminous power of the Spirit in contact with the res itself. This power makes use of logical processes but its influence does not cease there, because it possesses the very res in question as a present principle of knowledge of it and not just propositions about a (remote) reality, always remembering that the former cannot be had without a basic minimum of the latter. It is quite possible for there to be doctrinal progress on the ground of 'arguments of convenience', 'proofs' depending on similarity.[5] Naturally the individual theologian as such cannot say when an assured progress has in fact been achieved by means of (and 'in spite of') such arguments, for it is only the (conditional) force of the logical argument as such which can become apparent to his reflexive understanding. This decision belongs rather to the faith of the Church, who finds herself in actual fact in secure[6] possession of definite knowledge in faith by means of and in spite of such mere considerations of 'convenience'; and in consequence sees that her development in understanding has taken place in the power and the light of the Spirit.

For our purposes we can ignore the question whether such an 'argument of convenience', which provisionally at least is 'purely' such quoad nos, is in given circumstances, objectively considered, really only such and in consequence appears to us as such; or whether in itself there must always in any case be concealed in an argument of this kind, if assured knowledge in faith is acquired by it, what is in fact a logically stringent argument, which merely quoad nos has not yet reached such a degree of objectivity by accurate reflexive analysis as to be evidently so to us. A theologian who proposes to explain the development of dogma as strictly as possible in terms of the logical explication of propositions is bound to regard the second hypothesis as [54] the only permissible one.[7] In the natural order there undoubtedly occur many cases in which we know something with complete certainty in an unreflexive, 'global' way, where on the one hand the reflexive proof in fact offered for it could still be found very loose and inadequate (as 'merely probable'); and on the other hand a more

[4] Explikation. It seemed proper to translate this technical term by 'explication', and explizieren by 'explicate', both of which terms are permitted by the Oxford Dictionary. – Tr.

[5] A more prudent formula may be preferred: 'It is not demonstrably impossible a priori …'. Whether in fact doctrinal progress has been made in this way, and when it has done so, are questions to be answered a posteriori from the examination of individual cases in the history of doctrine. Once again we should have to distinguish two possibilities: either this progress took place just in consequence of what at first sight was a mere argument of 'convenience', which turned out to be quite stringent when larger contexts of theological relevance were brought to bear on it; or so long as we remain in the field of theological argument we have nothing but an 'argument of convenience'.

[6] Of course 'secure' does not mean here 'logically compelling', but firm', 'undoubted', 'undisturbed'.

[7] Only he has then to be able to show that he can do justice in terms of this postulate to the legitimate development of dogma which has in fact taken place. But he has no right suddenly to relax his conditions for logical stringency when he is considering the 'stringent' deduction from original Revelation of propositions already defined, if he is never prepared to relax them when it is a question of the theological deduction of propositions not yet defined. Let us forgo examples involving the use of a double standard.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

stringent proof, the possibility of which must be accepted in principle, is all the same going to be produced or has already been produced to the satisfaction of some more penetrating thinker. All that concerns us here is simply the idea, which even a theologian of this persuasion will have to admit, that it is not possible to assert that a sure knowledge in faith cannot be had, where what is had hic et nunc quoad nos is 'merely' a theological 'argument of convenience'. An assertion of this kind would in fact be a piece of theological naturalism, which would reduce to the level of merely human processes of thought that specific and peculiar kind of knowledge in faith which belongs to the Church as a whole, in virtue of the Spirit's abiding presence in her as the very object of faith. What is primary and more comprehensive in this knowledge in faith would be surrendered to the inferior and secondary, to 'scientific theology', which does indeed form an ingredient of knowledge in faith but certainly does not adequately represent its nature.

Conversely it follows from what has been said that it is superfluous and injurious to the honesty which is one of the virtues of theology, to attempt at all costs to produce a logically stringent argument of a reflexive kind from the sources of faith for every doctrine of faith to which there is firm testimony in the magisterium of the Church. The theologian should try to find such an argument and not try to lighten or simplify the disciplined labour of historical investigation and rational speculation proper to his science with the explanation that it doesn't matter very much because he always practises his theology in dependence on the faith of the Church. Such a view would be false and reprehensible. But even where he is unable to find an argument which [55] is honestly justified by the facts, he should avoid giving the appearance of supposing that his own mind and his own theological reflexions are simply the point at which the Holy Spirit of the Church has achieved its fullest manifestation.

In any case the attempt is superfluous in view of the undeniable fact that in many cases the Church's sure conviction in faith has temporally preceded such logical deductions (perfectly possible ones, in certain circumstances). Even in the concrete logic of everyday discovery the consequence, the conclusion, must very often be arrived at and brought to light by quite other means than those of logical deduction, so that one can generally look for possible premises or more general concepts in which this conclusion may have been contained implicitly. If we transfer this to the field of theological knowledge, we may ask: Why should a (individual or collective) consciousness not arrive by a concrete logic of discovery at a theological proposition, which (when it is a question of the Church's consciousness in faith) is apprehended as true and certain in this direct, global and concrete knowledge belonging to the supernatural life of faith, even before the theologian's reflective work of deductive intelligence has produced a reflexive 'proof'? In the theological field too, where the knowledge of Revelation becomes progressively more profound, there exists a 'concrete experience', a cognition which integrates a thousand and one merely 'instinctive' observations, and which only with great difficulty, if at all, permits of being exhibited in a chain of syllogistic formulae. For this extremely 'rational' knowledge of an unreflexive kind is richer than in its reflexive articulation and logical exposition, which is always subsequent to it (though within certain limits necessary). Any living thing of a certain degree of complexity needs a skeleton but is more than this skeleton, which itself lives by the life of the whole. So too it may be impossible for every theologian strictly to demonstrate hic et nunc that more explicit knowledge in faith is contained in less explicit (earlier) knowledge; but this is at any rate no criterion by which we may judge of whether in fact the later knowledge is contained in the earlier or not.

If we go on to ask how this 'being-contained' of new formulations of dogmatic propositions in an earlier form of consciousness in faith is to be understood objectively (now some such 'being-contained' must be allowed if Revelation is held to have 'closed' with the Apostles), then we come up once more against a very large number of [56] dark and difficult

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

problems, on which Catholic theologians have long failed to reach agreement. It must be pointed out once more that such a lack of clarity and unanimity is not surprising, and cannot serve as an argument against a genuine development of dogma. Spiritual processes continue to function with complete adequacy even though a satisfactory theory of their subjective and objective presuppositions has not yet been offered.

To clarify the point at issue once again. We have so far tried to show that a development of dogma does in fact exist and exist necessarily. Further we have learned to see that it takes place in vital contact with that res which is the 'closed' plenitude of revealed reality, in a contact which does indeed include as an intrinsic factor an objective givenness of the res in propositions and the possibility of their logical expansion, but is not simply exhausted therein. The 'motive' force which is at work in the development of dogma and guarantees its correctness is not simply to be identified with formal logic. If there does in fact exist a movement from the earlier to the later knowledge in virtue of this force, then we must yet again and more precisely put the question how the earlier and the later knowledge are related to each other. There is of course no doubt that the objective realities grasped in both the knowledge which acts as foundation and that which is founded upon it, are really connected in themselves, the only presupposition being that the knowledge which has emerged is a genuine dogmatic truth. But this mere connexion of the (known) realities in themselves is not in question: rather it is the connexion of the actual states of knowledge.[8] This connexion must be present. Not only because Revelation was 'closed' with the death of the Apostles, a fact that implies both the abiding plenitude and perfection of the Reality which is the object of faith, and in some sense the continual presence of the plenitude of faith in this reality as well. But also because if there were present only a connexion in the known object itself but not in earlier and later knowledge of it in faith, then there would have to be either a new revelation for the later proposition or an apprehension of the object independent of the earlier divine [57] pronouncements about this object; now both these views are unacceptable.

The theologians have attempted to explain this necessary connexion in terms of the explication of an implicit cognition in an explicit one. So far all are agreed. Something is really 'explained' in this way, for attention is directed by these concepts to a phenomenon which may be actually observed in the advance of knowledge in faith as well as elsewhere. There does actually exist such a thing as 'explication' of a cognition, the fullness of whose content is thereby displayed in an explicit and articulated way. We have the clearest example of this sort of propositional connexion in formal logic and pure mathematics, the propositions of which are related to each other as implicit to explicit. Moreover it cannot be denied that explications which seem to correspond exactly to those of formal logic may be found in theology too. Even if there are other, essentially different ways in which spiritual activity can achieve explicitness (as we shall see), yet the process of explication (speaking quite generally) does exist. And so this process would seem to be quite a suitable way of representing, at least in general terms, the connexion between two states of knowledge in faith, one of which arises from the other by a development of dogma.

But this catch-word 'explication' does not offer much 'explanation' of what we want, the way in which this connexion holds. For the precise nature of this explicative connexion, just that with which we are concerned, remains obscure.

We may begin with a brief account of the direction in which the average explanation offered by the theologians moves, and of the controversies which have their origin in this common starting-point. The point of departure of the explanation is tacitly and with a sense

[8] This distinction is not easy to make conveniently in English. In St Thomas's terms, we distinguish between the res intellecta, the independent reality in fact known, and the i*ntellectum*, the meaning or content immediately apprehended by the mind in the act of knowing, and through which the res is known. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of self-evidence taken to be the proposition. The only question is how a proposition, which, it is assumed, is a fixed quantity, can be explicated. It follows that the explication of the proposition must take place by means of formal logic. Explication is the analytic exposition of the content of the proposition or of the logical consequences of several propositions with the help of the principle of contradiction. The model which is expressly or tacitly employed as an example in this view is the procedure of logic or mathematics.

When the explication is that of a single proposition contained in original Revelation, and when this explication only states more expressly ('in other words', in a different conceptual language, etc.) [58] 'the same thing' as the original proposition (of course with the guarantee of the magisterium that the new proposition correctly renders the sense of the old), there can be no doubt that the new proposition too states what God has revealed, that it is believed with divine faith as materially God himself,[9] that it is 'dogma' and not just theology. But it may seriously be doubted whether the actual course of the development of dogma may be adequately interpreted in this way, by an explication of what is 'formally implicit' in a proposition. We shall discuss this in a moment.

Alongside this explication of what is formally implicit in a single proposition, however hard it may be to make sharp distinctions in individual cases, there exists a different form of explication of propositions: the explication of what is 'virtually' implicit in a proposition with the help of another proposition. Let us suppose that the following proposition is valid: All men born more than two hundred years ago are now dead. If I do not know that there was a Socrates who was born more than two hundred years ago, I cannot know that the general proposition includes Socrates as a particular case, not only in the real state of affairs under consideration but in the proposition as such. But if I do know the second proposition, the first contains something 'virtually' implicit: Socrates is dead, an implication which could never have been explicated by a mere analysis of the first proposition just in itself. Operations of this kind (of course more complex usually) do undoubtedly exist in the theological field. Without them it would be impossible to think of theology as a body of intelligibly connected ideas at all. In order to simplify our problem we leave out of account the case (which does undoubtedly occur too) when in a properly deductive procedure of this kind not only the formal technique (logic) but also part of the propositions and their intelligible content have their source not in original Revelation but in our natural knowledge; we shall consider only those cases in which the whole intelligible material of such a deductive explication, of the movement from the purely virtually implicit to the explicit, is provided by Revelation itself. Cases of this kind do certainly exist. And there is no doubt that they have their part in 'theological' development (as we wish to point out in advance, because the immediate question is whether a genuine development of dogma can be explained in this way).

[59] We can now go on to ask whether new knowledge derived in this properly deductive way as a conclusion from several previously given propositions, can still be said to be 'revealed by God', and so can properly be believed, in the proper sense of 'divine faith', 'on the authority of God'; or whether it is a merely human knowledge, not properly believed with divine faith, but at most to be accepted with 'ecclesiastical faith' on the authority of the Church (really infallible in this case too, with the necessary qualifications). The theologians are divided on this question. One group, the majority today, hold that these inferred propositions are purely human ones, the correctness of which can of course be guaranteed by the Church. The others believed that this kind of explication of what is contained merely 'virtually' in the immediate propositions of Revelation can and must still really be called 'Revelation', and as such can he proclaimed by the Church as the object of divine faith in the strict sense. The second view would seem more correct.

[9] 'Credere Deum', as opposed to 'credere Deo' or 'in Deum'. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We have already noted that in a concrete instance distinguishing between formally and virtually implicit and their explication can be very difficult, for the reason that the explication of even what is formally implicit can and often must, for the sake of clarity, take the form of a syllogistic operation. But it then becomes difficult in the concrete case to decide whether we have an instance of one or the other kind of explication. It is consequently always open to the theologians holding the first opinion, even where there has been a long chain of deductive reasoning, to explain that objectively after all we are dealing with the explication of something formally implicit and no more. So far it is not easy to dispose of this opinion. But if the concepts are allowed to keep their plain, original simple meaning, we are bound to say that an explication of what is formally implicit in a revealed proposition is present only when the new proposition really states the same thing as the old one in other words, has the same content as the old one, however useful and necessary it may be for various reasons to formulate the new proposition. Putting it differently: an explicit proposition has been contained in another proposition as something formally implicit only when it results from the latter in consequence of a hermeneutic and exegetical operation, not involving (as a necessary feature) the use of a properly deductive procedure. Where pure analysis of the meaning and significance of a proposition according to linguistic and grammatical rules does not by itself produce the new [60] proposition, there can be no question of something formally implicit. For instance, instead of the proposition: One and the same Logos is God and man, we can say: The ‘person’ of the Logos has both a human and a divine ‘nature’. If theological or metaphysical theories (very important ones perhaps, but in need of justification on other grounds) are not attached to the concepts ‘person’ and ‘nature’, we may conceive of the second proposition as the bare explication of what is formally implicit in the first. Explications of this kind do undoubtedly exist, the only question here being whether it is particularly illuminating to distinguish between ‘explicit’ and ‘implicit’, when in both cases we are meant to be dealing with something stated really ‘formally’, i.e. something which the initial proposition itself really states, for this belongs to the concept of the ‘formally stated’, if these words are allowed to have their natural sense.

But it is still very doubtful whether all the cases in which a development of dogma in the proper sense, one guaranteed by the Church, does undoubtedly take place, can be interpreted according to this schema. If we try to use it in order to explain such doctrines as those of Transubstantiation, Sacramental Character, the validity of heretical Baptism and so on, which have not always been found in an explicit form and yet belong to the Church’s treasury of faith today, it is clear that we can only do so by arbitrary and violent measures. Granted that there does in fact exist a development of dogma which goes beyond the explication of what is formally implicit, then it precisely can exist. And so there must exist (if we are going to take as our basis the logical explication of propositions) at least an explication of what is virtually implicit, the result of which may yet be claimed as the Revelation of God himself and consequently may be believed on the testimony of God himself.

Nor is it particularly hard, in the case of God’s utterances, to answer the question why a proposition of this kind, the result of an explication of what is virtually implicit, can be conceived of as stated by God, and hence credible on his personal authority. A human speaker can never survey all the necessary consequences which in fact follow from his statements. In this kind of speech, then, we cannot be sure whether these consequences too could be intended as a communication of the speaker’s own mind. The inner drive towards the infinite openness of truth which is inherent even in human concepts and propositions, is beyond the scope of the human speaker’s knowledge, and [61] therefore ceases to be fully the expression of his own subjectivity. We always begin by talking ‘above our heads’. The whole of what we ‘really’ state is not an expression of what we ourselves want to state. But when God speaks the case is different: he is necessarily conscious of the actual vitality and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

dynamism of his immediate communication, and aware of all its virtues and consequences. Moreover he has from the very beginning the intention and the will to bring about its explication and to guide it in his own Spirit. It is God himself then who states even what is only disclosed as stated in the historical life of what was (immediately) stated. And so even what is merely virtually implicit in his speech is his Word. Virtual explication, looked at from the point of view of God as speaker, is simply explication and nothing more, even if it requires real deduction by us, looked at from our point of view as hearers. What we 'deduce' in this way, God has not indeed stated 'formally' in the initial propositions from which our deduction proceeds (i.e. he has not expressed it in the immediate meaning of the propositions), but he has really 'com-municated'[10] it, so that entire faith can be given to it as his knowledge. It cannot be objected that on this hypothesis, in view of the absolutely unlimited virtualities of what has been revealed immediately, absolutely everything, that is, every conceivable true proposition, will in the last resort have to be regarded as revealed. For in the first place it is not true of every proposition of 'natural knowledge' that its referential content possesses that objective connexion with the original, immediate propositions of Revelation which is needed to support the claim that the proposition was communicated by God himself. Secondly the lack of the guarantee which must (usually) be given by the Church's consciousness in faith (her magisterium) will make it impossible to recognize the 'consequence' of one proposition from the other with enough certainty to permit of faith in the first proposition as something revealed by God. Thirdly, in the theory just outlined, it is only possible to regard as something 'stated' by God to man what God knows man will himself in fact evolve from what was stated immediately, under the impulse and in the light of the divine Spirit. But [62] what has in fact evolved or is in course of evolution is limited and finite.

A further objection, taken this time from inspired Scripture, might be offered to the distinction which has been made between something stated formally and something over and above this but really communicated; an objection, then, to the possibility of claiming the virtually revealed too as something which can be assented to with divine faith and authoritatively defined. In Scripture, it might be said, the inspired human author is not only a messenger delivering a message (for it is quite conceivable that a messenger should not comprehend the full bearing of the message, the range of the communication); he is also really an author, so that only that sense of the propositions is inspired which the human author, constructing his own propositions, intended and expressed. And so it is impossible to assert that in Scripture (which is nevertheless the most important starting-point of our deductions) more has been communicated by God than has been stated formally. For our purposes we need not concern ourselves here with the question whether this objection concerning inspiration as such really proceeds from a correct appreciation of the relation between human and divine authors.[11] But even apart from this it does not prove what it sets out to prove. It may (in just this context) be safely granted that nothing more is inspired than what the human author as such intended to state and write down. Yet it follows from this that more can be communicated, even if God, as literary author of Scripture and no more, should not be able to communicate more than what he and the human author have stated formally (i.e. written down). We have only to consider the fact that what is now found written in Scripture was also in historical fact, indeed primarily, the object of the Apostles' oral preaching. As preachers of this kind ('prophets'), i.e. as original, non-literary bearers of that revealed content which was also deposited eventually in inspired Scripture, they are however

[10] mit-geteilt. By inserting this hyphen Fr Rahner wishes to suggest the inclusive character of the divine utterance. Later he will show that this character is present to some degree even in human speech; and by an untranslatable emphasis suggests the communion of the hearer with the speaker in the *com*munication. – Tr.
[11] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Über die Schriftinspiration', ZKT LXXVIII (1956), pp. 137-68. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

essentially messengers and transmitters, not authors of their message; they pass on their message not as their own but simply as God's, so that what they communicate is in itself perfectly capable of being in excess of what they themselves have explicitly appropriated of it.[12]

[63] Summing up what we have seen so far, we may say that the connexion between the original propositions and those reached in consequence of dogmatic development can consist in the connexion between something formally or virtually implicit in a proposition and the explication of this by logical procedures with the support and in the light of the divine Spirit, leaving it open as to whether or not this connexion must be logically compelling in every case 'quoad nos'.

But this does not bring us to the end of our discussion. So far we have with the majority of theologians tacitly assumed that the starting-point of a dogmatic explication is always a proposition in the proper sense. But that this should always be the case may by no means be assumed.

In the first place it cannot be doubted that there exists in the natural order a kind of knowledge, which, while it is itself not articulated in 'propositions', is the starting-point of an intellectual process which develops into propositions. Let us suppose that a young man has the genuine and vital experience of a great love, an experience which transforms his whole being. This love may have presuppositions (of a metaphysical, psychological and physiological kind) which are simply unknown to him. His love itself is his 'experience'; he is conscious of it, lives through it with the entire fullness and depth of a real love. He 'knows' much more about it than he can 'state'. The clumsy stammerings of his love-letters are paltry and miserable compared to this knowledge. It may even be possible that the attempt to tell himself and others what he experiences and 'knows' may lead to quite false statements. If he were to come across a 'metaphysics' of love, he might perhaps understand absolutely nothing of what was said there about love and even his love, although he might know much more about it than the dried-up metaphysician who has written the book. If he is intelligent, and has at his disposal an adequately differentiated stock of ideas, he could perhaps make the attempt, slowly and gropingly, approaching the subject in a thousand different ways, to state what he knows about his love, what he is already aware of in the consciousness [64] of simply possessing the reality (more simply but more fully aware), so as finally to 'know' (in reflexive propositions). In such a case it is not (merely) a matter of the logical development and inference of new propositions from earlier ones, but of the formulation for the first time of propositions about a knowledge already possessed, in an infinite search which only approaches its goal asymptotically. This process too is an explication. Here too there is a connexion in re between an earlier knowledge and later explicit propositions. But the starting-point and the procedure are not those of the logical explication of propositions, which we first took as model for the development of dogma.

This case, which we are going to make use of in the field of dogma as a natural analogue for an explication other than that of the logical explication of propositions, must however be examined from a different angle. The lover knows of his love: this knowledge of himself forms an essential element in the very love itself. The knowledge is infinitely richer, simpler and denser than any body of propositions about the love could be. Yet this knowledge never lacks a certain measure of reflexive articulateness: the lover confesses his love at least to himself, 'states' at least to himself something about his love. And so it is not a matter of [12] Fr Rahner's point is that even on this limited view of literary inspiration, more can be communicated by the written word than the human author may have grasped, because the literary authorship may consist merely in making a record of a message, something which need not be fully understood by the messenger.

It should perhaps be noted at this point that Fr Rahner is leading up to his distinction between 'something formally stated' (ein formell Gesagtes) and 'something formally communicated' (ein formell Mitgeteiltes). – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indifference to the love itself whether or not the lover continues to reflect upon it; this self-reflexion is not the subsequent description of a reality which remains in no way altered by the description. In this progressive self-achievement, in which love comprehends itself more and more, in which it goes on to state something 'about' itself and comprehends its own nature more clearly, the love itself becomes ordered; it has an increasing understanding of what must properly be the foundation of its own activity, mirrors its own nature with increasing clarity, approaches as its goal, with an increasingly clear awareness, what it always has been. Reflexion upon oneself (when it is accurate) in propositions (i.e. in pensées which the lover produces about his love) is thus a part of the progressive realization of love itself; it is not just a parallel phenomenon, without importance for the thing itself. The progress of love is a living growth out of the original (the originally conscious) love and out of just what that love has itself become through a reflexive experience of itself. It lives at every moment from its original source and from that reflexive experience which has immediately preceded any given moment. Original, non-propositional, unreflexive yet conscious possession of a [65] reality on the one hand, and reflexive (propositional), articulated consciousness of this original consciousness on the other – these are not competing opposites but reciprocally interacting factors of a single experience necessarily unfolding in historical succession. Root and shoot are not the same thing; but each lives by the other. Reflexive consciousness always has its roots in a prior conscious entering into possession of the reality itself. But just this original consciousness possesses itself later in a new way, such that its life is now the accomplishment of that personal act of reflexive apprehension by which it has enriched itself. Reflexive consciousness would inevitably wither if its life were not rooted in the simpler basic consciousness, or if it were to reproduce this in every particular. The simple basic consciousness would become blind if, because it is richer and fuller, it refused to allow itself to grow out into a reflexive consciousness involving 'pensées' and 'propositions'.

The question now arises whether in the development of dogma there is to be found an interrelationship of types of explication, (analogically) similar to that which has just been indicated by way of example in the natural order. We believe that it is possible to reply in the affirmative.[13]

In the first place it may be supposed that the Apostles themselves had a global experience of this kind, lying behind propositions and forming an inexhaustible source for the articulation and explication of the faith in propositions. Christ, as the living link between God and the world, whom they have seen with their eyes and touched with their hands, is the objective content of an experience which is more elemental and concentrated, simpler and yet richer than the individual propositions coined in an attempt to express this experience – an attempt which can in principle never be finally successful. The vivid experience of Christ's relationship to sin, for example, his death, his attitude to Peter and a thousand other experiences of the kind, which the Apostles lived through in an unreflexive and global way, precede [66] the doctrinal propositions (at least in many cases, though also only in many, not in all cases!) and form a part of the original Revelation, the explication of which, already begun by the Apostles, is not of the same character as the logical explication of propositions. Even in the many cases where our Lord's spoken word as such is the necessary starting-point of the Apostles' faith because the actual content of Revelation is available in no other way, these words are heard in the context of a vivid experience of daily life in his company. And so, even in these cases, the concrete experience is an essential presupposition for the true and [13] In order to exclude the possibility of misunderstanding at the very start, let us draw attention to the following point. In the sphere of faith this global, still (in itself) non-propositional and unreflexive basic consciousness is manifestly an intelligence received from the historical revelation of God in Christ. It does not arise, any more than a dogma explicitly formulated in propositions, from some a priori religious consciousness or subconsciousness, itself the only source of an explication in dogmatic propositions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ever-deepening understanding of the words spoken and heard. These sayings are not in themselves explicit enough; rather they require the complete experience, which in turn becomes continually more explicit and reflexively intelligible as the content of these sayings is unfolded. An explication of this kind, then, is not just a matter of deduction from propositions: it takes a proposition which is offered as a conceptual expression of experience, measures it by the original experience and finds it correct by this standard. Nevertheless this experience depends for its realization upon its actually stating what it knows. The initial degree of self-reflexion in the experience may be slight but it cannot be entirely lacking. Every explication which has been successfully established in propositional form illuminates the original experience, allows it to grow to its proper stature, and becomes an intrinsic factor in the abiding life of this experience itself. Every theological proposition – in St Paul's Epistles, for example – is uttered out of the entirety of this living conscious contact with the incarnate God. Quoad nos the 'theology' of the Apostles is original Revelation, because it is guaranteed by the infallibility of prophetic mission and Apostolic inspiration as the new Word intended for us by God. Yet in a certain sense it is also, for the bearers of Revelation themselves, their 'theology', in relation to a more primitive communication made to them before, i.e. it is an explication and an inference from the most primitive data of Revelation.[14] In their case at any rate we have the right to speak of a development of dogma which takes place not just through the logical explication of propositions but through living self-explication within a mind's possession of a given [67] reality. The objective connexion between the new proposition and the old knowledge is not merely that between something logically explicit and something logically implicit in two propositions; it is rather a connexion between what becomes partially explicit in a proposition and the unreflexive, total spiritual possession of the entire res, so that the explicit proposition is at the same time more and less than its implicit source. More, because as reflexively formulated it elucidates the original, spiritually simple possession of the reality and in this way enriches it. Less, because it never does more than express reflexively and remotely a part of what was spiritually possessed before. This alone is sufficient to make it clear how one may conceive of the full consciousness in faith possessed by the Apostles and the primitive Christian community, and yet avoid anachronisms. It is true that men did not 'know' much then, if we understand by 'knowledge' a form of knowledge which is set up with the help of a reflexive, highly articulated conceptual system. There could have been for the most part so little acquaintance with a system of this kind that we may safely assume that it quite certainly would not have been immediately intelligible at the time, because concepts like this only emerge at a definite point in time and require a definite period of pedagogic activity to become intelligible. Yet at the same time all was known, because men had laid living hold upon the total reality of God's saving Act and now lived in it spiritually. Let us remember that in actual fact (if not in essential principle) greater reflexive articulateness of a spiritual possession is nearly always purchased at the cost of a partial loss in unhampered communication ('naive' in the good sense) with the reality given in faith (and which is still possessed in its entirety). Then we shall see that our more complex and highly differentiated consciousness in faith and the theology which corresponds to it need not fancy themselves 'superior' to the simple faith of Apostolic times! God allots to every age its mode of consciousness in faith. Any romantic desire of our own to return to the simplicity and unreflexive density and fullness of the Apostolic consciousness in faith would only result in an historical atavism. We must possess this fullness in a different way.

[14] If the Apostles use 'arguments' in their letters, they do so not merely from a pedagogic concern for their readers; rather they give us in this way an insight into the manner in which their own knowledge in faith unfolds, their own 'development of dogma' and 'theology'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It may be urged that in the Apostles we have an exceptional case which can contribute nothing to the explanation of the connexion between old knowledge and new formulation, because the Apostles could only pass on their completed reflexive explication in propositional [68] form and not their original living experience; so that in every age after them only a logical connexion between implicit and explicit in propositions could support the possibility of further development of dogma. But this objection has no force. It is not only propositions about their experience that the Apostles bequeath, but their Spirit, the Holy Spirit of God, the very reality, then, of what they have experienced in Christ. Their own experience is preserved and present together with their Word. Spirit and Word together form the permanent active potentiality of an experience which is in principle the same as that of the Apostles even if, because it is supported on the Apostolic Word handed down in Tradition, it is an experience, resting on that of the Apostles and prolonging theirs, which has historical roots and can never continue to live if it is cut off from connexion with the Apostles through Word, Sacrament and the handing down of authority. But just this 'successio apostolica', in a full and comprehensive sense, hands on to the post-Apostolic Church, and precisely with respect to knowledge in faith, not simply a body of propositions but living experience: the Holy Spirit, the Lord, who is ever present in the Church; the keen flair and instinct of faith, the acute sensibility which is a gift of the Spirit, ever alert for the true and the false in the sphere of faith, for what as formulated proposition is or is not homogeneous with the undispersed vitality of truth possessed in innocence. To this extent there exists here too, in post-Apostolic development of dogma, the connexion between what is implicit as a living possession of the whole truth in an unreflexive but conscious way, and what is always only partially explicit in propositions. It is only an explication of this kind that provides both the required bond with earlier explications, already propositional in form, and also the simultaneous passage to a new explication from the original experience through the tradition already formulated; and provides them with greater power and cogency than in the Apostolic age.

If we are properly to appreciate what has been said, we must first make a critical examination of an inadequate way of regarding propositions, all the more active for being tacit. An ordinary statement of everyday life, like those which appear among the propositions of faith too, is tacitly represented under the schema of propositions belonging to mathematics, geometry or formal logic. The latter have in fact – approximately speaking – a fixed content; it is possible – approximately – to state unambiguously and exhaustively in a few words (not [69] only to know in an unreflexive and global way) what their concepts mean and what is said with them. Their content, as ascertainable in the form of definitions, is (more or less) identical with what is communicated in them (the object seen through them). It is possible to establish that they state or communicate this and that, so much and no more. Anything over and above this which it may be possible eventually to infer from them in the way of further knowledge is precisely – newly inferred, precisely then something else. It is possible completely and exhaustively to understand the manifest sense of the initial proposition or propositions and reflexively to exhibit their content without knowing anything about the consequences inferred from them. But this is not the case with a normal human proposition. It does indeed have a determinate sense which can be clearly distinguished from the sense of another or contrary proposition. But any attempt reflexively to declare its content comes up against an intrinsic and irreducible marginal indistinctness of this content: its reflexive interpretation does not allow us to state adequately and exhaustively all that is concomitantly stated and known in it and all that is not; it is easy to establish unambiguously the minimum but not the maximum of what may in fact be its intelligible content. The proposition is always a kind of window through which a view may be gained of the thing itself, and implies in its full sense (as Com-munication) this view of the thing through the proposition (in its 'stated'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sense).[15] A proposition of this kind is in the nature of a window that has been opened to give a view of the thing; not of a package with sharply defined contents. For example, if I say, 'N.N. is my mother,' what has been communicated by this? What have I thought of here and communicated? The minimum is clear: what would make the proposition false if it did not exist: such-and-such a well-known biological relation. But do we mean by this that the proposition has nothing more to communicate, that when I spoke, I thought of nothing more and had nothing more to state? When I make a statement like this, there can and almost must be an abundance of other things in mind at the same time, globally and implicitly no doubt, but very really (as we have already said). But all this, in excess of the given minimum of propositional content, can concomitantly be heard by the hearer of the proposition: the specifically human character [70] of the motherhood, the relation between mother and son lasting long after the events of generation and birth, and all the other circumstances involved. The hearer too, just like the speaker, looks in and through the proposition with the speaker at the thing itself, and sees what he sees in the things as the communication made to one who is taking part as hearer. He rightly hears in the proposition not just its more or less definable minimum content, but concomitantly all that further content of the speaker's unreflexive awareness not yet propositionally objectified; and he hears it as something known to the speaker. This state of affairs must not be mistaken for one in which further truths, themselves precisely not spoken or communicated, are inferred from the propositional content spoken and heard, on the basis of its objective nature and specific cogency. Of course this is sometimes the case, but it need not invariably be so. It would invariably be so only if the proposition spoken and heard were in the nature of a package with clearly definable contents capable of exhaustive enumeration. But if this is not the case for the speaker, whose speech takes place in and with a knowledge, not yet articulated propositionally, of the thing discussed; and if this kind of speech, together with its 'train' of what is not yet propositionally articulate, is intelligible to the hearer[16]: then it is quite possible for the hearer to hear this knowledge of the thing too as the speaker's communicated knowledge, something had in common with the speaker about the thing, although not yet propositionally objectified. Or putting it the other way round, it is quite possible for the speaker to pass this knowledge on in propositions. It will then very often be the case that what seems to be something merely virtually implicit, from the purely logical point of view, will be in fact something formally communicated[17] it is not merely deducible [71] as new knowledge (not stated) from some

[15] In communication, what the proposition 'states' serves as a frame for a 'view of the thing '. – Tr.

[16] That this intelligibility is a fact cannot be doubted; but we cannot and need not proceed here to a further analysis of the presuppositions concerning intellectual knowledge on which it is based.

[17] It should now become possible to offer some clarification of the terms used by theologians in a controversy which has lasted up to our own times. One school (especially from the time of Suarez onwards) appeals to the conception of the 'formally implicit' to explain how on the one hand development of dogma is possible and on the other how what has been made explicit is still God's utterance. By the use of this conception they intend to circumvent the difficult question of how something which is properly speaking inferred by a specifically syllogistic procedure (the virtually implicit) can still be regarded as stated by God himself. The other school interprets the formally implicit as a more or less self-contradictory conception, because on their view what is formally stated in a proposition must be capable of being ascertained from the very concepts employed, with the help of grammars and dictionaries, by hermeneutical and exegetical methods. Now in practice 'explication' of this alleged formally implicit always takes place by means of what is often highly complex argumentation. In reality, then, this formally implicit is something virtually implicit, so that it will finally have to be granted that this too can become dogma.

In accordance with what we have just said in the text, the following distinction may be proposed. It is possible for something to be stated formally (the above-mentioned necessary minimum sense of a proposition); and for something to be formally communicated (the total meaning of the utterance, in fact communicated and intended in the speaker's utterance, but neither by speaker nor by hearer always articulated reflexively and propositionally, or even capable of immediate articulation). Strictly speaking then, what is formally stated

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

other (stated) knowledge, but even regarded as something in the mind which is propositionally not articulated, it is in fact communicated and so understood; and this is true even if it is only made propositionally objective by the hearer and this operation is exhibited (not, properly speaking, performed) in deductive form. Suppose someone says, 'I, A, sincerely love B'; it is quite possible that this statement should be made with the fidelity of the love in mind, and should consequently also be heard precisely as A's express communication of his love's fidelity. Now if C says, 'A [72] has affirmed his sincere love; atqui sincere love is faithful: then A is faithful,' it is only in appearance that C's knowledge of A's fidelity (derived from A's first statement) seems to belong to C alone, as a piece of reflexive, propositional explication; it is quite possible that in fact his propositional knowledge is a real ('formal') communication from A, even when it is not stated as a proposition.

Now it is not clear why this sort of communication should not be found in the sphere of Revelation: in fact, it must exist there too. Revelation too works with human concepts and propositions. Yet it follows then that we cannot ignore the irreducible distinction between what is explicitly stated on the one hand, and what is co-present in mind and communicated on the other.[18] Its importance is felt, and legitimately so, where propositions and concepts are used to communicate knowledge of a reality to which we could not have access in our present state without verbal information: in Revelation. When, for example, someone says, 'Christ "died" for us', everyone understands what is meant by dying or death in this statement. But what is meant by 'death' in this statement is not (or more prudently: need not be) just a physiological exit. The whole human experience of death can be really stated (i.e. communicated) and heard (not just deduced!) in this word, an experience which neither speaker nor hearer has ever translated adequately and objectively into propositions ('definitions' of death). If the hearer should ever arrive at a reflexive propositional analysis of what the word 'death' has always meant to him, it is then perfectly possible (though not in every case necessary) that what has been analysed in this way and minted into propositional coin, may still be conceived of precisely as communicated by the speaker. And this can still be so even when 'historically' we may grant that the speaker himself has never used a propositionally objective form to clarify his communication 'like this', or indeed if we grant that in his particular situation he could never have done so. If we believe a speaker [73] when he says something, then it is still this very speaker whom we believe when what he says has been explicated in propositions, because this is just what he has (or could have) known and cannot be implicit, but what is formally communicated certainly can. Thus even when something is deduced, it may nevertheless have been something formally communicated – against the second view; and where something is made explicit, it need not have been something formally stated (implicitly) – against the first view. This distinction between what is formally stated and what is formally communicated is materially that recognized by E. Dhanis ('Révélation explicite et implicite', Gregorianum XXXIV (1953) pp. 187-237, especially pp. 219, 221 s.), who distinguishes what is 'formellement signifié' from what is 'formellement attesté'. The latter may itself be signified in various ways: it maybe signified explicitly or implicitly, and if implicitly signified, either immediately (sc. capable of analytic explication) or mediately (sc. by demonstration or even merely as suasio or convenientia). Consequently Dhanis allows for something formally attested which is yet signified only mediately and persuasively. Nevertheless he does not discuss in any detail the noetic connexion which as such must obtain between this mode of signification and its formal attestation. It is not merely a matter of its being known in fact (this again is possible with various degrees of certainty), shall we say in the 'dépôt pris concrètement' (cf. pp. 227 s.).

---

[18] For every propositional explanation (definition) of the concepts of another proposition employs concepts in its turn; and these again can be explained propositionally. A process ad infinitum would begin. For it would be quite false to suppose that by a finite number of members this chain of explanations would reach an absolutely simple concept, in which the propositionally expressible would exhaust the object known non-propositionally without remainder. What an infinitely large number of things can be said about the 'ultimate' and the 'absolutely simple', about an entity as such!

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation communicated (though not propositionally).

This leaves room for an explication of a more complex kind (as to its express, propositional development) than any we have so far considered. It need not always be the case that from a proposition A, taken in its most immediate sense, a proposition B is deduced as formally, or above all, as virtually, contained in A. It might happen that in this explication the proposition B, taken strictly, should follow from what is com-municated in A or what is 'formally' contained in this com-munication. If the explication is to take place and to be set forth with all possible propositional and logical explicitness, the course of the explication in this case must run as follows. The immediately intelligible and express statements of Revelation in its manifold variety (propositional series A) are heard and questioned with a view to discovering what is compresent to mind and com-municated by them, that is, their background and the principle which comprehends the whole of this variety and gives it unity. This basic idea compresent to mind and con-signified (mit-gesagte) is extracted by making use of the individual propositions to give a view of the res on which they are based; in this way the basic idea is formulated expressly in propositions (proposition B). It is only from this intermediate proposition B that the desired terminal proposition is deduced, i.e. recognized as con-signified. If what has so far been said is correct, it immediately becomes clear that the procedure described does not (or need not in every case) move outside the sphere of what is properly speaking revealed. This schema according to which an explication of Revelation might proceed has been so briefly outlined that it may at first sight give the impression of something peculiar and artificially constructed. Yet a closer examination would show that in fact it is very often employed instinctively. Biblical theology always works like this: it invariably gives form to a multiplicity of concrete individual expressions in Scripture on the basis of a unifying conception, as it emerges from a consideration of various themes. For example, when an inquiry is made into the New Testament conception of God or the way in which it understands Time, or again into St Paul's idea of Pneuma, the same thing is always being done, from a methodological point of view: what is being sought is always the basic conception [74] con-signified in all the individual statements, the fundamental idea behind them, the leitmotiv, call it what you will. Now if, on the basis of this inquiry, an answer is given to a further special question, such as the incompatibility of this or that philosophical or metaphysica1proposition with a 'fundamental conception' discovered in Scripture, then we have the whole procedure outlined in our formal schema.

Nothing of what we have been saying is intended to postulate o recommend a new method of expounding dogma in theology. Theology as the practice of reflexive and scientific understanding will continue to work with its usual methods: strict attention to what has been said in original Revelation; concern for the exact sense of what has been heard, making use of all the methods at the disposal of a liberal and humane discipline (philology, history, logic, etc.); comparison and correlation of the propositions so heard and understood ('analogia fidei'); inquiry into the logical consequences resulting from these correlations (deductions), and so on. Theology as such can neither introduce the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit as a source or as a logical principle for its methods, nor can it propositionally articulate and explicate what is formally communicated (implicitly, if you will) otherwise than by logical operations. But what it is permissible to conclude (more clearly, perhaps, than before) with regard to these usual and unchanging theological methods is this: however, complex and protracted the methodical conduct of this sort of theological investigation may be, it need not necessarily lead to a result outside the sphere of what has been really stated and communicated formally by God (as though its discovery must necessarily be a piece of merely human wit). And this is so precisely because (from God's point of view) the God who speaks surveys in himself from the very beginning all the virtualities of his speech, and by his own Spirit in the Church inspires, guides and watches over their very actualization; and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because from the point of view of men and their properly human words and propositions, even in human speech more is actually communicated formally than can formally be stated. So, for example, we can give ourselves up to theological discussion of the Assumption with a kind of unhampered confidence,[19] and yet the result, considered [75] objectively, need not necessarily be just 'theology'. It is for the magisterium of the Church, which has the advantage of the isolated theologian in being able to make use of a higher criterion, to decide in any concrete case where the boundary lies between dogma and mere theologoumenon,[20] between certainly correct and merely probable explication. The Church possesses an organ of perception by which she can tell whether something which, from our point of view, emerges as a result of theological activity, is in fact objectively something more than the result of human speculation; whether it is still God's Word, though now expressed propositionally, in a new form, in a new articulation and explication. At any rate it need not necessarily be the case that what to us seems to be the fruit of theologically complex exegesis and speculation should in actual fact lack the character of Revelation, even if in a given case this character is only guaranteed by the verdict of the magisterium.

Thus where we have an explication of faith in which it is possible to demonstrate historically that theological reflexion has co-operated (whether this be in a properly scientific way or merely prescientifically, for there is no essential difference between the two inasmuch as both work with the same instruments), the magisterium, assisted by the Spirit, has a double function. Firstly it can in certain circumstances guarantee the correctness of this theological activity even where (in principle or up to now de facto) the activity, just as such, has led to no strict consequence but only to a convenientia. (We have at least left this possibility open.) Moreover it guarantees not only that the consequence is correct, but also that it is still God's Word.

In this process of exploring dogma we have restricted the theologian to the use of those means which are made available to him by [76] his exegetical and rational methods, so far as they enter objectively into his actual demonstrative procedures, that is, in so far as he may not, as theologian, rely upon any sort of intuition or illumination of faith or the like, in his actual demonstration. But that does not mean that in the long run he could come to any real result if he thought of working with the data of original Revelation rather as though he were merely an historian or a philosopher of religion. Rather it is as a member of the Church and in the light of faith that he must work, in real possession of the object of faith and in real contact with it through grace. As such these presuppositions play no immediate part in the demonstration itself but in the long run it would be impossible without them to see the objective force of a piece of theological argumentation and give it its proper weight. In the long run the correctness of our arguments and deductions from the propositions of faith can only proceed from the heart of a faith known by being lived, that faith which still possesses all in undivided unity and totality. But this original faith can only be explicated when we attend to the binding formulations in which it has never failed to express itself, and [19] Following the practice in this matter and elsewhere of all the classical theologians of the Middle Ages, who with every right quite calmly took it that the results of accurate theological reflexion formed part of the content of faith Cf., e.g., St Thomas, Ia.32.4 c: 'indirecte vero ad fidem pertinent ea, ex quibus negatis consequitur aliquid contrarium fidei.' According to R. M. Schultes, it was the general teaching from the fourteenth to the fifteenth century 'ad fidem pertinere non tantum ea quae expresse S. Scriptura vel Traditione habentur, sed simul, quae inde bona et necessaria consequentia deducuntur' (Introductio in historiam dogmatum, Paris 1922, pp. 115 s.).

---

[20] In the last resort between a theologoumenon logically certain in itself and something in the strict sense revealed (explicitly or implicitly) by God. Whether every strict deduction from the propositions of faith must be claimed as formally implicit Revelation, is a question which we leave open. The only purpose of our discussion is to show that one has no right to say that every deduction eo ipso can no longer be regarded as revealed. But it does seem to us that our discussion has at least shown this.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

necessarily in objective propositional form. Neither is wholly possible without the other. For it was only to the Church as a whole that the promise was made that she should possess the original faith entire and unclouded. She alone, and not every isolated individual, has the organs which, without fear of error, can bring this reflexion to completion with universally binding authority. In the last resort this is why it only in the Church that there is a secure guarantee of a permanent connexion between the original faith (in part global and implicit) in contact with the reality itself by grace and the light of faith, and the 'new' explication by theological means. The individual recognizes the faith as binding and certain only in so far as he grasps it in the Church and with her.[21] In no case however may one side of the connexion be played off against the other. Living, growing, as it were instinctive, awareness in faith must not suppose that it can do without sober theology, on the ground that it is more clairvoyant than theology, prudently and meticulously carrying out its historical and rational [77] tasks. On the other hand, theology, in its work of rational, conceptual deduction and historical investigation, must not suppose that in the Church's awareness in faith there can only be present as a real object of faith what it has already clearly demonstrated to be present by the use of its own proper theological instruments. It is only when the Church, after consideration of some 'new' proposition, knows herself to be in definitive possession of the truth, and declares this explicitly and with binding force for the awareness in faith of her individual members, that the just balance of the two aspects in any given case is finally guaranteed.

[21] This does not necessarily and invariably mean that the individual theologian is only able to recognize as revealed by God (fides divina) what is explicitly taught as such by the ordinary or extraordinary magisterium of the Church (fides catholica). But even where this is not the case, he hears God's Word as such in the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[79]

4

THEOS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT[1]

PART ONE: INTRODUCTION

I. Preliminary Remarks

A few preliminary remarks concerning matter and method will be in order before we begin the discussion of our theme, the conception of God in the New Testament.

1. Method. In view of the extent and complexity of the subject, it is evident that we can only offer an inadequate and provisional treatment of it in a short lecture. It need only be recalled that the relevant article in Kittel's Wörterbuck zum Neuen Testament[2] runs to sixty large, closely printed pages. Clearly a detailed exegetical discussion of individual passages is practically impossible. All that the lecture can offer is a general survey of the question; and thus it will unavoidably assume at least the external character of a study in the philosophy of religion and in speculative theology.

2. Matter. A preliminary observation of more far-reaching consequence has to be made here. If the Biblical theology we are practising [80] is to be Biblical theology and not simply the historical study of Biblical religion, we are justified as regards both matter and method in considering what fundamental lines of approach are laid down for us, as men who read the Scriptures in the Church with a faith instructed by the Church, by the whole of our prior knowledge of theology. This general theological a priori for our investigation into the teaching of Scripture need not prejudice the historical accuracy of what we are going to claim as Scriptural teaching. On the contrary: even the most recent Biblical theology, as it is practised by Eichrodt or Stauffer or, Kittel, for instance, invariably shows itself on closer inspection to be dominated by a priori theological concepts, formulations of the question and so on. Precisely because this a priori is not explicitly identified and reflexively formulated in advance, it involves a greater danger of 'eisegesis' and misinterpretation of the texts than when the general theological presuppositions from which we proceed to an examination of Scripture are honestly and plainly stated before-hand.

With regard to our question, then, we must try to discover in what way, according to the teachings of the Church, the Christian conception of God is bound to stand out in relief against pagan and philosophical conceptions. If we speak of a pagan conception, we have in mind for all practical purposes the conception of God in Greek and Roman antiquity; if we speak of a philosophical conception, by this is meant both non-Christian philosophy actually in existence (and so again for practical purposes Greek and Roman philosophy) as well as an 'ideal' philosophy. A review of Greek and Roman antiquity, not taking into account the

---

[1] This essay was originally delivered as a lecture to a small theological study circle in Vienna, and was intended merely to prepare the way for further discussion. Consequently no attempt was made in the lecture to supply references or the usual apparatus. External circumstances made revision impossible. However, even in its present form, the essay may perhaps stimulate attempts to provide a better foundation in Biblical theology for our usual dogmatic treatises De Deo Uno, which are in most cases just philosophy with a few trimmings of Scripture.

[2] G. Kittel, TWNT III, pp. 65-123. Anyone who is acquainted with this article, by Kleinknecht, Quell, Stauffer and Kuhn, will not need individual references to see how much this essay owes to it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

religions of the rest of paganism, is sufficient for our purposes, because (apart from the practical impossibility of further extending our field of vision) the variety and range of Greek and Roman religion allow it to serve as typical for pagan religion in general, and because it is in fact the religious context into which the Christian message of God first entered.

What we shall investigate, then, is the way in which the conception of God in paganism and philosophy may in advance be expected to coincide with and depart from the Christian conception of God in the faith of the Church.

In order to answer this question we must first go a little further back. According to the Church's teaching, the world in which we live is in fact supernatural, that is, a world which as a whole is ordered to [81] the personal, Trinitarian God beyond the world. It is ordered as a whole to a supernatural end: originally graced as a whole, then fallen as a whole (for truly 'all creation groans for redemption'), yet a world ever under the binding call of the God of supernatural life, shot through by the rays of primitive Revelation and even before Christ stirred by grace, at last redeemed as a whole in Christ. The whole of Nature, then, has always been embedded in a supernatural context. And so too the whole development of religion and all philosophy are included under a theological a priori. In spite of their newness, Christ and his Revelation are not the first in time to bring the supernatural into the world, although all that is supernatural depends on him; but Christ and his Revelation can indeed bring to light again the supernatural character of God's activity and of the world which stands before him, rescuing it from the oblivion in which it had been lost; and this oblivion itself might be due to forgetfulness and inadvertence arising from original sin, and thus 'theological'. It is Revelation, then, which can first tell us precisely what is natural and what supernatural in non-Christian religion and thought, what is simply lack of knowledge in the non-Christian world and what voluntary ignorance, and also what is supernatural knowledge or presentiment there (derived from primitive Revelation or the inner dynamism of grace). So it is Revelation which first throws light on the half or even completely concealed supernatural, theological factor in pre-Christian and non-Christian religion and philosophy, which cannot be regarded as some sort of purely natural religion or purely natural speculation, nor again as religion and philosophy which have become corrupted in some purely natural way. It follows from these considerations that the Christian faith must not and cannot owe anything to non-Christian religion and speculation; clearly its content and its formulations can appear nowhere else, either in principle or in fact. If similarities can be traced, they are purely a posteriori in character, matters of fact. Putting it the other way round, we may say that wherever some element or formulation of Christian faith is pointed out to us outside Christianity, even if the two are clearly shown to be connected empirically, there need be no embarrassment or disquiet in accepting such an identification, provided that it is really there and is not achieved by a levelling-down of what is specifically Christian, in the fashion widely current today among historians of religion. All that such a fact would prove is that the living God who revealed himself in Jesus Christ is at work [82] with his light and grace even outside the zone of saving history in the narrower, theological sense.

Let us now apply these general considerations of principle to the knowledge of God.

We know from the teaching of the Church that the one God as principium et finis of the world can be known with intrinsic certainty 'by the light of natural reason' from the objective world. All that is immediately given in this declaration is that such knowledge is possible for human nature. We say 'for human nature'; that is, concretely, this possibility of knowing God (concerning the content and extent of which more will be said in a moment) is something which belongs to the constitution of man even in independence of Revelation and the vocation which raises him by grace to a participation in the life of God in Trinity. It is a possibility, then, which man still has even when he has as a sinner lost the possibility of participating in God's personal life; one which consequently is still operative where and in so far as man's philosophy and religion lie under the law of sin; and so one which must in some form or other necessarily be met within the non-Christian world of man's religion and philosophy, simply because he is man. The phrase 'rational knowledge from the world' demarcates this way of reaching God, firstly, from a personal divine revelation to man (both as inner illumination by grace and as exterior historical revelation). Further, this knowledge is distinguished from an immediate experience of God (whether present in fact or not), as this is understood in every form of ontologism, no matter whether it is mystical or rational in tendency. Thirdly, the phrase guards against a conception of experience of God which would make it something purely irrational, emotive, not available to critical examination and incapable of mediation by rational concepts and statements. Moreover, only a possibility of this kind of knowledge of God is in question. A whole series of problems arises here. Does this possibility ever become a reality, and if so to what extent? How does this realization come about? Is it due in fact to human nature alone, or are there in fact causes at work such as primitive Revelation and the supernatural grace which falls to every man's share? How far does this realization depend not merely on rational and logical factors but also on a moral decision, on which again both the inherited and the personal sin of man have their influence as well as healing supernatural grace? For the concrete acquisition of this knowledge of God in a concrete man, how far is [83] growth in awareness of values always a presupposition, how far are sociological preconditions required like language, tradition, education, training of the religious sense? All these are questions on which no decision is made in the Vatican Council's definition. Taken by itself, all that is said in this definition about the content of the rational knowledge of God is that God can be known as cause and end of the world. Nothing is finally decided about the question as to whether God can be known as Creator of the world, in the strict theological sense of the word 'creation'. What in concrete terms forms the content of this possible natural knowledge of God, appears perhaps most simply when we try to determine the theological sense of this pronouncement about a possibility of human nature; for it becomes immediately apparent that Revelation could have absolutely no interest in determining a possibility of human nature, since it always has to deal with the concrete man, the man, then, who is always within the supernatural order. The theological sense of this decision (which in the last resort must always be related to a theological situation and not a purely natural one, in which, just in itself as a fact purely of this world, Revelation would have no interest) is clearly this: that in this conception of human nature alone is it possible for man to be a potentially receptive subject of theology and of Revelation. It is only if man stands before God always and of necessity and on every presupposition, even, then, as sinner, as turned away from God and deprived of the free gift of divine life – 'by nature', then – that he is that being who has to come to terms with Revelation, who has the power to perceive Revelation, for whom the failure to perceive Revelation involves not merely deficiency but guilt. Precisely in order to be able to experience God's personal self-disclosure as grace, that is, to be able to apprehend it as neither obvious nor immanent (just a part of the divine constitution), man must be a subject who in the very nature of things has to come to terms with God's disclosure or withholding of himself. Only if it is in the nature of things that he has something to do with God can he freely and spontaneously experience God's self-disclosure as it is actually promulgated in Revelation: in other words, precisely so that Revelation might be grace, it is necessary at least in principle that man should have something to do with God from a locus which is not already grace.[3]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[84] We are now in a position to state more precisely what the content of this natural

[3] Cf. K. Rahner, Hörer des Wortes (Munich 1941). It must of course be noted that this necessary 'natural' openness of man to God is, in the historically realized scheme of things, always necessarily 'overlaid' (even when man is not in a state of justifying grace) by a supernatural 'existential' ordering the spiritual person to the God of eternal life. See below pp. 297-317.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

knowledge of God must be. It makes no difference to us here whether the notes which we shall enumerate are held to belong to the natural conception of God in virtue of an authoritative definition, or are merely derived by us from the definition. We say: any knowledge of God's transcendence and his existence as personal belongs to the content of the natural conception of God. It is true that man is that being who has to give ear to a possible Revelation in history and in speech; and if he is to experience this personal self-disclosure by God not just as God's free act but also as free grace to him, man, as already constituted in being (and this is the Biblical, Christian conception of Revelation), then he must from the very beginning ('by nature') be that being who has to reckon with God's speech or silence, God's bestowal or refusal of himself. It is only if this kind of bivalent relatedness to God belongs to man's very essence that he is on the one hand a potentially receptive subject of Revelation, only then that his constitution is such that even while remaining conscious of his obligation he can culpably reject Revelation (for he would not otherwise remain capable of receiving the Word); and on the other hand it is only then that he can experience Revelation, in case it is promulgated, as free grace (for in the nature of things he has also to reckon with God's silence). In other words, even naturally speaking man must stand before God conceived of as a free Person transcending the world.

We may ask what consequences follow from all this with regard to the question as to what conception of God we may expect to find in advance outside the genuine historical Revelation, and hence with regard to the question how far the revealed conception of God is bound to stand out in relief against the non-Christian one. In a certain way all the influences we have found actually at work in man's religious life and enumerated when we began these reflexions, will play a part in the non-Christian conception of God: natural man's knowledge of God ascending from below through the world, the deterioration due to original sin, grace and primitive Revelation. [85] Consequently all three factors will be seen most clearly at work at that point in the conception of God which is formally decisive for the Christian conception, namely, in God's free, personal existence transcending the world as Lord of Nature and History. Granted that even in man's fallen state his nature and divine grace are still continually active, it will never be possible that the consciousness of a God, unique, transcendent, free and freely treating with man in history, should disappear. But if man lives in a fallen state, and if in the last resort sin is the will not to allow God to be God and the attempt to shut the world in upon itself, then every non-Christian religion, in so far as it is and must be qualified theologically as sin, is bound to give God's infinity the meaning of an infinity of powers and forces active in the world, will be in fact a polytheism. Each one of these religions, in a metaphysical and religious pursuit of unity which is quite justified in itself, will try to comprehend the multiplicity of deified powers and forces of the world in a unity; and so inevitably each will turn into a form of pantheism. Each will be guilty of forgetting God as Person and as free to enter into historical communication with the world by his revealing Word; and in the last resort each will become devotion to the world instead of obedience to the unique and living God. All these elements (in varying measure, of course) will be met with in every non-Christian religion. It becomes basically impossible, then, to interpret any one of them in terms of an absolutely clear-cut formula, by means of which it should be distinguished merely negatively from the Christian conception of God. Which of the elements present in it actually decides the issue before God for the individual man and his concrete, existential achievements, is in the last resort not for us to judge.

Inversely, we may note three corresponding features of the Christian conception of God. In the first place, it will confirm that knowledge of the unique, transcendent, personal God which is always stirring into life, whether naturally or supernaturally, even outside the history of Revelation; and, precisely from the viewpoint of Revelation, it will free what is naturally true in non-Christian religion and philosophy from the encumbrance of sin, allowing what is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

supernatural in these truths to appear as such, and restraining the attempt to claim it as part of man's innate, inadmissible nobility. Secondly, the Christian conception will always express God's passionate protest against every kind of polytheistic or pantheistic deification of the world caused by [86] original sin and everywhere at work, even today. Thirdly, it will alone be able to say unambiguously and definitively just how the personal, transcendent God desires in actual fact to stand to the world in his sovereign freedom: namely, as the God who actually discloses his inmost self to man out of grace, so compelling man in a unique, climactic situation to an absolute gravity, either bliss or damnation; as the God who gives his definitive sanction to the world in the Incarnation of his Son and so precisely summons it to share in his triune life.

3. We must now proceed to a further preliminary discussion of the material for this study. What we have so far said has been concerned with the features which distinguish the non-Christian from the Christian conception of God, still taking the history of Revelation as a unified whole. The preparatory remarks which follow are concerned with distinctions in the conception of God within the history of Revelation itself. In other words, the question here is whether the conception of God in Revelation itself permits of differentiation and change, and in what way it does so. In the concrete terms of our theme, this is the question whether a more or less fundamental difference between the conceptions of God in the Old and in the New Testament is to be expected in advance, and what kind of difference this may be.

For this purpose we must start somewhat further back. Revelation (by which we mean not just God's speech but also and above all his active dealings with men) does have a real history. Precisely because God, who is already known by man's natural reason from the world, is a free person transcending the world, the knowledge which is man's by nature must release this personal God. It cannot work out the concrete manner in which God wishes to enter into relations with man, to deal with him, by calculations starting from below, from man; it cannot, in the last resort, establish a clearly defined, concrete religion. In the last resort all it can settle with respect to religion remains enclosed within the brackets of God's free sovereignty and the knowledge of this sovereignty, at the disposal of which man must put himself by obedience in true religio, and in which God either denies himself to man or bestows himself in free grace. And on this either-or rests the final decision as to the concrete shape taken by a truly and existentially significant religion. Now this question cannot be answered [87] by men, in terms of a metaphysical outline of God's essence, but only by God himself, by his own free decision as event. But a decision of this kind is essentially historical, and historical in a twofold sense: firstly in the sense of a divine historicity (if we may be allowed the expression), by which all that is meant is simply that God's decision is personal and free, a moment in a dialogue with men already constituted in being. In so far as God's actually evinced speech to men always meets a human being for whose nature and existence God's Revelation can never become a self-evident constituent, and hence may never be interpreted in accordance with some physical law as a factor in the immanent development of human nature, it is clear that Revelation is always a free event, free even when and indeed in so far as man is presupposed as something given. It is not just because man himself is an act of God's freedom that God's Word and his saving Act are free; this metaphysical freedom is not to be confused with God's freedom within the world already in being. His Word and Act are free in the further sense that they are freely directed to men already in existence, and so are essentially Event and History, not Thing, metaphysical Idea or Norm. What happens in saving history is not the natural outcome of some unchanging ideal law, but the free, incalculable, ever new Event of God's activity. In this sense God's speech and action would take the form of an historical and temporal dialogue even if it were uniformly to accompany the whole duration of human history and physical process. But in actual fact God's decision

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is historical in a second sense – in human historicity: there does in fact exist a real history of Revelation. That is to say, God has certainly not established one and the same thing once and for all, but what he has said and done was said and done at quite definite points in space and time, so that even considered in extension saving history and world history do not coincide.

In spite of its character as event, its variety and multiplicity, God's historical activity in the world has as a whole an inner connexion, an inner teleology, so that any act in this saving history only becomes comprehensible and meaningful as an element in the whole. Comprehensible and meaningful, of course, not in the sense that we could on our own construct the whole from a part by some sort of physical or biological extrapolation, see it as possessing a conceptual necessity; but it is meaningful and unified just in that sense in which the manifold, changing behaviour of a free spiritual person is a single significant unity.

We have now to distinguish more sharply in Revelation and saving [88] history between the saving process itself (e.g. Paradise, the rejection of man, the Incarnation, the Church, Judgment) and the Word which necessarily accompanies it, and through which every saving process first exists for us as a saving action performed among us by God in the area of our spiritually perceptive personality. God's central and definitive saving act, one precisely for that reason different from all the others, is the single inner unity of Incarnation, Cross and Resurrection, in which he definitively and radically communicated himself to the world and in which he really came to us. In this sense all the earlier saving acts are intrinsically directed to Christ as their end, and every revealed Word which enters into composition with them and accompanies them thus has intrinsic reference to the definitive and unsurpassable Revelation of God in Christ. And so Augustine's statement is really true, that the New Testament is already present concealed in the Old. In accordance with what we have said this presence is of course prophetic, that is, the Word of the Old Testament already possesses in actual fact an inner orientation to God's definitive Word in and through Christ. It really is the first Word of a uniform, inwardly coherent dialogue, the final Word of which is Christ. But of necessity this first Word is spoken by God in such a way that within the historical dialogue of salvation man too retains freedom of speech and action, scope for genuine venture and decision. It must then be the case (returning to our question and its concrete terms) that the Word of the Old Testament, in so far as it already contains the tidings of the New, is necessarily obscure. This Word is primarily an utterance concerning God's saving Act in the time of the Old Covenant, and contains a prophetic anticipation of the saving reality of the New inasmuch as the reality of God's saving acts in the history of the Old Covenant possesses inner teleological reference to the New. It follows as a matter of intrinsic necessity that the Word of the Old Testament is in a characteristic way at once historical with respect to contemporary events and prophetic with respect to the future. It says enough about what has just happened to allow the hearer to come to a decision with regard to the future by abandoning himself in faith to the work of salvation then taking place; and what it says is so little and so obscure that his decision is still not really committed in advance. God always retains sovereign control over the course of this historical dialogue: what he had already laid down as its definitive sense from its very first Word, is disclosed to someone who can directly perceive [89] its last Word in a quite different and specifically higher way than it is disclosed to someone who only perceived the first Word. The Old Testament unfolds only in the New; and yet the inner nature of the Old Testament Word is such that anyone who abandons himself to its hidden dynamism and allows himself to be carried beyond the limits of his personal interpretation and the letter of the text, will mysteriously and secretly partake of the benediction really contained in the New. In principle, then, we can never interpret the Old Testament except in terms of our existential situation in the plan of salvation, in terms, then, of the New Testament. If we try to take up an objective, neutral position and ask what the Old Testament meant for a man under the Old Covenant, in precisely his situation and for him

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

alone, it is in principle almost impossible to avoid the danger of seeing too much or too little in the text: we should either make the continuity of Old and New into an already manifest presence of the New in the Old or harden the Old into a stiff, self-contained block.

What relation should we expect to find, then, between the idea of God in the Old Testament and that in the New, in accordance with these general considerations? We may say that the New Testament idea of God cannot take its place alongside the Old Testament as something simply new, as it were by a generatio aequivoca; it must already be active in the Old Testament, concealed in prophecies which must by their very nature be obscure. The New Testament idea of God must be the unveiling and the fulfilment of the Old Testament idea, the Word which for the first time declares the final and unambiguous meaning of what God has said about himself in the Old Testament by his speech and action, and on the basis of which we must interpret all its statements if we are to understand them properly in their significance for ourselves. This unity and sameness of the idea of God in the New and in the Old Testaments must not be misinterpreted by falsely reducing similar statements to the static necessity proper to a metaphysical idea of God. In the last resort, God is the Same in the Old Testament and in the New, not because he is in possession of a necessary, immutable essence, but because the whole of saving history is a progressive revelation of the way in which the free God who is active in history has wished to enter into relationship with his world.

[90]

II. The Greek and Old Testament Conceptions of God

1. The Greek Conception of God

If we begin by speaking of the Greek conception of God, this is because we must have some acquaintance with the concrete world in which the Christian Gospel appeared. It is only in this way that we can understand why the conversion from idols to God in order to serve the true and living God (1 Thess 1:9), why ‘monotheism’, that is, does not mean a self-evident metaphysical assumption for Christianity, but belongs to the very heart of its message. The following remarks about the Greek conception of God are restricted to conditions in the Greek, Roman, Oriental oikoumene of the time; they are not offered as a description of the whole long development of the Greek conception of God. And even these indications can only be summary in character, without any attempt to explore the historical material.

a. By θεο&φ the Greeks did not mean the unity of a definite personality in the monotheistic sense, but rather the unity of the religious world, clearly felt as one in spite of its multiplicity of forms. The Greek conception of God is essentially polytheistic, not indeed in the sense of many isolated gods but as an ordered totality of gods, such as appears in Homer’s divine polity, for instance, where the gods are ranged in order, one above the other. This view naturally promoted the use of the term θεο&φ and achieved its most generously conceived form in the person of Zeus, the πατη_ρ α)νδρω~ν τε θεω~ν τε, the monarchic θεω~ν υ#πατοφ και∴ α!ριστοφ, the ultimate exponent of divine dominion. This view of a pluralistic cosmos of gods was maintained to the end, in spite of the most strenuous attempts to establish unity in a philosophical conception of God from which all traces of anthropomorphism had long since disappeared. The Stoa still rejected monotheism as a diminution of God. According to Plotinus, God’s greatness is proved by the multiplicity of gods, because the divine must not be compressed into a point but must be unfolded in all its multiplicity, over the whole range of its own self-unfolding. The forms of the Greek gods are nothing but the basic forms of cosmic reality, whether these are conceived of mythically (as in Homer) or in terms of an ultimate homogeneous α)ρξη& (as in Ionian physics) or as [91]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the ι0δε/α of the philosophers. This reality is multiform, and approaches men with the most various demands, demands which exist in free and unruffled opposition in the divine world above but which often intersect each other in man's heart with tragic results. Hence the plural θεοι/ and polytheism. Wherever something profoundly actual, some massive, pregnant reality emerges majestically in the world, the Greek can only say: just this – not, shall we say, the 'wholly Other' – is God. Gods, then, are powers, which as Order, Form and Meaning penetrate the whole world with their influence, and continually restore the chaotic to coherence. The world's unfolding as Order, its realization as Form and Whole, its potent intelligibility – this is God; but the gods have not created the world ex nihilo. The historical development of the Greek conception of God invariably turns on the question of how this aspect of the Absolute in the world is precisely to be understood. The development of the Greek idea of God is the history of the forms in which the divine has expressed itself in Being. According as the world itself is metaphysically unified – and only so far – the conception of God too becomes henotheistic: it does not for that reason become any less cosmological. Θεο&φ continues to be a predicate, and the subject of this predicate is the cosmos.

b. In spite of this dominant polytheism and pantheism which is found throughout Greek thought even in its most sublime forms, a genuinely monotheistic note, a shadowy, unrealized knowledge of a truly personal, transcendent God, should not be overlooked. We must allow for this at least in the sense that under all the formulas, the rites and the religious practices which entered into the concrete activities of the individual man as he sought salvation and reflected on things under the touch of grace, man could enter into a truly personal relationship with a living God. It is always possible that primitive Revelation and rational, monotheistic reflexion may have contributed to the forms of Zeus and Jupiter. Something of true monotheism was really alive – it makes no difference what the ultimate motive was – wherever men simply prayed to God and so in some way or other a personal, urgent, unqualified Thou was uttered; wherever men asked to be told the will of the gods, or where, as in the philosophy of Plato or Aristotle, an attempt was made to discover an absolute and supreme One, transcending the Many; or when it happened, as in the case of the Pre-Socratics Xenophanes and Heracleitus, that the polytheism of the [92] Homeric pantheon was explicitly combated. In some such way the world became open and men attentive to what lay beyond: although this openness of the world to the living One transcending all might suddenly close in again, as soon as men tried to say who this ultimate One was to whom they prayed in real need; and the mysterious depths of the world as suddenly become again, no longer the unknown God, but the divine 'It' of νο&μοφ, δι/κη, Mind, Idea, beyond which ει9μαρμε&νη still maintained its incomprehensible and inscrutable sway.

2. The Conception of God in the Old Testament

a. A preliminary remark about method has to be made here, even if it is an obvious one. If we are going to discuss the Old Testament conception of God, we are not going to inquire what conception of God prevailed in historical fact among the individuals who composed the People of the Covenant, granting that this conception was of course reflected in the Old Testament literature. Our inquiry is directed to finding out what portrait of God is offered in the Old Testament as true and binding. And here too we must forgo any attempt to describe the historical development of the conception.

b. The religion of the Old Testament is commonly spoken of as monotheism. This basic

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

characterization is quite just, provided that we understand what we mean by 'monotheism' when we apply the term to Old Testament religion. Monotheism must not be understood here as a metaphysical denomination of a static kind, to be applied with equal justice to Deism. In the last resort, the monotheism of the Old Testament is not based on the rational considerations of a man who is seeking for the ultimate unity of the world and can only find it in a transcendent Source of all things; rather it is based on the experience of Yahweh's saving deeds in the midst of this world and in the history of his People. The heart of Old Testament monotheism is found in the fact that Yahweh, i.e. the definite Person with a proper name who actually intervenes in the history of a people and of all men by his own free will, has seized hold of this definite people, without regard to their natural qualities, has chosen it and made it his own People by entering into a covenant with it; and as the jealous God, has forbidden it to venerate all other numinous powers so that he might establish his uniqueness as the only God with whom his People [93] can be concerned. Old Testament monotheism involves a conscious recognition of this fact: it knows that this Person Yahweh, freely active in history, can alone legitimately claim the title El-Elohim; that all other Elohim are not such in reality, are Nothings; that this Yahweh is the absolute sovereign Lord of the World and of Nature (so that every kind of worship of Baal, as a cult of the powers of Nature and fertility, is a service of idols and nonsensical); that this Yahweh is wholly Spirit and Person, on whose free 'creation' absolutely everything depends. The further working out of this conscious recognition could safely be left to the historic development of this basic idea of Old Testament monotheism; it forms in fact the greater part of what is revealed in Old Testament history. This history does not of course advance by a merely human reflexion upon the basic datum we have described, but rather through an experience of the unceasing novelty of Yahweh's personal action (so that really it is not a history of theology, but a history of Revelation and Salvation, of God's own speech and action in the world). A cosmological metaphysics ascends to a first cause of the world, to an intellectual first cause, and thence to a first cause transcending the world, and thus (in principle, at least) proceeds until it has in fact achieved some understanding of God as Person (in purely formal terms, of course); in this way it terminates in the ultimate question as to whether and how this personal God might not only continue to cause the world but also – appearing alongside the world, as it were – might wish to deal with it. The development of the Old Testament conception of God proceeds in exactly the reverse order: first comes the experience of God as a free Person active in the world, a Person generous and abundant, who reveals himself in his proper name, who calls and chooses; and it is only from this historical experience of who Yahweh is that it becomes progressively clearer what he is – not just a God, not just a powerful Lord in the history of perhaps this people alone, but the Lord of the history of all peoples and so Lord of Nature too: the transcendent, spiritual Cause and Source of all reality, lifted up above every earthly limitation. This Lord (because of the original starting-point of his People's knowledge of him) is not dissolved in the empty indistinctness of an impalpable metaphysical concept but remains in his absolute transcendence of all earthly things concretely and unambiguously He, just as He wished in his sovereign freedom to show himself, in the course of the unique history of his covenant with this People. A brief [94] formulation of what we have learnt would run as follows: the basic form of Old Testament monotheism is not, 'One God exists' (there is a single primary cause of the world); but 'Yahweh is the unique God'. We shall content ourselves for the moment with this brief sketch of what is decisive for Old Testament thought about God, and return to the Old Testament as occasion offers in the course of our discussion of the New Testament conception.

PART TWO: THEOS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

I. The Point of Departure

1. The unquestioning assurance which characterized consciousness of God.

The first thing that strikes us when we try to find out how the men of the New Testament thought about God is the unquestioning assurance which characterized their consciousness of him. It never occurred to these men to raise the question of his existence as such. The New Testament knew nothing of all those characteristic features of our consciousness of God today: an anxious sense that questioning must come first, a sense that it is first necessary slowly and reflectively to lay a firm foundation before any sort of intimation, developed feeling or recognition of God can be admitted; a feeling that God never fails to withdraw himself from the grip of man's questions; a fear that after all God may be nothing but a monstrous projection of man's subjective needs and yearnings; a suffering in religious doubt. For the New Testament God is in the first place simply there. He is there: in spite of all his incomprehensibility and sublimity, all the fear and trembling and the overwhelming joy which this divine Reality may have in store for men, nevertheless as simply the most evident fact of all, the fact in no need of proof or explanation, he is really there. For the men of the New Testament the question is not whether the reality of the world which they can see and touch might perhaps point beyond itself to the infinite darkness of a wholly Other; all they are concerned with is how this God, who has always been given and self-evident, actually behaves, so that man might for the first time learn how things really stand with himself and the world. It is not the immediate reality of the world and its visible magnitude which serve as a kind of permanent base from which, subsequently as it were, God is going to come within reach, but just the reverse: it is only under [95] God that men find their own reality and the reality of the world really clear and comprehensible. This unquestioning assurance of God's existence does not arise from any properly metaphysical considerations, nor is it troubled or put off balance by the awareness that this kind of genuine knowledge of God is absent in the rest of the New Testament world.

Firstly, then, this unquestioning assurance does not really arise from metaphysical reflexion. Proofs for the existence of God are never produced. There is never any guidance on how man might by himself develop a consciousness of God, nowhere an appeal to a need for God with the intention of eliciting a conscious conviction of his existence. The New Testament is indeed aware of a self-consistent possibility of knowing God from the world. The one and only true God, his δυ&ναμιφ, and θειο&τηφ (this abstract metaphysical term occurs only twice in the New Testament), his σοφι/α and the δικαι/ωμα του~ θεου~, God's sanction of the natural moral law as a divine ordination (1 Cor 1:21; Rom 1:32; 2:14), can be known through what is made (ποιη&ματα, Rom 1:20) always and everywhere, hence in independence of God's historical action in the world (α)πο_ κτι/σεωφ κοσμου=, Rom 1:21); and they can be known with such certainty that the refusal to acknowledge God by revering him or giving thanks (Rom 1:21) involves moral guilt, which provokes the wrath of God (Rom 1:18). For St Paul, something knowable exists in God, which while remaining objective, presents itself openly (φανερο&ν) for man's recognition (Rom 1:19). According to St Paul again, the character of the world as created must always have been apparent to man (Rom 1:20). There is always the possibility for the world of a σοφι/α which can come to know God from the σοφι/α θεου= objectivized in the world (1 Cor 1:21). In spite of its certainty this possible knowledge of God, which is moreover always somehow present in actual fact (φανερο&ν ε0στιν ε0ν αυ)τοι=φ, Rom 1:19; γνο&ντεφ το_ν θεο&ν, Rom 1:21), always essentially involves man's moral and religious decision. Although God is never far from men (Ac 17:27), their situation is such that they must seek him (ζητει=ν); so that in consequence of this character of the knowledge of God as decision, it is uncertain (ει0 α)/ρα γε) whether they will in fact touch him and find him (Ac 17:27).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But for the actual consciousness of the men of the New Testament this metaphysical possibility is not the existential support and cause of [96] their consciousness of God. The metaphysical knowledge of God is never discussed at length. It is never invoked by the men of the New Testament as far as their own experience of God is concerned; reference is only made to it so as to show how ignorance of God is comprehensible as moral depravity, to convict someone who does not know God of sin. Even where this metaphysical possibility is briefly touched on in the context of an apologetic for monotheism (Ac 17:22 s.) the final motive of conversion to the living God is not the metaphysical argument but the historical activity of God himself revealing himself in the foolishness of the Cross (1 Cor 1:18 s.) and the Resurrection (Ac 17:31). These are facts which are brought home to men not in the form of a truth in itself basically reasonable and available at all times for inspection, by helpful guidance and instruction, but by preaching and proclamation, by an announcement which exacts not intelligent comprehension but obedient acknowledgment (ευ0αγγελι/ζεσθαι, Ac 14:15; α0παγγε/λλειν, Ac 17:30; κηρυ/σσειν, 1 Cor 1:21.23).

In the second place, the unquestioning assurance of God's self-evident reality is not disturbed by the awareness of an ignorance of God in the pagan world round about. The New Testament knows of ξρο/νουφ τη=φ α0γνοι/αφ (Ac 17:30), an α)/γνοια (Eph 4:18; Ac 17:23, α0γνοει=ν), an ignorance of God (Gal 4:8, ου)κ ειδε/ναι; 1 Thess 4:5; 2 Thess 1:8), a failure to apprehend God (1 Cor 1:21), α)/θεοι ε0ν τω~| κο/σμω| (Eph 2:12). For the New Testament this failure to apprehend God is always a moral fault and also its punishment. It knows of no ignorance or doubt about God which is morally neutral, any religious problematic which remains purely theoretical[4]; wherever God is not known, it is a matter of a ματαιο/τηφ του= νοο/φ (Eph 4:17; Rom 1:21), a πω&ρωσιφ τη~φ καρδι/αφ (Eph 4:18), a darkening of man's foolish heart (Rom 1:21) and his understanding (Eph 4:18), a μωρι/α (Rom 1:22). St Paul deals with this ignorance of the true God, involving moral guilt, in the concrete form of idolatry (Rom 1:23; [97] Ac 14:15; 17:29; 1 Cor 8:1-7; 12:2; 1 Thess 1:9).[5] And in the last resort St Paul sees idolatry as the worship of demonic powers (1 Cor 10:20.21; cf. Apoc 9:20). The New Testament knows quite well, in an almost rationalistic way, that the pagan gods[6] are 'nothing' (Ac 19:26; 1 Cor 8:4; 10:19, Gal 4:8); but the polytheistic pagan cults do in fact come into contact with a numinous reality, the demons. For St Paul there really are powers and forces in the world which may with a certain right be called θεοι/ and κυ/ριοι (1 Cor 8:5). He maintains that a specific and essential connexion must hold between spiritual powers and Nature, even if he does not explicitly state what it is (Eph 6:12, κοσμοκρα/τορεφ; Col 2:18, θρησκει/α τω~ν α0γγε/λων; cf. the notion of στοιξει=α του= κο/σμου, Gal 4:3.9; Col 2:8.20); so that for him, to treat the world as an absolute (ε0λα&τρευσαν τη=| κτι/σει παρα_ το_ν κτι/σαντα, Rom 1:25) is really equivalent to worshipping the spiritual powers who have turned away from God, and who as at once στοιξει=α του= κο&σμου and spirits hostile to God, hold sway in and over the visible world.

We have seen that this failure to know God consists in culpably making an absolute of the

---

[4] When a particular δεισιδαιμονι/α is attributed to the Athenians (Ac 17:22), it is an extensive and manifold religious activity which is meant – St Paul intentionally keeps the word as neutral as possible (TWNT II, p. 21). But it seems clear from St Paul's general view that the word is certainly not supposed to recognize the existence of a piety which while it is false theoretically, is morally praiseworthy, as though human guilt did not enter essentially into the form of this piety.

[5] On polytheism in Acts, see TWNT III, p. 100.

[6] ει1δωλον: TWNT II, p. 375.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

multiple reality of a world become demonic, and so becomes objectively a cult of the demons who form the metaphysical background of this world-power. For St Paul the failure is thus a refusal to know God (Rom 1:18 s.), and the refusal is intrinsically and necessarily coexistent with actually knowing something about God all the time (και∴ καθω_φ ου)κ ε0δοκι/μασαν το∴ν θεο_ν ε)/ξειν ε0ν ε0πιγνω&σει: they would not admit that they had knowledge of God, Rom 1:28; cf. Rom 1:19.21.32; 2:14). This is not the place to discuss this remarkable coexistence in man of a continual knowledge of God and a deliberate ignorance of him, and how we are to interpret it in logical and psychological detail; how it may be necessary to distinguish various layers in man's existential consciousness; how reference might be made to the phenomena of bad conscience, repression, self-deception, masked conscience; to metaphysical conceptions like the scintilla animae and synderesis. Yet this whole complex makes it clear why the men of the New Testament did not feel that their unquestioning assurance of God's self-evident reality was affected by the atheistic polytheism which surrounded [98] them. In it they saw guilt and the operation of demonic power, precisely in order to combat which they were sent in the strength of the true God who went with them. They were convinced that their Word did not encounter men to whom something till then simply unknown had to be brought home for the first time by careful instruction, but rather that it encountered men who had already had some kind of knowledge of God, even if they would not admit its truth, even if this truth was heavily overlaid in their minds by a settled ignorance – settled only in appearance. They brought tidings of the living God who had freely acted in history and so had disclosed himself to man as something infinitely beyond the capacities of the visible world; and at the same time their tidings laid bare a knowledge of God buried under original and personal sin – a kind of theological psychoanalysis, as it were. Thus the revealed Word and natural knowledge of God mutually condition each other. The revealed Word presupposes men who really know something of God in spite of being lying and lost through sinfully idolizing the world; and on the other hand this concealed knowledge of God only becomes really conscious of itself when it breaks through men's hardness of heart and is released by the Word of the God who reveals himself as utterly beyond the world.

2. The inner reason for the unquestioning assurance of God's reality.

The basic reason for this unquestioning assurance which characterizes men's consciousness of God in the New Testament is the simple and massive fact that God had revealed himself, that by his action he himself had intervened in these men's history and so had given testimony to his own actuality. Above all else the men of the New Testament are convinced that God had revealed himself in the Old Testament history of the People of the Covenant. For 'God at sundry times and in divers manners spoke to the fathers by the prophets' (Heb 1:1). Their God is the God of the fathers (Ac 3:13; 5:30; 7:45; 13:17 s.; 22:14; 24:14), the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Mt 22:32 par.; Lk 1:72 s.; 2:32; Ac 3:13), who showed himself to Abraham (Ac 7:2), who by the Covenant had made the People his People (Mt 2:6; Lk 1:72; 2:32; Ac 3:25; 13:17; Rom 9:4; 11:2; Gal 3:17; Heb 8:9; 9:15) and himself Israel's God (Lk 1:68). The men of the New Testament see this God at work throughout the [99] history of this, their People (Stephen's speech, Ac 7:2-53; St Paul's preaching at Antioch, Ac 13:16-41). They know God by seeing his action in the saving history peculiar to Israel. So too the prophetic monotheism of the Old Testament is for them the foundation of their knowledge of God. But their knowledge of God is not derived just from his self-disclosure in the past history of their People; they experience the living reality of God in his new activity in their own history. God reveals himself anew to them too. God has spoken to them in his own Son now (Heb 1:2), now made known his saving grace (Tit 2:11; 3:4; 2 Tim 1:10), through the Son of God, through whom they have come to faith in God (1 Pet 1:21).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Son has declared God to them, whom no one has seen (Jn 1:18); they have seen the Son of God with their own eyes, have heard him and touched him with their hands (1 Jn 1:1). God's glory shines for them in the face of Christ (2 Cor 4:6; Jn 12:45). For the men of the New Testament and just their situation in the plan of salvation, an indissoluble bond connects their experience in faith of the reality of Christ and their knowledge in faith of God. Hence the large number of expressions in which Christ and God are associated: eternal life is the knowledge of the only true God and of him whom he has sent (Jn 17:3); the turning away from idols to the service of the true and living God and waiting for his Son are as it were the basic formula of Christianity in 1 Thess 1:9-10. What St John preaches is κοινωνι/α with the Father and his Son (1 Jn 1:3). Salvation is fulfilled in the ε0πι/γνωσιφ του~ θεου~ και∴ 0Ιησου~ του~ κυρι/ου η(μω~ν (2 Pet 1:2). And these two realities do not stand unrelatedly side by side, nor are they connected merely objectively; they are now so inseparably connected even in the experience of the believer that whoever abandons one does away with the other too: 'Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father' (1 Jn 2:23; cf. Jn 5:23; 14:6-14). The New Testament does indeed allow for a true and enduring knowledge of God even without the possession in faith of his Son. But in that crisis in which the man whom Christ has encountered has to make a decision, this kind of true knowledge of God, such as the Jews perhaps have (cf. Rom 2:17 s.), ceases to be the only knowledge which matters to the New Testament: that knowledge which brings man into real relationship with the living God as Saviour. And in this sense those who do not have the Son do not in fact 'know' God at all, not as though it were only as Father of the Son precisely that they do not [100] know him. So the Lord can say: 'If I glorify myself, my glory is nothing. It is my Father that glorifies me. You call him your God, and yet you know him not. But I know him' (Jn 8:54-5). Because they do not acknowledge and love the Son come from the Father (ε0κ του~ θεου~) and sent by him (Jn 8:42), they no longer acknowledge the God whose sons they are convinced they are in virtue of the Old Covenant. But the men of the New Testament, the witnesses of the whole reality of Christ (Ac 2:22.32; 3:15; 10:39; 13:31), have had the living, tangible experience of Christ, his reality, his miracles and his Resurrection, with overwhelming clarity. They have encountered God there. They know him from his living, powerful action among them in Christ. The primary thing for them is not a carefully constructed philosophical conception of God, but God's own concrete self-disclosure to them in Christ.

II. The Content of the New Testament Conception of God

1. The Uniqueness of God

a. The central significance of the New Testament doctrine of God's uniqueness.
When Jesus was asked which was the first of all the commandments and answered that it was the commandment of love – and this is the heart of the Pauline and Johannine message too (Rom 13:10; 1 Cor 8:3; ch. 13; Col. 3:14; 1 Jn 3:11) – he himself in this critical context (Mk 12:29) cited the Shema: α!κουε, 0Ισραη&λ, κυ&ριοφ ο(θεο_φ η(μω~ν κυρι/οφ ει[φ ε0στιν. The Scribe can only confirm Jesus' profession of the faith of his People, once more in the words of the Old Testament (Deut 6:4; 4:35): ει[φ ε0στιν και∴ ου)κ ε1στιν α!λλοφ πλη_ν αυ)του~ (Mk 12:32). This confession of the one God runs through the entire New Testament. In Jesus' own words, eternal life is that they should know the only true God (Jn 17:3) and be mindful of the glory which is from this one God alone (Jn 5:44); ου)δει∴φ θεο_φ ει0 μη_ ει[φ (1 Cor 8:4). Thus testimony to the uniqueness of the sole God is constantly recurring: ει[φ ο(θεο&φ (Rom 3:30; 1 Cor 8:6; Gal 3:20; Eph 4:6; 1 Tim 2:5; Jas 2:19), μο&νοφ θεο&φ (Rom 16:27; 1 Tim 1:17; 6:15; Jude 25; Apoc 15:4). Now this monotheism is not just a fragment of tradition taken over from the Old Testament, although it is in fact usually expressed in the old traditional [101] formulas. It is bound up with the basic Christian confession; and when Christ wanted to state as briefly as possible what that eternal life was which he offered men, he spoke of the knowledge of the one true God (Jn 17:3). When St Paul, in the earliest portion of the New Testament, sums up what has come about in the Thessalonians who have become Christians, once again the first item to be mentioned is conversion to the living and true God in opposition to the many false gods (1 Thess 1:9). And from God's uniqueness St Paul derives support for two of his central themes: the calling of the Gentiles to the same rights in the New Israel (Rom 3:28-30; 10:12, 1 Tim 2:4-5), and the unity of the multiple workings of the Spirit among Christians in the one Body of Christ (1 Cor 12:6; Eph 4:6). Again the notion ευ)αγγε/λιον του~ θεου~ seems in many places (Rom 15:16; 1 Thess 2:2.8.9) in view of the context, to have the sense, 'Gospel of the one true God'. Confession of faith in the one true God is one of the essential elements in the Gospel of Christ.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. The meaning of the monotheism of the New Testament.

The central significance of New Testament monotheism becomes still clearer when we try to discover what is meant by this teaching. This confession is not concerned with a mere metaphysical matter of course, merely the primary cause of every sort of reality, necessarily conceived of as an ultimate unity. This one God is indeed spoken of as the primary cause of all things: ε0χ ου[τα_ πα&ντα (1 Cor 8:6), he is πατη_ρ πα&ντων, ο(ε0πι∴ πα&ντων και∴ δια_ πα&ντων και∴ ε0ν πα~σιν (Eph 4:6), ο(ε0νεργω~ν τα_ παντα εν πα~σιν (1 Cor 12:6); it is he who gives to all life and breath and all things (Ac 17:25), 'in whom we live and move and are' (Ac 17:28), so that 'he is not far from every one of us' (Ac 17:27); and because of this ontological relationship to the world, it is possible in principle, according to St Paul, for this one God to be known from the world in his θειο&τηφ (Rom 1:20). We have already noted that this metaphysical knowledge of God is a buried knowledge, only brought to some understanding of itself by actual contact with God's revelation in action; but even apart from this fact the confession of the ει[φ θεο&φ of its very nature goes beyond knowledge of a unified First Cause and End of the world. Here too we have an instance of what has been called 'prophetic' monotheism.

In the first place, it is not simply a matter of establishing the uniqueness of this one God in a neutral way; rather he is confessed in faith: [102] α)λλ 0 η(μι=ν ει[φ θεο&φ (1 Cor 8:6), although (and because) there are θεοι∴ πολλοι∴ και∴ κυ&ριοι πολλοι/ in the world (1 Cor 8:5) although (and because) behind the polytheism in the face of which monotheistic confession is made, there stand real demonic powers and not just error and misconception. As in the Old Testament, the one God of whom confession is made is not primarily the end-term of autonomous human knowledge, but the living, acting God who makes himself known by his own action. And so the formula for New Testament monotheism does not run, There exists one God, somewhat in the sense of the Enlightenment, We all believe in one God; but on the contrary, He who has actively manifested himself in Christ and in the pneumatic reality of salvation which has come into being with Christ, that is the unique God. And here too it is distinguished from Old Testament monotheism: the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is the unique God, and just this is the denial of Judaism. Because the one God (ο(θεο&φ) whom the men of the New Testament confess is the living Person who was at work in the saving history of the Old Testament and definitively revealed himself in his Son, the men of the New Testament like to go on using the old expressions 'God of the fathers' (Ac 3:13;

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

5:30; 22:14), 'God of Israel' (Mt 15:31; Lk 1:68; Ac 13:17; 2 Cor 6:16; Heb 11:16), 'God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob' (Mk 12:26; Lk 20:37; Ac 3:13; 7:32; Mt 22:32), and speak in the manner of the Old Testament about 'our' God (Mk 12:29; Lk 1:78; Ac 2:39; 3:22; 1 Cor 6:11; 1 Thess 2:2; 3:9; 2 Thess l:11-12; 1 Tim 1:1; Heb 12:29; 2 Pet 1:1; Apoc 4:11; 5:10; 7:3; 12:10; 19:1.5) or quite personally of 'my' God (Lk 1:47; Rom 1:8; 2 Cor 12:21; Phil 1:3; 4:19; Phm 4; Apoc 3:12 – 4 times); on the other hand they speak also of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom 15:6; 2 Cor 1:3; 11:31; Eph 1:3) or again more briefly of the God of our Lord Jesus Christ (Eph 1:17). This concrete God is the unique God intended when monotheism is professed. Anyone who confesses the One God and does not thereby intend to confess in this God the God of the fathers and of our Lord Jesus Christ, certainly does not mean the God of whom the primitive Church made confession: α)λλ 0 η(μι=ν ει[φ θεο&φ (1 Cor 8:6).

Secondly, the uniqueness of the divine nature in the world and in history is not supposed to be something established in a merely static way. God's uniqueness has first to become operative in the world and in history. God must first become for man the unique God. For men [103] to confess the unique God does not imply merely the confession of a fact but the acceptance of a task; for this God who acts in history intends precisely by this means to extend his βασιλει/α, the acknowledgment of his unique divinity, so it is truly only by a slow process that he becomes the unique God (ε1σομαι αυ)τω~ν θεο&φ, 2 Cor 6:16; cf. Heb 8:10; Apoc 21:7), until at the end of time he will really be ο(θεο_φ [τα_] πα&ντα ε0ν πα~σιν (1 Cor 15:28). In consequence it is precisely in the commandment of all-embracing and exclusive love for this one God that monotheism finds its achievement. 'For in this alone can it become apparent whether the one God is really God, and indeed the unique God, for those who confess him. They must have no idols by the side of God, neither Mammon (Mt 6:24) nor the belly (Phil 3:19), neither statues (1 Cor 10:21; 12:2; 2 Cor 6:16) nor forces of the cosmos (Gal 4:8 s.), neither local rulers (Ac 4:19; 5:29) nor the Emperor in Rome (Mk 12:17)', nor again the angels (Col 2:18). 'What matters is to serve God and give him what is his, to listen to him and rely on him alone; what matters is to remain faithful to God in face of the gravest threats, to the point of death by martyrdom': a continually new ε0πιστρε/ψαι προ_φ το_ν θεο_ν α)πο_ τω~ν ει0δω&λων δουλευ&ειν θεω~| ζω~ντι και∴ α)ληθινω~| (1 Thess 1:9) – 'in this Jesus and primitive Christianity see the real meaning of ει[φ θεο&φ. As a profession of faith monotheism may have been a matter of course to the men of the New Testament; in the actual conduct of their lives it was always a new task.'[7]

From what has been said it becomes a little clearer perhaps – this is an old problem of the Schools – how there can be a πι/στιφ ο#τι ει[φ ε0στιν ο(θεο&φ (cf. Jas 2:19). When the New Testament refers to the conviction that one God exists, it does indeed often make use of neutral concepts which do not necessarily imply a decision of a moral and religious kind but can in fact also signify, at least in themselves, a neutral theoretical knowledge (γιγνω&σκειν θεο&ν, Rom 1:21; 1 Cor 1:21; Gal 4:9. ε0πιγιγνω&σκειν, Rom 1:28.32; Eph 1:17. ει0δε/ναι το_ν θεο&ν, Gal 4:8; 1 Thess 4:5; 2 Thess 1:8; Tit 1:16). But on the other hand the New Testament characterizes this (or at least a) knowledge of God as πιστευ&ειν ο#τι ει[φ ε0στιν ο(θεο&φ (Jas 2:19), as πι/στιφ ε0πι∴ θεο&ν (Heb 6:1), as πι/στιφ η(προ_φ το_ν θεο&ν (1 Thess 1:8), as πιστευ~σαι τω~| θεω~| ο#τι ε1στιν (Heb 11:6). We [104] have already discussed the relation between the natural knowledge of God and the knowledge of God from Revelation in the New Testament. The question which concerns us here is whether, on the basis of what has been said about the content of New Testament monotheism, it is possible to explain at least in part how the first article of the Creed as such can be an

[7] TWNT III, p. 102.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation object of faith – which St Thomas Aquinas, for instance, denied (Ia.2.2 ad 1; IIa-IIae.1.5). There is nothing wrong in saying that anyone who has recognized that an ultimate cause of the world exists, cannot at the same time believe this in faith. In this sense St Thomas is perfectly correct when he says: 'Impossible est, quod ab eodem idem sit scitum et creditum' (loc. cit.). But this sort of faith is not in question at all in monotheistic faith, as we have seen. We do not believe by faith in a unified, ultimate cause of the world, which as such is known and not believed in; but we believe by faith in a Person living and active in history, of whose existence we can become aware because of his activity, before it is known as the absolute Being which is the foundation of everything: we believe what this Person says, namely that he and he alone is the absolute God. It is possible to believe that Yahweh, that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (both understood as proper names in the strict sense) is the unique God, because logically it is not yet necessary nor is it possible that, before the content of this self-disclosure is known, the Person who reveals these things should be known in that respect precisely in which he reveals himself by actually speaking.

2. God as Person

A further consequence of the inner reason for the unquestioning assurance of the New Testament consciousness of God is that for the men of the New Testament God's personal being is a living reality. Their knowledge of God is not the result of their own theoretical study of the world but of their experience of God's living activity among them. 'The countless examples of living prayer in the New Testament are so many testimonies to the personal God in whom primitive Christianity believed; and they indicate at the same time in what sense the concept of God's personality must be understood here: the God of the New Testament is a God whom men may address as Thou, in a way in which only a personal being can be addressed as [105] Thou.'[8] We shall see in more detail what was involved in thinking of God as a Person by attempting to set out the individual elements in this conception of a personal God.

God is He who Acts; He who is Free; He who Acts in an Historical Dialogue with men; and He who in the true sense tells us about his 'attributes' – which would otherwise remain hidden – only through this activity. Here we have four points of view in terms of which we propose to characterize the New Testament conception of personality; it goes without saying that these four aspects continually merge into one another.

a. God as He who Acts.

In metaphysical knowledge of God from the world, where God is apprehended in the sense of the Vatican definition as 'principium et finis' of all reality, God is also in a certain sense one who acts, he who sets up all reality. We may leave out of account here the fact that because of original sin the unity of the one transcendent God is concealed by man's subjection to a plurality of cosmic powers which he makes into idols, the στοιξει=α του~ κο&σμου. But even setting this aside, God's activity is in a certain sense concealed in 'natural' theology by the mere fact that for the metaphysician absolutely everything is an objectivization of God's activity. In this way God's activity remains absolutely transcendent: it has no Here and Now within the world such that in this Here and Now it might be grasped and experienced in distinction from all that it is not. Because everything is God's action, this action fades as it were into the anonymity of the Always and Everywhere, as far as human knowledge is concerned, for human knowledge remains essentially dependent on recognizing

[8] TWNT III, p. 111 s.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

something by bringing it into relief against other things of a different kind. Now what characterizes the experience of God in the New Testament (as of course it did in the Old Testament too) is that it knows of a definite and distinct activity of God within the world: it knows of God's saving activity in history, an activity which, as God's new, free initiative, neither instituted jointly with the world nor already contained in it, possesses a quite definite Here and Now in the world and in human history, distinct from all other being and becoming. The New Testament does indeed also know with complete assurance [106] that everything is, moves and lives in him (Ac 17:27-9), God as το_ θει=ον; it sees the πατη_ρ πα&ντων (Eph 4:6) at work everywhere, in Nature too; it sees how he makes the sun rise and the rain fall, clothes the lilies of the field and feeds the birds of heaven, as the God of the fruitful seasons, sating men's hearts with food and gladness (Ac 14:17); it sees him at work too in the history of humanity as a whole, the spreading abroad of the races of men as the historical epochs succeed each other, the coming and going of peoples (Ac 17:26).

But close observation shows that the New Testament completely lacks any expression of numinous feeling for the cosmos, excited by the world, its greatness and glory. And this is quite apart from the fact that the New Testament, when it speaks of the glory of the lilies, also remembers that they wither and are cast into the oven, and is generally aware that the whole of creation has been caught up in man's sinfulness and is thus remote from God, groaning for the revelation of its own glory (Rom 8:22). Thus on the one hand the New Testament is capable of seeing God powerfully at work in the whole of reality and history, and on the other God never becomes for it the mysterious glimmer of an Absolute immanent in the world, the world is never deified but remains always the creature of the Lord beyond all world who shapes it freely by his Word. And this is because the New Testament has experienced God's activity within the world, and for that reason can never be in any uncertainty about that activity of his either, from which the total reality of the cosmos derives. For the New Testament, God's self-revelation in the world is never a quality which adheres uniformly to every reality in the world. In his sovereign freedom he has chosen a people for himself to the exclusion of all others and made it his People (Ac 13:17 s.); this People alone possessed the Covenant and the giving of the Law and the Promise (Rom 9:4; σωτηρι/α ε0κ τω~ν 0Ιουδαι/ων, Jn 4:22); he has sent his Son (Rom 8:3; Gal 4:4), so that upon this unique historical event depend man's entire salvation and the transfiguration of the whole world (Ac 4:12; Eph 2:18). The New Testament is strongly conscious of a sharply defined saving activity of God within the whole of human history, which as a whole possesses no immediate relation to God's salvation at the start. So strong is this consciousness, that the calling of nations to reconciliation and community with God is not inferred from some metaphysical knowledge of God's necessary goodness but is the great mystery of God's free election, hidden from all men yet [107] disclosed contrary to all expectations, God as it were suddenly calling all nations to salvation in spite of the elective, discriminatory freedom of his love (Ac 11:17.18; Eph 2:11 s.; ch. 3).

It is from this experience of God's free personal activity within history that the confession of God as Creator of the world, simply speaking, also acquires its specific vitality and clarity (Mt 11:25; Mk 13:19; Jn 1:3; Ac 4:24; 17:24; Rom 11:36; 1 Cor 8:5 s.; Col. 1:16; Eph 3:9; Heb 1:2; 2: 10; 3:4; 11:3; Apoc 4: 11).

Firstly we may say that in the New Testament (as in the Old Testament) it is never claimed that natural knowledge from the world includes as one of its objects a free creation of a temporal world ex nihilo; we leave undecided the question whether and how far the character of the world as created in the strict sense is available to natural theology. The New Testament (like the Old) accepts its knowledge of the world's createdness in the strict sense from the God who speaks and reveals himself. Further, man only really learns what creating is from God's free and powerful activity in history, unconstrained by any prior obligation. It is here

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation that man experiences concretely the truth that God is o(καλω~ν τα_ μη_ o!ντα ω(φ o!ντα (Rom 4:17), a formula which is on the one hand related to God's free activity in the history of Abraham, and on the other is used by the New Testament as a clear expression for creation ex nihilo. Thus knowledge of God's historical activity within the world and knowledge of his creative omnipotence through his mere Word over against everything which is not He, complete and support each other reciprocally. Because he is Lord of heaven and earth he can maintain his sway in sovereign power and freedom over the destinies of the world and of men (Mt 11:25; Ac 4:24 s.; Eph 1:11). And in this sway over history man has a deep impression of God's free and unconstrained sovereignty in action, his creativeness – the ε0νε/ργεια του~ κρα&τουφ τη~φ ι0σξυ&οφ αυ)του~, which shows itself with power in the Resurrection, discloses to us in general το_ υ(περβα&λλον με/γεθοφ τη~φ δυνα&μεωφ του~ θεου~ (Eph 1:19.20), gives us the πι/στιφ τη~φ ε0νεργει/αφ του~ θεου~ (Col 2:12), and so allows us to experience concretely and vividly the fact that God is o(τα_ πα&ντα ε0νεργω~ν κατα_ τη_ν βουλη_ν του~ θελη&ματοφ αυ)του~ (Eph 1:11).

b. God as He who Acts freely.

This God who acts in Nature and in human history is one who acts [108] freely. God manifests himself as Person in his activity precisely by the fact that this activity is voluntary and free. Precisely because the activity even in his world arises from God's spontaneous resolution, which is not something given along with other ingredients in the original constitution of the world, its tendencies and finalities, it becomes clear that this active God is the God transcending natural and human worlds, that God's Activity is not just another word for the world-process, that his Will is not just another word for ει9μαρμε/νη. It is on the basis of a concrete experience of free irruptions into the historical course of the world, novel and unexpected and extrinsic to the world's immanent dynamism, that the men of the New Testament recognize God as a free, transcendent Person.

They do indeed know of the eternity of God's definitive decree, the purpose of his will to lead all history and the whole world to their definitive goal (Rom 16:25; 1 Cor 2:7; Eph 1:4; 3:9; Col 1:26; 2 Tim 1:9), and go on at once to reflect on it; and what is true of this divine purpose is obviously true of God's historical activity in the world in general. And this is to say that God's freedom has determined from the very beginning a goal for the world and for men which is in fact infallibly pursued and attained in the history of the world. But it is certainly not to say that this final, unified and definitive plan of salvation had always been so deeply imprinted upon the world from the very beginning and objectified there that from the very beginning everything was going to run its course according to a natural law, in such a way that, as in Deism, God would throughout the whole of time merely be the spectator of the immanent unfolding of that reality which he had created in the beginning. God's plan of salvation has rather been an absolute secret of his, concealed from all earlier ages and generations, and which only now, in the last times, becomes objectively real and thereby makes itself known. The reality of salvation in Christ has now emerged in the world for the first time (ε0πεφα&νη: Tit 2:11; 3:4), and in consequence become manifest (1 Tim 1:10); so that Revelation is not just instruction about something which has always been the case, but the unveiling of the new unfoldings of God's free activity. That this activity of God in Christ takes place precisely now and not at some other time (Heb 1:2, ε0π 0 ε0σξα&του τω~ν η(με/ρων του&των; Col 1:26, νυ~ν; Rom 16:25, φανερωθε/ντοφ δε∴ νυ~ν μυστηρι/ου); that it emerges over against man lost through sin; that contrary to every human standard it is aimed at the poor, the [109] weak, the foolish among men (Mt 11:25; Lk 1:51 s.; 1 Cor 1:25 s.), to men who can lay absolutely no claim to it in justice; that it is thus pure grace – from all this man learns that this activity is God's really new, original initiative, his free doing, βου&λημα (Rom 9:19: Jas 1:18), βουλη_ του~ θελη&ματοφ αυ)του~ (Eph 1:11; Ac 20:27), ευδοκι/α (Eph 1:5.9; 1 Cor 1:21; Gal 1:15), προορι/ζειν (Rom 8:29 s.; 1 Cor 2:7; Eph 1:5.11), προ&θεσιφ, ε0κλογη& (Rom 9:11; 11:5.28; 1 Thess 1:4; 2 Pet 1:10).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Disciplined by this experience of God's incalculable freedom as shown in the basic facts of our salvation, a man of the New Testament is now capable of seeing God's free activity at work elsewhere throughout Nature and Grace. What is distinctive in individual natural bodies is just as much the work of his freedom (1 Cor 15:38 s.) as the overwhelming and incomprehensible differentiation in his mercy and his reprobation (Rom 9:13 s.; 2 Tim 1:9; Jn 6:44.65), as the vocation to offices and gifts (Ac 10:41; 16:10; 22:14 s.; Rom 12:3; 1 Cor 12:6.28; Heb 2:4), as the appointing of a time for the End (Mt 24:36; Ac 1:7).

The eternity and immutability of God's free decree on the one hand, and its incalculability in terms of the previous situation of the world on the other, belong together and together form the presupposition for any proper human attitude to God. On the one hand, man can rely in faith on the fact that God is faithful (πιστο&φ, Rom 3:3; 1 Cor 1:9; 2 Cor 1:18; 2 Tim 2:13; Heb 10:23; 1 Pet 4:19) and true (α)ληθη&φ, α)ληθινο&φ, Rom 3:4; 15:8; Jn 3:33; 8:26), that his decrees are unchangeable and without repentance (α)μετα&θετοφ, Heb 6:17; α)μεταμε/λητοφ, Rom 11:29). On the other hand, what is still to come about by God's act, in its existential concreteness, continues to remain within God's sovereign power of disposal, and remains for us a mystery only fully to be unveiled at the end of all the ages; and for that reason this free God is never at the power of man's calculations: God remains free Lord. Because the God who acts freely is set over against man, and because he has mercy on whom he will and hardens whom he will (Rom 9:15.16.18), his free and sovereign dispensation is first and last for our 'existence' (in the modern sense of the word). St Paul does not even begin to try to formulate a theodicy in respect of God's free choice in grace: 'O man, who art thou, that thou wouldst dispute with God?' (Rom 9:20). The rightness and holiness of God's decision rests in itself alone, precisely because it is free; it is not to be [110] traced back to some necessitating source which has the lucidity of its necessity.

c. In the third place God shows himself as Person in that he deals with man in an historical dialogue, that he allows man, his creature, really to be himself too a person. Some brief explanation is needed of what we mean by this. Every purely metaphysical knowledge of God which starts from immediately perceptible reality and penetrates to its ultimate cause – and calls it God – always at least runs the risk of conceiving the world as a pure function of God, in such a way that the world becomes a pure expression and objectivization of this cause, merely a derived function of God (as opposed to the risk of making God into merely the inner meaning of the world). Thus it is almost impossible for metaphysics to avoid the danger of forgetting the two-sided personal relationship between God and the created spirit, the danger of not understanding that the personal God so transcends the world that he can allow this world, which is totally dependent on him, a genuine activity, even with regard to himself; that what is totally dependent on him acquires through his own agency a genuine independence with regard to him; that God can set man free with regard to God himself.

Further, this relationship between God and man, which is so obscure for metaphysics, is seen at its clearest precisely in the saving history of God's dealings with man. Man takes part in a real dialogue with God. He gives God's Word to him the answer which he, man, wants to give. And his may turn out contrary to God's will. Man can harden his heart (Rom 2:5; Heb 3:13), he can resist the Spirit of God (Ac 7:51), he can obey or not obey God's will (Rom 15:18; 16:19), he can contradict God (Rom 10:21), he can shut the doors of his heart to God when he knocks (Apoc 3:20), he can set his will in opposition to God's plan of salvation (Mt 23:37 s.). The existence of powers in the world which are hostile to God and which are yet creatures of the one God, cannot be separated from this reality of a personal independence of the created spirit; the reality of sin, its inexcusability before God, God's wrath over sin, his summons to reconciliation, prayer, the existential genuineness of which depends on man's having a genuine initiative with regard to God – all these realities witnessed to in the New Testament presuppose the same bi-personal relationship between [111] God and man. God's activity in the course of saving history is not a kind of monologue which God conducts by himself; it is a long, dramatic dialogue between God and his creature, in which God confers on man the power to make a genuine answer to his Word, and so makes his own further Word dependent upon the way in which man does in fact freely answer. God's free action never ceases to take new fire in the activity of man. History is not just a play in which God puts himself on the stage and creatures are merely what is performed; the creature is a real co-performer in this humano-divine drama of history. And so history has a real and absolute seriousness, an absolute decision, which is not to be relativized as far as the creature is concerned with the remark – at once true and false – that everything rises from God's will and nothing can resist it. The Scriptural basis for what has just been said lies in the simple and yet incomprehensible fact that in the Bible the Almighty, Absolute, the παντοκρα&τωρ (Apoc 1:8), through his own personally expressed Word, calls upon his creature, the work of his hands, to do his will; and that accordingly this Word which calls upon someone else cannot be meaningless, although it proceeds from him who has the power to do all things.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Although the creature is given free play in this way, the power to make a real answer to God, God retains the last word: not only in the sense that as the stronger physically, so to speak, he finally acts in such a way that no reaction of the creature can follow his action, having no further power to withstand it; but also in the sense that even the creature's sinful act, while it does indeed involve total disaster for the creature itself, is nevertheless incapable of leaving the field of God's ultimate will – the will by which God wills his glory. For God's power is revealed even in those vessels of his wrath which have fallen into destruction (Rom 9:22.23). So far as we have any knowledge of it from God, the history of the world, from the point of view of the world and in isolation, closes with a shrill disharmony never to be resolved. What is exterior to God is never in itself resolved into an ultimate, all-embracing harmony; and yet, and precisely in this way, the world proclaims the glory of the God whose ways are unfathomable and whose decisions are inscrutable. A creature can be reconciled with this end of all the world only if it unreservedly gives glory to God, and loves him and adores him precisely in the unfathomable, inappellable freedom of his will; loves him, then, more than itself, so [112] that solidarity with God's will is more important to it than solidarity with anything else, like itself created.

d. The attributes of God.

It is only after reaching some understanding of the living and free personal being of the transcendent God who is able to enter into an active dialogue with the world, that we can begin to examine the teaching of the New Testament about God's 'attributes'. For we have to know God as Person before we can understand that the decisive question for men is not, strictly speaking, what God is, but as whom he wishes freely to show himself with regard to the world. A person does not strictly speaking have attributes with respect to another person: he has freely and personally adopted attitudes. And this is above all true of God's absolute, sovereign being as Person with regard to his world. Certainly these free attitudes which God has adopted with regard to the world, have, so to speak, a metaphysical structure, arising from God's necessary nature; but the attitude actually adopted is not unambiguously laid down in consequence of this structure. He can have mercy and he can harden men's hearts, he can enlighten them and he can send them the ε0νε/ργεια πλα&νηφ (2 Thess 2:11) or the πνευ~μα κατανυ/χεωφ (Rom 11:8), without thereby ceasing to be the Holy One (Heb 12:10; 1 Pet 1:15) and his judgments ceasing to be true and just (Apoc 19:2). With respect to

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this God of the New Testament, then, everything depends for man on how God in fact behaves with regard to man, not just on how he necessarily is in himself. The experiences by which man learns about God in saving history are not just exemplifications, instances to show the attributes of God as a metaphysical entity which man knows in its necessary character; they are experiences containing a teaching of which man can only become aware through the experience. This experience therefore always remains new and unexpected; what is learnt from it is not identified with something always and already there, but itself occurs for the first time. The kernel of what the New Testament declares about God's 'attributes', then, is not a doctrine about God as an abstract metaphysical entity, but an announcement about the concrete, personal countenance which God shows to the world.

There are of course statements in the New Testament which express properly metaphysical attributes of God's nature. The Scriptures do indeed speak of a θει/α φυ/σιφ (2 Pet 1:4), a θειο&τηφ (Rom 1:20). [113] If God is called αι0ω&νιοφ (Rom 16:26; cf. Apoc 1:4.8; 4:8; 16:5), α)ι/διοφ (Rom 1:20), α)ο&ρατοφ (Rom 1:20; Col. 1:15; 1 Tim 1:17; Heb 11:27), α!φθαρτοφ (Rom 1:23; 1 Tim 1:17), μακα&ριοφ (1 Tim 1:11; 6:15), ου&δε.∴ προσδεο&μενο&φ τινοφ (Ac 17:25), α)πει/ραστοφ (Jas 1:13); or when it is said of him ου) γα_ρ α!δικοφ ο(θεο&φ (Heb 6:10; cf. Rom 3:5; 9:14), α)δυ&νατον ψευ&σασθαι θεο&ν (Heb 6:18; cf. Tit 1:2), οι1δαμεν ο#τι ο(θεο&φ α(μαρτωλω~ν ου)κ α)κου&ει (Jn 9:31), ου)δει∴φ α)γαθο_φ ει0 μη_ ει[φ ο(θεο&φ (Mk 10:18), μο&νοφ σοφο_φ θεο&φ (Rom 16:27), and when his omniscience is praised (καρδιογνω&στηφ, Ac 1:24; Rom 8:27; Heb 4:13; 1 Jn 3:20; Mt 6:4.6) – all these are objective expressions of God's essential attributes, which are also experienced as such: they are axiological statements about God, judgments of essence, not of existence. Inevitably, then, what was said about the relation of 'natural' theology to the revealed theology of the New Testament holds good for these statements too: these properties of the θει/α φυ&σιφ, the θειο&τηφ, can be known and always are known from the world; they are disclosed to sinful man who 'setting aside the Creator shows devotion to the world' (Rom 1:25), and are unveiled anew to anyone who in obedience and faith encounters the living God in his saving history. But these attributes acquire new harmonics in this encounter: he who is αι0ω&νιοφ is not only without beginning or end, but is raised up so high above the earthly world that he was able to enter into it and precisely so make it share in his own upliftedness above the eternal up and down, the eternal inconclusiveness of time (2 Cor 4:8 s.; 4:17; 2 Thess 2:16; Heb 5:9; 9:12.15; 2 Pet 1:11). The same is true of God's α)φθαρσι/α (Eph 6:24; 2 Tim 1:10) and his invisibility, through which alone we can understand what is meant by saying that we shall see God (1 Cor 13:12; 1 Jn 3:2); the same is true of his holiness and freedom from need, which we shall share (Apoc 21:23); of his omniscience, which no longer signifies strictly the infinite consciousness of the world-cause, containing all things in its being and knowledge, but rather the eye of the personal God, whose discerning, comprehending and provident gaze penetrates man's inmost heart and is felt there by him (Mt 6:4-6; Lk 16:15; Heb 4:12-13; 1 Thess 2:4; 1 Jn 3:20; Mt 6:8.32; 10:29).

It is also important to remember in this connexion that the New Testament does not systematize these metaphysical statements about God. Nowhere does it treat of them speculatively; and it remains completely silent about just those expressions which would be even [114] more important and more central for a theological metaphysics, or at any rate it has no specialized vocabulary for them: God is never appealed to in the New Testament as simply Being, his entitative infinity is never mentioned. It is not so much to the Absolute and Necessary – and thus easily impersonal and abstract – that the New Testament turns its gaze in metaphysical contemplation; its eyes are upon the personal God in the concreteness of his free activity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Everything depends on that. And so the decisive statements of the New Testament as to who God is are an answer to the question, 'As whom has man experienced God in history?' When God is called the just Judge, this is because of the shattering impression that it was the God of holiness who first brought men to any consciousness of their lost and sinful condition in his revelation to the creature, that he condemned sin in the flesh of Christ whom he made sin for us (2 Cor 5:21; Rom 8:3); that God's wrath broke forth and was experienced over and over again at other times in the history of salvation (2 Pet 2:3-7; Jude 5-16). Again, we must be careful not to trivialize the experience of God's wrath in judgment by interpreting it as a mere reaction of his necessarily holy essence to the sin of the world. For the same sin suddenly and incalculably encounters on another occasion God's forbearance and longsuffering (Rom 2:4; 3:26; 9:22; 1 Pet 3:20; 2 Pet 3:9; α)νοξη&–μακροθυμι/α). Further, this α)νοξη& and μακροθυμι/α of God is not some metaphysical attribute which man can reckon on as a fixed quantity in planning his life for the future; for that would be to tempt God (1 Cor 10:9), and the time of God's indulgence is suddenly interrupted by the Day of the Lord, which comes like a thief in the night (2 Pet 3:10).

The existentially personal and active character of God's behaviour, in contrast to some fixed metaphysical attribute of his essence, is just as clear when he is called good, merciful, loving, and so on. He is forgiving (Mt 6:14; Mk 11:25), merciful (Lk 1:72.78; 6:36; 2 Cor 1:3; Eph 2:4; 1 Tim 1:2; Tit 3:5; 1 Pet 1:3; 2 Jn 3; Jude 2), kind (Mt 19:17; Lk 11:13; 18:19; Jas 1:5; ξρηστο&φ, Lk 6:35; Rom 2:4; 11:22; Tit 3:4), loving (Jn 3:16; 16:27; Rom 5:5; 8:37.39; Eph 2:4; 2 Thess 2:16; Tit 3:4; 1 Jn 3:1; 4:8-11). He is the God of all grace (Ac 20:24; Rom 5:15; 1 Cor 1:4; 3:10; 15:10; 2 Cor 1:12; Eph 3:2.7; 1 Tim 1:2; 1 Pet 2:20; 5:10.12; 2 Jn 3), the God of hope (Rom 15:13), the God of peace (Rom 15:33; 16:20; 1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; 13:11; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; Phil 4:9; 1 Thess 5:23; 2 Thess 1:2; 1 Tim 1:2; [115] 2 Tim 1:2; Tit 1:4; Phm 3; 2 Jn 3), the God of all comfort (Rom 15:5; 2 Cor 1:3.4; 2 Thess 2:16), the God of love (2 Cor 13:11), the Saviour (Lk 1:47; 1 Tim 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Tit 1:3; 2:11; 3:4; Jude 25), who in his compassion desires the salvation of all men (Mt 18:14; 1 Tim 2:3.4; 4:10; Tit 2:11; 2 Pet 3:9). But for the New Testament God's kind and compassionate love is in its very core precisely grace, to which no claim can be made, grace, which against all expectation, encounters the 'atheistic' sinner (Eph 2:12) who has fallen away from God. That God loves us, that he is 'dear God', is not a metaphysical matter of course, but the inconceivable marvel that the New Testament must proclaim, belief in which never ceases to demand the utmost effort of man's powers of faith. God's love had first to become objective and to 'appear' (ε0φανερω&θη, 1 Jn 4:9) in the sending of his only begotten Son into the world, we had first to experience in this sending this love as it really is, in order really to be able to believe it: και∴ η(μει=φ ε0γνω&καμεν και∴ πεπιστευ&καμεν τη_ν α)γα&πην, η#ν ε1ξει ο(θεο_φ ε0ν η(μι=ν (1 Jn 4:16). Until this love becomes finally manifest, the conviction that it encounters me in my absolute concreteness must be maintained in this aion by the ε0λπι∴φ σωτηρι/αφ (1 Thess 5:8), and never becomes a matter of course; the triumphant consciousness of being loved by God (Rom 8:39) continues to be coupled with fear and trembling (Phil 2:12; 1 Pet 1:17); for even the unburdened conscience is subject to God's judgment. More clearly still: God's love is so free and sovereign that the effects in man of its creative, saving Word, its affirmation in faith and love or its refusal in unbelief do not in the last resort vary purely according to man's response in this way or that to God's freedom. On the contrary, its effects depend on whether God himself in his unqualified sovereignty bestows or withholds his own merciful love (Rom 9:9-11), to which man really consents. God's loving call is always a call of his προ&θεσιφ, an election (Rom 8:28-33; 2 Tim 1:9; 2 Pet 1:10). Nor is it surprising, in a context like this, that God's omnipotence, in spite of its metaphysical quality, is preponderantly seen and experienced in connexion with his free operations in saving history: he has the power to raise up children to Abraham from stones (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8; Mt 19:26 and par.); he can raise up the dead, and raise them to a quite new order of life (Mt 22:29 s.; Jn 5:21; 1 Cor 6:14; Eph 1:19; Heb 11:19); his ε0νε/ργεια is shown in the raising up of his own Son (Ac 2:24; 1 Cor 6:14; 2 Cor 13:4; Eph 1:19 s.; Col 1:12); [116] he is able (δυνατο&φ) even to convert the obstinate and to preserve those who are true to him (Rom 11:23; 2 Tim 1:12); his power is shown in his free grace (Rom 1:16; 16:25; 1 Cor 2:5; 2 Cor 9:8; Eph 1:11; 3:7.20; Phil 2:13; 4:13; 2 Tim 1:8; Heb 2:18), in the performance of his promises (Rom 4:21), in his power to punish (Rom 9:22). In comparison, metaphysical statements like the assertion that his δυ&ναμιφ can be known in the world (Rom 1:20), or which call him παντοκρα&τωρ (Apoc passim; 2 Cor 6:18 – hence only once outside the Apocalypse!), recede into the background. And because God's activity is part of a dialogue, his power is not seen as a magnitude continuously and obviously present in the world, something already realized, but as something which is only slowly realized, by a real struggle, in the drama of God and his world, until his βασιλει/α is actually present and his δυ&ναμιφ has really appeared (Mt 24:30; Lk 21:27; cf. Mt 26:64).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is in the paradoxical utterances that we have the clearest view of God's attitude as personal and existential, to be known concretely not from the world but only in the enactments of his free activity. For metaphysical knowledge of God, the summit of the world is itself just below God; the world attempts to ascend to God by an intensification and sublimation of its values and forces; the form of its own immanent quest for God, which serves as the basis for its knowledge of God's attributes, always has the form of the Greek Eros, which strives upwards to the supreme fulfilment of human reality and only so to God; and in consequence the world can only expect a revelation which would be simply the manifestation of its own power and wisdom. But the free, transcendent God, who is precisely greater than what is greatest in the world and is more unlike than he is like the summit of the world, surpasses all this by his sovereign eminence, and reveals himself precisely in what in the world seems furthest from him. Not in the wisdom of the world, not in the glory of the world's might, does God reveal himself; but he reveals το_ α)σθενε∴φ του~ θεου~, το_ μωρο_ν του~ θεου~ in the foolishness and weakness of the Cross (1 Cor 1:18-25). He does not communicate himself to those who are metaphysically close to him, the wise, the strong, the successful, the ontologically compact, but to the foolish of the world, the weak, the failures, the inwardly brittle and empty (1 Cor 1:26-9; 2 Cor 12:9; 13:4; Mt 11:25). The μορφη_ θεου~ empties itself in the μορφη_ δου&λου, lowliness, poverty, the death on the Cross (Phil 2:5-8; 2 Cor 8:9). [117] The eternal creator Logos becomes sarx, temporal, frail, delivered up to the power of sin and death (Jn 1:14). And all this happens ο#πωφ μη_ καυξη&σηται πα~σα σα_ρχ ε0νω&πιον του~ θεου~ (1 Cor 1:29). Looked at from the standpoint of the world, there is nothing in the world obviously privileged by nature to serve as God's revelation and representative. Even the highest is infinitely far from God; nor can the lowest of itself drag God down by a voluptuous passion for the base and wretched; both high and low in this word are sarx, and so all must become dumb before God: strictly speaking, there is no name named in this world and from it, which is really an attribute of God.

Properly and precisely, we know who God is, not from ourselves and the world, but only from the activity in history of the free and living God, through which he showed us who he wished to be to us. Consequently the teaching of the New Testament in the ultimate analysis is not an ontology of God's attributes, not a theory, but an historical account of the experiences in which man has come to know God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. The God of Love

Of all that man has learnt by experience about God in saving history, the decisive thing is that out of his grace God the Father has called us in his Son to the most intimate community with him: it is summed up in the proposition: ο(θεο_φ α)γα&πη ε0στιν (1 Jn 4:16). But to see what this proposition means we must undertake a somewhat more extensive enquiry. With regard to God's personal activity, the New Testament understands that the free, living God can act differently at different times, can enter into different relationships with man. The decisive feature of this understanding is that it involves a knowledge of the fact which is precisely not a matter of course for the New Testament understanding of God, that the free, incalculable God has spoken his last, definitive word in the dramatic dialogue between God and man. God is the Free and the Transcendent, whose potentialities could never be exhausted in a finite world, and who in consequence is never really bound by what he has done. But he has bound himself: he has taken up a position with regard to man and the finite which he himself freely declares to be definitive, and of which he himself says that he will never go beyond it again and never withdraw from it. And because the only time which really signifies before God does not [118] follow the periodicity of stars and clocks but rather that of God's ever new, free acts in his world, time really stands still when God has spoken his last word. And as this has in fact happened, the kairos is in fact accomplished (Mk 1:15), the end of time has come upon us (1 Cor 10:11; 1 Pet 4:7). The inner temporal form of the world, derived from God, is at its end, even if this last kairos may last for thousands of years by astronomical measures. We must realize what it means for the Infinite One to say that this deed which he has now done and which inevitably carries within itself the contingency of a free act in the sphere of the finite, is his last deed; that of all the innumerable possibilities which remain open to him, none will be realized after this deed; that the mode of his action at precisely this moment shall abide for all eternity.

If we are now to characterize this unique situation, one which can never be surpassed and which has never existed before, we must in the first place distinguish it against God's previous modes of behaviour, and secondly we must determine what is peculiar to it with regard to time and intrinsic content. It was said earlier that in the last analysis the New Testament does not offer a doctrine of God's attributes, but an account of those ever new attitudes of God of which man has had experience in the course of his history; and we have just seen that the kairos of the New Testament is characterized by the fact that God's attitude as it is experienced there is the definitive one. Our problem then may be formulated in terms of two questions: firstly, how is this attitude distinguished from God's previous attitudes, those of the Old Testament and in the time before Christ? and secondly, what in fact is this attitude or disposition (Haltung) considered precisely in the terminal situation of the New Testament?

a. God's love in the Old Testament.

According to the Epistle to the Hebrews, God expressed himself in the world by his speech and activity in manifold ways. But his last and definitive word, his last and definitive act, which have come to pass in the καιροι∴ ι1διοι (1 Tim 2:6; 6:15; Tit 1:3) of the new and eternal covenant and are now present, are not just the latest in a series, but the πλη&ρωμα of all earlier times (Mk 1:15; Gal 4:4; Eph 1:10), and yet precisely something new with regard to what had gone before. If this is the case, then this final disposition must be distinguished from anything earlier, which with regard to it is drawn into a unified order; [119] and at the same time this disposition must be understood as the telos of all that had gone before, which finds its fulfilment in this disposition. In other words, this ε1σξατον, which is τε/λοφ and πλη&ρωμα of everything before it, puts all God's previous saving speech and activity –

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

however manifold and various this may be – over a common denominator, and thus stands in essential distinction from the whole of what had gone before; and yet the whole must be resolved into this teleological fulfilment. We must bear this relationship in mind when we ask by what distinguishing features we are to know the God of the New Testament from the God of the Old. After all we have said, it should be clear that we are not just asking the harmless question as to what man understood about God in Old Testament and New Testament times; we are not concerned with the subjective conceptions of the men of the two covenants, with the growing knowledge of something in itself unchanging, but with a difference in God's own behaviour (Anders-sich-verhalten).

It is of course impossible to set out here the whole doctrine of the New Testament concerning the difference between the Old and New Covenants, between the time before Christ and the time in Christ, although this would be the only really concrete way of showing how the God of the fathers differs from the God of our Lord Jesus Christ. Otherwise we should be committed to the impossible task of discussing all the pairs of contrary conceptions like α)δικι/α (α(μαρτι/α)-δικαιοσυ/νη (Rom 3:5), δου~λοφ-υι9ο&φ (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:7), δουλει/α-ε0λευθερια (Gal 5:1), νο&μοφ-πι/στιφ (Rom 4:13 s.), σα&ρχ-πνευ~μα (Rom 8:9), κατα&κρισιφ-δικαιοσυ&νη (2 Cor 3:9), γρα&μμα-πνευ~μα (2 Cor 3:6), ε1ργον-ξα&ριφ (Tit 3:5-7), διανοι/α του~ θανα&του-διανοι/α του~ πνευ&ματοφ (2 Cor 3:7 s.), διαθη&κη παλαια& (πρω&τη)-διαθη&κη καινη& (νε/α; αι0ω&νιοφ) (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25; 2 Cor 3:6; Heb 8:6; 9:15; 12:24; 13:20; Gal 4:24), σκια_ μελλο&ντων-ει0κω_ν τω~ν πραγμα&των (Col 2:17; Heb 10:1), ε0παγγελι/α-ευ0αγγε/λιον (Rom 1:1 s.; Eph 3:6), στοιξει=α του~ κο&σμου-Ξριστο&φ (Col. 2:8-20; Gal 4:3-9). This would be the only way of achieving any real clarity about how God's behaviour in the Old Testament differs from his behaviour in the New. Here we must follow a simpler way. We shall simply start from the usual (and, it would seem, justified) view of this difference, that in the New Testament, and in the strictest sense there alone, God revealed himself as God of Love, as Love itself. In concrete terms, then, our first question becomes how and why God's [120] love, become manifest in Christ, is distinguished from God's behaviour in the Old Testament and is at the same time its fulfilment.

At first sight the anticipated conclusion does not seem very probable: God seems to have shown himself as one who loves even in the time of salvation before Christ. In what follows, only the barest outline of Old Testament teaching can of course be offered, and that with the utmost reserve. Firstly, then, we find references there to what might be called a metaphysical love of God. When we hear that God loves everything that is (Wis 11:24), that Yahweh gives everything its nature and that his mercy embraces all that he has made (Ps 145:9), when the Psalmist celebrates the whole of creation as a work of God's graciousness and goodness (Ps 136:1-9), what we have is the reflexions of a natural theology: the goodness (the value) of reality is traced back to its source in the Source of all being, which in consequence is also conceived of as good. What was said earlier about natural theology in general holds good for this metaphysical goodness of God; it is knowable and in a way familiar, it is hidden because of original sin and is only clearly disclosed when man comes to know God in the supernatural history of salvation. But a 'love' like this does not really set up a personal I-Thou relationship between man and God. Man is aware of being borne by a Will in some way directed to value and the good, but this is not enough to let him turn round, as it were, so as to enter into a personal relationship of community and reciprocal love with this Source of his own ontological value. Again, we often hear in the Old Testament of God's goodness and mercy, as they are shown in his personal, historical activity. God has chosen his people; he has in a special way shown his goodness, his mercy and his love in a special personal guidance, in election and covenant. For the Old Testament, and especially for the prophets, the very fact that he has entered into relationship with man in so personal a way is itself an expression of his inconceivable mercy and grace, a revelation of his love. And the climax of his love in the Old Testament is that he does not allow himself to be turned away by the unfaithfulness of his People, Israel's repeated falling away from its God; that he does not give up his desire for a personal relationship because of the adultery of his People. We could put this more sharply and say that for the Old Testament God's love is shown by the fact that he enters into a personal relationship with his People and that he does not abandon it in spite of man's rejection of him. But that is all this love seems yet to mean. Certainly there is a [121] constant celebration of Yahweh's mercy and graciousness, his compassion and his readiness to forgive, with regard to all creatures in general and the People of the Covenant in particular. But if we are justified in identifying God's goodness with a genuinely personal love, it follows that we cannot really draw any conclusions from language like this as to whether God already loves men there in the sense that as someone wholly personal in his very essence he wants to give himself to man. Goodness, forbearance, mercy, solicitude are still attributes which can characterize the conduct of a master to his servant. Consequently a relationship of this kind still does not mean that this solicitous and just and lenient ruler wishes to have anything to do with the servant in his own personal life. He can continue to be distant and inaccessible. Surely it was the beginning of something new and personal for God to have freely exercised his dominion over all that he has made in such a way as to enter actively into the world and intervene in it by his own personal initiative, as it were surrendering his sovereign upliftedness above everything finite by becoming a fellow-actor with his world. This is a new beginning which, looking back from the New Testament, we can only understand as a moment in God's movement towards the creature, a movement in which he wished to entrust himself to man in his transcendent identity, in the inner mystery of his own personal life. But this could not yet be seen in the Old Testament. The fact that God in his personal activity takes man into his service, makes him, by a divine historical act, what he already is by nature, the fact that God accepts man as his servant and personally communicates his will to him and has personal dealings with him – all this was already so inconceivable a marvel that it could only be described by using the image of paternal or marital love. But that it was already in fact a love which drew men up to God only became evident in the New Covenant. It has further to be remembered that God's loving treatment of man in the Old Testament was intrinsically orientated towards something to come, to a New Covenant. Now this great promised thing remains curiously obscure and ambiguous in the Old Testament. Is this new greater thing only the establishment of God's rule in the world, which is still going to leave man merely God's servant, or is it going to be something more? Is God's law going to be completely established at some time in the future, and is this rule going to be one in which God precisely wills to be more than just the Lord who establishes himself in the world by the jealous [122] affirmation of his own being? Is God going to be beloved Lord or lordly Beloved? All these promises were existential utterances of God, not just predictions; and of their very nature (until God should have bound himself by speaking his last, definitive word), they were held in abeyance so long as it was not known what answer God's free collocutor, man, would give to these promises in the dialogue which forms the history of salvation. In the Old Testament, then, God's love for man (so long as it does not mean just God's metaphysical relationship to his creature, something quite general and unexistential and implying no personal communion at all) consists in the very fact that he desires and makes possible a personal encounter with man, that he seeks this relationship urgently and maintains it in being, and that (provisionally, at least) this relationship was not abandoned in consequence of a turning away from God on man's part. But it was concealed in the Mystery of God's eternal decree that this relationship would go beyond that between a master and his servant and that it would be irrevocable. For God had still not done anything

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation in man's history which would unambiguously and irrevocably open a way for men to the depths of God's own personal life. And in consequence that love for God to which man was summoned, was still provisory, until it should be known how God himself wanted to love man. Man was commanded to love God with the whole force of his being; but it was still hidden in which of two ways this should be. This unconditional assent by man to God in his freedom, would it be the humble love of a servant for his master, who, precisely because by his love he affirms God to be as God wishes to be, remains far from his sovereign majesty and unapproachable light, not presuming to an intimate relationship with God such as would involve really unrestricted personal communion with him? Or does this loving affirmation, which man utters blindly and unconditionally, draw him into the depths of God's inner life? When in the Old Testament man uttered this affirmation of his loving pistis to God, he was inevitably swept up into the universal teleology of God's entire redemptive action, even when the telos of this activity was still hidden from him. Ready to be just a servant, he was already son; but just this was hidden from him until the Son of the Father came, and it thus became manifest in the history of men what the secret of God's purpose had always been.[9]

[123]

b. The nature of God's relationship to man in the New Testament.

When we say that God is love, and that this is what finally characterizes God's free, historical behaviour in the fullness of time, in the kairos of the New Testament, we mean to say two things. Firstly, this is in fact a free act of God in Christ, an Event, not an attribute: the coming to pass of the New Testament in Christ. Secondly, it is the event in which God's inmost life is communicated to men, in his love for them, fully and without restraint. A genuinely personal love always has these two marks. Love is not the emanation of a nature but the free bestowal of a person, who possesses himself, who can therefore refuse himself, whose surrender therefore is always a wonder and a grace. And love in the fully personal sense is not just any relationship between two persons who meet in some third thing, whether this tertium quid is a task, a truth or anything else: it is the ceding and the unfolding of one's inmost self to and for the other in love. The discussion which follows will be divided in accordance with this twofold distinction; not that the whole saving reality of the New Testament is to be depicted in this way, but rather that it will be considered only with regard to these two points.

1. That God is Love, that he has received man to the most intimate communion with himself in love – this has become manifest in the Sending and Incarnation, in the Cross and Glorification, of his only begotten Son. It has become manifest not merely in the sense that the Christ-reality may be taken as a particular instance, from which may be read off what attitude God has necessarily adopted with regard to man; but it has become manifest in the sense that all God's free activity in the whole history of salvation has been directed to this event from the very beginning and thus rests on this single decision; and that this free purpose of entering into unrestricted personal communion with man first became finally irrevocable and unconditional through God's act in Christ. Christ is the τε/λοφ του~ νο&μου (Rom 10:4), the fulfilment of the times (Mk 1:15); what became manifest in him is the α)γα&πη του~ θεου~ (Rom 5:8, συνι/στησιν δε∴ τη_ν ε9αυτου~ α)γα&πη ει0φ η(μα~φ ο(θεο&φ, ο#τι ε1τι α(μαρτωλω~ν ο!ντων η(μω~ν Ξριστο_φ υ(πε∴ρ η(μω~ν α)πε/θανεν. 1 Jn 4:9, ε0ν του&τω| ε0φανερω&θη η(α)γα&πη του~ θεου~ ε0ν η(μι=ν, ο#τι το_ν υι9ο_ν αυ)του~ μονογενη~ α)πε/σταλκεν ο(θεο_φ ει0φ το_ν κο&σμον. Tit 3:4, η(ξρηστο&τηφ και∴ η(φιλανθρωπι/α ε0πεφα&νη του~ σωτη~ροφ η(μω~ν θεου~):

God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son (Jn 3:16). It is not for nothing that [9] Heinisch, Theology of the Old Testament (ET, Collegeville, Minnesota, 1955), pp. 91-101; TWNT I, pp. 29-34.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the great argumentative movement of [124] the Epistle to the Romans on the theme of the new epoch which has just opened, reaches its climax in a hymn which, beginning with a celebration of the love of the elect for God, goes on to the love of Christ and comes to rest in the certainty of τη~φ α)γα&πηφ του~ θεου~ τη~φ ε0ν Ξριστω~| 0Ιησου~ τω~| Κυρι/ω| η(μω~ν (Rom 8:28.31 s.)[10] It is in the Christ-reality that God's love is really and truly present for the first time; it is there that it has first really appeared, there for the first time really objectified itself (συνι/στησιν, Rom 5:8); and through this real being-present in the world it has become manifest. And it is by this means that a definitive and unsurpassable fact has been brought into being; for Christ abides eternally, he has brought eternal redemption into being, he has entered into the eternal tabernacle and sits on the right hand of God. It is by this means that the Promises have first emerged from their existential abeyance and ambiguity, and have been really established (βεβαιω~σαι, Rom 15:8); so that no future epoch and no conceivable stage of development (ου!τε με/λλοντα, Rom 8:38) is ever going to annul this definitive Event of God's love for us.

2. Moreover, God has bestowed his very self upon us in Christ:- η(κοινωνι/α δε∴ η(η(μετε/ρα μετα_ του~ πατρο_φ και∴ μετα_ του~ υι9ου~ αυ)του~ (1 Jn 1:3; κοινωνι/α was frequently used in the koine for conjugal association); and our fellowship is with the α#γιον πνευ~μα too (2 Cor 13:13). This fellowship of love is produced by the Pneuma of God, through whom God pours forth upon us his love for us (Rom 5:5; Gal 4:6; 1 Jn 3:24; 4:13); and in this Spirit God's most intimate personal life is unfolded to us. For he is the Spirit who searches the βα&θη του~ θεου~, the depths of God, which none knows and searches but the same Spirit of God (1 Cor 2:10), and so leads us into the deepest intimacies of God's knowledge (Jn 15:26; 16:13; 1 Cor 2:12; 1 Jn 2:20.27). So this Spirit of God, who is the realization in us of God's personal love and in whom God has unfolded to us his ultimate depths, is the Spirit of adoption (Gal 4:4.6), who gives us testimony of our adoption (Rom 8:15). Through him we are children of God (1 Jn 3:1.2), called to know him as we are known, to see him face to face (1 Cor 13:12). In this way we are taken up into the most intimate community of life with the God of whom it is said that no one has seen him or can see him (Jn 1:18; 1 Tim 6:16), whom only the Son knows (Mt 11:27; Jn 3:11.32; 7:29) and in consequence only he to [125] whom the Son reveals it (Mt 11:27) by giving him a share in the nature and rights of his Sonship (Rom 8: 17.29; Heb 2:11.12). It is not our concern here to inquire further into the nature of this grace and sonship. Even so it is clear enough that this relationship is inseparably dependent upon the reality of Christ, and owes its existence as a reality precisely to God's free self-disclosure once and for all in Christ. 9Ο θεο_φ α)γα&πη ε0στι/ν is not primarily, then, a statement, illuminating in itself, about the nature of God, but the expression of the once-for-all, undeniable and unsurpassable experience in which mere man has come to know God in Christ: an expression of the experienced fact that God has bestowed his own entire self on man. Certainly, in so far as God's free disposition in the kairos of Christ is the unsurpassable communication of all that God is and can be by essence and freedom, it is also a communication of the divine nature. But this depends inseparably on the fact that God, as Person, freely wished to love us; and in the knowledge of this truth the entire reality of Christianity is contained.

4. 'God' as First Person of the Trinity in the New Testament

a. The question formulated.

[10] TWNT I, p. 49.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Biblical and dogmatic theology overlap in a specific way in the last question we have still to put ourselves. The question is one of dogmatic theology in so far as we presuppose the defined teaching of the Church concerning the Trinity, and consequently make use of concepts which are not immediately and explicitly given in the New Testament. But the question is also one of Biblical theology, in so far as we are attempting to determine the conceptual content of a word in its New Testament usage. Specifically, what we are trying to discover is who is meant when the New Testament speaks of ο(θεο&φ. Thus our task is not to present the teaching of the New Testament concerning God as Trinity; this is simply presupposed as a doctrine of faith. We take it as something given that the content of the Church's teaching concerning God as Trinity in the Unity of one and the same essence, is present in the New Testament too, though it is formulated there in different and simpler terms. But we are not concerned to ask whether, according to the New Testament, the three we find named there, πατη&ρ, υι9ο&φ, πνευ~μα α#γιον, are distinct from each other and yet identical with the divine nature possessed in common. Presupposing [126] all this, we wish to learn which of these three is meant when the New Testament speaks of ο(θεο&φ.

Within the conceptual system of scholastic theology, no real question remains once the Trinitarian doctrine itself has been presupposed (i.e. once the linguistic usage of the New Testament has been taken to conform to that of theology): the word and concept 'God' signifies (significat) the Person to whom the divine nature is proper; and so 'God' can stand for (supponitur) each of the three Persons who possess this nature, or again 'God' can stand for all three Persons together. When, for example, the Logos is called 'Son of God', 'God' in this predication stands for the Father, in so far as he is one of the divine Persons, for 'God' can stand for each of the three Persons, while the Father alone has a Son. Or again, in the statement, 'God creates the world', according to the conceptual system of Latin theology 'God' stands for the divine Person, this time indeed for the three Persons together, in so far as they are one God by reason of the unity of nature and thus one Source of the world by reason of the unity of their operation ad extra. For the theology of the Schools, then, 'God' is one with respect to the general concept of personality, if we may so put it, and consequently can stand for each of the three Persons individually and for all three together.[11] Once more we do not of course wish to deny that such a view of the concept and the word 'God' is possible, legitimate and in the long run unavoidable. But the question nevertheless remains whether this is also the usage of the New Testament. We may put the matter in the terms of scholastic logic. Is it the case that in the New Testament ο(θεο&φ only stands often for the Father and stands much more frequently for the threefold God in general, in that ο(θεο&φ signifies simply God's concretely existing and subsisting nature? Or is it the case that in the New Testament ο(θεο&φ always signifies the Father and does not merely stand for him often? We maintain that in the New Testament ο(θεο&φ signifies the First Person of the Trinity, and does not merely stand for him often; and this applies to every case in which another meaning of [127] ο(θεο&φ does not become clearly evident from the context. These few exceptions in no way support the opinion that ο(θεο&φ merely stands for the Father without actually signifying him.[12]

---

[11] Of course the' 'generality' of this concept must be understood properly. A concept is truly general only when the form signified in obliquo by the concrete concept (the nature) is capable of multiple realization. Further, as regards personality, generality is meant only in the sense in which a 'general' concept can be formed of the ultimate, concrete and irreducible uniqueness of a subsistent being.

[12] Translator's Note. According to Peter of Spain, a representative thirteenth-century logician, signification and supposition differ in that significatio est per impositionem vocis ad rem significandam, suppositio vero est acceptio ipsius termini iam significantis rem pro aliquo … significare est vocis, supponere vero termini iam compositi ex voce et significatione (Summulae Logicales, tr. 6; ed. Bochenski, 6.03, p. 58). For further information on earlier theories see Philotheus Boehner, Medieval Logic (Manchester 1952), pp. 27-51.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[128] This is not just a matter of logic-chopping. There will indeed be many cases in which a New Testament expression remains the same as to its material content in whichever way our question is decided; and this for the simple reason that in many or even in most cases a statement containing ο(θεο&φ, even if it refers explicitly to the Father alone (on the view, that is, that ο(θεο&φ generally signifies the Father and consequently stands for him alone), implicitly states something about the Son and the Spirit. But if statements about ο(θεο&φ bear explicitly on the Father alone, there is at any rate need of a much closer examination of these statements, and a strict proof that they do really imply something about the other Persons as well. For example, when the New Testament calls us 'children of God', the question arises as to whether this statement already says explicitly that we are children of the three divine Persons, and so in the same breath calls us children of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; or whether the latter can only be inferred from the original statement. No further explanation is required to see that a question like this leads on to the theological problem as to whether we are related in a specific way to each of the three divine Persons in virtue of grace. Although we shall not investigate this point here, the way in which we have formulated our question does indicate an indispensable presupposition of any theological treatment; and this single example is enough to show that the question has a real importance.

But even apart from the solution of this special problem, our question has real importance with regard to the correctness of theological language in relation to the kerygma. Not every objectively [129] true statement is also kerygmatically correct. For example, it is true, objectively speaking, that when Jesus prayed as man, he prayed to the three divine Persons.

According to John of St Thomas, from whom most modern writers on scholastic logic derive, signification and supposition differ in that the former is 'representative substitution', the latter 'applicative substitution', where the mind applies terms whose signification is already known, to stand for something about which it wishes to make some statement. Thus supposition is the 'acceptance of a term for something to which this term may be seen to refer', acceptio termini pro aliquo, de quo verificatur (Logica, P. I, lib. ii, c.9; ed. Reiser, p. 29 s.). This 'application' takes place normally in actual statements though it may also occur in everyday life when some object is physically pointed at or addressed.

For those who are familiar with the scholastic theory as well as for those who are not (both may find Fr Rahner's use of the theory puzzling), the following example may help. Suppose we wished to determine what people 'meant' when they spoke of 'the Sun' as opposed to what they 'meant' when they spoke of 'suns'. In the first place 'the Sun' is clearly being used to 'stand for' one determinate object, while 'suns' is used to 'stand for' an indeterminate range of objects. Thus in one sense of the English word 'meaning' (the suppositional or referential sense), 'sun' in The Sun is shining differs in meaning from 'sun' in The Milky Way contains thousands of suns. But no one would say that the meanings of the word 'sun' are totally unrelated. In fact 'sun' in both cases has the same conceptual meaning (what the scholastics ordinarily call significatio), namely 'a fixed star with satellites', though certainly this conceptual meaning is not what ordinarily 'comes to mind' when people speak of 'the Sun'. Thus a third sense of the English word 'meaning' is called for, 'what ordinarily comes to mind' when a term is used; this may be called the contextual meaning (or meaning in use) of the term, since it always involves implicit reference to a given context in which the term is used (cf. 'the King', 'the Prior', and the examples on p. 131). It is in a similar way that a proper name can (in spite of most modern logicians) be said to have meaning, by presupposing a context in which the name is understood to be used of a thing of a certain sort: by 'Nero' I may mean my bulldog. 'The Sun' in this third sense of 'meaning' means the particular object of a certain sort referred to in a given context of usage. It need hardly be said that this analysis is not meant to be exhaustive.

Now what Fr Rahner has, I think, succeeded in showing is that ο9 θεο&φ 'means' the Father in this third sense of 'meaning'; but I do not see that this third sense is properly significatio. Thus θεο&φ can retain its significatio and ο(θεο&φ yet 'mean' the Father, in a perfectly familiar sense of 'meaning' over and above the suppositional sense. The 'sort' of object here is on the one hand the Persons of the Trinity, and on the other hand anything to which θεο&φ may be applied; but if anyone objects to the notion of 'sort' or genus being applied to the Trinity, he should observe that the logical pattern and the logical difficulties are very similar for 'the Father'. In the last resort, it seems doubtful whether scholastic logic is sufficiently subtle to provide an adequate analysis of the semantics of ordinary language. One of the merits of Fr Rahner's study is that it shows how the sort of linguistic analysis practised in this country after Wittgenstein is not without its relevance for theologians.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Yet kerygmatically it would be incorrect to dwell on the fact that Jesus worshipped the Son of God. So if we ask which theologically true statements are also kerygmatic, we shall always have to orientate ourselves by references to modes of expression current in the New Testament (though not to them alone). It is only in this way that we shall avoid the danger of bringing things into the foreground of a human consciousness which is always finite, of emphasizing connexions and relationships, which conceal or at least push into the background the more important view of revealed reality, that which is of ultimate significance for the working out of salvation. For instance, if prayer is always directed only to God in general or to the three divine Persons indifferently, there may perhaps be some theoretical consciousness of Christ's place as mediator, but in the long run it is no longer going to have the significance for the full religious life which in fact is due to it. Taking into account, then, not only the objective truth of a mode of speech but also its kerygmatic correctness, it becomes important to make a close inspection of the linguistic usages of the New Testament. And no long explanation is needed to show that in this respect the use of the word 'God' is consequently of special significance. The detailed examination of what the New Testament means immediately and expressly by calling us children of God, is of particular urgency from the kerygmatic point of view. For in the usual Western sense of the word, the relationship of filiation with respect to God has led much more easily to the danger of a moralistic attenuation of this relationship than it would have done if the idea of filiation had from the very start involved a living consciousness of the fact that the Father in the Trinitarian sense is our Father (because 'God' precisely signifies the Father). Thus in this relationship of filiation to the Father of the eternal Son, quite precise relationships to the Son and to the Spirit are included, but they are not directly indicated by the word 'child' in the New Testament, and so ought not to be directly expressed by us in this sense when we speak kerygmatically. If 'God' signifies the Father and if we feel ourselves into this mode of speech, we shall become much more clearly conscious 'in prayer to God' (cf. Lk 6:12) that we call upon the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ when, taught by Christ, we say 'Our Father'. And so the Trinitarian structure of our whole religious life will become more [130] vital, and our consciousness of Christ's mediation with regard to the Father become more sharp, than if the word 'God' merely calls to mind in our prayer to God the God of natural theology and the Trinity in general (and hence indistinctly).[13]

b. Questions of method.

In the first place it is of course clear that in the New Testament ο(θεο&φ often at least stands for the Father in the Trinitarian sense, at any rate wherever Christ is called the 'Son of God' or where the Spirit (as Person) is called 'Spirit of God'. For the Son and the Spirit are not Son and Spirit of the Trinity, but Son of the Father and Spirit of the Father. The only question, then, is how we are to know whether ο(θεο&φ not only stands for the Father, but also signifies him (all this with reference only to New Testament usage, of course).

It might seem that this question has already been decided in the negative, for the following reasons. 1. Even in the New Testament ο(θεο&φ occurs in contexts in which the word must signify not the Father but the triune God as such; in those statements, for instance, in which ο(θεο&φ is used to speak of the God of the Old Testament, the Creator God, God as the object of natural theology. 2. θεο&φ is also used to speak of the Son. If these arguments should turn out not to be decisive for our investigation, we must ask positively how we may in general recognize whether a word merely stands for what is meant or signifies it in a given type of expression; and how we may know what follows in particular from such general methodological indications for the concrete case with which we are concerned.

[13] Cf. e.g. J. A. Jungmann, Die Frohbotschaft und unsere Glaubensverkündigung (Regensburg 1936), p. 67 s.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

From the very nature of the case, the only methodological directive available is that we should simply examine the linguistic usage before us. We may begin with the clearest case. Let us assume that a certain word is invariably used to refer to some one determinate thing and to no second thing, for which the word would also have to have supposition, in case it merely stood for the first thing but did not signify it. Further we suppose that this word occurs precisely in contexts in which, in order to avoid ambiguity, a signifying word, which does in fact exist, might have been expected and not merely a word with supposition. It is clear that in such a case the word would signify the [131] thing and not merely stand for it. It must of course be noted that in actual usage a word fluctuates between its suppositional application and its signification. This is due to the fact that the application of a word is subject to historical changes. The conceptual content of a word may become broader or narrower; a word may pass from a narrow to a wider meaning, and then to a different narrower meaning. Thus it can happen that a word may at first merely stand for a determinate thing and then signify it, or vice versa; and the signification of a word may become different as a result of an intermediate suppositional usage. It also follows from this that the principle just enunciated (that the significative meaning of a word with respect to a determinate thing may be recognized by the exclusive use of the word for the thing) must not be pressed too far. It is quite possible that a word should be significative of a determinate thing (still be or already be), while it may still be applied suppositionally in a few individual cases to indicate some other thing; and this fact would in no way prove that the word has been used for the first thing merely suppositionally. For example, when we are told of Howard in Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel that we know of course that the 'blade' here is a sword; but it by no means follows that even for Scott 'blade' means 'sword'. We have here a purely suppositional use of 'blade' for 'sword'.[14] But once a word comes to be used more or less regularly or exclusively for a determinate thing, we must say that it now also becomes significative of that thing. For example, when we speak of a 'torch' in our modern city life, the word has ceased to be strictly a generic concept for our linguistic sensibility. It no longer contains the electric lamp as merely one of its species, so as merely to stand for it from time to time. In the context of modern life the signification of the word 'torch' is simply 'electric torch', which is not to say that for modern city-dwellers in exceptional cases, and for others quite frequently, 'torch' may not [132] also stand for an oil or wooden torch, or even signify it.[15] Indeed it quite possible that the same word should signify two different things and not just stand for them. After the first World War, when we spoke of a 'tank', the word had the meaning 'container' or 'armoured vehicle' according to context, and yet for our linguistic sense there was no question of a single generic concept for the two things. What this shows is that we had no sense of speaking too generally and vaguely when we used the word 'tank' for an armoured vehicle; yet this would certainly have been the case if we felt that tank here was a wide, generic concept.[16] It is clear, then, that a word can name several things without eliciting for [14] Fr Rahner's own example is taken from Schiller's 'Der Graf von Habsburg', where the Count 'auf seines Knappen Tier Vergnüget noch weiter des Jagens Begier'. Even for Schiller 'Tier' does not mean 'Pferd' but is used for it in a purely suppositional way.

> His Bilboa blade, by Marchmen felt,
> Hung in a broad and studded belt

[15] Fr Rahner has, rather more neatly, Wagen – Kraftwagen and Pferdewagen.
[16] It is to be noted here that 'tank' is not thought of as an accidental homophone for two different concepts, such as 'calf' for the young bovine animals and for the fleshy part of the leg, or 'ball' for a dance or a sphere (Fr. Rahner has Steuer, Dichtung. – Tr.).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

linguistic sensibility the consciousness of a generic concept which includes them. In such a case we have several significations of the same word and not different suppositional applications. These properties of language must be kept in mind if the following discussion is to be properly appreciated.

c. Arguments against the thesis.

We shall now proceed to examine the soundness or unsoundness of the arguments brought forward to show that, in itself, o(qeo&f means in the New Testament God in general; and that consequently, if it refers in many places to the Father, we have a suppositional application of the word and not its inner signification.

We begin with the first argument. It might be said that even in the New Testament o(qeo&f is used as a name for the object of natural knowledge of God; and this God is not the Father but the one God who is cause of the world in virtue of the numerical unity of his nature: this attribute, then, belongs equally to all three divine Persons, since all three possess the one nature. But just this assertion – that what we know from the world is the triune God in the unity of his nature, and not the Father – is open to question. It is obvious that the Father is not known as Father in natural theology, i.e. not as He who communicates his nature to the Son by an eternal generation; and it is obviously true that the necessary uniqueness of the divine nature is [133] discerned by natural theology. But we can still say that he who is in actual fact known from the world, is concretely the Father and not the Trinity in general and indistinctly. For natural theology itself ascends not just to a divinity but to a God: it knows, that is, that this divine nature necessarily subsists, and subsists, what is more (or at least also), in an absolute and unqualified unorigination (Ursprungslosigkeit). Natural theology is quite capable of affirming the necessity of a pure and absolute unorigination in God, free from any conceivable restriction, even if its statement of this remains wholly formal. Of course it remains utterly concealed from natural theology that this concrete, absolutely unoriginate Origin of all reality is Origin also by communication of the divine nature and not merely by creation ex nihilo; that there exists Another originating from it which itself possesses the divine nature; that consequently this absolutely Unoriginate possesses the divine nature and its own absolute unorigination simply in being related to its Son; and that in consequence not every origination implies a finite reality, to be classified only as creaturely. All this makes no difference to the fact that when natural theology acquires knowledge of a simple and absolutely first Principle of all reality (not just all creaturely reality), what is so known is the Father. For, as it must yet again be emphasized, the assertion within formal ontology of the necessity of an a)rch& which is purely a!narxof, bears formally and a priori on an Unoriginate not just as set over against an origination by creation, but as opposed to every conceivable real and hypothetical origination.

It will be seen that our considerations have to do with the topics dealt with in theology under the heading of a subsistentia absoluta in God. If we disregard questions of terminology, which sometimes seem to take up most of these discussions, the real problem consists in knowing what (or better, who) 'this God' (hic Deus) is: a concept which is on the one hand distinct from that of the divine nature, the divinity; and on the other can apparently be thought and known in disregard (or ignorance) of the three relative Subsistences through which the divine nature alone really acquires unqualified and immediate concreteness. Unless we wish to follow Cajetan and Suarez, among others, in positing a subsistentia absoluta (and at least terminologically this does not belong to the Church's teachings), only one course is open to us: to maintain that the concrete Absolute (hic Deus) known by natural theology is precisely the Father, although natural theology [134] does not know that this Subsistence is one which is relative to other divine Persons. For in the first place, we know by natural reason that the divine essence must subsist simply and in a way quite peculiar to it as this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God, as Person. Secondly, remembering that it is something ultimate and immediate, we do not wish to make this personal subsistence into a concept which would fit more than one individual, or again into something which would entirely fail to bring God's absolutely immediate concreteness into focus (as is the case with the notion of subsistentia absoluta). It follows then that 'this God', in whom we are bound to conceive the divine nature as necessarily subsisting, must be the Father, though certainly he is not known by us as such.

We may see, then, that where the New Testament interprets 'God' as the object of natural theology, it does not follow as a matter of course that the triune God as a whole is meant, nor, then, that in this context we have a linguistic usage in which o(θεο&φ signifies the triune God in his unity and not the Father. The least that can be said of this view of the concept o(θεο&φ and its application is a non liquet.

There is no difficulty in seeing that the same holds true for the New Testament use of o(θεο&φ for the Creator of the world. For on the one hand God can be known naturally as origin of the world and thus at least in the broadest sense as its Creator; and the New Testament does give expression to the idea of God as Creator. On the other hand, this natural knowledge does bear upon the First Person as the radical term of its movement, though not upon the First Person as such. It follows that the same kind of thing can be said about the New Testament idea of God as Creator of the world. The absolutely Unoriginate, which is to say the Father, is Creator of the world too. This is not to deny that objectively this attribute belongs to each of the three Persons in possession of the divine nature, which is the basis of the divine creativity, the actio ad extra. On the contrary, it follows immediately from the first assertion; but it need not for that reason be expressly stated there. If it is possible to say without going any further, 'The Father created the world', then it is also true of the statement, 'God is the creator of the world', that nothing more need be said there expressly. Whether in fact more is expressly said there or just that and no more, is not a question to be decided from this statement in isolation; it has first to be decided whether o(θεο&φ merely stands for the Father or also signifies him. The same holds good for those propositions in which o(θεο&φ is used to speak of Him who was at [135] work in the saving history of the Old Testament. For in New Testament usage o(θεο&φ is precisely Creator and the Ruler of the Old Covenant, and so the same thing is true of both expressions; and it is likewise obvious that the other two Persons are included objectively in such an expression, in case this refers explicitly only to the first Person. We may just note here that there are places in the New Testament where o(θεο&φ, as God of the Old Dispensation, undoubtedly means the Father, because in the same context mention is made of Christ's being sent by this God.[17]

The second argument to show that o(θεο&φ in the New Testament only stands suppositionally for the Father, even in the texts in which he is actually referred to by this word, may seem more weighty. It relies on the fact that in some few texts θεο&φ is also used of the Son. The Jews' reproach to Christ that he makes himself God (Jn 10:33) cannot be counted among these, for in the mind of the hostile Jews there is no intention of making a distinction between the Son and the Father and so making a θεο&φ-statement about the Son with regard to his distinction from the Father. And since we are only concerned here with New Testament usage in its own right, we may also leave out of account the text (Heb 1:8 s.) where St Paul applies Psalm 44:7 s. to Christ. o(θεο&φ is certainly applied to the Son here; but this would only supply a convincing proof of the Apostle's usage if it were clear what sense elohim itself had in Psalm 44[18] and in what St Paul's messianic application consisted.

---

[17] Ac 3:12-26 for v.26; Heb 1:1-2, God has spoken in the prophets and in his Son; Jn 10:35-6, the Scriptures of the Old Testament are the word of God, who has sent Christ into the world; and so on. Cf. J. Beumer, 'Wer ist der Gott des AT?', Kirche und Kanzel XXV (1942), pp. 174-80.

[18] Cf. P. Heinisch, Theology of the Old Testament, ET p. 348.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But other texts of the New Testament are relevant here: in Rom 9:5 s. Christ is called o(w≡n e0pi∴ pa&ntwn qeo&f; in Jn 1:1 the Logos is called qeo&f; in Jn 1:18 monogenh_f qeo&f[19]; in Jn 20:28 Thomas says to the resurrected Christ, o(ku&rio&f mou kai∴ o(qeo&f mou; in 1 Jn 5:20 it is said of Christ, ou{tof e0stin o(a)lhqino_f qeo&f; in Tit 2:13 we are told of the do&xa tou~ mega&lou qeou~ ka_i swth~rof h(mw~n 0Ihsou~ Cristou~.[20] [136]Thus we have six texts in which the reality of the divine nature in Christ is expressed by the predicate qeo&f. In none of them – it is not unimportant to note – is qeo&f alone, without the addition of modifying clauses but with the article, used to speak of Christ. qeo&f is either found without the article (Jn 1:1.18; Rom 9:5)[21], and so suggests a kind of conceptual generality; or it is particularized in some way, and so suggests that what is being referred to is not simply to be identified with what is elsewhere meant by o(qeo&f.[22] It is further to be [137] observed that in all these cases (with the exception of Tit 2:13), qeo&f

---

[19] Assuming that we should not rather read o(monogenh_f qeo&f here, a reading which has been strongly recommended in recent times. Cf. TWNT IV, p. 784, n. 14 (Büchsel) and R. Bultmann, Johannesevangelium (in Meyer's Kommentar) 1941, p. 55, n. 4.

[20] We cannot count Heb 3:4 among these texts, because qeo&f here can just as well be referred to the Father on account of 3:6, as to the Son on account of 3:2.3; nor can we count 2 Pet 1:1 and 2 Thess 1:12, because qeo&f here is clearly separated from 'Christ' by the h(mw~n between 'God' and 'Lord' ('Saviour'), unlike Tit 2:13, and so is to be referred to the Father and not to Christ. Elsewhere St Paul often speaks of the Father as the qeo&f where he predicates ku&riof of Christ; and a mention of the Father as well as the Son is to be expected at the beginning of 2 Peter, in accordance with the usual practice at the beginning of a letter. Nor can we include Eph 5:5; Col 2:2; Tit 2:11; 3:4; in all these it is much more likely that qeo&f refers to the Father and not to Christ. The same is true of Ac 20:28; for the readings e0kklhsi/a tou~ qeou~ and e0kklhsi/a tou~ kuri/ou are evenly balanced in the manuscripts, and a change from the more difficult, because unusual, reading e0.t.ku. to the common e0.t.qeou~ is more easily explained than a change in the reverse direction, especially since from St Ignatius of Antioch onwards the phrase 'blood of God' had ceased to be linguistically unfamiliar, so that a correction of qeo&u into kuri/ou would no longer be suggested from that side.

[21] In itself, the absence of the article in Jn 1:1 and Rom 9:5 is sufficiently explained by the fact that qeo&f is being used predicatively; but the absence of the article in Jn 1:18 is all the more striking. Lagrange translates correctly, 'Un Dieu Fils unique' (M. J. Lagrange, Evangile selon Saint Jean[5], Paris 1936, p. 27). The article in Jn 20:28 is explained by the mou, which normally requires the article before it; by its use with the vocative (Blass-Debrunner, Grammatik des ntl. Griechisch[9], § 147, 3); and by its presence in the established formula o(ku&riof kai∴ o(qeo&f (cf. e.g. Apoc 4:11). It should further be noted that o(qeo&f mou, whether it is taken as vocative or nominative, is predicative in sense, and so cannot be used as evidence either way to show whether o(qeo&f in New Testament usage ever appears as subject of a statement referring to Christ.

[22] This should be clear from Jn 1:18, where the article is missing again: 'an only begotten God' excludes in advance the danger of simply taking this God for o(qeo&f. In Tit 2:13, qeo&f – the article is already explained by the h(mw~n – is protected against any misunderstanding by the conjoined Cristou~ 0Ihsou~, and is found in the context of a specifically Hellenistic vocabulary (e0piфa&neia–swth&r–me/gaf qeo&f); in a context like this, however, qeo&f, and especially in the cult-formula meɜgaf qeo&f, has a quite different, a much more general ring than o(qeo&f, which against its Old Testament background has much more nearly the character of a proper name. If 1 Jn 5:20 (bearing in mind that the text here is not entirely certain) must be referred to the Son, then this text is without question the summit of the predication of God with reference to the Son in the New Testament; for it is impossible to deny that a)lhqino&f here does not in itself make the o(qeo&f sound more general, but rather emphasizes still more sharply the uniqueness and exclusiveness of the one God. At the same time it should be noted that precisely in St John's First Epistle o(qeo&f so often certainly means the Father (1:5-7; 4:9.10; 4:15; 5:9-12; and ui9of tou~ qeou~ [au)tou~] in a good dozen instances) that it must be understood of the Father throughout the Epistle, unless we are to suppose that some incomprehensible change has taken place in the subject referred to by o(qeo&f. Now if at the close of the Epistle Christ is called o(a)lhqino_f qeo&f in a last emphatic utterance, this is clearly a conscious and deliberate departure from the usual sense of o(qeo&f, and we may not conclude from this that o(qeo&f possesses a signification which from the start allows it to mean the Son or the Father indifferently.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

stands as predicate or has a predicative sense,[23] and in this way suggests the more general connotation of the word in the context. But the word never appears by itself as grammatical subject, about which something else is said, as though it were a characterization of Christ needing no further explanation, like κυ&ριοφ, for instance (Lk 7:13; 10:1; Jn 4:11; 6:23; 11:2; Ac 9:10.11; 1 Cor 7:10.12; 1 Thess 4:16, etc.). But what is decisive for our inquiry is that these few texts in which Christ is called θεο&φ are vastly outnumbered by the other texts in which the New Testament intends to express Christ's divine nature in one way or another, and yet does not make use of the word θεο&φ, as one would have expected if the word had a quasi-generic signification. Christ is called 'Son of God', the 'true Son of God', κυ&ριοφ, 'Logos of God', ει0κω&ν of God, ξαρακτη&ρ and α)παυ&γασμα of God; we are told of his ε0ν μορφη~| θεου~ υ(πα&ρξειν, of his 'being-with-God', of his ει]ναι ι1σα θεω~|, of the πλη&ρωμα τη~φ θεο&τητοφ that dwells in him. All these are ways of trying to express Christ's divinity, and what is more to express it as clearly as possible, without any pedagogic attempt to withhold the full sense of the affirmation, as may have been the case when Christ began to reveal himself; and yet in all these texts the writers avoid the use of θεο&φ for Christ. The only way in which this can be explained is that for the linguistic sense of the New [138] Testament ο(θεο&φ originally signified the Father alone. 9Ο θεο&φ does not start by being neutral in a generic way, so as to be applicable to the Father and also, without explanation, to the Son. Originally it is associated with the Father and thus primarily signifies him alone; it is only slowly, as it were shyly and cautiously, that the expression is detached from him and evolves in such a way that a few texts (Jn 20:28; Rom 9:5; 1 Jn 5:20) venture to use it of Christ. These are texts in which an especially profound confession of Christ stirs the speaker to enlarge linguistic usage, whereas in more everyday language the customary signification of terms has to be followed more closely. Θεο&φ is still never used of the Spirit.

Summing up, then, we may say that the arguments against our thesis are not conclusive. These arguments attempted to show that for the linguistic sense of the New Testament ο(θεο&φ does not primarily signify the Father but rather any divine Person or the three divine Persons together, so that it only stands for the Father when it is used of him. It is not to be denied that a development in this direction is in its initial stages; but it cannot be shown that the significative meaning of ο(θεο&φ has already evolved so far in the New Testament itself that the unqualified expression ο(θεο&φ merely stands suppositionally for the Father there.

d. Positive demonstration of the thesis.

We have already stated the general rule of method for a proof of this kind. This is the principle that a word has significative and not merely suppositional meaning for a determinate thing when (a) this word is used always or nearly always to speak only of this thing; and (b) when the word is employed for this thing even in a critical context, although another word for the same thing is available which would be clearer (on the grounds of its signification of the thing), if the first word merely stood for the thing suppositionally. What follows falls into two parts in accordance with these two requirements.

(a) First of all, ο(θεο&φ is used so frequently to speak of the Father that the few texts already noted where θεο&φ is also used to speak of the Son, have no importance for the question whether the predication ο(θεο&φ of the Father is merely suppositional. Christ is called the 'Son of God' (υι9ο_φ του~ θεου~), where, as has been said, 'God' at least stands for the Father. Christ himself uses the phrase, Jn 5:25; 10:36; 11:4 (cf. Mt 27:43); he

[23] As the absence of the article indicates, Jn 1:18 is also to be understood in this sense: an only begotten, who is God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

expressly confirms it, Mt 16:17; 26:63 s.; [139] others use it, Mt 4:3.6; 8:29; 14:33; 16:16; 26:63; 27:40.54; Mk 1:1 (?); 3:11; 5:27; 14:61; 15:39; Lk 1:35; 4:3.9.41; 8:28; 22:70; Jn 1:34.49; 3:18; 11:27; 19:7; 20:31; Ac 9:20; Rom 1:3.4.9; 2 Cor 1:19; Gal 2:20; Eph 4:13; Heb 4:14; 6:6; 7:3; 10:29; 1 Jn 3:8; 4:15; 5:5.10.12.13.20; Apoc 2:18 (here too belong the texts with υι9ο_φ αυ)του~ directly related to ο(θεο&φ in the immediate context, Rom 1:9; 5:10; 8:3.29.32; 1 Cor 1:9; 15:28; Gal 1:16; 4:4; 1 Thess 1:10; Heb 1:2; 1 Jn 1:7; 3:23; 4:9.10; 5:10.11).[24] In the same sense ο(θεο&φ at least stands for the Father when God is called 'Father of Jesus Christ', Jn 6:27; Rom 15:6; 1 Cor 15:24; 2 Cor 1:3; 11:31; Eph 1:3.16; Phil 2:11; Col 1:3; 1 Pet 1:3; 2 Pet 1:17; Apoc 1:6, or when on the other hand Christ is said to be ο(λο&γοφ του~ θεου~ (Apoc 19:13), ει0κω_ν του~ θεου~ (2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15), ι1σα θεω~| (Phil 2:7). There is no doubt that the Father is referred to by ο(θεο&φ (once again at least suppositionally) when ο(θεο&φ is said to send the Son, Jn 8:42; Ac 3:26; Rom 8:3; Gal 4:4, or when Christ 'proceeds from God', Jn 8:42; 13:3; 16:27, or when the Logos (Christ) is spoken of as being with God, Jn 1:1; 6:46, or when God is called 'the God of our Lord Jesus Christ', Eph 1:17, because one divine Person can only belong to another if it proceeds from the other. But there are countless other texts in which 'God' actively works upon Christ or 'God' is the object of one of Christ's actions or in which 'God' and Christ seem simply to be put side by side: in all these 'God' refers to the Father. It is certainly true that according to the purely theological logic of real attributions, operations of 'God' upon Christ in his human nature can be attributed to the whole Trinity (St Thomas, Ia. 43.8), so that somewhat different relationships are found here from those found in a 'mission', in the strict theological sense of this word. But the view that it is in this sense that an operation of the triune God as such is also attributed to Christ (not merely implied logically) in the New Testament, would lead to linguistic impossibilities. For firstly ο(θεο&φ, put next to Christ, is often particularized by the attribute πατη&ρ (even without η(μω~ν!), and consequently can only be understood of the First Person of the Trinity; further, in these combinations of ο(θεο&φ and Christ, Christ is often [140] characterized as the κυ&ριοφ, i.e. as divine Person, and once again it is impossible that the Trinity and one of these three Persons should be put side by side (e.g. ε0ν ε0πιγνω&σει του~ θεου~ και∴ 0Ιησου~ του~ κυρι/ου η(μω~ν, 2 Pet 1:2); and often in these statements about an action of God upon him or vice versa Christ is called 'Son', and consequently this θεο&φ can only be the Father. Finally, it is quite inconceivable, bearing in mind the clear and simple language of the New Testament, that where two subjects are named side by side, the immediate and explicit sense of what is said should be that one subject ('God') just includes the other (Christ).

We can now go on to interpret a number of expressions in accordance with these presuppositions. Actions relating to Christ are attributed to 'God': 'God' has raised up Christ from the dead (Ac 2:24.32; 3:15.26; 4:10; 5:30; 10:40; 13:17.33-4; 17:31; Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 15:15; 6:14; Eph 1:20; Col 2:12; 1 Thess 1:10; 1 Pet 1:21. Ac 2:32 [πατη&ρ v.33]; 3:26 [. ˜]; Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 6:14 [κυ&ριοφ!] make it even clearer linguistically that the Father is meant by this God who raises up from the dead. – Cf. also Gal 1:1, where θεο_φ πατη&ρ appears as the one who raises up). 'God' has exalted Christ, glorified him (Ac 2:33; 3:13; 5:31; Phil 2:9). 'God' anoints Christ with the Holy Ghost (Ac 10:38). 'God' is with him (Ac 10:38). 'God' makes Christ sit at his right hand (Mk 16:19; Lk 22:69; Ac 7:55-6; Rom 8:34; Eph 1:20 [the subject here is . ˜ of v.17!]; Col 3:1; Heb 10:12; 12:2; 1 Pet 3:22 cf. Apoc 3:21, where the throne of the Father is being spoken of). 'God' has spoken beforehand of his (!) Christ (Ac 3:18). Christ is addressed by [24] 'Son of God' does of course have an indeterminate sense in a number of places in the Gospels, but this sense does not in itself come into consideration here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'God' (Heb 5:10). Christ is attested to by 'God' (Ac 2:22). 'God' gives Christ the throne of David (Lk 1:32). 'God' gives Christ all he asks for (Jn 11:22). 'God' is glorified in the Son of Man and glorifies him (Jn 13:31.32). 'God' is κεφαλη& of Christ (1 Cor 11:3). There are actions of Christ relating to 'God': Christ ascends to his 'God' (Jn 20:17); Christ speaks of his God (Jn 20:17; Apoc 3:2.12 [four times]); Christ is in prayer to 'God' (Lk 6:12); Christ appears in the presence of 'God' (Heb 9:24); Christ brings us to 'God' (Col 3:3); Christ delivers the kingdom to 'God' (1 Cor 15:24); Christ belongs to 'God' (1 Cor 1:24); Christ is an offering to 'God' (Eph 5:2). There are texts which speak of our relationship to God through Christ: we are with Christ in 'God' (Col 3:3); we have peace with 'God' through the Kyrios (Rom 5:1); we give thanks to 'God' in [141] the name of Christ (Eph 5:20); we are acceptable to 'God' by serving Christ (Rom 14:18); St Paul is an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of 'God' (1 Tim 1:1; 2 Tim 1:1). In a large number of texts ο(θεο&φ and Christ are put side by side: the kingdom of Christ and of 'God' (Eph 5:5); heir of 'God' and joint heir with Christ (Rom 8:17); priests of 'God' and of Christ (Apoc 20:6); knowledge of 'God' and of Christ (2 Pet 1:2); the righteousness of our 'God' and of the Saviour Jesus Christ (2 Pet 1:1); servant of 'God' and of the Lord Jesus Christ (Jas 1:1); servant of 'God', apostle of Jesus Christ (Tit 1:1); one 'God', one Christ (1 Cor 8:6; 1 Tim 2:5); commandment of 'God' and faith of Jesus (Apoc 14:12); testimony of Jesus and word of 'God' (Apoc 1:2; 20:4); love of 'God' and patience of Christ (2 Thess 3:5); the church in 'God' our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (2 Thess 1:1); preaching of the kingdom of 'God' and teaching about our Lord Jesus Christ (Ac 28:31); before 'God' and Christ (1 Tim 5:21; 6:13; 2 Tim 4:1); and all the formulas of greeting, containing wishes of peace and other benefits from 'God' and Christ (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; Phil 1:2; 2 Thess 1:2; 1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2; Tit 1:4; Phm 3; 2 Jn 3).

'God' at least stands for the Father also in the so-called Trinitarian formulas, such as Rom 15:30; 1 Cor 12:4-6; 2 Cor 1:21.22; 13:13; Eph 4:4-6; 1 Pet 1:2.[25] In the same way, 'God' at least stands for the Father when the Holy Spirit is called Spirit of God (Mt 3:16; 12:28; Rom 8:9.14; 1 Cor 2:11.12 [ε0κ θεου~]. 14; 3:16; 6:11; 7:40; 12:3; 2 Cor 3:3 Eph 4:30; Phil 3:3; 1 Thess 4:8 [.]; 1 Pet 4:14; 1 Jn 4:2.13 [πνευ~μα αυ)του~][26]), when he is sent and given by [142] 'God' (Ac 5:32; 15:18; 1 Cor 6:19; 2 Cor 1:22; Gal 4:6; Eph 1:17; 1 Thess 4:8; 2 Tim 1:7; 1 Jn 3:24; 4:13).

It is further to be observed that the following texts, Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; 8:6; 2 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; 5:20; Phil l:2; Col 3:17; 1 Thess 1:1 (?); 2 Thess 1:2 (?); 2:16; Phm 3, all speak of God our Father; moreover this God who is our Father is clearly characterized as the Trinitarian Father by putting 'the Lord Jesus Christ' immediately after. This alone shows that in New Testament usage it is the First Person of the Trinity who is meant when the writers speak of God our Father and our adoptive sonship. Accordingly Christ himself can speak of 'my' Father and 'your' Father (Jn 20:17), clearly meaning by this one and the same Person, the First Person in God. This may also be seen from the fact that according to St Paul (Eph 1:3.5), the Father of Jesus destined us to be his sons and bestowed his Son upon us, so that [25] If we take 'Trinitarian' in the widest sense and consider all those short passages in the New Testament in which all three divine Persons are named, the Trinitarian texts are as follows: Mt 28:19; Lk 24:49; Jn 14:16.17; 14:26; 15:26; 16:7-11; 16:12-15; Ac 2:32-3; 2:38-9; 5:31-2; 7:55-6; 10:38; 11:15-17; Rom 5:1-5; 8:9-1l; 8:14-17; 14:17-18; 15:15-16; 15:30; 1 Cor 2:6-16; 6:11; 6:15-20; 12:3; 12:4-6; 2 Cor 1:21-2; 13:13; Gal 4:4-6; Eph 1:3-14; 1:17; 2:18-22; 3:14-19; 4:4-6; 5:15-20; 2 Thess 2:13; Tit 3:4-11; Heb 2:2-4; 10:29-31; 1 Pet 1:1-2; 2:4-5; 4:14; 1 Jn 3:23-4; 4:11-16; 5:5-8; Jud 20-1. In these texts the Father is called simply ο(θεο&φ seventy times and only nineteen times πατη&ρ or θεο_φ πατη&ρ or ο(θεο_φ και∴ πατη&ρ.

---

[26] For the Holy Spirit as a divine Person can only be called Spirit 'of God' if he proceeds from this God, as the theologians have always insisted with regard to the Spirit as Spirit of Christ: cf. e.g. Pesch, Praelectiones Dogmaticae II, n. 529-31. But the God from whom the Spirit proceeds is the Father (Jn 15:26).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we might receive the adoption of sons (Gal 4:5), and Christ so become the firstborn among many brethren (Rom 8:29) and we together with him cry 0Aββα_ ο9 πατη&ρ (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:5; cf. Mk 14:36). At any rate, New Testament usage allows us to say that we are children of God in the sense that we are children of the Father as First Person of the Trinity, not as children of the triune God (whether the latter statement too is objectively valid or not is not our concern here).[27] Christ himself says that men enter into relationship with his Father (Mt 7:21; 12:50; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10.19.35; 20:23; 25:34; Jn 2:16; 6:32; 14:2.23; 15:8.23.24). The God whom the Jews believed to be their Father, is the God from whom Jesus has proceeded and who has sent him: the Father in the Trinitarian sense (Jn 8:32). Moreover, the heavenly Father, according to Christ's teaching, is not Father of men because he is Creator or because of his providential care for them, so that he could without further qualification be called Father of all men; he is the Father of the followers of Christ, of those in fact who belong to the kingdom of heaven. At least it is only to these [143] that Christ speaks of God as their Father. This fatherhood has its basis in the free election of the Father, who calls and leads men to his Son (Jn 6:37-40.44.45). Men are therefore not children of God by nature, but they can become his children, if they dispose themselves morally in certain definite ways (Mt 5:9.45: Lk 6:36; cf. Jn 1:12). According to Christ's own teaching, then, there is no reason to suppose that the adoptive sonship which he preaches is a relationship to God in general and not to the Father of Christ. All this taken together justifies the conclusion that in every text which speaks of God as our Father and of us as children of God and of our being born of God, it is the First Person of the Trinity who is meant. Hence all these texts are to be counted among those in which ο(θεο&φ at least stands suppositionally for the Father (Mt 5:9; Lk 20:36; Jn 1:12.13; 11:52; Rom 5:2; 8:14.16.19.21; 9:8.26; 2 Cor 6:18; Gal 3:26; Eph 1:5; 2:19; 3:14; 4:6; 5:1; Phil 2:15; 4:20; 1 Thess 1:3; 3:13; Heb 12:7; Jas 1:27; 1 Jn 3:1.2.10; 4:7; 5:1.2.4.7.18; Jud 1; Apoc 21:7).

We may outline our results as follows. Nowhere in the New Testament is there to be found a text with ο(θεο&φ which has unquestionably to be referred to the Trinitarian God as a whole existing in three Persons. In by far the greater number of texts ο(θεο&φ refers to the Father as a Person of the Trinity. It should be noted here that in the texts in which ο(θεο&φ is used without its being absolutely clear from the immediate context who precisely is meant, the expression never contains anything which is not said of God in other texts; and in just these other texts, this God may be recognized (directly or indirectly) as Father in the Trinitarian sense.[28] Besides this there are six complete texts in which ο(θεο&φ is used to speak of the Second Person of the Trinity, but still in a hesitant and obviously restricted way (the restriction is concerned of course not with the reality but with the use of the word). In addition, ο(θεο&φ is never used in the New Testament to speak of the πνευ~μα α#γιον. These findings are sufficient in themselves to justify the assertion that when the New Testament speaks of [144] ο(θεο&φ, it is (with the exception of the six texts mentioned) the Father as First Person of the Trinity who is signified. 9Ο θεο&φ signifies him and does not merely stand suppositionally for him, because a constant and practically exclusive suppositional use of a word is proof that this word also signifies the thing for which it stands

[27] How little obvious for scholastic theology this apparently obvious assertion in fact is, may perhaps be seen from the fact that Knabenbauer (Comm. in Ev. sec. Matt. [3], Paris 1922, pp. 311-12), citing Maldonatus and Suarez, holds that even in the Our Father it is God in Trinity who is being addressed, because we are children of God and 'God' means just God in Trinity.

[28] Thus, for example, the whole Old Testament saving history is ascribed to the God who sends Jesus, thus to the Father (Ac 3:12-26; cf. Heb. 1: 1). In Ac 4:24 s., Eph 3:9 s. and Heb 1:2, the God who created all things is clearly characterized as the Father in virtue of his distinction from the 'Son' ('Servant', 'Christ'). Now if creation and saving history are ascribed to God the Father, there can hardly be a single statement about ο(θεο&φ which is not included therein.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

suppositionally, especially when it stands for the thing as subject and not just as a predicative name. The few exceptional uses of θεο&φ, where the linguistic form itself marks them as exception, do not justify the view that in the usage of the New Testament ο(θεο&φ is an expression which signifies the Trinity in the unity of its proper nature, and so has always stood suppositionally for each of the three divine Persons in like manner.

(b) This impression is strengthened when we examine some critical instances. Where Christ's Person and Nature are to be declared with the greatest theological strictness and precision, he is called ο(υι9ο_φ του~ θεου~: so in Peter's confession of faith at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16:16), so in Christ's decisive testimony to himself before the Sanhedrin when he was being threatened with death (Mt 26:63; Mk 14:61; Lk 22:70), so in the final recapitulation of the theological content of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 20:31), so in the oldest formula in the New Testament summing up the meaning of conversion to Christianity (1 Thess 1:9.10, δουλευ&ειν θεω~| ζω~ντι και∴ α)ληθινω~| και∴ α)ναμε/νειν το_ν υι9ο_ν αυ)του~), so in the solemn opening of the Epistle to the Romans, the greatest of the doctrinal texts of the New Testament (Rom 1:2.4), so in the superscription of the Gospel of St Mark (Mk 1:1). In all these cases Christ is called 'Son of God', the theological meaning being always, Son of the Father. It must be kept in mind that the word 'Father' was always available to the New Testament writers. Indeed it is of the greatest interest that our Lord himself clearly avoided the form 'Son of God' (at least in general). In the Synoptics the phrase 'Son of God' never rises spontaneously to his lips, although he recognizes it as a formula for what he is. He himself speaks of himself only as the 'Son' absolutely (except for the formula 'Son of Man'); and he speaks of God, the Father, only as the 'Father' absolutely (Mt 11:27 = Lk 10:22; Mt 24:36 = Mk 13:32; Mt 28:19; Lk 9:26)[29] or as 'his (heavenly) Father (in heaven)'. He [145] never uses the expression ο(θεο&φ in the Synoptics to speak of 'God', in so far as the latter has a relationship to Christ himself. Even in St John there are only three texts in which it is certain that our Lord speaks of himself as, 'Son of God' (Jn 5:25; 10:36; 11:4).[30] If it is remembered that St John uses 'Father' 102 times, in 23 of which it occurs as 'my Father',[31] Christ's own avoidance of the word 'God' in characterizing what he is, is no accident; it is even lacking in the baptismal formula.[32] Thus it cannot be denied that when the men of the New Testament wanted to speak of the Father of Christ, they had at their disposal a word which signified this Father, a word which was quite familiar to them from Christ's own manner of speech and which they did in fact often (excepting perhaps the Acts of the Apostles) make use of ('Father', 'God Father', 'God and Father'). If, then, in the above-mentioned solemn formulas, where for the sake of clarity and precision everything depended on the use of a word which signified the thing meant and did not merely stand for it suppositionally, these men used ο(θεο&φ for the Father, this can only be explained by the fact that in these formulas ο(θεο&φ did in actual fact signify the Father for them and did not merely stand for him suppositionally. For them the expression ο(θεο&φ was just as exact and precise as 'Father'. Nor can it be said that the word 'Father' would have been imprecise in contexts like these, in that it could not be known which Father was meant; for the New Testament writers would have been able to follow Christ's example and speak of the 'heavenly Father' or of the 'Father in heaven', or they could have used in this context the

[29] Disregarding the parables, in which Christ lets himself be recognized indirectly as Son in contrast to servants, etc.

[30] Perhaps Jn 9:35 as well. Jn 6:27; 6:46; 8:42; 16:27 should also certainly be noticed. In these texts ο(θεο&φ is found in the context of other statements of Christ about himself; the use of ο(θεο&φ is once again quite comprehensible in view of the context.

[31] Only once as 'your Father'; and in the 78 occurrences of 'Father' absolutely, the word always refers objectively to the Father of Christ.

[32] How Christ's own manner of speech is itself to be explained is not our concern here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

common phrase 'God Father', like all the Apostolic formulations of faith.

An analogous observation may be made with regard to the Trinitarian formulas. Where this is undoubtedly ternary in form, we find Jesus himself using the group πατη&ρ, υι9ο&φ, πνευ~μα α#γιον; but for the Apostles the First Person is always signified in these formulas by ο(θεο&φ or θεο_φ πατη&ρ, never by πατη&ρ alone.[33] In these formulas [146] too, the replacement of Christ's word πατη&ρ by the Apostles' θεο&φ is only explained if ο(θεο&φ simply signified the Father.

When in consequence of all this we say that ο(θεο&φ in the language of the New Testament signifies the Father, we do not of course mean that it always signifies him precisely in so far as he is Father of the only begotten Son by an eternal generation. All that is meant is that when the New Testament thinks of God, it is the concrete, individual, uninterchangeable Person who comes into its mind, who is in fact the Father and is called ο(θεο&φ; so that inversely, when ο(θεο&φ is being spoken of, it is not the single divine nature that is seen, subsisting in three hypostases, but the concrete Person who possesses the divine nature unoriginately, and communicates it by eternal generation to a Son too, and by spiration to the Spirit.

It may easily be seen that this result is nothing more than a more precise demonstration of the fact that the conception of the Trinity, customarily (if inexactly) known since de Régnon as the Greek view, is closer to Biblical usage than what de Régnon called the Latin or scholastic view. The latter proceeds from the unity of God's nature (one God in three Persons), so that the unity of the divine nature is a presupposition of the whole doctrine of the Trinity; while the former begins with the three Persons (three Persons, who are of a single divine nature) or better, with the Father, who is the source from which the Son, and through the Son the Spirit, proceed, so that the unity and integrity of the divine nature is conceptually a consequence of the fact that the Father communicates his whole nature.[34] Associated with this Greek view of the Trinity is the fact that the Father is regarded as God κατ 0 ε0χοξη&ν. As Schmaus says:

> This is a procedure which goes back to the first Christian communities, because it is based on Scripture itself. Justin Martyr, Irenaeus and Tertullian all witness to this usage. Origen gives sharpness of definition to this view, and distinguishes between ο(θεο&φ and θεο&φ . . . This conception, even if not in so sharply defined a form, finds expression in the early Creeds; and it continued to be handed down in tradition. Denis of Alexandria reserved [147] the name 'God' to the Father. 9Ο τω~ν ο#λων θεο&φ and ο(ε0πι∴ πα&ντων θεο&φ are designations of the Father which are found everywhere in the fourth century. The Cappadocians had a general view of the Father as the absolute God or as the divine ousia. Hilary, as a pupil of the Greeks, is speaking of the Father whenever he uses the word Deus without qualification. Subordinationist ideas must not be associated with this mode of speech.[35]

Schmaus supports his assertion that this usage, which characterizes one of the two traditional ways of speaking about the Trinity, is based on Scripture itself with a bare reference to one page of de Régnon (I, p. 445); and here the only support offered is a citation from Theodore

---

[33] Cf. Cor 12:4 s.; 2 Cor 1:21 s.; 13:13 s.; 2 Thess 2:13; 1 Pet 1:2; Jude 20 s. These are the texts recognized as Trinitarian by E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology (ET John Marsh, London 1955), p. 326, n. 828.

[34] On these two views, see de Régnon's summaries, Etudes de théologie positive sur la Sainte Trinité, I (Paris 1892), pp. 335-40, 428-35.

[35] M. Schmaus, Die psychologische Trinitätslehre des heiligen Augustinus (Münster 1927), p. 19.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Abu Qurra (Abucara).[36] We have tried here to establish in more detail what was proposed by de Régnon as a thesis. This thesis may indeed be more or less obvious for someone who comes fresh from the New Testament, and the attempt to justify it may consequently arouse the suspicion that a way is being forced through an open door. Yet for someone who derives from the theology of Western scholasticism, and is accustomed to read the New Testament under the a priori of the conceptual patterns prevalent there, the thesis may well have its significance. We may leave aside the fact that the thesis which we have established in this way shows that the Greek conception of the Trinity is to be taken seriously on the authority of Scripture. But it is also important for a question such as what exactly is involved in our being children of God. If o(qeo&f in the New Testament is the Father, then we are children of the Father of Christ by participation in the eternal sonship of the only begotten Son. And it remains an open question whether we can characterize as sonship the justified man's relationship through grace to the Son and the Spirit (so that this fatherhood by grace is merely appropriated to the First Person of the Trinity); or whether, strictly speaking, it is not possible to interpret this relationship to the Son and the Spirit as sonship, so that each of the three divine Persons has its own proper relationship to the justified man, [148] not merely an appropriated one. Furthermore, this question is significant not only for a closer understanding of the nature of justifying and sanctifying grace, by providing what is in the last resort the only means of deciding whether 'uncreated grace' is merely something subsequent upon created grace, or whether it must be recognized as an independent element in the total concept of sanctifying grace. The question is significant also for the problem of the connexion between the Trinity as immanent and as economic, the entitative Trinity and the Trinity of Revelation; if man really has a special relationship to each of the three divine Persons,[37] the opposition between the entitative Trinity and the Trinity of Revelation is resolved at its very root: God stands in relation (verhält sich) to the justified man as Father, Word, Spirit, and is this too, in and for himself.

We may note finally that in the official prayers of the liturgy, it is the Father to whom we pray through the Son, and this Father is simply called Deus.[38] We have seen that this is also the usage of the New Testament. The kerygmatic significance of our enquiry was briefly touched upon earlier in this study.

---

[36] In Petavius, De Trinitate, lib. IV, c. xv, n. 14: 3Oqen oi9 a)po&stoloi kai\. pa~sa sxedo_n h(a(gi/a grafh&, o#t 0 ea!n ei1ph| o(qeo&f, ou#twf a)polu&twf kai\. a)prosdioriestwf, kai\. w(f e0pi/pan su_n a!rqrw|, kai\. xwri\.f i0diw&matof u(postatikou~, to_n patera dhloi=.

[37] Because grace in its full sense cannot be reduced to the concept of an effect of God's efficient causality, an effect which is worked by the three divine Persons in common. See below, pp. 319-46.

[38] de Régnon, I, pp. 495-9.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[149]

5

CURRENT PROBLEMS IN CHRISTOLOGY

Once theologians and the ordinary magisterium of the Church have begun to pay attention to a reality and a truth revealed by God, the final result is always a precisely formulated statement. This is natural and inevitable. In no other way is it possible to mark the boundary of error and the misunderstanding of divine truth in such a way that this boundary will be observed in the day-to-day practice of religion. Yet while this formula is an end, an acquisition and a victory, which allows us to enjoy clarity and security as well as ease in instruction, if this victory is to be a true one the end must also be a beginning. It follows from the nature of human knowledge of truth and from the nature of divine truth itself, that any individual truth, above all one of God's truths, is beginning and emergence, not conclusion and end. In the last resort any individual human perception of truth only has meaning as beginning and promise of the knowledge of God. But whether the latter is conceived of as visio beatifica or otherwise, it can only be genuine, only make blessed, in the knowledge of his incomprehensibility: at that point, then, in which comprehension and the determining limits of what is known are jointly transcended in the Incomprehensible and the Unlimited. Because every truth of the God who reveals himself is given as an incitement and a way to the closest immediacy of communion with him, it is all the more an opening into the immeasurable, a beginning of the illimitable. The clearest formulations, the most sanctified formulas, the classic condensations of the centuries-long work of the Church in prayer, reflexion and struggle concerning God's mysteries: all these derive their life from the fact that they are not end but beginning, not goal but means, truths which open the way to the – ever greater – Truth. The fact that every formula transcends itself (not because it is false, but precisely because it is true) is not due just to the transcendence of the mind which apprehends it and, in apprehending it, is always off beyond it after the greater fullness of Reality and Truth itself. Nor is [150] this self-transcendence due merely to the divine grace of faith, which always transforms the perception of a truth in propositional form into a movement of the mind towards the apprehension of God's ontological truth in itself. This transcendence is at work precisely in the movement of the formula itself, in that it is itself surpassed with a view to another. This certainly does not mean that the first formula has to be given up or abolished in favour of another, as though it were antiquated or another could take its place. On the contrary: it preserves its significance, it remains precisely living, by being expounded. This is so true and so obvious, that whole books can and must be written about the principle of identity, that is to say, the simplest, clearest, most necessary and undeniable formula of all, because it cannot really be said with much confidence that someone who monotonously keeps on repeating it – dressed up with a few 'clarificatory' phrases – has in fact understood it. Anyone who takes seriously the 'historicity' of human truth (in which God's truth too has become incarnate in Revelation) must see that neither the abandonment of a formula nor its preservation in a petrified form does justice to human understanding. For history is precisely not an atomized beginning-ever-anew; it is rather (the more spiritual it is) a becoming-new which preserves the old, and preserves it all the more as old, the more spiritual this history is. But this preservation, which recognizes the true uniqueness of something which has taken place once for all, is only historical preservation when – the history goes on, and the movement of reflexion departs from the formula which has been reached in order to discover it (just this old formula itself) again.

This holds good of the Chalcedonian formulation of the mystery of Jesus too. For this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

formula is – a formula.

Thus we have not only the right but the duty to look at it as end and as beginning. We shall never stop trying to release ourselves from it, not so as to abandon it but to understand it, understand it with mind and heart, so that through it we might draw near to the ineffable, unapproachable, nameless God, whose will it was that we should find him in Jesus Christ and through Christ seek him. We shall never cease to return to this formula, because whenever it is necessary to say briefly what it is that we encounter in the ineffable truth which is our salvation, we shall always have recourse to the modest, sober clarity of the Chalcedonian formula. But we shall only really have recourse to it (and this is not at all the same thing as simply repeating [151] it), if it is not only our end but also our beginning. We must say something here about this incompleteness which the formula does not resolve but in fact preserves.

Anyone who speaks of incompleteness in a matter like this must be prepared to be dismissed with contempt. This sort of language is hardly 'scientific'. It has to try to get a hearing without the help of the apparatus of learning; inevitably it sounds a little vague, rather like the cheap political programme which promises the emergence of a New Age, although the new Government is probably going to be just as bad as the old. It cannot by itself put into practice what it demands, and that is what is most questionable about it. For if someone says that this matter or that must be considered or investigated, or should be freshly analysed and treated of more comprehensively and profoundly, and yet this does not come about immediately in reality, he speaks like a man who proposes a route by which he himself has never travelled. It may very well be that many of his wishes and conjectures do not touch upon the essential, that the really decisive point will be overlooked. Nevertheless preliminary reflexions of this conjectural and tentative kind are unavoidable, and can only be despised or rejected in principle by someone who thinks that as far as Christology proper is concerned we have already reached the end. But if we are always at the beginning, then the first step is always the uneasy feeling of a need to ask whether it might not be possible to give this or that matter closer attention and find a better solution.

The object which this anxious seeking for the question (it is nothing more) has in view is not of course simply the whole plenitude of the 'objective Spirit'[1] of Revelation and theology in their long history. If we had clearly before us the plenitude of what was once perceived in faith and meditated upon in theology throughout its entire history, we should already in great part have found the question we are looking for and its answer too. For it is the bitter grief of theology and its blessed task too, always to have to seek (because it does not clearly have present to it at the time) what, in a true sense – in its historical memory – it has always known. The history of theology is by no means just the history of the progress of doctrine, but also a history of forgetting. That is the only reason why historical theology and history of doctrine have a real, irreplaceable and necessary task within [152] dogmatic theology itself. What was once given in history and is ever made present anew does not primarily form a set of premises from which we can draw new conclusions which have never been thought of before. It is the object which, while it is always retained, must ever be acquired anew, by us, that is, we who are just such as no one else can ever be in all history. So that when in considerable uncertainty, we set about asking – and the question itself has to be found first – what it is that we must bring back to mind so as to be able to make our own what we believe, the starting-point of this attempt to ask questions cannot be the whole of Revelation and its history in theology. It is the answer which lies there. The starting-point can only be the generally accepted position in theology today (meaning here Christology), as it is found in modern textbooks, in the conception which everybody would agree is the ordinary one, in

[1] In the Hegelian sense. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

what appears really clearly in our ordinary theological consciousness today. Any attempt to describe this starting-point is inevitably going to give the impression of being ill-informed, of generalizing unjustly and of distorting current theology. For this 'current theology' cannot easily be detached from its entire past; because along with the average it always offers – thank God – something deeper and closer to the sources of life; because when it is attacked and defends itself, it can always surpass itself and relate what it holds to the past and the future. And so it is impossible to avoid the danger of seeming to caricature current Christology when one attempts to describe what it finds clear and what would have to become still clearer to it in the future. Just because in theology everything is connected with everything else, it is always going to be the case that anyone who is sensitive to the reproach of not having examined this, or that question sufficiently or given it a satisfactory answer, can impatiently, but with a good conscience, hold that he has always really been aware of the question in point, and 'basically' even discussed it and analysed it sufficiently. One can only ask such a theologian why he has only discussed so briefly and casually what clearly deserves precise and detailed treatment, and whether he has not forgotten in other places what he – so he claims – regards as 'obvious', and whether this does not show that after all what everybody knows and what has long since been cleared up doesn't perhaps count for much. One has only to consider how few really living and passionate controversies there are in Catholic Christology today which engage the existential concern of the faithful (is there a single one?). Unless [152] someone is inclined to regard this fact simply as a mark of superiority, a proof of unruffled orthodoxy and crystal-clear theology, he will listen with patience and good will to the most modest attempt, undertaken with the most inadequate means, to depart from the Chalcedonian formula in order to find the way back to it in truth.

We should also observe the following point. The degree of theoretical precision and existential vitality with which man understands what he hears depends on the degree to which he comprehends it within the total content of his spiritual being. If this were not the case, there would never have been Councils of the Church with their definitions, because a new age would always have been able 'to live on in the old clarity; or we should have to suppose that the only reason for these Councils was the fact that there had been evil heretics who maliciously obscured what in itself had been said with quite sufficient clarity and what in itself would have been quite sufficient for later ages in spite of their unlikeness. If then the ordinary theology current today is to be asked why what it has told us is insufficiently clear, by 'us' is meant we as we must be today; for man's unique standpoint in history is inescapably given him in advance and helps to determine the perspective within which we have to consider God's eternal truths too, if we are really going to let them become a reality of mind, heart and life in our personal existence. This is not to say that it is in general particularly profitable for theology to take as the explicit starting-point of a critical consideration of the average Christology current today, any characteristic features of just that spiritual situation which has been imposed upon us, in so far as they are apprehended reflexively. Such a method is seldom successful, if only because these reflexively apprehended characteristics of the time are probably signatures of a time which is on the way out; it is unlikely that we should discover from them postulates big with promise for the Christology of tomorrow. It is preferable simply to look at the facts, that is to say at Christology itself – always providing that one has the courage to ask questions, to be dissatisfied, to think with the mind and heart one actually has, and not with the mind and heart one is supposed to have. One can then be confident that after all something will perhaps emerge which we ought to be thinking today. For it is quite meaningless to want to be modern on purpose. The only thing one can do in this situation is not to suppose that it is necessary to deny who one is (out of anxiety or distrust or falsely understood orthodoxy), but rather allow oneself [154] honestly to have one's say, and really build on the fact that God

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

can give his grace to this age of ours too, as he once gave it to sinners.

Let us then begin by going to the heart of the matter. This is primarily Biblical theology. There is no question here of practising Biblical theology in its own right; our intention is much more modest. We propose to show by means of a kind of transcendental hermeneutics[2] starting from dogma that the Church's Christological dogma never claims to be an adequate condensation of Biblical teaching, and so that there does remain from the viewpoint of dogma a place for further Christological Biblical theology. It is only in this sense that we shall speak of Biblical theology in what follows. It should be the source of dogmatic theology and so also of Christology. Without it, according to Humani Generis[3], dogmatic theology becomes sterile. And here we are already faced with a serious problem. How are we to pursue Biblical theology for Christological purposes, both generally speaking and in dogmatic theology in particular? Is it rash or unjust to say that among Catholic writers, the professional exegetes in this field do not practise Biblical theology, and that the dogmatic theologians know or make use of only those parts of the Scriptures which they require in order to prove Christological theses which have been laid down in advance in a canon already become traditional? Or, in case the first suggestion seems too hard, what noteworthy influence has modern Biblical theology had (so far as it is practised) upon the structure and content of the traditional scholastic theology?[4] Of course the theses of this scholastic theology are true and important, so far as they are dogma. Of course these theses are the concise, condensed expression of the fundamental testimonies in Scripture concerning Jesus Christ, an expression achieved by the immense labour of an irreversible spiritual and cultural history under the guidance of the Spirit of God in the Church. But is it true that the Chalcedonian dogma, and what little else has been acquired for the theology of the schools in the history of dogma, is a condensation and summary of everything, without [155] remainder, of which we hear in Scripture about Jesus the Christ and about the Son, or, again, of what we might hear if only we were to speak once more of what has still not entered into scholastic theology? Anyone who answers this question in the affirmative would deny that the Scriptures are the inexhaustible source of truth about Christ.[5] But is this conviction noticeable as an active force and a holy disquiet in the ordinary practice of Christology today? For example, let us take L. de Grandmaison's undoubtedly great work on Christ; after all its minute historical investigations, does it not, looked at theologically, simply arrive once again at the scholastic position in Christology? Is this to be explained merely by the fact that it has an apologetic end in view and not an immediately theological one?

Let no one say that nothing more is really possible in this field any longer. Something is possible, because something must be possible, if it is a matter of the inexhaustible riches of God's presence with us and if we honestly admit that we often find traditional Christology difficult to understand (we shall return to this point later) and so have questions to put to its source, the Scriptures.

For example, let us take so central an assertion of the Scriptures as the statement that Jesus is the Messias and as such has become Lord in the course of his life, death and resurrection.[6] Is it agreed that this assertion has simply been made obsolete by the doctrine of metaphysical Sonship, as we recognize it and express it in the Chalcedonian declaration, and that its only real interest for us now is historical, as a first formulation, important merely because Jesus

[2] An expression reminiscent of Kant, Dilthey, Heidegger. – Tr.
[3] Pius XII, Litterae Encyclicae 'Humani Generis' (12 August 1950), AAS XLII (1950), pp. 568-9; Denz 3014.
[4] 'Traditional' here refers to the actual practice of recent centuries, especially since the Enlightenment and the (fruitful and perilous) restoration of scholastic theology after the theology of the Enlightenment.
[5] 'Humani Generis', AAS, p. 568; Denz 3014.
[6] This is true of the Synoptics and also – though in different words – of St Paul.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

found it useful for the Jews? Is the Christology of the Acts of the Apostles, which begins from below, with the human experience of Jesus[7], merely primitive? Or has it something special to say to us which classical Christology does not say with the same clarity? Is there nothing more to say about the historical self-consummation of the Lord after we have said: meruit glorificationem corporis sui (and yet this is by no means peculiar to him)? Is Phil 2, for instance, really covered by this? It does indeed follow from the Incarnation of the Word of God through Mary (in the Chalcedonian sense) that he is the 'Mediator' [156] between us and God, provided, of course, that the real initiative, in some true sense, of the man Jesus with regard to God is given its genuine (anti-monothelite) meaning, and Christ is not made into a mere 'manifestation' of God himself and ultimately of him alone, such that the 'appearance' has no independent validity at all with respect to the one who appears. Such a 'Mediator' would be one in name alone. A Christology which fundamentally failed to see this would end by becoming a mythology.[8] But the fact that we have to add this proviso, in order to draw out the full sense of the concept of the mediator and thus (?) of the Messias from the theology of the Incarnation as it is currently taught in the schools, shows that the Bible can contribute something to this classical theology. In particular, if the human 'nature' of the doctrine of Two Natures[9] is seen merely [157] in the customary sense of a pure 'instrument', the possessor of this instrument can no longer be thought of as Mediator. He would simply be Mediator to himself. Any attempt to deal with the question by discussing it in terms of two 'moral subjects' would still only provide a verbal solution, because a 'nature' conceived of in this way could not provide any foundation for a second moral subject – in relation to God, [7] Ac 2:21-36; 3:12-26; 4:8-12.27; 5:29-32; 7:56; 9:22; 10:34-43; 13:28-41; 17:31-18:28.

[8] Thus mythology in this connexion could be defined as follows: The representation of a god's becoming man is mythological, when the 'human' element is merely the clothing, the livery, of which the god makes use in order to draw attention to his presence here with us, while it is not the case that the human element acquires its supreme initiative and control over its own actions by the very fact of being assumed by God. Looked at from this point of view a single basic conception runs through the Christian heresies from Apollinarism to Monothelitism, sustained by the same basic mythical feeling. The persistence of this idea even in theoretical formulations ought to make us realize that although it may have given up announcing itself in such a theoretical fashion today, the idea probably still lives on in the picture which countless Christians have of the 'Incarnation', whether they give it their faith – or reject it.

[9] It is not the Council's doctrine of Two Natures that is in view here, but a 'customary' curtailed form of this doctrine. We have not the slightest intention of suggesting that the Council should be blamed for this curtailed form or indeed that it represents the Council's teaching. What we have in mind is that this reduction of the Mediator to a mean term between God and man does exist in the common mind, when nature is seen as a mere instrument of the person, and consequently has no significance for a divine Person. The actual existence of such a reduction is not disposed of by the fact that it cannot find conceptual expression within orthodox Christianity in the form of obstinate error (and so is not even easy to grasp conceptually), nor by the fact that it is rejected by other doctrines which are maintained explicitly (Redemption as satisfaction). To establish this point is not to deny that the teaching of the Council, when it is taken in its full, historically ascertainable sense, was concerned to use the doctrine of the Two Natures to elucidate Christ's genuine, human role as Mediator. In the period just before Chalcedon, the recognition of a twofold physis in Christ certainly made it possible to locate the decisive mediatorial act, as against Apollinarism, within the reality of this world, in the very human nature of Christ. Although there are many who refuse to accept this view, there is a good deal to show that Athanasius located the act of redemption in the Logos as Logos; Apollinaris elevated this into a principle, by deducing the absolute hegemony of the Logos from his concept of physis. If nevertheless – in spite of Cyril's mia-physis formula – the Two-Natures formula was finally successful, all it was intended to emphasize was the fact that Christ's humanity was a φυ/σιφ, i.e. an αυ)τοκι/νητον, and so that the intrinsically redemptive act was an act of genuinely human freedom. This formed the basis of a genuine soteriology over against the over-emphasized Logos-sarx schema. Clearly it was the Mediator concept which was involved here. Once all this has not only been 'granted' but also clearly and explicitly maintained, it is surely permissible to proceed to a distinction between the full sense of the Chalcedonian formula, as this sensus plenus emerges according to the evidence of the history of dogma from the mind of the Council, and the perfectly true but curtailed version of the formula, as this can be drawn from the concepts of the formula alone when these are interpreted in conformity with the watered-down version of the schools. What we shall go on to say applies to this latter version alone.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

what is more – in that everything pertaining to a subject in this moral subject (= human nature) would be precisely the Logos himself; with respect to whom the Mediator is supposed to mediate. But is it possible today to keep sharply before our minds Jesus' true initiative in his human history with respect to God and before God and consequently its immediate empirical subject (in distinction from the metaphysical Person), by using only the word 'nature', and that in sharp distinction from the divine Person? Or is it not true that the Redemption thereby becomes for all practical purposes simply God's act among us, and no longer the act of the Messianic Mediator between us and God? And is it not true that the almost unavoidable consequence of all this is a conception, which undoubtedly dominates the popular mind (without of course reaching the stage of consciously formulated heresy), and which could be put rather as follows: 'When our Lord (= God) walked on earth with his disciples, still humble and unrecognized . . . '?

Now it may and indeed must of course be said that the doctrine of [158] the unconfused and unchanged real human nature implies, as the struggle against monothelitism after the rejection of monophysitism shows, that the 'human nature' of the Logos possesses a genuine, spontaneous, free, spiritual, active centre, a human selfconsciousness, which as creaturely faces the eternal Word in a genuinely human attitude of adoration, obedience, a most radical sense of creaturehood. Indeed it is emphatically maintained that this sphere of consciousness proper to a subject, a sphere enclosed in itself in creaturely fashion by reason of the gulf that distinguishes and separates God from the creature, only knows and only could know of its hypostatic union with the Logos in virtue of an objective communication. This communication is said to depend on the visio beatifica of this human consciousness, and cannot be a datum of Jesus' human selfconsciousness – if by selfconsciousness is understood the simple being-present-to-itself of an independent entity[10] (in the identity of the act and object of knowledge). Thus by maintaining the genuineness of Christ's humanity, room is left within his life for achievement, and the possibility of a real Mediatorship and thus – if you will – of a real Messiah-ship is preserved.

Let us first set aside the question whether this account of the matter, which Paul Galtier is trying to urge on theologians today as the unmistakable voice of Tradition, is in itself free from objection. Let us set aside the fact that the opposition which Galtier encountered, and the controversies which have continued since then, show that there still remain obscurities in orthodox theology, although both parties claim the support of the Chalcedonian doctrine. Our first concern here is this: is it possible from the basic Chalcedonian doctrine itself actually to evolve the account given us above in reply to the question how far Jesus can be the Mediator between us and God? Although this requirement is not strictly necessary, it seems nevertheless to be justified, because in fact the formula 'One Person and two natures' is the basic formula of Christology. If it is replied that we are quite certainly bound to take into account the fact that other truths, witnessed to in Scripture, must be added to this basic formula for a full understanding of the Lord as Mediator, although strictly speaking they are not found in this basic formula and cannot be derived from it – then the question with which we began arises implicite with even [159] more urgency. Is it in fact possible to derive from the formula 'One Person – two natures in the possession of the one Person' that characteristic relationship to God in the sphere of Jesus' human reality, a relationship apparent in Scripture and indispensable for the understanding of Christ's function as Mediator (for it makes it possible for him to act freely towards and before God)? That is to say, is it possible to recognize this relationship as contained in the formula implicite? Or is it in fact open to one to doubt this? It is well known that at the last moment it was decided to make an omission, verbally slight but theologically important, from the text of the Encyclical on Chalcedon:

[10] Das schlichte Bei-sich-sein einer Seinswirklichkeit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

instead of rejecting a doctrine which held that there were two subjects in Christ 'saltem psychologice', the Encyclical rejected the (Nestorian) doctrine of two (ontological) subjects, by omitting the phrase 'saltem psychologice'.[11] One thing at least becomes clear from this little episode in the history of the Encyclical's redaction: that there were and are theologians who cannot see that the doctrine of two natures involves a duality of even a merely psychological and relative kind between an existentially[12] independent I-centre (Ichzentrum) in the man Jesus and the Logos; indeed they believe that anything of the sort is excluded. And there are theologians who hold that something of the kind is a fact which can be demonstrated theologically and historically. But what must be granted is that the concept of person is always at least in danger of being understood in such a way that the 'independence' in view here seems to be excluded. It is not merely since the nineteenth century, with Günther's modern concept of person and Existentialist philosophy, that this has been the case. The concept of person as the ontological principle of a free[13] active centre, selfconscious, present to itself and through itself in being, is a concept which, in the sense just indicated, has always played round the edge of the most static and objective concept of person.[14] We cannot prove this here. But if it were not the case, monothelitism would [160] have been quite inconceivable; for it was not just a political device for making a concession to monophysitism, but persisted with such vigour that today it is still a widespread 'heresy' among Christians – all verbal orthodoxy notwithstanding. In the customary teaching about sin, untouched by any kind of Existentialism, a distinction is made between peccatum personale and peccatum naturae; in this terminology too we see that existential[15] ideas about the person are simultaneously at play. If these come to the fore, a connexion obtrudes itself upon the mind: where there is a single person, there is a single freedom, a single unique personal active centre, in relation to which any other reality (= nature, natures) can only be in this person the material and the instrument, the recipient of commands and the manifestation of this single, personal centre of freedom. But this is precisely not the case with Jesus. Otherwise he would only be the God who is active among us in human form, and not the true man who can be our Mediator with respect to God in genuine human freedom. It would of course be utterly false to say that the conceptual pair 'Person-nature' involves this monothelite interpretation (it would, be better and clearer to say today 'mono-existentialist conception'). But the concept of person, as it is in actual fact understood,[16] in fact [161]

[11] Cf. Pius XII, Litterae Encyclicae 'Sempiternus Rex' (8 September 1951), AAS XLIII (1951), p. 638. On the above-mentioned emendation of the text of the Encyclical, cf. P. Galtier, 'La Conscience humaine du Christ', Gregorianum XXXII (1951), p. 562, n. 68.

[12] Existential: see Introduction. – Tr.

[13] I.e. a freely responsible active centre, which merits even before God and in distinction from him, because before him.

[14] I.e. substantial unity and distinction involving incommunicability.

[15] Existentiell.

[16] We shall later have to discuss at some length why it is that such a misconception or the danger of it cannot be removed simply by terminological exactitude. Clearly it can be laid down that by 'person' we shall understand only the ultimate substantial unity and completeness of a subject which is incommunicable and whose reality as one in this sense can only be expressed by this subject itself. But as soon as the concrete person understood in this way exhibits a plurality in its real being, the question must arise as to how and in virtue of what the plurality is combined with the personal unity: what is sought is just the unique unifying centre of this plural unity, the unique point prior to the instituted plural unity; we want to make clear to ourselves in terms of its actual content what the function of this prior unity is in establishing unity in plurality, not just in terms of the communicatio idiomatum, which is only a consequence of this unity. Consequently when we are thinking, in connexion with this unity, of a person as ens rationabile, we tend to think that the function of the person which consists in establishing unity is not the actual, centralized, existential control and direction of the plural realities of the person, but rather their ontological foundation, which most clearly emerges to view in this control and direction. How little permissible it is simply to exclude this position out of hand may be seen from the defined doctrine that Christ's 'human nature', on account of the unio hypostatica, is wholly subject in its freedom to the Logos,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

insistently suggests this interpretation, and it is again and again taken unreflexively in this sense, though the interpretation is never reflexively thought out and formulated (for that would be heretical). Inevitably the question then arises: how can the whole complex of Christological dogma be formulated so as to allow the Lord to appear as Messianic Mediator and so as true Man, as soon as possible, or at any rate with sufficient clarity? As true Man, who, standing before God on our side in free human obedience, is Mediator, not only in virtue of the onto-logical union of two natures, but also through his activity, which is directed to God (as obedience to the will of the Father) and cannot be conceived of simply as God's activity in and through a human nature thought of as purely instrumental, a nature which in relation to the Logos would be, ontologically and morally, purely passive? The ordinary doctrine of two natures just by itself is quite insufficient as a ground from which to derive this insight into Christ's mediation as something which arises from the inner tendency of the doctrine. For if someone says that a human nature has a free will and that eo ipso this gives us all that is required, he overlooks the point that the question arises just here as to how freedom can belong to someone[17] with whom it is not identical, whose intrinsic core it does not constitute; why this freedom is neither subjugated to the 'person' distinct from it nor in a position to rebel against it.[18]

[162] It is easy to see from all this that only a divine Person can possess as its own a freedom really distinct from itself in such a way that this freedom does not cease to be truly free even with regard to the divine Person possessing it,[19] while it continues to qualify this very Person as its ontological subject. For it is only in the case of God that it is conceivable at all that he himself can constitute something in a state of distinction from himself. This is precisely an attribute of his divinity as such and his intrinsic creativity: to be able, by himself and through his own act as such, to constitute something in being which by the very fact of its being radically dependent (because wholly constituted in being), also acquires autonomy, independent reality and truth (precisely because it is constituted in being by the one, unique God), and all this precisely with respect to the God who constitutes it in being. God alone can make something which has validity even in his own presence. There lies the mystery of that active creation which is God's alone. Radical dependence upon him increases in direct, and not in inverse, proportion with genuine self-coherence before him. Measured against God, the creature is precisely not to be reduced unambiguously to the formula of merely negative limitation. Our problem here is only the supreme application of this basic truth concerning the Creator-creature relationship (a truth which at least historically has never been reached in and thus was essentially sinless. But once again, how little this doctrine offers us by way of an answer to the problem with which we are concerned, may be seen by putting the following question. Is it the case either that the unio hypostatica just in itself as such is the immediate real ontological ground for the realization of this sinless subjection of the humanly free spontaneity of Christ's human nature to the other will (that of the Logos)? Or is it only the mediately operative requirement in order that the Logos should effect this subjection by the use of means which elsewhere in the domain of creatures God is also capable of using as sovereign master over creaturely freedom, without thereby injuring it – indeed precisely realizing it? Or finally does the question itself in its disjunctive form show itself to be a false one, once the unio hypostatica is set quite generally in the wider context of the ontological relationship between God and the free creature?

---

[17] A person in the traditional ontological sense.

[18] There is no need to spend any time here in showing that the following approach provides no solution. Someone might say: The will is an accident of the substance of the soul (=nature), and freedom is its modality; consequently this cannot be conceived of in such a way that the question should ever arise as to how the freedom could be 'eccentric' to the person. The starting-point of this answer is sound enough in certain respects; yet, 'freedom' remains in its intrinsic ontological root supremely central to the person, and thus the question we have tried to put remains. If anyone doubts this, he should consider the fact that this modality of the second act of this accident is simply speaking master of the destiny and the decision of the whole reality of the free being, and that the free act can thus never be made 'central' enough.

[19] It is just this which is meant when Christ's merit as a man before God is spoken of.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

non-Christian philosophy). And it immediately follows once again that the purely formal (abstract) schema nature-person is inadequate. We must conceive of the relation between the Logos-Person and his human nature in just this sense, that here[20] both independence[21] and radical proximity[22] equally reach a unique and qualitatively incommensurable perfection, which nevertheless remains once [163] and for all the perfection of a relation between Creator and creature.[23] But in view of the fact that this simultaneous perfection can only be realized in a creature with regard to God, it becomes even clearer that the abstract concept of a 'person who has a nature' is not enough to allow us to infer this characteristic feature of Christ's human liberty with respect to God, a feature which is of such decisive significance for him and which characterizes him as Man and Mediator. This liberty is possible only when the person who has this free nature is either identical with this nature or is the divine Person as divine. And in this way it becomes clear how necessary it is to go beyond this 'Two-natures-one-Person' formula. In so far as this assertion (as predicate) 'one Person who possesses two natures' is made of the Logos (as subject), the subject must be introduced into the predicate, if we are to avoid the danger of saying too little and of conjuring up a – monothelite – error of interpretation. The metaphysical formulation of the truth 'This human history is the pure and absolute revelation of God himself' in terms of the formula 'This human nature is hypostatically united to the Logos', could very well be supplemented by a metaphysical formulation of the truth 'This human history, by the very fact of being God's own pure and radical revelation, is the most living of all, the most free before God from the world towards God, and thus mediatorial, because it is the history of God himself and because it is supremely creaturely and free.' But where are we to find the formula which expresses this latter truth with the same clarity as that with which the Chalcedonian formula expresses the former one?

Here we have entered upon a train of thought which it may seem profitable to pursue. Christological considerations have led the way back to the more general doctrine of God's relation to the creature and allowed Christology to appear as the clearly unique 'specifically' distinct perfection of this relation. Does this fundamental perspective not permit of being extended and built upon? In order conceptually [164] to express the mystery of Christ, classical Christology makes use of concepts of formal ontology, the content of which recurs at every level of reality, according to the distinct mode of each: nature, person, unity, substance and so on. Would it not be possible to go further, without abandoning classical Christology, and make use of the concepts in terms of which the relation of created things to God is conceived?[24] The fact that this relation reaches its absolute peak in the case of Christ

---

[20] Corresponding to the general creature-Creator relationship.
[21] Freedom of the human 'nature'.
[22] Substantial appropriation by the Logos of this human nature and its freedom.
[23] If in the Incarnation the Logos enters into relationship with a creature, then it is obvious that the ultimate formal determinations of the Creator-creature relationship must also hold in this particular relationship. Hence the question remains entirely open as to whether the special character of the Incarnation, in so far as it is distinguished from all other relationships of God to a created thing, may be derived as a special case of this general property or not. A negative reply may be given to this question without its necessarily following that what we have said would have to be or could be contested.
[24] It goes without saying that it is above all the relationship of the spiritual creature to God that we must keep in mind, and that in a special way, as we have learnt from Existentialist philosophy. For it is the spiritual creature which in a special way, as person constituted by transcendence and freedoms enters into relationship with God. We shall be speaking in what follows about 'creation' in general; but this should not be allowed to obscure the fact that it is at men above all that we must look in order to learn what the Creator-creature relationship is. It should thus appear – and this is the, point of all that follows – that Christology may be studied as self-transcending anthropology, and anthropology as deficient Christology; that Christology is the 'primitive conception' (although 'for us' in part subsequent)' of anthropology and the doctrine of creation, as Christ is the πρωτο/τοκοφ πα&σηφ κτι/σεωφ (Col 1:15).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

does not exclude such an application in advance. Such an analogical application of general concepts (and states of affairs) to a unique case occurs in classical Christology too. An attempt to carry out this suggestion would be of great importance if it were successful. The fact that the reality of Christ is intrinsically unique and cannot be derived from anything else, that it is a Mystery, does not mean that we may not regard it in a perspective in which it appears as peak and conclusion, as the mysterious goal of God's plans and activity for his creation from all eternity. Indeed this is not something new in theology. The fundamental lines of this perspective are in fact to be found in Scripture. But if this perspective is a valid one, we could try to express this inclusion of the reality of Christ in the total reality of all that is not God, not merely by stating it of him subsequently, after having spoken about Christ himself merely in the fashion of classical Christology; we could try to use this view in order to express the very essence of Christ. The advantage of this would be that the Incarnation of the Logos would no longer appear merely as something subsequent, a particular event in a world already finished (and hence in danger of seeming to be something mythological), a world into, which God suddenly introduces himself by his action and to which he [165] makes corrections as a kind of afterthought and which he consequently presupposes as already given. The Incarnation of the Logos (however much we must insist on the fact that it is itself an historical, unique Event in an essentially historical world) appears as the ontologically (not merely 'morally', an afterthought) unambiguous goal of the movement of creation as a whole, in relation to which everything prior is merely a preparation of the scene. It appears as orientated from the very first to this point in which God achieves once and for all both the greatest proximity to and distance from what is other than he (while at the same time giving it being); in that one day he objectifies himself in an image of himself as radically as possible, and is himself thereby precisely given with the utmost truth; in that he himself makes most radically his own what he has created, no longer the mere anhistorical founder of an alien history but someone whose very own history is in question. Here we must remember that the world is something in which everything is related to everything else, and that consequently anyone who makes some portion of it into his own history, takes for himself the world as a whole for his personal environment. Consequently it is not pure fantasy (though the attempt must be made with caution) to conceive of the 'evolution' of the world towards Christ, and to show how there is a gradual ascent which reaches a peak in him. Only we must reject the idea that this 'evolution' could be a striving upward of what is below by its own powers. If Col 1:15 is true, and is not attenuated in a moralistic sense; if then in Christ the world as a whole, even in its 'physical' reality, has really reached historically[25] through Christ that point in which God becomes all in all,[26] then an attempt like this cannot be false in principle. But if it is in fact possible to attempt something like this, we can make use of the general categories of the God-creature relation (distance-proximity; image-concealment; time-eternity; dependence-independence) in their radical, sharply differentiated form in order to make fundamental statements about Christ, and regard all other realities in this field of what is distinct from God as deficient modes of this primary Christological relation.

[166] The fact that classical Christology makes permanently valid statements about Christ which attribute to him an entitative determination[27], already (relatively) fixed and familiar (such as 'He is man' – so that we must already know what 'man' is) is no argument against this view. We may not say that it is illegitimate to try to take Christ as the starting-point in [25] Though in a history which is at the same time essentially spirit, freedom, 'moral'.

[26] And this must be understood in an essentially Christological sense, not as something abstractly metaphysical, 'permanently valid'; because God in Christ really became world, and so 'All' in all.
[27] Sachverhalt. This can ordinarily be rendered 'state of affairs'. The word has however a technical philosophical usage, in which it means something like 'the objective content of a proposition'. 'Entitative determination' is offered as a rough approximation. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

order to define these entitative determinations, and that consequently a 'Christian' ontology must necessarily be false in principle. For it will be clear on reflexion that our presupposition is that statements about Christ himself (even though they are intended to serve as a point of departure for the more general statements of theological ontology) are made with the help of a general doctrine of creation (and the ontology contained in it). Christology most certainly cannot and should not form an absolute point of departure for an ontology (and hence still less for an anthropology). Nevertheless the parallels in philosophical knowledge of God and the world show that a retrospective use can be made of Christology for ontological and anthropological assertions: God is known from the world, and yet we can start from God in order to say what the world is. It is neither necessary nor possible here to discuss more fully the general epistemological presuppositions of this shifting back and forth of initial and terminal points in the process of acquiring knowledge.

The only point with which we were concerned was to investigate the suggestion that other categories than those of classical Christology might be used to make the basic, initial statement of what Christ really is, categories, moreover, taken from a truly theological doctrine of creation. If such were the case, even the bare appearance that what was offered in orthodox Christology was an anthropomorphic myth, might perhaps be more easily avoided from the start.

A further question, to which classical Christology has given no very clear or far-reaching answer, is contained implicite in this question of a possible task for the future. The static categories of formal ontology employed by this Christology do not locate Christ in saving history in the narrower sense (or better: they do not locate the history with respect to him as goal and origin). The question suggests itself whether there might not be a formula for saving history as God's [167] progressive taking possession of the world in history, as the manifestation, ever clearer and more hidden at once, of God in the world as his quasi-sacramental mysterium. The Christ would appear as the summit of this history and Christology as its sharpest formulation, just as inversely saving history would appear as the prelude to and the extension of Christ's own history. Perhaps the ancients had a better idea of all this than we usually have today, with our still very pale and vague idea of the time before Christ as the preparation for the fullness of times. The old speculation about the Logos, which ascribed to him an activity and history in creation 'before Christ but Christ-like' distinct from the invisible Father, would be well worth rethinking, after being purified of its subordinationist elements. It is still by no means established that the extraction of this waste matter would inevitably lead to the ruin of these early speculations. The Logos did not merely become (statically) man in Christ; he assumed a human history. But this is part of an entire history of the world and of humanity before and after it, and, what is more, the fullness of that history and its end. But if we take at all seriously the unity of this history as centred upon Christ, it follows that Christ has always been involved in the whole of history as its prospective entelechy. We have then to ask how to conceive of history so that this result should follow from it. But if we do think of it in this way, it should then be possible, inversely, to learn from it who the Christ is to whom it is orientated and whom it has brought forth from its womb. What do we mean by Time, History, the Evolution of Humanity, if the Christ is to be the fullness of this time? Can all this be ascribed to Christ merely as an afterthought after he has been expressed in terms of the Chalcedonian formula? Or can it also be stated from the starting-point of a theology of history itself with such directness that the Chalcedonian formula in its abstract formality may rather be derived from this? Is it not possible so to conceive of Time and History theologically (not merely in terms of the philosophy of history) that one has conceptually stated the Christ of Chalcedon when one has said of him that he is the fullness of times, who as their Head definitively comprehends and recapitulates the aions and brings them to their end? We must not nurse the tacit yet active

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

prejudice that conceptual exactitude and compressed formulas can only be found in those concepts which the Fathers and the scholastics worked out from Greek philosophy with their eye upon – conversio ad phantasmata – individual things of a physical and static kind and their [168] individual processes of change. Anyone who does not share this prejudice, anyone who is convinced that the conceptual apparatus of scientific theology can be enlarged beyond the bounds of the traditional pattern, will not immediately assume that there is no prospect of carrying out the task which has just been proposed.

A Christology which derives from Biblical theology might set us a further task. If anyone were to attempt to discover the Biblical foundation of scholastic Christology, he would reach the conclusion, which does not seem false or unjust, that it contrives to get along with handful of texts from the Bible. Its predetermined goal is the dogma of Ephesus and Chalcedon and nothing more. The only texts from Scripture, whether they are sayings of Christ himself or appear in the teaching of the Apostles, in which it is interested are those which can be translated as directly as possible into the terms of classical metaphysical Christology. The method is a legitimate one; but it cannot cover the whole ground. A whole body of Christological statements remains unused in this way, statements which describe Jesus' relationship to the Father (God) in the categories proper to conscious experience (existentially)[28]: Jesus as the only one to know the Father, Jesus who brings tidings of him, does his will at all times, is always heard by him and so on. The question, then, is whether it is possible on this basis to construct a Christology in terms of Christ's consciousness. We shall not attempt to offer a complete solution to this question here; but we may make some remarks about its meaning and significance.

When it is said of a spiritual substance that it is 'simple', what we have here is an ontic statement (as we shall call it). When we say that it is capable of a reditio completa in se[29], we are making a statement which belongs to the metaphysics of knowledge: an onto-logical statement, or one which belongs to the philosophy of Existence.[30] We need not delay here to explain the connexion between these two statements [169] in re: they correspond to each other; the same asserted entitative determination is explained on the one hand by a characteristic feature of selfconsciousness (and thus by a concept applicable to a field in which the only entities are spiritual ones), and on the other by a metaphysical concept[31] which can be verified positively or negatively in every entity. Anyone who has grasped the metaphysical meaning of the scholastic axiom 'ens et verum convertuntur', 'ens est intelligibile et intelligens, in quantum est ens actu', will know that in principle at least, every ontic statement (whether positive or negative) is capable of being translated into an ontological one, however difficult or impossible this may often be 'quoad nos'. The higher an entity (in the widest sense of this word, including then entitative determinations and so on) in its grade of being, compactness of being, 'actuality', the more intelligible it is and present to itself (bei sich selbst). Clearly this axiom of scholastic metaphysics would require closer analysis if it is to be applied correctly in particular cases. Nevertheless we may say that the fact that Christ's humanity is substantially united to the Logos, in so far as this is a determination ('act') of the human nature itself, cannot be simply 'subconscious'. For as something ontically higher, this determination is something real which cannot be simply unconscious at least in the case

[28] Existentiell.
[29] This phrase, deriving from the Liber de Causis and thus ultimately from Proclus, is made considerable use of by St Thomas in order to analyse the ontological status of beings capable of self-knowledge. See, for example, Ia. 14,2 ad 1, where St Thomas quotes the proposition of the De Causis, 'Omnis sciens qui scit suam essentiam, est rediens ad essentiam suam reditione completa', and concludes that since to subsist in himself is proper to God above all, therefore he above all returns upon himself and knows himself. – Tr.
[30] Existential-philosophische.
[31] Seinsbegriff ('Concept of being').

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

where its subject has attained that grade of actuality in being which involves a presence to itself (Bei-sich-selbst-sein) of this entity. At least in the case where this presupposition is satisfied, it is metaphysically impossible that this actuality of the subject should be simply unconscious, when we remember that this actuality is entitatively higher in comparison with the level of actuality proper to the subject, and that this subject is present to itself; it is impossible that the immediate subject of the human presence-to-itself should not also be present to itself precisely in so far as it is wholly and substantially made over to the Logos. Here we must be careful to note that this 'presence to itself' is not to be confused with a 'knowledge of an object'. Presence-to-itself is the inner being-illuminated of actual being for itself; more precisely, for the subject which possesses this being in its own self. From this it follows that it is opposed to the true teaching of the scholastic metaphysics of knowledge to say that Christ's human soul knows of the unio hypostatica only in the way in which an object is known (and so through the 'visio immediata' as in [170] the vision of an object). Inasmuch as the unio hypostatica implies or involves an entitative determination, namely the being-united (Vereintsein) of the human reality with the Logos, as an ontological determination of this human reality, Christ's human soul is 'with the Logos'[32] in an immediately ontic and conscious way. The 'visio immediata'[33] is (if we may be allowed to make our point in this way for the sake of clarity) the consequence and not the presupposition of the conscious being-with-the-Logos of Christ's soul. It is not (in the last resort) a donum, conferred as a moral 'title' on the human soul on account of its being united hypostatically to the Logos, for reasons of convenientia or decentia; it is the hypostatic union itself, in so far as this is necessarily an 'intelligibile actu' in the intelligens actu of Christ's human soul. Once again: in the measure and manner in which the unio hypostatica is (or includes) a real ontological determination of the human nature, and indeed its ontologically highest determination; further, in the measure in which this human nature is by itself 'present to itself': the union must also be a datum of the selfconsciousness of this human nature of its very self, and cannot simply be part of the content of its object-knowledge given 'from without'. The Chalcedonian α)συγξυ/τωφ must not be taken in a sense which would result in the denial in fact of a union between the Logos and his human nature which was still being affirmed verbally.[34] But this would be the case if neither on [171] the side of the Logos (because he is immutable) nor on the side of the human nature there were present a real ontological

[32] Beim Logos. This being with is at a level of being which necessarily involves conscious presence (bei sich sein). For the phrase bei sich sein ('being with oneself') compare Marcel's être chez soi. – Tr.

[33] We prefer to say 'visio immediata' because this phrase expresses with greater exactitude and caution than 'visio beata' the 'theologically certain' content of the doctrine concerned here, in that the 'immediacy' of the possession of God follows from the considerations just proposed, while the 'beatitude' of this vision in Christ need not be experienced so nearly and immediately as something necessarily always 'beatifying'; after all, is it not conceivable that the vision may be undergone as a 'consuming fire' in certain situations proper to a 'viator'?

[34] All 'unconfused' says is that the same One is truly God and truly man and not some third thing in between. It does not however deny the unity, the human nature's state of having given itself away (das Sich-selbst-weg-gegeben-sein) to the Logos. It is precisely the task of theology (one which is set by the Chalcedonian formula but has not yet been performed) to throw light on (which does not mean 'to dissolve the mystery of') why and how this thing, which has suspended itself in this way, not only remains what it was, but in the most radical sense, unsurpassably and definitively ratified, becomes what it is: a human reality. But this only becomes possible once it has been shown how in the essence of man this tendency to become self-suspended upon the absolute God (in the ontological, not just the moral sense) belongs to his most basic constitution. Thus the highest actuation (unobliged, only once and for all realized in event) of this obediential potency (and this is no purely negative determination, no purely formal non-repugnance) makes the self-suspended thing all the more man in the most radical sense, precisely unites it thus with the Logos. And it needs to be shown too how this self-suspension can be a datum of man's selfconsciousness, because it belongs to his selfconsciousness to have, ontically and existentially, a disponibility open to God's disposal and the absolute mystery, that disponibility towards becoming self-suspended which is supremely realized and brought to consciousness in the unio hypostatica.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

determination other than that which would exist even if there were no unity. But if such a determination does exist on the side of the human nature, really and truly determining it, then it will also be a datum of the presence to itself of this nature in consequence of its being what it is (des Von-sich her – bei-sich-seins dieser Natur).[35] It is not our concern here to see how this may be harmonized with the data of our a posteriori empirical knowledge of the 'inner life' of Jesus and his psychology. The task is not an impossible one. In fact – given careful thought – it is considerably simpler than when traits, apparently postulated quite arbitrarily, are ascribed to Christ's inner life on the basis of argumentation ex convenientia, ex decentia. It only seems difficult to harmonize these traits with what we are told by Scripture about Christ's thinking and willing because these postulated 'traits' and 'endowments' are thought of as existing in the dimension of Jesus' everyday consciousness, on the surface of his awareness of objects. But our Lord's self-consciousness, which we have here inferred metaphysically from the unio hypostatica, is – in its source and primarily at least – a given quantity which must be thought of as being situated in that substantial depth of Christ's created mind which becomes aware of itself in the act of knowledge, pointing ontically beyond itself to that with which it is united, the Logos.

These are only brief indications, and we have no intention of taking [172] up the problem in its own right. All we wish to suggest is that a, Christology using categories appropriate to the description of consciousness need not be false a priori or impossible. If there is an ontic, Christology, there can also be an existential[36] one (or however one may wish to describe statements about the way in which a spiritual. being is present to itself). Thus we may confidently ask whether an absolutely exact understanding of our Lord's statements about his 'spiritual' relationship to God (the Father) could not lead to statements which would be equivalent, as ontological (existential) statements, to those of an ontic Christology. The fact that this existential[37] relationship of Christ as man to God is not immediately available in our own experience, thus where our concepts have their origin, does not absolutely forbid our making such statements. For the ontic relationship of his human nature is not immediately available to us either, and yet it can be stated in an analogical, indirect and asymptotic way. Otherwise there would be no Christology at all which could say something about what Christ really is. It is true that there have been attempts in this direction in modern Protestantism which, owing to hostility to the metaphysics in the 'Greek' theology of the Fathers and Scholasticism and the use of philosophically inadequate instruments, have led to heresy, because they reduce the mystery of Christ to the level of our own religious experience and our own relationship to God; but this is still no proof that such attempts are impossible and false a priori. Suppose someone says[38]: 'Jesus is the man whose life is one of absolutely unique self-surrender to God.' He may very well have stated the truth about the very depths of what Christ really is, provided that he has understood (a) that this self-abandonment pre-supposes a communication of God to the man; (b) that an absolute self-surrender implies an absolute communication of God to the man, one which makes what is produced by it into the reality of the producer himself; and (c) that such an existential statement does not signify something 'mental', a fiction, but is in the most radical way a statement about being. It may be objected that a Christological statement like [173] this, bearing on Christ's mind, either remains outside the limits of Christological dogma and its ontic formulation (and thus is [35] This is not the place to show how the approach outlined here – very briefly, of course – bears upon the controversy between P. Galtier and P. Parente.

[36] Existentielle.
[37] Existential
[38] This example is not meant to anticipate the successful performance of an undertaking which has here only been postulated. It is only intended to illustrate, in a case which is clearly highly problematic and in need of cautious treatment, what the task proposed would in general involve.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

heretical), or must appeal to ontic formulations in order to characterize the uniqueness and specific otherness of this relationship to God in distinction from any religious experience of our own or of the prophets. The second alternative[39] may be granted, though it does not follow from this that such existential statements are superfluous. It is true that these statements (so far as we possess concepts for them) may perhaps[40] not be capable, without the help of formal ontic concepts, of distinguishing precisely enough from other relationships a conscious existential relationship to God which is not available to our immediate experience. Yet they are extremely useful in filling out the formal emptiness of a purely ontic Christological statement, which would otherwise be in danger of being filled out in some other way, namely by interpretations of Christological formulas which are not indeed formulated explicitly, but which only too easily crystallize round the formulas without being noticed; these interpretations then make Christ out to be nothing but God clothed in a human form. If this danger is really avoided by asserting a conscious relationship of the man Jesus with respect to God, and by asserting it in such a way that the assertion of the distinctively unique character of this relationship is eo ipso an implicit or explicit assertion of the unio hypostatica; then the Scriptural accounts of Jesus' conscious dispositions to the Father would really be translated into theological Christology. We need only consider the following two statements to see this.

a. 'The Logos, who possesses in identity the absolute divine being, assumes a human nature as his own and thus becomes man while remaining himself.' b. 'This man – who, as we have said, is God – can pray, adore, be obedient, feel in a creaturely way to the point of abandonment by God, can weep, receive the wonderful gift of "being heard", experience the claims of God's will upon him as something authoritative and alien,' and so on. Does the second statement always come immediately to mind as soon as the first, which is a formula of faith and, it goes without saying, a true one, is uttered? Or do we know all this, but in a different compartment of our minds, [174] as it were, so that we have to 'switch over' from the first formula, almost entirely forgetting it, in order to make real to our minds what is also witnessed to by Scripture and what we find so difficult to think 'about God'? How would it be if we thought and spoke about the second, the human side, in such a way that it simply remained clear that all this was only possible in a man, and it became clear that this is only conceivable as a human happening if it is wholly the Happening of God himself, in all truth and in the most radical way?

Here we shall cease to pursue our investigations into Biblical theology, or more accurately, the transcendental hermeneutics for a Biblical Christology. We shall try to investigate the Chalcedonian formula itself, and make clearer to ourselves the problems it sets us. The formula speaks of two natures: it puts them clearly before our eyes in the characters proper to each. For we have some knowledge of what a man is, and our experience in this matter grows daily. And so we can make a fair estimate of what is really involved in being a man. What God is we only know by going beyond any information we may possess, in a docta ignorantia. But in this very way the Being whom we recognize as unknown is set apart from human nature. And now the Chalcedonian formula bids us conceive of the unconfused unity of the 'natures'. Isn't that hard? Of course we have at least a vague idea of what unity is. Someone may even like to call it a clear idea, and say that the apparent vagueness is not an indistinctness but is merely due to the formal generality and abstract emptiness of the concept. But that is just the point: here is the supreme particularity, the incomprehensibly [39] As something not wholly avoidable 'quoad nos'.

[40] This question, which would lead us into general considerations belonging to the metaphysics of knowledge, cannot be treated of here, and must be allowed to remain open.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

profound, unique Mysterium, which decides my destiny and that of the world, on which absolutely everything in heaven and on earth depends because it declares God's own destiny and takes up into this the destiny of the world; and I am supposed to see this mystery expressed in a concept which is one of the most general concepts of formal ontology, like that of entity, something which is itself always one thing and thus gives rise to the concept of unity from this emptiest of all abstractions. One should suffer the heavy burden of obscurity before running up with an answer. And please let no one say just that the concept of unity is indeed highly formal and abstract, but that in this case it acquires density and fullness from what is united. No doubt this is true in a certain respect: as the concurrence of two things, a [175] unity consists of what is united.[41] But this is precisely on the assumption that something is known of the distinctive character of the concurrence which unites what is to be made one. Now it could be said here (as was done earlier) that what is being spoken of is not just any unity of divine and human reality in Christ. What faith really makes profession of is a substantial, lasting, indissoluble, hypostatic unity, the belonging of the two natures to one and the same Person as its very own in virtue of its being the selfsame.[42] So this unity is not so empty, it does not allow the united natures to stand 'isolated' before the spiritual eye of faith, as though the duality were clearly given while the unity is as it were unverifiably situated on the side turned away from the eye of faith. The unity reaches the highest point of clarity for our understanding in the fact that, precisely because it is hypostatic, we must and can state of one and the same Person both what is divine and what is human, because precisely both are really and truly proper to one and the same Person. All this is true, and belongs to the essential core of meaning of the mysterium which we are toiling to understand. But does it say everything which can be said towards an understanding of the unity in the twofold reality of Christ? We do not propose to show that this is open to doubt by pointing to the old controversies between Catholic theologians which have once again been revived today. This would be too long a way of clarifying the question which still remains. Let us put the question in a different way; let us start from a few of the usual notions of scholastic Christology, which we shall presuppose. God the Word of the Father, so we are told, 'changes' in no way when he assumes the human nature as his own. The change, the novelty, is entirely on the side of the human nature. We have no desire at all to make the usual objection that in spite of this proposition it must remain simply true that it was the Word of God himself who became man; nor do we wish to inquire how this divine truth can remain valid if the former proposition, [176] deriving from human metaphysics, is soundly based.[43] On the contrary, the immutability of the Word in the Incarnation will be our presupposition. Thus as far as the Word itself is concerned, nothing is held to have happened, nothing emerged which has not always been there. It is purely on this side of the abyss between God

[41] This sentence illustrates the wider sense of the German Einheit, which means 'union' as well as 'unity'. Fr Rahner rarely uses the ordinary German phrase for 'hypostatic union', which is hypostatische Vereinigung: instead he either uses the Latin unio hypostatica, or speaks of the hypostatische Einheit. The English reader should bear in mind this wider sense of the word Einheit when he finds the phrase 'hypostatic unity' in the text. – Tr.

[42] Die Angeeignetheit der beiden Naturen durch die Selbigkeit der einen und selben Person.

[43] This metaphysics would need rethinking; and that would naturally lead to the problem, in what sense God does not alter when he creates the world. Here it would be necessary to say that he does not in himself become other to himself when he himself becomes other to the world as what is other than he and derived from him, and vice versa. This same formula would have to be applied in Christology. In fact the whole of Christology could be seen as the unique and most radical realization of this basic relationship of God to what is other than himself, measured by which all else in creation would be only a deficient mode, fading away into indistinctness; it would be the sharpest realization of this basic relationship, which lies in the self-alienation of the God who remains with himself, and thereby radically unchanged. However we have already alluded to this connexion between Christology and the doctrine of creation above.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and the creature that the new, emergent Event takes place.[44] Thus what we have to learn here is what happened when the Word became flesh. This flesh, this human reality, does not belong to itself then, in that it came into being as united to the Logos. But what does it mean to say, 'It does not belong to itself', what does it mean – we keep falling back on the same formulas of the Tradition, a sign that we don't really understand them – what does it mean to say, 'This human reality is united to the Word of God'? The reality can be predicated of him, someone may answer; what takes place here in this world in his flesh is most personally his own affair, someone may explain. That is all very well, one might reply, almost in despair; but He is not a man as I am a man. For I am a man in such a way that the I, the person itself, becomes human through my human-being; this is its own lot, it does not itself remain untouched. And that is just what one cannot say about the Logos of God, according to just this doctrine of faith. Nor is that all; according to the theology current in our schools, this humanity of the Logos is, without injury to him, not only created by the one God (not by the Logos alone); but every influence upon it [177] which it undergoes, either because it is a creaturely 'human reality or because it is precisely the humanity of the Logos, is the object of the operation of the whole Trinity as a single efficient cause ad extra, just because it belongs to the dimension of what is created from nothing. Thus all that this humanity possesses (in the highest measure, of course) in the way of tangible, expressible reality, is what can be given to any man: grace, knowledge, virtue, the visio beatifica. From this point of view again, the unique distinguishing feature which belongs just to it and to nothing else, is simply the formal unity which gives it the reality of the Logos without affecting the Logos itself. An example will show us what this means. How many sorrowful souls have been comforted and have seen through their tears the everlasting stars of love and peace because in their faith they knew, 'He, the eternal meaning of the world, the Word, has wept with me, He too has drunk of the chalice!' How many have died 'piously in the Lord' with the thought that this common and general death must mean something just because the Uncommon, the uniquely important, the absolutely Indiscutable, the incommensurable Measure, the coherent Meaning at the heart of being, because He – really He himself – died! 'One of the most holy Trinity has suffered', the Scythian monks used to say, with that brutality of faith which takes not only death but its hidden divinity with the same seriousness, so that hundreds of years after Ephesus and Chalcedon we are still startled by it, though it is perfectly obvious that we are bound to speak like this and that the whole truth, the single unique truth of Christianity, is contained in it. But – the same orthodox faith may now say – how do you understand this saying? Be careful not to take it too literally! God died, certainly. But he did so in precisely the same reality whose hopeless tears and death you believe are redeemed when you say, 'He wept too, he died'. But so doing he only made just another human reality weep and die, and thus himself remains the Holy One, serenely exalted above death, as he always has been, is, and will be. He wept only in the flesh, died in the flesh. When what is to be redeemed happens to the Redeemer, then it is itself redeemed. But does it really happen to him, when he remains untouched by the lot of what is to be redeemed? 'Non horruisti virginis uterum', we sing to him! As orthodox Chalcedonian theologians, are we not bound to say: 'You could not and need not ever have dreaded it, because it left you untouched in your real being; and why should your humanity have dreaded it, if it began like everyone [178] else's in your mother's womb?' Or where is your kenosis, which the Apostle adoringly celebrates, if you remained in plenitude, and the emptiness which we have been from the first and which you assumed, need not itself first be emptied but has never known anything but itself – emptiness, tears, death, the whole misery [44] But what takes place on this side of the α)συγχυ/τοφ is precisely and exactly the history of God himself! Primarily at least in the case of Christ. So something of the sort is possible. Anyone who suspected that we were practising Hegelian and not scholastic metaphysics in the preceding note might well reflect on this point.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of man? Are we ever to escape from this hopeless dialectic? When we say, 'He has remained eternally the same, untouched, immutable, glorious', we say it not only under the tyranny of a rigid metaphysics of infinity, about some pure, unspotted, uninterrupted Being; we say it because we need someone who is not as we are, so that we may be redeemed in that which we are. But if that is why we say it, as soon as we say it the door beyond which we who thirst for redemption sit, seems finally to shut, and there the matter seems to end: he is in heaven and we on earth, he is not where we are, and we are not where he is. Suppose we say: he came to us; he too wept; he too died; he too is flesh; he too is the emptiness, the infinity of which is immeasurable hollowness – then the Redeemer seems to be with us, but precisely a captive with us, one who shares our fate. But what good does it do us, if he too is truly – just what we are? Yet suppose we say: the finite is good: it is by no means one pole of a tragic opposition, from which we have to be redeemed; that which makes redemption necessary is merely 'accidental' to the finite, something from which the finite must be cleansed; the finite has always been finite and yet always as a simple matter of course capax infiniti – what need is there then of the Lord, of the God who became flesh? Is the Redemption anything more than a small repair job to something which was good and basically has always remained good? Has he who became man still an eternal function, if it is the prior goodness of the world which supports him and not he who really gives it its foundation and completion? Of course the world is good; obviously there could be a world which would be good and so possible, even if He had not come who stands free in relation to a world already in existence and so has freely come. Of course the stock of meaning and goodness cannot be just consumed without remainder by darkness, death, guilt and damnation. But it is wrong from the start to divide up the meaning and goodness of the world and its need of redemption in this quantitative way. Because it is still good, it can be redeemed. But all this goodness, all this meaning, needs redemption, from the meanest atom to the highest spirit. All is to be redeemed, because as good it is capable of redemption, because [179] apart from Christ it is all lost, as a whole, with all its goodness. All. But how does this happen, when he shares the appearance and the concreteness of this lost state, when he himself becomes what is in need of redemption? He could have done this in another way? He could have saved the world even without this, and redeemed it into his freedom and infinity? Certainly: but in fact he did so by becoming himself what was in need of redemption, and in this way, this way alone, must take place that one Redemption which really exists and is the only one we know. And that is what is so difficult to understand, because it seems in fact not have helped us at all, both when we take seriously the proposition that he became flesh, and when we take seriously the proposition that by becoming flesh he remained immutable and intact. The dilemma becomes still more acute if we think of the ascended Lord. He must be present in heaven as the God-man, we reflect, in the plenitude of his redemptive function, in its complete actuality. As Son of Man in his eternity, can he be more than – let no one take offence at our boldness – more than the conservation of an instrument of past times, a meaningless instrument long since antiquated, fit only for a museum? No wonder textbook theology has nothing to say about Christ in the tractate de Novissimis! Thus the dilemma becomes more acute: God would be the Blessed One even without this humanity, and the humanity has strictly nothing more to do than to enjoy a visio beatifica, which could also be present in someone who was mere man. The Christ is split into two possibilities, held together only by the formal and empty assertion of their hypostatic unity.

We may put the whole question formally. What remains of the α)διαιρε/τωφ, when the α0συγξυ/τωφ is taken seriously with all its consequences, and how are we then to interpret the α0ξωρι/στοφ? Can it be analysed merely in terms of the communicatio idiomatum, and what does this mean if the actual human reality predicated of the Logos as Person does not change the Logos, and so does not make him something which he would not be without this humanity? Can the 'average Christian' only get on by allowing the α)συγξυ/τωφ to slip into the background of his consciousness in faith in favour of the α)διαιρε/τωφ, by tacitly thinking in a slightly monophysite way, to this extent at least, that the humanity becomes something merely operated and managed by the divinity, the signal put up to show that the divinity is present in the world – a world which is only concerned [180] with this divinity and where the signal is put up pretty well for our sakes alone, because we wouldn't otherwise notice the bare divinity? Must it be an inevitable feature of our everyday religious life and practice that the Chalcedonian formula should be tacitly cut short like this, so that – here we must weigh up the matter for ourselves honestly – the 'average' non-Christian feels called upon to protest in his unbelief, refusing to admit that God has become man 'like this' and thus believing that he must reject the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation as a myth?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Our discussion of the problems of the Chalcedonian formula cannot set out to offer a precise and detailed answer to the question which has been raised; we shall merely make a few brief observations. Obviously what we should have to do would be to work out a fresh concept of unity (of a substantial, hypostatic kind, clearly). This concept would not merely analyse the unity in terms of a logical predication of idiomata (however indispensable this may be), because by itself this would either only be understood 'monophysitically' in the form of a cryptogamic heresy (sit venia verbo!), as we have pointed out above; or, while the immutability of the Logos and the Chalcedonian α)συγξυ/τωφ remained clear, the emptily formal abstractions of the unity (for all its being hypostatic [45]) would take on no real fullness of meaning for us. We cannot escape from this trap by looking at the unity as the (even merely logically) subsequent unity of two things to be united, already [181] existing independently as two prior to the unity. The Logos may be regarded in this way; but as soon as the humanity is so conceived of too, the position becomes untenable. It is not enough to say that the humanity has never existed apart from the hypostatic unity in fact, that is to say temporally. Nor is it permissible to suppose that it may merely be conceived of as always combined in fact, on the grounds that its nature is the same as ours, and we certainly exist apart from the hypostatic unity and yet are 'men'.[46] The only way in which Christ's concrete humanity may be conceived of in itself as diverse from the Logos is by thinking of it in so far as it is united to the Logos. The unity with the Logos must constitute it in its diversity from him, that is, precisely as a human nature; the unity must itself be the ground of the diversity. In this way, the diverse term as such is the united[47] reality of him who as prior unity (which can thus only be God) is the ground of the diverse term, and therefore, while remaining [45] We repeat: anyone who is tempted by our speaking of a formal emptiness of the unity to maintain that on the contrary, the unity in question is a hypostatic one, and thus a perfectly 'full' and close unity, must be warned that he should consider what precisely it is that he is saying. He will then realize (supposing that he has taken the average Christology as his starting-point) that his explanation of the hypostatic unity is conceived of in terms of a communicatio idiomatum. And then he will have to ask himself what it means for the Logos to remain 'unchanged' by this unity, when any sort of history which it implies takes place on this side of the abyss between God and creature, and what is more, without confusion. He is bound to indicate what remains of the former given the latter. If he says that this is just the mystery (and that we ought not to let go of one end of the famous chain because we don't know how it is linked with the other end, which we also hold), then we must ask with all moderation whether this mystery might not permit of being formulated more clearly, so as to come before the eye of faith as a whole; in this way the impression would not arise that the one truth must be utterly blotted out 'quoad nos' when we turn to look at the other.

[46] It will appear from what follows that this consideration is at any rate lacking in force. Everyone who is a Thomist in Christology must grant this. Further, it must be borne in mind that a purely de facto unity in the strict sense would be an accidental one.

[47] Geeinte. Fr Rahner gives einen (to unite) the sense of an act by which one of the two terms of a unity is the cause of this unity. It is difficult to make the English 'to unite' bear this sense: in English it is usually some third term which unites the other two, a suggestion which would be quite unsuitable here. Einen here means simply and solely 'to one'. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'immutable' 'in himself', truly comes to be in what he constitutes as something united (geeinte) with him and diverse from him.[48] In other words, the ground by which the diverse term is constituted and the ground by which the unity with the diverse term is constituted must as such be strictly the same. But if what makes the human nature ek-sistent[49] [182] as something diverse from God, and what unites this nature with the Logos, are strictly the same, then we have a unity which (a) cannot, as uniting unity (einende Eienheit), be confused with the united unity (geeinte Einheit) (this is not permissible)[50]; (b) which unites precisely by making existent, and in this way is grasped in a fullness of content without any relapse into the empty assertion of the united unity; and finally (c) which does not make the α)συγξυ/τωφ look like a sort of external counterbalance to the unity, always threatening to dissolve it again, but shows precisely how it enters into the constitution of the united unity as an intrinsic factor, in such a way that unity and distinction become mutually conditioning and intensifying characteristics, not competing ones. Properly speaking, we should now go on first to examine the question whether this position is in harmony with the Thomist theory of the unity of Christ, and how far it is so (we shall [183] not pronounce any final judgment on this matter here); secondly, to consider how far and in what way such a position makes it necessary to go back to a more general theory of the relationship between God and his world, of which the relationship 'Logos-human nature' would appear as a special case. Unfortunately this is not possible here either. All we shall do is to offer the following brief note. It might be supposed that any attempt to connect the general relationship of God to the creation with the relationship of the Logos to his humanity would immediately come to grief owing to the fact that the creation is the work of the efficient causality of the one God, while the hypostatic union is a relationship of the Logos alone. Before this is taken as finally settling the question, it would be necessary to offer a solution to another question: is it really agreed that another divine Person could also have become man? Or could it not be that –

---

[48] It follows from this statement that the assertion of God's 'immutability', of the lack of any real relation between God and the world, is in a true sense a dialectical statement. One may and indeed must say this, without for that reason being a Hegelian. For it is true, come what may, and a dogma, that the Logos himself has become man: thus that he himself has become something that he had not always been (formaliter); and therefore that what has so become is, as just itself and of itself, God's reality. Now if this is a truth of faith, ontology must allow itself to be guided by it (as in analogous instances in the doctrine of the Trinity), must seek enlightenment from it, and grant that while God remains immutable 'in himself', he can come to be 'in the other', and that both assertions must really and truly be made of the same God as God.

[49] See Introduction.

[50] The weakness of the Christology associated with Scotus and Tiphanus is that it cannot distinguish these two concepts: it declares that the human nature and the divine nature are united in the Person of the Logos. When it is asked by what (i.e. by what uniting unity) they are united (in the united unity), the original formula is repeated, so that in fact no answer is forthcoming. If someone goes on to maintain that it is impossible to provide a further answer because it is precisely a mystery with which we are dealing here, it would be necessary to reply that this account would suffice provided that the mystery given expression in the original formula remains clear in its meaning (though not in its explanation) even when no answer is offered to the further question. But if this is not the case, i.e. if the united unity in the sense intended (a sense which, though undetected, must be there even in a mystery) does not permit of being thought unless the uniting unity comes into sight, then the docta ignorantia of Scotus and Tiphanus is simply not appropriate here – no matter how far the ancient tradition provides or fails to provide a further explicit question and answer as to the uniting unity. Someone may object that it is in fact the one hypostasis which is the uniting unity for the two natures. To this we must reply that this may well be true, so far as it is a matter of the two natures in their mutual concord. But the question here is to what extent the divine hypostasis unites the human nature to himself. When the question is formulated like this, the hypostasis, *in so far a*s it is just the static concept of ens per se et in se which is involved, is something to be united – one 'part' of the united unity, and not the uniting unity. Thus it must be asked by what (i.e. by what uniting unity) the hypostasis unites to himself the human nature. Putting the same thing in another way: unity (as a formal transcendental property of an entity) is never something which can be set up as such, but is always the result of some other state or process among entities. Thus one has neither explained nor even understood what one is saying, when one elucidates unity by – unity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

when the unity of the created with the Creator given in creation itself attains by God's free act that unique height in which an existence as distinction from the Creator is bestowed upon a creature, an existence through which the distinct term becomes absolutely and supremely God's very own – could it not then be that this God is necessarily the Logos and no one else? What theological considerations would suffice positively to exclude this view? But if they are in fact produced, the suggested objection ceases to be so obviously compelling as it seemed to be at first.

Now, if the positing of Christ's humanity in its free distinction from God itself becomes in this way the act of unification (Einigung) with the Logos, it further becomes clear why this humanity, in its concrete existence as such, is eo ipso the mysterious manifestation, the quasi-sacramental presence (Anwesenheit) of God with us. We have constantly to remind ourselves that human-being is not some absolutely terminated quantity, which, while persisting as a quite self-contained whole indifferent to all else, is combined with some other thing (in this case the Logos) by a wholly external miracle. Human being is rather a reality absolutely open upwards; a reality which reaches its highest (though indeed 'unexacted') perfection, the realization of the highest possibility of man's being, when in it the Logos himself becomes existent in the world. The fact that there is human being which is not of itself the presence of the Logos existing into the world, is no more a proof of the falsity of this view than the proposition, 'The visio beatifica is the most perfect realization of (pure) [184] human nature', can be objected to on the ground that human being' is also to be found without the visio beatifica. The fact that an ('obediential') potency is only fulfilled by a free act from above is no argument against the view that this act is the pure fulfilment of just this potency for what it is in itself. It is quite true that we first become acquainted with human being in a less significant realization, and consequently derive our concept 'man' from this (and so can look forward from our point of view to a higher actualization of this concept only by way of an empty anticipation of the range, as yet undetermined, as yet open upwards, of our transcendence as a possibility perhaps possible). But this does not mean that we are not entitled to sketch the outlines of a theological anthropology from the starting-point of Christology, now that this has been revealed to us – no doubt by using our terrestrial concepts; nor is it perverse to conceive our human selves in terms of that Man who as such is God's presence for us, existent in the world. Only someone who forgets that the essence of man (although in a specifically human way, which is to say, in, accordance with the point of departure, in terms of a point in space and time) is to be unbounded (thus in this sense, to be un-definable) can suppose that it is impossible for there to be a man, who, precisely by being man in the fullest sense (which we never attain), is God's Existence into the world. But if this is the case, we only radically understand ourselves for what we really are, when we grasp the fact that we are existential beings because God willed to be man, and thereby willed that we should be those in whom he as man can only encounter his own self by loving us. The fact that God could have had a different will for us, that he freely willed us 'so', does not necessarily mean that he has not in fact precisely willed us 'so'. This 'so' is not just something mental, external to what is willed and without significance for its real consistency; it is a genuine 'existential', a mode of our own existence, without which we can indeed grasp ourselves as question, but never as the answer which it alone gives to the question which we are.[51]

[51] Translator's note. The reader may find it helpful to bear in mind the notion of existence as 'self-realization', a 'coming to the light', and this as eminently realized in human existence. It might be said that God, as supremely actual, cannot in this sense 'exist', cannot come to be himself: the Incarnation is what allows him to 'come to the light', 'existent into the world'. In this last paragraph, I take it that Fr Rahner wishes to point out that we are existential beings (wir die sind, die existieren) because of God's will to be an existential being himself and thus to achieve self-realization in common with other beings defined by their capacity to realize themselves, in a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[185] At the beginning of this section it was said that our rough knowledge of what man is, when we used the formula of Chalcedon, was due to the fact that we daily learnt what it is to be human by experience of each other and of ourselves. The slightest of discussions of the problems of this formula has shown that the attempt to advance our understanding of what this unity (unconfused and undivided) is which makes the human nature that of the Logos itself, would also further our understanding of who man is; we see that Christology is at once beginning and end of anthropology, and that for all eternity such an anthropology is really theo-logy. For God himself has become man. The less we merely think of this humanity as something added on to God, and the more we understand it as God's very presence in the world and hence (not, all the same) see it in a true, spontaneous vitality and freedom before God, the more intelligible does the abiding mystery of our faith become, and also an expression of our very own existence.

In this third section we shall discuss in more detail, though without any attempt to treat them systematically, the problems of a modern Christology; and for this purpose we shall go beyond the immediate range of the Chalcedonian formula.

1. Would it not be possible and appropriate to look for some sort of Transcendental Deduction[52] of faith in Christ? What we have in mind is an inquiry, more explicit than is usual, as to why man is capable of faith in the Christ of Christian dogma. Someone may answer 'He is the hearer of a message which is of itself credible, a message which exhibits its credibility by means of ascertainable facts.' But this [186] would be to overlook the fact that it is 'not only the knowability of the object which must be examined, but also the distinctive nature of the subject and his specific openness with regard to just that object. If this object is something indifferent and contingent, which has incontestably always been found within the region of this subject's experience, the transcendental deduction of the subject's capacity to know with respect to this object is simply that of the meaning and extent of his knowledge in general. But just in so far as Christ is the freest and in this sense (but also only in this sense) the most 'contingent' fact in all reality, so it is true that he is also at the same time the most decisive and important, and moreover that which is the most clearly related to man (. . . propter nos homines). His subjective knowability cannot tacitly be thought of as simply subsumed under the conclusions of a general metaphysics and critique of knowledge. He is too unique for that, too mysterious and existentially significant. It cannot be objected that such a 'transcendental deduction' of Christ's knowability by man would be to prejudge the question of what is contained in Christ, who can in fact be known only by obediently listening to a message which has gone forth in history. Nor can it be objected that such a deduction would imply the necessity of the fact of Christ, for this was something freely established by God. Both these considerations are unacceptable. An a priori sketch of the 'Idea of Christ' as the correlative object of the transcendental structure of man and his knowledge, even if it came to anything purely a priori[53], could never decide the question as to where and in whom this 'Idea' is reality (and without this reality this 'Idea' is of less existential significance than any other). It is only from the message of 'fides ex auditu' that communion, a common 'presence', of love. For the meaning of the noun 'existential', see Introduction.

---

[52] In the Kantian sense. – Tr.

[53] It did not come to anything before Jesus Christ. And now it is no longer capable of coming to anything, because he exists and it would be a delusion to suppose it possible – even in a purely methodological way – to abstract from him entirely.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this question could ever be answered. If and in so far as such an abstractly formal, a priori Christology were to offer a kind of formal schema of Christ to the Christology which hears the message a posteriori, we should reflect that such an a priori Christology is wholly capable of taking shape in the illuminating light of the grace of the real Christ (one need neither reflect on this nor be able to reflect on this and yet one's thought can move within the space enclosed by Christ's grace); we should thus consider that the a priori schema can owe its existence to the real object a posteriori, [187] and thus by no means implies a mastery of it. The question whether God might not wish to show us his grace, and what is meant if he did wish to show it, the deduction of a 'desiderium naturale' of the visio beatifica, neither makes the message from without superfluous nor restricts its content a priori, although these objects belong to the same strictly supernatural order as the unio hypostatica. Anyone who understands that an a priori openness to something is far from making this 'something' a debitum in a conceptually necessary way[54], will not say that such a deduction stands or falls with the affirmation of the necessity of the Incarnation.

A deduction of this kind must aim at showing that man is at once a concretely corporeal and historical entity on earth and an absolutely transcendent one. Accordingly he looks out – and looks out in the course of his history – to see whether the supreme fulfilment (however free it may remain) of his being and his expectation is not on its way to meet him: a fulfilment in which his (otherwise so empty) concept of the Absolute is wholly fulfilled and his (otherwise so blind) gaze can 'see through' to the absolute God himself. Thus man is he who has to await God's free Epiphany in his history. Jesus Christ is this Epiphany. It can, therefore, remain a completely open question whether the content of the a posteriori dogma simply 'coincides' with the Idea of Christ, which is the correlative object of this transcendental deduction, or whether this correlative only 'corresponds' to the real Christ declared to the hearing of faith and is essentially surpassed by him, although in its own axis.

An undertaking of this sort would bean important one. By means of it a religious a priori which lives today in every man who believes in Christ would achieve reflexive self-awareness. For this religious piety can only draw its life in fact from the historical Christ (from him and from no one else, from him and not from an Idea!) because man is continually kept in movement by the existential need to possess God concretely, to 'have to' possess him. Without such a deduction, and unless it is brought home to man as something really achieved, the historical message concerning Jesus the Son of God is always in danger of being dismissed as a mere piece of mythology. A deduction [188] of this kind might also contribute to the conceptual equipment used by Christology proper.

2. A theological phenomenology of the religious attitude with regard to Christ is greatly to be desired. It cannot be denied that in the ordinary religious act of the Christian, when it is not referred precisely to the historical life of Jesus by way of meditation, Christ finds a place only as God. We see here the mysterious monophysite undercurrent in ordinary Christology and a tendency to let the creaturely be overwhelmed in face of the Absolute, as though God were to become greater and more real by the devaluation and cancellation of the creature. Another sign of this is to be observed in the fact that Christ's humanity no longer has any part to play in the theology of the visio beatifica, as this is ordinarily presented. Theology is only concerned with the One who has become man in so far as he appeared at the historical time of his life on earth as Teacher, Founder and Redeemer. There is hardly any developed doctrine

[54] This proof can only conclude if the potency, the openness, etc., were to be purely and simply meaningless without just the act which is in question and which is itself foreshadowed in the potency. But that is by no means the case with the potency in question here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of his abiding function as man; and correspondingly, the doctrine of the specific character of our abiding relationship to him as Man-for-all-eternity is extremely fragmentary. Something is said about the adoration which is due to him even as man. But no one seems to have much to say about the fact that our basic religious acts, which are continually effected through the mediation of Christ, have an 'incarnational' structure. There is hardly any mention of Christ in the tractate de Virtutibus Theologicis: the discussion moves merely in the thin atmosphere of pure theological metaphysics. Reflexion on the permanence of Christ's humanity according to Chalcedon, which alone really brings God within the reach of our acts, has not yet penetrated as far as these tractates on the theological virtues or on religio.[55] The Council of Chalcedon has still to conquer here. The anti-Arian reaction, the special character of the Latin doctrine of the Trinity and the existential undercurrent of monophysite tendency in Christology, have all delayed this victory. But this very fact, that Christ more or less vanishes for an act momentarily directing itself to God, has led to a situation for which there are other causes as well, in which the Incarnation [189] appears to be almost a transient episode in God's activity in his world and is thus unreflexively felt to be a myth unworthy of faith. In view of this situation, a theological phenomenology of an 'incarnational' piety, valid now and always, would not only have significance for the doctrine of the spiritual life; it would also be important as a means of removing the basic causes which have led to a demand for 'demythologization'.

3. The first proposal (no. 1) would further suggest that dogmatic Christology might pay a little attention to the general history of religions. There is no intention here of proposing a 'hunt for parallels' to the doctrine of the Incarnation in other religions, nor ultimately of showing that such parallels do not really exist. In the last resort the point of such a study would be to examine the history of religions from the standpoint of our knowledge of the historical Incarnation, and from this standpoint alone, the only one to offer a really illuminating interpretation of a history otherwise unintelligible in itself: and to examine this history with a view to seeing whether and how far man in fact shows himself in history for what he unquestionably is in the depth of his concrete nature: a being who in the course of his history looks out for the presence of God himself. When the early fathers kept a lookout for such an activity of the Logos, the beginnings of his Incarnation as it were, in saving history before Christ (at least in the Old Testament), they were better advised than we are, for whom God rules there simply from heaven. It may in general be allowed that the history of religions[56] as a whole only escapes the mortal danger of infecting Christians with some sort of relativism when it is integrated (as Yes or No) in the single history of the dialogue between God and the world, a dialogue which flows into the Word become flesh, and when it is not interpreted merely as the product of a purely terrestrial religiosity of rationalism and as a human perversion. If this is true, it holds good also of the history of religions in so far as they were an unconscious Yes or No to the Word of God who was to come in human flesh.

[190] 4. Would it be a delusion to suppose that the abstract formalism of Christology has also contributed to a decrease of interest in a theology of the mysteries of Christ's human life? There is still a lively theological (and not just pious) interest in the mysteries of the Life

[55] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Die ewige Bedeutung der Menschheit Jesu für unser Gottesverhältnis', Geist und Leben XXVI (1953) pp. 279-88 (which appears in vol. III of the German edition of these studies).

[56] For the first time since the patristic era, this history is becoming a reality for the West again, in the perichoresis of all cultures and historical movements which is in fact taking place today. Cf. H. de Lubac, La Rencontre du Bouddhisme et l'Occident, Paris 1952.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of Jesus in St Thomas and even in Suarez. In the ordinary textbook-Christology current today, one has to keep a pretty close lookout to find anything about Christ's Ascension, as if this was a matter primarily for theologia fundamentalis. The Passion is treated of from an exceedingly formal viewpoint in soteriology, which seems very little interested in the concreteness of the Passion on the ground that some other moral deed of Christ's would have redeemed us 'just as well' if God had so pleased. What do we hear of Christ's Circumcision, Baptism, his prayer, the Transfiguration, the Presentation in the Temple, the Mount of Olives, the abandonment by God on the Cross, the descent into the underworld, the Ascension into heaven and so on? Nothing or pretty well nothing.[57] All this is left to piety, and it is rarely that we find anything more than applications of a moral and edifying kind here. The mysteries of Christ, which precisely in their once-for-all character and indissoluble historicity form the law of once-for-all world history, are all too easily misconceived as mere illustrations and examples, as 'instances', in which general moral laws, which are just as clear even apart from Christ's life, are exemplified. Instead of a genuine theology of Christ's life, we find that the theology (not in itself unjustified) of certain abstract privileges enjoyed by Christ has forced itself into the foreground; and that this theology draws attention to certain features (in the field of knowledge, for instance, Christ's visio in the course of his life on earth, his infused knowledge and so on) which distinguish [191] him from us, and even these features it does not always postulate for reasons which are really illuminating. This development is conditioned (if not perhaps with a very high degree of self-awareness) by that purely formal understanding of the unity of Christ as united, of which we have spoken above. In a conception like this an event in the field of Christ's humanity only has 'interest' in so far as it is dignified by being adopted by Christ's person, and thus precisely not in itself; or again in so far as it possesses special features not to be found elsewhere among human beings. Once attention has been turned in these two directions, the only soteriology to be expected is of that single type which (perfectly correct in itself) we do in fact find even today. This still contains a section on certain permanent 'consectaria unionis hypostaticae', but lacks any theological consideration of the history (which is in itself theological in the highest degree) of the particular, once-for-all events of the life of Christ as man, born of a woman, subject to history, law and death. This human reality as human (not as something abstract, of course) in its 'bare' humanity can only be of theological importance if it is as such (as just this) the manifestation of God in the world, not just as something joined on in a logically subsequent way; if that is to say, it is one with the Logos in virtue of being the reality of the Logos itself and not the reality of the Logos in virtue of being 'one' (how?) with the Logos. If we are to have a true theology of the human life of Jesus (not merely a theology of the extraordinary in Jesus' life) we must recover that right view of things which does not (by 'abstracting') overlook just that which cannot be really separated from what is human in Jesus: we must learn to see that what is human in Jesus is not something human (and as such uninteresting for us in the world) and 'in addition' God's as well (and in this respect alone important, this special character however always merely hovering above the human and forming its exterior setting, as it were). On the contrary, in this view the everyday human reality of this life is [57] The Biblical exegetes proper often seem today to be intimidated by the dogmatic theologians and their true – and often presumed – office as censors. They take the utmost care to avoid going a single step beyond the letter of the text and getting down to the real theological issues involved. What really happened at the Transfiguration? What took place at the Ascension? What did eating involve for Christ after his Resurrection? What really happened when he descended into Hell? What is Mt 27:51 s. telling us about the saints who rose from the dead, and what is its theological significance? What took place when Jesus was tempted? What are we to think about his remaining behind in the Temple as a boy? How are the postulates of dogmatic theology capable of being harmonized with Jesus' wonderment, his 'ignorance' and so on? It cannot be said that the exegetes have given much sign of theological heart for these questions and others like them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God's Ek-sistence, in the sense cautiously determined above: it is human reality and so God's, and vice versa. Then it will no longer be necessary to ask the question: What is there exceptional about this life over and beyond ours as we are already familiar with it, whose heights we have already climbed and into whose depths we have already plunged, what is there about it (still strictly only as a plus-quantity) which could make it important for us too? But the question we must ask is: What does our life mean, this [192] life which we ultimately fail to understand when we examine ourselves, however familiar with it we may be, what does it mean when it is first and last the life of God? It is because we need this ultimate interpretation of our lives, one which is not to be had elsewhere, that we must study the theology of Christ's life and death. Why does this happen so seldom in current Christology?

5. Thus we have reached the point of laying down requirements for soteriology, and have indicated why and how the average textbook-Christology leads to inadequacies or omissions in this field. The gravamen of our charge may be simply formulated as follows: as far as soteriology is concerned, the average theology current in our schools today is only interested in the formal value of Christ's redemptive act, not in its concrete content, the inner structure of the redemptive process in itself. Now the account usually given of the infinite worth of Christ's act as regards satisfaction and merit, on account of the infinite dignity of the Person, is a perfectly correct one. But it would be false to suppose that this accounts for all that is essential in soteriology. Yet this is in fact what is supposed. The simplest proof of this statement is found in the fact that the satisfaction theory in soteriology not only assumes tacitly but also explicitly maintains that Christ would equally have been able to redeem us by any other moral action, provided only that God had so willed it and had accepted this action as vicarious satisfaction. The inner content of the redemptive act (i.e. the Cross, death, obedience, abandonment by God, death due to the action of sinners themselves) thus only has significance for the Redemption as such in its abstract moral quality, which as it were gives up its substratum and its matter for the value which this action acquires in virtue of the dignity of the divine Person; the precise content of the action makes no difference. Now we have no intention of denying that God would have been able to forgive us our sin in regard to any one of Christ's acts at all, and that this forgiveness would be 'Redemption', and what is more Redemption on account of a 'satisfactio condigna'. But if the matter is so regarded, essential facts and problems of a really adequate soteriology are overlooked, in that a soteriology is bound to say how we were redeemed in concrete fact. The view which we have just described supposes that it has already proved that all the concrete particulars of the redemptive act really do not belong to the cause as [193] such of the Redemption as such. But in fact all it makes clear is that an abstractum of Redemption can be achieved by means of various species of one generic redemptive cause. If it is true that the Redemption consists only in God's purpose of forgiveness, conceived of in juridical and moral terms, or is considered only under this single (formal and abstract) respect, the view we have described may be accepted as the correct one. But what reason is there for saying that this presupposition is correct? Strictly speaking, one and the same effect can only be brought about by a single cause. If the causes as such differ, they cannot have the same effect. Thus when it is said that we could have been redeemed 'in another way', one of two things may be meant. Either it is meant that these differing causes do not in fact differ as such, that they are distinguished from each other in their subject only by modalities which are simply indifferent so far as their causality as such is concerned (as two knives, for instance, which are distinguished from each other only by the colour of their handles, can really cut in 'exactly the same way'), and consequently can really bring about the same 'Redemption'. Or it is meant that these causes differ even as such; thus they do not bring into being exactly the same Redemption, even if these different Redemptions can be conceived of subsequently in a conceptual unity of an abstract, generic kind such that in this sense it is possible to say that God could have effected 'the same' Redemption through some other redemptive action of Christ's. It would be necessary to prove that the first sense of the proposition is the right one; it cannot simply be presupposed. In fact no proof can be offered. This means that when Scripture says, 'We have been redeemed by Christ's death (with all that death, and death alone, implies) and by his obedience (his concrete obedience, realized precisely in death, and capable of being realized only in death)', we must assume, until the contrary is proved, that this is what characterizes the redemptive action in so far as it is cause, and not other characteristics, fundamentally unimportant as far as its causality is concerned, as the usual version of the theory of satisfaction assumes. This is not to deny that this death in obedience, which is as such the cause of our Redemption, is precisely cause in virtue of being the death of the Logos become man and thus of participating in the infinite dignity of the Person. If the death as such is the cause of Redemption, it naturally follows that this cause has not brought about exactly the same Redemption as would have been achieved if we had been redeemed in some other way. [194] These are primarily considerations of an abstract, methodological kind. But they do point to the fact that the soundness of the moral and juridical satisfaction theory, with regard to what it says positively, does not serve as a proof that there is nothing more to be said in soteriology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There are various points at which any attempt to complete positively and give real content to the abstract formalism of the average treatment of soteriology would have to begin. (a) We could first enquire whether the various theories of the unio hypostatica have any significance for the foundations of the satisfaction theory, and what that significance might be, for the doctrine, that is, that the infinite Person endows with infinite value even the actions he performs in his human nature. It is certainly not obvious that these theories about the hypostatic union are of little importance for this soteriological doctrine. If we do not wish to defend any sort of juridical and moral Idealism or a modern theory of 'values', and if the principle 'ens (reale) et bonum convertuntur' is true, then in the last resort every 'value', every 'dignity' (just to use another word and to look at what is involved from another point of view) is a reality, a real entitative determination, and does not merely 'rest upon' such a determination. Transposing our proposition into the ontological order, then, what does it mean to say, 'The Person endows its action with a certain definite dignity'? The variety of theories concerning the unio hypostatica cannot be without importance for this question, the answer to which again is of decisive significance for the precise meaning of the proposition to be transposed. Both the inquiry as to the uniting unity, the essence of the intrinsically hypostatic function of the Logos with respect to the human nature, as well as the inquiry as to the independence of Christ's human reality given precisely by this unity, must, if they are properly conducted, be capable of giving the satisfaction theory new depth. (b) It would then be necessary to work out in greater detail a theology of death in general and of Christ's in particular. Only then would it be possible to give a really adequate answer to the question: Why is it that we have been redeemed by Christ's death (and by nothing else), and what exactly does a redemption of this kind look like, which is brought about in just this way and no other? It is no exaggeration to say that a theology on these lines is still entirely lacking in our average modern treatment. Nothing is said about it in soteriology, and pretty well nothing in the tractate de Novissimis. Death would have to be [195] seen in its indissoluble unity of action and passion.[58] Only so can it become clear that the Redemption takes place in virtue of Christ's obedience (action) and yet in virtue of his death (itself); not, however (as is generally

[58] On what follows, see the short sketch: K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie des Todes', Synopsis III (1949), pp. 87-112. (Also, by the same author, 'Zur Theologie des Todes', ZKT LXXIX (1957), pp. 1-44. – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

said in a minimizing and superficial way), in virtue of the 'Passion bringing death in its train', for then once again this Passion would as such remain outside the redemptive act and would form merely the matter 'in which' obedience is actively engaged – something in the last resort accidental and for which substitutes may be found at will. Death would have to be set forth as the connatural manifestation of alienation from God by sin (and not just as the externally inflicted 'penalty', something for which God could just as well have found some substitute) and at the same time, as the manifestation and constitutive sign of absolute obedience to God (at least when Christ dies this death or someone with him).[59] It would further have to be shown that in spite of the separation of body and soul, death does not simply withdraw man from the world and make him acosmic; rather it transposes him into a new and more comprehensive relationship to the world, freed from the limitation to a single point in space and time characteristic of his earthly existence.[60] This result (together with much else which would also have to be considered) would make it possible to achieve a better understanding of the significance of Christ's descent into hell, as something which does not merely signify a phase of his historical existence made void by what happened after. More searching questions could then be raised about the possibility of reaching a more concrete understanding of the lasting efficacity of Christ's humanity with regard to grace than is [196] allowed of in the rather thin formalism of the Thomistic teaching of the instrumental causality of Christ's humanity.[61] But it would then once more be necessary to show how all this is connected explicitly with the proposition that the humanity and the human events in the history of this humanity in Christ are the ek-sistence of God himself in the world.

In thus attempting to give a deeper meaning to ordinary soteriology, we should take account of another point of view, which could also have found a place in an earlier stage of our discussion. Scripture speaks to us in many places of Christ's σα/ρχ.[62] We ordinarily take this to be a reference to Christ's human nature or to his body. This is quite sound; but it clearly fails to exhaust the Scriptural meaning. What we involuntarily think of when we speak of Christ's humanity and his human nature is nearly always just that element in the meaning of sarx which belongs to the necessary and permanent constitution of the entities so characterized. But sarx is intended to characterize man or his corporeality precisely in so far as this possesses a quite definite character arising out of an historical development within a history of salvation and damnation. Flesh is the weak, the corruptible, consecrated to death, the dimension within which sin becomes manifest and tangible: it is man's essential reality in so far as it did in fact become flesh at the beginning, yet in free history, and so in primordial history. The Logos assumed the 'flesh of sin'. We must take this phrase seriously, and we must say what exactly 'flesh of sin' is. Only then can we understand why it is in Christ's flesh precisely that we are redeemed. Only then can we see that the Event of the Redemption has taken place precisely in that dimension of man's personal existence which is capable of being simultaneously the dimension in which his personal guilt becomes historically tangible and that in which his guilt is overcome. A really adequate soteriology cannot renounce the task of laying as its foundation a sharply defined theology of what is meant by 'flesh'. We should then see more clearly that Christ had not only to be 'like us in nature' so as to be our [59] It is not possible here to show that death has a basic nature open to further determination, such that it becomes the death of sin or the death of redemption according as it is undergone in disobedience or obedience. Nor is it possible to show here that this is why death is 'natural', indeed that this is the fact on which is based the possibility of the above-mentioned existential-ontological dialectic of death as Adam's death and Christ's death.

[60] That the soul is not in consequence of this 'everywhere' is illuminating. This would certainly imply a more extensive relationship to the world in that dimension precisely which is abandoned in virtue of death (until the Resurrection). Thus the theory indicated above has no connexion with Luther's doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's resurrected body.
[61] Cf. K. Rahner, 'Die ewige Bedeutung der Menschheit Jesu', pp. 279-88.
[62] Jn 1:14; 6:51; Rom 8:3; Eph 2:14; Col 1:22; 1 Tim 3:16; Heb. 5:7; 1 Pet 3:18; 4:1; 1 Jn 4:2; 2 Jn 7.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Redeemer, but with us had to spring 'from one' (Heb 2:11), our brother according to the flesh. For he could only possess this flesh, which was to be redeemed and in [197] which we were to be redeemed, if he who was 'born of woman' shared our origin as well as our nature. Here again we see that a satisfaction theory of a purely formal and juridical kind does not exhaust the Biblical truth of Redemption. For in such a theory the Logos would have been able to redeem us whatever creaturely form he assumed, and not only in a flesh derived from a single origin and stamped by the history of man's sin.

What has been said in this fifth section only has any real importance for our purposes in so far as the usual soteriology too shows the same kind of formal and almost juridical abstractness which we have noticed in ordinary Christology today, and for the same basic reason. Any progress beyond Chalcedon, and thus really any further insight into the meaning of its definition, would then be to the advantage of both tractates. We intend to offer only a few brief indications here.

6. There are two distinct points as regards which the problems raised by the old Christology deserve fresh consideration.

a. The single Christ.

The question as to whether the Logos did not also become angel was raised as early as Origen. Today it is less possible than ever to dismiss as an idle speculation the question why there is and will be only one Christ, and one Christ as man, simply by appealing to 'God's decree'. There are indeed decrees of God and ultimate dispositions of his free choice. But free acts of this kind do not exclude the possibility of our asking what they mean. On the contrary, it is precisely God's field of action that is the field of the greatest intelligibility, more so than the field of a mechanical and meaningless 'necessity'. And so we should not appeal to God's decrees and his 'unsearchable' will in order to lighten our theological labours or dispense with them altogether. Anyone who wishes to proclaim the Incarnation as something worthy of faith, that is, who wishes to make it possible for modern man to assimilate this Truth of all truths, must find a place for it in his single historical world. But it is no longer a simple matter for modern man to accept as worthy of faith the position that the event of the Incarnation should have taken place just once. Why is there no Godmanhood in general? Or better: why does this exist in fact (as regards grace and [198] eternal life) in such a way as precisely to 'require'[63] that the unio hypostatica in the strict sense took place just once? How are we to understand the inner connexion and unity of the cosmos as a whole, the nature of man and angel, in such a way as to make it comprehensible that the Logos became 'only' man, and yet that as such he is Head and End of the whole cosmos (including the angels), and this not only in respect of a higher dignity (than that of the angels) but also in respect of a real function which he exercises with regard to the angels as well? We have to offer a picture of the world in which the one Christ, the one Christ as man, seems meaningful. This point is of kerygmatic importance today. A clearer and more explicit treatment of it would help to show (and this itself is important) that the classical Christology of the dogma is in no need of demythologization.

b. The same is true of the time of the Incarnation.

The Fathers took a more active interest in this question than the thinkers of later times. Today it has become important again: on account of the prolongation in time both of human [63] It need hardly be said that the question is left open here as to how far this 'requirement' signifies a pure convenientia, i.e. a genuine connexion of meaning obtaining in objective reality, or a strict necessity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

history before Christ, as well as of possible history after Christ. Both are more extensive, stirred by more various movements, than the Middle Ages used to think. In the expectations of many men, the higher development of humanity seems only to reach its ultimately intended realization in a mastery of the material world, the unification of men in society and their planned, i.e. rationally ordered life in common. It is of the first importance to show, with a sympathetic and yet critical regard for current patterns of thought, why this expectation does not contradict the fact of faith, that the finally decisive Event of history for all time to come has happened already: God's becoming man. To the stature of this Event all humanity can only asymptotically grow, in all its cosmic and moral dimensions, in the dimensions of grace and eschatology, whatever conceivable 'evolution' it may undergo. It can never surpass this Event, because the summit of all 'evolution', the irruption of God into the world and the radical opening of the world to the free infinity of God in Christ, has already been realized for the whole world, however true it may be that what has already taken place definitively in this Event must still reveal itself within the world [199] in the reflexion and image of all history still to come, in an eschatological climax.[64]

7. It would be to the benefit of both Christology and the other dogmatic tractates if both were more clearly aware of their unity. The fact of this unity has already been touched on more than once in the foregoing discussions. The division and structure of the tractates in the textbooks of dogmatic theology available today is a problem in its own right, and a much more serious and important problem than is generally recognized. Perspectives and existential allocations of attention are very nearly as important as the question, 'Is what is said here correct?' We shall say nothing about these matters here. But even within the customary framework of a modern treatise of dogmatic theology more Christology could be studied in the other tractates than is actually the case; it would be highly beneficial for these tractates. We have already discussed the way in which the truth and richness of content both of a 'protology' as well as of an eschatology essentially depend on its becoming clear that man and his environment and his history are from the first devised with a view to Christ, and that the man Christ at the end of all history still retains his fundamental significance. The tractate de Gratia is commonly entitled de Gratia Christi. Commonly it contains little else about Christ. And yet we only have a Christian understanding of grace when it is conceived of not only in the most metaphysical way possible, as a divinization, but rather as assimilation to Christ. And the existential transposition of this is the following of Christ, something about which moral theology ought to say rather more, although it offers a schema less handy for casuistical purposes than the Ten Commandments or other schemata of natural moral law. Furthermore, why is it only in Christology that Christ is said to have sanctifying grace in his soul? Why is it not stated conversely that grace is the unfolding within human nature of [200] the union of the human with the Logos (in the sense mentioned above and is therefore, and arising thence, something which can also be had in those who are not the ek-sistence of the Logos in time and history but do belong to his necessary environment? Sacramental theology is again becoming more Christological today, so too the theology of the Church as a doctrine of the 'Mystical Body of Christ'. A theology history, and what is more a Christocentric one, is almost entirely lacking.

[64] In such a theology of time in Christ, it would naturally also be necessary to discuss the question to what extent the grace of Christ, the communication of the Spirit, justification, could exist before Christ; and again, why, for example, there was no visio beatifica before Christ, and why, then, in the former case the 'post Christum' became in the historical development of theology a 'propter Christum', 'intuitu meritorum Christi futurorum', while this is not possible in the latter case.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

8. Would it not be fitting for someone to make a systematic study of the ways in which the real teaching of faith about Christ is unreflexively misconceived? This is not a question of the 'official' heresies from the earliest days up to the liberalism of our time, or if these, only in so far as behind them a profound misconception of the real dogma is at work. It would rather be a matter of investigating with exactitude and system what sort of idea the average Christian and non-Christian really has of Christ, whether it be to 'believe' this idea or reject it as not worthy of belief. It would probably emerge that the content of this idea by no means coincides with the real dogma, or at any rate renders the dogma with really serious, that is disastrous, distortions and omissions. We should then have to ask which misunderstood formulations of the dogma, either in solemn pronouncements or (what is of more practical importance) in the normal catechesis and preaching, have given rise and continue to give rise to such pre-theoretical and cryptogamic heresies in Christology. Such an investigation could be of use not only for apologetic and kerygmatic ends. It could make clear to academic theology that what are apparently very ticklish questions of theology could be of the highest missionary significance provided that they are properly put and answered. For a true theology of proclamation is nothing else than the one theology, which takes its religious task so seriously with all the scientific means at its disposal that it becomes at once more scientific and more kerygmatic.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[201]

6

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

On December 8, 1854, Pius IX made the following solemn declaration, which the appeal to his supreme teaching authority in the Church shows to have been infallible: 'The doctrine which holds that the Blessed Virgin Mary, in the first instant of her conception, has been, by a special grace and privilege of Almighty God, and in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the human race, preserved and exempted from every stain of original sin, is revealed by God, and consequently is to be believed firmly and inviolably by all the faithful.' Since then a hundred years have passed; and to mark the occasion Pius XII, in his encyclical 'Fulgens Corona' of December 8, 1953, has announced a Marian Year.

The first thing which this centenary celebration and the announcement of a Marian Year would seem to demand is an attempt to understand more deeply this truth of Catholic faith. The fact that the Supreme Pastor so explicitly desired the celebration of this centenary, more so than in the case of similar commemorative feasts (such as those of Ephesus, Chalcedon and Trent, in recent times), makes it immediately clear that a true Catholic's attitude in faith and love to this definition cannot be one of 'minding one's own business'. 'We desire', the Pope says, 'that sermons and lectures should be delivered on this subject in each diocese, so that this Christian doctrine might be made clearer to men's minds.'[1]

A truth of faith can be brought home to the understanding in various ways: we can find out what Scripture says about it; we can trace the historical course of the doctrine with the passage of time, and learn what is involved, both as regards its content and as regards its binding force on faith, from the examination of this long and often fluctuating history in which the Church's consciousness in faith has come to maturity. We can observe the influence of such a doctrine on [202] piety, liturgy and art, study that mutual interaction between life and official authority, theology and devotion, God's eternal truth and the preoccupations of succeeding ages, in which the conscious grasp of this truth slowly reaches maturity. We can also quite simply try to see how the particular truth fits into the whole of Christian faith, how it derives its life from this whole and how its meaning and content can be clarified by reference to the whole.

The last procedure is specially valuable for truths of the kind with which we are concerned here. For truths like these, which have not always been in the stage of a reflexive and explicit presence for the mind in their own right, have grown out of the totality of the Christian understanding of faith, or else they would not exist at all. The development of a particular theme of knowledge in the Church, stimulated and watched over by the Holy Spirit, takes place rather in the way in which a man's knowledge grows in the course of his historical life: it is out of the whole of his being that his knowledge apprehends the particular, although this whole may in certain circumstances be available only unreflexively. Thus it is not surprising that any attempt to understand a particular truth out of the whole of faith must inevitably have recourse to propositions and points of view which do not so certainly form part of the traditional deposit of the faith – as this is determined by reference to the Church's official teaching – as the proposition to be explained, which in a given case has already been defined. This must be borne in mind, when we now set out to see how the de fide proposition concerning the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin allows of being made intelligible in terms of the whole of Revelation.

---

[1] AAS XLV (1953) p. 587.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Mary is only intelligible in terms of Christ. If someone does not hold with the Catholic faith that the Word of God became man in Adam's flesh so that the world might be taken up redemptively into the life of God, he can have no understanding of Catholic dogma about Mary either. It may indeed be said that a sense of Marian dogma is an indication of whether Christological dogma is being taken really seriously; or whether it is being regarded (consciously or unconsciously) merely as a rather outmoded, problematic, mythological expression of the fact that in Jesus (who is basically just a religious man) we undoubtedly feel God (here again a cipher for an unexpressed mystery) particularly close to us. No, this Jesus Christ, born of Mary [203] in Bethlehem, is at once, as One and Indissoluble, true man and true Word, consubstantial with the Father. And so Mary is in truth the Mother of God. It is only to someone who truly and unreservedly confesses this that the Catholic Church can continue to speak meaningfully about her other Marian dogmas. And if anyone protests against further Marian dogmas, either explicitly or by passive indifference, he must expect to be asked whether he believes and confesses what the Church solemnly confessed at Ephesus in 431 as the faith of the one and undivided Church, and what the Reformed Church of the sixteenth century believed too, though it did not really raise the question whether this was necessary in order that one could as a sinner be consoled by faith in a gracious God.

Now according to the testimony of Scripture, this divine Motherhood is not simply identical with the biological fact that Mary is the mother of Jesus, becoming this 'passively' as it were, while Jesus is in fact the Son of God. St Luke's witness goes further than this: this Motherhood is a free act of the Virgin's faith. One comes about by the other, and both together form a unity. Mary's consent in faith, as St Luke relates it, cannot be regarded merely as a fragment of the Blessed Virgin's private biography, one which consequently should have no further interest for us. It is rather an Event of public ('official') saving history as such, more so than Abraham's faith or the Covenant on Sinai. It is for this reason that St Luke relates it: it is part of the saving history of humanity, not a pious, edifying idyll from someone's private life. Mary is blessed because she believed; and she is blessed because her sanctified womb bore the Holy One. Thus her consent at the Annunciation must not be regarded as a merely external precondition of an Event which as human (and this is something more than biological and physiological) would be exactly what it is even if this consent had not been given. She is Mother personally, not just biologically. Looked at in this way, her personal divine Motherhood precedes – this is rather a bold way of putting it, admittedly – her Son's divine Sonship. It is not as though some biological process in her reached its term in a divine Person, without her having taken any part in it. It is perfectly true that it is of fundamental significance for the Christian understanding of the divine Motherhood as a deed performed by the Virgin, that her obedience in faith, without which she would not be Mother of God, is itself a pure grace of God; but it makes no difference to the fact that she became Mother of God in the freedom [204] of faith. That is why we must say with all truth that for us and for our salvation she opened the way into our flesh of sin for the Eternal Word.

Catholic theology is often reproached with making an absolute of the official, the institutional, whatever can be applied by process of law or administrative authority, whatever has become detached from freedom, charisma, faith, to the detriment of free grace, the unique, the creative act not subject to administrative discipline, the charismatic. This is why she is said to have combatted Montanism, Donatism and so on, and the Reformation too, as so many outbreaks of fanaticism; thus she has glorified spirit-less officialdom and declared it to be God's authentic representative in the world. To this it must be replied that sacrament, office, law possess their own consistency, quite independently of the holiness, the pneumatic

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

endowment of the dispenser or bearer. And this is necessary, for otherwise office or law would not exist at all, or man would have to be able to establish with certainty someone else's grace or holiness, and judgment on this point would cease to be God's secret. And further it must be pointed out that the distinction between sacrament and grace, law and pneuma, office and holiness, exterior and interior hierarchy within the Church, does not in general mean that there could be an ultimate and absolute discrepancy between them. Otherwise the Church would be a provisional synagogue, and not the Church of the Last Times, which are the times of the victory of grace over sin and defection. Thus the Church as such and as a whole can no longer escape from God's truth, fall away from his salvation, no longer lose the Holy Spirit, no more cease to be the Holy Church even 'subjectively'; she can no longer become merely an official, emptily institutional Church. And this is not because the men by whom she is borne are no longer free, but because their freedom remains comprehended within the predominance of grace. Thus the Church is not only the Event of the victory of God's Yes over man's No; it is just this become historically tangible too (allowing for all that God's grace can do by way of making things perceptible in the light of faith). In the last resort, then, the realm of the official, of saving history, in the Church cannot be sundered from the realm of the personal and the pneumatic; for the Word has definitively and for all time become flesh, and overcome in death the power of darkness. That is why the Church has always seen clearly that the Apostles' office was exercised not only while they lived here on earth, but that they sit in [205] judgment on heavenly thrones in the heavenly city too, the gates of which bear their names; and the Church has seen that we must say this and confess it. So too she has always seen that the witnesses to her faith before the tribunals of earthly history, to the point of death, are also really the delivered. So too she could be sure that the very heroes of her own prehistory in the Old Testament belong eternally to the number of those who have power with God, the redeemed. Office (= essential function in the public saving history of God's People) and personal holiness coincide at the decisive points of saving history, so that each supports the other and makes it possible. Such is the Church's conviction according to the Scriptures, in spite of her unequivocal rejection of Donatism.

We are now better able to understand what was maintained above, that according to the Scriptures Mary is Mother of the Incarnate Word in and through her free obedience in faith.

Her divine Motherhood, then, belongs to that utterly decisive Event of saving history in which the Word of the Father came into the flesh of sin, and thus also, fundamentally and inevitably, to the death which redeemed us. Her motherhood is an event of authentic, public (i.e. engaging God's People as such in its historical tangibility) saving history. In fact, so far as such an act of saving history can be performed by a mere human being, it is the decisive Event of saving history, and an eschatological one. From this time on (as opposed to all previous acts of saving history) the dialogue between God and humanity (even in this world) is no longer open, because in reply to this assent of the Virgin, God spoke his definitive word to the world as a Word of salvation and not of judgment. This eschatological and decisive Event of public saving history, through which Mary dealt in the name (= for the salvation) of all humanity, is at the same time her personal act in faith. At this point if at all there clearly coincide office and person, position in the Church and situation before God, dignity and holiness. Mary is the holy Mother of God, as necessarily as the Church is the holy Church, as necessarily as God's grace is stronger than man's power to deny him. Her life is the free act (maintained right up to the moment when she stood below the Lord dying on the Cross) through which she received God's Word in faith and in her womb, for her own salvation and the salvation of all men. This was the moment for which she existed; then it was that there took place the covenant between God and humanity, which is eternal and definitive.

[206] Here we must give more explicit consideration to the fact that this act of unconditional faith performed by the Blessed Virgin was God's grace and Christ's, and only

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

so of saving significance for her and for us. A man's free performance of a salutary act and God's grace are by no means things which tend to exclude one another: grace rather bestows the power to act and the actual performance, and the creature's answer is itself the work of God's effective call. If Mary opens the door of the world for the definitive coming of the redeeming God into the flesh of humanity, she does it freely, because God wishes to come, and on account of this unconditional will to save the world, himself gives her the power to realize the condition under which God's Word wished to come: in the freedom of those who were to receive him, because the Word wished to come freely. Her word is pure answer in the strength of the Word directed to her: nothing else, but this wholly. That reception in acceptance of the grace of the world is itself grace. As her act, her conception of the Word is just as much grace as what was so received and conceived. He gives not only himself, but also his conception, on the human side, in free faith and in the very corporeality of the Virgin's Motherhood. But he wished to give himself only by giving the Virgin too the free word of faith.

If we were to try and sum up what we have so far said about Mary in a concise formula, which expresses it all at one stroke by means of a concept whose theological validity requires no preliminary proof, then all we need say is: Mary is she who is most perfectly Redeemed. What this formula means will appear from the following simple considerations. Redemption as one person's grace is always another's blessing; redemption takes place as the reception of Christ in the act of faith, which is itself grace and – for faith – establishes itself as something historically tangible in the world. Then the most perfect redemption is the conception of Christ in faith and in the body for the salvation of all in the holiest act of freedom, which is grace. Because Mary stands at that point of saving history at which through her freedom the world's salvation takes place definitively and irrevocably as God's act, she is most perfectly redeemed. It may be felt that these propositions take away from the significance of Christ's death; that they do not may be seen from the fact that the descent into the flesh is already the beginning of the descent into death, because the flesh assumed is dedicated to death. Thus the Incarnation is not just a [207] condition for a redemption still open, still to come, but its inception, with which the whole, however much it has still to grow, is set upon its own proper way. As Mother of God, Mary is most perfectly redeemed, and vice versa. The Church has always been aware of this, however little explicit that knowledge may have been in itself and in its consequences. But it is only possible for the Church always to have been aware of Mary as holy before God, as redeemed and delivered, and to know this from her divine Motherhood alone, if in the present regime of salvation there is found in her some real, objective connexion between her task in saving history and her personal holiness. If this is so, then it includes a perfect correspondence between Mary's unique task in saving history and her personal holiness. In short, for the faith of the Church Mary is she who is most perfectly Redeemed, the example and exemplar of redemption simply speaking.

We have now reached a position from which we may look directly at Mary's Immaculate Conception, but before we do this, two points still have to be considered.

The first of these may appear if we ask ourselves what we as Christians really think about the unbaptized infant. We say that it has original sin, it is not justified, possesses no sanctifying grace, is not yet a temple of the Holy Spirit and so on. We say all this without hesitation, and none of it calls for further discussion. But if we go on to say that it is under the dominion of the Devil, that it is a child of God's wrath, a lost and rejected creature, then we hesitate with some justice. And yet we must grant that these assertions are identical in content with the former ones, or are their simple logical consequences. Why do we hesitate? We notice that we have abstracted from certain things in making the first set of assertions, and still more the second. This child, of which we can and must make both the former and the latter assertions, is already, as unbaptized, an object of God's infinite mercy, in spite of original sin; it is included in God's vision of his only-begotten Son, and thus it has, if not yet a realized, at least a 'remote' claim to inheritance with the Son. Looked at from this point of view, its condition as first described is basically – I do not say in itself – already annulled, or, if this formulation seems doubtful, already comprehended within God's grace and love. We should remember that in original sin (and so in all its formulations: enmity, wrath, damnation, dominion of the Devil and so on) we are dealing with a 'sin' which [208] is essentially different from personal sin as the act of that freedom which permits of no deputization, a sin, then, which only falls under the same concept 'analogically'. We should not then be wholly astray if – to exercise our minds a little and clarify matters – we were to say that in this case (as opposed to personal guilt or freely received justification) Luther's 'simul iustus et peccator' had something to be said for it.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This coexistence of God's true saving purpose and of original sin in the unbaptized infant forms as it were a supratemporal region within which the infant has its existence. It is only because God's gracious love in Christ already belongs to the infant that the perceptible history of its salvation takes a sacramentally visible form, that history in the temporal succession of which a sinner becomes one of the just by baptism. Now this grace, given in the lifetime of this individual, derives from the former grace, which already comprehends his whole lifetime, and pretty well amounts to its temporal deployment; one might have the impression that it is not after all very important exactly when the temporal realization should take place – has anyone ever seriously regretted having been baptized after a fortnight instead of as a two days old babe in arms? That is why the whole mystery of Mary's Immaculate Conception cannot simply consist in the fact that she was graced a little earlier, temporally speaking, than we were. The distinction must lie deeper, and this deeper distinction must condition the temporal difference. And this for the primary reason that it would otherwise be impossible to see why God, whose saving purpose has reigned in unspeakable power over the holy Virgin 'from the first moment of her existence', of her 'conception', as it does in every case, for us and for all things, why God did not want this difference between natural beginning and the temporal realization of his purpose in her case too, though she too is redeemed. Would it not have appeared more clearly in history that she too is redeemed, as we are? If the mystery of our dogma were merely this difference of time, it would not be easy either to understand how the Church could have come to know it, since she has not always grasped this mystery explicitly. For it would always be possible to hold that what Tradition tells us about Mary's unsurpassable holiness did not bear strictly upon a condition of grace in her, but upon God's saving purpose from the beginning.

Consequently a second point must be taken into consideration if we [209] are to make any progress. We have a rather more difficult theological concept to consider here, and the reader must be asked to be as patient as he can. In what follows we wish to discuss the free actions performed by creatures, and morally good ones, since the question of God's causal relationship to evil actions does not arise here. God can of himself i.e. prior to a man's actual decision, absolutely and effectively will a definite good act of a man's freedom, and yet this act does not thereby cease to be free, nor does it follow that on account of the creature's freedom God merely has foreknowledge of this free action just because it happens and not also because he wills it. In this way God attains his will, and man does freely what God of himself has unconditionally willed. For God is He who as God can bestow freedom itself upon the creature, freedom even before Himself. Why he can do this, how he does it – this is a mystery of blinding darkness. Let us for convenience call this fact predestination, carefully excluding everything fatalistic, unfree, deterministic from this theological concept. Thus we may say: Mary, as the Holy one and she who has been most perfectly Redeemed – her personal free consent includes both these – is already predestined in God's will with respect to Christ, the Incarnate Redeemer of the generation of Adam. If in the last resort God's grace is the cause and not the effect of man's actions; if consequently the redemption of sinful humanity proceeds from God's free saving purpose alone; if according to this saving purpose, which arises from God's free yet absolute initiative, the redemption through the Incarnation of the Son was to take place by the assumption of an Adamitic human nature and its destiny: then it is immediately clear that in God's predetermining will for this Christ an earthly Mother of the Son was likewise predestined, i.e. was willed absolutely and prior to any human decision, like the Incarnation itself. And so her free consent to this Motherhood is already given too. For human motherhood must be free, if it is not to injure the dignity of the human person, which is unthinkable with God. Yet in this election is also included the choice of Mary as the Holy One, as she who has been most perfectly Redeemed. That is to say, in that God's absolute and unconditional will is that the Redeemer should come from Mary and her free Fiat, his will is that she should be the most perfectly Redeemed in this free Motherhood itself. For here 'office' and personal holiness must coincide. If, then, God wills Christ and his Mother in the plan of predestination, he wills her as the Holy one in this single predestination: [210] not just in any similar predestination, but in Christ's, and thus in his first, original plan.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now what does all this imply for the 'Immaculate Conception'? We have already said above that even prior to any actual eradication of original sin by baptism or any non-sacramental justification, God's saving purpose as First and Last embraces each human being; and that consequently man is never the sinner he would be if God's free grace were not to support his existence from the beginning. We can now say: this divine purpose of salvation, which embraces Mary in this way from the very beginning, indeed from all eternity, and thus precedes all other possibilities (in reality, at least, if not in time), is for her the predestination of Christ himself. That is to say, if she had not been willed as the Holy one and the perfectly Redeemed, then Christ himself, as we know him in actual fact, would not have been willed by God. This cannot be said of any other of the redeemed. It is true that a divine predestining purpose of salvation of this kind reigns over everyone who is going to find salvation; it is true that God wills this salvation as an effect of Christ the Incarnate, Christ who was crucified in obedience to the Father. And yet, so long as we are here below, this saving decision of God remains hidden from us for everyone except Mary – at least in general. In general we can point to no event in the experience of our own history which will allow us to read off this divine predestining decision for any individual as such. And further – and this is the decisive point – in every other case Christ could exist and be predestined by God without its being necessary for the individual concerned to be one of the redeemed. Any individual apart from Mary who is predestined to salvation, is not simply included in God's predestining will in respect of Christ, but relies upon a divine decision which must proceed for his especial benefit. Otherwise everyone would be certain of his own salvation by the mere fact that Christ exists. But that is a position which is forbidden to us, we who have to work out our salvation in fear and trembling, in firm hope, and not intellectual certainty; we who must always say, whatever may be our humble, acquiescent trust (and no one is forbidden to hope in the unlimited extent of this for each of us): 'I do not know whether I belong to the elect'. As perfectly Redeemed, Mary stands – in reality and for our knowledge in faith – within the circle of Christ's own predestination. And thus it is that she is different from us not merely by having become graced at a temporally earlier point in her [211] existence. It is much more the mystery of her predestination we must look at: this is the mystery which first gives its real meaning to the temporal difference between her and us in the mystery of the Immaculate Conception.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But does it follow from what has been said that Mary, from the beginning of her existence, was not only the object of a specifically unique predestining purpose of salvation on the part of God, but also possessed sanctifying grace; that in this sense she was preserved from original sin, redeemed by being preserved and not just by being freed from original sin? For this, after all, whatever may have been said about her predestination, is what is immediately contained in the Marian dogma. Is the latter statement something which we have to say 'as well', 'additively', or does it follow as a consequence and a more explicit articulation of what was said earlier? We hold that the second alternative is the true one.

Firstly, then, we have already said that Mary is the perfect, exemplar, pure case of redemption in general. Now one of the points of faith on which the Church has slowly reached a reflexive clarity of insight with the assistance of her Spirit, is that redemption does not necessarily and in every case presuppose a temporally earlier condition of being unredeemed, of sin and alienation from God. Someone who is preserved in grace is just as radically delivered and redeemed, if not more so. The fact that of ourselves we are nothing and have nothing, that nothing could come from our hearts but a malice which ultimately God alone overcomes at its source and not we: all this is something which he who is preserved can and must acknowledge in praise of grace, just as much as he who is delivered with regard to his deliverance. If in the Our Father we are bound to pray to be preserved from temptation, the thanks we offer for this grace of protection is no less in praise of redemption than the thanks for deliverance from the consequences of giving way under temptation. Both standing fast and standing upright again are his grace. If this is true, then the redemptive preservation from original sin is the most radical and most blessed mode of redemption. It must necessarily have been her lot who is the most perfectly Redeemed, because she alone, by reason of her office and person, stands precisely at that point at which Christ began the definitive and victorious redemption of mankind. Thus it is that the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the holy Virgin belongs to the doctrine of [212] Redemption itself, and stands for the most radical and perfect form of redemption.

There is a second point to consider. Why do infants first obtain Christ's grace only at baptism? Why not earlier, at the very beginning of their existence? If someone were to adopt the latter view (which won't do), this would not necessarily be in flat contradiction with the fact that the Immaculate Conception is a unique privilege of the Blessed Virgin. For we have already seen that this privilege involves more than just the temporal difference between her justification and ours, especially as still other differences remain, such as freedom from concupiscence and so on. Nor would such a view necessarily do away with the Redemption and the character of justification as grace; for these remain in Mary's case too. Nor again would such a view put in doubt the necessity of baptism. Although justification by faith and love is normal in the adult, and in the normal way takes place before baptism or the sacrament of penance, these sacraments retain their necessity and their meaning. Nor can such a view be disposed of simply by a reference to the lot of infants who die unbaptized. For we have absolutely no real knowledge of what happens to them, and the controversy over the 'limbus puerorum' is once more quite open today. And yet this view must be rejected, because Tradition and the official teaching of the Church too clearly presuppose and speak of original sin in Adam's posterity not just as a condition due in itself (if it were not hindered by God's redeeming grace), but as one which has come about in fact. But why does God permit it to come about, if on the one hand the reasons for it which people tend to offer immediately are not free from objection, and on the other, a divine purpose of salvation reigns over man, directed as redemption and forgiveness against the hereditary guilt? Why is this purpose not realized from the beginning of any individual's existence? It would certainly remain grace, the Redemption of Christ, and even infant baptism would remain meaningful and necessary.

Unless one is prepared to be satisfied simply with an arbitrary 'decree' of God, which is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

too cheap an answer, however frequent it may be in a theology infected with nominalism, the only possible answer to this question is as follows. The interval of time between the beginning of existence and the commencement of justification is not an expression of the bare need for redemption as such. Rather, what becomes visible here is the fact that man may not in general be regarded [213] even in the Regime of Christ as simply one redeemed, predestined, as someone who is absolutely and unconditionally taken into God's grace simply because God's mercy has become, absolutely and unconditionally, an irrevocable and victorious fact in the world in the flesh of Christ. The fact that our salvation and our attained blessedness are not simply predestined simultaneously with the predestination of Christ acquires historical manifestation in the temporal interval between the beginning of existence and the commencement of justification. And thus the converse holds good: Mary is she who is taken into predestining grace in Christ's becoming flesh as the victorious and definitive presence of God's mercy in the world, overcoming all sin; and therefore in her case this temporal interval has no meaning. Not because she did not require redemption, but precisely because she is the one member of the redeemed without whom it is impossible to think of the Redemption as victorious. The dogma of the Immaculate Conception belongs to the very heart of the doctrine of our Redemption by the one unique Mediator Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who became man, died and rose again 'propter nos homines et propter nostram salutem'.

If this Marian Year which has been proclaimed should make us specially bear in mind the dogma, proclaimed a hundred years ago, of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin and Mother of God, such a commemoration, rightly understood, is a celebration of the mystery of our Redemption and a praise of the grace of the one Lord in whose name alone there is salvation. Ultimately we can only praise him by saying what he has done among us. If we want to speak of this as his deed, how can we do it better than by acknowledging what he has done in Mary, and in this way fulfil the saying that the Spirit put on her lips: All generations shall call me blessed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[215]

7

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE DOGMA OF THE ASSUMPTION

In this short study we shall attempt to discuss what is actually meant by the new dogma of Mary's bodily assumption into final perfection, and not its theological foundations. Thus we shall not ask in what way precisely it can be 'based on' Scripture (this is how the Constitutio Apostolica promulgating the definition cautiously formulates it). Nor shall we ask how the dogma is contained explicitly or implicitly in the tradition of faith, nor how one can reach the conviction that the 'new' dogma is a truth which belongs to that Apostolic Tradition which never changes, although it was not always taught in the Church so expressly and with such binding force as is the case today. These questions too do indeed have their own, by no means small, importance; and they too must be answered in a theology of this dogma. Indeed they are even more important theologically. But everyone has the right to choose his own subject; and what we choose is not the latter but the former. Moreover we believe that an exposition of the content of the new dogma of Mary's 'bodily' assumption into 'heaven' is not only of importance in itself (for ultimately one has also to know what one believes); we also believe that it is of use in answering the questions not dealt with here. For many of the difficulties of an epistemological and psychological kind which seem to show that this doctrine does not belong to Revelation as it is handed down to us, arise rather from a misconception of its content than from any special difficulties in establishing the fact. What is more, as far as one can see, among the almost countless studies of the question today, there is hardly one which attempts to enter more deeply into the inner meaning of the new dogma. Writers are content to demonstrate the fact of what is asserted as something given in the case of Mary, and obviously take it tacitly for granted that Christians are sufficiently familiar with the truths of Christ's Resurrection and of the future general [216] resurrection to understand what is really meant by saying that someone is corporeally glorified in heaven.

Thus if we wish to know what is really involved in the substance of this defined proposition, our best plan is to ask first of all in what wider context of Christian truths it really belongs. The true meaning of any individual proposition of revealed truth does indeed contain an 'item' of new knowledge, which is added on to the other truths, enlarges and completes them; yet a proposition of this kind is itself only really intelligible in the totality of the one saving Truth. We may regard this totality as plainly set out for the first time in the Apostles' Creed. Our question then runs as follows: To which article of faith does the new dogma belong as its consequence and organic unfolding? The question seems simple: it belongs to the article 'Born of the Virgin Mary'. The answer is correct but insufficient, and that in two ways. Firstly, for the connexion we are seeking, everything depends on how exactly 'Born of the Virgin Mary' is itself understood. Secondly, this is by no means the only article of the Creed to which the new dogma is essentially and immediately related.

As to the first point we may say this: by itself, i.e. if the words are simply taken in their most primitive sense, 'born of the Virgin Mary' could mean that Mary has given the Word of the Father his body from her own (as every mother does her child), and that she is for this reason, and in this way alone, his mother, the mother of the Son of God, and nothing more. But according to the Scriptures and the testimony of the Church from the most ancient times, the phrase says more than this. It is not just of an event belonging to the private life of Mary and Jesus that the phrase speaks; even by itself (and not only in consequence of the actions performed later in his life by this child born of Mary) it means a saving event, an historical happening, which makes a fundamental difference to the situation of the whole world before

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God. For the Father's eternal Word has become flesh in Mary, God has already indivisibly assumed the world in the flesh of this Virgin's Son; God's eternal Son has already made his own the destiny of the world in the 'flesh of sin' (Rom 8:3) (i.e. in flesh dedicated to death), so that this personal existence in the world's sinful flesh led undeviatingly (in this wise or that) to the death in which the guilt of the world is endured to the end and overcome. Thus this Event of becoming man is an 'eschatological' event: the definitive salvation of the world, irrevocable and unsurpassable, by God's grace in the Word [217] of the Father become flesh, is already definitely in the world in virtue of what took place in and through Mary, and had to and still has to merely work itself out in what we call the Cross of the Son, his Resurrection and the history of the world post Christum natum. This eschatological Event of saving significance for the whole world took place in Mary: in her flesh and through her faith. In her flesh: for our whole salvation depends on the fact that the Son shares not only our 'specific' human nature but also our very generation, entering into that community of us all in which no one lives for himself or dies for himself. The Son of God had to be a son of Adam. And this he became in Mary, so that our salvation depends upon his having been born of woman, that is to say, quite concretely, of Mary. Through her faith: however true it may be that the Event took place and had to take place in the flesh, we know from the testimony of Scripture that it did not fail to engage the Blessed Virgin's 'private life', her freedom and her faith. No, what took place in the flesh, took place there through the 'Let it be done to me according to thy word', through her faith; so that because of this she might be called holy, by Elizabeth at that distant time and since then by all generations. Her objective service, by means of which her bodily reality is delivered to the Word, is also her subjective action, one in the other. Her faith is called blessed because it admitted the Word into the region of the flesh, and her bodily motherhood is not only a biological occurrence but the supreme action of faith, through which she becomes blessed. She lets the Son of God into the world; and she does it only by his power and in virtue of his grace. She can only let him into the prison of the sinful and mortal world because he wishes to come, and because her letting him in is itself again the work of the grace of his coming. But it is she who does it. She could do nothing if he did not grace her by his coming. But he graced her in just such a way that in her (flesh and faith together) the salvation of the world has definitively begun, and that in her God spoke his final, because total, word in the dialogue between him and humanity which had till then remained open. And so, when we make confession in the words 'born of the Virgin Mary', we do not merely say that the 'biological' happening of the Incarnation of the Son of God has made use of the Virgin's womb; we say that in her and through her (both) Christ's salvation (his alone!) was bestowed upon the world. She does not thereby become 'Co-redemptrix' 'by the side of' Christ, as though the Son and the Virgin [218] 'shared' in the redemption of the world in a kind of 'synergism'. But she co-operates in the redemption of the world, in so far as she does, for the salvation of the whole world and not only for her own, what a human being can and must do in the power of grace and for grace: receive it. She has received in her flesh the salvation of the world from the Holy Spirit through the consent of her faith, she has received for all men and in the most 'corporeal' way the whole Christ.[1] That is why, however, the Church has always believed that in her the redemption which took place in her and through her in the world has reached its fullest and most radical perfection. When the Church confesses of her that she remained 'preserved' from original sin (an expression which is easily misunderstood) and always sinless, this does not mean that she 'privately' by herself, and in contrast to the rest of humanity, has not lost man's original grace in Adam

[1] No more seems to be claimed for Mary's position in saving history, as it is briefly indicated here, than what the Lutheran theologian, H. Asmussen, presents as a completely Biblical teaching about Mary. See his book Maria. Die Mutter Gottes (Stuttgart 1950), esp. p. 51.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(this was lost to her too in Adam); it means that she is the radically Redeemed, in whom Christ's single and unique grace exhaustively surpassed man's sinfulness, even 'temporally' in a certain way, so that she can in no way (not even as to sin) call anything her own which is not the gift of the incomprehensible grace of the Father in the Son of her womb. And that is how she is the second Eve, the Mother of all the living, the type of perfect redemption and the perfect representation of what redeemed humanity, what the Church can be.[2] God's grace achieved its most incomprehensible and unsurpassable work where it laid hold of the world most closely and in the most 'fleshly' way: in Mary.

Before we attempt to unfold the full meaning of the article 'Born of the Virgin Mary' as it concerns the new dogma, we have yet to discuss the second point made above. We said that there were other articles of the Creed to which this proposition was essentially and immediately related. We have in mind the 'descent into the kingdom of death' and the 'resurrection of the flesh'. First of all, these two articles belong together. Because He descended among the dead and rose again there exists a resurrection of the flesh. It is only because he [219] himself arrived at that furthest point of human existence which we call being dead, which was limitless and implies something deeper and more dreadful than what modern man thinks of in terms of a cessation of biological life, that a Resurrection exists, that alone is why man is saved through and through, and is capable of God's beatitude with his whole undivided being. The heart of the earth has accepted and received the Son of God; and it is from a womb so consecrated, this womb of the 'hellish' depths of human existence, that the saved creature rises up. Not just (not even temporarily) in the Son alone. It is not that he alone descended and so rose again as victor because death could not hold him captive. 'Even now' he is not the firstborn among the dead in the sense that he is even now the only human being to have found the complete fulfilment of his whole human reality. By his death salvation has come to be definitively. Then what is there in principle to prevent any man from finding this definitive salvation? When the early Church confessed her belief in Christ's descent, victorious over death, she had in mind other dead ones, who 'already' share in the definitive character of the total victory over death and sin.[3] Let us remember (and this is something Althaus[4] has said too – quite rightly, in itself though his approach is wrong), that it is quite impossible for the Resurrection to be an individual event, because our 'bodily condition' (whether glorified or not) is simply the outward aspect of the spirit, which the spirit forms for itself in matter so as to be open to the rest of the world, and which in consequence necessarily includes a community of a bodily kind with a bodily Thou (and not just with God's Spirit). If this is so then the Son of Man 'cannot' have risen alone. What, we may ask, is really to be understood by his glorified bodily condition (if we take it seriously, and don't spiritualize it into another way of talking about his eternal 'communion with God') right up to the 'Last Day', if meanwhile it should persist all by [220] itself – something which is precisely unthinkable for the bodily condition (though glorified)? So when we find in Mt 27:52 s.[5] that other bodies too, those of saints, rose up with him (indeed even 'appeared' – as

---

[2] Cf. here O. Semmelroth, Urbild der Kirche. Organischer Aufbau des Mariengeheimnisses (Wurzburg 1950); H. Rahner, Maria und die Kirche (Innsbruck 1950; ET in preparation).

[3] Cf. e.g. K. Gschwind, Die Niederfahrt Christi in die Unterwelt (Munster 1911); K. Prümm, Der christliche Glaube und die altheidnische Welt II (Leipzig 1935), pp. 17-51 (esp. pp. 29-31). It should be noted that the conclusion arrived at in these works – that the overcoming of death in others is also contained in the ancient Christian confession of the descensus – was reached wholly without an eye to the modern doctrine of the Assumption or any apologetic concern for it.

[4] The Lutheran theologian from Erlangen. Cf. P. Althaus, Die letzten Dinge[6] (Gutersloh 1949), p. 141; pp. 156 s.

[5] On the exegesis of this text and its history see H. Zeller, 'Corpora Sanctorum. Eine Studie zu Mt 27:52-3', ZKT LXXI (1949), pp. 385-465. We still maintain that Zeller's exegesis is correct and convincing in spite of the objections made to it by A. Winklhofer, 'Corpora Sanctorum', Tübinger Theol. Quartalschrzft (1953), pp. 30-67, 210-17. It is clearly impossible here to go into the exegesis of this text in greater detail. So too we must

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

he himself did – to show that the end of all the ages has already come upon us), this is merely positive evidence from Scripture for what we would have expected anyway, if definitive salvation has already been unshakably founded, death conquered, and a man, for whom it is never good to be alone, has entered upon the fulfilment of his whole being. Hence to try to set aside this testimony from Matthew as a 'mythological' intrusion, or to argue away its eschatological meaning with ingenious evasions – such as that it is merely a matter of a temporary resurrection or even of 'phantom bodies' – would not be in accordance with the authoritative voice of Scripture. It is a fact that by far the greater part of the Fathers and the theologians, right up to the present day, have firmly maintained the eschatological interpretation of the text as the only one possible from the exegetical point of view. In this connexion it is not without interest that most of the Fathers and theologians adduced as witnesses for Mary's Assumption in the Bull of the definition also gave explicit support to this eschatological interpretation of the text.[6]

But how are we to conceive of a bodily condition like this, perfected and glorified, as an essential element in the total perfection of the single, whole human being? What kind of existence is this? And where? It is not easy to answer these questions and others like them. But can we who are imperfect ever form an idea of what has been brought to perfection? Even in the risen Lord, who showed himself [221] to appointed witnesses in his manifestations, we see little more than the fact of his Resurrection. For the inner nature of his glorified bodily condition could only be made deeply evident for 'what it is in itself' to those who themselves live in this new mode of existence. What the Apostles saw and touched of the Risen One was the Risen One himself in his 'flesh and bone', as he himself said; and yet this was necessarily in the manner in which something glorified can appear to the unglorified, it was an appearance 'for us' which permits us to say little about him 'as he is in himself'. We need only remember how seriously this in itself obvious fact ('quidquid recipitur, ad modum recipientis recipitur', runs a scholastic axiom) must be regarded if the idea is not to arise that, for instance, our Lord's 'Ascension into heaven', as the Apostles saw it take place, is something 'which continues rectilinearly 'in itself' after his being taken up by a cloud from their eyes, and in such wise ends in heaven. And when St Paul insists that an absolutely radical 'transformation' of our bodily condition must take place in order that we, who will no longer then be 'flesh and blood', may be able to inherit the Kingdom of God, what is being said at the same time is how little capable we are of 'forming an idea' of the new condition of the body. All we really know of it allows of being stated only from the 'outside', from two points of view: we ourselves shall be in this condition, we with all the reality we had and all our experience; and again, we shall be transformed, be quite different. Beyond this we shall say what St Paul said, that an incorruptible, a glorious, a spiritual body will rise in power (1 Cor 15:42 s.); and we shall read the blessed visions of the Seer of the Apocalypse, visions of a new heaven and a new earth (Apoc 21 s.), in which image and reality for us now are inseparably intertwined. Ancient man (who in this respect continued to exist in Catholic theology into the eighteenth century) could be easier in mind about the possibility of representing the definitive fulfilment of the whole man and of the world corresponding to him. For him (in his unreflexive, underlying, 'world-picture', not in the convictions he held in faith, even if the one passed without distinction into the other), Heaven, as the region of the glorified condition of the body, was a spatial setting which existed even before the saving renounce any attempt to evaluate works like that by W. Bieder, Die Vorstellung von der Höllenfahrt Jesu Christi. Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte vom sog. Descensus ad inferos (Zurich 1949).

---

[6] Daniélou's view, in Etudes 267 (1950), p. 291, that it is no longer admissible after the bull to interpret Mt 27:51 s. in terms of a definitive, eschatological resurrection of these saints, is quite without foundation. There can be no question of this. The bull nowhere affirms that Mary's privilege of 'anticipated' resurrection is to be understood as being unique in itself simply, as well as in its cause and title.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Event of the Resurrection, towards which this event moved as the 'uppermost part' of its cosmos. Time ran its course (one might have said) in space; in virtue of being glorified the body came to its new place, a place connatural to it, existing prior to it and possessing the [222] 'properties of glorification'. Today we can no longer use this imaginative picture to explain an 'ascent into heaven'. Consequently it is usual for theologians today to reply to the question as to the 'place' of heaven by merely saying that it is above all a 'condition'; and that, if one must allow for some spatial location on account of the bodily condition of a man who has been saved totally, it is in fact impossible to say just 'where' this heaven is. Certainly this modesty is in large measure justified, and yet it sounds a little unhappy. Especially so, because the attempt is made, instinctively and yet without any real reason, to conceive of this spatiality, however indefinite its Where, as a portion of this 'physical' world of space, something infinite and in itself homogeneous, which we are acquainted with as the space of our experience. Today we should say something more like this: the new 'spatiality' is a function of saving history, of the time which shapes this space; it comes to be by the fact of Christ's rising from the dead, and it is not given in advance as the possibility and the place of this glorified state. The ancients may have conceived of the happening of historical event (i.e. time, thought of as 'local movement' up to and including Christ's Ascension) as a function of space, in which it moved; we today on the other hand think of it rather differently: 'space' and 'place' arise through the happening of historical event; space is rather a function of time; in virtue of an event as radical as a transforming glorification, a spatial and local condition (of a quite new kind) arises which is no longer a portion of space as it was known till then but is incommensurable with it; and hence it is no longer capable of being 'represented', but has to be 'postulated' for the single reason that the true 'bodily condition' of someone who has risen in glory must not be dissipated by a false spiritualization. What is more, Christ's body remains in this way eternally a piece of this world, bound up with it in its deepest and inmost ground; otherwise the mortal would not have attained to eternal life or the unity of the world would be split asunder. Beginning with Christ's body, this very world thus achieves even now a new mode of being by means of its history in Christ, which is a history of the material and the spiritual at once, of flesh and person in the one Spirit of God which renews all things. The world acquires a new heavenly 'dimension' (not of course to be thought of as added to previous ones as a 'fourth', but one which for the first time gives the whole of the world a new order, its all-embracing 'heaven' in fact, by means of the originating Event of [223] Christ's Resurrection). Here too and here above all is it true to say that time and history shape 'space' and do not intrinsically presuppose it. None of this makes heaven easier to 'imagine'. Yet it becomes conceivable that heaven is not deprived of 'place' by the mere fact that we are no longer capable of accommodating it in a 'caelum empyreum' by a homogeneous extension of the world of our experience. Our own representation of the world in terms of space and time is itself, as a part of this world, necessarily confined within the structures of this world and our senses. But speculation and above all faith testify to the fact that reality does not simply come to an end where our representation of it does.

Everything depends on the fact that our own reality itself is transformed and not simply replaced by another, one which could no longer be our own selves and our world. There follows, then, a twofold consequence, in so far as the new reality which has come to be through Christ's Resurrection and the space which is proper to this reality continue to cohere with our world in its ultimate ontological root. Firstly, there will be not only a new heaven but also a new earth, and the new earth will be no other than the perfection of the 'heaven' which will have wholly and exhaustively transformed into itself and its mode of being the reality of the world. Secondly, we may grant that the new heaven and the old earth are radically and necessarily connected, and that the heavenly form of existence does indeed involve a migration from the mode of being proper to 'flesh and blood', the earthly,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

perishable manner of being characteristic of the body and its environment, under sentence of death; but it does not involve a migration from the world itself (there cannot be a 'beyond' like this, if in fact man is ever to 'rise again' and this is to involve his intrinsic fulfilment). If this is so, then the reality beyond (so far as it already exists in the glorified Christ and those 'saints' who follow in his train) cannot be conceived of as lacking all objective bonds with this world, as lacking a cosmic bond with the unglorified world which objectively coheres with the glorified reality and is really capable of being used to express it; though this does not require the application to it of categories which because of their cosmological limitations could not be used to speak of things 'beyond'. Reflexion on this point will show that it is meaningful to say, for example, that one man has 'already' risen again while another has 'not yet' done so, for this does not involve any application of limited categories to an object which [224] wholly transcends them. The eternity in glory of the earthly and historical is not simply identical with God's eternity, which is equally immediate and equally near to every point in time, and to which consequently temporal statements cannot be applied. Rather, the eternity in glory of the earthly is a fruit of time and history itself. Saving history transforms the temporal itself into eternity, by means of a process which on the one hand does not necessarily run its course 'simultaneously', owing to the plurality of our earthly reality; and on the other does not in its parts and their outcome lose its connexion with the process as a whole, so that the part can be really determined 'temporally' from the point of view of the whole. What is glorified retains a real connexion with the unglorified world, it belongs inseparably to a single, ultimately indivisible world; and that is why an occurrence of glorification possesses objectively its determinate place in this world's time, even if this point in time marks precisely the point at which a portion of this world ceases to endure time itself, in so far as it is different from all others while remaining in unity with the whole. Furthermore, the Christian has a guarantee that statements of this sort, open to temporal qualification, can be made meaningfully about something 'beyond'; for Scripture makes them about the Risen Lord. Of him it is said that he has 'already' risen, while just this statement cannot yet be made of us and also of many of the dead. Supposing that this distinction may be meaningfully and justly applied to statements about the 'moment in time' in which there is possession of the resurrection-body in Christ's case and in the case of many of the dead' who have not yet risen, it follows that the distinction cannot be meaningless in Mary's case either, on the alleged ground, perhaps, that the transcendence of God and of the eternity of the man who has been saved touches every point of our time with equal immediacy.

We can now resume our consideration of the phrase 'born of the Virgin Mary'. As we said, this proposition of faith concerning Mary has in view not only the fact that she is the Mother of the Lord, in so far as she has bestowed upon the Son of God his earthly existence from her flesh; but also above all the fact that she becomes Mother, i.e. that in her and through her, in her flesh and through her faith, the eschatological Event of salvation takes place, drawing after it everything else as its inner consequence, so that Mary appears as herself the perfectly Redeemed and the representation of perfect redemption. The concept of the 'perfectly Redeemed' may in certain respects be a [225] 'dynamic' one (if we may so put it), i.e. a concept the contents of which cannot be simply enumerated, in terms of fixed, given notes, one which cannot be 'defined' like mathematical and geometrical concepts. It has a life of its own, so that it is never possible to avoid the apparent difficulty that more is found in it when it is expounded than it originally contained, or that one can find quite arbitrarily in the concept of 'perfect' Redemption whatever one chooses to find. However, the objection does not touch us very nearly. It has already been shown that that End of time has begun already, although thousands of years may still draw out this single End in Christ; it has been shown too that that End of the whole history of salvation which has already become Event and Presence in Christ's Resurrection includes not only his Resurrection but that of the saints as well, however little it may be in our power to say in general who precisely these first fruits of complete redemption may be. But it follows from this that the total redemption in body and soul 'already' achieved is not something which has been arbitrarily invented or merely postulated a priori as characteristic of a perfect redemption. And what this means is that if Mary is the ideal representation of exhaustive redemption because of her unique place in saving history, then she must 'even now' have achieved that perfect communion with God in the glorified totality of her real being ('body and soul') which certainly exists even now.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus it is that the two articles of the Apostles' Creed from which we started fuse into one and provide us with the meaning of the new dogma: She who by her faith received salvation in her body for herself and for us all, has received it entire. And this entire salvation is a salvation of the entire human being, a salvation which has already begun even in its fullness. Mary in her entire being is already where perfect redemption exists, entirely in that region of being which came to be through Christ's Resurrection. When we speak of 'Mary's Assumption' into heaven, the 'privilege' of the Blessed Virgin implied here is simply that she has a special 'right' to this Assumption in virtue of her divine Motherhood and her unique position in saving history. It is also possible to speak of a special privilege here in so far as the temporal interval between death and bodily glorification in Mary's case must clearly be thought of as being shorter than in the case of those 'saints' in Mt 27:52 5., 'who had seen corruption'; though here of course it must not be forgotten that this distinction is conditioned not so much by the difference of the persons in themselves [226] as by the progress in the general situation of salvation in consequence of Christ's Resurrection, before which it was precisely impossible that anyone else should rise, because the 'space' of the world's glorification could only be opened up by Christ. But a 'privilege' is implied here not in the sense that Mary alone enjoyed it or that what is involved is in a real sense an 'anticipation' of a perfection which in every respect and in every instance could only 'really' emerge later. On the contrary: salvation has already advanced so far historically that since the Resurrection it is completely 'normal' (which is not to say 'general') that there should be men in whom sin and death have already been definitively overcome. Christ's victorious descent into the kingdom of death is precisely not just an event belonging to his private existence, but a saving Event, one which affects the dead (not merely and not in the first instance those who lack the vision of God). And his entry into the eternal glory even of his body does not open up an 'empty space', but institutes a bodily community of the redeemed: however far from being complete the number of the brethren may be, and however little we may be able, with a single exception, to call them by name as those who have been redeemed even in their bodies.

Because the 'future' of the Church is the presence of the glorified Son of Man, and because this future is already present even for the Church in Mary as her most perfect representation, the Church too is already redeemed totally, not in all her members certainly but already in reality in some of them. The salvation of the flesh too has already begun in its final form. The world is already in transition to God's eternity, not only in the 'spirit' of those who have gone to their everlasting home and not only in the body of the Son who came 'from above', but also in the bodies of those who are simply 'from below'. Even now there belongs to the reality of the entire creation that new dimension which we call heaven and which we shall also be able to call new earth once it has subjected all earthly reality to itself and not just an initial part of it. Perhaps the deepest reason why Protestantism rejects the new dogma is because really it is only aware of a theology of the Cross as a formula for reality here and now, and not a theology of glory; for Protestantism this is ultimately only a promise, and not something which exists 'even now', although it has not embraced everything yet and for us here below has not yet become apparent. But for anyone who believes that counter to all appearances the forces of the world to come have already seized hold of this world, [227] and that these forces do not consist merely in a promise, remaining beyond every sort of creaturely existence, for a future still unreal; for such a one the 'new' dogma is really nothing more than a clarification, throwing light on a state of salvation already in existence, in which he has always believed. That this state of salvation should be attributed to Mary in its entirety and fullness will not seem an impossibility to someone who knows that this salvation was born of her in virtue of the consent of her faith and in consequence has had its most perfect effect in her. The 'new' dogma has significance not only for Mariology but also for ecclesiology and general eschatology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[229]

8

THEOLOGICAL REFLEXIONS ON MONOGENISM

This inquiry proposes to treat of a restricted number of questions relating to monogenism in the strictly theological sense of that word. There is no intention of undertaking a systematic and exhaustive treatment. No attention will be given to that aspect of the problem concerned with the natural sciences. And even apart from this, many things which would form part of a comprehensive treatment of the topic will be omitted or merely touched on. Nor will there he any detailed examination and assessment of modern theological literature dealing with the controversy between monogenism and polygenism.[1] Occasional references will he made to this literature only [230] as a help to our own exposition. Our examination is divided into three parts: 1. The official teaching of the Church; 2. The possibility of proving monogenism

[1] We give here a conspectus of recent literature in alphabetical order. This survey makes no claim to completeness (the writings of Catholic 'polygenists'-in the widest sense-are indicated later on). It is noticeable how small the German contribution to this literature is.

J. M. Alonso, 'La encíclica "Humani Generis"', Illust. Cler. XLIV (1951), p. 16; L. Arnaldich, 'Historicidad de los once primeros capitulos del Génesis a la luz de los últimos documentos eclesiásticos', Verdad y Vida IX (1951), pp. 385-424; F. Asensio, 'De persona Adae et de peccato originali originante secundum Genesim', Gregorianum XXIX (1948), pp. 464-526; T. Ayuso Marazuela, 'Poligenismo y evoluzionismo a la luz de la Biblia y de la Teología', Arbor XIX (1951), pp. 347-72: J. Backes, 'Die Enzyklika "Hum. Gen." und die Wissenschaft', Trierer Theol. Zeit. LIX (1950), pp. 326-32; J. Bataini, 'Monogénisme et polygénisme. Une explication hybride', Div. Thom. (Piac.) XXX (1953), pp. 363-9; A Bea, 'Die Enzyklika "Hum. Gen." Ihre Grundgedanken und ihre Bedeutung', Scholastik XXVI (1951), pp. 36-56; C. Boyer, 'Les Leçons de l'encyclique "Hum. Gen.", Greg. XXXI (1950), pp. 526-39; G. Castelino, 'La storicità dei cap. 2-3 del Genesi', Salesianum XIII (1951), pp. 334-60; J. Caries, 'L'Unité de l'espèce humaine. Polygénisme et Monogénisme', Arch. de Phil. XVII-2 (?), pp. 84-100; F. Ceuppens, 'Le polygénisme et la Bible', Angel. XXIV (1947), pp. 20-32; – Quaestiones selectae ex historia primaeva.[2] (Turin 1948); – 'Rilievi ad una nota sul poligenismo', Sapieniza 11(1949), pp. 107-9 (contra B. Prete in Sap. 1 (1948), p. 420); G. Colombo, 'Transforrnismo antropologico e teologia', Scuola Catt. LXXVII (1949), pp. 17-43; P. Denis, Les Origines du monde et de l'humanité (Liege 1950); M. Flick, 'II poligenismo e il dogma del peccato originale', Greg. XXVIII (1947), pp. 555-63; J. de Frame, 'De Bijbel en het ontstaan van de Mens', Streven VI (1952), pp. 215-23; M. Garcia Cordero, 'Evolucionismo, Poligenismo y Exegesis biblica', Ciencia Tom. LXXVIII (1951), pp. 465-75; 477-9; H. Garrigou-Lagrange, 'Le Monogenisme n'est-il nullement révélé, pas même implicitement?' Doct. Comm. II (1948), pp. 191-202; J. M. Gonzalez Ruiz, 'Contenido dogmático de la narración de Gen. 2:7 sobre la formación del hombre', Est. Bibl. IX (1950), pp. 399-439; J. Havet, 'L'Encyclique "Hum. Gen." et le polygénisme', Revue dioc. de Namur VI (1951), pp. 114-27; – 'Note complémentaire sur l'encyclique "Hum. Gen." et le polygénisme', ibid., pp. 219-24; C. Hauret, Origines de l'Univers et de l'Homme[3] (Paris 1952); M. M. Labourdette, Le Péché originel et les origines de l'homme (Paris 1953); C. Lattey, 'The Encyclical "Hum. Gen." and the origins of the human race. An answer', Scripture IV (1951), pp. 278-9; H. Lennerz, 'Quid theologo censendum est de polygenismo?' Greg. XXIX (1948), pp. 417-34; J. Levie, 'L'Encyclique "Hum. Gen.", NRT LXII (1950), pp. 785-93; V. Marcozzi, 'Poligenismo ed evoluzione nelle origini dell'uomo', Greg. XXIX (1948), pp. 343-91; – 'Le origini dell'uomo secondo l'enciclica "Hum. Gen." e secondo la scienza', Doct. Comm. I (1951), pp. 26-39; B. Mariani, 'Il poligenismo e s. Paolo (Rom 5:12-14),' Euntes Docete IV (1951), pp. 120-46; E. C. Messenger (ed.), Theology and Evolution (London 1952); C. Muller, L'Encyclique 'Hum. Gen.' et les problèmes scientifiques (Louvain 1951; on the Index); G. Picard, 'La Science expérimentale est-elle favorable au polygénisme?', Sciences Ecclésiast. IV (1951), pp. 65-89; J. Renié, Les Origines de l'humanité d'après la Bible. Mythe ou Histoire? (Lyons 1950); J. Rojas Fernandez and M. de la Cámara, El Orígen del hombre según el Génesis y a la luz de la ciencia (Madrid 1948); J. Sagüés, 'La encíclica "Hum. Gen." Avances teológicos', Estud. Eclesiast. XXV (1951) pp. 147-80; M. Schulien, L'Unità del genere umano alla luce delle ultime risultanze antropologiche, linguistiche ed etnologiche[3] (Milan 1947); E. Stakemeier, 'Die Enzyklika "Hum. Gen.", Theol. u. Glaube XL (1950), pp. 481-93; G. Vandenbroeck and L. Renwart, 'L'Encyclique "Hum. Gen." et les sciences naturelles', NRT LXXIII (1951), pp. 33751; G. Weigel, 'Gleanings from the Commentaries on "Hum. Gen.", TS XII (1951), pp. 520-49.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from Scripture; 3. The possibility of proving monogenism metaphysically.

It will be clear from this programme alone that we have no intention of setting out explicitly the teaching of Tradition, its content, its force and its limits. This is not to say that it is of no importance. But it is not difficult to see the reason for this omission. An investigation of this kind would probably compel one very soon to take up fundamental [231] theological considerations of great generality, and these cannot be undertaken with sufficient thoroughness in a short essay.

For the question would soon arise as to what constitutes a 'unanimous' witness of 'Tradition', i.e. whether the tradition is a really theological one in the strict sense. It is not easy to answer this question. For it must be borne in mind that another 'tradition' which is at least as unanimous exists in regards to the creation of the first man, a question which is very closely related to our own. And yet we know from the most recent pronouncements of the magisterium, which leave the question of some sort of transformism open to the free investigation of theology and the other sciences, that a unanimous 'tradition' like this is never sufficient of itself as a conclusive argument for a definite view which it represents; and we know then that in the case of transformism there is no certain agreement as to whether the tradition is a really theological one which binds the theologian. If we were to investigate Tradition in our case, then, we should either have to go into the difficult question of what sort of tradition was involved and what principles of discrimination were applicable, or we should have to consider not Tradition as such but the objective arguments proposed in it (on the basis of Scripture or other dogmas). It is the latter course which we shall in fact pursue in the following reflexions.

1. MONOGENISM AND THE OFFICIAL TEACHING OF THE CHURCH

I. The Encyclical 'Humani Generis'

For reasons of method we begin with the latest utterance of the magisterium to do with our question. It is not only in a purely temporal sense that it is the latest. The reason why it forms the proper starting-point of our investigation is that it is the only one to treat of the topic ex professo, and treat of it in the context of the latest controversies; thus it is the latest by reason of an acquaintance with the questions and results of modern science, which were not available in earlier times to set the background of the problem. In addition, by leaving the question of anthropological transformism open to theological discussion, 'Humani Generis' has – in appearance at least – made the theological problem more difficult. For one thing is clear from the start. It was once usual to offer a simple and direct theological proof of monogenism. Applied to the corresponding question of anthropological transformism, this would inevitably lead to its [232] condemnation as obviously false theologically. Now such a simplicity and directness cannot be correct. For if it were (just as the practice really used to be once in both questions without distinction) the Church would not be able even temporarily to leave the question of, transformism free for theological dispute. We should thus be well advised to make a start with 'Humani Generis'.

We find the following statement in the encyclical 'Humani Generis' of 1950:

> Cum vero de alia coniecturali opinione agitur, videlicet de polygenismo quem vocant, tum Ecclesiae filii eiusmodi libertate minime fruuntur. Non enim christifideles eam sententiam amplecti possunt, quam qui retinent asseverant vel post Adam hisce in terris veros homines exstitisse, qui non ab eodem prouti omnium protoparente, naturali generatione originem duxerint, vel Adam significare multitudinem quandam protoparentum; cum nequaquam

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

> appareat, quomodo huiusmodi sententia componi queat cum iis quae fontes revelatae veritatis et acta Magisterii Ecclesiae proponunt de peccato originali, quod procedit ex peccato vero commisso ab uno Adamo, quodque generatione in omnes transfusum inest unicuique proprium.[2]

There is little to be said as far as the letter of the text is concerned. The opposite opinion called 'polygenism' which the encyclical rejects, is first of all formally characterized as a coniecturalis opinio. This is a way of saying that even within the natural sciences and anthropological paleontology the view is no more than a hypothesis; so that it is not a priori impossible even from this point of view that the opinion should be rejected as false because of information derived from a source other than the sources of natural science. The description of polygenism which follows does not regard it purely as an hypothesis of natural science; it is taken up from the only viewpoint which could be of interest to theology. In this sense (i.e. looked at from the point of view of the 'Adam' of theology) polygenism is the doctrine which either leaves room for the existence, after the Adam of theology, of other men who do not belong to his bodily posterity; or which holds that 'Adam' is a collective concept which combines into one the totality [233] of human progenitors. By taking polygenism in this sense the encyclical clearly intends to avoid the question of the so-called Pre-Adamites: whether, that is to say, other human groups might not have existed before 'Adam', the sinful progenitor of the whole human race which was going to exist on earth after him, those earlier groups having died out. This view is not sanctioned, nor again is it rejected; it simply remains outside the theological discussion of the encyclical. This is not of course to say that a theologian may not hold that Pre-Adamitism is a theory which is scientifically speaking arbitrary, as well as being absurd and dangerous theologically.[3]

What is said of polygenism formally and substantially characterized in this way is that it is not a free opinion in the Church, it cannot be held. Thus it is not permitted positively to defend polygenism even as a possible theory or scientific hypothesis, the grounds of this inadmissibility being of course theological and not derived from natural science. Quite intentionally, a more precise theological qualification (for instance, 'This opinion is heretical') is not given. Thus the only theological qualification of monogenism which may be derived from the encyclical just by itself is that it is theologically certain.[4] That is to [234]

---

[2] Denz 3028. Cf. also the encyclical 'Summi Pontificatus', in which the same teaching seems to have found an earlier expression, AAS XXXI (1939), pp. 426 s.

[3] I hold that it is not sufficient to qualify this theory with Vandenbroeck and Renwart (p. 349) as merely 'antiquated and lacking in interest'. Cf. also Levie (p. 789). This seventeenth-century theory is a characteristic product of an attempt to reconcile theology and secular science (so-called) in an external and basically nominalistic way. Could anyone but a nominalist, for whom reality consists of an atomized sum of divine decrees, conceive the idea that God calls one man to a supernatural end, and another of exactly the same nature, simply to a natural end? And the angels again are joined together with one part of humanity in being given a supernatural end. Again, it would be necessary in the case of these Pre-Adamites who have come into being in this polygenistic way, that they should have died out just at the time of Adam – an arbitrary postulate. It would be improper on this view for Adam to have descended from them – another arbitrary postulate. The whole position is contrary to the way of looking at things we find in Scripture: Adam is the Man, not the surviving representative of a human group. If there had been Pre-Adamites, God can 'become man' more than once. On the basis of what calculations does this possibility cease to be realized once Adam comes into existence? No, Adam was the first man; and where for the first time a man is to be found in the metaphysical and theological sense, that is where we must look for Adam, even if this is in the late Tertiary period.

[4] We are aware of the kind of discussion this concept requires, its 'general problematic'. It is often said that something is 'theologically certain' if it can be inferred from a revealed truth only with the help of a truth of natural reason. By qualifying monogenism as theologically certain we naturally do not wish to say that the truth of monogenism cannot itself be revealed. We use this problematic theological concept in a more general sense: by 'theologically certain' we mean anything of which on the one hand it cannot be said with absolute certainty that it is revealed by God and is indubitably taught as such by the Church; and which yet on the other hand can say, according to the current state of the Church's consciousness in faith, of the doctrinal pronouncements of her magisterium and of theology, monogenism must be affirmed with inner (but not in itself irreformable) assent. And this assent must be given for two reasons: because on the one hand it has not been possible, at least up to now, to say that polygenism is without danger for assured truths of faith; and on the other because monogenism itself seems to be at least contained (mitgesagt) in doctrinal statements; and our assent must be given in so far as this is the case. Consequently opposition to monogenism – without sufficient grounds – would threaten to deprive these statements, in which monogenism is contained, of their sense, and would imply the denial of a statement of which it can be said with good reason (though not with absolute certainty) that it is to be found in the sources of Revelation. No stronger qualification – as far as the encyclical goes – can be given. For if any such attempt were made it would be easy to reply by asking why the encyclical itself does not give this stronger qualification. It would not have been difficult. And we have no right to assume that the encyclical has been lacking in courage and in theological decision.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now it is indeed theoretically possible that a pronouncement of the magisterium should in fact allow only of a weaker qualification, while a theologian could on other grounds decide for a stronger one.[5] But [235] this is highly improbable in the concrete case with which we are concerned. The clear intention of the encyclical is to exclude polygenism from theology. The simplest and most radical way of doing this would have been to declare that such a teaching was in direct contradiction to the teaching of faith, or to have branded it explicitly as heretical. If however the encyclical did not do this, it may very well be taken as a sign that the Church's magisterium does not (or does not yet) suppose such a qualification possible in the current state of her consciousness in faith and of theological reflexion. Consequently it is legitimately claim our interior assent, in such a way that a contrary doctrine is not tolerated by the Church.

---

[5] J. F. Sagüés (Sacrae Theologiae Summa II, Madrid 1952, n. 545) reviews the usual qualifications of the monogenistic thesis in these terms: 'etsi non constet thesim umquam explicite magisterio sollemni definitam, theologi eam expresse vel aequivalenter habent (a) aut communius ut de fide vel sirnpliciter (Pesch, Flick, Card. Ruffini), vel divina (Lahousse, Minges) vel etiam catholica (Janssens, van Noort, Beraza, Hugon) vel etiam saltem implicite definita (Boyer, Lercher, Pohle-Gierens, Muncunill, Daffara, Lennerz, Huarte, Bozzola); (b) aut saltem ut fidei proximam (Tanquerey, Garrigou-Lagrange)'. For Sagüés himself, 'de fide divina et catholica, imo implicite definita (Denz 788-91)'. Concerning these qualifications it must first of all be noted that nearly all of them belong before 'Humani Generis' and before a moderate transformism was permitted. Further they all belong to that period of exegesis which believed that it was possible immediately to extract the historical content of Gen 1-3 without taking into consideration its specific literary genus; on this view it was possible to hold that monogenism was stated with complete explicitness, and was thus *de fide divi*na. Finally, transformism is rejected by many of the authors cited with a correspondingly higher theological qualification. Beraza, for instance, held that every kind of transformism was temerarious in the highest degree, and cited authors who regarded the creation of man out of inorganic matter as fides catholica (Suarez, Valentia, Perrone, Katschthaler, Jungmann, Mazzella, Lahousse). Huarte held that any kind of transformism was temerarious. Hugon regarded its contrary as guaranteed by the literal sense of Scripture. For Pesch the rejection of transformism is 'evidently' taught in Scripture. Minges and Janssens hold like views. A critical revision of the methods which led to this over-emphatic qualification would doubtless show that polygenism by no means deserves exactly the same qualification as transformism; rather it would seem that the revised methods would conduce to a greater restraint in allotting theological qualifications than was practised by the authors whom Sagüés cites. Further, it would not do to get the impression that the certainty of the monogenistic doctrine is as highly qualified by all theologians as it is by Sagüés and his authorities. He himself cites Tanquerey and Garrigou-Lagrange as giving a lower qualification. To these should be added, for the period before 'Humani Generis', Diekamp-Hoffmann (fidei proximum), and in recent times C. Hauret, J. de Frame, L. Ott (sententia certa: Fundamentals of Christian Dogma[2], ET. Patrick Lynch (Cork 1958), p. 96), A. Gelin (Problèmes d'Ancien Testament (Lyons 1952); cf. Eph. Theol. Lov. XXVIII (1952), pp. 285 s.), C. Muller, J. M. Alonso, J. Havet, Labourdette. The last-named says quite rightly (p. 204): 'On sera autorisé a dire en théologie que des assertions inséparables de celle qui a été définie ne peuvent pas être niées; mais on ne le serait pas a prétendre que, du moins en vertu de ce texte-là, elles sont définies aussi. C'est ce qui nous a paru être le cas du "monogénisme".' Furthermore Sagüés himself says in regard to the qualification which may be derived from 'Humani Generis', saltem theologice certa (n. 543).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[236] hardly probable that an individual theologian by himself and on his own account should see more deeply than the magisterium. At any rate a theologian who claims no greater certainty in this question ought not to be accused of minimalism or indecision.

Many people may find this situation unsatisfactory. But it is undoubtedly an essential part of theological conviction and its growth that there should exist theological certitudes and obligations to a positive inner assent which are not 'in themselves' those proper to a definition and the assent of fides divina et catholica. If this is so, the 'per se' in the assensus per se non irreformabilis of a theological certitude ought not to be expounded so as to give the impression that this revision of assent could never occur at all. For this would be to continue verbally to grant the existence of a distinction between a theologically certain proposition and a proposition of faith (fides divina et catholica or fides ecclesiastica) while annulling it in fact: so when a theologian declares that what is involved is an assensus per se reformabilis, he must not be reproached with wanting to dissolve or to throw doubt upon the certitude of the proposition concerned. All he is doing is to apply to a given proposition what is maintained in theory by all theologians in theologia fundamentalis, and furthermore what the history of theology requires us to say.

Corresponding to this assessment in the light of 'Humani Generis' of the degree of theological certainty to be attributed to monogenism, we should note the way in which the encyclical provides grounds for its teaching. In the first place (and this is remarkable) it does not appeal to the texts of Scripture and the magisterium which speak directly of the one Adam as progenitor of all men. Had it been the view of the magisterium that it was certain that monogenism was unambiguously stated in these texts, it would simply have cited them and perhaps laid it down in an authentic interpretation that monogenism was in fact the true meaning of these texts. But in reality the encyclical merely refers us to an indirect argument: monogenism is logically presupposed by the dogma of original sin, unless this too is given an inadmissible interpretation.[6] But this connexion is itself asserted in the [237] most cautious way: the encyclical does not say: cum appareat nequaquam componi posse . . .; it says neququam appareat quomodo . . . componi queat . . . We may well suppose that this milder and more cautious formulation was chosen deliberately. What is being stated is not a positive declaration of the irreconcilability of polygenism and the Catholic doctrine of original sin, but a denial of the obviousness (not in fact to be had) of a possibility of reconciliation. It goes without saying that a formulation of this kind neither offers the slightest indication nor makes any positive affirmation as to whether at some later date this reconcilability might not or could not be recognized. Thus it cannot be said that the encyclical positively 'leaves the door open' for some future polygenistic theory. Nor, on the other hand, is any positive statement made to the effect that something of the sort is always going to be impossible. Thus the attitude adopted is precisely that which theology describes with respect to the propositions which it calls theologically certain. Of course the fact that the encyclical restricts itself to this indirect probative procedure with a reference to the dogma of original sin does not mean that the theologian is prevented from bringing other arguments to bear in favour of monogenism. Admittedly it would hardly be modest if he wished meanwhile to claim for such an argument – looked at theologically and in view of a theological qualification – a greater degree of [6] This is obviously what the phrase 'ex peccato vere commisso' points to. One tendency in modern Protestant exegesis, which has found favour here and there even among Catholic theologians (though this sympathy has not manifested itself in a literary form), has been to deny the 'actuality ('Tat'-sächlichkeit) of a once-for-all historical process at the beginning of human history, and to make of original sin (as peccatum originale originans) the mythological expression of a condition 'always and everywhere' to be found because of what man himself is as such: thus original sin takes place always and everywhere. On this view of original sin there could obviously be no question of presupposing monogenism. (It is often important to remember that the ordinary German expression for original sin, Erbsünde, means literally 'hereditary sin'. – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

stringency than for the argument briefly sketched by the encyclical.

In view of the firm attitude of the magisterium in this matter and its wise restraint, one is bound to conclude that its previous utterances as regards our question cannot be regarded with absolute certainty and clarity as a formal definition of monogenism. It is clear first of all that up till now (leaving aside the decree of the Biblical Commission, which is not a definition) the Church has never imposed her anathema on polygenism as such in a decision having the form of a definition, directly and explicitly taking up a stand with regard to it. For up till now it has not been a centre of theological interest, and a definitory [238] intention of this kind, formally directed against polygenism, is nowhere to be demonstrated. Moreover, in view of the attitude adopted by the encyclical, it is not even possible to speak of monogenism as certainly contained in the Tridentine doctrine of original sin in virtue of so formal an implication that it would have to be called an implicitly defined truth of faith (granting that there was no intention of defining it directly). For the question precisely arises as to whether the single sinful ancestor of all men, of whom the definition speaks, must necessarily be understood in the sense of monogenism alone; and this not merely as an idea belonging in historical fact to the mental background of the Fathers of the Council, but as something which the intention was to teach in the form of a definition. It is possible to show (as we shall try to do) that an objective connexion holds between monogenism and the Council's teaching on original sin, in such wise that to contest the former is implicitly to deny the latter. But at the moment, at any rate, the demonstration of this connexion is by no means so immediately obvious quoad nos that one can speak without hesitation of a formal implication of monogenism in the Tridentine teaching on original sin, and could thus claim for it the status of something in fact already defined in substance. If that were the case, the encyclical would not have stated the connexion with such prudent restraint.

We need not here go into detail about the occasion of this teaching of the ordinary magisterium. It is well known that there were individual theologians in the years before the appearance of 'Humani Generis' who believed that the polygenist theory was an open question in the same sense as transformism, the solution of which could be left to the natural scientists.[7] And in individual cases polygenism was [239] positively maintained. Other theologians were doubtful about the theological certainty of monogenism. Consequently attempts were made here and there to assess the possibility of reconciling polygenism with the Church's doctrine of original sin: the assumption relied on here was that a plurality of ancestors could jointly act as the cause of original sin, and this plurality of ancestors was combined in Scripture in the idea of the one Adam.

2. The Decree of the Biblical Commission of 1909 (Denz 2123)

[7] The names of a few writers may be mentioned here, not so as to brand them as 'polygenists', but because they raise in their writings, more or less circumspectly, the question whether polygenism might not be an open problem for the theologian: E. Amann, 'Préadamites', DTC XII (1933), col. 2799 s.; – 'Transformisme', DTC XV (1946), col. 389 S.; J. Bataini, 'Monogénisme et Polygénisme', Div. Thom. (Piac.) XXVI (1949), pp. 187-201; A. and J. Bouyssonie, 'Polygénisme', DTC XII (1933), cols. 2520-36, esp. 2534 s.; J. Chaine, Le Livre de la Genèse (Paris 1948), p. 54 s.; A. M. Dubarle, Les Sages d'Israel (Paris 1946), p. 21 s.; – 'Sciences de la vie et dogme chrétien', La Vie Intell. XV (1946), p. 624; J. Guitton, La Pensée moderne et le catholicisme (Aix 1936), p. 39; A. Liénard, 'Le Chrétien devant les progrès de la science', Etudes CCLV (1947), pp. 299 s.; A. Mancini, 'Monogenismo e polygenismo. Informazioni', Pal. del Clero XXVIII (1949), pp. 904-8; B. Prete, 'A proposito del poligenismo', Sap. 1 (1948), pp. 420 s.; H. Rondet, 'Les Origines humaines et la theologie. Problèmes pour la réflexion chrétienne', Cité Nouvelle (= Etudes) 1 (1943), pp. 973-87.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

However readily one may grant that the more recent declarations of the magisterium[8] permit of or authorize, a wider interpretation of the decree of the Biblical Commission of 1909, no one can doubt the force of this decree even today.[9] As regards the matter with which we are concerned, the decree teaches that among other things the generis humani unitas too belongs to the historical content of Gen 2-3. The expression may in itself be undefined and vague, but it cannot be doubted that what is meant is the monogenistic unity of the human race, and not some merely specific or other conceivable unity. For the specific unity is not in question; and any other unity (apart from the two just mentioned) is not easy to grasp. It would, as it were, have to be discovered or invented first; so that the decree cannot have had it in mind. Thus a concept not yet available would first have to be found; and it would further have to be shown of this concept that it does as much justice to the ultimate theological intention of the decree as monogenistic unity, which the decree without any doubt had primarily in mind. Thus it can be said that in virtue of the continuing force of this decree monogenism is theologically certain, as the single [240] tangible point so far as we are concerned here: a result which takes us no further than 'Humani Generis'. It is stated in the decree that this unitas belongs to the sensus litteralis historicus of the first three chapters of Genesis. We may ignore the fact that the concept of the sensus litteralis historicus has undergone a sharpening of definition – and in some respects a restriction – as a result of the declarations already mentioned. Even so, the conclusion we have reached leaves an important question open: do purely exegetical means allow us to establish the fact that the monogenistic unity of man is contained in Gen 2-3? Nothing is stated on this point. We cannot simply take it for granted that it was the intention of the decree to indicate the possibility of doing so as something which goes without saying. For then we should also have to say, for example, that purely exegetical means (without the help, therefore, of the rest of Scripture and of Tradition) would allow us to derive with certainty from Gen 3:18 the Reparatoris futuri promissio. It may well be doubted whether all exegetes would undertake such a task.[10] In other words, the decree of 1909 does not require us to maintain that the monogenistic unity of the human race is not only contained in Gen 2-3, but also that it can be derived from this text by purely exegetical means and thus can be known from it quoad nos. Thus a theologian who is not prepared to admit the stringency of such a proof does not go counter to the decree. Obviously this is to say nothing against the possibility of such an exegesis: the question is left open. Thus the encyclical's approach has already been preformed, as it were, inasmuch as it does not prove monogenism simply by a Scriptural citation (say Gen 2:6 s. 18.21; 3:20; Ac 17:24-26) but by a process of theological discussion. We can sum up, then, by saying that the decree of the Biblical Commission of 1909 takes us no further than the teaching of 'Humani Generis', either as regards theological qualification or by way of supplying fresh grounds of proof.

3. The Council of Trent

[8] It is expressly said in the reply of the Secretary of the Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard, a reply sanctioned by Pius XII, that this decree should be understood and interpreted in the light of the Pope's recommendations, in which exegetes are encouraged to make afresh approach to difficult problems in such a way that their solution might be in full harmony not only with orthodox doctrine but also with the assured results of modern science. Thus it is emphatically maintained that the decree in no way prohibits a more searching examination of the problems in question in accordance with the results of research over the last forty years (Denz 3002).

[9] Cf. Denz 3002; 3029.

[10] Flick says (p. 558): 'Anche sei testi biblici dell'Antico Testamento potessero, considerati astrattamente, non repugnare assolutamente al poligenismo . . . '

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the canons of the Council of Trent on original sin many theologians see an implicit definition of monogenism.[11] Clearly it is impossible [241] here to examine more closely what is really meant by 'implicitly defined'; whether such a concept allows of being reconciled with CIC c. 1323 §3, or whether 'defined' (and so 'manifeste' ascertained to be defined)[12] and 'by way of inclusion' (and so, while not perhaps 'manifeste', yet ascertained to be defined) do not cancel each other out.[13] Let us adopt as simple as possible a way of establishing what the Council of Trent has to say to us.

We should first remind ourselves of two obvious points which are easily forgotten. On the one hand, it is possible for a Council to teach or to define something even when it has no knowledge of the problems which only arise later in connexion with its teaching. Thus it would be wrong to say or to assume that, because the Council had no knowledge of polygenism and monogenism as a problem of secular science, therefore it is a priori impossible that it should have said anything of importance on this matter. On the other hand, it is not a priori impossible that a Council should formulate a doctrinal statement in such a way that one could see in the light of historical studies that the statement has been reached under the influence of a presupposition which turns out later to be false or unnecessary. The essential proviso here is that the presupposition actually made is not itself expressed (and so is no more than an actual presupposition of the mode of expression), and that what is really expressed has its own objective validity apart from the presupposition. We may take an example from a field quite [242] close to our own. The Council of Carthage, followed by many other Councils and doctrinal pronouncements, says (Denz 102) that original sin is incurred generatione. Speaking as historians, we must say that the Fathers of the Council thought of generatio in an Augustinian way, as involving libido; in other words, they thought of generation as communicating original sin because and in so far as it is bound up with sexual desire; and we must say then that this idea was one of the reasons which made them formulate their statement in just the way they did. But this does not prevent us from saying today (any more than it did in the Middle Ages) that what was stated in the definition of Carthage retains its validity even without this idea[14], and that what is presupposed by the formulation (not the formulation itself) is false. In other words, not everything which can be learned from the text of the definition as belonging to the mind of the definer is by that very fact defined. It may be said, conversely, that something is co-defined (mitdefiniert) which, although it is not directly intended by the definer as properly speaking to be defined, fulfils the two following conditions. Firstly, it must have been certainly compresent to the definer's mind (mitgedacht); and secondly, which is more important, it must stand in so immediate, so immediately evident and indissoluble a connexion with the proper and direct matter of the definition, that it is impossible in fact or in thought that it too should not bear the whole

[11] See above, p. 234, n. 1: all the theologians who hold that monogenism is (at the very least) implicitly defined have the Council of Trent in mind.

[12] One might well ask if something can be ascertained to be defined 'manifeste' except when the intention of the definition is known. But this is precisely not given in the case of something implicite definitum. (The text of CIC c. 1323 §3 runs: 'Declarata seu definita dogmatice res nulla intelligitur, nisi id manifeste constiterit.' – Tr.)

[13] If implicite definitum means no more than 'implicitly contained in a definition', such that this being-contained can be brought to expression by logical operations, then there is of course no doubt that something of the sort exists. What is doubtful, however, is whether it can be said to be 'defined'. One would have to go on to ask what the various ways are in which a proposition may be implicitly contained in another (defined) statement, and what degree of certainty the implicit proposition has, compared to that of the other proposition, according to which of the ways it is contained (formal or virtual implication; two concepts, again, whose meaning it is not easy to set out clearly and sharply). The controversies, still not settled, over fides divina and fides ecclesiastica and their relationship in the matter of what can be defined as revealed by God, show how many obscurities remain in the apparently simple concept of something implicite definitum.

[14] This idea is still very clearly to be seen at work in the discussions of the Council of Trent.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

weight of the affirmation given to the proper content of the definition.[15] If this is not the case, i.e. if the connexion between what was compresent to mind and what was properly intended by the definition is not seen quite directly and quite explicitly as such, although it is quite objectively given and even demonstrable, then what was compresent to mind cannot be spoken of as defined. We could say that it can be derived from a definition as a presupposition or a consequence of what is contained in the definition; but it cannot be said to be affirmed by the definer with that absolute affirmation which he gives to the proper content of his definition. For suppose one were to ask the definer in [243] such a case, 'Are you affirming what was in fact compresent to your mind just as absolutely as what you properly defined, and are you doing so for the very reason that this latter is what you are defining?' Then in this given case he would have to reply, 'I must think about this first, i.e. I must first reflect on the connexion between what is defined and what was merely compresent to my mind (as a matter of fact, first and foremost).' But what he is saying here implicitly is that he has not defined what was compresent to his mind at the time, but only that he might be in a position to define it on some future occasion, when in fact there emerges on further explicit reflexion an indissoluble connexion between what was defined and what was compresent to mind at the time. Thus this affirmation of the possibility of definition depends (so far as the individual theologian is concerned) on the stringency of the knowledge of this connexion.

If we apply what has been said to the canons of the Council of Trent, the following conclusions would seem to be true.

a. The Fathers of the Council had no intention of defining monogenism, nor does anyone in fact assert this. The definition and so its substance are directed against the Pelagian denial, renewed by Erasmus[16], of the existence of a hereditary sin; in this heresy the condition of sinfulness prior to personal sin is replaced by personal sins which each person commits for himself in his own lifetime, though certainly in imitation of Adam. Because the Council's intention was to define the existence of hereditary sin over against personal guilt, we cannot say that the phrase 'origine unum' (in the sense of a chain of causality derived from a single individual) is as such defined. If this were the case, we could obviously say that monogenism was defined implicitly. But is this the case? That precisely is the question.[17] It is a question which cannot simply be answered in the affirmative without further proof if it was indeed the intention of the Council to establish the existence of a state of guilt prior to personal sins against the teaching [244] of Pelagianism (and of Pelagian essays at the time of the Council, such as that of Erasmus). Certainly no one denies that the Council could have taught more and even defined more than what is necessarily posited in the mere contradictory opposite of the rejected heresy. But the question is whether it has in fact done so, that is (in our case), whether as well as just teaching the unity of origin of hereditary sin it also defined it; and further (this too) defined it in such a way that a 'moral' unity of origin of hereditary sin is not merely something which did not enter the Council's field of vision but has been objectively excluded by means of an authentic definition. But the proof of this is so complicated as itself to serve as a proof that there can be no question of a definition here but rather of an inference [15] One could ultimately in this case speak of something 'implicitly defined'. But in our view it would seem preferable to say that what we have here is something (expressly) 'co-defined', something clearly and unavoidably 'co-expressed' in the definition, possessing the same theological grade as that upon which the intention to express directly bears.

[16] Cf., e.g., S. Ehses, Concilium Tridentinum V, p. 212. References will also be found here to Erasmus's teaching on original sin as an imitatio of Adam's sin.

[17] Lennerz (p. 421) seems simply to assume this. This makes it very difficult to see why the only use he makes of the consideration that polygenism does away with the unity of origin of hereditary sin is to show that monogenism is not a matter of indifference to dogma (p. 423).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

from what was defined.

b. There is no doubt that in this definition there is contained a statement (mitgesagt) that a single individual stands at the beginning of human history, who as 'first man'[18] and as ancestor of all men handed down original sin to his posterity by means of the natural bond of generation (Denz 788, 789, 791, 793). Original sin is spoken of as origine unum (Denz 790), in saying which the Fathers of the Council once again had in mind the single deed of a single historical ancestor. It cannot be doubted that the Conciliar Fathers had in mind only a single, numerically individual person at the beginning of human history, who by means of his unique historical act instituted the sinfulness of the race, a sinfulness which becomes each individual man's own in so far as he is connected with his fellows and so with the first ancestor by a bond of natural, biological generation. It cannot be doubted that the whole Tridentine teaching on original sin is formulated on this presupposition. Nor is it a matter for doubt that something contained (mitgesagt) in this way in the solemn definition of a fundamental dogma is of great theological weight, even if it is not defined.

[245] c. Yet it may be doubted whether monogenism is itself implicitly defined or, better, co-defined (mitdefiniert). The question here is no longer whether it is clearly a necessary presupposition of the Tridentine teaching. To demonstrate this would still be far conceptually from demonstrating that what we have here is an implicit definition. This would only be demonstrated once it had first been shown that what was concurrently asserted (Mit-gesagte) by the Conciliar Fathers about monogenism was for them so precisely and immediately a composite part (mitgesetzt) of their doctrine of hereditary sin that their absolute affirmation of the one had to extend with the same force and unambiguity to the other – and this is doubtful. Once again we have to start from the fact that the Conciliar Fathers did not want to define monogenism. But then the burden of proof does not fall upon those who doubt the status of monogenism as something defined but on those who assert it. This proof is not effected by demonstrating that monogenism is concurrently asserted by the Fathers in the definition of the doctrine of original sin, nor even when it is clear over and above this that the Conciliar Fathers did not engage in reflexion as to the possibility or impossibility of separating what was defined and what was concurrently asserted, or that the Fathers knew nothing of such a possibility, or (had they turned their minds to this question) would have rejected it. All this can in certain circumstances prove that anyone who defines the Conciliar doctrine of original sin or affirms it absolutely must logically do this in respect of monogenism, but not that he has already done so.

The question ultimately amounts to this: does what the Council defined concerning original sin stand in an objectively indissoluble and immediate connexion with monogenism? If the connexion exists, and exists immediately and so is clearly to be seen immediately and at once, then it is possible to speak of an implicit definition. If the connexion does indeed exist, but the demonstration of the indissoluble connexion requires relatively involved consideration which, looked at in itself, is not entirely free from doubt, then we can speak of a possibility of definition (definability) and of a theological certainty, but not of a definition already (implicitly) achieved. We shall be concerned in Section II with the demonstration of this connexion, and it will appear there that a demonstration is not as simple as it might seem at first sight. In other words the doctrine of a state of sin pertaining to a number of men in [18] If Adam is the primus homo (Denz 788) in relation to omne genus humanum (Denz 789), to omnes homines, then the defenders of an implicit definition of monogenism would also have to say (if they are consistent) that the falsehood of any Pre-Adamite theory is equally defined implicitly. The fact that they do not do so, but rather expressly reject this view, puts the affirmation of the implicit definition of monogenism in an unfavourable light.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

virtue of an historical event prior to an individual [246] act of sin committed by each one of them does indeed imply monogenism (as we shall see); but it does not imply it with that immediacy which would be necessary for an implicit definition.

It might be objected that instead of 'historical event' in the previous sentence what should have been said (as in the Council) was precisely 'through the historical act of an individual', which would have made the whole matter clear and clearly in favour of an implicit definition of monogenism. The answer to this is twofold. (a) In this case too, monogenism would unquestionably be defined if the 'generatione (propagatione)', so far as it means more than just the contradictory opposite of 'imitatione', were regarded as defined in the sense of a mode in which hereditary sin is handed down. That is, it would have to be defined not only that a guilt derived from someone else exists prior to the personal decision of the individual (non imitatione), but that; this can be inherited only by a biological bond of generation with the historical cause of this guilt ('generatione' as more than 'non imitatione'). De Frame for example contests this.[19] In other words it could be asked whether the 'generatione' (in so far as it is the object of the definition) means more than 'non imitatione'.[20] If this were not the [247] case, the fact that the Council speaks of the guilt of an individual does not lead in this case either to any clear consequence in the direction of monogenism. However, we do not intend to examine this question here. (b) But that is not the main answer to this objection. As we shall see, it may be shown with sufficient certainty that the 'individual' of which the Council speaks as the originator of hereditary sin must really be an individual, because otherwise the defined doctrine of hereditary sin would no longer retain its force. But what is not proved by this is that this unique individuality of 'Adam' is itself thereby defined.

4. The Vatican Council[21]

[19] Pp. 57-62. (If this is a reference to the article cited at the beginning of this study, it is obviously wrong, but I have not been able to check it. – Tr.)

[20] Not much information on this point is to be gained from the Conciliar discussions. It is generally evident that the precise point of our question was not under consideration. There was a desire to repudiate the Pelagian error, which instead of original sin only admitted an imitatio of the first sinner. Ideas about why and how generatio, *propagati*o handed on original sin were pretty confused. There was still a widespread idea that the cause of the handing down of original sin was an infection of the flesh due to generatio, and theologians were still fairly far from regarding generatio as a pure, non-causal condition under which original sin was passed on (cf., e.g., Ehses V, p. 174: propagatione et libidine inordinata transfunditur; p. 176: the caro corrupta causes original sin in the soul infused into it; similarly p. 180; p. 166: contrahitur ex carne infecta; p. 181: transfunditur in omnes ex carne infecta ex generatione, offered as a summary of the view of the Conciliar Fathers!). This fact alone warns us of the need for a certain caution. If we were to take 'propagatione' as defined even in so far as it says more than 'non imitatione' (it is often spoken of in the acts of the Council as a pure opposite of 'imitatione'), then it would be strictly consistent to say that it should be taken in the sense in which most of the Conciliar Fathers took it: in the Augustinian sense of the corruption of the flesh due to 'libidinous' generation as the immediate cause of the soul's infection with guilt.

[21] For the following see: Collectio Lacensis VII, col. p 515 s. (the theologians' schema, chiefly due to Franzelin, 'De doctrina catholica cap. 15: de communi totius humani generis origine ab uno Adamo'); col. 544, n. 3 (a note on this chapter of the schema); col. 555 (Schema reformatum constitutionis dogmaticae de doctrina catholica, cap. 2: 'De hominis creatione et natura'); col. 566 (canon II, 4 of the canons of the revised schema: 'Si quis universum genus humanum ab uno protoparente Adam ortum esse negaverit: anathema sit'); col. 1633 (cap. 6 of the schema as revised by Martin and Kleutgen); col. 1637 (the corresponding canon of the revised schema: 'Si quis universum genus humanum ab uno protoparente ortum esse negaverit: anathema sit'). As is well known, only the first four chapters of this schema were thoroughly discussed by the Council's Deputatio de fide (January – March 1870) and laid before the Council in the form of a proposal for a constitutio dogmatica de fide catholica in its own right (col. 69.s.). The Deputatio de fide did indeed continue to discuss the second part of the original schema; but this part never reached the General Congregation of the Council, still less was it voted upon in a public sitting.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

In the original schema of a 'Constitutio dogmatica de doctrina catholica contra multiplices errores ex rationalismo derivatos' monogenism was included as a doctrine of faith, and the polygenism which opposed it was branded as heretical. Appeal was made for this purpose to the explicit testimony of Scripture in the Old and New Testaments (Gen 1:28; 3:20; Wis 10:1; Ac 17:26), and it was pointed out that the denial of monogenism infringed (violatur) both the dogma of original sin as well as that of the redemption of all men by the one Christ, and thus came into conflict with Rom 5:18.[22] The [248] discontinuation of the Council prevented any further treatment of the schema.

The first thing to strike one about the much-revised schema is the fact that neither chapter nor canon make allowance for any kind of Pre-Adamitism. Had the text been defined in the form proposed, this theory, which 'Humani Generis' prudently avoids, would have been heretical, which suggests the need for a certain prudence in our estimate of the schema. And this is independent of the fact that it did not achieve the status of a definition, that it is not the last word for theology: we must not be in too much of a hurry to wonder how things might have gone, if... Otherwise one could also pronounce sentence on Molinism, for example, in view of the fate it suffered at the hands of the theologians during the congregations de Auxiliis.[23] Nor ought the general parallels between the decree 'De Doctrina Catholica' of the Provincial Council of Cologne in 1860 and the Vatican schema to be overlooked. These are especially noteworthy as regards the title, purpose and choice of matters dealt with. Chapter 14 of the Cologne decree[24] rejects equally transformism (even in [249] respect of the body only) and polygenism. Now it is indeed worthy of note that the Vatican schema touches on the question of transformism with the utmost caution, by using Biblical expressions (formavit de limo terrae; corpore de limo terrae formato) to describe the genesis of man, so as to turn its full attention to the other error against which the Council of Cologne protested. Perhaps this may be taken as an indication that the two points in question were not regarded as entirely equivalent even then. But on the other hand the parallels between the Cologne decree (which was confirmed by Rome in its rejection of moderate transformism too) and the Vatican schema show that a certain prudence is in place with regard to an opinion of theologians (even if it is a general one) in questions of this kind. From the point of view of the magisterium the Vatican schema is no more than an unofficial product of the labour of theologians. It can only have a theological weight over and above the weight of the arguments it adduces if and in so far as it can be said to reflect the general teaching of the [22] The annotations to the first schema (col. 544) still further developed this indirect argument. It is said there that doubt was cast upon monogenism 'nostra aetate ab hominibus quibusdam ex levissimis rationibus geologicis et ethnographicis'. Labourdette himself (p. 158) remarks: 'On ne pourrait plus parler aujourd'hui avec cette hauteur'. In the revised schema the direct argument is brought more into the foreground; here it is said (col. 555) that polygenism does injury to (laeditur) the dogmas of original sin and redemption. In the note it is further added: 'tertium dogma, quod statuitur, est unitas generis humani, de quo nulla est difficultas'. In the further revision by Martin and Kleutgen (col. 1633) recourse is had only to the direct argument with the help of Wis 10:1 and Ac 17:26. Not much was said on this question in the course of the Council. The American Bishop of Savannah, A. Vérot (who in his speech sought, let it be noted in passing, an explicit rehabilitation of Galileo), took it up in the sixth general meeting (3.1.1870). He objected to the phrase 'ex levissimis rationibus' of the theologians' annotation: the reasons, he maintained, were much more serious, and it was only the authority of Scripture which prevented him from giving them his assent. In his view the schema (on this point) laid undue emphasis on German errors, and overlooked French and English representatives of erroneous teaching, as well as American polygenism in the form of a theoretical justification for racial discrimination. (Cf. Granderath, Geschichte des Vat. Konz. II, p. 100 s.; Hauret, p. 174 s.)

[23] Rabeneck says, quite rightly, 'neque quidquam iuvat illuc confugere librum concordiae aegerrime tantum condemnationem sedis Apostolicae evasisse. In eiusmodi rebus quod paene accidit pro nihilo habendum est' (Archivum hist. S.J. XIX (1950), p. 140). Of course we do not wish to suggest that the two cases are simply parallel; there is, nevertheless, a certain analogy.

[24] Coll. Lac. V, col. 292.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theologians of the time, and so serve as a token of something of more importance than this theological labour purely by itself. But precisely this general view of the theologians, as it takes clear shape in the schema, hardly justifies a higher theological qualification than that we have already arrived at on the basis of more definite pronouncements of the Church. For the case of transformism, with regard to which the theologians of the time, generally speaking, took up the same attitude as with regard to polygenism, shows that an irreformable position is by no means reached by simply establishing the fact of a consensus of opinion (even when this consensus claims to be related to a theologically relevant question).

The results of this investigation into the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church may be summed up by saying that monogenism is to be qualified as theologically certain. Neither a higher nor a lower theological qualification would seem to be justified in the present state of the question. In view of the fact that the pronouncements we have examined or at least the most recent of them taken from 'Humani Generis' are extremely explicit, it is not to be expected that an appeal to the ordinary magisterium in its usual teaching would produce a different result. For it is not to be supposed that the Church's magisterium at the moment wishes to have this question treated in ordinary instruction and preaching and so on otherwise than in its own most explicit treatment in 'Humani Generis'. There is no need to [250] repeat here the other observations and positions at which we have arrived.

Nevertheless a general remark will not be out of place here. Some readers may have had the impression that we have as it were haggled about the Church's doctrinal pronouncements, practising the utmost theological minimalism and juridical formalism, always concerned to make their demand on us nothing more than is absolutely unavoidable. As regards such an impression it should be remembered that we Catholics rightly insist that the Scriptures can only be read rightly in and with the living Church, and under the guidance of her magisterium as it is actually exercised in a given situation at any particular moment; it should be remembered that the historical letter of the Bible by itself does not fully guarantee the assimilation of the truth therein expressed by a spiritual subject who belongs to another age and whose historical perspective is unavoidably different. If this is true of the Scriptures as God's Word, it is obviously true too of the historical letter of an earlier Council or of some other pronouncement of the Church of earlier times. We Catholics, then, have neither the duty nor the right so to conduct ourselves with regard to an earlier doctrinal pronouncement of the Church – like the old Protestants with regard to the Bible – as if from it alone, independently of the magisterium today, all the teaching we need, the answer to every problem which afflicts us for the first time today, could unambiguously be obtained. For a Catholic, then, who believes in the guidance of the magisterium today by the Holy Spirit, the prudent and restrained appraisal of what may be obtained with certainty from old pronouncements of the Church for a question of today, is simply a consequence of a twofold conviction. Precisely as a Catholic he holds that every age has its own questions, because it is not always simply the same thing that happens in history – even in the history of the Spirit; and he holds that the living magisterium of the moment so preserves the old that a real advance in knowledge is possible, and that what is said is not just an exact repetition of what has always been said. Consequently when the magisterium today adopts a clearcut and yet restrained attitude with regard to our question, there is still less ground for saying that more is to be learned from old declarations of the magisterium than from modern ones. To establish the fact that this restraint exists is not even remotely to insinuate that the present attitude is perhaps going to be revised in favour of some form of polygenism, just as little as if someone a few centuries [251] ago were to have qualified the Assumption as 'merely' certain theologically (and it was to this and no more that he would have at that time been obliged).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

II. MONOGENISM AND THE SCRIPTURES

The subject of this second section falls naturally into two parts. First we must discuss the question as to whether it may be said, and with what certainty, that Scripture testifies directly to monogenism. Secondly we must consider whether other Scriptural doctrines postulate monogenism as a necessary presupposition. In this second matter we shall proceed first by presupposing the teaching of the Church as an authentic interpretation of the given Scriptural doctrine; then try to show that monogenism is really presupposed by this doctrine. The method may not be that of 'pure' Biblical theology, but it has much to recommend it here. We are by this means relieved of a task which we should otherwise be incapable of fulfilling in this context, the task of opening out and establishing according to the methods of Biblical theology the doctrines of original sin and redemption in the Scriptures, and of doing this in extenso and taking all the pains required by such a task. We are specially justified in adopting this method here because the Church's doctrine of original sin presents itself not only as true in itself and revealed, but also as an authentic interpretation of Scripture itself.[25] In this way we can carry out what we have so far omitted from our consideration of the Church's doctrine concerning monogenism, and that is to ask ourselves whether the Church's doctrine of Original Sin does not necessarily contain monogenism objectively, even if it cannot be said to be implicitly defined there. Nor does this method prevent us from making ourselves clear about whether the certainty we seek does not vary, both as regards the starting-point of the deduction and as regards the process of inference, [252] according as we regard Scripture alone or together with the utterances of the Church's magisterium bearing on our question.

A. The Direct Proof, its possibility and limits

1. The Old Testament

a. Gen 2-3. Because there is no doubt that Wis 10:1 looks back to Gen 1-3, while there are no other Old Testament texts of importance, we must begin by considering the doctrine of Gen 1-3.

It is of course impossible to develop here all the hermeneutic principles which must be presupposed if we are to establish what the inspired author of these chapters wishes to tell us, the real content of his teaching so far as it is binding theologically. We have to take these principles for granted. There is no difficulty in assuming them in so far as they are generally acknowledged; where differences of opinion persist, we shall content ourselves with the mere application of those principles which seem to us to be correct and which we believe to be in harmony with the principles which according to the Church's magisterium hold good for everyone in the interpretation of this chapter.

There is no doubt that in Gen 2-3[26] an individual man is set before us; before him there [25] Cf. Denz 789, 791. When it is said that Rom 5 contains the Church's doctrine of original sin and that this too is expressed in the canon just cited, the question obviously still remains open as to how far this content may be extracted by purely exegetical means. It is not easy to hold the proper mean here between an exegetical semi-agnosticism and an attitude in which one behaves as though the Biblical theologian had no real need of the Church's understanding in faith and her m*agisterium*. Cf. the study by J. Levie, taking precisely our question as an example, 'Les limites de la preuve d'Ecriture Sainte en théologie', NRT LXXI (1949) pp. 1009-29.

[26] We may ignore Gen. 1:26-8. Ceuppens (p. 25), Hauret (p. 162) and others have justly declared that monogenism could not be proved from this text. All that is said here is that God created 'man' ('den Menschen'), in two sexes. We have a statement of the origination of the species and of the duality of the sexes

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

was no man who could cultivate the earth, he was 'alone', and it was only by a fresh divine intervention that he was given a companion of the same rank who did not exist before and who was to become the mother of all the living (cf. Gen 2:6.7.18.21 s.; 3:20). The Adam who is portrayed as the ancestor of all men is portrayed as an individual. Does this mean that according to the testimony and in the intention of the author of Genesis he was eo ipso an individual? What we have just established merely gives rise to this question but as yet provides no answer to it. For the question precisely arises as to what the author meant to say by this portrayal in symbolic and dramatic terms. Anyone who says that the question has already [253] been answered by what has been established is asserting that we have before us an historical report in the modern sense of the word: a statement, that is, whose genus litterarium itself is historical [27] in the modern sense, and not just a statement the content of which – in a sense to be more sharply defined – is constituted by an historical state of affairs. In other words, what we have to ask is whether, in the intention of the author of Genesis, Adam's individuality belongs to the mode of expression or to the (historical) content of these chapters. This question must in any case be put, in the present state of hermeneutic principles regarding the literary genre of the first chapters of Genesis. A mere citation of the sentences from Genesis in dispute, together with the assertion that monogenism is in fact unmistakably and palpably referred to there, is simply not possible any longer. By methods hike this one could equally prove that the creation of the world in six days or God's immediate formation of man out of the slime of the earth were 'acknowledged facts'. For it is really not at all clear at first sight why one rather than the other should belong to what is 'expressed' or 'meant'. And yet, while granting the methodological necessity of putting the question, people are quite prepared today to say that monogenism belongs to the content and not to the mode of what is expressed, because otherwise the statement would no longer have any historical content at all.[28]

[254] But is this really so certain? First of all, what is said about the one Adam and the one Eve is found in a narrative context of a symbolic and dramatic kind. Is the distinct individuality of the persons put before us an independent element of the account, for which as such by itself an historical content must be sought? One cannot just arbitrarily detach a by God, and nothing more. Lennerz leaves the question open (p. 429).

---

[27] A statement may be (a) historical in its mode of expression (and yet in certain circumstances be unhistorical as regards its content, namely when it is erroneous). It is historical in its mode of expression when it describes the historical object in the categories proper to it as an observable phenomenon. A statement may (b) have an historical content (and be unhistorical in its mode of expression), i.e. describe the historical object intended in categories which are not those which an observer and reporter would arrive at by an examination of the historical event in the mode of manifestation proper to it. Expressions like 'the falling to earth of the stars', 'the coming of the Son of Man on the clouds of the air', 'the sounding of the archangel's trumpet' do refer to a (future) historical event (not a supra-temporal truth); but if the historical event intended were portrayed as an observer then in existence would be able to observe and narrate it, presumably there would appear in the portrayal neither the sound of a trumpet nor a cloud nor a star falling to earth. The historical content and the historical mode of expression (= historical genus litterarium) are two different things.

[28] Cf., e.g., Lennerz, p. 431, Sagüés, n. 546. I must admit that both these eminent theologians seem to me to reach their conclusions rather too abruptly. 'Nam,' says Sagüés about these texts, 'ea, nisi negentur aliquid historice verum continere, saltem monogenismum docere putanda sunt'. And Lennerz says, 'Non iam apparet quid in tota illa narratione veri remaneat de origine generis humani. Si ergo hoc loco aliquid de origine generis humani dicitur, non potest esse nisi monogenismus'. No more is said on this capital point; all we hear is this one assertion. But is it so certain from the first that the whole narrative of the first human pair could have no historical content apart from that of monogenism? The matter is still simpler in the case of Ceuppens (p. 25). After going through the texts (Gen 2:5-7, 18-23) he says simply, 'De ce passage il ressort assez clairement, je pense, qu'à l'origine Dieu ne créa qu'un homme et une femme'. In this way the exegesis of the texts is disposed of. It is really not clear why by such methods one could not also prove that any kind of transformism is 'assez clairement' in contradiction with Scripture; yet Ceuppens will not allow this for Adam, although for Eve again he maintains it strictly.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

single element from its total context and ask what its particular content may be. If one were to do this, could one not also consistently look for the historical content of 'God's walking in the cool of the day' and 'the sound of his feet' in Gen 3:8? Must we suppose that the first man was a husbandman, because otherwise Gen 2:15 would lack historical content? It is by no means asserted that the former case and the two latter are equivalent. But where is the strict and positive proof that they are not? Even if we ignore this preliminary difficulty, the question remains: is it true and above all is it proved that the account of the one man would cease to have any historical content if it were not understood 'literally' in a monogenistic sense? From the purely exegetical standpoint, is it agreed that this account is certainly intended to give expression to ('to teach') more than the real and genuine community of all men among themselves, who, being created by one and the same God, are meant to possess, in spite of their great mutual differences, a single nature, a single goal and a common history of salvation and damnation? We should recall the tendency of the Oriental mind to think in concrete and personalistic terms and to see the foundation of every sociological unity in a single king or a single ancestor.[29] Is it not conceivable that [255] the mutual community based upon the single divine origin of man and the unity of his nature, the family relationship of all men should be given expression by putting it before our eyes in the form of an image of a unique clan with a unique ancestor? From the purely exegetical point of view, is it immediately certain that this is insufficient as the historical content of the 'description populaire des origines du genre humain' (Denz 3002)? Nor can it be said that this content is insignificant and obvious. The fact that all men of the most diverse peoples are children of the one God and form one family was not even at that time simply a matter of course. How should this specific and historical unity be expressed in a 'langage simple et figuré, adapté aux intelligences d'une humanité moins dévelopée' otherwise than in the image of a unity of origin giving rise to relations of kinship?

Anyone for whom monogenism is simply expressed in an explicit and indubitable way in Gen 2-3 has to face the question of the sources of such a knowledge. Simply to introduce here an appeal to a recent revelation is rather too simple. Inspiration and Revelation may by no means be confused, especially since today 'it is no longer doubted by anyone' that these reports make use of extra-canonical sources both oral and literary. However if it is proposed to refer the knowledge of these sources to the primitive revelation, the following considerations must be borne in mind. 'Adam' could not know in virtue of his human experience that he was the one and only man. He could at most ascertain that no others were to be found in his environment. But God could inform him of this? Certainly, that is possible. But did this possibility become a fact? Had he to know this with certainty in order to be able to be and to do what he in fact was and did as ancestor and sinful head of humanity? Are we to suppose that this knowledge, supposing it existed, was handed down over a few hundred thousand years? It may be true that in other narratives of the Near East which describe the emergence of man several human pairs are created simultaneously[30] that is still no reason why the Genesis narrative should be a deliberate contradiction of these other narratives so as to make monogenism the content of what it has to say. For on the one hand these other narratives and the enumerations peculiar to them (7 pairs, 4 [256] men) may only wish to state the same thing as the unitary number of Genesis: the totality of men. On the other hand one would have to ask whether the intention of these other narratives was not to symbolize an essential distinction between different men (and of the peoples springing from them) by speaking of a plural number. The intention of the unitary number in Genesis would then be to [29] Cf. e.g. Gen 9:19.22; 19:37 s.; 25:1-4. Finally it should not be forgotten that even in the New Testament (Mt 2:3; 3:5; 4:24) 'all', 'the whole', need not imply more than a great number, which need by no means include every relevant case.

[30] C. Hauret, p. 119 s.; R. Labat, Le Poème babylonien de la création, p.51.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

combat this view by emphasizing the fundamental likeness of men; but this would not necessarily mean that monogenism in the strict sense was being taught here in objective fact. Ultimately this too must be borne in mind: it is not immediately clear why an essential distinction should be held to obtain between the story of the single human pair and the story of Eve's origin from Adam in respect of a 'literal' [31] interpretation of the two stories. In connexion with the question of Biblical monogenism Ceuppens, for example, does in fact hold that Eve's physical bond with Adam is expressly taught in the Scriptures.[32] But if one is not prepared to grant this[33] it does not seem immediately intelligible how monogenism may nevertheless be presented as an explicit and unmistakable declaration of Scripture. It is not clear how one can consistently associate this conception of Eve's origin with the admission that Gen 1-3 is not necessarily in contradiction with a moderate transformism.[34] Thus from this point of view too it seems more in accordance with the facts not to assert that it is certainly possible for someone to show by [257] purely exegetical methods that monogenism is contained in Gen 1-3 as a direct statement.

It goes without saying that this is neither to throw doubt upon monogenism in itself nor positively to contest the fact that it is in actual fact contained in Gen 1-3. Thus what has so far been said in no way conflicts with Denz 2123. For all that is declared there is that the unitas generis humani is objectively contained in Gen 1-3, against those who deny the fact itself; no position is taken up with regard to the question of how this fact of being contained may be recognized by the use of purely exegetical methods.[35]

If we have restricted the bearing of Gen 1-3 for monogenism in this negative way, our task is by no means done. We can and must now go on to add positively: what Genesis says is positively open[36] to a revealed doctrine concerning monogenism arrived at elsewhere and [31] We make use of this term only for the sake of brevity and so as to be understood quickly. In itself it is misleading: a statement is taken most literally when it is understood to have the meaning proper to it on the basis of the literary genre employed in the given case. Someone who holds that God created the world in six times 24 hours has not really taken Gen 1 'literally'; he has misunderstood its meaning.

---

[32] Le polygénisme, p. 26.

[33] There appears to be an increasing number of writers who in this matter too take the literary genre of the first chapters of Genesis seriously, and see in the formation of Eve from Adam's rib a dramatic symbolization of her likeness to the man and her subordination to him, the question of the physical mode of her origination being left open: so Cajetan, Hoberg, Hummelauer, Nickel, Holzinger, Peters, Lagrange, Junker, Göttsberger, Schlögl, Lusseau, de Frame, Hauret, Premm, Colungs, Chaine, Bartmann, Cordero, Remy. Naturally there are considerable differences of detail between the views of these authors into which we cannot go here. The same is true of the extent to which they go in rejecting Eve's physical and material extraction from Adam.

[34] In fact it has been one of the 'classic' arguments against transformism in any form (Pesch, Lercher, Sagüés, etc.) that since it is not applicable to Eve, it cannot be asserted in Adam's case either.

[35] Sensus litteralis historicus is precisely not the same as the sensus litteralis historicus which can be extracted from the passage concerned taken by itself. Denz 2124 itself points out that the analogia fidei must be observed in the interpretation of Gen 1-3. This would be superfluous if everything a text contained objectively could be extracted from it without recourse to anything else. Certainly we must as far as possible proceed from the text itself if we wish to find out what the human author has necessarily stated as a minimum, or else we shall be dragging into this literal sense things which owe their origin to a later and more developed revelation.

[36] 'Positively open' is intended to imply more than 'does not exclude', 'is not in contradiction with' (but indifferent as regards any further statement). What Genesis says, rather, is so formulated that its human author did not indeed have to be conscious of its entire bearing, but so that it can nevertheless be understood without hesitation as an expression of this fuller content; and it is God's will too (as later Revelation shows) that we should now understand it positively like this in this 'sensus plenior'. In this case at least it cannot be objected that God wishes to say to us in the given passage what the human author wished to say, and thus no inspired 'sensus plenior' exists. This objection to a 'sensus plenior' may be justified (we need not go into the matter here) in many cases where appeal is made to it, but that is not the case here. For here it is not a matter of some new idea which is affixed additively to one which has been really expressed as its 'sensus plenior'; what we have here is a proposition (and they are countless) which exhibits marginal indistinctness, so that it was neither necessary nor possible for the human author (as opposed to God) to be reflexively clear about how far the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[258] by other means and guaranteed by the magisterium; and in this sense it is now possible to say that monogenism belongs to the content of Gen 2.

Let us clarify this point a little more. First of all it can be said that all we have so far said in no way excludes the fact that monogenism is part of what is actually stated, its content. We take it that there is no question of explaining what is said in Gen 1-3 arbitrarily and without resort to really clear hermeneutic principles, finding a literal sense here and a symbolic one there; we take it that the whole is a great, complex image with an historical content which is meant to be the kind of content proper to a unified, symbolic utterance. But then there is nothing to prevent this plastic image of a human pair from giving expression to the reality of a unique human pair as the ancestors of all men, over and above what was said to be the minimal sense above.

But it is permissible to go further. The author of Gen 2-3 intends to tell the story of the beginnings of humanity, and by means of this, reflexion upon the Beginning to speak of what is 'original' in his own existential situation, provide a theological interpretation of his own existence, by referring it to its origin. In fact one can say that the past is regarded from the point of view of the writer's religious situation. The author sees himself faced by an ethnological and cultural plurality, and he reduces this to a more primitive unity. It is very far from our intention here to examine the exact terms in which he determines this original unity, whether he speaks quite certainly there of the strictly numerical unity of our terrestrial origin or only of a transcendent unity in God or of what is indeed a quite tangible unity of a terrestrial but not of a strictly monogenistic kind.[37] The reduction to an original [259] unity of an historical and cultural plurality belonging to his own living-space, a unity which guarantees the mutual community today of the many in a common whole of meaning and a common history of salvation and damnation – to see this and to say it is already in itself an astonishing phenomenon, especially as the author's field of vision embraced a number of peoples extremely unlike each other in race, culture and religion, in respect of whom this original unity was hardly a matter of course for the religious philosophy of this simple man. We can realize how particularly hard it must have been for him when we remember that the distinctions in Gen 1 among plants and animals, the differentiae of which in themselves must have seemed no greater throughout their entire range than those among men, were seen without the slightest hesitation as original in a 'fixist' way (Gen 1:11.21.24.25). It is impossible to say that the Yahwist arrives at this essentially bold idea of unity merely from the observation that men have children and multiply (Gen 1:28). Modern rationalist ideas (inter-racial fertility in spite of diversity, etc.) were certainly still further from his mind. The fact that he nevertheless sees the riven plurality of his own living-space as sprung from an (at least larger) unity of a terrestrial ('Adam') and transcendent kind (the one Creator of all), is the mark of a profound mind, especially since generation for him elsewhere means the proposition does in fact go, although he was quite capable of seeing that it could imply the 'sensus plenior'. In a case like this it is quite possible to say that the 'sensus plenior' is inspired, for the human author affirms it in the sense meant by God even when he is incapable of giving a reflexive account to himself as to whether everything which even he sees as a possible sense of his own statement really belongs unmistakably to what is affirmed.

---

[37] It would not indeed be excluded a priori that a terrestrial, original, historically tangible unity of humanity might be conceivable for the author of Genesis, a unity which is not precisely that of a unique original pair and for which such a pair would serve as a plastic medium in which the unity could be visualized. To portray a priori possibilities of this kind would serve no useful purpose here. In order to see that they are not a priori impossible one need only reflect on what this unity is meant to be opposed to in the mind of the author of Genesis. Looked at from the viewpoint of the whole theology of the first chapters of Genesis, what this unity is contrasted with is not simply a purely numerical multiplicity, but the qualified multiplicity of a humanity rent asunder into peoples, races and religions, a humanity which is no longer at one in anything, so that the various peoples themselves no longer acknowledge a common God as their joint origin. It is against this empirical plurality that the Yahwist writer sets his portrayal of what was 'in the beginning': the one Man from the hand of the one God as a unique pair of man and woman.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

generative cause of the like (Gen. 5:3). Admittedly the Yahwist feels this need for unity even where the plurality of individual peoples each for itself is involved: this plurality too he refers back to a unique ancestor for each (to this extent what was said above about the certainty of a strictly monogenistic statement holds good). But let us not be in too much of a hurry to say that therefore no more lies behind the former statement than behind the latter. For in the latter case we may have a secondary, inexact application, not wholly accurate objectively, of a valid metaphysical principle (though of a relatively unreflexive kind), which is wholly justified in the former case.

We may describe this basic metaphysical conception by which the author must be actuated in the following terms. A. In spite of their variety men are basically the same, and are thus sharply and (even [260] from a purely terrestrial point of view) unconditionally separated from the animal kingdom; they are the same by nature: perishable in their earthly substance (like the animals) and yet moral creatures addressed by Yahweh in a special way, for whom everything else exists as the environment of their own existence; over all of them there reigns in grace and judgment the one God of their origin, so that they all belong to a single history of salvation and damnation in spite of their differences; where they are found to be not merely different but divided by enmity, this is not of the origin but the result of their guilt (the history of Cain, the Tower of Babel). Thus men form ('now' primarily) a solidary community of nature and history, and this is something belonging to the origin, created by God. B. This unity in the now, which is theologically disclosed behind the surface, of dismembered existence as an existential[38] willed by God, now in force and prior to all guilt, has a beginning and an origin; this beginning is as early as men themselves (and not the effect of an historical decision of the guilty choice of men themselves), and it is primordial just because it arises from the real unity of an identical origin. For in the first place the larger plurality arises from the more restricted one, as everyday experience teaches: men multiply (Gen 1:28). But over and above this, if they are able to multiply in this way, there need only have been one human pair in the beginning. For if there were another cause of human multiplicity, independent of generation, why should it no longer be active now, why should there be another cause as well? And above all, would these men who have been independent of each other from the origin really form the unity and solidary community which they now are – or ought to be? Or would they not precisely stand over against each other in the same alien way as the animal species which God created? May one suppose that the Yahwist's theological reflexions moved in this direction, and occasioned that portrayal of the beginning and one origin of all men which he gives us in plastic imagery? If one can credit him with something of the kind (and there is a good deal to be said for this), then it becomes apparent with what justice we may say that his statements are – even 'quoad nos' – at least positively open to a genuine monogenism. Yet this is not to say that it becomes probable, purely exegetically, that monogenism belongs to what is expressed in the strict sense. Nor do [261] we wish to assert that this view that the unity of the whole of human reality is prior to its plurality, even terrestrially, is so consciously thought out by the Yahwist that his intention to act as guarantor of absolute monogenism is unmistakable.[39]

We may put this in slightly different terms. The account of the single primordial pair is first of all an element in a figurative account, and we have next to inquire what in its total context it is meant to express by way of historical content. It states without doubt that from the beginning humanity forms a unity of nature and of destiny in saving history, in virtue of a divine disposition (and not by its own 'choice'). Over and above this, it is quite probable and at least positively open (from the purely exegetical point of view) that Genesis means to say

[38] See Introduction. – Tr.
[39] In his theological aetiology he does not, for instance, expressly extend his reflexions beyond the surrounding history of his field of vision.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation that this primordial unity possesses a terrestrial foundation in a strictly physical unity of generation. It is not, however, possible to decide purely exegetically whether the image of a single primordial pair can only possess its historically intended content in a physically unique primordial pair, because the reality aimed at might in certain circumstances have been conceived of in terms of a different kind of original unity, also terrestrial in kind. For this reason, from a purely exegetical point of view we regard monogenism as a Scriptural doctrine which is only probably expressed in Gen 2-3.

We must add a few notes to what has just been said. It might be objected that we have forgotten that it is a question of Revelation here, and that consequently any attempt more sharply to determine what strictly was meant in the statement by reconstructing what the author must have thought is bound to go astray. The objection is unsound. It is nowhere laid down that what is said in Gen 1-3, over and above its character as inspired, must have been revealed throughout in just such a way that in regard to what it really certainly states – not in regard to what we arbitrarily suppose for such – it could only be known by genuinely new revelation. What the Yahwist tells us he could at least in many cases have known without new revelation (woman's equality of nature, the creation, even probably, according to the great medieval theologians, the fact of some kind of guilt at the beginning of humanity). The fact that he did see what can be known in this way, and see it and express it with such purity in spite of the obscurity of his existence, remains a marvel of the God who reveals [262] himself[40], and remains inspired. It may even be said that until the contrary is proved, that is, until it is shown to be impossible, we should presume that the immediate source of the human author's statements in many individual cases in Gen 1-3 is his own theological reflexion, not a revelation the content of which is communicated sheerly by God from above without any intermediary. Otherwise one would have to look for this revelation in concrete form in the Yahwist's sources, or postulate an oral tradition going back to the beginning[41] expedients, these, of a highly questionable kind, to say no more. If this view is correct, it is metaphysically entirely justified and even imperative to try to find out first of all what the author's thoughts may have been and how he arrived at them; and then by following his train of thought in this way we should have a more exact knowledge of what he really intended to say and what possibly he did not. These reflexions show how necessary it is for us to reconstruct for ourselves reflexively those metaphysical and theological considerations which moved him to form his image of original humanity; then we should see how far these considerations of his and ours will carry us. But this is something we can only turn to later.

Let us provisionally establish as our only result that in view of the literary genre it is impossible to be sure by exegesis alone that monogenism is found in Gen 1-3 in the form of an authentic and binding statement. However, the whole presentation is at least positively open to a monogenistic interpretation; this lies minimally in the author's theological tendency to explain the religious situation of his own existence by reflecting theologically on the (really historical) origin. In any case the narrative of the single ancestor is a declaration about the original, divinely willed unity of all humanity and its history of salvation and damnation. For it follows from all that has been said that this is the minimum statement made by this narrative.

---

[40] Especially as this theological reflexion on the Beginning proceeds from the author's experience of God's dealings in his own period of saving history; thus the point of departure of the reflexion is by no means simply 'natural', but contains God's Revelation in the strict sense through his deed and the word accompanying it.

[41] This is not to contest the genuine possibility of such a tradition. But it, may fairly be said that if one tries to form a concrete idea of it one begins to suspect that all it is capable of preserving through thousands of years of history is what is simultaneously kept alive by man's metaphysical reflexion and his needs; just as conversely the latter is continually stimulated by the former.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[263] b. Wisdom 10:1. We find it said of Wisdom in a review of her activity in the history of the chosen People: 'She protected the father of the world, the first creature to be formed, when he alone was created, and delivered him from his fall. She gave him power to exercise dominion over all things.' There is no doubt that the text has in view the Adam of Gen 2-3. We have a survey of the saving history of Genesis, in which Cain, the Flood, Abraham, Lot and so on are also mentioned. It is to be observed that the subject of the statement in 10:1 is not Adam but Wisdom. In chapters 10-12 her powerful sway over her lovers in mercy and blessing is celebrated. Historical examples are provided to show how active Wisdom is, and these are simply taken in a freely poetic way from Genesis as a didactic aid in making vividly clear what the writer really wishes to state: the blessings acquired by the followers of Wisdom. One may set up a principle for the interpretation of such statements: where a report belonging to an earlier book of the Old Testament is simply taken over without further commentary, the content and bearing of what has been taken over in the later book is to be assessed according to the content and bearing of its source, provided that the purpose to which it is put demands nothing further. In virtue of this principle, what may be derived from Wis 10:1 is just what can be derived from Gen 2-3 and no more. Nothing new is said except that Wisdom has protected and delivered that Adam whose story we find in Gen 2-3, in the way in which that story relates and in the way in which what is there related of him is to be interpreted. Wis 10 s. mentions no proper names (neither Adam nor Cain nor Abraham nor Lot nor Jacob nor Joseph nor Moses are spoken of in chapter 10 by their own names, although it is they who are being spoken of); and so the only purpose of the statements which are made about Adam as ancestor is to distinguish who is being talked about at all, without having to use his name. Thus the author of Wisdom could with a tranquil mind leave it to his source to determine and to guarantee the bearing of the characterization taken from Gen 2-3. Thus the text possesses no independent significance for the question of monogenism.[42]

[264]

2. The New Testament

Ac 17:24-26. It must first be noted that St Luke is reporting one of St Paul's speeches. Inspiration as such with the inerrancy proper to it is thus referred primarily to the fact that this speech with this content was actually delivered, not to the correctness of what was said. Thus the content of the speech can only be guaranteed true in so far as the, speech is an Apostle's sermon and is for this reason true in its content and exacting for faith, and in the measure in which the content of a single Apostle's sermon raises such a claim. An Apostle can err where his preaching does not exact the absolute obedience of faith[43]; and so, it would have to be proved that St Paul uttered this proposition as an absolute demand of his preaching of the faith, as the indispensable content of his Gospel.

---

[42] A parallel case may help to make this clear. The Vatican schema, already cited, speaks of the corpus (Adae) de limo terrae formatum, of Eve e costa eius (Adae) divinitus formata (Coll. Lac. VII, col. 1633). It is clear to everyone that what we have here is a citation from Gen 2, and that the author of the schema relies on the source of his citation and its interpretation for the bearing and precise content of the citation and its delimitation; thus the text offers no conclusive argument against transformism or in favour of the physical reality of the rib. This remains true even though it is practically certain that the author of the schema was at that time convinced that Adam's body was formed directly from inorganic matter, and that Adam's rib as the matter out of which Eve was formed was a physical reality. But all he wished to state was what the cited text really covered with its authority. The same example in more recent times is to be found in Pius XII's address to the members of the Papal Academy of Sciences, AAS XXXIII (1941), p. 506.

[43] It is quite unnecessary to attribute any wider range of infallibility to an individual Apostle as such (i.e. when he is not at the same time an inspired author) than to the successors of Peter. In other words the limits of the latter infallibility are those of the former. For a practical example, see Ac 20:25 compared with 2 Tim 4:20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But we may peacefully disregard this question. St Paul says that the one God unknown to the Athenians whom he preaches, formed the entire race of men 'from one'[44] so that it might inhabit the whole face [265] of the earth. All he does is to repeat, as every preacher is allowed and expected to do, the account given in Genesis (and the ideas of Deut 32:8). And he does this to make the Athenians realize that their piety and their religious observances cannot be nationally autochthonous but must be determined by the one Lord of heaven and earth; their religious existence is not dependent upon a private God peculiar to their nationality and their history. In accordance with the principle formulated above, we must say that St Paul is simply repeating his source, giving it the meaning and the bearing which it has in itself. For the context in which St Paul repeats this teaching of Genesis demands no more either. He wishes to draw attention to the unity of humanity in its saving history due to the one living God of Israelite and Christian saving history, and so he makes it arise 'out of one' just as in Genesis and with the same intention. Genesis teaches an historical unity of origin as the ground of the unity of men and of the solidarity of their history; this is what happens in St Paul's speech too, in the same measure and with the same limits and the same certainty. Nothing more can be said with certainty. St Paul is certainly concerned in the context of his speech with a unity of origin; nor can one say that this is merely a rhetorical element without significance for the central point of his speech. But all he says in regard to Genesis is simply what is said there already. Just because a unity of origin is spoken of there [266] which would suffice for his argument in any case, he does not need to have reflected on the precise limits and bearing of the statement in Genesis with regard to the alternatives of monogenism and polygenism. But this statement taken in itself provides us with no final and unambiguous information about monogenism in the strict sense, over and above what it says about an original, historical unity of the human race, and this unity can be conceived of a priori in various ways; nor can we then find this information when St Paul repeats the account.

Thus what was said above about Gen 2-3 might be said here about Ac 17:26, both negatively and positively, too. For we have here the same ε0χ ε9νο&φ which we find in Heb. 2:11. It may be true that the same thing must be said about this ε0χ ε9νο_φ πα&ντεφ, taken purely in itself, as about Ac 17:26 and Gen 2-3, read in isolation (and also disregarding the fact that it is formally set in opposition to all α(γιαζο&μενοι not to all men). And yet, in the framework of the whole Pauline, theology of redemption, the objective context of Heb 2:11 shows that a genuine unity of origin of all men must be understood in St Paul in a really [44] It seems to me to make no real difference whether one prefers the old reading ε)χ ε9νο_φ αι(/ματοφ instead of εχ ε9νο&φ or goes to great pains to find a way of completing ε9νο&φ. For in every case this ει9/φ or ε9/νseems to imply a unity which according to the context is other than God and is a unity of origin. Even if with de Frame (p. 55) one reads 'out of one blood' and refers to Jn 1:13 and the Old Testament significance of blood as bearing life, it is still a unity of origin (ε)χ) and not the unity (= identity) of the mode of origin of all men that is in question. For even then the translation 'from the lineage of a single individual' would be the most obvious one (cf. Bauer, W*örterbuch* (ET Arndt and Gingrich) s.v. αι[μα). One would have to translate 'make out of the same blood' and give this the meaning 'make out of the same (= homogeneous) matter' (as the ε)χ in Jn 1:13 refers to the material cause and not strictly to the origin).' But is this interpretation possible? What would then be the purpose of ε)χ ε9νο&φ? The homogeneity of men would be expressed, even without this clause, by the statement that the one God created all peoples. Surely the reference to Adam is much more obvious, since it appears elsewhere in St Paul in similar contexts (Rom 5:12 s.; 1 Cor 11:7 s.; 15:22.45), since the whole passage from the very beginning is a summary of the first chapters of Genesis, since Rabbinic theology too (Strack-Billerbeck II, p. 7, etc.) taught the descent of all men from Adam for reasons which are closely connected with those with which ultimately St Paul is concerned here: the justification of the unity of nature and solidarity of all men. 'We believe (in spite of de Frame) that Lennerz is right in saying (p. 428) that he knows of no exegete who would not interpret the text as referring to the one Adam; and we are of the opinion that this is the most obvious interpretation for the unprejudiced exegete. Only we hold that this still does not dispose of the problem in regard to monogenism; it is just the beginning of the problem, exactly as in the exposition of Gen 2-3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

monogenistic way if it is to retain its meaning. However, we must postpone to the next section these considerations drawn from the whole Pauline doctrine of original sin and redemption, since they go beyond the exegesis of an isolated text.

A certain prudence and caution is very much in place with regard to these New Testament citations from the Old Testament.[45] Many exegetes today are no longer prepared to grant that 2 Pet 2:5 makes it certain that the Flood extended to all man.[46] Is it necessary that Jonas' stay in the belly of the whale should have been historical fact because of Mt 12:40?[47] Does Jude 9 guarantee the historicity of the [267] struggle between Michael and the Devil for Moses' dead body, which is taken from The Ascension of Moses, or is it still possible and meaningful to say what the Apostle wishes to say when the example which is meant to explain something else – what is really stated – has only a literary existence? Is it really possible to use 1 Cor 11:8.12; Eph 5:28-30; 1 Tim 2:13 s. to prove the 'literal' interpretation of the story in Genesis of the formation of Eve from Adam's rib? The Catholic exegetes mentioned above[48] are clearly not of this opinion. What St Paul wished to inculcate about woman by making this reference is still meaningfully illustrated by the reference even when a less 'literal' interpretation of Eve's origin 'out of' Adam is assumed beforehand. 'What historicity does 2 Tim 3:8 guarantee to the names Jannes and Jambres for the sorcerers mentioned without their names in Ex 7:8-12, since St Paul took these names from an apocryphal writing? What historical particulars about Melchisedech can really be got from Heb 7:3? It might be said that citations, especially when the writing being cited is an authoritative one, form a literary genre of their own. This is not to say, with the theory which received so much discussion a few decades ago, that a writer need not identify himself with what he cites; what is meant is that a writer, when he makes a citation, knows from the first, precisely because of the authority of the source accepted beforehand, that one can and must speak 'to this effect', and consequently need have no reflexive knowledge of the exact bearing of the quoted statement. This is something which belongs to the plain and unavoidable rights of human speech. It holds good for Scripture too. But precisely for that reason it is ordinarily to be presumed that one should assess a citation by its source; the cases mentioned above are examples of this. This is not to say that Ac 17:26 is simply an instance of exactly the same thing as we find in the other examples. By no means. But if this principle derived from an examination of the examples given above is applied to Ac 17:26, it will not be found easy to prove that this passage, taken in isolation, is [268] capable of providing more in favour of monogenism than is said by Genesis.

B. The Indirect Proof (from Scripture and the Church's Magisterium)

[45] Another example of this sort of thing is to be found in Ex 20:11; the six days of Creation do not become 'more literal' because they are spoken of in a passage which, compared to Gen 1, is extremely unpoetical and sober.

[46] It is contested by Vaccari and others, and an increasing number of writers after him.

[47] The following comparison would seem to be a fair one. Someone who says 'I shall be as brave as Siegfried was' no more vouches for Siegfried's historicity than Jesus did for the historicity of this event. J. Schildenberger too finally admits this (Vom Geheimnis des Gotteswortes, Heidelberg 1950, p. 316, n. 212). It is not here in debate whether Jonas' fate is necessarily historical on other grounds. Catholic exegetes like A. Calmeet, A. van Hoonacker, H. Lesêtre, M. Tobac, A. Condamin, Dennefeld are among, those who doubt this. There is no reason why the text of the encyclical 'Spiritus Paraclitus' of Benedict XV (AAS XII (1920), p. 398) should be seen as contradicting this view. It is merely being explained there by examples that the Old Testament in all its parts was an absolute authority for Jesus. But Pope Benedict gives no decision as to how one should interpret the texts which Jesus cited in this sense, in themselves firstly, and consequently in Jesus' intention.

[48] P. 256, n..3.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The indirect proof of monogenism consists in the demonstration that it is an indispensable presupposition of the doctrines of redemption and original sin as these are contained in Scripture and in its interpretation by Tradition and the Church's magisterium; and that in this sense it is taught by Scripture. That this proof must be regarded as the most important of all may also be seen from the arguments with which 'Humani Generis' justifies its rejection of polygenism, though with the utmost brevity.

1. The usual form of the indirect proof

The proof is usually presented by taking the unity and universality of original sin as point of departure.[49] On the basis of these two points as taught by the Council of Trent, the argument proceeds as follows. On the polygenistic hypothesis, unless original sin is to be rejected outright, several ancestral pairs who were in possession of original justice would have to have sinned at various times and in various places; and they would have to have transmitted their sin, i.e. the loss of original justice, to their posterity. Firstly, it is argued, it is arbitrary to assume that all these men should have sinned, and, what is more, sinned at considerable intervals of space and time, independently of each other – for otherwise the polygenistic hypothesis could no longer meaningfully be maintained. It is not clear why none of these pairs should have had children before its fall or the fall of another, so that the question arises as to how these stand with respect to original sin. Nor is it clear when this original sin, which – as peccatum originans – would need to be conceived of as the one act for the whole earth of a collectivity, really came into existence. Only when all the pairs have sinned? But ex suppositione the last of these pairs exists it may be a few thousand years after the first pair. How do matters stand with the earlier pairs and especially with their children, if, while there have been personal sins of the earlier primordial pairs, original sin still cannot [269] be handed down to their posterity (although this arises by generation) because original sin does not yet exist, and does not exist because the last primordial pair belonging to the constitution of this sinful collectivity does not yet exist? Or does original sin come into existence with the sin of the first pair? But then the other pairs do not yet exist, or if they do exist, have not yet sinned. How do matters stand in this case with the children they perhaps already have? When these later pairs first come into existence, after the first pair has sinned, will they be created with or without original justice? In the first case they would not have original sin, which would not then be general; in the second case, the withdrawal of original justice on account of the fall of the first pair would not be original sin, which is transmitted 'generatione', nor would the fall of the later pairs when it takes place have anything further to contribute to the constitution of this 'original sin'. Supposing that these pairs are not conceived of as a juridical unity for the purpose of administering the original justice intended for humanity, and that each of them is thought of as having sinned 'on its own account' and only transmitting its own loss of original justice to its own posterity, then original sin would not be 'origine unum' and there would be instead be several original sins, which will not do either.

There is no doubt that these arguments show that polygenism is far from being in harmony with the doctrine of original sin. But is it completely excluded by this kind of argument?[50] It is, I hope, permitted to express some doubts as to the absolute stringency of this procedure.

Admittedly no difficulty remains if one regards both the 'origine unum' as well as the 'propagatione' of the Council of Trent as an unambiguous and defined statement to the effect

[49] For what follows see among others Lennerz, pp. 419-24.

[50] The whole series of acute arguments in Lennerz (p. 423 s.) seems in the end only intended to prove that polygenism is not a dogmatically indifferent, purely secular affair, although the whole argument is aimed at wider conclusions.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that the peccatum originale originans was the sole act of one physical individual and that every transmission of original sin can only take place in virtue of a generative connexion with this unus. For then every form of polygenism is straightforwardly opposed to the doctrine of original sin, for only a physical individual can be the primordial sinner. If everyone else is to have original sin, and this can only be had through a generative connexion with this primordial sinner, then everyone else must [270] descend physically from this one individual. A postadamite polygenism cannot be reconciled with a defined doctrine of universal postadamite original sin caused by a physical individual and only capable of being transmitted by generation.

One may also regard this particular doctrine of original sin, with all the details to which attention has been drawn, as a general and obligatory teaching, though not indeed defined. In this case one will be bound to regard this proof of the irreconcilability of polygenism and this version of the doctrine of original sin as formally stringent, arid will merely have to add that monogenism acquires that theological qualification which is proper to the premises of the proof on this valuation. Thus it would not be defined implicite, but would have to be given a lower qualification.

But if all this (or the latter at least) may be granted, all the questions concerning this indirect proof in its usual form are by no means disposed of.

First of all, we have already shown above that it is not beyond all doubt that the 'propagatione', in so far as it signifies more than the contradictory opposite of 'imitatione', is defined by Trent. If the doubt is admitted and one then assumes (something which is far from being implied in the first admission) that the 'propagatione' is a theological explanation, not a doctrinal statement in the strict sense,[51] it is possible to conceive of the following hypothesis. The first man created in the state of original justice is nominated by God as the trustee, in respect of the justice compulsorily intended by God for all men, for all the men who follow him, whether they descend from him physically or not.[52] This first man loses original justice for himself and all other men. Thus all are subject to original sin. The universality of original sin and its unity of origin are preserved. It is through Adam that all are subject to original sin, the other first pairs not indeed generatione, but per inoboedientiam primi hominis, non imitatione. Soon, [271] one could go on, all these men became so mixed that there was no longer a single man left who did not go back to Adam generatione as well. Hence generatione would continue to be the expression for what now holds good generally (descent from Adam as well) and what was always the chief point at issue, namely that men's likeness of nature and the consequences of this were God's reason for making the justice of all men dependent upon the action of the first man. Would it be possible to show that this view clearly runs counter to the dogma of original sin as defined? It seems doubtful. We have of course made an assumption which is very far from being proved. The possibility of a communication of original sin in individual initial cases without a generative connexion need not be clearly and unmistakably counter to a definition, and yet be quite untenable theologically. We have in no way proved that it is not untenable or even shown it to be only positively probable. The general doctrine that original sin is transmitted by generation is in truth unfavourable to this assumption. But if this doctrine is to be a simply peremptory argument against the assumption, it would still remain to be shown: (a) that 'generatione' in Tradition, and furthermore with the obligatory character of a doctrinal statement, certainly [51] This seems to be de Fraine's assumption.

[52] This supposition need meet with no ultimately insoluble difficulty in the average theory of original sin. Grace is God's free gift. Thus he can make its possession dependent (so it might be said) upon any meaningful condition. The preservation of grace by the first man would be a meaningful condition even for the men who do not descend from him, because these other men and their posterity are intended to form a community of goal and history with the descendants of the first man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

implies more than 'non imitatione'; (b) that the expression is not chosen as a theological interpretation of the authentic dogma of original sin merely because monogenism has been pre-supposed without thereby being absolutely guaranteed; (c) that generatione cannot signify, 'by reception of human nature after Adam' (the question then being left open as to whether it was received from Adam or elsewhere, while after Adam and in consideration of his stock). It is obvious that this investigation cannot be carried out here. And so a kind of question-mark must be left here against the result of the ordinary indirect proof.

To this it must be added that what was said earlier about the doubtfulness of whether 'propagatione' was defined, holds good also of the 'unum' of original sin. Certainly original sin is 'one' in so far as all men born by generation are born without original justice, the privation of which is of the same kind in all of them; in so far as in all of them this privation arises in the same way owing to the guilt of the man or men not brought into being by generation; in so far as no further increase of this original guilt occurs once there exist only men brought into being by generation. Original guilt is thus 'one' in many respects, in virtue of which it is distinguished from personal sins, [272] which differ specifically among themselves, may be increased at will and are performed by each individual self. Thus it cannot be said without further qualification that the 'origine unum' of Trent would lose all meaning if the agent of the loss of grace in men born by generation were not a numerical individual, it would be possible to translate 'origine unum' by 'a hereditary state of guilt of the same kind everywhere owing to the mode of its reception (from another)' in contrast to personal sins. Of course the Fathers of the Council had more in mind than this; but did they wish to define this plus, when in fact they only wished to define the existence of original sin against Pelagius and Erasmus? We must repeat: even if the 'origine unum' is not certainly defined in its traditional fullness of meaning it may still be binding as a doctrine of tradition. At any rate proof of the contrary has never been produced. And that surely means that the Catholic theologian cannot tuto or sine temeritate depart from the traditional meaning of 'origine unum'. But if he retains it, it follows as a consequence that he must either deny this traditional unity in polygenism or must postulate the juridical hypothesis of a collective guilt of primordial pairs, which once again comes into conflict with the doctrine of the hereditary transmission of original sin as the unique means by which it is handed on. Nevertheless, let us for the moment suppose that the 'origine unum', in its traditional fullness of meaning, is not defined, and let us make the (wholly unproved) assumption that the plus of the full meaning over and above the sense proposed in the hypothetical interpretation above is not necessarily demanded by a tradition binding upon faith. Then we could say that when all the original pairs (only a few, after all) have sinned[53] and transmitted their privation of grace to their posterity in each case, all born men would be subject to original sin and would have the like original sin from the origin, in so far as the same grace was lost to them all for the same reason. A true collective guilt of a true collective subject would then not be necessary. All the difficulties of such a view would cease to arise. A collective subject would only have existed in the sense that these primordial [273] sinners were brought together under the name of Adam in a symbolic and plastic way. It must once again be emphasized that even apart from 'Humani Generis' it may not be asserted that the restrictive interpretation of 'origine unum' can be classified as unobjectionable. No proof of this has been produced; and the weight of the tradition which points in the opposite direction cannot be denied. It would thus be temerarious to depart from it. But is it absolutely certain that this tradition which takes the full meaning of 'origine unum' for granted and hands it down, is indubitably binding upon [53] If we say that without God's special help not one of the countless millions of men could observe the natural moral law for any length of time and yet sins by not observing it, this assumption ceases to be as arbitrary as it may seem at first sight. For the same reason the assumption of a guilt which appears very soon (hence before the generation of children) among several pairs is not quite so arbitrary as one might otherwise suppose.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith? And so, is the argument against polygenism, in so far as it is based on the 'origine unum', free from every possible objection?

The following point should also be borne in mind. Let us suppose that in virtue of Tradition, the 'propagatione' and the 'origine unum' in the original sin common to all is quite certainly binding upon faith (though not directly defined) in the full and strict meaning upon which the usual indirect proof of monogenism relies. It can then still be asked whether this traditional interpretation of the unity and mode of transmission of original sin can be derived from Scripture itself, and how far this may be done, such that in this way it can be made the basis of an indirect argument for monogenism.

All we have so far said about the traditional form of the indirect proof is only intended to show one thing: that there is no need to feel that the endeavour to provide this indirect proof has yet reached its term. Something still remains to be done. Clearly the most important thing to do would be to examine carefully the theological weight of that whole tradition which forms the basis of the indirect proof of monogenism in its usual form. This is of course impossible in a slight essay like this.

We have a much more modest contribution to this indirect proof in mind here, which is simply to offer a small study of the teaching of Scripture in this matter. We are not so much concerned with the formal conclusiveness of the considerations to be put forward in favour of monogenism, with an effort to retain the desired result in as few and as 'clear' syllogisms as possible (what usually happens here is that the real difficulty remains hidden away in one of the premises classified as obvious). We hope rather to extend the field of vision by showing how closely monogenism coheres with the fundamental Biblical conception of a history of salvation and damnation. It is in this sense that the following discussion must be understood. If we succeed in showing [274] that monogenism is not simply a marginal idea in Scripture, the only function of which is to elucidate something which would remain in just the same form without this elucidation, we should have fulfilled the task we have set ourselves here in this section.

2. The community of a stock as the basis of the community of salvation and damnation

A difficulty concerning our question meets us at the very start. In this connexion it should be noticed that the fact of the redemption of all men by the one Christ from whom we are not physically descended in no way shows that an individual and his action for others can be morally significant before God independently of whether he stands with regard to the others in an ontologically real relationship of membership or not. For the question is precisely whether Christ can only be Head and Mediator of humanity because and only because he is a member of a humanity monogenistically one from the origin.[54]

However obvious it may be in itself, one thing must be made perfectly clear from the start: it is utterly unacceptable from the viewpoint of Catholic theology to regard some object (or the inquiry into it) as dogmatically or theologically irrelevant just because it is also to be found in the field of the profane sciences or has such a scientific aspect or consequence. One cannot allot their respective competences to theology and the sciences simply by telling them

[54] Hence I do not fully understand what de Fraine is trying to prove by appealing (p. 61 or 223) to the statements of Cornelius Mussus at the Council of Trent (Ehses V, p. 175; 'omnes eramus in Adam, cum ipse peccavit antequam nasceremur, cum nascimur, Adam in nobis est. Quemadmodum cum Christus pro nobis passus est, omnes in eo eramus . . .'). The parallel may show that not every moral consequence necessarily presupposes a relationship of descent precisely between the cause and the subject of the effect. But it does not prove that such a consequence can dispense with the presupposition of an ontologically real connexion, based on the physical unity of the stock.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to 'part and be friends'. One cannot begin by tidily banishing the objects of theology to an 'existential' beyond, the sphere of 'the events of faith', with the result that they are no longer even capable of disturbing the profane sciences or being disturbed by them. If God's word has gone forth and the Redemption has taken place, they have done so for Christianity [275] just where we exist in other respects, in the one space of existence in which we live in other respects with our experience and our science. Of course we know of this decisive event for salvation which took place there because we have been told of it and have believed what we were told, but it took place and is heard of just where we are in other respects. Hence theology can never admit that the object of a profane science could lie utterly outside its competence. The one identical reality is the object of faith and of profane science under essentially different aspects, but it remains one and the same for all that. In the last resort it is theology alone which can decide whether in a particular case something falls within her competence and is theologically significant or not. Hence if an object of theology penetrates into the realm in which the profane sciences pursue their way (as for instance happens with the existence of Jesus, the historicity of a definite statement made by him, the empty tomb), it cannot be totally untheological to want searchingly to examine the statements of faith intellectually, i.e. logically and metaphysically, in respect of their meaning, their presuppositions and their consequences. This is indeed a matter of course for Catholic theology generally speaking, but one cannot help having the impression that in the question of monogenism a kind of juridical theology has been practised with undue exclusiveness: a few individual propositions are interrogated in the way in which a jurist interrogates a paragraph of a statute and takes as indisputable in themselves propositions from 'positive law'; thus he looks at the propositions and not properly at the reality meant by them, making little attempt to discover the one meaning of the whole so as to grasp it in terms of the whole of reality.

But now to our real business. In the Scriptures Christ appears as our Redeemer, not (only) because he is man (1 Tim 2:5) and thus of 'specifically' the same nature, but because he is the 'firstborn'[55] among [276] many brethren, and we are his brethren according to the flesh (Rom 8:29; Heb 2:11.12.17). He is of the seed of David according to the flesh (Rom 1:3) and thus has assumed just that flesh of sin in need of redemption (Rom 8:3), he is 'of' the fathers according to the flesh (Rom 9:5); he the Sanctifier and we who are sanctified are all of the same origin: ε0χ ε9νο/φ (Heb 2:11). This verse means 'that Christ and Christians are descended from one like children of a common flesh and blood (v. 14). In view of the emphasis laid upon the bodily kinship, this one is not God but Adam.'[56] Because our connexion with him is of this kind we justly lay claim to the inheritance of his glory with the Father (Rom 8: 17.29).[57] The emphasis laid upon the identity of origin and on the assumption [55] It does not concern us here in what sense Christ is called firstborn in Rom 8:29 (in the sense of Col 1:15 or Col 1:18; Apoc 1:5; 1 Cor 15:49; Phil 3:21). Nor is it denied that the 'brethren' in question here are those who are being conformed to Christ, and that a close kinship with the Son is based upon the spirit of adoption. But they are not just 'brethren' because they are conformed to him, but because they are brethren they are destined to become conformed to him (in glory). This brotherliness cannot be simply that of a community of disposition, of a supernaturally ethical kind. For in view of the irreducible distinction maintained by Jesus and the whole New Testament elsewhere between our filiation and his Sonship, it would be peculiar if these two things were now being subsumed under the one concept of brotherhood. The reason why we can speak of a brotherhood at all must lie at that point at which we are really 'consubstantial' with him, in such a way, then, that those who are like each other are really 'brethren', hence in virtue of a common stock. This train of thought finds confirmation in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

[56] Procksch in TWNT 1, p. 113.

[57] To repeat, it is the possession of the Spirit of Christ that gives us our immediate right. But that his Spirit can be in question for us at all (and this must keep on happening if we are to lay hold of it) is due precisely to the fact that he belongs to our flesh. For when it is asked why the condemnation of sin in Christ's flesh should mean anything at all for us, the only possible (though not yet adequate) answer according to the mind of the New

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of a human nature precisely as historically incriminated (the σα∴ρχ α9μαρτι/αφ: Rom 8:3; Eph 2:14; Jn 1:14; Col 1:22; 1 Tim 3:16; Heb 5:7; 10:20; 1 Pet 3:18; 4:1; 1 Jn 4:2; 2 Jn 7) shows clearly that Christ's brotherhood with us can be neither a mere community of disposition or of grace, nor one based purely upon the specifically identical human nature. Rather he enters redemptively into our one common history of guilt, which is one because it is the history of our physically real common stock.[58] That σα/ρχ which is his is not just a quidditative but an historical concept: that which has become what it is and belongs to us as the inheritance of the stock; it is that historically evolved situation of our existence which became [277] his in that he precisely came to be as we come to be flesh (Jn 3:6), by birth in a generative series: he is of woman and therefore has an origin κατα_ σα&ρκα (Rom 1:3; 9:5). The unity of the community of redemption, and thus of the community of salvation and damnation of humanity in general, is not a purely juridical one, rising out of the coincidence of the actions of originally isolated individuals; it is not a 'universal' formed subsequently from individuals thought of as alone being real: it is a community of a stock. Because and in so far as Christ entered into this community by being 'born of woman' (Gal 4:4) he is solidary with men and they with him.[59] We have here a use of the concept of the unity of a stock as a theological concept independent of the Genesis account. This use (in the doctrine of Redemption) may indeed be preformed by the Old Testament doctrine of the one historical origin of the human situation of condemnation which extends to us and in which we come to be as members of this common stock. Nevertheless the new use shows that the New Testament takes up the doctrine independently and uses it on its own responsibility. And that again shows that it is not just 'making a citation' in this case, leaving the meaning and bearing of the idea, as well as its limits, to the Old Testament.

The objection is naturally to be expected here that even in the New Testament the whole thing arises out of a typically Semitic and anyway archaic or even 'mythological' kind of thought, which is only capable of thinking of a community of destiny and a similarity of kind in terms of the community of a stock. To this it must be replied that nowhere is it laid down that such 'archaic' thought does not see more truly than our atomistic and individualistic thought today. One would have to ask whether it was methodologically and objectively sound to push off lightly on to some alien 'thought-form' a conception which does not strike us immediately as obvious (as though this were to explain anything, since it is only to replace one question by another, provided that one does not simply regard a thought-form, in a mechanistic and biological way, as a matter in no need of further explanation and accessible to none), instead of allowing this thought [278] to draw our attention to something which would otherwise escape our notice but which is usually capable of being comprehended by us. Clearly it is methodologically necessary in such a case to look at the reality itself with the eyes of Scripture, to make this object present in its own intelligibility, which is to practise theology and not just historical philology. This will allow us to see clearly that Scripture does not merely 'elucidate' and 'illustrate' something (namely the human unity of destiny and kind) 'in this way' (by a unity of stock); it justly sees in this and expresses through it an objective and essential presupposition[60] of the former truths. One might be tempted to say Testament is: because his 'flesh' is 'our' flesh. This answer puts us new questions, fails perhaps to 'explain' very much. Nevertheless it is the answer which must be given first and foremost, although it may itself be in need of theological clarification.

---

[58] Cf. on this point E. Stauffer's analyses in TWNT II, pp. 432-40 (ει[φ), which are instructive for the whole problematic of the categories employed.

[59] We should remind ourselves of the theological sense of the genealogy in Luke, who takes it back to Adam (Lk 3:38). It becomes all the more necessary to ask what the genealogy really means if it is held that the last part before Adam has no historical content in the modern sense.

[60] We say 'a presupposition' not 'the adequate justification'. In the ordinary scholastic doctrine of original sin

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that a little 'blood and soil mysticism' would be beneficial here and would teach us to see what is, not merely what is 'thought' by one but what is overlooked by the other. We shall have to take this up in the third part of our discussion, returning meanwhile to our examination of Scripture.

This unity of saving history resting on the unity of a stock in which all men are solidary with Christ because he is of their stock[61], becomes still clearer as a reality for Scripture (and Tradition) in the doctrine of original sin.[62] It is true that the handing down of original sin (or putting it differently, the extension to further human subjects prior to their personal decision of that situation of pneuma-less ungodliness realized independently of Christ) in virtue of generation precisely is not expressly declared in Scripture. We have also seen that the assertion that this is a defined doctrine is not entirely free from doubt, while it is of course a doctrine general and undisputed in the Church. But the doctrine is in reality attested in Scripture. We are 'flesh', [279] 'fleshly' (in the sense of a condition of hereditary guilt, i.e. Spirit-less, subject to death as the manifestation of this guilt-incurred abandonment by the Spirit, in the servitude of the law which provokes us to personal sin) because we are born of flesh (Jn 3:6), because we are flesh from our very origin (φυ&σει: Eph 2:3; cf. 1 Cor 15:44-9). Death, which for St Paul is the manifestation of the sin which entered into the world in the beginning, is for him an inherited death (true though it is that it can also be an expression of personal guilt). We 'die in Adam' (1 Cor 15:21 s.), because it is from him that we bear his earthly image (1 Cor 15:48 s.).[63] But if this is true of death, it is true of death's inner essence, original guilt itself: it really is hereditary guilt, a guilt-situation which is ours because we human beings belong to a common stock: born of flesh and therefore flesh.[64]

All we have said about the situation of salvation and damnation may be summed up as follows: Scripture knows of such a common situation of salvation and ruin only in so far as men are of one stock.

3. The institution of the community of salvation and damnation by the act of an individual

This general situation of salvation and damnation having the unity of a stock for its presupposition is not however simply a static existential which is just there. Rather it has come to be historically by a personal action. Such an act, if it is to be of significance for all, i.e. for those too who have not posited it, presupposes that the agent and those jointly the question is for instance certainly treated of, without a final decision, as to how far the fact that Adam is the physical origin of the stock suffices to establish the possibility of hereditary guilt, or whether anything else is necessary. Unfortunately parallel questions in Christology are not submitted to a sufficiently careful examination.

---

[61] It would be interesting perhaps to reflect on how the unity of community with Christ in the one stock was gradually weakened by its Greek equivalent, that he is consubstantialis with us. The historical perspective is displaced by one which is confined to the static quiddity. 'He has the same, nature as we have' says less than 'He is of our stock'.

[62] It goes without saying that we have no intention of providing here a general Biblical theology of original sin. The greater part of it has to be assumed here.

[63] We have still to see that this general guilt-situation was established historically, by the trespass of an individual. For the moment the important point is that it is general and that its generality extends as far as the common stock by means of which it is spread.

[64] The overcoming of this guilt-situation can consequently be conceived of as a re-birth: Jn 3:3-5; Tit 3:5 s.; Pet 1:3.23. While the 'new creation' might be conceived of as 'birth' without reference to another birth, the emergence of the pneumatic man can only be called 're-birth' in regard to a birth which puts the one born into fleshly existence; what is more, this latter birth clearly does not just put him there because without birth he would not exist, and when he exists he is precisely fleshly: it is because the birth as descent from fleshly man brings forth the one born into the fleshly common stock.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

affected by his act are of a single stock. But the reverse is true too: the fact of being affected by salvation and damnation is caused [280] by a unique act which took place once for all within this community. This is clear with Christ in the first place. In the flesh which he shared with us, he, the concretely and historically one, abolished sin by his obedience, and our situation became that of the redeemed, of the redeemed by God.

But it is true of Adam too. That is to say, the one Adam and his act are not the plastic, symbolic simplification of a process in itself 'complicated', which St Paul merely sketched out (in imitation of the symbolic speech of the Old Testament) so as to have a smoothly working parallel to the one Christ. This we shall now try to show.

Let us ask first of all: what, according to Scripture, Tradition and the Council of Trent, is the minimum[65] if we are to continue to speak of original sin at all? The answer must run as follows: by 'original sin' we must at least mean a general situation of damnation[66] embracing all men prior to their own personal free decision, a situation which is nevertheless historic and not an essential condition, one which has come to be through man and is not simply given in the fact of creatureliness. If there were no situation of damnation prior to the sin of the individual, it would be impossible to speak of an hereditary original sin, a cosmic sin (Rom 5:12), the 'generatione' of Trent even as the mere opposite of 'imitatione' would be false and Pelagius would be [281] in the right. If the origin of this universal situation were not historically human, what we should have would be Manicheism (as Augustine would say) or a conception which saw inevitable sinfulness in the very fact of being creaturely. Here we must bear in mind what has already been shown: in so far as this situation of damnation is general, i.e. is binding for every individual, it is based upon the community of the stock. We may then go on to ask the following question. Is it possible to conceive of and to maintain this universally pre-personal and yet historically realized situation of damnation proper to the stock as such, if its historical origin did not lie in a single real individual in the beginning and in his act? The answer is in the negative.

A universal situation of damnation is only conceivable, supposing it to be based upon the community of a stock, if it was historically established at the origin of this community. A later member within such a community can certainly become, by his being and actions, of saving significance for the whole community, as we see in the case of Christ's act, which is salvation for the pre-Christian world too.[67] But a later member cannot establish a situation of damnation for all. For the temporal priority of many of the members of this community

[65] The word 'minimum' does not of course mean that the minimum ascertained in this way is sufficient in fact for the teaching of the Church. It is a minimum agreed to for purely methodological purposes, which if it were absent would make it impossible, as everyone must see at once, to speak of original sin in the Church's sense.

[66] This concept should not be allowed to obscure the character of the state of guilt, in the strict sense, in original sin. Nevertheless it is in our opinion capable of indicating the distinction between original and personal sin, and also of making a point of view clear in a way which concerns us here: this is the universality of original sin, which is precisely not that of a subsequent conceptual unification of the actual sinfulness of many individuals, but is something prior to the individuals as such. And this 'prior something' is not only Adam's one sin as a once-for-all, temporally punctiform happening, but a real universal unity, which may best be appreciated by being called a situation. This is not exactly the same as what is called in scholastic theology the debitum contrahendi peccatum originale; yet the latter expression too draws attention to a state of affairs which is prior to the existence of the individual and the original sin which is inwardly his, and yet cannot simply be identified with the peccatum originale originans as Adam's sinful act.

[67] The ancient Church was exercised by the question of how this was possible (e.g. 'Christ's preaching in the underworld'; the doctrine of faith in the Redeemer to come as a cause of salvation). In later times people have been rather too easily satisfied with the statement that the redemption of the pre-Christian world took place intuitu meritorum Christi. This is perfectly correct, but it is an abstractly formal answer which tells us nothing about how this single divine purpose of salvation embracing the totality of the world in Christ so produces its effect upon the pre-Christian world that the grace given to this world is really Christ's; for surely this means more than the acceptance in God's eyes of Christ's action as the 'juridical' title for this grace. But we cannot go further into this question here.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

would make possible and enforce a personal decision by them which would precede such a situation of damnation not only temporally but also in reality, which could, in other words, make it impossible in advance. For a situation of damnation can only be brought about by one who himself belongs totally to this temporal history.[68] But if the founder of damnation belongs totally to time and if this time is genuine time, i.e. irreversible, and not merely a reflexion of an intemporal 'simultaneous' network of relations of dependency which can [282] run as well in a reverse direction as in their merely apparently temporal exposition[69]; then the later cannot be the ground of the earlier's situation of damnation. To assert the opposite would be to degrade time and the temporal to mere appearance. But it is one of the basic presuppositions of Christianity that time is a reality, created by God, and that in this genuine time itself salvation and damnation come to pass. Thus the historical act which establishes the one situation of universal damnation of the one stock must necessarily have been established at the origin of the stock.

This historical origin of the situation of damnation at the beginning of the stock can only proceed from an individual: in other words, it cannot there and then have been posited by a multitude. The plurality of those to posit the situation of damnation is something which is in direct contradiction with what we are here concerned to maintain: that a situation of damnation is to be found prior to the freedom of any individual you like. Whether it were many (if original sin did not exist) or few (if a polygenistic 'explanation' of original sin were justified) who decide independently of each other, without presupposing in their decision an historically realized situation of damnation already there, would make no difference to the facts of the case: there would be many who do not act out of the solidarity of an historically realized disposition of things in their regard. But if this could be the case in this order of salvation, and with men who give being by generation[70], then original sin ought not to exist at all. If it did indeed exist for many, who would nevertheless form only a part of men, [283] although men form an historical community of goal, it would split the history of the salvation of all humanity into two wholly disparate (though unequal) parts. The situation, that is, which forms an intrinsic factor in man's creaturely freedom, i.e. his externally conditioned freedom, would be essentially different in the two parts: the situation of Paradise[71] and the situation of deliverance as a liberating redemption.

The fact that it is not at all easy to visualize this clearly is the result of a lusus imaginationis: one thinks of the one original member as a random, variable member of a multitude. One argues to oneself: if there has been one 'Adam', who in spite of the radically different situation from which he set out to make his free decision can nevertheless form a [68] In Biblical terms: a second individual who is still an 'Adam' is only possible if he is more than the son of Adam and his other ancestors.

---

[69] The eternal God's timeless knowledge of the whole of the genuinely temporally structured (i.e. objectively irreversible) Whole of the world and its history may not simply be used as a substitute for a terrestrially impossible relationship between a temporally later cause and a temporally earlier effect, when the precise question at issue is how the cause-effect relationships lie in the temporal world itself. We do not in fact pray for the happy issue of past events too, which would be perfectly possible on the contrary assumption. God can indeed, in so far as he wills the totality of a definite world, will every part so far as it is a part and hence stands in correspondence with everything else; and so everything can be of significance for everything else (no matter what point of time it occupies). But this does not signify any terrestrial causality of the later on the earlier; and that is all we are investigating here.

[70] We shall speak later in more detail about this point, that it is always a question of men who have the active power to form a plurality.

[71] What use is made of this situation is another question, with which we have nothing to do here. Let it be noted in passing that Mary's case is not the one in mind here, the case of a paradisal supralapsarian situation of freedom; it is the supreme and the most radical case of the infralapsarian situation of redemption, which presupposes the situation of damnation. This may be seen simply from the fact that Mary finds her salvation and works it out in carne passibili.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unity of personal community and history with his posterity then there could have been two or three or more, and each one of them can (by himself or together with the others) hand down an 'original sin', if this is still to be the way of things. But tills precisely will not do, or at least this 'idea' in no way proves that this is how things are or can be in reality and that the proof of the contrary already provided must be false. For these many would already constitute – prior to their decision – humanity as a multitude, the 'members' of which share no common situation (no matter whether, each for himself, they were to produce a somewhat similar situation for their posterity in each case). The fact that there is one instance by no means proves the possibility of a multitude of them. The first is precisely not necessarily one of a multitude with the index '1' but it is in "our case the whole in its original unity.[72] Thus it is lacking in cogency to argue [284] that if there can be one Adam who is not bound to act on the basis of an infralapsarian situation of 'flesh' but on the contrary posits this situation, then there 'can' (at least) be many such. For if the one Adam is humanity in the sense of its origin and not merely the first of a series, it is no longer possible to say that there has once been a supralapsarian situation open to decision, then it 'can' exist more than once (which is impossible, as we have shown). It is not every unit that can be multiplied in every respect. Any one of these many individuals not subject to original sin would be only one among many in relation to the many subject to original sin who do not descend from him (not their origin, which essentially forms a primitive and not a special case) and yet of an essentially different kind: the situation of damnation would cease to be the common one. And yet this commonness of the situation of damnation is presupposed by every Christian interpretation of existence: you, I, all of us here below, begin as the lost[73], so much so that we know from the start that everyone we come across in the course of our history, with whom we have to do as 'neighbour', is of this kind. The fact that this common situation came into being 'historically' makes no difference. It shows rather how this very historical origin is to be conceived of if it is not to do away with the universality of the situation of damnation. This origin in its proto-historical character must lie wholly behind us, it has a kind of historical transcendence, it cannot be encountered as one factor alongside another in our history. But that is what it would be if (speaking quite concretely) a sinner in the course of his history could encounter another primordial man who was ('so far', at any rate) in a state of justice.

It becomes clear from these considerations that we cannot interpret Rom 5:12 s. as a plastic simplification and stylization of the plural occurrence of more than one Fall. We must either take the text as it stands, the one Adam as one[74] has made all into sinners; or we must [285]

---

[72] The whole in its original unity does not make the whole which arises out of it superfluous, neither is it merely the first member of the latter. Otherwise one would have a series, but no stock and no genuine time, in which the later is no longer capable of reaching back behind the origin but remains enduringly committed to it. The idea of a mathematical series, in which one term proves the possibility of another, is out of place here. For one term does not really arise out of the other in such a series. The problem of the multiplicability of the origin is thus different from that of the multiplicability of what arises from it and of the terms of a purely quantitative series. It should be observed that the proof offered here is purely negative: we do not prove that the possibility, apparently obvious in itself, of a multiple human origin is more than – a confusion.

[73] Someone who thinks of Mary too and of the divine purpose of salvation embracing the situation of lostness would perhaps do better to say 'as those who are to be delivered and the one delivered by anticipation'.

[74] 'One' is really better here than 'individual'. The old problem of humanity's 'being contained' in Adam should be taken up again from the standpoint of Adam's never to be repeated 'uniqueness' ('Einmaligkeit'), which becomes more intelligible in the course of such considerations. It is to miss the point either – as is usual today – to make Adam merely the first individual in a series, or to try to grasp the ontological realities involved here in terms of a Platonic universal, in the Patristic manner. The transcendence of primeval history in our regard could give new life to our understanding of the Ancient traditional doctrine of the privileges of Paradise, an understanding which is in danger today (cf. H. Rondet, Problèmes pour la réflexion chrétienne. Le Péché originel. L'Enfer et autres études, Paris, 1945). All one has to see is that the historicity of the primeval history is not simply a piece of our history with its structures, structures which in spite of all the variety and diversity of simply reject original sin and understand the text as the existentialist analysis of man in general as a sinner in terms of the purely mythological image of 'Adam'. Every other explanation is a hybrid. But if original sin did not exist, then the redemption of many by one would be superfluous too; and we should have to reject it for the same reasons as those for which St Paul's doctrine of original sin is rejected a priori by an atomistic Existentialism based on the uniqueness of the isolated conscience and a guilt which always transcends history. St Paul was therefore completely right when, taking as his starting-point Christ and the knowledge of his Redemption, he gave new depth to the Old Testament doctrine of a situation of death inherited from Adam by making it into a doctrine of original sin, and setting the one Adam and the one Christ in strict parallel to each other.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One result at least ought to have emerged from these considerations: monogenism is a doctrine which is closely connected with the whole basic conception of saving history found in Scripture. It is not something barely attested marginally by this or that brief text, a pure matter of fact which could quite 'possibly' be otherwise. This last point may now serve as the occasion for some discussion of a few matters of principle.

[286]

III. THE POSSIBILITIES FOR A METAPHYSICAL PROOF OF MONOGENISM

1. We assume that from the point of view of the natural sciences polygenism even as a scientific hypothesis possesses no greater probability than monogenism. We assume that monogenism in the strict sense (i.e. one unique original human pair) cannot be proved scientifically, i.e. that from the purely empirical standpoint many original pairs might be possible 'in se'.

2. However it should not simply be assumed as obvious that monogenism can only be known by us here and now in virtue of a positive revelation. Not as though this were impossible a priori. But we have here to do with realities which on the one hand belong in themselves to the natural order, or at any rate are not mysteries in the strict sense, and of which on the other hand it is extremely difficult to say just when and how they formed the express object of a revelation. One only endangers the appropriation of such realities in faith by being in too much of a hurry to banish this object from the realm of natural knowledge and erect the knowledge of it solely upon the basis of this text of the Bible or that. There is a theological positivism too, and it is dangerous. Clearly the only way in which one can answer the question whether monogenism can really be proved philosophically (i.e. within the framework of a theological metaphysics) is by trying to do it and seeing how far one succeeds.

3. Notes for a metaphysics of generation. Such an attempt would have to presuppose an analysis of the essence of generation in terms of natural philosophy if it is to be firmly based. It is not a rash judgment to assert that there is nothing adequate in this field within the framework of scholastic philosophy[75], although the subject is of course [287] treated of what takes place in it remain homogeneous with those of primeval history; that it is and seeks to be a history with its own structures (if it is taken seriously), granting the identity of what exists in both historical regions. Once this is seen, no insuperable reserves will be felt towards the portrayal of Paradise found in classical theology. It is to be expected, indeed postulated theologically, that this portrayal should not 'fit in with' our conceptual world and its science.

---

[75] It is impossible that such a metaphysics of generation should exist for the simple reason that generatio

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

according to the lines laid down in Aristotle's De Generatione. Clearly it is impossible to make good this neglect here. Nevertheless we shall try to offer some remarks on this theme, in an attempt to show that such an ontology of generation might perhaps be of use in the discussion of monogenism. In full consciousness of the questionableness of such a procedure we shall omit all discussion of generation in living things in general and turn our attention at once to human generation. What is offered is merely a sketch for a route which might perhaps be followed.

a. Man is to be conceived of as spirit, and as a bodily spirit: both together, so that he is body in order to be spirit, and only is a spiritual person as such (in the concrete) by incorporation. 'Corporeality' is understood in the first place as spatio-temporal determination. Thus man has a world, i.e. he is a here and now in the one continuum of space and time and is himself a spirit who has a space-time. He is not a personal spirit first 'and then' also an entity with a body. But bodiliness is the necessary mode in which alone he can reach the achievement of his spiritual being.

b. The personal spirit is a spirit referred to others. An absolutely lonely spirit is a contradiction in itself and – so far as it is possible at all – is Hell. If (a) is correct, then what (b) means is that the bodily spirit which is man exists by necessity of nature (also) in relation to a Thou, which is itself present in its own spatio-temporal world as such~ It is not only as an isolated person but also as isolated man that an individual man is incapable of perfection – or is Hell. Where there is man, there is necessarily – not only in fact – human community, i.e. bodily personal community, personally spatio-temporal community.

c. Spatio-temporal order (the basic structure of bodiliness too) is not a subsequent, purely conceptual summation or abstract of individual spatio-temporal entities; it is the single and, as single, exhaustively distributed, prior real condition of the possibility of the individual spatio-temporal entity. Both the scholastic ontology of materia prima, when it has reached an understanding of its own nature, and tendencies [288] in modern physics point in this direction. Thus every material entity is co-determined in its real concreteness by the totality of material reality.

d. The living spatio-temporal entity must exhibit this dependency of the individual upon the whole (its whole) as something itself living, if life is to be on the one hand a new, irreducible order (dimension) above the inorganic, and on the other hand a higher dimension precisely of the spatio-temporal order and not something 'alongside' it. The individual living thing is thus an entity which is necessarily determined as living by the totality of the form of life to which it belongs and whose concrete individuality it displays, just as the individual, merely spatio-temporal thing is determined by the prior real spatio-temporal order in general. The institution of such a form of life itself takes place quite concretely in the institution of the first living thing of this species: this is not merely the first instance of a purely ideal multitude which arises by the emergence (no matter how) of the individuals; it is the institution of the totality in its origin.

---

aequivoca was taken for a fact, so that from the first generation was looked at as being on the same level as other processes of change, all of them being conceived of after the manner of human production of a form in matter. Where generatio aequivoca is regarded as possible and real, monogenism must always have the look of a mere fact which could just as well not be. Consequently, the effort thoroughly to analyse monogenism philosophically is paralysed from the start. It seems as though this medieval attitude is still active in theology today.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

e. The real dependence of the individual spatio-temporal living thing upon the totality of its form of life reaches its real completion and concrete manifestation in generation. Hence this is not just one possible way in which an individual spatio-temporal living thing (as such) and a living spatio-temporal thing as such may 'also' come to be: it is the only possible way. Generation must be conceived of transcendentally as the exclusive genesis (not one of the possible ways of coming to be) for the living individual as such within a species. Just as sensibility is not just one of the possibilities of receptive (spiritual) knowledge but the only one, so the coming to be of the living individual within a single species (i.e. in a characteristic living spatio-temporal unity) is generation and nothing else. Where a living thing arises differently, what takes place is not the coming to be of an individual within a species but the institution of the species itself. Anyone who contests this conception of generation and treats it as a merely contingent possibility among many other, at least conceivable possibilities, denies that the individual spatio-temporal thing and the living thing as spatio-temporal are contained within a real a priori unity which forms the condition of the possibility of the spatio-temporal individual as such; or he refuses to allow that this holds also [289] for the living thing as such, i.e. in so far as it displays being of a higher order than the merely inorganic material thing.

f. If and in so far as man is and must be a spatio-temporal personal spirit in a spatio-temporal community of like beings, he is a spirit living in matter: animal rationale; living animately so as to be spirit and to be spirit in human community.

g. But then it is true of man too that generation is the one necessary way of forming community; where the human species has already been instituted in its origin, no other way of man's spatio-temporal extension in community than that of generation is possible. The institution of a new origin would be the institution of another species. Monogenism and the unity of species allow of being distinguished conceptually but not of being separated in reality. Conversely, wherever 'polygenistic' phenomena are really to be found, what we are in presence of is the genesis of a metaphysically new species, not the multiple original coming to be of the same one; or (if this is not the case) not the genesis of a new species in the metaphysical sense but merely accidental spatio-temporal variations of the same species (in the metaphysical sense).

4. Monogenism and the transcendence of the divine creation of man. We may look at the metaphysical problem of monogenism from another point of view. This will give us an opportunity of replying to an objection which may easily arise to what we have just said. It will probably be objected to no. 3 that it is surely beyond all doubt that God can create many men on this earth independently of each other. To doubt this would be to restrict in a quite absurd way the divine omnipotence, which must be able to do more than once what it once could and has done (thereby proving that it is intrinsically possible). Our second mode of approach may also perhaps be more easily intelligible in view of the extremely sketchy character of what has been said above.

a. Before attacking the new question itself we have once more to draw attention to an established position. Man is a being distinguished in a strictly metaphysical sense from everything below him. However [290] difficult it may be to say where natural boundaries of a really metaphysical kind run in the realm of things below man, man knows that a radical boundary of nature lies between him and everything below and near him, because he is spirit, person, selfconsciousness, transcendence opening in knowledge and freedom upon the unlimited, beyond the inevitable particularity of his environment. He is not just a combination in a different pattern of what is to be found elsewhere in the material world. What he is cannot be conceived of as a modification of other realities. He has an essence really distinct from any other, which is one and entire, irreducible to another. Hence he must be an original institution; not a modification of what was there already, taking place through its own powers, but an original reality newly instituted by God. It may well be that inanimate and animate elements already present in the world are drawn upon and united in this original new beginning, and that man thus has a real genetic connexion with the animal kingdom in the one dimension of organic life. But this makes no difference with regard to the really decisive point: the one entire man as a whole is God's original institution and not the bare product of terrestrial forces, conceived of as having produced man solely in virtue of potentialities permanently inserted in other terrestrial beings. We need not attempt to decide here whether this irreducible novelty of nature may only be recognized in the field of the spirit and of the humane sciences, or whether it is also manifested with sufficient clarity in man's bodily and sensitive life, and thus in the field of the natural sciences too.[76] It makes no difference to the established fact, though it may make some difference in the method by which the fact is exactly established.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. A certain caution is in place when reference is made to some 'potentiality' in God in virtue of his omnipotence. The abstract possibility of an entity or a fact, when this is regarded in itself and in its own isolated relationship to God's power, is to be distinguished from a concrete possibility of whatever is in question when it is related to the totality of things in the world which already exist, to the one world in which they are to exist, to the intelligibility of the divine action (potentia ordinata), to the mode of action proper to God as creator of the world, i.e. to the transcendent creator of a self-consistent [291] world of, which God and his action are not a portion but the background, the meta-physical condition of the world's own reality.[77] In relation to one and the same whole, for example, something which is possible 'in itself' because it exists in this whole can both be impossible a second time[78] and can also be contradictory as an object of God's meaningful action. The possibility of an imaginative reduplication of the same thing at two different places and-or times, both being thought of as brought about by the same divine cause, affords us proof that something of the sort is a genuine possibility in itself and for God.

c. Assuming now what has been said in (a) and (b), we may follow two complementary ways in order to further our argument that polygenism as an object of the divine action is impossible.

1. It is impossible that the same thing (specifically the same, such that the only distinction would be that of a purely negative difference of spatio-temporal location) should be able to have two categorically different causes. Or putting it in another way, two causes which as such are (specifically) different cannot cause the same thing (specifically). Now men arise

[76] Cf. the investigations of Gehlen, Portmann and others.
[77] The Thomist may be reminded here of an example which shows how easily man's quantitative imagination deceives him in such matters. Even in the philosophy of mature scholasticism there were still countless people for whom it was 'evident' that God could create two angels 'Gabriel'. This is nonsensical for the Thomist.
[78] The case in which something is duplicated with identical local and temporal characters is easily seen to be impossible by everyone. But it would be false to assert that this is the only conceivable case. This is not a matter of course for the simple reason that the real unity of place in general can bring it about that something at one place makes 'the same thing' impossible at another.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

through generation. Thus this is not one specific mode but the specific of their genesis, i.e. another specifically different mode of genesis is impossible for them.

It cannot be argued against this that the first man, and thus 'a' man did not arise through generation. For obviously the transcendent institution of the cause of an effect is categorically different in kind from the institution of the effect by this cause. The institution of the world and its original potencies by the world-transcending causality of the Absolute and the institution of the terrestrial effects of these [292] potencies are categorically different. But the institution of the first man (without injury to his individuality) is an institution of a prime cause (Ur-sache), not the institution of an effect like that instituted by this cause. For the first man is instituted precisely as capable of generating; and he is instituted by cod, not by a terrestrial cause. But if the Absolute, without being obliged to achieve itself in the institution of the conditioned, does institute something conditioned, which can produce effects and whose capacity to produce effects belongs to its nature; then the Absolute is not 'able' once again to produce and to wish to produce that precisely for which it has created the cause distinct from itself. Of course the Unconditioned 'can' do what that which was conditioned by it can do. But it cannot wish once again to institute without the conditioned that of which the conditioned is capable, once it has instituted the conditioned.

2. A repeated institution of the terrestrial cause by God[79] would make his own action, in so far as he is Creator, and thus meta-physical condition of the possibility of the finite, into a terrestrial event. The question to arise here would not only be that of the meaningfulness of such a divine action. Why does he himself do what he has given to the creature itself to do and to perform, or why does he give the creature a power from which he himself immediately removes the field of activity by himself doing that for which in fact he created the creature? Such activity would be contrary to the principle of economy, which is not only a methodological principle of cognition but a metaphysical principle too. God's action would become a terrestrial event: it would become a miracle. That divine activity, of a miraculous kind, is terrestrial which takes place at a fixed point in space and time within the whole of material reality; and there on the one hand is as such observable, and on the other can be recognized as the divine institution of novelty. But such action on the part of God is precisely his action; in saving history, in which he wishes to reveal himself as someone [293] who conducts a personal dialogue with the spiritual person and in regard to him, and does not only maintain his sway as transcendent cause of the world itself. The fresh creation of a man in the realm of a man already in existence would thus be a terrestrial, miraculous activity on God's part, which therefore ought necessarily to belong to saving history and yet in itself would form a part of the purely natural history of creation. It is thus a contradiction. But in saving history and there alone the transcendent cause steps forth from behind the veil of space and time and conducts a dialogue with man. Otherwise it institutes the world and its individual, irreducibly separate origins, without putting itself as an agent in the world. Every occasion on which it does this immediately and necessarily has the character of personal dialogue addressed to man. But that is Revelation, not Creation.

A polygenistic account of man's coming into being may take one of two forms. It may either be a biological materialism, holding that no transcendent cause (i.e. one not capable of being localized as cause in space and time)[80] is needed for the genesis of man, nor any [79] We must always reflect on the fact that the humanity in question is one in kind, goal and living-space. The first single human pair is already sufficient as a cause for that. Thus if several first human pairs had been created, the cause would have been instituted more than once for the same end: for all generated men, who are intended to form a unity of a more than conceptual kind.

[80] The institution of space and time in general or of a determinate spatio-temporal order (such as that of a –

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

intervention of God from beyond space and time.[81] Or it may be a naive anthropomorphism, to which pious people are especially liable, imagining that God as Creator produces effects in the world (instead of the world itself), that transcendent miracles of creation can take place every day in the world (instead of saying that the days of the world, its course – not a link in its course – are instituted), that God fills out gaps in the world with his activity, why, he even continues to appear (as in our case) where he has not even left a gap, since he has already seen to the multiplication of men and their historical connexion by the institution of the one human pair capable of procreation.

Certainly it follows once again, when one considers more closely what has been said, though no further examination in detail will be undertaken here, that the first man must not only be thought of as just temporally and numerically the first. However true it may be that he [294] is an individual, he is also the transcendent humanity instituted by God; he is the origin, not just the beginning, the created source of humanity, not just the first drop from a source which lies behind humanity in God. There is no need of argument to show that a train of thought like this, which would need to be explained in more detail and defined more sharply in conceptual terms, is at least advisable from the viewpoint of a theology of original sin. We may enlarge the scope of the problem in the following general terms. Our somewhat medium-quality philosophy today knows only of the really isolated individual, the 'universal' as an abstract concept, and, as the real principle of unity beyond the real individuals of the material world, God alone, who merely by 'pushing from outside' orders together into a single world-machine the pluralities of the world in their reciprocal interaction, which is something wholly subsequent to their ontological constitution. In reality there are cosmic, created, ontologically real principles of unity apart from God: the one first matter, the real unity of origin of all genuine metaphysical species, the angels as created origins (α)ρξαι/) and principles of the unity of order of the material world. God is the supporting ground of these cosmic principles of unity, not a substitute for them. Where he is conceived of in this way, where for example the unity of the human race is seen merely in the one transcendent divine origin, God's transcendence is misconceived and he is made into a cosmic demiurge.

d. It would be false to argue that if what has been said is true, it would follow for the plant and animal kingdoms too that, supposing the theory of descent were maintained, the first appearance of a new species could only come about in a single exemplar. The objection may be answered as follows. Where a really new species appears for the first time in severally mutually independent exemplars and yet arising from a species which had been different up to that time, what is in question is not really a metaphysically new species, however true it may be that this 'species' must be assessed as new and independent from the viewpoint of a biological systematics orientated to the phenotype. A new 'entelechy' or 'form' of an essentially diverse: species (which as a new 'Idea' not to be derived from elsewhere can only arise through a transcendent divine causality) does not arise in several mutually independent instances, or alternatively these 'instances' do not generate – like the angels. But in regard to the animal [295] kingdom man is a metaphysically new, essentially diverse species, not merely in the biological sense of the phenotype, not only in name, but in that ultimate root of his psychosomatic nature, lying behind the space of outward appearance, in his spiritual form.

Thus while it is entirely conceivable that biological development in the animal kingdom reached so advanced a stage of development in a number of exemplars that the transcendent miracle of 'becoming man' could take place in them, this miracle took place only once, metaphysical – species) is itself transcendent with respect to the corresponding spatio-temporal order because it institutes the latter; now that which conditions is not subject to that which is conditioned.

---

[81] An event which for this reason is inaccessible to us in its inner now is unquestionably metaphysical.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

because it established something metaphysically new, which, because it should and could unfold itself by self-multiplication, did not come to pass more than once, if indeed genuine creation was not to become a cosmic spectacle.

Nor consequently is it surprising that the animal world, which drew near in the course of its development to the metaphysical locus of this miracle without being able to arrive at it by its own powers, developed away from this point again, after the miracle of 'becoming man' took place. We are told by an authority[82]:

> In the last 1½ million years of the Tertiary epoch, shortly before the appearance of man, simian forms very close to man emerge. They lived on the steppe, walked upright, their hands were free and they had a human or nearly human set of teeth. Their instinctive activities must have gone far beyond those of our modern primates (gorillas, orang-outangs, chimpanzees). South-east Africa is where they have been discovered. The most recent fossil examples were approximately contemporary with the first man. But in comparison to their predecessors they seem to have been already more simian, more specialized, than the earliest specimens of Australopithecus. This group of prehuman, animal forms died out at the time of the first man. Among their number may be reckoned the giants of East and South-east Asia, which likewise seem to have died out when the first man appeared.

Why did they die out? The simplest and surely the truest thing to say would be, 'Because they had fulfilled their purpose: to prepare the way for man'. We need only ask once in return: Why do the primates, closest systematically speaking to man, which once existed, no longer exist? Why does the family tree of the primates develop away from [296] man again in the modern geological period? Would it have been impossible for such manlike forms to exist today? The answer is simple: now that what was to be achieved is standing, the scaffolding which served the achievement is simply taken down again. But if the event of man could often take place as origin, these approximations to man would always be meaningful.

Nor can it be said that men would not have been able to continue if they had first appeared in a single pair. This cannot be proved. And conversely, even a greater number, which must in any case have been a small one, is no assurance against becoming extinct. Entire groups, from which man may have come under a certain aspect, have died out, although they were more closely related to him than modern primates. Remaining alive or dying out are alternatives which must depend on other factors than that of the original number of ancestors.

It further follows from these considerations that a moderate theory of anthropological evolution, maintained simultaneously with monogenism, does not lead to a shameful compromise. On the contrary both arise in the same way from a single metaphysical principle of economy: the transcendent divine causality influences the terrestrial course of things in the most discreet and economic way, only, in fact where something essentially and irreducibly new is to appear for the first time as an origin. What the world can do by itself, it must do in the highest possible way; and that includes both the preparation of the biological substratum which was to 'become man' and the spreading abroad of the one stock.

[82] Philipp Dessauer, in a manuscript not yet published.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[297]

9

CONCERNING THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN NATURE AND GRACE

The questions which have recently been raised concerning the relationship between nature and grace are well-known. There is no need to provide an historical account of them. We assume here that the reader is familiar with what has been said on this subject by such theologians as de Lubac, Bouillard, Delaye, von Balthasar or Rondet (who are associated in the popular mind, not wholly without justification, with what is called 'la nouvelle Théologie'). We assume too the criticisms which have been offered in regard to these freshly formulated questions by other writers, such as de Blic, L. Malevez, C. Boyer, Garrigou-Lagrange, A. Michel, de Broglie or Philippe de la Trinité, in the way of considerations of principle, or such as Alfaro in the way of historical investigations. We assume that the point made by the encyclical 'Humani Generis' is generally accepted: 'Alii veram "gratuitatem" ordinis supernaturalis corrumpunt, cum autument Deum entia intellectu praedita condere non posse, quin eadem ad beatificam visionem ordinet et vocet' (Denz 3018). There is no intention of dealing here with the whole complex of questions to do with the relationship between nature and grace; we shall attempt this neither historically nor systematically. All we have in mind is to set in motion a few considerations of principle without any idea of even touching upon everything of importance.[1]

[298] Nor shall we be concerned then to present the criticism offered by the 'nouvelle théologie' of the average textbook-conception of the relationship between nature and grace. Ultimately this amounts to the reproach of 'extrinsecism': grace appears there as a mere superstructure, very fine in itself certainly, which is imposed upon nature by God's free decree, and in such a way that the relationship between the two is no more intense than that of a freedom from contradiction (of a 'potentia oboedientialis' understood purely negatively); nature does indeed acknowledge the end and means of the supernatural order (glory and grace) as in themselves the highest goods, but it is not clear why it 'should have much time for' these highest goods. For more is required for this than the simple facts that the good is high (higher than another) and its attainment possible. A free being at least could always reject such a good without thereby having inwardly the experience of losing its end. And this is especially the case because in the average (if not unanimous) view grace in itself remains absolutely beyond consciousness.

It cannot be denied that an extrinsecism of this kind has been current in the average

[1] The original publication of these considerations (here merely expanded slightly) in Orientierung XIV (1950), pp. 141-5, met with more attention than I had expected, not only of an unfavourable kind (though missing the real point) as in the Schweizer Kirchenzeitung of 7 September 1950, pp. 441-4 (cf. also Civitas VI (1950-1), p. 84). It also met with a friendly reception and a large measure of agreement, for example from H. U. von Balthasar in Karl Barth, Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie (Cologne 1951), especially pp. 278-335, 'Der Naturbegriff in der katholischen Theologie', and, in a detailed examination, from L. Malevez, 'La Gratuité du surnaturel', NRT LXXV (1953), pp. 561-86; 673-89. The study by Malevez drew my attention to the fact that the theory of the 'supernatural existential', of which Malevez approves (apart from some small improvements which meet with my agreement), had already been put forward in substance by E. Brisbois, 'Le Désir de voir Dieu et la métaphysique du vouloir selon saint Thomas', NRT XIII (1936), pp. 1103-5. I can only express my happiness at discovering this predecessor, for in questions like this there are no rights of priority for which one has to struggle. The citation from Blondel in Malevez (p. 679) may be compared here as pointing in the same direction. An account, as detailed as that by Malevez and equally in agreement, of the first publication of this study was also given by J. P. Kenny, 'Reflections on human nature and the supernatural', TS XIV (1953), pp. 280-7. (See also by K. Rahner, 'Natur und Gnade', in Fragen der Theologie heute, ed. Feiner, Trütsch and Böckle (Einsiedeln 1957). – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

teaching on grace in the last few centuries. It has been usual to presuppose a sharply circumscribed human 'nature' with the help of a concept of nature one-sidedly orientated to the nature of less than human things. It has been felt that one knows quite clearly what precisely this human nature is and how far precisely it extends.[2] What is still more problematic, it is tacitly or explicitly [299] presupposed that whatever man comes to know by himself (independently of Revelation) about himself or in himself belongs to his 'nature' (because' supernatural' and 'knowable by verbal Revelation alone' are identified as a matter of course), and that so a sharply circumscribed concept of man's nature can be produced out of the anthropology of everyday experience and of metaphysics. Thus it is presupposed that the concretely experienced (contingently factual) quiddity of man squarely coincides with man's 'nature' as the concept opposed by theology to the supernatural. Supernatural grace then can only be the superstructure lying beyond the range of experience imposed upon a human 'nature' which even in the present economy turns in its own orbit (though with a relationship peculiar to itself to the God of creation). Hence this nature is first of all merely 'disturbed' by the purely external 'decree' of God commanding the acceptance of the supernatural, a decree which continues to be a purely exterior divine ordination so long as grace has not yet laid hold of this nature, justifying and divinizing it, and has in this way made the vocation to the supernatural end into man's inner goal. If this external decree, which obliges man to the supernatural purely from without, is not taken into account, a man in the present economy without grace is equal on this view to the man of 'pure nature'. Again, since this decree is known only through verbal Revelation, it follows that man in his own experience of himself experiences himself as this pure nature. And [300] because on this view original sin and its consequences only represent a state of man which ought not to be, in so far as once again man ought to be otherwise only in accordance with a divine decree binding from without, man is not even disturbed in the immanent experience of his pure nature by original sin. In short, what by himself he experiences of himself here and now he could have on this view also experienced in an order of pure nature.

This average view is in fact open to serious objection. There is no difficulty in seeing that it is problematic and dangerous from a religious point of view: if man, just so far as he experiences himself existentially by himself, is really nothing but pure nature, he is always in danger of understanding himself merely as a nature and of behaving accordingly. And then he will find God's call to him out of this human plane merely a disturbance, which is trying to force something upon him (however elevated this may be in itself) for which he is not made (on this view he is only made and destined for it after he has received grace, and then only in a way entirely abstracted from experience). This is particularly true since this offer of inwardly elevating grace remains ex supposito outside or above his real experience, and only becomes known in a faith which knows of its object ex auditu alone. A portrayal of the [2] This is not intended to deny that something which is recognized to be present in consequence of a transcendental analysis of the human reality belongs to human nature (even in the theological sense). To this extent one does know precisely that this belongs to the nature, and to this extent I am in agreement with Malevez (pp. 685 s.). But conversely Malevez will have to grant that one cannot ascertain the whole of human nature by such a transcendental method. Any moral philosopher (so far as he retains the lex naturalis) would have to protest in the strongest terms if someone tried to assert that that alone belonged to man's immutable nature which allowed of being demonstrated to belong there by means of such a method. At any rate I would not venture to maintain such a position. But once anthropology (in the widest sense) is forced to make use of a non-transcendental (and in this sense a posteriori) method in ascertaining man's nature, it begins at this point to become unavoidably 'imprecise'. For there is no way of establishing quite clearly in all cases from experience alone (at least without recourse to theology) whether what experience shows about man belongs to his nature as such (invariably and without exception) or to his historical nature, so far as this displays features (invariably and without exception from the empirical point of view, but conditioned by the fact of vocation to a supernatural end) which it would not have had if this vocation had not existed.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

historical and spiritual consequences of this view may be found in de Lubac's Surnaturel. Even if it is a little on the gloomy side, it certainly provides food for thought. And even if the consequences are in great part due to the influence of a whole spiritual and cultural climate of opinion reflected in this particular view as well rather than consequences of just this theological theory, yet the portrayal of them is not without importance for the assessment of the theory itself.

But the view is also problematic in regard to its tacit presuppositions and its ontological conceptions. How am I to know that everything I in fact encounter in my existential experience of myself (the ultimate yearning, the most profound inner dispersion, the radical experience of the universally human tragedy of concupiscence and death) does in fact fall within the realm of my 'nature', and would also exist, exist in just this form, if there were no vocation to supernatural communion with God? There is no way of providing a justification for this tacit presupposition starting from man, nor is it really proved by any theological argument. And this for the simple reason that the possibility of experiencing grace and the possibility of experiencing grace as grace are not the same thing. If this is not assumed beforehand or taken for [301] granted, is it so easy to say what belongs to human 'nature', and what is more not merely to the contingently factual nature of this concrete economy but to 'pure' nature, in such a way that if it were lacking man would cease to be man? How could one give this question a precise answer philosophically, without recourse to Revelation? It may with justice be said that man is an animal rationale. But do we know whether the subsistent object actually envisaged in terms of this formula would really be just such as we actually experience it, if this man were not called to eternal communion with the God of grace, were not exposed to the permanent dynamism of grace and were not to feel its loss a mortal wound on account of being continuously ordained to it in his inmost depths? One may have recourse to a transcendental deduction in order to ascertain the irreducible quiddity of man, i.e. take that for man's purely natural essence which is simultaneously posited in first asking the question about this essence at all. But even then one does not know whether one may not have introduced too little into this concept of man, or whether in the very act of asking the question, contingently but for us unavoidably, a supernatural element may not have been at work in the questioner which could never in actual fact be bracketed off, and so would prevent one from laying hold purely of man's natural essence in the concept.[3] A [302] precise delimitation of nature from grace (supposing it were possible at all) and so a really pure concept of pure nature could thus in every case only be pursued with the help of Revelation, which tells us what in us is grace and so provides us with the means of abstracting this grace from the body of our existential experience of man and thus of acquiring pure nature (in its totality) as a 'remainder'.

[3] The phantasma of the 'conversio ad phantasma' which is necessary in order to grasp the most abstract concept of man's nature is the concrete experience, never to be absolutely and exhaustively analysed, which man has of himself. To this extent, like every concept, even the most highly purified metaphysical concept of man's nature remains 'historical', i.e. consisting in and apprehended only in a synthesis, already achieved beforehand and never wholly resolvable, of a priori conditioned 'concept' and 'intuition' (experience). But in this experience supernatural, grace-qualified factors are involved too in the present concrete economy (the contrary at least cannot be proved). And this in such a way that no process of elimination could ever be exhaustive, since the intuition which is necessary if we are to have the concept inevitably contains more elements than would be necessary for the concept, for its power to represent. In other words, we inevitably think the abstract nature of man with our eye upon a model of man offered us by experience. But right to the end of his history man will never be quite done with learning what in him is essence and what merely contingently factual model. The whole spiritual and cultural history of man testifies to this. For in this history he continually experiences new modes of the single process of the realization of his essence, which he would never have been able to infer from his essence a priori. And in each new mode he learns anew by living it the difference between essence and its concrete historical realization, the synthesis of which he had held before to be more or less incapable of being dissolved.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The ontological presuppositions of this extrincesism are equally problematic. One in particular is quite unintelligible, though it is tacitly assumed, to the effect that where grace has not yet laid hold of I the man who has awakened to freedom by justifying him, his binding ordination to the supernatural end can only consist in a divine decree still external to the man. Even if this binding ordination is not counted 1 among the constituent elements of human nature as such, who is going to prove that it could only be interior to man in the form of a grace already justifying, that an interior supernatural existential of the adult man could only consist in justifying grace already stirred into faith and love? On the contrary, must not what God decrees for man be eo ipso an interior ontological constituent of his concrete quiddity 'terminative', even if it is not a constituent of his 'nature'?[4] For an ontology which grasps the truth that man's concrete quiddity depends utterly on God, is not his binding disposition eo ipso not just a juridical decree of God but precisely what man is, hence not just an imperative proceeding from God but man's most inward depths? If God gives creation and man above all a supernatural end and this end is first 'in [303] intentione', then man (and the world) is by that very fact always and everywhere inwardly other in structure than he would be if he did not have this end, and hence other as well before he has reached this end partially (the grace which justifies) or wholly (the beatific vision). And it is entirely legitimate to start from this point in an attempt to outline the one concrete 'quiddity' of man (if not indeed his 'nature' as opposed to grace). In short, we admit the basic contention that there is widely prevalent in the average teaching on grace an extrinsecist view which regards this as being merely a superstructure imposed from without upon a nature in itself indifferent with regard to it. It would seem to be a genuine concern of theology to put an end to the extrinsecism. Nor is it wholly overcome by emphasizing (e.g. with Malevez[5] against de Lubac) that the potentia oboedientialis of nature includes nevertheless a kind of velleity, indeed a yearning (only a conditional one of course) for the immediate possession of God in the depths of the essence, and that a spiritual nature cannot really be thought of without this appetitus, so that the potentia oboedientialis is not simply an absence of contradiction in a purely negative way. For so long as this yearning is really conceived of as conditional and, contrary to this basic position, a half unhappiness is not made out of the finite happiness which would be man's lot without the visio and a proper capacity not made out of the potentia oboedientialis which is identical with human nature, this desiderium remains so hypothetical that nature can always become enclosed within its own plane.

But is this inner reference of man to grace a constituent of his 'nature' in such a way that the latter cannot be conceived without it, i.e. as pure nature, and hence such that the concept of natura pura becomes incapable of complete definition? It is at this point that we are bound to declare our inability to accept the view which has been attributed to the 'nouvelle théologie' and has met with so much opposition.[6] It is here that 'Humani Generis', in the

[4] Malevez says with justice (p. 678): 'Toute volonté divine ad extra se définit par le terme, qu'elle pose; si donc le décret divin, qui a présidé a la creation, a été un décret de destination des hommes au Royaume, cette destination a dû se traduire par un certain effet au plus profond de nous-mêmes: au décret immanent à la volonté divine, a répondu en nous une certaine disposition, une ordination aux biens qui nous étaient promis.' This starting-point for the considerations we shall be offering about the 'supernatural existential' should be noted. This existential is not postulated in order to simplify the problem of the 'potentia oboedientialis', to explain why nature has an affinity to grace. If this were the starting-point it could be said that the problem was merely shifted by introducing this term (cf. E. Gutwenger, ZKT LXXV (1953) p. 462). (For the term 'existential' see the Introduction. – Tr.)

[5] L. Malevez (in a review written before the article frequently cited here), NRT LXIX (1947), pp. 3-31.

[6] It is certainly defended by the anonymous writer D. in Orientierung XIV (1950), pp. 138-41, 'Ein Weg zur Bestimmung des Verhältnisses von Natur und Gnade'. D. belongs to the circle of those theologians who are usually grouped together (though some of them protest against it) as the school of 'la nouvelle théologie'. We are not concerned to decide whether and how far D.'s presentation really reproduces de Lubac's views

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

statement [304] quoted above, set out a teaching about which there can be no misconceptions.[7] The problem is this: is it still possible to conceive of grace as unexacted,[8] supposing that the existential consisting in the inner and unconditional reference to grace and beatific vision were a constituent of man's 'nature' in the sense that man as such could not be thought without it? That grace is absolutely unexacted, that this proposition is the unquestioned point of departure for all further reflexion, this was an indubitable axiom for the 'new' teaching too, which it accepted as much as any other theology. The only question then is whether this axiom is objectively consistent with the theorem of an unconditional reference to grace in virtue of nature as such. This reference to the beatific vision was regarded in this recent view as on the one hand an intrinsic, inamissible constituent of man's nature, and on the other so conceived that the withholding of the end of this directedness was expounded as being incompatible with God's wisdom and goodness and in this sense unconditional (provided of course that the creature does not fall short of the end by its own fault). We hold that with these presuppositions grace and beatific vision can no longer be said to be unexacted. The precise point at issue is to be noted. Even D., who is perhaps the most explicit champion of the view in question[9], [305] himself holds (as the conclusion of the article already cited shows) that grace is unexacted for the man actually in existence; unexacted, then, not simply for an imagined or hypothetical man who is not yet in existence and to whom consequently God does not owe being and all that he needs to be, but for the man already supposed to be in existence. This unexactedness is significant from a religious point of view: as God's real partner I must be able to receive his grace (otherwise than my existence) as an unexpected miracle of his love, not first of all think myself out of existence and then conceive of my own being as such as the miracle of his freedom. But it would appear that against his will D. goes no further than the unexactedness which is proper to creation, and that for him grace is distinguished from other created things only in respect of the greatness of the gift but not in respect of unexactedness itself; for these other created things may also be said in a certain sense to be 'unexacted', in so far as they arise out of God's freedom.

It is true that one may perhaps say too that the defenders of the unexactedness of grace, of the possibility thereby derived of a pure nature and of the impossibility of an unconditional striving of nature for the immediate vision of God by grace, make the defence of their position into far too easy a matter. For a less than personal entity unconditional reference to an end and the 'unexactedness' of this end are incompatible assumptions when they are applied to the same thing at the same time. This is especially the case when the matter is accurately, which is D.'s intention.

---

[7] The teaching has been heard in quarters which previously had shown appreciation of de Lubac's basic orientation – and still may show it even today. Cf. H. U. von Balthasar (further to his book on Barth) in ZKT LXXV (1953), pp. 454 s.

[8] Ungeschuldet. This word, derived from schulden 'to owe', appears so often in this study that I have decided to translate it conventionally by 'unexacted'. The disadvantage of this translation is that 'unexacted' negates obligation from the point of view of the 'creditor', while ungeschuldet negates it from the point of view of the 'debtor'. This is perhaps not quite so important in the present context as it might otherwise seem; and in any case it seemed intolerable to have to repeat the form 'unowed' (or worse, 'unowedness'), or resort to continual paraphrase. The reader may like to compare the relation between 'right' and 'obligation', a right in A involving an obligation in B. – Tr.

[9] We concern ourselves in what follows chiefly with D., because his essay is perhaps the clearest, and also the most extreme, exposition of the standpoint here rejected. Apart from H. de Lubac's essay, 'Le Mystère du surnaturel' in RSR XXXVI (1949), pp. 80-121, most of the essays from this circle were primarily historical in character, and are consequently not easily to be interpreted as regards their theoretical and systematic intentions. Thus H. Bouillard, Conversion et grâce chez S. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1944); H. de Lubac, Surnaturel (Paris 1946); H. Rondet, 'Le Problème de la nature pure et la théologie du XVIe siècle', RSR XXXV (1948), pp. 481-521; – , Gratia Christi. Essai d'histoire du dogme et de théologie dogmatique (Paris 1948).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

looked at from God's point of view, in that he himself constitutes the unconditional reference through his own act of creation. But is this equally simple and obvious where a personal being is in question? Could it not be said here with apparent justice that it is precisely the essence of the personal being (his paradox, without which he cannot be understood) that he is ordained to personal communion with God in love (by nature) and must receive just this love as free gift? Is this not true of earthly love too? It is (as the act of the partner) something to which the man giving and receiving love knows himself uniquely ordained, so that he would seem lost and unhappy to himself if he did not receive this love, and yet he accepts this same love as the 'miracle' and the unexpected gift of free (and so unexacted) love. Someone might [306] ask: cannot the essence of a personal spirit lie just in this (in this and nowhere else!), that it must accept personal love as unexacted if it is not to lose its own meaning, and that hence its unconditional ordination to this love and the unexactedness of the love not only do not exclude each other but mutually condition each other? To the objection in this more precise form it must still be replied that it does not prove what it sets out to prove. The example, first of all, is lacking in cogency. For where is it proved that the ordination of the one loving person to the other, so far as it is really 'unconditional', precedes a free decision, which would be necessary if the example is to prove anything? But the decisive reply is this: can that person, who has himself created such an ordination to the personal and intimate communion of love between two persons (in our case man and God), once this has been presupposed still simultaneously refuse this communion without offending against the meaning of this creation and his very creative act itself? This question however is to be answered in the negative, no matter whether one might still be able to say that the person so created must and can regard this love as gift and grace if it is in fact bestowed upon his unconditional ordination to it. But if this negative answer is correct, it follows that on the supposition of such an ordination (in sensu composito with it) the actual granting of the end of this ordination can no longer be free and unexacted. Thus if the ordination cannot be detached from the nature, the fulfilment of the ordination, from God's point of view precisely, is exacted. And, as all admit, just this is false, and so must the presupposition be.

The defenders of the theory here rejected attempt to indicate various facts (as may be seen in D.) which in their opinion are of a kind to show that the state of absolute ordination of man's nature as such to grace and the unexactedness (supernaturality) of grace do not exclude each other. It may perhaps be profitable to examine these indications a little more closely.

So far as the first counter-argument to be found in D. is concerned, it seems to us to be lacking in force. The Council of Trent does indeed declare that blessedness is both grace and simultaneously merit (Denz 809; 842); but there is no difficulty in seeing here that on the one hand the pre-suppositions of this merit (justifying grace) are pure grace, and that on the other hand – this grace once presupposed – the further consequences of this state can be true merit: thus glory in its mediate presupposition is grace, in its immediate cause is merit (exacted). Thus [306] the example does not prove that the same thing (grace) in respect of the same (natural dynamism towards grace) can be both exacted and unexacted at the same time; thus it does not prove that a reality can possess at the same time and in the same respect the character of being unexacted and the character of being something which God could not refuse. This is not of course to deny a generosity and wisdom in God which do not annul the unexactedness of a gift as far as the receiver is concerned, although these divine attributes 'owe' it to themselves, 'exact' it of themselves, to bestow this gift, when in fact the wise and generous God has promised such a gift. But this does not prove that a gift may still be regarded as unexacted in respect of its receiver when God's wise generosity has objectified itself in the world primarily by creating in the receiver, in his very nature, a disposition which under pain of losing its own meaning finds uniquely in this gift its unique end and its only possible fulfilment. In this case God's wisdom owes 'itself' the fulfilment of this disposition, because and in so far as it has created this disposition in such a way that the disposition itself exacts the fulfilment. The example of the beggar who is promised a meal fails at the decisive point: the beggar does not have a 'disposition' to be fed by just this determinate particular host, and the host has not got to take upon himself a responsibility for the beggar's hunger: thus what we have here is a gift bestowed in pure generosity. But where an unconditional disposition of nature has preceded the gift, such a gift can at most be a part or a partial end of nature, and hence can only be unexacted in the sense in which nature itself is (i.e. God need no more have created it than the whole of nature).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

An appeal to the mysterium of the paradox whereby grace is both unexacted and yet cannot be refused would only be appropriate once it had been satisfactorily demonstrated from positive theological sources that the impossibility of refusing a 'desiderium naturale' for grace was an assured theological datum and not itself a theological hypothesis. The proof of this has so far not been provided.

Of course one can and should define the essence of supernatural grace in its own terms and not in terms of nature merely. It is correct to say that its essence is God's self-communication in love. One might with justice say that a gift of such a divine order and the communication of personal love are essentially unexacted. But all that follows from this is that a disposition cannot subsist on the human side which would inevitably draw this divine self-communication of personal [308] love after it, or that if it did, the disposition must likewise be unexacted. But it does not follow that as a natural disposition it would allow the unexactedness of such a divine love to subsist. But if this disposition is conceived of as belonging to nature, grace would be unexacted merely as something given in just the same way as nature and with it; in fact it would represent the highest (because uncreated) gift within the formal framework of just this unexactedness, a gift essentially distinguished from other (created) unexacted gifts (though not under the formal aspect of unexactedness). In neither case does it cease to be impossible to say: grace is unexacted in respect of this nature. In other words, it follows from the innermost essence of grace that a disposition for grace belonging to man's nature is impossible, or it follows that such a disposition, in case it is needed, itself belongs to this supernatural order already; but it does not follow that as natural it would permit the unexactedness of grace to subsist.

It is certainly true that man's concrete end is the first object of God's will and that it is with this in view that he first devises the concrete quiddity of man. But it only follows from this that if God wills a supernatural and unexacted end and if he wills this (or must will it) in such a way that the created quiddity has for it a disposition of a positive and unconditional kind, then God must simultaneously give to this created thing the disposition to this end. But it does not follow that the disposition must itself belong to the nature of this thing. Otherwise God would be creating a creature which would as a whole, together with this natural disposition, be created freely and in this sense unexactedly, but not a creature in respect of which precisely once again grace would be unexacted. It might however be objected that it would ultimately be necessary to suppose yet again a 'disposition' to this supernatural disposition in the creature, and that this 'disposition' would then have to be conceived of as an essential constituent of man's nature. This may by all means be granted; but where has it been proved that this natural disposition cannot so be conceived of that while remaining simply identical with man's spiritual nature it still continues to have its meaning and significance even when it is not fulfilled by this inner, supernatural disposition for grace?

We may omit any consideration here of the question whether the condemnation of Baius has any relevance for or against the view here being discussed. Any attempt to answer it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

would drive us too deeply [309] into the details of historical theology.[10] But there is no doubt that this condemnation must be interpreted very cautiously – something which is frequently forgotten in the average sort of theology. If for example it results from this condemnation that God could have created man, even without his having sinned, in the state in which he now finds himself (in actual fact because of original sin), it does not follow from this that the state of man now experienced is simply identical materially with that of a natura pura. For obviously God could not have created man without his guilt in the state of an unfulfilled and yet binding demand for the supernatural (that, for instance, is the obvious presupposition behind the condemnation of Baius' proposition in Denz 1055). But what the persistence of this ordination to the beatific vision signifies for the man without grace in respect of his nature, whether this ordination is ontologically intrinsic to his concrete quiddity or is only juridically external, and hence whether it makes itself perceptible in his experience of himself or not, all this is something concerning which the condemnation of Baius offers no decision.[11]

Whether or not the unbounded dynamism which is held on this view to belong to nature and yet to be meaningless without grace and the beatific vision, is capable of being fully known philosophically quoad nos and of being analysed in terms of its supernatural end, in D's view however it objectively includes the supernatural as the end intrinsically necessary to its essence. But this is immediately to threaten the supernaturality and unexactedness of the end, no matter whether independently of Revelation we should in actual fact have succeeded in sounding these ex supposito natural depths of our being so comprehensively that they themselves objectively and compellingly refer us to the beatific vision as possible and real.

The paradox of a natural desire for the supernatural as a link between nature and grace is conceivable and necessary if by 'desire' is understood an 'openness' to the supernatural, and it is taught in every type of Catholic theology, even if this often interprets the potentia oboedientialis in too purely formal and negative a way as a mere non-repugnance. But a 'desire' which is natural and at the same time, even if only objectively, inevitably attracts grace to itself (the desire itself, [310] not just God's wisdom and his promise but the latter through the former!), is a desire which 'demands' grace, demands precisely because it would otherwise be meaningless. But this is incompatible with the unexactedness of grace.

After this critique of an unconditional and yet natural ordination of man to the supernatural, we should like to try to suggest in a few brief words how we ourselves conceive of the relationship between man and grace. God wishes to communicate himself, to pour forth the love which he himself is. That is the first and the last of his real plans and hence of his real world too. Everything else exists so that this one thing might be: the eternal miracle of infinite Love. And so God makes a creature whom he can love: he creates man. He creates him in such a way that he can receive this Love which is God himself, and that he can and must[12] at the same time accept it for what it is: the ever astounding wonder, the unexpected,

---

[10] Cf. e.g. L. Renwart, 'La "Nature pure" a la lumière de l'encyclique "Humani Generis", NRT LXXIV (1952), pp. 337-54.

[11] See the study below, 'The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia', especially pp. 375-82.

[12] Two things are meant by this 'can and must'. Firstly, merely the fact: God wishes so to communicate himself that his self-communication to the creaturely subject is unexacted. Hence he must create man just 'so' that he can receive this self-communication only as grace; thus he must not only give him an essence but also constitute him as a 'nature' (as opposed to an unexacted supernatural). But this formula is intended to convey a second point: the self-communication simply cannot be other than unexacted, i.e. the will to a 'purely' unexacted self-communication is not only a fact but a necessity: there is no essence of a creaturely kind which God could constitute for which this communication could be the normal, matter-of-course perfection to which it was compellingly disposed. This is indeed (against Ripalda) the general teaching of theology today: grace and glory are simply speaking supernatural. But then one would have to draw the consequence of this proposition, more clearly than is usually the case: this grace is only then conceived of in its true essence when it is recognized to be not just the created 'accidental' reality produced by God's efficient causality 'in' a (natural) substance, but

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unexacted gift. And let us not forget here that ultimately we only know what 'unexacted' means when we know what personal love is, not vice versa: we don't understand what love is by knowing the meaning of 'unexacted'. Thus in this second respect God must so create man that love does not only [311] pour forth free and unexacted, but also so that man as real partner, as one who can accept or reject it, can experience and accept it as the unexacted event and wonder not owed to him, the real man. As unexacted, not only because he does not deserve it as sinner, but further because he can also embrace it as unexacted when, already blessed in this love, he is allowed to forget that he was a sinner once. That is all we have to say on this matter 'kerygmatically'. It will appear that one need not discourse at such great length about nature and the supernatural in one's proclamation of the Gospel as one has been accustomed to do in this connexion.

Now if one quite rightly sets about transposing these simple propositions, which every Christian can in a true sense make his own, into 'theology', because this transposition is necessary for the theologian and the preacher if he is to be preserved from the danger of misinterpreting them or rendering them innocuous, the following points may be made.

1. Man should be able to receive this Love which is God himself; he must have a congeniality for it. He must be able to accept it (and hence grace, the beatific vision) as one who has room and scope, understanding and desire for it. Thus he must have a real 'potency' for it. He must have it always. He is indeed someone always addressed and claimed by this Love. For, as he now in fact is, he is created for it; he is thought and called into being so that Love might bestow itself. To this extent this 'potency' is what is inmost and most authentic in him, the centre and root of what he is absolutely.[13] He must have it [312] always: for even includes 'uncreated grace' in its own concept in such a way that this may not be conceived of purely as a consequence of created grace. For it is difficult to see from an ontological point of view why it should not at least be possible for a created accident (however 'divinizing' it may be thought to be) to be ordered to a natural substance connatural with it, i.e. it is difficult to see how a purely created, accidental reality could be supernatural simpliciter.

---

[13] H. U. von Balthasar holds (at least in his book on Barth, pp. 310 s.) that if one allows this determination to the acceptance of God's unexacted loving self-communication to be the 'inmost' thing in man, one can no longer disregard this inmost centre in favour of the possible concept of a pure nature; thus he holds that the position put forward here is an uneasy compromise between the views of Maréchal and de Lubac. This is not the place to discuss Balthasar's theology of the grace-nature relationship as a whole. The reader may be referred to the essay by L. Malevez cited above and Balthasar's own most recent explanations in ZKT LXXV (1953), pp. 452 s. All that needs to be established here is: 1. If one wishes positively to contest (and that ultimately is what we are doing here) the possibility of a pure spiritual nature 'for God' (Balthasar, p. 311), i.e. looked at from his point of view, one could no longer speak of admitting such a possibility 'from the standpoint of a creaturely theology' either. Thus this distinction 'for God' – 'for us' (which is our own) does not help to reconcile the opposed positions. 2. When Balthasar asks how it should be possible to subtract 'the inmost' with a view to which all else is in concrete fact devised by God, without leaving behind a meaningless remainder, it is easy and in this case fair to reply by recalling the paradox of the most intimate divine Love, or, in more harmless terms, its mystery: precisely if it is bestowed freely (hence in concrete fact, hence not by essential necessity), it is the inmost, and that with a view to which everything else is willed concretely and freely. Here too it holds good that the summum is the intimum. And yet this Love, precisely because it is the highest and inmost, is the most unexacted. Does not Balthasar himself slip into a naturalistic concept of nature when he takes it for granted that the 'inmost', the 'most personal' is eo ipso the most inamissible, the ever-available? Is it not precisely the essence of man to receive the unexpected as the inmost, and to have the inmost as grace? But then the inmost love is not only the love of an aristocratic 'gratuitousness from above' but that of a 'gratuitousness from below' (p. 311), because precisely man himself, man as existential (hence very much 'from below') is meant to accept this love as unexacted by him, not owed to him. But then the concept of a possible 'pure nature' is no longer to be avoided. What has been said about this Love holds good then necessarily of an ordination to it, in so far as this 'ordination' is apprehended not merely as the natural possibility of the potentia oboedientialis, but as 'unconditional'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

one of the damned, who has turned away from this Love and made himself incapable of receiving this Love, must still be really able to experience this Love (which being scorned now burns like fire) as that to which he is ordained in the ground of his concrete being; he must consequently always remain what he was created as: the burning longing for God himself in the immediacy of his own threefold life. The capacity for the God of self-bestowing personal Love is the central and abiding existential of man as he really is.[14]

2. The real man as God's real partner should be able to receive this Love as what it necessarily is: as free gift. But that means that this [313] central, abiding existential, consisting in the ordination to the threefold God of grace and eternal life, is itself to be characterized as unexacted, as 'supernatural'. Not because man first of all – 'obviously' – has a fixed, circumscribed nature in the sense that measured by it (as a fixed quantity known beforehand) grace, which is to say ultimately God himself, appears to be out of proportion and must therefore be called supernatural. But because the longing for, the ordination to, God's Love, this existential for supernatural grace, only allows grace to be unexacted grace when it is itself unexacted, and at the moment when, fulfilled by grace, it becomes conscious of itself as supernatural, i.e. shines forth as unexacted by the real man, not owed to him. Man is not to recognize himself merely as part of God's free creation; because he exists and although he exists already, he is to accept God's Love as gift and unexpected wonder. But if he were in a certain sense nothing but this existential, and were this – here there arises the theological word 'nature' for the first time – simply his nature, i.e. were it in absolutely no way capable of being dissociated from what he is otherwise and from what he could understand himself to be, then he could certainly as a free agent always continue to behave contrary to this nature in the despite of Love; but he could not accept this Love as bestowed gratuitously and without exaction upon him, God's really existent partner. Were he simply this existential, and were this his nature, then it would be unconditional in its essence, i.e. once it has been given, the Love which is God would 'have to' be offered by God.

3. Thus the man who receives this Love (in the Holy Spirit and thanks to the Word of the Gospel) will know this very existential for this Love as not owed to him, unexacted by him the real man. This knowledge is what allows him to distinguish and delimit what he always is (his concrete, indissoluble 'quiddity') into what is this unexacted real receptivity, the supernatural existential, and what is left over as remainder when this inmost centre is subtracted from the substance of his concrete quiddity, his 'nature'. 'Nature' in the theological sense (as opposed to nature as the substantial content of an entity always to be encountered in contingent fact), i.e. as the concept contraposed to the supernatural, is consequently a remainder concept (Restbegriff). By that is meant that starting as we have done, a reality [314] must be postulated in man which remains over when the supernatural existential as unexacted is subtracted, and must have a meaning and a possibility of existence

[14] The theologian must seriously ask himself how it is possible to explain the poena damni without adopting such an abiding supernatural existential foreordained to grace. In fact it cannot otherwise be explained. For the loss of a good which is possible, but not the object of an ontological ordination prior to free endeavour ('voluntas ut res'), can only be felt as a painful evil when the loser wills it freely (but the damned have no use for this and do not do it). But the decisive argument for the existence of the supernatural existential is that already indicated above (p. 302 s.): even prior to grace man's binding, indissoluble ordination to the supernatural end is a real determination of man himself, and not merely a divine intention, a decree 'in God's will'. To make of this a purely 'juridical', purely 'moral' entity is nothing but a nominalism which has not taken cognisance of itself.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

even when the supernatural existential is thought of as lacking (for otherwise this existential would necessarily be demanded precisely by the postulated reality, and it could only be unexacted with respect to a purely possible man, as an element in creation in general). But this 'pure' nature is not for that reason an unambiguously delimitable, de-finable quantity; no neat horizontal (to use Philipp Dessauer's way of putting it) allows of being drawn between this nature and the supernatural (both existential and grace). We never have this postulated pure nature for itself alone, so as in all cases to be able to say exactly what in our existential experience is to be reckoned to its account, what to the account of the supernatural. Where life is a matter of concrete yearning for eternal Truth and pure and infinite Love, of the inescapability of a free decision before God, of the pangs of birth, of concupiscence, labour, toil and death (hence of man's real essence and its achievement), all this is unquestionably experienced by a man who (consciously or unconsciously) is subject to the influence of the supernatural existential (if not of grace). Thus there is no way of telling exactly how his nature for itself alone would react, what precisely it would be for itself alone. This is not to deny that in the light of experience and still more of Revelation it might not be possible in some determinate respect to use a transcendental method to delimit what this human nature contains. 'Animal rationale' may still in this respect be an apt description. Certainly the philosopher has his own well-grounded concept of the nature of man: the irreducible substance of human being, established by recourse to human experience independently of verbal revelation. This concept may largely coincide with the theological concept of man's nature, in so far as without Revelation the greater part of what goes beyond this theological 'nature' is not experienced, and at any rate is not recognized as supernatural without the help of Revelation to interpret it. But in principle the content of this philosophical concept of man need not simply coincide with the content of the theological concept of man's 'pure nature'. It can in concrete fact contain more (i.e. something already supernatural, though not as such). When therefore one undertakes to state with precision what exact content is intended by such a concept of a pure nature, in particular as regards God and his moral law, the difficulties, indeed the impossibility, of a neat horizontal [315] once again become apparent for us, as the history of theology shows only too clearly. But these difficulties lie precisely in the nature of things: man can experiment with himself only in the region of God's supernatural loving will, he can never find the nature he wants in a 'chemically pure' state, separated from its supernatural existential. Nature in this sense continues to be a remainder concept, but a necessary and objectively justified one, if one wishes to achieve reflexive consciousness of that unexactedness of grace which goes together with man's inner, unconditional ordination to it. Then in fact this unconditional ordination must itself be grasped as unexacted and supernatural; man's concretely experienced quiddity differentiates itself into the supernatural existential as such and the 'remainder' – the pure nature.

4. Hence there is no longer any reason why speculative theology should avoid considering the relationship between the supernatural (including the supernatural existential) and nature in itself. It will be permissible to take hold with an easy conscience of the concept of potentia oboedientialis scorned by de Lubac. The spiritual nature will have to be such that it has an openness for this supernatural existential without thereby of itself demanding it unconditionally. This openness is not to be thought of merely as a non-repugnance, but as an inner ordination, provided only that it is not unconditional. It will be permissible at this point to point unhesitatingly at the unlimited dynamism of the spirit, which for D. is the natural existential immediately ordered to grace itself. All one must guard against is identifying this unlimited dynamism of the spiritual nature in a simply apodeictic way with that dynamism which we experience (or believe we experience) in the adventure of our concrete spiritual existence, because here the supernatural existential may already be at work – as subsequently emerges in the light of Revelation. And one will guard against asserting that this natural dynamism is an unconditional demand for grace. How should we know this, if we never experience it 'pure'? There is no reason why it could not retain its meaning and necessity even without grace, if on the one hand one can learn to see it as the indispensable transcendental condition of the possibility of a spiritual life at all; and on the other hand if this spiritual life, although in comparison with the beatific vision it remains eternally in umbris et imaginibus, [316] can at any rate be shown to be neither meaningless nor harsh but can always be seen as a positive, though finite, good which God could bestow even when he has not called man immediately before his face. Even according to D. the pure philosophy of man's nature (even his concrete nature) is not capable of discerning the possibility of a visio beatifica. Then D. too must hold that a spiritual life towards God as an end approached merely asymptotically is not to be dismissed as meaningless from the start. But as has already been said, we have no pure experience of this purely natural dynamism (or at any rate the contrary is not proved). Thus one who believes that he or humanity in the concrete is driven on the most sublime ways of its history, even apart from verbal revelation, by an impulse which would be meaningless if it did not lead to the immediate vision of God, need not on that account go on to assert anything which would be opposed to this view. All he would be bound not to assert (and his experience gives him no occasion for this either) is that this existentially (existentiell) real dynamism belongs to the substance of the nature of man in the theological sense.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Of course what has been said is far from providing an answer to all the questions which could be put concerning the relationship of nature and grace. It would be proper to speak with more precision of the potentia oboedientialis of nature as such. It would be necessary to examine more closely how the supernatural existential is related to grace itself, and in what sense it is distinct from it. All the questions and theses concerning the relationship of nature and grace would need to be wholly rethought in terms of an explicit recognition of the fact that grace is not just a 'neutral state' (however sublime), that it cannot be sufficiently described by purely formal ontological categories alone (created 'quality', accident, habitus, etc.), but that personal categories (love, personal intimacy, self-communication) can neither be avoided in the description of what grace is, nor, because they do not belong to the realm of formal ontology, are on that account inaccessible to a more precise philosophical or theological reflexion or stand in no need of it. In regard to the question of the nature-grace relationship it would be necessary to consider in more precise detail how a philosophical knowledge of a 'nature' really comes about. Scholastic philosophy and theology do indeed rightly insist (as 'Humani Generis' recently impressed upon us again too) that immutable 'essences' and concepts of essences are to be found. [317] But too little thought is given to how in fact one arrives at such an individual concept of an essence and in particular that of the essence of man, meaning by that something more than the most general metaphysical propositions (about entities in general, the transcendentals and the most general metaphysical principles of identity, causality, finality, etc.). Even the distinction made above between a transcendental and an a posteriori empirical method in the investigation of the essence of man is not generally familiar. The view is too lightly taken as a starting-point that whatever has been empirically observed in man 'always and in all cases' also belongs eo ipso to the immutable substance of man's 'nature', which then supplies the foundation of the 'lex naturae'. But the question is not so simple. Can pure natures be produced? In atomic physics perhaps? Can and may man change his nature? Is the variable eo ipso something which lies outside the concept of nature as such? Even when this quantity once achieved (produced) was general and (relatively) stable? It might be asked whether the scholastic concept of 'nature' as applied to the 'nature' of man does not still owe too much to the model of what is less than human (in the train of archaic philosophy with its orientation towards 'physics'). What is signified by the 'definition', and hence the circumscription, of man's 'nature', if he is the essence of transcendence, and hence of the surpassing of limitation? Is it meaningful at all in such a perspective simply to assign to this 'nature' an end perfectly defined materially? Not as though the remotest doubt were being thrown here on the fact that man has a nature and that this in itself has an end assigned to it. But these must not and cannot be conceived in such simple terms as the mutual order of a pot and its lid or of a biological organism and its fixed environment. One has only to ask why a supernatural end can be set for man without annulling his nature, and why God cannot do this with the nature of something below man. Then it becomes apparent at once that however universally the formal ontology of nature, end, etc., may extend, these concepts can only be used in the particular matter of each individual grade of being in a highly analogical way. There are many more such questions, and they are not idle subtleties. For that nature should remain nature for the sake of grace and yet always be grasped by the Christian as an intrinsic element in the single object willed by God when he willed man as his beloved in his Son – to bring this about is a task of the Christian life, and so a serious question for theology.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[319]

10

SOME IMPLICATIONS OF THE SCHOLASTIC CONCEPT OF UNCREATED GRACE[1]

This brief essay has a very modest aim. Its only purpose is to inquire whether it might not be possible to use elements already found within the conceptual equipment (Begrjfflichkeit) of scholastic theology to define the essence of uncreated grace[2] more [320] sharply than has hitherto been the case. The inquiry is concerned neither to ask whether a more adequate understanding of the gracious communication and indwelling of God himself in the justified, attested by Revelation, may be better reached with the help of a conceptual equipment not so expressly a part of the substance of scholastic theology (in the terms, say, of a more personalist metaphysics)[3], nor does it propose more closely to establish and justify for themselves the conceptual elements called into service, independently of the application here in mind.

1. The Problem

a. Grace in the primary sources of Revelation.
All that is possible here under this heading, and all that is intended, is of course only a brief indication. As regards Pauline theology first of all, man's inner justification and renewal is

[1] On its first appearance this study received a fairly detailed and very friendly treatment from J. Trütsch in his work SS. Trinitatis inhabitatio apud theologos recentiores (a printed dissertation for the Gregorian University of Rome, Trent 1949), esp. pp. 25, 107-16. Cf. the review by F. Lakner in ZKT LXXII (1950), p. 116. A survey may be found in Trütsch (pp. 21-5) of the most important literature of the last thirty years (Delaye, Gardeil, Garrigou-Lagrange, de la Taille, Galtier, Retailleau, Martinez-Gómez, Mersch, Beumer, Kuhaupt, Schauf), which will not be mentioned again here. Since the appearance of Trütsch's work have also appeared M. J. Donnelly, 'The Inhabitation of the Holy Spirit: A Solution according to de la Taille', TS VIII (1947), pp. 445-70; P. Galtier, L'Habitation en nous des trois personnes (éd. revue et augmentée, Rome 1950); S.I. Dockx, Fils de Dieu par grâce (Paris 1948; cf. ZKT LXXIII (1951), pp. 111 s.); R. Morency, L' Union de grâce selon saint Thomas d'Aquin (Montreal 1950); P. de Letter, 'Sanctifying Grace and our Union with the Holy Trinity', TS XIII (1952), pp. 33-58; M. J. Donnelly, 'Sanctifying Grace and our Union with the Holy Trinity: A Reply', TS XIII (1952), pp. 190-204; F. Bourassa, 'Adoptive Sonship: our Union with the divine Persons', TS XIII (1952), pp. 309-35. (Cf. also P. de Letter, 'Created Actuation by the Uncreated Act: Difficulties and Answers', TS XVIII (1957) pp. 60-92. – Tr.) There is no intention here of undertaking a detailed examination of these studies. While it is true that since the first appearance of our own study significant contributions have appeared, bearing both on the history and the objective substance of the question, which would have to be taken into account in any detailed presentation and solution of the whole topic (especially as bearing on the problem of proper or appropriated relations to the divine Persons), it still seems to us that this modest inquiry is not yet quite out of date. This all the more, since theologians as eminent as P. Galtier are still looking for a solution of the question by way of a combination of the theories of Vasquez and Suarez, so that the real starting-point of the theology of grace remains 'created grace'.

[2] This is not to imply that we propose to adopt any position with regard to the much-discussed question whether the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the justified is proper to the Spirit or merely appropriated. To this extent 'Spirit' and 'God' signify the same thing in this study. We shall return briefly to this question in our conclusion.

[3] Cf. e.g. J. Auer, 'Um den Begriff der Gnade. Grundsätzliches zur Frage: nach der Methode, mit der Übernatur als Gnade im strengen Sinn bestirnmt werden kann', ZKT LXX (1948), pp. 341-68; further his great historical work, Die Entwicklung der Gnadenlehre in der Hochscholastik I-II (Freiburg 1942-51), in which Auer sets out to test his threefold system of categories, (the objective-metaphysical, the psychologico-moral, the personal-existential) on the historical data. See also A. Brunner, 'Gott schauen', ZKT; LXXIII (1951), pp. 214-22; by the same author, A New Creation. Toward a Theology of the Christian Life, ET. Ruth Bethell (London 1955). Brunner seeks to describe the grace-relationship to God using the concepts of a personalist philosophy.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

primarily seen as a being endowed with the πνευ=μα α(/γιον, being dwelled in by it and led by it. The 'Spirit' is given to us, is (dwells) in us (Rom 5:5; 8:9.11.15.23; 1 Cor 2:12; 3:16; 6:19; 2 Cor 3:3; 5:5; Gal 3:2.5; 4:6; 1 Thess 4:8; 2 Tim 1:14; Tit 3:5; Heb 6:4), as in a temple (1 Cor 3:16 s.; 2 Cor 6: 16). We are made to drink of the 'Spirit', anointed and sealed with it (1 Cor 12:13 (cf. Eph 5:18); 2 Cor 1:21 s.; Eph 1:13; 4:30). Like statements are made of Christ (Rom 8:10; Gal 2:20; Eph 3:17; Col 1:27). Now it is quite true that these statements do not exclude but on [321] the contrary include a created effect of the communication of the Spirit.[4] Being led by the Spirit (Rom 8:14), glowing with the Spirit (Rom 12:11), being sanctified and justified in the Spirit (1 Cor 2:15; 6:11), being made to drink of the Spirit, anointed and sealed by it, creation, renewal, rebirth, strengthening, illumination (by the Spirit, Christ, grace) (Eph 3:16; Tim 1:12; 2 Tim 2:1; Eph 1:18; 5:14; Heb 6:4), etc., all these also essentially imply or embrace an inner transformation of the justified as such, hence an inner quality which inheres in him, hence what scholastic theology calls created grace. The same result may be derived from texts which speak in a partitive sense of the gift of the Spirit (Tit 3:5; Heb 6:4) or of the earnest and the first-fruits of the Spirit (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Rom 8:23), using expressions, that is to say, in which the genitive ('of the Spirit') can doubtless be understood as not merely epexegetic but at least in a partitive sense as well. We are not justified in saying that the πνευ=μα which appears in these texts as the principle of our sanctification and justification always refers to the personal Spirit of God. In many of these Pauline texts πνευ=μα may primarily and immediately signify a non-personal created quality of the sanctified man himself, especially when it is found without the article (Rom 5:5), or is opposed to the divine Spirit itself as 'our' πνευ=μα (Rom 8:16; cf. Rom 8:9) we are 'in the Spirit' because the Spirit of God dwells in us), and yet this spirit clearly means a supernatural principle and not our νου=φ or our ψυξη/ (1 Cor 14:14; Phil 4:23; 1 Thess 5:23). Yet it is not the case that πνευ=μα α(/γιον in St Paul (in its religious usage) refers primarily to a non-personal power communicated to man or a permanent quality of his sanctity, and then perhaps from time to time occurs secondarily as the name of the personal Spirit of God. Gaechter indeed has shown in a remarkable way[5] that the religious concept of πνευ=μα in St Paul [322] is a unified whole in which the Trinitarian personal Spirit is the basic element from, which all other modifications of the concept are to be derived. From this it follows that for St Paul man's inner sanctification is first and foremost a communication of the personal Spirit of God, that is to say, in scholastic terms, a donum increatum; and he sees every created grace, every way of being πνευματικο&φ, as a consequence and a manifestation of the possession of this uncreated grace. Thus at least from the point of view of his concept of pneuma and its structure, we should say with St Paul that we possess our pneumatic being (our 'created sanctifying grace') because we have the personal Pneuma of God. The converse proposition, corresponding to the ordinary viewpoint of the scholastic teaching on grace ('God's Pneuma is present in us in a special way because we have created grace'), lacks the same measure of immediate and explicit support in St Paul. This is not to assert any absolute incompatibility of the two formulations; the question merely arises whether the scholastic theology of grace in the matter of the relationship between uncreated and created grace does sufficient justice to the first formulation. In the Johannine theology of grace the idea of inner [4] Cf., e.g., W. Reinhard, Das Wirken des Heiligen Geistes im Menschen nach den Briefen des Apostels Paulus (Freiburg 1918); H. Bertrams, Das Wesen des Geistes nach der Anschauung des Apostels Paulus (Munster 1913); J. Wobbe, Der Charis-Gedanke bei Paulus (Munster 1932); Bertrams in particular has shown that πνευ=μα in St Paul should not invariably be understood as referring immediately to the Third Person of the Trinity.

[5] P. Gaechter, 'Zum Pneumabegriff des hl. Paulus', ZKT LIII (1929), pp. 345-408. Following in this R. Blüml, Paulus und der dreieinige Gott (Vienna 1929), Gaechter's study provides a certain corrective to Bertrams's conclusions concerning the concept of pneuma in St Paul.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sanctification does not rest so explicitly and exclusively on the conception of the communication of God's personal Pneuma, inasmuch as this communication, in the form of a possession of Life, a generation (being) of God, a being in God (Christ, Truth, Love, Light), a possession of God's seed, his unction, love, witness, takes its stand upon a created quality inhering in man. Nevertheless God's own indwelling is not forgotten here either; Christ is (abides) in us (Jn 6:56; 14:20; 15:5; 17:26; 1 Jn 3:24), the Father and the Son make their dwelling in us (Jn 14:23), God is in us (1 Jn 4:4; 4:12 s.15), the Spirit is given to us and is in us (Jn 14:16 s.; 1 Jn 3:24; 4:13 – admittedly it is not clear in the two latter texts whether what is in question is an inner gift of grace and the personal Spirit of God (partitive expressions again!)). Nevertheless it may be said that nothing in St John is contrary to St Paul's way of looking at God's mercy to man. As for the teaching of the Fathers, it is still less possible to offer a detailed exposition in this merely preliminary discussion than for Scripture. However we hope that it will meet with no opposition from historians of dogma if we summarize the conception of the Fathers (especially the Greek Fathers) as regards our topic by saying that they see the created gifts of grace as a consequence of God's substantial communication to justified men. Gaechter has already established [323] this for Irenaeus[6]: it is indeed true that for Irenaeus the personal Spirit of God and his gifts form a single, indissolubly linked principle of man's sanctification; but this result, which represents the intermediate position taken up by A. d'Alès[7] between the two extreme interpretations of his theology of grace proposed by R. Massuet and J. Körber, is not the whole of Irenaeus's conception: 'For anyone who reviews all the texts which speak of the Spirit will frequently discover that the gifts of the Spirit are consequences of his conjunction with man'.[8] That this remained the case in the later Greek tradition may be seen from Petavius[9] and de Régnon,[10] to whom it is still permissible to refer even now. For whatever the position may be as regards the soundness and theological tenability of the teaching they developed in connexion with this observation, that the conjunction of the Holy Spirit in particular with man is a proper and not merely an appropriated one, the soundness of the observation itself, with which [324] we are concerned here, is not open to doubt. It is confirmed by a historian of dogma who is under no suspicion of favouring Petau's personal thesis; Galtier writes: 'Ex his omnibus (i.e. the texts cited from the Fathers) apparet gratiam creatam seu imaginem divinae substantiae efformatam melius iuxta Patres dici logice consequi quam antecedere ad praesentiam personarum in nobis'.[11] And he appeals to the Fathers for his own thesis: 'Praesentia divina

---

[6] P. Gaechter, 'Unsere Einheit mit Christus nach dem hl. Irenäus', ZKT LVIII (1934), pp. 503-32.
[7] A. d'Alès, 'La Doctrine de l'Esprit en saint Irenée', RSR XIV (1924), pp. 497-538, esp. 528-30.
[8] Gaechter, p. 531.
[9] Petavius, De Trinitate, lib. VIII, cap. 4-6.
[10] T. de Regnon, Etudes sur la Trinité, torn. IV, Etude 27, cap. 4 §7-8, pp. 553-8. Cf. also many of the texts adduced by Thomassinus, Dogmata Theologica III (Paris 1866), lib. 6, cap. 9-20, as well as those collected by J. C. Martinez-Gómez, 'Relación entre la inhabitación del Espíritu santo y los dones criados de la justificación', Estudios Eclesiásticos XIV (1935), pp. 22-50. It is demonstrated in the latter study with a wealth of texts from the Fathers and theologians – even if one may put a question-mark against some of the individual texts taken by themselves – that the idea persistently reappears in theology that a logical (not temporal) priority to created grace should be ascribed to uncreated grace (as given, not just as to be given or as causing grace). We refer to this article for confirmation from the theologians even for the later developments to which we proceed in this study. Martinez could have included Gregor von Holtum, 'Die heiligmachende Gnade in ihrer Beziehung zu der Einwohnung des Heiligen Geistes in der Seele', Divus Thomas IV (1917), pp. 435-63, esp. 448 s., among the theologians who defend such a priority of uncreated grace. Cf. also P. Dumont, 'Le Caractère divin de la grâce', Revue des Sciences Religieuses XIV (1934), p. 92: 'En optant pour l'antériorité de nature de l'inhabitation divine a l'égard des vertus surnaturelles, on aurait au moms l'avantage de se mieux conformer, semble-t-il, à la manière habituelle dont les Pères se sont exprimés en parlant de la grâce.'
[11] P. Galtier, De SS. Trinitate in se et in nobis (Paris 1933), n. 411, nota 2.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

non est mera consequentia seu merus effectus iustificationis, quae sit per solam gratiam.'[12]

b. Grace in scholastic speculation.

This is not the place to set out in detail the various scholastic theories about the relationship between created and uncreated grace. We wish to draw attention only to that common feature which concerns our present discussion, being clearly conscious of simplifying matters somewhat and leaving aside other approaches (which will be indicated later). However diverse they may be among themselves, it is true of all the scholastic theories that they see God's indwelling and his conjunction with the justified man as based exclusively upon created grace. In virtue of the fact that created grace is imparted to the soul God imparts himself to it and dwells in it. Thus what we call uncreated grace (i.e. God as bestowing himself upon man) is a function of created grace. It is not difficult to see the basis of this conception: 'uncreated grace' (God's communication of himself to man, the indwelling of the Spirit) implies a new relation of God to man. But this can only be conceived of as founded upon an absolute entitative modification of man himself, which modification is the real basis of the new real relation of man to God upon which rests the relation of God to man.[13] This absolute entitative modification and determination of man is created grace, which has in consequence a twofold aspect: it is ontologically the formal basis of the analogical supernatural participation in God's nature through entitative assimilation of man to God's spirituality and holiness (consortium formale), and it is the basis [325] of a special relation (union, indwelling) between man and God himself (consortium terminativum). For our purpose it makes no difference how the various theories go on to explain the way in which created grace provides a basis for a new relation between man and the God of grace: whether for instance it is said that God's new efficient causality in respect of grace makes him present in a new way in the object of his activity (in virtue of the identity of being and operation in God and his immensity); or whether the view is put forward that the entitative elevation of man as regards his spiritual powers, which are thus orientated to the beatific vision as last end, gives him a new capacity (of an actual or potential kind) to take possession by knowledge and love of the God who is present in him by immensity; or whether one sees a perfect friendship with God established by grace, a friendship which provides a new and in itself sufficient basis for the presence of God in man (already there in fact). For in each case the indwelling of the Spirit in the justified man by grace is seen merely as a consequence of the bestowal of created grace, as the end-term of a (categorical) relationship of man to God given with created grace.

c. The precise point at issue.

Hence the question arises how the two ways of looking at things, that of Scripture and the Fathers on the one hand, and that of scholastic theology on the other, may be brought into harmony: there created grace as a consequence of God's communication of himself to the man whose sins have been forgiven, here created grace as the basis of this communication. There is not the slightest question of contesting the soundness of the positive aspect of the scholastic theory. Our only intention is to complete it by elaborating in more explicit terms a pattern of thought (already in principle to be found in scholastic theology) and applying it to our problem in such a way that the admissibility of the patristic formula should become clear too, and hence make available a more adequate appreciation of the nature of uncreated grace.

---

[12] Ibid., n.412.

[13] This is already suggested by St Bonaventure (II Sent. dist. 26, a. I, q. 2 fund. 2) and later by St Thomas in I Sent. dist. 17, q. 1, a. 1 contra n. 3, (It is striking nevertheless that St Thomas no longer makes use of this argument to prove that grace (charity) is created in De caritate a. 1; Ia-IIae. 110.2 and IIa-IIae. 23.2.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

2. The Presuppositions of the solution offered

a. The relation of the state of grace (as a whole, not distinguishing between created and uncreated grace) to the beatific vision of God.

It is generally recognized in scholastic theology that the closest of [326] relations holds between grace (as a whole) and the ontological presuppositions of the beatific vision. The intrinsic supernaturality of grace, for instance, is shown to follow from the supernaturality of the beatific vision and is characterized in terms of it; since the latter is supernatural simply speaking and in its inner nature, so must grace be, for it is a commencement of the blessed life, homogeneous with the ontological presuppositions of the vision (inchoatio formalis). The life of grace, that is to say, and the life of future glory do not stand in a purely moral and juridical relation to each other, such that the latter is the reward of the former as merit; the life of glory is the definitive flowering (the 'manifestation', the 'disclosure') of the life of divine sonship already possessed and merely 'hidden' for the moment. Hence grace, as the ontological basis of this supernatural life, is also an inner entitative principle (at the least a partial principle) of the vision of God. According to Scripture the possession of the Spirit is the earnest and first fruits of the definitive beatifying bestowal of God's grace and mercy; thus it is not just its 'pledge' and legal title, but a commencement of glory, still hidden, no doubt, only present to consciousness in faith, but really and entitatively given already. Hence the inner nature of grace as a whole in this life must allow of being more closely determined in terms of the nature of the ontological presuppositions of the immediate vision of God. We may formulate this more cautiously in view of the obvious differences between grace and glory: in accordance with what has been said, there is at least no objection in principle to applying to an ontology of grace a set of concepts which have proved themselves objectively valid in an ontology of the immediate vision of God, if such an application shows itself to be feasible and unavoidable from a consideration of the essence of grace itself.

b. On the ontology of the visio beatifica.

Clearly the answer to any question concerning the essence and the presuppositions of the immediate vision of God must depend in decisive fashion upon fundamental conceptions of the nature of knowledge in general. Even where terminological uniformity prevails with regard to the interpretation of the presuppositions of the visio beatifica, very far-reaching divergences of real meaning may prevail at the same time, since the concepts applied bear an essentially different sense according to the various metaphysical theories of knowledge they [327] presuppose. The metaphysics of knowledge presupposed here is that of St Thomas Aquinas, and with this as our starting-point we ask what is meant when St Thomas says that in the immediate vision of God God's essence itself takes the place of the species (impressa) in the created mind. Whether in some other metaphysics of knowledge (that of Suarez, say), even if it makes the very same statement here under discussion, the same thing is meant or not, is a question which may be left aside here. In order to understand what St Thomas means by species we must start from his basic conception of knowledge in general.[14] In the original and basic concept of knowledge (which alone provides a means of interpreting metaphysically all concrete modes of knowledge), knowledge is not an 'intentional' stretching out of the knower to an object, it is not 'objectivity' in the sense of the going forth of the knower out of himself to something other, not an externally orientated entering into

[14] Cf. K. Rahner, Geist in Welt. Zur Meraphysik der endlichen Erkenntnis bei Thomas von Aquin (Innsbruck 1939), esp. pp. 41 s. (I have not had access to the first edition, but this reference would seem to correspond to pp. 71 s. of the second edition (Munich 1957). – Tr.)

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

contact with an object by means of the cognitive faculty; it is primarily the being-present-to-itself (Beisichsein) of an entity, the inner illuminatedness of an entity for itself on the basis of its determinate grade of being (immateriality), it is a being-reflected-upon-itself (Insichreflektiertheit). It is only from this point of departure that it becomes really possible to conceive what is meant by species as the ontological ground of any knowledge. The species must not unhesitatingly be conceived of as the 'intentional image' of an object, made present in the mind in a non-real 'mental' way as a copy of the object due to the object's impression upon it. Rather it is primarily (i.e. if we reflect upon the nature of the connatural species of a cognitive power) an ontological determination of the knower as an entity in his own reality, this determination consequently being logically prior to knowledge as consciousness, and, because it shares or bestows the knower's determinate grade of being, also participating in the consciousness (being-reflected-upon-itself, being-present-to-itself) of this entity thus 'in act'.[15] If and in so far as the species understood in this way is also the effect of an object distinct from the knower and so entitatively assimilates the knower to the [328] known, the being-present-to-its-own-self (Beisichselbersein) of the knower as an entity determined by the species becomes also the knowledge of the object itself (in a manner not further to be explained here). Thus a posteriori knowledge rests for St Thomas on an assimilation to the object entitatively determining the knower by means of the species as a reality of the knower's own being, through which the knower and the known are really 'the same thing'. The knower and the known do not become one through knowledge (as consciousness); but because they are entitatively one (whether this be immediately or by means of a real determination, representing the object, of the knower as an entity, i.e. by means of the species), the knower knows the object.[16] 'Species' is therefore primarily an ontological and only subsequently a gnoseological concept.

Thence arises the whole problematic (a necessary one, indeed) of St Thomas's proposition, that in the immediate vision of God, God's own essence takes the place of the species. As regards the necessity of this proposition: given this concept of the species there is no difficulty in seeing that an immediate, non-analogical vision of God cannot be based upon a created species, for this could only reveal its object, God's infinite Being, in the measure of its own entitative capacity as a finite determination of the knowing subject.

As regards the problematic of this proposition: when it is said that God's own Being appears in the place of a created species of the finite mind, this is to assert a real 'relation' (speaking with all due caution!) between creature and God which is not founded upon an accidental, real, absolute[17] modification of one of the related terms in itself and with regard to itself. For a modification like this is impossible in God on account of his utter transcendence and immutability. It is not to be asserted of the creaturely term of the relation in the present case, because as an accidental modification, from without, of the creature's being in itself and with regard to itself, it could not be the basis for a fundamentally and essentially new 'relationship' of God to the creature. For the only fresh feature such an accidental absolute modification of the creature could bring with it is that relation to God [329] which is a constituent of any creaturely being, namely the transcendental reference of absolute finite being to God as to its cause. But here it is a question precisely of a 'relation' which does not immediately imply an absolute created determination; for otherwise the species of the beatific vision would ultimately be yet again a created quality.

Such a new 'relationship' of God to the creature, which cannot be brought under the category of efficient causality but only of formal causality, is on the one hand a concept

[15] Cf. e.g. J. Maréchal, Le Point de départ de la métaphysique V (Lyons 1926), pp. 60 s.
[16] St Thomas, De Veritate, q. 1, a. 1 corp.: 'assimilatio . . . est causa cognitionis'. For the rest cf. Bahner, ibid.
[17] 'Absolute' is used in this paragraph and occasionally later on to mean 'non-relative', of something merely inherent in the subject. 'Relation' translates Beziehung (relatio), 'relationship' Verhältnis (habitudo). – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which transcribes a strictly supernatural mystery; and on the other hand its possibility must not be put in doubt in virtue of purely rational considerations. It transcribes in the mode of formal ontology the concept of supernatural being in its strictly mysterious character; for all the strictly supernatural realities with which we are acquainted (the hypostatic union, the visio beatifica [18] and – as we shall go on to show here – the supernatural bestowal of grace) have this in common, that in them there is expressed a relationship of God to a creature which is not one of efficient causality (a production out of the cause, 'ein Aus-der-Ursache-Heraus-stellen'), and which must consequently fall under the head of formal causality (a taking up into the ground [forma], 'ein-In-den-Grund[forma]-*Hinein*nehmen'): the ontological principle of the subsistence of a finite nature in the one case, the ontological [330] principle of a finite knowledge in the other. And such a formal causality of God (a Trinitarian hypostasis, his Being) is not known to us in the realm of nature (i.e. in knowledge which proceeds from the creature and consequently attains God only as efficient cause), and so cannot be ascertained as regards its actual realization (and hence also as regards its possibility) without Revelation. Such a relationship of God's formal causality in regard to a creature must not be put in doubt by rational considerations so far as its general conceptual possibility is concerned. For firstly it is indubitably given for every Catholic theologian at least in the special case of the hypostatic union. And secondly, an in all respects analogous perplexity, capable of no further resolution, lies before us in the (admittedly distinct) field of God's efficient causality in respect of the world: for here too God stands in a certain connexion with something else and yet remains wholly transcendent to it, i.e. he is active and yet this fact in no way reacts upon him nor gives him a fresh determination; so that the concept, in itself finite, of efficient causality, once it is applied to God, has to be provided with a negation, in consequence of which the continued existence of a positive content in this concept becomes obscure. If such is the case in this field, it cannot be impossible in principle to allow an active formal causality (eine formale Wirkursächlichkeit) of God upon a creature without thereby implying that this reactively impresses a new determination upon God's Being in itself one which would do away with his absolute transcendence and immutability. One may explicitly draw attention to this meta-categorical character of God's abidingly transcendent formal causality by a prefixed 'quasi', and in our case then be entitled to say that in the vision of God his Being exercises a quasi-formal causality. All this 'quasi' implies is that this forma', in spite of its formal causality, which must be taken really seriously, abides in its absolute transcendence (inviolateness, 'freedom'). But it does not imply that the statement, 'In the beatific vision God occupies the place of a species in virtue of a formal causality', is a mode of speech lacking all binding force; on the contrary, it is the quasi which must be prefixed to every application to God of a category in itself terrestrial.[19] The only reason why it is specially to be [18] On the parallels between the unio hypostatica and the unio gloriae cf. e.g. St Thomas Comp. Theol. c. 201; Cajetan, In IIIa. 17.2; Contenson, Theologia mentis et cordis (Paris 1875) lib. I, diss. 5, cap. 1, spec. 1; Gotti, Theologia scholastico-dogmatica (Venice 1781), tom. I, tract. 3, q. 3, dub. 1 §3; E. Hugon, Tractatus dogmatici, vol. I (Paris 1933), p. 107; L. Billot, De Verbo incarnato (Rome 1927), p. 151. Billot offers the following excellent summary of the parallels: 'Unio hypostatica et unio gloriae inter se conveniunt: Primo quoad terminos, qui uniuntur. Utrobique enim creatura immediate unitur Deo, vel natura creata supposito increato, vel mens creata increato intelligibili. – Secundo quoad modum unionis. Utrobique enim Deus actuat quasi formaliter: vel scilicet naturam substantialem cui communicatione sui tribuit consistere, vel potentiam intellectivam cui communicatione sui tribuit adsistere obiecto in esse intellecto. – Tertio quoad supernaturalita rem unionis. Sicut enim natura creata non est in naturali potentia ad hoc quod trahatur ad esse divinum ut ad suum actum essendi: ita mens creata non est in naturali potentia ad hoc quod trahatur ad divinam essentiam ut ad suam speciem intelligibilem. – Quarto quoad non repugnanriam unionis. Eaedem enim rationes quae removent impossibilitatem circa unionem hypostaticam, similiter earn removent circa unionem beatitudinis . . .'

[19] So it is a 'hesitation' founded in the nature of things when St Thomas once simply says that in the beatific vision God is the 'forma intellectus ipsum cognoscentis' (Comp. Theol. cap. 105; similarly Ia. 12.5. corp.), and yet also asserts emphatically: 'Non autem oportet quod ipsa divina essentia fiat forma intellectus ipsius, sed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation recommended in [331] our case that the quasi should be explicitly added is that (as opposed to efficient causality) it provides an emphatic reminder of the analogical nature of our concepts in the matter of a relationship to the world known only through Revelation; and above all because in this matter of a formal, though ontological, causality of God the only causality in question is one which brings to its highest perfection the human mind as knowing (and in this respect only).

For the rest the ontological problematic of God's formal causality in respect of a creature is treated of in scholastic theology in discussions of the hypostatic union. What is there said about the compatibility (at least negatively demonstrable) of such a concept with God's immutability, or about the category to which such an objective state of affairs must analogically be ascribed, etc., likewise holds good in our case mutatis mutandis. We need consequently not go into the matter [332] again here. Nor is this the place to specify this formal causality more sharply in view of the fact that the causality precisely under discussion here is one which determines the finite spirit in the direction of the object which it is to know and love (and in this way only!). It is sufficient here to hold firmly on to the fact that in the beatific vision there is present as its ontological presupposition a 'relation' between creature and God which is not a categorical one, resting upon an accidental absolute modification, but is a quasi-formal causality of God himself upon the created spirit; so that (corresponding to the general nature of the relationship of a 'forma' to its formal effect) the reality of the mind in the beatific vision, so far as such a reality in itself is due to a species as the means of knowledge, is the very Being of God.

Furthermore it goes without saying that this active formal causality of God on the human spirit must not be understood one-sidedly as engaging only the intellect. It is true that scholastic theology is concerned almost exclusively with the ontology of the immediate knowledge of God, but there is no doubt that God's immediate communication to the created spirit extends just as much to the 'will' (understood in the scholastic sense).[20]

There is still one question to be touched on briefly here: the relationship between God's formal causality on the spirit and the light of glory. We do not have to provide here a proof of the existence of the lumen gloriae; our only question is how, following St Thomas, we should conceive of its relationship to God's Being as the quasi-species of the spirit in terms of formal ontology. If one examines St Thomas's proofs for the lumen gloriae in themselves,[21] it quod se habeat ad ipsum ur forma' (De Ver. q. 8, a. 1 corp.; similarly Suppl. 92.1 ad 8, 'quasi forma intellectus qua intelligit'). It is usual today to distinguish two senses of 'forma' by speaking of 'actus informans' and 'actus terminans': thus 'forma' (the determination) in the first sense is that which in itself arrives at reality and perfection in virtue of the act of determination; in the second sense it is that which in itself is and remains a perfect reality in spite of and prior to the act of determination. It is indeed not to be denied that many theologians who continue to employ the formula of God as the quasi-forma of the beatified mind, in actual fact leave it very little of its proper metaphysical sense. So for example Suarez (Vivès I, tract. 1, lib. 2, cap. 12-13), Pesch (Prael. Dogm. II n. 80) and others. Even Billot (De Deo uno et trino[4] (Rome 1902) p. 141) is not very clear on this point when he speaks of the opposite of a forma inhaerens as 'informare non physice sed intentionaliter tantum'. If this is supposed to mean that God is in fact an 'intentional' known object, the whole explanation is false, for it is a question here precisely of an ontological (hence 'physical') presupposition of knowledge. Thus 'intentionaliter informare' can only mean that God's active formal causality does not interiorly determinate the 'form' in itself (as is the case with finite forms), or be attempting to express the fact that God's Being in spite of its relation as form to the finite mind does not make the divinity into an inner determination of this mind. An ontology, developed in more detail than is here possible, of the formal causality of the divine Being in regard to finite being would doubtless be able to show (once this concept had been presupposed) that something of the sort is basically possible, so long as the divine Being remains unaffected, only in two cases: either as unio hypostatica, or as the communication of this Being as the object of immediate knowledge and love.

---

[20] Cf. B. Froget, De l'habitation du Saint-Esprit dans les âmes justes[2] (Paris 1900), pp. 148-154.

[21] Summa contra Gentiles III, 53, etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation becomes clear that he regards it as a dispositio of the spirit for the reception of the formal causality of God's intelligible Being upon it. Thus in respect of God's immediate conjunction with the spirit the lumen gloriae takes its place in the category of material causality, which does not exclude, but necessarily includes, the fact that this dispositio, as an entitative determination of the cognitive power, possesses the character of a formal cause in regard to the human spirit. This dispositio needs however to be determined more sharply: it is (for reasons which may be [333] studied in St Thomas) a dispositio ultima.[22] Now according to St Thomas it is the case with a dispositio ultima (dispositio quae est necessitas ad formam) that on the one hand as causa materialis it logically precedes the forma, and yet on the other that it depends for its subsistence upon the formal causality of the forma,[23] so that to affirm its presence is simultaneously to affirm with inner necessity the presence of the formal causality of the forma and conversely.[24]

[334]

3. The Proposed Solution

We are now in a position to offer a more exact answer to the question put above than is commonly the case, without really having to leave the traditional ways of scholastic thought.

a. The statement of the solution.

The possession of the Pneuma (and thus primarily uncreated grace) is conceived of in Scripture as the homogeneous germ and commencement of the beatific vision. And therefore we have the right to apply to uncreated grace in this life the concepts of formal ontology relating to the possession of God in the visio beatifica, at least in those cases in which the theological statements concerning this grace themselves suggest it. Now it has been seen that one fails to do justice to the essence of uncreated grace as this is declared in the sources of [22] De Ver. q. 8, a. 3 corp.

---

[23] Cf. e.g. Dc Ver. q. 28, a. 7 corp.; IIIa. 7. 13 ad 2, 9. 3 ad 2. Clearly it is of no importance in this connexion whether St Thomas's use of this mutua causalitas in the texts cited, which are concerned with other topics, is justified or not.

[24] Thus it becomes possible to say in what the strictly supernatural character of a created grace (here primarily the light of glory) consists: while in the created entity in general its relation to the divine cause does not belong to the inner distinguishing features of its essence (Ia 44.1 ad 1), created grace, as ultima dispositio to an immediate communication of the divine Being itself in the mode of formal causality – a communication which can only exist in terms of this formal causality – involves a relation to God which belongs to its very essence.

And it is so and only so that a created grace can possess the quality of something absolutely supernatural. This is seen most clearly when one takes into consideration what sort of entity is capable of being an absolute mystery. It is necessary to provide an answer to this question if one bears in mind the Thomist doctrine of the relationship between knower and known, that a created thing purely as such can never be an absolute mysterium. For in principle it is always possible in virtue of the convertibility of being, knowing and intelligibility, to correlate with any finite grade of being a knower of the same or a higher level of being to which the former grade of being of a finite level is not in principle inaccessible. Accordingly Ripalda's view was in itself quite sound, when he held that created grace (the inner, essential connexion of which with uncreated grace he did not clearly perceive) can only be unexacted in concrete fact with respect to any really created substance, but not with respect to some still higher, conceivable and creatable substance (cf. H. Lange, De Gratia, Freiburg 1929, n. 260). Given a grace which on the one hand is ontologically an accidental reality and on the other remains as such purely in the created order, it is really impossible to show why to such an accident there should not correspond a created substance as possible, from which such an accident could proceed connaturally. Hence we may sum up our conclusions as follows: it is quite impossible for something purely created to be really absolutely supernatural and to present an absolute mysterium; but if there is something supernatural simply speaking which is absolutely mysterious, then God himself must belong to what constitutes it, i.e. God in so far as he is not merely the ever transcendent Creator, the efficient cause of something finite which is distinct from him, but in so far as he communicates himself to the finite entity in quasi-formal causality.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Revelation, if one sees it as exclusively founded upon a categorical relation to God of the man to whom grace has been shown, which relation rests merely (in some way or other) upon an accidental created modification of man's soul. This difficulty is resolved when we transfer to uncreated grace the concepts of formal ontology which appear in the visio beatifica: God communicates himself to the man to whom grace has been shown in the mode of formal causality, so that this communication is not then merely the consequence of an efficient causation of created grace. Thus it becomes clear that the proposition no longer holds good which maintains that man has uncreated grace because he possesses created grace; on the contrary, with Scripture and the Fathers the communication of uncreated grace can be conceived of under a certain respect as logically and really prior to created grace: in that mode namely in which a formal cause is prior to the ultimate material disposition.

In what more precisely the communication of God by way of formal causality to the creature consists – this almost purely formal ontological account says very little expressly about it – may be determined in terms of the visio beatifica only negatively. Just as grace in general as an entitative supernatural elevation of man can be described in more [335] precise detail only in terms of its definitive unfolding, the visio (though this 'unfolding' and 'disclosure' are not just a 'growth' to a final stage arising out of an inner impulse but are also a new eschatological intervention of the God who is still in himself concealed), so too uncreated grace is only to be determined in terms of the visio: it is the homogeneous commencement, already given though still concealed and still to unfold, of that communication of the divine Being taking place by way of formal causality to the created spirit which is the ontological presupposition of the visio.[25]

Firstly, then, this union, so far as it takes place by way of formal causality, is not simply a consequence of created grace – indeed it precedes the created grace to the extent that this grace, as the ultimate disposition to the union, can only exist when God's formal causality is actually being exercized. Secondly, so far as it is the ontological presupposition of the beatific vision, this union is already posited independently of an actually exercised apprehension of the threefold God by man in knowledge and love, whether this should be through [336] the supernatural acts of the theological virtues or through the beatifying vision and love of fulfilment. Thirdly, this ontological union is posited as a presupposition of the visio. By this is meant that this immediate, ontological union, in spite of or even because of its basis in formal causality, should not be conceived of vaguely as some sort of 'unity of nature', in which God and the created spirit are thought of as flowing into each other along arbitrarily adopted courses. This ontological unity arising out of the exercise of formal causality is nothing but the presupposition and the ontological aspect of the unity of the [25] Cf. Leo XIII, 'Divinum illud munus' (AAS XXIX (1896), p. 653): 'Haec autem mira coniunctio, quae suo nomine inhabitatio dicitur, condicione tantum seu statu ab ea discrepans, qua caelites Deus beando complectitur . . .' As is well known, Pius XII in the encyclical 'Mystici Corporis' (AAS XXXV (1943), p. 231 s.; Denz 2290) has once more referred to this text as a starting-point for a consideration according to the analogia fidei so as to achieve a deeper understanding of the indwelling of the Spirit in the grace of justification. The Pope points out more clearly than before that the divine activity ad extra is common to the three Persons (Denz 428; 704) in the sense that this is to be understood of efficient causality (Denz 2290); and at the same time draws attention to the visio beatifica as the starting-point for a more profound theology of grace. In this way he clearly points to a theology of grace which seeks to make full use of that notion of God's formal causality with respect to the creature which is a traditional possession of the schools in the theology of the visio beatifica and is quite inescapable in the doctrine of the hypostatic union. The circumstance that Pius XII clearly seems to wish to leave open the question whether the relations to the three divine Persons of the man to whom grace has been shown are really only appropriated cannot be discussed here. There is hardly any need to establish the fact that the solution here proposed respects the Pope's warning against every kind of pantheism ('omnem nempe reiciendum esse mysticae huius coagmentationis modum, quo christifideles, quavis ratione, ita creatarum rerum ordinem praetergrediantur, atque in divina perperam invadant, ut vel una sempiterni Numinis attributio de iisdem tamquam propria praedicari queat'). Compare here Trütsch, loc. cit. pp. 112 s.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

created spirit with God in the act of immediate loving contemplation, an act therefore which implies the highest degree of unity in the fullest distinction. And here our interpretation once again reaches a point at which it can either rejoin the traditional interpretation of God's indwelling in the line of St Thomas, Suarez, John of St Thomas or Gardeil,[26] or adopt the categories of a more personalist metaphysics of the relationship between God and the creature through grace. For in the last resort this interpretation of ours seeks nothing else than to focus more sharply for the human understanding the highest and most intimate union with God which is possible to a creature in the gaze of love, and to do so by grasping as precisely as possible the ontological presupposition of the union in the categories of formal ontology.

We need not attempt to decide here how we should interpret the distinction between the communication of the divine Being to man by way of formal causality in grace and in the visio: whether we should interpret it as a difference in the degree of this increasing communication in itself, or as a difference derived from the difference in the material disposition to this communication.[27] In other words, we [337] do not intend to take up the question whether the growth from uncreated grace to the possession of God as the basis of the visio beatifica is an inner growth of this possession in itself or just the 'growth' (always understood with the restriction indicated above) of created grace into the light of glory – or whether this either-or is really not justified at all in a more precisely worked-out ontology of the relationship between causa formalis and causa materialis.

b. Hints of this view in the theologians.

If in order to confirm our view we refer here to a few texts of the great scholastic theologians (without any pretentions to completeness), we do so not in order to identify these theologians as defenders of our view but only so as to show a posteriori too how it is possible to find many examples of a preliminary movement in this direction in scholastic theology. As early as Alexander of Hales 'gratia increata' is not just the efficient cause of created grace but also the perfectio complens of the state of grace, as opposed to which gratia creata is only a perfectio disponens, a medium, a dispositio in anima ad susceptionem gratiae increatae. Indeed Alexander even teaches a priority of uncreated grace in a certain respect.[28] As regards St Bonaventure reference should at least be made to the fact that he regards the existence of uncreated grace as more certain theologically, and thus its existence is even objectively more basic for him than that of created grace.[29] There is to be found in this opinion not only a reflexion of the doctrinal situation which arose in the early scholastic period through the well-known teaching of Peter Lombard, but also an echo of Biblical and patristic theology: the Holy Spirit himself is the true gift – 'et hoc a fide et Scriptura determinatur', as St Bonaventure says – while created grace (even if it is now no longer possible to say of it 'investigatur a doctoribus rationum probabilitate') is to be understood in terms of uncreated grace. Should there not be an ontological order corresponding to this logical order at least under one aspect? At any rate the approach almost exclusively adopted today, which grants to [26] At any rate, it is quite unjustified, on the basis of the fact that the created grace of the 'pilgrim' state (status viatoris) is distinct at least in degree from the light of glory, to conclude with B. Froget (De l'habitation . . ., pp. 155 s.), M. Retailleau and others (cf. Trütsch, passim) that if the divine essence is already united immediately with the pilgrim's spirit as it is in the visio, he would have to possess the visio already. Such a conclusion presupposes that this immediate union is the unique cause of the vision. But if a created supernatural disposition (grace or the light of glory, which are capable of growth) is a necessary presupposition of the vision, the fact that it is deficient can explain why the visio is not posited, although an immediate informing communication of the divine Being to the created spirit has already been posited.

[27] Cf. Galtier, De SS. Trinitate in se et in nobis (Paris 1933), nn. 443 s.

[28] See the texts in E. J. Primeau, Doctrina Summae theologicae Alexandri Halensis de Spiritus Sancti apud iustos inhabitatione (Mundelein 1936), pp. 33 s.

[29] In II Sent. dist. 26, a. 1, q. 2 corp.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

uncreated grace only a very modest little place in the tractate de Gratia, is very [338] far removed from St Bonventure's point of departure.[30] In St Thomas too the idea is found that created grace stands to uncreated grace 'ex parte recipientis vel materiae', as 'dispositio'.[31] And even St Thomas once calls the Holy Spirit the causa formalis inhaerens of our adoptive sonship.[32] Nor again is created grace for St Thomas simply causa materialis for uncreated grace but also under a different aspect its consequence, as may be seen from IIIa. 7.13 corp.: 'gratia enim causatur in homine ex praesentia divinitatis, sicut lumen in aere ex praesentia solis'; nor is there any occasion to weaken the 'praesentia divinitatis' of the text to a merely natural divine omnipresence, since this omnipresence appears as an analogous case parallel to the hypostatic union. Besides we find him saying elsewhere: 'Personae divinae sui sigillatione in animabus nostris relinquunt quaedam dona quibus formaliter fruimur (Deo), scilicet amore et sapientia'.[33] Thus the sealing logically precedes the means by means of which man arrives at the fruition of the Godhead. Finally it is St Thomas who again and again on the one hand speaks of grace as inchoatio gloriae,[34] and on the other hand in the ontology of glory does not see this, as has already been shown, as based merely upon a created quality (and the relation to God posited with it). In the case of Lessius and Scheeben,[35] although their theory of the essence of grace and filiation is almost inextricably bound up with their theory – not under discussion here – of the union of the Holy Spirit with man as a property of the Third Person of the Trinity, yet their authority may be invoked here in so far as they both point to the parallels which, from an ontological point of view, hold between the [339] unio hypostatica and the gratia increata even of the pilgrim state. Scheeben does indeed make much use of the concept of the causa formalis, but almost exclusively in the question whether and in what sense the indwelling of the Spirit is causa formalis precisely of the adoptive sonship of the justified; but the concept never or hardly ever appears in the only question which concerns us here, how in fact the indwelling itself as such ought to be conceived of. Franzelin[36] regards the communicatio Dei ipsius per modum causae formalis as the characteristic feature of a supernatural gift, and finds an example of it in the unio hypostatica, the visio beatifica and the grace of justification. In itself we like to think, our view is in harmony with that of Galtier. As we have already said above, he recognizes as not merely historically accurate but also as theoretically valid today the principle, 'Praesentia divina non est mera consequentia seu merus effectus iustificationis quae sit per solam gratiam'.[37] When he goes on to explain how this principle can be maintained Galtier makes use of the concept of the 'actio proprie assimilative . . . (quae) praesentiam substantialem implicat ratione sui'.[38] This concept is clearly inspired by the Biblical and patristic image of the sealing of man with [30] Cf. the remarks of P. Dumont in Revue des Sciences Religieuses XIV (1934), pp. 62 s.

---

[31] In I Sent. dist. 14, q. 2, a. 1 sol. 2. Similarly in Ia. 43.3 ad 2: 'gratia gratum faciens disponit animam ad habendam divinam personam'.
[32] In III Sent. dist. 10, q. 2, a. 1 sol. 3. If to Spirit there is added here 'cui appropriator caritas, secundum quam formaliter meremur', this must not straight away be translated as though it read 'cui appropriator productio caritatis infusae'; for St Thomas has just before said simply (loc. cit., qla. 3 obj. 4), 'sed caritas est Spiritus sanctus'.
[33] In I Sent. dist. 14, q. 2, a. 3 ad 2.
[34] Ia-IIae. 111.3 ad 2; IIa-IIae. 24.3 ad 2; De Ver. q. 8, a. 3 ad 10; q. 27, a. 5 ad 6; in III Sent. dist. 13, q. 1, a. 1 ad 5.
[35] Lessius, De summo bono, lib. II, cap. 1, n. 4; Scheeben, Handbuch der Dogmatik, II §169, nn. 851 s.; also in his controversy with Granderath, e.g. Katholik LXIV, 2 (1884) pp. 479 s.
[36] De Deo uno[3] (Rome 1883), pp. 340-2. Cf. also Scheeben's clarification of Franzelin's teaching on this point in Katholik LXIV, 2 (1884), pp. 480 s. C. Pesch (Praelectiones Dogmaticae II, nn. 681 s.) likewise conceives of the indwelling of the Spirit ad modum formae assistentis et analogae, but the formula is for him only another expression for the ordinary conception of uncreated grace.
[37] P. Galtier, De SS. Trinitate . . ., n. 412.
[38] Loc. cit., n. 456.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God's Spirit,[39] and renders it accurately. But the question then arises how precisely this sealing is to be conceived of, how, in other words, we are to understand Galtier when he writes: '(Personae divinae . . .) animae ita se communicant et coniungunt, ut in eius essentia simul et potentiis imprimant suam ipsarum imaginem'.[40] Is the 'se communicare' a pure consequence (effectus formalis secundarius) of the generation of the created image of God? In that case Vasquez' view is not finally disposed of,[41] or alternatively, recourse will have to be had once more to the Suarezian theory [340] of the indwelling, the point of departure adopted above being abandoned. But if the 'se communicare' precedes, at least under one aspect, the generation of created grace, or if at least it is not merely a consequence of it, then the question remains how precisely this communication of God himself to the creature is to be conceived of in its own right. Finally we may refer here to the two essays of P. Dumont and J. C. Martinez-Gómez[42] who declare themselves in favour of a priority of the communication of uncreated grace to created grace, without, it must be admitted, going more closely into the question how precisely the donum increatum is to be conceived of. We have already referred to the fact that the Encyclical 'Mystici Corporis' of Pius XII is favourable to the theory here proposed (and proposed before the appearance of the Encyclical) to the extent that it draws attention to two points of departure from which we have set out here: the admitted fact that in the relationship between God and man there evidently exists a categorical order which is not that of efficient causality; and the admitted fact that the doctrine of the visio beatifica should be drawn upon in order to determine the essence of grace. It has already been said that Trütsch 'awards the palm to the solution of de la Taille and Rahner'.[43] It would take us too far to examine the most recent literature, nor is it necessary, particularly as it is orientated more towards the question of whether the relations of the divine Persons to man in grace are appropriated or non-appropriated than to the question which concerns us here.

c. Difficulties.

There is no need here to discuss the general problematic of the concept of a communication of God to the creature. Consequently we [341] have only to take up the questions which arise from the application of this concept precisely to the indwelling of God, to uncreated grace. Does not our view, with its emphasis on the relative independence of uncreated grace as regards created grace, endanger the significance of created grace for justification, adoption, etc., as Trent sees them? We need not here go into the familiar controversy conducted above all by Scheeben and Granderath as to the meaning of Chapter VII of the Sixth Session of the Council of Trent in the matter of the unica causa formalis iustificationis. In this question too we may surely have recourse to the concepts developed in scholastic theology in its treatment of the visio beatifica. Just as there the light of glory is

[39] Loc. cit., n. 458.
[40] Loc. cit., n. 456; cf. also n. 445.
[41] Accordingly Trütsch says of Galtier's theory too 'potest dici ulterior evolutio et modificatio explicationis Vasquesii' (p. 23). Nor has Galtier gone any further in developing his theory in the latest edition of his French book on this subject (see above, p. 319, n. 1). Cf. Lakner ZKT LXXII (1960), p. 116. Nevertheless Galtier's theory is worthy of note, since it recognizes the inadequacy of the classical solutions stemming from Vasquez and Suarez.
[42] Cf. above, p. 323, n. 5
[43] So Lakner, in ZKT LXXII (1950), p. 116. It should be made clear in this connexion that the present investigation arose independently of de la Taille's work. This is not said in order to establish any rights of priority, which would certainly not be the case. On the contrary it is a deficiency of the present study (dating from 1939) that de la Taille's important essay, which had already appeared some ten years before, escaped my attention. But if two people reach the same conclusion independently of each other, there is a higher probability that they are not totally at fault, which is a comfort in this unfortunate accident.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

seen as the dispositio ultima quae est necessitas ad formam, so here an analogous relationship may be assumed to hold between created and uncreated grace. In this regard created grace is seen as causa materialis (dispositio ultima) for the formal causality which God exercises by graciously communicating his own Being to the creature. In this way the material and formal causes possess a reciprocal priority: as dispositio ultima created grace is in such a way the presupposition of the formal cause that it can itself only exist by way of the actual realization of this formal causality. From this objective reciprocal priority there follows further the logical justification for inferring the presence of one reality from that of the other. Because created grace as dispositio ultima can only exist along with the actual formal causality of the form for which it is the dispositio, it is correct to say: If created grace is given, so too necessarily by that very fact uncreated grace, and hence the whole grace of justification, is communicated to man.

Thus on our view of the relationship between created and uncreated grace there does not exist even the beginning of a possibility of thinking of created grace apart from uncreated grace, and so of thinking of uncreated grace as a fresh gift arising out of a new and independent demonstration of God's grace. We must remember furthermore that created grace alone (as a finite determination of the subject) can be called forma in the strict (categorical) sense of the word (as opposed to the divine Being itself, which remains transcendent with respect to the creature in spite of its formal causality); and we must remember that the Council only wished to meet the imputation theory of the Reformers, Seripando and others, but did not wish to determine how created and uncreated (inner!) grace (of which latter it also says precisely 'signans et ungens Spiritu promissionis Sancto . . .') are [342] related to each other and together constitute the single grace of justification. In view of all this we may say that the Council's teaching on created grace as the unica causa formalis of justification does not exclude our conception of the relationship between created and uncreated grace. For in this conception too created grace remains the 'unique' formal cause of justification, in so far as it alone is the genuine (categorical) 'form' of the justified man, and once it is posited, justification as a whole is really posited with it already. In addition it must be said that Chapter VII of the Tridentine decree on justification only teaches explicitly that the causa formalis of justification is wholly interior (and thus not an imputed 'causa formalis extrinseca'), and that conversely therefore the causa formalis of justification is interior grace alone. It is true that the Council describes this interior grace in terms which in the theology of the schools hold good primarily of created grace, but it nowhere says that interior grace, as the unique formal cause of justification, must be understood exclusively of created grace.[44]

If on our view created grace is conceived of as the dispositio (causa materialis) for the donum increatum, this is in no way to deprive it of what is attributed to it by theology. In order that it can be a dispositio for uncreated grace at all, it does indeed have first of all the character of a formal entitative, supernatural determination of the human spirit; as such, however, on our view too all those effectus formales can be assigned to it ascribed to it by scholastic theology. Just in so far as and in virtue of the fact that it constitutes man as a subject fit to receive the substantial gift of the divine essence for a future visio, it assimilates man to God's nature considered as the principle of his possession of himself in Trinity; and thus it at once becomes the causa formalis of all the properties of man's supernatural elevation.[45]

---

[44] Cf. Galtier, op. cit., n. 413: 'Propterea communior est in dies sententia, quae tenet specialem illam in anima habitationem, esse de ratione causae formalis justificationis . . . Nec propterea ullatenus contradicitur concilio Tridentino.'

[45] In this sense our view is not in conflict with St Thomas's statement (Ia-IIae. 110. 1 ad 2; De Ver. q. 27, a. 1 ad 1) that created grace alone and not God himself is the 'causa formalis' in respect of supernatural 'life'. It is

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[343] It remains true, certainly, that the usual theological argument for the existence of created grace from the communication of uncreated grace must be formulated rather more cautiously in our interpretation than is usually the case. If there is someone who supposes, in accordance with the view of Cajetan or Suarez in respect of the manner in which the unio hypostatica is to be explained, that an active formal causality on God's part necessarily comprises a created modality, he will be able correspondingly to conclude to the presence of created grace from the premiss of uncreated grace. Someone who does not share these views of Cajetan and Suarez will use arguments to prove the existence of created grace[46] analogous to those used by St Thomas when he shows the necessity of the created light of glory in spite of and because of God's formal causality in the visio.

d. A consequence of the proposed solution.

The question is well-known and much discussed today whether God's indwelling in and conjunction with the justified man is only appropriated to the divine Persons or whether through grace a relationship to the man to whom grace has been shown arises which is peculiar to each divine Person. On the view according to which indwelling and so on is merely a relationship of God to man resting entirely upon created grace, this question can only be answered in the sense of a bare appropriation. For then we are required to apply the principle of theology recently emphasized once again by Pius XII: 'omnia esse habenda Sanctissimae Trinitati communia quatenus eadem Deum ut supremam efficientem causam respiciant' (Denz 2290). But if 'uncreated grace' is not ontologically speaking a pure consequence of created grace as a qualitative accident, if rather the view proposed here is correct, then the question which has just been put is by no means immediately answered yet; it can really be put for the first time as a question which is hence not obsolete but is still open. For it is above all at least conceivable then that the quasi-formal causality which we have attributed – simplifying the question for reasons of method – to [344] God and his essence, should also be proper, with regard to the recipient of grace, to the three divine Persons in their personal distinction. Of course one can at once raise the classical objection that this is inconceivable from the start. The argument here is that where one divine Person as such in distinction from the other two has a relation to a created reality which is proper to the given Person, this relation can only be a hypostatic unity (such as is given in Christ's case alone), since this union must on the one hand occur in respect of what is proper to the individual Persons, yet on the other hand proper, relative subsistence is the one thing which belongs to a divine Person in distinction from another (cf. Denz 703). We are not required here to go more closely into why this a priori objection, for all its apparent exactitude, need not for various reasons be taken as conclusive. H. Schauf, for instance, has treated of it at length.[47] Nor does it enter into the scope of this investigation to show the force of the arguments from Biblical theology and the Fathers in favour of the thesis that the relations of the divine Persons to the justified man are non-appropriated ones. Nor again is there any question of showing with the help of recent studies that, in spite of its justified opposition to Peter Lombard, medieval theology exhibited more nuances in its thought and sought to do more justice to the data of through created grace alone that man becomes a subject who is capable of knowing and loving God supernaturally, who has the capacity for it. But in order that such a supernatural 'life' should become actual there is need further of the self-communication of the object of this supernatural life, and this communication is not simply the mere consequence of the communication of the subjective potency of this life.

---

[46] For the diversity of the arguments brought forward in the great age of scholasticism, cf. Auer, Die Entwicklung. . . 1, pp. 97 s.; 111 s.

[47] H. Schauf, Die Einwohnung des Heiligen Geistes. Die Lelire von der nicht-appropriierten Einwohnung des Heiligen Geistes als Beitrag zur Theologiegeschichte des 19. Jabrhunderts unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der beiden Theologen Carl Passaglia und Clemens Schrader (Freiburg 1941), esp. pp. 224-49. See also M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik I[4] (Munich 1948), pp. 378 s.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Scripture and Tradition than the simplified teaching of the schools of latter centuries might allow one to suppose.[48] We should like to draw attention here merely to one aspect of the question since it arises out of our previous considerations. If it is true that in the visio beatifica that alone can be grasped really immediately in its very self, without the mediation of some other known object, which communicates itself to the knowing mind in quasi-formal causality after the fashion of a 'species impressa', onto-logically prior to knowledge as such, then this holds good equally of the three divine Persons each in its own personal property. In other words, they are either not beheld immediately as such in the visio [345] beatifica; or, in logical priority to the visio as a conscious act, they have each as divine, mutually distinct Persons their own proper quasi-formal causality upon the created spirit, a causality which makes it possible for these divine Persons to be possessed 'consciously', and, what is more, immediately. Hence there also follows one aspect of the answer to the above-mentioned classical objection to the doctrine that the indwelling and communication of the three divine Persons are not appropriated but are proper to each. 'Communication of (in respect of) the proper hypostasis' can in fact mean two things. It can either mean: communication of (according to) the particular hypostasis in such a way that it exercises its hypostatic function in respect of that to which the communication is made. Or 'communication of (according to) the hypostasis' can mean that a true ontological communication of the hypostasis takes place, but to the end and only to the end that it can become in virtue of this quasi-formal causality the object of immediate knowledge and love. In the first sense we have such a communication only in the case of Christ, by reason of the relationship of the divine Word to the human nature assumed by him. We should have an instance of the second kind of communication in the 'uncreated grace' of the justified man. It would have to be proved in the strictest possible way that it was impossible for there to be this kind of communication of the divine Persons each in his own personal particularity and hence a non-appropriated relation to the three Persons. There is no way of producing such a proof. Consequently there can be absolutely no objection to maintaining on the basis of the positive data of Revelation that the attribution of determinate relations of the recipient of grace to the three divine Persons is not merely a matter of appropriation, but is intended to give expression to a proper relationship in each case. In Scripture it is the Father in the Trinity who is our Father, and not the threefold God.[49] The Spirit dwells in us in a particular and proper way.[50] These and like statements of Scripture [346] and Tradition are first of all 'in possessione'. It would be necessary to prove that they may be merely appropriated, on the grounds that they can be understood merely as such and that the contrary is impossible; it cannot be presupposed. So long as this has not been achieved, we must take Scripture and the expressions it uses in as exact a sense as we possibly can. There is another point which should not be forgotten. In the history of Western piety an attenuation of the 'Trinity of the economy of salvation' into a kind of pre-Christian monotheism (and that is what the doctrine of bare appropriations in the theology of grace really amounts to) has not merely diminished the significance of the Holy Trinity in concrete religious life. In itself (i.e. logically, and if the contrary were not already defined) this attenuation could also endanger the 'interior Trinity' to the benefit of a rationalistic monotheism for which the three divine Names would only be for us three aspects [48] Cf. the writings cited above, p. 319, n. 1, especially the work by Dockx. See also C. Sträter, 'Het begrip "appropriatie" bij S. Thomas', Bijdragen IX (1948), pp.1-41; 144-86.

[49] See above, pp. 147-8.
[50] By this it is not of course meant that the Spirit alone makes his dwelling in us. Each Person communicates himself and dwells in us in a way proper to him. And because the indwelling ascribed to the Holy Spirit in Scripture (as a Power who sanctifies, consecrates, moves, etc.) corresponds precisely to the personal particularity of the Spirit and of his going forth from the Father and the Son, there is absolutely no objection to saying that in this way only the Spirit dwells in man.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

under which to regard the one divine Essence. For in Scripture the interior Trinity and the Trinity of the economy of salvation are seen and spoken of in themselves with such simultaneity that there would be no justification in itself (logically) for taking the expressions literally and substantially in the first case and only in an 'appropriated' way in the second. We should like to think that here our proposed theory of uncreated grace in terms of the concepts of scholastic theology offers the possibility of determining man's relationship in grace as a non-appropriated relation to the three divine Persons, without doing injury to the principle of the unity of efficient causality in the creative action of the threefold God ad extra, and without making the indwelling conjunction of the three divine Persons into a hypostatic union.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[347]

11

THE THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT OF CONCUPISCENTIA[1]

The concept of concupiscentia as it is employed by theologians is undoubtedly one of the most difficult in dogmatic theology, not only because of its extraordinarily disturbed history from St Paul by way of St Augustine to Luther, Baius and Jansenius, but also because it must be regarded in Catholic theology from two points of view which are not easily reconciled. On the one hand concupiscentia must he seen as something which can be called sin in the sense of chapter VII of the Epistle to the Romans[2], i.e. sin at least in the [348] sense that it arises out of transgression and can give occasion to fresh transgression as the Council of Trent explains (Denz 792); thus it must be possible to see it in a certain sense as a power weighing down upon man, with all the shattering impetus attested to by St Paul, St Augustine and Luther. On the other hand, according to Catholic teaching as it was laid down against the Reformers by the Council of Trent and above all against Baius by Pius V (Denz 792; 1026; 1078; 1516 s.), concupiscentia has to be conceived of in such a way that freedom from it represents even for unfallen man an unexacted, preternatural gift. If from the first point of view concupiscentia appears as a power oppressing man in his very depths and driving him on to moral transgression, from the second point of view it presents itself as something immediately given with human nature, and so really a matter of course, 'harmless', indeed almost necessary.

There is a further difficulty as well. Concupiscentia is a concept the content of which is on the one hand known to us from Revelation and yet on the other hand is available to our immediate human experience. Now from the point of view of this human experience of concupiscentia it is easy to see that the revealed theological concept of concupiscentia is

---

[1] The following reflexions were submitted to a detailed examination (based on their first publication in the Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie) by J. P. Kenny in 'The Problem of Concupiscence: a recent theory of Professor Karl Rahner', The Australasian Catholic Record (Sidney) XXIX (1952), pp. 290-304; XXX (1953), pp. 23-32.
(I use 'concupiscentia' to translate Konkupiszenz, 'concupiscence' to translate Begierlickkeit. Both German words are to be regarded as technical terms, but Konkupiszenz is simply a Germanization of the Latin word adopted by Fr Rahner in order to have a neutral word at his disposal through which he can present his special view. – Tr.)

[2] As the Council of Trent allows (Denz 792). Certainly it is very doubtful whether it is really concupiscentia as such alone which St Paul calls α(μαρτι/α. It is true that the Sin (η(α(μαρτι/α) which appears in the world and affects all men in consequence of Adam's act is not regarded by St Paul as a purely static deprivation of the Spirit suffered by Adamite man; rather this primal and hereditary Sin contains a dynamic and active element which urgently seeks to reveal its own nature in the personal sins of the individual. Thus the Sin comes into the world like a ruler (Rom. 5:12), 'dwells' in man's flesh (Rom 7:20), subjects man to itself as its slave (Rom 6:6.17.20; 7:14), revives through the experience of the Law (Rom 7:8, 9), in this way becomes manifest in man's concrete life (Rom 7:13) by subjecting man to its law (Rom 7:23; 8:2) and using his 'members' as its weapons (Rom 6: 13). This does indeed show that for St Paul 'the Sin' (original sin) includes concupiscence as an element in its concrete concept. But this does not prove that he ever means by α(μαρτι/α concupiscence precisely as such, inasmuch as he himself distinguishes it from the primal sin (Rom 7:8) and recognizes it for something still remaining in the justified man (Rom 13: I4; Gal 5:16; Eph 4:22; Co1 3:5; 1 Thess 4:5; 1 Tim 6:9; 2 Tim 2:22; Tit 2:12) who is no longer under the κατα&κριμα of sin (Rom 5: 16; 8:1). It is correct to say that concupiscence is often included as a partial factor in the concept of α(μαρτι/α and even stands in the foreground. But that it alone is ever called α(μαρτι/α would still have to be proved. The fact that this view has been shared even by Catholics exegetes would seem to be the consequence of a long practice of applying, with St Augustine, chapter VII of the Epistle to the Romans to the justified man; for then of course the α(μαρτι/α whose strength is there depicted can only be concupiscentia as such.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

always in danger of being interpreted subjectively according to man's understanding of himself, which is something to a large extent historically conditioned and to some extent variable. The various interpretations offered of the Pauline concept of σα&ρχ, for instance, show how hard it is not to shift the sense of a concept of Revelation without noticing it, in accordance with the unconscious a priori preconceptions of the interpreter's own anthropology or in accordance with that philosophical a priori by which he believes St Paul himself was influenced.[3]

[349] In what follows we shall attempt briefly to develop a conception of concupiscentia which will, as we believe, do justice to the real data of Revelation on the one hand, and at the same time avoid that disequilibrium which, so it seems to us, may still be encountered today in the usual theological conception of concupiscentia. For lack of space we deliberately and expressly renounce the task of supporting what we have to say with the apparatus of theological scholarship and of confronting it with the usual views in closer detail. The theologian who is familiar with scholastic teaching on concupiscentia will be able to make use of it to understand and assess this study. Our considerations proceed as follows: the conception of concupiscentia usual in modern Catholic theology will be briefly set out and submitted to criticism (I); and then an attempt will be made to offer a fresh formulation of this concept (II).

Naturally we do not suppose in the matter of this 'fresh' formulation that the elements for a 'fresh' determination of the concept are lacking in Tradition and the customary teaching of the theologians. On the contrary. In general we shall have recourse to doctrines and presuppositions of a quite self-explanatory kind (or at least also represented in scholasticism) which seem fitted to contribute to the understanding of the theological concept of concupiscentia and thus to make possible a clearer formulation of it. While it should not he necessary to discuss this point in detail, the theological proof for the proposed concept always consists in the fact that formulated in such a way it fits in with the assured theological data which we have about concupiscentia, and does so better than the previous concept. Once this is granted, it is unnecessary to be able to show that the conception proposed is itself clearly and explicitly to be found in Tradition, particularly as it may more easily be seen in detail that, as has been indicated, the sharper concept of concupiscentia actually found in certain Fathers and theologians is a product both of Revelation and of a philosophical anthropology.

One other preliminary remark is necessary if we are to avoid the danger that as a consequence of an insufficiently considered interpretation of human experience certain factors may be introduced into the theological concept of concupiscentia which do not belong to it, in such a way that this concept would be opposed to ours on the ground that it alone corresponded to experience. In the concrete experience of man's exposure to temptation, his moral weakness and sinfulness, [350] elements are to be found which do not belong to the theological concept of concupiscentia. And this for the simple reason that we must necessarily presuppose their presence in Adam even before the Fall, because Adam too, in his preternatural state of integrity, could be tempted and could sin. Now it is only what was lacking in Adam in virtue of his gift of integrity that belongs to the theological concept of concupiscentia. Thus from the first two entirely distinct elements are given in our empirical 'concupiscentia': one an element which belongs essentially to every man so long as he forms a part of this cosmic epoch, and another which is a consequence of the loss of the integrity of Paradise due to the primordial sin. Hence it is not immediately easy to say what features of empirical 'concupiscentia' belong to theological concupiscentia – to that concupiscentia which Adam did not have originally. Nor is it any easier immediately to decide that [3] Cf., e.g., W. Schauf, Der Begriff 'Fleisch' beim Apostel Paulus unter besonderer Berücksichtigung seiner Erlösungslehre (Munster 1924).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theological concupiscentia is of more significance for moral decisions than those essential characteristics of man which independently of original sin and prior to it already provide the basis for his exposure to temptation and his power to sin.

I. A CRITICAL APPROACH TO THE CURRENT CONCEPTION OF CONCUPISCENTIA

Current expositions of dogmatic theology usually begin by distinguishing three concepts of concupiscentia. In the broadest sense concupiscence is for them any kind of conative potency (Strebevermögen) and its respective act; in a narrower and proper sense concupiscence is sensitive desire (Begehren)[4]; concupiscentia in the narrowest and strictly theological sense signifies for them the sensitive appetite (Begehrungsvermögen) and its act, in so far as this strives after its sensitive object in opposition to the law of the moral order independently of the higher, spiritual conative potency, and thus resists the spiritual free decision of man's will. For this reason this concupiscentia is also called evil, disordered, rebellious concupiscence, evil inclination. The gift of integrity is correspondingly defined today, generally speaking at least, as freedom from evil concupiscence.[5]

[351] Against this definition of concupiscence grave difficulties have been raised in two different directions. Franz Lakner has already drawn attention to the first of these difficulties as regards the concept of concupiscentia in more recent textbooks[6]; the reader may be referred to his discussion for further details. As Lakner justly says, the dogmatic and the ascetico-moral concepts of concupiscence are not distinguished in these treatments. A dogmatic consideration of concupiscentia ought not immediately to concern itself with the tendency of the sensitive appetite to what is morally forbidden, as the ascetico-moral consideration does – quite rightly; to the appetite there belongs in the first place the spontaneous character of a conative potency alone, on the basis of which conative acts anticipate and resist reflexion and free decision. This spontaneity is something which remains wholly prior to an ascetic qualification of concupiscentia as 'evil inclination', so much so that in certain circumstances the spontaneous conative act may just as well be directed to a good of a morally positive value against man's bad free decision, as to a morally illicit good. By concupiscentia in the theological sense must be meant this character of spontaneity proper to the appetite, and correspondingly freedom from concupiscentia must be conceived of as total dominion over the appetite with respect to its character of spontaneity. Only then is it possible for an explanation of integrity to avoid the psychologically untenable view that the gift of integrity only comes into play when the appetite seeks for something morally *un*lawful; this would make the gift of integrity into a series of discontinuous new interventions of God in the psychological course of man's spiritual life. For this spontaneity (the exact nature of which we have still to discuss) and this tendency to resist found by nature in the appetite are either in themselves and of themselves suspended or they are not. In [352] the first case, this holds good then necessarily of every one of its acts, thus of those too which

---

[4] Ia-IIae. 30.1.

[5] Cf., e.g., C. Mazella, De Deo creante (Woodstock 1877), n. 724; D. Palrnieri, Tractatus de Deo creante et elevante (Rome 1878), thesis 44; M. J. Scheeben, Handbuch der Kath. Dogmatik II §155; J. B. Heinrich, Dogmatische Theologie VI (Mainz 1885), pp. 518 s.; C. Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae III, nn. 187 s.; H. Hurter, Theologiae dogmaticae Compendium II[8] (Innsbruck 1893), nn. 329-31; DTC III, col. 803-14; G. van Noort, Tractatus de Deo creatore[2] (Amsterdam 1912), n. 199; J. Pohle-M. Gierens, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik I[9] (Paderborn 1936), pp. 506 s.; F. Diekamp, Katholische Dogmatik II[9] (Munster 1939), pp. 126 s.; C. Boyer, Dc Deo elevanre (Rome 1940), p. 276. This list could be considerably extended.

[6] ZKT LXI (1937), pp. 437-41. Cf. also L. Lercher, Institutiones theol. dogm. II[3] (Innsbruck 1940), nn. 608-10, where Lakner's exposition has already been put to excellent account.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

would be acts of resistance of the healthy nature to the morally inferior free decision of the person. For the concupiscentia itself cannot decide whether its object at any given time conforms to the moral norm or is opposed to it; such a decision rising from spiritual knowledge necessarily conies too late. A habitual inner binding of concupiscentia would thus have to extend uniformly to all its objects. In the second case, integrity could only be conceived of in an occasionalist way, as a continually renewed intervention by God from without, which suddenly puts a brake on concupiscentia just at the moment in which it is going to turn to a good opposed to the moral norm. But an idea like this would make the conscious life of man's soul into a chain of unmotivated accidents and surprises.

The second difficulty relates to the conception of concupiscentia, in the theological sense, as a purely sensitive power. Certainly in a metaphysical psychology we must distinguish between sensitive and spiritual appetites as between two really distinct powers of man. Yet this distinction must be conceived of with the utmost caution. For a human power must not be conceived of as a 'thing'; it is never more than that through which the one man acts. And a plurality of powers are and remain always powers of one and the same man, from whose substantial ground these powers, on St Thomas's view, arise, are supported by it and held together by it in a unity.[7] Consequently the objects of the sensitive and the spiritual appetites are present to the awareness of one and the same subject, related to one and the same subject. In a properly understood Thomist metaphysics of human knowledge, the relationship between the sensitive and the spiritual cognitive powers must be so conceived of as to fulfil two conditions. One the one hand the sensitive cognitive faculty will have to be seen as itself arising from the spiritual ground as a continuation of the information of matter by the spiritual soul and thus as completely mastered by the spirit right from the start. On the other hand the spiritual cognitive faculty, because it must allow sensibility to arise from itself as the presupposition of its own realization, will itself have [353] to be seen right from the start as a 'sensitized' spirituality. Thus in virtue of man's metaphysical structure it will be fundamentally impossible from the start for there ever to be an act of sensitive cognition which is not also eo ipso an act of spiritual cognition. And the converse holds good too.

It further follows from this that a sensible good is never pursued by man in virtue of his sensitive appetite alone. Every object (hence a sensible object too) is apprehended by man in a sensitive-spiritual way, and consequently pursued by him in the same way too. And conversely: a spiritual value is never apprehended in man's case in a purely spiritual way either. For neither is the purely spiritual object ever apprehended by pure intellect; it must also always be given sensibly in a certain way, on account of that reversion of man's spiritual knowledge to the senses (conversio ad phantasma) which is necessary for human cognition, and the same holds good for the spiritual conative power too. Every human cognitive and conative act is necessarily, in virtue of man's very nature, sensitive-spiritual or spiritual-sensitive. Now it follows from this that just as there exists a sensitive spontaneous act of desire, so too there exists at least as much an involuntary spiritual conative act prior to man's free personal decision. Thus where there exists a concupiscentia in the theological sense as an involuntary concupiscence anticipating free decision and resisting it, this is spiritual too. And it is quite impossible to see why this act of spiritual craving (Begehrlichkeit) should only be directed to sensible objects.[8] We may think for example of a persistent [354] temptation

[7] On this point and on what follows see, e.g., Karl Rahner, Geist in Welt. Zur Metaphysik der endlichen Erkenntnis bei Thomas von Aquin (Innsbruck 1939), pp. 175 s. (2nd edn. 1957, pp. 243 s. – Tr.); W. Brugger, 'Die Verleiblichung des Wollens', Scholastik XXV (1950), pp. 248-53.

[8] Thus it may be observed again and again in the literature on concupiscentia cited above, how the interpretation of concupiscentia as a sensitive impulse is found to be insufficient. Pesch, for example (loc. cit., n. 188) finally recognizes an 'inordinatio motus in bona spiritualia . . . in quantum illa bona sub sensibili ratione apprehenduntur et facultatem sensibilem afficiunt'. But that is what all bona spiritualia necessarily do, when

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

against faith, or to despair. In such cases we are clearly faced with acts of the appetite which bear the typical marks of concupiscentia in the theological sense, namely the spontaneity of the act and its persistence in opposition to a free decision. And yet the act in question is plainly one which belongs specifically to the spiritual appetite.[9] Thus it is by no means clear why concupiscentia should be conceived of as a 'rebellion' precisely of the 'lower' man against the 'higher'. This always tends to suggest the idea that it is precisely the metaphysically (ontologically) lower in man which is also the more dangerous ethically and in this sense lower: as if the danger of turning away from God arises precisely from the ontologically lower spheres of man; as if the higher a being is entitatively, the less in danger it is in a moral way, while in reality there is just as much danger from the Luciferan heights of the spirit as from the dark depths of the purely sensitive. It is not that the ontically lower in man is intrinsically at variance with the higher, but that man is divided against himself. But we shall discuss this positive concept of concupiscentia in a moment.

If then no solid grounds can be offered why the front line of man's inner division against himself should exactly coincide with the metaphysical line which separates the ontologically higher and lower in man, it is at any rate clear what the historical basis of this conception is. It does not lie in Revelation itself. For the concepts of 'flesh', of the 'law of the members' and so on, with which St Paul tries to make vivid to our imagination man's inner division against himself on account of concupiscentia, are purely religious concepts, not the meta-physical concepts of an anthropology which ontologically stratifies man's essence. 'Flesh' for St Paul is not a part of man, but the whole man, in his spiritual dimensions too, in so far as for lack of the holy Pneuma and of grace he is subject to sin and to God's wrath.[10] Only an they are apprehended by a man! Palmieri does indeed exclude the 'indeliberatae affectiones . . . partis rationalis (motus superbiae, invidiae et huiusmodi)' from the concept of concupiscentia, but then goes on to explain (loc. cit., p. 367): 'nihil modo refert, utrum hanc facultatem (sc. the concupiscent faculty) censeas esse potentiam formaliter sensibilem, an potius voluntatem ipsam, quae ferri potest in bonum delectabile sensui, apprehensum a sensu et proinde etiam ab intellectu'. Now if concupiscentia can be an attitude of the spirit, it is no longer clear why it can only be directed to sensible goods. At any rate for Palmieri it is something which characterizes man's sensibility and his spirituality in like manner. Hurter and van Noort also introduce into the concept of concupiscentia the conflict between the ratio superior and the ratio inferior, and so show in their own way that one cannot be content with the concept of a purely sensitive concupiscentia.

---

[9] The 'concupiscence of the flesh' in St Paul does not have the exclusive sense of 'sensitive desire' either. Cf. here Schauf, op. cit., pp. 159-61.

[10] In offering a few remarks about St Paul's concept of sarx, what we have primarily in mind here is only sarx in St Paul so far as it is seen as the seat, the source and the revelation of sin. Thus from the start our only question is what σα&ρχ means in these texts. And once again the only question which concerns us here is whether the ontological quality of 'flesh' as the sensitive part of man over against natural 'spirit', man's intellectuality, is or is not for St Paul the exclusive or at least the preferred cause of sin. (If the first of these alternatives were true, we could go on to ask whether it was in its essential or merely in its historically evolved particularity that 'flesh' was with such exclusiveness the seat and source of sin.) Now it need not be denied that St Paul does see one of the sources of sin in 'flesh' as the sensitive and thus ontologically lower part of man. But it is not true that, when flesh is under discussion as the source and the seat of sin, what is referred to (and not merely simultaneously referred to) is exclusively man's sensibility and corporeality as meant by a metaphysical anthropology; nor does it become true by adding that the 'sarkic' quality of the lower part of man does not belong to it by metaphysical necessity but only because of the concrete particularity of history. The identification of the Pauline concept of with the philosophical concept of human sensibility is excluded by the simple fact that for St Paul sarx is the contrary of pneuma. But pneuma for St Paul is not the 'spiritual' side of man; it is the divine spirit graciously bestowed from above which must cleanse and sanctify man's higher part too, so that it should not be – sarx. For in St Paul this sarx is the source of spiritual sin too, every graceless will to moral perfection is 'fleshly', the sarkic and the merely physical man are synonymous, etc.: all expressions which are incompatible with the identification of sarx and sensibility in the philosophical sense. For details see Schauf, op. cit. It is true that in a few places σα&ρχ is also seen in opposition to νου=φ. But this is far from implying that what is in question is an opposition of two 'parts' in man. The proper sense of these texts (Rom 7:23, 25) will be grasped if with St Paul one begins with the assumption that νου=φ is as a matter of course the locus of the knowledge of God and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[355] interpretation which had not yet completely eliminated Gnostic or Neoplatonist tendencies with their a priori categories (and this is definitely the case with St Augustine) could have explained St Paul's [356] purely religious concepts in the sense of a philosophy for which the ontologically less perfect is also eo ipso what is religiously further from God and the spirit is always something more divine[11], in such a way [357] that the opposition of the flesh to God and to the law of the holy pneuma (which is not just 'spirit' as meant by a philosophical anthropology) is transposed into an opposition of man's sensibility (in the metaphysical sense) to his intellectuality.

If these two elements (concupiscence precisely for what is evil, concupiscence as pure sensibility) are taken together, it is easy to see why such a concept of concupiscence, even against the will of those who so conceive it, tends to endanger the unexactedness of the gift of integrity. For it is not clear why a rebellion of the lower part, which exclusively impels to evil, his law and of the reception of the pneuma; all this not because νου=φ is without further qualification ethically privileged, but because spirituality, as a morally quite neutral quality, is the ontologically necessary presupposition for all these things. Then there can be no difficulty in speaking a parte potiori of the whole man as flesh resisting the pneuma, and inclined to sin, and the whole man as νου=φ bound by God's law and requiring and receiving grace. This νου=φ for St Paul is not the part of man privileged in a moral respect on account of its purely ontological character, as may for example be seen from the fact that there also exists an α)δο&κιμοφ νου=φ (Rom 1:28), a νου=φ of the flesh (Col 2:18), a corrupted and defiled νου=φ (1 Tim 6:5; Tit 1: 16), which like everything in man is in need of renewal (Rom 12:2; Eph 4:23). It remains true of him, as Catharinus once said (in Schauf, op. cit., p. 157): 'Quodcumque enim non est a Spiritu Sancto, sed prodit ex homine, ex carne venit. Narn et ipse hominis spiritus in carne computatur; et totus homo caro dicitur in scripturis, in quo non est Spiritus Dei.'

---

[11] It would of course be possible to say a great deal more about this topic both from an historical and a systematic point of view. Just one further remark for the present: scholastic ontology will never forego its right to distinguish between 'higher' and 'lower', ontologically 'more perfect' and 'less perfect', within finite being. If this qualification, which establishes not just specific varieties but rather distinctions in density of being, in 'onto-logical level', between individual beings, is primarily a measurement of finite beings in regard to each other, nevertheless such a comparison between finite beings by grading them implies an absolute criterion, i.e. a knowledge of being in general (however little necessary it may be for this knowledge to be given with objective reflexivity). Yet a higher grading consequently always includes a judgment as to an ontologically more perfect 'participation' of this being in the Being of God. While it is true that for a Christian ontology the concept of creation (and thus of the distinguishing mark of the finite as something created from nothing) takes precedence before that of 'participation' in God's Being (and this originally unchristian concept must be subjected to radical transformation with the help of the concept of creation), yet it remains true that for a Christian doctrine of creation it is impossible to abandon the use of the statement that the creature is like the cause because it has been caused by God, and like it in varying degree: thus that the creature 'partakes' in God's perfection in the measure of its own ontological density of being. Otherwise any positive statement about God would be absolutely impossible from the start. In the end we should consequently have a theologia negativa identical with atheism. But where it is a question of justification, grace or salvation, as these occur in the present concrete order, these realities are incommensurable with the ontological criterion, because they are unexacted and beyond the reach of the creature by its own powers; for even the ontically 'most perfect' finite entity lacks any positive proximity to these saving goods in virtue of which these goods could fall within its reach or be demanded by it. But it is not only religiously and ethically that greater ontological perfection does not signify any greater proximity to God. It is not true for a scholastic ontology of grace either, that grace is simply a 'still higher' step in the ladder of entitative perfections, immediately below which ontologically comes, let us say, the spirit (as the highest natural level). Grace can only be bestowed where there is spirit, and to this extent spirit has something to do with grace in a way that would not be true of the purely material considered purely in itself. But grace, even looked at ontologically, as the communication of God so far as he is in himself precisely distinct from every merely participating creature, is precisely not just a 'higher' grade of being which remains in the finite order like the lower grades and would thus be strictly commensurable with them; it is (as 'uncreated grace') even ontologically the utterly incomparable, namely God himself. And for this reason the human spirit too, like everything else, is 'flesh', i.e. something even ontologically so distinct from God as God that in this respect it is impossible to think of a more or less in the degree of this distinction, inasmuch as the distinction of individual creatures between themselves is contained within their common infinite difference (Differenz) from God, and the former cannot be brought together with the latter over a common denominator.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation should be conceivable in a sinless human nature and could thus be part even of a state of pure nature. If concupiscentia in the theological sense is thought of exclusively as a quality of man's 'sensitive' part, and in such a way that this only impels to evil and has no other function, then just this quality is something immediately and exclusively opposed to the moral order as such, i.e. something opposed to the inner teleology of man as a whole, and nothing else. Such a quality, which is opposed in a merely negative way to the inner orientation of man as a whole (and to this totality even the individual parts must be subject), would from the first introduce an inner contradiction into man's ontological, stratified structure: the ontologically lower stratum of man would have the character merely of something burdensome and hindering, an encumbrance which works purely in opposition to the moral order.[12]

[358]

II. THE THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT OF CONCUPISCENTIA

After these brief critical remarks on the current idea of concupiscentia we turn at once to the concept of concupiscentia which seems to us to be the correct one and which avoids the objections indicated above, in an attempt simply to develop it in a positive way from the nature of things and without further polemic. Some repetition of what has just been said will be unavoidable.

1. The Concept of Concupiscentia

a. Desire in the broadest sense is any witting (bewusste) reactive attitude adopted to a value or a good (both such an act and the permanent power of performing it) as opposed to a receptive act of awareness. Since we cannot here offer a phenomenology and metaphysics of the emotional and volitive side of man, those most general concepts with which scholastic anthropology describes human conation must be presupposed. We presuppose as familiar then what is involved in conation as a mere natural dynamism (appetitus naturalis) and as a witting conation (appetitus elicitus), what in sensitive and spiritual desire, in desire as potency and as act; the difference between a witting act which owes its existence to natural dynamism alone (actus indeliberatus) and one which owes its existence to its being freely posited by the person (actus deliberatus). Finally we also presuppose the scholastic concept of appetite, to the extent that this concept includes not only 'conation' or 'wanting' but also 'feeling' or 'emotion' (in the sense of modern descriptive psychology), not only the tending to a good not yet attained or to a value still to be realized but also the [359] value-response to [12] That the usual characterization of concupiscentia is only with difficulty to be reconciled with its 'naturalness' (taught by all Catholic theologians as a matter of course) and also with the unexactedness of freedom from it, may be seen for instance by reading what some of them say (consistently with their doctrine of concupiscentia): that even in the status naturae purae concupiscentia would have 'sufficed for our dishonour' (Heinrich, op. cit., p. 527), that it is a 'convulsive and morbid excitability of the instinct' (Scheeben, op. cit., n. 553), a 'rebellion' (Hurter, loc. cit.) of the lower against the higher, a 'disordered', 'evil', concupiscence (Pohie-Gierens, Diekamp), an 'evil inclination'. Of all these modes of expression Lakner says with justice (loc. cit., p. 440): 'Ultimately all these expressions imply that concupiscentia is something which really does not belong to our nature, something which dishonours it, which ought not to be; but the consequence of this, even when the true definition of the concept is retained, is that what precisely forms the essential element in concupiscentia is denied.' The possibility of non-moral evil (death, sickness, etc.) cannot be adduced as an argument to the contrary. For evils of this kind are not in the same sense opposed without further qualification to the ultimate teleology of man as a whole (a religious and moral finality), as would be the case with concupiscentia if it were conceived from the first in a one-sided way as an inner impulsion purely towards the morally bad.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a possessed or present good; and finally we presuppose this concept so far as it includes both the positive tending to the good and the negative avoidance of the contrary disvalue and evil. The characteristic feature of this concept of concupiscentia as taken in its broadest sense is that it embraces both the free as well as the involuntary acts of human reaction to value.

b. Concupiscentia in the narrower sense is the act of the appetite in regard to a determinate good or a determinate value, in so far as this act takes shape spontaneously in the consciousness on the basis of man's natural dynamism, and as such forms the necessary presupposition of man's personal free decision. We have already given reasons above for saying that as regards the theological concept of concupiscence we make no distinction here between spiritual and sensitive desire. In the matter of this spontaneous act of desire we have to do with a sensitive-spiritual act, whether this act is directed to a (sensible) good immediately available to human experience or to an object which in its very being transcends immediate experience. In every case man's whole cognitive and appetitive powers take part, and this total sensitive-spiritual human conative act precedes man's free decision (dictamen rationis) and is its necessary precondition.

If we are later to mark off sharply the nature of concupiscentia in the narrowest (theological) sense from the concept of concupiscentia in the narrower sense, it is indispensable here to make still more clear the fact that the act of desire responding spontaneously to the object merely on the basis of natural dynamism is the necessary presupposition of a free choice of attitude, and in what sense this is so. Every finite freedom, because of its finitude, implies, in the adoption of an attitude to an individual object given from without, a real transition from potency to act. Now such a transition implies that the power freely to adopt an attitude is not of itself invariably and from the first in possession of the object to which it is to adopt an attitude; thus it presupposes that the object is 'given' to the subject's appetitive power, 'given' to this power itself and not just to his cognitive power. In consequence of the active nature of desire (in contrast to the receptivity of knowledge) this givenness of an object for the conative power with a view to the free adoption of an attitude can only consist in a spontaneous activation of the conative power in regard to the object. For in view of the essentially active nature of the appetitive [360] power, a purely passive givenness of the object for this power is excluded from the very beginning. Thus with the same metaphysical necessity with which a finite freedom (a spiritual power, that is to say!) must be given its object if it is to become active, there precedes the free operation a spontaneous (and spiritually spontaneous too!) act of the appetitive power; and this act ultimately is no other than the innate dynamic orientation of man to his goods, but on the conscious level so soon as an object is present cognitively. This alone is enough to show that freedom from concupiscentia in the theological sense cannot be a freedom from every kind of spontaneous act of the appetite really prior to the free decision; and consequently that man's dominion over this spontaneity of his appetitive power, if it neither can nor may he thought of as a simple lack of any such spontaneity, is fundamentally capable in itself of being realized in diverse ways, of which we shall have something to say later.

c. Concupiscentia in the narrowest (theological) sense.

We give first of all (ignoring the distinction between sensitive and spiritual desire) the usual description of concupiscentia in the narrowest sense (= concupiscence, Begierlichkeit). On this account concupiscence is man's spontaneous desire, in so far as it precedes his free decision and resists it.

If we are to understand this description of concupiscence aright, we must go rather further back. We ask: what can be meant by saying that concupiscence anticipates the free decision and resists it? With this in mind we begin first of all with a phenomenology (if we may so

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

call it) of man's free decision. This free decision firstly is obviously a spiritual act. But this spirituality must not be conceived of as though it were a purely 'spiritual' act. For such an act does not exist in man. It is necessarily accompanied in man by a sensitive process, and therefore necessarily has its influence also on the sensitive sphere in man. The essential feature of the free decision is thus what is personal and free, as opposed to that spontaneous act of the appetite which, because of its non-free character is essentially pre-moral.

Now such a free decision in man permits of being more closely qualified in two ways. First of all it is an act through which man is explicitly or implicitly set before God, the absolute Good, and comes to a decision in his regard. This is true in so far as God is comprehended at least implicitly in every free decision in virtue of falling under [361] the concept of the good simply speaking, for the individual finite good can only be freely assented to or rejected in the dynamism of a movement towards the good simply speaking. The spontaneous, involuntary act, on the other hand, is always referred to a finite (or finitely presented) good, for only such a good can be immediately set before man's cognitive and appetitive powers and thus call forth the spontaneous act.[13]

In the second place, man's free decision is an act by means of which he disposes of himself as a whole. For originally and ultimately moral freedom is not so much a decision with regard to an objectively presented individual value-object as a decision with regard to the freely operative subject himself. For in the last resort, on account of the first aspect of the moral act just mentioned, the morally free agent comes to a decision not so much with regard to his attitude to the finite good presented to his mind as to his relationship to God's absolute reality as value. Because man can only be free in regard to the finite good in virtue of his dynamic orientation to the infinite good, every free decision is a disposition made by man in respect of his situation before God, not only in virtue of a juridical or moral interpretation of this act but on the ground of its metaphysical structure. In this way the free decision tends of itself to dispose of man as a whole. For the spiritually knowing and willing subject necessarily brings to completion in every objective act of knowledge and decision a return upon itself as well (reditio completa subiecti in seipsum, Summa contra Gentiles IV, II), and in this way is present to itself and itself acts as something so present to itself. In this way the free operation, as a [362] genuine operation and not just a passive experience, arises from the inmost core of the subject and exercises a determining influence upon this subject. For otherwise the operative subject, in so far as it is identical with this personal centre, would merely undergo the free decision passively and not actively posit it. But that is in contradiction to the inmost essence of the free operation, inasmuch as the operative subject is really responsible for it. Now the operative subject itself can only be and remain responsible for the free decision if it posits this decision in such a way that the decision becomes a qualification of the operative subject itself. Thus the free decision is essentially a disposal of himself made by man, and one which proceeds from the inmost centre of his being. Now if man's free decision is the shaping (or in the terms of modern existential philosophy, the 'self-comprehension')[14] of his own being proceeding precisely from its inmost core – from that core, that is to say, from [13] This is not of course to deny but rather to affirm by implication that through the spontaneous, involuntary act (so far as it is a spiritual one), the unlimited horizon of spiritual aspiration is already opened up in a movement of transcendence towards being and the good in general, and that precisely by this means the necessity of having to decide freely in this way or that is for the first time disclosed. And conversely what has been said must not be taken to mean that the free spirit always comes to a decision before God (for or against him) in such a way that God himself is the express, objectively presented object of the free decision. Transcendence towards being and the good in general is disclosed as conscious (in receptive knowledge and spontaneous aspiration) through the finite object, which gives itself by being what it is; and in the free act the free spirit, through the finite object, adopts an attitude to the absolute good, which is simultaneously affirmed in voluntary transcendence.

[14] The reference here is to the notion, derived from Heidegger, that the personal existent (Dasein) contributes to its own being by a preforming comprehension of its own future realizations. – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which man's whole metaphysical essence arises and is compacted – then the free decision also tends essentially to shape and modify this whole essence arising from the centre of the person. Thus the free decision tends to dispose of the operative subject as a whole before God.

The question now arises as to how far the freely operative subject when he makes his decision succeeds in actually extending this tendency totally to dispose of himself throughout the whole extent of his being. And here we simply lay it down a posteriori – the metaphysical justification of this fact will be briefly touched on later – that this tendency within man's ordinary free decision never completely succeeds in making its way. There always remains in the nature of things a tension between what man is as a kind of entity simply present before one (as 'nature') and what he wants to make of himself by his free decision (as 'person'): a tension between what he is simply passively and what he actively posits himself as and wishes to understand himself to be. The 'person' never wholly absorbs its 'nature'. [15]

[363] The metaphysical discussion of this fact can only be briefly indicated here. It presents special difficulty in that it is based upon two interdependent factors which not even a metaphysical anthropology has ever really succeeded in distinguishing in detail in a clear and concrete way.[16] Certainly in one essential respect the dualism of person and nature just indicated has its metaphysical root in the finitude of man; thus ultimately in the distinction between essence and existence, in virtue of which the essence, in its complete unfolding, always [364] remains an ideal capable of being attained only asymptotically by the concretely existent being, even as regards the freedom through which it makes itself what it is. But on the other hand it is equally a matter of course for an anthropology on the basis of Thomist metaphysics, that just as essential an element of the dualism of person and nature, of the resistance of the entity given prior to the free decision counter to the tendency of the free subject totally to dispose of its whole subsistent reality, arises from the materiality of the [15] 'Nature' (objective presence, Vorhandenheit) and ' person' (existence, Existenz) are of course understood here in the context of modern metaphysics and the philosophy of existence. Man is a 'person' in so far as he freely disposes of himself by his decision, possesses his own definitive reality in the act of making a free decision about himself. By 'nature' is meant all that in man which must be given prior to this disposal of himself, as its object and the condition of its possibility, and in so far as this is the case. While these concepts must be distinguished from those which, for instance, are used in expositions of the Trinity and the hypostatic union by the scholastic theology usual in the Church, it must at the same time be emphasized that they cannot be avoided, and that they are not wholly alien to the scholastic tradition. They cannot be avoided, because a clear and handy distinction between that in man which is not open to question and that which he is in virtue of his capacity to dispose of himself, is of fundamental importance; otherwise the free operation is going to look like a sporadically occurring activity of the man in connexion with an object distinct from himself, and this transient operation will then leave the operative subject untouched and at most of significance for him by being imputed to him in a moral-juridical way. Apart from all else, this is already excluded by the onto-logical nature of the spiritual act: the spiritual act (the free decision, above all) is by its very nature reflexive, reflecting back upon the subject; the free act is not simply imputed to the subject, for the latter has from the first determined itself through this act. Further, the pair of concepts mentioned above have their roots in scholastic tradition. For instance, when a distinction is made between peccatum naturae and peccatum personae, the same distinction lies in the background: original sin is a peccatum of 'nature' because it is found prior to the free decision of the individual subject as an element in the space within which (the 'situation') man is first called to make his own 'personal' decision, and with regard to which he must take up a position by comprehending this situation in this way or that.

[16] The scholastic metaphysician knows only too well how heavily burdened the whole of scholastic metaphysics still is today by the question as to how far the concept of materia (in the strictly metaphysical sense of pure potentiality) may not in the last resort simply be the Greek counterpart of the concept of the real finitude of the finite in general, with this difference alone, that just this Greek pre-Christian philosophy had no knowledge of spirit as in itself finite and thus equated materiality and finitude. This does not mean that in our own view all we have here is a confusing duplication of concepts for the same thing. All we wish to point out is the reason why it would lead us much too far away if we set about the final clarification of the question: In what does the metaphysical root of the specifically human dualism of nature and (freely achieved) person consist?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

human being, from the real differentiation of matter and form, which prevents the form from bringing itself fully to manifestation in the 'other' of matter.

Here too is to be found the nucleus of truth in that otherwise too crude distinction between the spirit as the freely operative principle and the sensibility as the principle which resists this free decision. In reality of course the whole 'nature' given prior to freedom offers resistance to the 'person's' free and total disposition of himself, so that the boundary between 'person' and 'nature' stands as it were vertically in regard to the horizontal line which divides spirituality from sensibility in man.

The specifically human form of the distinction between person and nature (as distinguished, for example, from a like dualism which has to be supposed for the angels as well) is explained by the dualism of matter and form in man, regarded as each possessing its own consistency (insichständig); thus in the concrete experience of life this human dualism finds its sharpest expression – no one will contest this – in the resistance of the sensitive to the spiritual part of man.[17]

[365] From what has been said it follows that the spontaneous act of desire (actus indeliberatus) belongs to the 'nature' in the sense indicated by our distinction above. For to the nature (as opposed to the person) belongs everything which must be given prior to the person's free decision, as a condition of its possibility. Now as we have just shown, the spontaneous act of desire, arising from the bare dynamism of nature and directed to a wittingly apprehended object, is one of the metaphysically necessary presuppositions of a concrete free decision made by a finite subject.

It is now possible to arrive by stages at a statement of what is meant by concupiscence in the theological sense. As we have said, the free decision tends to the end that man should dispose of himself as a whole before God, actively make himself into what he freely wishes to be. Thus the end to which the free decision is orientated is that everything which is in man (nature), hence the involuntary act as well, should be the revelation and the expression of what man as person wishes to be; thus that the free decision should comprehend, transfigure and transfuse the spontaneous act, so that its own reality too should no longer be purely natural but personal.

In connexion with this personal entry into and shaping of naturally spontaneous desire, we must not think straight away simply of those spontaneous acts which can be a hindrance to one of man's morally good decisions. Because a spontaneous act precedes every personal act of man, whether it be directed to good or evil, and because in every one of them the person never wholly absorbs and personally assumes what it is on the basis of its spontaneous acts and what is given prior to it, it follows that the dualism of nature and person in its specifically human form, which we call concupiscence, is something which is at work both in the case of [17] This is seen most clearly in the connexion which holds between 'passio' (πάθος) as on the one hand a spontaneous act of nature, concupiscence, and on the other the influence of a cause from without, a being-determined from without, a 'suffering'. In other words, looked at from the point of view of the free person, 'passionateness' and 'passibility' (prior to the personal act) are in themselves the same thing: the accidental qualification of the person by circumstances which are not brought about by the person's own freedom. Both spring from the same metaphysical root, the materiality of the person, which is the condition which makes possible a 'passio' in both senses of the word: the condition which makes it possible for a person to be open to a finite, terrestrial cause which, although it has not instituted the 'patient' itself, can nevertheless act upon it, without the patient's necessarily having had to open itself freely to this action upon it in advance. The problem of Christ's freedom from concupiscence in spite of his passibility is not to be solved by denying or weakening the connexion between the two sorts of pathos; it may only be solved by understanding when and how passio as a suffering caused from without – which in itself (i.e. in actu primo) is always concupiscence as well, because it is an impulse to an action outside the person's free decision – may yet be taken possession of and transfigured by the free decision from within, and in this way does not become concupiscence (in actu secundo). But we shall have to speak of this in another context.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a good decision of man's freedom against the spontaneous desire of nature for a morally negative good, and also in the case of a bad free decision against a natural inclination to something morally good.[18] Both the good and the bad moral decision encounter [366] the resistance, the solidity and the impenetrability of nature. Concupiscence in the theological sense shows itself for instance just as much when a man blushes in the act of lying as when the 'flesh' refuses to follow the willingness of the 'spirit' for the good.

It must further be observed, as we have already indicated above, that the personal penetration of nature in the free decision can in itself be carried out in several ways, when the case in question is one where a decision has to be taken against a spontaneous inclination of nature. First of all it is absolutely speaking neither necessary nor possible that the spontaneous acts should precede the individual free decision in no sense whatever.[19] Such an absolute identity of nature and person, and so of suffered and freely-willed desire, is found only in the absolute freedom of the infinite Being. In the case of exhaustive, ideal dominion of the finite person over its nature, this exhaustiveness[20] can only consist [367] in the fact that the personal decision is wholly and securely achieved as regards the nature. Thus this permanent and (relatively) exhaustive dominion of the 'person' over its 'nature' by no means necessarily implies that no spontaneous act whatever can arise in the field of the nature so subject to personal dominion. All it implies is that no act can take shape in this nature which would be opposed to the personal engagement of the man so endowed. Now it is not the case that every kind of 'passivity' is necessarily a threat to man's actively free personal engagement. Where a graciously bestowed or freely acquired personal attitude of man really succeeds in shaping his whole natural being throughout, even the act passively endured from without must be subject to the inner law of this person in order to be able to arise at all. For wherever an activation encounters a 'patient' which already has its own structure and not an [18] For instance, a man wants to be brave and goes on trembling, although he would like to be so brave that he does not tremble. And this whole process can be in the service of something good or bad, so that for instance the trembling can be an expression of the 'cowardly' nature (i.e. one whose resources of vital self-affirmation are nearer an end) or of the good nature (one which spontaneously reacts against baseness), and the bravery can be a hero's or a rogue's. Someone wants to be cordial to someone else (for good or bad motives), and only succeeds imperfectly (unfortunately or commendably). In a thousand ways like this, always in fact, a bit of the human material of free decision is left over without being refashioned, or (looked at in reverse) a bit of the inclination of the free decision remains without achieving anything, because it becomes stuck fast as it were in the sluggish mass of its natural material in man, in which it tries to realize itself. For this reason (if we confine ourselves to the empirical evidence) it makes no difference whether we say, 'The free principle is of itself too weak to achieve itself wholly in man's nature', or, 'The resistance of the material in which the decision tries to realize itself is too strong for the entire success of this intention.' And in accordance with the statement adopted, one can either say, 'The personal decision does not wholly make its own the potentialities of its material', or 'The free principle does not succeed in overcoming the resistance of its nature-material.'

[19] Most of the theologians cited above put the matter as if the man who is in possession of the gift of integrity only experiences acts of the sensitive appetite when he expressly commands them by a resolution of his spiritual will. This is an exaggeration, which would not only make the psychic life of a man in Paradise into something beyond our conception, but also comes up against the metaphysical principle that the object of a finite freedom must be given to it, while such a givenness is only to be found in virtue of an affection of the conative power, i.e. through its spontaneous act.

[20] This is an exhaustiveness which is and always must be essentially relative in the finite entity, because otherwise neither the phenomenon of repentance nor that of the experience of its free decision as an inner distress and an inner condemnation would be metaphysically explicable. Looked at metaphysically, repentance is only possible where man's immoral free decision has not the power so exhaustively to impress evil upon his being that no starting-point for a new decision remains over from which a fresh redisposition of the elements of the human person could ensue. One's own morally wrong decision can only be experienced as inner distress and condemnation when it does not succeed in removing from one every resistance offered to it by what is given prior to freedom (by the 'nature'). Otherwise man could also be happy by making a heroic and radical profession of evil and by wholly delivering up his being to it (even though he may suffer 'physical' pain at the same time); only the evil man who is too cowardly and weak to be wholly evil would be the unhappy one.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

absolutely empty and undetermined potentiality, the effect of this activation is just as much an expression of the reality of the 'patient' as of the particular character of the impression from without. Thus where the person has a habitual dominion over the entire nature, even the spontaneous act of the appetite, excited from without and 'passively' undergone by the person, is from the first shaped throughout by the personal engagement of the person and so not an act of 'concupiscence' in spite of man's 'passivity' with respect to this act; thus it is unnecessary to suppose that this act should come about on the basis of a 'command' of the freely deciding will. Now it is possible per se to think of various ways in which this habitual dominion of the nature by the person, which becomes the a priori law of the spontaneous natural act itself, works itself out in detail in these acts. Firstly (and this is incorrectly what is alone [368] thought of in the usual theological expositions of integrity) there is the way in which the free decision from the first excludes from man the spontaneous act of desire running in the contrary direction, and either prevents it from emerging at all or wholly suppresses it. But a second possibility is equally conceivable. Here the person does not annul the spontaneous natural act which in the last resort is only apparently contrary to its decision, either because this is impossible or not feasible for other reasons; it wholly assumes this act in a new way into the inner dynamism of its personal attitude, in such a way that finally the act is no longer resistant to the person, an undissolved remainder of nature, but becomes an intrinsic factor in the process which makes available the depths and the dominating force of the personal decision. We may consider, for example, Christ's fear and trembling on the Mount of Olives, which could be endured and experienced (in a truly human, passive way) in spite of the gift of integrity he continued to possess: this fear did not persist in Christ as a remainder, not yet in his power, of a resistance to his personal willingness to suffer and hence as a threat to this personal attitude; it was there in Christ as an intrinsic, necessary factor, wholly within his power, of this personal decision itself.[21] It depends on the particular nature of the spontaneous act of desire to be mastered in each individual case which of these two kinds of integrity is the appropriate one: whether it is one jointly given from the first, or whether it is one achieved only approximately in the course of moral struggle. We cannot go further into this question here.

It is now possible to see what is the essence of desire in the narrowest (theological) sense, the essence of concupiscence. In the concrete man of the present order free personal decision and self-determination are not capable of perfectly and exhaustively determining the operative [369] subject throughout the whole extent of his real being. The free act does indeed dispose of the whole subject, in so far as it is as free act an act of man's personal centre, and so, by the root as it were, draws the whole subject in sympathy with it. And yet man's concrete being is not throughout its whole extent and according to all its powers and their actualization the pure expression and the unambiguous revelation of the personal active centre which is its own master. In the course of its self-determination, the person undergoes the resistance of the nature given prior to freedom, and never wholly succeeds in making all that man is into the reality and the expression of all that he comprehends himself to be in the core of his person. There is much in man which always remains in concrete fact somehow impersonal; impenetrable and unilluminated for his existential decision; merely endured and [21] Bravery 'in spite of' trembling and bravery 'in' trembling, strength against weakness and strength which can be and wants to be victorious precisely in weakness, are not the same thing. This remains true even when it may not be possible to decide in a given case which of the two is present. Weakness is really experienced and endured even in the second case. In the last resort it will be a secret of the God who is Judge whether in a concrete case the continuing weakness of the flesh was yet an intrinsic factor of the decision, integrated into this very decision, or whether this good decision, while undoubtedly present, did not succeed in so comprehending the sluggishness of the weak flesh without simply eliminating it that the sluggishness itself might become part of the victory of the willingness of the spirit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

not freely acted out. It is this dualism between person and nature, in so far as it arises from the dualism of matter and spirit and not from man's finitude, the dualism of essence and existence and the real distinction of his powers given with it, that we call concupiscence in the theological sense. While it does indeed find its concrete experiential expression in a dualism of spirituality and sensibility, it is not identical with the latter. Thus concupiscence does not consist in any conceivable givenness of the spontaneous act prior to the free one[22] nor does it in every case necessarily consist in a capacity of the spontaneous act to be despotically expunged by freedom nor precisely in the fact that the spontaneous act drives towards what is morally impermissible contrary to the direction of the free decision. Concupiscence consists essentially in the fact that man in this regime does not overcome even by his free decision the dualism between what he is as nature prior to his existential decision and what he becomes as person by this decision, not even in the measure in which it would absolutely speaking be conceivable for a finite spirit to overcome it. Man never becomes wholly absorbed either in good or in evil.

2. The Significance of Concupiscence

a. Concupiscence and moral action.

It is clear from what has been said that concupiscence as such in the theological sense is not open to moral qualification in the strict sense. [370] Even in the strict theological sense, therefore, one should not speak of 'evil' or 'disorderly' concupiscence. One may speak in this way with some justification from an ascetico-moral point of view; but then one is regarding concupiscence in the theological sense onesidedly in so far as the resistance of nature to the personal decision does admittedly in certain circumstances work precisely contrary to the morally good free decision. But according to what has been said this is only one aspect of concupiscence; regarded in its full theological sense, concupiscence is just as much capable of working in a positive sense as a resistance of nature to the bad moral decision, by making this less absolute. (Even for a theological anthropology, it may be noted in passing, this is why a merely venial sin[23] is possible in a being at once sensitive and spiritual, and only in it: the resistance of the nature considered as orientated to the good prevents the free decision from reaching that intensity and personal centrality which would be required for a grave sin). Thus in so far as concupiscence (in the theological sense) precedes the free decision, which is alone capable of producing a formally moral quality, and in this theological sense is bivalent in so far as it is capable of taking on a tendency to good as well as to evil, it cannot be characterized as morally evil, let alone as sin, even regarded in itself in this full (adäquat) theological sense. Yet it can of course be called 'evil' in so far as it is only present in man in its concrete existential form in virtue of the Fall of the first man (something which is admittedly beyond experience), and in so far as, on account of its tendency, bivalent in itself,

---

[22] Otherwise free human operation would be purely action and not reaction, and man himself would be pure 'existence'.

[23] Primarily, at least, venial sin 'ex imperfectione actus'. As free, an act always 'originates' from the personal centre: but it is precisely never as simply originating but as having reached completion in the materiality of nature, as originated, that the act is itself. Were this not the case, such an act would be precisely not free or not a merely venial sin (because it is free). A further question (which we shall not pursue here) would be whether in the last resort venial sins 'ex parvitate materiae' may also be reduced to the first type and why this should be so; for unless it has a definite kind of content, the act cannot have even in its formal freedom that intensity which it must have as originated. We shall only note further in passing how surprising it is that this ontology of free acts is only touched on in theology (if it is mentioned at all) when bad acts, sin, are under discussion. Yet the ontological and existential distinction between venial and grave sins must also exist where morally good acts are concerned. There does not even exist a terminology for this situation yet.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to offer resistance, it can [371] on occasion also drive towards what is morally impermissible contrary to man's free decision and thus lead to sin (Denz 792).[24] What follows or does not follow from these conclusions for the question of the experience of concupiscentia (as 'something which ought not to be'), must be left for later discussion, since it is impossible to offer a satisfactory answer without first bringing certain other aspects to view which cannot be taken up yet.

b. In this way we gain some insight into the naturalness of concupiscentia and so into the unexactedness of the gift of integrity. Precisely because concupiscentia in the theological sense is something absolutely bivalent from the ethical point of view, because it can act as a retarding factor both as regards good and as regards evil and because it results from man's metaphysical nature as a material essence, the absence of it in men cannot be conceived of as intrinsically possible in purely natural terms, and still less can one assert a claim to this absence as something owed to man. Any idea of this kind becomes empty the moment it is seen that the absence of concupiscentia considered as an impulse to evil would also mean eo ipso the cessation of a retarding factor contrary to man's free decision to choose evil; in other words, it would make man into a kind of being concerning whose intrinsic possibility it is impossible to make any assertion in natural terms.

c. If we are to gain a better understanding of the nature of concupiscentia a few remarks on the gift of integrity will be in place here. From what has been said it appears that the gift of integrity, as it is ascribed to the first man before the Fall by the sources of Revelation, cannot lie in the absence of desire in the broad or in the narrower sense, but only in a freedom from desire in the narrowest and theological [372] sense, a freedom from concupiscence. But it also follows at once from our analyses of the nature of concupiscence that the 'freedom' in question here is not so much a freedom from something as a freedom for something. A man who possesses the gift of integrity is no less 'sensitive', he is no more 'spiritual' in a Neoplatonic rather than a Christian sense, involving the lack of an intense vitality.[25] Rather he is free really to dispose of himself through a personal decision in so sovereign a way that within the area of his being there is no longer anything to resist this sovereign self-determination by a sort of passive sluggishness. If we conceive of concupiscentia as a bivalent property of man, it also follows that integrity was not bestowed on the first man purely and primarily to facilitate his decision as head of humanity for or against God, by removing dangers and impulses to evil; rather it was given to him in the first place in order that his free decision, even when it went out to the good, could acquire the exhaustive existential impetus of a self-determination which a man could never have without the gift of integrity. For even where the case is not precisely one of the resistance of a spontaneous act to a morally good decision, the essence of concupiscentia as we conceive it is such that it prevents man's personal decision from achieving total and definitive mastery over his nature

[24] In so far as concupiscentia is to be subsumed under the 'deterioration in body and soul' due to original sin (Denz 788), this must be measured, as is quite generally taught today, by man's state in Paradise, and not by the state of some pure 'nature' possible in itself and what this nature 'ought' to be. But since this real term of comparison is not a datum of our experience, this 'deterioration', this 'corruption' is not an object of experience either, of the experience, that is, which man can test empirically for himself, purely by reference to his nature (in the theological sense). We shall have to discuss in its own right the question whether this excludes the experience of every kind of way in which concupiscentia is 'something which ought not to be'.

[25] This is already emphasized for instance by St Bonaventure (in II Sent., dist. 9, a. 3, q. I) and St Thomas (Ia: 98:2 ad 3). But for true vitality it is also required that involuntary impressions from without can be genuinely 'experienced' and 'undergone'. As has already been said above, this shows that statements like that of Pesch (loc. cit., n. 190), 'nullos potuisse in iis oriri motus appetitus sensibilis independenter ab imperio voluntatis', are false and do not follow from the essence of integrity.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

on account of the inertia of the nature contrary to that decision. Hence integrity was given to Adam not so much for the sake of avoiding a greater danger of sin, as for making possible an exhaustive engagement of his being in a personal decision directed to the good. Indeed it might be said that Adam's state in Paradise was in a certain sense 'more dangerous' than our present state. For the gift of integrity, which was intended to make him capable of overcoming the dualism of nature and person (so far as this is possible at all in a finite entity) in the direction of a good decision, also implied for the morally bad decision which Adam in fact made, an existential impetus of which we in our present order of things are not normally capable with regard to evil either. In fact, though we shall not attempt it here, if one were [373] to try to explain in the terms of a theological and metaphysical anthropology the possibility of repentance for Adam (as opposed to the absence of such a possibility in the free decision of the angels), in the last resort one would only be able to do this by insisting that integrity was for Adam a preternatural gift, and that its loss[26] as a consequence of the loss of sanctifying grace in general, was only possible for this reason. But this loss of integrity once more releases the nature in respect of the personal decision, so that it is not wholly assumed by this decision and in this way repentance (purely as a psychological and personal phenomenon) is once more made possible. This is not to deny that concupiscentia produces a specifically new possibility of sin, namely that of sins of weakness in the strict sense, which are to be found where man finally gives way to the persistent inclination of his nature against a freely adopted attitude which had originally been a better one, and in a subsequent free modification of his attitude sets the centre of his being as it were in that region of it which is actualized in the spontaneous impulse of his nature at that moment. Such a modification of a freely adopted attitude by yielding to a dynamism of nature which is precisely there already and actively persists, cannot of course be found in a man who possesses the gift of integrity.

It has already been said that every free human decision tends of itself to dispose totally of the subject as a whole. If this is true it also follows that in spite of its unexactedness the gift of integrity perfects human nature in a direction in which man as a personal being is already turned. For integrity is in fact what makes possible the exhaustive realization of the tendency associated with every free decision: the tendency of the person totally to dispose of himself before God. Without the gift of integrity this tendency, which is undoubtedly proper to every free decision, will find expression in greater or less degree according to the circumstances. To this extent it is the goal of all moral growth that [374] man should increasingly bring the whole of himself into play in a morally good decision, in Biblical terms increasingly love God from his whole heart and with all his strength. The gift of integrity, we may say, made it possible for man from the first really to do from his whole heart and with all his strength what he wished to do, and none of his powers could refuse to follow this will, wholly or in part. Thus it also becomes clear that in a certain respect the goal of Christian moral maturity consists in a return to Adam's state in Paradise, not certainly in the sense of a return to some possibility still prior to moral decision, but as to a goal which is itself already the fruit and prize of moral concern. In this sense it may be allowed that the ascetic strives for the blessed α)πα&θεια possessed by Adam in Paradise, as the Greek Fathers often say. But the perfect Christian possesses it otherwise than Adam did. In Adam the person's freedom to dispose of the nature made it possible for him exhaustively to engage his nature both in a good and in an evil direction. The blessed freedom of disposal possessed by the perfect Christian, the saint, is the freedom of a man who has succeeded in surrendering his whole being and his whole [26] This loss is insufficiently explained in terms of sin as such, for the angel who has sinned retains the metaphysical essence of his integrity (the relative identity of 'nature' and 'person') even after his sin. Thus he is 'impenitent' precisely because he was in a position exhaustively to shape his entire nature through his personal decision; hence too no remainder is left over in him, either psychologically or ontologically, which might have escaped this personal decision and from which the reshaping of the person could begin.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

life to God totally.

German mysticism often named as its ideal the man 'of the heart' (innig), the 'collected' (gesammelt) man, the man, that is, whose whole activity is an exhaustive expression of his innermost centre and his innermost vital decision, and who therefore remains 'collected' in this innermost centre without being dispersed in anything alien to this decision. The fact that man never wholly possesses this collected heartfelt inwardness of his whole life in the ultimate deed of his inmost being is what is really meant by concupiscentia in the theological sense, the index of his finitude and his terrestriality (his sensitive and spiritual essence). This inner division of man is often indeed the occasion of his ruin, but – who knows – perhaps still more often the occasion of his salvation, because it also prevents him from being utterly evil.

3. Concupiscence in the present order of Salvation

But we have not yet exhausted our subject. The whole movement of thought in what has so far been said, has been directed towards determining the character of concupiscentia in its relationship to nature as such. If we say 'nature' here, the word is no longer meant [375] in the sense in which we have frequently used it in the course of this study, as something opposed to person (and vice versa). 'Nature' here is intended, in the usual theological sense, in distinction to the 'supernatural', that is to say as that essential content of an entity both spiritual and sensitive called man, which inamissibly persists through sin and righteousness, grace and alienation from God, and in regard to which the possession of the Holy Spirit, adoptive sonship, justification, etc., are to be characterized as an unexacted gift, as 'supernatural' grace, even prior to any question of the forgiveness of sin. What we have so far said in regard to this 'nature' is that concupiscentia is the inertia and impenetrability, in itself bivalent, of that 'nature' (in the earlier sense) which precedes the person's free decision, which inertia does not permit the person as freedom totally to integrate this 'nature' into his deeds. This impossibility, we have said, is bivalent, i.e. we have here a retarding factor in respect of both good and evil free actions in like manner, and hence may not simply be qualified without further consideration as 'evil', 'disordered' concupiscentia; it may therefore very well be conceived of conversely as a property arising from the nature of the spiritual-material and finite creature; thus further it cannot be experienced on that account as 'something which ought not to be', as 'shameful', as something which could only arise from a primordial moral catastrophe: on the contrary, this should be the starting-point of an attempt to elucidate the preternatural unexactedness of integrity.

But have we not thus 'taken the sting out of' concupiscentia? Can we, starting from this position, go on to gain some understanding of the Pauline experience, 'Unhappy man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death?' Can we still do justice to Augustine, whose view of man, derived from his daily experience of concupiscentia and death precisely, was such that for him man could only be the creature either of a Manichean primordial principle of evil or of original sin, his primal constitution being perverted in its very depths by the sin of the first man? Is the opinion of the Reformers or of a Pascal (leaving aside the doctrine of the great scholastics for the moment) simply false in every respect when they held that man, driven as he is by his passions, could not have proceeded 'like this' from the hand of his Creator? Is not the teaching of Pius V, that concupiscentia (and death) can be found even in a sinless 'pure nature' (a teaching which our whole concern so far has served to justify), unchristian and naive as [376] well in view of these testimonies to the meaning of Christian existence? On the other hand we may attempt to explain this concrete experience of concupiscentia in two different ways. We may ask whether it is not already exactly rendered by saying that even in our interpretation it precisely constitutes a threat to moral equilibrium,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a danger of sin, however true it may be that it results naturally from man's essence. Or we may say that this lived awareness of concupiscentia as such is confused with the experience of real – but precisely personal – sinfulness,[27] and that this confusion is the cause of the doctrine of 'evil' cupidity and of a sinfulness which already adheres to man on its account alone.

If we want a clearer view of this question we must start from a position which has been established on a somewhat firmer basis elsewhere in these studies.[28] Even the man who has not been justified and inwardly sanctified by God's grace is not, in the present order, in such a way identical with a man in the 'status naturae purae' that he differs from him only in virtue of an external decree of God, in accordance with which he ought to have grace. The ordination which obliges him to a supernatural end consists (even when he is not 'in a state of grace') not just in a purely juridical obligation; as 'ens iuridicum' this would rest in reality on the reality of the divine will alone, and hence could only enter into awareness or experience in virtue of a communication by God in the word, since purely moral or juridical entities cannot present themselves to consciousness in virtue of their own reality. It is far preferable to think of the ordination to a supernatural end, which is binding on all men in the present order of reality and salvation, as a real ontological existential of man, which qualifies him really and intrinsically. Further, in the present order man is subject to the dynamism of God's saving grace, at least at those 'moments' at [377] which he is made capable by supernatural prevenient grace of performing a salutary act in the appropriate circumstances. There is nothing further in principle to prevent us from thinking of this offer as less 'intermittent'; rather we may conceive of the situation in such a way that free, unexacted grace, which elevates and makes possible supernatural salutary acts, is always given. Thus the proximate possibility of a salutary act is not constituted by an elevating grace offered precisely at a 'now' (but not 'then') but by other terrestrial circumstances (subject of course to God's supernatural providence), which precisely now make the salutary act for man into a possibility capable of immediate actualization while at another time they exclude just this possibility. In any case the conception of the unexactedness of grace by no means includes the idea that grace should be offered only now and then in a sporadic way.

Let us then presuppose this, and add to it a second presupposition, which we have no intention of providing grounds for here but which is obviously above suspicion theologically. This is the possibility that these supernatural existentials, which we have at the very least shown to be conceivable, also enter into consciousness. The fact of being a datum for consciousness does not imply that the existential concerned is capable of being reflexively apprehended or indeed is apprehended as supernatural. Nor need it imply that the existential concerned is capable at least of being reflexively distinguished from other data of consciousness. Now the Thomist school says that two spiritual acts which are essentially distinct ontologically must necessarily possess two specifically distinct formal objects, and these acts thus differ from each other even consciously; in our view what is being said is absolutely valid, and we can simply appeal to this doctrine in our present context. There is no difficulty at all in understanding the doctrine in such a way that it does not imply those ideas of consciousness which we are content to reject or leave open as not intended here. Now it is [27] As a matter of fact the theological interpretation of the experience of concupiscentia would have to give more consideration than it usually does to the fact that in the concrete, man can never have a reflexive experience, which can be theologically interpreted purely as reflexive, of his essence as given prior to freedom and of pure concupiscentia in isolation. For in every reflexive act he already becomes aware of himself as someone who has freely chosen, which means that he is capable neither of assessing with absolute precision this 'option fondamentale' which he has already taken, nor of separating it with complete purity from his nature and from pure concupiscentia in those properties they possess prior to the free decision.

[28] Cf. pp. 302 s., above.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

certainly the case that something can be given as existing in consciousness in an a priori way, modifying the totality of what is objectively present to consciousness with a contour which marks it off from other objects of the kind. The objection made against the Thomist doctrine in this matter, that one would 'notice' something like this but in fact one 'notices' nothing, is childishly primitive (particularly in an age of depth psychology, etc., from which it is easy to learn that givenness in consciousness and reflexive, or potentially reflexive, objectivity for [378] consciousness are precisely not the same thing). We are thus quite free to suppose that the above-mentioned existentials also help to structure man's spiritually conscious existence, even if this does not take place in the manner in which objects of consciousness do it which are apprehended as supernatural and reflexively demarcated from others. Unexpressed impulses, basic dispositions and attitudes, which escape total clarification by reflexion, are of more comprehensive significance for the totality of our spiritual life in certain circumstances than what is objectively recognized and expressed. A conscious logic, for example, holds sway in man's mind even when he has never spent a moment's thought on logic. It is of no importance in this connexion that this logic can at least subsequently be presented formally in terms of a reflexive objectivity.

Let us then suppose that even in his conscious spiritual life, on account of the real ontological supernatural existential of his ordination to a supernatural end and on account of the grace which is offered to him even prior to his knowledge of it through verbal revelation, man is other than he would be if he were to find himself in a state of pure nature. What form should the experience of concupiscentia (and of subjection to death) take if it arises concretely in this man and is not merely related to the 'pure nature' in this man, which is what has been done so far in our study? Even in this case concupiscentia still has that ontological and ethical bivalency which we have been claiming for it. But must it for that reason be experienced as a harmless phenomenon, which can hardly be separated in thought from man's 'nature'? Related to the nature of man this must be the case. But related to this concrete man? This would still necessarily be the case if, but only if, concupiscentia and death had absolutely no contradictory relation to those conscious supernatural existentials of which we have spoken, if they are both in relationship to each other absolutely disparate quantities. But this is not the case, although it is assumed almost involuntarily in most of the theology available nowadays. The paradisal gifts of integrity and (conditional) immortality were by no means simply externally attached ones, which happened to be included, in a purely additive way, along with the grace of sanctification and justification, as another piece of paradisal equipment. Rather they are gifts which flow connaturally from the grace of justification, as it were the reflexion and the manifestation of this divine life in the dimension of man's corporeality. The fact that someone can acquire [379] the grace of justification without recovering these gifts, does not prove the absence of this close connexion in reality between pneuma and the preternatural gifts of integrity and immortality in the primordial state. If the justified still suffer death and concupiscentia, this is not due to the fact that the grace of justification is intrinsically indifferent in regard to them and that integrity and exemption from death in Paradise were merely externally complementary gifts. It is due to the fact that on the one hand grace has as it were a longer time to run now, until it has achieved the complete transformation of the whole nature (a connatural prolongation of a real ontological principle by no means implies that it must always necessarily be given at exactly the same moment of time as the latter); and on the other hand to the fact that the mystery of the grace of Christ, the Crucified, consists precisely in this, that Christ has made what of itself is contrary to the divine life of grace into the manifestation and the weapon of the victory of this grace. But if this is the case, there is no difficulty in seeing that the man with conscious supernatural existentials can by no means 'so' experience death and concupiscentia as the man in pure nature would. The latter can only experience them as not indeed

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

pleasurable, but all the same unavoidable, consequences of the finitude of this nature, as (although not 'something which ought to be', yet) 'something which has to be' in his nature. But the former is entirely capable of feeling them as something alien to his being which ought not to be, not indeed in relation to his pure nature as such, but in relation to his concrete existence, to which the supernatural existentials belong. To such a man death and concupiscentia can appear very 'unnatural', although they are – natural. Of himself alone man cannot indeed interpret this 'unnaturalness' in its ultimate meaning. Of himself he can neither say that death and concupiscentia are a penalty following upon the loss of a sanctifying grace (i.e. he cannot, on the basis of the 'unnaturalness' of death and concupiscentia, recognize original sin as our state of guilt), nor can he of himself know that these oppressive forces of his being can constitute a participation in Christ's redemptive death through his grace. But none of this is an obstacle to the existence of a real ontological discrepancy, entering into consciousness, between death and concupiscentia on the one hand and the nature elevated by supernatural grace on the other, a nature which is still of this kind even when it is not justified by this grace. We may go a step further. If and in so far as the experience of concupiscentia (and of death) must [380] be conceived of as an intrinsic element in these realities themselves[29], we are wholly entitled to say that this concupiscentia which we experience, and (or) this experience which we have and call concupiscentia, is quite incapable of existing, in the concrete form in which it is given, in a state of pure nature. This is in no way contrary to the teaching of Pius V against Baius; for when we find it said there, 'potuisset ab initio talem creare hominem, qualis nunc nascitur' (cf. Denz 1055), this clearly does not mean that God could so create man without his guilt (ab initio) that be should be deprived of justifying grace and integrity (qualis nunc nascitur), and at the same time demand this grace of him (for then he would precisely be in original sin). The same state in man, which materially can be entirely alike in two instances (and to this extent can be present in two wholly different subjects, i.e. on account of, and without, guilt), can yet be entirely different formally, according to the difference of the subjects in which it is found. We may grant then that concupiscentia itself differs formally, though not in its barely material content, according as it is found either in a man belonging to an order of pure nature, or in a man who has been given a supernatural end; we may grant too that it is compulsorily experienced in this diversity, and that this diversity and the experience of it is an intrinsic element in concrete concupiscentia itself as such. Then we can say quite calmly that this concupiscentia is only possible in someone subject to original sin, and that he experiences it, already as such, as something in contradiction with what he ought to be 'authentically', even if this 'authentic' something is not his 'nature' but his supernatural and yet undeniable determination. Anyone who reduces man's fear of death simply to a biological instinct of self-preservation (which of course ceases at the moment of real death), anyone who conceives of concupiscentia as a mere threat to the moral person through an instinctive life not yet morally impregnated (but in itself bivalent), will not do justice to the phenomenon as it really is. At all events he cannot say that such an interpretation follows with logical necessity from the fact that death and concupiscentia are natural consequences arising out of man's nature.

It may be objected that our thesis concerning the givenness in [381] experience of concupiscentia as something which ought not to be (von dem erfahrbaren Nichtseinsollen von Konkupiszenz) rests by our own admission on a series of presuppositions, which may indeed be conceivable, but have not been proved, i.e. on the existence and givenness in consciousness of the supernatural existentials of which we have spoken. To this we answer first of all that it by no means follows from the fact that we have not proved these [29] This is immediately obvious for concupiscentia – just as there is no 'pain' without consciousness. We shall not here go further into the reason why this holds good of death too (the question is of course more difficult).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

presuppositions here, that they cannot be demonstrated in themselves. They are only introduced by way of hypothesis here because to justify them here would mean going far beyond the limits of the present discussion of concupiscentia. But the following considerations seem to us decisive. In the order of realities our presuppositions really are – presuppositions. The reverse may be the case in the order of knowledge. That is to say: the experience of humanity, the analytics which considers it in the course of its history with respect to its own condition, finds no difficulty in showing that in concrete fact man does not conceive of concupiscentia as something self-explanatory, but as something which ought not to be, which causes perplexity and which forces one to ask how it can be explained, if man is the work of a God who cannot create anything contradictory. It is irrelevant here whether each and every man finds his way to this experience for himself or whether it first reaches clear consciousness at the summits of human self-comprehension in the history of the spirit. It has always been the case that man only learns slowly and arduously to know who he is and all that is in him. When and where man is present to himself with the utmost clarity (and it is a rationalistic, unhistorical superstition, not a postulate of a rational metaphysical anthropology, to suppose that he must be capable of this at any moment he chooses), he may not know why and how he finds himself to be like this; but he can notice the fact that he does not feel in order. And if an Augustine[30] and later the great scholastics too[31] were thoroughly convinced that the present [382] constitution of man with his concupiscentia and subjection to death could not be intelligibly interpreted except on the presupposition of a primordial Fall, i.e. if they felt that concupiscentia and death were very 'unnatural' and needed explanation (and this is the presupposition of the first affirmation); then it is possible that they were in the right, even if not every simple soul can verify this at every moment. It is also irrelevant what degree of certainty – greater or less – individual thinkers have allotted to this conclusion regarding a primordial fall (which is not the same thing as a conclusion to an hereditary sin), and also how they attempted to justify in more detail this 'unnaturalness' of concupiscentia and elucidate it rationally. The fact that they felt it to be unnatural is sufficient here. If today we possess in a still clearer form than even medieval theology a concept of pure nature and of the naturalness of concupiscentia, then we today are bound to explain the experience of the contradictoriness of concupiscentia in a somewhat different way and at any rate with more theological nuance; but nothing compels us to abandon this experience itself as false or exaggerated. It is not only the experience of something which objectively ought not to be, in so far as its object arises in objective fact from the primordial transgression; just this character, that it ought not to be, as such, is itself – however obscure and enigmatic it may still be – an element in the object of the experience as such.

Concupiscentia, and death too, is not just the manifestation of sin, in Christ's order it is not just what is left over in the justified, something to be overcome eschatologically because it is in contradiction with human nature in this concrete order; it is also the form in which the Christian experiences Christ's sufferings and suffers them himself to the end. But of this we shall say no more here.

[30] Cf., e.g., Contra Julianum VI, 21 s. (PL XLIV, 863 s.); further DTC XII, col. 374, 377, 390 S.; C. Boyer, 'Dieu pouvait-il créer l'homme dans l'état d'ignorance et de difficulté?', Gregorianum XI (1930), pp. 32-57 J. de Montcheuil, 'L'hypothèse de l'état d'ignorance et de difficulté d'après le De libero arbitrio de s. Augustin', RSR XXIII (1933), pp. 197-221.

[31] Cf. for Anselm, DTC XII, col. 435; for Alexander of Hales, DTC XII, col. 459; for Bonaventure, DTC XII, col. 463 s.; for Aquinas, Summa contra Gentiles IV, c. 52.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[1]

MEMBERSHIP OF THE CHURCH ACCORDING TO THE TEACHING OF PIUS XII's ENCYCLICAL 'MYSTICI CORPORIS CHRISTI'

The repercussions which Pius XII's Encyclical 'Mystici Corporis Christi' (29th June 1943) has had in certain quarters, induces us to pose the following questions: Who, according to the teaching laid down in this Encyclical, belong to the Church as members in the fullest sense and who do not belong to it in this sense? What follows, or what does not necessarily follow with regard to justification, state of grace and union with Christ, from this kind of non-membership of the Church? Finally, what insights into the nature of the Church itself result from this teaching about membership and non-membership of the Church?

This is a relatively restricted subject compared with the burning questions of present-day Ecclesiology. Indeed it becomes even more confined by basing our investigations exclusively (in as far as this is practicable) on the aforesaid Encyclical.[1]

[2] Yet it is an important, as well as difficult, question. Important and difficult, first of all because the particular doctrine of this Encyclical which is the subject of our present considerations, has given rise to the opinion that the teaching authority has come to positively new decisions on this matter, and that these are of such a nature as to be offensive to non-Catholics and detrimental to the efforts towards Union. If this were true, and if the gulf between Catholics and non-Catholics had indeed widened as a result of these particular authoritative pronouncements, then this would of course be very sad and most regrettable (humanly speaking) in an age of a new awakening of love for the Una Sancta. Hence this question of the membership of the Church is not simply a matter for subtle treatment by the Canonists, but a vital question for all those who love the Church of Christ and who own themselves in duty bound by our Lord's will that all be one. This is precisely why we must know dispassionately and objectively to what extent all Christians are in reality already one in Christ and in the Church (in spite of outward appearances which would point rather to a separation between Christians), and to what extent these same Christians are actually separated from one another (although their yearning for unity and their mutual love might make them believe that they are more or less united already).

The subject under discussion is important, furthermore, as an instance of the work of the theologian. For it must be stressed most emphatically from the outset that a great deal in our problem is still unclarified and obscure. If we wish to proceed as true theologians in this matter, then we will have to take the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church as our starting-

[1] The following should serve as a select bibliography of the most recent literature on this question: J. Beumer, 'Die kirchliche Gliedschaft in der Lehre des hl. Robert Bellarmin', Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII (1948), pp. 243-257; J. Gribimont, 'Du sacrernent de l'Eglise et de ses réalisations imparfaites', Irénikon XXII (1949), pp. 345-367; C. Lialine, 'Une étape en ecclésiologie', Irénikon XIX (1946), pp. 129-152; pp. 283-317; XX (1947), pp. 34-54; L. Malevez, 'Quelques enseignements de l'encyclique "Mystici Corporis", NRT LXXVII (1945), pp. 385-407; A. Chavasse, 'Ordonnés au corps mystique', NRT LXXX (1948), pp. 690-702; V. Morel, 'Le corps mystique du Christ et l'Eglise catholique romaine', NRT LXXX (1948), pp. 703-726; A. Liege, 'L'appartenance à l'Eglise et l'encyclique "Mystici corporis", RSPT XXXII (1948), pp. 351-357; J. Brinktrine, 'Was lehrt die Enzyklika "Mystici Corporis" üiber die Zugehörigkeit zur Kirche?', Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII (1947-48), pp. 290-300; L. Valpertz, 'Kirchliche Mitgliedschaft und Nichtkatholiken nach der Enzyklika Mystici Corporis', Theologie und Glaube (= Th. und Seelsorge) (1944), pp. 43-46; E. Brunet, 'Les dissidents de bonne foi sont-ils membres de l'eglise?', Analecta Gregoriana LVIII (Rome 1954), pp. 199-218.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation point (for these are the beginning and end of all theology),[2] instead of starting with some impressive and lucid, [3] but ultimately uncompelling and subjective speculation. But the employment of this theological method will immediately bring to light a fact which is fairly familiar to the theologian, but which never ceases to puzzle the layman (and how many 'theologians' are really 'laymen'). We refer to the fact that the magisterium of the Church, supported by Tradition, simply lays down this or that particular point about a certain question, without it being at once apparent how all these individual pronouncements are to be logically combined into one systematic framework. Indeed the very attempt at logical systematization not only encounters grave difficulties, but perhaps has still to achieve any real success in theology. Thus it is a fact that there still remain important tasks for the theologian, which are of consequence even beyond the special province of the theologian as such.

Finally, our subject is important too for Ecclesiology in general. It is true, as will be seen in the course of our considerations, that any question about the membership of the Church necessarily and rightly presupposes a certain knowledge of the nature of the Church. For only in that way can it be logically determined who belongs to the Church and who does not. Yet, on the other hand, the ecclesiastical teaching authority has made pronouncements on the question of membership of the Church. Hence it is in turn possible to collect certain evidence about the nature of the Church from the positive elements of these pronouncements, which it might be impossible to find otherwise – at least as clearly. In other words, from a purely logical point of view, our question would follow on from our knowledge about the nature of the Church; but for the theologian, who works from the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church, this question is in its turn also a source of a deeper understanding of the nature of the Church. We see the fundamental importance of our subject precisely in this: that it forces us to develop a deeper-going theology of the Church as a whole.

From what has been said so far, we can already distinguish three questions within the subject under discussion:

I. What does the Encyclical say about the conditions for membership of the Church?

II. What does it say about the possibility of union with Christ through grace for those who, in the sense of the reply to our first question, are not members of the Church?

III With regard to the Church's nature itself what further facts, [4] and what indications for further lines of inquiry can be gathered from the answer to the first two questions?

I

We will inquire first of all, then, as to what conditions must be fulfilled in a person so that he may be called a member of the Church. In formulating a question such as this, we are clearly conscious of the fact that neither the notion of the Church nor the notion of membership of the Church is of itself an unequivocally or clearly defined quantity in the minds of ordinary people today or, for that matter, in theology itself. To begin with, it can be seen without much difficulty that the concept of membership is not of itself clearly

[2] But not the 'end' in the sense that theology has, in spite of this, no other task in the last analysis than to defend and comment on the present (and earlier) clear and explicit doctrinal pronouncements of the magisterium of the Church. In other words, we do not mean that the theologian can engage only in a 'Denzinger-theology' – which is unfortunately often precisely all he does. But the 'end' must be understood here in the sense that the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church are not only the starting-point, but also the abiding norm of all dogmatic theology. Whenever theology, sustained by faith and the desire for salvation, does moreover not forget its existential source and aim, then it will also continually serve the teaching authority itself, and it will then ultimately be possible to include it, with its newly gained insights, in the very teaching of that authority.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

determined. From the mere general conception of the union of an individual with a community, it is already possible to conceive a priori of many different closer or looser ways in which a person may be united with the Church. It goes without saying that the conditions of such closer or looser union of an individual with the Church would be quite different in each case. As it would, however, be completely contrary to the correct theological procedure to construct or even lay down in terminology any special a-priori notion of membership of the Church, the only method left open to us in this matter is as follows: We must first of all simply accept, on the Church's teaching authority, who belong as members to the Church and what conditions must be fulfilled in them to constitute such membership. Only in this way can we determine, not only how we must deal with this whole subject objectively, but also what is the Church's own notion of (i.e. this notion as defined in its very terminology by the magisterium of the Church). The same necessary method as follows from the notion of membership of the Church results also from the problematic notion of the Church itself. Here again it cannot be a question of arbitrarily adopting some notion of 'Church' and of then determining logically, in accordance with this notion, who belongs to the Church and who does not. For otherwise we could run the risk of making the full and adequate content of the notion of the Church consist in some merely partial aspect of what is, in reality, her complete nature. If this were to happen, we would deviate in doctrine or at least in terminology from the teaching of the Church, neither of which is permissible; at the very least, the teaching of the Church would be obscured or disfigured. [5] Hence our method must simply be to start with the Church's doctrinal pronouncements about the conditions of her membership. Here and now, we must simply state the definition of the authoritatively taught notion of the Church, at least as found in present-day ecclesiastical usage. For clearly we cannot treat exhaustively of this notion in these investigations and particularly not at this point. According to the teaching of the Church and the usage adopted by her (and binding also on us), the 'Church' means the Roman Catholic Church, which knows itself to be founded by Christ, even as an external, visibly organized society with the Bishop of Rome at its head, and which as such declares itself to be basically necessary for salvation. That this is the language of the Encyclical needs no special proof for anyone who has read it even once attentively. We do not mean to deny by this that the word 'Church' could of itself have also a wider sense; indeed the history of the proclamation of the Faith, and of Theology, shows that it has in fact had this wider sense as well.[3] Yet the Church is not just the infallible herald of the truths of the Faith; in other words, she does not merely announce the saving realities without error, but has also, [6] for this very purpose, the right to determine usage concerning words and concepts which are employed in this declaration of truth. And therefore, she also has the right

[3] A proper history of Ecclesiology has not yet been written. Such a history would not only need to have as adequate a grasp as possible, and make as complete a collection as possible, of what has been said about the Church in each period, and by the different Fathers – but would also have to give its particular attention to what was uppermost in the Church's consciousness during the different periods. We may mention the following among more recent works: the whole patristic literature as listed by B. Altaner, Patrology (Edinburgh-London 1960), pp. 32 sq.; J. Cl. Fenton, 'Scholastic Definitions of the Catholic Church', American Ecclesiastical Review CXI (1944), pp. 59-69; pp. 131-145; pp. 212-228. M. Ramsauer, 'Die Kirche in den Katechismen', ZKT LXXIII (1951), pp. 129-169; pp. 313-346. A. Mayer-Pfannholz, 'Der Wandel des Kirchenbildes in der Geschichte', Theologie and Glaube XXXIII (1941), pp. 22-34; id., 'Das Bild der Mater Ecclesia im Wandel der Geschichte', Pastor Bonus LIII (1942), pp. 33-47. S. Tromp, Corpus Christi, quod est Ecclesia I (Rome 1937). J. Beumer, 'Die altchristliche Lehre einer präexistenten Kirche und ihre theologische Auswertung', Wissenschaft und Weisheit IX (1942), pp. 19-32; id., 'Die Idee einer vorchristlichen Kirche bei Augustinus', Münchner theol. Zeitschrift III (1952), pp. 161-175; Y. Congar, Ecclesia ab Abel; Festschrift für Karl Adam (Düsseldorf 1952), pp. 79-108; H. de Lubac, Catholicism (London, 1950); A. Mitterer, Geheimnisvoller Leib Christi nach St Thomas von Aquin und nech Papst Pius XII (Vienna 1950); Th. Strotmann, 'Les membres de l'Eglise', Irénikon XXV (1952), pp. 249-262. H. Felderer, 'Der Kirchenbegriff in den Flugschriften des josefinischen Jahrzehnts', ZKT LXXV (1953), pp. 257-330.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation to say what she wishes to be understood at the present time by the word 'Church', and to demand that theologians keep to this linguistic usage in order to avoid misunderstandings and errors. Thus, when we ask in this sense what are the conditions for belonging as members to the Church, then we inquire, in accordance with the terminology of Mystici Corporis, after the conditions of membership of the Roman Catholic Church, understood as the visibly organized society of believers under the government of the Roman Pontiff. And so, in order to have a proper appreciation of the exact meaning and scope of the teaching of the Encyclical, we must first of all treat of the Church's previous teaching about membership of the Church, and then ask ourselves, secondly, what the Encyclical itself tells us about it.

1. The Church's previous teaching on the conditions of membership of the Church

As already indicated, we are here concerned with the conditions of membership of the visible Roman Catholic Church. This visible character of the Church has, according to her own teaching, itself several dimensions. The Church's teaching[4] itself distinguishes two powers in the Church as a visible society, which constitute it as a 'societas perfecta': viz. the potestas iurisdictionis (under which we may subsume, at least in this present context, the absolute power of enacting binding decisions regarding Faith and Morals),[5] and the potestas ordinis. [7] These two powers are together the basis of the visible nature and visible unity of the Church, since authority is the source of the unity, community and consequent visibleness of a societas perfecta. These two powers cannot be regarded as two sides of one and the same thing which must always run parallel to each other. It is for instance possible, on the one hand, to have a 'power of jurisdiction' without there being a 'power of orders' (even when it is a power of jurisdiction by divine law, as e.g. that of a legitimately elected Pope, who has however not yet been consecrated Bishop; cf. CIC can. 219); and, on the other hand, there can be cases of a 'power of orders' without a 'power of jurisdiction', and this even in someone who is outside the Church. For the Church's doctrine regarding the validity of the sacraments, as brought out in the third century controversy about baptism by heretics, as well as in her fight against Donatism, shows that even outside the Church – for this was precisely the point at issue – there can be valid administration of the Sacraments and hence a 'power of orders'. Nevertheless, contrary to what might be expected, one must not conclude from this same doctrine that the power of orders can be looked upon as of no account for the constitution of the visible nature of the Church, simply because in certain circumstances this power can be exercised also outside the Church. For the important point to remember in this connection is that baptism is an act of sacramental and not, in itself, of jurisdictional power. Now, the very doctrine under discussion regards baptism basically as the act by which a person becomes a member of the Church, given the various other prerequisite conditions; and it is here quite obviously a question of the membership of the Church considered as a visible, and indeed jurisdictional body. For the Church regards every baptized person as fundamentally under her jurisdiction and obliged by her Canon Law (CIC can. 87). All this

[4] Cf. e.g. CIC can. 196; 210; 872; 948.

[5] We do not mean to decide by this the controverted question as to whether the powers of teaching, ruling and sanctifying are three specifically distinct powers, or whether there are in fact only two basic powers. The first alternative is the opinion of the majority of ecclesiologists, who explain that the first two of these powers (viz..the powers of teaching and of ruling) are only more closely associated with each other on account of the nonsacramental manner of their transmission; in this way (i.e. as power of jurisdiction – power transmitted in a legal manner) they are more clearly distinguished from the third power than from each other. The other alternative is the opinion of the majority of canonists. For the whole controversy cf. the bibliography in M. Nicholau-J. Salaverri, Sacrae Theologiae Summa I^2 (Madrid 1952), pp. 933-952; J. Salaverri, 'La triple potestad de la Iglesia', Miscellanea Comillas XIV (1950), pp. 5-84.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation makes it quite clear that both the jurisdictional and the sacramental powers of the Church are required as constitutive elements of her visible character. Therefore, when we speak of the membership of the Church in future, we must be understood to refer to membership of the Church under both these aspects, since the Church herself when dealing with this membership (as we shall see) does not distinguish between them. We do not mean to prejudge our question about the conditions of the Church's membership by these reflections on the constitutive elements of the Church and of her visibleness. Our intention in this has merely been to call attention, from the very start, to a [8] matter which will have to be taken into consideration when we now come to ask directly what the Church taught about the conditions of membership before the Encyclical was written.

Our procedure will be simply to try to put together, for a start, the pronouncements made by the Church's magisterium, and then to work out the essentials of this question from these various pronouncements.

a. In the first place, it is a defined Dogma of Faith that baptism is a necessary condition for belonging in any way to the Church; for baptism is acknowledged as the door through which a person enters the Church,[6] and the Church expressly does not claim any jurisdiction whatsoever over the non-baptized.[7]

It is similarly a defined Dogma that there can be members of the Church who are not in the state of grace, and indeed even such as will not attain salvation.[8]

[9] It must be qualified as a doctrine clearly taught by the ordinary magisterium of the Church and by Tradition (although admittedly it is not an explicitly defined Dogma), that – notwithstanding their baptism – those baptized persons are no longer members of the Church who have publicly (i.e. by a legally verifiable act) sided against the Church through schism or [6] Third Council of Valence (855) can. 5, Denz 324; Council of Florence, Denz 696; Council of Trent, Denz 895; cf. Denz 869; CIC can. 12; the same is to be found also in the 1st Schema of the Constitutio de Ecclesia, cap. 1, submitted to the Vatican Council (Collectio Lacensis VII, 567): 'ad hanc vero Mystici Corporis unionem efficiendam Christus Dominus sacrum regenerationis et renovationis instituit lavacrum, quo filii hominum. . . membra essent ad invicem suoque divino Capiti. . . coniuncti.' Theologians refer to Mt 28.19; Jn 3.5 Ac 2.41; I Cor 12.12 sq.; Gal 3.27 sq.; Col 2.11 sq. For a more detailed statement of the relationship between baptism and membership of the Church, cf. J. Hamer, 'Le baptême et l'Eglise', Irénikon XXV (1952), pp. 142-164; pp. 263-275. Further texts in Gasparri-Serédi, Codicis Iuris Canonici Fontes II (Rome 1924), n. 394, p. 197.

[7] Denz 895; CIC can. 12; 87.

[8] Denz 424; 485 sq.; 588; 627; 629; 631; 838; 1422-1425; 1515. This question of the membership of sinners is emphasized also in the Encyclical (p. 203), and since we will not discuss it any further in what follows, we wish to make at least a very brief reference at this point to the development of this doctrine. On the one hand, the doctrine that in the 'Ark of the Church' and on her 'threshing-floor' there are to be found also 'impure animals' or mere 'chaff', and that the Church is not a Church of saints, is found already in the earliest period of theology. Yet even as late as St Augustine (despite his fight against Donatism), it remained comparatively vague whether these sinners are 'members' of the Church merely supposedly and in the order of external appearances, or whether they really belong to the Church. In other words, the exact meaning of the belonging 'in numero' to the Church as opposed to the 'merito' membership of the Church was not made clear. With Bellarmine it is clear that sinners are really members of the Church, and not merely apparently members. Yet even he underlines that they are membra mortua et arida, and that it is not necessary for membership of the Church that 'Christ should be active in all His members'. The Encyclical, on the other hand, calls sinners 'defiled' and 'sick' members and stresses that they are not deprived of all supernatural life in spite of their loss of sanctifying grace. This, of course, passes over the question of whether this applies also to those who have interiorly lost even supernatural faith, since in this context only those are dealt with who have preserved faith and hope. This omission is understandable, since it would otherwise have been necessary to adopt a definite position on the question of whether or not 'occult' heretics are members of the Church, a question with which the Pope obviously did not intend to deal explicitly in this Encyclical. In any case, we recognize in all this a growing tendency to regard the sinner ever more clearly as a member of the Church, and this in the sense that his membership of the Church in the external, juridically and sacramentally visible order is regarded as of consequence also for the inner impulses of grace which are received even by the sinner, and are received by him precisely as a member of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

heresy, and that by a mortally sinful act. For the whole of Tradition, and the practice of the Church concerning readmission of such heretics and schismatics, regards such formal heretics as no longer in the Church. Indeed, in the third century and at the time of Donatism, the entire controversy about baptism by heretics already hinged on the question of how baptism and ordination to the priesthood could be valid despite their being administered or received outside the Church. In this whole controversy, both opposing parties presupposed as obvious that those who are thus baptized or ordained in heresy, are not in the Church; for the whole theological problem was precisely whether and to what extent the sacrament could, in spite of that fact, still be valid and even fruitful. The same conclusion, viz. that formal heretics do not belong as members to the Church, follows also from the fact that the Church has constantly and emphatically taught (even if not by solemn definition), that she is not made up of the sum of Christian denominations.[9] If, however, public [10] and formal heretics and schismatics were members of the Church, then the one Church would nevertheless in fact be composed of the various Christian groups. For the Church is undoubtedly not to be simply equated with valid baptism as such, but is the people of God and hence a community. If, therefore, all baptized persons belonged as members to the Church simply and solely by the fact of their valid baptism, then the community of the Church would be made up also of those groups of baptized persons who have united together in the other Christian communions. The Church would in that case be objectively the sum total of Christian denominations – a conception which the magisterium of the Church expressly and resolutely rejects. We reach the same conclusion, lastly, from the Church's doctrine about the visible nature of her unity.[10] If formal public heretics and schismatics were also members of the Church, then there could no longer be any question of a visible unity of the Church through oneness of faith and of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, both of which factors are declared by the Church's teaching to be constitutive elements of her visible unity. And so, the Council of Florence[11] regards 'haeretici atque schismatici' as 'intra Ecclesiam non existentes'.

For the same reason we must, however, go even further now and state that even those public heretics and schismatics who either cannot be proved to be, or in fact are not, in heresy or schism through formal sin or subjective guilt are outside the Church. In short, even heretics and schismatics in good faith (i.e. merely 'material' heretics or schismatics) do not belong as members to the visible Church.

Of course, as is obvious from the very nature of things, only those are to be considered as (at least) material heretics or schismatics, who – by their own doing, even though through no fault of theirs – have cut themselves off from the Church's communion of belief or allegiance, or have moreover joined a non-Catholic communion. Merely passively received baptism outside the Catholic Church cannot as such [11] (and by itself) make the baptized infant a member of a non-Catholic communion. For baptism, of its whole nature, is in no way ordained to such an effect. And so,[12] those who are baptized outside the Church in infancy, remain members of the true Church until such time as they renounce that membership of the visible Church by their own personal action in the external forum, even though (in certain circumstances) they do so without any personal subjective guilt[13]; thus do they lose that

[9] Denz 1685 sq.; 1955; 2199. Cf. also the following canon, prepared for the Vatican Council but never actually voted on: 'Si quis dixerit veram Ecclesiam non esse unum in se corpus, sed ex variis dissitisque christiani nominis societatibus constare, per easque diffusam esse; aut varias societates ab invicem fidei professione dissidentes aeque communione seiunctas, tamquam membra vel partes unam et universalem constituere Christi Ecclesiam, A.S.' (Collectio Lacensis VII, 577.)

[10] Cf. e.g. Leo XIII, Satis cognitum, Denz 1954 sqq.

[11] 'Decretum pro Jacobitis' (1442) (Denz 714). Cf. also Denz 1641: To deny a defined dogma of faith is 'ab unitate Ecclesiae deficere'.

[12] Cf. Denz 324; 696; 895. CIC can. 87 etc. Denz 869-870.

[13] When Benedict XIV says in his 'Breve Singulari nobis' (1794), §13 (Gasparri, Codicis Iuris Canonici Fontes

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

membership of the visible Church which they obtained by baptism in a purely passive manner and without any personal decision on their part, since they were at that stage incapable of receiving it in any other way.

The fact that even merely material heretics and schismatics are not members of the visible Church is proved from the same premises which we used in our proof for the non-membership of formal heretics and schismatics. We cannot, it is true, describe material heretics as heretics or schismatics pure and simple and in the fullest sense, as defined in CIC can. 1325 § 2. For this canon seems to require a pertinacia, and hence also a subjective guilt, for heresy or schism in the fullest sense. A Protestant in good faith does not have this.[14] But the [12] Codex Iuris Canonici, it should be noted, must add the factor of pertinacia to the notion of heresy or schism. For it is concerned with the question of ecclesiastical penalties for heresy and schism, and therefore cannot, in this context, omit the important factor of guilt. Nothing, however, is thereby decided as to whether this factor applies also to the notion of heresy or schism when the question of full membership of the Church is under discussion.

It was the almost universal teaching of theologians[15] even before the Encyclical, and indeed it follows from the very nature of things, that even material heretics and schismatics do not belong as members to the visible Church. For if those who are outside the Church by a non-imputable, but nevertheless public and juridical act, belonged nevertheless to the Church, then the visible Church could no longer be one in respect of her visibleness; nor could conformity of profession of faith and of subjection to the ecclesiastical juridical power be any longer constitutive elements of the unity of the Church.

It might be objected to this doctrine (i.e. that both formal and material public heretics and schismatics no longer belong as members to the Church, despite their baptism), that such heretics and schismatics are nevertheless still basically regarded as under the Church's authority (CIC can. 12). Apart from anything else, this can be quite clearly seen, for instance, by the fact that the ecclesiastical marriage impediments hold good even for heretics and schismatics (CIC can. 1038 § 2). One might say that non-membership of the visible Church and subjection to her laws are mutually exclusive. In reply to this it must be stated that full

---

II (Rome 1924, p. 197): 'coopertum est eum, qui baptisma ab Haeretico suscepit, illius vi Ecclesiae Catholicae membrum effici', nothing more is meant than what we have just indicated. For in the following paragraph (14) Benedict emphasizes explicitly that such a baptized person ceases to belong to the one Church and is deprived of all the goods enjoyed by those who 'are in the Church' ('in Ecclesia versantes') as soon as he accepts the error of the heresy of the baptizer. No distinction is made here between material and formal heretics. L. Richard is, therefore, wrong in trying to conclude from this text that every baptized person is a member of the Church, although this membership is 'anormale et incomplète' in the case of material heretics ('Une thèse fondamentale de l'oecuménisme: le baptême, incorporation visible à l'Eglise', NRT LXXIV (1952), pp. 485-492). Benedict's teaching does not recognize any 'gradations' of membership, but, on the contrary, is absolutely in agreement in this respect with our interpretation of the teaching of Pius XII. Richard's interpretation (p. 488) of the Encyclical 'Mystici Corporis' is unacceptable, because it overlooks the fact that it is just not true that heretics 'veram fidem profitentur', and it is beside the point whether one can or cannot say of them that they have severed themselves from the bond of the Body.

[14] Cf. already St Augustine, Epistolae 43 (PL 33, 160); Chr. Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae I[5] (Freiburg 1915), II. n. 395. It goes without saying that even though one cannot do other than use the word 'heresy' when speaking of merely material 'heresy', any suggestion of personal depreciation in this word must, however, be avoided. This word qualifies a doctrine, and not the persons who profess this doctrine in good faith and with unwavering conviction.

[15] A few theologians hold the opposite view. Thus the Sacrae Theologiae Summa I[1] (cf. note 5 above), n. 1030 (p. 839) names the following as holding this view: Franzelin, De Groot, d'Herbigny, Capéran, Terrien. The following theologians of the last decades are enumerated in support of the view proposed above in the text: de San, Billot, Straub, Muncunill, van Noort, Zubizarreta, Michelitsch, Dorsch, Lercher, Dieckmann, de Guibert, Fraghi, Stolz, Vellico. The first group includes also A. Malvy (RSR XVII [1927], pp. 29-35), M. Schmaus (Katholische Dogmatik III, 1 [Munich 1940], pp. 171 sq.) etc., as well as those canonists whom we will mention later on.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

membership of the Church includes several [13] factors in its extension as a direct consequence of the complexity of the constitutive elements of the visible nature of the one Church. It follows from this that, even when only one of the factors required for this membership is absent, there is no longer any question of membership of the one Church in its proper and fullest sense. However, it does not follow that, even in such a case, there cannot be any consequences of a juridical nature due to some other factor which still survives (and indeed cannot be lost) and which also contributes to the constitution of membership. In other words, the baptized person is formally subject to the Church's authority through baptism – not because he always and ipso facto becomes simply a member of the Church through baptism, but precisely because subjection to the Church is an immediate consequence of baptism, quite apart from the fact of whether baptism has actually also given membership of the Church or not.[16]

We will, in the meantime, pass over the various questions controverted among theologians, up to the time of the Encyclical, about full membership or non-membership of the visible Church as far as the so-called excommunicati vitandi are concerned. Furthermore, we leave completely to one side the question about the position, in this respect, of those whose baptism is only putatively valid.

There remains, however, one further question of importance for a thorough understanding of the membership of the Church. This is the question about whether those still belong to the Church or not who have inwardly abandoned the true Faith, without this apostacy revealing itself in the external forum. This question too has been controverted among theologians up until now. Important theologians, such as Suarez, Billuart, Franzelin, Hurter, Michelitsch, Stolz, Fraghi, Liégé, etc., deny that these occult apostates belong to the Church as members, whereas the great majority of theologians, following Cano, Bellarmine, Palmieri, Mazzella, Billot, Straub and Pesch, affirm their [14] membership of the Church.[17] If we leave out of consideration, in the meantime, the question as to whether (and in what direction) the Encyclical may have clarified this issue, then we must, absolutely speaking and for internal reasons, prefer the second of these opinions. For it is impossible to see, for one thing, why such a merely inner unbeliever should belong any less to the Church than other sinners, in whose case it is absolutely certain according to the Church's teaching that they are still in the Church. When Franzelin declares that the Church is the kingdom of truth and that, therefore, someone who denies this truth no longer belongs to the Church, then if this reasoning were correct, we would have to say also that the Church is the kingdom of love and hence an unjustified person could no longer belong to her. Moreover, a bishop or Pope, according to the universal teaching and one which is necessary for the steady and sure continuance of ecclesiastical authority, keeps his ecclesiastical powers even if he is occultly unbelieving in the purely internal forum. But possession of ordinary ecclesiastical authority and non-membership of the visible Church are mutually exclusive notions.[18] Therefore even such [16] For a more detailed treatment of the distinction between legal status, the nature of being a subject (Untertanenschaft) and membership in the domain of the Church, cf. A. Gommenginger, 'Bedeutet die Exkommunikation Verlust der Kirchengliedschaft?', ZKT LXXIII (1951), pp. 1-71 (and for this particular question, cf. above all pp. 17-25). The difference between membership and subjection to the authority and law of the Church is found clearly expressed as early as, for instance, Benedict XIV ('Breve Singulari nobis', of 1749, §14: Gasparri, Codicis Iuris Canonici Fontes II [Rome 1924], p. 197).

[17] The Sacrae Theologiae Summa (cf. note 5 above) gives (on p. 839) the following as examples of further names: Kilber, van Laak, de San, Wilmers, Tanquerey, Muncunill, Felder, Zubizarreta, d'Herbigny, Schultes, Dieckman, Vellico, Parente, Hervé.

[18] It is true that 'having legal authority' in the Church and 'being a member' of the Church are not formally identical notions (cf. Beumer, Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII , p. 256). But it is contrary to the nature of an ordinary sovereign power in a community, that it should be capable of being exercised by a non-member or outsider. For ordinary, enduring exercise of a function proper to the nature of a community does, in fact,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

occult heretics and schismatics must remain members of the Church. Finally, the opposite opinion is guilty in the last analysis of mixing up two spheres which must be most carefully distinguished, viz. the sphere of the inner and personal moral decision and internal grace, on the one hand – and, on the other hand, the sphere of visible juridical matters [15] and the visible sacramental sign. Sacramental sign, public profession of the truth, external belonging to the order of the Church – on the one hand – and sacramental grace, inner existential ratification of the truth of faith and inner affirmation of the order and unity of the Church through love – on the other hand – are each things which are indeed essentially related to one another. However, they must also be basically distinguished from one another and that to such an extent that, for example, according to the teaching even of the primitive Church, the sacramental sign can be entirely valid without the sacramental grace being actually obtained, and that, conversely, justifying grace can be given without the justifying sacrament. And just as these two spheres are to be clearly distinguished from one another, so also are the constitutive elements of both these spheres different from each other and in the same way as the spheres themselves. Hence, the elements of one sphere can be absent without the elements of the other sphere ceasing thereby to exist. For the same reason, the question about the conditions of membership of the public and juridical communion of belief must not be identified with the question about the conditions of the inner and personal act of faith. The opinion of Suarez and Franzelin does, however, wrongly identify these two questions.

b. With that we come to the inner organic conception (Systematik) and argument of the statements about who belongs to the Church which we have so far simply collected together in a more a-posteriori manner from the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church.

As Leo XIII already argued in 'Satis cognitum' (1896), the Church is, in conformity with the Hypostatic Union and with the work of salvation in general, both a visible and an invisible structure, a juridically organized, visible society and the inner communion of those who are united in Christ and through the Spirit with the God of the supernatural life. These two dimensions of the Church are essentially related to one another, and this relationship, although it reaches much further in reality, has been thought through most systematically in theology, and has been fought over most explicitly in the history of Dogma, under the heading of the relationship between the sacramental sign and its effect of grace. Now the sacramental sign can be validly posited without there being effected the supernatural reality of grace signified by it. And, conversely, the supernatural reality of grace can, under certain circumstances, be given without the positing [16] of the sacramental sign. In general, then, the question of the conditions for the validity of the positing of the sacramental sign must be clearly distinguished from the question of the conditions for the real happening of the supernatural grace which is signified and normally called into being by this sign. Just as all this is the case, so we must fundamentally observe the same relationship, difference and distinction with regard to the connection between the two dimensions of the Church and with regard to the relationship of the human person to them both.

In this regard it is furthermore essential that we observe the following: when the usage of the Church speaks of 'Sacrament', this term is taken to signify directly the sacramental sign (i.e. the plane of the public historical and tangible proceeding) and only indirectly also the sacramental grace (i.e. in so far as the sign causes the grace), without it being thereby denied constitute membership. This does not mean to say that a merely delegated power, and one which is exercised per modum actus, can never be exercised in a particular case even by a non-member. Consider, for instance, the case (if this is really ad rem here – which we will leave an open question) of the confessional jurisdiction of an apostate priest in respect of the dying (CIC can. 882). Leo XIII is perfectly justified in saying ('Satis cognitum'): '...cum absurdum sit opinari, qui extra Ecclesiam est, eum in Ecclesia praeesse.' Cf. A. Gommenginger, ZKT LXXIII (1951), pp. 51 sqq.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

that the sacramental sign and the sacramental grace are objectively connected. The same is true of the ecclesiastical usage regarding the term 'Church'. No matter how true it is that grace, inner faith and the union of men with Christ and with each other in the Holy Ghost through grace, belong to the full reality of the Church – and no matter how little true it is that the full objective reality of the nature of 'Church' is accounted for by a legal organization – it is nevertheless a fact that the term 'Church' is employed in the following quite definite sense in ecclesiastical usage. Like the notion of 'Sacrament', the term 'Church' refers in ecclesiastical usage directly to the external, visible and legally structured community of believers. It refers only indirectly to men's inner faith and union with Christ by grace, in so far, namely, as these, both as signs and as tangible realities, are effected and become present in this world through the visible Church. It is true that, to some extent, one may not find this usage too obvious in itself and it is undoubtedly in a certain sense merely a question of a de facto, fixed terminology; nevertheless we must take cognizance of this. This fact must be respected by Catholic theology and also in the proclamation of the Faith. It must be fully fathomed if there are not to be continual misunderstandings, and it has undoubtedly (as we shall see later) its own positive and essential importance. Thus when we ask about the membership of the Church, it is a question of the Church as a visible historically tangible unity (for, as we have just pointed out, this is the direct object of inquiry when it is a question of the membership of the 'Church'). Hence this question, to put it in this particular way, is posed on the plane of the sacramental sign and [17] not on the plane of personal attitudes and inner decisions or inner grace. For this reason, therefore, all those and only those points which affect the Church as a visible, public and juridical society are significant and decisive for the question of membership of the Church understood in this precise manner. Since the visibleness and visible unity of the Church are constituted by the sacramental and juridical authority of the Church (which latter includes in its turn the teaching and ruling authority of the Church[19]), all and only those belong to the Church as members who are visibly, i.e. in the external forum, subject to these two powers of the Church. And everyone who, on the social plane, is cut off or has withdrawn himself from one or both of these powers, is not a member of the Church. From this fundamental principle there follow then quite clearly the individual propositions which we have established in the first instance in an a-posteriori manner under (a) from the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church and the teaching of theologians. Since the theological note of each individual proposition does not appertain to it as a consequence of a systematic principle, but only according to the manner in which it is presented by the magisterium of the Church, these individual propositions retain their different, theologically gradated notes, as stated under (a).

c. At this point we wish right away to append a few words on the statement of this question as frequently found in Catholic canonistic literature. In contrast to dogmatic Ecclesiology, certain canonists very often state our question as if every baptized person necessarily is, and always remains, a member of the Church (taken as a perfect society), in such a way that even a heretic, schismatic or excommunicatus vitandus is still a member of the Church, and that only his rights as a member are to a large extent in abeyance. This conception which has become much more common in canonistic writings particularly through the work of A. Hagen,[20] continued to be put forward even after the [18] Encyclical, as e.g. by Klaus

[19] Cf. Note 5 above.

[20] A. Hagen, Die kirchliche Mitgliedschaft (Rothenburg 1938). Hagen's view is not quite clear. Cf. also note 13 above. A similar view is held by J. B. Haring, Grundzüge des katholischen Kirchenrechts[3] (Gras 1924), pp. 38 and 942; G. Ebers, Grundriss des katholjschen Kirchenrechts (Vienna 1950), pp. 244 and 254; P. Minges, 'Gehören Exkommunizierte und Häretiker noch zur Kirche?', Passauer Monatsschrift XII (1902), pp. 339-347; L. Valpertz, 'Kirchenbann und Kirchenmitgliedschaft', Theologie und Glaube XIX (1927), pp. 254-258; N.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Mörsdorf.[21] According to Mörsdorf it is through baptism alone that an essential membership is given which cannot be dissolved either by the baptized person himself or by the Church. This he calls 'constitutional membership', and this is the basis for an operative (tätige) membership (of an active and passive nature) which activates the legal status, both active and passive, conferred with baptism. Now, according to Mörsdorf, heresy, schism or ecclesiastical penalties give rise to a more or less far-reaching curtailment of membership-rights, without the membership proper, i.e. the 'constitutional' membership, being thereby destroyed. This conception bases itself on the following considerations. On the one hand, it considers it impossible to decide anything definite about the conditions of membership of the Church from the allegedly vague notion of the Church's nature as found in Fundamental Theology. On the other hand, it is possible to decide our question definitely (and in the sense of this canonical conception) by means of the declarations of Canon Law, which after all are also significant expressions of the teaching authority. For this they appeal particularly to canon 87 of the CIC (and to its sources), which declares: Baptismate homo constituitur in Ecclesia Christi persona cum omnibus christianorum iuribus et officiis, nisi ad iura quod attinet, obstet obex, ecclesiasticae communionis vinculum impediens, vel lata ab Ecclesia censura. Canon Law seems therefore to acknowledge only baptism as the constitutive element for personal legal status and hence for membership of the Church, so that, with enduring membership in the case of all baptized persons, it can only be a question of how far they possess the rights and duties which in the normal course of events spring from membership of the Church.

To begin with, we can concede without any difficulty that this difference of opinion is in part merely a matter of difference in terminology. But even in this respect there remains the objective question as to which conception renders the terminological usage of the Church [19] more exactly. But furthermore, this is after all not merely a matter of terminology. For once we presuppose the conception of these canonists, there immediately arises, for example, the still objectively speaking most important question as to whether only the 'constitutional' membership is necessary for salvation according to the Dogma concerned, or whether operative membership is also required for this. There is at least the danger that in this canonistic explanation one regards the constitutional membership alone as necessary for salvation in the sense of Catholic Tradition. But this would undoubtedly be completely contrary to the Church's understanding of the Faith, since she emphasizes even to baptized heretics and schismatics the necessity for salvation of a membership of the Church which they do not possess.

If we now turn to the arguments of the canonists, we will have to state the following (even prescinding for the moment from the Encyclical): To begin with, it is not true to say that the conception of the conditions for Church membership as found in Fundamental Theology proceeds from an absolutely controversial conception of the nature of the Church. For no matter how hotly debated and deeply problematical a 'definition' of the nature of the Church may be, it is quite clear and definite from the Church's doctrinal pronouncements that the Church is an undivided and visible quantity which essentially requires for its constitution the unity of Faith and of Law. And the conception of the ecclesiologists with regard to the prerequired conditions of Church membership follows from this with logical necessity, quite apart from the way in which they may try to capture the sense of the Church's nature more exactly in a definition.

Turning now more in particular to their appeal to can. 87 itself (and to its sources), we can

---

Hilling, 'Die kirchliche Mitgliedschaft nach der Enzyklika Mystici Corporis Christi und nach dem CIC', Archiv für das katholische Kirchenrechts CXXV (1951-52), pp. 122-129.

[21] Kl. Mörsdorf, 'Die Kirchengliedschaft im Lichte der kirchlichen Rechtsordnung', Theologie und Glaube (1944), pp. 115-131; id., Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts I[7] (1953), pp. 183 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

quite readily concede that the formulation of this canon does not take the conception, which we have here proposed as the common (although not defined) teaching of the Church on our question, as much into consideration as might be desirable. One is not, however, forced to say that this canon contradicts this teaching and that it is therefore a final argument in favour of the above-mentioned canonistic conception regarding our question. For one may quite rightly suppose that this canon and its sources have in mind the normal cases of baptism, in other words baptism in the Catholic Church (and particularly such baptism of those who have not yet reached the use of reason). Since, therefore, baptism in these cases does actually make the person a member of the Church by its very inner [20] nature, provided of course that the other prerequired conditions are fulfilled (which can be presumed, since they are in the same line of intention as baptism, the sacrament of faith and love), we may quite safely affirm with the Code that baptismate homo constituitur in Ecclesia Christi persona, without it being necessary to mention explicitly the other conditions of actual membership of the Church. If the canon recognizes over and above this only a limitation of the rights of membership, then this must simply mean that it has only those baptized persons in mind who are and remain members of the Church (and who as such experience a limitation of their rights), without wishing to declare itself on the question of whether a loss of the real membership of the Church is possible or not. The opposite interpretation of can. 87 also presupposes, without proving it, that having legal status in the Church, being a subject of the Church and having membership of the Church are all convertible or at least inseparably connected terms. But these notions must be distinguished. And when we do distinguish them, then there is a question of whether can. 87 speaks of proper membership at all, or merely of the legal status and the subject relationship of the baptized person to the Church.[22] Even if we leave this an open question, it still remains true that this canon is not a cogent argument against the traditional doctrine.

Moreover, the very concept of operative membership is itself full of problems. It presupposes that there is such a thing as non-operative membership. Now it is, of course, correct to say that there are greater or lesser degrees of enjoyment, by a member of the Church, of the rights derived from his membership of the Church – but that fact alone would not mean a change in the sort of membership as such.

Furthermore, if we give the terms constitutional and operative membership their normal sense, then we mean by these that anyone who, even without operative membership, possesses constitutional membership, is a member of the Church and is not separated from her. According to Mörsdorf therefore, a baptized schismatic or heretic would still be in the Church, because he still has constitutional membership. But the Encyclical states exactly the opposite when it [21] declares[23] that schism, heresy and apostasy cause hominem ab Ecclesiae corpore separari.

Finally, this whole canonistic argumentation jumps to conclusions. For it concludes from [22] For the interpretation of this canon cf. A. Gommenginger, loc. cit., ZKT LXXIII (1951), pp. 17 sqq.

[23] AAS XXXV (1943), p. 203. The same statement is to be found also in the Catechismus Romanus (I, 9, 12): 'tria tantummodo hominum genera ab Ecclesia excluduntur, primo infideles, deinde haeretici et schismatici, prostremo excommunicati...haeretici et schismatici, quia ab Ecclesia desciverunt, neque enim illi magis ad Ecclesiam spectant, quam transfugae ad exercitum pertineant, a quo defecerunt: non negandum tamen quin in Ecclesia potestate sint, ut qui ab ea in iudicium vocentur, puniantur et anathemate damnentur...'. We already mentioned above that according to the Council of Florence, too, heretics are not in the Church (Denz 714). Using Mörsdorf's terminology, however, we would have to say: they are in the Church – only they do not have any active or passive functions of membership (either through their own fault or simply through being barred); for 'just as baptism, once validly administered, may never be repeated, so also is incorporation into the Church irrevocable once it has taken place, i.e. constitutional membership is indissoluble,' (loc. cit., p. 184). But anyone who is irrevocably and indissolubly incorporated into the Church, can never be 'outside' the Church or separated' from her. Yet the latter is precisely what the terminology of the Church affirms.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the fact of being subject to the legal power of the Church to the subject's membership of the Church. It is, of course, evident that a member of the Church must be subject to her. But that the subject is ipso facto a member, is the very thing that has to be proved and cannot be presupposed as self-evident. For the passive object of the legal claim of a community does not for that reason have to be already, without any further conditions having to be fulfilled, a member of that community.

When, quite apart from this, the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church say that a person becomes a member of the Church through baptism, we must explain that such formulations wish to emphasize that baptism is the first and most basic condition of membership of the Church. And such formulations presuppose that normally the other conditions are fulfilled automatically together with baptism, without necessarily implying by this that a person is already a member of the Church in a true and proper sense by baptism alone, even apart from his being subject to the authority of the Church. Whenever (as they frequently do) the sources of CIC can. 87 (and, by the way, the Encyclical too; cf. p. 201) explain the belonging to the Church and the incorporation in the Mystical Body of Christ as an effect of [22] baptism, the following fact must also be borne in mind. It is a universally accepted usage in the theology of the Sacraments to attribute certain effects to certain Sacraments without any further qualification, even if these Sacraments have these effects only under certain conditions which are not always necessarily fulfilled. Although we ascribe, for example, inner rebirth simply to baptism, no one will hold for that reason that it follows from such a statement that this effect will always be present whenever baptism is validly administered. For in fact this rebirth is effected only under certain further conditions, even although these are not explicitly mentioned in such a statement. Thus when the Council of Florence, for example, declares in the Decretum pro Armenis that the effect of baptism is membership of Christ in the Body of the Church,[24] it is arbitrary and illegitimate to suppose that this effect in particular is always and immediately brought about, without any further conditions, whenever baptism is valid. Only one of the effects of baptism is 'theologically certainly' caused by every valid baptism, viz. the sacramental character. Now it is indeed true to say that the sacramental character is directed in some way towards membership of the Church – viz. in so far as it is in its nature of signum configurativum, distinctivum and dispositivum – the condition and root of all the other effects of baptism. But just as it is not true that the other effects of baptism are always given and inseparably bound up with the character, so it is also untrue to affirm this as necessary of membership of the Church. If we now conceive fides and communio ecclesiastica as conditions of baptism received properly in every respect (and this is a completely reasonable conception), then there is no reason why membership of the Church should not be declared a consequence of the character and hence of baptism – with the tacit condition, it is true, that fides vera and communio ecclesiastica are present – without it being necessary to underline this expressly.[25]

---

[24] Denz 696. Cf. the 'Decretum pro Jacobitis' (Denz 714) in the same Council: Heretics are 'intra catholicam Ecclesiam non existentes', they do not remain in the 'ecclesiastica corporis unitas', but must first of all be rejoined ('aggregari') to her.

[25] When Mörsdorf says (in the 6th edition of Eichmann [1947], p. 169, note 2), that the conditions demanded here over and above baptism are on the 'plane of free personal decision', he presumably means to imply by this that the conception which we have advocated here, demands simultaneously completely disparate things for membership of the Church. The following must, therefore, be kept in mind in this connection. On the one hand, even valid baptism is impossible without an 'intention' on the part of the baptizer. But this 'intention' is also on the 'plane of free personal decision', even though it does not need to be a morally good act. (Cf. for this H. Schillebeeckx, De Sacramentele Heilseconomie [Antwerp 1952], pp. 457-479.) On the other hand, when we speak of faith and obedience to the Church's authority as relevant to membership of the Church, we do not refer to the moral and supernatural side of this faith and this obedience, but to faith and obedience in so far as they are data of the external forum. After all, it has been explicitly stated that the 'occult' heretic still belongs to the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[23] In rejecting the above canonistic conception, we do not mean to dispute the fact that man can have a closer or looser connection with the Church, even when, as we have established, he has not fulfilled all the conditions of membership of the Church. This looser way of belonging to the Church, however, can come about (although only in an essentially lesser measure) even in the case of a non-baptized person, as e.g. in the case of a non-baptized person who is in the state of grace. It is, therefore, impossible to understand why the canonistic conception wants to situate the step between belonging and non-belonging precisely in baptism, and why it does not want to use the term 'membership' to describe full and complete membership. For there is an alternative. We must either draw the border-line between 'belonging' and 'non-belonging' on the plane of inner personal being, and therefore between the 'justified' and the 'unjustified' person – and in that case we would, on the one hand, have to reckon even non-baptized persons [24] as belonging to the Church, and, on the other hand, reckon sinners as no longer belonging to the Church (which is impossible according to the terminology of the Church). Or we must draw this line on the plane of the visible and of what is verifiable in the historical and legal order (and hence also then on the plane of the sacramental sign), and then we cannot understand why baptism should have an essential priority (with regard to the constitution of membership of the Church) over the communion with the Church's unity of faith and law; the only way to understand this would be to conceive baptism in a wider and fuller sense as including also an external avowal of the Church's communion of belief and law. But in that case our question would have been pointless from the very start.

d. In conclusion, in order not to give any false impressions, we would like to add the following with regard to what the Church taught before the Encyclical about her membership. When this teaching states that only baptized Catholics belong to the Church, it is not thereby maintained that there is nothing Christian outside the Catholic Church. In Part II of this inquiry we will have to treat expressly of the question about the possibility of grace for those who do not belong in the full sense to the Church. But even prescinding from that, the doctrine expounded above does not maintain that Christianity simply ceases at the borders laid down by this doctrine. After all, it is in the first place a Dogma of Faith that even baptism by a heretic is valid and, under usual conditions, also fruitful. And it is a self-evident fact that the Sacrament of baptism is actually administered in this way even outside the Church. This fact necessarily represents not only a part of the grace of Christ in the world, but also a continued embodiment in history and a visible appearance of the divine causality of grace in Christ. Furthermore, there are the Holy Scriptures even outside the Church, as the Word of God – and men who receive the Scriptures as the inspired Word of God in faith and obedience. That too is a part of the continuation in the flesh and in the human word of the visibleness of the eternal Logos in this world. There is still, furthermore, an apostolic

---

Church. But as data of the external and verifiable legal order, the external profession of faith and the corresponding obedience to the Church's authority are on radically the same plane as the 'professio fidei' given in baptism – on the same plane as that of the sacramental signs, which are also connected with a 'forum' (sacramentale). In the 7th edition of Eichmann (Paderborn 1953, pp. 183 sq.), Mörsdorf concedes (for adult Christians) the three essential marks of membership of the Church and then distinguishes two 'strata' in this membership, since one of the essential marks depends on God alone, whereas the other two depend on a free and personal decision of the Church member. He then characterizes these two 'strata' once more as 'constitutional membership' and 'operative membership', i.e. he distinguishes two memberships and not two strata of the one membership. And then he finally states once more that 'both (memberships) together form the essence of Church membership for the adult Christian'. I still find that this terminology is unfortunate. For one cannot help asking oneself: is there one membership or are there two? What Mörsdorf describes as 'operative membership' ('the personal realization of the Christ-likeness imprinted on the baptized in a consecratory manner') is not really an active membership, but the activation of membership.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation succession even outside the Church, especially in the Eastern Churches, at least in respect of the potestas ordinis and at least in respect of the material connection of the present-day office of Bishop with the Church of the Apostles. And this apostolic succession in these Churches is not only factually present, but is also affirmed as [25] a necessary and inalienable Christian reality. In this way too is found a part of that reality which even inside the Church belongs to the basic elements of that Church. Even outside the Church the will to Tradition is still alive to a large extent, i.e. the consciousness of being bound in conscience to the truth which Christ brought us and which must be transmitted as his message, with the assistance of the Holy Ghost and from generation to generation. In brief, there is Christian doctrinal truth (even though not in its undiminished fullness and purity) even outside the Church. And conversely, it is perfectly true that the Roman Catholic Church knows itself as the only Church of Christ, And it is perfectly true that she stresses that the one Church of Christ does not still have to be created but is already and always was achieved in her. Yet it is equally true that it is not thereby claimed that the catholic fullness of truth, grace and sanctifying love has already always and everywhere been manifested and represented actually and fully in this concrete Catholic Church, or even that this is possible without the return into the Church, as to their father's house, of the separated Christian communions (and even of the pagan peoples). And these must bring with them into the Church that aspect of Christian realization which they alone can achieve in full measure on account of their racial, historical and cultural characteristics. Even the one Catholic Church, therefore, only really attains the realization of the fullness of its actual reality and explicit development, when these our separated brethren bring it back to where it really belongs and is truly at home. This is true all the more so because the present-day separated Christian communions cannot be simply put on a par with those heretical secessions from the one Church which the Fathers of old and pre-Reformation Tradition had before their eyes and against which they fought. In those days, the Fathers of the Church saw themselves faced with heresies which in relation and comparison to the one Church possessed nothing in terms of actual historical realization apart from heresy, error pure and simple, and (at the most) perhaps also that general truth-impulse towards greater and clearer truth more explicitly unfolded, which can be the real strength even of error. But over and above this these heresies and schisms had nothing. Anything else they possessed, they had brought with them, in precisely the form in which they possessed it, from the Mother Church: law, liturgy, Scriptures, etc. They were in very fact and in every respect only less than the true Church. Today the Church finds itself in quite a different [26] situation. She is faced with Christian communions which have a long history, a history of many hundred years. This history is, however, in this case not only the history of error and of a progressive loss of the substance of Christian reality. It is also and, at the same time, always a history of the development of genuinely Christian possibilities. The latter are indeed present in germ and radically in the one true Church and can unfold themselves in her. But it is not necessarily certain that they are always and everywhere equally present 'in act' in the Church, in the way in which they are present in the separated Christian communions. That it is also a history of this kind, is a historical fact which we can view without concern, since it is a living witness not, properly speaking, to heresy, but to the power of the one Christian truth and grace even outside the Church, which is a known fact. This is not the place to submit these Christian realizations in the non-Catholic Christian communions for examination and to compare them with the Church. But if there are such factors which, on the one hand, are genuine realizations of the Christian spirit and of Christian grace outside the Church and of which, on the other hand, it is not certain a priori that they must already be actually present to the same extent and in the same measure within the Church, then there arises a task for the Church which she did not have towards the heresies and schisms of earlier times. Previously heresy was nothing more than the lost Son who brings nothing with him. Today such a

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian communion can bring with it genuine Christian realizations which represent an enrichment of the Church. For this the Church, however, needs to have discernment and needs to be in a receptive preparedness. Men in the Church must not simply identify the present state of Christian realization (in theology, culture, Christian life, etc.) with that Christian reality which the Church has been commissioned to realize; they must be ready to learn in all humility even from those who, while they are outside, possess already (in spite of all the error and loss of Christian reality) part of those riches which we are meant to have, and indeed have already 'in potentia', but which we do not always and in every respect possess 'actu' and perhaps never will until everything Christian which has been scattered, has been brought into the one Church of Christ.

2. The teaching of the Encyclical about membership of the Church

We must now look at the teaching of the Encyclical against the above background. We will first of all state this teaching, then give a [27] more detailed explanation of it and finally, estimate its doctrinal significance.

a. The teaching of the Encyclical.

The Encyclical positively determines to begin with who belongs to the Church as a member (AAS 202): Only he is a member of the Church (Ecclesiae membrum) who firstly has received baptism, secondly professes the true Faith (veram fidem profiteri) and thirdly, has neither severed himself from the bond of the corporate ecclesiastical body (corporis compago) nor has been separated from it by the ecclesiastical authority. From this it follows, in the negative sense, that the unbaptized and those who have set themselves in opposition to the Church through a profession of faith different from the Faith of the Church or through a radical rejection of the authority of the Church (fide vel regimine dividi), are no longer members of the Church.

b. Indications for a more detailed explanation of the principles laid down by the Encyclical.

Prescinding for the moment from the question of the membership, or respectively non-membership, of the excommunicatus vitandus, we can state that these principles of the Encyclical do not mean anything more, either objectively or in formulation, than what we have established under 1) as the general teaching before the Encyclical.

With regard to the necessity of baptism for belonging to the Church, the phrase 'regenerationis lavacrum recepisse' will no doubt not need to be interpreted as a decision about whether someone's belonging to the Church can be based on a merely putatively valid baptism or not. But it is clear, in any case, that even according to the Encyclical no one is a member of the visible Church who has not positively received sacramental baptism (which is more than 'sacramentum in voto').

With regard to the second condition for full membership of the Church, viz. the professio verae fidei, we think the following must be said: The Encyclical gives nowhere even the slightest indication that it wishes to decide the hitherto controverted question about whether occult heretics are still members of the Church or not. The majority of theologians before the Encyclical had counted such heretics as still belonging to the Church, and one of these theologians was Bellarmine, [28] a classic author in Ecclesiology who is cited in the Encyclical. There is, therefore, no real reason for seeing in the Encyclical a confirmation of the opinion that occult heretics no longer belong to the Church. There is no reason for this even on the grounds of terminology. For 'veram fidem profiteri' can be understood, without forcing it at all, of the public profession of faith, even when prescinding in this from the question of whether the inner and personal decision of faith corresponds to this external profession or not. This does not mean that the Encyclical has by its wording decided the previously controverted question in favour of Bellarmine's view. It simply means that the text of the Encyclical contains nothing which militates against his view.[26]

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The Encyclical makes no distinction between material and formal heresy with regard to the fact of being separated in faith as a reason for the lack of membership. We have, therefore, no right to read such a distinction into the wording of the Encyclical and thus to try to understand the 'fide dividi', which divides someone from the Church, as referring only to formal heresy. This is seen to be all the less admissible when it is realized that we cannot attribute a professio verae fidei even to a material heretic, and yet this is an explicitly demanded prerequired condition for belonging to the Church. In the abstract, on the other hand, the doctrinal pronouncement of the Encyclical retains a meaning even if it were understood merely of formal heretics. It no doubt follows from this that even the distinction in theological notes given above under (1), relative to the membership of formal and merely material heretics, is not abolished by the Encyclical. This affirmation has of course no particular significance in practice and objectively speaking. For neither before nor after the Encyclical was it possible, once one had evaluated the various objective reasons correctly, to hold [29] that material heretics belong to the Church, in spite of the different opinion of a few isolated theologians.[27]

'Those who have severed themselves from communion with the ecclesiastical body' means of course schismatics. It would be important even objectively speaking to examine at what point and by what means such a separation takes place in the concrete. According to CIC can. 1325 § 2, where the notion of 'schismatic' is more clearly described, this separation from the communion of the Church can apparently take place even without consequent entry into a non-Catholic communion. One would therefore have to inquire into the question of [30]

[26] It must, however, be added, it is true, that the official German version of the Encyclical has not been particularly felicitous in its translation of this veram fidei profiteri. For there is a certain difference in the genius of the German language between 'den wahren Glauben bekennen' ('to profess the true faith' – Tr.), as stated by the Latin text, and 'sich zum wahren Glauben bekennen' ('to profess oneself an adherent of the true faith' – Tr.), as stated by the German translation. The careless reader might thus get the idea that this 'sich zum wahren Glauben bekennen' is always and of necessity also a matter of an inner personal faith, so that even the occult heretic or apostate no longer belongs to the Church. This the official text of the Encyclical not only does not state, hut evidently also did not wish to state.

[27] The following must be noted for the correct appreciation of this sentence. We start from the theological note which was established with regard to the doctrine that formal heretics do not belong to the Church. We determined this Note above in the sense that it is not an explicitly defined dogma of faith, but a dogma which is proposed by the ordinary magisterium and by Tradition, that formal heretics do not belong to the Church. Thus Lercher-Schlagenhaufen, for instance, (Institutiones Theologiae Dogmaticae I[3] [Innsbruck 1939], n. 407), gives saltem fidei proximum as the Note of this doctrine; and Sacrae theologiae Summa (cf. note 5 above): implicite definitum praesertim in Conc. Florentino (p.842). But the objective reasons for the non-membership of formal and of material heretic-decisive as it is from a moral point of view – is quite intangible on this plane. Otherwise even the occult heretic would have to be regarded as outside the Church. Since there is such an immediate inferential connection between the proposition about material heretics and the doctrine about formal heretics, we will have to say that the non-membership of the Church of material heretics may not be disputed. Nothing that has been said here attaches an adverse theological Note to the canonistic view which affirms that all baptized persons belong to the Church or are members of the Church. For this view refers equally to formal and material heretics. And so this canonistic conception is not necessarily affected by the theological Note given with regard to material heretics (viz. 'theologically certain'), to the extent and degree in which such a conception and terminology does not have to be regarded as being necessarily directed against the doctrine of the non-membership of formal heretics (since one may say that it works with a different set of concepts, which objectively do not necessarily express anything contrary to this doctrine). Of course, whether this canonistic view agrees sufficiently with the Church's official usage is quite another question. We have already stated that we do not consider it very felicitous but fear, on the contrary, practically unavoidable misunderstandings as a consequence of this view.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

whether the refusal of communicatio cum membris Ecclesiae (CIC loc. cit.) cannot also be effected in certain circumstances even without an officially registered (standesamtlichen) secession from the Church, but simply by a permanent non-participation in practical Catholic life. For such non-participation can in certain circumstances manifest a radical rejection of the communicatio cum membris Ecclesiae, even if this non-participation in Catholic life is not a direct and express refusal of obedience to the Roman Pontiff. But we cannot enter any further into this question within the present context. Suffice it simply to add that this question might under certain circumstances be important also from a pastoral point of view.

It is furthermore significant that the Encyclical also recognizes a dissolution of Church membership by a positive act of the ecclesiastical authority itself. The Encyclical does not say what form such an act must take in order to have this effect. If, however, there is to be such an act at all – and in this connection we can safely take it as self-evident that such an act of the ecclesiastical authority is not only radically possible, but is moreover already provided for in practice by the Church's actual law – then we must see this act at least in that kind of excommunication by which an explicitly named individual is declared an excommunicatus vitandus, and that by an express act of the Apostolic See, valid in law (CIC can. 2258). The question as to whether an excommunicatus vitandus is still a member of the Church was controverted up to this time.[28] Hence the Encyclical has here made a decision on this particular point of the controversy, in a manner which under a certain regard is authoritative, although of course not of itself infallible.[29]This particular point is, therefore, the only one

[28] Banez, Gregory of Valencia, Suarez, Guarnieri, and among more recent theologians d'Herbigny, Spacil and Dieckmann (cf. Sacrae Theologiae Summa [cf. note 5 above], p. 840), all denied, as is well known, that excommunication can effect a loss of Church membership properly so called.

[29] One may, of course, say that such excommunication with which, according to the declaration of the Church, there is connected an 'e gremio sanctae Dei Ecclesiae pentus eici' (AAS XIV [1922], p. 593), could be in the nature of things simply a 'sententia declaratoria' regarding an already existing state of separation on account of heresy or schism, quite independently of this sentence – and that this sentence does not effect this exclusion from the Church independently of such heresy or schism. Viewed in this way, even the appeal to Mt 18.15-18 is no longer a compelling argument. Nor is the appeal to the teaching of the ancient Church about penitential excommunication within the whole framework of penitential procedure (the 'binding' of the sinner) to the point here, because this teaching was concerned with quite a different matter. This follows immediately from the fact that according to this teaching every person in mortal sin had to be 'bound' in this way. This was, therefore, basically a question of that removal of the sinner to the furthermost limits of the communion of the Church, which still takes place even today in the exclusion from the Eucharist of everyone who is in mortal sin. It will be extremely difficult to name cases in most recent times where someone who was not already a public heretic or schismatic has been declared 'vitandus' by excommunication. It will also not be easy to find an a priori argument which proves that the Church as a society must have the right to exclude someone completely, even when this person who has offended against her has not already cut himself off from her by his very offence. Hence, in view of this situation with regard to the proofs for the aforesaid thesis, one may begin to wonder whether the Encyclical really meant to decide this hitherto controverted question. Perhaps, in the last analysis, it meant merely to establish by this 'ob gravissima admissa a legitima auctoritate sejungi', that such an excommunicatus vitandus is de facto separated from the Church, in the same sense as (public) heretics and schismatics; and thus it would not necessarily follow from this that the question as to the real, ultimate cause of that separation had actually been decided. One could then say, in this sense, that the Encyclical has not decided whether the cause of separation is the guilt which is established by this excommunication and which must (of necessity) be at the root of the excommunication – or whether it is the sentence of excommunication itself. Even in the first case the Encyclical would still bring with it a certain clarification in regard to the above mentioned view of Banez, Suarez etc. For it would now at least be certain, as against these authors, that by an excommunication of the severest kind ('faciens' or at least declaratory) the Church has in view a real exclusion from the Church, of the same nature as that brought about by heresy and schism even according to these authors. To that extent the Encyclical does decide a hitherto controverted matter. It shall here remain an open question whether the Encyclical has also ended controversy in the sense of determining that such an excommunication does not simply legally establish a loss of Church membership, but is actually itself the cause of it. Cf. for this A. Gommenginger's profound work: 'Bedeutet die Exkommunikation Verlust der Kirchengliedschaft?', ZKT

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

which has [31] given rise to a certain shift of position regarding the question of membership of the Church. In practice, this particular point is of no great importance; for apart from someone who is guilty of personal assault on the Roman Pontiff (CIC Can. 2343 § 1), no one is really [32] nowadays declared an excommunicatus vitandus except someone like Loisy, for instance, who, quite independently of this declaration, was already no longer a member of the Church, on account of his notorious heresy or manifest schism.

We said just now that at least the excommunicatus vitandus is to be counted as one who is severed from the ecclesiastical corporation by the Church's authority itself. By this nothing has been decided of itself, either positively or negatively, about the question of whether or not other kinds of excommunication imply a dissolution of Church membership in the sense of the Encyclical. It is indeed true that every excommunicatio, and hence even the kind by which the excommunicated person remains an excommunicatus toleratus (CIC can. 2258 § 1), is defined as 'censura, qua quis excluditur a communicatione fidelium' (CIC can. 2257 § 1). Thus, at least explicitly, Canon Law does not recognize as essential a difference between the excommunication of an excommunicatus vitandus and that of a toleratus, as there would have to be on the supposition that only the excommunication of the excommunicatus vitandus implies a dissolution of the membership of the Church. Yet, on the other hand, we cannot say that Canon Law excludes this essential difference by its definition of these two forms of excommunication and by its combined treatment of them both. When, therefore, in general only the excommunication of the vitandus is regarded as dissolution of Church membership, there can be no essential objection to this on the grounds of can. 2257. In fact, this differentiation must be made, since e.g. according to can. 2266 an excommunicatus non vitandus retains his ecclesiastical titles and offices and so must obviously still possess membership of the Church. We can here leave it to the Canon Lawyers to determine how and in what sense even such an excommunication (which does not deprive a person of his membership of the Church) can be defined as exclusio a communione fidelium.[30]

We would like to draw the reader's attention to two further points, in view of what we will have to say in our summary under (c). Firstly, we would point out that, according to its explicit and immediate wording and sense, the Encyclical's explanation of Church membership is an explanation of the membership of the Church (in Ecclesiae [33] autem membris . . .) and not expressly of the conditions for belonging to the corpus Christi mysticum. It would certainly not be in the spirit of the Encyclical to overemphasize this nuance in any way, since it is after all the essential endeavour of the Encyclical to show the equivalence of the concepts of 'Church' and 'corpus Christi mysticum'.[31] Yet at the same time, in the light of later reflections, this nuance does not seem insignificant either. Secondly, we would point out that the Encyclical speaks simply of membership of the Church. It does not give the least hint of any kind of distinction such as, for instance, between constitutional and active membership. Its train of thought runs throughout on the same lines as the traditional thought of Fundamental Theology on this question. We have, therefore, no right to read such a distinction into the text of the Encyclical, nor indeed do we have any reason for doing so. And so, we cannot help thinking that it is rather an arbitrary interpretation of that text for a canonist[32] to say that the Encyclical hints at a constitutional membership by the fact that it does not regard separated Christians as strangers, but as those who come home to their father's house. For those who are not in the home of the Church, are indeed to return to it, but

---

LXXIII (1951), pp.1-71, which comes to a negative conclusion on this question. Similar in matter is V. Morel, NRT LXXX (1948), p. 721.

[30] Cf. for this article by A. Gommenginger, which we have already quoted more than once.

[31] An endeavour which was emphatically underlined once more by the Encyclical 'Hurnani Generis' (Denz 3019).

[32] Cf. Mörsdorf, loc. cit., p. 190.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation precisely because they are not in fact in their father's house but outside it – in other words, they are not members of the Church. If they did, however retain a constitutional membership, then it would be meaningless to speak of their being outside their father's house – at most it might be said that, while being in their father's house, they cannot exercise all the rights of a child of the house. Since it is here as elsewhere a basic principle for the interpretation of the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church, let us repeat once more that what is decisive, is that the teaching of the Encyclical reproduces so obviously the usual and general doctrine of fundamental theology and of dogmatic theology, as it has been taught by theologians for centuries. It must, therefore, also be interpreted according to this general teaching, even when the conception of certain canonists diverges from that teaching, at least in terminology. The Encyclical knows, therefore, only one proper membership, and even baptized persons can lack this, viz. when they are separated from the Church by schism or heresy (or 'total excommunication').

[34]

c. Evaluation of the doctrinal significance of this teaching.

If we prescind from the question of the position of the excommunicatus vitandus, we can say that the explanation given by the Encyclical of what it means to belong to the Church, does not create a new state of affairs in theology. For what the Encyclical says on this matter had always either been Catholic Dogma or (in the case of the non-membership of material heretics and schismatics) is to be qualified as having always been 'theologically certain' on account of the common and clear teaching of theologians. The Encyclical is indeed an authentic doctrinal pronouncement, and as such it certainly obliges the believer to an internal assent. But it is not of itself an infallible doctrinal pronouncement of the supreme teaching authority of the Church. Hence it has not, in practice, altered the theological notes given to the norms regarding membership of the Church. The teaching of the Encyclical is, therefore, in this respect a confirmation and more recent enforcement of the traditional teaching. But this teaching of the Encyclical has its own significance. For evidently a false notion of the Church appeared to have been more or less clearly presupposed here and there outside the field of specialized theological writings, such as in talks on the union of the Churches, etc. According to this notion even those separated from one another in belief could nevertheless form the one Church together. But such a notion would turn the Church founded by Christ as the visible, one and juridical society with the Roman Pontiff at its head, into a purely inward, pneumatic community of love. This, however, contradicts in its very deepest sense the incarnational principle of Christianity, according to which God was made flesh and attached his grace to the concrete, historical here and now of human realities. And according to this principle, God has not left it to the free choice of man to decide for himself in what concrete form and historically verifiable reality he wishes to find Christ's salvation and the grace of God.

II

What does the Encyclical say about the possibility of union with Christ by grace for those who, in the sense of the reply to our first question, are not members of the Church? This is the second question which we must pose ourselves.

We have to ask ourselves this, for the whole question of who [35] properly speaking belongs to the Church as a member and who does not, is given its full weight and significance only by the fact that this same Church declares both herself and full belonging to her (understood in the sense explained) as necessary for salvation. This is what happens also in the Encyclical, and it is precisely its statements regarding this matter which have aroused real bewilderment among non-Catholic Christians. The real significance of the question about full belonging to the Church can, therefore, be explained only by confronting this question with the statement to the effect that the Church is necessary for salvation. And only in this way will the question about membership of the Church lead us back from an area of more or less exclusive concern with definitions of terminology to the question about the objective nature of the Church, which we will then have to take up directly in the third part of these investigations.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Since man's salvation is assured, in the last analysis, by the fact of his possessing the Spirit of Christ and grace, the necessity of the Church for salvation cannot be defined merely in the sense of stating that outside the Church there is no salvation. Such a definition must also include the statement that outside the Church it is impossible to possess the justifying grace of the Holy Spirit. Our present question can, therefore, be formulated both as a question about the Church, as necessary for salvation, and as a question about the possibility of grace for those who, according to the definitions of our first part, are not members of the Church. Now the formulae of the Encyclical, which are to be examined as to their meaning and extent in this second part of our reflections, do in fact follow both these directions. Just as in the first part, we will first of all present the previous teaching of the Church on this point, so that we may then look at the pronouncements in question against this background. In this part, even more clearly than in the first, it will be necessary to observe the essential rules of our theological method to which we drew attention at the very beginning of these reflections. We must first of all simply accept the doctrinal pronouncements of the Church, even when these seem to point in completely different directions or even seem to contradict each other at first sight. We must accept them, even if theology has not as yet completely succeeded in deducing them speculatively from one uniform principle, and even if we too may perhaps not succeed absolutely in this.

[36]

1. The necessity of membership of the Church for salvation, as found in the Church's teaching before the Encyclical

Before we try to answer this question directly, we must first of all reflect a little on where in practice and in the concrete this question was treated in theology in the first instance. In the course of the history of the development of Dogma, this question was posed first of all in the concrete form of the question about the necessity of baptism for salvation. This is easily understandable from everything we have said so far. It took this form, not merely because baptism is one of the necessary conditions for belonging to the Church, but also, and above all, because even the other element of membership of the Church, viz. subjection to the juridical authority of the Church, is in its profoundest nature of the same 'sacramental' structure. What is valid of the one, viz. of the element of sacramental incorporation into the Church, with regard to its necessity for salvation, is valid in the same way also of the other, viz. of the element of being subject to the legal power of the Church (as teaching and ruling power). It would be quite wrong to make any distinctions in this respect, as if for example, baptism were basically more important for belonging to the Church and hence also more necessary for salvation, than the other element. Thus it is a fact that the axiom, 'Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus', was applied in absolutely the same way both to heretics (and schismatics) and to pagans. Therefore if, in what follows, we reflect more explicitly, although not exclusively, on the necessity of baptism for salvation, in order to discover whether and in what sense membership of the Church is necessary for salvation, everything we say in this connection will be equally valid of the legal element of this membership. Having pointed this out, we can now proceed immediately to the statement of the Church's teaching on her being

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

necessary for salvation.

a. We find statements of the necessity of membership of the Church for salvation, first of all in phrases which are in reality synonymous with the axiom: Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus. Thus Innocent III's statement of the Church: Extra quam neminem salvari credimus,[33] and: extra quam nullus omnino salvatur[34] or such statements by Boniface VIII as: Extra quam . . . nec remissio peccatorum[35], and: Subesse [37] Romano Pontifici omni humanae creaturae declaramus . . . omnino de necessitate salutis[36] or Clement VI's: Nullus homo . . . extra fidem ipsius Ecclesiae et obedientiam Pontificum Romanorum potent finaliter salvus esse.[37] Thus also the Council of Florence: Nullos intra catholicam Ecclesiam non existentes non solum paganos, sed neque Iudaeos aut haereticos atque schismaticos aeternae vitae fieri posse participes,[38] where it is expressly added that even the Sacraments avail for salvation only when their recipient remains in the Church. Formulae such as these, and others similar to them,[39] could be further multiplied.[40] This is, indeed, as Pius IX says,[41] a notissimum catholicum dogma. The unbending unconditionality itself of these formulae is the very property of the oldest doctrinal proclamations. The Fathers compare the Church – and by this they mean the visible Church – to an organic body, to paradise, to Noah's Ark and to the house of Rahab. And over and over again, beginning with Ignatius of Antioch and right down through Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, Augustine, Fulgentius and Gregory the Great, they derive from this the one truth formulated by St Augustine[42] in the following words: Extra Ecclesiam catholicam [38] totum potest habere (Emeritus) praeter salutem. Potest habere honorem potest habere sacramentum, potest cantare alleluja, potest respondere amen, potest Evangelium tenere, potest in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti fidem et habere et praedicare, sed nusquam nisi in Ecclesia catholica salutem potent invenire.[43]

---

[33] Denz 423.
[34] Denz 430.
[35] Denz 468.
[36] Denz 469.
[37] Denz 570b.
[38] Denz 714.
[39] E.g. Denz 1647, 1677, 1717.
[40] Cf. in particular the Tridentine Profession of Faith, Denz 1000. Cf. also: L. Hofmann, 'Die Zugehörigkeit zur Kirche in den Verhandlungen und Entscheidungen des Konzils von Trient', Trierer theologische Zeitschrift LX (1951), pp. 218-231. In the same way, Pius XII in his Encyclical 'Humani Generis' (Denz 3019). On these declarations of 'Humani Generis' cf. J. Vodopivec, 'Ecclesia catholica romana Corpus Christi mysticum', Euntes docete (Rome 1951), pp. 76-98; J. Cl. Fenton, 'The meaning of the Church's necessity for salvation', American Ecclesiastical Review CXXIV (1951), 124-143, 203-221, 290-302.
[41] Denz 1677. It was intended to issue the following definition in the Vatican Council: Fidei catholicae dogma esse definimus extra unam Ecclesiam Christi nullam esse sperandam salutem. This is the wording of the revised Schema, after the first draft had explicitly mentioned the 'necessitas medii'. This phrase had then been left out, but with the explicit explanation that the necessity spoken of in the revised Schema is to be understood as a necessity of means (cf. Mansi LIII, pp. 312, 323). Cf. for this: Sacrae Theologiae Summa I[2] (Madrid 1952), n. 1095; J. Beumer, 'Die Heilsnotwendigkeit der Kirche nach den Akten des Vatikanischen Konzils', Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII (1947-48), pp. 76-86; G. Gonzalez, 'Quintana, El axioma "Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus" segun el esquema De Ecclesia Christi al Concilio Vaticano', Eccl. Xaver. (Bogota) I (1951), pp. 71-90.
[42] PL 43, 695.
[43] For further texts, cf. e.g. A. Straub, De Ecclesia Christi I (Innsbruck 1912), nos. 365 sq: Chr. Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae I[5] (Freiburg 1915), n. 392; P. Murray, De Ecclesia Christi I (Dublin 1860), pp. 737 sqq.; A. Seitz, Die Heilsnotwendigkeit den Kirche nach der ältesten Literatur bis zur Zeit des hl. Augustinus (Freiburg 1903); M. J. Rouet de Joumel, Enchiridion Patristicum[17] (Freiburg 1952), series 47, p. 761; L. Capéran, Le problème du salut des infidèles. Essai historique (Toulouse 1934); F. Hofmann, Den Kirchenbegriff des hl. Augustinus (Munich 1933); J. Beumer, 'Ekklesiologische Probleme der Frühscholastik', Scholastik XXVII (1952), pp. 183-209 (esp. pp. 197-203); L. Smit, 'Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus', Jaarboek 1951 Nederl. Kath. Theologen (Hilversum 1951), pp. 5-26. Moreover, all the early Protestant Creeds stress the necessity of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

b. The necessity of baptism for salvation is emphasized just as apodictically.[44] This necessity of baptism for salvation is also more immediately evident in the Scriptures (Jn 3.5) than the explicit doctrine of the necessity of membership of the Church for salvation in general, so that usually the scriptural proof of this general statement is furnished by the scriptural proof of the necessity of baptism for salvation.

c. On the other hand, the magisterium of the Church emphasizes, at least in more recent times, that those who live outside the Church can also be saved. Thus Pius IX says in his Allocutio 'Singulari quadam' (1854): 'We must hold fast in the Faith that nobody outside the Apostolic Roman Church can be saved; she is the only ark of salvation and everyone who does not enter it must perish in the flood. But we [39] must hold fast just as firmly to the truth that in the eyes of the Lord no one who lives in invincible ignorance of the true religion is stricken with this guilt.[45] Similarly in his Encyclical 'Quanto conficiamur moerore'(1863).[46] If we examine these and similar texts closely, we find that they are couched in much more careful terms with regard to the possibility of salvation for someone outside the Church than might appear at first sight. When we submit these and similar texts (to which we will return later on) to an exact analysis, we will find that they actually state only that someone who lives in invincible error about the true religion is naturally not regarded as guilty of this by God. Whether this invincible ignorance of the true religion can actually last for a whole lifetime, and what will be the eternal fate of such a subjectively guiltless person (especially when he has moreover not received baptism) – in other words, whether he will in fact reach supernatural salvation – these are questions about which these and similar utterances say practically nothing positive. But one can nevertheless say, first of all, that the Council of Trent evidently[47] recognizes, for all that, a properly supernatural rebirth of man by grace even by the votum baptismi. In other words, it recognizes a supernatural justification of man even before the most fundamental condition for belonging to the Church, namely actual baptism, has actually been fulfilled. Basing ourselves on this, we may legitimately give a wider interpretation to the first texts mentioned above about the possibility of salvation for someone outside the Church, and we may thus understand them as extending the possibility and actual, final realization of salvation even to those who never enter the Church. We are entitled to do this, even although, strictly speaking, the Council of Trent does not say anything about whether there actually are cases in this actual order of divine providence of someone having been justified by the votum baptismi who never reaches actual baptism and the full membership of the Church during the further course of his life. We may adopt this large-hearted and optimistic interpretation of the texts cited at the beginning without fear of erring and of reading too much into these texts, if only because it corresponds to what has now generally become, with ever decreasing exceptions, the generally accepted view of Catholic the Church for salvation in exactly the same way; for texts, cf. e.g. Straub I, n. 368. That it is possible even today to stretch the principle of the necessity of the Church for salvation too far, can be seen from the so-called Boston Heresy Case; for this, cf. C. Goddard-Clarke, The Loyolas and the Cabots (Boston 1950); G. Montesi, 'Skandal in Boston', Wort und Wahrheit VI (1951), pp. 233 sq.; E. Brock, 'The Boston Heresy Case', Theologische Zeitschrift (Basle) VIII (1952), pp. 49-59.

---

[44] Cf. e.g. Denz 348; 482 (Baptisma... credimus esse... perfectum remedium ad salutem); 712; 796; 799 (Sacramentum fidei sine qua nulli unquam contigit iustificatio); 861 (Si quis dixenit, baptismum liberum esse, hoc est, non necessarium ad salutem, anathema sit); 1470 (baptismum esse necessarium ad salutem).

[45] Denz 1647.

[46] Denz 1677.

[47] Denz 796. Cf. also Denz 1031-1033; 1070 sq. (justification is always given with believing love, even before baptism).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

theologians, a view never objected to by [40] the magisterium of the Church.[48] But it is undoubtedly true that such positive formulations of the possibility of salvation for those outside the Church had not been given with such clarity and optimism until more recent and indeed most recent times.

And yet it is not as if, even in earlier times, there were no traces of that consciousness in Tradition, which has since then led to such views as have already been allowed, although with very great caution, to leave their clear imprint on the above quoted formulae of Pius IX. Already at the time of St Cyprian, the anonymous author of a writing entitled De rebaptismate speaks, with reference to the centurion Cornelius (Ac 10.44 sqq.), of a baptism in the Holy Ghost, without water.[49] Well known also is the following expression which St Ambrose used in his funeral oration for the Emperor Valentian who had died without baptism[50]: Hunc sua pietas abluit et voluntas. It is possible to establish the doctrine of such a baptismus flaminis also from St Augustine, at least from certain periods of his theological development.[51] This doctrine of the possibility of justification and hence of salvation outside the Church solidified then (to put it bluntly and boldly) in the Middle Ages – beginning, for instance, with St Bernard[52] – into the explicit doctrine of the baptismus flaminis or baptismus in voto, and then settles in the Church's doctrinal pronouncements as the doctrine of the necessity of baptism, at least in voto, i.e. under certain circumstances also only in voto.[53] On the other hand, we have to admit nevertheless that the testimony of the Fathers, with regard to the [41] possibility of salvation for someone outside the Church, is very weak. Certainly, even the ancient Church knew[54] that the grace of God can be found also outside the Church and even before Faith.[55] But the view that such divine grace can lead man to his final salvation without leading him first into the visible Church, is something, at any rate, which met with very little approval in the ancient Church. For, with reference to the optimistic views on the salvation of catechumens as found in many of the Fathers, it must be noted that such a candidate for baptism was regarded in some sense or other as already 'Christianus',[56] and also that certain Fathers, such as Gregory Nazianzen[57]and Gregory of Nyssa,[58] seem to deny altogether the justifying power of love or of the desire for baptism. Hence it will be impossible to speak of a consensus dogmaticus in the early Church regarding the possibility of salvation for the non-baptized, and especially for someone who is not even a catechumen. In fact, even St Augustine, in his last (anti-pelagian) period, no longer maintained the [48] Thus also the Sacred Office, in a declaration of 8th August 1949, seems to count without hesitation on the fact that a votum implicitum Ecclesiae suffices for salvation in the case of someone in invincible error. Cf. A. Hoffmann, 'Die Heilsnotwendigkeit der Kirche', Neue Ordnung VII (1953), pp. 90-99.

[49] Cyprian, Opera III, 75 (Hartel).
[50] PL 16, 1374.
[51] For further reading on this question we would suggest L. Capéran, Le problême du salut des infidèles, Essai historique (Toulouse 1934), or A. d'Ales, Dictionnaire apologétique II (1924), pp. 819 sqq.; F. Hofmann, Den Kirchenbegriff des hl. Augustinus (Munich 1930); A. Landgraf, 'Das sacramentum in voto in der Frühscholastik', Mélanges Mandonnet II (Paris 1930), pp. 97-143. For the Fathers this problem arose in connection with the question about the eternal salvation of those who had died as catechumens. The biblical example is usually the good thief on Calvary.
[52] PL 182, 1036.
[53] Denz 388; 413; 847 and above all Denz 796: Council of Trent, Session VI, cap. 4; cf. CIC can. 737, §1 and Denz 1031. Cf. for this also P. Hörger, 'Concilii Tridentini de necessitate baptismi doctrina in decreto de iustificatione (sess. VI)', Antonianum XVII (1942), pp. 193-222; 269-302.
[54] What Jansenism still denied: Denz 1376, 1377, 1379, 1522.
[55] Cf. e.g. the Council of Orange, Denz 179 sqq. etc.
[56] Cf. e.g. the Canones Hippolyti, can. 63 sq.
[57] Or. 40, 23 (PG 36, 3890).
[58] 'Sermo contra dilationem Baptismi' (PG 46, 424).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

possibility of a baptism by desire.[59] The hard inflexibility in the formulation of the meaning of 'Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus', which has, after all, remained the same even in most recent times,[60] can, no doubt, be explained to some extent by the fact that the early Church did not, at the outset, make any very explicit or clear distinction between material and formal guilt. The Church only made this distinction in subsequently admitted, and particular cases. Instead, the early Church during the period of the preaching of the Gospel more or less took it for granted that every pagan remained a pagan through his own fault, and that every heretic and schismatic was a formal heretic or schismatic.[61] But we would not do justice to the theological sense of this ancient formula (which is [42] after all formulated in an equally apodictic manner with regard to the necessity of the orthodox faith, for instance, in the Athanasian Creed[62]), if we were to look on it as a formulation of the necessity of the Church for salvation merely in so far as it points out that subjective guilt either does not allow full membership of the Church to materialize or dissolves it again. This is clearly shown even by the simple fact that salvation was radically denied even to unbaptized children by appealing to this proposition: 'Extra Ecclesiam nulla salus'; and in their case there is of course no question of subjective guilt. In other words, even this fact alone shows that the necessity of belonging to the Church asserted by this formula, was of a fundamentally different order from any merely subjective moral obligation to belong to the Church. Having said all that, there still remain two further questions to be dealt with in the light of the Church's teaching before the Encyclical. First of all there is the question as to the way in which theology normally defines this particular necessity of membership of the Church more exactly; and, then the question as to how such a necessity can nevertheless be objectively and logically reconciled with what we have just seen, viz. the fact that salvation is possible even for someone who does not in fact actually belong to the visible Church.

d. In order to define more exactly in what way external membership of the visible Church is necessary for salvation, theologians make use of the notions of necessitas medii and necessitas praecepti.[63] This terminology, it is true, is not yet to be found explicitly in the pronouncements of the magisterium of the Church – these speak simply about a necessity for salvation. But this distinction, in its application to our [43] question, has its objective basis in the doctrine of the necessity both of baptism and of faith – or, formulated differently, it is objectively based on the necessity of wiping out original sin and of being in the state of grace in order to enter Heaven. This necessity was in all this always understood by Tradition and the teaching of the Church in the sense that it still applies even to one who, without any fault of his own, cannot comply with this necessity, as is seen most clearly in the case of the necessity of infant baptism.[64] Since the necessity of infant baptism is obviously a case of something necessary for the attainment of justification and salvation which still remains necessary even when the non-reception of baptism is absolutely guiltless, this necessity is [59] Cf. Fr. Hofmann, Der Kirchenbegriff des hl. Augustinus (Munich 1933), pp. 221 sqq., 381 sqq., 464 sqq.

[60] Cf. Denz 1647.
[61] And thus, for instance, usually regarded baptism among heretics as valid indeed (and hence as incapable of repetition), but did not regard it as conferring the Holy Ghost; – in fact, this was precisely the presupposition for the development of the doctrine of the sacramental character in St Augustine. Cf. as against this, however, the view of Pope Stephen (Denz 47, note 1), who obviously allows for a certain supernatural effect of baptism even amongst heretics. For the question as to which particular effects Pope Stephen adjudges to heretical baptism and which effects he excludes, cf. my remarks in the article entitled: 'Die Busslehre des hl. Cyprian von Karthago', ZKT LXXW (1952), pp. 264-271.
[62] Denz 40.
[63] Cf. J. A. de Aldama, 'La necesidad de medio en Ia Escolástica postridentina', Archivo Teológico Granadino VIII (1945), pp. 57-84.
[64] Denz 102; 410; 424; 430; 482; 712.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

therefore a necessity of means and not merely of precept. Thus if in fact, as is the almost universal view,[65] the consequences for the infant dying without baptism, even although this happens through no fault of its own, are that it remains in original sin and hence cannot attain justification, then this means that, according to the explicit teaching of the Church, the infant which has died in this way incurs the loss of supernatural beatitude. Consequently, the necessity of baptism for the attainment of the Beatific Vision, at least in these particular circumstances, [44] is more than just a necessity of precept; it is here a question of a necessity of means, since in this case the lack of baptism makes the attainment of the Beatific Vision impossible even although this lack is not due to any guilt. And since, according to what we have stated previously, the necessity of belonging as a member to the Church is of the same kind as the necessity of baptism, we must therefore affirm that the necessity of full membership of the Church is a necessity, not merely of precept, but of means. Accordingly, theologians do in fact teach unanimously that the Church's dogma of the necessity of the Church for salvation is to be understood in the sense of a necessity of means, so that this interpretation of the Church's dogma must be looked upon as itself a theologically certain doctrine. Up to this point the matter is relatively clear and simple, at least if we prescind from the fact that the notional distinction employed in all this is not, in fact, as unproblematical as it might seem. This doctrine, stating that membership of the Church is necessary as a means for salvation, becomes difficult only when we now go on to ask how it can be reconciled with the already explained doctrine of the Church about the possibility of salvation even for someone 'outside' the Church. For if membership of the Church, as defined more precisely in the first part, is required for the attainment of salvation with a 'necessity of means', then this membership is therefore also necessary for all those who through no fault of theirs do not possess it. Hence it would seem that the possibility of salvation is for this very reason denied to every one of these untold people from the very start, and even prescinding from any guilt, simply because they are not members of the Church.

e. It is relatively easy to give a purely formal solution to this difficulty regarding the compatibility of the facts that the visible Church is a necessary means for salvation and that it is possible for someone to be saved who does not belong to the visible Church. For just as Tradition and the magisterium of the Church recognize a baptismus in voto (a baptism of desire) besides actual baptism, so the same can and must in itself be held regarding full membership of the Church. Besides actual belonging to the visible Church (in the exact way in which this full membership was defined in the first Section), there is then also a membership of the Church in voto, a desire of the full membership of the Church. This desire in its turn can be conceived either as an explicit desire which as such is known to the person [65] In most recent times, it is true, there has been renewed theological controversy about this question. Cf. e.g. Ch.-V. Hens, 'Le salut des enfants morts sans baptême', Maison-Dieu X (1947), pp. 86-105; G. Mulders, 'Rond het Limbus-Vraagstuk', Bijdragen IX (1948), pp. 209-244; N. Sanders, 'Het ongedoopte Kind in het andere leven', Studia Catholica (1948), pp. 125-138; E. Boudes, 'Réflexions sur la solidarité des hommes avec le Christ. A l'occasion des limbes des enfants', NRT LXXI (1949), pp. 589-605 (giving a further bibliography); P. Laurenge, 'Esquisse d'une étude sur les enfants morts sans baptême', L'Année theologique augustinienne 1952; F. H. Drinkwater, 'The "Baptism invisible" and its extent', The Downside Review LXX (January 1953), No. 223, pp. 25-42; for a summarizing account cf. Peter Gumpel, 'Unbaptized infants: May they be saved?', The Downside Review No. 230 (1954), pp. 342-457. These attempts to leave a way open even for the *super*natural salvation of infants dying without baptism (without going against the teachings of Scripture, Tradition and the Church's magisterium) do not touch directly on our subject and, therefore, we do not need to enter here into a discussion of them. For even these attempts admit that an unbaptized infant is not saved simply because it was not its own fault that it could not receive baptism and hence seek some 'substitute' for baptism. In other words, they all presuppose that the necessity of baptism is a necessity of means (albeit a conditional necessity). And in the final analysis, this is really the only point with which we are here concerned.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and willed by him (e.g. [45] when a catechumen is prevented from receiving baptism by purely external circumstances) or as a desire which is present implicitly, i.e. is included in a serious general moral outlook[66] and intention to do everything necessary for salvation. And this intention or readiness can after all be present even when the person concerned does not know explicitly that membership of the Church is one of the objective factors necessary for salvation. When we thus distinguish between real and desired membership of the Church, there is no longer any formal difficulty, at any rate, in reconciling the two principles stating that the visible Church is a necessary means for salvation and that someone who is not actually a member of the Church can be saved. For these two principles are then reconciled by saying that the real full membership of the Church is necessary as a means for salvation in the sense that it can also, under certain circumstances, be supplied for by an (explicitly or implicitly) desired membership of the Church. And in this sense actual full membership of the Church is necessary with a conditional necessity of means. Or, to put it even more simply, full membership of the Church is a necessary means for salvation, but the notion of membership in this axiom embraces both actual and desired membership. By formulating it in this way, the possibility of attaining salvation even for someone who does not visibly belong to the Church is then not excluded from the sense of the statement that the Church is the only ark of salvation. And thus the statement, that the visible Church is necessary for salvation, loses its appearance of cruel and haughty severity towards that unnumbered multitude of those who seem to live with good intention outside the Church and beyond Christianity.

f. With the foregoing we have stated at least in outline all that can be affirmed from the explicit teaching of the Church and of theology before the Encyclical. But even before looking at the teaching of the Encyclical itself, it seems appropriate to point out a further series of theological problems (weitere theologische Problematik) which lie hidden [46] behind the apparently slick formal answer given by theology. It will be the task of the third part of these investigations to try at least to approach a solution of these problems. But even at the present stage we must not give the impression that this theological teaching on the necessity of the Church for salvation and on the possibility of salvation outside the Church does not need any further clarification. For this reason we must already at this stage clarify at least to some extent the further problems involved. It will certainly be objectively correct to say, on the one hand, that someone who has come to the use of reason can suffer the loss of supernatural salvation only through his own personal and grave fault. That seems to follow quite simply from the knowledge of the serious and universal salvific Will of God with regard to all men, which is clearly found in the Church's consciousness of Faith. On the other hand it is also true that we may not presume that all those who come to the use of reason (i.e. who have the capacity of making their own moral decisions), but who during their life do not, in fact, reach full and external membership of the visible Church, are kept from this by their own personal grave fault. For no matter how great the tendency may be for us today to be wary once more of conceding a clear conscience, we will hardly be able to suppose, in view of the immense amount of external conditioning of the personal spiritual life of man by disposition, race, upbringing, level of culture, etc., that the unnumbered millions of people, who throughout the Christian period have not come to the Church, were prevented from doing so by their own fault. Nor will we be able to assume, as Billot[67] did a few decades ago, [66] We naturally cannot enter here into the question concerning the extent and the exact sense in which Faith, in its strict theological sense, is necessary for everyone without exception as a means for salvation, as part of this ethico-religious attitude which guarantees salvation. Cf. on this point S. Harent, 'Infidèles', DTC VII, pp. 1726-1930; R. Lombandi, La salvezza di chi non ha la fede[4] (Rome 1949). (E.T. The Salvation of the Unbeliever, London, 1956).

[67] Cf. L. Billot, 'La providence de Dieu et le nombre infini d'hommes hors de la voie normale du salut', Etudes

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation that the majority of these people remained on the infant level with regard to ethico-religious decisions, and that therefore the question about the possibility of their salvation is simply part of the question about God's salvific Will regarding infants. We [47] will really, therefore, have to conclude from these two propositions that there are in fact people who attain their supernatural goal without externally belonging to the visible Church. If, and in so far as, these persons have an interior supernatural faith and, rooted in this, a supernatural love of God (how this can be in the case of pagans, is a question which cannot occupy us here), then we certainly can and must say on these presuppositions that such persons have at least implicitly had the desire (votum) for external membership of the visible Church. But if one gives these words their plain meaning and understands them exactly and dispassionately, then, by speaking precisely of a votum for external membership of the Church, we once more underline by this term itself, that these persons did not actually belong to the visible Church, but merely desired to belong to the Church. And it is no use, with regard to this point, to side-step the issue by suddenly and imperceptibly switching over to some concept of 'Church' other than that of 'visible Church'; the latter was the sole concept of which we spoke in the first part, and it was with this concept alone in mind that we inquired into the conditions of membership. For the axiom of the early Church about the necessity of the Church for salvation seems to state precisely that it is necessary for salvation to belong actually to the visible Church. It would seem that, when the early Church explains its teaching of the necessity of the visible Church over and over again by means of such illustrations as 'paradise', 'Noah's ark', 'the House of Rahab' or 'an organic body', we are meant to understand by this that it is here a question of absolute (and not merely conditional) necessity of means. After all, someone saves himself from the raging seas only when he has actually got on board the ship and not when he merely desires to be on the ship – and a member is alive only when it is actually united with the body and not simply when it would like to be united with it. Of course, it is certainly true to say that such comparisons must not be stretched too far. But would these illustrations have any meaning left if they were not meant to indicate the necessity of an actual membership of the Church? It is, after all, precisely the visibleness of the Church and the necessity of actually and fully belonging to this visible Church, which the Fathers wish to underline and explain by these similes; but to belong in voto to the Church means precisely that there is in this case no visible membership, and it, therefore, cannot be considered for the constitution of the visibleness of the Church either. Moreover, to solve [48] our question by showing the possibility of a baptism and a Church membership in voto, seems to be a confusion of two orders which should be clearly distinguished. The desire for baptism and membership of the Church belongs to the dimension of the inner and personal decisions of man, whereas the actual membership of the visible Church belongs to the dimension of the visible and signifying sacramental actuality which symbolizes and effects saving grace. The inner spiritual attitude of a man (in so far as he is capable of such) is, of course, also of decisive importance for the actual attainment of salvation; this does not, however, imply that this attitude as a personal, spiritual and free human act before God (and which as such lies beyond historical verifiability and the social order), can replace the visibleness of membership of the Church which has the nature of a sacramental sign. If one were to suppose this, however, then one would have to be consistent and say that the cessation of such an inner personal will to membership of the Church would

---

CLXI (19:9), pp. 129-149; CLXII (1920), pp. 129-152; CLXIII (1920), pp. 5-32; CLXIV (1920), pp. 385-404; CLXV (1920), pp. 515-535; CLXVII (1921), pp. 257-279; CLXIX (1921), pp. 385-407; CLXXII (1922), pp. 515-535; CLXXVI (1923), pp. 385-408. For a criticism cf. L. Capéran, Le problème du salut des infidèles, Essai historique. Essai théologique (Toulouse 1934) (2nd edition of both works); S. Harent, 'Infidèles', DTC VII, p. 1891; pp. 1898-1912; M. Larivé, 'I..a providence de Dieu et le salut des infidèles', Revue Thomiste XXVIII (1923), pp. 43-73; H. Lange, De gratia (Freiburg 1929), n. 694 (with further bibliographical references).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

also dissolve this very membership of the Church. But we have already rejected this in the first Section for a very decisive reason, when we showed that someone who disbelieves merely internally, still belongs to the Church. If the votum baptismi, merely as an inner subjective human act, were sufficiently constitutive of membership of the Church, considered as a necessary means of salvation – and all the more so if this were true even of a merely implicit votum – then, in order to be consistent and logical, we would have to say that it is really the inner spiritual attitude of the adult which is necessary as a means for salvation. And thus it would have to be said that the obligation to belong also externally to the Church is merely implied in this necessity of the inner attitude as a consequence or as added to it, and implied by a necessitas praecepti, if it be possible and if one becomes conscious of this precept. But if, in this way, the inner decision of a person were properly speaking and fundamentally the sole necessary factor for salvation, then it is difficult to see why the necessity for salvation of such an inner and freely adopted attitude should and could be any different from the necessity of a moral obligation. For the necessity of a free decision seems of its very nature to be the necessity of a moral demand, i.e. a necessitas praecepti. Of course, one might object to this on the grounds that according to all theologians the freely and personally made act of faith is, after all, also an inner, free human act on the one hand, and that, on the other hand, it is nevertheless regarded by all theologians, [49] in accordance with Heb. 11.6, as a necessary means for the salvation of adults. However this merely extends the problem, but does not solve it. For the distinction between what is necessary as a means and what is necessary by precept would in this way seem to be reduced to a point where it can no longer be conceived with any meaning at all. The sole decisive factor for salvation would in this case seem to be merely man's inner attitude. And this attitude, in the form of a votum baptismi et Ecclesiae or of an act of faith, would then have to be said to be necessary as a means for salvation, in spite of the fact that, as a free moral act, it can surely imply only a moral obligation for man. And thus the question would arise of how God can demand such an act from an infant dying before reaching the use of reason for the attainment of its salvation, when it is quite incapable of performing this act. If what is strictly necessary as a means of salvation is the inner faith of man – and since God will surely not demand more of the infant than of the grown-up – he would, in that case, seem to demand an act of faith from the infant and not properly speaking actual baptism, since even of the adult he seems to demand actual baptism only by precept. Or conversely, if inner faith is really necessary as a means for salvation (understood in a sense which is more than a necessity of precept), then this faith would have to be demanded of the child as necessary for salvation, even though (according to all appearances) it is incapable of making this act of faith. There would then remain only one way out of this difficulty, viz. to postulate (contrary to all appearances) the possibility, even for a dying infant, of making a free decision of faith (as has still been done most recently by Daniel Feuling,[68] for instance). In this way we could then indeed regard the inner personal decision of faith as necessary, both as means and by precept, for the salvation of all men. But even this would not help us to solve the actual question we have posed ourselves. For this would still leave us only with a demand in the sphere of free personal attitudes and decisions, which is also a necessary means for salvation. However, according to everything that has been said so far, it is more than improbable that whatever is meant by the necessity of the Church for salvation could be found on this level of inner personal decision alone. Is it possible, ultimately, fully to explain the apodictic statements of the Fathers, who flatly deny the possibility of salvation to unbelievers [50] and schismatics practically without any restrictions (with the few exceptions we pointed out above), merely by the fact that they do not explicitly take into account the distinction between those in good faith and those in bad [68] Katholische Glaubenslehre (Salzburg 1937), p. 904.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

faith for the simple reason that they always presumed in practice a formal guilt on the part of pagans and heretics? Or is there a still deeper theological reason behind the emphasis on the necessity of the visible Church for salvation, which is to a certain extent clouded by the nowadays usual formulation, according to which actual membership of the visible Church can be supplied for by a purely interior, personal human act? Or to put it more exactly: Is the votum Ecclesiae, in fact and in the concrete, a purely spiritual, personal human act in the sphere of a positively extra-sacramental and utterly invisible interiority of grace, and does it thereby and in this manner replace the visible and, in a certain sense, sacramental way of belonging to the Church, the sign of salvation made incarnationally visible? Or is it necessary to show that the votum Ecclesiae has a certain inherent 'visibleness', so that it can on that account replace the normal external membership of the visible Church when the need arises, without the sacramental structure of all salvation being thereby suddenly suspended in a special case? Is this the truth of the matter, so that something which is necessary as a means in the dimension of personal decisions does not suddenly supplant or replace something necessary as a means in the dimension of the nature of the sacramental sign?

This brings us to the end of our outline of the teaching of the Church's magisterium and of theologians, before the Encyclical, about the possibility of grace and salvation for someone, who in the sense of the first Section, does not belong to the visible Church. We have also at least suggested the whole line of problems which still demand further explanation relative to this doctrine. However, before we pursue this task of further explanation, we must examine the teaching of the Encyclical on whether it is possible for someone who does not belong to the visible Church to be saved.

2. The teaching of the Encyclical on the possibility of grace and salvation for those who are not members of the visible Church

a. The texts themselves:

There are three statements in the Encyclical[69] to which we must [51] now give our attention: (Spiritus Christi) membra . . . a corpore omnino abscissa renuit sanctitatis gratia inhabitare. Qui ad adspectabilem non pertinent catholicae Ecclesiae compagem . . . de sempiterna cuiusque propria salute securi esse non possunt. Qui fide vel regimine invicem dividuntur, in uno eiusmodi corpore atque uno eius divino spiritu vivere nequeunt.

As can be seen, these sentences also express the necessity of the Church for salvation in the twofold way of which we spoke before: outside the Church there is no certainty of salvation; anyone who does not belong to the Church, does not have the grace of the Holy Ghost, in which salvation consists in the concrete.

b. Some general considerations about the interpretation of these texts:

When we think back over our statement of the previous teaching of the Church's magisterium on the necessity of the Church, of baptism, of subjection to the Roman Pontiff, etc., for salvation, we see at once that these three statements of the Encyclical do not add anything new. They in no way differ, either from the point of view of their meaning or of the perspective which gave rise to their expression, from the previous pronouncements made by the magisterium on the necessity of the Church for salvation and on the conclusions to be drawn from this. These three statements are simply a reiteration of the dogma of Faith as it had been clearly held even before the Encyclical and indeed from the very beginning of the Church. Hence no one at least who knew the previous unchangeable teaching of the Church

[69] AAS XXXV (1943), 203; 243.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

will be surprised or astonished at the apparent harshness of these statements.

The Encyclical treats exclusively of the nature of the Church. The particular subject of the Encyclical does indeed include in some way also the necessity of the Church for salvation, therefore, but it is quite obvious, by the same token, that the question about the possibility of salvation for someone who is actually outside the visible Church, is simply viewed in the particular perspective of the necessity of membership of the Church for salvation. It lies, therefore, completely outside the scope of the Encyclical to treat of the question as to what positive possibility of salvation there is for such a person and as to how such a possibility of salvation can be objectively and logically reconciled with the necessity of the visible Church for salvation. If, therefore, we do not receive any information on this question, the [52] reason for this is not to be found in the fact that the present magisterium of the Church contests such a possibility of salvation, or tries to push it as far into the background of theological consciousness as possible. The reason for this lack of information will simply be the fact that this question does not pertain to the subject of the Encyclical. It is, therefore, obvious from the outset that all those insights into the possibility of grace and of salvation for non-Catholics, which had been manifested up until then either by the Church's magisterium itself or by the universal teaching of theologians, remain rightly intact even after the Encyclical. And this all the more so, since no counter-appeals to all this will arise out of the interpretation of those statements of the Encyclical which are under discussion. Many even of the previously referred to statements by the magisterium of the Church about the necessity of the Church for salvation lack those precise qualifications, in their apodictic form, which we have added to them in the spirit of the magisterium, of Tradition and of the universal teaching of theologians, when we spoke of the possibility of salvation for those who are outside the visible Church. When the Council of Trent,[70] for example, anathematizes anyone who denies that baptism is necessary for salvation, this canon does not deny (although there is no reference in it to the votum baptismi) what the same Council[71] teaches elsewhere, viz. that in certain circumstances even a votum baptismi can suffice for justification. In the case of all such statements about the Church and baptism as necessary for salvation, we may rightly, and indeed must, according to the mind of the Church's magisterium, add the qualification that this membership of the Church, and baptism, are conditionally necessary. Thus the statement about the membership of the Church as a necessary means for salvation may and must be understood as referring to a conditional necessity of means for salvation, so that the actual membership of the visible Church can, with the usual prerequired conditions, be replaced also by the fact of belonging to the Church in voto. And this is valid even when this is not expressly added in such statements about the necessity of the Church for grace and salvation.

There are partly objective and partly historical reasons why in such pronouncements by the magisterium about the necessity of the Church for salvation this qualification is normally not added. The objective [53] reason consists in the fact that it follows immediately from the very nature of things, that the mere votum Ecclesiae is not of equal privilege with actual membership of the Church as a means of salvation, but can only supply for this actual membership of the Church in exceptional cases. The historical reason for this traditional way of expression – and probably the more important of the two – lies in the fact that, in respect of our present question, it is clear from the history of the development of the Church's consciousness of the Faith that the knowledge of the necessity of actual membership of the Church came earlier and was more explicit than the reflections about the possibility of salvation for someone who is outside the Church. And, therefore, that knowledge fashioned its dogmatic formulae (which, speaking naturally, have an extraordinary consistency) much

[70] Denz 861.
[71] Denz 796.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

more decisively than the only slowly and timidly developing reflections about the possibility of salvation and grace for someone outside the Church. Added to this there is the fact that the proclamation of the Faith as message of salvation has of its very nature an existential character. This means that it is a message which tries to express God's demands of men and man's duty even in its most abstract formulae, a message, in other words, which outlines the existential situation of man. But it does not have so much to say, on the same lines, about the sovereign freedom and mercy of God, which God reserves to himself and which, precisely in these questions of grace and of eternal salvation, are largely incomprehensible to man's understanding even when enlightened by revelation. And what is valid, in this sense, of the interpretation of these earlier statements by the Church's magisterium, can equally well be applied to the statements of the Encyclical. This means that we have from the very start the right to add the qualification of the conditional to its statements about the necessity of the Church for grace and salvation, if they do not already state this qualification explicitly themselves.

c. About the particular interpretation of each of the three statements.

The following points should be made regarding the first statement cited above: the starting-point of the interpretation of this statement must be the question as to the exact meaning of the phrase 'membra a corpore omnino abscissa'. Two conceivable possibilities offer themselves here: The first possibility is to understand this phrase about the members separated from the body, simply of all those who, according [54] to the norm given by the Encyclical (p. 202), are not full members of the Church, i.e. of those who are separated from the visible Church by lack of baptism, or by a profession of faith different from that of the Church, or by non-subjection to the ecclesiastical ruling power. Interpreted in this way, the meaning of the statement must be as follows: Anyone who does not possess full membership of the visible Church, does not possess the sanctifying grace of the Spirit of Christ. This statement would in that case be one of those apodictic pronouncements about the necessity of Church membership as a means for justification, which we have already frequently cited from earlier doctrinal utterances by the magisterium of the Church. Even although it is not here explicitly stated by the Encyclical, such a statement (as we have seen) permits of the tacit addition: 'unless he be in this state through no fault of his own and also has the votum Ecclesiae'.

But there is a second possibility for the interpretation of this first statement, and this seems the probable one to us. According to this interpretation, the membra a corpore omnino abscissa are not simply all those who are not members of the Church in the full sense in accordance with the norm on p. 202, but only those who are utterly and in every respect separated from the Church. For, in spite of its emphasis on the fact that heretics and schismatics are not members of the Church in the proper and strictest sense, the Encyclical nevertheless evidently recognizes explicitly or tacitly some sort of wider reference and manner of belonging to the Church for men. It recognizes an inscio quodam desiderio ac voto ad mysticum redemptoris corpus ordinari[72] (p. 243) in the case of those who are not simply speaking members of the Church. It often stresses the natural blood relationship of all men with Christ; it knows that Christ in becoming man became the Head of all men and the Saviour of all men (even although 'especially' of the faithful). When the Encyclical stresses that those who are not simply speaking members of the Church are deprived of many and [72] Chavasse (NRT LXXX [1948], pp. 697 sq.) and Brinktrine (Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII [1947-48], p. 292) draw attention to the fact that Bellarmine's 'voto esse in Ecclesia' is most likely intentionally avoided in the Encyclical, which says instead 'desiderio ac voto ad mysticum Redemptoris corpus ordinari'. In other words, the Encyclical did everything in its power to avoid giving the impression that the yearning for membership is already a 'being-in-the-Church' or a proper actual membership.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

great heavenly graces (p. 43), it obviously presupposes that these [55] people who are separated, are not however deprived of every influence of grace from Christ. The Encyclical also represents the ecclesiological aspect of the Sacraments in great detail. Therefore, since it is self-evident in this connection (for it is Catholic Dogma) that the Sacraments can be valid and effective even outside the Church, this again implies that there is, if we may put it this way, a share of 'attachment to the Church' (Kirchlichkeit) even outside the Church, precisely if and because such sacramental visibleness of the saving work of Christ has its proper place basically 'inside' the Church. Again, the Encyclical (p. 242) speaks of the High Priestly Prayer for the members of the Church on the one hand, and, on the other hand, for those who, because they are pagans or heretics and schismatics, are not members of the Church. And in this connection it mentions not only the Souls in Purgatory but also the catechumens in the section on prayer for members of the Church. But according to the previous declarations of the Encyclical, catechumens are not 'reapse' members of the Church. There must, therefore, be some way of belonging to the Church which is to be distinguished from the notion of full and proper membership and yet is not purely fictitious. All these hints given by the Encyclical are so many indications of the fact that, besides the simple straightforward membership of the Church, there are other lesser and looser ways of belonging to Christ and to the Mystical Body of Our Lord which reaches concrete form in the Church.[73] If this is

[73] We wish to remark at once that such a view (of which we will speak more explicitly in Part III) has nothing to do with the distinction between constitutional and operative membership of the Church as advocated by some canonists (cf. note 25 above). For this distinction, as made e.g. by Mörsdorf, presupposes that the proper, essential membership is the same in all baptized persons, since it can at most experience an abatement merely in its activation but never in its nature. This distinction also presupposes that the unity of faith and law is less constitutive of the membership of the Church than baptism. Even if 'operative membership' in Mörsdorf's sense were to be explained as 'essential' (since in his sense it too is obligatory), one would still be bound to say that on this supposition the distinction between constitutional and operative membership has a most misleading effect as terminology. For what distinguishes an operative or active membership from an activation of membership? An activation of membership, however, from the very nature of things, cannot be an essential membership, but can at best be only the act of an essential state. But all this has nothing to do with the acknowledgement of the fact that, besides proper and full membership (for which baptism and unity of faith and law are, essentially speaking, equally important constitutive parts), there are also looser ways of belonging to Christ and to that saving reality which becomes concrete, in an historically and juridically verifiable manner, in what we call 'the Church'. We grant that greater clarity could be achieved on this point both in the Encyclical and amongst theologians, if one were to use a more differentiated terminology. Using the precedent of canonistic terminology, we have already distinguished above between 'legal status in the Church', the 'subject relationship' ('the being-subject') and 'membership', each of which is different from the other and is also constituted in a different way. One might now go on to ask whether 'belonging' (Zugehörigkeit) and 'being a member' (Gliedschaft) are to be considered as terminologically equivalent or whether they can be distinguished. To the feel of the German language, at least, these two notions are not absolutely equivalent. 'Belonging' seems to be a wider notion which, for instance, embraces also legal status and the subject relationship (or could do so, at least). One could inquire whether, on the presupposition of such a terminological distinction, one should not say that 'being a member' (of the actual kind) is something which does not admit of degrees (one either is or is not a member) whereas 'belonging' does admit of degrees, the highest and fullest of which is precisely membership itself. From there one could go on to ask further, whether the 'ordinari' towards the Church, of which the Encyclical speaks, is not an even wider notion, which does, indeed, include all grades of 'belonging' apart from the highest degree of belonging (i.e. membership), but over and above this applies also in the case where one may no longer speak even of an incomplete 'belonging', as e.g. in the case of a non-baptized pagan of good dispositions. At the same time, the notion of 'belonging' would then find its proper application, in such a context of a more precise terminology, only in cases where one or several (but not all) of the elements are present which, apart from those conditions which can never be missing, are required for full belonging (i.e. membership), such as baptism, for instance, or profession of the true faith (as in the case of a catechumen). Although the individual theologian cannot simply create such a terminology for himself in the hope that its use will then become universal, he can nevertheless try to employ it on his own account and at his own risk. It is in this sense that we speak here of 'belonging', on the one hand, and of 'membership', on the other. Objectively there is no problem about this. For no theologian can deny that even a heretic, while not being a 'member' of the right, then it is [57] true also that all those and only those can come under the heading of membra omnino abscissa, who do not even belong to the Church in any of these looser ways. It is, of course, in consequence absolutely and unconditionally true to say of these, that they do not have the Holy Spirit of Christ. But in the concrete this could be said with certainty only of those who, having come to the use of reason, have explicitly or implicitly rejected any union with Christ as their head by their own and subjectively grave fault, and thus have also severed every relationship with his mystical Body.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It follows from all this, however, that objectively speaking both interpretations of the text in question come to the same thing in the end. For one's meaning is ultimately the same, whether one says that heretics and schismatics do not possess the Holy Ghost unless they have a votum Ecclesiae (all other conditions being fulfilled), or whether one says that those heretics and schismatics do not have the Holy Ghost, who do not even have the votum Ecclesiae (and thus are membra omnino abscissa). It is therefore quite immaterial which of the two interpretations is formally correct, and hence we also cannot reproach the Encyclical for not having presented this doctrine clearly enough. The first statement under discussion, therefore, does not exclude the possibility that someone possesses justifying grace, who is not a [58] member of the Church in the full sense of the fundamental norms of the Encyclical (p. 202). For, on the one hand (to repeat our basic reflections once more) we have seen that, according to the traditional ecclesiastical usage and even when this is not expressly stated, the emphasis of the necessity of actual membership of the Church for justification does not exclude the possibility of this 'belonging' being supplied by a desire or votum for it, in the case of someone who, without any guilt on his part, is in error or ignorance. And, on the other hand, the Council of Trent (not to mention other arguments which could be adduced) evidently presupposes the possibility of a person's being justified by the mere votum baptismi,[74] in which connection it must be noted, however, that such a person, who has not yet received the Sacrament of baptism, is certainly not a member of the Church without any further qualification, in spite of his votum baptismi.

The statement quoted by us in second place is taken from the Litterae Apostolicae of Pius IX, which the latter addressed 'ad omnes Protestantes aliosque Acatholicos' on 13th September 1868, in order to announce to them the summoning of the Vatican Council and to Church, remains nevertheless subject to the Church and, therefore, still 'belongs' to her in this sense, even although one cannot say that he 'belongs as a member' ('angehört') to her. Furthermore, the term 'being-in-the-Church' will be reserved for membership. For already in the imagery used by the Fathers (and especially by St Augustine), a heretic is someone who – like the soldier with his army unit or the sheep in its fold – ought to be in the Church (and therefore, still 'belongs', in the nature of things, 'to' the army or fold of the Church), but, in fact, simply is no longer 'in' the Church. This. manner of belonging to the Church (who is herself visible) without, however, being an (actual) member of the Church, can itself be again either 'visible' (i.e. historically verifiable) or 'invisible'. If it is 'visible', it is constituted either by baptism or by the profession of the true faith (in the case of the catechumen), or by baptism and true faith without, however, subjection to the ecclesiastical authority (in the case of the schismatic). If this 'belonging' is 'invisible', it is constituted by the possession of justifying grace (or by infused supernatural faith). Of course, one and the same person flay thus 'belong' both visibly and invisibly and yet not be a member. We will have to ask ourselves in the third Part of these investigations whether someone can belong 'invisibly' to the visible Church (without having proper, full membership), i.e. in a manner which has absolutely no quasi-sacramental visibleness and historical tangibility – or whether this is unthinkable. We have not really anticipated this question by the notional distinctions just made. Such a manner of belonging to the visible Church would be termed 'invisible' only in so far as it is constituted by grace, which does indeed relate man to the one Church through his social nature and the Holy Ghost, although not in a historically perceptible manner. For an account of similar attempts to evolve a more precise terminology in this matter, cf. M. Nothomb, in Irénikon XXV (1952), pp. 241 sqq. These attempts originated above all from the French-speaking world, where it is perhaps more difficult to distinguish between appartenance, incorporation etc.

---

[74] Denz 796.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

exhort them to return to the unity of the Church.[75] Let us say at once that this statement about the uncertainty of salvation for those who are separated from the Church, naturally does not mean that Catholics, as opposed to those separated from the Church, have an absolute subjective certitude of their salvation and do not have to 'work out their salvation in fear and trembling'; such an absolute subjective certitude of salvation is not normally granted to anyone.[76] Hence in the statement under discussion it is not directly a question of subjective certainty or uncertainty of salvation in the human consciousness. It is rather a question of the presence or absence of the objective presuppositions for salvation, such as they are normally provided for, prepared and demanded by God in the concrete order. Since membership of the Church is one of these conditions, it is obvious that anyone who is not a member of the Church lacks one of the positive conditions for objective security of salvation. It follows from this that anyone who of his own grave fault rejects this objective condition for salvation which is obligatory for him, thereby also forfeits salvation as long as he persists in this state of mind – and that such a person can in that [59] sense also not be subjectively certain of salvation. As is emphasized by the Encyclical (p. 243) it is a fact that actual membership brings with it a great abundance of graces, on account of the common life of the faithful in the true faith and on account of their sure direction by the Church, etc. All this is lacking even to someone who is outside the Church through no fault of his own. Taking this fact into consideration, it follows that no one has at hand the same objective aids for his salvific activity as the members of the Church, even though he is in no way responsible for his being separated from the Church. And, therefore, such a person is also objectively in a less secure position than a member of the Church. In this sense it is also true to say of him that, although he is guiltless, he is not as sure of his salvation as a Catholic (but ultimately, of course, all this is rooted in God's free and inscrutable Will of good pleasure, for he distributes his grace as he wills). But the statement in question does not mean that this objective insecurity of salvation, even for someone who is outside the Church through no fault of his own, is such that it is absolutely impossible for him to attain salvation. Indeed it does not even mean that the grace which is included in actual membership of the Church, can never under any circumstances be replaced in God's mercy by some other, more hidden supernatural aids from God. For the rest, we can apply the same to this statement as what was said about the first. In other words, if we understand by uncertainty the insecurity of salvation on account of the lack of absolutely every means for salvation, then this applies only to those who are separated from the Church through their own subjective fault. If we understand this statement as meaning an insecurity of a relative and not of an absolute kind, on account of the lesser although still sufficient[77] degree of objective possibility of salvation (which is still given even by the looser relationship with the Church), then it can and must apply to all who do not actually belong in the fullest sense to the Church. Objectively speaking, [60] these two possible interpretations come once more to the same thing in the long run.

We come now to a more particular explanation of the third of the statements cited above: Qui fide vel regimine invicem dividuntur, in uno eiusmodi corpore atque uno eius divino spiritu vivere nequeunt. In the framework of this second Section of our investigation there is no longer any question of the fact that those who are not subject to the teaching and ruling

[75] Collectio Lacensis VII, 8-10.
[76] Cf. Denz 802; 822-825.
[77] On account of his universal salvific Will, God gives every man sufficient grace to work out his salvation, if he does not reject this opportunity through his own fault. Hence, anyone who does not want to maintain that to remain outside the Church throughout one's life is always and in every case a sign of grave subjective guilt, must admit that, on account of God's universal salvific Will, a person can be provided with sufficient opportunity for salvation even when he never actually attains to membership of the Church throughout his whole life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

authority of the Church, no longer belong to the Body of the Church. What we have to discuss here is that interpretation of this statement which goes on to conclude that these same people are moreover neither animated by, nor live in, the divine Spirit of this Church. Objectively, of course, to live by the one divine Spirit of the Church in the fullest sense, means sanctifying grace and, to a lesser degree, possibly even the infused virtues of Faith and Hope. The latter can, according to the Council of Trent, still be present even in someone who has lost justifying grace. To live by the divine Spirit of the Church does not mean a 'spiritual communion of outlook' with the Church, as some have tried to interpret it in order to make things easier for themselves. For in the whole Encyclical the word spiritus is never used to mean a spiritual attitude or outlook, or anything else of that nature. On the contrary, it is always used to mean the divine Person of the Holy Spirit, in so far as he is the justifying and sanctifying principle of the members of the Church, together with his created graces.[78] If, therefore, anyone who is not in the fullest sense a member of the Church is nevertheless to be said to be justified, then such justification and sanctification can only be the work of this [61] divine Spirit of the Church. But precisely this seems at first sight to be excluded by the statement under discussion. And at least at this point we cannot give the second and more probable interpretation of this text which we used when interpreting the first statement in question. In itself, only those were formally said to be deprived of the Holy Ghost together with his sanctifying grace, in that interpretation, who are no longer in any way united with the Church. But in the third statement the same is said also of those who do not possess full and proper membership of the Church, although their lack of this proper membership is still always compatible with a looser relationship to the Church. As far as the third statement is concerned, therefore, it can only be a question of emphasis on the necessity of full membership of the Church for the possession of grace. However, according to our previous arguments, this necessity of full membership of the Church for the possession of grace is a conditional necessity of means, i.e. a necessity which, in certain circumstances and under appropriate presuppositions, can be fulfilled also by the mere votum of full membership of the Church. Our explanations in the first section of the second part have already proved that it is ecclesiastical usage (which is, of course, based on the nature of things) to predicate this necessity of the visible Church for grace also of full membership of the Church, without mentioning always also that it is possible for this form of belonging to the Church (which is a necessary means for salvation) to be supplied for by the votum Ecclesiae. We have also shown already that we are not prevented from understanding this necessity of belonging to the Church as a means to salvation in the sense of a conditional necessity, by the fact that it is formulated apodictically. This usage of the Church is completely justified by the fact that the votum Ecclesiae, which, if need be, can be sufficient in certain extreme cases, merely re-emphasizes of its very nature the necessity of the Church for salvation. For the possibility of salvation provided by the mere votum Ecclesiae is not really founded directly on the objective nature of things. It is founded rather on the inadequacy (even although guiltless) of the circumstances and of the understanding of the person who finds grace and salvation by reason [78] I cannot see why the divine Spirit in question should be the 'Spirit who is the Soul of this Body and who above all effects and guarantees the infallibility of the Church' (thus Brinktrine, in Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII [1947-48], p. 293, note 24). It is, of course, true that the statement with which we have just been concerned, is the summary and conclusion of the statements about the conditions of Church membership and about the reasons for them. But from this it follows that this Spirit, according to the texts from St Paul (1 Cor. 12.13 and Eph 4.5) quoted by the Encyclical in the very preceding sentence, is the One in Whom we were baptized at baptism into the one Body animated by this Spirit. Now the whole of Tradition and the whole teaching of the Encyclical take it for granted that one is granted justification by being made a member of the one Body of the Church and by thus participating in its Spirit. But where does the Encyclical speak of our participating in this Spirit by baptism precisely in as far as he effects the infallibility of the Church (which, of course, is in fact one of his effects)?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of the votum Ecclesiae alone. For, if it is in this way understood correctly, the possibility of salvation provided by the votum Ecclesiae does not mean a separate possibility of salvation which would take its place with equal rights beside that other possibility of salvation provided by full actual membership of the Church. And this [62] is true, no matter how much more decisively important the votum Ecclesiae may be, in practice, in innumerable cases. Hence, even in the case of this third statement, we may tacitly but objectively add that anyone who is divided from the Church by faith or government, cannot possess its divine Spirit, unless he be in good faith and has the votum Ecclesiae.

We conclude this Section with two quotations which, although quite independent of the Encyclical, seem to us to reiterate and to summarize well the material contents of the problems with which we have been concerned in this Section. The first passage to be quoted consists of the 6th and 7th Chapter of the Schema constitutionis dogmaticae de Ecclesia Christi Patrum examini propositum, submitted for the Vatican Council.[79] Albeit this Schema, as seen from the point of view of the magisterium, is a purely private work of theologians, it is nevertheless a good summary of the Church's teaching on the necessity of the visible Church for salvation and on the possibility of salvation for those who are divided from the Church. Moreover, it has not really been surpassed by any theological work since the Vatican Council. It reads as follows:

> The Church is a society which is utterly necessary for the attainment of salvation. Hence everyone should understand exactly how necessary the Church of Christ is as a society for the attainment of salvation. For she is as necessary as the unity and union with Christ, the Head, and with his Mystical Body. Apart from her there is no other community which he nourishes and cares for as his Church, which alone He has loved and for which He has given himself so as to sanctify her, by purifying her through the waters of baptism in the Word of Life, in order to render her unspeakably exquisite to himself, without spot or wrinkle or anything of that kind, but rather holy and without blemish. We therefore teach: The Church is not a society with regard to which man may please himself, as if knowledge or ignorance of her, entry into her or leaving her be quite indifferent for salvation. On the contrary, she is utterly necessary for this, and this not only by the necessity of the Lord's precept, by which the Saviour prescribed entry into her for all peoples. She is also necessary for this by the necessity of means, since in the factual order of saving providence, the communication [63] of the Holy Ghost, and the participation in Truth and Life are only obtained within the Church and through the Church of which Christ is the Head. Furthermore, it is a Dogma of Faith that outside the Church no one can be saved. And yet no one who is in invincible error regarding Christ and his Church, will have to be declared deserving of eternal punishment on account of such error. For such a person is in no way involved in guilt in this respect before the eyes of the Lord. God desires that all men should be saved and should attain to the knowledge of the Truth, and He will not deny to anyone who does what is in his power, the grace for being able to attain justification and eternal life. But no one will attain eternal life who passes out of this life separated from the unity of faith or from the community of the Church, through his own fault. Anyone who is not in this Ark will perish in the raging floods. Therefore we reject and abhor the doctrine of religious indifferentism, which is both a godless doctrine and one which is, in fact, contrary to reason. We mean the doctrine according to which the children of this world annul the difference between truth and error and then declare that one religion is as good as the other for reaching the haven of eternal life. Or they maintain that one can have only more or less probable opinions

[79] Collectio Lacensis VII, 569.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

about the truth of a religion, but never certitude. We equally condemn the godlessness of those who close the kingdom of heaven to men, by maintaining on false pretexts that it is unbecoming and quite unnecessary for salvation to change from the religion in which one was born or brought up, even if that religion be false. We condemn the godlessness of those who reproach the Church for declaring herself to be the only true religion and for rejecting and condemning all other religious communions and sects which are separated from her communion – as if righteousness and godlessness had anything to do with each other, or light and darkness had anything in common; as if Christ and Belial could speak with one voice.

The other text is taken from Pius IX's Allocution 'Singulari quadam' of 9th December 1854[80]:

Another error, equally destructive, has taken hold of some parts of the Catholic World, as we see to our sorrow. It has sunk deep [64] into the minds of those Catholics principally who think there is good hope for the eternal salvation of all those who in no wise live in the true Church of Christ. Therefore, they are in the habit of frequently asking what will be the future lot and condition after death of those who in no way have given adherence to the Catholic faith. Advancing the flimsiest of arguments, they expect a reply that will support this erroneous opinion. Far be it from Us, Venerable Brethren, to dare set limits to the divine mercy, which is infinite. Far be it from Us to want to penetrate the secret plans and judgements of God, which are a great abyss, impenetrable to human thought. But according to Our apostolic office, We want your episcopal care and vigilance to be on the alert to keep away from men's minds, with all possible effort, that opinion which is as unholy as it is deadly. We mean the opinion that a way of eternal salvation can be found in any religion whatever. With all the learning and ingenuity that is yours, teach the people entrusted to your care that the dogmas of the Catholic faith are not in the slightest opposed to the mercy and justice of God. It must, of course, be held as a matter of faith that outside the apostolic Roman Church no one can be saved, that the Church is the only ark of salvation, and that whoever does not enter it will perish in the flood. On the other hand, it must likewise be held as certain that those who are affected by ignorance of the true religion, if it is invincible ignorance, are not subject to any guilt in this matter before the eyes of the Lord. Now, then, who could presume in himself an ability to set the boundaries of such ignorance, taking into consideration the natural differences of peoples, lands, native talents, and so many other factors? Only when we have been released from the bonds of this body and see God just as he is shall we really understand how close and beautiful a bond joins divine mercy with divine justice. But as long as we dwell on earth, encumbered with this soul-dulling, mortal body, let us tenaciously cling to the Catholic doctrine that there is one God, one faith, one baptism. To proceed with further investigation is wrong.

3. Summary and supplementary remarks to Part II

a. The Encyclical says nothing beyond what was already and always, quite apart from the Encyclical, obligatory theological doctrine in the Church, with regard to a person's membership of the true Church of [65] Christ and the necessity of this Church for salvation and grace, and regarding the possibility of salvation for someone who is not a member of the [80] Cf. Denz 1646 sq. (English Translation: The Church Teaches [St Louis and London 1955], nos 173-174).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church in the fullest sense of ecclesiastical terminology. It stresses, on the one hand, the real necessity of strict membership of the Church for salvation, without excluding, on the other hand, the possibility of justification and salvation for those who through no fault of their own do not belong to the Church as members in the strict and full sense. The terminology of the Encyclical also moves along traditional lines with regard to the formulae expressing the necessity of the Church for salvation, without laying any more stress than had been traditional usage on the positive possibility of salvation even without full actual membership of the Church.

b. In what concerns our questions, the only peculiarity of the Encyclical is that it employs the terms 'Church' and 'corpus Christi mysticum' synonymously, in a much more definite fashion than had perhaps been the custom up to then in respect of man here below, i.e. in the dimension of the Ecclesia militans. In proceeding in this way, the Encyclical is obviously imbued with the urgent desire to remove a theological error from the scene which evidently still prevails today in certain quarters in the discussions on union between Catholics and non-Catholics. We refer to that error according to which a man, or at least a Christian, may belong to the Church, or at least to the Mystical Body of Christ, no matter how he stands in relationship to the Roman Catholic Church. By identifying in practice the Church on this earth, which is also a visible, juridical society under the authority of the Roman Pontiff, with the Mystical Body of Christ, the Encyclical obviously wishes to free the theological consciousness of today from the danger, even in the field of terminology, of distinguishing these two notions in such a way that the uniqueness, visibleness and necessity of the visible Church for salvation are at least in danger of being obscured.

c. On the other hand, it is true to say that the Encyclical as a whole makes the visible Church on this earth and not the corpus Christi mysticum the subject of its declarations. Taken as a whole, the notion of corpus Christi mysticum remains in the Encyclical a notion which is predicated of the Church. It is of course equally true that Tradition also recognizes a wider concept of the corpus Christi mysticum, which, [66] for instance, embraces also the just who lived before Christ's coming or all those who are justified even if they are not in the full sense members of the visible Church, or which includes also the peaceful unity between Church and State.[81] Thus, in view of both these facts, it will not be necessary to regard this terminological identification by the Encyclical of 'Church' and 'corpus mysticum' as theologically obligatory in such a way that it would, in principle, no longer be permissible to use the term 'corpus Christi mysticum' in a terminologically wider sense. One should, however, be very careful in future, when using this wider notion, not to conjure up again the misunderstandings and errors indicated above. Even when making a terminological distinction between the two notions, which is 'in itself' possible, it would at all events have to remain clear that the 'Mystical Body of Christ and the Roman Catholic Church' are 'one and the same thing',[82] in the sense that one cannot belong to the former if, and in so far as, one does not belong to the latter. It seems to us, however, that this doctrine of the two Encyclicals Mystici Corporis Christi and Humani Generis does not require us to make the assertion, from the historical point of view, that both notions have always and everywhere been identical in theology. For one would find it difficult to make this assertion. Indeed, a careful differentiation of the two notions will even in future not be impossible, as long as one observes what has been said before. For, although it would in itself be possible for these Encyclicals to determine the terminology of this matter (and this is something which has [81] Cf. S. Tromp, Corpus Christi, quod est Ecclesia I (Rome 1937).

[82] 'Humani Genenis', Denz 3019.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

frequently happened in the course of the history of Dogma[83]), which would prohibit the further employment of the previous usage, they do not say anything about intending to do so directly. Thus it will, for example, still be possible to prefer to say that the just of pre-Christian times belong to the Mystical Body, rather than to say that they belong to the Roman Catholic Church.[84] In other words, the identity of the [67] two terms, as taught by these Encyclicals, is valid in as far as they relate to the time of salvation after Christ. And, moreover, it is a material and not a formal identity, i.e. the two notions regard the same thing in so far as they relate to the Church considered as the juridical foundation of Christ for the time after Christ – yet this same reality is, and can be, looked at by these two notions from different points of view, since it has several dimensions, etc.

d. The Encyclical calls the Holy Ghost the soul of the Church (p. 220). But it emphasizes most explicitly that this justifying and divinizing Spirit is the 'soul' of the visible Church and hence can properly speaking be found in her alone. For this precise reason, it does not seem to be in line with the Encyclical's direction of thought simply to say (as e.g. Dieckmann still does), that those who are not members of the Church in the strict and full sense but are nevertheless justified, do not indeed belong to the Body of the Church, but do, however, [68] belong to the Soul of the Church.[85] What is, of course, correct about this manner of speaking, [83] As, for instance, the restrictive determination of the sense of 'physis' in Christology. This is a case of a determined terminology which can now be looked upon as absolutely obligatory. For otherwise there would only be misunderstandings and confusions (if nothing worse), without there being any rational reason for resurrecting an earlier phase in the development of dogmatic terminology.

[84] Indeed, it must not be forgotten that the notion of the 'Church', too, has had, and can have, a narrower and a wider sense in history. Cf. for this the bibliography given above on p. 5, Note 3, and the examples collected together from the works of St Thomas and Suarez in the Sacrae Theologiae Summa I^2 (Madrid 1952), no. 1060 sqq. The Church is, for instance, constituted 'in the wide sense' (a modern qualification) of all men, beginning with Adam; the Patriarchs belong to her by faith, as we do; all those who have fides informis (i.e. the infused virtue which can also be in a heretic), are her members, it is the same Church before and after Christ etc. But one cannot simply make the above question easy for oneself by saying: just as the notion of the 'Mystical Body of Christ' can have a manifold, narrower and wider meaning, so also in the case of the word 'Church', – thus these two notions are still identical in every respect. For 'Humani Generis' does not speak of a simple identity of notion between 'Church' and 'Mystical Body of Christ', but between the latter and the 'Roman Catholic Church'. This last expression is, however, identical merely with the notion of 'Church in the narrower sense'. And so the question arises as to how this identification is to be understood. And to this we have just answered: this identification refers to the two quantities only in the order of salvation after Christ and on this earth, – and their identity is merely a material, not a formal identity. We, therefore, do not conflict in any way with the Encyclical 'Humani Generis'. Thee Sacrae Theologiae Summa I^2 (Madrid 1952), no. 1007, nota 30 is therefore incorrect in counting us among those who cast doubt on the traditional teaching about the identity of the two notions. This teaching is in no way disputed, but simply more precisely determined in its meaning and extent. Cf. also M. Nothomb, 'L'Eglise et le Corps du Christ. Dernières Encycliques et doctrine de Saint Thomas', Irénikon XXV (1952), pp. 226-248.

[85] The same opinion is held e.g. by B. J. Beumer (in Theologie und Glaube XXXVIII , p. 84; compare this also with: J. Beumer, 'Der Heilige Geist "Seele der Kirche", Theologie und Glaube XXXIX [1949], pp. 249-267). J. Brinktrine (loc. cit., p. 294), on the other hand, is of the opinion that the distinction between Body and Soul of the Church, if properly interpreted, is unobjectionable and reconcilable with the Encyclical when applied to someone's belonging or not belonging to the Church. This distinction can pass, if it is understood correctly. But the real question is whether it must not almost necessarily be misunderstood. Brinktrine's interpretation identifies 'belonging to the Soul' with 'belonging invisibly to the Church', and 'belonging to the Body' with 'belonging in an external, visible manner to the visible communion of the Catholic Church'. But is this 'invisible belonging' an invisible belonging to the visible Church (even qua visible), or is it merely an invisible belonging to some invisible element of the Church? This is precisely the question which must not be left open – but this distinction does leave it open. And then: can one belong to the visible Church, precisely as visible, in a way which is utterly and in every respect 'invisible', i.e. without any tangible historical expression whatsoever, but simply grounded in the pure interiority of a personal act? This question, too, clamours for an answer. It will be treated explicitly in the third part of the present chapter.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is precisely what the Encyclical itself also teaches explicitly, viz. that non-Catholics cannot be simply called members of the Church without any further qualification. But it would nevertheless be misleading and contrary to the ultimate intention of the Encyclical, although very natural, to understand such a mode of expression to mean that there can be a relation to the Spirit of the Church by grace, without this having anything whatever to do with her visible Body. Even although the Encyclical does not in any way enter directly into this question, one may nevertheless say that it gives us to understand that there is in some way or other a further reference, relation and connection with the visible Body of the Church for everyone who is justified. And we may say that in this way the Encyclical somehow points out that each and every grace of God has, in a certain sense, an incarnational, sacramental and ecclesiological structure. The Encyclical, to be sure, leaves the further theological elucidation of this question to the work of theologians. We will have to return to this question in our third part.

e. In the work for union between the Churches, apparent solutions and the obscuring of differences of dogmatic teaching are neither in the [69] interest of truth nor in the interest of charity. If, therefore, the Encyclical draws attention to ecclesiological truths which belong to the Church's inalienable deposit of faith and which, with the best intentions in the world, had perhaps here and there not been clearly enough stated or professed before separated Christians, then this is not meant to arrest properly understood efforts for union but rather to further them. Union, such as Christ wills it, can only mean the unity of Christians in the Church such as Christ has willed her, and such as, according to her nature and constitution founded by Christ, she has always actually existed, and still does actually exist, in the Roman Catholic Church. Even the clearest and strongest emphasis on the uniqueness, visibleness and necessity for salvation of the true Church, i.e. the Roman Catholic Church, does not imply that one presumes in any way to judge the good faith and the grace of separated Christians. Nor does it in any way mean a denial of the great treasure of Christian reality in their teaching, in their faithfulness to Holy Scripture and in their sacramental life. It also does not mean a denial of the fact that the true Church herself would be enriched in Christian reality (in so far as this is to be realized in men according to their national, historical and psychological characteristics), if these Christians returned to the home which, in the words of the Encyclical (p. 243), is not strange to them but is their own father's home.

III

The third question which we intended to ask ourselves in our consideration, asks: With regard to the Church's nature itself, what further facts, and what indications for further lines of inquiry can be gathered from the answer to the first two questions? We intend to take our starting-point for this task from two problems which have been raised rather than solved by our answer to the first two questions in the light both of previous teaching and of the Encyclical. The first problem arises out of the notion of the Church which is at the root of the Encyclical's teaching on man's belonging to the Church, i.e. the problem which in practice arises out of the answer to our first question. The second problem arises out of the question about the objective Compatibility of the doctrine of the visible Church as a necessary means for salvation, and of the doctrine of the possibility of salvation [70] for someone outside the Church, i.e. the problem which in practice arises out of our second question.

1. We said in the first Part of our considerations that, according to Tradition and the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Encyclical, only those, and yet all those, who are distinguished by baptism, by external profession of the faith of the Church and by subjection to the legal authority of the Church, belong as members to the Church. The consequence of such a definition of Church membership is that, on the one hand, e.g. some people who are justified and in the state of grace do not belong as members in this strict sense to the Church, whereas, on the other hand, some people who are not in the state of grace, are still members of the Church. This conclusion, drawn from the definition of membership of the Church, is not in itself surprising so long as one does not think of the Church as anything but an external, juridically organized society confessing one faith. For such a notion of 'Church' it is naturally self-evident that the internal possession or non-possession of grace, which is an intangible factor for the external forum, cannot be of any consequence for membership of the Church. Indeed, one will have to say at first sight that this definition of Church membership cannot but proceed from such a notion of the Church and that it, therefore, has this notion as its only legitimate basis. For if, as we have shown, this definition of Church membership is at least a theologically certain doctrine, and if the notion of the nature of the Church just mentioned is unequivocally and clearly the logical presupposition to this theologically certain doctrine, then that notion of the Church's nature must also be said to be a theologically certain doctrine. We would, therefore, have to consider it a theologically certain doctrine that the Church's nature lies exclusively in the visible and juridically verifiable sphere. For only on this condition, as we have said, can all those (and only those) circumstances of membership (Zugehörigkeit) of the Church be taken into account, which are to be found in this sphere. However, the Encyclical (p. 197) declares that it would be a rationalistic error to see nothing more in the Church of Christ than a purely juridical and social unity. And Leo XIII had already characterized this particular notion of the Church very profoundly as ecclesiological Nestorianism in his Encyclical Satis cognitum of 29th June 1896. The, Church is more than just a juridical organization, even one founded by [71] Christ himself. She is the Body of Christ, animated and sanctified by the Spirit of Christ, she is the Communion of Saints; the grace of Christ, the Holy Ghost and the interior union of men with Christ as their head by an inner god-likeness and assimilation to Christ, all manifestly belong to the reality of the Church. Thus we seem to be faced with a dilemma: the definition of the conditions for Church membership knows only one notion of the Church for which the Church, whose membership is under discussion, can only be an external juridical organization; and yet precisely this notion of the Church seems to be rejected by Tradition, and also by our Encyclical, as nestorian rationalism in Ecclesiology. The solution of this apparent contradiction between various declarations of one and the same Encyclical, which is something on which the Encyclical itself does not explicitly reflect, provides us with a first possibility of acquiring a somewhat better grasp of the nature of the Church.

We have already pointed out earlier on that the theological clarification of the notion of Sacrament is very fruitful and important for Ecclesiology.[86] This assertion may also find verification in our present question. A Sacrament is a sign which confers grace. It does not only subsequently symbolize the internal event of the sanctifying meeting between God and [86] I have already discussed some of the points required for an understanding of the notion of Sacrament (which we are here trying to clarify) in Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951), and in 'Personal and Sacramental piety', theological reflections on 'spiritual Communion' and similar matters, cf. pp. 109-134 below. Certain facts concerning the historical background of the conception of the relation between the sacramental sign and the signified reality of grace, which underlies our present considerations, become clear in the Essay: 'La doctrine d'Origène sur la pénitence', RSR XXXVII (1950), pp. 47-49; 252-286; 422-456. Cf. also the treatise on 'Guilt and its remission' in the present volume. Furthermore: H. Schillebeeckx, De sacramentele Heilseconomie. Theologische bezinning op S. Thomas' sacramentenleer in het licht van de traditie en van het hedendaagse sacramentsproblematiek (Antwerp 1952).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

man by grace. Rather this event takes place under and through this sign. The nature of a Sacrament as an external liturgical rite can only, therefore, be comprehended by having regard to that event which happens behind and through it in the form of the hidden mystery of grace. If we were to separate this reality of grace which takes place behind the sacramental rite from the latter, or even merely attempt to comprehend the sacramental rite separately from its [72] effect of grace, then the Sacrament would lose all its meaning and significance. The Church's fight against a Protestant kind of conception of Sacrament,[87] which latter ultimately and basically transposed the event of the reception of grace exclusively into the purely internal and subjective sphere of fiduciary faith and of the interior experience of justification, is sufficiently clear proof of the way in which the Church has never given its consent to the rending of the natural bond between sacramental rite and inward grace. Yet, in spite of this, it is equally a truth of faith that there are cases when the Sacraments are validly conferred but do not actually effect this grace. The third-century controversy about baptism by heretics and the fight against Donatism were not simply wrangles about the existence of sacramental events outside the Church. These controversies were at least equally also a fight for the truth that, in spite of the essential reference of the sacramental rite to the inner event of grace, there could be real and valid sacramental events which are not fulfilled by the reality of grace necessarily symbolized and, of itself, effected by these events. Two questions must, therefore, be clearly and essentially distinguished in connection with the Sacraments. Firstly, there is the question about the necessary and unalterable conditions for the sacramental sign as a real and valid visible act of Christ and the Church effected on man. And secondly, there is the question of what conditions are necessary so that this visible action of Christ and the Church on man can actually attain what it symbolizes. And in accordance with this it is, in fact, essentially and inevitably possible (and not just something due to the indifferent notions employed), to give a twofold description of the nature of a Sacrament. Thus, on the one hand, one can give a definition of a Sacrament which includes exclusively only what belongs to the constitution of a valid sacramental sign. And, on the other hand, one can give a description of the nature of a Sacrament which also includes that reality in its notion for which the external sacramental event is essentially intended and without which it would ultimately lose its meaning. Both these notions of Sacrament, if we may put it this way, are necessary and indispensable, neither can replace the other; they must not be played off one against the other. One may not even regard the full notion of Sacrament as the only valid one, to the detriment of the other notion of Sacrament on the plane of the sacramental sign. [73] For the fact that there can be a valid but unfruitful Sacrament shows that a genuine and decisive Christian reality can exist on the visible, and sacramentally and juridically verifiable plane, without always being, in fact, an immediately effective expression and manifestation of an actual event of grace. Indeed, one will have to go further and say that this notion of Sacrament which is concerned solely with the visible and juridically verifiable dimension, must be the one which strikes man first and foremost, as he does not and cannot, in the last resort, grasp or determine the interior event of grace. When one asks about a 'Sacrament', one's question is in the first place concerned with what man himself must do and achieve in the externality of his necessarily self-averted consciousness. In other words, one asks first of all about the sacramental happening as such, in as far as this must be essentially distinguished, although not really separated, from sacramental grace as such.

Now these facts of the particular domain of the Sacraments are, however, only a particular instance of the general structure of Christian reality. Just as in Christ himself the divine nature and the human nature are as much unmixed and necessarily to be distinguished as they are unseparated, so it is also in the case of the Sacraments and elsewhere in Christian reality.

[87] Cf. e.g. Denz 848 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

And precisely this fact manifests itself now also in the nature of the Church. The Church is in a certain sense the Proto-Sacrament[88]; this means, however, that she is, in her whole concrete, visible and juridically verifiable appearance, a real sign and embodiment of the salvific will of God and of the grace of Christ. That is, she has a bodily nature which as such possesses an unmistakable, fully determined and juridically determinable form, and which actually causes the grace which it renders present in the historical here and now; and yet that bodily nature remains essentially different from this divine grace which will always be the sovereign mystery of God's freedom and can never be subdued by man. Hence there can be, as in the case of the Sacraments, a twofold notion of the Church which is due, not to the vagueness of notions or inaccuracy of terminology, but to the very nature of things. Thus, on the one hand, there is the notion of the Church as incarnate presence of Christ and his grace, together [74] with Christ and his grace, and, on the other hand, the notion of the Church in as far as she must be essentially distinguished from this grace and inner divine union, without ceasing, however, to be even in this way a still valid Christian reality; in other words, Church as parallel notion to Sacrament, understood as sign and grace, or Church as parallel notion to Sacrament, taken as the valid sacramental sign, even in as far as this can be thought of, and indeed can exist, without an effect of grace.[89] We will have to say in this connection also that this second notion of the Church (i.e. in the historical, juridically verifiable and humanly clearly determinable dimension) is the most striking, but for that very reason also the more introductory notion, just as in the case of the corresponding notion of the sacramental sign. And, therefore, the Encyclical, together with more recent theology, simply denotes by the term 'Church', as we pointed out previously, the external and juridical community directly.

As a result of these reflections, the dilemma with which we began, now gradually solves itself. When the Encyclical defines the conditions of Church membership exclusively on the basis of the external social structure of the Church, this means that it proceeds from this second notion of 'Church'. And since this notion is fully valid, and to mix up [75] the two notions would merely expose us to the danger of obscuring the objectively existing multidimensional structure of the Church's reality, the definition of the conditions for membership of the Church is also valid. This definition, to express it in terms of sacramental theology, is the definition of valid but not necessarily fruitful membership of the Church, and of the necessary conditions for the full constitution of the visible nature of the union with Christ through grace. But it does not define those conditions in so far as this visibleness is actually imbued with the 'grace-full' reality which it signifies and, in itself, renders present in the here and now of the finite space of man's life on this earth. On the other hand, in view of [88] Cf. about this e.g. O. Semmelroth, 'Die Kirche als "sichtbare Gestalt der unsichtbaren Gnade"', Scholastik XXVIII (1953), pp. 23-39; id., Die Kirche als Ursakrament (Frankfurt 1953), together with its review by H. Zeller in ZKT LXXVI (1954), pp. 94-99.

---

[89] One could also say: Church as 'res et sacramentum' (or even as 'res sacramenti') and Church as 'sacramentum (tantum)'. The history of the notion of the Church is in great part a history of the transition or change of accent from the first to the second of these notions of the Church. With St Thomas, for example, the first notion still holds supreme sway: the 'Church' is humanity united with Christ in grace and faith. And this was even more truly the dominant notion before his time. The external, sacramental and juridical form of this Church was not, of course, denied; but nevertheless, the constituting cause of this external form as a Church was above all the Spirit. Thus it could, for instance, remain quite clear right up to the later Middle Ages, that the sin of the Christian sinner changes also his relationship to the Church; the whole history of Penance bears witness to that fact in the formation of the rites of this Sacrament. Cf. also for the early Middle Ages: A. Landgraf, 'Sünde und Trennung von der Kirche in der Frühscholastik', Scholastik V (1930), pp. 210-247; and P. Anciaux, Le Sacrement de Pénitence au XII^e siècle (Louvain 1949), passim. All this is also brought out by the fact that even St Augustine, in spite of his fight against Donatism, still struggled with the difficulty of admitting that sinners belong really and not merely apparently to the Church. Hence we also find in St Augustine the conception that the Sacraments administered outside the Church are 'valid' indeed, but that they do not on that account bestow the Spirit, since the latter can, in fact, be obtained only within the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

what has been said, the comprehensive notion of the Church, which includes also the divine interiority of the Church, remains also fully valid. For the whole earthly reality which we call Church (in the other sense of that word) does, in fact, have a meaning only as the effective sign of the unity of the world with God through grace. Hence, without coming into conflict with the doctrine of faith that sinners too are members of the Church, one may rightly ask also about the nature of the conditions for a membership of the Church by grace. For full membership of the Church by grace in this sense, we would then have to add all those conditions to the conditions for external membership of the Church, which are required for the justification and sanctification of man (into which, of course, we do not need to inquire here). It is equally clear with regard to the full notion of the Church as giving grace, that the sinner does not belong to the Church to the same extent and in the same sense as the justified member of the Church. Thus, for instance, the ancient Church right up to the later Middle Ages was clearly conscious of the fact that the sacramental reconciliation of man with God by Penance is also a reconciliation with the Church, and that every grave sin is a 'separation' from the Church as a reality full of grace. And in keeping with this consciousness, the proceedings of the Sacrament of Penance were opened in the ancient Church by making this 'separation' visible also in the external forum of the Church. All this is proof of the fact that the Church fully appreciated that the sinner is no longer related to the Church by a fully fruitful membership, although his membership is still valid.[90]

[76] The ultimate reason for this distinction of the two notions of 'Church'[91] is easy to understand: only if there are Sacraments which really cause grace, can there be a genuinely 'incarnational' presence of God and of his grace in the world of man here below where he is imprisoned in space and time and in the' 'flesh'. Only if there are (in principle) also merely valid Sacraments which really are Sacraments and yet are empty of grace, can the grace of God remain free and beyond the ravishing grasp of man which would turn it into magic; only in this way can the grace of God remain the mystery of the unfathomable God, without this having, at the same time, the effect that God and the salvation he gives disappear into the nowhere of his infinity. In the mystery of the valid Sacraments which nevertheless are actually empty of grace there moreover reveals itself once more the mystery of the crucified God: the God-emptiness becomes a real form of God's appearance in the world. The same as is true of the Sacraments is also true of the Church: she is the real, permanent and ever valid presence of God in the world. And this remains true even when she is the Church of the sinner; the presence of God is in her in a manner which leaves the mystery of God and the incomprehensible-ness of his grace and free love intact. And just as with the Church, so also with the membership of the Church: in a certain sense, viz. in its external juridical verifiability, this membership is the basic sacramental sign of the sanctification of the individual man. And since this membership is still valid even when it has lost grace, it leaves the grace of God in respect of the individual human being with that mystery which must be respected even by the man of the Church, who must always renounce all ultimate certainty about this.

2. If the reflections on the problems of the first Part of our considerations have thus given us a somewhat deeper understanding of the unseparated and unmixed divine and human [90] Cf. apart from the bibliography given above, p. 74, note 89, the bibliography given in my article 'Forgotten truths about the Sacrament of Penance', pp. 135 sqq. below.

[91] It is to be noted that it is here a question of two notions of the Church and not of two Churches. By distinguishing between a valid and a fruitful Sacrament, one arrives at two notions but does not thereby distinguish two Sacraments; no more do two notions of the Church imply the assertion of two Churches of which it might then be asked how far they 'coincide' or do not coincide with one another.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

natures of the Church, the reflections on the problems of the second Part will lead us to the [77] realization of a stratification within the nature of the Church as sacramental sign. The visible nature of God's grace which we call Church is itself composed of several realities. In what follows we must try to clarify what exactly is meant by this.

The consideration of the necessity of the Church for salvation in the second Part led us to the question as to the possibility of salvation for someone who does not belong in the legal sense to the Church. Our answer was that the necessity of the Church as a means for salvation does not deny the possibility of salvation for someone with the votum Ecclesiae and is, therefore, to be conceived as a conditional necessity of means. The necessity of the Church for salvation and the possibility of salvation for someone outside the Church were, therefore, logically reconciled with one another in this notion of the conditional necessity of the Church as a means for salvation, but only in a formal notional manner. For there remained the question as to what is left objectively of the necessity of the visible Church as a means for salvation, if man can attain God's grace even without the sacramental medium of the visible 'historical' Church, but simply by the pure interiority and spirituality of his own personal decision. For the ancient Church's conception of the necessity of the Church for salvation meant precisely the Church as something visible and distinct from the subjective attitude or 'good will' of man. There seems to remain nothing of this conception, if man can under certain conditions find salvation also by his 'good will', even if this be the will for the Church. Therefore, on the one hand, the practical possibility of justification by the mere votum Ecclesiae cannot be denied and, on the other hand, the objective significance of the dogma that a visible Church is necessary for salvation must be more clearly understood than is commonly the case in the ordinary explanation of the votum Ecclesiae. Since this is so, it will obviously only be possible to attain this clearer understanding by a more exact theological reflection which will show how even a mere votum Ecclesiae, as long as it is really present, has a quasi-sacramental visible aspect in the concrete, which can and must also be included in the visible nature of the Church. We must now develop what is postulated by this from a different angle.

The human race is a unity. This unity manifests itself right away in the common descent of all men from Adam.[92] The human species is [79] regarded and treated by God as a concrete

[92] Cf. Denz 3028. 'Humani Generis' draws attention to the fact that the unity of descent of the human race is no theologically indifferent conception. In a metaphysical anthropology, the unity of the human species would have to be considered even more exactly. Scholastic Ontology recognizes properly speaking and explicitly only that 'species' which is the purely logical comprehension of many individuals which are the same, the ontological substratum of this unity being merely the repeated sameness of 'nature' in many. This leaves out of consideration the question as to what is meant by the historical unity of many, who are the same by oneness of origin, and also the question as to how far specific unity is based on such a unity of origin and history. One cannot a priori point to the 'specific' sameness of inorganic things in objection to this. For in the first place, it would be necessary to look more closely into the merely analogous nature of the individuality and difference of the 'individuals' on both of these levels of being, before one could assert that the unity of origin is irrelevant to the specific unity of living beings. And secondly, one would have to inquire into whether the 'individual' (particle) in the inorganic world does not have essentially less determined limits and less independence in contrast to the 'field' (of force) etc., than is analogously the case in the organic world. And one would then have to ask whether the unity of origin and the consequent unity of history in the organic world is not perhaps in some way the 'homologue' in this world of the unity of the field in which the inorganic 'individual' exists as a moment of this field, outside of which it cannot even be thought. These reflections are simply meant to show that the unity of origin of the human species has more to do with its specific unity and hence with the possibility of a common determination of all men and of a common goal, than might appear to a more superficial view. One should in any case ask oneself seriously whether the unity of origin of the human race (i.e. 'monogenism' in its specific theological sense) is not also a datum of a deeper-going philosophy of Nature – and whether modern theologians have not 'beat the retreat' in the wrong place by regarding this monogenism as a truth which can be known only from revelation and as a fact which is simply and necessarily based on the Creator's free decree. Moreover, one need not be afraid that this monogenism might appear as a theological distortion of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

unity, not only in the natural order but also in the order of salvation, as is seen in the fact of original sin and in the fact of the radical and universal redemption of the human race by Christ. This unity can here be presupposed as a fact, without our having to enter into the ontological question as to how this unity is to be more exactly established and conceived metaphysically. It cannot, therefore, concern us here whether this unity is established more exactly in a platonic or aristotelian manner, more from the point of view of the unity of the Idea of 'Man' or more from the point of view of the infraspiritual unity of the one materiality (in the sense of the thomistic materia prima); nor whether it be more clearly established from that openness of man to the personal community of spirits, based on his spiritual nature, or from something else. Whatever may be the more exact explanation, there is, in fact, such a natural unity of all men, which is the underlying potentia oboedientialis of God's saving work with regard to humanity – in the sense that humanity is not merely the subsequent, purely conceptual summation of the many human individuals. The inclusion of the individual man within this unity is also, therefore, a reality presupposed by his free personal activity. And he necessarily takes up position relative to this reality in his activity in as far as it is the prerequired condition which makes this activity possible. Moreover, he consciously helps to consummate this unity by his action as a person, since it is part of his 'nature'. This oneness with humanity, in so far as it is presupposed as a part of Nature by man as an acting person, belongs to the visible nature of man, in so far as we understand by this everything concrete in the spatio-temporal sense which the freedom of man as a personal being presupposes as the preceding and determining condition of action and which, as a reality stamped by the personal decision of man, is the substance of the gradual revelation of man in history as an intelligible free being.

For by reason of his twofold nature of spirit and matter, we must distinguish between man as intelligible person and man as 'nature'. By person[93] we mean man in so far as he can be, and is, freely in [80] command of himself (as nature). By nature we mean here everything which, as condition for its possibility, precedes this free activity of man as a person and signifies a norm which sets bounds to the autonomous sovereignty of his freedom. In conformity with the general structure of human activity, which is that of a spirit in matter, we must also distinguish two strata in man's existential determination of himself.[94] We refer to the hypothesis of a real connection between human life and the animal kingdom. For, on the contrary, both theses (i.e. the thesis of the anthropological theory of descent and that of monogenism) arise from the same metaphysical principle of economy: i.e. the intervention of the divine, world-transcendent cause can be postulated only where, and only in as far as and as often as, terrestrial forces are insufficient for the explanation of a certain phenomenon – in fact, only where something really and irreducibly new appears and in so far as it does appear. It is no doubt unnecessary to explain further that a polygenism (which still wanted to recognize the irreducible novelty of man) is contrary to this metaphysical principle of economy in the case of a man who can beget his like, and that it turns the miracle of the one creation of man by the divine cause behind the world into an oft-repeated miracle of a demiurge in the world. Cf. for all this, Vol. I of the present work, pp. 229-296 ('Theological reflexions on Monogenism').

---

[93] The terms 'person' and 'nature' are, of course, used here in a modern sense which must not be confused with the sense which these terms have, for instance, in the scholastic exposition of the doctrines of the Trinity or of the Hypostatic Union. But if one is careful, it will not be too difficult to keep these meanings apart. In any case, the modern usage is also already foreshadowed by the old scholastic terminology, as when the latter for example distinguishes in its exposition of the doctrine of original sin between 'peccatum naturae' and 'peccatum personae' (personale). Hence it may not be said that the modern conceptualization endangers the clarity and unambiguous preciseness of scholastic terminology. Regarding the concepts concerned, cf. also chap. 11 ('The theological concept of concupiscentia') in the first Volume of the present work, pp. 347-382; and: Würde und Freiheit des Menschen: Kirche in neuer Zeit. Reden und Erklärungen des Österreichischen Katholikentags 1952 (Innsbruck 1952), pp. 9-43.

[94] For what follows cf. also (apart from the essays mentioned in the preceding note) e.g. W. Bragger, 'Die Verleiblichung des Wollens', Scholastik XXV (1950), pp. 248-253; K. Rahner, 'Guilt and its remission: the borderland between theology and psychotherapy', chap. 9 below, pp. 265-281; id., Geist in Welt (Innsbruck

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the initial intelligible free human act as such and its necessary materialization in what are commonly known as man's actions, actions which are always necessarily also activation and activity of the 'nature' of man. These two 'strata' in the free activity of man are, on the one hand, always inseparable one from the other. This means that man's free action is never absolutely creative (in the terms of pure existentialism), but is always also subjected to the laws of the matter of free activity (i.e. to man's 'nature' – to his 'corporeity' in the metaphysical sense – to the 'world'). On the other hand, the initial intelligible act of free will and its materialization must also never be identified, just as the 'spirit' of man is never absorbed by the soul, and just as (in scholastic terminology) the anima intellectualis is never merely the forma corporis (no matter how much it is this form also qua spirit). With this there is given a peculiar but real dialectic between what is freely willed as such and what is freely done. Because it is necessary for the action of freedom, that which is carried out by the person into the dimension of nature, is the expression and revelation of that decision of freedom in the spatio-temporal materiality of [81] man, i.e. in his 'visibleness'. But at the same time, because it is different from the initial freedom, it also throws a veil over this initial act of freedom as such, i.e. the revelation of the personal decision of man in man's spatio-temporal appearance can be mere empty appearance. In so far as the finite freedom of man presupposes nature as its condition of possibility, the expression of man's act of freedom in his historical visible nature implies always essentially an acceptance of 'impressions'. It means that what is his very own always reveals itself essentially also by accepting what is alien, by accepting the imposed determination of his nature.

The real unity of the human race, of which we spoke previously and which we saw must be considered as a natural dimension of man's personal decision, to be accepted by the free act of man, is determined in the concrete also by the Incarnation of the Word of God. By the fact that God the Son became man of the Virgin Mary, a member of this one human race, the Word of God became himself a member of this one Adamite humanity and, conversely, the one human race became thereby fundamentally and radically called to share the life of God supernaturally. This calling to share supernaturally in the life of the triune God is fundamentally already given as a real fact in the world (and not merely as God's 'intention' and 'law'), by the simple fact of the Incarnation of the Word. And so this calling is, on the one hand, a reality which precedes man's personal decision. And, on the other hand, because it is a reality accomplished by the fact that the Word of God became flesh, it is a reality which belongs to the historical and visible dimension and a reality which, as a factual determination of the human race as a whole, is also a real ontological determination of the nature of each human being. Hence, if man as a spiritual person accomplishes his 'nature' by the total decision about himself, then he must in the concrete, by this decision, always and inevitably take position for or against man's supernatural calling to a participation in the life of the triune God himself.[95]

1939); id., Hörer des Wortes. Zur Grundlegung einer Religionsphilosophie (Munich 1941), esp. chaps 10 sqq., pp. 150 sqq.

[95] The thesis enunciated in this sentence would, of course, require further elaboration. This would be the only way to prove it sufficiently and to incorporate it properly into the whole context of theology. Indeed, only further development would define this thesis in such a way as to avoid misunderstandings, and in this way, too, all its consequences would be fully unfolded. However, we will confine ourselves here to two observations. Firstly, if this thesis is not to appear unbelievable from the very start, the following must be taken into consideration: every free human act takes place essentially and necessarily within the dynamism of the spirit, which is directed to the good as such. This means that it takes place within the unlimited intentional transcendence of the free spirit, so that the individual good can be freely willed only in as far as man is (always and inevitably) 'set on' Being and the good as such. But this means that each free decision of the will is an act directed into what lies beyond its range of vision; and this is so not only in fact and in everyday life, but always and essentially (as proceeding from the nature of finite freedom which realizes itself in the individual object).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[82] Taking up position in this way, considered as happening with and in man's 'nature', the reality presupposed by man's freedom and regulating it, is, on the one hand, the expression of what a man wants to be personally and, on the other hand, the visible historical aspect of the salvific Will of God which man accepts by his personal decision.

Let us try to clarify still further the objective content of what we have just stated on the metaphysical plane of abstraction. By the fact that the Word of God became man, humanity has already in advance become ontologically the real sanctification of individual men by grace and also the people of the children of God. Nowhere that men exist, [83] are they in the concrete simply 'mere men' in the abstract sense of the aristotelian-scholastic concept of the essence of man. In as far as mankind, thus 'consecrated', is a real unity from the very start, there already exists a 'people of God' which extends as far as humanity itself, even before any social and juridical organization of mankind as a supernatural unity in a Church. This people of God exists before its juridical and social organization into what we call 'Church', somewhat as a definite historical people exists before its organization into a State on the plane of this world. This real determination of the one humanity as the people of God is a real fact and no mere abstract idea of what ought to be, for it is based on the two coinciding facts of the natural unity of the human race and of the real Incarnation of the Word of God. It is, indeed, a reality which even as such belongs to the historically visible dimension of human nature, for God became man as Jesus of Nazareth, in a historical here and now, in the 'flesh'. On the other hand, this real and historical actuality of the people of God, which precedes the Church as a juridical and social body, is however such that it can, and according to the Will of God had to be made more concrete on the social and juridical plane, in what we, in fact, call the Church. For no matter how much the setting up of such social and juridical bodies in their concrete determination depends on the free design of man or God, these bodies can at the same time be the concretion and elucidation of a reality presupposed by the freedom of man. Thus, for instance, every actual State is always set up by a free historical decision, and yet it implies at the same time a taking over and a recognition of something which was given before this free, instituting decision and which enforces itself through this decision. If we may settle for this terminology (i.e. 'people of God') to express the reality referred to, without entering into the question as to whether this or another term taken from traditional usage is the most apt, we must say that there exists, therefore, a peculiar relationship between the 'people of God' and the Church. Both of them, from the point of view of the individual man as a person, lie on the visible historical plane of a reality which precedes the free decision of each man. They are both the expression of God's loving salvific Will in this world, for even the assuming of a human nature into the unity of the Person of the Logos is, as such, once more merely the expression and visible manifestation of this salvific Will of Such an act is always essentially either a surrender or a refusal of oneself in face of the uncontrollable and the unpredictable – either (blind) obedience or disobedience – readiness or refusal to put oneself at the disposal of some greater unknown Force. Seen in this light, it is clear that we may not say that the question of the unknown as such (meaning what is not known as something given objectively and consciously), cannot enter into the discussion of the quality of a free and responsible action, when the latter is considered simply as such. It can merely be said that something which is itself simply and utterly finite cannot be of any significance for this free act as such, if it be unknown (even although the free act may have further consequences in the dimension of finite unforeseen realities). But such an unknown, finite reality does not, in fact, belong to that which, in its incomprehensible immensity itself, is the real object of the act of free will exercised on finite realities. And so this is quite different from the case under discussion here: obedience to God in his infinite incomprehensibility as found in every good act of freedom may, even as such, very well be determined by a reality which, although finite and concrete, is nevertheless the reality of God himself. Secondly, the thesis enunciated in the above sentence does not come to the same thing as the doctrine of Ripalda who holds that every morally good, free act is also a supernaturally elevated, saving act. For our statement leaves it still quite open whether according to God's free decree such a saving act requires also faith, with a definitely determined content of faith settled by a revelation coming from without, and whether and in what way this may be lacking in a particular case.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

God which means the union of all men as persons in grace and glory with God. And in all this the [84] Church is meant to be a further expression (freely founded, indeed, by Christ, but nevertheless natural) of the very fact that in Christ the human race is the people of God. Hence, in view of these relations it is not surprising, for example, that Tradition (at least to some extent when using terms in a wider sense) gives the name of Church even to humanity consecrated by the Incarnation, i.e. to the 'people of God', and thus has the fundamental foundation of the Church taking place already in the fact of God becoming man. The people of God has a real relation to the Church as a social and juridical body, even although that relation comes into being by way of a free decision made by the God-Man. Therefore, where there is, and to the extent in which there is the people of God, there already is radically also the Church, and that independently of the will of the individual man. Hence wherever, and in so far as, there is the personal will to the people of God, there is also grasped to that extent a reality which has a real tendency to become more concrete on the social and juridical plane in the Church. But, according to what has been said, membership of the people of God is one of the determining factors of a concrete human nature, since every human being is necessarily and indissolubly a member of the one human race which really became the people of God by the divine Incarnation. Therefore, when someone totally accepts his concrete human nature by his decision of free will (the question as to the conditions required for this need not detain us in this context), and thus turns his concrete nature into an expression of every one of his free decisions for God, his free action gains an expression which is at the same time also an expression of the proper, supernatural salvific Will of God. For this decision in freedom necessarily consents also to that membership of the people of God which, in continuance of God's Will of the Incarnation of his Word, constitutes an historically verifiable expression of the Will of God for the inner bestowal of grace on man as a person. Hence, whensoever man as a person accepts the concrete reality of his nature totally, in the free act of a supernatural justification by faith and love, the membership of the people of God becomes the expression of this justifying act. The act of justification itself, therefore, finds expression in something really different from itself, viz. in membership of the people of God which, in its turn, is in reality ordained to membership of the Church in the proper sense.

When the justifying act is thus understood as the votum Ecclesiae, then it is not merely an act which aims in intention at the Church as its [85] implicit object. It is, thus understood, a spiritual and personal act which, in fact and of necessity, already comprises something of the Church, since it is the ratification, in an ontologically real sense, of the membership of the people of God. The act of justification, qua act of faith and of love, is the deed of a spiritual person; qua act of man in the concrete as a member of the one human race which was consecrated by the Incarnation, it necessarily possesses at the same time a reality which is different from, although the expression of, the personal action and which, as membership of the people of God, has a quasi-sacramental nature. Precisely because man as a concrete, bodily human being is a blood-relation of Christ, the votum Ecclesiae does not at all take place in a purely extra-sacramental and invisible interiority of grace. Rather it is essentially, as an act of the concrete human being, an acceptance of the quasi-sacramental structure which by reason of the divine Incarnation is necessarily proper to humanity and hence to the individual human being, considered as the people of God or member of this people respectively. The votum Ecclesiae, therefore, does not replace real membership of the Church by being 'good will' towards the Church. It replaces it by being the personal acceptance of that membership of the people of God which is already a fact on the historical and visible plane and in which is already given a real reference to membership of the Church as an established society. Real membership of the Church is, therefore, a merely conditionally necessary means, not because it could be replaced by a supernatural moral act of man in so far as it is a moral quantity, but because this act itself already reaches necessarily into the dimension of the visibleness of salvation in which the Church in the proper sense also finds itself. Or conversely, the proposition about the Church as necessary means for salvation suffers no exception through the possibility of justification by the votum Ecclesiae, in so far as that necessity of the Church for salvation always does and must mean – by 'Church' – at least what we have called 'people of God' – and, indeed, always can mean this. Because 'people of God' has an objective reference to the Church in the proper sense (a reference which is not left to the discretion of the individual human being), the proposition of the necessity of belonging to the people of God for salvation does not impair the proposition of the necessity of the Church in the proper sense for salvation. For whenever man is consciously and freely guilty of excluding this membership of the Church in the proper sense from his intention, he [86] opposes himself to his membership of the people of God, so that even the latter no longer profits him for salvation but only for damnation. We cannot enter here into the question why the mere membership of the people of God does (or respectively does not) also, like the membership of the Church proper by baptism, bring about grace and supernatural salvation for those who are not capable of a personal act.[96] In the event of it being feasible to assume that this presupposition of incapacity of free decision is not actually valid even in the case of those who die as infants, this problem would in fact dissolve itself from the very outset as being merely an apparent one.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

These arguments have been given merely as scanty suggestions with the simple intention of showing one thing: the whole series of factual problems connected with the compatibility of the fact of the necessity of the Church as a means for salvation with the fact of the possibility of salvation for someone outside the Church points in the direction of our having to assume a certain stratification in the reality of the Church. And this does not, in this ease, refer to the fact that both the juridical and social organization (called 'Church') and also man's union with God by grace belong to the full notion of the Church. The stratification referred to here is to be understood in the sense that the Church, as something visible and as sign of the union with God by grace, must itself be composed of a further twofold reality, viz. Church as an established juridical organization in the sacred order[97] and 'Church as humanity consecrated by the Incarnation'. Any question about belonging to the Church as necessary means for salvation must distinguish between these two strata in the being of the Church, the Sacrament of salvation. It will then certainly be easier to reconcile the necessity of the Church as a means of salvation (although this has to be affirmed of both strata of the Church's nature) with the statement of the possibility of salvation for someone outside the Church, without the former principle evaporating into mere verbalism.

[87] We must now, therefore, answer in the negative to the question we asked earlier on[98] about whether there can be a belonging to the visible Church (i.e. not yet membership) which is merely 'invisible', because merely constituted by the metahistorical possession of grace and by the necessary justifying human acts for this in an unbaptized person, considered as merely personal acts. For basically every personal act finds also a historical expression (a constitutive sign[99]) for the fact of its being a votum Ecclesiae[100] in the concrete nature of man

[96] Cf. for this the literature quoted on this question above, p. 43, note 65, which might be afforded a deeper insight by the points of view indicated here.

[97] As such a juridical organization she has then, furthermore, the three dimensions of unity of faith under the authoritative magisterium, visibility of grace in virtue of the Sacraments (above all in Baptism and the Eucharist) and united action under the direction of the ecclesiastical ruling authority – in other words, the three dimensions to which correspond the three conditions for strict membership of the Church.

[98] Cf. above, p. 68, Note 85 (not Note 78, as stated in the German text. – Tr.).

[99] Cf. for this expression: K. Rahner, Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer (Freiburg 1951), pp. 8 sqq.

[100] This does not necessarily mean that this characteristic of being 'votum Ecclesiae' must be capable of being deciphered in such a moral act of free will by everyone and from every possible point of view. 'Expression' and 'sign' refer to an ontological quality of the human act in its relation to grace and to the Church, – they do not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation and in its incarnate act. Hence, the justified person who belongs (or is 'referred') to the Church without being a member of it, belongs 'invisibly' to the visible Church by grace and has a 'visible' relation to this Church, even when this relation is not constituted by baptism or by an externally verifiable profession of the true faith (as in the case of the catechumen). In other words, there is a lowest limit, in a certain sense, below which man's state of grace and its quasi-sacramental tangibility can no longer be separated from each other, as if the former could exist without the latter. Only the reverse is possible, i.e. there can in some cases be the sign-aspect of grace without there being also the personally and freely accepted grace.[101] But there always is grace in the sense that it is always offered – since everyone belongs indissolubly to the people of God – and in the sense that it is always also visible in this offer.

refer to a quality of knowability for any and every power of understanding.

[101] This is not surprising, since the expression of personal acceptance of grace (which expression can be given without acceptance) is nothing other than the (accepted) expression of the grace offered by God. This offer, however, is directed to all men. It is not merely a juridical, transcendental, 'abstract-unhistorical' reality existing only in the other-worldly 'intention' of God, and communicated only by the revelation of the Word. On the contrary, this offer is really present in the world and in history through the Incarnation of the Word in a humanity which is really one. In view of this, it is therefore evident that the expression of acceptance is always already given even before there is any personal acceptance of grace (i.e. before there is any 'invisible' belonging to the Church), and that the reverse is quite impossible. For the reverse would mean that man assents to a grace which is not at all offered to him, or that this offer has no incarnational presence in the world and in the history of the one human race – in short, that it would be an offer of the 'grace of God' which would not be essentially also the 'grace of Christ'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[89]

2

FREEDOM IN THE CHURCH

It is not at all surprising that freedom is so much talked about at the present time. In this world where things last only for a time and then perish, a world in which things are put to the test, we frequently discover values only after they have disappeared or when they seem to be dying. We invoke the values which we lack. And so we speak of freedom and need not wonder at that fact.

But – freedom in the Church: this would seem a somewhat surprising subject for discussion. St Paul spoke of the freedom of the Christian. After that, this particular topic was no longer mentioned very much. Luther turned this theme into a reformational battle-cry against the Roman Church, and yet at the same time he denied man, this same man, his freedom before God. He thought to extol grace by stressing the impotence of the human will to choose between God and the Devil. As against this, the old Church preached the duty of obedience to the teaching and command of the Hierarchy, as well as the freedom of the will before God and in face of his grace. Then there came the period of the liberalistic conception of freedom – when people became preoccupied with liberating man from social and economic restrictions and with the defence of the freedom of conscience, of speech and of the press. However, we do not seem to have got very far with this since 1789. For the proletarians do not find that they have become free. And the various freedoms of speech, etc., have been in the end simply monopolized once more by the Ministries of Propaganda and similar institutions. During this time of Liberalism, the Church preached about the law and authority, about order and obligation. And when she spoke of freedom, she meant the freedom which she claimed for herself against those who wanted to overpower the Church with their omnipotence of the State (always in the name of freedom, of course, and as Liberals), so that she might no more be tempted to threaten the freedom of modern times. And so, since the [90] time of St Paul there was really not much talk in the Catholic Church of freedom in the Church. Was this subject overlooked, because it is insignificant or because it was dangerous, or because we do not need to speak much about what we possess as a matter of course? Or was it spoken of in other terms? Who can say for sure?

At any rate we must speak of it at the present time. For in times when there is no freedom, we search anxiously for it in whatever place we still hope to find it; and today people are listening more thoughtfully once again to the message of the Faith, especially such as it issued originally from the pages of the New Testament. We must speak of this subject nowadays, because one has become sensitive and delicate about transgressions against the holy spirit of freedom in the Church, since one does not at any cost wish to confuse the Church with a totalitarian collectivity.

It must be understood that important points of view on this much unnoticed subject may perhaps even here be overlooked in what we shall have to say about it. However, two matters will be the subject of discussion in what follows: 1. the Church, considered in its role of sacramental sign of freedom, and 2. freedom in the Church.

I

There is a freedom which in Christian philosophy is called psychological freedom of choice. This freedom is the presupposition of what is called responsibility, and it

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

characterizes what is meant by person in the modern sense of the word. The Scriptures and Christian consciousness regarded it as self-evident that man is in this sense a free responsible person, even in his relationships with God. This means that they looked on man as a person who is continually and repeatedly called upon to make decisions and choices, who holds himself and his fate in his own hands, who disposes of himself either for good or for evil and thus can be the subject of good and evil actions and of moral reward or punishment. All this is so very obvious in the Scriptures and to Christian consciousness that men never reflected explicitly on it except in times when this permanent and unchangeable basic structure of human existence was called into doubt, as it was, for instance, by Gnosticism, etc., in the second century. This freedom is lived in the Scriptures rather than made the object of theoretical reflection. When the Scriptures, and especially St Paul, speak of the freedom which the [91] Christian message does not regard as its obvious presupposition in man but as something which Christianity brings with it for the first time, then it is a question of a different kind of freedom. It is this freedom which we must first of all determine in its nature and then show why and how it has something to do with the Church. In this way it will then become clear that what we are above all concerned with here is the fact that the Church is the tangible sacramental sign of this freedom.

We obviously cannot give even a brief account here of the history of the Graeco-western notion of freedom, no matter how useful this might be for our purpose. Freedom was regarded at the beginning as freedom from social, economic and political coercion. It was, therefore, looked upon as the antithesis of slavery, servitude, etc. Thus it is in the first instance a property of the citizen of an independent polis who is concerned in the supporting and ordering of the State. After that, this notion took on a more individual and inward character. The free man now comes to be thought of as the man who has α)υτοπραχι/α, who can do what he likes. And this freedom towards himself, as not being bound by any forces which would alienate the individual from himself, is now regarded more and more as confined to the interior life, where man always is and can be really himself. Thus, if man takes this upon himself and if he recognizes and fully appreciates this unassailable precinct of his inner spiritual nature as the very region of his proper human existence, then he is and can be free at least in this sphere. Here and there it was apparently thought that man can also free himself from the dimensions of his being which are different from this sublime inner Ego, and from their governing forces (such as the forces of Nature, of the State, etc.), simply by abandoning all opposition to them and withdrawing himself from them as being, in his esteem, indifferent. Man was regarded as becoming free by detaching and freeing himself from these forces, having seen through them and recognized them as inessential in themselves and as insignificant for himself. The remarkable thing about all this seems to be that, until it is seen in the light of Christianity, one cannot have any clear understanding even of real freedom of choice, i.e. of the freedom which consists not merely in the fact that man is not coerced from without, but also in the further fact that a free decision about himself is demanded of him – a freedom, therefore, which is rather a requirement and commission than freedom. For only in the Christian context – in [92] God's personal love for man – is everyone a unique individual with eternal value and someone who must attain his fulfilment in complete responsibility for himself and hence in freedom.

Be that as it may, the message of Christianity tells man above all: you, together with the freedom in which you have all along taken possession of yourself, are precisely as such the one to be freed, the one to be saved. You have, of course, the formally unfilled capacity of self-mastery and of freedom, you can act in this way or that, not only towards and with the things which constitute your surroundings, but also with regard to yourself. You yourself are the one who disposes of himself. You are not simply one who develops in accordance with a law which has determined your place and role, even if this law were conceived as the most

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

individual of all. You deal with yourself in freedom, forming yourself for eternity through an act which cannot adequately be dissolved into something merely provisional, and which decides precisely what you yourself finally want to be – through an act which you yourself really posit, which does not merely happen to you, an act which is your deed and not your fate.

But all this does not yet make you by any means simply free in the true and ultimate sense of the word. Finite freedom of choice, in spite of its true autonomy, is always choice arising out of a given situation. It is a choice which is imposed on us without our being able to choose it ourselves. It is a choice, imposed without choice, which can itself be the least free of all if the scope given to it, and within which it is exercised, is itself already a prison of bondage in the wrong place – somewhat as if one were to say to someone sitting in a prison-cell that he is free, because he can choose in which corner of his dungeon he wishes to sit. Everything depends on the object of one's freedom. Now one might think that this situation, which limits in advance the capacity of choosing, should of itself include what is right and good for salvation among its possibilities, in so far as the choice has a moral character and is said to be the cause of good and evil. In other words, one might think that if man is the one who, essentially as man, must dispose of himself for salvation or damnation by his freedom of choice, then his salvation must be part of his nature from the very start, as a possibility which, although it can be thrown away, can also, at any rate, be achieved and attained by him of his own power. It would seem that man, being free to choose, must have free and autonomous access to his salvation; his salvation must, therefore, ultimately be himself.

[93] But it is precisely this that is false. The conception of the consummation of human existence, which presupposes and affirms this, is the most abysmal falsehood of all. And the freedom which is understood in this way, not only as a call but as something of itself capable of achieving what it is called to, is the most radically false freedom. For the very fact that man would withdraw himself into his own unassailable interior being, into that dimension in which he would be himself alone and cut off from anything else, would mean that he is not free, but a prisoner and one banished into that inescapable limitation of his nature which is all the more apparent in this freedom. For precisely such a mode of existence, freed from everything else, would be something empty and senseless, and merely the point at which freedom is turned into a state of radical abandonment and into futility. Freedom would thus become sheer negation – in other words, a hell or a freedom which holds itself aloof from everything, because it must fear everything as being alien and oppressive. But if freedom, even in its own most proper sphere, does not of itself have what could be regarded as its liberating or saving realization, where then is the freedom of freedom, i.e. where is the object of freedom which does not cause the very ruin of freedom but, on the contrary, brings about its realization? Where, indeed, is this freedom of freedom, if freedom, delivered up to the finite as such and realized in it, becomes captive freedom, since freedom is to be had only when the finite is recognized as such and because freedom, in spite of the fact that it is essentially referred to the finite for its self-realization, nevertheless consumes itself in the finite or must retreat into the empty infinities of its own mere possibilities? In short, where is this freedom of freedom, if there is the oppressive and the enslaving?

To answer that it is in God, is the true answer but also the most dangerous one. For then, if what we are saying is not to be a downright lie and the worst sin, we must mean by this the One whom we (in order to be free) do not have but who gives or withholds himself, who is not conquered but always remains a grace. God must not be just another word for the splendour of our self-disposing freedom, any more than for the sublimity of our knowledge (called Transcendence). God must be God, the One whom we need, but who does not need us and for whom we remain unnecessary even when we already exist. If God, however, is to be in this way the very object of our freedom which alone makes this freedom free, then this freedom would neither [94] consume itself infernally in its own emptiness when it withholds itself, nor would it deliver itself to the slavery of the finite when it gives itself. Considered in the abstract, then, He can be this liberating reality in two ways: by refusing himself and by declaring himself, by remaining afar off and by drawing near. Even the first way would be a consummation of freedom which would give it meaning: to be before God, the unattainable; adoration of the infinitely distant; remaining open to him in the knowledge of his glory as experienced in the blessedness of the painful flame of yearning; the most obedient will to listen attentively to his silence which also reveals him; the acceptance of his decrees which is in any case always blessed and more fulfilling than if man wanted to pass God by. But God did not want to be the distant One, which we should always be prepared to let him be and, indeed, must be prepared to let him be in order to understand and grasp his gift (and in so far as we do). He wanted to be the God who is near to us, the One who gives himself as a gift in love, who communicates himself and who realizes our freedom in its (very) freedom. He is the freedom of our freedom by the grace of his self-communication, without which our free will could only choose bondage no matter what choice it might make. And he is this freedom of our freedom by way of communication and not of refusal. God's communication of himself, which is the liberating terminus ad quem of our freedom, is called by us grace of justification and sanctification, or sanctifying grace, and the Bible calls it also 'divine pneuma'. We may say, therefore, that the divine pneuma is the liberating freedom of our freedom; our freedom is saved by it from the dilemma of being either a freedom given up to the finiteness of the chosen finite possibilities and thus enslaved, or a freedom preserved but starving to death on account of its own emptiness – in short, it saves it from the dilemma of being either an exhausted freedom or a starved freedom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The freedom of freedom, in as far as it is that which is offered by God in grace and is thus thought of as preceding its free acceptance, is the decisive factor in the situation of our freedom. It can be given or refused by God. Hence it can be made to depend on certain conditions which are outwith and previous to the decision of the freedom proper to each one of us as an individual. And thus there is a community of situation which applies to the freedom of all men, in spite of the fact that each particular act of freedom can be executed only by the individual himself and cannot be performed for him by any one else. This [95] community of situation is the basic reason for the fact that, by God's decree, the offer made to us of the liberating freedom of freedom (called sanctifying grace), was dependent on the acceptance of the offer made to the first man, which offer was de facto refused. And so man is the slave of what we call original sin, in as far as this offer of the freedom of freedom made to us in that way through the first man no longer persists, and in as far as man has, therefore, from that point of view, lost the freedom of freedom. This means that, as someone who has his origin in the first man, he no longer finds himself on a plane where his exercise of freedom remains free simply on account of an offered self-communication by God. And so, in as far as the pneuma of God, which makes freedom free, is offered gratuitously to this man of the Adamite community of guilt (which by this fact has become the Christian community of redemption), the freedom of freedom given gratuitously through the pneuma is now properly speaking a redemptive freedom from the slavery of guilt. This is all the more so the case if, and in so far as, the individual human being, who has been robbed of the freedom of God by original sin, has willed himself by personal guilt to be in this state without pneuma, and if he has tried to remain free while remaining without grace. Thus he might want to do the work of the world by himself in his finiteness and redeem himself in this way, possibly believing himself to be justified by this even before God. Or he might believe that by retreating into his own transcendence, he has already found his redeeming freedom there within himself. This attempt to achieve freedom in the finite, either by laying hold of it or by withdrawing from it, will to a greater or lesser degree become a slavery to the finite. In so far as it does, and to the extent in which the objects of such an enslaved freedom are in their respective orders under the power of personal agencies (called angels or, if evil, devils), this particular kind of slavery is objectively slavery under diabolic powers. The freedom of freedom given by the pneuma is, therefore, the redemption from such powers, in so far as these strive to be the confining boundary of the situation of man's freedom.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

That the pneuma is gratuitously given to us as the redemptive freedom of freedom which had fallen into culpable bondage in Adam and in us, is no mere abstract theory or ideological postulate, nor is it an always necessarily valid truth or (merely) a datum of our mystical experience. On the contrary, this spiritual freedom of our freedom is established by the very act of God freely present in the flesh of Christ [96] himself as a sign in this world, and is grasped and made our own as present in this sign. In so far as God freely gives himself in Christ in a tangible and irrevocable manner, the freedom of our freedom (as offered) is really established and present in this world – in the historical, tangible reality of the flesh of Christ. In so far as he became present in the world by his birth as the presence of God himself and remained the Son of God in death and made this even more tangible in his resurrection, Christ is the real and, indeed, tangible and visible fact of the free opening out of the world into God. The fact that there is a pneuma, which is the freedom of freedom, has its source, is made accessible and is applied to us in Jesus, the Word of the Father in flesh of Adam, the Crucified and the risen Christ.

Now the Church is nothing other than the visible, socially composed communion of men with Jesus, the source of sanctifying grace; she is the community which, in its historico-social form, its tangible liturgical actions, its word of truth and its life, is the continuation of the historically tangible reality of Christ. And hence she is the community which continues to exercise the function of this historical tangibility, viz. to render the pneuma of freedom effectively and actually present in the world and to signify that fact. As the continuation of the Sacrament which is Christ, the Church is, therefore, the tangible and original sacramental sign of the pneuma which is the freedom of our freedom, i.e. she, and with her also the community, signifies and effects that we have this freedom of God.

We are now in a position to have a somewhat clearer understanding of certain New Testament phrases which state in short formulae what we have up until now tried to set forth in a rather systematic train of thought.

The love of the Father, the α)λη/θεια which has been revealed in the Son (Jn 8.36), Who became flesh, sets us free (Jn 8.32), because where the pneuma is, there is freedom (2 Cor 3.17), since it is for freedom that Christ has made us free (Gal 5.1). This freedom is a freedom from sin (Rom 6.18-23; Jn 8.31-36), from the law (Rom. 7.3 sq.; 8.2; Gal 2.4; 4.21-31; 5.1, 13) and from death (Rom 6.21 sq.; 8.21): from sin, in so far as this is in a thousand different ways the assertion of self freely accomplished both within oneself and in the world, without being open to the love of God as proceeding both from him and to him; from the law, in so far as this, although the holy will of God, (whether infringed or self-complacently accomplished in deed) merely [97] becomes a stimulus for man without grace to assert himself against or before God; from death, in so far as this is merely the manifestation of guilt. Man appropriates this freedom, which Christ is and gives, by obeying the call to this freedom (Gal 5.13) and by submitting himself in faith and in its tangible sign, i.e. baptism, to the event which breaks open the prison of this world, viz. the Incarnation, death and resurrection of the Son.

We cannot enter more closely into all this here. What is important, however, is that we should in some measure substantiate also the connection of this liberation of freedom with the Church from the Scriptures. Even that can be done only in brief outline. Suffice it to give the following four catch-words which establish the fact of the connection between the Church and Christian freedom from Scripture; Call, baptism, Pneuma, the New Law. The Church is the ε)κκλησια, the congregation convoked from those who have received their call, having been called into God's light out of the world of sin and death. But this call is at the same time the call to freedom (Gal 5.13). Baptism establishes the Church (Eph 5.25 sqq., etc) and is at the same time the event through which we enter into freedom (Rom 6.16 sqq). The Pneuma is the principle of freedom (Rom 8.2; 8.15; 2 Cor 3.17) and the animating entelechy of the Church (Jn 3.5; 1 Cor 3.16; 1 Cor 12.13; Eph 4.4, etc.). Christianity (in contrast to the Law of the Old Testament) is simply characterized by the Law of freedom in the New Testament (Jam 1.25; 2.12), which does not consider it as an idea or a Weltanschauung but only as the Church in the concrete. The Epistle to the Galatians accordingly tells us in summary that the Church (as the new, heavenly Jerusalem in contrast to the Old Testament) is the free woman, and that we are not children of bondage but children of the free woman (Gal 4.21-31).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

One should now, of course, go on to prove more exactly why, and above all how, the Church is the quasi-sacramental tangible element and the historically visible factor of the redemptive liberation of the freedom of man. In so far as she is, or rather has, the pneuma of God, she is or has freedom, and to her alone can we strictly apply the text: Where the Lord's spirit is, there is freedom. She is the 'where' of spiritual freedom. In so far as she is different from the Pneuma living and ruling within her, the Church is the historical quasi-sacramental sign of this pneuma, and hence also of freedom, by which the 'pneumatic' freedom is signified and made present. One should now go on [98] to inquire into the way in which the Church is the effective sign of this spiritual freedom in her being, her Word, her sacramental action and in her history. First of all, she proclaims this freedom in her Word which is the message of Christ. She does not do this by teaching subsequently about freedom which would exist even without this teaching; but, on the contrary, she renders freedom present by proclaiming it. She gives man this freedom by effectively obtaining the divine pneuma or freedom for him in the Sacraments. Her life is a sign of this freedom, in so far as she lives the love of God and neighbour in her sanctified members. And love, precisely to the extent in which it forgets itself, relinquishes self-assertion and serves others – for the sake of others it even lets itself be bounded by many an earthly and legal limitation. Love frees man from himself. It makes him free for the boundlessness of God and of his eternal life. But even this can unfortunately only be briefly outlined here.

One thing, at any rate, must be firmly borne in mind from what has been said: the reality and the notion of freedom is not merely something which belongs to man's natural being, which the Church, as the guardian even of the natural order, would then in addition defend and regulate in its ordered exercise and in the different fields in which such freedom is lawful. Freedom is rather a proper theological notion which expresses a reality belonging strictly to the order of grace, and much more than this psychological freedom of choice and freedom as a right of the person. Freedom is a theological notion expressing a reality which in the strictest sense of identity is itself the gift of salvation, rather than being merely a presupposition for salvation. For the real, true and ultimate freedom, which must be gifted to our freedom to free it from guilt, law and death, is the sacred pneuma of God itself and of his Christ. Hence the Church is the indispensable, existential place of this freedom, in so far as and because this pneuma can be had only in the Church, since it is her inner reality and she its external sign.

II

Everything we have seen so far is not only in itself more important than anything we are going to treat of now, but is important also precisely for what follows. We are now going to speak of the freedom in the Church. This subject leaves out of consideration everything

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

signified by the question of the religious or civil tolerance of the [99] Church or a Christian State towards other Christians and towards non-Christians.

We intend, therefore, to inquire only into the freedom which the Catholic Christian as such enjoys in and vis-à-vis his Church. This is a question which must be posed. The Church is a legally established society with laws, regulations, authorities and subjects etc. – and this will always be so, as long as she is still on pilgrimage towards the final return of Christ and as long as she lives in this world and is still in via between Adam and Christ in her members. All this, although determined by the will of Christ, belongs to the transience of the present aeon. It is all encircled and supported by the love of the divine Spirit, Who is freedom; this whole order of things can ultimately be respected and accomplished by Christians only out of this love, which does not seek its own and which, freed for the freedom of God, does not need to flee anxiously before earthly ties and obligations built up by this love. All this does and indeed must exist in the Church in the aeon of this world. And so also the question arises as to where exactly lies the balance between these bonds and freedom. This question has, however, its own proper weight in theology, precisely because the Church, as sign of the presence of the divine freedom in this world, must also unquestionably fashion its earthly tangible form in such a way as not to obscure her reality as a sign of the divine freedom. And in this age of totalitarian systems the Church has the additional duty not even to give the impression, either to her own or to outsiders, of being a clerical, religiously camouflaged kind of totalitarian system herself. Her objective nature is not that of a totalitarian system, because the dignity of man, the directness of man's relationship to God and freedom are part and parcel of the basic principles which are proclaimed by her and which have been constitutively established in her very being. Moreover, the Church, and she alone, has been given God's promise (and this is the decisive fact distinguishing her from every other society in danger of totalitarianism), that she will be preserved by his grace until the end of time from every essential defection from this her true nature, to which it also belongs that she must respect the genuine rights of human freedom in this world. However, since the Church is always also a Church made up of sinful men, even as far as the holders of her authority are concerned, she can also in her individual actions offend against her own principles and against the freedom of the individual both within and without. This has happened often [100] enough in the course of history. It can happen even today. And this is what the Church must guard against, for today more than ever she must be the champion of true freedom. But even by such individual offences she does not become a totalitarian system. For she acts in these cases against her own proclaimed and practised principles, whereas a really totalitarian system does not recognize such principles of the freedom and dignity of the individual either expressly or tacitly, but on the contrary idolizes the collectivity and degrades the individual. But the Church must reckon with the real danger of giving the scandal of an apparent totalitarianism. This is particularly the case because, no matter how clear her ultimate basic principles may be, there can be, and in fact there has been, a subjective development of the Church's consciousness in articulating and applying more particular and proximate principles with exactitude and sureness. And this also explains how it is possible for the Church to violate the legitimate claims of freedom both from within and from without, particularly in cases where she does not become clearly conscious of such a violation.

Authority, law, norm, command – all these are to be found in the Church, as well as the reaction of the Church against violations of such norms, which take the form of exhortation, censure, penalty. And there must of necessity be such realities in the Church. After all, she must by the Lord's commission preserve, explain, develop and teach divine revelation authoritatively in its unchangeableness as divine truth and as it terminated with the Apostles. She must maintain and guard the nature given to her by her founder in respect of her form of government, the administration of the Sacraments, etc. She has the duty to promulgate the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

abiding moral norms of the Natural Law and of the divine positive Law, and to apply them to the changing historical situations. She has, therefore, also the right and obligation to decide by her teaching- and pastoral-authority and in a manner binding on the conscience of her children, whether this or that particular, actual behaviour of individuals or social groups can be objectively reconciled with God's moral law or not. The Church, therefore, has the right and duty not just to lay down general norms of a material or even merely formal kind, as if everything else must then be left on principle to the individual and to his conscience and as if he alone must decide on every occasion whether the general norms promulgated by the Church apply to his case and situation or not. No, more than this, the Church has the right and the duty, as part of her teaching office and especially of [101] her pastoral office, to enact over and above this such norms binding in concreto as will make it clear that in consequence certain definite actions fall outside the objective sphere of morally good conduct, both on principle and in every case. Hence, without passing final judgment on the subjective conscience, she can also proceed in her Church law against those who by their conduct place themselves outside this field of action negatively determined by ecclesiastical authority. All this limits the Christian's scope of freedom within the world. It would be wrong to blind oneself to this fact or to try to dispute it by appealing to the pauline doctrine of the Christian's freedom from the law. For according to St Paul, this freedom of the Christian is freedom from the law understood as something divorced from grace, which makes demands from without and thus incites to sin; it is the freedom of man from himself and from his egoistical self-assertion against or before God, and thus it is a freedom for the infinity of communion with God in love. It is not, however, a freedom from the holy Will of God, in so far as this Will can and ought to become the inner law of our heart under the pneuma of God, and in so far as this Will of God can and will also become a completely concrete demand in the form of definite and individual material commandments right down to the particular norms of the natural moral law. This freedom is moreover not an emancipation from the teaching and pastoral authority of the Church, of which Christ spoke when He said: 'He who hears you, hears me.'

With reference to this indisputable limitation of the scope of the freedom of Church members, which is absolutely compatible with the pauline doctrine of freedom, three points must be borne in mind:

(a) Freedom, in this intramundane sense of the psychological and moral capacity to decide to act in this way or that, receives its meaning and value ultimately from the object for which and upon which one decides. It is true that freedom as such, i.e. freedom of exercise and not merely freedom in what is done, belongs to the absolute dignity of a person, so that to deprive someone completely of any scope for freedom, even in a case where the object would still be attainable even without this concession of scope for freedom, would still amount to a degrading of the person. This means, therefore, that to deprive someone of the very scope itself for making even morally wrong decisions, cannot be the business of any man or of any human society vis-à-vis other men. For such an unconditioned refusal of the possibility of an objectively and morally wrong decision would amount to [102] a suppression of the very scope for freedom itself. But it nevertheless remains true to say that the objective and moral justification for an individual free act is essentially co-determined by the object of this act. If the latter does not furnish an objective and moral justification, then such justification can also be denied to the free act qua individual act. There can, therefore, be no question of a real right to choose error or to decide on some objectively wrong moral conduct, although it is quite a different question whether and to what limited extent someone may have the right to be given room for freedom, within which the possibility of choosing error or what is morally wrong remains open to him. Seen from this point of view, the authority of the Church, her laws and the decisions of her teaching authority cannot be regarded as an infringement or

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

curtailment of a genuine right to freedom. She merely keeps man away from objects which of themselves either cannot be the object of a true exercise of freedom or at least are not a necessary object of such an exercise which receives its dignity from the object and not by a merely arbitrary choice.

(b) It must not be forgotten that the norms promulgated by the Church in limiting the scope of freedom oblige, in as far as they are ecclesiastical norms, only those who, by the free decision of their conscience, have acknowledged the Church as a divine institution, and who acknowledge the authority of this Church as legitimatized by God. The conscientious heeding of an authority acknowledged in freedom can never be objectively contrary to this freedom. And the Church clearly refuses to allow anyone to be physically forced to accept the faith or to receive baptism.

(c) A further point is to be noted. We spoke just now about the fact that the Church is not simply the authoritative teacher of abstract or even merely formal religious and ethical norms, but has also the right and the duty to condemn certain concrete forms of behaviour by the Christian as incompatible with these norms, and thus to delimit the scope of morally possible freedom of action in a negative way. This applies to the Christian even if in a particular case he can no longer fathom the objective reasons for the binding force of the ecclesiastical norm nor understand the application of this norm to life in the concrete, but must simply be satisfied with the fact that, although this is beyond his comprehension, the legitimate authority of the Church has declared this or that to be incompatible with the moral law. But all this does not mean that the freedom of the Christian in the [103] decisions of his life consists simply in the fact that he has acknowledged the Church's authority once and for all by a free decision, and that from this moment onwards nothing is left to him but to receive orders and to carry out commands which determine even the most minute details of his life. Nor does it mean that in those cases in which the Church does not issue the Christian with any such detailed command, it can only be a question of matters which are unimportant from a religious or moral point of view. The true picture is quite different. For when the Church goes beyond proclaiming general norms by her teaching authority and draws concrete conclusions in her pastoral office which are obligatory for the practical conduct of her members, her function is in itself and fundamentally of a negative kind. She sets limits, without thereby ascribing to herself the duty, or even the ability, to say fundamentally in each case what exactly the individual must do here and now in this particular situation and within the bounds set by her in the religious and moral fields, in order to ensure that his action is right both in this world and before God.

For it is wrong to think that the concrete reality of our deeds and omissions corresponds in every respect to God's will and hence to what is fully moral, simply because it does not run into conflict with the general norms which can be formally stated in a proposition. For such an opinion is ultimately based on the platonic conviction that the individual and concrete thing or case is nothing more than the negative limitation of the universal. But if there is a concrete and particular reality which cannot be adequately reduced to the universal (and which, therefore, is not expressible in a formal proposition and thus cannot be dealt with by the authority of a community), then there is an ethics and Christian morality which, for the want of a better word and in spite of possible misunderstandings, we may call 'existential' ethics and Christian 'existential' morality. Such an ethics and morality must not be disregarded, in spite of the fact that one can give only formal and general laws for it.[1] In the concrete, this means that when I am faced with a decision in my private or public life, certain possibilities of action will – basically speaking – be eliminated as being incapable of a

[1] Cf. below: 'On the question of a formal existential Ethics'. In this connection cf. also: K. Rahner, Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln 1950), pp. 9-30: 'Der Einzelne in der Kirche'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian or moral realization, since they conflict with this or that formal or material universal norm promulgated by the Church as [104] being objectively right and prohibiting this or that manner of conduct. But this does not basically provide man with a clear positive imperative as to what is to be done here and now in this concrete situation. Such a negative procedure of sifting moral possibilities may, of course, in many cases lead in fact and in practice to an unmistakable conclusion concerning the question as to what is to be done here and now. But this is not necessarily so. In the nature of things there will always still remain several possibilities which could all be realized without coming thereby demonstrably into conflict with any definite material norms of morality. And yet only one of these possibilities can be the morally correct one, because it alone corresponds to the actual demands of the case and of the will of God.

We cannot concern ourselves here with the question of how the concrete imperative for the fulfilment of my actual individual task in a particular situation can be found beyond the analysis of the situation and its confrontation with the universal moral norms. However, it should be immediately evident that this individual norm is not only not settled for me authoritatively by the Church authority, but also that the latter is unable to do this. The Church cannot, for example, tell me what career I must choose, or whether I in particular – this concrete and unique individual – am to marry or not, and whether I should choose this or that marriage partner. The Church can, indeed, promulgate this or that important and very 'practical' social norm; she can also reject this or that actual economic system as being incompatible with Christian standards. But she cannot tell the individual statesman, in the particular concrete situation in which he is placed, which among the Christianly possible social and economic constitutions he in particular is to bring about. She cannot do this, although we cannot say that the choice of a definite form from among the different abstract Christian possibilities is a morally and religiously indifferent matter, simply because all these possibilities proposed for selection are of themselves reconcilable with Christian truth and. morality. Precisely this choice from among the abstract Christian possibilities can in many cases be an important matter from the point of view of the situation in this world. Not only that, but for this very reason such a choice can also be a moral decision of the highest order, for which the person concerned is responsible before God, although the Church's authority cannot say in the concrete what is right and the Holy Will of God for him here and now. It therefore follows from [105] this, that fundamentally all moral decisions which have to be made by the Christian – and all his decisions have a moral and Christian side to them – have also a concrete and individual dimension which of itself and directly cannot be covered at all by the authority of the Church. This, therefore, provides a zone of freedom, but not of freedom to act simply as one chooses, as if anything were indifferent before God. This is a zone of freedom where the Church leaves the individual Christian to himself, to his conscience and the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and to his own charisma given him by this Spirit. And the Church does so to such an extent that the individual cannot at all transfer the burden and responsibility of this freedom to the Church. The Church is made up of individuals who can never hide themselves under the anonymity and irresponsibility of an ecclesiastical mass. The ecclesiastical and the concrete ecclesiastical reality, on the one hand, and what is Christian and what is justified before God, the Creator of the universal and the individual, on the other hand, never coincide completely.

Even in the Church there is to be found an application of the principle of subsidiary function in respect of the functioning of her hierarchically constructed authorities, without prejudice to her basic God-given constitution and the direct origin of her fundamental authority and powers in her divine founder. This means that even in the Church every individual, community and authority must, indeed, be fitted into the whole structure of the Church and subordinated to the highest authority of the Church; but this does not mean that the members of the Church (both individuals and communities), which are thus incorporated and subordinated, cannot and ought not to have their own relatively independent functions; it does not mean that the life of the Church is directed by an omnipotent central body of bureaucrats, and that all others have merely the duty to receive orders passively, without any responsibility or initiative of their own. Even in positive Canon Law (which is not unchangeable) changes can take place in the boundary between freedom and compulsion and in the distribution of duties and rights. The Canon Law obtaining at any particular moment in time does not need to be regarded as something immutable. Because someone does not have a divine right in a certain respect and in a particular case, this does not mean that the Church herself may not invest him with this right in the form of a ius humanum, which can be a true right and not merely a privilege. Thus it is [106] conceivable that in this respect the rights of lay people might be further extended or re-extended, since in the long run this is the only way in which the layman can be brought to a consciousness of his duties in and on behalf of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Even within her life of religion, the Church must combat the tendency among her own members of taking refuge in the mass and taking flight into a merely collective religious life, as is manifested by too great a dependence on others, by the fact of shying away from personal responsibility or waiting for ecclesiastical directives from above in the wrong circumstances, or by the opinion that everything is morally as it should be merely by the fact that the Church has not issued an explicit and detailed verdict, and by the dwindling of a personal private life of piety both of the individual and in families, in spite of their participation in the official liturgy, etc.

If, in conclusion, we are to give some indication of certain concrete instances where room should be left for freedom inside the Church particularly at the present time, then the following must be said:

(a) Even within the Church there should be room and toleration for the expression of opinion, i.e. Public Opinion.[2] Pius XII himself pointed this out and stated that the absence of such public opinion in the Church would be a fault for which both the pastors and the flock would have to take the blame. The following are the Holy Father's actual words (Osservatore Romano, 18th February 1950):

> Public opinion is the natural portion of every normal society composed of human beings. . . Whenever there is no manifest expression of public opinion at all, and above all whenever one must admit that public opinion does not at all exist, this lack must be regarded as a fault, a weakness and a disease in the life of that society . . . In conclusion, We wish to add a few words about public opinion within the pale of the Church (in respect of those matters, of course, which are left to free discussion). Only those will be surprised at this who do not know the Catholic Church, or at least know her only badly. For, after all, she too is a living body, and there would be something lacking in her life if there were no public opinion in the Church – a lack for which the pastors as well as the faithful would be to blame . . .

[107] (b) There must be room in theology for research, for different schools and directions of thought, for experiments and progress, within the framework of actual dogmas and any other really obligatory doctrines.

(c) There is, if we may express our meaning in so profane a manner, a lawful 'freedom of association' for Christians within the ecclesiastical sphere. Even in this sphere is it a valid rule that higher forms of organization must not be allowed to suppress, in favour of a kind of 'State Socialism' which organizes things in a bureaucratic manner from above, the

[2] Cf. Karl Rahner, Free Speech in the Church (London 1960).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

spontaneous individual life of fellowships which grow up within the Church from below. Such methods would be more convenient and would make it easier to survey everything, but they would not be more successful in the long run and would, in fact, mean the death of any true Church life. An exaggerated principle of parochial and natural social groupings offends against the rightful freedom of the Christian in his religious life.

(d) Side by side with the official function which is transmitted in a juridical manner, there is and must also be the charismatic and the prophetic in the Church which cannot be officially organized right from the start but must, in all patience and humility, be given sufficient room for growth, even though its bearers are sometimes rather 'inconvenient'. It is written: 'Do not extinguish the Spirit.'

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[109]

3

PERSONAL AND SACRAMENTAL PIETY

I. INTRODUCTION TO THE PROBLEM

1. The Question

The question about the particular place which the reception of the sacraments, and especially the sacrament of the altar, should occupy in our daily spiritual life will always go on being discussed. Years ago people argued about the relationship between 'ontic' piety and subjective piety. Since that time, everyone has no doubt realized that the reception of the sacraments is not meant to dispense us from the efforts of self-discipline nor, therefore, from personal co-operation when receiving the Holy Eucharist. Consequently, the important question for us in our present discussion will lie in a different direction. What we will ask ourselves is whether a 'Spiritual Communion', for example, can be a valid substitute for the actual reception of the Eucharist – without loss of benefits – and whether it is of the same value and has the same effects for salvation. Can examination of conscience and contrition mean the same as a sacramental 'Confession of devotion'? Have there not been times when the reception of the particular sacrament – be it the Eucharist or Penance – was rather infrequent, without it being possible to assume lightly that there was less piety and less love of God among the pious in those days?

2. Insufficient Answers

To begin with, one cannot simply dismiss this question merely by stating that in fact, since the sacrament is effective ex opere operato, a sacrament gives grace of its own power, and that one does not receive this grace without a sacramental reception of the sacrament. For firstly: A sacrament, even when received worthily, does not simply increase grace with absolute certainty and necessity in arithmetical proportion [110] to the number of times it is received. Even although such a conception is the tacit basis of a fairly widespread popular opinion about the sacraments and their efficacy, this view falls down in face of the clear doctrine that the sacraments increase in efficacy (i.e. in the efficacy peculiar to them) in proportion to the dispositions of the recipient. These dispositions are, according to the Council of Trent (Denz 799), the measure (although not the cause) of the sacrament's factual growth in efficacy. And even these dispositions themselves do not grow simply in proportion to the frequency of the reception of the sacrament. Otherwise it would be impossible to explain ultimately why, for instance, the Church allows the Eucharist to be received only once per day.

And secondly: Are there 'sacramental' graces which can be received only through the sacrament? There are, of course, effects of the sacraments which cannot be received otherwise than through the sacraments, such as our alloted place in the order of the hierarchico-visible Church, given to us by Baptism, Confirmation and Holy Orders, or the sacramental character, and the marriage bond. But our question is not concerned with such matters. The question is rather: is there some grace which can be acquired only through a sacrament, be it the grace of the state of justification and sanctification and its growth, or be it (actual) grace to help us to continue in the truly Christian life of oneness with Christ and to fight against sin, face the trial of death, profess the Faith, fulfil our vocation to the priesthood, matrimony, etc.? This may well be doubted. For when we speak in sacramental theology of the peculiar grace of each individual sacrament, which pertains to the particular sacrament in accordance with the particular characteristics and purpose of the sacrament concerned, nothing more is meant by this than that the sacraments differ from each other in this way in their effect and not merely in their outward rite. Such a statement does not, however, imply that the sacraments give a grace which otherwise could not be obtained in any way. In reality, sanctifying grace is increased through the whole Christian life – through prayer, penance, the carrying out of one's duties, the keeping of the Commandments, through sufferings undergone in faith, through a Christian dying. Who is going to doubt that the priest obtains further graces by his prayer and by the faithful exercise of his office to help him in the fulfilment of his priestly task, and similarly also in the case of the partners in a marriage? Who is going to deny that penance, [111] prayer, etc. obtain graces for avoiding further sins and for the removal of the consequences of sin which still remain after guilt has been remitted – graces, in short, which are 'peculiar' to the sacrament of Penance?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

It is also not sufficient to say that God has de facto instituted the sacraments as the means for grace and that he therefore wants them to be used, so that anyone who culpably neglects these ordinary means of grace may not count on obtaining this grace by some other means. This may well be correct. But the real question is: when does one 'neglect' the sacraments? To judge by the divine or ecclesiastical commandments, the required frequency of reception of the sacraments is not very great. Can someone who takes this frequency as his norm be accused of 'neglect' of the sacraments; could he not expect to receive the necessary helps for a very holy life, merely presupposing (and this must certainly be presupposed) that he uses the other means of grace, such as prayer, penance, etc., most zealously? If one already sees tepidity, and therefore non-disposition for a rich aid of grace, simply in a relatively rare reception of the sacraments itself then one tacitly presupposes precisely what has to be proved. For, in fact, such conduct, simply considered in itself is 'lukewarm' only if the person concerned throws away chances of grace in this way, because he cannot merit them in any other way. But this is just what is in question.

One can, of course, pose the following counter-question: What reason could one have for receiving the sacraments (in which Christ applies the power of his grace to us) less frequently than the nature of the sacraments and the demanding circumstances of life and of its situations permit? One might add that a frequent reception of the sacraments is not detrimental to 'subjective' piety but, on the contrary, encourages it. And so, both frequent reception of the sacraments and subjective asceticism and piety together must at any rate be richer in blessings than if one were to be satisfied with the merely 'subjective' way of perfection of the Christian life. Hence, the fact of a rare reception of the sacraments must after all be due to a certain tepidity, i.e. to an indifference towards the divine assistance of grace. This may in fact often be the case. For it is quite right to say that, at least in general, the Christian who really believes in the Incarnation of the divine Logos with a vital faith, feels the urge to meet God's action on himself in the most tangible and human manner possible – and that means in the sacraments. There will, of course, be an upper (albeit fluid) limit [112] to this frequency for practical and essential reasons. But one would surely not be justified in saying that, prescinding from border-line and individual cases, this limit is exceeded by the present-day tradition of frequency in receiving the sacraments, as found amongst zealous Christians in the world, as well as amongst the clergy and in the life of the Religious. Such a frequency in the reception of the sacraments need not, therefore, arouse any suspicions of being exaggerated or superfluous. This is true especially because one's spiritual life, if it is genuine and hence also in accord with the mind of the Church, will fit itself quite simply and trustfully into the life of the Church as established in one's day – and, therefore,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nowadays into a life of an increasingly sacramental piety. In this way one can be confident that one lives the sort of life which the Spirit of God, who ultimately disposes sovereignly of men and of the Church, wishes us to lead in his Church at this particular period in time. For after all it is he who in the final analysis brings in the ages of the Church and determines which aspects of the abundance of Christian existence (i.e. of the life of Christ) will be particularly marked here and now. Such accentuations fall under the law of the guidance of the Holy Ghost in the Church, and cannot be entirely deduced from theoretical considerations in theology. But does such an answer say everything that is to be said? What about the question with which we started, viz.: is it possible to receive the effect of a sacrament (the res sacramenti) even without receiving the sacrament itself?

II. A POSITIVE ATTEMPT AT A SOLUTION: THE INNER UNITY OF FAITH AND SACRAMENT

It seems that, in order to clarify fully the obscurities which have come to light both in the question itself and in the usual answers, we must inquire somewhat more deeply into the more exact relation obtaining between subjective activity and the sacraments. For, once their inner unity and correlation has become clearer, our original question will answer itself. For if it turns out (as we hope to show) that in the case of subjective activity and sacramental happening it is not at all a question of 'two ways' to the same goal (viz. the reception and increase of God's grace), but merely of two moments or phases of one and the same event, then it no longer makes any sense to ask whether one should take one way or the other.

[113]

1. The teaching of current sacramental theology about the 'two ways' of justification and of the increase of grace

The whole of the present-day theology of the sacraments is unfortunately directed in its outlook towards encouraging the conception of 'two ways' of justification and increase of grace which meet only (but then entirely) in their final result. Various trains of thought have contributed to this outlook.

When one speaks of sacraments in general and – as it were – constructs the formal model of a sacrament, one instinctively envisages infant baptism as one's example, with the unspoken thought in the back of one's mind that the pure essence of a sacrament can best be represented in the case where man's personal activity of faith and love is completely out of the question. As far as the other sacraments (e.g. Penance and Extreme Unction) are concerned, one would probably represent the normal case as follows: one supposes a disposition such that the effect of the sacrament (the res sacramenti: remission of sin, justification) does not come about without the sacrament. And one then regards this case as typical (merely imperfect contrition as sufficient disposition) and as the one which should, therefore, give us the clearest idea of the nature and effect of that particular sacrament. Hence, in the case of sacraments which demand a greater disposition (viz. the 'sacraments of the living'), one accordingly regards this disposition merely as a moral demand on the part of God for the de facto reception of the effect of the sacrament, i.e. as something which remains completely outside the sacramental event as such.

And conversely, when one speaks of the subjective way of justification and increase of grace, one thinks of a purely 'subjective' event. One knows, of course, that such an event (understood in this way) is possible only with the support of the grace of Christ. But one does not, in this connection, bring out the christological and ecclesiological aspects of this grace.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

There are whole tracts 'De gratia Christi' in which for all practical purposes, and seen as a whole, the word 'Christus' appears only in the title. These tracts simply presuppose as self-evident, or mention only briefly, that this grace is 'merited' precisely by Christ himself. The word 'Church' just does not appear at all in these treatises. And yet every grace has analogously the same structure as its source, viz. the structure of the Word become man, and all grace is grace of the Church, i.e. all grace has an ecclesiological structure. The [114] outcome of all this is that in the sacraments, seen now also from the angle of the subjective way of justification, man's personal action in faith and love is conceived as a disposition which remains external to the sacramental happening as such. And furthermore, the ecclesiological aspect of the personal action of the believer (and with that every inner reference to the Church as the sphere of the sacramental happening) is then left completely out of consideration (even although it is not explicitly denied).

Against the background of such trends of thought, there must quite instinctively arise the conception of two different ways and manners of justification, and of two sometimes independent and self-sufficient causes of the same effect. This dualism is only barely bridged by the doctrine (in itself quite correct) that even in the case where the subjective way has been taken (such as baptism of desire or perfect contrition) and has borne fruit, the sacrament is nevertheless of obligation and necessary as a means for salvation, and that therefore the merely subjective manner of justification must include a votum sacramenti (which in fact it always does). At the same time this doctrine also underlines expressly in this connection that it is not the 'votum' but charity which justifies, so that no one may possibly get the impression that these two ways could be allowed to fuse into one.

2. Critique of the doctrine of the 'two ways of salvation', by showing the inner unity of faith and sacrament

We naturally do not mean to dispute the correctness of the starting-points of this doctrine of the two ways (which doctrine itself is never explicitly expressed, but is all the more effective for that very reason[1]): there is an effective infant baptism, there is a sacramental justification of the person who approaches the sacrament only with attrition or imperfect contrition,[2] there is a justifying votum baptismi, etc. But [115] these facts do not at all force us to hold the external dualism which they are intended to justify. This will become clear by the fact that they can be just as easily derived from, or integrated into, a conception of the sacraments which does not contain this dualism. It will now be our task to develop the latter conception and to prove it, in so far as this is possible within the limits of a short article.

It might first of all be said that even on the metaphysical plane it is altogether impossible that one effect should have two formally different causes in the strict sense. If and when there are, therefore, two materially different causes for the same effect (as when one can, for instance, knock a nail into the wall by using either a stone or a hammer), one would at least be obliged to work out the formal identity of the causes as such for this one effect, a unity which must ontologically precede the sameness of the effect. But such very correct metaphysical considerations are not usually very convincing in practice. Nevertheless, they do at least give an indication of methodology: the more a theory of causality succeeds in

[1] This doctrine is not at all explicitly expressed, because each of the two ways is even treated in different scholastic tractates, so that the 'danger' of any contact arising between them is avoided from the very start.

[2] It is, however, also true that present-day theology, frequently in contrast to St Thomas, presupposes too easily, by appealing to a very questionable experience, that the dispositions do not change under the influence of the sacramental happening, so that the dispositions sufficient for the reception of the Sacrament and the dispositions sufficient for the reception of the effect of the Sacrament are presumed to be one and the same thing.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

explaining the same effect by the sameness of its cause, the greater will be its chances of being the right theory. Plurality must be proved, for it, and not unity, is ontologically the more questionable.

Now, in Scripture, justification (and increase of grace, union with Christ, salvation, eternal life, etc.) is sometimes ascribed to a sacrament (baptism, Eucharist), and at other times to faith (and to charity, conversion, etc.). The necessity of both sides is stressed. The Scriptures do not reflect on the internal harmony of these two assertions. But they also do not 'make it easier' for us to solve this question which they pose for us, i.e. the Scriptures do not reckon with cases in which the subjective action of man (to which they ascribe justification) would not be sufficient and in which the sacrament would then be the sole means of salvation. The Scriptures speak neither of a justification by reason of a merely imperfect contrition, nor do they speak of infant baptism. Of course, these cases are not thereby excluded. And yet theological speculation is thereby given a different direction, if it is to grasp the unity of the subjective and the sacramental sides of justification. Scripture recognizes beyond this also the possibility of a justification by faith in anticipation of the sacramental happening. It thus gives a hint, indeed, that theological speculation must begin with this point of the 'subjective' happening in order to arrive from there at the sacramental event. It hints, therefore, that wherever precisely [116] this subjective activity of man leads to justification, it must in the present dispensation of salvation lead to the sacraments (and not only in the case of merely imperfect contrition).

It is not possible here to give a theological history of the conception of the relation between opus operatum and opus operantis. This would lead us too far afield, and the analyses required would be too far-flung, especially since these conceptions are not completely uniform and many attempts have been made to understand these two facts of revelation in their internal harmony.

This question arose already in Tertullian's theology of baptism. It found various and varying answers with Augustine in the course of his life. At this stage (and already with St Ambrose) our question poses itself under the heading of the possibility of a baptism by desire, which question itself was not uniformly answered. Our question appears again later on at the end of the patristic period under the guise of the question as to whether a contrite person who dies without being reconciled with the Church will be saved. In the early Middle Ages it becomes absolutely clear that there is a baptism of desire; it is now explicitly recognized that in the normal course of events a sinner, who has been justified by contrition 'alone', does reach reconciliation with the Church – indeed it was still taught at that time that this is in itself required of him. The patristic teaching is now developed into the explicit doctrine of 'Spiritual Communion'. From the twelfth century onwards the question arises as to what happens in the case where someone comes to the sacrament of Penance with a good will indeed, but with a merely supposedly justifying contrition; and it is admitted (although only very gradually and hesitatingly and with various explanations) that the sacrament becomes effective even in such a case. The case of infant baptism is considered. However much one attributed a cleansing from original sin to it (this question had been decided by Augustine's fight against Pelagianism), one was still very far from understanding clearly whether such a baptism gives also sanctifying grace and the infused virtues. Even the Council of Vienne, in the final analysis, left this question open. It was felt that the question as to where faith is to be found in such a case is a difficulty, for after all according to Scripture faith is absolutely necessary for salvation. The average theology of today probably underestimates the weight of this question.

One can say, in any case, that theology until well into the thirteenth [117] century had a clearer consciousness of the fact that both aspects of the process of justification belong together than theology has today. It is also clear that in those days the case of a sacrament

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

having a saving effect by reason of merely imperfect contrition was not considered as the classical test case for the study of the real nature of the sacrament.

St Thomas still considered it an important doctrinal part of the teaching about the sacraments, that the sacraments are 'protestationes fidei' and hence also render the faith of the recipient truly visible in the public forum of the Church. Indeed, in his teaching on the sacrament of Penance he develops a theory about the interlacement and mutual dependence of subjective and sacramental events which is far removed from any theory of two ways of justification. The very contrition with which the penitent approaches the sacrament and which in itself he must contribute qua justifying contrition, already comes about in virtue of an ecclesiastico-'sacramental' grace (of the 'power of the keys') before the actual reception of the sacrament. And conversely, the conversion of the sinner, rendering itself truly concrete in and before the Church and her authority by the contrite confession of the penitent, enters as a constitutive part into the sacramental happening as such and becomes, together with the absolution given by the priest, the sacramentally efficacious sign and an intrinsic element of the opus operatum itself. Thus there is a dialogue between the contrite human person and the Church in which Christ's saving activity becomes really historically tangible in space and time and in the particular 'Now' of each individual existence. In St Thomas' view, it is precisely this dialogue in its unity which reacts ex opere operato on the inner attitude of the penitent and on his personal fulfilment of metanoia, and really completes it properly. Indeed, in the exceptional case of someone approaching the sacrament in good faith with merely imperfect contrition, it is only at this very moment that this personal fulfilment receives its justifying power. Of course, in the normal case (according to St Thomas) the personal activity of the penitent would already have this justifying power even before this moment, by virtue of the very grace which had continued to flow towards him from the Church,[3] [118] precisely because (and not although) justification before reception of the sacrament is the normal case. And so, in the case of the sacrament of Penance, the personal supernatural activity of the subject is embodied sacramentally in the visible dimension of the Church, because this activity had itself already been borne along by the grace of the Church. Only in this way does that activity attain the fullness of its existence, which corresponds to the fullness of existence – in the flesh and in the space-time of the empirical world – of Christ the God-Man, the source of this grace, and also to the fullness of existence of the visible-invisible Church, the Proto-Sacrament.

We do not mean to imply by this brief reference to St Thomas' teaching on Penance either that he himself would wish to see the here-developed structure of this sacrament applied to all the sacraments in exactly the same way, or that he himself had already thought this theory through to the very last question, or that this theory should or could still be maintained in all its details.[4] But one thing may undoubtedly be claimed by appealing to the authority of St Thomas: the nature of a sacrament as an opus operatum is in no way contradicted by the [3] This conception will not seem strange to anyone who bears in mind that the Sacraments operate as signs of a human kind, and that it cannot, therefore, in itself be reasonably demanded that their constituent factors should be physically or chronologically simultaneous. This is also the way in which one must understand what current theology usually calls the 'reviviscence' of the Sacraments. This is not a question of the reviviscence of a dead Sacrament, but refers to a more extended chronological separation in time of the constituent elements of the Sacrament and the dispositions. In such a conception it will be necessary to dig more deeply than is usual in order to prove the necessity of a disposition being present during (chronologically) the actual positing of the sacramental sign – but it will not be impossible to find a reason for this necessity. To take another example: at the Last Supper, the consecrated elements of bread and wine will undoubtedly never have been present at chronologically the same time, although the representation of the Sacrifice of the Cross requires both of them, so that the Sacrifice of the Mass cannot be celebrated under one kind only.

[4] Thus e.g. someone who explicitly acknowledges himself to have merely imperfect contrition, may not be excluded from the reception of the Sacrament.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

indicated interlacement between the opus operantis and the opus operatum, which are immediately mutually and internally related by reason of their very natures and not merely by a votum sacramenti on account of a purely positive decree of God.

For the sake of brevity we must here refrain from indicating other elements of the sacramental theology of St Thomas which reinforce and clarify this conception further. The view set forth previously, which on the whole is also the usual view on the relationship between [119] opus operatum and opus operantis held in current theology, did not originate until after St Thomas' time. This view has the advantage of being easy to handle in a concise and 'clear' manner, but it does not have the same depth, nor does it exhaust and use all the riches and elements of a comprehensive doctrine of the sacraments as given in Tradition. It is not possible here to attest these elements from Tradition by a positive theological investigation. We must content ourselves with giving a brief and more synthetic and speculative outline of the basic theory which would arise from these elements. Using such a procedure, it is inevitable that certain questions cannot be explicitly tackled, and hence that certain things will remain obscure. We will simply try to get a rough idea of the relationship between opus operatum and opus operantis to the extent in which this is required for answering the particular question of this essay as objectively as possible. The particular question of this essay, let us remind ourselves, concerns the mutual relationship of ascetic endeavours and sacramental events in our day to day spiritual life, and whether there are two different ways for the attainment of salvation, simply to be followed for some reason which is not quite clear, or whether these are only two aspects or phases of what is ultimately one and the same process, viz. an always personal – 'sacramental' way of acting which sometimes, and even often (but not always), grows and develops into such an explicit and tangible activity that it is then to be called reception of the sacraments in the strict sense.

3. Theologico-speculative clarification

The supernatural grace of salvation is grace of Christ. It is not merely 'merited' by him, but bears also something of the distinctive trait of him who as God-Man has introduced it in a definite manner into the world and has earned it by his act of salvation on the Cross, so that it becomes the legal property of his brethren according to the flesh. This grace, if we may put it this way, has an incarnational tendency. It has not merely a dynamic directed to the inner life of God in which it makes us participate (and this indeed constitutes its nature, but, as it were, its abstract nature which prescinds from the order of Christ). It has also a dynamic directed towards the world, by which it causes the man whom it saves to be comprised within the redeeming and transfiguring descent of the Word of the Father into the world, [120] and in which HE gives this world his Holy Ghost. The grace of Christ is, therefore, also the source of the transfiguration of the body and thence of the transfiguration of the world as a whole. Similarly, it is the basic principle of the slow moral integration of human nature into the theocentric orientation of the sanctified person, i.e. the slow and, in the meantime, piecemeal recovery of the paradisean grace of man's original state in which the psychophysical 'nature' of man was completely docile to the supernaturalized human personality. Hence this grace should and wants to spread itself according to its proper nature over the whole stratified being of man, right down to his corporeal nature itself – forming, transforming and elevating, and sanctifying it. This grace is, therefore, not merely the principle of a merely transcendental 'interiority' of man, uniting him with God. It is meant to be rather the sanctifying formative principle of the whole body-soul life of man, coming right down into his concrete, tangible daily life, where it therefore receives its 'expression' and takes on its corporality.

Now grace – seen ontologically – always becomes externalized in this sense. For, although

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ethics may legitimately distinguish from an empirical standpoint between 'internal' and 'external' human acts, there are no purely internal acts from a metaphysical and theological point of view. For even in the most sublime interiority of his spiritual acts man still acts as man, i.e. as a body-soul being, so that even the most spiritual acts still have extension in that corporeal nature by which human beings, even as spiritual persons, are in touch with one another in a real material spatio-temporal unity. This is a real unity, no matter how difficult it may be to define it in a category. To put it somewhat crudely: even the most sublime stirring of a most supernatural love for God in the innermost depth of the spiritual person still depends on (and at the same time changes) electro-physical processes in the brain, which belong to the one totality of the material world in which everything depends on everything else and everything helps to determine everything else. It would be to the point to apply even here what was said once by a modern physicist: When a child throws its doll out of the cradle, Sirius itself will shake.

Grace, as the principle of a higher order, i.e. of the absolute divine order, transforms and elevates the moral act qua spiritual act; the latter however rests on, and at the same time externalizes itself in, an act in the material world (or rather: in an inner moment of the one whole act which diffuses itself through all the dimensions of human [121] existence). And so grace finds its living expression in every act (just as the body is the act and outward manifestation of the 'soul', albeit not adequately), and finds it in the spatio-temporal dimension and hence (still in a general sense) also in history. Every existing supernatural grace has, therefore, its own historical externalization in which (when accepted) it renders itself present and comes to appear. It renders itself present in making itself appear: analogously to the way in which the soul 'becomes' and 'is' by endowing matter with a living form and thus in-forming itself into matter, and hence cannot be thought of as preceding this act of in-forming. Grace, therefore, has of its very nature and from its very source a quasi-sacramental structure in the present incarnational order of Christ and of man.

This grace is essentially the action of God on man and cannot be thought of in any way apart from the free personal mercy of God, by which he gives himself as a gift to man. Hence the quasi-sacramental, spatio-temporal and incarnate nature of this grace is to that extent not only the manifestation in which the spiritual-existential act of the human person expresses itself at the very first, but also the 'outward appearance' of God's action on man and of his redeeming love for man. And so the union and relationship constituting the saving dialogue between God and man (which of itself is spiritual and transcendent), becomes present in the spatio-temporal tangible nature of every supernatural-moral act, i.e. it manifests itself in the dimension of the historical situation and existence of each human individual. One cannot object to this that (at least in general) the empirico-moral side of human acts for salvation belongs only to the domain of natural morality and that it cannot, therefore, be the 'outward appearance' of supernatural grace, since that side is possible even without saving grace. For, prescinding from everything else which is essential and which we pass over simply for the sake of brevity, even the divine assistance which we require for the factual achievement of natural moral acts is willed by God in the present order of salvation as an integral part of the one single new order which is conceived and willed precisely as comprehended in Christ and as projecting (and indeed assumed) in him and through him into the inner life of God. And so, in the last analysis, even this divine help is gratia Christi (wherever, at the very least, it finds a response). This is why even the actually achieved moral fulfilment of the natural law is already a manifestation of the divine will of grace in Christo, especially when it [122] is transformed and elevated by supernatural divinizing grace and is thus orientated to the goal of direct communion with God in eternal life, and when it is modified by this elevation even in its per se natural condition.

Over and above all this, the following should be borne in mind: the grace of Christ is intended for humanity as a whole; it reaches the individual in so far as he is a member of the one community of damnation and salvation which represents the human race as a unity. And Christ not only wanted to become man in this community, but to be man as a member of the one humanity, 'born of a woman'. Those who are being sanctified and he who sanctifies are of one race. His grace has, therefore, a social structure. Even in the history of personal salvation there is no isolated individual; there are indeed individuals but no individualists. Indeed, the culminating point of the process of becoming a person, which takes place through the grace of a most direct relationship to God, signifies the highest form of the communion of persons who have become in this way most personal in the one eternal kingdom of God – the highest form of the eternal communion of all saints. 'Individual' and 'community' in this sense are not realities which are opposed to each other or compete against each other. On the contrary, they are two sides of the one reality of achieved and redeemed persons which can only increase or decrease together and to the same degree.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

But in accordance with the characteristics of human nature, such a communion of persons, who are justified and share in the divine life, is not willed by God merely as an invisible kingdom of inner and transcendent union by grace. Rather, God wills it as a communion which as such creates its own expression for itself in the visible and spatio-temporal dimension of history, or rather receives this expression in its institution by Christ. God's holy people of the redeemed takes on the form of the Body of Christ and of the Church, which is the combined product of the interior mutual union of the redeemed by grace and of the historical, visible form of this transcendent interior union which consists in the united profession of truth and a social union through one hierarchical order and its functions. Just as on the natural plane a people renders itself historically tangible and capable of concerted action by forming a State, so the communion of the redeemed becomes historically tangible in the Church. By the impulse of the ultimate and inmost principle of her unity – the grace of Christ, [123] the Holy Ghost – this communion becomes a corporate and socially constituted body. Yet this process must not be thought of as a kind of process of nature. It must not be thought of as a process which bypasses free voluntary decision and historical action. Rather it must be thought of as a process which is accomplished primarily by the will of the divine-human founder of the Church, and then secondarily by the will of the Church herself who by her own institutions renders the communion of grace and salvation (which she is) even more tangible and historically manifest.

In accordance with the nature of man which develops and unfolds itself in time, the tangibility and historical character of the Church, the people of God historically constituted, must not be thought of as something merely static which as such alone would give historical expression to the grace uniting the redeemed even amongst themselves in the closest communion. The Church carries this grace into effect and lets it appear in its deeds. Thus grace appears as truth in her continually renewed and progressive teaching which introduces men more and more into the fullness of the truth of Christ according to the particular character of their mental, historical position. This grace appears also as the demand made on man by her pastoral office in her law and commandments – as the sanctification of men in her sacraments – as surrender to God in the Sacrifice which she celebrates daily. There where the Church, in her action on the individual, renders grace historically manifest as the sanctifying principle on the level of her supernatural social life according to the will of her founder, she dispenses her sacraments. By giving this sanctifying grace a historically tangible form in such basic social acts, in accordance with the commission given her by Christ, the Church renders this grace really actual and present as well as effective in the here and now of her individual members. The Church effects grace by signifying it. The sacrament effects grace because it is its sign – a sign, in other words, which, as externalization (Leibhaftigwerdung) of grace, renders grace present – in short, a sacrament is a constitutive sign. In other words, it is not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

only true that the sacraments are signs of grace because they are its cause, but essentially the converse is just as true: they are causes because they are signs.

This category of causality per modum signi must not, however, be forced into other familiar a priori categories of natural causality, for otherwise the peculiarity of this particular category would suffer or at [124] least be overlooked. The relation between the outward bodily aspect of a spiritual act and that act itself is probably the closest analogy we can find. The spiritual act posits itself and is caused by taking on an outward bodily form.[5] The spiritual person, superior in its origin to the corporeal, posits its spiritual act by interpenetrating the corporeal principle formatively from this its superior position; it gains its proper achievement from its opposite, material pole.

It is somewhat similar with the activity of the Church; by positing the material, outward sign and expression of grace in space and time through her ritual action, which is the action of Christ, she obtains a really efficacious mode of presence for the grace thus signified in this historical moment of time. By the fact that Christ acts on man through the Church by giving his grace the form of a constitutive sign, it is he who renders his grace inwardly efficacious in man, and not his servant nor the recipient of the sacrament. This is the meaning of the term 'opus operatum', which has therefore nothing to do with the imagination of any kind of physical effectiveness of a material occurrence which would appertain to this occurrence independently from its nature as a sign, so that this occurrence would only be 'incidentally' 'also' a sign of grace.[6] The gestures of Christ which he performs through the Church, one might simply say, are gestures meant in earnest; he on his part really effects by them what he expresses by them, simply because he performs them. If these gestures of the Church are understood from the outset (as they must be) as Christ's gestures, as the real physical appearance of his action, then it will be quite easy to understand that there is no sense in asking oneself whether and how they 'act on' the divine (and divine-human) Agent of grace, and that there is no sense in trying to solve the problem of the causality of the sacraments in that direction.

Now, whenever man really receives the grace of a sacrament as its effect, he must provide a disposition, to the extent to which he is capable of a personal act. This disposition is, however, necessarily [125] borne by grace which, as already pointed out, is, on the one hand, grace of Christ and of the Church, and, on the other hand, finds its outward bodily expression in the space and time of history by this activity of man. For after all this disposition is not merely something 'interior'; for man must desire to receive the sacrament visibly and he must manifest this desire – he lets the sacrament be administered to him and this fact of letting it happen to himself is as much a historical act as any other. Thus the sacrament takes place in a historical dialogue between Christ in the Church, on the one hand, and man on the other. And seen from both sides, this dialogue is the constitutive sign of the one grace of Christ and of his Church, which is effective at this moment.[7] A sacrament takes place, therefore (in the case

[5] One might think here of Pascal's profound remark to the effect that one must perform external humble acts in order to become humble.

[6] Hence the intention of the human minister of the Sacrament is also required, since without it the sign would just not be a sign, i.e. a human expression. And conversely: whenever one ascribes a really physical efficacy to the Sacrament, one can no longer explain properly why the intention of the minister is necessary even for the mere existence of the Sacrament.

[7] This does not necessarily involve a denial of the fact that in general, and especially on account of the case of valid and fruitful administration of the Sacraments to infants, only that part of the dialogue which the Church actively posits can be called 'Sacrament' in the strict sense. But this fact in its turn need not exclude the other fact that the totality of the dialogue is externalization (Leibhaftwerdung) of grace. This grace, proceeding from Christ present in the Church, seizes hold of man, becomes 'flesh' in his activity which brings him to the Church (i.e. in the words and gestures of man vis-à-vis the Church) and then receives a further tangible expression (Leibhaftigkeit) in the active response of the Church, precisely as tangible response of the Church, and this is an

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

we are considering), as a dialogic unity of the personal acts of God and of man in the visible sphere of the Church's essential (i.e. given to her directly by Christ himself) sanctifying ministration. The 'incarnation' of grace, and grace's process of becoming tangibly historical, reaches its climax in the sacraments. Grace is not only incarnated in the personal supernaturalized activity of man, but also in the acts of the Church as such: not only in the activity of a member of God's people, but in the essential activity of the historically constituted people of God, i.e. in the essential activity of the Church in her own public, social sphere. There is, indeed, no saving human act which in its historical spatio-temporal nature does not experience an embodying of grace or which falls outside the fundamental law of incarnation applicable to Christian salvation as such. But this process of embodiment has its own definite variability. This is somewhat similar to what happens in an ordered society, where there are acts, performed by and on the individual, of a [126] more or less official or public nature. Everything a man does is done by him in some degree or other as a member of his people; it has to a greater or lesser extent an effect on this people and is some kind of expression of the life of this people, and hence is an act of this people, no matter how 'private' it may be – this is after all the reason why there is not only a history of States and of wars, but also a history of cultures. But there are acts of the human individual and of the people which take place in a qualified public sphere, in which the act of the people as such manifests itself and the act of the individual has its full validity only when it is done in the properly qualified public forum and is replied to by the act of the people through the action of its public authorities; thus, for instance, a marriage contracted before the registrar, a contract drawn up by a notary, a testament attested before a notary, the confirmation of property-rights by a judge, etc. So also the sanctifying word of Christ to man, which is uttered in the depths of conscience and which in any case becomes outwardly present in the world in the active assent of man, can receive a properly qualified embodiment through the Church in her public forum; it can then become sacramental in the strict sense of the word. And in view of the incarnational structure of Christian salvation and of the ecclesiastical constitution of the people of God, it is easily understandable that the Lord of grace should wish and (to various degrees) demand this qualified outward form of his word of grace to man wherever it is a question of the basic effecting of the event and acceptance of His grace.

It would lead us too far afield for our present purpose if we were to take a detailed look at the organized body of the seven sacraments in the light of what we have just seen. For the seven sacraments are the seven basic embodiments of the occurrence and appropriation of grace. What is important in the present context is simply to note clearly that grace does not occur merely internally and subjectively (as it were outside the visible form of the Church) at certain times, and in the form of sacraments at other times. No, presupposing the corresponding subject, grace always occurs both subjectively and in the Church, interiorly and outwardly, existentially and collectively, although in varying degrees of one or other of these elements.

This variability is in the nature of things: not every occurrence in a community which is brought about by the individual and is also borne at the same time by this community, can have the same degree [127] of explicitness and be of the same official public nature in the social framework of this community. The more basic and significant an act is for the individual and the community, the greater must be the public explicitness demanded of this act. The more humdrum an act is, the less will be demanded of it in the way of public and official outward expression; this is true to such an extent that it becomes practically imperceptible that even in this case the community still helps to condition such an act. The expression of grace precisely qua grace of the Church. And so, in this way the full 'truth' of grace now appears and carries itself into effect.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation exact dividing line between these two kinds of act cannot, of course, be simply deduced a priori. This is a matter which is determined legally by the authority which has the right to give intentional determination to the constitution and law of the particular constituted community. It can, therefore, also happen that it is left to the free decision of the individual whether he will perform an act in this or that form – take, for instance, the different forms of wills and contracts, or the case of a valid but clandestine contract of marriage, etc. So it is also in the visibly constituted community of the people of God – in the Church. The application of all this does not require any further detailed explanation here.

III. CONCLUSION: ONE WAY OF SALVATION BY FAITH AND THE SACRAMENTS

We can now approach our particular question from what we have seen above. What happens in fact when, for example, a Christian repents of his sins in the quiet of his own little chamber in one case and at other times makes a 'Confession of devotion'? Does he follow a different way to the same goal in each case, or else what happens? Can one say: take the first way, for the effect is the same and you can spare yourself the second way? Or should one say: in the first case you are merely concerned with yourself and everything is merely 'subjective', whereas in the second case the grace of God is having an effect on you...? Or should one merely say: do both, for after all two is better than one . . .? And similarly in the case of Spiritual and Sacramental Communion?

1. The quasi-sacramental visible appearance of the workings of God's grace in Faith and Love

God's action on man occurs even in the 'subjective' way, and even the 'subjective' way occurs in the Church. Here, too, there is a dialogue [128] of grace between God and man, an effective action of God which really and truly fills and transforms the heart of man more and more with his Holy Spirit. Here, too, there occurs not merely a disposition of repentance, but God also gives his word of forgiveness to man. Even in this case there is not merely an intellectual and affective reference of man to Christ, but a true deepening of the real union with Christ in the Holy Spirit. In this case, too, these forces pour forth upon man because he is incorporated into the Body of Christ which is the Church, and because this Church prays, sacrifices and loves for him. Here, too, the life of the one Body of Christ goes on, and everything is embraced and supported by the visible-spiritual unity of the Church, which is not an ideological but a real unity, preceding the individual man's subjective will for union. And when man acts in this way in the quiet and seclusion of his closet, it is not only his own dispositions which are expressed in his actions (his praying, kneeling, etc.), but God's grace in him and that through his freedom. When he reflects on his actions and looks at them as it were from the outside, he can say: God acted there, and in this hour of my life he became tangible and visible in the intangible workings of his grace. The life of Jesus, which pervades all spaces and times, has advanced another little step further. His hand has rested upon me and his own word has gone straight to my heart; the life-streams of his Church have risen out of the hidden depths of his Heart, in which the Holy Ghost is poured out, and have risen to the surface of my life where they become accessible to my everyday consciousness.

2. Grace and Love, inspirited and embodied in the visibleness of the Sacraments

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Why does such a person nevertheless receive a sacrament even in cases where he is not obliged to do so? Is this merely a help for the weak in faith who would otherwise not comprehend what happens in and to them even without this sacrament, when they simply believe and have faith? Or does the recipient of the sacrament suddenly do something quite different now from what he did before, because this also is blessed? Neither is true. On the contrary, reception of the sacrament continues the life of faith and lets this identical faith grow up into the fullness of its being and thus gather strength. Ceteris paribus, i.e. presupposing his 'subjective' act as also accomplished in the sacrament, [129] he does the same now as what he did or let be done to him before in the silent room of his secluded prayer. Only now he does it in a more tangible fashion, and hence more intensely to himself and lets it happen to him in a more tangible and hence more intense manner by his co-operation. Christ's deed and the vitality of the Church take shape in him in a tangible and express manner. Christ's gesture towards man becomes more emphatic: Christ's word of absolution is clearly set off against man's word of contrition (although the latter was never possible other than as a response in which Christ's word took effect). And Christ's word is here addressed to him explicitly and powerfully. Christ's body is received as a palpable pledge of the fact that a profounder union is taking place here and now with the living Lord in the Holy Ghost. Explicit expression is given now to the relationship all grace has to the Church, by the fact that the Church takes a visible part by her tangible action. In short, what had already been happening previously, now becomes a qualified tangible event and appears publicly in the form of a means of grace which had already sustained the previous events and which is the Church. However, this qualified, higher objectivity of the constitutive sign of the grace of Christ, considered as rendering man's action tangible, means (ceteris paribus) an intensification of man's own supernatural fulfilment of life (opus operantis); and when considered as the tangible aspect of the action of Christ, it means a new actualization of grace (the opus operatum in the sacrament). Hence no new path is taken. Rather the one way of salvation and of grace is pursued right to the end. The final phase follows from the first phase, and the latter is completed by the former. These two phases of the one process depend on one another; in both of them the same powers are at work: Christ, the Church, and the human person as recipient of grace.

The whole process can be compared to the life shared in common by two lovers. Everything they do is sustained and transformed by this love and is its – very discreet, almost imperceptible – expression, even the insignificant, ordinary things which seem to have quite a different meaning and purpose from love and which would have to be done even if there were no love between these two persons. And yet, sometimes, and even often, they must tell each other their love openly, in words and by gestures which are nothing but the expression of love – of a love which was already finding expression in everything they do. It is as if the hidden law of the whole of their two lives united [130] together must continually bring forth new formal, outward expressions (Gestaltwerdungen) of their love, in which this love, which after all is always there, realizes itself ever more fully and in ever new forms. These are only gestures, not love itself – gestures 'which do not really seem to matter' compared with the proving of one's love in deed and in truth; and yet love lives by them. Love would die if it were not for these expressions which are not love itself at all and which those not in love consider superfluous 'formalities'. There is a connection between the proofs of one's love in deed and in life (i.e. of the real, love which really matters) and these gestures; yet in the ultimate analysis this connection cannot be formulated in rules but must always be discovered anew. It is impossible to lay down hard and fast rules for everyone and for each individual, telling him in what rhythm and proportion both of these factors belong to the one life of love and in what way the one love lives by both. But the everyday course of love will always go on concentrating itself in such gestures and love itself will always draw new life from them.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This comparison is merely a – comparison. But it may illustrate the fact that there can be no real competition in the spiritual life between the opus operatum and the opus operantis. Not only because the opus operatum also demands in some small measure the opus operantis, if the sacrament is to be in any way fruitful. But because the opus operantis reaches its proper climax in the opus operatum, i.e. its climax of outward, corporeal expression which corresponds to its proper and always given nature. And the opus operantis attains in this way the highest fulfilment of its own inner existential intensity which is in itself possible here and now,[8] because this intensity itself (other things [131] being equal) does not in fact grow merely through this increased intensity of its expression (by giving rise to the latter), but grows also through the grace of the sacrament itself which comes out to meet it. For the event of this grace does not merely mean an increase of a purely inactive state of grace. It also effects this increase through and by way of an intensification of the personal activity to which it responds. It would be a merely superficial empiricism to try to deny this statement by appealing to a contrary 'experience' on the occasion of a pious reception of the sacraments. One would in that case confound certain verifiable feelings of consolation, uplift, etc., which are accessible to direct internal experience, with more profound spiritual-supernatural acts which can become more interior, personal and 'existential' without this fact being necessarily verifiable by ordinary internal experience.

3. Consequences of the foregoing for determining the frequency of the reception of the sacraments

The foregoing again does not mean that we may simply lay down the principle that the greater number of times the sacraments are received, the better the recipient's spiritual life will be. Such a somewhat wild repetition of the reception of the sacraments does not only go beyond the limits of what is possible in practice or according to the law of the Church, but it would be senseless even apart from that. It is simply a fact that, if life is to remain healthy, then those spiritual acts which are done with great explicitness and solemnity must be relatively rarer and more unusual than the more humble and ordinary actions of everyday life. So also in the case of the sacraments. Let us put this more precisely and explain this matter factually, judging it by the finite, spiritual and moral possibilities of a human being which are conditioned by the level of his spiritual development, his personal characteristics, his external circumstances, etc. Now, there can be cases where, seen and judged in this light, it cannot really be [132] expected that a more frequent reception of the sacraments would mean any marked increase in the intensity of the existential accomplishment of the reception of the sacraments (even remembering that this must not be confused with certain very devout sentiments and emotions). In such cases any further increase in the reception of the [8] It is important to note the terms 'in itself' and 'possible here and now'. For otherwise this part of the statement would be an exaggeration. To take an example: a martyr for the Faith has received the Sacrament of the Altar with great devotion – before being sentenced to death; now, supposing that – after sentence of death has been passed – he places his life in his hands for whom he sacrifices it, and that he does so out of the freest, believing love. There is no difficulty on theological grounds (on the contrary; remember the patristic teaching about baptism of blood) in assuming that in the second, i.e. the non-sacramental act, the existential acceptance of his sharing in the, fate of the Lord – the 'res' of the celebration of the death of the Lord – is more intense than in the first act. Nor is there any difficulty on theological grounds in accepting that more happens in the line of the supernatural and of grace in the second act than in the first. The constitutive sign of one and the same reality present in both acts (viz. the participation in the death of Christ) is greater and has a higher excellence in the first act (i.e. in the reception of the Body of Christ, which is the sign and not the signified thing or effect of the Eucharist); but the 'res sacramenti' is more intensely and really present in the second act, even though this act takes place without the sacramentum.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

sacraments will be senseless, even though such further acts of receiving the sacraments would still have to be characterized as 'fruitful' 'in the abstract', i.e. purely in accordance with the norms of the general moral theology of the sacraments. In the normal case of the average Christian, there would be no sense, for instance, in his wanting to keep on going to Holy Communion several times successively each day, or in his wanting to get absolution from the priest several times in uninterrupted succession, even if the law of the Church had not placed any limit on this (in the former case). The reason for this is quite simply the fact that it is the 'dispositions' which are the measure (not the cause) of the sacramental effect. If, in a particular case, these dispositions cannot actually increase any further to any marked extent either before or through the reception of the sacrament (for reasons which lie beyond the sacrament and the good will of man), then the sacrament, too, cannot achieve any further marked increase of its effect. Two kisses of love – to use the language of our previous illustration – are not always more than one.

This principle in no way permits us to criticize and to combat as exaggerated what, for example, Canon Law (can. 863; 595, 2) as well as the Encyclical 'Mediator Dei' (C.T.S., London, no. 127) and the rules and customs of Religious Orders regard as the normal frequency of reception of the sacraments for a devout Christian of today. For one must take it absolutely for granted that in the normal case the dispositions required in present-day practice (before and through the reception of the sacraments) are possible for anyone who has the good will, and that, therefore, the now normal frequency does make sense. But the aforesaid principle, even if it does not permit deduction of any hard and fast numerical rules, can be useful for recognizing in practice that a certain freedom of the children of God is justified in what concerns greater or lesser frequency, and the upper and lower limits of frequency in the reception of the sacraments. We will not, for instance, smile at a Saint (such as Francis Borgia) because he receives the sacrament of Penance daily, nor look on him as a noteworthy oddity on that account. Nor will we immediately have suspicions of tepidity [133] about a mature priest, in whose life examination of conscience and contrition are firmly established (quite apart from the rules of the Order), but who only goes to Confession every four weeks. Seen in this light, it is also absolutely understandable that the most authoritative moralists count with the fact that a priest may on occasion not offer the sacrifice of the Mass and not receive the Holy Eucharist, without thereby missing an opportunity for growth in grace.

4. The inner unity of personal and sacramental piety

One may not, therefore, say that 'Spiritual Communion' is 'just as good' and as profitable as sacramental Communion, or that the mere examination of conscience and contrition achieve 'the same thing' as sacramental Confession. This is so, not because these acts of one's private spiritual life are so to speak only an 'as if', but because, in the incarnational order of Christ and of our flesh and as long as we remain dependent on the shadows and signs of our world even in our relationship to God, these acts of our everyday spiritual life only attain their proper essential climax precisely in the sacraments. Faith (itself) realizes itself most really and intensely, of its very nature,[9] in the sacrament of faith. The unity and union

[9] I.e. if faith in its existential profundity were to correspond fully to the unsurpassable dignity of the sign as such. We have already said that this is often quite different in actual fact, even in the providence of God – i.e. that it can happen that the res sacramenti is acquired in greater measure outside the Sacrament (cf. note 8 above, pp. 130 sq.). This, however, is no argument against the principle just formulated; for in this principle it is merely a question of the highest degree of acquisition of the res sacramenti attainable here and now (i.e. in a case where one can receive a Sacrament, the Sacrament is offered, and its reception has sense according to the principle just formulated). In such a case, to abstain from the Sacrament would also mean renouncing the chance to increase

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation with Christ, which takes place through love, appears and realizes itself with the greatest intensity in the sacrament of the Body of Christ. The forgiving grace of God reaches its clearest and most efficacious expression in the sacrament of Penance.

---

one's personal exercise of faith and love. One could imagine a sort of 'case of conflict' only where a sacramental Occurrence and another act of virtue apparently compete simultaneously with one another, as e.g. if one could help Christ in a poor person 'now' and only now during the time of Mass. In such a case one must, of course, choose the act of greater and more selfless love, even if under certain circumstances it were 'only' a spiritual Communion included in the act of love of one's neighbour.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[135]

4

FORGOTTEN TRUTHS CONCERNING THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE[1]

The phrase, 'forgotten truths', in the title of this article, must naturally be taken with a grain of salt. The Church's consciousness in faith always stores up more in her memory, as her lasting property, than is 'present' to it at any particular moment in time which we may arbitrarily mark off. For the past and Tradition belong to this consciousness. But there will also be 'forgotten truths' if it is true that the Scriptures and Tradition must be the ever new and inexhaustible source of theology – the source from which theology must always draw anew and without which it would become sterile[2] (i.e. if it were to believe that it conceives everything adequately 'now', which it possesses in the memory of its Tradition but which it must also always awaken and raise again by ever new efforts). Such truths do not necessarily need to have been 'defined' or to be truths found in 'Denzinger'. For if this were necessary, then the study of 'Denzinger', and 'Denzinger' itself, could make the Scriptures and Tradition, as well as the ever renewed delving into them, superfluous. That truths are 'forgotten', also does not imply that no one knows these truths. Indeed, it is often almost comical (and yet really quite natural) how this shows itself in theology. Thus, when someone exclaims: 'This is something you have forgotten (you theologians, preachers, catechists), you never mention this!', then the accused parties take notice and [136] retort somewhat indignantly: 'You are wrong, that is something we have always known and indeed have always stated in such and such a place. For have we not always known, with Augustine, Thomas, Suarez (where the point which has been passed over in silence, is to be found), what you are now affirming?' One knows these truths – they seem familiar and (more or less) self-evident, when one is reminded of them, and yet one may have forgotten them. When we speak in what follows about such truths concerning the sacrament of Penance, we do not mean to imply by this that all of these 'forgotten' propositions have always the highest degree of theological certitude. We are satisfied (without making it an object of inquiry or defending it), if a reasonable theological justification can be given for these propositions and if they are supported by the views of authoritative theologians. Nor do we mean to maintain that these 'forgotten truths' are more important than those which are always and everywhere explicitly preached about and meditated upon. When one states that in the sacrament of Penance God forgives us our guilt by the grace of Christ and through the word of the Church, one has undoubtedly stated the most important facts that are to be stated about this sacrament. However, the works of God are in fact too rich in their reality to allow these riches to be rendered adequately by a short formula, no matter how clear and powerful the latter may be. Sober exactness and lucid abstractness, although good in themselves, may also lead to spiritual impoverishment in theology. We have no right, whether it be in theology or in our spirituality, simply to select arbitrarily according to our own particular tastes; rather we have the duty to penetrate more and more, and in ever new ways, into the infinite breadth and [1] I was somewhat grieved to notice – only after having finished this article – that I had overlooked an article by M. Schmaus ('Reich Gottes und Busssakrament', Müncher Theologische Zeitschrift I [1950], pp. 20-36), in which much of what I have said here has been anticipated (besides treating other things which are not mentioned in the present article). In referring the reader to this excellent article, I hope, however, not to have worked completely in vain. Cf. also on this whole subject: K. Rahner, 'Beichtprobleme', Geist und Leben XXVII (1954), pp. 435-446.

[2] Cf. Pius XII, 'Humani generis' (Denz 3014).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

depth of divine truth.[3]

1. Consideration of sin as sin against the Church

Sin is opposition to the holy will of the eternal God; it is opposition to the love which he offers us and in which he wants to give and communicate himself more and more, so that we might participate, or increase our participation, 'in the divine nature'. The offence against [137] this God is the very essence of sin. Over and above this, sin is however not only an offence against the nature of man and against his supernatural calling to grace, and against the growth and ever deeper personal acceptance of this grace. Sin is also an offence against the holy communion of the redeemed, which is the Church. For the divine will of love and the supernatural calling of man, against which man offends by sin, are not realities which concern man only as an isolated individual or existent. The Christian who is baptized meets the holy God of grace as a member of the Church. The baptized Christian belongs both to the visible and invisible reality of the Body of Christ. His visible belonging to the Church, which is based on the sacramental character of baptism, is the 'proto-sacrament' which gives him a constant and effective title to justification and sanctification in the Holy Spirit. He ought to contribute his share by his life of walking in the Spirit, so that the Church, whose member he is, will be the 'holy Church' even in a 'moral' sense and thus bear witness to the fact that God's mercy and grace have really come into the world both validly and invincibly.[4] The holiness of the Church (her Spirit) is given to the Christian as his own, because he is her member – and he is to give his holiness (his life in the Spirit) to the Church, so that she will be the holy one. The Christian who sins offends, therefore, against his own attachment to the Church (which is essential to him as a Christian) and against the Church herself. Not that he is simply severed from her by (grave) sin, as lack of baptism, heresy and schism separate a person from the Church on the level of her historical visibleness and tangibility. Nor is it that sin (if it is not schism or heresy) is of no account for the Church and for the Christian's membership function in the Church. Just how sin affects the Christian's belonging to the Church is something we will have to deal with more explicitly in the next section. The main thing to realize at this point is that the baptized sinner becomes guilty in regard to the Church by his sin. He offends against her Spirit, against her mission and against the unquestioning obedience he owes to her. He for his part renders the Church herself sinful in a certain regard.[5]

This ecclesiological aspect of sin can already be clearly perceived in Holy Scripture – even although we cannot enter more deeply into [138] this here. The Holy Spirit and the Body of Christ belong together in the one Church. Anyone who belongs to her, has her Spirit and is sanctified by belonging to her and by having her Spirit through her mediation. Anyone who belongs to her is holy in this sense, so that his holy life (his living by the Spirit) is the incumbent consequence, and not the original cause, of this holiness in the Spirit of God. Anyone, therefore, who as a Christian becomes once more a child of disobedience through sin, upon whom comes the wrath of God (Eph 5.5 sqq.) – anyone who gives way again to the lusts of the flesh when, incorporated into the Body of Christ, he could and should instead be spiritual (Gal 5.13-21) – whoever is dead and worse than an unbeliever (1 Tim 5.6-8) – such

[3] The bibliographical references given here and there in this essay do not claim to be exhaustive. Moreover, no attempt has been made in the notes to furnish scientific proofs for every proposition and every remark on the history of dogmas.

[4] Cf. e.g. 1st Vatican Council, sess. 3, cap. 3 (Denz 1794).

[5] Cf. on this: K. Rahner, Die Kirche der Sünder (Freiburg 1948), (also in Stimmen der Zeit CXL [1947] pp. 163-177).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a person contradicts his membership of the Church and the nature of the Church, which is the sanctified communion of the members of God's household, the communion of Saints (Eph 2.19; 5.26 sq.; 1 Cor 12.13). The early Church knew this not only in some theoretical way, but she also really lived this in her day to day existence. One cannot understand the whole ancient penitential discipline of the Church properly, if one does not keep this ecclesiological aspect of sin constantly and vividly before one's eye, as did the early Church.[6] The fact that the early Church – as we will see more explicitly in the next section – took public action against the sinner (and this in principle even when his sin was occult), is based on the consciousness that the sinner has transgressed even against the Church. The early Church, in her penitential discipline, is not only the representative of God who helps the sinner to get rid of his guilt against God – as we are 'forgetfully' inclined to think nowadays – but she is also the representative of God who reacts against the injustice which has been done to her – although she reacts, of course, with a strictness which is the manifestation of the curative mercy of God.

It cannot be maintained that this idea is valid only in the case of those sins which 'exclude from the kingdom of God'[7] – in other [139] words, only in the case of (objectively and subjectively) grave sins. Certainly, these are the sins for which the sacrament of Penance exists principally. Mortal and venial sin are not only different in degree – they differ essentially, so that they are only 'analogously' covered by the one notion. But just as venial sin – although in an essentially different qualitative manner – represents an offence against the will of God analogously to mortal sin, so it is also in the same analogous measure an opposition to the Church. Since venial sins form an obstacle to the actualization of God's love in man, they simply diminish, by that very fact alone, the depth and power of God's love which should be found in a holier Church – quite apart from all the tangible social damage done to the Church by the majority of venial sins. They contribute to a lowering of 'standards' in the Church. Superficiality, tepidity, great or small egoism, obstinacy, want of prayer and penance – such and other 'venial' sins are, therefore, an offence against the Church, and this not only in those cases where we can perceive this diminution of the life and salvific power of the Church through such 'venial' sins (because, for example, they offend directly against certain official ecclesiastical duties).

Would it not be well if, when receiving the sacrament of Penance, we took to heart – somewhat less forgetfully – the truth that we have also sinned against the Church, that we are coming to the very grace of the Church against which we have offended and that she, too, has something to forgive us? It has been said that the man of today is almost incapable of the thought of being happy or of reaching heaven without bearing his neighbour and his fate along with him – that he does not wish for any happiness if it does not also include that of others. If this is so, then it ought to lie heavily on our soul that we have been guilty of offences against our neighbour, even if only in our most secret thoughts, and that to some extent the field of our disloyalty and of our failure is spread over the whole Church (and beyond her). No one lives for himself alone. And so no one sins for himself alone. In the darkness of the world, in its stifling sinfulness, in the mental indolence of the Church of which we complain so often – as if we did not bear any responsibility for it – our own guilt looks us in the face. Anyone who understands this, will recognize that the most truly

[6] Cf. B. Poschmann, Paenitentia Secunda (Bonn 1940); id., Busse und Letzte Ölung (Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte IV, 3) (Freiburg 1951); K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie der Busse bei Tertullian: Abhandlungen über Theologie und Kirche', Festschrift für Karl Adam (Düsseldorf 1952), pp. 139-167; id., 'Die Busslehre des hl. Cyprian', ZKT XIV (1952), pp. 257-276; 381-483; id., 'La doctrine d'Origène sur la Pénitence', RSR XXXVII (1950), pp. 47-97, 252-286, 422-456; id., 'Busslehre und Busspraxis in der Didascalia Apostolorum', ZKT LXXII (1950), pp. 257-281.

[7] Cf. 1 Cor 5.6-13; 6.9-10; Gal 5.19-21; Eph 5.5.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Christian revolt against sin in the Church is – to accuse oneself of one's own guilt before the Church, in the face of which one has oneself been guilty by one's own sins, both great and small. Since the time when the [140] divine Logos himself became man and in his Holy Spirit permanently united himself with the congregation of the sanctified redeemed, the 'tibi soli peccavi' of the psalm 'Miserere' no longer has the sound of lonely individualism. It does not express the thought that my relationship to God, both in good and evil, concerns myself and God alone, and no one else. This does concern me and God. But therefore it concerns everybody. 'I confess to God...to all the Saints and to you brethren, that I have sinned.' We could not and would not need to confess to the brethren if we had not sinned against them also, by every sin we have to acknowledge.

2. 'Binding'

It is a well known fact that the early Church appealed more to Mt 16.18 and 18.18 than to Jn 20 for the scriptural proof of her sacramental power to forgive sins.[8] The reasons for this fact (which may al first seem strange to us today[9]) need not be examined here. The said fact alone already shows us that remission of guilt by the Church in the sacrament of Penance – to formulate it quite cautiously and vaguely to begin with – has something to do with 'binding and loosing'. If we now go on to ask what exactly this means, and especially what is meant by this 'binding', then we discover once more that this also is a 'forgotten' truth in the theology of the sacrament of Penance. For if we inquire into the ordinary interpretation of these words current in scholastic theology today, we do not receive a really satisfactory answer. 'Binding' (and the corresponding 'retaining' in Jn 20), in so far as it regards the administration of the sacrament of Penance, means, we are told, the 'refusal of absolution' to someone who by a self-accusation has surrendered himself as a sinner to penitential tribunal of the Church.[10] Theology, in opposition to the [141] theology of the Reformers, tries to prove the judicial nature of the Church's power of forgiveness over the baptized sinner precisely by the dual power of binding or loosing. And so a great deal of formal juridical acumen is often summoned up in order to show that such a refusal of absolution – as opposed, e.g. to the refusal of baptism to a sinner or unbeliever – represents a truly positive judicial act which creates a new legal situation. Thus, for instance, the sinner is obliged in such a case to deliver himself up once more to the penitential tribunal of the Church, and the state of sin which had to some extent become liable to forgiveness through the accusation, has been re-confirmed through the refusal of absolution, etc.

We need not here go into the internal difficulties of this explanation of the meaning of the term 'binding'. All these difficulties arise ultimately from the same fact, viz. that, objectively speaking, a refusal of absolution, no matter how cleverly it may be explained, cannot be any more than the (in certain circumstances) obligatory omission and refusal of an act – no more than this can be said of a refusal of baptism (which does not involve any judicial decision on the part of the Church). Such a refusal cannot be an independent act with its own, new legal [8] Cf. e.g. H. Bruders, 'Mt 16.19; 18:18 und Joh 20,22.23 in frühchristlicher Auslegung', ZKT XXXIV (1910), pp. 659-677; XXXV (1911), pp.79-111; 292-346; 466-481; 690-713. Also instructive in this respect would be a look into P. Anciaux, La théologie du Sacrament de Pénitence au XII^e siècle (Louvain 1949); cf. the Index of this work, p. 619.

[9] The Council of Trent, sess. 14, cap. 1; can. 3 (Denz 894; 913), refers only to Jn 20.22 sq., although with the restriction that our Lord instituted the sacrament 'praecipue' on the occasion referred to by Jn 20. Recourse to other texts is therefore not forbidden.

[10] Cf. e.g. J. B. Umberg, 'Die richterliche Bussgewalt nach Joh 20,23', ZKT L (1926), pp. 337-370; P. Galtier, De Paenitentia tractatus dogmatico-historicus (new edition, Rome 1950), nos 125-141.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

consequences, which is, after all, precisely what the above explanation must presuppose. Much more decisive is the fact[11] that 'binding', in the language of the New Testament and in the view of the early Church, means something different (which also makes the 'retaining' in Jn 20 fully understandable, if this is taken in the same sense); its meaning there is 'to put under the ban'. It is important to stress from the outset that we must not be too hasty in making a mental connection between this meaning and the modern canonical concept of 'excommunication'. The latter is a proper ecclesiastical [142] penalty which is imposed in a fixed manner for certain crimes committed within the Church. In order to understand what is meant by this 'binding' banishment in the New Testament and in the early Church, we must remember what we have already said about the ecclesiological aspect of (grave) guilt. A baptized person in mortal sin still belongs to the Church, he is still 'inside'. But this very fact of his continuing to belong to the Church is robbed of its real meaning by his guilt. It should be a permanent, quasi-sacramental visible sign of his possession of the Spirit.[12] His belonging to the Church in the visible dimension of the Church (i.e. in the sphere of the historically and juridically tangible, of the tangibility of the profession of faith, etc.), becomes a lie in the case of the sinner. It becomes in a sense a 'merely valid' but not 'efficacious' continuous reception of the Proto-sacrament which the belonging to the Church represents. The first thing, therefore, the Church must do (precisely in order to save the sinner), consists in exposing this guilty and mendacious state of the sinner even in the external visible sphere. In short, the Church must first of all unmask the outward appearances – i.e. she banishes or 'binds' the sinner. She establishes the true facts even in the historical tangible sphere: you are precisely as a member of the Church not at all the person you appear to be by your visible membership; you have the appearance of being alive (simply because you belong to the communion of the living in the Body of Christ which is filled with the life-giving Spirit), but in reality you are dead. The Church, in judging, distinguishes and separates in accordance with the twofold meaning of the word κρι/νειν (κρι/σιφ).[13]

It follows from this also that 'binding' and 'loosing' are not two sides of an alternative, but two phases of the one reaction whereby the Holy Church answers the sin of one of her members. At least this is so in the intention of the Church. When she binds, she binds in order to be able to loose. Only once the truth, which is covered up by the outward appearances[14] of the belonging to the Church, has been [143] brought to light on the visible plane of the Church, can the guilt towards the Church and God be lifted or 'loosed' again on the same plane, i.e. on the sacramental plane. Nothing is altered in this regard even in a case where the obduracy and impenitence of the sinner make it impossible to proceed beyond the 'binding' stage. The second stage of the one process (i.e. the loosing) depends on the repentance of the sinner. But the binding already aims at the loosing, and the latter presupposes the former.

[11] Cf. K. Adam, 'Zum ausserkanonischen und kanonischen Sprachgebrauch von Binden und Lösen', TQ XCVI (1914), pp. 49-64; 161-197 (also in: K. Adam, Gesammelte Aufsätze [Augsburg 1936], pp. 17-52); Strack-Billerbeck I, pp. 738-747; 792 sq.; IV, I pp. 293-333; Kittel, Theol. Wörterbuch II, pp. 59 sq.; III, pp. 749-753; V. Brander, '"Binden und Lösen" in der altsyrischen Kirche', Der Katholik XCV, I (1916), pp. 220-232; 287-304; V. Brander, 'Ist Binden und Lösen bei Mt 16.19 und 18.18 ein rabbinischer Schulausdruck?', Der Katholik XCIV, 2 (1914) pp. 116-132; B. Poschmann, De Paenitentia Secunda (Bonn 1940), pp. 4-9. Also Paul F. Palmer, Sources of Christian Theology II: 'Sacraments and Forgiveness' (London 1960), p. 3 (on this particular point), and the whole work for the present chapter in general –Tr.

[12] Cf. e.g. O. Semmelroth, 'Die Kirche als "sichtbare Gestalt der unsichtbaren Gnade"', Scholastik XXVIII (1953), pp. 23-39; K. Rahner, 'Membership of the Church according to the teaching of Pius XII's Encyclical Mystici Corporis Christi', see above pp. 1-88 (esp. pp. 69-88).

[13] Cf. e.g. 1 Cor 5.3 sqq.

[14] The sinner's belonging to the Church is not 'outward appearance' in the sense that he no longer belongs to her, but in the sense that his continuing state of belonging (both according to its true sense and its demonstrative character) gives a false appearance of something which should be there but no longer is there, viz. the sharing in the holy Spirit of the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This is the way in which the early Church always understood it.[15] She always stressed the fact that the Christian who is weighed down with grave guilt must be bound so that he might be effectively loosed. And she never regarded this binding, this segregation of the sinful Christian from the full enjoyment of her communion, as an additional penalty of merely external Church discipline, which could only be imposed in certain cases. On the contrary, she always regarded this binding as a reaction incumbent on the Church in the face of every sin (in principle) which 'excludes a person from the kingdom of God'. It is significant in this respect[16] to note the identical nature of the pauline catalogue of depravities, i.e. of sins which exclude from the kingdom of God (in other words, of mortal sins, in our terminology) and the pauline catalogue of those sins which the Church (congregation) must answer by expelling the sinner from its midst. Thus it remained also in the theology and discipline of the early Church. In our present context, we cannot give a more detailed consideration to the exact form taken by this 'ban' – the connatural reaction of the Church to the grave sin of her member – in the actual practice of the early Church's penitential discipline; and it could, of course, take on a variety of forms there. One thing is clear everywhere and this is the theologically deciding factor; the sinner was at least excluded from the precinct of the Church's innermost life. He was excluded from her central mysterium, the source of all salvation – from the Lord's Supper and Sacrifice. Of course, he was excluded because [144] he had excluded himself from it by his guilt. But precisely this culpable self-separation from the precinct of the Church's innermost life which takes place in the depths of conscience, is given its tangible character and bodily reality on the plane of the visible Church[17] by the 'binding' of the sinner on the part of the Church. The plane of the visible Church does not necessarily mean the 'forum externum', in the sense in which this term is used in modern Canon Law. For, in itself, it is here a question simply of the visible plane on which are found also, for instance, the sacraments.

Now, it might be said that this interpretation of the 'binding' as an inner and necessary moment in the sacramental process of forgiveness (as the so-called 'public' 'excommunication'-penance in the early Church), must be false or, at the most, can have a merely historical, antiquarian interest for us. For, firstly, this expulsive binding is sure1y no longer to be found in the present-day administration of the sacrament of Penance; and, secondly, this whole 'construction' surely cannot be applied to the 'Confession of devotion', and yet the latter is nevertheless a dispensation of a sacrament. The examination of these objections will show us that we have uncovered a forgotten truth in this question of 'binding', which is still significant for us today and which will enable us later on to see the Church's propitiatory 'loosing' also under a 'forgotten' aspect.

The first objection states that this 'binding', such as it has been explained and defined to the exclusion of the proper ecclesiastical penalty of excommunication as found in present-day

[15] Cf. among others the literature cited above, p. 138, note 6.

[16] Cf. on the one hand 1 Cor. 5.1-8; 5.11; 2 Ths 3.6; 2 Tim 3.2-5; 1 Tim 1.19 sq.; Ac 8.20 sqq.; Ap 2.2; 2.14 sq.; 2.20 sq. (lists or cases of a 'ban', 'avoidance' etc.), and on the other hand Gal 5.19-21; Eph 5.5; 1 Cor 6.9 sq.; Col 3.5-8 (lists of sins which exclude from the eschatological kingdom of God).

[17] N.B.: This lies on the same plane as the 'loosing' and 'forgiving' in every possible or thinkable interpretation of the 'binding' (on earth) or of the 'retaining'. Now in every Catholic exegesis and dogmatic theology, this 'loosing' or 'remitting' is, however, a sacramental process and therefore one which essentially has a historical tangibility in the visible Church as such. In other words, it is a process which is enacted in a 'forum', even though this 'forum' must be called 'internum seu conscientiae sacramentale' (CIC can. 196, 1047, 2314 § 2) compared with the external dimension of the Church in which those processes are enacted which affect the Church as a merely external society and her 'bonum commune' as such. Events which take place in the sacramental forum effect directly happenings in the 'sphere of conscience' (as simply all sacraments do). They do not, however, take place only in the 'private' sphere of internal conscience, but in the visible Church. The same must, therefore, be said in any case also of the 'binding'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Canon Law, no longer exists today. In order to see the falsehood of this statement, we [145] will first of all make a little thought-experiment before we start talking more 'theologically'. Let us think of a very zealous little Christian parish of today, in which everybody knows everybody else even as ordinary 'citizens'. Let us suppose that all the members of this congregation meet together on Sundays for the celebration of the Eucharist and that, under the necessary presuppositions, they all receive during it the Body of the Lord as a matter of course. Let us suppose furthermore (without wishing, of course, to recommend such a practice) that these zealous Christians have – as in the early Church – the seemingly strange custom for us of merely submitting those sins committed by them to the sacramental tribunal of Penance which are objectively and subjectively grave, but that they do nevertheless go to Confession in the manner to which we are nowadays accustomed, viz. by queuing up before the Confessional on Saturday afternoons. All these hypotheses are conceivable even today, even without making the slightest alteration in the present Canon Law. The people of this parish need only act in this way. No one could oblige them to act in a contrary manner – one could at the most encourage them to do so. What form would the life of this parish take under these presuppositions? With only slight modifications in the theological or practical sense and without any new canonical measures being taken, there would immediately and visibly appear again in such a parish what could be called 'the public ecclesiastical penance' or 'excommunication-penance'. If someone in such a community committed a mortal sin and consequently does not (as he must not) receive Holy Communion on the Sunday, or (as he is equally obliged to do) queues up before the Confessional on the Saturday, then he would publicly confess himself to be in mortal sin[18] and he would be in the 'ordo [146] paenitentium' even in the public sphere of the Church (even although the exact nature of his mortal sin would be known only to the Confessor through his Confession, as was also the case, by the way, in the early Church). It would not make any real difference whether such a sinner has his assigned place at the very back of the church on Sunday, as was the case in the early Church, or whether he inevitably attracts attention by remaining alone in his usual place (as would be the case in our little congregation); he would in either case inevitably avow himself 'publicly' to be a sinner. And the parish priest of this congregation could also preach just as publicly about the 'queue' which stands outside his Confessional on a Saturday evening: 'abundant hic paenitentes; quando illis imponitur manus, fit ordo longissimus'; (innumerable are the penitents among us; there is a long queue at the time when the hand is imposed on them. Sermo CCXXXII, 7). With St Augustine, he could say of these penitents: 'proprie vocantur paenitentes remoti etiam a sacramento altaris participando, nec accipiendo indigne iudicium sibi manducent et bibant' (penitents in the proper sense are also excluded from participation in the Sacrament of the Altar, so that they may not eat and drink judgement to themselves by partaking unworthily of it. Sermo CCCLII, 3.8). He, too, could preach with St Augustine: 'illi enim, quos vidistis agere paenitentiam (i.e. 'who stand outside the Confessional '), scelera commiserunt, aut adulteria aut aliqua facta immania; inde agunt

[18] It will not be very easy to prove that the Church, in the said hypotheses, has the strict duty to modify the external apparatus of the sacrament of Penance in such a way as to prevent anyone, even in these circumstances, betraying himself in practice to be in mortal sin. At any rate, the Fathers of the Church demanded a public ecclesiastical penance even for occult (mortal) sins (cf. e.g. B. Kurtscheid, Das Beichtsiegel [Freiburg 1912], pp. 16-23; Offentliche Busse für geheime Sünden). Although this naturally did not signify a public Confession of guilt in the proper sense, the sinner did nevertheless inevitably reveal, in the then absence of a Confession of devotion and on account of the public nature of penance, that he had been guilty of grave sin. By such considerations it also becomes clear, incidentally, what pastoral difficulties would necessarily arise if the tendency of those who oppose the practice of the 'Confession of devotion' (or wish to push it into the background as far as possible) were to succeed. If these tendencies were once to prevail, it would in practice be impossible to get those who have committed mortal sins to go to Confession except on their death-bed (just; as at the time of Caesarius of Arles and during the succeeding centuries).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

paenitentiam. Nam si levia peccata ipsorum essent, ad haec quotidiana oratio delenda sufficeret' (those whom you see doing penance, have committed crimes, either adultery or some other terrible crime; this is why they are now doing penance. If they had only venial sins, daily prayer would be sufficient to blot these out. De Symbolo VII, is). It can also not be said that in our case the 'public nature' of this penance is only a factual one, without being constituted by a proper act of the Church. For these people are also excluded from the sacramental centre of the visible supernatural life of the Church by an act of the Church herself. Their sin forces them (under our presuppositions) to do 'public penance', because they are also excluded [147] from the Eucharist by a legal enactment of the Church, which falls upon everyone in mortal sin (and yet is not an excommunication in the modern sense of the word)-and because a commandment of the Church obliges them to receive the sacrament of Penance at least once a year, to which those who have not committed mortal sins are not obliged. Nothing is fundamentally changed in this by the fact that this ecclesiastical act is not nowadays enacted for every individual in particular and as such (as was the practice in the early Church) nothing is basically changed, in other words, by the fact that this act is nowadays to some extent 'latae sententiae' and not 'ferendae sententiae'. Even today, the Church still 'binds' everyone in mortal sin, just as she did before, by isolating such a sinner even by her own legal enactment from the circle of those members of the Church who enjoy free access to her highest mysterium. And this activity of 'binding', which isolates, could at any time and by purely factual changes assume again the tangible and distinct character which we find in connection with the act of 'binding' in the early Church and which we (unlike the early Church) qualify nowadays as the 'public nature' of penance.[19] The act of 'binding', considered as the first stage of the Church's reaction to the mortal sin of the Christian, is, therefore, to be found today just as in the early Church. It is merely covered up, and hence 'forgotten' by us today, because it does not attract attention. But it does not attract attention because in fact many of those who would have the right, unfortunately do not receive the Eucharist; and many, fortunately, go to Confession who are not obliged to do so.

This whole matter can be expressed somewhat more briefly and in a somewhat more theological form in the following terms. The Church 'binds' the Christian who has sinned gravely. This is still true in so far as the Church excludes such a Christian by her own act (CIC can. 856) from the Eucharist, the greatest mysterium of the Church's life and the communion of Christians with each other in the Church (even although this is nowadays done in a somewhat abbreviated form, as was indeed the case already here and there in the early Church[20]). It is [148] true also in so far as the Church has laid down[21] (over and above the divine commandment) that such sinners are obliged to surrender themselves to the tribunal of Penance at least once a year. And this 'binding' of the Christian in mortal sin by the Church takes place in the dimension of the visible Church, which differs indeed from the 'forum externum' but which nevertheless is really a sphere of the visible order, because it is precisely that dimension of the Church in which the sacraments are effected as 'visible' signs of grace.

[19] The early Church did not, after all, qualify ecclesiastical penance as 'public' in contrast to a 'private' sacramental penance, but in contrast to non-sacramental penance for venial sins (by prayer, fasting, almsgiving etc.).

[20] We would refer the reader, for instance, to the abolition, under Nestorius of Constantinople, of the office of priest-penitentiary, who had to deal in an inquisitorial fashion with those who had rendered themselves unworthy of partaking of the Holy Eucharist. By this abolition, the decision in each concrete case, as to whether one is in fact in a state of unworthiness, was left to the individual, and thus the Church contented herself with laying down the general principle (considered, however, as a principle laid down by herself and not merely announced by her). In so far as, for instance, St Augustine too expected that the secret sinner would present himself spontaneously before the Church and abstain voluntarily from the Eucharist, he too really presupposes such an exclusion from the Eucharist ' latae sententiae'.

[21] CIC can. 901,906.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

The fact that this visible (and hence 'public') process of 'binding' is not noticed in our present-day practice, is due to accidental circumstances which lie outside the nature of this matter. Because it does not attract notice, we are inclined to overlook and 'forget' this aspect of 'binding', yet this does not in any way mean that it no longer exists.

Would it not be better if we did not forget this 'binding'? The separation from God and his grace, and the binding by guilt before God himself is, of course, the last and greatest awfulness of sin. But this very separation is brought out of the hidden depths of conscience to the surface of man's existence through the 'binding' by the Church. Anyone who has met people (and there are such people) who suffer from this banishment from the innermost sacramental sphere of the Church, will be able to imagine what this 'binding' can mean in a person's religious life. St Paul saw it as a handing-over to the power of Satan.[22] And how could man not fear this banishment, when he cannot take refuge in the very precinct of the Church in which the incarnate Mercy itself is present as the power of life over sin, death and diabolical passions? How could a man 'bound' in this way not feel; abandoned and lonely in the fullest sense, when he is shut out from the mysterium in which is given the closest communion of men with one another? Because there is one bread, we who are many form one [149] Body; for the one bread is shared by all, says St Paul (1 Cor 10.17). How must these words affect someone who is excluded from partaking of this bread?

At this point it might be said – and with this we come to the second of the above mentioned difficulties – that the fact that there is no possibility of a 'binding' in the case of a 'Confession of devotion', which is nevertheless a sacramental forgiveness of sin, shows that the 'binding' does not after all belong to the essence of the Church's penitential procedure.[23] 'Binding', one might therefore object, is not a necessary first stage in the judicial and saving reaction of the Church to the sin of her member, or at least this aspect does not enter into a 'Confession of devotion'. This does, of course, represent a certain difficulty which must plainly be admitted. But it must be recognized, first of all, that this difficulty exists just as much in the usual explanation of 'binding' and 'loosing' ('retaining' and 'forgiving') mentioned at the beginning of this section. For this theory tries to prove the judicial character of the sacrament of Penance precisely by the alternative dual power of binding or loosing, with legal consequences in both cases. It must then be admitted, however, that even in this theory there can be no question of a true 'binding' in the strict sense with regard to merely venial sins. For the wiping out of venial sins is simply not dependent (not even by obligation) on the sacramental judicial intervention of the Church in the same sense as is true in the case of mortal sin. In addition, even in the usual theory, it is only by making superfluous and objectively most problematical assumptions that one can imagine a case in which someone confesses a venial sin in a mere 'Confession of devotion' which he has not already had forgiven [150] before he comes to the sacrament.[24] Venial sins cannot properly speaking be 'bound' or 'retained' in the strict sense, no matter how one may interpret these two words

[22] Cf. 1 Cor 5.5; 1 Tim 1.20.

[23] N.B. we do not say: 'to the proper essence of the sacrament of Penance as such'. The sacramental power in the strict sense is, in every view, merely part of a judicial (binding and loosing) power of the keys which Our Lord has given to the Church with regard to sinners. It is, therefore, justified and unobjectionable to distinguish between the nature of the (whole) penitential procedure and the nature of the particular phase of this procedure which must (and can alone) be designated in a more restricted sense as 'the sacrament'. For the 'binding' as such retains its meaning and significance even in the case of the sinner who remains impenitent, but it is not, of course, of a sacramental nature in this case at any rate. And this sacramental nature should not, therefore, be attributed to it either in the case when, in accordance with what is properly and originally meant by it (cf. 'ι3να' in 1 Cor 5.5), the binding' in fact 'resolves' itself into 'loosing'.

[24] As to the reason why the reception of the sacrament does nevertheless not become meaningless, this has been sufficiently discussed in two of my articles: 'Vom Sinn der heutigen Andachtsbeicht', Zeitschrift für Aszese und Mystik IX (1934), pp. 323-336, and 'Personal and Sacramental Piety', cf. above, pp. 109-133.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

expressive of the full authority of Christ, which are the scriptural foundation for the sacrament of Penance. It follows from this that the above mentioned difficulty is one which affects every theory, and not merely our own particular explanation of 'binding'. For every theory must recognize, on the one hand, that the sacrament of Penance is geared in its whole structure to the wiping out of mortal sin, and, on the other hand, every theory knows from the practice and teaching of the Church that in a secondary and derived sense it can nevertheless also be a sacramental means for the cleansing from venial sins.

Presupposing these preparatory reflections for a 'retorqueo', we may say that venial sin, analogously to mortal sin (i.e. in a really similar way or with merely small differences), is also an offence against the holy Church and against the functions of membership to which a Christian is obliged in the Church. Venial sin does not, indeed, exclude the sinner from the inner life of the Church which is the 'vessel of the Spirit' (as Irenaeus would say), but does, however, hold him back from the full unhindered exercise of the life issuing from this inner vital principle of the Church. As St Thomas would say, venial sin does not exclude the virtue of caritas, but impedes the act and fervor caritatis[25] however, caritas must not be understood here as the merely subjective disposition, or merely as the individualistically conceived 'infused' virtuous habit, but as the divine love which pours forth continuously in our direction from the Church: Ecclesiae caritas, quae per Spiritum Sanctum diffunditur in cordibus nostris (the Church's love which is poured into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, Augustine, In Joan. tract CXXI, 4). By venial sin man places a distance between himself and this fiery fervour of love which issues from the Church and from her divine principle, seeking to grip man ever more fully and jealously – to this fire he consciously opposes himself. This is first of all enacted in his own private sphere, perhaps even only in the hidden [151] depths of his conscience. And he himself can also terminate and repair this culpable resistance to the stirrings of the Spirit in these dimensions of his existence, viz. by 'private' penance, prayer and reception of the Eucharist which is after all the very sacrament of the 'fervor caritatis' according to St Thomas.[26] But the case which really concerns us here is when the sinner comes to the Church and deplores, and accuses himself of, his remissness and contrariety, and when the Church in her official representatives accepts this accusation and takes it seriously, confirming by seriously listening to this confession that this is not merely the expression of a sensitive soul, which is concerned with its private individual blamelessness, but a confession of guilt through which the Church herself must join in suffering and expiating. In such a case even the hidden separation of man from the fullness of life and vital energy of the Church, which is implied by venial sin, is in fact given a visible character in the sacramental forum of the Church. And this visible character is analogous to the visibleness which arises through the binding of a person in mortal sin (especially since even such a person does still remain a member of the Church). The confession of venial guilt, consisting in the declaration by the sinner and the acceptance by the Church, renders this guilt, and the separation from the Church caused by it, 'present' in the particular public sphere of the Church (no matter how discreetly this is nowadays constituted) which, distinct from the forum externum, is precisely the sphere in which the Spirit and Body of the Church permeate one another most intimately. The fact that the distance of the sinner from the Church's fullness of life becomes perceptible as a result of the Church's action and not merely by the action of the sinner, makes it quite legitimate to call this action of the Church a 'binding', analogous to the 'binding' by which the Church responds to the mortal sin of a Christian.

Again, anyone who reflects properly on this will not say that these are theological subtleties which cannot be of any importance for man's religious life in practice. There is no sin by [25] De malo q. 7, a. 2; I.II q. 89, a. I.

[26] III. q. 79, a. 4 etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation which we do not also become guilty against our neighbour; this is only too obvious in the case of most sins, including venial sins. Take a priest who kneels in the Confessional and confesses his sins. Suppose he confesses 'merely' venial sins: his gruff manner, his formalistic performance of his [152] priestly functions, his lack of penance and deficiency in the spirit of prayer, his haughtiness and his egoism, his cowardice in carrying out his mission. How much has he not in reality fallen short, both visibly and imperceptibly, in his duty towards others – how much is he not guilty towards the children, the poor, towards those who look for the Church and cannot recognize it in him, towards all those whose soul God will demand of him on the day of judgement? When this priest now confesses his sins, his 'merely' venial sins, in this way, then this is not (or should not be) only the unavoidable presupposition for his getting rid of these sins. This Confession has its own weight (after all, he could cleanse himself of these sins even without this Confession); it says: Oh my God, I, the most reverend gentleman, Your anointed and ordained priest, the representative of holy Church – I am a poor sinner and no better than those before whom I am meant to walk as a good shepherd on the paths of salvation. How great a gulf there is between what I am and should be as a priest and what I am as a poor sinner! And how this disparity weighs heavily upon me! How am I to confess it, how destroy the false appearance and the lie which spread around the truth of my priesthood by my guilt! I cannot kneel down before my parishioners to beg them to forgive me my guilt towards them, so that God in heaven may forgive me. And, therefore, I confess at least to another priest, to my own brother – in the place of God and God's holy congregation whom I have offended – my fault, my grievous fault . . . Do not take me for an exalted saint but regard me rather as what I am through my guilt: a poor sinner. Through this Confession, by showing myself before the Church and thereby before all against whom I have sinned to be far from what I should be and seem to be, I can hope that God, by the love of his Spirit Whom he bestows, will also place me again where he has placed me by Ordination. By the fact that I show my fetters, he relieves me of them. This is merely an example. It could be made to apply to the case of the person in public life, of the father who has to watch over the salvation of his children's souls, of the mother who should be an example to her, family of what is meant by being a true Christian, of the poor and lonely who should draw grace for others out of their own bitterness, of those who live in a monastery which should be a radiant city set on a hill . . . All of these should try to gain an existential realization of their being bound before and by the Church, before they let themselves he loosed from their venial sins by and before the Church.

[153]

3. The 'Matter' of the Sacrament of Penance

Anyone who has at some time or other studied theology will recall (probably with feelings of weariness and disinterest) a 'scholastic controversy' about the question of what is the 'matter' of the sacrament of Penance. He will probably regard this controversy as an exceedingly empty wrangle about words, which is utterly unimportant in practice and for our spiritual life. He will probably regard it as a controversy which drags on in the textbooks simply because theologians have taken it into their heads to distinguish between matter and form even in the case of the sacrament of Penance, although (in his opinion) this distinction which is clearly understandable in the case of other sacraments (such as baptism), can be applied to the sacrament of Penance only by dint of artificial subtleties. And so one gets the impression that the Thomists will go on calling the 'acts of the penitent' the matter of the sacrament of Penance, the Scotists (who deny this) will go on regarding these acts as merely necessary conditions for this sacrament, and that in the last resort both opinions come to the same thing. And yet this whole matter is a bit different in reality. This question is important,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

and not only because the Reformers disputed the proper sacramentality of ecclesiastical Penance partly by maintaining precisely that there is no 'res' in this case, i.e. no 'matter' (as there is in the case of baptism and of the Lord's Supper), but merely 'words' (verba). And, they maintained, since these words stand on their own, there is no question here of a sacrament, but rather of something belonging to the efficacious preaching of the Gospel of forgiveness. We prescind here from the significance of the scholastic controversy in this particular respect. Even apart from this, once we presuppose the thomistic view as well founded and as the now more common opinion in theology, we can discover a 'forgotten' truth in this question discussed in the schools, which is not without some significance for our religious life.

We will come closer to the proper meaning of this thomistic doctrine, if we try to discover how it originated. The application of the notions of 'matter' and 'form' to the sacraments as a whole was not made until the first decades of the thirteenth century, partially replacing the older notions of 'res' (elementum) and 'verbum'. Now, before the question as to what is the matter and form in the sacrament of Penance was first asked in the thirteenth century, there had already [154] been a question (in the twelfth century) as to what in general is the sacramental sign of this sacrament, in contradistinction to the effect as such. The almost universal answer[27] given to this question during the whole of the twelfth century was, however, that the external penitential acts of the penitent are the sacramental sign, and above all his confession or the imposed penance. It should be noted, in parenthesis, that if here and there,[28] the absolution given by the priest was already regarded as the sacramental sign, this opinion is only apparently identical with the Church's present-day teaching. For practically nowhere in the twelfth and thirteenth century (up to the time of St Thomas), did speculative theology regard Absolution as the sacramental process which effects the cleansing from guilt as such before God. Speculative theology attributed other, even though supernatural, effects to Absolution, and regarded the contrition of the penitent (caused in him by grace) as the sole cause, even in the sacrament, of the cleansing from guilt in the strict sense. But to return to the then prevalent explanation of the sacramental sign: we should not be surprised at this explanation. Both in the practice and in the theology of the early Middle Ages, the personal doing of penance by the sinner through contrition, confession and satisfaction (all done, indeed, before, and under the direction of, the Church) stood so much in the foreground of consciousness, that theology until the time of St Thomas saw the proper cause of forgiveness of guilt in this personal penance and in this love given by God. All that remained then to be attributed to the priestly absolution (the necessity of which was never disputed) were other effects, such as, for instance, the forgiveness of the punishment due to sin, etc. If it was asked from this point of view as to which is the sacramental sign of the sacrament of Penance, the answer could in consequence merely lie in – the acts of the penitent. And so, when, in the middle of the thirteenth century, theologians turned slowly and hesitatingly to the question of how they could distinguish between matter and form in the sacramental sign of the sacrament of Penance (because they were trying to apply this distinction to all the sacraments), the answers necessarily took on very different and undecided forms in view of the above situation, viz. the [155] general opinion that the acts of the penitent are the sign and that the Absolution has no causal effect on the cleansing from guilt as such. We do not need to enter here into the theory propounded by High Scholasticism before the middle of the thirteenth century on this question.

At this time (shortly before St Thomas and through St Thomas himself) the original and [27] The materials for this will be found in B. Poschmann, Die abendländische Kirchenbusse im frühen Mittelalter (Breslau 1930); P. Anciaux, *La Théologie du Sacrement de Pénitence au XII*e siècle (Louvain 1949).

[28] Cf. Anciaux, pp. 146 sq., 376, 382.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

early tradition of the Church was successfully given a clear formulation in the new set of concepts. This was achieved first of all with regard to the sacramental causality towards guilt as such: Absolution by the Church exercises a sacramental causality on the cleansing from guilt as such. This is the decisive step forward which was taken by the theologians of this period (William of Auvergne, Hugh of St Cher, William of Meliton, Bonaventure, Thomas Aquinas)[29] in the clarification of the theology of Penance; we are not, however, concerned with this here. But this very step forward also made it clear that the Absolution, which cleanses from guilt, is therefore also necessarily the sacramental sign, or at least belongs to it as a necessary and constitutive moment. Now St Thomas, being the conservative and harmonizing genius which he is everywhere in his theology, could not and would not simply discard the theological thesis, traditional for one and a half centuries and still current in his day, according to which the acts of the penitent are the sacramental sign in the sacrament of Penance. The two notions of matter and form give him the possibility of working the traditional thesis and the newly won understanding into a harmonious synthesis. Thus, the acts of the penitent belong to the sacramental sign (this is where the older view is right); they are the matter, the one element in the sacramental sign which must be formed and further determined, and which signifies and calls forth the divine forgiveness. But the absolution given by the priest also belongs to this sacramental sign (this is where the new view is right); it is the form, the determining element in the totality of the sacramental sign which puts the final stamp on the acts of the penitent, and by which alone these acts are given their ultimate meaning. The (moral, not physical) union in meaning of the tangible penance done by man before the visible Church and the forgiving, [156] authoritative discharge given by the Church forms the unity of a sign, which signifies the divine forgiveness and which, by signifying it, effects it, i.e. allows it to become an actual happening.

Within this totality of the sign (and only thus), the priestly absolution (understood as 'form') is, for St Thomas, the decisive element as regards the causal effect[30]; the acts of the penitent, however, are the more important element as far as the sign-function as such is concerned.[31] These two elements of the one sign, in so far as they are ordained to one another by their very nature, can together also form the unity of the one signifying and effective sign.

It can be seen from this that St Thomas does not arrive at the theory, that the acts of the penitent are the matter of the sacramental sign, by the consideration that the judicial verdict of the Church requires a 'matter' (as has often been done since, in order to try to 'prove' his thesis [32]). Indeed, such a proof would merely show objectively that there must be an object for the Church's pronouncement of a sentence, to which it can refer, and so this would not go beyond the Scotist theory. St. Thomas' sole proof (which, it should be remembered, he does not at all work out fully and on which he does not at all reflect) is rather the usual scholastic doctrine which was held before his time, viz. that within the one totality of the ecclesiastical process of penance, the personal act of the penitent has an effective influence on the cleansing from guilt and is not merely an extrinsic conditio sine qua non for the latter, as it is in the case of baptism (according to St Thomas). One could even say that this teaching of St Thomas was inspired by his deep theological instinct which urges him to let the personal and sacramental moments in the process of justification permeate one another as intimately as possible. This instinct does not allow him to recognize two separate 'ways' of justification, but urges him to regard the personal and sacramental elements-both of them in and before the [29] Cf. for the above mentioned theologians: Valens Heynck, 'Zur Busslehre des hl. Bonaventura', Franziskanische Studien XXXVI (1954) pp. 1-81; for St Thomas: III, q. 84, a. I corp., ad 1, ad 2, ad 3; a. 3; a. 4, ad 3; a. 7 corp.; q. 86, a. 6 corp.; q. 89, a. I, ad 2.

[30] III, q. 86, a. 6 corp.
[31] In IV Sent. dist. 22, q. 2, sol. 2.
[32] Cf. e.g. Chr. Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae VII 4-5 (Freiburg 1920), no. 79.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Church-as two sides or phases of the one process, which demand and condition each other.[33] The reason why he was able to carry this basic theological conception through, particularly in [157] the case of the sacrament of Penance (and more clearly there than in the case of other sacraments), lies, it is true, in the peculiar situation of the theology of Penance at his time, which moved the acts of the penitent to an even more central position in the sacrament of Penance than in the other sacraments.

It would be most superficial to attempt to see in this thomistic theory merely a clever verbal harmonization of objectively quite different points of view, and to admit in this way that Scotus[34] was right after all. Scotus, taking his departure precisely from this newly won position of St Thomas, transposed the sacramentality of the whole process of Penance exclusively into the priestly absolution, because this is ordained authoritatively and effectively to the cleansing from guilt itself, which St Thomas had been the first to make theologians see. With St Thomas it is a question (it seems to us), not merely of including in his theory an opinion of the schools which has existed before him, but of conceptually working into that theory a genuine tradition from the time of the Fathers. We can give only a very brief indication here of the proof of this statement, without going into the various pieces of evidence. The Fathers see first of all an essential difference between baptism and ecclesiastical Penance.[35] Baptism is forgiveness by free favour, a new creation, simply remission, sheer direct action of the Blood of Christ. Penance (even as a sacrament) is laborious atonement, baptism in one's own tears, not rebirth of a sudden kind, but a slow bitter cure by one's own efforts (even though these must be supported by the grace of God). And the Fathers refer this difference not merely to the cleansing from the temporal punishment due to sins but to the remission of guilt itself.[36] They see this difference not merely in the relation of baptism to the cleansing from sin after baptism which takes place extra-sacramentally, but in the [158] relation of baptism to the cleansing from sin which constitutes the penitential process regulated by the Church terminating in the reconciliation with and by the Church. If personal penance were only an extrinsic conditio sine qua non even in the sacrament of Penance,[37] then this difference between the two sacraments as such could not be maintained, or at least could be maintained only with regard to the temporal punishment due to sins. In view of this difference between the two sacraments, it is also not possible to hold that subjective penance has an effect on the cleansing from sin precisely in so far as these acts are meritorious. It is true that they are meritorious. But that is true also of the personal preparation for baptism (in so far as this normally includes faith, contrition and love), and so this circumstance does not constitute a difference between the two sacraments. This difference can, therefore, lie only in the fact that in contrast to baptism, subjective penance, done before and in the Church, is itself an intrinsic co-constitutive element of the sacramental happening and hence of the positing of the sacramental sign.[38] However, the act

[33] Cf. on this: K. Rahner, 'Personal and Sacramental Piety', pp. 109-133 above; H. Schillebeeckx, O.P., De Sakramenteele Heilseconomie (Antwerp 1952).
[34] Cf. N. Krautwig, Die Grundlagen der Busslehre des J. Duns Skotus (Freiburg 1938), pp. 133 sq.
[35] Cf. e.g. B. Poschmann, Paenitentia secunda, pp. 161, 239, 241 sq., 285, 287 sq., 400 sq., 409, 413, 427-435; B. Poschmann, 'Die kirchliche Vermittlung der Sündenvergebung nach Augustinus', ZKT XLV (1921), pp. 208- 228 etc. (esp. pp. 210-214); K. Rahner: RSR XXXVII (1950), pp. 52-69, 73-79, 96 sq.
[36] This (objectively correct) distinction which was as yet foreign to the Fathers, must not be arbitrarily introduced into their teaching to the effect that the sinner after baptism must get rid of his sins differently from the candidate for baptism.
[37] As it is in the case of baptism, which fact is emphasized also by the Fathers: cf. P. Galtier, L'Eglise et la rémission des péchés (Paris 1932), pp. 51 sqq.
[38] The inner reason for this difference is understandable: the baptized sinner is still a member of the Church. His actions in and before the Church are, therefore, an expression of the life of the Church (in contrast to the actions of the unbaptized), and can, therefore, more easily have the character of a sacramental (even though merely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of the Church, her forgiveness, also belongs to this very happening, for it also is effectively ordained to the cleansing from sin. Hence both of these facts cannot be true at the same time unless the subjective and ecclesiastical [159] penance of the sinner and the Church's word of forgiveness combine (before there is any question of the effect) in one unified sign of the interior event of grace which is the remission of guilt, and constitute together the one sign of forgiveness. St Thomas is, therefore, absolutely right in calling the 'acts of the penitent' the matter, and the priestly absolution the form of the sacrament. He merely states in scholastic terms what had always been the conviction of the Fathers.

If we try to get a clearer idea of what is contained in this thomistic thesis, by approaching it in a somewhat less abstract and scholastic form, it will perhaps become clear why we think that there is a 'forgotten truth' hidden in it. We can do this even if someone were of the opinion that the theological proof for the thomistic thesis is not beyond all doubt. For we have the right, even under this presupposition, to entrust ourselves without fear to the authority of the 'Prince of the schools'.

To begin with: if the thomistic thesis is correct (and is really understood), then the penitent sinner co-posits the sacramental sign and hence is also a subordinate cause (of a sacramental-instrumental kind) of the sacramental grace. He is not only the passive recipient of this grace but is the one who, together with the priest, actively celebrates the sacred mysterium itself which is the sacramental cause of the grace which he receives. Matrimony, or, for instance, the priest's Communion in his own Sacrifice, provide us with similar cases. We may not on this account, it is true, call the penitent the 'minister' of the sacrament of Penance in the proper sense, for he does not give the absolution but only receives it, and his own penitential act does not presuppose any new authorization of an official kind in the proper sense. But it remains true to say that, in the thomistic theory, the penitent is an associate cause of the sacramental sign and hence of the sacramental grace, with the causality of an instrument and of a sign. By his confession and request for forgiveness, the penitent lends his interior penitential disposition a concrete form and a tangible character in the ecclesiastical sphere (i.e. in the public forum of the Church, no matter how discreetly a public form this may take) and in the presence of the Church – he incarnates that disposition, so to speak, historically. By doing so, he creates a reality in the dimension of the Church which, given the response and the transformation by the forgiving answer of the Church, becomes the sign of the effective presence of God's forgiving grace.

In a sacred process of mystery, he himself-the sinner, that is- provides God's pressing will of forgiveness in the Church with its matter in which this forgiveness becomes concrete and thus effective in this particular sinner. He who has ratified the black godlessness of the world by his guilt and has increased it in his own person, is permitted to prepare the means himself by which the invisible grace of God comes to shine out even in a concrete historical manner. The readiness of the sinner to accept God's grace (if it should come to him by free favour), which occurs and manifests itself within the sphere of the Church, becomes itself, under the response of the Church and with her forgiveness, the sacred sign of the fact that this grace really comes to pass here and now. His 'Come' is transformed into a 'Here I am'; man's cry partial) sign than the activity of an unbaptized person. This does not imply that an unbaptized person must every case be incapable of positing a sacramental sign (an unbaptized person can at least baptize, after all). Such exceptions are based on the historical and free nature of the divine institution of the sacraments; they do not prove that the sacraments are not intended by their nature to be posited by members of the Church and as deeds of the Church. Added to this, in our case, is the fact that the sins of the unbaptized are sins which do not incriminate the Church considered as the visible saving community. It is different in the case of the baptized. He does penance, therefore, as a member of the Church. His penance as such is, therefore, an expression of the life of the Church as such. The fact that this penance, in contrast to that of the candidate for baptism, is included in the sacramental sign-nature of the sacrament, has thereby its meaning (even though perhaps not its strict necessity) from the very nature of things.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

becomes itself part of God's answer. If the carrying out of the sacraments is 'liturgy' in the proper sense of the word, then the confessing sinner celebrates a part of the Church's liturgy and does not merely receive the effect of someone else's liturgical action. In him, too, the Church acts and executes her liturgy. A staggering liturgy this, the liturgy of the Church of sinners, the solemnly regulated appearance of the Church of sinners before the seat of grace of the Father Who holds the Cross of the Son; the liturgy of the prodigal son which consists in man's confessing himself before the holy God to be what he is of himself, namely a sinner; the sacrifice of praise by the lips which God himself must open, even if it is 'merely' a question of preventing them from denying one's own sinfulness as a result of being both proud and cowardly at the same time; the prize of grace in the confession of guilt. The early Church celebrated this terrible and healing liturgy of the Church of sinners most 'solemnly' (if we may say so) in her penitential discipline.[39] The 'celebrant' of this liturgy wore a special vestment for this, viz. the penitential robe; he fasted and wept; over and over again during the long period of penance he let the representative of Christ impose hands upon him, in prayer and in exorcism of the powers of darkness; the whole congregation celebrated with him, praying and interceding on his behalf. This liturgy took place in the presence of the whole saintly congregation; the distance from the pure bliss of the Altar, which was both punishment and healing, was clearly brought out. The priest (bishop) took [161] part in the prayer and fasting. He made his grace-giving word of forgiveness still more tangible and clear by his imposition of the hand (which was probably done ever since the time of the Apostles: I Tim 5.20-22).[40] Today this liturgy is quite sober – indeed, it is often mistaken for a primitive psycho-therapeutic consultation of hideous profanity; it is the liturgy of the Confessional. But perhaps this liturgy is in its kind most expressive for anyone who can see by faith, just because it is so sober: the liturgy of poor little sinners, of the mediocre and the weak, who are too poor and feeble to say and do more than what is absolutely necessary. Perhaps the liturgy thus expresses even better today what man is: a poor being which is just able to call for the mercy of God in a weak, almost dying whisper, and whose little lamentation is already enveloped by the loud, powerful utterance of mercy which fills all spaces: ego te absolvo. Christian Pesch is right when he says in-sober theological language: 'If someone denies that the acts of the penitent cause grace ex opere operato, then he is objectively on the side of Scotus, even if he says that these acts are the "matter" and "parts" of the sacrament of Penance.'[41] What we have just stated, therefore, gives a completely true interpretation of the meaning of the thomistic conception. No one will be able to dispute the fact that we usually forget this significance of the personal acts in the sacrament of Penance, even if the tradition of the thomistic conception is carried on in the textbooks.

Why and how can the 'penitential' deed of the sinner in the dimension of the Church be itself, even though only together with the priestly absolution, the sign of the effective presence of God's grace of forgiveness? First of all we must reflect on the fact that the penitent sinner is a Christian. The grace of Christ in the Church, therefore, does not flow towards him as towards someone who is 'outside' (as in the case of a candidate for baptism). He is himself already a member of the Church, his penitential activity (unlike that of someone to be baptized) is already based on the character of baptism and on the historical tangibility of his belonging to the Church. Hence whenever that activity takes place before the Church (as in this case) and wherever it is directed towards her sacramental action of grace, it takes place as act of the member of the Church in the sacramental public [162] forum of the Church, no matter how unobtrusively it may be done in the obscurity of the Confessional; it has,

[39] Cf. J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung (Innsbruck 1932).
[40] Cf. P. Galtier, Aux origines du sacrement de pénitence (Rome 1951).
[41] Praelectiones dogmaticae VII $^{4/5}$ (Freiburg 1920), no. 74.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

therefore, an ecclesiological explicitness; it is itself ecclesiastical. Since this activity is, however, necessarily supported and caused by the anticipatory and supernatural saving grace of God, and since it thus renders its own divine basis tangible in the historical here and now (which is done by any effect for its cause), the penitential activity of the Christian is also the sign of the anticipatory effectiveness of divine grace in the sinner. In, so far as this very grace is grace of the Church, since all grace is grace of the Body of Christ (i.e. from this Body and directed towards it), and in so far as it is given as a gift to this baptized sinner qua member of the Church (as her vital force), the personal penance of the baptized person is a manifestation of grace both as divine and as of the Church. Hence, the personal doing of penance by the baptized Christian is, in so far as he comes to the Church, already a sign and appearance of further divine and ecclesiastical grace in the dimension of the official, and sacramental public forum of the Church. This personal penance of the baptized is not yet simply by that fact and by itself alone an ex opere operato effective sign of the sacramental remission of guilt – for this it is required that the priestly absolution, the response of the Church, be joined up with it. But it is easily seen from what has been said, that the personal penance done by the baptized before the Church is in itself suited to cooperate in constituting this one effective sacramental sign of divine forgiveness and that it is also orientated to the Church's forgiveness together with which it is meant to constitute the one sacramental sign.

4. The Prayer of the Church

When the priest exercises his office of messenger of the effective word of reconciliation, he says the Misereatur . . . and the Indulgentiam . . . before he pronounces the Ego te absolvo. But how often does he not say these words thoughtlessly and hurriedly, if he does not omit them altogether because he must hurry as there are many waiting outside his Confessional and these little prayers really do not belong to the necessary 'forma sacramenti'. The penitent, in his turn, will only too often wait eagerly until these prayers are past and he hears the longed for 'Ego te absolvo' which he understands much better. In most cases he will not know or notice at all that what the priest whispers between the giving of the penance and the Ego te absolvo is [163] already familiar to him from the prayers at the foot of the altar at the beginning of Holy Mass. But even in the Mass he will seldom come to 'experience' that in such a request and intercessory prayer for liberation from guilt this freeing from guilt can become a real event; he is too much caught up in the constricting impression that such a thing happens simply in Confession and that such prayers are merely pious wishes which, if they are fulfilled, realize themselves, in the normal course of events (indeed, almost exclusively), in Confession. How many priests and faithful have the concrete experience – such as they have sometimes experienced in Confession – that even a truly genuine Confiteor . . . can be a grace-giving event of real forgiveness of sin on the part of God,[42] so that they begin the Sacrifice of the Mass as different persons from what they were when they gathered round the altar for the preparatory prayers?

[42] Even though, naturally, not of a sacramental kind. We may mention in passing that in a sober theological treatment one would have to be careful in maintaining that such a remission is 'surer' in the sacrament than outside it where it happens merely 'ex opere operantis'. For, given the corresponding necessary personal disposition, then it is possible to have the certainty even outside the sacrament which can be attained in the sacrament, because the success even of the sacrament depends on this disposition. If one wished to insist on the fact that 'imperfect contrition' suffices in the sacrament, whereas perfect contrition' is required outside the sacrament, then it must be remembered that the 'difficulty' of 'perfect contrition' consists precisely in something which is also required for 'imperfect contrition', viz. in the honest renunciation of sin considered as an offence against God. If this, however, is truly present, it is hard to see what special and new difficulty should be presented by contrition out of love for God.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

What exactly is the meaning of these little wishes expressed before the absolution? They can no longer be called 'prayer', strictly speaking, since they do not address God at all but the penitent. They are a small relic of that part of the old penitential liturgy in which the Church made intercession for her member and prayed with him since she suffered with her member in his guilt. But what does this intercessory prayer of the old penitential liturgy mean? When we speak of the sacrament of Penance, our regard is more often than not strangely confined to seeing only the particular event which alone can be called 'sacrament' in the strict sense and, in fact, can be distinguished as a sacrament from other sacraments. And we moreover attach importance in this only to what is absolutely required-and sufficient-for the constitution of this sacrament. In this way we isolate the sacrament [164] from the totality of human and Church life, from the whole penance of man and the Church in which the sacrament is embedded and which leads to it and springs forth from it. We know all this, it is true, but we forget it. We need only ask ourselves some time what has all happened already in terms of supernatural events when a Christian stands outside the Confessional. Augustine[43] would say: he has already been raised by the word and grace of Christ from the tomb of sin like a Lazarus (not that he necessarily has already obtained the remission of guilt which is freely given to him by his being loosed by the Church); he has already begun to live, he needs 'only' now to be loosed by the Apostles from the fetters of sin. But the tomb is already open and the power of Christ, which is life, has already taken hold of him. Indeed, consider, in the light of the simplest principles of the Faith, what must already have happened before Confession and absolution! There has been a miracle of grace. For only in that way does a man come to that repentance without which the sacrament would be a sacrilege. There is no contrition of any significance for salvation unless God's gratuitous grace has already anticipated man so that he may be able to repent and actually does repent, since the capacity and the actual doing are God's grace. But this miracle of grace does not simply fall from heaven. It too has an incarnational nature: it is the miracle of the grace of Christ. It is conditioned by the historical event of Christ and of his Cross, by the preaching of the Word of God in the Church; it may depend on the example and word of another Christian which in the last analysis does also originate again in the grace of God; it is given as a gift to man, because and in so far as he is baptized and a member of the Church. Even before the Ego te absolvo there has already taken place a miracle of grace in the Church. And this miracle is also sustained by the intercessory prayer of the Church. We already find testimony of this intercessory prayer of the Church for sinners in the New Testament – it is so important there, that its refusal to certain sinners constitutes the gravest rebuff imaginable to a sinner by the Church: 1 Jn 5.16, and also in the Didache,[44] in Tertullian[45] and from then [165] onwards over and over again in the Fathers.[46] Christ prays in the Church for the penitent, and this prayer is gladly granted, says Tertullian. The Fathers of the Church emphasize over and over again that the sinner is freed from his burden by the 'prayer' of the Church and above all of her episcopal representatives – especially when, liturgically speaking, the intercessory prayer of the whole congregation in direct conjunction with the penitential process had receded into the background. And by this 'prayer' must not be understood here merely the 'absolution'; it

[43] E.g. In Joan. tract. XLIX, 24; XXII, 7 Sermo LXVII 1,2; Sermo CCXCV 3,2; Sermo CCCLII 3,8 (and not 38, as stated in the German text. Tr.). Cf. B. Poschmann: ZKT XLV (1921), pp. 214 sqq.
[44] Didache 8, 2.3; 14,1.
[45] De paenit. 10,5 sq. Cf. K. Rahner, 'Zur Theologie der Busse bei Tertullian' (cf. above, note 6, p. 138), pp. 152-154.
[46] Cf. e.g. St Augustine, sermo CCCXCII, 3 (agite paenitentiam, qualis agitur in ecclesia, ut oret pro vobis ecclesia); St Ambrose, De paenit. I. 15, 80; St Jerome, Dial, contra Lucif. V; Epist. LXXVII, 4 sq.; St Pacian, Parenesis X (exoratricem Ecclesiam deprecari); St Leo the Great, Epist. CVIII, 2 (Denz 146: . . . supplicationibus sacerdotum . . .); Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. VII, 16. Cf. also B. Poschmann, Der Ablass im Licht der Bussgeschichte (Bonn 1948), 10-13.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

really refers (also) to the intercession made by the Church for the sinner. Because the Church prays and does penance in her Saints and justified members, God anticipates the sinner with his grace and leads him to the conversion without which no absolution is of any avail and which itself leads to salvation, in a case of necessity, even without priestly absolution. (It is obvious, of course, that this intercession and penance of the Church springs itself again from nothing other than the grace of God and the power of the Cross. But this itself again does not rule out the fact that such a deed done by someone is significant for the salvation of others.) When the penitent Christian comes to the Church's sacrament, the Church does not only not start her work on him, but she even has already done her greater work on him. For his interior conversion is also already the work of the praying Church.

In earlier times the Church included this work more tangibly and in a more developed form in the sacramental liturgy of the remission of sins: the bishop imposed hands (and this quite frequently during the period of penance) with prayers and exorcisms, the congregation assisted in this prayer and there was a proper penitential liturgy joined to the Eucharistic Sacrifice.[47] In the early Middle Ages the priest and penitent knelt before the altar and said long prayers together; the priest had to fast before he administered the sacrament, etc.[48] [166] Today all that has diminished and has become much more unobtrusive: a short expression of the desire to forgive, addressed directly to the penitent. But it should remind us of what is still true and actual today when we come to the Church to beg for forgiveness: she has already borne our guilt together with us, suffering by it and helping to atone for it when we became hardened in this guilt; she already sought us in her prayers when we were still obstructing the reign of her Spirit in us; she had already met us with her love when we were still indifferent to it; we came to her because she has sought us out. And when she now completes the work of reconciliation in us by the authority of Christ, she can do this because she had already begun it a long time ago in her prayer.

5. Loosing on earth and in heaven

When we read in the Scriptures about the power given to the Apostles to 'loose' sins in such a way that they are loosed also in heaven, we think instinctively and as it were naturally of the power of according the sinner forgiveness of his sins, in the name of God and by commission of Christ Our Lord, in such a way that the annihilation of his guilt through God's grace of forgiveness becomes an event in him here and now in a sacramental process (similar to that of baptism), and all this precisely on account of these words addressed to the Apostles. To understand the Bible text in this way is absolutely correct' (especially with a view also to the commission given by Christ in Jn 20), and indeed we can recognize this immediately and historically as being the interpretation already given to the text by the early Church from the third century onwards. But if we think that we have thereby exhausted the meaning of these words, then a more careful exegesis, and the mind of the early Church, will show us that we have not done full justice to the content of this text and have overlooked part of it. Not the essential and decisive part, certainly. For all that matters ultimately is that God forgives us our trespasses and that precisely this [167] forgiveness is given a tangible sacramental form and an effective presence in our life by the word of the Church. And yet it is not as if the further content of truth and reality of these words regarding the earthly and heavenly loosing [47] Cf. above all J. A. Jungmann, Die lateinischen Bussriten (Innsbruck 1932).

[48] Cf. e.g. apart from Jungmann, the different 'Ordines paenitentiae' in H. J. Schmitz, Die Busskirche und die Bussdisziplin der Kircke I (Mainz 1883), pp. 75 sqq., 87 sqq., 98 sqq., 239 sqq., 397 sqq., 471 sqq. These Ordines are still alive today – at least in writing – in the Pontificale Romanum, which still contain a solemn episcopal liturgy of penance for Ash Wednesday and Holy Thursday.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of sins could remain indifferent to us, simply because we have understood the decisive and most important thing properly and have let it become a reality in the Church in the sacrament of Penance.

We are already partially prepared to grasp what more there is in these words, by what we said above about the 'binding on earth'. For the meaning both of 'binding' and 'loosing' obviously becomes clearer by the antithetical nature of these terms. And what is even more important (and something which is not taken into consideration by the customary view about the meaning of 'binding' which we mentioned above) is that we can surmise from the very outset that the loosing by the Church to which Mt 16 and 18 refer, does not simply represent an alternative for binding but refers to the very binding undertaken by the Church – in other words, that the person to be loosed is loosed precisely from the ban imposed by the Church. This is the most obvious thought purely linguistically, simply because in this context there is no question whatsoever of any other restraint which could be loosed. If therefore, any kind of meaning can be gathered from the text in this particular direction, it must be preferred to other meanings. Now we saw that 'to bind on earth' means the showing forth, by the official authority of the Church, of the distance which has arisen in the public sacramental sphere and through man's fault, not only between God and the sinner but also between the Church and the sinful member of the Church. It is to be noted that this 'binding' contains a twofold element of 'distancing', viz. the one which arises through man's guilt itself and the one which is set up by the Church's act and by the Church herself. These two moments are to each other as nature is to connatural manifestation, or as a thing is to its constitutive expression. It therefore followed from this also that, in the case of grave sin, this expression (the 'binding') must in principle ensue on the part of the Church and before the Church, and that the Church's first reaction to the guilt of her members is always a 'binding'. The first element itself is again insolubly bound up with the guilt before God. Precisely because and in so far as this guilt is present, the person has (by that very fact) put himself at a distance also from holy Church, and so the Church must (in the case of grave sin) put [168] herself at a distance from the sinner by binding and banning him. She can, therefore, lift her ban (Bindung) only when she knows that the guilt is also forgiven before God 'in heaven' and that the sinner is also loosed in heaven. Now the words of our Lord state, however, that this very thing happens by the fact that the Church looses the sinner 'on earth', i.e. looses him from the ban imposed by her and (since this cannot have meaning or be possible in any other way) looses him also from the cause of this ban, i.e. from the ecclesiological side of his guilt. This means, therefore, that the remission of guilt in heaven is not simply and solely a presupposition for the loosing on earth but is also, moreover, its effect. It means, therefore, that if and because you loose something on earth, it will be loosed also in heaven – however much the effective loosing on earth naturally presupposed the repentant return of man to God, and however much the change in the relationship of man to God and to the Church which comes about through the loosing in heaven and on earth, represents basically only the two sides of the one unified process.

What meaning, and what increase of meaning, is given then to these texts beyond the meaning given to them by the usual, correct but inadequate interpretation? These texts now signify: when you have bound a sinner on account of his guilt in the face of God and against the holy Church ('on earth', i.e. in the visible sphere of holy Church) and when you then – on the sinner's repentant return – loose these bonds (his officially manifested distance from the Church) in the perceptible sphere of the Church by your sovereign act, forgiving him thereby his ecclesiological guilt, then he is also loosed by and through this from his state of guilt before God (from his 'bound state in heaven') and then he is also recognized once more 'in heaven' as a free member of the Congregation of Christ, animated by his Spirit, with all the rights and graces of such a member. The Church grants the sinner peace with God in granting

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

him the gift of her peace and by once more according him her spiritual love in an authoritative manner.[49]

This is also how the Fathers understood this text. By receiving the -peace of the Church, we receive the Spirit of the Father, says Cyprian (Epist. LVII, 4). By the fact that they (the sinners) are restored to [169] peace with the Church, they receive the pledge of life (Epist. LV, 13). Peace with the Church remits sins, estrangement from the peace of the Church retains sins, says Augustine (De bapt. contra Donat. III, 18.23). Or St Augustine again in another place: 'The Church's love which is poured out into men's hearts by the Holy Spirit, remits the sins of those who participate in this love, and retains the sins of those who have no participation in it' (In Joan. tract. CXXI, 4). 'The City of God renders man guiltless by receiving him into herself' (Contra Cresc. II, 16).

Elsewhere too-however little the remission of guilt before God was overlooked, indeed as clearly as this final outcome was kept in view – the final result of the whole penitential process is characterized above all and before all else as 'peace with the Church', 'communion' (with the Church), 'reconciliation with the Altar', full 'return into the tower of the Church', 'reincorporation into the Church', etc. Even during the early Middle Ages, indeed until right into the thirteenth century,[50] there still persists the clear consciousness of the fact that absolution given by the priest is a 'being received into the Church as someone healed',[51] an introduction into the Church of Christ,[52] etc. This is true, even although it was perhaps no longer so clear in this connection that all this is not only one effect of the priest's absolution among others, but the first effect in the objective, ontological order through which the other effects – especially the remission of guilt before God – are attained. Indeed St Bonaventure still says that Confession was directly instituted so that man could be reconciled again with the Church and so that his reconciliation with (through) God might thus become manifest (In IV Sent. dist. 17, q. 3, a. 2, fund. 2). And St Thomas says that, by the sacrament, man must be reconciled not only with God but also with the Church (IV Sent. dist. 17, q. 3, a. 3, qc. 5, ad 3).[53] The decisive factor for this testimony of [170] the Fathers is, however, the practice of the early Church (and the Fathers' explanation of this practice). The 'public' penance is as such the sacrament of Penance; it is not merely a disciplinary measure taken by the Church and running concurrently with the sacrament, i.e. a 'censure' in the current canonical sense. This is why the Fathers (e.g. Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen) keep emphasizing the fact that the sinner must first of all be 'bound' (at least through the exclusion from the Eucharist) in order to be capable of being loosed. One cannot really explain why the whole process of sacramental remission of sins as such took the particular form it actually did take in the early Church, if one does not realize that the early Church clearly and consciously recognized an ecclesiological aspect in this sacramental process as such. We mean by this that she saw sin as an offence against the Church and looked on forgiveness also as a remission of the guilt of such an offence against the Church, as a reconciliation with the Church. And so, in accordance with the Scriptures, she regarded this very reconciliation with [49] Cf. 2 Cor 2. 5-11: the sinner is once more granted access to the agape of the Church in due form (cf. Kittel, Theol. Wörterbuch III, pp. 1098 sq.).

---

[50] Cf. e.g. Anciaux, loc. cit., pp. 277, 290, 320, 321, 344, 350, 453, 496, 499, 503, 504, 516. A. Landgraf, 'Sünde und Trennung von der Kirche in der Frühscholastik', Scholastik V (1930), pp. 210-247. Cf. also V. Heynck, loc. cit., pp. 14, 17, 34^{93}, 40, 45 (Lombard), 52^{160} (Hugh Ripelin of Strasbourg).

[51] Anciaux, p. 170^{1}.

[52] Richard of St Victor (PL 196, 1172).

[53] When St Thomas says about venial sin (in opposition to mortal sin) that 'nec indiget reconciliatione ad Ecclesiam' (IV Sent. dist. 17, q.3, a.3, sol.3), the stress is on the indiget; it does not, therefore, need to be denied that when venial sins are confessed, the absolution has, as in the case of mortal sins (even according to St. Thomas), the character of an (analogous) reconciliation with the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the Church as the means to reconciliation with God. We must – one could say in the spirit of Cyprian – be reconciled again with our Mother the Church in order to be in a position to have God for our Father once more. Even though, given the present-day external structure of the sacrament of Penance, this aspect has receded more into the background in the case of a 'Confession of devotion', it is nevertheless still there even today. This needs no further proof after what has been said above about mortal sin considered as an exclusion from the Eucharist and even venial sin as an offence against the Church, and about Confession and its acceptance considered as the distance of the sinner from the Church becoming officially and publicly visible. But these truths should become less 'forgotten' truths.

The following would be a brief exposition in scholastic concepts of what has been said: The state of being reconciled again with the Church is the 'res et sacramentum' of the sacrament of Penance. As is well known, we make a distinction with regard to the sacraments between the sacramental sign (sacramentum), the effect of grace which is the ultimate object of the sign-causality of the sacrament (res [171] sacramenti) and an intermediary reality between these two which has both the character of the sign with reference to the 'res sacramenti' and also the character of the effect in relation to the sacramental sign, and is, therefore, called the 'res et sacramentum'. A more precise analysis of those sacraments in which such an intermediate factor between sign and effect is most clearly perceptible, shows that this factor always has an ecclesiological character. Thus: the character of baptism which means that a person is permanently directed to the Church as her member, the character of Holy Orders which is the appointed mandate of one's station in the Church-and the deeper incorporation into the Mystical Body of Christ through communal reception of his Body in the Eucharist.

Now in the High Middle Ages, the 'internal disposition of penance' was designated the 'res et sacramentum' of the sacrament of Penance in so far as it is the effect and not merely the presupposition of the sacrament; in modern theology, thinking in terms of purely formal, legal niceties, it is 'the right to the grace of the sacrament' which is held to be the 'res et sacramentum' of this sacrament. For reasons which we cannot explain just now, these explanations do not satisfy. If one does not wish to abandon altogether (as is in part the case today) any attempt to find such an intermediate reality between sign and effect in this sacrament, the most meaningful answer, historically and objectively, is that in the sacrament of Penance the forgivingness of the Church towards the sinner is the 'res et sacramentum'. This no more endangers the character of the opus operatum in the sacrament of Penance than is the case in the sacrament of baptism. In the latter case this intermediate reality is made to consist in the character of baptism considered as the first incorporation into the Church; the intermediate reality in this case is regarded as that real right which gives the recipient a claim to the actual reception of the grace of justification in baptism, as long as there is no obstacle placed in its way by the unbelief or the impenitence of the recipient of baptism. In so far as man, therefore, through the process of reconciliation with the Church (sacramentum: loosing on earth), enters once more into the state of being fully reconciled with the Church (res et sacramentum: pax et communio cum Ecclesia), he necessarily receives a (new or more profound) share in her Spirit which forgives guilt and justifies before God (res sacramenti: peace with God). This intermediate reality does not always require to be stressed in baptism (and is not, in fact, stressed [172] in the formula of baptism, and very rarely and slightly in the old Tradition [54]). Instead, the proceedings of baptism are directly connected in the explicit formulation with the final effect of baptism (baptism for forgiveness of sin, for the gift of the Holy Spirit), although there certainly is a character of baptism which constitutes that intermediate reality. Similarly, this intermediate reality does not always require to be stressed [54] Much less than in the case of the sacrament of Penance, since reflection on the baptismal character, considered as the sign of belonging to the flock of Christ, only began with St Augustine.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation in the case of the sacrament of Penance (neither in the words of its form nor throughout its theological description), and yet it must not be denied objectively. The basic conception of the nature of the Church points in the same direction, when it is again emphasized more strongly today that the Church is the 'Proto-sacrament'. In fact, this old doctrine about the pax cum Ecclesia as 'res et sacramentum', which is old in substance if not in its explicit formulation, gains more and more adherents in modern times.[55] It does not really matter so very much in the end about the formulation; what matters is the very essence of the facts. And these facts, it seems to us, are at any rate given in the forgotten truth: 'non . . . adhuc Ecclesiae reconciliatus est . . . nisi prius sacerdote absolvatur' (unless the priest absolves him first, he is not yet reconciled with the Church), as St Thomas puts it.

If we stop there, this does not mean that we have even touched on all the 'forgotten' truths in the theology of the sacrament of Penance. There still remains a lot to be said. We will end by simply mentioning a few things at random.

Theologians speak about the penance imposed by the Church in the sacrament (i.e. the satisfaction) as belonging to the sacramental sign itself (even though not as an essentially necessary part, yet as an integral part), and thus as participating ex opere operato in the sacramental causality. Do we have too poor an opinion of ourselves and of other Christians if we maintain that such a doctrine is to be found only in books, but is not 'realized' in our religious life? I am afraid [173] that this question cannot be answered in the affirmative. One 'says one's penance' simply because this is part of the proceedings. Moreover, the penance is usually too insignificant to make us really and strongly conscious of the fact that we are doing penance. How could it then be recognized that the sacred Liturgy of the sacrament of Penance is not yet completed when we leave the Confessional? But this is after all what is meant when it is said that the sacramental satisfaction belongs still to the sacramental sign and indeed fuses, without ceasing itself to be sacramental, with the whole of one's life in so far as this is penance. For the penitent who has been absolved is told at the end that all his actions and sufferings are to avail him unto the forgiveness of sin.[56]

The fact that the sacrament of Penance is based on the baptized condition of the Christian, i.e. on his baptismal character, could be brought more explicitly into consciousness. Not merely in the formal juridical sense that only a baptized person can receive other sacraments. Rather, the baptized person activates, develops and carries through afresh in his life the conversion which was begun in baptism; he acts in the sacrament of Penance as a member of the Church, which he is by baptism; his sin has a peculiarity about it which does not belong to the sins committed by 'those who are outside'; he has a judgement passed on him which can be passed only on members of the Church (1 Cor 5.12 sq.). The negotiation of redemptive grace which takes place in the sacrament of Penance is a release of the (formal)

[55] Cf. B. Xiberta, Clavis Ecclesiae (Rome 1922); B. Poschmann, 'Die innere Struktur des Busssakraments', Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift I (1950), pp. 12-30; H. de Lubac, Catholicism (London 1958), pp. 37 sq.; M. de la Taille, Mysterium Fidei (Paris 1931), p. 581; M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV, I[4/5] (Munich 1951), pp. 527 sqq. (cf. also the article by M. Schmaus cited in note 1 on p. 135 above).

[56] A good number of theologians are indeed of the opinion that the prayerful wish expressed by the 'Passio Domini . . .' is intended to urge the penitent to regard his whole life, in all its hardness, as a continuation and expansion of the penance imposed. This is the reason why according to this opinion the confessor (in the expectation that this stimulus will be followed up) gives only a mild penance, and why the 'penance of one's life' receives by this mutual intention also a sacramental efficacy of satisfaction. Cf. St Thomas, Quodlibet III, a. 28 (cf. also III, q. 84, a. 8 and a. 9); Pesch, loc. cit., no. 253; P. Galtier, Dc Paenitentia (Rome 1950), no. 511. This, at any rate, is – even from a historical point of view – the meaning and intention of this concluding wish, which is found in the penitential liturgy at least in spirit since the thirteenth century (in the Poenitentiale Vallicellanum II in F. G. H. Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche [Halle 1851], pp. 550-557) and which later on appears more and more often in that same liturgy (cf. Jungmann, Bussriten, pp. 199, 237, 262). It can also be concluded from St Thomas' Quodlibet III, a. 28 that this terminating formula was still quite new in his day and not quite universally used as yet.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation efficacy [174] of the baptismal character,[57] as was already seen clearly by St Augustine.[58]

We should above all consider and apply to the sacrament of Penance what St Thomas-in full accord with the old Tradition-says about the sacraments in general: viz. that they refer back in their signs to the mysteries of the life and death of Christ and point ahead to the end of the whole history of salvation. For it is true that there occurs in this sacrament, taken as a visible ritual mysterium, a dying to sin first of all in the mortification of the flesh, and hence (because happening by Christ's grace) a sacramental manifestation of the death of Christ, a submission of oneself to the judgement of God which on the Cross condemned sin in the flesh of the Son (Rom. 8.3). And this judgement points in advance to the judgement at the end of life and of time in which grace will triumph.[59]

[57] Cf. pp. 21-25 of the article by B. Poschmann cited in note 55 on p. 172 above; M. Scheeben, The Mysteries of Christianity (St Louis and London 1947), pp. 576 sqq.; H. Oswald, Die dogmatische Lehre von den Sakramenten II[5] (Münster 1894), pp. II sqq., 310 sqq.
[58] Texts in Poschmann, loc. cit., p. 24.
[59] III q. 6o, a. 3. See the profound commentary on this by H. Schillebeeckx, loc. cit., pp. 143-183.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[175]

5

REMARKS ON THE THEOLOGY OF INDULGENCES

We may sometimes get the impression nowadays that there are truths in the Church which, although they are not indeed disputed in their explicit ('in thesi') formulation, are being silenced to death by the fact that no one takes any notice of them any longer in the practice of their religious life.[1] They are to be found in the Catechism, but they are not inscribed 'in our hearts on tables of flesh'. Of course, we know that such a process, which threatens to kill some particular truth in the Church, cannot lead to the real death of this truth – at least not in the case of those truths which really belong to the deposit of Faith. But this does not dispense theology from reflecting on the reasons for any such 'shrinking' processes which it observes. These reasons are not always and exclusively to be found necessarily in the spirit of the age, bad faith, or heretical hardening of the heart against a truth of the Church. The reason may also lie in the fact that a changed age really finds it difficult to understand these truths 'in the form' in which they had been expressed up to this time. Theology is not trying very hard to make them understandable. And so the poor Christian, who is not a theologian and therefore cannot resist this process himself, often cannot do very much else but let such an uncomprehended truth rest in the files of the fides implicita where it lies buried. He has the feeling that no doubt there is a truth here and that there is no doubt something in it, but that he himself cannot 'do anything with it'; and so he feels he just has to let the matter rest there, especially since there are after all enough other things and truths in Christianity which are for the moment more 'real' to him. It is not, of course, as if such (uncomprehended) truths [176] are in danger of disappearing all at once and everywhere, and for everyone simultaneously. After all, contemporaries live only apparently in the same age, and a truth can still be very much alive and be put into practice in certain quarters when elsewhere it gives the impression of being almost dead; it can be coming to life again somewhere, while elsewhere people have not even noticed yet how dead it has been in their hearts. Regarding such truths, the following should also be taken into account: they often cannot in any way be enjoined as a necessary part of men's lives – not even in the case of a member of the Church and not even by the threat of an anathema on such a member. How could anything like this be done with reference to the certain doctrine of the profit and blessing of the Confession of devotion or of the private devotion to Our Lady or of the private Sacred Heart devotions? The Church can proclaim the truth of the profit to be gained by such things; she can hope that this proclamation will move her hearers to action, but she cannot enforce the 'realization' of such truths as it were by strictly binding regulations. And no doubt it is not absolutely certain that the assistance of the Holy Spirit, which is assured to the Church, always guarantees in the respectively desired measure that such exhortations to the realization of such truths will bear much fruit. In such cases, too, it will, therefore, sometimes be useful to reflect on the reason why so little success is granted to such efforts not merely to state certain truths in the children's catechism class or in a sermon (so that it has been said and the preacher can then speak of something else with a clear conscience), but also to make them really enter into the life of the Christian: whether it is not because the proclamation itself has not quite understood the truth in question in such a way that it can be easily 'assimilated' and 'realized'.

Is not, for instance, Christ's descent into 'hell' such a truth? Who has ever heard a sermon

[1] Cf. for this also K. Rahner, 'Der Gestaltwandel der Haeresie', Wort und Wahrheit IV (1949), pp. 881-891. Included also in K. Rahner, Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln 1953[2]), pp. 63-80.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

on this since the time he heard it stated during the children's catechesis? Is this not strange in the case of one of the articles of the Apostles' Creed? It has recently been said that the doctrine of hell is beginning to be a truth which no longer has any existential meaning for Christians – even though they still hold it in a theoretical way. Is that not also true of indulgences and the doctrine of indulgences? There are indeed many indulgences actually in existence and it is not very long since the latest edition of the list of indulgences was published. In every treatment of dogmatic theology, and even in Canon Law, can be found what is necessary to know about [177] all this. But it is surely no false suspicion and no pessimism in the pedagogical and pastoral religious field to advance the conjecture that – at least in Central Europe – the interest expressed by the average Christian in indulgences and in gaining them has very much decreased compared with earlier, i.e. pre-reformation and post-tridentine, times. People still like to make pilgrimages to Rome or other sacred places during the Holy Year or on other similar occasions, and even for religious motives – and they do, perhaps, in the process gain also the corresponding indulgences – because this is simply part of these exercises. But it will be difficult to maintain nowadays that the promised plenary indulgence is the decisive motive for these pilgrimages of the Christian masses, and that the indulgence once gained is for them the most precious effect they carry home with them. Indeed, how could anyone think in this way when an indulgence, even a plenary one, can be gained 'more cheaply' and at any time by saying a little prayer after Holy Communion, for instance. It cannot, after all, be said that the plenary indulgence of a pilgrimage (in its present-day form!) is more certain than some other indulgence. Contrition for sin is equally difficult in both cases. And the prescribed works for the indulgence, the conditions on which it is granted, are, according to the common teaching of theologians, merely an 'extrinsic condition' laid down on the part of the Church and by her authority alone for the granting of an indulgence. Whether this condition be great or small, difficult or easy, does not alter anything as regards the certainty and amount of the indulgence gained. Why should one, therefore, gain it precisely by a pilgrimage to Rome? There are many good reasons for making such a pilgrimage. However, that the indulgence is one of them, is not so easily seen. Whatever may be the truth of all these considerations, it is perhaps possible already to see that the interest in indulgences, and in gaining them, has undoubtedly decreased. And perhaps some of the blame for this must be attributed to the obscurities in the doctrine of indulgences which were less noticeable to earlier ages, but which today – even if we do not reflect on this at all – act as psychological repressions for the religious realization of an indulgence. It is, however, not completely superfluous – even looking at this from a religious and not merely scientific point of view – to strive for the greater clarification of the theology of indulgences. We 'nay regret the falling-off of interest in indulgences or we may be inclined to accept it as a possible and, in itself, harmless change in the [178] history of piety (because not only are there such changes, but they are quite legitimate). But only a clear and deepened theology of indulgences will enable us to understand whether there is something to be regretted in this state of affairs or merely something to be observed and, if the former, how we can make indulgences become something vital again for men today. The latter undertaking will not be very easy. How are we to get to grips with a Christian who declares that he accepts the teaching of the Council of Trent that the Church has this power to grant indulgences and that to gain them is useful and salutary (Denz 989), but for the rest declares himself not to be very interested in them in his own religious practice? For he himself, he says, has the impression that his religious life in the present day and age, and in the unavoidable narrowness of his consciousness, has more important things to think about and to live for. This is so also because he has moreover the faint feeling – without being able or willing to state so clearly – that the complete wiping out of his sins with all their consequences can, in fact, be achieved more surely and honestly in other ways.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

We must, at any rate, welcome gratefully every attempt at gaining a better theological understanding of the nature and mode of operation of indulgences, especially any attempt which will do this in such a way that the man of today can more easily overcome the undeniable repressions he has developed with regard to this matter. For it is not immediately certain that the repressions are due merely to the nature of this matter.

A great deal of work would have to be done in this connection in the history of dogma and in dogmatic theology. In the field of the history of Dogma we do indeed possess the great and scholarly work of N. Paulus. But no matter how great the industry shown and how important the material results achieved in this work, it has nevertheless been written in the spirit and mentality of an age which wrote history in order to understand how it had evolved and not in order to understand what would still develop in the future. Applying this to theology, this means that the theological position which is the goal and norm of historical research, forms in the case of works of history of theology of this kind the reassured theological knowledge of the present which itself is not questioned and is regarded as complete and properly terminated without any inner dynamic. History, in such a perspective, naturally teaches also only what has been transmitted to us as theological [179] inheritance from the most recent past. And at the end of all this historical work, which has often been carried out with admirable industry and acumen, we know more about the history of the question, but not really more about the question itself. Because these historians had basically no new questions to pose, history also does not volunteer any new answers about such matters. Hence, even after having studied the weighty volumes of Paulus, we know no more about the nature of indulgences than what we could have gathered even before that from an ordinary textbook. And so it is also not in the least surprising that these manuals themselves simply refer to such historical works in a single line of the bibliography given in small print, and that otherwise everything remains as it was before.

And yet so much remains still to be done on this question. So much remains to be done in a theological way and not primarily in the manner of the history of dogmas. Or to be more precise, it must be done in the historical field of Dogma but by a dogmatic theologian who has the courage to pose questions and who does, in fact, pose them, quite unconcerned about whether he is also immediately capable of answering them adequately. A beginning to this work has undoubtedly been made by the not very bulky but important work[2] on which we wish to make a few comments in this chapter. If in this way our own contribution to the understanding of the doctrine of indulgences is only very small, this should be taken as an indication of the fact that we think this work should go on and must not come to a standstill simply because this subject is rather tricky and dogmatic theologians, too, do not like to skate on thin ice.

B. Poschmann, the well-known researcher into the ancient and early medieval history of penance, investigates in this work[3] the nature of [180] indulgences in the light of the history

[2] Bernhard Poschmann, Der Ablass im Licht der Bussgeschichte (Theophaneia IV; Bonn 1948, Hanstein). For the history of this question cf. also Paul F. Palmer, Sources of Christian Theology II: 'Sacraments and Forgiveness' (London 1960), pp. 321-368; 398-401. – Tr.

[3] The book has unfortunately, as far as I know, not met with the interest it deserved. So far Poschmann's theses on this question have not yet been very closely investigated. Karl Adam has given his assent to them (at least this is the impression one gets): TQ CXXIX (1949), pp. 242-245. H. Weisweiler declines, politely and gently, to accept them: Scholastik XX – XXIV (1949), pp. 591-594. The position he adopts shows indeed (even though we do not consider it as the correct position as far as its ultimate verdict is concerned) that – as we, too, shall emphasize – the question which Poschmann poses himself can surely not be answered conclusively from history alone. P. Galtier seems in the last analysis to agree with Poschmann (although he bases himself on somewhat different reasons), at least in what concerns the factual uncertainty of the effect of the indulgence grant on the individual. Cf. his discussion of Poschmann's work: 'Les indulgences origine et nature', Gregorianum XXXI (1950), pp. 258-274. Galtier does not at any rate, raise any conclusive objections against Poschmann from the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

of penance. His intention, therefore, is not in the last analysis a purely historico-dogmatic one, but a dogmatic one. He wishes to show, on the one hand, how the doctrine of indulgences evolves naturally out of the development of the Church's penitential practice, and, on the other hand, he wishes to clarify in this way the nature of indulgences by going beyond the position commonly adopted in theology today – an endeavour which in fact is seldom pursued and achieved in the field of the history of Catholic dogmas. In this endeavour, he traces the development of the practice and doctrine of indulgences up to the High Middle Ages – that is to say, until the last significant change in the theory of indulgences up till now. As P. himself says (in the Preface), he takes the materials for his historical expositions in this book from his own researches into the history of penance, from J. A. Jungmann's treatise on the Latin penitential rites and above all from Nikolaus Paulus' great work on indulgences and their history. Even as a mere summary of these researches, P.'s new work deserves our gratitude. But even in its historical aspect, this work is more than just a precise and concise summary of the conclusions of those other works. For he makes certain small critical corrections even in the work of N. Paulus (cf. e.g. p. 58, note 287; p. 85, note 401). The accent, too, even in the dogmatic point of view, is shifted quite significantly, in the sense that the meaning of the early medieval 'Absolutions' (both outside and in the sacrament of Penance), as seen in their significance for the development and the nature of indulgences, is brought out much more than had been the case in Paulus' work – in spite of the abundance of his material on this question.

It is not possible here to recapitulate P.'s survey of the origin and development of indulgences which is in itself already very concise. We [181] wish simply to give a few brief indications which are necessary for the understanding of the dogmatic conclusions of this book. P. first of all exposes those elements of the early Church's teaching on penance which are important for indulgences later on (pp. 1-14): the necessity of subjective penance for post-baptismal sins as a cleansing factor in respect of sin, without distinguishing in this between guilt and punishment; the support given to this subjective penance by the cooperation of the Church (congregation, martyrs, 'pneumatics', etc.) and above all by the intercessory prayer of the priest which is to be distinguished from the act proper of reconciliation (with the Church and thereby also with God) and which must not be conceived as absolution (in the modern sense) in a deprecative form (p. 11). P. then (pp. 15-36) treats in detail of the nature, forms and modes of operation of the early medieval 'absolutions' outside (this is the earlier element, beginning already with St Gregory the Great) and within (from the tenth century onwards) the sacraments of Penance. These 'absolutions' are (at first independently from the imposition of an ecclesiastical penance) the genuine continuation of the priestly intercessory prayer for the penitent; and, in spite of the continually recurring appeal in this to an apostolic authority and the power of the keys, these 'absolutions' must be conceived as an intercessory (though authoritative) prayer of the Church for full forgiveness (hence embracing also the punishment for sin) of the penitent's sins – and not as a jurisdictional and hence infallible act of absolution from the temporal punishment due to sin. This follows from the fact of their taking place (even earlier) outside the sacrament (especially also in the case of 'general absolutions'), from their style and their restrictive clauses, and from the early scholastic theories about the nature and extent of the priestly activity in the sacrament of Penance. P. then (pp. 36-43) describes the historical and theoretical presuppositions in penitential matters which lead to the origin of indulgences: the change of the penitential institution from public to private penance and the placing of the reconciliation before the fulfilment of the point of view of any binding doctrine of the Church. That is already a great deal. Especially since Galtier has frequently and resolutely contradicted the conceptions of Poschmann elsewhere in questions of the history of penance.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ecclesiastical penance leads to the reflex differentiation between the guilt of sin and the punishment due to sin; thus subjective penance is now related more clearly to the payment of the debt of temporal punishment for sins, and the 'absolutions' are now appraised as helps of the Church for the payment of these same punishments, without there being as yet any question of a relaxation in the imposition of ecclesiastical penances as well. Then there follows [182] (pp. 43-62) an analysis of the first indulgences in the proper sense. They appear in the eleventh century in France, whereas the remissions of penances, granted to pilgrims to Rome since the ninth century, must (contrary to N. Paulus' view) be held to be still graciously-granted redemptions. The essence of the new indulgences consists in the fact that, on account of the hoped-for effect before God of the intercessory absolutions on the payment of temporal punishment due to sin, the penitent is made a gift also of part of the ecclesiastical penance imposed. Thus, in these indulgences in the proper sense, a jurisdictional element is now added to the previous 'absolution', in so far as the 'absolution' now regards also the ecclesiastical penance imposed and naturally has a legal character relative to this imposition. Side by side with these indulgences in the proper sense, simple 'absolutions' in the old sense continue to exist for a long time. The beginnings of indulgences, therefore, are found in a practice which develops without being conscious of being something new. The Church had all along claimed the right to accommodate the amount of ecclesiastical penance imposed to the concrete circumstances and capabilities of the penitent. This was already the case in the first centuries, and in the early Middle Ages this practice was merely extended by various commutations and redemptions. The Church claimed this right although the sinner himself had to pay the temporal punishment due to his sins before God, even although with assistance from the Church and her authoritative intercession. And so such an 'absolution' could be granted the penitent to help him with his own penitential efforts, in view of some good work which made him particularly worthy of this 'absolution'. It was then possible to remit a part of his ecclesiastical penance, because the ultimate purpose of the latter was thought to be achieved by the 'absolving' intercession of the Church. There follows then (pp. 63-99) an account of the judgement and theory of this practice of indulgences by the theologians of the early and High Middle Ages. Abelard completely rejects the then still new practice of indulgences (this is the first known declaration of theological attitude; Peter of Poitiers takes up essentially the same position, although in somewhat more moderate terms). Abelard was censured because he denied not merely that bishops were able to grant a judicial release from temporal punishment for sin before God, but also that they have the power of the keys in general (except in regard to ecclesiastical penances). From the end of the twelfth century onwards, the practice of indulgences [183] becomes gradually clarified and recognized in theology, but only after many vacillations and obscurities; for this the practice itself is used at first as the main argument for its justification, and its objective justification is found in the communio suffragiorum. With Huguccio (†1210), the notion of indulgences appears fairly clearly for the first time as a jurisdictional release from temporal punishment before God. But it still remains obscure for a long time why the suffragia of the Church are a sufficient substitute for the non-occurrence of the heavenly effect of the remitted ecclesiastical penance. And it is not clear for some time yet what is the role of the good work required for the gaining of the indulgence with regard to the effect: whether it is to be regarded as a redemption or merely as a condition for an effect which as such originates exclusively from the power of the keys. However, before the actual high scholastic period, it seems to have been the more general opinion that an indulgence does not have its transcendent effect on account of a direct power of absolution on the part of the Church, but only per modum suffragii (pp. 81 sq.). Through the explicitly developed doctrine of the 'Treasury of the Church' (already to be found in Hugh of St Cher, 1230), a new phase begins in the development of the doctrine of indulgences. It was possible to point out more clearly now the

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

factor in which the remitted penance finds its substitute. And when it was then added that the Church has a legal claim to this 'Treasury of the Church', and one which can be applied in a jurisdictional manner, all the previous difficulties seemed to be solved. It was now possible to develop the doctrine of indulgences which is still familiar to us today: the remission of temporal punishment due to sin (for which, until this time, the Church had simply interceded, with the result that the ecclesiastical penance imposed was remitted) could now be seen as taking place by means of a jurisdictional act which disposes of this Treasury of the Church authoritatively (as does the owner with regard to his property) and hence with infallible effect (St Albert, St Bonaventure, St Thomas). Once this stage was reached, the reference of indulgences to the remission of an ecclesiastical penance imposed could become increasingly loose, until at least some theologians (like Billot) exclude this reference completely from the nature of indulgences. For the same reasons, the granting of indulgences (beginning with St Thomas) came to be more and more independent of the sacrament of Penance. It came to be something reserved to the Pope, because only the Pope (or someone else dependently on him) can [184] dispose of the Treasury of the Church in a legal manner: whereas before – since it had been essentially a question also (but not merely!) of the remission of an ecclesiastical penance – all those who imposed such penances (confessors or at least bishops) could grant indulgences by their own power. On the other hand, if the Church can dispose of the Treasury of the Church in a legal manner, it becomes again more difficult to solve the question why, and to what extent, a good work is required as a necessary condition for an indulgence – for basically this can be understood only in relation to the more primitive commutations and redemptions of penances, and not in the new theory.

As already stated, these merely suggestive and fragmentary references to the outline of this history of the practice and theory penance as given by P. are meant merely as a preparation for the understanding of the question which really matters to P. (pp. 99-122) and to us, viz. how are we to conceive the nature of indulgences theologically in the light of this history of indulgences? And this is what is really new in P.'s treatment. What conclusions does he come to concerning the nature of indulgences?

The Church has always known that in the Communion of Saints, in the Body of Christ, the individual Christian is assisted in getting rid of his sins by the whole Church on earth and in heaven, and she has translated this knowledge into action in many different ways. In the case of indulgences, what was new at first was the fact that the knowledge about the 'Treasury of the Church', when carried into intercessory action, gave rise to the conclusion that the sinner could be granted remission also of a part of the ecclesiastical penance by jurisdictional act. Thus an indulgence has an effect in heaven and an effect on earth. Everything is clear and comprehensible up to this point, and P. believes that even the pronouncements of the Church magisterium about indulgences do not contain anything more as of obligation. The theological interpretation of the doctrine of indulgences, however, goes beyond the bounds of what is true and what can be proved, when it now adds to this the notion that in the case of indulgences the jurisdictional act as such refers not only to the Church-imposed penance as such but also directly to the very punishment for sin in the next world. This means that in this interpretation a 'plenary' indulgence, for instance, results (simply on condition of repentance for the sins concerned) in the full remission of all temporal punishment due to these sins, and does so with the certitude due to the effect of a [185] jurisdictional act (as in the sacrament of Penance with regard to guilt). That this goes beyond what is true and what can be proved to be true, is clear on several grounds. Thus, indulgences (in so far as they refer to the arrest of punishment before God) grew out of the old 'absolutions'. The latter, however, were explicitly not intended to be an infallible means of a judicial remission of punishment, but were explicitly intended as an intercessory aid to the penance of the sinner, even though we may attribute a particularly powerful effect to this intercession, on account of the authority of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the intercessor. The appeal to Mt 16 and 18, and to Jn 20, is not telling, because it proves too much (p. 101). For it would then be immediately and unconditionally possible to loose also from temporal punishment due to sin in the sacrament of Penance. And why go to the bother of proving the power to grant indulgences by reference to the Treasury of the Church, when the Church has from the very start been given a legal power over temporal punishment due to sin as well as over guilt itself? Guilt can be remitted by the Church for the simple reason that she has been given the power to do this by Christ (and this precisely in Mt 16, etc.), without having to look for any further explanation for this. In the usual theory of indulgences, the true doctrine of the 'Treasury of the Church' has been turned overmuch into the notion of a sort of 'exchequer', and has been given a legal connotation such as is possible only in the case of material goods (nihil aliud – says Billot, for instance, about indulgences – quam solutio ex publico aerario pro debitis privatorum). But once we see clearly that the reality of the Treasury of the Church simply means that God can gratuitously and freely grant a remission of temporal punishment in view of the Sacrifice of Christ, and the sanctity of the Saints supported by that Sacrifice, then the Church's right to dispose of this 'treasury' depends entirely on the free will of God, and the fact, as well as the manner, of such a disposal must be completely derived from the positive dispositions made by God. There is no proof of the fact that God has granted the Church a legal power of disposal with regard to the temporal punishment due to sin, and the assertion of such a concession meets with quite a few difficulties even apart from this. The Church certainly has, however, a moral right to this 'Treasury', i.e. the Church, in her intercessory action for sinners before God, calls upon the merits of Christ and of his Saints, whose ready support she may presuppose as the fruit of her prayers. For God, in and despite the freedom of his dispensation of [186] grace, is undoubtedly especially ready to listen to the Church as a body and to her authorized prayer.

From all this follows naturally the understanding of P.'s determination of the nature of indulgences. An indulgence is a combination of the old 'absolutions' from temporal punishment – which are effective as a prayer of the Church – and of a jurisdictional remission of ecclesiastical penances. Even in the case of a plenary indulgence, the Church aims merely at a relaxation of all temporal punishment; she cannot guarantee with absolute certitude that God will completely remit these, punishments. In this conception of indulgences many other phenomena of the practice of indulgences also explain themselves better: the fact that indulgences still continue to be determined quantitatively by the old rates of penance; the necessity of a causa proportionata for the, granting of an indulgence, and of a good work for the gaining of it, by which the recipient of the indulgence also disposes himself in a special way for a favourable response to the special intercession made by the Church; the factual uncertainty of the success of an indulgence on which the Church herself counts, etc.

What is to be said about this Theology of Indulgences? First of all, it should not be overlooked from the very beginning in the further discussion of this thesis propounded by P. that this thesis is not so different in its objective, ultimate conclusion from the traditional theory of indulgences as might seem at first sight. For, a thoughtful theology which really and truly reckons with the seriousness of the consequences of sin and knows something about the non-transferable character of a personal deed in spite of the whole reality of the community of guilt and its consequences, will not at all doubt that, in fact, the 'gained' indulgences do not have exactly the effect which is ascribed to them in se. Thus far, therefore, P.'s thesis in itself simply transfers the always-given element of factual uncertainty to a somewhat different point than is the case in the usual theory. For the rest, however, we seriously mean to defend the view here that P.'s thesis is right, although one part of the proof which P. gives does not seem to be absolutely watertight, and another part of the proof would seem to be open to still further development and deeper study. It should be mentioned that the whole of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this defence is, of course, subject to the results of further theological discussion and to further precisions of the thesis, as well as to the obvious right of the Church's magisterium.

P.'s main argument is in fact the one based on the history of [187] indulgences: indulgences grew out of the old 'absolutions', the only really new element being the remission of a penance imposed by the Church. But, although the 'absolution' undoubtedly had an effect on the punishment in the life to come, it did not, however, have a judicial but an intercessory character in its regard. Ergo . . . Now, the historical connection between 'absolution' and 'indulgence' has certainly been correctly perceived and worked out. And we shall have to agree with P., that this 'absolution' is the continuation, with an intercessory character, of the penitential intercessions made by the priest in the early Church, which intercessions may not be simply and formally identified with the reconciliation proper. And it is right that the 'absolutions' within and without the sacrament were regarded as such a continuation at the time of their growth and flowering. But will not the dogmatic theologian who wishes to hold on to the current common theory of indulgences, object to the above that this historical connection (in a less empirical conception of the development of dogmas) does not exclude the possibility that the Church came to see only slowly in the course of all this, that her authoritative prayer has the efficaciousness of a jurisdictional enactment[4]? And this all the more so since the authoritative character of this prayer had always been very clearly in the forefront of consciousness, as P.'s description itself shows. And a 'prayer' of an authoritative kind need not necessarily lack the efficacy of an opus operatum (remember the 'prayer' of the anointing of the sick). Such a dogmatic theologian could reverse P.'s appeal to the fact that the 'absolutions' before the time of indulgences could not have been more than intercessory prayers because the early medieval theories about the efficacy of the sacrament of Penance for the cleansing from guilt hardly ascribe any more to the 'keys'. He could say that this proves precisely that, both in the first and in the second case, the clear theoretical recognition of an ex opere operato efficacy had first to break through, and that this clarification is equally compelling in both cases. He will, in other words, point to the fact that the same development took place also in the case of the deprecative form of absolution from the guilt of sin itself. He will point out that, with regard to its transcendent and certain effect, the jurisdictional character of the deprecative formula employed in the sacrament [188] of Penance was also recognized only slowly, and yet that the early obscurities must not be used against the later clarified teaching. P. does indeed give pointers to suggest that this parallel must itself be interpreted differently (p. 11). But this retort depends in its turn on the whole of his interpretation of penance in the early Church (pax cum Ecclesia as the res et sacramentum of the forgiveness of guilt before God, so that the intercessory formula does not at all formally represent the act of reconciliation as such[5]). The present author does indeed

[4] The remarks of Weisweiler, for instance, run along the same lines as this objection.

[5] We might get the impression from this work (cf. e.g. p. 20) that P. regards this doctrine of the early Church, concerning the *pax cum Ecclesi*a as res et sacramentum of the reconciliation with God in the sacrament of Penance, simply as a theorem of an earlier theology which has now been left behind. This impression is not correct. P. is, on the contrary, convinced of the fact that this doctrine is still correct today and it is still important for a deeper understanding of the sacrament of Penance. Cf. for this, his article: 'Die innere Struktur des Busssakraments', Müncher Theologische Zeitschrift I (1950), pp. 12-30. This theory, which can also appeal to de la Taille, de Lubac and Xiberta for support among present-day theologians (and which also seems the correct one to ourselves, cf. the previous chapter in the present volume), is of great significance for the theory of indulgences. For it explains easily why the Church can indeed remit the guilt but not the punishment of sin by a juridical act, although a remission of guilt is in fact more difficult than a remission of punishment, and it would therefore appear that whoever is capable of the greater is capable also of doing the lesser. If the legal power of the Church employed in the sacrament of Penance consists precisely in the fact that man is thereby incorporated into the Church's inner means of grace and hence obtains the grace of God, which is the cleansing from sin, then it becomes immediately intelligible that the Church, by a legal act of reconciliation and reincorporation into the Church qua bearer of the Spirit of God, can forgive everything (and only that) which is inconsistent with this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

agree with this interpretation, but it is an interpretation which has not yet by any means won the day among dogmatic theologians as a whole. If we are in this sense not quite as convinced as P. of the full force of the historical argument for the essence of indulgences based on the nature of the early medieval 'absolution', this does not mean that we do not recognize the importance of this argument. For it [189] shows that the burden of proof for the usual theory of efficacy rests with those who advocate this theory, because they assert more than can be gathered immediately from the origins of indulgences. One may, however, get the impression that theologians have not lost a great deal of sleep over this proof. And even if we presuppose as self-evident that there is a dogmatic proof ex consensu theologorum, it is nevertheless doubtful whether such a proof can be gathered in this case from a relative unanimity of theologians regarding the jurisdictional nature of indulgences (qua forgiveness of temporal punishment due to sin). For closer scrutiny shows that this unanimity is not as great as it might seem at first sight.[6] The initial verbal unanimity soon turns into [190] an objective difference of opinion, once we demand more precise information regarding particular questions.

There is another argument for his thesis which seems more telling in P.'s work than the proof from the history of 'absolution' taken by itself. Only that argument seems a little bit too brief and too historical in P. For it is not, after all, merely the early Church's theory of penance (which seems to be somewhat too much in the foreground with P.) but also the dogmatically binding teaching of the Council of Trent (Denz 807; 904; 922), that the Church does not always and necessarily absolve from all temporal punishment due to sin in the sacrament of Penance. However, this proposition, which has the whole of the ancient teaching on penance behind it, makes sense only if it is not merely a fact that in practice the Church does not remit this punishment by her jurisdictional act exercised in the sacrament, reincorporation. Man can, however, be justified in the grace of God and yet, in the nature of things, be burdened with what we nowadays call the debt of punishment (in a somewhat colourless, formalistic and legal jargon). It follows, therefore, immediately from this that the legal power of the Church, when it forgives guilt by such an incorporation into, and reconciliation with, the Church, does not necessarily apply itself also to the punishment due to sin.

---

[6] One need only enter more closely into the question as to what sort of uncertainty is supposed by theologians as regards the effective gaining of indulgences, and how they explain this uncertainty, which after all is presupposed in the practice of the faithful. Galtier (loc. cit.) maintains that, even in the common opinion, indulgences do not imply a real absolution (with regard to sin's temporal punishment before God), but a 'solutio' granted by the Church, i.e. the Church places the 'Treasury of the Church' at the disposal of one of the faithful (in a juridical manner), so that he may then use it to pay his debt of punishment. Hence, he maintains, the extent to which God accepts this form of payment remains indeterminate (in spite of the juridical character of the 'solutio'). Now, this explanation does, perhaps, preserve the currently common interpretation of the doctrine of indulgences ('against' Poschmann) as far as terminology is concerned, but objectively it says exactly the same thing as Poschmann. Every theological theory about the nature of indulgences must be prepared to allow itself to be faced with the following question (to be answered clearly by a 'yes' or a 'no'): if a man is in the state of grace, has repented of his sins and has fulfilled the work prescribed by the indulgence grant (and is a homo viator), is it certain then, under these presuppositions, that in fact all his temporal punishment due to sin is remitted if a plenary indulgence was attached to his prescribed work? Is this objectively certain in this case, and is the doctrine stating that this is so objectively, a theologically certain and binding doctrine? Any theologian who cannot answer these two questions with an unhesitating 'yes', must let Poschmann's theory pass as at least theologically unobjectionable for the time being. Anyone, however, who dares to answer this question with an unconditional 'yes', must not only be prepared to allow himself to be asked as to what sufficient reason he can give for his 'yes'. He must also be prepared to face the following questions: Does his 'yes' fully satisfy the seriousness of the divine justice? Why then cannot practically everyone be preserved right away from Purgatory by a simple jurisdictional act of the Pope? Why do theologians, generally speaking, nevertheless demand a causa proportionata for the validity of the granting of an indulgence on the part of the Church? Why does the normal Christian, with the true instinct of the faith, nevertheless regard a plenary indulgence, gained by the performance of a very small good work prescribed, as more uncertain than another indulgence gained, for instance, by a fatiguing pilgrimage? etc.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

but also that she cannot remit it (with certainty based on this act as such). For, on the one hand, no more is demanded on the part of the penitent for such a remission according to the usual doctrine of indulgences) than for the remission of the guilt itself. And, on the other hand, the sacrament is simply orientated in every respect towards the cleansing from sin. And so it is impossible to see why the Church would not remit by her jurisdictional act in the sacrament what she could remit. If, however, the Church cannot do this with the efficacy of a jurisdictional act in the sacrament, then she cannot do it either outside the sacrament. Otherwise she would be able to do more outside the sacrament – at least in one respect – than in the sacrament, and indeed in respect of an object to which the sacrament is ordained. For in the last analysis the sacrament is also ordained to the blotting out of the temporal punishment due to sin, as is shown even by the imposition of a penance which is included in the opus operatum. It is necessary to state all this, and all the more so since theologians appeal to the same scriptural texts to prove the power to grant indulgences as they do when proving the power to forgive sins in the sacrament.[7] If this proof proved anything, [191] it would be that the full power of a jurisdictional (and as such certainly efficacious) freeing from temporal punishment due to sin is an intrinsic moment of the particular sacramental power which is given in these texts. It is, therefore, impossible to prove from these texts the jurisdictional nature of the power of granting indulgence and to deny at the same time that this power can be exercised in the sacrament of Penance qua sacrament (which is instituted or promised in these texts). If, however, this proof from Mt 16 and 18 is abandoned, then there is absolutely no scriptural proof left for a jurisdictional power of the Church with regard to temporal punishment due to sin. However, there is not only no proof for this, but also the very object of such a proof is immediately excluded by the teaching of the Church to the effect that she does not forgive temporal punishment in the sacrament ex opere operato simply as she pleases (and hence also cannot thus forgive it). For it is absolutely impossible to find any reason why the Church should not be able to do in the sacrament (which is there for the purpose of cleansing from the whole sin, including the debt of punishment) what (ex supposito) she is able to do outside the sacrament.

To put all this in a different way: if the reasons for the uncertainty of the success of an indulgence (which uncertainty is ultimately admitted by every theologian and good Christian) were to be found, as in the sacrament, merely on the side of the subjective disposition of the penitent, and were the same as in the case of the sacrament (as the usual indulgence-theory maintains), then the effective cause of this objectively infallible result would have to be, as in the case of the sacrament, a legal act, even if not already a formally sacramental act. For only such an act (we prescind from a physical act) can be infallible in its effect and yet be hindered from achieving this effect by merely subjective conditions in the line of the aim of the act. But then this legal act could be distinguished merely formally (or as a part of the whole) from the legal act exercised in the sacrament of Penance; it would, at any rate, no longer be possible to see why it could and should not be posited in any case also within the sacrament, especially since it is supposed to be included in the sacramental power given in Mt 16 and Jn 20. It would in this case be possible at the most to show that this act, in so far as it refers only to temporal punishment, may also be posited outside the sacrament, in accordance with the principle; qui potest plus, potest et minus. In order to avoid this whole conclusion, it would be necessary to adopt the despairing subterfuge of saying [192] that the Church can indeed exercise this legal power of forgiveness in the sacrament of Penance with regard to temporal punishment, since it is included in the sacrament, but that she does not do so on account of a self-imposed limitation of what is itself a greater power. To this it would then have to be

[7] Cf. e.g. Ch. Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae VII, no. 492; F. Diekamp, Katholische Dogmatik III[8], p. 315; J. Pohle-M. Gierens, Lehrbuch der Dogmatik III[8], p. 506; M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV, I[4], p. 541.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

replied that the Church cannot suppress in such an arbitrary manner the greater power given to her, ex supposito, by Christ. It is also impossible to give a really intelligible reason in the usual theory about indulgences for the fact that the Church requires a legitima causa for the granting of an indulgence over and above the need of the sinner for complete cleansing from his sin. For such a power of a legal kind (included in the sacramental power of Mt 16 and 18, from which it is after all derived) would be given precisely for the sake of that complete purgation of man. And so, no more than the power to forgive guilt as such could it be made dependent on any other conditions than the need of the sinner and his dispositions.

Let us elucidate these reflections further by a few observations taken from some of the most recent treatments in dogmatic theology[8] on the question of the sacrament of Penance and indulgences. Galtier refutes the theory which holds that by an indulgence the Church: simply 'makes a present of' the punishment due to sin by means of a simple remission on her part, by pointing out that indulgences would in this case be more efficacious in regard to temporal punishment due to sin than the sacrament of Penance. This theory attacked by him 'ascribit concessioni indulgentiae efficacitatem ex opere operato veriorem et maiorem, quam quae sacramentali absolutione agnoscitur'. For the sacrament does indeed also effect a (partial) remission of temporal punishment due to sin ex opere operato, but only in the measure of the subjective dispositions of the penitent. But under the presupposition opposed by him, the indulgence is effective ex opere operato (presupposing simply contrition), purely and simply in the measure of the: amount of indulgence determined by the one who grants the indulgence. In accordance with this view, the Pope could, by a mere act of his will, remove something which is binding (the debt of punishment), which he could not do as the minister of the sacrament and by virtue of the sacrament. This consideration put forward by Galtier is, in our opinion, conclusive. But this is precisely why we cannot understand how Galtier can nevertheless teach before this, that indulgences are [193] effective ex opere operato,[9] and indeed in such a way that their effect, in contrast to the sacrament of Penance, 'independens est a subjectiva dispositione et proportionatur tantum voluntati concedentis indulgentiam' (no. 610). This seems to us to be in utter contradiction to what Galtier says a few pages further on concerning the fight against the theory of indulgences for punishment due to sin per modum absolutionis. It cannot be said that this contradiction disappears by the fact that Galtier rejects the infallibility in the form of 'absolutio' and admits it in the form of 'solutio'. Given that the 'solutio' is really infallibly effective even in its end-effect, independently of the dispositions of the recipient, then Galtier's objection holds true also against the 'solutio': its effect is surer and greater than the effect of the sacrament. If, however, this 'solutio' is to be taken as meaning that the Church does indeed (in certain circumstances) place her 'Treasury' – in a jurisdictional act – completely at the disposal of the penitent by a plenary indulgence for the payment of the debt of temporal punishment due to sins but that it is an open question whether, and in what measure, God is prepared to accept this supplied payment in any particular case (that he has, therefore, not bound himself in this case – contrary to what is true of the sacrament, as far as the guilt of sin is concerned), and acts in this case (in what concerns the debt of punishment) exactly as he does in the sacrament: then this is saying the same thing, in a more complicated terminology, as what Poschmann holds. For with regard to [8] P. Galtier, De paenitentia, (new edition, Rome 1950), no. 613.

[9] Loc. cit., no. 609. It should be mentioned that this doctrine is proved merely by an appeal to the teaching of St Thomas (Suppl., q. 25, a. 2). The conceptual background of this proof, however, is the idea that the Treasury of the Church is inexhaustible, and that the Church can draw on it and apply it in an authoritative manner. If she can do this, it is indeed correct to say that in this case the effect of the indulgence is not dependent on the dispositions of the one gaining the indulgence, and hence that indulgences 'tantum valent quantum praedicantur' (St Thomas, loc. cit.). But how can we prove this presupposition if the Church does not only not acknowledge herself to have such a power even in the sacrament, but explicitly denies having it?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the end-effect, which consists in the effective payment of the debt of punishment, the jurisdictional process of placing the Treasury of the Church at the disposal of the faithful has exactly the same value as an intercessory prayer of the Church. Such a prayer is addressed to God in the form of an appeal to the merits of Christ and the Saints, i.e. the 'Treasury of the Church'. Galtier himself it should [194] be noted, remarks quite rightly about this 'Treasury' (no. 600), by appealing to Lehmkuhl, that it must not be imagined as something which is divided out quantitatively and bit by bit – and hence with the danger of being exhausted – but that it must be thought of rather as the undivided totality of the moral works of Christ and of all men who are in his grace, in view of which God grants grace and forgiveness to other men.

It may be maintained that this argument, which is merely hinted at by Poschmann, is more convincing and objectively more conclusive and that, considering that P.'s aim lies in the field of dogma rather than purely in the field of the history of dogmas, it should therefore have been developed further than the purely historical argument from 'absolution'. In the case of the latter argument we have constantly to ask ourselves whether it is not tacitly based on too positivistic and empirical a notion of the history of dogmas, i.e. on the conviction that the Church cannot even come gradually to the consciousness of a power of which she had not always been aware and which she had not always employed from the very beginning.

Naturally this main consideration, which we have even here merely indicated, should be deepened even further. It would be necessary above all to go into the question of how we can explain and make intelligible the fact (which at first sight seems a surprising one) that the Church can indeed wipe out the greater by a legal act, viz. the guilt before God, but not the smaller, viz. the debt of punishment. If we do not want to answer this question merely by appealing to a positive divine decree, made intelligible by means of such considerations as are contained in Denz 904, then we can only answer this question in a more profound manner if we enter more closely and comprehensively into the nature of the punishment due to sin than is usual in current theology. Current theology sees this punishment too exclusively as something which is extrinsically imposed on man by the justice of God, conceived merely as something vindictive. A practically necessary presupposition for a deeper study of this question would be to examine the doctrine of temporal punishment due to sin in the light of the history of dogmas, in such a way that this examination would also further the dogmatic theology of this doctrine. It is to be hoped that someone will soon write us such a history. Only a more profound doctrine about temporal punishment can offer any prospect of our being able to break down, even in this direction, the [195] objections and prejudices of Protestant and Eastern Christians against the Catholic teaching on punishment due to sin, satisfaction and indulgences.

The doctrine, and the history of the doctrine, of temporal punishment due to sin is a much more difficult Chapter than the average textbook of dogmatic theology would lead us to believe. For the Church did not get a clear consciousness of a debt (reat) of punishment really separable from the 'debt' (reat) of guilt until the moment when the practice of the Church (for very practical reasons) brought about a temporal link-up between the absolution in the sacrament of Penance and the commencement of penance. Thus the performance of the penance (which in the Fathers was concerned with the cleansing from sin in general, without any distinction between the 'debt' of guilt and that of punishment) had to have a really distinguishable effect from the reconciliation which had now already taken place in the sacrament by means of contrition and absolution. And so we would have to inquire exactly as to what doctrine of the 'debt' of punishment really does arise (and what does not) from such a starting-point. It would then be necessary to inquire further as to what exactly was meant originally by the Fathers' demanding a long period of subjective penance for post-baptismal sins in contrast to the cleansing from sin in baptism. Was the real 'living basis' of this

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation demand the conviction that the sinner has incurred temporal punishment in the next life which he must pay for already in this life (why, by the way, already in this life?) – a payment to which he must be constrained under pain of refusal of reconciliation? (It is well known that even Scotus felt uneasy about the logical clarity of these considerations.[10]) Or is this patristic theory about the difference between the forgiveness granted by baptism and that granted by post-baptismal penance already a theory (which does not mean that it must be false) constructed to explain and support a practice whose basis lay elsewhere, viz. in the conviction that a baptized person who has relapsed into sin must be examined much more closely and critically than a catechumen, before being readmitted into full communion with the Church? And if this is the real starting-point of the practice in the early Church[11] which gave [196] rise to the theological theory, what results from this as far as this theory itself is concerned? This theory does not at all need to be false. But perhaps we could circumscribe its contents much more precisely and carefully once we think this theory through, starting from the point indicated. Would this – we may at least inquire – lead us to a doctrine of temporal punishment due to sin which is a little less juridical in the formal sense than the present common doctrine? Would it lead us to a doctrine which could bring more understanding to the Greeks (Origen at their head[12]) than the Latin doctrine of the punishment due to sin and of Purgatory has done hitherto? An examination of the real nature of punishment due to sin would practically have to bring in, and set in motion, the whole of theology. Is the really, from and on God's side (in distinction to an earthly lawgiver), an objective distinction between vindictive and medicinal punishment? St Thomas, to be consistent with his deepest intuitions, would have to deny this. Non esset perpetua poena animarum quae damnantur, si possent mutare voluntatem in melius, quia iniquum esset quod ex quo bonam voluntatem haberent, perpetuo punirentur (Summa contra Gentiles IV, 93) Could we not also omit the 'perpetuo'? In other words, can we not say that man and the world (including the realities beyond) have been constituted by God in such a way that sin punishes itself? Is it not true that wherever the connatural consequence of sin is accepted and endured to the bitter end, sin becomes of itself the temporal and medicinal punishment (no matter how much this punishment is a manifestation of the justice of God and is in this sense also vindictive)? And is it not true that whenever the will, in permanent obduracy, refuses definitively to acknowledge the most profound meaning of the attitude of sin, sin becomes of itself an eternal punishment? Such a conception would not in the least need to dispute that there are 'external' punishments due to sin. It would not at all have to conclude that, in as far as the divine punishments are concerned, these consist merely in 'sorrow', 'feelings of remorse', and similar 'inner' punitive consequences of sin. With the principle of the nature of divine punishments due to sin thus envisaged, it would not at all be denied but, on the contrary, even demanded, that there are 'external punishments for sin'. To see this, we would simply need to base ourselves on a deeper Ontology of the nature of the spiritual (human) [197] person and its surroundings. For the human person is spirit in materiality, which itself is again a part of a uniform and (in its continuity) indissoluble world of a material kind. Whenever, therefore, some act of spiritual freedom is exercised, this act embodies itself necessarily in the 'exterior' of the being – which is not simply identical with the personal core of this act – and it does so right into the materiality of this exterior. In this 'embodiment', the actual physio-psychical corporeality of man consists much more in the most exterior stratum and in the index both of the stratification and of the outward-directed construction of man, than that this should [10] Cf. J. Lechner, Die Sakramentenlehre des Richard von Mediavilla (Munich 1925), pp. 321 sq.

[11] Cf. on this K. Rahner, 'Die Busslehre des hl. Cyprian von Karthago', ZKT LXXIV (1952), pp. 257-276; 381-438, esp. 395-403.
[12] Cf. on this K. Rahner, 'La doctrine d'Origène sur la pénitence', RSR XXXVII (1950), pp. 47-97, esp. 79-97; 252-286; 422-456.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation simply be identical with 'what is different from the personal nucleus of man' and hence be no longer present in any way after death. Now, such 'incarnations' of man's personal decision of freedom in the 'exterior' of the person (and, beyond this, in his surroundings) are not simply cancelled out again, once they have taken place, by a change of disposition in the spiritual nucleus of the person through contrition, etc. Of themselves, these 'incarnations' remain and can in certain cases be changed, and work themselves off only by a slow process in time which may last much longer than the free conversion in the centre of the person. The person, who has himself caused these 'exteriorizations' of his own guilt in his 'exterior' and his surroundings, inevitably experiences them as something causing him affliction, as a connatural punishment. Although this punishment arises out of the guilt itself, by the collision of the guilty act with the given structures of the 'exterior' established by God into which the guilt engraves itself it must nevertheless be called an 'external' punishment. For this punishment is not simply the conscious reflection of guilt in the consciousness of the guilty person, which must disappear again together with the annihilation of the guilt. Any attempt to understand the nature of the punishment due to sin in the sense indicated must then, of course, also conceive the payment of the debt of punishment in a somewhat less juridical and formalistic manner than is usually the case. The payment of a punishment of this kind could in this case be conceived only as a maturing process of the person, through which, though gradually, all the powers of the human being become slowly integrated into the basic decision of the free person. This does not at all necessarily mean that the soul after death is still capable of meriting supernaturally an actual growth in grace. The profundity of the 'option fondamentale' which has been made during life can no longer grow in the life beyond. But this, in its [198] turn, does not exclude the possibility of conceiving man as still really maturing in the purgatory condition of 'Purgatory'. We are not, at any rate, in any way compelled by the dogma of the Church to think of 'Purgatory' as a purely passive endurance of vindictive punishments, which, when they have been 'paid for' in this sense, release man in exactly the same condition in which he commenced this state of purification. For not every 'change' or 'process of maturing' must necessarily be already what is theologically described as growth in grace, increase of merit, advance in the degree of glory. Such a change of condition in the degree of maturity can just as well be conceived as an integration of the whole stratified human reality into that free decision and grace which, having been made and won in this life, is in itself definitive. Certainly such a conception of sin's temporal punishment in the life beyond requires implicitly also a certain modification, of the conception as to the manner in which these punishments can be 'remitted'. In the common, purely formal-legal and 'extrinsicist' conception according to which these punishments have a purely vindictive character, and according to which they are connected with sin only by a juridical decree of God and are added by a divine intervention exercised purely 'ad hoc', these punishments due to sin can obviously be 'remitted' by a simple remission which merely consists in God not adding them and in the fact that God refrains from the tormenting action on the 'Holy Souls'. In the conception of temporal punishment proposed for discussion above, it would not be possible to conceive the remission of punishment as a mere abstention from punishing. This occurrence would have to be conceived rather in the sense that the process of painful integration of the whole of man's stratified being into the definitive decision about his life, taken under the grace of God, happens more quickly and intensively and therefore also less painfully. That this is possible can be seen from our life on this earth. Thus, depending on circumstances, aids offered, etc., the same living 'process of working out' a moral problem can proceed easily and quickly or painfully and slowly. We cannot indeed picture to ourselves how in particular such a process of maturing can develop in different ways in the life after death; but that such a thing is conceivable will be ye difficult to dispute a priori. In other words, a 'remission' is conceivable even in the conception of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

temporal punishment suggested above, even although this remission does not in this case consist simply in the mere omission of punishment.

[199] Such and many other questions would have to be considered if we really wished to work out an adequate theory of indulgences understood as the remission of temporal punishment due to sin. These questions are enumerated here, not in order to give an answer to them, but merely to show how much would still have to be done to clarify the questions which Poschmann has tried to solve.

Even apart from this, P.'s theory of indulgences would, of course, require to be proved and developed more closely. What is the exact nature of an authoritative prayer of the Church in distinction to a private intercessory prayer? Where is such a prayer to be found in the present-day granting of indulgences? If we adopt P.'s theory of indulgences, is it still possible to make the distinction between indulgences for the living and those for the dead sufficiently intelligible? For surely this is a distinction which goes further than the fact that after death the soul can no longer be absolved from a penance imposed by the Church? Why does not the Church return to the simple 'absolutions' (to use P.'s terminology), since the imposition of an ecclesiastical penance, from which we are also freed by an indulgence, is after all purely hypothetical nowadays? Why do we, strictly speaking, still need to appeal in this theory of indulgences to the Treasury of the Church, which is part and parcel of the Church's doctrine of indulgences, when elsewhere (e.g. in the case of the Sacramentals) the theological explanation of the intercessory prayer of the Church, no matter how authoritative this prayer may be, does not, as far as I know, fall back (at least not explicitly) on the Treasury of the Church? What is the meaning, in Poschmann's theory taken as a whole, of the good work with which the Church connects the granting of an indulgence? (Schmaus[13] gives a good explanation: the good work is a sign of the incorporation into the outlook of Christ and of the Saints to which the Church appeals in her intercessory stand on behalf of the person who gains the indulgence.) How and why is there still a concrete and factual difference in this theory between a plenary and a partial indulgence in respect of temporal punishment before God? In other words, is there any intelligible sense in which the authoritative prayer of the Church (in the case of an indulgence) can be intended to relate only to a part of the punishment due to sin which is to be remitted by a partial indulgence? Moreover, can what [200] is contained in the Church's doctrinal pronouncements regarding indulgences be fully reconciled, after thorough analysis, with P.'s theory? Poschmann affirms that it can and gives good reasons for maintaining this. P. certainly does not come into conflict with anything really defined in the matter of indulgences. As to whether this his theory is absolutely compatible with other, if not defined yet theologically binding explanations by the Church of indulgences, is something which would require still closer investigation; it is true, of course, that even such an investigation would have to bear in mind that the expression of such a doctrine taught by the magisterium of the Church might possibly be conditioned by some particular age. The references in P. to the explanations given by the Church seem to me to be rather scanty, but of course this question does not really belong to his particular theme.

If we may be allowed to summarize P.'s thesis once more (in terms which do not actually occur in his own formulation of it), we would say that: an indulgence is the sacramental of the remission of sin's temporal punishment before God, and this in conjunction with a jurisdictional remission of an (at least hypothetically) imposed ecclesiastical penance. Being a sacramental, it operates ex opere operantis (orantis) Ecclesia, and not ex opere operato as most theologians teach nowadays, even although, for historical reasons,[14] it is connected with [13] Cf. M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV, I $^{3/4}$ (Munich 1952), p. 548.

[14] Galtier, De Paenitentia, (new edition, Rome 1950), nos. 612-615 also declares that the 'definition' of an indulgence (contained also in the CIC) which regards indulgences as a remission of temporal punishment due to sin 'per modum absolutionis', is nothing more now than a historical reminiscence which no longer has any real

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a [201] jurisdictional act of the Church which is concerned with the remission of an ecclesiastical penance and produces a sure effect in this regard.[15] We are inclined to think that this thesis is correct and that the reasons adduced in support of it are worthy of consideration.

---

meaning in the present-day practice of indulgences. This means (in Galtier's sense) that we speak of an 'absolutio' in contradistinction to a ' solutio', only in regard to the ecclesiastical penances which were imposed in the past, but not in regard to sin's temporal punishment before God. Since, however, such unperformed penances imposed by the Church, which could be remitted ('absolved') in this way, no longer exist at all in the present-day practice, the expression 'per modum absolutionis' is merely a reference nowadays to a former practice. We do not mean by this to claim Galtier as an advocate (in every detail) of the definition of an indulgence proposed by us above. But his arguments prove at least that we may not adduce the definition given in CIC can. 911 to prove that it is a question here of a jurisdictional act of the Church as the 'per modum absolutionis' appears in opposition to the 'per modum suffragii' of the indulgences for the dead. As to whether the 'per modum solutionis', which Galtier (appealing to Cajetan and Billot) declares to be the real essence of the indulgence grant (i.e. the placing of the Treasury of the Church at the disposal of the believer so that he may as it were clear off or 'pay' the debt of punishment from it), is a proper jurisdictional act and one which causes 'ex opere operato' (as Galtier maintains), that is a different question again; and it is, at any rate, a theory which has only as much weight as the reasons adduced in support of it, since it is not taught directly and with binding force in the Church's doctrinal pronouncements. How far we today are in this respect from the old practice which still actually presupposed ecclesiastical punishments which were remitted by indulgences, can be seen also from the following observation: the Council of Trent was still afraid that too liberal a granting of indulgences by the Church could bring about a weakening of ecclesiastical discipline. Today, indulgences have become so much separated from, and independent of Church discipline as a whole, that they can neither further nor endanger it. We do not mean to imply by this that the objective content of the exhortation delivered by the Council has lost its object or need no longer be taken to heart. Galtier, too, (Gregorianum XXXI , pp. 273 sq.) makes it clear, in appealing to the words of Bellarmine, that this warning given by the Council seems still very real in his opinion.

[15] Our 'definition' is cited by M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik IV, I[4] (Munich 1952), pp. 548 sq., who seems to assent to Poschmann's theory. The same is true of L. Ott, Fundamentals of Catholic Dogma (Cork 1960), p. 442: 'The Church Authority possesses the right to dispose of this spiritual treasury, though not strictly judicially . . . In the granting of an Indulgence, the Church appeals to the mercy of God . . . The prayer of the Church requires the gracious acceptance of God, but . . . a hearing can, with moral certainty, be counted on'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

If indulgences are to be found not only in textbooks but also in the practical life of the man of today, and if they are to be the means of blessings in practical life, then the Church's doctrine of indulgences must be thought through anew and in a living manner by theologians. Poschmann has made a good start in this direction, for which everyone ought to be grateful to him.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[203]

6

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY

If we look at things honestly, we must notice that divine revelation – and how could it be otherwise – always overtaxes man in a certain respect. We recognize this also by the fact that certain truths of God's revelation are always in danger of becoming 'un-existential' in the everyday practical life of man. And this not only in the case of those why deny these truths, i.e. 'heretics', but also in the case of good, orthodox Christians. This may be true of almost everyone belonging to a certain period (although it should be noted that not all those who live at the same chronological time are contemporaries), or it may be true of all those who belong to a certain stratum of society, as e.g. the 'educated' (how many of these, for instance, gain indulgences nowadays?). These people do not deny the truth concerned. They perhaps even know the truth quite well. They will perhaps even protest vehemently when such a truth is explicitly denied in some quarter. Nevertheless, such truths are 'believed' in a somewhat similar manner as when we buy something 'along with' something else which we really want, simply because there is no other way of obtaining that other thing we really want. We take cognizance of these truths and then push them (not on reflection, of course, but instinctively) to one side a little, to the periphery of thought and life, into the subconscious (as we would say nowadays), or into the sphere of the fides implicita (as they used to say). At any rate, we occupy ourselves with such a truth at the most only on the fringe of our religious consciousness (or not at all), compared with the 'existential' interest shown by us for other truths of the same Faith.

When you ask the orthodox Christian for his beliefs, he will refer you to the Catechism, where all the truths of faith which have been expressed most explicitly and in an existentially clear manner in the history of the Faith up to date, have kept their unchanged place. The orthodox Christian seldom stops to realize that the unprinted catechism [204] of his heart and religious life has quite a different distribution of materials from his printed Catechism, and that in the former many pages of the latter are missing completely or have become quite faded and illegible. He gets on quite well in this way with his printed Catechism. He takes from it what he needs. He finds in it everything necessary for a right way of living and for a happy death. The rest he quietly leaves there: it must be right enough. When a part of it is so good and holy, the rest will be true enough, he would think to himself, if he were to reflect at all on the selective instinct of his practical religious life. And so, on the whole, these other truths too do not cause him much brain racking or many 'difficulties of faith'. It would be interesting to investigate some time the 'interior catechism' of the average Catholic (ten years after his last religion lesson at school) in our day and in our particular region – it will not be the same everywhere in the world. The official catechesis could learn a great deal from this.

The 'unorthodox', the one who has leanings towards heresy, and the 'heretics', open their internal catechism as it were reflectively: whatever they do not find clear in it, they would then like to see removed also from the printed Catechism. They say: whatever we today cannot grasp quickly and clearly, vitally and comfortingly in our heart and life, likewise should not weigh down the memory and mind of the Christian of today. The fact that they are so 'difficult' to understand, that they can only be so laboriously reconciled with our present-day religious needs and 'scientific convictions' and generally speaking with everything which we possess in the way of possibilities of belief – this is said to be a sign that these other matters are pious but outmoded notions, fables, outdated expressions of a thought, right in itself, perhaps, but which must be extracted like a kernel out of its shell, myths which must be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'demythologized' to produce the real meaning of Christian thought. This shows, by the way, that the orthodox believer and the Christian heretic differ less from each other in a certain respect than it might seem at first sight. But this also reveals a difference of vital importance (prescinding from everything even more important): once something has been erased from the printed Catechism, how, if what has been erased was true and important for life and shortsightedness and presumptuous modernism (which can be very stupid) have erased it, is it to be reincorporated into it and into the catechism of the heart? Here the seemingly so inaccurate and somewhat superficial orthodox person does after all act [205] with a surer instinct; he tells himself: what I do not understand today, what does not mean much to me as yet (in spite of all my good will), can nevertheless be true; tomorrow I will perhaps see it as a most important truth; the day after tomorrow it may be the truth of the coming generation.

Does not the 'resurrection of the body' belong to these truths, which are given a wide berth by the orthodox and the heretics alike, but by each in their own way? It is to be found in every Catechism, it is treated of in every course of dogmatic theology and is prayed in every Credo. There are, of course, books – and especially again in most recent times – which try to express this truth more clearly and intelligibly to the present generation. But this has not meant any very great change as yet. Things are really as they were in the early days: 'Now when they heard of a resurrection of the dead, some began to sneer, but others said, "we will hear thee again on this matter" (Ac 17.32). Since one's 'sneering' can also arise out of profound thought and deep affliction, the present-day sneerers are those who are 'demythologizing'. But the orthodox Christians should not be too quick to become indignant with them. For they themselves are probably those who in their lives today want to hear about it 'again', in other words – never. Nor can it be said that the dogmatic definition of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, body and soul, into heavenly glory, is a proof of how alive the eleventh article of the Creed is in the hearts of Christians. For it is significant how little, how hesitatingly and really lifelessly the whole literature on the Assumption entered into the content of the new Dogma. Hardly any portion of this literature seized the opportunity to re-state more precisely and vitally, and to study more profoundly, what precisely is meant by 'resurrection of the body'. One acted as if nothing new was to be said about this, as if everything about this were already clear, in so far as this is at all possible, and as if the question were merely as to whether Mary has already found this consummation now.

This article of faith has, if we may say so, always had a troubled existence, ever since it stepped out of the world of late Judaism (since Dan 12.2 sq.; 2 Mac 7) and of the New Testament (where it belongs to the first elements of Christ's teaching; Heb 6.1), to begin its journey through the history of the Church and of the Spirit. It was given the assent of faith. This goes without saying. For it is attested by the Scriptures, the word of our Lord and his apostles. Indeed, [206] theology too always pondered on it. In the Middle Ages it was perhaps reflected on even with precision and loving interest (as far as was possible at that time), since the Middle Ages were a period which was still capable of humbly and obediently resisting its own overloud taste and its own tendencies of thinking and living – no matter how much we nevertheless notice, of course, in what direction it actually tended in its theology. They defended the article of faith. Against the pagans and their 'Idealism': Tertullian did so even passionately – Caro salutis est cardo; against spiritualistic tendencies among Christians, such as those of the Gnostics and of Origen (interpreted this way); against the Albigenses and Cathari in the Middle Ages; against Rationalism and Enlightenment thought. The populace, the naive man who likes to think pictorially, has always liked to picture the Last Day to himself (more terrified, it is true, than comforted) with the bodies rising from the graves and the Judgement: tuba mirum spargens sonum. And even today, this sociological milieu is still favourable for massive images of the resurrection, as is shown by the spread of sects of a chiliastic kind.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Thus far everything in the garden seems to be lovely and in order. And yet the road along which this article has travelled, has been a hard one. Whenever the Fathers became 'philosophers', i.e. platonists, it is noticeable that they find it difficult to include the body in the victory of the 'spirit'. In the history of this Dogma during the Middle Ages, the view of the end veers more and more away from the resurrection of the body to the soul's direct vision of God. And it becomes clearer all the time (even against St Bernard) that this visio can already be granted to the individual soul before the cosmic resurrection and consummation, until this doctrine is finally enforced in the Dogma of Benedict XII (in 1336). Almost all that the average Christian of today has written in his internal catechism is merely that the good go 'to heaven' after death. He writes on the little in-memoriam-cards: 'What we bury in the coffin is earth's vesture. What we love has remained, and remains to all eternity'. For St Paul the resurrection was the pre-required condition for the participation by the deceased in the full blessing of Christ and in his Second Coming. The average Christian of today, if he were to reflect basing himself on his unwritten catechism, would ask in astonishment why the happily deceased should be so interested in the Second Coming of Christ, since he is after already with Christ and God in beatitude and so does not need to concern himself very much any more about the fate of this world here [207] below. Even for the theologian, the 'resurrection' is usually an 'accidental' increase in the essentially already fully realized beatitude of the soul, in so far as the body is then reawakened as well and is reunited with the soul. For him too, therefore, the resurrection is very much a supplementary matter. We would suppose that if he had to make a new draft of the Creed, it would be more likely to contain an expression of the 'immortality of the soul' – which after all is stressed in many catechisms as a 'basic truth' – without mentioning in this connection the 'basic truth' of the Epistle to the Hebrews, viz. the resurrection of the dead.

What those who wish to 'demythologize' have to say against this Dogma (and against it especially) because it, practically more than any other, gives rise naturally to objection, does not require to be specified here. All this seems too 'miraculous' for them to dare to expect the contemporary man of physics to accept it. They will then maintain furthermore (falsely indeed, but with a certain semblance of truth) that the Bible itself does already begin to demythologize here and there, in so far as the bodily resurrection does not seem to be nearest to its heart everywhere in the same way, and sometimes no longer appears to be anything more than some sort of covering image for the timeless validity of the victory of the faith over the powers of death and the futility of life. They will point to the fact that medieval theology far into modern times, imagined the resurrection and transfiguration of the body within a world which no longer exists: the caelum empyreum as the highest and most sublime world-sphere, which as a 'spatial division' of this world exists before the time-of-salvation and its events as the fixed framework of saving history. Into this highest sphere, therefore, the bodily substance of man, to which this region has become connatural through the resurrection and transfiguration of the body, can emigrate as to its 'heavenly' place – to Christ who by his 'Ascension into Heaven' has 'ascended' into this sphere. Those who wish to 'demythologize' will ask where this heaven is. It must after all be a place, if the doctrine of the glorified bodily nature is to retain any inner content. How are we to 'conceive' this bodily substance? Will we still eat there, and how are we to conceive this, if it happened in the case of the risen Lord, without the wheel of changeableness and perishableness being set in motion again? Can any such bodily substance be thought of in any other way than as a prison, if we remain eternally restrained by it, or does it still make sense and is it [208] honest to speak of a body when we make a spirit or something else unimaginable out of it, in order to render the 'glorified nature' of the body intelligible?

Before we ask ourselves in the concrete what we Christians really believe when we profess

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

(and whether this is believable and moreover significant for us), we can hardly avoid saying a basic word or two on the subject of 'demythologizing'. It will by no means be a thorough treatise on this question, and even less a historical statement of the pros and cons in this matter. It will simply be a question of one or two remarks to render what follows à propos the subject of this chapter more intelligible. All human knowledge is always bipolar: conceptual and intuitional at the same time. Even the most abstract and most precise metaphysical notions still include their particular intuitional element. Under certain circumstances an intuitional happening may belong and be suited to this necessary intuitional element just as much as the static image. The boundary between the image and what is meant by it is not to be found at exactly the same point in all 'meant' realities, if only for the simple reason that even something directly representable can be 'meant' (e.g. the cessation of new births, etc.). The 'proto-historical' (Gen 1-3) and the 'eschatological' must of their very nature show the greatest distance for us between their representation or image on the one hand and the intended or meant object on the other hand. Although something can be meant only together with and under cover of a representation (an image, a representable happening), it is possible to mean realities and happenings which cannot be represented (e.g. the 'depth' of the soul, the 'sub'-conscious, the 'pure' spirit). Man can recognize the inadequacy of such notions, in which the representing element is taken 'as a makeshift' from some other reality than the one meant by the notion itself, and hence he can criticize and change this element. He does this, not by doing away with this element and obtaining a 'pure' concept of the object itself and in itself alone – which is beyond what can be represented – but by modifying his representation and looking at the reality anew. This can be done since the reality though not represent able in itself can still be conceived from different points of 'view', and thus man gains a clear understanding of the various points where the individual image and representation is merely an image and representation without applying simply as such to the referred-to object in itself.

[209] When someone undertakes in this sense a critique of the representation-schemata of the religious concepts which are used for a Dogma, and does so cautiously and slowly, in the constant endeavour (under the control of the magisterium of the Church) of not losing anything of the content of faith in the process, then he does not 'demythologize', but does something which theology has always done and must always do. And conversely, if he does this, he can easily see that he has no cause to demythologize and that such a 'demythologizing' is ultimately nothing else but his own, in itself perfectly justified method (if properly applied), which has been badly applied in this particular case, because one has – rightly – emptied out the bath-water and – unjustifiably – the child with it. This critique of the schemata of representation always remains unfinished; for we can always conceive something only with the help of other 'representations'. The 'critique' is, therefore, of necessity, just as inadequate in relation to the object in itself as the 'criticized' proposition. In many cases in theology it will not be possible at all to say where precisely the meant object stops and the 'mere' image begins. In such cases the believing Christian and theologian will abide by the usage of the Scriptures and Tradition in theology and even more so in the proclamation of the Faith, because he knows after all that he has there an image which has been sanctioned and which allows the matter itself to be seen correctly, even though it is impossible in this case to achieve an adequate reflective separation of the two elements. There are of course notions whose representative element is of such a basically human and at the same time objectively unavoidable kind, that these notions, once they have been found, cannot really be replaced by any better ones. But in every concept there takes place a conversio ad phantasmata, as St Thomas says. All knowledge about any reality, no matter how supramundane the object and strict and abstract the notion, is knowledge in 'likenesses and parables'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Now, it is important to observe that the different parts of Scripture, when depicting the events of the consummation of the world and of the resurrection of the dead included therein, give descriptions which simply cannot be combined together into one unified picture, however much they mean the same thing objectively and without contradiction. Sometimes our regard is directed to the resurrection of the just alone who, conscious of their salvation, go out happily to meet their returning Lord and come up to join him as his retinue, so that there is no [210] longer any room – in this image, it must be added – for a universal resurrection and a yet to be accomplished separation of the good and the bad. Or, at other times, the saints are the retinue of the Lord who come with him from above. At one time the end takes place on earth, which only then becomes the place of beatitude; at another time the place of beatitude is the already existing abode above into which man enters on leaving the earth. The figurative nature and the easy freedom and practical variability of the cosmic images (the conflagration of the world, the falling of the stars onto the earth, etc.) is too clear to allow us any possibility of thinking that they were not recognized as being imaginative by the original speakers. Who can seriously doubt that even the writer of Holy Scripture knew that in the case of many the phrase 'the tombs open up' cannot correspond exactly to the actual manner of their resurrection? We do not need to be afraid that we will depart from the teaching of St Paul, if we do not rack our brains too much about how the dead will hear the sound of the archangel's trumpet and how this harmonizes with the sending out of the many angels or with the resuscitating voice of the Lord himself, which we are told about in his own eschatological discourses. We can regard this text as an image and yet be terrified by what it truly means to convey both to the people of those days and to us today: the aft powerfulness of God over the dead, who even when dead cannot escape him; indeed, we may conjecture that God in his omnipotence just because he is all-powerful and never in danger of being rivalled, will give even the created forces of the world a share in the work of the consummation of the dead into the life beyond all death. It follows from this that we are not 'demythologizing', but that it is an unavoidable and justified task, when we ask quite simply what reality – according to the intention of the Scriptures themselves – these eschatological, popular and poetic illustrations are actually meant to convey. For the reason given, a harmonization of the pictorial elements on their own level is quite superfluous and not at all in keeping with the intention of the Scriptures. In this case, too, it will not always be possible to separate the form and the content without ambiguity.

And so when we Christians profess our belief in the 'resurrection of the body', what then do we really mean by it? What is the least we mean by it?

'Body' (Fleisch) means the whole man in his proper embodied [211] reality. 'Resurrection' means, therefore, the termination and perfection of the whole man before God, which gives him 'eternal life'. Man is a many-sided being which in (and despite) its unity stretches, as it were, through several very different dimensions – through matter and spirit, nature and person, action and passion, etc. And so it is not surprising that the process of man's perfecting and the entrance into this perfection is not in itself a simple and identical quantity in every respect. And it is not surprising that the 'moment' of completion of such a stratified being is not simply the same for every one of these dimensions. Hence, as the Church's consciousness in faith has come to comprehend ever more clearly – instructed as it has been by the beginnings of such a comprehension in the Scriptures – the continuing reality of the personal spirit can already reach the direct communion with God by the event and moment which, looked at from its intramundane side, we experience as death. In so far as this union with God constitutes the innermost being of blessed completion, 'heaven' and 'eternal happiness' can already be given with death (Denz 530). Nevertheless, the deceased remains

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

'united' with the reality, fate and hence the temporal events of the world, however little we are able to 'picture' to ourselves such a continuing belonging-to-the-world and however few immediately comprehensible statements on this matter are contained in the Scriptures. We must simply try to realize clearly and soberly that a spiritual union with God cannot be regarded as something which grows in inverse proportion to the belonging to the material world, but that these are two quite disparate matters in themselves. Thus basically, for instance, there can be vision of God before death, and 'separation from the body' for the soul in death does not by a long way need to mean ipso facto a greater nearness to God. Remoteness-from-the-world and nearness-to-God are not interchangeable notions, however much we are accustomed to think in such a framework.

The deceased remain therefore (despite the visio beatifica) united with the fate of the world.

This world in its totality has a beginning and a history; it goes on towards a point which is not the end of its existence but the end of its unfinished and continually self-propagating history. It is true, we may not succeed in representing to ourselves concretely how it will be possible at some time to separate its continued existence in itself, on the one hand, and its transition into the unknown (to our prevision), on the other hand; it may be impossible to imagine how the former [212] continues while the latter ceases. We may not be able to say what the then remaining world will be like (all attempts to picture this to oneself never get beyond the image). And yet, for all that, this final state of the world as a whole, which will come at a certain point but has not come as yet, is more conceivable for us today than it was perhaps for earlier generations and especially for the ancients. For to them this world of their experience gave the impression of being something eternal; change and transitoriness was only a happening in the lowest stratum of all in this 'eternal' world of 'eternal' laws, which was enveloped by the quietly reposing serenity of celestial spheres; for them (even for the Christians[1]), beatitude could, therefore, only mean leaving the sphere of the transitory for the blessed heavenly sphere intended for this 'migration' in the framework of saving history; the history of salvation took place in the 'heaven'-enveloped world, but was not the development itself of heaven. We today are becoming more clearly aware of the developmental character of our world as a whole, in spite of the ultimate uncertainty of the natural sciences and the extremely profound problems of a 'harmonization' of theological data and our natural knowledge of the world. We have come to realize the senselessness of trying to retrace the existence of the world into the infinite; the world itself, practically down to the last detail – and not merely the revolutions of its stars – is temporal.

If we allow the 'becoming', time and history to be really temporal and do not in the end turn them again into a false eternity, then we may say (very carefully): it does not contradict the nature of the world that this open, self-propagating history has a beginning and an end. Who can say how far this end is the very 'running-itself-to-death' of the course of the world itself (which is happening in accordance with its eternal laws), how far a halt is called by the creative and restraining Word of God, how far both of these things ultimately come to the same thing! We know at any rate from the testimony of God that the history of the world will come to an end, and that this end will not be a sheer cessation, a 'being-no-longer' of the world itself, but the participation in the perfection of the spirit. For this spirit is assigned a beginning, but in relation to God. And hence its beginning is not [213] the beginning of the end, but the beginning of a development in freedom towards freely achieved completion, which does not let the becoming end up in nothingness, but transforms it into the state of [1] In their view the world as a whole was created and temporal. But this is far from implying that medieval theology could clearly see the radical temporal and historical character, as we experience it, of even the superlunary spheres of the world.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

finality. Furthermore, the deepest conviction of Christianity and of idealism is true: the personal spirit is the meaning of the whole reality of the world and, in spite of all its biologico-physical insignificance, it is not merely a strange guest in a world which, standing ultimately untouched and indifferent opposite this spirit, carries on its own history; the personal spirit, precisely as human spirit, is a material, mundane, incarnate – indeed intra-mundane spirit. And so the end of the world is participation in the perfection of the spirit: the world remains, beyond its previous history, as the connatural surrounding of the achieved spirit which has found its finality in the fellowship with God and achieves its own history and that of the world at the same point. If this is so, however, it is necessary to consider what exact form this history of spiritual persons has taken and is taking: it is a history which, as the history of mankind, has taken place (consciously or veiled to itself) with, for and against the Person of the One who – right through death and resurrection – possessed the life of God and the history of a human reality at one and the same time – Jesus Christ, our Lord. The end of the world is, therefore, the perfection and total achievement of saving history which had already come into full operation and gained its decisive victory in Jesus Christ and in his resurrection. In this sense his coming takes place at this consummation in power and glory: his victory made manifest, the breaking through into experience, and the becoming manifest for experience too, of the fact that the world as a whole flows into his Resurrection and into the transfiguration of his body. His Second Coming is not an event which is enacted in a localized manner on the stage of an unchanged world which occupies a determined point in space in this world of our experience (how could everyone see it otherwise, for instance?); his Second Coming takes place at the moment of the perfecting of the world into the reality which he already possesses now, in such a way that he, the Godman, will be revealed to all reality and, within it, to every one of its parts in its own way, as the innermost secret and centre of all the world and of all history.

This is the context into which we must fit what we call the resurrection of the body in the strict sense. The history – which has remained [214] within the framework of the world – of those who by their lives have already effected their personal finality, reaches its real completion and explicit expression together with the consummation of the world. These human beings now become achieved as totalities with soul and body, and their perfection, already begun in death, becomes itself perfected, tangible in the world, embodied. We cannot really imagine the ‘how’ of this bodily consummation. But we can say in our faith together with God’s revelation: I believe, that we will one day be the living, the complete and achieved ones, in the whole expanse and in all the dimensions of our existence; I believe that what we call the material in us and in the world surrounding us (without really being able to say what it is basically, what belongs to its essence and what only to its temporary form and appearance) is not simply identical with what is unreal and mere appearance, with what has been cast off once and for all and which passes away before the final state of man. If, however, the material world is not simply an objective illusion, and is not merely some sort of material which must be taken off and on which the history of souls gets practice in freedom until it has achieved its end, but is a part of the true reality itself, then the material world does for that very reason enter into the consummation in accordance with the divine promise, and it too can participate in the state of finality and completion. When we look at the risen Christ, taking into consideration the experience the Apostles had with him, we may also get some idea of what the perfected condition of the body is like in which the created spirit achieves itself. Only, in doing this, we must not forget that what the Apostles, being themselves as yet unachieved, were to experience of this consummation, is a somewhat broken, translated experience, and that even then it still remains obscure how the perfected appears to the perfected. In the last analysis, therefore, we can merely say in St Paul’s

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

language of paradox: it will be a spiritual body (1 Cor 15.44), i.e. a true bodily nature which, however, is pure expression of the spirit become one with the pneuma of God and its bodily existence, and is no longer its restricting and abasing element and its emptiness. It will be a bodily nature which does not cancel again the freedom from the earthly here-and-now gained with death but will, on the contrary, bring it out in its pure form.

If (and in so far as) we cannot think of the physical nature and concreteness of the risen and real person (even in accordance with what was experienced with regard to the risen Christ) in any other way than [215] together with a definite spatial and local determination, then we must think of heaven as a place and not merely as a 'state'. In so far as there are already human beings (the risen Lord, our Lady and no doubt others: cf. Mt 27.52) who possess a glorified bodily nature, this place does already exist as a result, even if not as the presupposition (as the ancients thought), of this transformation of the incarnate human spirit. When we remember the intrinsic finiteness of our own physical spatiality, which is not a presupposition but an inner moment of non-glorified matter and the result of its history, we will not find it impossible to conceive (not: 'to imagine') that this spatiality and the heavenly 'kind of space' are in themselves essentially different and incommensurable quantities. This, however, means then that, on the one hand, it is a-priori senseless to ask where heaven is (if by this 'where' we are to understand a location in our physical spatial world), and that, on the other hand, it remains nevertheless possible to hold fast most 'realistically' to the conception of the bodily existence of the glorified, including their spatial determination and location. We do not need to accommodate those in heaven in the physical world system of our experience. Since we are, however, learning in physics nowadays more than ever to think abstractly, there will be less of an obstacle in this than before to our taking the existence of those in heaven very seriously in a non-pictorial way. Once the history of the Cosmos and of the spiritual world has come to its complete end, everything will be transformed. It will then be equally correct to call the one new reality a new heaven or a new earth.

The complete, all-embracing solution is always the most difficult, because it must reconcile everything. It is most difficult for such a solution to penetrate the narrow limits of our mind which demand concise and synoptical solutions. And so it is also with regard to the question about the end. Anyone who disposes of the earthly world and dismisses the perfected man from this earth for good, spiritualistically or existentially or in whatever other way, directing him into a beatitude of (supposedly) pure spirits, stultifies and betrays the true reality of man, the child of this earth. Whoever lets man perish, ground to pieces in the cruel mill of Nature, does not know what spirit and person are, and does not know how much more real, in spite of all their apparent weakness, the spirit and the person are than all the matter and energy of physics. Whoever does not believe that both of them, once reconciled, can come to the one completion, denies in [216] the last analysis that the one God has created spirit and matter in one act for one end. The Christian, however, is the man with the complete solution. This solution is the most difficult, the least synoptical. The belief for this solution and the courage for such a solution he draws from the Word of God alone. But God's Word testifies to the resurrection of the body. For the Word himself became flesh. He did not assume something unreal but something created. But whatever is created by God is never something merely negative, is never the veil of maya. Whatever has been created by God, assumed by Christ and transfigured by his Death and Resurrection, is also destined to finality and consummation in us.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[217]

7

ON THE QUESTION OF A FORMAL EXISTENTIAL ETHICS

The subject on which we are going to reflect in this chapter reads: On the question of a formal existential ethics. It is not for the sake of making a gesture of humility that we speak of a question: for practically everything we can say here is and remains in fact problematical. What exactly is meant and implied by 'existential ethics' and 'formal' existential ethics should become clear in the course of our considerations.

Our subject must first of all be distinguished from what is nowadays usually called situation ethics. It would be interesting to know who first introduced the term 'situation ethics' into the present-day discussions of moral theology and philosophy. What is meant by this term can be presupposed as known; it is also well known that situation ethics has frequently been discussed during the last few years within the realm of the German language. We may remind the reader (apart from the great names of existentialist philosophy) of the essays and books by W. Dirks, R. Egenter, J. Fuchs, M. Galli, H. E. Hengstenberg, H. Hirschmann, Ernst Michel, M. Müller, M. Reding, G. Siewerth, Th. Steinbüchel and by the author of these Investigations.[1] The [218] general human bases for the rise of an extreme situation ethics are known to us: the intricacy of man's life at the present time and the uncertainty and manifoldness of the ethical norms advocated. The following are the theoretical foundations of situation ethics: on the one hand, an extreme existentialist philosophy, and on the other hand a protestant repugnance to the validity of a 'law' within a Christian way of human existence. What situation ethics implies in consequence of this is easily understandable: it denies the universal obligation (and one which remains valid in every case) of material universal norms in the concrete individual case, it being quite immaterial whether these norms be conceived as a natural law or as a positive divine law. Norms are universal, but man as an existent is the individual and unique in each case, and hence he cannot be regulated in his actions by material norms of a universal kind. Man is the [1] W. Dirks, 'Wie erkenne ich, was Gott von mir will?', Frankfurter Hefte VI (1951), pp. 229-244; R. Egenter, Von der Freiheit der Kinder Gottes (Freiburg^{2} 1949); id., 'Kasuistik als christliche Situationsethik', Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift I (1950), pp. 54-65; J. Fuchs, Situation und Entscheidung (Frankfurt 1952) (cf. pp. 163-168 in this work for further bibliographical references); M. Galli, in Orientierung XIV (1950), pp. 13-16, 27-30, 37-39, 52-54; H. E. Hengstenberg, Die göttliche Vorsehung (Münster^{3} 1947); id., Die Frage der Individuation als aktuelles Problem: Die Kirche in der Welt^{4} (1951), pp. 349-352; H. Hirschmann, '"Herr, was willst Du, dass ich tun soll?" Situationsethik und Erfüllung des Willens Gottes', Geist und Leben XXIV (1951), pp. 300-304; E. Michel, Renovatio. Zur Zwiesprache zwischen Kirche und Welt (Aulendorf 1947); id., Der Partner Gottes. Weisungen zum christlichen Selbstverständnis (Heidelberg 1946); id., Rettung und Erneuerung des personalen Lebens (Frankfurt 1951); M. Muller, Exkurs über das Verhältnis der 'existenziellen Entscheidung' zur Idee einer Wesens-, Ordnungs- u. Ziel-Ethik: Existenz-pkilosophie im geistigen Leben der Gegenwart (Heidelberg 1949), pp. 100-106; Pius XII, Allocutio to the Congress of the 'Fédération mondiale des Jeunesses Féminines Catholiques', on 18th April 1952, AAS XLIV (1952), pp. 413-419; K. Rahner, 'Situationsethik und Sündenmystik', Stimmen der Zeit CXLV (1949-50), pp. 333-342; cf. also in the present volume: 'The Dignity and Freedom of Man' (pp. 235-263) and 'Freedom in the Church' (pp. 89-107), and the works of the author referred to in the notes to the present essay; M. Reding, 'Situationsethik, Kasuistik und Ethos der Nachfolge', Gloria Dei V (1951), pp. 290-292; id., Die philosophische Grundlegung der katholischen Moraltheologie (Munich 1953); G. Siewerth 'Von der Bildung des Gewissens', Mitteilungsblatt des Aachener Bundes und der pädagischen Akademie (June 1951), pp. 3-36; Th. Steinbüchel, Die philosophische Grundlegung der katholischen Sittenlehre I (Düsseldorf^{4} 1951), id., Christliche Lebenshaltungen in der Krisis der Zeit und des Menschen (Frankfurt 1949); A. van Rijen, 'Situatie Moraal', Nederlandse Katholicke Stemmen XLIX (1953) pp. 265-276.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

believer; and faith sets free from the Law. There remains then as 'norm' of action only the call of each particular unique situation through which man must pass successfully, be it before the inappellable judgement of his free decision as a person, or be it before God, whose immediateness to the situation, conscience and faith must not be thought of as mediated by a universal law. A law can therefore only have the function of making man always face up again to each situation peculiar to him, or forcing him to believe, but it cannot be that which has to be fulfilled. How such [219] a situation ethics is then established more in detail, whether it is in fact always advocated in the extreme form we have just outlined and whether every theory which calls itself 'situation ethics' adopts this extreme position – all these are questions which need not occupy us here. When we speak here of an (extreme) situation ethics, we mean the explicit or implicit denial of the absolute validity of material norms for the human person as such or the believer as such – the denial of norms which can state something which is also binding in the concrete situation.

That such a situation ethics is unacceptable to a Catholic hardly needs any lengthy proof, however much the practice of many Catholics in the present age is in danger of favouring such a situation ethics unconsciously. This kind of situation ethics comes in the last analysis to the same thing as a massive nominalism; it basically denies the possibility of any universal knowledge which has objective significance and truly applies to concrete reality. It turns the human person into an individual who is absolutely and in every respect unique (which the human person, considered as created and material, is not), and (what is far more important still) it also comes into conflict with divine revelations as given in the Scriptures and magisterium of the Church. It is not our intention to expound and establish all this more closely here. All this has, after all, been impressed once more on Catholic theologians in most recent times by 'Humani generis'.[2] Yet we must nevertheless add one thing even to this: one may get the impression that we sometimes make the proof for this rejection too easy for ourselves. For the question is – among other things – the following: How do we determine, for instance, the eternal, universal and unchanging nature of man? Is it by a transcendental deduction (and in that case, how and with what results)? Or can this notion of the nature be found in a purely a-posteriori empirical fashion? Or partly in the former, partly in the latter way? However, is the a-posteriori determined condition of man really unchangeable? How do I recognize in it what really belongs to the nature? Is what we have (until now) been able to find always and everywhere a sure and sufficient criterion for this condition? Can this existence (investigated a posteriori), may it (morally), be changed by man himself who achieves himself freely? What would follow in this case as to what [220] concerns the moral norms? What would then be the peculiar structure of the knowledge concerning this sort of essential make-up of man (which is first of all effected and delivered in and through freedom) and the moral norms drawn from it? Of what kind would then be the 'necessity' indicated in such norms? What sort of relationship is there basically between law, faith, grace and freedom according to St Paul? There will no doubt be few theologians who can remember from their school years in theology ever having heard anything really exact about these questions. Yet, as has been said, none of these questions are up for discussion here. We have referred to situation ethics at the beginning of our reflections merely because, on the one hand, what we are going to call 'formal existential ethics' must not be confused with the (outlined) situation ethics, and because, on the other hand, this existential ethics is in our opinion the core of truth which is also found in the false situation ethics.

In order to come now to a positive understanding of what is meant by existential ethics, we are going to start from a critical view of the reigning conception in our present-day Catholic Moral Theology and Philosophy about the content and process of a definite moral imperative

[2] Cf. also the Allocution by Pius XII referred to in note 1 above, p. 217.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

with material content in a concrete situation of the individual man. It does not really matter to us here whether in the course of this discussion of the common conception, absolutely everything is really brought out which has ever been thought and said about this question in scholastic theology and philosophy by profound and illustrious minds. What is above all important for our purposes is rather what is normally thought about this in the schools and in the turba magna of minor theologians. For this is precisely in question for us: whether this common conception really does justice to the way things are in reality.

Let us take a determined material imperative for a particular person in a concrete situation: here and now, this particular thing with this particular material content is to be done by you. Now how, according to the common conception of our present-day moral teaching, does such a concrete and materially determined imperative come about for the individual man in his particular determined situation? Surely it does so by the fact that the application of universal moral norms to the concrete situation results ipso facto in the concrete imperative. Naturally this conception knows also that in the concrete individual case there may possibly be several things which can be lawfully done (I [221] may, for instance, in certain circumstances choose to go for a walk hic et nunc or say my breviary). Yet this does not alter anything in this way of understanding things as far as the basic conviction is concerned that the concrete imperative arises out of a universal norm and the concrete situation simply given as a matter of fact. Simply, this imperative is in the case just mentioned merely a concrete permissiveness of several possibilities. This permissiveness itself is in this case the norm which arises out of the general norms plus the given situation.

It is not essential for us to know here how these universal norms are founded and how they are recognized. We can presuppose as given that they exist and that they are recognized by the acting subject as being obligatory for him. The question in this common conception is merely as to what is the given situation here, and what application of determined universal norms is demanded by this situation. The situation, as it were, gives the cue for the choice of the universal norms to be considered here and now. What is carried out and applied, are the universal norms and they alone. The situation is conceived tacitly and as a matter of course as simply pre-existent to the finding of the norm and the making of one's decision. The coincidence of this simply objective situation and the general norm results, according to the common opinion, in the concrete imperative in this situation, and this quite unambiguously, in such a way that apart from these two factors nothing more is required for the finding of the concrete imperative. Or put in another way: according to the common teaching, ethics is a syllogistic, deductive ethics. I.e., the major premise contains a universal principle: in this situation, under these presuppositions this or that is to be done. It must be noted in this connection that in such a major even the situation is something abstract – something of which it is tacitly presupposed that it can in principle happen often and that it can, therefore, be (adequately) expressed in a universal notion and in a universal proposition. The minor premise of this syllogism then asserts the fact that the presuppositions, the situation is given hic et nunc. The conclusion finally converts the major into a concrete and clear imperative. Conscience, accordingly, is conceived exclusively as that mental-moral function of the person which applies the universal norm to the concrete 'casus'. The difficulty in discovering the moral imperative in the concrete is accordingly seen to lie only in the exactness and adequacy of the analysis of the given situation in concreto and, under certain circumstances, in the unambiguous expression of the [222] universal norms. However, if both these things are absolutely clear – this is the tacit view – then there can no longer be any doubt about the concrete imperative. Whoever knows the universal laws exactly and comprehends the given situation to the last detail, knows also clearly what he must or may do here. An ethics whose norms are theocentric, will naturally admit in this theory that the living God can, in the nature of things and basically, manifest his will in the concrete situation – a will which need not be

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

derivable either from a universal norm or from the situation distinct from that manifestation, and which must then nevertheless be obeyed. Yet either such a case will always be regarded as an exception, or such a particular commandment of God will, in spite of everything, be subsumed under the general divine norms or be counted as a factor in the given situation. And so, nothing in the fundamentals of the general theory of a syllogistic, deductive ethics is altered by this case.

Is there any justification for this current view? This question is naturally not meant in the sense of wishing to question the fact that universal norms can and must be applied to the individual case, or that the individual case must obey these norms. Otherwise we would after all fall back into the very situation ethics which we dismissed as unacceptable at the beginning of this chapter. We also do not mean to dispute the fact that in practice, in thousands of cases in everyday life, the method just described suffices for obtaining a concrete moral imperative. This is obvious. And we do not have the least intention of dramatizing the speculative problem towards which we are steering and of acting as if there had been no theory of morals up until now sufficiently acceptable in practice. Yet there remains the following question to be put to the theory described above: is what we are in fact morally obliged to do in the concrete case, also basically identical with what can be deduced from the universal norms in view of a concrete situation? The morally obligatory cannot and must not contradict these norms – this is clear. There can be nothing which actually ought to be done or is allowed in a concrete or individual situation, which could lie outside these universal norms, and to that extent everything which morally ought to be done in the concrete is also the realization of the universal norms. But is it not more than that? Is what is morally done only the realization of universal norms – is what ought morally to be done in the concrete case merely, as it were, the intersection of the law and the given situation? And conversely: [223] if in a certain situation the universal laws leave room for a free choice, i.e. if according to the universal norms several things are still ‘allowed’ and ethically possible in a determined situation, can we then do what we want, just because ex supposito we do not in such a case offend against any universal laws whose content could be materially formulated? Is the concretion of the individual moral good (i.e. of the concrete morally good action) merely the negative circumscription of the ethical universal by a definite here and now, which carves out a portion for the here and now out of the sum-total of what is ethically possible and allowed, without this becoming and being more than a case or casus of the universal?

We should like to answer: ‘No’. The reasons for this ‘no’ and the explanation of the counterthesis lead us into the set of difficult problems regarding the basic relationship between the universal and the individual, applied to the ethical universal and the ethical individual. We cannot, of course, hope to treat this wider question here in the manner demanded by the nature of the matter. The only possible alternative, therefore, is to give a few indications regarding this question. For this question cannot be passed over if we wish to pose the problem at all from which we have taken our departure.

We would really have to ask already at this point as to what exactly is the position of the situation whose existence and perceptibility we have up until now presupposed, following the current conception of the formation of a concrete moral imperative. How does one, as a matter of fact, perceive such a situation and how far can one perceive it reflectively? Can a concrete situation – at least in principle – be adequately analysed into a finite series of general propositions? For there are no other kinds of propositions apart from general ones. For besides such propositions there is only the no longer propositional turning towards the concrete by pointing to it: ‘That there belongs to this kind’ – a ‘sentence’ whose subject is not a notion. And now, if there is not (in a complete way), nor cannot at all be, such an adequate analysis of the concrete situation as such into formulable propositions, what follows

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

then from this as far as the theory described above is concerned? I.e. what follows for it, in so far as it alleges that it not merely states something definite and essential about a concrete case (especially by negative judgements and maxims), but also claims furthermore to be able to provide us fundamentally with the clear imperative for a situation which as such cannot, after all, be captured [224] unequivocally and adequately by the syllogism and be built into it? As is well known, the medieval metaphysics of knowledge greatly racked its brain- – even as far as the field of the knowledge of the ethical was concerned – about these and similar questions. We do not get the impression that the average textbook ethics of today is very much perturbed by questions of this kind. However, we intend to leave all these questions to one side, although we could – even from this angle – work up to the real question we have proposed to ourselves.

We want to approach our problem from a different angle. Let us presuppose (in an almost impossible oversimplification of the problem) that we have clarified and mentally penetrated a certain situation through and through, and that we have comprehended it by some sort of faculty of human knowledge in the moral field – let us say, by the virtue of prudence, etc. Let us suppose further, that all the universal material norms of ethical action, which can in any way apply to this case, are displayed before our eyes in all their clarity. Suppose that by reason of both these presuppositions, we have formulated a concrete moral demand of which we can say with certitude: by fulfilling this demand, we certainly do not offend against any of the universal norms applicable to this case – and also do not offend against any demand made on us by this situation, in so far as this situation has become a reflex datum for us through its analysis into propositions. The question then is this: is the fulfilment of the imperative identical in the concrete with what we are morally obliged to do here and now? Once more: the question is not whether even what we ought to do here and now might perhaps be permitted to offend against the imperative produced in the manner described. Any question of this being possible must be put out of our mind from the very start. Rather, the question is merely whether this imperative is simply identical with what we are obliged to do here and now. And this question has not yet been answered simply by what we have just described as unquestionable. It has not yet been answered for at least two reasons. Firstly: it is a least conceivable that – even in a concrete situation – all the universal norms that can be found still leave different ways of acting open to us as being allowed and possible in their respective spheres. Indeed, this will happen very often. In such a case, is all of what is allowed before the tribunal of the universal norms actually possible morally, or can I also happen that, from some other source altogether, only one of these ‘permitted’ possibilities of action is designated as the only [225] morally right one in the concrete? Anyone who opts for the first alternative, presupposes what has first to be proved, viz. the proposition that what ought morally to be done in the concrete is nothing more than merely a case and specifying application of the universal norms. This, however, has to be proved and this is precisely what we are questioning. And secondly: even if in the dimension of what is reflectively assignable, the dimension of the describable difference of possible actions and behaviours, only one action is morally permitted in a determined situation according to the universal norms – when, therefore, the syllogistic deduction has seemingly succeeded unequivocally – even then there still remains the question as to whether just this apparently one and unambiguously determined action could not take quite a different form in a dimension which can no longer be adequately regulated by the universal norms, and yet be here and now the only right one and the one carrying the moral obligation. Taking both reasons together, it is possible to ask: is what corresponds to the universal norms simply identical with what ought to be done here and now, and is what obeys these norms also simply without further qualification what is morally permitted? More concisely still: Is the concrete moral action merely a case of the universal moral good?

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

This however, seems completely open to question. The concrete moral act is more than just the realization of a universal idea happening here and now in the form of a case. The act is a reality which has a positive and substantial property which is basically and absolutely unique. To prove this in a precise and sufficient manner goes beyond the possibilities offered here. We can only give a few indications of what we mean. We can, to start with, say from a more Christian and theological standpoint: Man is destined to eternal life as an individual and someone in the concrete. His acts are, therefore, not merely of a spatio-temporal kind as is the case with material things; his acts have a meaning for eternity, not only morally but also ontologically. Now we must, however (even for ontological reasons), hold fast absolutely to the fact – even if this is not obvious to everyone at first sight – that something which is merely a case and a circumscription of something universal, something which as an individual and concrete something is just sheer negation, also cannot have – as something individual – any real, eternally valid significance. Man with his mental and moral acts, therefore, cannot be merely the appearance of the universal and of what is – in this universality alone – 'eternal' and ever-valid in the [226] negative expansion of space and time. In him, the individual, there must rather be a given a positive reality; expressed differently: his spiritual individuality cannot be (at least not in his acts) merely the circumscription of an in itself universal nature through the negativity of the materia prima, understood as the mere repetition of the same thing at different points in space-time. We must realize that a contrary view would be profoundly unchristian, and that anyone who does not see this, really has no right to protest against a medieval Averroism or against a modern Idealism. The assertion of something positively individual, at least in man's spiritual personal acts, does not moreover, need to appear unscholastic, indeed not even really unthomistic. Of course, anyone who cannot rise to the metaphysical thought that (in good scholastic language) God cannot even de potentia absoluta create a second Gabriel – in other words, anyone who cannot rise at all to the notion of something individual which is not the instance of some universal idea, of something repeatable – cannot follow our thought here from the very start. Anyone, however, who can grasp this thomistic thought of something real which cannot be subsumed unequivocally under a universal idea or under a law, cannot reject the idea from the very start that something like this is conceivable – indeed, must be postulated – also in man as a spiritual person, as that existent who does not resolve himself completely into forma-materiae-esse. We may also say: if (and in so far as) man as a spiritual person participates by his acts in the permanency-in-itself of the pure form, which does not resolve itself in its ordination to matter as the principle of repeatability, then he must also participate in that spiritual individuality of the spiritual which has a positive individuality, an individuality which is not merely the sameness of the repeated universal and not merely a case of the law. Seen in this way, we therefore have to say: in so far as man belongs to the material world by his concrete activity, his activity is an instance and fulfilment of something universal which determines his actions as something different from the individual and opposed to it, i.e. as a law expressed in universal propositions. In so far as the same man subsists in his own spirituality, his actions are also always more than mere applications of the universal law to the casus in space and time; they have a substantial positive property and uniqueness which can no longer be translated into a universal idea and norm expressible in propositions constructed of universal notions. At least in his actions, man is really also (not only) [227] individuum ineffabile, whom God has called by his name, a name which is and can only be unique, so that it really is worthwhile for this unique being as such to exist for all eternity.

It also cannot be said that such an individuality of a spiritual act has no place in the real world, or that one cannot conceive anything by it. For, first of all, there is the whole almost unascertainable field of different possibilities which remain open to the morally acting man

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

within the scope of what is morally commanded and allowed. In every case in which a man decides, within the ethical sphere of the universal norms, on one of several possibilities – in which he 'chooses' within the sphere of the universally and positively moral good – this (non-derivable) concretion of his moral 'being-thus', brought about by a decision, is undoubtedly conceivable as the 'coming-to-light' of his ineffable moral individuality and not just as the merely arbitrary selection from among certain possibilities, as if these are equally-valid in the last resort and as if in relation to them, the 'just-this' and 'not-that' has no further positive and ethical meaning. And furthermore: even in a case where the deductive, syllogistic formation of conscience from the universal norms and the concretely given situation seemingly leads to the unequivocal result of a concretely one imperative, the latter can still in actual fact be realized in the most diverse ways and with the most diverse inner attitudes. Even a case where these differences are no longer traceable, where one could conceive of exactly the same case as repeatedly realizable, only proves (this and nothing more) that something uniquely and positively individual cannot be expressed reflectively and after the manner of a proposition – that it cannot be the object of a reflective objective knowledge which can be articulated in propositions. It does not, however, prove that there cannot be a case of the positively ethico-individual element of a personal action.

The following must be added to what has been said: this positively individual element in the moral action (an action which is more than the fulfilment of the universal norm or of an abstract being: 'man') is even as such to be conceived absolutely as the object of a binding will of God. It would be absurd for a God-regulated, theological morality to think that God's binding will could only be directed to the human action in so far as the latter is simply a realization of the universal norm and of a universal nature. If the creative will of God is directly and unambiguously directed to the concrete and the individual, then surely this is not true merely in so far as this individual reality is the realization [228] of a case of the universal – rather it is directed to the concrete as such, as it really is – to the concrete in its positive, and particularly its substantial, material uniqueness. God is interested in history not only in so far as it is the carrying out of norms, but in so far as it is a history which consists in the harmony of unique events and which precisely in this way has a meaning for eternity. The fact that this divine binding force, which regards the individual reality as such, cannot be expressed in a general proposition, is no proof of its non-existence, but arises out of the nature of things. The perception of this 'individual norm' (if we are going to use this term for the binding will of God in so far as it regards the uniquely individual which, precisely in its particular positivity, cannot be specified in the universal which can be contracted in 'cases') cannot come about in the same way as the perception of the universal law, viz. by an abstraction which forms" notions of essences. Yet this fact is also no proof for the non-existence of such a perception and for the consequent impossibility of such an 'individual norm' or 'existential norm' as something actually binding.[3]

[3] The more familiar notion of 'individual' (individual-norm, -ethics), which would seem the obvious one to use in the context and the nature of things, has been deliberately clarified here (and in what follows) by using the notion of 'existential' (existential-norm, -ethics). We have done this in order to make use even of the terminology to guard against possible misunderstanding, such as that 'individual-' might be understood as being used here in contrast to 'social-', and 'individual-ethics' as against 'social-ethics'. The notion of an 'existential' ethics excludes this misunderstanding; it shows itself unequivocally as the counter- and complementary notion of an abstractly universal 'essentialist ethics'. Yet this 'existential ethics' does not signify an unreal 'ethics of existence' (in the sense of the familiar distinction of existence and essence). On the contrary, it relates – in accordance with the original content of meaning of the modern word 'existential' – to the substantial nature of man, in so far as this (at least as φυ&σιφ, as principle of the origin and actualizing of the historico-personal activity) must achieve itself constitutively in the positivity of each single, uniquely-one con-cretion of the individual decision. And so this nature in particular cannot have the all sufficient condition of its free moral self-realization in an abstractly essential ethics of norms and order, arrived at purely deductively. It remains

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[229] No matter how inadequate the reasons offered in the present context, it can surely be said that there is an individual ethical reality of a positive kind which is untranslatable into a material universal ethics; there is a binding ethical uniqueness – by which we do not mean to say that every ethical individual reality must also necessarily and always be a binding moral reality, and that therefore there also cannot be anything individually or existentially ethical which remains free. In so far as there is a moral reality in an existential-ethic sense and of a binding kind which nevertheless cannot (in the very nature of things) be translated into universal propositions of material content – there must be an existential ethics of a formal kind, i.e. an ethics which treats of the basic elements, the formal structures and the basic manner of perceiving such an existential-ethic reality. Just as, on the one hand, there cannot be any science of the individual considered as a really individual singular as such and yet, on the other hand, there is a universal formal ontology of individual reality, so (and in this sense) there can and must be a formal doctrine of existential concretion, a formal existential-ethics.

In practice, the most urgent and difficult problem regarding such a formal existential-ethics would, of course, be the question about the perceptibility of the individual moral reality and its obligation (when and where such an obligation is present). We may say: there must be some function of conscience which does not merely apply the universal norms to each of my particular situations but which moreover grasps also what has not yet been made absolutely clear by the situation and the universal norms, and which is precisely and as such what has to be done by me individually. And in saying this, we have indeed named an essential, basic function of conscience, which is for the most part overlooked by the usual scholastic ethics, but we have not yet explained how this individual – or existential-function of conscience comes about. We should go on to ask in this regard: how does the individual person know about himself at all as the uniquely individual? How is such a perception conceivable, when basically it cannot adequately be a perception of an objective propositional reflection? How are we to pose and answer the question, when (and in so far as) this individual reality is not the individuality of my being and of my already freely effected state, but the individual uniqueness of something which has still to be done by me? How can this individual future reality be perceived also as something which ought to be done? What [230] does this (moral) necessity look like, which emerges in the approaching history and affects it? It is clear that we cannot really answer all these questions here. We would have to enter into a study of the peculiarities of a non-objective perception which is not merely a subsequent, reflected subsumption and articulation of an (adequately) given condition, but also a constitutive expression of the known thing itself; we would have to go into the question of the peculiar identity of perceiving and acting in the perception of the personal. We would have to treat of the fundamental option of the total (although also in a certain sense empty) basic decision about himself, in which the person, when he begins to reflect about himself always finds himself already there. We would have to speak of the perception of the future and free individual reality by means of an, as it were, ‘playing’ and ‘attempting’ anticipation of what (as something absolutely decided) is still outstanding and in the future, because the quality of the free future can be known only in such an anticipation by testing attempts (up to the point of being ‘tempted’). It would have to be asked how all this is modified in a supernatural order where there are the gifts of the Holy Ghost, a supernatural instinct and an individual immediacy to the personal, living God far beyond anything merely in the nature of a norm or law, where there is an inexpressible groaning of the Spirit and an unction which teaches us installed, on the contrary, in just as unnegotiable a manner (i.e. in the line of the constitution of the substantial ethico-personal nature) in the non-derivable qualitative property of the unique, individual act – an act which cannot be treated adequately in the manner of a ‘case’. An analysis of this ‘existential’ structure of human nature could provide us with a more exact philosophical basis for what we have developed here from a more theological point of view.

---

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

everything, a secret understanding between the spiritual man and the Spirit of God, so that this spiritual man judges everything but cannot himself be judged by anyone. For the clarification of this non-reflective, non-propositional self-presence of the person to itself in its positive uniqueness we might refer to the dialectic between the uncertainty of salvation, which is an essential property of the condition of a Christian, and the (equally given) testimony of the Spirit that we are children of God (which surely does not refer merely to God's salvific will in general and which cannot be adequately interpreted by a theory of a 'moral' certitude of the individual state of grace); we might adduce certain phenomena of current depth-psychology which manifest something like a coexistence of knowledge about oneself on the one hand, and nescience and displacement of knowledge about oneself, on the other hand, which is nevertheless given. These and many other things would have to be reflected on if we wished to come to a detailed knowledge about our singularity, about the existential quality of our actions as something possible and existentially binding. Yet [231] an exact exposition of all this is more than what can be undertaken in this context.

Since this is therefore not possible, we must content ourselves with pointing out, to finish up, a few things which – as it were as applications of the theory of the truth of an existential ethics and the existentially ethical – can show that the question we have posed ourselves here is not of merely speculative interest. We can merely refer to these things, and even in this we must renounce any systematic method.

It may, for instance, be said that – in addition to its other uses – the suggested theory has its meaning also for the exercise of ethico-theological casuistry. This is not meant to imply that we approve here of the horror against which the traditional casuistry so widespread and frequently engaged in in Germany. This horror rests to a large extent on mental laziness and smugness and on the dread of a clear, discerning and penetrating decision. Yet are there not cases in casuistry where one labours in vain, from the very start, to reach an unequivocal decision of the case by means of a syllogistic deduction in the manner described above, since so unequivocal a clarity cannot be reached in this way, for the simple reason that it cannot be attained by starting with the universal? Are there not cases in casuistry where we make unnecessary work for ourselves in the wrong direction, because we do not reckon with an existential ethics? Is it not conceivable that we also reach for the formal means of probabilism at the wrong time-when there is no possibility of our coming to a decision of an unambiguous kind by means of a universal essentialist-ethics and we then come too quickly to the conclusion that the concrete case must remain open to a decision in utramque partem after the manner of probabilism, because the only method known is that of the universal essentialist-ethics? In general, would not an existential-ethics determine the significance and the limits of the different systems in moral theology (i.e. nowadays above all probabilism) from the very start by a more exact ontology and theology of the ethical individual?

A further question would be whether we could not understand the whole teaching on Choice in the Spiritual Exercises of St Ignatius much more profoundly and exactly if we were clearly conscious of such an existential-ethics and the way of finding an ethical existential-imperative. According to the usual theory about the finding of the correct imperative in the concrete (which we have outlined at the beginning of the chapter), the third time for making a choice named in [232] the Exercises would have to be the real and decisive way of coming to a decision. But according to St Ignatius this time is only something secondary compared with the first and second times for choice. We may perhaps hazard the assertion that – as regards this point (as also many others) – our average theology and ethics has not yet caught up with the unconscious theology underlying the Exercises.

In the usual theory of sin we treat sin too exclusively as the mere offence against a universal divine norm. Could not an existential-ethics help us to see more clearly that sin, over and above its property of being an offence against the law of God, is also and just as

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

much an offence against an utterly individual imperative of the individual will of God, which is the basis of uniqueness? Would we not perceive sin more clearly in this way as the failure of the personal-individual love of God? Even though all this has been developed in a formal ontology which in itself is of a philosophical kind, would it not offer a set of categories applicable and useful in a theology of the supernatural as an immediate personal encounter with the personal God as he is in himself?

In an essay about the 'Individual in the Church', the author of the present study has drawn attention to the significance of the question developed here for the position of the individual in the Church.[4] We can merely make reference to this here. If there is an existential-ethics, then there is also a sphere of decision for the individual in and for the Church, which cannot be taken away from the individual by a material command of the ecclesiastical authority.

Has not our theory consequences also for a more profound theology of obedience in general, in the Church, and in the life of the religious? Is obedience to a person giving commands merely the respect for the objective rightness (to be presumed in the individual case) of the individual command, which is right as measured by the objective universal norms of a material kind on which it is based, or must obedience in some cases – and where and when – also be exercised as an act of homage to the individual will of the person commanding which can no longer be thought of as an interpretation and application of the universal and, in themselves, intelligible norms? When and towards whom is this second sort of obedience conceivable?

[233] Would it be possible to find reasons, in the proposed theory, for a difference between the teaching and pastoral offices as two spheres which are not adequately reducible to each other? That such a question also has very practical consequences for the life of the Church in the concrete surely does not need a great deal of explanation here.

What are the consequences of our theory for the theory of the choice of calling in the strict sense? Even though we should not dispute the practical usefulness of Lahitton's theory – the usual theory in the Church for the past forty years – about the choosing of a calling and the requirements for being called, especially where ecclesiastical functionaries are concerned (and not the person making the choice), we may nevertheless ask ourselves whether this theory is really quite correct theoretically and in particular where it is a question of the one who asks himself about his being called.

We might also ask ourselves whether the suggested theory could not provide a contribution to the question about the duty of striving for perfection. For if our theory is right, then the question about the duty of a higher moral good is not yet decided in the negative whenever it is impossible to derive this duty from universal norms.

Does our theory not permit us to contribute something also to the question about the relation between the hierarchical and charismatic elements in the Church and in her history? Is not the Hierarchy as such the bearer and guarantor of the correct application of the permanent norms instituted together with the Church? However, if the Church acts in her history and if every action is always also more than just the application of the universal norms to the concrete case and given situation, then must there not be a function in the Church which takes in precisely this divinely inspired individual impulse given to the action of the Church and gives it its validity in the Church – a function which cannot be replaced by the administration and right application of the universal norms? Must this function always be originally found and united in the person of the bearers of the hierarchical powers? And if not (as is undoubtedly the case, after all, according to the evidence of Church history), does the Hierarchy not have the duty then to accept such impulses from those quarters in which they

[4] Cf. Stimmen der Zeit CXXXIX (1946-47), pp. 260-276; the same in 'Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus', in the series Christ heute I, 10 (Einsiedeln 1950).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

originally strike the Church in the providence of God: even from the charismatics, the prophets or whatever one may wish to call these antennae of the individual divine imperatives given to the Church? Can this provide us with a rational basis for 'public opinion' in the [234] Church?[5] (Seen from this point of view, are – for example – the reasons given for the Sacred Heart devotion completely dependent on the fact that the general and ever valid dogma gives it a Nihil Obstat?)

Such and similar questions could no doubt be still further multiplied. However, these questions may show that the suggested theory is not merely of an academic nature. Certainly, this theory must not be overestimated in its significance. Just as there was logical thought before there was a reflectively grasped formal logic, so there was and is existential-ethical action of a natural and supernatural kind individually and in the Church, even before there is an explicitly developed existential-ethics. And just as, even after the discovery of formal logic, applied logic was not essentially improved, so it will also be in the present case. And yet, just as no one will on account of this hold formal logic to be a superfluous matter of idle curiosity, so, we would think, it will be necessary also to think about an existential-ethics of a formal kind. Such an ethics might have its uses from many points of view. For this it must, of course, be presupposed that it is right and is first of all developed explicitly. We did not mean to do more here than to raise a few questions in this direction.

[5] Cf. by the author: 'Die öffentliche Meinung in der Kirche', Orientierung XXIII-XXIV (1951), pp. 225-258; the same under the title of Free Speech in the Church (London and New York 1960).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[235]

8

THE DIGNITY AND FREEDOM OF MAN[1]

The general theme of the Austrian Catholic Congress (Katholikentag) is 'The Dignity and Freedom of Man'. The significance and aptness of this theme for the present state of the world is obvious. Yet so also is its obscurity. We need only remember that the word 'freedom' in particular has been the motto and war-cry of the most diverse intellectual and religious movements in the West. It was Paul's cry against Jewish legalism. It was the cry of the French Revolution and of Liberalism in their fight against the political and social system of the Christian Middle Ages in the West and against the Church . . . And strange to say, one hundred years ago under Pius IX, 'freedom' was the object of criticism and reservations on the part of the Church, whereas today under Pius XII it is the motto of a 'Katholikentag'.

There can be no question here of formulating stirring slogans with regard to this theme. Our intention is rather to put forward – quite soberly and almost in thesis form – a few basic reflections on this subject which might to some extent supply the basis for the various specialized group-discussions. These reflections, therefore, must not remain too much on the level of mere generalities and yet they must not be so 'concrete' as to anticipate and make superfluous the work on individual problems.

I. THE DIGNITY OF MAN

1. 'Dignity' in general signifies the fact that a being has of its very nature a determined objective position within the manifoldness and [236] heterogeneity of being which demands respect and protection as well as realization both in its relations to others and in itself. Thus 'dignity' is, in the last analysis, objectively identical with the being of an entity – understood as that which is given necessarily in its 'essential structure' (Wesensstruktur) and as that which is given as a task (Aufgegebenes) to be accomplished. And in the present context 'essential structure' means everything man necessarily is and must be, whether this – regarded in itself – be a natural essence (Natur) or whether it be – with reference to the basic structure – a free gift of God, a grace and hence supernatural.

2. For the exact nature of the dignity of man we must consult Reason and Revelation. We cannot give a detailed explanation here either of the methods of natural knowledge by reason and the science of revelation or of their respective possibilities, validity, differences and mutual relationships. We must simply mention two things:

a. With regard to objective rank, subjective claim to lead and comprehensiveness in content, the knowledge and science of revelation as found in the believer is superior to rational metaphysical knowledge. This is true even though, conversely, a certain 'natural' knowledge is also required as an irreplaceable prerequisite for the knowledge of faith. For this 'natural' knowledge itself is effectively exercised through God's saving grace, as well as being co-revealed as a guarantee for its true contents by the God of revelation. Hence our

[1] This Essay was originally given as a Paper at the opening meeting of the Study Session of the Austrian 'Katholikentag' (Catholic Congress) in Mariazell on 1st May 1952. This fact determined its subject. We have not tried here to disguise its thematic thought and form as pre-determined by the leading ideas of the Vienna 'Katholikentag'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

method in attempting to express the nature and dignity of man will be to start from revelation and to try to determine, as far as possible, the 'natural' remainder of that dignity from this starting-point, i.e. from the whole of this (historical) 'nature' of man.

b. In view of the biological, cultural and cultural-historical mutability of man, it is no easy task to attain an exact metaphysical understanding of the permanent, necessary nature of man underlying his historical mutability. Such a knowledge is not to be gained by a mere collection of factual evidence of what can be observed at a moment of time in the individual man – by using, as it were, the methods of the natural sciences. For this would imply that what can be thus observed is 'everything', or that everything observed is necessary for the nature or in accordance with it. A knowledge of essences (Wesenserkenntnis) which includes the concrete knowledge about the possibilities [237] of nature (which in part are to be freely realized), must rely rather on a twofold method:

(i) On a transcendental method. Everything which already reaffirms itself with implicit necessity in the very question about the nature of man and in the very way man puts this question (i.e. more strictly speaking, in the metaphysical aspect of the knowledge man has of himself), belongs to the metaphysically necessary nature of man and to the moral perfection of that nature. Anything in this knowledge which is not transcendentally 'lasting' in this sense, need not on that account be accidental; but the question of its belonging to the necessary nature of man does in this case require to be proved separately and cannot be presupposed as self-evident.

(ii) The reflection on the historical experience man has of himself, without which the notion of man remains 'empty' and without which this notion has no clearness and consequently no power in history. Such reflection is indispensable because only in this way can we recognize the metaphysical possibilities of man as a free being which, because he is free, cannot be adequately deduced from something else clearly given. Since this reflection, being itself a 'historically becoming' process, is essentially unfinished, the understanding of the essence is permanently in via in spite of its a-priori and transcendental metaphysical element. To give an adequate design of man (what he is and ought to become) by an a-priori-rationalistic reason is impossible. Man must always refer also to his history and thus even to his future in order to know what he is. And conversely, the critique of the experience of self, which is necessary because not everything which is, is right and 'rational', refers the historical experience back to the transcendental, metaphysical method of self-knowledge and to God's judgement on man in revelation. Because man really knows 'concretely' about himself in this historical experience only – an experience which is still in a state of becoming – there is no manifest knowledge of essence without Tradition (of a natural kind and of the kind of saving history) and without a venturing, planning, devising anticipation of the future (which is itself grasped in an intramundane, 'utopian' manner and in a revealed 'eschatology'). All that follows, about the dignity (i.e. the nature) of man, must be understood with the reservation that the second element of this knowledge of essence is brought out merely formally and not in its reflex content. Finally, it must be noted that nothing can be explained here regarding these questions by [238] something which is itself no more than an independent and lucid hypothesis, but that every notion refers to everyone for its explanation, and that such explanation must always merely elucidate the explaining and the explained and at the same time remove them into the obscurity of mystery.

3. The essential dignity of man consists in the fact that, within a sexually differentiated community in spatio-temporal history, man, by spiritually recognizing himself and freely identifying himself, can and ought to open himself (in the direction of immediate personal communion with the infinite God) to the love in Jesus Christ which communicates God

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation himself. His dignity may be regarded as something pre-established (vorgegebene), i.e. as a capacity and a task, or as something fulfilled. Fulfilment, the gaining and preservation of the pre-established dignity constitutes itself the final and definite dignity of man (which, therefore, can be lost). The pre-established dignity cannot simply cease or become non-existent, but can exist as something denied, as foundation for damnation and judgement. In so far as this nature is from God and directed to God, receiving from him and opening itself in his direction, it is a nature in which the given dignity is always both the innermost being of man and what lies above man and hence partakes in the remoteness, the mysteriousness and namelessness of God. It only unveils itself completely in the knowing-believing-loving dialogue of man with God, and hence can never be given simply in the manner of object-like objectivity. We perceive God in a mirror and in images only; the same is equally true of man and of his destiny, for he is from God and directed towards God.

4. The dignity of nature is pre-appointed (vor-gegeben) to man for his free self-understanding – as the goal of his freedom, as its salvation or judgement.

5. The dignity of man's nature may be regarded formally, i.e. in advance of the question whether, by exercising his free choice, which is dependent of course on redemptive grace and the judgement of God, his dignity brings about his salvation or God's judgement upon him. [239] Regarded in this way, the dignity of man's nature embraces the following moments which mutually determine each other:

a. Man's personal nature (in its specifically created and human characteristic), i.e. the 'natural' being of man. This means:

(i) Man is Spirit: in the perception of the spatio-temporal, he is always dependent on the total unity of reality, i.e. on God, who existed before the multiplicity of his immediately-given objects. This is true even in his own case, understood as a subject set off from the object and (implicitly) perceiving.

(ii) He is freedom: about this we will have to say more later.

(iii) He is an individual: he is not merely an instance of the universal; each man is someone unique and ultimately never someone who can be totally deduced; his individuality in being-thus and in action is not merely the negatively spatio-temporal application of a universal or of a universal idea, which circumscribes him in the here and now. Because he is an individual, he has a valid existence which, as a real existence, does not coincide with his spatio-temporal existence; he is 'immortal' and the subject of an eternal destination and destiny. This is why the individual man, who is now, may never be forcibly sacrificed, in a manner which destroys him, for the future of 'humanity', of the others who come after him. The present is never just the material for a utopian intramundane future.

(iv) He is a community-building person: Person is not the opposite to community; rather, both are correlative realities, i.e. qua person, man is intended for community with other persons (God and men), and there is community only where there are persons and where persons are protected; he is a perfect person in the measure in which he opens himself in love and service for other persons. A genuine problem of opposing tensions exists only where (and in so far as) there is a question of striking a balance, in the plurality of human existence, between personality (or community) on one particular human level (as, for instance, on the level of economics, of the State, of the Church) and the same sort of community (or personality) on another level.

(v) He is (qua human person) an incarnate, mundane person who realizes himself in his ultimate core only in a spatio-temporal, pluralistic expansion, in concern for his bodily

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

existence (economy) and within a community communicated in a tangible manner (marriage, parent-and-child relationship, the State, Incarnation, Church, [240] sacraments, symbol, etc.). The personality of man, therefore, cannot be relegated to an absolutely internal realm. It requires of necessity a certain space for realizing itself. Such a space, although it is to a certain extent 'external' to it (body, earth, economy, sign, symbol, State), is nevertheless essentially necessary and hence must be so constructed that it permits personal self-realization. Seen even from this point of view, a retreat into the merely 'private', the inner 'conscience', the 'sacristy', etc., is contrary to nature.

b. The supernatural existential. This means: the person, as we have just outlined him, is called to direct personal communion with God in Christ, perennially and inescapably, whether he accepts the call in redemption and grace or whether he closes himself to it in guilt (by the guilt of original sin and of personal sin). The person is addressed by the personal revelation of the Word of God in saving history which finds its climax in Jesus Christ, the Word of the Father become flesh; the person is unquestionably situated within the offer of his interior, saving and divinizing grace; he is called to the community-forming visible manifestation of this personal state of 'being directly called before God' which is the Church.

c. The supernatural existential is related to what we have called the personal nature of man, as a gratuitous gift of God, as grace. In this way man exists in nature and 'supernature'. This does not, however, mean that it is left to his free choice whether he intends to understand himself as a purely natural person or as a person called to direct communion with God by grace.

6. With this essence and this dignity of man there is given a plurality of human existential dimensions (Existentialien):

a. He is a corporeal-material living being, in a biological community of life with its material surroundings, and with a care for its will to live.

b. He is a spiritual-personal, cultural being with a diversity of personal communities (marriage union, family, kinsfolk, a people, the State, the community of nations), and with a history.

c. He is a religious, God-centred being (by nature and grace), with a 'Church', in a history which either damns or saves.

d. He is a Christ-centred being, i.e. his being possesses an ontic and spiritual-personal capacity for communicating with Jesus Christ in [241] whom God has forever made the countenance of a man his own and has opened the reality of man, with an unsurpassable finality, in the direction of God; only thus was the real possibility of a direct communion of all men with God established with finality. Hence we can only speak ultimately of God by engaging even in the midst of all this (in the midst of theology) in anthropology; and ultimately any information about anthropology, about the nature and dignity of man, can be given only when we engage in theology about God and from God.

7. a. While the many existential dimensions must be distinguished, they and their achievement cannot be divorced from each other 'spatially' in the concrete. Each one of these existential dimensions is really dependent on the other. The lowest dimension is determined by the highest and vice versa; the whole being of man must work itself out in each one of them in particular. Every attempt by a dimension to make itself independent and self-sufficient, even merely in its own realm, contradicts the fact that man, without prejudice to any true and genuine plurality of his ontological moments, is first and last, originally and by destination, one person. Hence, for instance, economics or even economic legislation do not

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

enjoy a 'pure' autonomy from the laws of the spiritual person, i.e. from ethics.

b. On the other hand, man in his self-knowledge, which must always proceed from a multiplicity of perceived objects and remains dependent on this multiplicity as such, can never perceive himself adequately from one principle, in such a way that he could adequately deduce from this his existential dimensions and their structural laws. There is, therefore, a permanent plurality of sciences of man and a relative individual structure of laws for each existential dimension and of the powers administering and forming it, which must be respected by every other.

c. Because this plurality possesses in its turn a structure and a superior and lower order, the claim of the higher dimension takes precedence over that of the lower one in any (apparent or, for the meantime, rightful) case of conflict.

8. The nature and dignity of man are threatened. And that in a twofold way:

[242] a. From without: Man as a bodily being, before he has made his personal decision, is 'open to being seized by a creaturely influence which is independent of him: the influence of material forces and other created persons (men and angelic powers). Although an ultimate and final damning situation for man can arise only through the free decision, of man from within, nevertheless such interventions from without, which touch the person and his personal arid indeed supernatural dignity, are possible and hence menacing. There is no 'zone' of the person which is absolutely inaccessible to such influences from without. Every 'external' event can be significant and menacing for the ultimate salvation of the person, and is, therefore, subject to the law of the dignity of the person who as such can be degraded by some intervention from without (cf. 7a and 7c above).

b. From within: Since the dignity of man is imposed as a task on man who disposes of himself in freedom, man can fail to find himself and his dignity by a free offence against himself in any one of the existential dimensions, in so far as this offence touches the whole of man essentially. Man cannot, indeed, cancel out or change his pre-established essential dignity as he pleases; but in practice he can understand it in such a way that this dignity contradicts its own pre-established nature ontologically and hence ethically, even by the way it is activated; in this sense, he can degrade it by becoming culpable before God. The use of his freedom necessarily poses man with the choice of degrading his dignity or preserving it by the grace of God and converting it into achieved dignity.

c. External and internal threats mutually determine each other, seen from a total viewpoint. Speaking theologically, the fact of being threatened from without is, in its post-paradisian characteristic, a consequence of man's perversion from within. And at the same time, this external threat is the situation in which the inner defection of man from his own nature achieves itself in a characteristically post-paradisian, impelled and concupiscent manner, so that ultimately for us – before the revelation of the judgment of God – guilt and fate become unceasingly intertwined.

9. One of the results of this situation of being threatened is that man inevitably finds himself either in a state of guilt or in a state of redemption, in so far as he has had any free control at all over himself [243] (we prescind here from the manner of original sin's sinfulness). As a spiritual person, control over himself is for him inescapable. If, however, he has control over himself, then he has control (implicitly or explicitly) over himself in accordance with all the existential dimensions of his being. He accepts, therefore, his concrete being (including the supernatural existential of this being), or he possesses it in the manner of rejection and then he is guilty. There cannot be any existential neutrality in the face of the historical being of man. The question can only be how far man – precisely by objective reflection – must be explicitly conscious, in his understanding of himself (which of itself need not be adequately reflex), of the depth of his being and of his dignity. Men acting historically among each other are, therefore, in actual fact either men with a dignity which they have culpably degraded or men with a dignity redeemed by grace. The precise position of the border-line between the two within the saving history of humanity only God knows. It does not, at any rate, coincide unequivocally with the boundaries of Christianity or of the visible Church. There is also a battle of light and darkness within the Church.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

10. Where the pre-established nature and dignity of man is preserved, and where the individual realizes it in the particular manner which was assigned to him alone, there is redemption by the grace of Christ. This means:

a. There is preservation and realization of a nature to which belongs the supernatural existential of being called to immediate participation in the life of God, i.e. participation in the grace of the Son of the Father become man.

b. This act of preservation and unfolding of nature has a reality which presupposes the entitative, gratuitous communication of the divine nature to man.

c. The accomplishment of this act is itself, without prejudice to its freedom, a gratuitous grace of God, considered even as an accomplishment in actual fact.

d. In so far as this act aims, in its reflex-objective explicitness, at the preservation and unfolding of the natural essence by observing the 'law of nature' (i.e. in so far as this act is considered as nothing more than this), it is in itself basically possible without any supernatural help of grace and external revelation of God. However, in so far as even [244] such a taking possession of oneself as regards one's natural essence requires quite a long temporal duration for its accomplishment, it needs the help of God's grace:

(i) In the concrete, post-Adamite situation of man, an actually undimmed and sufficiently unfolded perception of the natural essence of man, taken as the norm of his natural moral acts, can be obtained only with the help of the revelation of God's Word.

(ii) The actual accomplishment of such acts (in their longer temporal duration), even in their natural aspect, can take place only by the help of God's grace. This grace is not owed to the individual qua individual with regard to his actions (over and above his mere potency), it is given to him with a view to the total salvation (and hence also that which embraces the supernatural dimension of man) of the whole concrete human being in Christ and as destined for the eternal life of God.

Hence the actual preservation of the dignity of man, even in its natural dimensions, depends on God's supernatural will of grace in Christ Jesus. Any actually preserved dignity of man, wherever it is to be found, is a part of Christian salvation – it is redemption in Christ Jesus. This does not necessarily mean, however, that man must thus be always and everywhere conscious of this source of his actual preservation, that he must explicitly accept it as redemption, or that the preserved dignity in its natural and supernatural dimension can on this account be found only within the visible framework of Christianity. Where and to whom God gives the grace of Christ, this he alone decides. It is his secret. What we know about the conditions of such a distribution in the actual order (necessity of faith and, in certain circumstances, of baptism), does not permit us to make any unequivocal judgement in the concrete, individual case about whether grace has been given and thus the vocation and dignity of man has been preserved.

11. Accordingly, it is absolutely possible in the nature of things, it can and should be our

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

aim, to reach a mutual understanding with unbelievers even qua unbelievers (i.e. with non-Christians) about the natural part of the actual constitution of the nature of man, about his dignity as a person and the 'natural moral law' resulting from it. However, the following points must be observed:

[245] a. Wherever and in so far as such an understanding is wholly or to a large extent successful, it is also in actual fact itself the result of the indirect influence of revelation (through the believer in revelation) on the unbeliever who otherwise would not actually see without error what in principle he is capable of seeing.

b. The practical consequences arising from the formal principles regarding the natural being of man and his dignity, thus accepted in common, will again differ essentially in the case of the Christian and of the unbeliever, since they do not yet give the former a grasp of the totality of the actual man. The significance of this agreement, possible in principle, must therefore not be overrated. This agreement does not in practice lead to any real concrete settlement, not even in a partial sphere of human existence, but at the most to a provisional agreement in tolerance which, even in the particular sector which really cannot be adequately separated from the rest, signifies a certain modus vivendi and nothing more. (Think, for instance, of the questions of education and schools, cultural-political problems, etc.)

12. If we have in this way to some extent circumscribed the dignity of man in its objective content, we can now define it in its formal quality and draw the most fundamental conclusions from the definition.

a. In so far as man is a person, who possesses himself knowingly and in freedom – in other words, is always objectively referred to himself and hence does not ontologically have the character of a means but of an end, an end by a reference away from himself, indeed, to persons but not to things (which themselves are rather referred to persons), he has an absolute value and hence an absolute dignity. What we call the absolute, unqualified validity of moral values is essentially based on the absolute value and the absolute dignity of the spiritual and free person. 'Absolute' means here the same as 'unconditional' (but not 'infinite'). This means that all subhuman things and values of an objective kind are conditional, i.e. they are dependent on a free (even ethically) determination and choice of values: if (you are not obliged to) you want this or that, then you must do, prefer, respect, etc., this or that. The human person by its nature and dignity demands an unconditional respect which is independent of any freely exercised determination of an end and value – i.e. is absolute.

[246] b. This dignity of man as a person is given an even greater quality essentially and in the actual order, in respect of its absoluteness, by the fact that man is called to be the direct partner of God, who is the simply Absolute and Infinite.

II. THE FREEDOM OF THE PERSON IN GENERAL

Because one of the existentials of man, viz. freedom, is particularly threatened today in its right understanding and its exercise, we must turn to it in particular at this point.

1. Freedom of choice (or of decision), being a basic condition of the person, can be defined only with difficulty. It is the possibility for the person to dispose himself in such a way that this disposal in its concreteness cannot be entirely resolved or analysed into something different from itself from which it could be deduced, so that in such case it would be, and be thus, because its prerequisites happened to bi such and not otherwise. By prerequisites we

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

mean here both internal and external presuppositions, the inner disposition of the person, the external circumstances and conditions, present before the decision. The causality of free action must, therefore, be understood as a free openness to more than what is realized by the decision. This causality can, therefore, be possible only when faced with the finite, or the infinite conceived as merely finite, and hence can have meaning only in the face of the finite. Of course, in so far as the source of the existence of an affirmative or negative attitude towards the absolute God lies precisely in the adoption of a right or wrong attitude towards finite goods (or those conceived as finite) in their divinely caused order, in virtue of the necessary relation of the spirit to the absolute which supports freedom, freedom is in the last analysis the possibility through and beyond the finite, of taking up a position towards God himself. This position is taken up by the person himself and he himself is responsible for it. Freedom is possible, therefore, only as the transition from the open choice of infinite possibilities to the definiteness of the finite realization, in which and passing through which the infinite destiny of man is gained or lost in a personal manner. And so freedom is possible only where there is a transcendental openness to the infinite God, that is to say in the spiritual person. Freedom is self-achievement [247] of the person, using a finite material, before the infinite God. It is, therefore, a datum of theology, of theological anthropology. For without freedom man could not stand before God as a responsible agent, in dialogue and partnership with God; without it he could not be the subject of guilt before God nor of profferred and accepted redemption and pardon.

1. However, finite freedom is preceded, without prejudice to genuine spontaneity, by interior and external conditions different from its act, and hence it presupposes also a law of the ontological and ethical order. It is the freedom to say yes or no to a call; it is not an absolutely creative freedom. Of course, this call must not be understood here merely as a universal law, nor the ‘yes’ merely as the realization of universal norms of being, as if it were merely a ‘case’. These preliminary conditions, which are constitutive conditions for the exercise of finite freedom, are themselves finite and thus limit the possibilities of freedom. They are not equally great in every case and they are changeable. It follows that we cannot demand a determined and fixed magnitude of such prerequisite conditions and of the possibilities of freedom pre-established in them, as arising out of the nature of creaturely freedom. Herein consists the ontological and ethical basis for a legitimate limitation of freedom. This must be noted if we wish to distinguish the legitimate and the false meaning of an equality of rights for everyone and of the equality of all before the law. Basically, such an equality of rights can merely mean that everyone shall have his rights protected, rights which only coincide with the rights of everyone else in certain basic points, but not in every point of an objective kind. The tendency towards the attainment of an adequate material equality of rights for everyone would only mean the Oppression of everyone, because it would be based on an interference with the different scope for freedom objectively ordained for every individual in particular.

3. Freedom, on the one hand, is the manner of the appropriation and realization of the person and of his absolute dignity before God and in the community of other persons, using finite, decided materials. And yet, on the other hand, freedom must not on that account be [248] conceived as a merely formal capacity which receives its significance only from the result realized by it but different from it. The person and, consequently, freedom are themselves existing realities of the highest order and are, therefore, even in themselves absolute values. Thus freedom is also meant to be for its own sake, so that, even if all its

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

results were attainable without it (which is not so in reality), it would still have to exist, and the frustration of its exercise would still mean an attempt on the absolute dignity of the person. And so it is not in the least a matter of indifference whether a result is brought about with or without freedom.

4. If, on the one hand, freedom considered simply in itself, i.e. freedom of exercise and not merely freedom in what is done, belongs to the absolute dignity of the person and if, on the other hand, it is dependent for its exercise in the concrete on conditions of an external, and internal kind, then the concession of these possibilities of the exercise of freedom to a sufficiently large extent is demanded by the dignity of the person. To deprive the person totally of this scope for freedom would, therefore, still be a degradation of the person even when the thing to be done would still be attainable without this concession of scope for freedom. Simply to deprive a person of the scope even for morally wrong decisions of freedom (even if or in so far as such a thing is or were possible) cannot, therefore, be the business of any man or of any human society in its dealings with other men. Even this would be an attempt on the dignity of the person and of his freedom which is not merely a means to an end (i.e. of the good realized, without freedom) but is also itself a part of the goal (viz. of the person). The unconditional refusal of the possibility of an objectively and morally wrong decision would amount to a suppression of the very scope for freedom itself. It is no counter-argument to this to point out the fact that it is impossible for the Blessed to sin. For they have already achieved their freedom totally. Freedom, however, does not consist in always being able to do the opposite of what has been done up to now, but it consists in being able to effect oneself once and for all into finality. This does not postulate any real 'right' to what is morally evil which would relate to the morally evil as such. We merely mean to say by this that the attempt to make what is morally evil more or less completely impossible by coercion is not only in actual fact [249] quite utopian in this world, but must in the concrete degenerate into a morally wrong attempt to eradicate the scope for freedom itself.

5. The scope for freedom thus demanded as the possibility of the exercise of freedom must – without prejudice to the plurality of moments of human existence – extend through all the dimensions of this existence on account of the mutual interconnection of the dimensions of human existence. To try to exclude some particular material of finite goods for freedom from this scope for freedom right from the start and absolutely, and to try to limit freedom a priori to certain other fields of personal freedom, would violate against the principle formulated above (I, 7a) and would represent a grave injury to the dignity of the person. Hence there must be a zone of personal freedom in the sphere of economy, of the formation of communities, of the creation of objective cultural values, in the religious field, in the sphere of Christian values, whether or not these realms in particular and taken simply by themselves could 'function' sufficiently even without such a concession of freedom.

6. The moral law as such (in contrast to the forced compliance with it) is not a limitation of freedom, since it does after all presuppose freedom of its very nature and turns to it (since it is fulfilled only when it is obeyed freely), and since it orientates freedom to its own essential goal, viz. the true achievement of the person. The law (qua liberating law of freedom) can do this, to be sure, only if it is more than a merely destructive demand which provokes guilt, i.e. in so far as it is not a demand made on the powerless from without but the imperative expression of a power from within which is granted to the person in the concrete order of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

salvation only by the pneuma of God (cf. above I, 10).

7. The freedom of the personal decision for which we are responsible ourselves and the consequences of which we must bear ourselves is a higher value (because more personal) than material security of physical existence as such. The flight from freedom into the enclosure of a merely secure life is, therefore, immoral. Wherever (and in so far [250] as) a certain freedom and security of the material conditions of life belong to the necessary practical prerequisites of personal freedom, they are sanctioned by the dignity of human freedom and must be demanded in the name of this freedom – they must, therefore, be fashioned in such a way that the freedom of man itself is not sacrificed to the desire of possessing these material goods.

8. There can nevertheless be a justified limitation, not indeed of freedom as such, but of the scope for freedom. For the latter is (a) changeable and finite from the very start and independently of any human intervention and (b) is unavoidably changed in one person. (even to the extent of a restriction) by the claim to freedom made by another person. Restriction of the scope for freedom of one person even when voluntarily posited by another cannot therefore be immoral, but flows precisely from the nature of the freedom of finite persons who exercise their freedom in a common space of human existence.

9. Such a limitation of the scope for freedom is thinkable as legitimate on various counts and in different ways:

a. As making it impossible to have a total or partial, but unlawful, restriction of some people's scope for freedom by others. For instance, the principle of the lawfulness of compulsion in a formal democracy: the freedom of political groupings is conceded only to those who also recognize this freedom in others; against enemies of democratic freedom we may proceed with compulsion. Or: anyone who steals is put in prison; society's reply to the unlawful limitation of freedom in the material realm of the free shaping of one's life is the enforced limitation of the freedom of movement. This principle of the enforced protection of the freedom of the many against someone who threatens freedom is not, however, the sole principle of the lawful restriction of freedom. There are others which are equally essential.

b. As an educative restriction of the scope for freedom with a view to the liberation of freedom. Man, on account of the uninvited influences exerted on him from without, is not simply and from the very start in lordly possession of complete control over his personal power of decision. He can be swept away involuntarily (before any action of [251] his freedom takes place) to do actions which either lack freedom and responsibility completely or possess them only to a diminished degree, and which then become an obstacle to and restriction of the possibilities of his freedom for good. He can be corrupted in advance of his decision. The enforced restriction or elimination of such influences imposed by others (viz. 'those charged with upbringing', such as the State, the Church, etc.) is not an attempt on freedom, even when it is done in the face of objections from the one who is not really limited by this in any proper sense. In this respect it would be a false, utopian outlook of an optimistic or pessimistic kind if we were to think that man can, from a certain age onwards, do without any such, to-a-certain-extent enforced education by others (i.e. an education which does not merely appeal to the free good sense of the other by exhortation and instruction, etc.) or if, on the other hand, we tried to keep every possibility for evil always and everywhere away from him.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

c. Whenever the legitimate demand for an objective action (be it legitimate by reason of the things itself or by reason of obligations freely contracted towards it) is of its nature independent in its objective being of whether its performance is constituted by freedom or without it – and to the extent in which this applies – then the enforcing of some action is not contrary to the nature of freedom.

d. Difficulties arise in the case of someone, on the grounds of conscience, refusing to do something which is objectively justified and hence legitimately enforceable, by maintaining that conscience forbids him to perform this task (refusal to do military service, etc.). In such a case the following has to be said:

(i) The one who makes the demand must re-examine the justification for his demand very closely, out of respect for the freedom and conscience of the person who refuses.

(ii) He must ask himself whether he has merely the right or is furthermore morally bound to make this demand.

(iii) If the former, then he can desist from enforcing his demand. In many cases such a course will even be advisable or demanded by general considerations.

(iv) If the latter, then he has the right and duty to enforce his demand (in so far as this is possible) by using coercive measures proportioned to the importance of his demand. For it is then not really a case of a conflict between freedom-conscience, on the one hand, and [252] coercion, on the other hand, but between freedom and conscience on both sides. The tragic conflict between the objectively justified and obligatory demand, on the one hand, and the subjective conscience in good faith, on the other, is insoluble in practice. Its tragedy must be accepted with patience and mutual respect as a sign of the imperfection of the order here below.

e. The performance of actions and adoption of attitudes which essentially include the free 'yes' as one of their internal constitutive moments (and to the extent in which they do this), must not be coerced. The only law that remains valid in this case is the law of what ought to be done, and no longer the law of what must be done. The actual demarcation of the one case from the other is indeed difficult, because the concrete execution can include both moments. On account of the higher dignity of freedom as compared with the doing of something, we must decide against the use of coercion in a doubtful case.

10. Since there is, therefore, a legitimate (and of its nature, higher) principle of freedom and a legitimate (although of its nature lower) principle of justified coercion – and since both these principles are not capable of simply being divided between separate dimensions of human existence and action in such a way that they do not come into conflict from the very start – there arises the problem of drawing the right line between coercion and freedom in the same realm of freedom. The following has to be said on this subject:

a. Every demarcation in the concrete is morally justified and feasible in the long run only when it respects both principles. Anarchic freedom and absolute totalitarian coercion both equally misunderstand the nature and dignity of the human person and of freedom.

b. It is impossible to find a demarcation which can be deduced a priori, which is valid once and for all and in every case and which is at the same time exact, because the finite realm of freedom possesses an objective variability the exact magnitude of which itself depends again both on the concreteness of the situation and on the free decision of man.

c. It is also not possible to discover such an unequivocal demarcation from revelation and the teaching of the Church. Even these sources do not provide us with any possibility of a theological rationalism [253] in the construction of a fixed system of the right proportion between freedom and coercion in society, the State, the Church, etc., which would be valid always and everywhere.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

d. Hence it is a duty of man for the preservation of his dignity and freedom continually to renew and re-establish a correct proportion between both these factors – a moral duty which he has as a man and as a Christian.

e. The demarcation of boundaries is variable. It must be undertaken, within the framework of the general principles:

(i) In accordance with the objective and changing circumstances of mental disposition, economic situation, the real possibilities of the use of freedom, etc., which objectively can prescribe certain obligatory changes of demarcation. To these 'objective' circumstances of the situation can also belong those which in themselves have arisen from the wrongly employed freedom of men but which in actual fact have already taken root in an objectified manner in certain attitudes and needs, etc. In this case it would actually cause even more serious damage to freedom and the objective order not to take cognizance of such real facts. This is the right place for showing a legitimate 'tolerance' in the proper sense of the word, which puts up with what objectively is not justified but nevertheless is given in actual fact, because its removal would in fact cause more evil than good. (Where freedom of conscience is respected as such, even when it – i.e. obeying the dictum of conscience – realizes itself in the wrong object and yet exists as freedom of conscience itself, it would be more correct not to speak of tolerance or 'toleration' but of active esteem and respectful deference before the conscience of another. Objectively false situations must in certain circumstances be tolerated; positions adopted by conscience which are subjectively right or must be imputed as subjectively right, even if they have a false object, must always be respected and never be injured.)

(ii) As a historical decision. This means that even bearing in mind the general principles and taking into consideration as objectively as possible the concrete situation, there still are (at least in principle) several possibilities open which form the object of the free historical decision of the powers appointed for this (both individuals and groups). This means that here the result is not merely a deduced application of formal principles to purely static, objectively established circumstances, but that it has the characteristic of historical uniqueness [254] and of creative originality in which the dignity of freedom reaches its highest achievement.

f. Hence the historical way of acting of Christians in society, the State and the Church, has inevitably the character of a bold venture, of uncertainty, of walking into the dark, of 'not knowing what we should pray for', of praying for gracious guidance from above to lead us beyond that which can be calculated in advance, of 'art' (in contrast to theory). Anyone who believes himself to be dispensed, at least as a Christian, from making such a decision, on account of the fact that the shaping of the future is in the nature of a venture, offends against the historicity of his existence and becomes all the more guilty. The Christian has not merely the duty of proclaiming and commending the ever valid principles; he must place his trust in God and venture a concrete future. Even as a Christian he must not only suffer but also act without the rightness and the intramundane powerfulness for the future of his concrete actions being materially and concretely guaranteed for him simply by the rightness of his principles. This is true in general and especially is it true of the courage needed for freedom and coercion and their concrete balancing. That we always have to deal with a fluid, unstable and provisional balance arises ultimately not from any cheap cowardly willingness to compromise on the part of the Christian, or from an uncreative decadence of man at a certain period, but from the essential creaturely nature of man; man in his knowledge and freedom as a creature does not stand at the absolutely one point of origin of all reality, but must master what is for him an indissoluble plural reality in the one realm of his free actions by human truth and creaturely freedom. Compromise, the middle way, the 'on the one hand – on the other hand', a seemingly uncreative lack of originality, incompleteness, provisionality, making an attempt with right of recall and with reservations, the abandoning of a position,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

being willing to learn from new experiences, slow evolution, the lack of any clear sustained construction, etc. – all these are, in their right place, signs of genuineness and of genuine humanity. We do not have any reason for letting ourselves be impressed by the unbending monoideism of other 'Weltanschauungen' (outlooks on life). Anyone who believes that he can open all locks with one key, arrogates God's position to himself, is lying and has no genuine future. All this does not in the least signify a confused, vague both-yes-and-no-programme for the Christian. Precisely because, on the one hand, [255] the concrete imperative programme of action is not unequivocally deducible from metaphysical and theological principles and yet, on the other hand, because it is something necessary, it does not need to be a popular repetition of eternal principles in uniformly balanced vagueness but ought rather to command courageously and with justified one-sidedness (i.e. subjection to the situation) what ought to be done at this particular moment. For however true both 'sides' of a question (the question of coercion and freedom, for instance) usually are in theory, both of them are not equally urgent for action at every moment. Watchword and theory rightly have different structures. The Christian must not only have the courage to uphold a balanced eternal theory but must also have the courage and decisiveness to pass a clear, even though time-bound, watchword which he, in certain circumstances, can utter in the name of Christianity although it has not been and also cannot be proclaimed by the Church as such.

g. The execution of such a shifting of the boundary between freedom and coercion must generally take place by evolution, making full use of the legal possibilities already given. Whenever the present state of affairs encloses an essential and general annulment of the rights of freedom granted by natural law, the changing of this state is permitted (from the Christian point of view) even by the employment of revolutionary acts; and indeed, if there is any real hope of success, such a method of removal is demanded of those who have the necessary means at their disposal.

h. The boundary between freedom and coercion lies within each particular dimension of human existence, each of which regarded by itself differs from the others in the nature of things. The more material such a dimension, the more confined may be the field of freedom in principle; the more personal the dimension, the greater the actual freedom must be. The Christian is, therefore, quite rightly, more touchy about the interference of the State in matters of cultural import, for instance, than about its interference in economic matters. Although the Church is not a free association of men but rather (like the State) has a right to exist prior to such associations, she cannot force anyone to enter her against his will.

III. THE STATE AND FREEDOM

I. The State exists for man and not vice versa. It must serve the personal dignity and freedom of man. It is true that the communities of [256] interest and the orientation of man to a 'thou' in love and mutual service already belong to the nature of man from the very start. And yet the State is not the first and decisive organization of these communities but merely a subsidiary social organization which must serve these more primitive and essential communities (such as the marriage community, the family, the clan, local and vocational communities, the community of friends, a people, communities arising from common possession and creation of cultural goods, etc.). The State presupposes these; it does not first invest them through itself with their rights.

2. And yet the State is a natural institution, founded on the natural law wherever a greater number of people are living together. Its final structures and rights are not arbitrarily assigned

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

to it by its citizens.

3. The State does not grant the original rights and the scope for freedom of the individual and the smaller but more primitive communities (which are more primitive because arising more closely from the core of the person). Rather, it must protect them and, where necessary, regulate and harmonize them with each other. It must, therefore, always authenticate its right to make a particular limitation of freedom in a concrete case – it cannot simply presuppose such a right. And it must in the case of such limitations of freedom and use of coercive measures keep to the already mentioned principles. It must in certain circumstances refuse to further its citizens' flight from freedom. There are also instances of a 'voluntary' transference of rights which the State ought not to accept so long as the individual or the smaller communities can look after these rights.

4. Even those laws of a formal democracy which have come into being in a formally incontestable manner, are only then justified when they do not annul the freedom of the individual in some sector of his sphere of existence or curtail it beyond right measure. Otherwise democracy becomes the dictatorship of the numerical majority, which is just as immoral (because ultimately the same) as a totalitarian State in which every right of the individual is merely a concession granted by the apparatus of the State.

[257] 5. The (written and unwritten) constitution of a State will be all the more the way it ought to be, the more that State is so constituted as to allow the citizen the effective use of his native rights and freedoms, even against the State itself, be it by a division of powers and an independent administration of justice orientated by the natural law, or be it over and above this (which is ultimately something absolutely necessary and cannot be replaced by formal State laws) by an effective appeal to the conscience of the supreme rulers of the State who bow before and know themselves responsible to God and his law. Wherever man no longer has such a possibility of exercising his rights against the State, there we have the Moloch of the totalitarian State, no matter what its written constitution may be.

6. The universal and equal suffrage in a formal democracy is neither a necessary right flowing everywhere and always from the nature of the human person nor is it a sufficient safeguard in itself of the right order of a State or of the just laws and the right demarcation between freedom and coercion. It may even stand in the way of a reform of conditions and outlook and cover up the fact that not only must everyone be given an equal right but his right. Of course, this universal and equal suffrage may in a certain historical situation be in actual fact an indispensable, even though by itself insufficient prerequisite for the maintenance of the citizen's freedom against the State. Yet we must not then grow forgetful on this account of the other necessities for the State: the education and formation in principles and practical acquaintance with affairs of the rising generation of political leaders, legal measures against the dictatorship of political parties, care and maintenance of the communities which have a midway position between the individual and the State, delegation of specialist problems away from the political parliament to appropriate specialized organs (which have to be set up if need be).

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

7. There are unchangeable principles akin to the natural law and of a Christian kind which are valid for every State and for the constitution of every State and economy. To see that they are observed in the State and in the economy as well as in their constitutions, is the duty of every Christian. Their observation would be a blessing for every [258] one which cannot be exaggerated. However, there is no constitution of State or economy which could simply be deduced from these unchangeable principles in its concrete form. Over and above these principles, Christians (not the Church) in a certain period, culture and historical situation need a correspondingly determined concrete conception of how this State ought to look in the concrete here and now, especially with regard to the division of freedom and planning (coercion). The fact that they cannot simply obtain this concrete conception, the imperative of the present hour, from the Church, does not dispense them from this duty; and nothing much is achieved by a common consent to the principles when people are not clear and agreed about how these principles ought to be realized in this particular place and at this particular time. The fact that this concrete and communal, courageously forward-looking picture of order is not sufficiently present, has a paralysing effect on Catholics and turns them into an object rather than the very subject of history – in contrast to much smaller groups who have a different way of thinking.

IV. THE CHURCH AND FREEDOM

1. The Church is an indispensable shelter of freedom in the world; she teaches, lives and defends the dignity and hence the inviolability of the individual man: that he is a person, has an eternal destiny and has freedom. She places man before the living God and hence before the Guarantor of the right of the weak as against the physical power of the stronger. She proclaims the Judgement of God, before which there is no respect of persons. By her independent existence from the State she is the living protest against every caesaropapism, every idolization of the State and absorption of the whole life of the individual, considered under the spiritual and material aspect, by the State bureaucracy and by a total planning which necessarily means the death of all spiritual creative life. By professing eternal life based on the grace of God beyond history, she relieves man of the pride and the anguish of life, both of which lead to a violent attempt – and one which enslaves the present in favour of an utopian future – to achieve the kingdom of God already here on earth. She educates man to be moderate and humble, which in the long run serves the real and ever-new improvement of earthly conditions better than any utopian radicalism. In so far as she places all men before the one Lord and [259] Father and before the one goal, she creates the only really objectively tenable basis for a permanent and really sacrificing love of neighbour.

2. Today more than ever the Church must be on her guard not to appear in the eyes of men as a clerical, religiously camouflaged kind of totalitarian system. Her objective nature is not that of a totalitarian system, since the dignity of man, the directness of man’s relationship to God and freedom are part and parcel of the basic principles proclaimed by her herself and established by constitution in her very being. Moreover, she has been given God’s promise that she will be preserved by his grace until the end of time from every essential defection from this her true nature. However, since the Church is always a Church made up of sinful men, even as far as the holders of her authority are concerned, she can in her individual actions also offend against her own principles and against the freedom of the individual both within and without. This has happened often enough in the course of history. It can happen even today. And this is what the Church must guard against, for today more than ever she must be the champion of true freedom. But even by such individual offences she does not become a totalitarian system. For she acts in these cases against her own proclaimed and practised principles, whereas a really totalitarian system does not recognize such principles of the freedom or dignity of the individual either expressly or tacitly, but on the contrary idolizes the collectivity and degrades the individual. But the Church must reckon with the real danger of giving the scandal of an apparent totalitarianism. This is particularly the case because, no matter how clear her ultimate basic principles may be, there can be, and in fact there has been, a subjective development of the Church's consciousness in articulating and applying more particular and proximate principles with exactitude and sureness. And this also explains how it is possible for the Church to violate the legitimate claims of freedom both from within and from without, even in cases where she has not become clearly conscious of this.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

3. Even in the Church there is to be found an application of the principle of subsidiary function in respect of the functioning of her hierarchically constructed authorities, without prejudice to her basic [260] God-given constitution and the direct origin of her fundamental authorities and powers in her divine founder. This means that even in the Church every individual, community and authority must, indeed, be fitted into the whole structure of the Church and subordinated to the highest authority of the Church; but this does not mean that the members of the Church (both individuals and communities), which are thus incorporated and subordinated, cannot and ought not to have their own relatively independent functions; it does not mean that the life of the Church is directed by an omnipotent central body of bureaucrats, and that all others have merely the duty to receive orders passively, without any responsibility or initiative of their own. Even in positive Canon Law (which is not unchangeable) changes can take place in the boundary between freedom and compulsion and in the distribution of duties and rights. The Canon Law obtaining at any particular moment in time does not need to be regarded as something immutable. Because someone does not have a divine right in a certain respect and in a particular case, does not mean that the Church herself may not invest him with such a right in the form of a ius humanum which can be a true right and not merely a privilege. Thus it is conceivable that in this respect the rights of lay people might be further extended and re-extended, since in the long run this is the only way in which the layman can be brought to a consciousness of his duties in and on behalf of the Church.

4. Even within her life of religion, the Church must combat the tendency among her own members of taking refuge in the mass and taking flight into a merely collective religious life, as manifested by too great a dependence on others, by shying away from personal responsibility or waiting for ecclesiastical directions from above in the wrong circumstances, or by the opinion that everything is morally as it should be merely by the fact that the Church has not issued an explicit and detailed verdict, and by the dwindling of a personal private life of piety both of the individual and in families, in spite of their participation in the official liturgy, etc.

5. If we are to give some indication of certain concrete instances where room should be left for freedom inside the Church particularly at the present time, then the following must be said:

[261] a. Even within the Church there should be room and toleration for the expression of opinion, i.e. Public Opinion. Pius XII himself pointed this out and stated that the absence of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

such public opinion in the Church would be a fault for which both the pastors and the flock would have to take the blame. The following are the Holy Father's actual words (Osservatore Romano, 18th February 1950):

> Public opinion is the natural portion of every normal society composed of human beings. . . Whenever there is no manifest expression of public opinion at all, and above all whenever one must admit that public opinion does not at all exist, this lack must be regarded as a fault, a weakness and a disease in the life of that society . . . In conclusion, We wish to add a few words about public opinion within the pale of the Church (in respect of those matters, of course, which are left to free discussion). Only those will be surprised at this who do not know the Catholic Church, or at least know her only badly. For, after all, she too is a living corporate body, and there would be something lacking in her life if there were no public opinion in the Church – a lack for which the pastors as well as the faithful would be to blame . . . (German translation: Orbis Catholicus III (1950), pp. 3I3-316).[2]

b. There must be room in theology for research, for different schools and directions of thought, for experiments and progress, within the framework of actual dogmas and any other really obligatory doctrines.

c. There is, if we may express our meaning in so profane a manner, a lawful 'freedom of association' for Christians.[3] Even in this sphere is it a valid rule that higher forms of organization must not be allowed to suppress the spontaneous individual life of fellowships which grow up within the Church from below, in favour of a kind of 'State Socialism' which organizes things in a bureaucratic manner from above? Such methods would be more convenient and would make it easier to survey everything, but they would not be more successful in the long run and [262] would, in fact, mean the death of any true Church life. An exaggerated principle of parochial and natural social groupings offends against the rightful freedom of the Christian in his religious life.

d. Side by side with the official function which is transmitted in a juridical manner, there is and must also be the charismatic and the prophetic in the Church which cannot be officially organized right from the start but must, in all patience and humility, be given sufficient room for growth, even though its bearers are sometimes rather 'inconvenient'. It is written: 'Do not extinguish the Spirit'.

6. If the non-Catholic fears the Church as a potentially totalitarian system which would oppress him in his freedom once it became sufficiently powerful for this, then the following must be pointed out:

a. In those cases where coercion would be directly or indirectly aimed at what can of its nature take place only by free consent (i.e. entry into the Church, etc.), the Church of its very nature cannot and will not want to use coercion. In these matters she desires freedom for herself and for others and nothing less.

b. Since the line of demarcation between coercion and freedom has in the nature of things a variability determined historically and by circumstances, and since this change in situation can bring with it not only the right but in certain circumstances also the absolute moral duty of shifting the boundary between freedom and coercion – and this even in favour of a greater freedom – the Church is not simply and absolutely bound by old ideals of protection for the

[2] Regarding the object, limits etc. of public opinion in the Church, cf. K. Rahner, 'Offentliche Meinung in der Kirche', Orientierung XV (Zurich 1951), pp. 255-258. The same in: K. Rahner, Free Speech in the Church (London and New York 1960).

[3] Cf. on this: K. Rahner, 'Peaceful reflections on the parochial principle', pp. 283-318 in the present volume.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

Catholic religion by the State; she is not bound by ideals which restricted non-Christians in their freedom. Such ideals can be absolutely justified in a certain situation, so that the Church does not need to be ashamed of her ideals even in this respect (at least not of everything appertaining to them). Yet these ideals do not have any ever-valid binding force on the Church herself. It is not as if the Church had still to regard these ideals in every respect even today as being valid everywhere and as having to be realized 'of their very nature'. Neither the Holy Empire nor the sectarian, territorial State with special privileges for the Church as the State-religion need nowadays be the Christian ideal in our country. Although there can be no right to a false cult as such, there can certainly be a right to scope for freedom within which a false cult is possible, and within which it would not be permitted to [263] suppress this false cult by external force merely because it is false, when (and because) this would be possible only by a restriction of what is a legitimate scope for freedom in a determined historical situation. Suppose the State permits all its citizens, and hence also the Christians, the freedom which is their due by natural law and uses only that coercion to which it can be proved to have a right by natural law, materially and not merely formally . . . Suppose further that it does not engage in culture-politics, which goes beyond the kind of politics really incumbent on the State (which is of an essentially negative and subsidiary character[4]) . . . Suppose finally that the State above all does not engage in an anti-religious culture-politics (directly or indirectly) and does not conceive the 'separation of Church and State' in this anti-religious sense, as did the liberalistic State of the nineteenth century . . . Then, under such conditions, we Christians need not nowadays nor in the foreseeable future demand any patronage for the Church by way of political coercive measures from the State, a patronage which would restrict the freedom of the non-Christians. Nor ought we to demand this, but should rather believe in the power of the Gospel. There would be no harm if we who historically speaking still come from a sectarian State with a State-Church, were to reexamine out situation and practices to see whether we do not here and there still hold fast to things from that bygone age which are or were historically justified, thus giving grounds for continued anticlerical feelings to the detriment of Christianity's real power for winning souls.

[4] And hence the State must, for example, respect the wishes of the parents even in its State schools, since the parents have the primary right and duty to be the educators of their children.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[265]

9

GUILT AND ITS REMISSION THE BORDERLAND BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND PSYCHOTHERAPY[1]

Perhaps the most important question theology can address to psychotherapy today is whether the latter claims to be or hopes to become the secularized form of what takes place in the realm of the Christian Faith, of the sacrament and the proclamation of the faith, viz. the remission of guilt. If psychotherapy does not make this claim, since it would be senseless to believe that it could perform such a function, then we must ask ourselves where we should draw the real, basic line of demarcation between the activities of the Church and those of profane psychotherapy concerning guilt and its remission. For obviously it cannot be said that psychotherapy is in no way concerned with guilt and remission of guilt, just because it is an activity in the field of medical psychology which, unlike the activity of the Church, does not require any divine mandate. Consequently, we must determine the line of demarcation.

In the following pages we will attempt to define this boundary. We will do this in as concise a manner as possible, almost in bare thesis-form. The metaphysical anthropology underlying our reflections would, of course, require to be worked out and proved more exactly. Nevertheless we may hope that what will be said can be fairly well understood even in the form given.

[266] 1. 'Guilt' is one of the most fundamental notions in theology, for theology has to do with God and his word to man. This word, addressed to man in the totality of his being, declares him to be a sinner in the sight of God and one who is redeemed by God and his action. This at once implies a threefold truth for theology:

a. Sin or guilt, as understood in theology, is indeed an occurrence capable of description, even definition if you wish, but is not at all events a derived phenomenon reducible to other, more original phenomena. The theological meaning of guilt has, for instance, nothing to do with a problematical interpretation of states of depression, disturbances of the psychical mechanism, etc.; it is in no way an ideological superstructure imposed on the facts of immediate experience. Guilt is not the same as illness, 'evil' is different from 'neurotic', 'ill', etc. Theocentric ethics is neither an unwarranted interpretation of psychical events nor merely some sort of ideal standard to which the physics of the spirit ought to 'conform'. Rather, it expresses the true reality of the spiritual, God-related person and is, together with Logic, the 'physics' of the spirit, so that any 'setting-in-order' or 'disposing-to-the-good' of spiritual-personal reality cannot escape the question of truth. This means that since really existing guilt is an intentional happening with an intrinsic constitutive moment of truth or falsehood, moral right or wrong, even 'existing' or, if you like, 'physical' guilt can be repaired only by attaining the objective truth or good. In the personal dimension, to which guilt belongs, there can be no question of 'repairs' or 'setting-in-motion' of the 'physical

[1] The following was first published (in an abbreviated version of a lecture) in: Angst und Schuld in theologischer und psychotherapeutischer Sicht, A collection of lectures, edited by Wilhelm Bitter, M.D., D.Ph. (Stuttgart 1953). Unabridged reprint in: Anima VIII (1953) pp. 258-272.

Throughout this particular treatise, the author uses the term 'Schuld' almost exclusively – a term used equally by the theologian and the psychotherapist (although in different senses). Hence we have translated it throughout by the term 'guilt'. It should, however, be noted that, whereas the German term (in its theological sense) refers directly to the free and responsible offence against God, the English term refers rather to the result of such an offence – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

apparatus' (which does not really exist in this dimension), except as a result of its assimilation to the objective norms of truth and goodness which express not only an objective duty but the true essential structure of this 'apparatus'.

b. Guilt in the theological sense is not an offence against some universal custom, civic morality, public penal laws or conventions, the laws and conventions arising from normal upbringing, etc. Nor is it merely a wrong action with harmful, destructive, pathogenic, physically and socially perturbing effects. Sin and guilt in the theological sense are to be found only where man, addressed by God, acts in God's sight and together with Him (as is his will), even though the overriding refusal to admit this fact and the suppression of this truth (viz. of the dialogical structure of guilt) is one of the essential moments of guilt and one which is not confessed until there is a conversion by grace: Tibi soli peccavi.

[267] c. Only when someone sins knowingly against God can there be guilt. It is quite a different matter (and one into which we do not wish to enter more closely here) to determine the extent to which there must be objective and reflex 'awareness' of saying 'no' to God and his will and of thus (and only thus) establishing guilt. The fact, however, that real guilt before God is possible only as a knowingly perpetrated act, does belong to the theological notion of guilt. Unconscious and involuntary personal guilt before God does not and cannot exist. There can be extremely reflectionless, forgotten, dissimulating or suppressed guilt, but not guilt brought about unknowingly and involuntarily. The different degrees of guilt, therefore, depend absolutely on the degree of knowledge and freedom. Yet, although there cannot be any unknowing and involuntary guilt before God in the theological sense, there can of course be wrong decisions or actions which are guiltless and yet offend in their material reality against the objective structures and rules of man and his world. Such decisions and actions can, without detracting from their guiltless character, have such injurious and pathogenic effects on man as to encourage and eventually induce him to incur real, conscious and voluntary guilt. In so far as there can be guilt only before the One God and his undivided will (which ultimately is the only binding one), man can also never find himself, objectively speaking, in the tragic situation of being able to choose only between different ways of becoming guilty, so that no matter what alternative he chooses, he necessarily incurs guilt. In certain situations the only choice open to us may lie between two actions, both of which must be regarded as harmful and wrong in a certain respect; yet, objectively speaking, no situation can ever force us into guilt. For this would imply the contradiction that God at the same time imposes and condemns the self-same behaviour. It is, therefore, also quite contradictory and immoral to say that we must learn to have the courage to incur guilt and to recommend such courage. It is true, however, that under certain circumstances man may have to learn to act courageously even though his action may, in certain more restricted aspects, harm him or others in some specific realm of human existence.

2. For theology and according to revelation itself, guilt and sin are principally and originally acts or events and not states, even though the very frame of mind produced by the sinful act helps to cause further [268] sinful acts and constitutes the atmosphere in which sin thrives. Sinfulness arises ultimately from sin – the first theology of sin, the account of the Fall given in Genesis, already shows this. By depicting man as becoming guilty through a deed in the state of paradisean goodness, it tells him that his sinful state does not simply come into being without reference to his own active freedom but arises out of his responsible act. It tells him that he cannot shift responsibility for his guilty acts to a dark, impersonal, anonymous fate or to an 'Ego' from which he, the one who acts and suffers, can separate himself and which he can accuse as the tragic and incomprehensible power disposing of him, the active subject. On the contrary, it tells him that he must hold himself and no one and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

nothing else responsible for his guilty state, in so far as he acts and suffers. Man has entered fully into the biblical truth only when he no longer makes any distinctions in this, and when (since the account in Genesis is the aetiology of man's disastrous state of suffering) he confesses the state from which he suffers to be his doing, which should not have happened and indeed did only happen because he who suffers, and he alone, willed it. He must not accuse his tempting surroundings or the woman or nature (real temptations all) of being the cause of his state; he must see that cause in himself and in his own inalienable act of freedom – he himself in his free act is the one whom he must accuse as the cause of the state making him now suddenly ask the question which really ought not to have been asked at all: how did all this happen? It is certainly true that, in spite (and because) of his consciousness and freedom which are the a-priori conditions making a guilty act possible, the reflecting man always encounters himself in his reflection as someone who has already decided, i.e. as someone in a determined moral disposition, and never as someone who makes a decision arising out of pure moral indifference – in short, as, a sinner or as someone redeemed by God's grace. And to that extent his reflection is never capable of retracing his own particular sinfulness sufficiently clearly in the unique direction of his sinful act or of simply attributing his sinful act to his sinfulness (brought about by previous decisions). Guilt, in spite of its basically active character and its nature as an event, has a diffused existence for us in the whole course of human history, even simply on account of the fact that ultimately our subsequent and always unfinished reflection and 'analysis' can never adequately resolve the conjunction of act and state, habitual disposition and new original decision, sin and sinfulness. We can, no [269] doubt, say with some probability or practical moral certitude that there and in this way, at this spatio-temporal point in this particular history, guilt began. And yet we must also say: it 'could' not help coming this way, in view of the 'sinfulness' which reigns throughout the whole of existence and out of which this culpable act arose. Our meaning here is not only that the culpable act was preceded by a dangerous or tragic but actually still innocent state, but also that it was preceded at least by an always possible, truly sinful state which was expressed in a consistent manner by this particular culpable act. It is of course true, as already stated, that the sinful state referred to must ultimately have sprung from an act of decision, but this does not mean that the latter must necessarily have been stored up in the person's historical memory and thus be always available for renewed reflection. Consequently, the fact of our getting the impression that this or that could really have happened no differently – 'I acted thus because I am that way' – does not necessarily argue against guilt considered as an act and thus for the tragedy of a development opposed to the responsible freedom of one's personal state; it is merely an indication of the fact that the person had always understood and accepted himself in a certain manner even before the action in question occurred, and that he had performed the act out of and in accordance with his freely acquired attitude and frame of mind.

3. Man is that strange being who attains self-consciousness only by being conscious of something other than himself, who deals with himself by occupying himself with something else (even if this be merely the perception or thought of himself), who catches sight of himself only by perceiving an object. Man always requires some material distinct from himself which will act as the Archimedean point, so to speak, from which alone he can attain himself. He must be in-the-world in order to be capable of being personal; he must diffuse himself in order to concentrate himself on himself, he must 'go out' (as the German mystics used to say) in order to be able to enter into himself and into the very core of his person. Thus we may quite rightly say that in the case of man, who is a creature and essentially in-the-world and who is at home with himself only by being-with-others, the act of freedom

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

springing from the core of his person, where man is ultimately concerned with himself and his relationship to God (both insolubly [270] bound up with one another), is necessarily achieved in a material which, although different from the real spiritual core of the person, is nevertheless the prerequired object on which the act of freedom is exercised. Man's relationship to himself, and his action on himself and before God, is inevitably mediate, i.e. by means of ob-jects. Man's culpable desire-to-be-God and his emancipation from the all-embracing will of God, who wants him to be always open to his infinity, operate within man's attitude to the fruits of the world and in the face of commandments relating to this or that finite object in the world. This is why there is, according to the Scriptures, more than one divine commandment and more than one human sin, each distinct from the other although (and because) the same reality of 'becoming-guilty' before God is realized in all of them. There is, therefore, a peculiar dialectic relationship between guilt considered in itself and as arising originally, and the material of guilt in which guilt, actualizing itself, is posited – a relationship similar to that existing between spirit and body: one cannot exist without the other and yet they are not the same; each refers, for its understanding, to the other which it is not itself. The objectively tangible offence against man's nature, against his due relationship to God which can be formulated as a law, and against the intramundane, ordered structure of persons and things in his surroundings, is the constitutive sign of the real revolt against God taking place in the depth of man's soul and utterly determining it. We call this objective falseness of man's concrete act a 'sign'. For firstly, it is not strictly identical with what is properly speaking meant in theology by the guilt of the person as such and before God as he is in himself; this is clearly shown even by the mere fact that the same objective perversity of the action, considered as an offence against a restricted material law, can also come about, indeed can even be induced from outside, without there being any personal guilt. And yet, secondly, this objective falseness also indicates the presence of such a guilt (in the normal case), and man looks at himself in it and recognizes himself reflectively as a sinner. For example, drunkenness is normally physically wrong because it normally offends against man's bodily health which, as the health of a spiritual person, is also subject to the binding sovereign dignity of the spiritual person assured to him by God. Now, in certain cases a person may make himself drunk quite innocently, either because he does not know that it is contrary to nature or because he lacks the necessary moral freedom in [271] doing it; in other cases, drunkenness may be brought about by external force and still other cases, it may be the concrete material or the sign-like manifestation of personal guilt, by and within which the personal turning-away from God realizes itself in concreto. In this last case the concrete action is called a constitutive sign, because personal guilt can realize itself only in this (or a similar) sort of concrete form. This dialectic unity, this difference between personal guilt and its constitutive, concrete manifestation still exists even when we are dealing with 'internal' sins in the superficial sense given to this term in everyday experience (or, in the language of Holy Writ: when it is 'merely' a case of 'lusting after'), or when it is a question of an apparently explicit and direct refusal to submit to God himself and his will. For even the merely 'internal' act of sin is an 'em-bodied' act (in the original sense of the word), which changes man's bodily, physiological, etc., constitution and, in consequence, indicates its presence, like the external sinful action, in the 'otherness' of external reality. In other words, it indicates its presence by expressing it in the 'other' of its own bodily reality (to be understood as an animated reality which consequently includes the psychical as one of its inner constitutive moments), i.e. it shows itself as 'now-existing' by positing itself. And similarly, even when sin seems to be directed explicitly and reflectively against God himself (in a judgement and objectively), it nevertheless takes place in the material of the world and hence with a constitutive sign-likeness. For propositional thought about God is even in this case constructed with the use of the 'materials' of the world. Also, there is a difference

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

between 'thought about' God and God meant 'intentionally' and aimed at by the transcendental nature of original thinking and willing. And thought about God, like any other 'inner' thought and act of the will, does include a physical manifestation in the form of a sign. Thus it is conceivable, for instance, that in certain circumstances such an opposition to God, although objectively wrong, may nevertheless not be existentially culpable (i.e. in the very core of the person), because in such a case God is denied in the objective concept but not with that real, fundamental grasp (Zugriff) which occurs in the basic act of freedom.

4. We started above with the simple fact that according to Scripture and Tradition sin against and before God is always the same and yet [272] there are sins (in the plural), which must be given specifically different names and must be appraised in a specifically different manner. Proceeding with logical necessity, we have now arrived at an ontological conception of man's nature, which we now intend to outline again in greater detail so that it may then be easier to understand our subsequent propositions about guilt, recognition of guilt, guilt and suffering, divine remission of guilt and earthly triumph over suffering.

Man is a being constructed, as it were, from the interior towards the outside. He has, on the one hand, a spiritual-personal nucleus giving him an 'intentional' transcendental relation to 'Being as such and in its totality', and hence to God, and rendering him capable of hearing the word of God as such. Man's transcendent orientation and consequent freedom and openness towards all being, allow him to maintain a selective, de-ciding, consenting or denying attitude towards individual things (and the merely represented totality of being and hence God in this sense), since he always transcends everything limited and desires the whole, Being as such, God. On the other hand, man always has to achieve himself qua transcending person in a relationship to something which is neither himself nor the transcendent counter-pole to his spiritual openness for the whole as such. In short, he must constantly achieve himself as a person in an 'intermediary reality' (in einem Mittleren), formed by the union of his animated corporeality and embodied spirituality together with their concrete, material and propositional objectifications, and by the external world of equally real persons and things as well as by the objectifications produced there by 'external' actions. This 'intermediary reality' – which alone provides man with the means of cognitive access to himself, free control over himself and a conscious, free attitude towards God – is at the same time different and unseparated from the 'seminal' (ursprünglich)[2] human person. There is no permanently fixed boundary-line between these two spheres of man which are continually undergoing osmosis into one another; man constantly transforms himself into the objectifications of his body, thoughts and actions-in-the-world; he deposits himself into them without being absorbed by them (like brute-animals) and without having to deliver himself to them [273] completely; and when he objectifies himself in this way in the world, he is constantly referred back again to himself and to God. These objectifications are 'he himself' and yet not he himself; he is in the Other and becomes the Other, but never in such a way that he can be in the Other as he is in his own self. For he is never contained totally in the Other which expresses him and shows him to himself and to others. And the Other is also never completely only his expression, since the intermediary material itself includes structures alien to the person to which the person cannot refuse to submit himself up to a certain point and in varying degrees, if he is to be at all able to express himself in the Other by forming himself into it and so fulfil himself in this intermediary reality. Only by passing out of the depth of [2] We have translated 'ursprünglich' by 'seminal' rather than 'original', since the 'seminal person' is a continuing dimension of the one person, fulfilled in the 'achieved person' via the 'intermediary reality of the person' – Tr.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

his being into the world, can man enter into the depth of the person where he stands before God; this is roughly what the medieval mystic would already have said. Thus we may say that we must distinguish between the 'seminal' person (ursprünglicher Person), understood as transcendent spirit and as freedom before God; the world-like and piecemeal 'intermediary reality' (Mittleren) in which the person, searching for himself, must achieve himself; and the 'achieved' person (endgültigen Person) who has freely fulfilled himself via his intermediary reality. By the fact that the seminal person achieves himself in the intermediary 'world' of his animated body and external surroundings, this constitutive sign (i.e. the intermediary reality of the person) becomes relatively independent; it may even remain when the act of the seminal person no longer persists. The connection between the act of the seminal person as such and its constitutive sign in the intermediary 'world' of the person is fluid, both as regards their interdependence and as regards the expressive capacity of the constitutive sign. The intermediary 'world' of the person is at the same time the medium of the constitutive sign and the medium of influences exerted on the person by the 'Other'. Realities different from the person, the surrounding world, Nature, heredity, other persons, etc., reflect themselves into this intermediary reality and create in this way an a-priori basis for the possibilities of personal self-achievement in the sphere of the constitutive expression of the person; for personal self-achievement requires such an expression in the same medium as the 'Other'. In this way (and only in this way) the 'outer world' influences the person himself; it naturally does so in the many different ways in which the intermediary sphere of personal exercise of freedom [274] can be determined: by physical influences, psycho-somatic influences of speech, etc. In so far as the seminal person and the Other find fulfilment in identically the same realm of the intermediary 'world' of the person, there is 'interpenetration' in this medium between Action, and Passion, between what is done and what is imposed, one's own and the Other; one's own is covered up by the Other and the Other becomes the property of the person; thus, the person posits the constitutive sign as the 'other part' of himself, becomes a stranger to himself and divests himself of himself – while, conversely, the surrounding world, originally strange to the person, finds fulfilment by forming itself into the very medium belonging to the person as sphere; of his self-fulfilment.

5. The person finds certain pre-determined structures in its nucleus, psycho-somatic medium and surrounding world which precede freedom and its formative control over the person. What in particular these structures are and how they are recognizable cannot of course be explained here; the analysis of the nature and necessity of these structures is the task of theology, metaphysical anthropology, ethics and all the other anthropological sciences (in so far as they do not regard themselves as purely positivistic descriptions of merely temporary conditions). Now, if an act freely performed by the seminal person (who is spiritually and freely referred to God) contradicts the right structure of the person and his proper relationship to God, i.e. if the person turns an intermediate reality and his own expression contained in it into an absolute (in other words, mistakes it for God and idolizes it), then there is sin qua act. The constitutive sign of sin, i.e. the embodied reality of the seminal, personal act and of the seminal person in his intermediary being, is called 'suffering' in theological language. Such a sign of the sinful act has necessarily a painful effect on the person. For the medium is not absolutely indifferent, or pure possibility of personal 'expression', but has its own a-priori structures, independently of the freedom of the person. And so when the seminal, personal act is formed into this medium in a manner contradicting its a-priori structures, it experiences the resistance offered by these structures as a conflict and hence as suffering (for the medium is inevitably also the medium of the 'passio' of the person). However, in so far as the surrounding world can also enter into this [275] same

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

medium by its painful influences, not every suffering is a constitutive sign of personal guilt. Yet, because the state of suffering induced from without. (independently of guilt), or continuing even after its originating guilt, constitutes in its turn a question posed to the person (about how he is to understand it), it can and must be answered either in a guilty or in a true manner. When answered in a guilty manner, the state of suffering becomes the 'tinder' of sin and hence the source of its own or new guilt. When it is accepted by faith as a sharing in the Passion of Christ (i.e. answered truly), the state of suffering becomes the means of making Christ's Passion one's own. The sinful act of the seminal person, achieved via the intermediary reality of the person but able to remain thus achieved even after its constitutive sign has ceased, is the state of sin, i.e. sinfulness.

6. The essential freedom of the seminal person, i.e. freedom as distinct from its exercise in the intermediary outer world of the person, is of its very nature a conscious occurrence. This does not mean, however, that basic freedom strictly as such is an objective datum of consciousness and can, therefore, be the direct object of reflection. Man can look at himself and his freedom only in their constitutive sign (by considering himself as an object) and in the objectifications of his freedom which are different from freedom itself even though they are its constitutive signs. This leaves him in an essentially ambiguous situation as far as his knowledge of guilt is concerned. To understand this we need only consider the sober facts of theology, even before making any deductions from what has been said so far. According to the Scriptures, man ought to confess his sins; he ought to say (hence can also say) that he has sinned in this way or that, and not merely make a general, vague statement about his sinful state. Now, in so far as he makes an explicit confession or admission, he must have an objective knowledge of his sinful acts which is expressible in concepts and propositions. He must, therefore, be able to gather sufficiently certain information from the objective, material data of his internal and external life to be able to say that he has sinned. The material of his consciousness, tangible to reflection and open to analysis, must really be the sign of the personal guilt of the seminal person about which he wishes ultimately to make a statement. And yet, according to the same Scriptures, man is not only commanded not to 'judge' others, i.e. [276] not to make absolute assertions about the real state of a person deep down and in the sight of God, but he also cannot and is not allowed to pass such an absolute judgement on himself and declare himself to be either absolutely justified or an absolute sinner, in the sense of declaring that a justifying or sinful act has certainly taken place here and now. Thus, the constitutive sign on which such a judgement would have to be based, cannot be so absolutely unequivocal that it allows him to pronounce such a judgement before the divine tribunal, in spite of the real informative function of the constitutive sign, the real information given by it is of an essentially equivocal character. In the light of what has been said previously, it is easy to see the reason for this ambiguity; since the constitutive sign is 'embedded' in the very same intermediary reality as that which acts as the medium for passive determinations from outside (i.e. outside in the widest sense, including the antecedents of the person as regards free, personal self-determination and the inner conditions making it possible), there is at least in principle absolutely nothing in this medium which could not be an impression received from outside as well as an expression of the original, personal act. When reflection interprets the realities in the intermediary medium of the person as expressions or impressions or both, this cannot basically be anything more than an approximate, provisional interpretation. Such an interpretation may be sufficient for practical conduct and the duties imposed by it – and indeed will be sufficient for it in the normal, everyday case – but it will not be an absolute interpretation and will always remain subject to reservations; it will always remain exclusively reserved to God, the only Judge. Only in this way can the interpretation

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation correspond to the indistinct situation with which the creature must bear patiently to the end. By its character of 'not being absolutely clear about oneself', of 'not being able to deal definitively with oneself', this interpretation not only realizes a regrettable fact but also a basic and essential situation of the creature, since it is precisely at this point that the creature surrenders himself unconditionally to God. Any would-be final analysis of guilt and justice implies usurpation of God's Judgement. Reflection can never 'catch up' with man, for the simple reason that every reflection, whatever its pretensions to objectivity, is itself a morally good or evil act demanding a new reflection on its own quality and so on ad infinitum. A reflective self-knowledge and analysis of guilt (by oneself or with the help of others) means primarily an analysis of the constitutive sign of [277] guilt and only indirectly (and with reservations) a knowledge of the guilty act committed by the seminal person. Qua analysis of the constitutive sign and of the 'deposit' of the seminal person in his psycho-physical external nature (i.e. of everything which is at all analysable in itself), our analysis can of itself and in principle reach real certitude, even though it will not usually do so in actual fact. But even if we were to attain certitude in this, it would not be an absolutely safe foundation for an unequivocal decision about the seminal or achieved person who remains in himself necessarily unattainable by analysis. Homo videt faciem, Deus autem cor. The 'science of the heart' is even today reserved to God alone. Any progress made in any of the ways and techniques of psychology is amazing and important; but it is always concerned only with the outer zones and not with the real centre of the person or the 'heart' in the biblical sense, which never objectifies itself adequately. We can draw conditional conclusions from these zones, applicable to the 'heart', and these will be important, indeed may even involve practical consequences. Yet this is all we can do. The 'heart' remains the secret of the King, a secret known to itself and God but not to the Ego as it faces itself by reflection and self-expression, and not to others either. In parenthesis, it should also be remembered in this connection that every analysis even of the intermediary dimension of the person changes the data to be observed, rather like (but even more than) the effect produced by observation in physics. And so, what is observed is not the pure constitutive sign of the personal act but rather a synthesis (no longer adequately dissoluble) of the sign and the change resulting from its being observed by the self or some other person. Consequently, this observation itself is again no purely theoretical matter untouched by ethics, but a moment in that chain of moral decisions which no man can escape during his life; and so man can never, not even for a single moment, become a purely objective observer. In short, every reflection is always faced with an ultimate ambiguity: what seems to be guilt, when read off the supposedly or really constitutive sign, may ultimately be guiltless suffering alien to the person due purely to the 'passio' caused from outside; and conversely, what seems to be suffering tragically inflicted from without, may in reality be a proper constitutive sign of one's own guilt, at least by the fact that it would not have assumed its present form if man had not been guilty of misunderstanding this originally non-personal suffering by his inevitably-activated personal decision. An adequate [278] analysis of this synthesis of possibly culpable Action and possibly merely endured Passion would be feasible only if we could stop this continually flowing process of synthesis and turn ourselves for a single moment into a purely active or purely passive subject. Man never is, however, either of these while living here below. And when the ontological difference between the inner and outer person is removed in death, man is no longer the judge but God alone judges, looking into the heart and from there to the works (not vice versa); he can judge them from this viewpoint – they are the works in which the heart has fulfilled itself.

7. The foregoing considerations allow us also to see the already-mentioned connection and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

ontological difference between guilt and suffering (illness in the widest sense of the word). Suffering is the constitutive sign of guilt. Accordingly, it is not the same as guilt. It is not always and unequivocally a constitutive sign of personal new guilt, actively caused from within, or the simple expression of the suffering person's guilt. It is certainly, according to Scripture, always a sign of guilt, but this may be the guilt of the race, original sin. Yet it is not a neutral suffering for all that. Since (and in so far as) man had already understood himself, and taken up a position towards himself, even before making any reflective stand by his original free choice, suffering (in man already grown up to personal freedom) is never a merely neutral, personally indifferent happening simply to be deplored. Rather, it is suffering understood and responded to in this way or that and thereby actually becoming the expression of our own guilt or the material for justifying faith and the expression of our appropriation of redemption by sharing in the Passion of Christ. In consequence of this double possibility, always decided but veiled, suffering itself is also ambiguous.

8. Only through God can man be delivered from guilt in the strict sense. In the first place, the original, personal act of guilt of the seminal person and the sinfulness of the achieved person, of the person who has fulfilled himself, cannot be removed by evading the freedom of the person. Such removal demands at least a free personal act of conversion. We do not wish to enter here into the question of the conditions [279] under which such a conversion is even thinkable, in view of the fact that the person has completely activated, 'understood', and (apparently) exhausted himself in the choice demanded by the previous, presupposedly guilty 'option fondamentale'; it is – let us note – not very easy to explain how this person, who has not only done a guilty act but also has become guilty as a result of this act, can still be capable of such a fundamental transformation of the whole nucleus of the person. In any case, this transformation alone does not yet wipe out guilt. For the wiping out of guilt is essentially a kind of dialogue, the adoption of a position concerning God and in the sight of God. God, in spite or rather because of his absolute nature, is not an impersonal 'It', or the stationary, unattainable vanishing-point of the spiritual person's transcendence. He is the 'living God'; relative to him, every human act is essentially a response to his call, so that after the creature's 'no' to this call, the dialogic process of human existence can really continue only by a new Word of God. HE must forgive the guilty act committed against him. Guilt can, therefore, be remitted only by his act, and this act can be known only through his Word and can be decided upon only by him. This word, if it is to take place in the tangible manner of this world, can be spoken only by a man if and in so far as he can truly say that he has been appointed and sent to accomplish this word and be its servant. To the 'Tibi soli peccavi' corresponds God's 'Ego te absolvo', and this alone delivers from guilt. This deliverance remains in the nature of things just as transcendent to empirical reflection as guilt itself; it must, therefore, be heard and accepted by faith – only in faith does it become real and known.

9. This-worldly victory (at least partial) over suffering and cure of sickness in the widest sense of the word are quite a different matter. Sickness and suffering differ from guilt as such (even though they spring from guilt in certain circumstances), just as the constitutive expression (sign) is different from the reality expressed or signified; they extend over the intermediary, world-like reality of the person, where they receive their objective character. And so, suffering and sickness can be reached also from without by somatic and psychical intervention, for the dimension in which they exist is exactly the same as that in which these determinations from without are received. Combative outside interventions against suffering are possible even [280] independently of the question whether suffering in a particular case is due to personal, past or present guilt, in so far as the relationship between guilt and its constitutive sign is a fluid one (i.e. in so far as there is no unequivocal and absolutely fixed connection between them, in the sense that guilt can exist without any adequate expression), and the expression of guilt, i.e. suffering, can still continue to exist even after guilt has been remitted by the word of God. Since suffering is never an absolutely unequivocal constitutive sign of guilt, it is also morally justifiable to fight against it by direct means intended to destroy it, even when it can be supposed with sufficient practical certitude that the suffering comes from still unremitted guilt. Whether this attempt to remove suffering under these presuppositions will be successful in a particular case, is quite a different question which cannot be answered a priori. It must, however, be stressed also that there is a Christian way of overcoming suffering which does not consist in removing suffering (sickness, etc.) from the intermediary realm of the person, but in faith's acceptance of suffering – of the suffering which continues to exist in this world of transitory things and of probation, as a means of sharing in the redemptive Passion of Christ. Consequently, the phenomenon of suffering will always remain ambiguous, and this ambiguity will always put man in doubt whether he is not after all merely a sinner and will always incite him to renewed efforts in his fight for perfect happiness in this world, offending thereby against faith and hope; accepted in faith, on the other hand, suffering is the very way in which redemption, the eschatological good coming from God alone, appears. On this basis, it must be asked whether every kind of combat against suffering in this world (which in itself is permitted and a duty) for the Christian) is not itself culpably based on the secret opinion that there 'really' should be no suffering and that, with a little bit of energy and cunning, suffering can really be banished through the progress of technical science, medicine and psychotherapy, even while the economy of this world is still in existence. To say 'no' to the sufferings of this world is at once a sacred duty for the Christian in the sight of God and, at the same time, the greatest danger of allowing himself to steal past the Cross of Christ. This 'no' can ultimately consist only in helping man, by means of teaching and God's merciful benevolence, to shoulder the Cross in spite of its continued weight, so that he may carry it without bitterness and despair and go on believing in the promise of eternal life.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

10. As a result of the dialectic unity and ontological difference between guilt and its constitutive sign, between sin and suffering, regarding their actual dimensions, natures and conquest, the respective tasks of priest and physician are also mutually related and different from each other. Each has a different object and procedure. The priest in himself can only be the mediator of the word of God which remits sin but which as such does not simply and necessarily remove the constitutive sign of sin, viz. suffering, even when the latter has arisen from personal guilt. For once the suffering springing from sin has arisen, it attains its own manner of existence, like any other objectification of the personal spirit and freedom, since it is supported by the intermediary reality of the person and not by the personal nucleus and the seminal person himself. The physician (both of the body and psyche) aims directly at the pathogenic suffering and not at the sinful act or state of the seminal or achieved person. He must not, indeed, simply bypass the question of real guilt in the theological sense, for his own proper object may be a constitutive sign of real guilt, and this question inevitably poses itself for the sufferer. Moreover, suffering often (though not by any means always) cannot be removed from the person, i.e. from his intermediary reality, without a conversion – μετα&νοια – having taken place in the seminal person; and such a conversion can take place, at least in actual fact, only when man, believing, accepts remission of his real guilt from God. Yet the object and activity of the physician as such remains strictly different ontologically and theologically from that of the priest. The physician should not indeed be merely

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

a healer of the body; but even in so far as his 'patient' suffers or may suffer spiritually, his task still differs from that of the priest. His task remains, directly, confined to the objective materializations of the proper guilt of the seminal person in this world; it confines itself, if you wish to put it this way, to the psyche and does not directly reach the immaterial, personal ground of spiritual freedom as such, where man is called directly by God and answers him with a 'yes' or a 'no'. In so far as guilt and suffering are nevertheless connected, though not identical, i.e. are connected in the unity of the dialectically 'veiling' and 'revealing' relationship between origin and the originated, between sign and the signified, expression and the expressed, the priest and the physician are referred to each other and dependent on each other, in spite of all the differences of their task and commission.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[283]

10

PEACEFUL REFLECTIONS ON THE PAROCHIAL PRINCIPLE[1]

I

Principles are good in themselves. Anyone who has no principles is like a 'jelly-fish'. Yet principles can also become 'fads' – and be 'flogged to death'. And that does not do any good even to the most sacred of them.

It might be advisable to distinguish first of all between two classes of principles concerning human conduct. One class consists of those which are always the only correct and valid ones, no matter how much [284] they may be violated. This is the sort of principle which is meant to govern its particular objective domain exclusively (e.g. 'Thou shalt not commit adultery'). The reason for this is that such principles alone express the whole objective structure of the reality over which their validity is meant to extend. The other class is composed of those principles which are meant 'also' to have validity in a sphere of human conduct, but together with others; they must divide their authority in this sphere with other principles and must be applied in proper doses, as it were, if they are not to become harmful (e.g. 'The economy must allow for the development of private enterprise'). Such principles not only permit but, in the very nature of things necessitate, 'compromise', (if we may use such a suspect term to express what we mean here); they demand that other principles be allowed their rights, and they themselves must be applied 'more or less'. For such principles do not of themselves alone express the whole intrinsic law of the reality to which they are applicable. Hence, if they are to be applied justly, they must leave room for the application of those other principles which flow equally well from the same multiform structure of the reality concerned. With these principles we have to be very careful not to defeat their purpose by becoming obsessed with them. In their case there are inevitably different 'manners' in which the opposing principles may be 'apportioned' and applied in the concrete (there can, for example, be freer or more restricted forms of economic organization). One of these principles may take the place of the other, and there will be no great sense or hope of success in combatting the desired new 'apportionment' of practical application by defaming the newly adopted 'manner' as being a denial of the one and only principle. There simply are no clear-cut boundaries in these cases. It will always remain a debatable point whether one of two

[1] Cf. J. Höffner, 'Um das Pfarrprinzip', Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift LVI (1950), pp. 60-62; O. von Nell-Breuning, 'Pfarrgemeinde, Pfarrfamilie, Pfarrprinzip', Trierer Theol. Zeitschrift LVI (1947), pp. 257-262; J. Höffner, 'Nochmals das Pfarrprinzip', Trierer Theol. Zeitschrift LVII (1948), pp. 236-239; A. Schrott, Seelsorge im Wandel der Zeiten, Formen und Organisation seit der Begründung des Pfarrinstituts (Graz 1949); M. Marchi, Esperienze parrocchiali (Rome 1949); A. Kirchgassner, Pfarrgemeinde und Pfarrgottesdienst (Freiburg 1949); C. Noppel, Aedificatio Corporis Christi[2] (Freiburg 1949); K. Lechner, Laie und Pfarre (Vienna 1949); R. Perenna, Innovazioni o rinnovamento della parrocchia? (Como 1950); B. Socche, La communità parrocchiale (Rome 1950); A. Ryckmans, La paroisse vivante (Tournai 1950); G. Viviani, La parroquia (Rome 1950); H. Legare, Introduction à la sociologie paroissiale (Lille 1950); J. Miller, 'Beitrage zum Pfarrprinzip', Orientierung XV (1951), p. 163; F. Benz, 'Die neuen franzosischen Seelsorgsmethoden und ihre Bedeutung für Deutschland', Tübinger Theol. Quartalschrift CXXXI (1951), pp. 208-247,320-339,464-486; L. Borlée, 'Structures sociales et ministére paroissial', Rev. Dioc. Tournai VI (1951), pp. 427-446; J. Peitzmeier, 'Jugendgruppenarbeit und Jugendpsychologie', Theologie und Glaube XLII (1952), pp. 454-461 (important for an evaluation of the 'parochial youth movement'); R. Spiazzi, 'Spunti per una teologia della parrocchia', Scuola Catt. LXXX (1952), pp. 26-42; A. Schrott, 'Pfarrseelsorge und überpfarrliche Seelsorge', Der Seelsorger XXIII (1953), pp. 202-208; P. Virton, Enquêtes de sociologie paroissiale (Paris 1953); Die Pfarre, Gestalt und Sendung (Vienna 1953); La Maison-Dieu XXXVI (no. 4 1953): 'Problèmes de la Paroisse'.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation principles opposing each other in this way has enough scope in practice for being realized (whether, e.g. in a particular system of education the right of authority is sufficiently preserved as against freedom). In such cases, even legal demarcations and stipulations concerning the principles can never replace the honest and decent attitude of men. The proof of the presence of such an honest attitude is given when the champion of one principle really and honestly recognizes the right of the principle professed by his antagonist, successfully keeps the extremists in his own 'party' within bounds and is capable of granting greater force to the opposite principle (when he sees that the concrete state of affairs [285] demands it), without fearing the reproach of being unprincipled and of betraying the party doctrine.

Let it be understood from the very beginning that the 'parochial principle' belongs to the second category. The first thing to do now, though, is to discover what we mean by the parochial principle.

Before we attempt to do so, we would like at once to suggest a distinction which is usually overlooked but which would seem to be important both in theory and in practice. We have to distinguish two principles contained in the parochial principle. We will call them the 'parish-priest principle' and the 'parish principle'. As an abstract 'principle' (i.e. one formulated on its own, before entering into an objectively-justified – not 'lazy' – compromise with other 'principles' in practice), the 'parish-priest principle' demands that all pastoral work in a determined community be exercised and directed by the parish priest of that community and his assistants, curates etc. It is quite indifferent whether these assistants are permanently at his disposal or are called upon by him (N.B.) as the need arises. It follows immediately (in principle, or at least in practice) that according to this principle the care of souls refers here only to those who belong to a particular parish. The 'parish principle' demands that all pastoral work be done within the parochial territory, in other words that pastoral care devote itself in its various activities to people belonging to the same parish. Hence this principle, looked at purely theoretically, does not require every particular pastoral activity to come (permanently or only for the occasion) under the authority of the parish priest or of the assistants under his authoritative direction. It requires merely that the group of people given pastoral care belong to the same parish. An example of what is meant here would be a parochial youth group directed by an independent diocesan youth chaplain, answerable to the bishop alone, or a parochial branch of a men's society directed by a member of a religious Order who is responsible for the work in this particular field. We do not mean to dispute that the transition between the 'parish-priest principle' and the 'parish principle' is fairly fluid in practice. Nevertheless, as we will see later, the distinction between the two is important both theoretically and practically, if we are to get a really clear idea as to what is demanded when the parochial principle is advanced. Our distinction would, for instance, make it easier at least to determine the point at issue in the debate about the line of demarcation between 'ordinary' and 'extraordinary' care of souls.

[286] Following on the distinction of concepts just made, let us at once add a further distinction concerning the concept of 'extraordinary' and 'ordinary' care of souls. For we must somehow balance the 'parish principle' with the right of the representatives of 'extraordinary pastoral work'. Looked at purely in the abstract, pastoral work could be called 'extraordinary' for several reasons: either because and when it happens only occasionally (e.g. a parish Mission held only every ten years); or because it is performed by someone who does not belong to the ordinary parochial clergy even though it is done in the parish and by the authority of the parish priest (as for instance a course of Lenten sermons preached by a Regular in a parish at the invitation of and as the representative of the parish priest); or because it is carried out independently of the parish priest's directing authority and, therefore, (at least in most cases) outside the framework of a parish (such as work with a Third Order group formed in conjunction with a non-parochial Friary Church). It will be useful, for the sake of clarity, to apply the term ‘extraordinary’ (at least here) only to this third kind of pastoral work. The other two kinds are really only more exceptional cases of ‘ordinary’ pastoral work, since they are after all directly or indirectly borne by the parochial clergy and take place within the framework of a parish.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

After this preliminary, formalistic distinction of concepts, we must now go more closely into the matter in hand. What in the concrete is meant by the parish- and parish-priest principle? Is there, and why should there be, such a principle? Although we ought to distinguish these two principles in theory and, as will appear later, also for practical reasons, they do nevertheless stem from the same (or related) objective conditions and may consequently be described and appreciated together for the moment. The ‘parish-priest principle’ (taken in the abstract) indicates the exclusive competence of the parish priest and his assistants regarding the pastoral care of the people under his jurisdiction. The ‘parish principle’ is ultimately concerned with the same object, but more from the point of view of the people given pastoral care. Thus it demands that that care must be exercised primarily and exclusively in a territorially-defined congregation, in the sense that wherever men come together for the care of their souls, they must do so as members of the same parish.

Whenever such principles have been given a new emphasis and it [287] has been demanded that they be carried out to the full, two factors have always been associated with such a tendency: a changed general situation in the spiritual field and theoretical reasons recalled to mind as a result of this new situation. We have seen the gradual development of a new situation in our day. There have been times in the Church when the ordinary parish clergy felt, rightly or wrongly, less qualified for dealing with the greater pastoral tasks. At such times they were, therefore, quite pleased to leave certain pastoral activities, demanding greater accomplishments, to the ‘extraordinary’ pastoral work especially of the regular clergy – thus, e.g. Missions, pastoral care for special groups of men making greater demands on the intelligence and spirituality of the chaplain, etc. So the parish clergy confined themselves at such times more or less to their administrative functions, regular Church services (with a sermon or Sundays), catechism lessons in the schools, instructions and the administration of the sacraments. Today the secular clergy, especially in our great cities, feel themselves fully qualified even for further and greater tasks. And since the secular clergy of today are rightly of the opinion that the responsibility for sufficient pastoral care as a whole falls ultimately on them, they also are no longer willing to confine themselves to that sector of the care of souls which might easily give the impression (at least when looked at superficially and in comparison with the tasks previously left for the most part to the ‘extraordinary’ pastoral care) of consisting of bureaucratic and administrative functions. The seculars are no longer willing to limit themselves to those duties which make great demands on time and man-power, but for which the representatives of ‘extraordinary pastoral works’ easily tend to consider themselves ‘too good’. Wherever the ‘ordinary’ care of souls is at a high level, the work will tend to be as self-sufficient as possible. If it did not show this tendency, this would merely be a sign that things are not all that they should be. In addition to this, there is a second determining factor in the matter under discussion, viz. the newly-reawakened will to community among lay people, who are the object of pastoral care. We live, from a cultural-historical and social point of view, in the period of the ‘collective man’, of the mass, and also in the age of the dissolution of those social forms and structures (‘classes’, etc.) which, by their diversity and peculiar characteristics, facilitated the formation and growth of more independent, more strongly-marked individual personalities. Although this development has been attended by its own extremely [288] grave dangers for man and for the Christian in man, it has also created a renewed understanding and will to community within the sphere of Christian life, a will to form ‘communities’ and, concretely, a desire for the parish. Indeed, in so far as modern communization threatens and diminishes the sense of security and

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

inviolability of the individual, who is left to the tender mercies of anonymous, vast, soul-less and brutal collective powers, the parochial community in particular, with its religious foundations and spirit, will appear in an ever-increasing measure as a haven of refuge to the threatened individual. Living in this parish-community and finding support in it (which can in certain circumstances go far beyond the purely religious sphere through such factors as 'Caritas', Christian neighbourhood, and the creation even of a high intellectual and moral 'milieu'), man is no longer a helpless, solitary individual and yet is not merely a 'cog' or 'number' in a soul-less collectivity. It may well be that the meaning of the parish community can still increase a great deal in this direction and that parish-life may be developed much further still, especially since the Christian of today – even in so-called Catholic countries – lives in pagan surroundings.

Perhaps something of the social, economic and cultural organization found in the Jewish community in the great pagan cities of hellenistic antiquity is necessary also for the Christian parish of today, situated as it is in the midst of the unchristian and humanly formless mass-society of our day. The parish would have to develop to a far greater extent into the complete home of the Christian man. (Yet this must not give rise to a ghetto-mentality, and Christianity must remain active in its missionary task, continuing to feel responsible for the life and salvation of all people. And so the Christian congregation must not only be self-sufficient as far as possible, but must also be mentally and spiritually alive and must regard itself as the germ-cell for the re-christianization of all the people.) 'Junge Mannschaft' and similar phenomena are in fact the first steps towards a re-formation of the Christian parish and the Christian 'home-land'. We cannot enter further into these questions here. The little we have said, however, may suffice to indicate that even the present-day situation of the layman has urged a more vigorous emphasis on the parochial principle.

When we debate nowadays about the parochial principle and try to discover how it is logically and legally reconcilable with other 'principles' and to what extent it is actually limited by them, it must [289] not be forgotten that the present state of the world certainly demands a more intense life in the parish, and in that sense also a more vigorous application of the parochial principle, than was the case in former times. The fact that present-day parishes (and especially parishioners) to a large extent do not as yet, and indeed will not very quickly, correspond to the demands of the situation, is no argument against these demands.

In such a situation one naturally recalls the fundamental, and in a certain sense 'always valid', arguments for the parochial principle. These arguments can perhaps best be divided into two groups, viz. those based on dogmatic reasons and those based on pastoral considerations. The dogmatic argument is founded on the fact that the Church has an episcopal structure by divine, and hence always valid, law. We quietly leave to one side the question of whether everything attributed directly to the concrete (territorial) structure of a diocese is really as immutable by divine right as is the dogmatic notion of the Church's episcopate. (Actually, there would be quite a few debatable points in this matter.) The Church as a whole is divided into different territorial parts. And each of these parts, defined by spatial boundaries (and not by difference in social station or other conceivable principles of organization), is subject to a bishop. The bishop is in his own person the pastor of his diocese, with full responsibility and rights. Any pastoral care in his diocese is his responsibility, is exercised in his name and by his authority, and is concerned with those who are subject to his authority because they, as Christians, live within the boundaries of his diocesan territory. (We prescind here from the case of the exempt Orders where the spiritual care of their members within the Order lies outside the competence of the local Ordinary.) The reason for this spatial structure of the Church is a very profound one precisely because of its primitive nature, and is easily comprehensible: the Church's pastoral care is concerned with the whole man and with men in so far as they form a 'people' which as such is to enter

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

into the Kingdom of God. Both of these purposes are accomplished by addressing man as a being with a home. For 'at home', where he is rooted with his past and his relations, where he has his house and home and where his life is lived, there man is wholly present because that is where he has his habitat both bodily and mentally which determines his characteristics, and that is where he is directly the member of a people to which the Church has been sent by the commission given to her by our Lord. [290] Now, the parish (which in the early Church coincided practically with the diocese) is in a sense the diocese in miniature. The parish in itself exists indeed only in virtue of human law and hence has not basically the same irrevocable necessity as the diocese. Thus the bishop can to a great extent (and within the framework of canon law) make use also of other instruments besides the parish (and parish priest) in the fulfilment of his pastoral duty.[2] Nevertheless, the parochial structure is a consistent development and practical application of the principle of the territorial diocese ruled by the bishop as pastor of the whole flock. The parish, too, can in this sense claim to be a realization of the divinely-wise and ever-valid principle which the Founder of the Church has established within her for all time, viz. that she should convert men into Christians, men who have a home and are a people. When principles of pastoral organization begin to vie with one another, it remains an indisputable fact that the parochial principle can claim to be the oldest and most venerable principle applied by the Church on the authority of Christ; one man is in charge of the whole pastoral work done among a group of people who are collected together under him because they have their home on the same soil. If this principle has eternal validity for the over-all structure of the Church (and hence also permanent meaning and utility), it cannot be absolutely false for the smaller structures of the Church.

Let us pass on now to the pastoral argument for the parochial principle. The pastoral effort requires a living centre on account of the unavoidable and immense variety of its activities, means and forms and of individuals with whom it is concerned. From this centre everything derives its proper place, right measure and correspondingly greater or lesser importance, and this centre is a safeguard both against a kind of planless hypertrophy and against an atrophy of particular pastoral activities. This living centre can only be the Altar, even though genuine Christian life and ecclesiastico-sacramental life do not by an means coincide, i.e. even though Christian Priesthood and Liturgy are not the same thing[3] and genuine Christianity itself must come to grips with the whole of reality (and hence also with 'profane' reality), [291] making it subject to its law. Yet it remains true that wherever pastoral care exercised in federations, associations, organizations, etc., more or less cuts itself loose from the central concern of all Christianity which man, as a member of the holy people of God, adores through the Sacrifice of our Lord and – truly and historically – encounters in the Sacrament of the God of grace and eternal life, this 'care of souls' becomes a mere empty busyness, an exclusive interest in local club life, a rationalistic urge to reform the world and an officious organization-fever, by which the members seek their own advantage and not God. The Altar, however, stands first and foremost in the parish church. For the parish church is the representative of the diocese and the primary place for the care of souls according to canon law (if only for the reason that the parish priest has the right and duty of the care of souls of all Christians living in his territory). Hence, if every pastoral work finds its central point in the Altar of Christ, then the life of the parish, issuing from the altar of the parish church, is and remains the basic form of the care of souls. In this way we also have a guarantee that individual pastoral endeavours preserve their mutual relations and proper proportion, by the very fact that in the parish they reach man under the very respect which even by nature is one of the most many-sided and yet

[2] The reserved rights of which the bishop cannot deprive parish pries according to Canon Law, form only a small sector in the business of present day care of souls.
[3] Cf. my essay 'Priesterliche Existenz', Zeitschrift für Aszese und Mystik XVII (1942), pp. 155-171.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

most uniform, viz. man as member of a natural, spatial community. Such an organization has also fundamentally the greatest stability in times of crisis. The most primitive structure is also the most indestructible. The bond uniting kith and kin, as realized in the natural community, belongs to the most primitive forms of human society. And the parish builds on the foundations of the natural community. Consequently, taking things as a whole, the parish, and hence also its pastoral function, has (after the family) the greatest social, spiritual and thus also pastoral resistance of all human associations, both against internal tendencies to dissolution and against external influences.

We have tried in the above to give at least an indication of the inner justification of the 'parochial principle', an indication of its 'essence' as it were. Since this principle is, however, of human law in the Church (though in practice an almost self-evident conclusion from the territorial principle of the episcopate, going back to a divine ordinance), it follows that the parochial principle, taken as something actual, can be given 'existence' (i.e. its real validity) only by Canon Law, and not merely by basic considerations about its meaning and actual [292] fitness for the matter in question. Now, the parochial principle has in fact been instituted by Canon Law. There are three canonical prescriptions which together bring what we call the 'parochial principle' into existence: firstly, the Tridentine provision that a diocese must be wholly divided into parishes (CIC can. 216); secondly, CIC can. 464 § 1,[4] which lays down the parish priest's pastoral duty with regard to all his parishioners; and thirdly, can. 94 §§ 1-3, which determines that every Catholic Christian acquires the parish priest of his place of residence or, if he has no domicile, of the place in which he is actually staying, as his proper parish priest. It follows from this that where the law itself does not make an exception, every Catholic Christian is inevitably made subject to a parish priest who has the right and duty of pastoral care in his regard and who carries the responsibility before God and the Church for the salvation of those Christians whose parish priest he is. There can, therefore, be no doubt about the existence of a 'parochial principle'. Nor can there be any doubt about the fact that every Catholic Christian is basically placed under a parish priest (apart from certain exceptions which are of no practical interest here, since in most cases they concern only exempt Religious). Two observations should be made here on this canonically formulated parochial principle. Firstly, although there can be only one parish priest in each parish (can. 460 § 2), his right and duty to exercise his pastoral function among his parishioners does not imply that he is necessarily the only one who has a pastoral duty towards the parishioners. The pastoral right of the parish priest can basically be a cumulative right and is not necessarily an exclusive one. Thus the parish priest has, for instance, a duty to instruct the children in the Catechism,[5] and yet this is (obviously) also the duty of the parents;[6] similarly in the case of those charged with seeing to it that children make their Easter duties.[7] Thus it is obviously in no way a violation of the parish priest's pastoral right when the bishop grants a certain limited right and duty of exercising pastoral care among the parishioners of a parish to someone other than the parish priest (e.g. to a teacher of religion in the school; to Religious at their own church: can. 1334), without thereby releasing the parish priest from his obligation to exercise the same function (in such a [293] case, those appointed to the same task may, of course, 'share' the actual carrying out of this task). Secondly, it is important to make a further observation with regard to the more precise nature of the canonical 'parochial principle'. There is no duty on the part of the parishioner, corresponding to the parish priest's pastoral rights, to make use of the parish priest's 'services'. The parish priest must preach, proclaim

[4] 'Parochus ex officio tenetur curam animarum exercere in omnes suos paroecianos, qui non sint legitime exempti.'
[5] CIC can. 1329, 1330, 1333 § I.
[6] CIC can. 1335
[7] CIC can. 860.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the doctrines of Faith, hear Confessions, distribute the Eucharist, officiate at divine service on Sundays.[8] These are indeed most important, if not the most important, functions of his pastoral right and duty. The Christian obviously has the duty of knowing the teachings of the Faith, of receiving the sacraments and of attending Mass on Sundays and Holydays; and the parish priest can exhort the Christian to fulfil this duty.[9] Yet in the very matter of these most important and frequent duties of their religious life, the faithful are not bound to fulfil their duty specifically in the parochial sphere of the care of souls. According to can. 467 § 2, the faithful should indeed be admonished to attend frequently, where this causes no inconvenience, the services and sermons in their parish church, but, according to the meaning of the word 'admonition',[10] this urgent recommendation is not intended to impose an obligation in the strict sense and is in itself already limited by the 'frequenter' and 'ubi commode fieri potest' expressly added by the canon. Hence, in so far as Canon Law itself authorizes the admonition of the faithful to take part in the parochial life, this admonition can concern only a 'frequent' participation (a notion which is still realized even if someone does not attend the parochial services absolutely every Sunday) and may be given only if the parishioner does not thereby experience any additional inconvenience. Thus current Canon Law (contrary to the law of previous ages) quite logically does not speak of any duty of attending the parochial Mass on Sundays, since the duty of Sunday Mass can be fulfilled also by attending Mass somewhere else (except in Private Oratories).[11] The same is true of the reception of Holy Communion,[12] even of Easter Communion (which we are merely advised to receive [294] in our own parish church)[13] and of the annual Confession.[14] So it is clear, even from these considerations that, in so far as it has been established as an actually valid principle by Canon Law, which alone is capable of so establishing it, the parochial principle is of itself not an absolute and exclusive principle. Otherwise the parishioners would necessarily have a duty strictly corresponding to the parish priest's pastoral right. The fact that this is not the case, that, in other words, the parochial principle determined by Canon Law presupposes that the faithful may fulfil their religious duties outside the parish, shows that Canon Law recognizes a pastoral activity of the Church which is not based on her parochial-territorial structure. Nevertheless, there is a parochial principle since Canon Law has established it, and it is also possible that future legislation will once more extend its validity further than is the case today.

II

That, then, is one side of the picture. But, as already stated at the beginning, the parochial principle is not the only valid one and must not be the only one which governs our pastoral activity. Side by side with it there are other principles which must also be given their due place in the concrete structure of the care of souls. We must not complicate matters, nor must we oversimplify them. 'Clear, simple lines' can be just as dangerous as the confusion created by discordant tendencies. No matter how justified the parochial principle is, it must never become the weapon of an (unacknowledged) 'State Socialism', which would equate, level and centralize everything from above, even if this 'above' and the 'central point' be merely [8] CIC can. 467 § I, 1344 § I, 1329-1332, 863, 892 § 1, 873 § 1.

[9] CIC can. 863; 854 § 5; 1348.
[10] Cf. Benedict XIV, De synodo dioecesana lib. XI, cap. 5, no. 5 Wernz-Vidal, Jus canonicum II 'De personis' no. 736, IV (Rome 1943), p. 937.
[11] Can. 1294.
[12] Can. 869.
[13] Can. 859 § 3.
[14] Can. 905 sq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the parish.

In the first place, the parish (and hence also the parochial principle) is merely of human right in the Church. Parishes and parish priests are not divine, unchangeable realities in the Church, like the Primacy of the Pope, or the Episcopate. The territorial parish exists because and in so far as Canon Law and the bishop desire its existence and the measure of its functions. The same holds good for the parish priest. Now, it follows from this that the standard for judging the legitimacy of this humanly-given right is not the parish and its greatest possible self-sufficiency (for the parish is the measured and not the measure) but man, the object of the care of souls. And the concrete application of [295] this yard-stick, i.e. the actual organization of pastoral care as divided among the work of the parochial and non-parochial clergy, is a matter for the bishop. Besides basic clarity, this application will always require a 'prudent estimate' which can never be replaced by 'unequivocal principles'. Since the parish and the office of parish priest are merely a canonical development of the diocese and the episcopal office, which can differentiate their functions not only in this particular manner but also directly in extra- and supra-parochial organizations, it would be wrong to say that e.g. ecclesiastical associations and their chaplains can and must properly and lawfully present themselves only as structures arising out of the parish as such, although it would be very regrettable if the parish were to deteriorate into a kind of 'blanket-organization' for such associations and groups within its territory.

When it is a question of how the pastoral office should be exercised – whether parochially or supra-parochially, according to the parish- and parish-priest principle or (partly) without it – then the only objective yard-stick is furnished by the answer to the question as to how the pastoral office attains its goal, which is the transformation of man (both as an individual and as a member of a community) into a Christian so as to enable him to lead a Christian life (in knowledge and adoration of God and by imitation of Christ). For pastoral care exists for the sake of the Christian, and not the Christian for the sake of pastoral care, and certainly not for the sake of the one who exercises it. No pastor (whether 'ordinary' or 'extra-ordinary') has the right to judge and shape the technical structure of pastoral work according to whether and how far it will offer him as unhampered and undisturbed a sphere of activity as possible. Professional or 'bread-and-butter' jealousy (of a material and spiritual kind), bureaucratic 'tidiness', a schematic 'planned economy', a need for self-assertion, fear of losing the justification for one's existence – such and other 'motives' which often play their part on both 'sides', are not a fit basis for discussion whether in favour of or against the parochial principle.

The only question to be considered is how the object of the care of souls (viz. the Christian man) can best be attained. Now, the parochial principle in its intrinsic reasoning is itself ultimately based on a natural view of man, the 'object' of pastoral care, for it makes use of a basic fact of human life for its particular view on the care of souls, viz. of the fact that man has a home somewhere. In this view, pastoral care must approach man from this particular side of his existence. And this is [296] quite right as far as it goes. Man, however, is in fact a many-sided being; 'having a home' (having roots in a place) is not the only existential of his life. For he has a certain individuality endowing him with individual talents, experience of life, temperament, etc. He is differentiated according to age and sex. He has a particular occupation. As a rational being, he is free to form associations which may cut across his territorial community. He can change his place of residence. He has individual needs not catered for where he lives. And man is this many-sided being even qua the object of pastoral care. By the very fact that the parochial principle is based on a natural existential of man, it is obvious from the very beginning that other natural existentials of man may equally serve as a basis for the possibility, right and duty of pastoral care. In other words, the care of souls can also deal with man in so far as he is conditioned by these other existentials, i.e. it can make

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

him its object in so far as he has a certain occupation, enters into certain free associations, etc. If this right and duty are denied to it, or these opportunities are not utilized as far as lies within its capability, then the pastoral ministry does not address itself to the whole man in the manifold plenitude of his being and life, and man cannot become fully Christian nor Christianity fully human. In other words, since man's being embraces different natural dimensions, the pastoral ministry may basically be exercised from the viewpoint of all of these dimensions, and indeed must be so exercised if it is seen that complete christianization of man is in fact impossible merely from the point of view of his living in a certain place (i.e. merely by applying the parochial principle).

This is, however, in fact the case. It is in fact impossible, as can be seen from the point of view of both the object and the minister of the care of souls. To these we must add a third consideration which points in the same direction.

Considering man who is the object of pastoral care, it is obvious that wherever we have to deal with simple human conditions – in other words, with agricultural communities where practically all the happenings of human life (such as work, cultural life, etc.) occur within the confines of a parish which can humanly speaking be surveyed by an individual – the pastoral ministry can deal with man in accordance with the parochial principle, i.e. basing itself on the fact that his home, interests, etc. are centred in this one place. Thus it will still be able to reach man in all his relationships, for the simple reason that his whole life unfolds itself in practice within the parish. Something similar [297] (although sociologically quite different) happens where the number of Catholics scattered over a large area in a non-Christian district is comparatively so small that Church life can of necessity unfold itself only in the form of parish life; for in such circumstances there can be no other way of exercising the pastoral ministry since the number of people who could, for instance, be interested in any particular 'society' is so small. So in this case, too, the parish is in fact the only possible soil for the care of souls. Prescinding, however, from such cases, the narrow confines of their immediate home can no longer embrace all the activities of townspeoples' lives in present-day circumstances brought about by urbanization, greater freedom of movement and the extensive departmentalization of modern man. The location of man's material and spiritual home (if we may be allowed such a distinction) differs widely. Modern man living in towns (in contrast to the farmer or perhaps even to the small-town artisan) pursues his occupation outside of the parish. He visits schools which are very often in no way connected with his parochial district. Like a nomad, he changes his residence so frequently that he cannot possibly have the farmer's sense of 'belonging'. He often knows his next-door neighbours least of all. Differences in intellectual and cultural needs deeply separate people living in the same place and lead to the formation of communities which are not in the least recruited from the immediate neighbourhood of their domicile. Man's life, lived in his society (clubs, communities of interest, etc.), side by side with his professional and family life in the narrowest sense, takes him just as far away from his immediate local surroundings. His travels, hikes, recreations and amusements, looked at territorially, all take place, in the majority of cases, outside of the narrow confines of his place of residence and hence outside of the parish. The ties binding him to his relations (if such ties still mean anything at all to him) also transfer his life out of the parish, since a man's kindred too are scattered in these days of shifting populations. We may regard these conditions as unavoidable, regrettable, requiring to be reformed or in any other way you like; the fact remains that the pastoral ministry cannot directly change this state of affairs (based on social transformations) to any considerable degree by its own proper means. It must, therefore, reckon with this general state of affairs as an established fact (for an unforeseeable length of time), just as life in the parish in bygone days did not create (though it did strengthen) the territorial community and its solidarity, but presupposed and accepted [298] it as the obvious norm for pastoral

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

organization. This means, consequently, that the possibility of getting a hold of the whole man by pastoral means, basing one's efforts merely on the parochial principle, i.e. on the principle proceeding from the place where man lives, has diminished considerably as compared with what was the case in times past. If the pastoral ministry is to meet man on all levels of his actual life, and if to a large extent man does not actually live any longer in the community corresponding to the parish, then pastoral care must not limit itself obstinately to meeting him on the level of the parish alone. If school-children, for example, live more in the school and in youth groups created by these surroundings than in the district of the town where they happen to live at any particular moment (until their parents 'move' once more), and if our pastoral work must in its own interests meet them on their own ground, where they actually feel 'at home', how can the parochial youth group, i.e. the youth of their 'district', be the only and decisive meeting point between Church and school-child? If the teacher's nearest neighbour is not actually the milkman or dressmaker living next door, but his or her professional colleague with whom he shares his economic endeavours, his level of education, general interests, etc., how can the pastoral ministry refuse to create a 'personal parish' in a certain (non-canonical) sense for such people and refuse to christianize the spiritual sphere in which these people actually live? If young craftsmen, apprentices, form economically and intellectually a specific type of man, who inevitably also expresses and asserts himself in associations (if not in a religious then at least in a profane sense), can pastoral care renounce the formation of apprentice-associations, merely because these are contrary to the 'parochial principle' or because it must then answer the question as to how the Christian 'congregations' thus springing up may be coordinated in a vital union with the parochial congregation (which is most desirable) – simply because it is easier 'without all this'? If an intellectual, even I one who is very much a man of the people and who does not wish to cut himself off in a separate caste, nevertheless has his own intellectual and social needs which only come into their own if he and his colleagues are allowed to be 'among themselves' sometimes (not because they cut themselves off and exclude others, but because the 'others' exclude 'themselves' for want of corresponding interests), and if these associations are 'supra-parochial' (if only for numerical reasons), are we to say that even religiously-guided circles for such men (in any form [299] whatsoever) are forbidden simply because this would offend against the parochial principle? There may be still other needs of association according to profession, social position, age, sex, etc. (Other examples, apart from the ones already given, might be associations for priests, soldiers, students, young workers, etc.) Since these cannot be condemned together with their non-conformist, exclusive, singular and small-minded abuses, but must be judged by their natural and rightful purpose, viz. to create human and spiritual homes for the men of today who can no longer find such a home merely among their local neighbours and relations, any truly up-to-date form of pastoral activity which is trying to reach and christianize the whole man under as many aspects as possible, cannot base itself simply and solely on the parochial principle. By thus contesting the exclusive validity of the parochial principle, we do not mean to deny that it is imperative for such an 'association-minded ministry' (in the widest sense of the word) not to forget that the right structure of its activities must come from what is essential to Christianity – from the 'altar' (and that there is a real danger of forgetting this which certainly has not always been avoided in past decades). For, on the one hand, we do not deny the justification of the parochial principle nor, on the other hand, is it impossible for an 'association-minded ministry' to observe this imperative even within its own form of activity.

The conditions of social structure in which modern man lives forbid any exclusive application of the parochial principle. The latter is not the only valid principle for the organization of pastoral activities. This does not – for the reasons indicated – apply only

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

where there is an almost compelling movement today towards some form of organized extra-parochial associations as an indispensable basis for the care of souls, but even where otherwise strongly differentiated groups of people (though not strictly organized) may be given sufficient pastoral care only on a supra-parochial level. We are thinking, for example, of the specific public catered for by our works of religious formation, or of converts in large towns.

Finally, there is a further factor which must be taken into consideration in this connection. Our city-parishes are very often so large that there cannot possibly be any sense of neighbourly 'togetherness' among all the members of a parish to the required and desirable extent; yet this is the natural basis for any parochial ministry. Among [300] ten-thousand people there is no neighbourliness in the way in which a parish of the old type could presuppose it. In such large parishes there may, of course, be a certain circle of people (the 'faithful' parishioners) whose whole Christian life is centred in the life of their parish with the kind of Christian 'togetherness' which is the ideal sought by the parochial principle. In this way even a large modern parish may give the impression of having a 'flourishing' parish life. Yet this impression is secured at the cost of the many others who remain strangers. Should not our pastoral ministry 'get hold' of them too?

The care of souls as practised in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries (in Germany) has, of course, recognized this added need for an extra-parochial ministry and has taken pains, with greater or lesser success, to fulfil it. Yet for the last fifteen years the more vigorous emphasis laid on the parochial principle has given cause for pointing out expressly the continued existence, as far as the object of pastoral activity is concerned, of the sociological presuppositions which have led during the last hundred years to an ever more wide-spread ministry conducted also extra- and supra-parochially; indeed, these presuppositions have if anything become even stronger today. So it would be high-flown romanticism (even when it can apparently appeal to 'dogmatic' reasons) and typically German pedantry, or a leaning towards false ecclesiastical State Socialism, if we were to throw the experience and methods acquired by the extra-parochial ministry during the last hundred years completely overboard, in the name of the parochial principle, and regard them as something utterly out of date for modern pastoral work. We do not in any way mean to deny by this the fruitfulness and necessity of the renewed pastoral-theological appreciation of the significance of the strictly parochial pastoral ministry, extending from the 'Grossstadtseelsorge' (1911) of the Viennese Heinrich Swoboda to the 'Aedificatio corporis Christi' (1937) of Konstantin Noppel, S.J. Nor must it be asserted that every 'organizational development' which has ever existed has a right to existence today. Nevertheless, the fact that during the last years of National Socialism pastoral care was to a very large extent reduced to a purely parochial ministry, does not prove that we may still make a present-day virtue out of the necessity of that period of persecution, in times which now permit once more of a freer and more comprehensive development of the Christian missionary mandate.

The conclusion that the parochial principle (or more exactly: the [301] 'parish-priest principle') cannot be the only legitimate one for present-day pastoral activity follows also from a second point of view, viz. that of the pastor himself. The more departmentalized man is nowadays as the object of pastoral care, the more difficult and multiform the pastoral ministry must be, if we do not intend to subscribe to the pious and merely comfortable illusion that the care of souls is required to concern itself only with the 'universal human element' in all these differentiated people and yet can christianize them sufficiently and in all the different spheres of their lives. If, however, there ought to be special ministries concerned with priests, artists, students, converts, etc., and if such a pastoral ministry exercised on highly-differentiated groups of people presupposes a great deal of specialized experience and knowledge about the occupations, living conditions, spiritual origins, etc. of these people,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

then there surely cannot be anything sinister in supposing that not every priest is called to and capable of such a ministry merely by the fact of his belonging to the parochial clergy of a particular parish. In short, there is surely nothing sinister about suspecting that in such cases the parish-priest principle is insufficient (quite apart from the fact that in practice these different ministries cannot be carried out within the confines of a single parish and hence the parish principle cannot be applied even for merely technical reasons). It is no disgrace, and no reflection on their own human, scientific and moral-ascetic qualities, if the parochial clergy draw the logical conclusion from the fact that it is impossible for the parish priest and his curate (in every parish) to be qualified (humanly, scientifically and pastorally) for all these necessary specialized forms of the care of souls. Non omnia possumus omnes. A capable doctor – to draw a parallel – does not feel ashamed, but feels it to be his duty as a doctor in certain cases, to send a patient to a specialist or to a hospital. A sober and objective estimate of the capacities of the parish clergy, on the one hand, and of the demands of youth on the other, will make us realize that we cannot even expect to find the youth-chaplain in every single parish who will – humanly and pastorally – be equal to the demands of present-day youth-work and will have the time for it. If in this case a better pastoral care of youth can be achieved extra-parochially (e.g. by supra-parochial youth-groups organized in conjunction with the schools, or in 'federations'), then the parochial principle must not be allowed to stand in the way, nor must such a settlement of the matter be regarded as a 'sign of the poverty' of parochial care of souls. Such a [302] scheme would be nothing more than the recognition of the limitations of any man, even of the pastor, in the matter of the salvation of souls, a limitation which, after all, applies equally, in other spheres, to those to whom the clergy of a parish surrender the pastoral ministry of certain groups of men. Moreover, such an arrangement does not deprive the parish priest of his right and duty to see to it that the task of educating the youth of his parish, imposed on him as the representative of the Church, (which has the autonomous right to educate), is actually carried out to the full in these circumstances (even though partially by others).

Although we must for the reasons given dispute the exclusive validity of the parochial principle, even considered from the viewpoint of the pastor, we do not deny by the same token that often (though certainly not always) the parish principle may still be observed even when we have to diverge from the parish-priest principle. For instance, a men's society directed by a Regular may have its 'parochial groups', or a group of a youth federation equally directed from 'outside' may be recruited from young people of the same parish. In many cases, certainly, even the parish principle will not be applicable, if only because the number of extra-parochial pastoral 'specialists' is so small; in other words, the special groups under the care of these 'specialists' will in such cases require to be organized also supra-parochially, even when the number of members belonging to the same parish would otherwise be sufficient for the formation of a parish group. In these instances the impracticability of the parish-priest principle also requires us to abandon the parish principle.

There is yet a third point of view from which the exclusive validity of the parochial principle may be contested. As we have explained in a previous essay,[15] the individual has his own independent rights in the Church, i.e. (applying the matter to our present question) the individual must in principle be left enough scope in the Church to be able to express his individuality. This applies also to his freedom to form associations even when these arise, as in this case, 'from below', by the free initiative of the Christian individual himself.[16] The [15] 'Der Einzelne in der Kirche', Stimmen der Zeit CXXXIX (1947) pp. 260-276.

[16] We do not need to make a detailed examination here of the many possible motives for the actual formation of such associations. In cases applicable to our question, these motives will usually arise in some form or other from the already suggested need of a 'spiritual' home characteristic of the differentiated man of today. This need is nowadays no longer satisfied simply by the person's residential neighbourhood.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation authoritative [303] ecclesiastical government (i.e. the bishop and the Pope) has the right and the duty to decide whether in the actual individual case such a 'free group' (as we are going to call it) corresponds in its concrete characteristics to the basic norms of Christian Faith and Morals. This authority has the right and duty of deciding whether a 'free-group' is in this particular instance a necessary or desirable realization of the Christian individual's right, or at least one which may be tolerated, and whether in the concrete case the Church wishes to use such a 'free-group' as an instrument of her care of souls (e.g. by giving the group a 'spiritual leader', 'spiritual director', 'president', etc. who then owes his right and duty not only to the group but also to the Church). Thus, 'permission' or 'refusal of permission' for such a free-group does indeed lie with the Church authorities in individual cases, but it is not an act left simply to the good pleasure of this authority. For it too finds its objective norm in the basic right of the individual Christian to form such groups; it is rather an act binding on the conscience of ecclesiastical authority by objective norms, even though the actual observance of these norms is not in its turn subject to the judgement of the individual believer. Before the conscience of ecclesiastical authority, the right of the individual to free association is first of all in possessione; moral justification for 'non-permission' of such an association in a concrete individual instance must, therefore, be proved and not presupposed. As Pius XII himself emphasized in an address to the College of Cardinals (20th February 1946),[17] the principle of subsidiary functions is valid even in the Church, without prejudice to her hierarchical structure; but this means that fundamentally the free formation of associations from below may be prevented and replaced by organization from above only when there are compelling reasons. Hence, Christians have fundamentally the right to form such associations arising from their own initiative, because there is an inalienable right of the individual in the Church; such a basic right of free formation of groups must actually be capable of being realized, and its realization cannot always be limited of its nature by the framework of one [304] and the same parish. A group of young Catholic Christians, formed by its members on their own initiative, a Catholic students' Union, a 'Christian Section', a 'local academic group' not established by ecclesiastical authority, a Catholic Sisterhood which is not necessarily an ecclesiastical association, even the first seed-bud of an 'ecclesiastical Religious Order (when religious enthusiasm brought like-minded Catholics together) – all of these are free-groups which, even though they may not be (or are not yet or not necessarily) fidelium associationes in the canonical sense of CIC lib. II, tit. 18-19, have basically nothing 'unecclesiastical' about them and do not require to owe their origin to any official initiative on the part of the Church. This is all the less necessary since even Canon Law (CIC can. 684) recognizes associationes of the faithful which are not 'erected' by the Church. The Church, therefore, recognizes the right of the faithful themselves to form such societies; of course, even in these cases the Church reserves the right to approve or disapprove of them and of keeping a legitima vigilantia over them.[18] Moreover, it is self-evident that such a formation of groups cannot claim to be an 'ecclesiastical association' in the proper sense without approbation by the Church,[19]which again does not mean in the least that a free-group which is not an 'ecclesiastical association' must by this fact alone be 'unecclesiastical'. Such 'free-groups' of Catholic Christians will not in practice pursue exclusively or primarily religious ends in the strictest sense (we are thinking here, e.g. of a Students' Union, a youth group, etc.). Nevertheless, if they pursue a relatively comprehensive goal and have of their very nature a greater formative and educative influence on their members, they can provide a very suitable basis for the pastoral work of the Church. Thus since, on the one hand, the formation

[17] AAS XXXVIII (1946), pp. 144 sq.
[18] CIC can. 684; cf. also can. 336 § 2 can. 469.
[19] CIC can. 686 §1: in Ecclesia . . . associatio.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of such 'free-groups' independent of the parochial territory is fundamentally an inalienable right of the individual believer (which cannot be choked off merely by an appeal to the parochial principle), and if, on the other hand, since sufficient scope must basically be allowed to them, such groups do actually come into being and as a result offer an important opportunity to the Church for influencing their members by her pastoral activity, then the parochial principle is not justified in preventing the Church from making the best use of these pastoral opportunities. In other words, the Church [305] must be allowed to fulfil her pastoral office in the soil of such 'free-groups', by providing them with spiritual guides, particularly since the bishop, precisely speaking, has no power whatsoever by current Canon Law to impose a duty binding in conscience on the believer of participating in an association established authoritatively by the Church herself (and, let us say, erected in a parish). Even the suppression of 'free-groups' would not guarantee the growth of the official Church societies. If, for instance, youth groups or 'federations' of Catholic youth have a basic right to originate in a 'movement' coming from their own free initiative – a right which the Church is a-priori and fundamentally in no position to annul (she has after all until now not even absolutely forbidden her young members to take part in inter-denominational youth organizations) – and if such groups actually offer an excellent opportunity for the Church's pastoral work (desired by themselves), should or may the Church, by refusing to give them the requested spiritual guides, leave this pastoral possibility unexploited merely because such a 'free-group', or such groups of a federation, 'offend' against the parochial principle?

Such an attitude could only with difficulty avoid the suspicion of being an ecclesiastical 'State Socialism', which recognizes only an ecclesiastical 'State youth movement'. It would not in the long run prevent such free-groups from springing up, but merely cause them to become indifferent religiously or cause their members to leave in order to join inter-denominational federations. The Church has certainly the right, as the divinely authorized educator of youth, to create those institutions by which she believes herself to be best able to fulfil her own task of education. She certainly has the fundamental right to make these institutions (whatever they may be) obligatory for her young faithful. But, if the right of individuals to unite freely in groups is not annulled by this right of the Church, and yet must also not be placed in the dilemma of having either to renounce its own actualization altogether in the face of institutions created from above (such as parochial youth groups) or to actualize itself merely in the formation of a religiously or even denominationally indifferent group (such as in a club without any connection with the Church whatsoever), then the only practical conclusion to be drawn from this will be that the Church ought to use the free-group itself as an instrument of her formative activity by appointing her spiritual assistants to guide it. The Church can, of course, make it a condition for such a spiritually-guided [306] free-group that it become suitably incorporated, without losing its own characteristics as a 'movement', into wider ecclesiastical institutions (e.g. into 'Catholic Action') and that the free-group for its part see to it that its members associate themselves with the pastoral youth work taking place directly within the framework of their parish (corporate Mass and Communion for the youth of the parish, etc.). It follows from what has been said that the parochial principle is neither in a position today nor basically entitled to set itself up as the sole organizational principle of the care of souls.

Looking back over the reasons against the exclusive validity of the parochial principle, the conclusions so far reached may be easily formulated. The parochial principle, in its fundamental reasoning, is the 'territorial principle', since the objectively decisive reason for it lies in the fact that man becomes the object of the care of souls in a suitable, and indeed unavoidable, manner precisely in so far as he has a 'home' (Heimat), a 'place-where-he-is-quartered' (Stand-ort). The reasons which militate against the exclusive validity of the parochial principle, both on the part of the object and on the part of the minister of the care of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

souls, are all based on the fact that man has his 'station' (Stand) in life (taking the word here in its widest sense as referring to the differences in occupation, intellectual differences, differences in sex, age, culture), which owing to present-day sociological conditions no longer corresponds completely in practice with the narrow confines of the immediate locality where he lives. Now, in so far as man's social differences in this widest sense furnish a basis for the possibility and duty of an extra-parochial care of souls exercised in view of these differences, we may speak of the application of a 'social-differential principle' (Standesprinzip) to the care of souls. Our third reason against the exclusive validity of the parochial principle for the pastoral ministry was based on the fundamental right of the individual in the Church to form 'free-groups'. In so far as such extra-parochial 'free-groups' give grounds for the possibility and (in certain circumstances) duty of an extra-parochial pastoral care, we may speak of a 'free-group principle'. And so we may formulate the results of our inquiry so far by stating that the parochial principle is not the only legitimate principle for present-day pastoral practice. Side by side with it, and possessing their own validity, there are the 'social-differential principle' and the 'free-group principle' – even if social differences (in the meaning used here) and free-groups do not take the form of mere expressions [307] of the individual parish. The 'federation principle' implied several times during our discussion of the parochial principle is, in the terminology adopted here, a combination of the social-differential and free-group principles. For a 'federation' (Bund) (prescinding from its supra-diocesan organization) is a 'free-group' whose organizational principle is to be found in the 'social-differential' (i.e. occupational and similar differences). To this extent the 'federation principle' is also justified by our reflections.

In actual fact, the parochial principle has never governed alone in the history of the Church's pastoral ministry. The Apostles themselves had no territory as the limit of their commission and work. Already in the Didache[20] we find mention of 'wandering apostles' engaged in pastoral work, side by side with the local clergy. We have accounts of such migrant ascetic teachers as late as the third century.[21] The ever-growing importance acquired by the monk in the Eastern Church right up to the tenth century as confessor and moral adviser as compared with the secular cleric points to another chapter in such extra-parochial care of souls. The 'guest-master' who, in accordance with the rule of St Basil, gave spiritual direction and counsel to those coming from outside the monastery,[22] was also engaged in extra-parochial pastoral work. The ancient institution of 'visitors' (περιοδευται/)[23] points in the direction of an 'extraordinary' care of souls in country districts, practised by 'wandering physicians of the soul' in the name of the bishop of the town. Wherever we find the influence of monks on their surroundings in the early Church (and their influence was indescribably great), there we see also an 'extraordinary' pastoral care at work. The missionary migration of Irish-Scottish monks in the seventh and eighth centuries all over the Continent was equally an 'extraordinary' form of the care of souls, since it took place mostly in established Christian lands. Already towards the end of the eleventh century, we hear of a slight controversy concerning the right of extra-parochial pastoral care, an altercatio monachi et clerici, quod liceat monacho praedicare according to [308] the title of one of the writings of Rupert of Deutz.[24] Similar treatises were written by Idung of St Emeran[25] and Honorius Augusto-dunensis.[26] We might also just mention in this connection the controversy in the [20] Chpts. 11 and 13.

[21] Ps.-Clemens, Epist. I, 10 sq.; Ep. II, 1-6 (Funk II, Tübingen 1901, 8 sqq., 15 sq.).
[22] Reg. brev. tract. C-CI; reg. fus. tract. XXXIII, 2 (PG XXXII, 1152 B sq.; PG XXXI, 997 sqq.).
[23] First Synod of Laodicea, can 57 (Mansi II, 574).
[24] PL CLXX, 537-542; cf. also PL CLXX, 541-544; 609-664; 663-668.
[25] Pez, Thesaurus anecdotorum novissimus II, 2, pp. 507 sq.
[26] Text in: I. A. Endres, Honorius Aug. (Kempten 1906), pp. 147 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation twelfth century between monks and Canons Regular, since it also touches on the justification of the monks' apostolate.[27] As early as 1096, a Synod at Nimes[28] had defended the right of the monastic apostolate, in the presence of Urban II. From the thirteenth century onwards, the pastoral ministry in medieval towns is no longer even conceivable without the extra-parochial apostolate exercised by the Mendicant Orders. In the middle of the thirteenth century, the Church experiences the first really important controversy about the 'parochial principle', in the fight between the Mendicant Orders (on the one hand) and William of Saint-Amour and his followers (on the other). This controversy ended theologically and canonically in favour of a less absolute parochial principle.[29] Of course, this does not I mean that the defenders of the parochial principle did not also have very good reasons on their side; and, above all, there has undeniably been a reverse movement since the thirteenth century with regard to the subordination of the pastoral ministry of the Orders to the bishops as against the privileges of the Mendicant Orders. Arguments like those put forward by Thomas of York,[30] Bonaventure,[31] or Thomas Aquinas[32] in favour of the extra-parochial care of souls exercised by the Mendicants are still worth reading, and not a few of the arguments with which they had to deal in favour of the parochial principle sound surprisingly modern (as e.g. when they speak of the nuptial relationship of the parish priest to his church in which no one else may interfere, [309] or when the parochial right is said to be analogous to the exclusive right of the bishop with regard to the care of souls). This mid-thirteenth-century controversy about the right of existence of the extraordinary pastoral ministry had its sequel in the doctrine of John of Pouilly, condemned by John XXII in 1321.[33] The significance, extent and influence of the extra-parochial pastoral ministry exercised mainly by the regular clergy (though not exclusively so; cf. e.g. the Oratories of St Philip Neri), has fluctuated slightly even in subsequent history. But basically and in practice the right and possibility of the extra-parochial care of souls has remained essentially uncontroverted since the thirteenth century. Even the Council of Trent does not represent an essential deviation in this matter, although it ordered the absolute division of dioceses into parishes.[34] If anything, it is the pastoral theology of Jansenism and the struggle against it which show signs of a revival of the former controversy about the parochial principle. The 'parochialism' of Jansenism[35] and its doctrine of the incompatibility of the Religious life with pastoral activity[36] signify objectively a dogmatic and pastoral absolutist view of the parochial principle, which has its echoes also in the polemic of the Enlightenment against the Religious life. We cannot, of course, go into details here regarding the whole history, which to a large extent is still unwritten, of the fluctuations in the relationship between the parochial principle and the principle of the 'extraordinary' care of souls. It would be a history which would reflect a great part of the history of the spirit, economics and Canon Law of the Western world. We would have to speak about many matters in the course of it: about the history of conventual exemptions, about the slow transformation and abandonment of the law imposing a duty of attending the [27] Cf. e.g. Anselm of Havelberg (PL CLXXXVIII, 119-140); Arno of Reichersberg (PL CXCIV, 1493-1528).

[28] Mansi XX, 934 sq.
[29] The official Church documents on this controversy can be found e.g. in Cavallera, Thesaurus doctrinae catholicae, no. 414 sq. (Denz 458 sq.).
[30] 'Manus, quae contra Omnipotentem tenditur' cap. 13-18: Bierbaum, Bettelorden und Weltgeistlickkeit an der Universität Paris (Münster 1920), pp. 134-167.
[31] 'Quare Fratres Minores praedicent et confessiones audiant', Opusc. XIV, Quar. tom. VIII, pp. 375 sqq.
[32] 'Contra impugnantes Dei cultum et religionem' cap. 4, cap. 10, 12 (Opusc, I, edit. Parm. XV, pp. 13-23; 52 sq.; 54-56).
[33] Cf. Denz 491-493.
[34] 24th Session (11th November 1563), de reformatione XIII.
[35] Denz 1510 sq.
[36] Denz 1580 sqq.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

parochial Mass on Sundays or the duty of confessing to one's own parish priest (at least at Eastertide). We would have to speak of the history of the right to preach possessed by non-parochial pastoral ministers, of the Third Order sodalities of the Mendicant Orders, of the 'Compagnies de Predication' in the France of Philip II Augustus (†1223), of the controversy between secular and regular clergy in the Middle Ages regarding burial rights. We would have to deal with the history of private Oratories and non-parochial churches, and to speak of the [310] efforts to incorporate churches into monasteries, of the history of the pastoral ministry of pilgrimages, of the development of confraternities and Marian congregations, of the history of parish Missions, of the medieval guilds as spheres of extra-parochial pastoral activity among people of different social stations, of the development of Catholic life in associations during the nineteenth century, and of many other matters. At any rate, such a survey of the pastoral ministry would show that the parochial principle was never exclusively in force in the Church and that the Church, on the contrary, protects the many facets of life even in the pastoral sphere, by her healthy instinct for life which defend itself against every form of pedantry.

It has already been shown in part, in connection with our treatment of the parochial principle, that other pastoral principles too are known and recognized as valid by current Canon Law, which alone, in the final analysis, can create really valid principles for the care of souls beyond mere considerations of their suitability (viz. laws which are more than, and more exact than, the merely natural law and the general norms of the Church's mission determined by divine institution). The same follows also, on the other hand, from what still remains to be said about the pastoral apostolate carried out by members of Religious Orders in accordance with Canon Law.

Since a large part of the extra-parochial pastoral ministry is carried out by Religious, it will be well to say a few words about the Orders-apostolate to conclude this Section. It is an undoubted fact that the final purpose of the life of an Order is absolutely compatible with the care of souls in general. St John Chrysostom and Pope Siricius already tried to attract monks to the priestly apostolate. Men like Eusebius a Vercelli, Paulinus of Nola, Martin of Tours and Augustine already tried to shape the life of the clergy after a monastic pattern. The ancient institution of episcopal monasteries, the establishment of the Clerks Regular, the almost untold number of Orders and Congregations founded since the twelfth century which count the pastoral apostolate as part of the express and ecclesiastically approved purpose of their Order, the clarification of this question by the great medieval theologians, and the already mentioned decisions by the Church's magisterium,[37] make the compatibility of life in an Order with pastoral activity a theologically indisputable truth. Nevertheless, it [311] may not be utterly useless today to call this truth expressly to mind. The pastoral ministry as exercised by Religious even in hierarchically organized countries does not of itself necessarily mean (either conceptually or objectively) an extra-parochial ministry. For such a care of souls can basically be exercised within the framework of a parish. In other words, the pastoral ministry exercised by Religious can basically be in keeping with the 'parish principle', either because the Orders take over parishes of their own (as happens frequently and is also provided for in current Canon Law)[38] or because they perform other pastoral duties in parishes at the invitation of the parish priest[39] (as is in fact true of the greater part of their pastoral ministry), so that even these activities of 'extraordinary' care of souls in a wider sense do not overstep the parish principle. Yet actually the pastoral activity of the Orders does very often pass beyond the boundaries of the parochial principle. And if anything, it is [37] Denz 458 sq.; 1580 sqq.; 491 sqq.

[38] Cf. especially CIC can. 456; 630 sq.
[39] Cf. e.g. CIC can. 608 § 2 together with 1334; 1341 § 1.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

this alone which can be regarded as a serious question. What is to be said about this? First of all, we must emphasize that the extra-parochial pastoral ministry exercised by Religious is in no way a violation of the hierarchic principle of all care of souls, i.e. of the principle that every pastoral ministry must be carried out as a result of a mission and mandate given by the Pope and the bishops, and as their instrument. The great medieval theologians already referred to the fact that the Pope and the bishops have an original and inalienable right and corresponding duty to minister to the faithful, and that they do not lose the right of ministering directly to all the faithful (i.e. to the whole Church or the whole diocese respectively) by charging parish priests with the maintenance of their rights and the fulfilment of their duties, in a measure and to an extent left to their own discretion (determined by the purpose of the measure and not by any 'parochial rights' existing before their ruling). These theologians already concluded quite rightly from this that when the Pope or a bishop entrusts Religious with the exercise of this ministry (originally devolving on the Church's Hierarchy) even without parochial-territorial limitations, this care of souls is a function of the Hierarchy, and hence of the organism of the Mystical Body founded by our Lord himself, in exactly the same way as is the territorial parochial office. Since the Roman Pontiff has [312] universal and immediate jurisdiction over all the faithful (even the individual),[40] he can or could also transfer such pastoral functions to Religious without using the bishop as an 'intermediary'. Even in this case it could not be said that the hierarchical principle of the care of souls has in any way been violated (although, of course, such a measure which is in keeping with the existing Canon Law, is in fact only rarely taken, apart from marginal cases which in the main concern the internal life of the exempt Orders of Clerics). Now if secondly, the full accomplishment of the pastoral task did and does in fact also demand extra-parochial care of souls, then the Pope and the bishops are absolutely justified in calling also on Religious to help in this task. The reason for this is not that members of Orders desire to be pastorally 'employed' in accordance with the Rule of their Order and cannot in practice find such employment in the parochial ministry alone. Just the reverse is true; because the care of souls must, for reasons arising out of its objective needs, be carried out partially in an extra-parochial manner, this extra-parochial ministry may also in such a case – and in the measure of its needs – be carried out by Religious, if they are called to this by the Hierarchy. It also follows from this, however, that Religious should not include those works within the sphere of their supra-parochial, 'extraordinary' pastoral ministry which can be performed within the parish ministry, i.e. anything which does not of its very nature require to be done supra-parochially or can be done in the parish without loss of any really special benefit. If and when they are not in a position to engage in objectively supra-parochial pastoral work (either because of a lack of such work or because of a shortage of suitable men who could do it), then they should, to the extent to which they dispose of men free to do pastoral work, either do real 'supplies' in secular parishes by arrangement with the parish priest, or (in the spirit of their Order) take over humble and 'stony' parishes or found new ones. If, for example, a non-parochial Orders-church is simply an exact copy of the parochial church in whose territory it is situated, i.e. if it does not exercise a really specialized pastoral function which cannot be performed by a parochial church, then let it quietly 'shut up shop' or become a parish church in its own right in cities where parishes are too large.

It is to be expected that much could still be done in this direction to [313] make better use of those among the Religious who are able to do pastoral work, and to remove in this way much unnecessary friction between the pastoral ministry exercised by Orders and that exercised in the parish. Since there must, however, be a supra-parochial ministry in the nature

[40] Denz 1827.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation of things and since it can be exercised by Religious, the existing Canon Law (thirdly) also envisages, sanctions and protects an extra-parochial ministry carried out by Religious. Thus Canon Law commands bishops not to refuse Religious the faculty to preach or confessional jurisdiction without grave reasons.[41] The bishop is not allowed to interfere in the internal discipline and spiritual direction of an ecclesiastical association of lay people erected by apostolic privilege in conjunction with the church of an Order.[42] The ecclesiastical law governing associations[43] recognizes and sanctions ecclesiastical lay-associations (Third Orders, Confraternities, etc.) which very often have a supra-parochial organization and are often (in keeping with their characteristics) directed by Religious. The bishop may for a grave reason withdraw Religious Houses and Pious Institutes from the care of the parish priest, even though they be situated within the boundaries of his parish and are not exempt de iure from his authority.[44] The bishop can thus create as it were a 'personal parish', a congregation without any proper territory, whose pastoral care is therefore also extra-parochial. Canon Law[45] envisages that the bishop may also require the help of Religious, when necessary, for giving Catechetical instructions, especially in their own churches. It positively desires that there should be sermons at Sunday Masses even in non-parochial churches (even those of Religious).[46] If a bishop permits the erection of a Clerical Religious House in his diocese, he must also inevitably grant to it the right to a church or public oratory in which religious services (including Sunday Mass) may be held for the laity, according to the rules governing 'churches' and 'public oratories'.[47] Thus, wherever there exists a properly-erected house of a Clerical Religious Order, even the bishop cannot forbid a certain measure of extra-parochial ministry by these Religious, especially[48] since the permission for the erection of a Religious House includes also (unless something else was explicitly agreed upon at the time) the faculty for the Religious [314] to exercise the activities proper to their Order, and thus in certain cases also to exercise pastoral care beyond the boundaries of their own church. Although the foregoing provides us with only general, skeleton-directions which by themselves do not give a full guarantee of the objective justification of extra-parochial pastoral work by Religious in any individual case (even of such pastoral work as remains within these limits), these canonical regulations do nevertheless show clearly that current Canon Law does regard even extra-parochial pastoral care as something basically justified and desirable. Since these regulations were not after all drawn up expressly 'in favour' of Religious, in order to give them 'work' or 'rights' and privileges, but for the sake of pastoral work in general, these canons show that evidently the same considerations lie behind these norms of present-day Canon Law as we have adduced above on the limits of the parochial principle from the point of view of the object of the care of souls. The 'existence' of principles even of extra-parochial care of souls is therefore as much warranted by Canon Law as the 'existence' of the parochial principle which is also merely established by the fixed law of the Church.

III

In conclusion, we would like to make a few reflections, based on our theoretical

[41] CIC can. 1339 § I; can. 874 § 2
[42] CIC can. 690 § 2.
[43] CIC can. 684-725.
[44] CIC can. 464 § 2.
[45] CIC can. 1334.
[46] CIC can. 1345; cf. also can. 483, I^0.
[47] CIC can. 497 § 2.
[48] CIC loc. cit.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

considerations, which may perhaps be of some little use in pastoral practice. There can, of course, be no question here of defining concrete boundaries and lines of demarcation of competence between parochial and extra-parochial ministries. Such an undertaking would require a more exact examination of pastoral work according to task, available man-power, and specific situations, which is a matter for the appropriate diocesan authorities. Yet a few matters pertaining to the intermediate sphere between extremely general theories and extremely particular practice may perhaps still be added to the practical insights we have already discovered here and there.

If besides the parochial principle (both qua parish- and parish-priest principle), other organizational principles of pastoral care also have validity de iure and de facto (i.e. at least the 'social-differential' and the 'free-group' principle), and if there are to be settled and comprehensive (which does not mean, primitive and narrow-minded) conditions, then this requires on all sides a good and selfless will to live in harmony and to work together. Although we may not simply turn the parochial [315] principle into an absolute norm in order to create a clear situation even without good will on all sides, the advocates of the parochial principle must be able to find among the representatives of supra-parochial associations and alliances (based on different social stations) understanding of their insistence on the importance of a living parochial pastoral care and on the importance of parish life, since the parish cannot be merely a subsequent blanket-organization of groups and associations or federations in which these other organizations are not really interested. Conversely, the advocates of the 'social-differential' and 'free-group' principle must be able to feel that parish priests do not have a clerical craving for power but are possessed of that attitude which enabled St Paul for his part to solve a similar quarrel about relative competencies : dum omni modo . . . Christus annuntietur.[49] Whenever several principles are entitled to demand their rights, a ready attitude of understanding and of love will always be the deciding factor. Without it, even the reduction of the theory to one, unique principle will fail to succeed in practice; with it, even the difficult task of allowing several principles their rightful place within the same sphere is really quite simple when all is said and done. Selfless, unassuming love is most practical; it teaches us to recognize the justification of several principles and reduces them in practice to its own common denominator. Norms, no matter how clearly and subtly reasoned out in a legal sense, can never replace a right moral attitude on the part of those who must put them into practice. Frictions arising from the lack of such an attitude can never be avoided by guiding principles and fixed spheres of action, no matter how exactly thought out they may be. Whenever such frictions arise, we must first of all call for an examination of consciences and not for an examination by the jurists.

If we have given support in the preceding pages to the necessity and right of extra-parochial care of souls, this does not mean that we are in favour of a wild, excessive creation of extra- and supra-parochial groups, federations and associations. It does not mean that in this respect the situation as it was before 1933 has canonical validity for all time, that everything should remain as it was in 1933. There will be no harm done if many phenomena which existed at that time remain buried, for they were manifestations of singular German tastes and [316] exclusive interest in local club life rather than of genuine pastoral needs and genuine 'freedom of the spirit'. Whenever something old or necessary which has proved itself, or something new which is useful, revives again, it must have the will to real cooperation with the parochial ministry. Let those appeal to the 'social-differential' and 'free-group' principles who have the greatest love for the altar of their own parish and who prove their Christian liberty by being prepared to serve and love the whole which does, after all, find its first and clearest expression in the parish, in the 'Church'. Whenever the right attitude [49] Phil 1.12-20.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

is present on all sides, this cooperation with the parochial pastoral care can be achieved, even though it will often not be easy to formulate it in legal arrangements and norms in a manner which will satisfy everyone. Anyone who has grasped the fact that such arrangements remain lifeless without the proper living spirit, will not be terribly unhappy if he feels that these agreements do not offer to all sides the desired 'guarantee' of such cooperation and settlement.

Whenever several valid 'principles' strive for and demand realization in one and the same set of circumstances, cooperation is impossible without some 'compromise'. In such cases, to come to the sort of understanding we have indicated is not a 'lazy' compromise. Whenever it is ultimately a question of everyone's seeking not the triumph of his own principle but rather the salvation of souls, such a compromise will not create the impression in those concerned that they have made a 'painful sacrifice' in the cause of mutual understanding. Since there can, in the very nature of things, be different solutions to the question of how in practice the many principles are to be reconciled, the final solution is a matter of decision; in other words, it is a task to be left to the authority of the Church. Once this decision has been made, after mature deliberation, in favour of a really workable agreement, then we should not go on debating endlessly but should set to work. For pastoral care does not consist in a debate about principles. It is better to work without 'the ideal solution' (which in this matter can never be found), than to wait idly for principles regarding the care of souls which are still more ideal, just and wiser than those which have in fact been arrived at by an authoritative decision. Seeing the spiritual distress in which man finds himself today, it is high time we stopped fighting about the principles according to which these human beings are to be saved. When someone saves another, he does not require anyone beside him to ensure that he is doing it in accordance with [317] principles. Although there cannot really be a 'best' synthesis of the different pastoral principles deducible a-priori, and one which is valid once and for all, there is nevertheless a very clear criterion in practical life as to whether a possible synthesis has actually succeeded, not only on paper and as a legal arrangement, but in the hearts of the advocates of particular principles. Such a synthesis has been successful only when the parish priest of the parochial principle shows a positive, active interest in the various forms of 'extraordinary' pastoral care, when he tries to bring his parishioners into contact with these forms (federations, Orders, associations, literature, etc.) according to their (not his) needs. It has been successful only when the clerical representatives of extra-parochial care of souls have an active consciousness of their responsibility as regards the life of the parish and when they, on their own initiative and as far as in them lies, stimulate the people under their pastoral care into real service to the life of the parish.

Cooperation and right order does not exclude 'competition'. It is not at all a bad thing if a preacher knows that his listeners can go away to someone else if he preaches badly. If we were to attempt, even on the pastoral plane, to make 'competition' impossible from the very start by legal measures (e.g. by a parochial principle made absolute), this would merely be a sign of weakness and a proof that we seek ourselves and not the salvation of souls. To suspect every variety, every form of competition in the pastoral realm at once as 'chaos', 'disorder' and a 'frittering away' of our forces, would be a sign of the same evil or of very shortsighted pastoral politics. Even if things (i.e. in truth: for the man of the 'competitionless' institution) went more smoothly and with less hindrance for a time without competition, such advantages would have to be paid for in the long run by the slow but sure degeneration of such an institution into self-complacency. Thus the desired cooperation between the parochial and extra-parochial care of souls must not be thought to have succeeded only when the different institutions no longer 'compete' with each other in any way whatsoever. The will for right order and a living will to honest and objective competition are absolutely compatible. Even in the pastoral realm we do not need any 'controlled economy' bureaucratically imposed from

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

above right down to every detail.

Finally, it should be expressly emphasized that we have nowhere in the course of our deliberations defined our attitude to the question of supra-diocesan societies and of the possibility as well as the limits of a [318] central direction of such societies. This is a special question which would have to be considered separately.

The work of St Bonaventure, one of the Doctors of the Church, which we have cited previously, was also really concerned with the ius positivum of the parochial principle. Thus it was concerned with the question of how we must act if charity, in the face of men's needs of salvation in the concrete situation of the times, demand that we do not make the parochial principle the only organizational principle of our pastoral ministry. The final words of his whole investigation contain the kernel of all our reflections and should, therefore, also conclude these considerations: . . . rigor iuris positivi, ubi expedit, servandus est, ubi autem salutem impedit remittendus est . . . Quod enim pro caritate institutum est, non debet contra caritatem militare. Amen. Et sic est finis illius quaestionis.[50]

[50] Quar. VIII, p. 381.

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

[319]

11

NOTES ON THE LAY APOSTOLATE

If we are to attempt to say anything precise about the lay apostolate, we cannot avoid saying something about 1. What is meant by a 'layman', 2. the 'apostolate' in general, 3. the nature of the 'lay apostolate' and 4. the significance of the lay apostolate today.

I. THE LAYMAN

1. The concept of 'layman', in the ecclesiastical sphere, has nothing to do with that of the 'profane' or 'ignorant', of someone who on account of his inexperience is helplessly dependent on the expert, or of the 'unecclesiastical', religiously indifferent, the mere object of hierarchic powers. In this sense there are, or should be, no laymen in the Church. For a layman in the theological sense is one of the λαο&φ of God; in other words, someone eminently sanctified, consecrated, called from a world lost in sin and death into the ε0κκλησι/α of God and of his Christ, into the host of those who have been visibly and tangibly called to salvation by baptism. The notion of 'layman', therefore, does not mark the boundary between the sphere of the profane and the sphere of the sacred and sacral; rather, it refers to someone who has a definite position within the one consecrated realm of the Church.

2. This determined position which constitutes the layman within the sacral sphere of Holy Church, can first of all be described negatively (by contrast with the non-lay in the same Church) and then positively (by description of the inner characteristics of the lay state).

3. Negative description:

a. The layman must first of all be distinguished from those who have proper hierarchical powers in the Church (CIC can. 948). These [320] powers comprise the potestas ordinis and the potestas iurisdictionis. The 'power of orders' consists of those full powers, which of their very essence are primarily of a sacramental nature; they either can only be conferred by the sacrament of Holy Orders (thus the power to absolve, confirm, ordain, consecrate) or at least are in fact only given in a permanent fashion by Ordination (thus the powers of the Diaconate and the lower Orders). The 'power of jurisdiction' is made up of those powers which belong to ruling and concern the authoritative instruction and direction of the rest of the Church's members. Lay status in the Church means, in the strict sense, that one does not have these powers. It must, however, be clearly underlined, in this connection, that there are powers in the Church which do not require to be transmitted exclusively by the sacrament of Holy Orders or cannot even be conferred by it strictly as such. Complete sovereign power (jurisdiction) is not transmitted by the sacrament of Orders but by a non-sacramental, sovereign act of the (highest) Church authority. The full powers of an acolyte, subdeacon, etc. are in fact (often) conferred by Ordination, but they can also be given without such an act (of a sacrament or perhaps merely of a sacramental). We cannot then differentiate a lay person from a cleric, with reference to these powers, by the manner of their transmission but only by the content of what is transmitted (viz. the power). And so a clear and exact theological terminology must state that anyone who is, in any way, rightfully in habitual possession of

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

any part of liturgical or legal power (over and above the basic rights of every baptized member of the Church), is no longer a layman in the proper sense, i.e. no longer belongs to the simple 'people of God'. It is most important for our further reflections to understand this and grasp the reasons for it. An officially commissioned 'lay-catechist', a woman officially employed as 'parochial helper', an official sacristan, etc. are not indeed ordained; yet if these are their principal functions, they are no longer, properly speaking, lay persons. This is apparent even in the sentiment of the early Church. She conferred all these offices by Ordinations; thus the old 'Minor Orders' were not in fact merely transitory 'steps to the priesthood' but conferred a permanent 'minor' office in the Church through which its possessor belonged to the clergy. The same conclusion follows from the very nature of things; the precise powers by which the clergy is distinguished from the laity are of their nature divisible, according as the Church may think fit (as far as jurisdiction and the sacramental [321] powers are concerned). Hence, whenever the Church gives someone – whether with Ordination or without – some part of the power distinguishing clergy from laity, and does so, not merely for an individual occasion, but habitually, and as constituting a calling and office, she makes him a cleric, whether we would apply this term or not. In this strict theological sense, it is absolutely possible for a woman to belong to the 'clergy' even though, according to the will of Christ and already in the practice of the Apostles, the extent of such hierarchic powers conferrable upon her is much more limited than that accorded to men. The fact that in current Canon Law a woman cannot have ordinary jurisdiction in the narrower sense, because in current Canon Law such jurisdiction is an ordinary 'office' reserved to men, does not alter anything about the basic principle which concerns us here. Regarded from the viewpoint of purely divine law alone, it is absolutely conceivable that a woman, e.g. an abbess, should have the permanent right of patronage of a parish, as was the case at the time of the right to 'private churches'. If in fact the 'clergy' is normally composed of men only, it is because (at least in the case of higher offices) the power of ruling and the power conferred by Ordination are meant to exist normally in one and the same person according to Christ's will; now the powers conferred only by Ordination are reserved to men and that already de iure divino. And so we must be extremely careful in the use of theological terminology. Even a simple question, such as the following, will make this clear: Can a layman, who is elected Pope, accepts the election and thus already possesses the absolute plenitude of all jurisdictional power in the Church before he has been ordained and consecrated, still seriously be called a 'layman' in theological terminology, until he has been ordained? A negative answer to this question logically involves saying with us that the lay status ceases whenever there begins, in any measure whatsoever, a total or partial participation in the potestas iurisdictionis or potestas ordinis or both. It is, of course, debatable whether this or that actual, small ecclesiastical office can still be considered as participation in the proper powers of the hierarchy, or whether it merely implies obligations which can no longer be looked upon as such a participation (as e.g. the duty merely of lighting the candles); it remains therefore a debatable point whether the bearer of such an office still belongs to the clergy in the theological sense or not.

b. Secondly, the notion of 'layman' must be distinguished from [322] that of the 'Religious' (and members of 'secular institutes' properly so called, since they also, take the vows of the Evangelical Counsels). We cannot explain here the nature of the Evangelical Counsels and of vows, especially under their truly ecclesiological aspect. We wish simply to state it as a fact here, in pure thesis form and without proofs, that the vows taken in respect of the Evangelical Counsels have of their nature an ecclesiological aspect. This does not indeed mean that these vows give the one who takes them a hierarchical power and a status in the Church based on this power and distinguishing this status from that of the people of the Church as such; but it does mean that the Evangelical Counsels are an expression, visible

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation manifestation and representation in the world of a very definite essential characteristic of the Church, viz. of her world-transcending origin and destination. They must, therefore, be found in the Church, considered as the historical, visible form of the world-transcending and eschatological grace of Christ; they consequently provide the basis in the Church as such, for a proper status, so that the one who has this status is theologically, and not merely canonically (CIC can. 491 § 1: religiosi praecedent laicis), distinguished from the people of the Church in general and hence from lay people.

4. Positive description:

a. From the point of view of the world. Up until now we have merely given a negative description of the layman, i.e. he is not one of those who have hierarchical powers and he does not belong to the Religious. Both of the 'estates' from which he is thus distinguished are 'states', i.e. (relatively) stable, permanent forms of life (even though they are not always irrevocable), which – each in their own way – take their subjects out of the 'world' in virtue of the content of their tasks. Correspondingly, the layman is a Christian who remains in the world, not in the sense of the profane which we have already excluded above, but in the sense that the layman must have a specific task towards the world and in the world which determines his 'status' in the Church and not merely in civil life. Being a layman, seen from this point of view, does not mean being a Christian who does not really have much say in the Church and who is merely a passive object of the pastoral endeavours made by the Church (= the clergy) for his salvation; a layman is not one who for such reasons occupies himself [323] with those worldly-profane matters lacking any religious relevance which would occupy him just the same even if he were not a Christian. Being a layman in the Church (and also to have the qualification of a Church member in this sense) means rather, having one's place in the Church as her member and exercising her functions wherever there is the world (all this referring, of course, to the lay-Christian only in so far as he is distinguished from the clergy and from Religious). For the 'world' is not merely constituted by sinful and rebellious opposition to God, Christ, grace and the Church; the world is also God's creation, a reality which can be redeemed and must be sanctified (i.e. the Kingdom of God); and even in this respect the world is not simply identical with the Church, but rather the Church is the historically tangible and socially constituted instrument used by Christ for the coming of the Kingdom of God through the redemption and sanctification of the world. In this world the layman has his determined place according to his historical situation, his people, family and calling, the individual possibilities furnished by his gifts and capabilities, etc. And he has this, his place-in-the-world, basically *in*dependently of and prior to his Christianity; after all, he is born before he is re-born. This original independence of the layman's place-in-the-world is the element of truth in the notion of the 'lay' considered as the 'profane' which we rejected above as false. The layman is originally in the world in virtue of the pre-Christian (but not 'godless') position of his existence; in this place, and not in any other, is he to be a Christian. This he must be, not just 'in addition', but by christianizing his original pre-Christian situation, which is the very essence of lay-existence, in such a way that precisely where there is the world and not the Church, the Kingdom of God may begin to exist through him as a member of the Church. We will, however, have more to say about this later on. For the moment it is important to realize the fundamental point that the Christian qua layman is distinguished from the non-lay (i.e. the clergy and the Religious) not merely by the fact that he has an original place-in-the-world even for his Christian existence (which is true of every Christian), but that he also retains this place as a Christian and for his Christian existence as such, and does not leave it even in the fulfilment of his existence (at least not by living a new kind of life which takes on the permanent form of a new 'state'). In other words, when we

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

rightly say that 'the Christian layman remains in the world', this does not mean that the layman is a Christian and in addition also [324] a man, a member of a family, the father of a family, a tailor, politician, art enthusiast, etc. Rather it means that his being-in-the-world which preceded his Christian being, remains and is not changed as a 'state' by the fact of his being a Christian; but it is now both the material for his very being as a Christian and the limit of this being, as far as his exterior life and the structure of his state are concerned. As far as his state is concerned, if he goes beyond the limit set by his original situation-in-the-world, he ceases to be a layman. What has just been said provides us also with the right meaning of the expression, frequently used nowadays, the layman's 'mission in the world'. Such expressions must always be understood to refer to a twofold fact: the layman is placed in the world as a member of the Church at a determined point, given prior to his Christian being, and this is positively and negatively the place of his being as a Christian (i.e. it is a calling and the limit of his commission).

b. From the point of view of the Church. The positive determination of the concept of 'layman' (i.e. one which does not distinguish him merely negatively from the clergy and Religious) must not only consider his specific situation-in-the-world when trying to define his Christian being. It must also say what the layman is in the Church, as such, and what he brings with him to his place-in-the-world and what he can realize there as a member of the Church. We can obviously, give here only a very brief indication of this, since it involves, or should involve, almost everything affecting Christian existence.

(i)The layman is someone called by God, in Jesus Christ and through grace, to eternal life. He is the justified and sanctified, the gratuitously adopted son of God He shares in the one grace which in Jesus Christ was promised and communicated to redeemed humanity, to holy Church.

(ii) Within the Church, he cooperates in rendering this grace historically tangible (a visible manifestation which in its totality nothing other than the Church). For the layman has received the sacrament of baptism; he offers the sacrifice of holy Church together with the priest; he is given his Christian mission in the world by sacrament of confirmation which commissions him personally, expressly, and in a sacramentally tangible manner. He takes part in the Church's life in many other ways too, so that as a result, this, his life in holiness with, in and through the Church (its direction, divine service, power of grace, proclamation of the Word, charity, etc.) becomes part [325] of the manifestation of the Church. Thus he shares in making the Church what she always is and must always become more and more, viz. the historically tangible, spatio-temporal presence of the redemptive grace of God in Jesus Christ.

(iii) The life of the Church is more than just the exercise of their functions by the holders of hierarchical offices (instituted once and for all by Christ as her permanent organs) in the authoritative proclamation of the Word, administration of the sacraments, direction and celebration of divine services and government of the ecclesiastical community in all the other forms of its Christian life, on the one hand, and the acceptance of these exercised functions by the people of the Church, on the other. In spite of her permanent proper structure and hierarchical organization, given to her by Christ, the Church must always remain open to that unpredictable initiative taken by her Master through his Spirit and the charisms of this Spirit which cannot be institutionalized. Over and above the static element of official functions there must be, and is, the dynamic element of charisms. We cannot give here a closer definition of their nature and importance for the Church. It must suffice to state that even laymen can be the subject of such charisms; these charisms are not only gratuitous graces and aids granted by God for the private life of their recipients, but are also given to them for the salvation of the Church. A message received from heaven and passed on to the Church, a life giving outstanding example and which has a type-forming power in a determined situation,

CD compiled by the Centre for Culture, Technology and Values, Mary Immaculate College, Limerick, Ireland
Distributed by THE WAY, Campion Hall, Oxford, OX1 1QS. the.way@campion.ox.ac.uk

Licensed for the exclusive use of The Cambridge Theological Federation

the discovery of a new aspect of the Christian Faith and life, a historical decision of universal significance inspired from above, a God-given impulse to perform a certain work in the public life of the Church, etc. – all these are to be understood as charisms inspired by the Holy Spirit. And even lay people can receive such charisms, for the Spirit has not limited himself in the distribution of his gifts by any rule known to man and applicable by man. The poor, children, women, married people can equally well be the recipients of such heavenly impulses and the point of entry of the divine Spirit's permanent influence on God's Church. God has in no way guaranteed that the movement of his Spirit should always and necessarily begin at the summit of the hierarchy. The hierarchy has, on the contrary, a strict duty to discern and further the Spirit wherever he may act; it must not extinguish the Spirit simply because he has not inquired beforehand whether he is everywhere seen to be in conformity with [326] the plans and the opinions 'in high places' on pastoral matters and the affairs of ecclesiastical politics. Ecclesiastical authority has certainly the duty, right and power of discernment of spirits (even though it is not necessarily capable of an infallible decision in every case), but it is not the original and sole owner of this Spirit. Laymen too can be the recipients of charisms which exercise an irreplaceable function in the Church, side by side with her official functions, laws, rules and everything which can be deduced a-priori both dogmatically and rationally. In so far as such charisms (in this narrower sense applicable here) are of their nature free, non-organisable, unpredictable and hence also uncontrollable gifts of God, they also do not give rise to a 'state', unlike the hierarchical offices or the Evangelical Counsels which for all their gratuitous realization are intended to constitute a permanent form of life. Hence even when these charisms are bestowed on a layman, they do not remove him from his situation in the world. He does not cease to be a layman by being the recipient of such charisms. It should just be mentioned in passing that we must not confuse these charisms in themselves with a possible enthusiastic manifestation of such charisms. Even absolutely normal fulfilments of Christian life can be counted as charisms, if by their strength, purity and depth (i.e. as 'moral miracles') they bear the stamp of their divine origin even in their outward appearances. This is true even when their recipient is not a clearly determinable individual but when the Spirit takes hold of many; thus the liturgical movement, for instance, can perhaps be looked upon as a charismatic happening in the theological sense just as much as, let us say, Fatima. In both cases, there will always ultimately be certain side-effects which do not have a particularly spiritual origin.

